DESCRIPTORS

<Social protection>,<Safety net>,<Developing countries>,<WB pub.>

ABSTRACT

This paper highlights the need to expand the definition of social protection to encompass all public interventions that help individuals, households, and communities to manage risk or that provide support to the critically poor. It also recommends that social protection programmes be embedded in an integrated approach to poverty reduction based on a new framework for social risk management.

02.03.1	Social protection for homebased workers in Thailand and the Philippines.

DESCRIPTORS

<Social protection>,<Homeworkers>,<Thailand>,<Philippines>

ABSTRACT

This study will analyze the circumstances of homebased workers in Thailand and the Philippines, and explore how individuals and organizations of informal homebased workers have responded to problems of growing insecurity, risk and vulnerability. A number of social protection schemes - on the community, local and national levels - will be examined to see what appears to be "working", what is apparently not working, and why this is so.

ABSTRACT

This publication collects the key insights and discussion points that took place at the workshop on Local economic development (LED) that was organized in August 2006 at SRO Manila. It is a contribution to the broader debate within the Philippine development community on the opportunities and the limitations that decentralization and local governance offer to promote sustainable and equitable economic and social welfare. It also expected to be an instrument for disseminating good practices, encouraging new thinking and developing new programmes for action.

DESCRIPTORS

<ILO pub.>,<Child labour>,<Children>,<Indigenous peoples>,<Tribal peoples>, <Education>,<Social exclusion>

ABSTRACT

What is known about the challenges of child labour and education among indigenous and tribal peoples? The case of indigenous peoples provides a good example of the need to address the particularities of child labour. For many indigenous peoples, traditional education typically includes learning traditional occupations. History shows that learning traditional occupations in the form of light work has been more educative and the formal education system more disruptive – in social, emotional and economic terms.

ABSTRACT

Indonesia's post-crisis period is over: the country now has enough financial resources to address its development needs. Prudent macroeconomic policies particularly the extremely low budget deficits were instrumental in this recovery. Now is the time to build on the achievements of the past few years and to spend Indonesia's financial resources effectively and efficiently to improve the quality of education, expand healthcare, close critical infrastructure gaps, in order to reduce poverty and build a competitive economy.

03.02.3 Foreign exchange reserves, exchange rate regimes, and monetary policy: issues in Asia.

ABSTRACT

The paper assesses empirically the sustainability and feasibility of the government debt in the Philippines using the No Ponzi Game criterion. The test results show that, up to the end of the present administration in 2010, the Philippine government debt is not sustainable but weakly feasible, that the feasibility is vulnerable to major adverse shocks, and that simple budgetary deficit control policy is inadequate for achieving debt sustainability or strengthening feasibility.

ABSTRACT

The paper takes a fresh look, from a macro perspective, at the issue of aid effectiveness. An important point of this study is that it adopts poverty reduction, as contrasted from economic growth, as the metric for measuring aid effectiveness. The result suggests that aid is effective when it is relatively moderate but becomes ineffective when the size of aid exceeds the critical value defined by the absorptive capacity.

ABSTRACT

The study aims to formulate a methodology for estimating the vulnerability to income poverty of individual households in the Philippines. Results revealed that, in general, regions and provinces with the highest numbers/incidences of poverty were also those with the highest numbers/incidences of vulnerability. Thus, both poverty alleviation and prevention interventions should be intensified in the poorest areas, incidence-wise or magnitude-wise.

ABSTRACT

The manufacturing Regional Model Competency Standard (RMCS) enables the industry to accurately define its workplace requirements. As well as underpinning training and vocational education outcomes these standards provide the benchmark for recognition of competencies gained informally. The fundamental concept of competency in the manufacturing RMCS is that it focuses on what is expected of an employee in the workplace rather than on a learning process or time spent in training or education.

ABSTRACT

The two papers in this volume provide in-depth information on, and analysis of, the policy shifts in Argentina in the wake of the 2001 economic crisis and their impact.

The first paper by Marta Novick and Carlos Tomada, discusses the adaptation of the development model as a whole, and the attempt to integrate economic and social goals in general, and decent work in particular, within a coherent policy framework. The second paper by Mario Damili, Roberto Frenkel and Roxana Maurizio, explores in some depth a crucial dimension of the policy response, concerned with macroeconomic management.

In the Southeast Asian region, there is a clear need to aggressively promote occupational health and safety for service sector workers including white collar workers. Few countries and unions in the region address health and safety issues faced by service sector workers. Worker education serves a far broader purpose when it seeks to empower workers to take an active part in making the workplace safe, rather than simply to encourage worker compliance with management safety rules.

This publication comprised of three working papers that look into the efforts of five NGOs working with local government units, child abuse prevention and determining best interests of children.

The first paper, "Integrating personal safety in the school curricula: the CPTCSA experience in child sexual abuse prevention" presents the efforts of the Center for the Prevention and Treatment of Child Sexual Abuse (CPTCSA) in influencing the attitudes and practices of duty bearers in the educational system. The second paper, "Bridging the gaps in children's work: NGO's strategies in collaborating with LGUs" looks into the processes that NGOs go through alongside issues they face when coordinating with local government units. The third paper, "Dignity, potentials and rights: cultural definitions of the best interest of the child" documents the practices of two NGOs in Davao City at how prevailing attitudes and beliefs of parents, children and NGO workers affect the definition of children's best interests.

ABSTRACT

This guide is based on experience aimed at developing the operational tool required to respond to constraints, as well as enhance a culture of organization and negotiation within the communities. In essence, this tool is- and should be- a very simple one: a contract defining rights and obligations of all parties concerned.

Community contracting, the subject of this guide, is therefore a challenge which many communities are not prepared for; neither for that matter, are many of those administrative institutions such as district councils, municipalities and communes which should prepare, negotiate and supervise contracts entered into with community-based organizations.

ABSTRACT

The gender balance appears to be shifting. Girls are involved in more and more hazardous occupations deeper into the interiors of the mine, but at the same time they are also upheld to their traditional female responsibilities in the home. The result is that girls in mining communities are forced to juggle their domestic tasks with other paid or non-paid work.

ABSTRACT

Micro and small enterprises (MSEs) in India make a substantial contribution to socio-economic development. The number of MSEs has grown significantly since the introduction of a policy for small-scale industries (SSIs) and a wide range of different programmes of the government. This report documents the findings of this study and presents a series of recommendations for change.
