ABSTRACT

This report traces the divergent historical experience in "developed" and "developing" countries of putting into practice the fundamental rights to social security, including social insurance, and an "adequate" standard of living. The rights are enshrined in Articles 22 and 25 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights; 9 and 11 of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights; and 26 and 27 of the Convention on the Rights of the Child. The impact of social security systems in the OECD countries over more than a hundred years best illustrates the gathering importance of these rights.

The study shows how development creates a need for formal social security, as traditional systems of family support are no longer sufficient. It discusses the advantages of risk pooling systems compared to capital-based systems where individuals are responsible for their own security. For the informal sector, positive experiences with micro savings and credit schemes are described.

ABSTRACT

The paper reviews the experience of employment creation programmes. In undertaking the review, the paper focuses attention on several aspects, e.g., issues relating to the design, funding and implementation of the programmes, their impact on production, asset creation and the labour market, the sustainability of poverty reduction through such programmes, and gender considerations. Based on the review, the paper presents some concluding observations by way of lessons emerging from the experience.

ABSTRACT

Principles embodied in the ILO forced labour Conventions Nos. 29 and 105 have found practically universal acceptance and endorsement and have become an unalienable part of the fundamental rights of human beings. They have been incorporated in various international instruments, both universal and regional. The prohibition of the use of forced or compulsory labour in all its forms is considered now as a peremptory norm of modern international laws on human rights. These two fundamental ILO conventions are the most widely ratified of all the ILO instruments, and further ratifications are envisaged in the near future.

ABSTRACT

This evaluative study is an endeavor to analyze the dynamics of labor representation, to study its underlying mechanisms, and to examine and assess the performance of labor representatives in key government institutions. The study also notes a serious disparity in terms of emoluments and perks enjoyed by labor representatives. While emoluments varied greatly, the study identifies that accountability to the nominating sector does not.

 <Partnership>,<Social protection>,<Governance>,<Labour market>,<Poverty reduction>,
 <Unemployment>,<Underemployment>,<Africa>

ABSTRACT

This report details many of the challenges facing Africa, but it goes much deeper. It presents three areas of focus: (a) linking the decent work agenda to the millennium development goals and the wider global development agenda; (b) shaping ILO support to the Ouagadougou follow-up through a decent work policy portfolio for Africa within a framework of time-bound targets; and (c) reinforcing the ILO's Africa constituents.

If the world is committed to national ownership of poverty reduction strategies, then we have to be serious about reinforcing the social and economic arm of government and helping African social partners to organize and exercise their voice as the real actors of the economy.

ABSTRACT

This report provides a snapshot of the issues which international transport carriers and drivers working in the main international corridors regularly encounter when physically crossing an international border. It presents possible means of addressing these issues, providing examples of what some countries are doing, or proposing, to improve the situation.

ABSTRACT

This report is organized as follows: Chapter 1 presents some recent developments in the industry - in the areas of production, exports and employment using internationally comparable statistics to the extent that they were available, plus a case study of the Republic of Korea. Chapter 2 traces the rise of contract manufacturers or electronics manufacturing services providers. Chapter 3 looks at the original design manufacturers and the PC and mobile phone industries. Chapter 4 examines recent experiences of countries in attracting foreign direct investment and their ability to build up an export industry as a means of participating in globalization.

ABSTRACT

This paper explores the labour and employment prospects for Filipinos as the mining industry is seen to become, one again, vibrant. Heedful of the voices from stakeholders in the mining sector, it eyes opportunities for growth from the perspectives of one who looks at developments in the labour market. An examination and discussion of available indicators related to the mining industry, however, must first be placed within the context of developments at the policy level, as these indicators provide the precursor conditions of the overall climate in the sector.

ABSTRACT

Improving work conditions among home workers in the informal economy is an important component of the ILO agenda to extend decent work to all workers. The work improvement for safe home (WISH) action manual responds to this immediate need of home workers and provides them with practical, easy-to-implement ideas to improve their safety, health and working conditions. These improvements will also contribute to higher productivity and efficiency of their work and promote active participation and cooperation of home workers in the same workplace or in the same community.

ABSTRACT

Street vending was the first occupation available for many people immediately after the fall of the Democratic Kampuchea regime, and is still one of the few occupational options for poor migrants into Phnom Penh. Even though the relative significance of street vending as an employment option is going down, the actual number of people working in this sector continues to increase.

This study brings together findings from different studies in Cambodia on street vending. It characterizes street vending in Cambodia, describes its contribution to employment, and highlights the role of associations in engaging the state so that appropriate policies may be established to capitalize on the potential of this subsector.

Gold mining provides a glimmer of hope for thousands of Mongolians, who are in desperate need of income due to unemployment, reduced livelihood opportunities in rural areas and diminished livestock herds. But informal gold mining also puts the health and safety of men, women and children at risk.

This baseline survey looks into the plight of informal gold miners in Bornuur and Zaamar Soums, with a view to identifying their needs and measures that the government, local authorities and the industry need to put in place.

This report examines the role of street food vending in reducing poverty. It shows how local policies and social attitudes that legitimize street vending can produce benefits not only to vendors but also to consumers who gain access to cheaper basic goods. This research also shows that street vending can provide adequate incomes, mobility across generations and a viable means of livelihood for a city's population. The research concludes with policy recommendations.

ABSTRACT

This working paper is a component of an ILO-IPEC project to calculate the economic costs and benefits of the elimination of child labour. Universal education up to the minimum age for admission to employment is one of the measures to eliminate child labour. It is an important means of protecting children who are especially vulnerable to child labour exploitation because of poverty, or other difficult socio-economic conditions.

ABSTRACT

This publication presents the ILO's global estimates of child labour in 2004 and compares them with the previous estimates for 2000. The document is structured as follows. It started with a presentation of the main estimation results for 2004 and compare these to the 2000 data. This includes the analysis of trends in children's work and the more restricted categories of child labour and hazardous work by children. As far as possible, data are broken down by age group, sex and region.

ABSTRACT

This research project was planned as an important step in a longer process of changing the policies and laws affecting female workers in the informal sector. In order to persuade policymakers of the need for change, advocacy organizations need hard data and clear analysis to support their arguments. The research focused on a rapidly growing subgroup of the informal sector subcontracted women and on their links to the global economy.

ABSTRACT

This report provides estimates by the ILO of the impact of HIV and AIDS on the labour force, men and women of working age, youth and children in a set of tabulations. The estimates and projections in these tables are based on three types of data. The most readily available data are the population base by age and sex from the United Nations Population Division; HIV prevalence estimates from UNAIDS and WHO; and regular updates of global estimates of labour force participation from the ILO.

This report is designed to offer a full update of global estimates of the impact of the HIV epidemic on the world of work.

ABSTRACT

This guide is a response to the increasing recognition of the role that employers' organizations can play. It is intended particularly for those employers' organizations that are considering engaging in their national poverty reduction strategy papers (PRSPs). It is designed to inform employers' organizations about the nature of PRSPs, the way the process functions and the role that they can play.

The guide provides illustrations of how tools and resources can be used by employers' organizations to strengthen their lobbying efforts. Also included are examples of how federations have engaged in the PRS processes.

This paper has been prepared within the framework of a research project on analyzing the employment effects of multinational enterprises (MNEs). The paper reviews approaches to the collection of information on the labour and employment effects of MNEs. An examination of such approaches is important as solid information is critical for policy makers and the social partners to design effective consensus-based policies.

ABSTRACT

The ILO published its first ever estimate of forced labour in the world, with indications of its regional distribution and broad forms. It includes a thorough evaluation of the results, with calculation of margins of error and comparison with external sources. The global estimate's methodology is experimental and there are, doubtless, many ways to improve it. With this document, the ILO makes the calculations transparent in the hope of stimulating an intellectual debate on the most appropriate way to estimate hidden problems such as forced labour for which little or no reliable data is available at the country level. But ultimately, these estimates will serve the purpose of attracting public attention to the continued existence of forced labour in the world and drawing support for its elimination.

ABSTRACT

Trafficking is not a thing. It is not an event. You cannot point a finger at it or take a photograph of it. Trafficking is a convenient, simple and useful label attached not to a single phenomenon but to a complex series of states and events that individually may or may not be harmful or wrong. Even as understanding of the complex phenomenon of trafficking grows, however, there is still some confusion between trafficking and other forms of people movement and often, as a result of this, people who have been trafficked are treated as wrongdoers rather than victims.

ABSTRACT

This paper examines the rights and working conditions of Philippine domestic workers employed in the country and abroad. It reveals that there are marked differences between migrants and local domestic workers in educational qualifications and work experience. The fact that they form two distinct pools of labour certainly has implications for policies and programmes on domestic work.

This study on the youth labour market surveyed young people from the lower half of socio-economic groups in eight provinces. It suggests that early drop out from school is a major contributor to insecure employment, poor working conditions and lower wages later in life. Dropping out from basic education is not motivated by prospects of entering the work force early but by lack of finance to stay in school.

ABSTRACT

The purpose of this report is to record in detail the methodologies applied by the Visayan Forum Foundation – a Philippine-based non-governmental organization working in partnership with ILO-IPEC – that work well, and to identify gaps in methodologies and strategies to address these gaps. The reason for doing this is to provide lessons for future action by ILO-IPEC partner organizations and other agencies in the Philippines and in other countries.

ABSTRACT

The report focuses on the present situation of women and strategies for mainstreaming women and/or gender concerns in trade union organizations. To put the findings of the Indonesian survey in perspective and to enable the reader to compare them to what is happening in other parts of the world, the first part of this report presents a short desk review of relevant international literature on women and gender in trade unions.
