The Japanese workers and trade unions are completely opposed to apartheid; we have been working under the policy of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and, in consultation with the Organisation of African Trade Union Unity, have been engaged in various actions against apartheid. We have organised rallies to which the members of ICFTU and OATUU have been invited. We have invited them to attend our conventions, and asked them to participate with us in demonstrations. We have organised fund-raising campaigns on a number of occasions. We have also addressed protests to the South African Consulate in Japan, and have dispatched a number of protest telegrams to the Government of South Africa. In addition, we have appealed to the Government of Japan and to the economic organisations of my country to seize every opportunity to take action against apartheid, including trade restrictions. At every opportunity we have made representations, consulted them and put forward proposals.

Therefore, I believe that the proposal contained in the new Declaration that separate reports should be made to the ILO on the individual actions and activities of governments, workers and employers, to clarify what has been done by whom, when and what still has to be done, is extremely important for taking effective sanctions against the system.

We, the Japanese workers, pledge that we will fight, with renewed determination, to eliminate apartheid, together with our brothers and sisters of ICFTU and OATUU.

In concluding my statement, I urge once again that the draft Declaration be adopted unanimously by the Conference.

Interpretation from Chinese: Mr. FANG (Workers' delegate, China) – We have carefully gone through the report of the Committee on Apartheid and the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia as well as the Programme of Action against Apartheid as amended. We think they are very good documents and agree with the report, the Declaration and the Programme of Action as amended.

More than 20 years have passed since the International Labour Conference adopted the Declaration in 1964. However, the South African authorities have not in the least changed their position in pursuing the criminal policy of apartheid. On the contrary, they have been intensifying their atrocious and repressive measures against the just struggles waged by people of various circles in South Africa against the apartheid system. They have not only refused to release Nelson Mandela and other political prisoners, but also detained without trial tens of thousands of people, as well as arrested, kidnapped, tortured and murdered large numbers of trade union leaders and activists since the declaration of the state of emergency in 1986. In February this year, COSATU, the largest trade union organisation in South Africa, and 17 other mass organisations were prohibited from carrying out any political activities. At the same time, in defiance of the relevant resolutions adopted by the United Nations, the South African authorities have been continuing their illegal occupation of Namibia and intensifying their colonial rule over Namibia, making use of it as a base to invade other southern African countries. Moreover, they have time and again launched aggressions and subversions against the neighbouring countries in a vain attempt to threaten them to give up their support to the just struggles waged by the people of South Africa and Namibia. However, all these perverse acts of the South African authorities have met with severe condemnations and strong opposition from people and countries who care for justice all over the world.

We are very glad to see that the people of South Africa and of the southern African countries have been further united in their persistent struggle against South African racism and that the struggle of the Namibian people for independence has been surging forward, putting the South African authorities in an ever more isolated position.

The Chinese workers and trade unions have all along strongly condemned and been firmly opposed to the racist policy pursued by the South African authorities and their atrocious repression of the workers and people in South Africa. We resolutely support the South African workers and people in their just struggle against apartheid and racial discrimination and for racial equality and fundamental rights. We resolutely support the Namibian people in their just struggle for national independence. We pay tribute to the front-line States for their enormous contributions to the liberation causes of the people of southern Africa. We have noted with satisfaction that the Tripartite Conference on Action against Apartheid sponsored by the International Labour Organisation in Harare has registered positive results. We call upon the International Labour Organisation to continue to adopt effective measures to implement the Declaration and the Programme of Action against Apartheid, adopted by the Conference, in a comprehensive way. We hold that greater pressure should be exerted on the South African authorities in the political, economic and all other possible fields, including comprehensive and mandatory sanctions, as a means to force them to give up the system of apartheid.

We are fully convinced that, with the support of the people of Africa and all countries in the world which uphold justice, the final victory will surely belong to the South African people and the Namibian people who have a glorious tradition of militancy.

Mr. MORTON (Workers' delegate, United Kingdom) – I first congratulate the President on his election to preside over this 75th Session of the International Labour Conference, a momentous session, not least because of the Report now before the Conference.

On behalf of the workers of the United Kingdom I support and commend the Report and the conclusions of the Committee and the revised Declaration.

The TUC, with 9 million members, is by far the largest democratic representative organisation in my country. It has been deeply involved in the struggle against apartheid for many years. Our involvement in that struggle has led us consistently to support and advocate mandatory economic sanctions and the severance of relations – including cultural relations – with South Africa. We, the organised workers in Britain have been reinforced in our beliefs by such spontaneous and informal demonstrations as the Mandela concert last week as well as by the expressions of support from many voluntary organisations in our country.

Now, there is of course no doubt about the legal and constitutional right of our Government, the United Kingdom Government, to express its views on the matter of action or indeed inaction against apartheid, both in this Conference and elsewhere. But there is a serious question about the degree to which they represent the views of the ordinary people of Britain on this matter.

What is even more doubtful is how long their views about the efficiency of polite persuasion can logically be sustained. The special Report of the Director-General makes it absolutely clear that such approaches have fallen – and will continue to fall – on deaf ears. Increased repression and inhumanity has been the response to these friendly overtures. Those who say that there is no evidence that economic sanctions will succeed ignore the clear evidence that diplomatic exchanges in the absence of such sanctions are not succeeding. Similarly, those who suggest that Black economic power may eventually break down the structure of apartheid appear to disregard the evident fact that the whole repressive structure of the South African State is designed and applied to the ruthless preservation of that evil regime. Without external intervention neither such limited economic power as will be permitted to the oppressed people nor any considerations of justice will produce a peaceful transition in that country.

It is these considerations, not a desire for confrontation for its own sake, that cause us – the overwhelming majority of the Committee – to submit these conclusions and this programme of necessary action.

We appeal to those who would rely on peaceful persuasion to be persuaded themselves and to join wholeheartedly in this great international effort. Let them do so openly and, as requested by the Committee, undertake to give individual replies on the implementation of the measures stipulated in the updated Declaration and Programme of Action.

If governments will not join in this humanitarian action then let them – at the very least – comply with the Programme to this extent – let them lift all impediments preventing or inhibiting trade unions from taking action against apartheid. Let them ensure that their own people are free to express themselves in action and then be prepared to learn from the result.

British workers, through the TUC, will continue to give all possible support and assistance to their brothers and sisters in South Africa. We have continued at home, as we do here, to urge the British Government to support United Nations mandatory economic sanctions and to apply more vigorously the measures it has adopted.

Our member unions in Britain extend all possible support to independent trade unions in South Africa and approach British companies with South African subsidiaries in dispute with those unions.

We sent financial relief to workers involved in strikes and generally seek to give fraternal support to fellow trade unionists.

The TUC has produced a cinema advertisement film promoting the consumer boycott of South African goods and publishes other materials for this purpose.

We welcome this revised and updated Declaration and Programme of Action. We shall intensify our efforts to implement the Programme in all its detail.

Like others, we should prefer this report to be adopted without any division; but if there is to be one we shall stand proudly with what we are sure will be the overwhelming majority and what we are certain is the moral majority of this Conference.

Mrs. FRYBORTOVA (representative of the World Federation of Trade Unions) – On behalf of the World Federation of Trade Unions, representing in its ranks 214 million workers from all over the world, I should like to express the support of our organisation for the conclusions of the Committee on Apartheid in respect of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia and assure you, true to our long-standing commitments, that our Federation and all its affiliated organisations will contribute in every possible manner towards follow-up action.

The implementation of the Declaration and the Programme of Action against Apartheid certainly will be an important instrument of the people in southern Africa, particularly of the workers and trade unions, in their struggle for human and trade union rights in South Africa and Namibia.

Only this week, on the occasion of the International Day of Solidarity with the struggling people of South Africa, the World Federation of Trade Unions took appropriate initiatives to intensify its solidarity actions for the just struggle of the workers and people in South Africa and Namibia for their inalienable rights and freedoms.

Concerning the latest decision of the South African High Court, the WFTU has reiterated its total condemnation of the death sentences passed on the “Sharpeville Six”, in gross violation of law and justice, in a telegram of protest to P.W. Botha, head of the apartheid regime.

The WFTU therefore once again joins the worldwide demand by organisations and governments for the cancellation of the decision to carry out the execution of these innocent persons, and calls for their unconditional release.

The international community cannot turn a blind eye and a deaf ear when thousands of workers and people are harassed, detained, tortured and killed in cold blood.

The WFTU is deeply concerned at the worsening of the situation in South Africa and its continuance and worsening of the human suffering resulting from the apartheid system of the Pretoria regime and its new extension of the state of emergency to cover the entire country.

Especially, concerning the tragic and inhuman situation of the South African and Namibian workers, the WFTU underlines the fact, as stated in the conclusions of the Committee, that the policy of apartheid remains the most serious and persistent challenge to the principles of equality that are defended by the ILO.

The WFTU reiterates ‘that the policies and practices of apartheid pursued by the Pretoria racist regime, which are the root cause of the grave and deteriorating situation in South Africa and Namibia and in southern Africa as a whole, constitute a serious threat to international peace and security.

The WFTU strongly condemns the racist Pretoria regime for its repeated attacks against the front-line States, and its recruiting, training, financing, directing and infiltrating of bandits and mercenaries, for the purpose of destabilising the independent neighbouring countries, actions which have caused a high toll in economic loss and human suffering.

In connection with the realisation of the Programme of Action against Apartheid, the WFTU is concerned about the operations of transnational corporations doing business in South Africa and Namibia. It is a fact that these TNCs, which have formally announced disinvestment from South Africa and Namibia, still maintain a large presence there by various subterfuges. There is no convincing evidence that the TNCs’ declarations in any way helped to weaken the apartheid regime. The collusion between TNCs and the racist regime continues. Therefore, the WFTU reiterates its demand that actions of TNCs operating in South Africa and Namibia should come under the United Nations definition of the crime of apartheid and that legal action should be taken against them.

The Pretoria regime has recently decided to ban the political activity of 18 anti-apartheid organisations, including the Congress of South African Trade Unions (COSATU). Furthermore, the racist regime has promulgated the Amendment Bill to the Labour Relations Act, which is designed to shackle the strength of the trade union movement. These new provisions will not only contravene ILO standards but could, in effect, paralyse the Black trade union movement. In this respect, the WFTU learned with great concern that a number of employers in South Africa have threatened to undertake action against COSATU, its affiliates and members who participated in the country-wide protest of the trade union movement from 6 to 8 June 1988 against these measures of the Pretoria regime. Such is the challenge issued by the apartheid regime and its collaborators to all people in South Africa advocating freedom and justice.

In conclusion, I should like to assure all of you here in this plenary session that the 214 million workers who belong to the WFTU will take a very active part in all measures contributing to eliminate apartheid. This, we feel, is our obligation. Therefore, let us unanimously demonstrate our unity in the struggle against apartheid not only in supporting but particularly in implementing the conclusions of the Committee on Apartheid and especially the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia and thereby contribute to the establishment of a free, democratic unfragmented and non-racial South Africa and an independent Namibia.

Mr. ZOUPANOS (Chief, External Relations and Inter-Agency Affairs of the United Nations, on behalf of the Chairman of the United Nations Special Committee against Apartheid) – I take the floor as representative to this Conference of the United Nations and its Centre against Apartheid, to salute the presence at, and the participation in, this Conference of Mr. Sam Nujoma, President of the South West Africa People's Liberation Organisation. We pay tribute to his fighting spirit and to his leadership in the struggle for the liberation of his country.

I have been requested to deliver a statement by the Chairman of the Special Committee against Apartheid of the United Nations, Mr. Joseph Garba, and the statement reads as follows.

Mr. President,

Allow me to congratulate you on your election and the guidance you have provided, along with your colleagues in the Bureau, to the work of the Conference. I also take the opportunity to express the high esteem in which we hold Mr. Blanchard, the Director-General of the International Labour Office and Secretary-General of this Conference, and our appreciation for his contribution to the international campaign against apartheid.

Your work today assumes special significance. Recent developments in South Africa show that the apartheid regime is determined to continue its undeclared war against the people of South Africa and the region. Also, they show that South Africa will continue to defy the international consensus against it in the belief that apartheid can be maintained with impunity.

History, however, indicated that no government can rule eternally without the consent of all its people. The end of apartheid is historically inevitable. The question before us is whether or not the unanimous rejection of apartheid can be transformed into concerted and effective international action against the regime. It is in this context that the work of the International Labour Organisation becomes an important component of the international campaign against apartheid.

In adopting, as expected, the conclusions and recommendations of your Committee, including in particular the proposed Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid, you are giving concrete support to the Black workers of South Africa, those courageous men and women who confront the regime and the employers at the point where it hurts best – at the workplace.

Your Conference has been privileged to hear the testimony given by the representatives of the Congress of South African Trade Unions and the National Congress of Trade Unions. Through their voices you have heard of the victories and disappointments of the Black workers of South Africa. You have seen their courage and determination to fight against the regime's attempts to shackle the Black labour movement and all other forms of political resistance. You have heard their views regarding the assistance they need from the International Labour Organisation, particularly at this juncture. The representatives of COSATU and NACTU have clearly stated that apartheid is of global concern and that international support of their struggle is now more imperative than ever. They have reiterated that only effective – and more importantly – enforceable action by the international community against South Africa will help in the demise of apartheid. And they have no illusions about the pain international action like sanctions will bring them.

Understanding this need to isolate the regime and in so doing support the liberation struggle in South Africa, the General Assembly of the United Nations has repeatedly called for the imposition of comprehensive and mandatory sanctions against South Africa under Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter. Short of the adoption of these sanctions, it has called for the application of co-ordinated and strictly monitored measures. The General Assembly has recognised the need to target the loopholes among the sanctions taken by individual States so far. It has recognised the need to urge States to strengthen these measures, close the loopholes and strictly monitor the implementation of their sanctions.

The Special Committee against Apartheid has welcomed the selective measures adopted by different States which, it must be stressed, vary in their strength and, therefore, in their effectiveness. These measures, though, constitute the growing international consensus against the regime. But as the representatives of the Black labour movement of South Africa have said, increased support to their struggle is now needed. And only a firm and effective response by the international community, that is, sanctions, will help them bring about peaceful change in their country. In South Africa today, the writing is on the wall. No stone shall stand on top of the other till eternity. Let us hope that the actions of the International Labour Organisation and the United Nations can help the Black workers of South Africa realise their ultimate goal: the complete elimination of apartheid, and the building of a democratic, united and non-racial society, at peace with itself, with its neighbours, and with the world.

Twenty-seventh sitting

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON APARTHEID: DISCUSSION (concl.) AND ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT (Mr. AITKEN) – We will now resume our discussion on apartheid.

Mr. MUKHERJEE (Workers' adviser, India) – First of all, on behalf of the working class of my country I express my heartiest congratulations to the President and to the entire working class of the world through this august gathering. Indeed, it is a great privilege to be with you all, at this international forum. As a delegate of the Indian Workers' group from the Indian National Trade Union Congress, the largest trade union organisation of India, it is a great honour for me to address you here in this historic place.

My subject is the right of the trade union movement in general and the struggle against apartheid in South Africa.

Because of shortage of time I have no desire to enter into an in depth analysis of the problem. I shall just refer to certain basic and important characteristics of the subject.

The ILO is playing a vital role in promoting the solidarity of workers by encouraging and strengthening the democratic trade unions and advocating their rights in various international governmental and non-governmental forums. But still, it is a blot on the entire civilised world that the apartheid policy of the White minority Government in South Africa, which denies the majority population basic human rights and freedoms, is being tolerated.

It is also appalling that, despite world-wide condemnation of the blatant discriminatory policies of the South African Government, some affluent countries in the West, while loudly claiming to be crusaders for freedom and human rights, talk of "constructive engagement" in a bid to cover their economic and trade links with the White regime, which has loosed a reign of unabashed violence on the majority Black population struggling for freedom in their own country.

My organisation, the INTUC, is a signatory to the resolution passed by the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference at Geneva, calling for comprehensive and effective economic sanctions against South Africa in order to force an end to its apartheid policy.

Let this august house call on the workers and their movements the world over to demonstrate their solidarity with the people of South Africa by forcing the governments in their respective countries to refrain from having any type of relations with the racist regime.

Now, I want to suggest some action by the United Nations, by the governments, by the employers' organisations, by the trade unions the world over, and by the ILO.

First, government action through the United Nations: to adopt comprehensive and mandatory sanctions against South Africa, in accordance with Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter; to co-operate by all possible means in the implementation of United Nations resolution 435 for the independence of Namibia.

Second, government action: to sever political, military, cultural, sporting and diplomatic relations with the South African Government, in so far as such relations with South Africa are maintained; to stop trade and commercial relations with, and to prohibit new public and private investment in South Africa, as well as the export of nuclear and other technology to the South African Government. In addition, to prohibit loans, trade credits and gold exchanges by the banks to and with South Africa; to discourage the emigration of their nationals and the promotion of tourism to South Africa, by such means as banning advertising and cutting air and sea links with South Africa; to give material and moral support to the liberation movements, to the independent Black trade union movements and to popular movements struggling for the establishment of human rights in South Africa and Namibia; to lift all impediments preventing trade unions from participating in solidarity action with the workers engaged in the anti-apartheid struggle.

Third, action by employers' organisations: to ensure that their members do not maintain trade, commercial or financial relations with the minority South African Government; to try to transfer the investments to other African countries, especially the front-line and SADCC States; to refuse to co-operate with the South African authorities in the implementation of apartheid legislation and to make a firm commitment to the abolition of apartheid.

Fourth, action by trade unions the world over: to give financial and moral support to the Black independent trade union movement inside South Africa; to organise consumer boycotts in order to promote sanctions against the South African Government; to co-ordinate trade union action against apartheid in accordance with the Declaration adopted by the International Conference of Trade Union on Sanctions and other Actions against the Apartheid Regime in South Africa, held in Geneva in 1983.

Fifth, ILO action: to give further impetus to implementation of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid and the Programme of Action; to increase activities in the fields of vocational training, assistance to migrant workers, improvements in infrastructures and in other fields of benefit to workers of South Africa; to ensure a wider dissemination of public information throughout all member States, by all possible means, concerning atrocities being perpetrated by the apartheid South African regime within South Africa and Namibia, as well as front-line and neighbouring States, as a means of countering the news blackout imposed by the South African Government under its oppressive emergency and-overcoming the silence of the mass media.

I am proud to mention that under the leadership of our beloved Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi, India has pledged Rs. 500 million to the African fund over three years. India has helped Angola, Botswana, Mozambique, Tanzania, Zambia, Zimbabwe and liberation movements with supply of articles of daily use and consumer durables worth Rs. 15 million to Angola and Rs. 15 million to SWAPO.

Lastly, I assure you that the Indian working class, which considers the valiant struggle of the South Africa's liberation movement as its own, will in every possible manner strengthen the South African Congress of Trade Unions and the African National Congress in their determination to put a permanent end to apartheid as well as to achieve the release of all brave fighters.

I want to finish my speech with the part of Indian "Rigvede" philosophy, which will be proper here: "May our aim be common, our assembly common, Common the minds and the thoughts of these united.

A common purpose do I lay before you, and worship with our common oblation. Common be our aim and our hearts united, Our minds be one so that all may happily live together."

Mr. MALVIYA (Deputy Minister for Labour, India) – May I first of all congratulate the Chairman and members of the Committee on Apartheid for the high quality of their report placed before us. On behalf of the delegation of India I would like to express our support for the set of conclusions adopted by the Committee on Apartheid. We also fully endorse the proposed Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia and the Programme of Action against Apartheid annexed to it, which have been amended and updated by the Tripartite Conference on Action against Apartheid held in Harare early last month, and hope that these would be adopted unanimously by the plenary session of this Conference.

South Africa is a place where racism and racial discrimination is the deliberate and acknowledged official policy of the State; where Blacks have no rights or freedoms, no voice in the management of their affairs and are denied their human dignity. They are disenfranchised in their own land and deprived of their proper means of subsistence. Nowhere in the world is racism more virulently manifested and institutionalised than in the apartheid system of South Africa; an abhorrent system created to perpetuate the hold of the Whites over the South African majority of Blacks and Coloured people. As the late Prime Minister of India, Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, so clearly stated while addressing the Lower House of the Indian Parliament 30 years ago; and I quote "In South Africa, it is the deliberate, acknowledged and loudly proclaimed policy of the Government itself to maintain this segregation and racial discrimination. This makes the South African case unique in the world. It is a policy which obviously no person and no country which believes in the United Nations Charter can ever compromise, because it uproots almost everything the modern world stands for and considers worth while, whether it is our ideas of democracy or of human dignity."

India's own commitment to the struggle against apartheid, extending over many decades is well known. We have been privileged to play a special and leading role in support of the long and valiant struggle of the Black majority in South Africa for human dignity and freedom. India was also the first country to impose sanctions against South Africa and I would like to confirm again that our application of diplomatic and economic sanctions against the Pretoria regime and our boycott in this respect is complete.

India strongly condemns the evil of apartheid and regards all modifications of it as completely unacceptable, for apartheid has to go and it has to go in its entirety. In this context, we call upon all governments, employers' and workers' organisations which have not so far done so to join in imposing comprehensive and mandatory sanctions against apartheid. Clearly, the international community must act cohesively to ensure that such sanctions become a reality. As my Prime Minister Shri Rajiv Gandhi said, it is futile to hope that co-operation in any manner with the regime will give anyone leverage or influence, so as to change things for the better.

Comprehensive and mandatory sanctions constitute the only peaceful means to compel the South African regime to dismantle apartheid. The half-a-dozen or so governments supporting South Africa should realise that any delay in action to end apartheid in South Africa would only lead to more bloodshed, perhaps on an unprecedented scale. If peaceful change does not take place in southern Africa, bloodshed and the grossest suffering would be inevitable. It is the duty of the international community to see that this does not happen.

I would like to commend the Director-General of the ILO for the high quality of his Special Report on the Application of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa which has also for the first time analysed the situation in Namibia. The new evidence of the continuing deterioration of the situation of the Black majority in southern Africa causes us deep concern. It is clear that the perverse system of apartheid is responsible for the expanding turbulence in the labour field in South Africa. The Pretoria regime continues to trample trade union rights, harass and imprison trade union leaders, ban trade union organisations, and generally use brute force to smother any kind of protest. Hardly a day passes without our learning of fresh acts of repression and torture, and of deaths arising out of the violence spread by the South African regime. In complete defiance of world public opinion, the Pretoria regime has undertaken new acts of repression. ANC activists have been killed; regional destabilisation activities undertaken including raids into neighbouring states. In February 1988 regulations were promulgated by the Pretoria regime banning political activity by 17 leading anti-apartheid organisations and by COSATU. My Government condemns outright such acts of the Pretoria regime which, through them, seeks to perpetuate the evils of racism.

It was because of India's abiding commitment to the elimination of apartheid that we were entrusted by the non-aligned countries at the Harare Non-Aligned Summit to chair the AFRICA Fund which was set up to channel urgently needed assistance to the frontline States. Pledges and contributions to the AFRICA Fund already exceed a quarter billion US dollars in cash or in kind and have come from as many as 46 countries, including those outside the Non-Aligned Movement. This includes a pledged contribution from the Indian Government of approximately US$40 million to the AFRICA Fund. In addition, funds have also been raised by way of public contributions from individuals, workers' and employers' organisations in India. I take this opportunity to appeal to governments, employers' and workers' organisations, non-governmental bodies and individuals to make every possible contribution to the AFRICA Fund so as to ensure the early realisation of its noble objectives.

Today we were privileged to be addressed by Mr. Sam Nujoma, President of SWAPO. He outlined the extremely grave and difficult situation facing the Namibian people. India condemns outright South Africa's illegal occupation of Namibia and is entirely with the oppressed people of Namibia and their sole legitimate representative, SWAPO, in their just struggle for independence.

In conclusion, I would like to restate our conviction that the abhorrent system of apartheid is doomed to collapse. As the late Prime Minister of India, Shrimati Indira Gandhi, so eloquently stated, and I quote: "The idea of freedom cannot be stamped out. Some spark will persist to burst into flame, somewhere, some time, to light the way and illumine hearts and ultimately lead to success. Neither colour nor caste nor sex makes one person superior or inferior. No matter what laws South Africa devises for itself, history cannot be denied, nor will the inexorable march of the future be halted. Apartheid cannot survive".

Mr. SARKAR (Workers' delegate, Bangladesh) – We join the previous speakers in congratulating the President on his election to this distinguished position. I also congratulate the Vice-Presidents of this Conference. I place my trust in their abilities to conduct the affairs of this Conference in the right direction.

The Director-General has highlighted the issues on human rights in his Report. He also referred to them in the Special Report on Apartheid and the report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories. These issues are directly connected with the unsatisfactory state of affairs prevailing in different countries. But the situation in the occupied Arab territories as well as in South Africa and Namibia calls for fitting attention from this tripartite body.

As will be recalled, the question of human rights in the occupied Arab territories, including Palestine, is being discussed in various forums of the United Nations system. In spite of the priority attached to this issue by the international community, tangible changes have yet to occur in this connection for human beings in general, and workers in particular, who have been subjected to atrocities and tribulations. I would urge this august body to take steps to ameliorate the sufferings of the people in the occupied Arab territories and to protect the rights and interests of workers there. Measures should be taken to ensure education and training for Arab workers, equal opportunities of employment and equal remuneration for equal work. Measures should also be taken to prevent arbitrary dismissals and the inhuman treatment that is meted out to them.

I have no words to condemn this policy of apartheid. It is a policy which enables the racist regime not only to deny fundamental human rights to Black people in South Africa but to perpetuate discrimination in matters of education, training, employment and services, among others. The baneful effects of this policy is found in the denial of civil rights that are recognised throughout the world. South Africa has now the notoriety of being isolated from the community of nations, the majority of which have no social, political and economic relations with it.

Isolation has not, however, brought sanity into the body politic of South Africa. Rather, the racist regime has taken measures to prevent the Black people of South Africa from receiving their due. Discrimination has led the majority to a state of despair. However, the world community, through the ILO, has instituted programmes to remedy the grievances of the Black people, on the one hand, and as a demonstration of solidarity with them, on the other.

On behalf of the workers of the world, as well as of Bangladesh, I denounce the policies and programmes of Israel and Africa and express solidarity with the oppressed people. May I state here that all the social partners in Bangladesh, namely the Government, employers and workers are working in unison to advance the cause of Palestinian and Black workers. The workforce in Bangladesh is determined to work hand in hand with the Palestinian and Black workers.

The workers of Bangladesh are very happy to associate themselves with ILO activities designed to help the workers both in the occupied Arab territories and in South Africa. The workers have persuaded our Government, under the benevolent and dynamic leadership of President Hossain Mahammad Ershad, to associate itself with other member States in the ILO, the United Nations, the Commonwealth, the Organisation of the Islamic Conference (OIC) and the Non-Aligned Movement in adopting measures to try to force the racist regime to accept the realities of life. The organisation of workers, as it has in the past, pledges itself to work hand in hand with the workers of the world in the field of technical co-operation sponsored by the ILO for workers in the occupied Arab territories, South Africa and Namibia.

With these words, I conclude my statement. I thank the President for giving me the floor and thank the delegations of friendly countries for giving me a patient hearing.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. ABDULGHANI (representative of the Palestine Liberation Organisation) – It is a great pleasure for me to be addressing this august assembly during this special meeting devoted to discussion of the Report of the Committee on Apartheid. Allow me, first of all, to congratulate the President most sincerely for having guided the work of this session so ably and with such wisdom and competence.

I am also very grateful to the Chairman of the Committee, Mr. Nkomo, Minister of Labour, Zimbabwe; thanks to his wisdom and leadership, the Committee has been able to present its Report on Apartheid to this session. At the same time, I should like to greet our dear invited guest, Brother Nujoma, President of SWAPO. I wish him and his fellow African fighters every success in their constant and uninterrupted struggle for freedom, independence and the elimination of the abominable policy of apartheid which runs counter to all humanitarian principles, values and ideals.

We have read very carefully the Report submitted by the Director-General on the application of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa. In that Report the Director-General set out the recent developments in the area of labour and social matters in that region of the world. Although laudable efforts have been made in preparing this Report, and although it represents an improvement compared with previous Reports, it has not attained the desired level and has not emphasised the most sensitive points. Because the Report did not call things by their proper names, the Working Party of the Committee on Apartheid was obliged to make a number of recommendations; in particular, it requested the Director-General to prepare a report on the application or non-application by governments, employers' and workers' organisations of certain ILO decisions, in order to expose the hypocrisy of certain parties which address fine-sounding words to our African brothers and then stab them in the back by supporting the apartheid regime and collaborating with that regime economically, politically, socially and militarily. We are referring in particular to the hypocritical policies practised by the Zionist entity, the United States, the United Kingdom and other countries with which you are only too familiar. I should also like to highlight the conclusions reached by the special group on the financial and banking facilities accorded to the ILO, particularly the conclusion encouraging the Director-General to diversify and spread the ILO's deposits among the banks and financial institutions.

While appreciating the considerable efforts that have been made in this area and the delicacy of this situation, we feel, from these conclusions, that the international organisations, and more specifically the ILO, had to remain prisoners of the big financial corporations and had to continue with their financial operations and investments in South Africa and Namibia. This, in our opinion, is a very important and very serious situation, which must be corrected, and an end must be put to it as quickly as possible.

The Director-general has highlighted the policy of repression practised by the Pretoria regime against the people of South Africa, and in particular the state of emergency, the military laws, the arrests, the deportations, the demolition of houses, and the raping of women and children. To all that must be added the censorship imposed on the newspapers and the mass media. These are the same methods and the same practices as those imposed by the Israeli entity against the Palestinian workers. Furthermore, these practices have become more numerous and have intensified during the courageous uprising of our people. This is not strange when we realise that this Israeli entity is throwing fighters out of helicopters, burying people alive, gouging their eyes out and breaking their limbs so as to handicap them for life. In fact, Zionism and apartheid are two inseparable manifestations of the same evil, as was borne out by the United Nations General Assembly resolution adopted in 1975 which considered Zionism as a form of racism.

As the fighters of South Africa and Namibia rot in prison, with the great Nelson Mandela at their head, there are hundreds of thousands of Palestinian nationalist and trade union fighters who are also rotting in Israeli prisons with Shahir Saad and his six comrades who are members of the People's Committee of the General Confederation of Workers in the West Bank at their head. As South Africa persecutes African fighters, so the Zionist Mossad also hunts down the leaders of the PLO to assassinate them. Their most recent crime has been the assassination of the fighter Abu Jihad. We are certain that all this is drawing to its end, and our African brothers are realising that their victory rests in the joint action they can take and in the strikes they can organise, and which have recently expanded to involve more than 3 million workers. It is the same for the Palestinian workers who are refusing to work in Israeli institutions and companies, in response to the instructions given by the leadership of the uprising, under the aegis of the PLO.

You have certainly heard of the Bantustans in southern Africa but I don't believe you will have heard of Bantustans in occupied Palestine. Whatever the degree of injustice, unfairness and poverty in which these African Bantustans exist, if their inhabitants want to plant a tree they are not required to obtain prior authorisation. The populations of the Bantustans do not need authorisation to manage their water resources, as is the case in our villages as a result of the "kindnesses" of the Israeli occupation. I wouldn't wish to press too far the comparison between the two racist regimes of South Africa and Palestine in terms of the usurping of land, confiscation, groundless arrests, arms and nuclear co-operation, but I think I should stress what has been said by the Soviet newspaper Red Star and the French magazine Le Point to the effect that trading in death is the cornerstone of the Israeli economy and that Israel is the main exporter of arms to South Africa. Israel has just exported long-range 155-mm. guns to South Africa.

I should like to follow your own example and stop the comparisons there. I should, however, like to say that we give vigorous support to the proposed Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia and to the Programme of Action against apartheid submitted by the Committee on Apartheid. We appeal for mandatory sanctions to be imposed and for all the parties which do not comply to be denounced. Adequate funds must also be made available to implement these recommendations, even if those funds have to be obtained at the expense of other programmes, given that nothing is dearer than human life in its freedom and dignity.

We in the PLO are ready to share our resources with our struggling brothers in the African National Congress, and the Pan-Africanist Congress of Azania and with SWAPO, just as the children of the revolution of the stones in Palestine have, through their uprising, compelled the Israeli enemy to recall more than 150 experts in repression and espionage who had been loaned by the Zionist entity to the apartheid regime. We shall, therefore, continue our solidarity with our brothers on the African continent; we shall support them with all our hearts so that together we may raise the banner of victory against our common enemies, namely the apartheid regime and the Zionist entity.

Mr. MASHASI (Workers' delegate, United Republic of Tanzania) – First of all, allow me to pay tribute to Mr. Sam Nujoma, President of SWAPO, who addressed us this morning and to reassure him of the support of the workers of the United Republic of Tanzania to the struggling workers and people of Namibia.

This day has a special significance. It marks the twelfth anniversary of the Soweto massacre, a day when more than 170 unarmed protesters, mostly school-children, were killed by the ruthless South African forces. Let us pay homage to the martyrs of freedom by showing our determination to eradicate apartheid.

We are considering for the second time updating the Declaration which was originally adopted by the International Labour Conference in 1964. At that time, the international community realised that apartheid was an evil to mankind and that its elimination was of concern to us all. Indeed, apartheid was showing indications that it was not only a dirty system but that it would become a threat to world peace.

It is now 24 years since the Declaration was adopted. The world has since witnessed not only enormous persecution of the Black people in South Africa itself, but also abhorrent actions of the regime, ranging from direct raiding of the neighbouring front-line States to destabilisation of the States by terror; using its proxy armies of MNR in Mozambique and UNITA in Angola. It is strangling the economies of the front-line States, especially by making it difficult for the neighbouring landlocked States to have access to harbours for their exports and imports.

The regime has remained stubborn with regard to the illegal occupation of Namibia. It has taken the cursing world for a humble toothless bulldog, if I may use the phrase of a Zambian diplomat.

The proposals contained in the updated Declaration and the Programme of Action against Apartheid seek to reject this abusive status. The ILO, as the champion of human rights, cannot pretend that it does not have the right to apply what it considers to be the most effective means to eradicate apartheid.

We have been hearing from some quarters that the ILO is not competent to recommend mandatory economic sanctions. The International Labour Conference has identified a problem and it is free to prescribe a solution to the problem. It would be hypocritical on the part of delegates to this Conference to say that we know the solution and that it is within the capability of the Members of this Organisation, but that we are unable to put it into practice.

Representatives of some member States and some employers' members have declared that they are opposed to the imposition of mandatory economic sanctions because, in their opinion, the measures will harm more the people we are undertaking to defend. This, to me, is tantamount to an insult to the intelligence not only of the oppressed people in South Africa and Namibia and of the front-line States, but also of the entire world.

All the forces representing the oppressed masses in South Africa and Namibia have pointed out that their people are prepared to suffer the consequences of mandatory economic sanctions, for they know that there can be no greater suffering than the one they are experiencing now. The front-line States have said the same.

We are all sure that with mandatory economic sanctions the apartheid regime cannot survive for long. It is my view, and indeed that of the workers of the United Republic of Tanzania, whom I represent, that those who are opposing mandatory economic sanctions, those who are opposing absolute isolation of the South African regime, are in alliance with the regime. They are the pillars of the regime. We are appealing to them to join hands with the international community to help precipitate the eradication of apartheid.

The workers of the United Republic of Tanzania consider themselves a party to the struggle. We shall not retreat until victory is attained.

In conclusion, may I take this opportunity to pay tribute once again to the Congress of South African Trade Unions (COSATU) and to the workers of South Africa in general for the success of a three-day general protest which the world witnessed early this month. We are proud of their heroic struggle.

I commend the proposed Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia and the Programme of Action against Apartheid for adoption.

Human rights are a common responsibility.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. BOZO (Minister of Social Affairs and Labour, Syrian Arab Republic) – I have the honour once again to address this august assembly on behalf of the workers, employers and the Government of Syria to discuss the subject of apartheid.

I should like to start by congratulating Mr. Sam Nujoma, who was our honoured guest this morning, wishing him and the African people in Namibia and South Africa success against the Pretoria regime.

I would also like to express my gratitude to my friend, Minister Knomo of Zimbabwe, for his wise chairmanship of the Committee on Apartheid, which finished its work with great success thanks to his wisdom and competence.

The ILO, using its tripartite structure, has undertaken great efforts in combating apartheid in South Africa and Namibia. We are all hopeful that the Programme of Action of our Committee will mobilise the political will to eradicate this abhorrent regime and eliminate apartheid.

We in the Arab world looked forward to the results of this Committee with great interest, hoping for progress in the field of labour and human rights which will alleviate the suffering of the African masses and enable them to continue their struggle until they achieve their legitimate aspirations of freedom and equality.

The work of the Committee on Apartheid coincides with the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights; it also coincides with the convening of the Harare Conference, which reached a number of very promising and satisfactory decisions. Despite the fact that we have some reservations, we urge those concerned to work wholeheartedly to eliminate the apartheid regime.

All persons, no matter their creed, race or colour, are created by God and have the right to dignity. This is proclaimed by all religions.

I take the floor today to express the complete endorsement by the Arab delegations of the results of the Committee's work.

As you know, our solidarity with the African peoples and movements is a matter of principle; it goes back in history to the independence of Arab peoples. The Arab League in its earliest resolutions confirmed this solidarity and our faith in the just struggle of peoples for freedom and equality. Therefore we shall never accept the hypocritical policies of those who publicly condemn the Pretoria regime while secretly continuing to collaborate with it. The Arab stance is solid and steadfast. It is based on our religion, which considers all men equal. Without going into the details of what the Arab countries will do to help their brothers in South Africa and the legitimate liberation movements in their heroic struggle against apartheid to secure their right to self-determination, I affirm that we shall give them our full support. What the Arab countries are doing at all levels stems from their conviction that comprehensive and mandatory sanctions must be imposed on the apartheid regime. This is the moral duty of all peoples. We shall continue on this path. We must all work together to put an end to this racist regime which oppresses the African masses.

The Arab people are most sensitive to the sufferings of the Black population of South Africa. After 40 years, our brothers and sisters in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories are still experiencing the same sufferings as those of the African people, both the victims of two racist entities, in South Africa and Namibia and in Palestine. Both are deprived of their most basic human rights, and are subject to the same practices: oppression, terrorism, military force, deportation and other inhumane practices.

The long list of crimes and aggressions against these peoples includes the policy of settlements, the arming of the settlers, the arrest of trade unionists, etc. Of course, both regimes stem from the same source: racism. This ideology runs counter to basic human rights. These two peoples have no other choice but to struggle against the racist regimes.

The Arab group, including governments, employers and workers, strongly supports the Declaration and the condemnation of apartheid, as well as the Programme of Action against the policy of apartheid as presented by the Committee on Apartheid. We would have preferred that these documents had called for mandatory sanctions against the racist regime in occupied Palestine, which maintains military, nuclear, economic and trade relations with the Pretoria regime, despite the international community's condemnation. These relations provide mutual support to these two abhorrent regimes and further the oppression of their victims.

Ms. RUGE (Government delegate, Norway) – In order to comply with the President's request for brevity I will present here a short version of my prepared intervention. On this occasion I have the honour to speak on behalf of the Nordic countries, that is, Denmark, Finland, Iceland, Sweden and my own country, Norway.

Today, we commemorate Soweto Day, remembering all those who were killed and wounded in Soweto in 1976. Both the uprising in Soweto and the other unrest that we have seen in South Africa over the years are clear indications of the suffering and frustrations of the majority of the people in that country. The situation for the Black majority in South Africa and Namibia today is worse than ever. We face a situation where international action against apartheid and support for the victims of apartheid are more important than ever.

The ILO must continue to strengthen its efforts in this field. The Nordic countries therefore welcome the updating of the Declaration on Apartheid, and we endorse the draft Declaration that was prepared by the tripartite conference in Harare last month and adopted by the Committee on Apartheid at this Conference. We strongly urge governments, workers and employers of the world to take the Declaration seriously and implement the Programme of Action.

We would also like to welcome the Director-General's Special Report. This Report contains valuable information that is most useful in our deliberations.

South Africa's continued illegal occupation of Namibia is a source of serious tension in all of southern Africa, and according to the view of the Nordic countries it is therefore most appropriate that the situation in Namibia is dealt with in the updated Declaration. The future of Namibia is linked to the abolition of apartheid in South Africa, and our assistance to Namibia should be seen in that context.

The Nordic countries condemn all forms of racial discrimination, especially South Africa's policy of apartheid and continual aggression against its neighbouring States. International solidarity with and support for the Front-Line States in the face of South Africa's aggression have become increasingly important.

Our countries are convinced that international measures against South Africa are necessary to abolish apartheid. Positive measures, not the least in the form of economic assistance to Front-Line States and to victims of apartheid, are also important. However, they cannot be a substitute for restrictive measures like an economic boycott of South Africa. The Nordic countries have on numerous occasions urged the United Nations Security Council to impose comprehensive and mandatory sanctions against South Africa. The absence of such sanctions should, however, not be used as a pretext for failing to act against apartheid. That is why all the Nordic countries have adopted national laws and measures on economic boycott against South Africa. We are of course aware that a Nordic economic boycott by itself cannot put significant pressure to bear on South Africa. However, we do hope that our measures can inspire other countries to follow suit.

South Africa's policy of destabilisation has created a situation of war in neighbouring countries and forced a large number of people from these countries to leave their homes. In order to look into what the international community can do to alleviate some of the burdens caused by this situation for the refugees and for their host countries, Norway has undertaken to host a conference in Oslo on 22 to 24 August this year in co-operation with the Organisation of African Unity, the United Nations High Commission for Refugees and the United Nations Development Programme. We hope that the conference will give a new impetus to raising the consciousness of the international community to the plight of the people in the region.

Time is running out for peaceful solutions to the problems of South Africa and Namibia. If apartheid is not abolished soon the whole region of southern Africa may explode in a violent upheaval. It is time for all nations to prove that their rejection of the apartheid system is genuine by introducing restrictive measures against South Africa and by increasing their assistance to other countries in the region. Hence, let us all join in taking effective action against apartheid.

In spite of their overall support for the Declaration the Nordic countries are not in a position to sever diplomatic relations with South Africa, and there is no legal foundation on which the Nordic governments could comply with the recommendation that contracts be denied to firms and enterprises having commercial relations with South Africa.

Mr. ELIAV (Government delegate, Israel) – My delegation has studied with great interest the report of the Committee on Apartheid, a unique body of the ILO established to deal with the unique situation. The Government of Israel has always been on record as condemning unequivocally the policy of apartheid carried out in South Africa. Any policy based on the false doctrine that human beings can be distinguished from one another on the basis of colour or alleged racial differences or that any so-called race can claim superiority to any other is totally contrary to the Jewish doctrine of the equality of human beings expressed in the Bible and enshrined in Israel's Declaration of Independence. Indeed, it would be unthinkable that a Jewish State, after the appalling suffering undergone by the Jewish people in the name of such revolting doctrines, should in any way take a different stand. It is our firm wish that apartheid and the evil philosophy underlying it should disappear from the face of the earth.

This policy has been expressed on many occasions in different forms and the most recent steps regarding this policy were taken by the Government of Israel on 18 September 1987, namely: the prohibition of new investments in South Africa, any exceptions to be approved by a committee composed of the Minister of Finance, the Bank of Israel and the Minister of Foreign Affairs; the prohibition of government loans, and of the sale and transfer of oil and oil products and of the import of Kruger rands; the freezing of iron and steel imports at their level at that time; the reduction of cultural contacts between the two countries to a level that reflects Israel's negative attitude towards apartheid; sport events, if any, to be subject to the decisions of international sports associations; the Minister of Tourism and other tourist authorities to refrain from promoting tourism to South Africa; no scientific agreement to be signed any more; government officials no longer to visit South Africa without authorisation by an interministerial committee; and the establishment of a fund to assist in the implementation of training programmes in Israel in educational, social and cultural fields for members of the Black and Coloured community of South Africa. Finally, all possible measures to be adopted to prevent Israeli territory from serving as a transit area for the movement of goods and services between South Africa and other countries with a view to circumventing sanctions imposed by a third country. Israel's commercial ties with South Africa are, in fact, extremely limited and are decreasing even more.

In a list published by the ICFTU on 13 May of the leading 1,200 countries that trade with South Africa, Israeli companies are very low down on the list. Furthermore, Israel has taken positive measures to foster good relations with the Black community of South Africa. The Afro-Asian Institute of the General Federation of Labour, the Histadrut, has played a major role in this respect. In April 1986 it conducted its first workshop seminar specifically designed for the leaders of the Black community in South Africa. Twenty people took part, all of them longstanding fighters against apartheid. The theme of the seminar was the role of the people's organisations in community and nation building. The results achieved were examined, their relevance to present-day South Africa discussed and proposals based on these discussions put forward. A second seminar was held from November to December 1986 on the subject of the role of trade unions in community and nation building. The third, in April 1987, on women's and people's organisations in community and nation building, and the fourth in November-December 1987 on the role of people's organisations in community and nation building. Furthermore, the Institute has also conducted such activities in South Africa itself: in August 1987 in Soweto, Cape Town and Northern Transvaal. The Institute's team was warmly welcomed and established contacts with a very large number of men and women across a broad spectrum.

Israel has thus demonstrated both its condemnation of the policy of apartheid practised by the South African Government and its wish to foster good relations with the Black population there. No baseless accusations against us made in a spirit of hatred and venom like those just a few minutes ago can change the facts, and these polemics only deflect attention from the issue at hand.

Let us hope that these and similar policies adopted by other countries will end in the termination of the regime of apartheid and the introduction of a system based on human equality and dignity.

Interpretation from German: Mr. MARTINEK (Government delegate, Austria) – The Austrian Government delegation approves the report of the Committee on Apartheid. This corresponds to the Austrian Government's Policy of rejecting apartheid. We are following the situation in southern Africa with considerable attention and concern. The problems of that region within the International Labour Conference are of course of great interest to us above all the problems concerning workers and employers, which cannot be solved as long as the unjust system of apartheid continues to exist. There are serious violations of human rights. However, the Austrian Government delegation must stress it cannot agree to all the items in the report of the Committee on Apartheid.

We feel that the conclusions of this Conference are perhaps not a matter for our Organisation, but rather for the Security Council of the United Nations.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. BOTVINOV (Workers' Adviser, USSR) – For the past quarter of a century the question of the situation in South Africa has been at the centre of attention at our Conference every year without fail. This is unfortunately not because it has become a habit, but because it is a necessary and most melancholy reaction to the ever deteriorating situation in the South African subregion, which the racist regime in Pretoria has turned into a chronic nucleus of oppression of the African population and a serious threat to peace and international security.

This session of the Conference takes on particular importance against this background. As we know, after a careful analysis of the situation in Africa, which had become extremely explosive, and of the trend of Botha's policies, the 73rd Session last year recommended that the ILO Declaration and Programme of Action against Apartheid be reviewed and supplemented, in view of the considerable contribution of our Organisation to the struggle for the elimination of the shameful system of apartheid in South Africa, with its basis of hatred for mankind, and to putting a stop to Pretoria's aggressive attitude against the Front-line and neighbouring States.

The events of last year, which provided endless evidence of the further worsening of the situation in southern Africa, only underlined the necessity for our Organisation to take long overdue additional and effective measures in this direction. A rich source of information of the dramatic situation unfolding in that country is the well-balanced and substantial 24th Special Report submitted to our Conference by the Director-General. More evidence is provided by the events at the beginning of this year, including the introduction in February of the bans and restrictions by the Pretoria regime on 17 mass democratic organisations in South Africa, the wave of terrorist acts against ANC representatives in Africa and Europe and the acts of open armed aggression by South African forces against Angola, Botswana and Mozambique. The latest example was the recently held three-day strike, unparalleled in scale, of African workers in South Africa who, under the very difficult conditions of the state of emergency, struck in protest at the pending draconian anti-trade union bill in that country. The challenge has been made and time will not wait.

In the opinion of our delegation, the tripartite Conference of the ILO which was held in Harare in May against apartheid accomplished positive results. It submitted for approval proposals for revising the texts of the ILO Declaration on Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia and the Programme of Action against Apartheid. The undoubted merit of these documents is the extension of their range to cover Namibia, the consolidation and expansion of aid and co-operation to front-line and neighbouring countries and stricter measures against the racist Pretoria regime, so as to achieve abolition of the apartheid system by peaceful means and avoid the incipient explosion of violence with tragic consequences. The key element at the present stage of the struggle against apartheid is, we are convinced, the introduction and the application of comprehensive mandatory sanctions against the racist regime in South Africa, namely the measures being asked for primarily by the victims of apartheid themselves: the oppressed majority of the population of South Africa and the neighbouring countries which have achieved independence.

On behalf of the delegation of workers of the USSR, we urge all participants to the present tripartite Conference, to support unanimously the report of the Committee on Apartheid and thereby approve the revised texts of the Declaration of the ILO and the Programme of Action against Apartheid, rather than putting forward trumped up excuses and objections.

But, of course, even more important than approving these documents will be the scrupulous, conscientious implementation of their provisions by all member States of the ILO. And in this connection we fully support the proposal in the report of the Committee on Apartheid to improve the control system of the ILO. We trust that the Governing Body of the ILO will adopt the recommendation of the Committee in order to enable our Organisation and all its members to make an active contribution to the struggle of the world community for the speedy elimination of the apartheid regime in southern Africa.

(Mr. Adiko takes the Chair.)

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. GABUARDI IBARRA (Government adviser, Nicaragua) – On behalf of the Nicaraguan Government, I thank you for this opportunity to express the feelings of my country in connection with the dramatic effects of apartheid upon the life of the populations of South Africa and Namibia.

We should also like to extend a greeting from this rostrum to our colleague, Mr. Sam Nujoma and his noble cause.

Mankind and the community of nations have been waging a long struggle to do away with this racist policy, which is an affront to the entire human race.

The Reports submitted to the Conference on the development of this harsh reality suffered by the workers and peoples of Namibia and South Africa, clearly show the sacrifices and sufferings meted out to them.

Nothing can justify attitudes which claim to remodel the Pretoria regime or put it into different form. The only possible acceptable moral approach to apartheid is its complete eradication.

The Nicaraguan Government in the spirit of the principles set out in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, joins all those who condemn this criminal regime and fully supports the adoption of much more radical sanctions against South Africa.

Finally, we express our full support for the declaration on the subject as drafted by the Committee on Apartheid.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. TORREZ GÁMEZ (Workers' delegate, Nicaragua) – Our delegation would like to greet from this platform our comrade, Sam Nujoma, and his noble cause.

On behalf of the workers of Nicaragua, we express our whole-hearted condemnation of the odious regime of apartheid.

The workers of South Africa and Namibia are heroically resisting the oppression of a criminal social and political system which is flouting all the principles of humanity.

Racial discrimination is a shame in the history of mankind. It has left deep scars that will not easily be erased from our consciences.

Nicaragua, therefore, would like to support the Report of the Committee on Apartheid, and we urge all the other delegations to do likewise. There is no moral justification for coexistence with the Pretoria regime. Those who advocate a simple restructuring of relations are placing their political and economic interests ahead of the need to take effective measures to eliminate that system.

The workers of Nicaragua express their full and unreserved solidarity with the workers of Namibia. We are convinced that the injustice and immortality of apartheid will soon disappear from the face of the earth.

Interpretation from German: Mr. LAMPRECHT (Workers' adviser, German Democratic Republic) – All the previous Special Reports of the Director-General on the Application of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid have clearly shown that my Organisation and my country have done everything in order to implement the action decided upon by the International Labour Organisation against apartheid.

The Committee on Apartheid has provided us with documents which respond to the new demands made upon us by the struggle against apartheid. We support the updated Declaration as well as the Programme of Action against Apartheid.

Facts have clearly shown us – and this has also been stressed by the discussion – that apartheid, which is an anachronism in our century, cannot be reformed but must be eliminated. We therefore firmly support any measures designed to step up sanctions and other actions against apartheid. For this reason, we also welcome the setting up of a permanent monitoring group to follow up and monitor the application of sanctions and to point out any violations.

We also welcome the fact that the Director-General will report about this subject every year.

On behalf of my Organisation, I can assure you that we will apply this Declaration to the letter and continue giving our solid support to the actions of the South African trade unions.

We are aware that there are still certain groups which want to convince us that all boycott measures and other sanctions will only have an adverse effect on the Black population. Practice, however, has shown that this policy derives super-profits from the sweat and blood of the Black population and leads to the stabilisation and continuation of the apartheid policy. The International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) has published an extremely interesting and informative booklet, on this subject: Investment in apartheid. It gives the names and addresses of 1,267 transnational corporations and their branch offices which work in co-operation with the apartheid regime or which have settled in South Africa; and this in spite of all the United Nations sanctions and all the efforts made by the International Labour Organisation to eliminate apartheid.

However, every day longer than apartheid lasts is tantamount to the denial of human dignity in one's own country, the denial of the right to existence, the violation of all democratic trade union rights and freedoms and the practice of terror and violence against the majority of the population.

Every additional day of apartheid implies arbitrary arrests, torture, even murder; it also means unsuccessful efforts to paralyse the action of democratic organisations, particularly that of COSATU; it also means that international law is trampled underfoot.

This situation requires the urgent co-operation of all democratic forces in the world against apartheid. Trade unions alone – and there are practically 400 million organised workers in the world – today constitute a powerful force which can do a great deal to support the struggle of South African trade unions.

I should like from this rostrum to assure the trade unionists of South Africa and all those struggling against apartheid in Namibia and in South Africa of the full support of my organisation, the Free German Trade Union Federation, in their fight for a free, united, democratic and non-racist South Africa and for a free Namibia.

Mr. O'FARRELL (Workers' adviser, United States) – As the Committee on Apartheid of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference began its deliberations on the updating of the Programme of Action against Apartheid and its review of the Special Report of the Director-General on the Application of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa, momentous events were occurring in that country.

On 6, 7 and 8 June, more than a million workers exercised their right to protest in the equitable, economic, political and social system in South Africa by refusing to go to work. In the time-honoured tradition of workers everywhere in the world, the workers of South Africa, denied the ballot box, denied the right of political expression, denied social equality solely because of the colour of their skin, and about to have their few hard-won and grudgingly acknowledged trade union rights eviscerated by an amendment to the Labour Relations Act, voted with their feet. More than 90 per cent of the workforce in the major industrial areas of South Africa cast their votes against the enactment of legislation by the White minority that would further impede the Black trade unions in their peaceful pursuit of equality.

Speaker after speaker here has related all the problems facing the people of South Africa in their struggle. There is no need for me to repeat them. Speaker after speaker have pointed out the things being done in their own countries and by their own organisations to support the struggle of the people in South Africa for freedom. Speaker after speaker have lamented the fact that there has been no progress towards eliminating apartheid and that things seem to be worse now than when we met here one year ago.

I, for one, would like to present a different view of the events of the past year. The Special Report of the Director-General shows us that Black trade union membership in 1986 was estimated to be more than 1,150,000, an increase of more than 26 per cent over 1985 and, for the first time, more than half of the total trade union membership.

The Report also tells us that the number of strikes in South Africa increased by more than 600 per cent between 1979 and 1986, while the number of workers involved in these strikes increased by almost 1,000 per cent in the same period. In 1987 the National Union of Mineworkers conducted a legal strike that kept more than 340,000 miners off the job for three weeks and represented a major feat of organisation that should be seen as an indication of the process made by Black trade unions.

The Labour Relations Amendment Bill currently being considered by the South African Parliament is evidence of the success of the efforts of the Black trade union organisers over the past ten years. If there had been no progress in the fields of organising, collective bargaining, dispute resolution and other legitimate trade union activity, and if the trade unions had not successfully demonstrated their increasing ability to work in concert to achieve their legitimate objectives, then there would be no need for the Government to undertake to change the rules and tilt the game in favour of the employers and the Government, and against the workers. Violence and intimidation are not sufficient for the Government of South Africa: Police-state measures cannot contain the workers and therefore other so-called legal measures have to be found to deter the march of the workers towards equality. While the Amendment Bill itself is repressive and must be fought by any means available to South African workers and their unions, we should not lose sight of the fact that events leading to such a proposal by the Government should be viewed as a positive reflection of the spirit and the determination of the oppressed workers of South Africa, and their success. The enactment of the Amendment Bill will be a set-back in the progress of the trade union movement but it will not be fatal to their cause, nor will it deter South African workers or their supporters around the world in their continued opposition to the apartheid system.

In the words of the Director-General in his Special Report "The past year saw both consolidation and growth of the trade union movement, with the two major federations laying the foundations for even larger membership and stronger structures, developments which occurred in circumstances of great difficulty and represent a considerable achievement. In addition, the emerging unions themselves, through their democratic internal processes and in the absence of Black rights and political parties, are providing their members with the experience of democratic practices which they see as a major factor in the struggle for both improved working conditions and a just and equitable political system. The actions of the ILO in stating its intent to assist in this struggle and the actions of constituent members of the ILO in bringing the intent of the Organisation to fruition in their respective areas must be of inestimable value to those in South Africa who carry on the struggle day by day. That is why the Workers' delegation of the United States of America honours the progress made to date by the workers of South Africa, reaffirms its support of them in their struggle and urges the unanimous adoption of the revised Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid that is before us today.

Interpretation from French: Mr. RYCHLY (Workers' adviser, Czechoslovakia) – Within the general context of the International Labour Conference which is dealing specifically with questions of respect for human rights, our annual session devoted to the situation in South Africa and the entire southern region of the continent is very important.

Forty years after the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, there is throughout the world no more striking example of the brutal violation of human rights than that of South Africa.

The racist regime of South Africa continues to tyrannise its population and that of Namibia, and commits aggressions and attacks against sovereign neighbouring States.

The Government of South Africa has just been shown the tremendous will of the patriotic and democratic forces which have mobilised the African workers to organise their resistance action. A significant part is played in this by the trade unions, which have become the most important basis for the struggle of the workers for change.

The resistance movement in South Africa is also growing, thanks to increasing international solidarity with the just struggle of the South Africa and Namibian peoples. However, international solidarity cannot be really effective if the appeals launched by the international community do not bring about a reaction by certain governments and certain countries which profit handsomely from the existence of apartheid to consolidate their position of supremacy in the region and take advantage of the situation to maintain tension there, thus jeopardising constructive achievements throughout the world which humanity welcomes with hope.

We share the ideas contained in the special report of the Director-General of the ILO, that is that only international pressure upon the South African Government can lead to the liquidation of apartheid.

On behalf of all Czechoslovakian trade unionists we reiterate the following demands: all economic sanctions directed against South Africa should be applied consistently and made mandatory; the measures against the activities of the democratic mass organisations in South Africa should be immediately revoked; all the trade unionists, patriots and political prisoners detained in South Africa should be immediately released; the resolutions adopted by the United Nations, the International Labour Organisation, the WFTU and other international organisations concerning the solution of the situation in South Africa and the settlement of the situation in Namibia should be implemented without delay.

We therefore support the new documents which have come from the Harare Conference and encourage their implementation. We reiterate our appeal for united action by all parts of the international trade union movement and other progressive and democratic forces to support the just struggle of the South African and Namibian peoples aimed at the final liquidation of apartheid and the establishment of lasting peace and security in the region.

Interpretation from German: Mr. HERTEL (Government delegate, German Democratic Republic) – In 1964, the International Labour Conference adopted the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa. Today, 24 years later, we are being called upon to adapt this Declaration to new requirements for the second time and to bring the Programme of Action in line with the the latest developments.

On the one hand, this bears witness to the sad fact that the world has not yet succeeded in eradicating this dreadful situation. As a result of its hopeless situation, the regime of apartheid is becoming increasingly aggressive against its own people and those of neighbouring States.

On the other hand, the updating of the Declaration, is an expression of the growing conviction, both within and outside South Africa, that only concerted action and relentless international pressure on the Government of South Africa, can force it to abandon its policy of segregation.

The system of apartheid cannot be reformed; it must be completely demolished. It is therefore only logical that in the updated Declaration and Programme of Action, particular stress is laid on the promotion of comprehensive sanctions against the racist regime, based on Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter. My Government, which has no relationship at all with the racists, supports firm sanctions as the only effective, peaceful means of obliging the regime to change its policy.

The call by the independent Black trade unions of South Africa for sanctions, refutes the claim constantly put forward by certain groups that sanctions will harm first and foremost those who are already oppressed. Behind this statement, of course, we know there are interests of international monopolies who fear a threat to important sources of profit for them. The projected setting up of an independent group of experts to monitor the maintenance of sanctions is an important forward step towards the worldwide promotion of comprehensive and binding measures. All overt and covert collaboration with the racists will only prolong the suffering of the people in South Africa.

My Government is very happy to see the extension of the Declaration and the Programme of Action to Namibia and the front-line States. The ILO will now be in a position to commit itself even further in its support of the people of Namibia under the recognised leadership of SWAPO, which is struggling for a free and democratic Namibia. Our Organisation could make an important contribution towards preparing the people of that region for the day when they will be taking the responsibility for their future into their own hands.

It is a great joy for us that the President of SWAPO, Sam Nujoma, was able to be with us. We have had a close relationship of many years' standing with him, as attested by the number of regular meetings he has had with the highest representatives of the German Democratic Republic, which are all documented.

His talk this morning gave us a graphic picture of the situation in Namibia, and also of the struggle of his people for independence.

My country will continue to support the people of Namibia even more in the future, and it is unreservedly in favour of the full application of the United Nations Security Council resolution 435/78, and the other relevant United Nations resolutions on the settlement of the Namibian question.

The racists, with state-controlled terrorist actions, are trying to undermine the front-line States in their justified struggle to support their brothers in South Africa, and are also trying to destabilise the governments of these States. Pressure and terror tactics used by the regime, both inside and outside the country, constitute an additional heavy burden for the population of that area. The recent ILO Tripartite Conference on Action against Apartheid in Harare showed the determination of these States to step up their efforts even more in their struggle against apartheid. The German Democratic Republic fully supports these States.

South Africa represents not only a danger to peace and security in the region. The international agreements recently signed with regard to disarmament and the solution of regional conflicts, as well as manifold activities to do away with other centres of tension and conflict, show clearly that a peaceful settlement of problems is also possible in South Africa.

Finally, may I pledge the full support of my Government to the new Declaration and the Programme of Action, as well as to all the other accompanying urgent measures that are needed. They constitute an excellent foundation for the ILO's further commitment to combat apartheid. It is the duty of all of us to breathe life into these documents.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. BORCHT-CHEVSKY (Government delegate, USSR) – Today, we are approving the Report of the Committee on Apartheid. Each page of this report time and again calls for a decisive struggle to eliminate this monstrous legacy of the past, this criminal practice which has been elevated by the racist regime of South Africa to the rank of State policy.

The Soviet Union fully supports the aims of the new Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia and the Programme of Action. Their adoption will unquestionably enter the history of the International Labour Organisation as an important event. The real situation in South Africa and Namibia, the specific facts listed in the Special Report of the Director-General on the Application of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa, the acts of brigandage perpetrated by the South African racists with respect to the front-line States looks particularly ugly against the backdrop of the main theme of this session which is the common responsibility of the international community for human rights.

The Pretoria regime stubbornly continues resisting the demand to put an end to the policy it is carrying out, resorts to its favourite method of terror and repression against those fighting for the rights of the indigenous population. Some particularly striking facts concerning this emerged very clearly from this morning's statement by Mr. Sam Nujoma.

Looking at the crime of racism and understanding their complete incompatibility with a civilised way of operating, the question arises will-nilly as to where are the sources of the vitality of apartheid? Why does it continue to exist despite practically universal condemnation? It seems that the adoption of a new Declaration and Programme and Action is a good occasion for all of us once again to ask this question of ourselves, and to give an honest and truthful answer. It is no secret that condemning apartheid in words does not always tally, in some countries and in certain business circles, with practical policy. Therein precisely lies one of the main reasons, if not the main reason, for Pretoria's defiant contempt for the views of the international community, as well as the absence of real progress in solving the problem of southern Africa, which has now become a destabilising factor on a global scale.

The basic position of the Soviet Union in respect of the conflict in southern Africa is wellknown. Our policy is an open and honest one. We unreservedly condemn apartheid in the Republic of South Africa and call upon everyone to unite their efforts in order to achieve its unconditional liquidation. We consistently come out in favour of granting independence to Namibia as soon as possible in accordance with the decisions of the United Nations and we are solidly behind the patriotic forces in the Republic of South Africa and Namibia, headed by the ANC and SWAPO, and we give aid and support to the front-line States to repel aggression from Pretoria.

The tripartite ILO Conference in Harare and the consideration of the problem of apartheid at this session of the International Labour Conference fully correspond to the aims and tasks of the Organisation's Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia. Our task is to do our utmost actually to put into practice those decisions and recommendations which will be approved by this session and to act in the struggle against apartheid in a concerted and decisive manner.

As before, the Soviet Union will strictly and firmly support the front-line States, come out in defence of their sovereignty and territorial integrity and grant them all-round aid. A real expression of this aid is our co-operation with the AFRICA Fund. The USSR's total contribution to this Fund has reached more than US$100 million.

In conclusion, we should like to emphasise the need to speed up the solution of the problem being considered here today. The realities of the world today require new political thinking, and the Soviet Union is urgently and actively calling for this. Mankind can no longer reconcile itself with apartheid. With our joint efforts, apartheid and the problems it gives rise to must be eliminated. This would then be a major step towards the creation of a system of international peace and security corresponding to all objective interests.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. DJEMAM (representative of the International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions) – I would like first of all, on behalf of the International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions, to extend to our brothers struggling for freedom in South Africa and Namibia our greetings and appreciation for their heroic struggle. We would also like to emphasise our support to them and to their struggle to obtain their legitimate and natural rights, recognised by the international community for all people and emphasised in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights whose anniversary we are now celebrating.

The Report of the Director-General of the ILO to this session shows that the situation in South Africa and Namibia has not changed since last year. In fact, it has become worse; the Black population is still subjected to the laws and oppression of the apartheid regime, and continues to be under the rule of Martial Law, which was extended by the Pretoria regime for another year. It is deeply regrettable to see, at the end of the twentieth century, that there are people who deny freedom to others who are different in colour from them. These people have become inhuman and have to be treated as such.

The existence of such a regime is a challenge to the moral principles of mankind. The Arab workers have studied the reports of the international organisations and have followed with great interest the proceedings of the Harare Conference and the events that have taken place in South Africa and Namibia. We are concerned to see the workers in this region suffer the same fate as their brothers in Palestine and in the occupied Arab territories who endure oppression and terror, exile and expulsion and the denial of their legitimate rights. The whole world is a witness to this, which is perpetuated through the support of certain Powers that claim to be democratic and concerned for the progress of the human race. The present situation requires us to take immediate steps within the ILO, as it is deteriorating day by day and the oppressive laws are mercilessly enforced.

The racist regime continues its aggression against neighbouring countries. Governments and companies should impose an economic boycott on the regime. If such a boycott is put into force, it will lead to the fall of this odious regime, which could not survive without the assistance of a number of countries, and of imperialism and Zionism and without the assistance given to it by multinational corporations. The people of Namibia and South Africa are thus deprived of their legitimate rights as the racist regime is supported by those who believe that it is in their strategic and economic interests to do so, justifying their behaviour by pretending that they are helping to improve the situation of the Black people. Do they not know that the wage of a Black worker is no more than a tenth of the wage of a White worker? Are they not aware of the circumstances and conditions of life of the Black people? Do they not know about the practices and the oppression engaged in by the racist regime?

Experience has shown that there is no solution to this question other than to eliminate this racist regime by force. The peaceful solutions advocated by some have not led to concrete results. On the contrary, the regime is continuing its oppressive practices.

It is the duty of peace-loving people, together with the workers and the ILO, to extend all possible moral, material and technical assistance to the workers and trade unions in South Africa and Namibia in order to be able to face the situation, so that they will be able to assume their responsibilities once they obtain their freedom and independence. In fact, the ILO has an important role to play in awakening world opinion so as to bring pressure to bear on the countries that co-operate with this regime. The workers also have a vital role to play that will lead to radical changes in their positions and attitudes.

We reiterate once again that we have to establish social justice to enable all peoples to exercise their rights, to be able to live in dignity and their right to realise self-determination.

Long live the struggle of the people of Namibia and South Africa!

Miss RADIC (Government adviser, Yugoslavia) – The current 75th Session of the International Labour Conference is about to conclude an important task in updating the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa and the Programme of Action contained in its Annex.

By the adoption of these two documents and, in particular, by the adoption of the conclusions of the renamed ILO Conference Committee on Action against Apartheid at its present session, the International Labour Conference will round up the work that has also been done by the Governing Body Committee on Discrimination and the Tripartite Conference on Action against Apartheid held in Harare last May. Thus, the International Labour Organisation will make a further contribution to the international struggle against Pretoria's policy of apartheid in South Africa and its illegal occupation of Namibia.

Ever since the problem of racism in South Africa was raised in the United Nations some 40 years ago, and following the illegal occupation of Namibia later on, the Government and people of Yugoslavia have given full political, moral and humanitarian support and assistance to the oppressed people and liberation movement fighters in those countries.

In the 1960s, a law was passed in Yugoslavia banning any kind of relations or co-operation with the racist Pretoria regime. In the United Nations, my country supports every action aiming at implementing the United Nations Plan for Namibia adopted by the Security Council, as well as actions aiming at the abolition of apartheid, including comprehensive and mandatory sanctions against the racist South Africa regime.

Yugoslavia will continue its policy of support for the just struggle of the freedom fighters of SWAPO, whose President, Mr. Sam Nujoma, addressed this Conference today. In his speech, he gave us a horrifying picture of the long sufferings of his people under the occupation of South Africa.

In conclusion, I wish to express our full support for the changes introduced in the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia and the Programme of Action against Apartheid and, in particular, our support for the conclusions of the Conference Committee on Action against Apartheid at the present session.

We endorse the hopes that these documents will be adopted by consensus. Thus, the ILO would make a further contribution to the struggle against apartheid and the illegal occupation of Namibia and enrich the overall activities of the international community in marking the 40th anniversary of the adoption in 1948 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

Interpretation from Chinese: Mr. LI (Government delegate, China) – This morning the Chinese delegation listened with great interest to the speech given by Mr. Sam Nujoma, the President of SWAPO. We wish to express our high regard and firm support of SWAPO in its just struggle.

The Chinese delegation has examined the report submitted by the Committee on Apartheid. We wish to thank the Chairman and all the members of the Committee for the great amount of work they have done and we agree with the report and conclusions submitted by the Committee.

The Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia, submitted by the Committee to the Conference for examination and deliberation, is a very important document.

Having revised and updated the Declaration of 1981, this document emphasises the need to eliminate apartheid in Namibia, the need to strengthen support for the South African people and the front-line States, and the need to impose comprehensive mandatory sanctions on the South African racist regime.

In its appendix the report formulates conclusions concerning the Programme of Action against Apartheid. These meet the needs of the present struggle against apartheid.

The Chinese delegation supports the Declaration, as amended.

In the past year or so, the situation in South Africa has further deteriorated. In defiance of the widespread condemnation by the international community, the South African authorities have wantonly intensified their suppression of the resistance by the South African people.

Since the beginning of this year, the South African authorities have adopted a series of repressive measures, restricting and banning the political activities of 17 anti-apartheid organisations and COSATU, assassinating their activists and representatives of ANC abroad. They continue their military attacks and economic retaliation against the neighbouring countries. They also prohibit the international community from providing material assistance to the anti-apartheid organisations.

Undoubtedly, these acts have brutally trampled upon the basic human rights of the Blacks in South Africa and to the situation in southern Africa and to the peace and stability of the world; these acts cannot be tolerated by the international community.

The Chinese Government and people have always strongly condemned the perverse acts of the South African authorities, and have firmly supported the South African and Namibian people in their just struggle.

I wish to reaffirm here that the Chinese Government will not have any contact with the South Africa's racist regime.

Last May, I had the honour to participate, as a Government representative of China, in the Tripartite Conference on Action against Apartheid, held in Harare. That was a successful meeting.

Having been to a front-line State myself, I felt all the more strongly the profound miseries suffered by the South African Black people and the grave threat posed to the front-line countries by the South African authorities.

Today, as we commemorate the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, it is time for every person and every country to reflect seriously on the untold exploitation, suppression, humiliation and suffering of Black people in South Africa and Namibia. Shouldn't we do more to help them free themselves from this barbarous and inhumane system?

I hope that the ILO and the whole international community, especially those countries which have strong influence over South Africa, will be more extensively mobilised to turn the words of the Declaration into effective actions, thus forcing the South African authorities to abandon their evil policy of apartheid and end their illegal occupation of Namibia, so that the principles and objectives embodied in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights will be truly realised in South Africa and Namibia at an early date.

(Mr. Tsujino takes the Chair).

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. FRANDIOUK (Government adviser, Ukrainian SSR) – The special Report of the Director-General on the Application of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa, and the discussion on this question at the present session of the International Labour Conference, once again focuses world attention on events in southern Africa, and the unceasing evil deeds of the apartheid regime of Pretoria.

New instances of terror against the indigenous population of South Africa, new acts of aggression of the South African racists against the front-line States and other illegal actions by the South African authorities, including those on the territory of occupied Namibia, are widely documented in the Report.

One of the latest instances of the flagrant disregard in Pretoria of the South African people's aspirations towards freedom and basic human rights is their repression of the progressive trade union movement and their ban on a political activities by a range of mass democratic organisations, including the Congress of South African Trade Unions (COSATU).

The authorities in South Africa have once again demonstrated their contempt for the United Nations Charter, the International Covenants on Human Rights and the ILO Freedom of Association and protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

The racism in South Africa has created an explosive situation in the southern part of the African continent, which presents a true threat to international peace and security.

The international community is realising more and more that the main source nourishing this dangerous focus of tension is the direct support given to the apartheid regime by a number of Western States, their transnational companies and major international banks and financial institutions.

We feel that, in the present circumstances, only firm and concerted action by all States in the struggle against apartheid could make a start to the task of achieving a political settlement in southern Africa on the basis of a balance of interest among all the countries caught up in this regional conflict. The basis for such activities should be the urgent implementation of the relevant decisions of the United Nations and the Security Council, the granting of independence to Namibia, strict observance of the arms embargo and absolute refusal to co-operate with South Africa in the design and manufacture of nuclear arms or any other weapons of mass destruction.

With its great international prestige and importance, the International Labour Organisation makes its own contribution to activating international efforts to curb apartheid. In view of this, we should like to take note of the real progress in ILO activity in the struggle against apartheid and in providing assistance to the front-line States in southern Africa. At the same time, it cannot be ignored that the effectiveness of the decisions adopted by the ILO and the activities of this Organisation to combat the policy of apartheid in South Africa is unfortunately undermined by the fact that some member countries of the ILO and certain employer circles ignore these decisions. This is obvious from the replies they have given to the ILO's requests on these matters.

The Ukrainian SSR, following its basic policy of totally rejecting all forms and manifestations of colonialism, racism and racial discrimination, fully and steadily supports the earliest possible abolition of apartheid in South Africa.

The Ukraine is taking an active part in United Nations activities in this direction, particularly in the work of the United Nations Special Committee against Apartheid and in the intergovernmental group for the monitoring of deliveries and transport of oil and oil products to South Africa. The Ukrainian SSR supports all decisions and recommendations of the United Nations and other international organisations, including the ILO, which condemn apartheid in South Africa and are aimed at its abolition, boycott and isolation.

We are in favour of taking the necessary steps to help execute United Nations action against apartheid and of the introduction of comprehensive mandatory sanctions on the basis of Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter. We support the decision of the recent Harare Conference and hope that our Conference will make a considerable contribution to further promoting international efforts against apartheid in South Africa. We feel that the adoption by this Conference of the updated Declaration and Programme of Action of the ILO will contribute to these aims.

Interpretation from German: Mr. HILGER (Government adviser, Federal Republic of Germany) – Speaking on behalf of the Twelve member States of the European Community, I would like to present our views on the work and the conclusions of the Committee on Apartheid of this Conference. The consideration of the Committee's work and conclusions take place this year against the sombre background of the situation in South Africa, which has deteriorated since we discussed this matter at our Conference last year.

Before commenting on the recommendations of the Committee and the Special Report of the Director-General, I should like at the outset to reiterate briefly the position of the Twelve. Let me first of all recall the position of the Twelve with respect to the policy of racial discrimination conducted by the Government of the Republic of South Africa as it has been explained time and again in numerous United Nations and other forums. Apartheid constitutes a flagrant violation of the fundamental human rights laid down in the United Nations Charter and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights to which the Twelve attach the highest importance. Our basic position is clear: the system of apartheid, including the "homelands" policy, must be completely dismantled to create a non-racial democratic society through the full and free exercise of adult universal suffrage by all the people in a united unfragmented South Africa with freedom and justice for all.

The Twelve share the grave and increasing concern of the whole international community over the lack of significant progress towards the abolition of apartheid in South Africa. The disturbing events of the past year have brought no comfort to those who hope to see this immoral and unacceptable system which breeds hatred and violence dismantled. Massive repression has continued unabated, human rights have been violated and censorship has been tightened and strengthened. The extension of the state of emergency continues to deprive many thousands of their freedom and has worsened prospects for peaceful change, stifling the voices of opposition. The prohibition by the South African Government in February 1988 of 17 South African organisations and COSATU, peacefully opposed to apartheid, from engaging in political activities is a further manifestation of the political suppression which has been condemned by the Twelve. This prohibition can only exacerbate further the tensions within South Africa and lead inevitably to further confrontation and polarisation. The Twelve have viewed the intensified curtailment of press freedom under the state of emergency with serious concern and have again urged the South African Government to lift its restrictions on the press without delay.

As we have repeatedly made clear, in the Twelve's eyes the apartheid system is totally unacceptable and indefensible. We are continuing to work actively for its complete and peaceful dismantlement. The Twelve are convinced that only broad-based negotiations, in which true representatives of the various components of the South African population are involved, can bring about a lasting settlement. The aim of these negotiations should be the emergence of a free, democratic, non-racial and united South Africa which takes into account the multiple facets of its society. To allow this to happen, the South African Government must take steps necessary to allow national dialogue to begin. These steps include the unconditional release of Nelson Mandela and all political prisoners, the lifting of the ban on the African National Congress, the Pan-Africanist Congress of Azania and other political parties, and the lifting of the state of emergency. We have left the South African authorities in no doubt as to the urgency of this task: the longer it is delayed, the more difficult it will become.

The Twelve and the Commission of the European Communities follow a policy designed to encourage non-violent change within South Africa and to lead to the total abolition of apartheid through peaceful means. This policy has been reflected in the implementation of programmes of positive measures aimed at assisting that part of the population disadvantaged by the apartheid system to better develop their potential. The Community's special programme in particular has concentrated mainly on the education and training sector, as well as on humanitarian and social assistance and legal assistance, particularly for those detained without charge.

The member States of the European Community continue to give active support to the non-violent opponents of apartheid through assistance provided to organisations in South Africa.

Important beneficiaries of the Twelve's programme directed at the promotion of peaceful change within South Africa are the trade unions. The Twelve firmly believe that the trade unions in that country, particularly the Black trade union movement, play an important role in the process of peaceful change in South Africa. The Twelve are of the opinion that in the past few years improvements in the position of South Africa's Black population have taken place in the field of labour relations. The Twelve are encouraging these developments through support to the Black trade union movement.

The Twelve therefore regret all the more the recent moves by the South African authorities aimed at curtailing the political activities of the trade unions.

The Twelve condemn all sorts of aggression and destabilisation committed by the South African Government against its neighbours in the region and urge that all regional problems should be settled by peaceful means.

The Twelve provide important assistance to these countries, both bilaterally and through the Southern Africa Development Co-operation Conference (SADCC). The Twelve recognise the important role that the ILO plays in providing assistance in this respect.

It is with grave concern, therefore, that the Twelve and the Commission of the European Communities view the intention of the South African Government to impose wide-ranging restrictive condition on organisations and individuals in connection with external funding.

The enactment of the Promotion of Orderly Internal Politics Bill would endanger the access of underprivileged groups in South Africa to community support for humanitarian and social assistance programmes. The adoption and implementation of the bill would, therefore, impose a severe strain on our relations with the Republic of South Africa.

The Twelve have noted some encouraging developments in the trade union movement in recent years and would be concerned at any deterioration as a result of new legislative measures in that area.

The Twelve and the Commission of the European Communities call upon the South African Government to desist from its policy of isolating the few remaining organisations and voices seeking dialogue and peaceful change within the country. The Twelve has made approaches to the South African Government to this effect.

The EC Code of Conduct for companies with subsidiaries, branches of representation in South Africa was revised in 1985, strengthened and updated and brought more in line with the changes in the social and labour fields in South Africa since its original inception in 1977.

The seventh comprehensive report on the application of the Code of Conduct by companies registered within the Community and which have subsidiaries in South Africa, covers the period from 1 July 1985 till 30 June 1986 and gives an analysis of the replies received from 265 companies. These companies had a total of 136,000 employees, among them 105,000 Black employees.

To sum up the findings of this Report, the Twelve stated the following: the number of companies that maintain relations with trade unions composed of Black workers has increased; the companies use unified schedules of payment for all employees of race; more than 95 per cent of the Black workers receive wages which are on or above the level recommended by the Code of Conduct; many companies have specific programmes for the training and advancement of Black employees and offer a whole range of voluntary social benefits.

The Twelve wish to underline once more that the Code of Conduct is an important instrument of their policy aimed at a complete abolition of discriminatory practices and of the apartheid system as a whole. They want to encourage the European companies to continue their efforts to improve the social and economic conditions of the Black workers. At the same time, the Twelve urge the South African Government to undertake specific steps to bring about the complete abolition of any racial segregation within the labour market, to repel all discriminatory laws and regulations and to set free all those, especially the trade unionists, that are detained without charge or trial.

The Twelve are convinced that international pressure is necessary and important in order to induce the South African Government to end its policy of apartheid. In addition to the positive measures referred to earlier, they have continued to implement significant and concrete measures designed to impress on the South African Government the urgent and inescapable need for fundamental reform. These measures are designed to increase the pressure on the South African Government to move towards the creation of a society free of racial discrimination. As the Twelve continue to monitor closely developments in South Africa, this series of measures, which have been outlined in the special reports of the Director-General, is kept under close review.

Turning to the Special Report of the Director General on the Application of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid, the Twelve appreciate its balanced account of, on the one hand, developments in labour and social matters of South Africa in Namibia; and on the other hand, of the action against apartheid taken by Governments, Employers' and Workers' organisations in this respect.

With respect to the report and the conclusions of the Committee on Apartheid, the Twelve wish to make the following remarks. The Report contains many thoughts which the Twelve can share or are ready to consider. However, as was also the case last year, a number of the conclusions of the Committee on Apartheid this year go beyond the mandate of the ILO. Whenever actions are proposed, it is vital to respect the competence of the United Nations and of the different international organisations and their respective organs. In this respect, the Twelve would like to reiterate that comprehensive and binding sanctions, under Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter, can only be decided upon by the Security Council.

A number of conclusions propose measures with respect to specific activities within the "homelands" or with respect to representatives of "homelands". The Twelve reiterate that they do not recognise the so-called "homelands" as entities separate from the Republic of South Africa.

Some conclusions are imprecise in their formulation and others go against what is considered in our States to be due legal process, many fail to take into account the different constitutional provisions of the member States of the ILO, especially those concerning respective competence of national, regional and local authorities.

The Twelve are also of the view that actions taken on the basis of these conclusions should not lead to additional costs for the Organisation and that any expenditure should be within the limit of the present budget.

In the face of the recent developments within and around South Africa, and in view of the great concern shared by all of us that apartheid should be abolished and very soon, the Twelve would have preferred to arrive at conclusions born of a wider consensus. This would have made these conclusions more meaningful.

Interpretation from French: Mr. CAMARA (Government delegate, Guinea) – In the name of the Guinean delegation I should first of all like to join my voice to those who have congratulated Mr. Beyr-euther on his brilliant election to the presidency of our Conference.

The question before us has always been a point to which my country has been particularly sensitive. The unjust and humiliating situation imposed on the Black workers and the Black populations in South Africa is a legitimate reason for wrath and revulsion on the part of all persons who cherish justice, dignity and peace. It is therefore not surprising that every year throughout the world this shameful system of apartheid is decried and severely condemned.

Our Conference has even set up a standing committee to follow the development of the situation of workers in southern Africa, and periodically the ILO convenes a special Conference in one of the front-line States. Nevertheless, this system continues to exist and has even recently celebrated the 40th anniversary of the ascension to power of the National Party of South Africa.

In this period of rather curious and troubling coincidences of anniversaries – on the positive side, those of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and on the negative side, that of the institutionalisation of racism as a method of government – it seems to us that we are called upon to take up more energetic action against this dehumanising system, which must be destroyed because it cannot be reformed.

The most developed countries in this world which maintain the greatest number of commercial contacts with this regime, have a greater responsibility than the others. We can only hope that finally they will undertake vigorous action, as urged by all lovers of freedom, peace, justice and progress throughout the world, to abolish apartheid once and for all. It goes without saying that my delegation gives its wholehearted support to the unanimous adoption of our Conference is Declaration on Action against Apartheid in South Africa and in Namibia.

Mr. WILLIAMS (Government delegate, Nigeria) – My delegation earlier expressed its sentiments on the personal merit of Mr. Beyreuther and on his undoubted ability to direct the affairs of this Conference to a successful conclusion. May I again pledge the very full support and co-operation of my delegation to him in the discharge of his difficult assignment.

I wish to start this address by expressing our gratitude to the Chairman and members of the Committee on Apartheid for the excellent work they have done. I should also like to express our appreciation to the Director-General of the ILO for producing an excellent report on apartheid for the Conference.

My delegation has noted with satisfaction the conclusions of the Committee on Apartheid. We are particularly happy to note the spirit of co-operation exhibited by the members of the tripartite Committee and the unanimous voice with which all participants spoke against apartheid. However, my delegation would have wished to see the conclusions and the annex – that is the Programme of Action against Apartheid – adopted by the Committee without resort to a vote.

Today is the 12th anniversary of the Soweto uprising when young men and women decided to lead a spontaneous revolt against the unjust system of apartheid. We salute those heroes and heroines who laid down their lives in defence of the freedom of the Black population of South Africa. However, it is regrettable that 12 years after Soweto the situation in South Africa has yet to change for the better. The whole world has continued to witness callous brutality, oppression and the killing of defenceless Blacks in South Africa by the agents of the racist regime. The Black population of South Africa is still subjected to hardship and all forms of humiliation. Black people are constantly harassed, tortured and oppressed. They live under permanent siege and fear and are totally unsure of their future and that of their children.

The conditions of the Black workers in South Africa have worsened since the Whites-only elections to the House of Assembly in May 1987. Real political initiatives came to a standstill because the National Party which was returned to power did not introduce the fundamental changes which Botha had declared he wanted to bring about. Instead, there was continual siege as well as an all-pervading surveillance of the Black townships by the military forces, police forces and the national security management system.

South Africa continues to undermine the stability of neighbouring countries in southern Africa, aggravating the already grave economic and social problems.

In the area of industrial relations, Black workers are subjected to inhuman labour practices. The racist regime has on many occasions employed violence in quelling peaceful industrial actions by defenceless Black workers, and in the process many have been murdered in cold blood.

Working conditions for Black workers have not seen any significant improvement. They still earn low wages and are denied freedom of association. Black trade unionists are constantly arrested, detained and killed for demanding improved working conditions for their members.

In pursuance of its policy of total liberation of Africa, Nigeria has given material, financial and moral support to the liberation movements and Front-Line States. Needless to restate here that Nigeria believes that economic sanctions could bring down the apartheid regime of South Africa, and this is why we shall continue to give material and financial support to the oppressed people of South Africa and the Front-Line States. Nigeria has demonstrated this in many ways.

At the summit meeting of the Non-Aligned Movement held in Harare in September 1986, Nigeria proposed the establishment of the Africa fund. My delegation would like to appeal to all friendly countries, individuals and organisations to contribute generously to this Fund. The South Africa Relief Fund, established in Nigeria, has offered scholarships to Black South Africans and Namibians to study at Nigerian educational institutions during the 1986-87 academic year. As the Chairman of the United Nations Special Committee against Apartheid, Nigeria has been in the forefront, championing the cause of liberation for the Black majority in South Africa.

We should like to seize this opportunity to condemn the recent clamp-down on liberation movements in South Africa and Namibia by the racist regime and the assassination of ANC representatives in many parts of the world by agents of the South African Government. We abhor in particular the cold-blooded murder of Dulcie September, the ANC representative in Paris, on 29 March 1988 by South African agents, a cowardly and brutal action of a regime whose days are numbered. We also unequivocally condemn the recently-announced proposals for Black participation by racist President Botha. The proposals are cosmetic and irrelevant to the South African situation, and the reforms, which fail to address the fundamental issues in South Africa such as the end of the state of emergency, the release of political detainees and an end to the apartheid policies, will be unacceptable.

Nigeria is totally committed to the freedom of Blacks in South Africa and we will support any measure that is designed to put an end to the oppressive and criminal system that degrades the Black race. We support any move that will completely isolate the racist regime within the international community, because the policy of apartheid is inhuman. Nigeria supports the imposition of economic and mandatory sanctions against South Africa as a way of bringing about the much-needed change in the racist enclave. We implore all progressive nations of the world to implement all ILO and United Nations resolutions on apartheid. We urge those Western countries that support the eradication of apartheid to do so both in words and in action. My delegation believes that the imposition of economic sanctions against South Africa is a credible policy option which can only be found useful when faithfully and properly applied. We believe that the South African Government will stop challenging world opinion when its few but powerful friends among the Western Powers are generally committed to the eradication of the evil policy of apartheid by imposing stringent economic sanctions against it.

I wish to conclude this address by reminding the apartheid regime of South Africa that oppressive powers like that of Botha have crumbled and the oppressed people have freed themselves from the yoke of the oppressors; where there is a will there is a way.

Africa is united in her determination to rid the continent of all oppressors. There were only 22 independent African countries when the OAU was founded in 1963, but today, 50 member States are independent. Namibia and South Africa will certainly be independent – it is only a question of time.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. TIZMAAGHZ (Government delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran) – The struggle against racial discrimination is one of the things that were decided on during the early days of the victory of the Islamic Revolution, in accordance with what the Koran has to say: "Men and women you were created as peoples and tribes so that you could make acquaintance amongst yourselves, and the best of you will be the most pious in God's eyes".

We also read in the Koran that men are equal and God is one, that an Arab is not better than a Persian and a White man is not better than a Black one. All men are equal, and as regards basic liberties, the Koran says: "Do not make another man your slave because God has created you all free."

All these principles have been adopted and applied in the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Iran. The Islamic Republic of Iran, furthermore, has broken off political, economic, military, cultural, commercial sporting and diplomatic relations with the authorities of South Africa and has prohibited the export of oil to that country and to the Zionist entity. And we appeal to all other countries and governments to do the same.

The illegal occupation of Namibia, the breach of human rights and destabilisation in that country and in the front-line States is being pursued for various reasons, including support of colonialism and imperialism, by the Pretoria authorities and the racist regime of that country. We appeal to all countries represented here to condemn and boycott that country.

We are asked today to take action to combat the policy of apartheid in South Africa and the Arab occupied territories in Palestine, and the only means of doing this is to pursue and support an armed struggle materially and otherwise, to support the front-line States, to join together to eliminate racial discrimination and to put an end to the occupation of Namibia by the South African Government, and to support the results of the Harare Conference.

The Islamic Republic of Iran is ready to support any co-operation designed to ensure objective co-operation with the workers of South Africa and the front-line States. We insist on the need to set up a special fund in which everybody would co-operate.

Mr. MEGYESI (Government adviser, Hungary) – Forty years have passed since the Universal Declaration of Human Rights stated that “all human beings are born free and equal in... rights, ... without distinction of any kind, such as race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion...”. Looking at the past, one cannot but note with regret that, despite significant changes in numerous spheres of life, there is a great deal yet to be done for us to be able to say that the ideal formulated in the Universal Declaration has universally materialised on earth.

I think it will suffice to give but a few examples in support of my statement.

Has the full equality of sexes become a reality? For all the efforts exerted, in which the ILO has also taken an active part, women are still at a disadvantage compared to men in several fields of life as regards their career prospects as well as material appreciation. As is pointed out in, among other things, the latest ILO study, women doing the same jobs earn 20 to 40 per cent less than men in many workplaces.

Has equality been attained without distinction on grounds of language? The situation of nationalities or national minorities is still not satisfactory everywhere. Their inalienable rights, such as the right to use their mother tongue or the right to cultivate their cultural traditions, which pertain to them just as to any other people or ethnic group, are being violated.

I could also refer to another elementary right reaffirmed by one of the ILO Conventions that equal conditions must be secured for access to employment.

In this forum, too, the Government of the Hungarian People's Republic speaks out for the assurance of equality for nationalities, and for the protection of their collective and individual rights. In our policy concerning nationalities, we are doing all we can to translate the principles enunciated into practical terms.

For nearly a quarter of a century, the International Labour Conference has been addressing one of the gravest violations of human rights, apartheid, which is based on racial discrimination.

We must face the sad fact that the struggle against racial discrimination is as important today as it was when the ILO adopted its Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa. In this respect the most important task still remains to do away with apartheid as soon as possible, as a most inhuman form of massive and grave violations of human rights. The Government of the Hungarian People's Republic most resolutely condemns the apartheid regime in South Africa, which has institutionalised on a racial basis the plunder of natural wealth and the exploitation of human resources in the southern part of Africa. It equally condemns the apartheid regime's destabilisation policy and armed aggressions against neighbouring countries.

As a founding member of the United Nations Special Committee against Apartheid, Hungary has taken an active part in United Nations efforts to combat apartheid, racial discrimination, and discrimination of any kind in general.

In keeping with its foreign policy principles, Hungary maintains no political, economic or other relations with the racist regime of South Africa.

The Government of the Hungarian People's Republic fully support all resolutions condemning the apartheid policy of South Africa and implements them to the full.

The past period has given unquestionable proof of the impossibility of reforming the apartheid regime. The policy of “constructive engagement” has failed. We are convinced that mandatory and comprehensive sanctions are the only means of compelling the racist Government of South Africa to change its policy, to start a dialogue with the Black majority and to introduce a democratic system.

The foregoing is ample evidence for us to see the extent to which the ideal of human equality is under attack in our days. But should this cause us to be discouraged and resigned? On the contrary, we must redouble our efforts to ensure that human equality on our globe is attained in every respect.

This is why the Government of the Hungarian People's Republic attaches great importance to the ILO Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid and lends support to its updating and amplification.

I should like to take this opportunity to express our thanks for the valuable work of the Committee on Apartheid, and I propose that the participants in this Conference accept the Committee's Report.

Interpretation from Farsi: Mr. SALIMIAN (Workers' adviser, Islamic Republic of Iran) – In the name of Allah, the Merciful, the Compassionate! “How should we not fight for the cause of Allah and of the weak, among men and women and the children who are crying. Our Lord, bring us forth from out of this town if which the people are oppressors. O give us through thy presence, some protecting friend; give us through thy presence, some protector”.

I wish to start by extending the greetings of the heroic workers of my country to our brothers who are suffering from apartheid; in particular, the great martyrs who have sacrificed their lives for the cause of the struggle against apartheid.

We propose that the report of the Committee on Apartheid be adopted by consensus by the Plenary. Although the great Iranian people are involved is an unwanted war imposed upon them and are not able to fight directly against the apartheid regime, as they wish to do according to their divine and humane duty, they are filled with a desire to give more tangible meaning to the verse I quoted at the beginning of my speech from the glorious Koran; they do wholeheartedly hope for the victory of the brave combatants who are fighting this evil of the twentieth century. I sincerely declare on behalf of the working men and women whom I am representing here that we hope, in the very near future, to be able to fight alongside them in a united front against the apartheid regime and to overthrow it in a fully armed struggle. The world should be told very clearly that the apartheid regime cannot be guided to the right path by preachings. This bloodthirsty regime ruling over South Africa does not seem to intend setting aside its cruelties, even in the face of resolutions, statements or even general universal condemnation. As a matter of fact, the capitalists ruling over South Africa see nothing other than the gold mines which belong to the oppressed people of that country; indeed, they take no criticism of their ways seriously.

Apartheid is based on force and Mr. P. W. Botha and his apprentices see the only way to survival through the application of force and leave no crime uncommitted towards that end. If this were not the case, it would have been unnecessary for them to occupy militarily the neighbouring countries in the face of the support of the front-line States for the oppressed people of South Africa. Unfortunately, they have waged shamelessly open military aggressions against the freedom seekers. The question still remains as to why the great powers of the world, who break through the borders of other countries, are now standing silent in the face of all these aggressions. They are surviving only by condemning without any tangible results the justified acts of the liberation seekers; they are breaking through the borders of other countries from a great distance, on the pretext of defending democracy. They push into those countries with all their military machinery, with their war machines, and kill thousands of people with chemical bombs as in Halabja; they massacre all the freedom-seeking people, children, women, defenceless people who are defending their rights and struggling for the liberation of Palestine; they falsely defend human rights and justify their silence by stating that any action against apartheid is an interference in the internal affairs of the South African regime. Nevertheless, since we cannot remain silent in the face of any obvious breach of human rights, particularly the breach of the rights of the Black majority in South Africa under the apartheid regime, what can be done?

As a positive step forward we have proposed that the main supporters of the apartheid regimes, namely the great Satan, America, and the veteran colonialist power, Great Britain, should have their membership suspended.

I should, in conclusion, emphasise our demand, which was also reflected in the Committee on Apartheid, that well-planned action should be taken to assist the struggles of the liberation-seeking Black majority in South Africa. Whatever measures are necessary for the furtherance of the cause of the liberation-seeking people of South Africa should be taken. As a first step, there should be an appendix to the report of the Committee listing governments, trade unions and employers' associations which have taken some tangible action instead of just pronouncing empty slogans.

In the future, only those people who can make a firm commitment should take the floor and have the right to address the Conference and the Committee on Apartheid.

The victory of the freedom-seeking people of South Africa is assured and Allah has determined that the oppressed shall become the rulers of the world.

Peace be upon us and the true followers of Allah!

Interpretation from French: Mr. GEORGET (Employers' delegate, Niger) – I am speaking on behalf of my colleagues of the Executive Committee of the Pan-African Confederation of Employers, somewhat belatedly I admit and I apologise to the interpreters for not having prepared a statement. But when the time comes to talk about apartheid I think that as a good African I don't exactly have to have a written speech before me to know what to say. As they say in French, "when one understands something clearly, the words to express it come easily".

Before starting, I would like to congratulate the President and other officers of the Conference on their election to these positions of weighty responsibility.

Allow me also to congratulate the officers of the Committee on Apartheid, directed by an excellent man whose warmth and ability are very well known to us. I have had the luck to visit his country; he welcomed us warmly in Harare. I am speaking of course of our brother and friend, the Minister of Labour of Zimbabwe, Dr. Nkomo. I would also like to pay tribute to his two Vice-Chairmen and the Reporter who asked us this morning to say a few words for the record.

* As regards the analysis of this report, I cannot but support very sincerely what the Employers' spokesman of the Committee, our distinguished brother and friend, Mr. Nkomo, who did an excellent job, said so firmly and carefully concerning the position of the Employers, even if some reservations were expressed in our group which we, of course, took into consideration. However, we certainly do not think that those who expressed reservations in any way condone apartheid since we all know them very well. The Committee, I think, worked in a most excellent fashion. I have never seen a calmer or more measured Committee on Apartheid, whose excellent work may be taken into consideration by all governments and workers' and employers' organisations, and recommended to friendly countries as a resolution which is consistent with the Constitution or our Organisation.

And it is this point I wish to discuss, since racism and the violation of the rights to live and exist and have one's dignity as a man, are prohibited by the Charter of our Organisation, which seeks to defend man and his integrity. I hope this interpretation will be better understood, at least in its application in the field, and I hope it will help us to eliminate apartheid. As President Sam Nujoma said, and as our late President said, all those who live here on this planet, Black and White, must live in peace to build their future.

After all, that is the very aim of our struggle against apartheid. We haven't come here to say "go away"; we have come here to say "Work together. Build peace together. Forget all resentment." As Sam Nujoma told us, "Africa is built on forgiveness." I can't imagine that anyone here would say that they support apartheid; no one supports injustice; no one will convince me that he really feels that he can defend apartheid. No one would dare. I believe in reason. I believe we have to help each other to live in peace. I believe we have to do everything we can to implement the updated resolution drawn up in Harare, in an atmosphere of peace and mutual understanding with a resolute determination to uproot apartheid. This was the spirit that reigned in the Committee on Apartheid, reflecting the will of its members.

I called upon the Conference to adopt the report by consensus.

I appeal to all delegates here – government, employers and workers – to support the report without reservation. What it says I need not repeat.

Apartheid is on its way out. Whether we like it or not, it will disappear. But we hope that those who will be helping us to overcome apartheid, will do so in the interest of this vast country which needs peace, which needs to build.

Africa needs peace, not fighting.

Let us build peace. This hall is a hall of peace, a hall in which we must build peace and solidarity, and remember that all men are equal. That is the message of the African Employers – solidarity, equality, complementarity and peace for our continent, which so desperately needs it to develop economically and socially to the benefit of all who live on earth.

Mr. AHMED (Workers' delegate, Pakistan) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I take this opportunity to associate myself with earlier speakers who have demonstrated their full support to the cause of the struggling peoples of Africa and Namibia against the racist regime of South Africa.

Apartheid is a crime against mankind and our Organisation, the International Labour Organisation, by its Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia has upheld the right to develop in full freedom and economic security of all human beings, irrespective of race, colour or creed.

We are celebrating the 40th anniversary of the United Nations Declaration of Human Rights which is also stands for these principles, and all religions, including Islam, and reform in all ages has upheld the principle of the quality of man and of non-discrimination on the basis of race, colour and creed.

The Holy Prophet said that no man can claim superiority wholly on the basis of colour and creed: only by virtue of his noble acts is one man superior to another. But it is sad to find that even in this age, the crime is being committed in South Africa.

We, in the Workers' group, have always supported the just cause of the struggling peoples of South Africa and Namibia. And I think our recent Conference which was held in Harare also demonstrated solidarity with those struggling people. Our group at that Conference was led by Mr. Muhr, representing the Workers' group, and we appreciate the work done at that Conference as well as the recent work done by the distinguished members of the Committee on Apartheid under the chairmanship of Mr. Nkomo, assisted by Mr. Hernandez, the Employers'

Vice-Chairman and the Workers' Vice-Chairman, Mr. Mercier.

This work is reflected in Provisional Record No. 19. We in Pakistan, have no relations with the racist regime of South Africa and we have continually supported the just cause of the struggling peoples of South Africa and Namibia. On this occasion, we express our continued solidarity and condemn the atrocities which are being committed in South Africa, particularly against the struggling people and workers, by virtue of various discriminatory acts, including the recent legislation which has been imposed in violation of trade union rights.

And we fully share the views of the Workers' group expressed in this report and again congratulate the Chairman and other members. We urge the adoption of the report.

Mr. KUSUMOTO (Government adviser, Japan) – The Government and the people of Japan have consistently maintained that the South African Government's policy of apartheid violates the principles of racial equality and respect for fundamental human rights and freedom and that such a policy therefore should be abolished once and for all.

In this spirit, we have taken very strict measures against South Africa. First of all, Japan is the only country among the industrialised democracies that has no diplomatic relations with South Africa, nor has Japan accorded any recognition to the so-called independent homelands. In an effort to limit contacts between the peoples of the two countries, Japan has imposed restrictions on sports, cultural and educational exchanges, it has suspended the issuance of tourist visas to South African nationals and has urged the Japanese people to refrain voluntarily from visiting South Africa.

Japan refuses to engage in military or nuclear co-operation of any kind with South Africa. In the field of economic and trade relations, Japan has banned all direct investment in South Africa since the end of the 1960s. It has restricted commercial loans and urged all those concerned to co-operate in halting the import of krugerrands and other gold coins.

Its trade restrictions vis-à-vis South Africa also include prohibition on iron and steel imports, on arms exports and on the export of computers to South African institutions that impose apartheid.

It has suspended air links with that country and prohibits its government officials from using international flights of South African Airways. Moreover, recognising the need for concerted action, the Japanese Government has appealed to the Japanese business community to ensure that their commercial activities will not, in any way, undermine or weaken the effectiveness of sanctions or similar punitive measures taken by other countries.

The Japanese business community has heeded this appeal.

On the other hand, we consider it very important to give assistance to the victims of South Africa's policy of apartheid while taking the various restrictive measures which I have just decried. From this viewpoint, we have been making voluntary contributions to such schemes as the United Nations Educational and Training Programme for southern Africa, the United Nations Trust Fund for South Africa and the United Nations Trust Fund for Publicity Against Apartheid.

In addition, we provided last year direct assistance of US $400,000 for the benefit of Black people who are victims of apartheid in South Africa. We intend to expand such assistance this year.

It should not be forgotten that southern African countries are being affected by the situation in South Africa and are facing various difficulties. We have a high regard for the persistent efforts made by southern African countries to uphold their economic independence from South Africa and promote their own development.

Last year a high-level government mission was sent to Tanzania, Zimbabwe, Zambia and Mozambique to discuss economic co-operation and study their various needs. We have been acting upon their request that the mission received and have already extended offers of grant assistance for rehabilitation and development projects in those countries.

We also intend to increase further our economic co-operation with them.

Japan attaches great importance to promoting political dialogue with the regional leaders, including the Black leaders of southern Africa. Last year we had the pleasure of welcoming such important visitors as Doctor Oliver Tambo, President of the ANC, and Prime Minister Musokotwane of Zambia. Similar important dialogues are continuing this year in my country with President Chissano of Mozambique and Vice-President Peter Mmusi of Botswana, who is also President of the Council of Ministers of the Southern African Development Co-ordination Conference.

We are very much concerned about the continuing unrest and disturbances in South Africa and deeply regret the recent decision taken by the South African Government to extend, once again, the state of emergency. We strongly demand that South Africa revoke the state of emergency immediately, lift the existing ban on anti-apartheid organisations and release political prisoners, thus permitting the peaceful settlement of the South African issue through dialogue as soon as possible.

We also demand that South Africa take concrete and fundamental measures to abolish apartheid and present to the international community a credible timetable for the achievement of that goal.

I would like to take this opportunity to touch upon the report of the Committee on Apartheid. This year the report intends to adopt a proposed Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia which was adopted at the tripartite conference held in Harare from 3 to 6 May 1988. My delegation regrets to state that certain articles in the Programme of Action annexed to the proposed Declaration, such as I(a) and II, prevent us from fully supporting the proposed Declaration. In our view, such measures fall outside the scope of the mandate of the ILO and should be taken up at other appropriate UN forums.

The international community must be relentless in exerting suitable political and economic pressure on South Africa until it recognises that apartheid is totally inadmissible and that it must be eradicated. Japan, for its part, will continue to explore all possible avenues toward this end.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. HEREDIA PEREZ (Government adviser, Cuba) – Now that we are celebrating the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the Director-General in his Report has provided us with a valuable study of this topic to which this Conference has devoted special attention. Paradoxically, however, at this time of commemoration, this forum has to contend with the hideous violation of human rights and fundamental freedoms which is the crime of apartheid.

Deplorably, once again, we meet to note with sadness and horror that in South Africa and Namibia there is still a social system that enshrines and institutionalises a disgraceful inequality which involves the unleashing of a cruel repression against the immense majority of the population. We are also aware of the present struggle to once again to prevent the lives of valiant fighters from being cut short – I am thinking in this case of the Sharpeville Six.

Today, the Government delegation of Cuba would like to voice once again its most energetic rejection of the regime of apartheid and condemn its policy of violating human rights in southern Africa.

My country also wishes to express once again its support for the independence of Namibia, whose people continue to be denied this legitimate right by the Pretoria regime.

The Cuban Government delegation would also like to state its solidarity with the Front-line States which continue to be the object of countless aggressions, even military aggression, perpetuated by South Africans themselves as well as by their agents. It is known that Pretoria continues to use mercenaries against the legitimate governments of those countries and tries to destabilise them politically, economically and militarily.

Cuba also supports the result of the Tripartite Conference on Action against Apartheid recently held in Harare. It endorses most firmly the work of the Committee on Apartheid including the proposals contained in the Report which is before you, proposals which imply strengthening the ILO Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa. Along the same lines, the Special Report of the Director-General on the Application of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa, which is presented to this Conference, also deserves our appreciation.

As we indicated earlier to the Committee on Apartheid, it is evident that the situation of the Black population, and particularly that of the workers in South Africa, is worsening day by day. There are innumerable examples of this. At the same time, resistance is hardening to the oppression practised by South Africans, against those who suffer from fascist repression, who are murdered, tortured and subjected to other police measures. Despite the repression, however, tens of thousands of men, women and children continue to protest and it has not been possible to stifle the struggle of the African population which, led by SWAPO and ANC, are well on their way to freedom.

On this occasion, Cuba wishes to reiterate its unshakeable solidarity with national liberation movements that are tirelessly struggling against apartheid, and calls upon the international community to condemn aggressions against the Front-line States.

My delegation condemns the military, economic and diplomatic support provided to the racists by their allies. This is the corner-stone of the hateful system of racial segregation which, in South Africa and Namibia, oppresses millions of human beings.

In conclusion, the Government delegation of Cuba wishes once again to reaffirm the principles of resolution 435 of the United Nations Security Council, and voices its support both for the struggle against apartheid in South Africa and for the independence of the valiant people of Namibia.

Mr. FREEMAN (Government delegate, United States) – My delegation believes apartheid to be the rootcause of economic misery and political instability in southern Africa.

Helping to dismantle apartheid and assisting those South Africans of all races who are working to create a non-racial democratic society in South Africa constitutes the number one United States foreign policy objective in the African continent, along with ridding the south-western region of Africa of foreign military forces, securing Namibian independence and achieving peace and stability within Angola.

The United States takes a backseat to no nation represented in this hall in pursuing a foreign policy aimed at achieving these objectives.

The United States is also implementing legislation which imposes, we believe, the toughest sanctions against South Africa in the world. Even tougher sanctions are currently under consideration by the United States Congress in reaction to the latest developments in South Africa. These sanctions are intended to send a message to the supporters of the status quo in South Africa that, failing to demonstrate sustained progress in dismantling apartheid and in establishing a fully participatory democratic system for the benefit of all, it is they and not us who are cutting themselves off from the civilised world.

However, the United States cannot concur in a call by this body for comprehensive and mandatory sanctions, the severance of all diplomatic relations and other similar measures contained in the proposed Declaration and the annexed Programme of Action. Such provisions run counter to United States policy to impinge on the national sovereignty of other countries and exceed the mandate of the ILO.

Some of the operative paragraphs of the draft document are within the mandate of the ILO and we can endorse them. Others we can concur with in principle, but must object because they exceed the ILO's mandate, and still others, such as those I have just mentioned, we oppose both on policy grounds and because they fall outside the legitimate purview of this Organisation.

Sending a message to the South African Government is one thing, but we seriously doubt that apartheid can be defeated by isolating South Africa from the outside world or by heaping more economic hardship on all of southern Africa.

Apartheid, in our political judgement, will be defeated only when its victims gain the economic and concomitant political power to liberate themselves. What few positive changes that have occurred in South Africa in recent years, such as the abolition of the pass laws and job reservation, have come about largely when Blacks have gained enough economic power to make such discriminatory laws unenforceable.

This is what we find so promising about the emergence of the Black trade union movement inside South Africa. More Black power means more power to break down the structure of apartheid. Indiscriminate sanctions mean less Black economic power.

Accordingly, the emphasis in the United States anti-apartheid policy will continue to be on positive measures designed to advance Black economic empowerment, to strengthen apartheid's victims to wage a legal and moral struggle for their solution and to encourage and facilitate dialogue among South Africans of all races who are courageous enough to work together to throw off the shackles of fear and mistrust that are the chief underpinnings of apartheid.

Our position is spelled out in greater detail in the report of the Committee where we made very clear our non-concurrence with some of the key provisions of the Declaration and Programme of Action. But we think it would be a mistake in this plenary to overemphasise the points that divide us. While there may be differences reflected here over tactics, the message that should emanate from this hall today is that the civilised world is united in its determination to see an end to the system of apartheid. In that interest, I will let pass without comment some unfounded and distorted statements that were heard earlier from this tribune during the course of its discussion. However, let me just say that in addition to being extraneous to the topic of this sitting, we find offensive the effort of some delegates to turn the word "racism" on its head and to nullify its meaning by applying it to a political conflict at an other part of the world between two peoples of the same race. And to answer on a positive note, regarding concrete positive measures which the ILO could take that are within its mandate, we have been pleased to learn that the Black trade union movement inside South Africa has recently forwarded a complaint to the ILO which presents this Organisation with a unique opportunity to bring its supervisory machinery into play in the South African case. This potentially is an extremely promising development which would have the full support of the United States.

(Mr. Beyreuther takes the Chair.)

Mr. TEFERI (Workers' adviser, Ethiopia) – May I congratulate the President on his election to the presidency of this 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. I am fully confident that his experience and competence will bring this session to a successful conclusion.

May I also congratulate the Director-General of the ILO for his well-assessed and detailed Special Report on the Application of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa presented to this session. The Report has fully enabled us to update our knowledge of the situation in South Africa and the atrocities of the intransigent Pretoria regime against the Black population of South Africa and Namibia, as well as the neighbouring countries, have been increasingly worsening. The South African racist regime, defiant of international pressure and world public opinion, has completely refused to bring about any fundamental political change in its racist policy. It continues to strengthen its repressive measures against the people and to threaten the stability of neighbouring countries.

As clearly indicated in the Special Report of the Director-General, the continuing state of emergency sanctioned by the harsh security laws and the resulting wave of brutal military and police repression, as well as the hunting surveillance exercised by the national security, have further exacerbated the political and economic crisis of South Africa.

The massive detentions without charge or trial, tortures and brutal killings inflicted upon the Black population, have aggravated the situation.

In the ever-worsening tragic situation in southern Africa, trade unions and workers' organisations have stood at the forefront of the struggle for freedom. They have also become the primary targets of the outrageous acts of the racist Pretoria regime. The right of association and collective bargaining have been drastically curtailed; child labour, low wages and job insecurities are normal phenomena. Migrant workers also suffer from severe exploitation and harassments.

In the circumstances of the increasingly widening popular unrest and courageous struggle of the Black population of South Africa and Namibia, the past year has been marked with the consolidation and growth of the trade union movements. They have become strong forces challenging the racist Government on issues of vital importance to workers and the Black population. They have been strongly pressing the regime to give immediate solutions to the deteriorating living conditions of the Black population, growing unemployment and increasing trade union repression.

The past year is also marked by increased violence by the Government against workers and their organisations. The various restrictions imposed on the activities of trade unions, police harassments of strikers, massive detentions of trade union officials and their members, as well as bombing of trade union offices, has further impeded trade union activities and has aggravated gravely and reprehended the working and living conditions of Black workers. Hence, this is the crucial moment when they need our unreserved support and assistance.

We, the workers of Ethiopia, hail the courageous struggle of the workers and people of South Africa and Namibia to attain complete independence and freedom.

As we have repeatedly expressed and demonstrated by action on various occasions, the Ethiopian workers strongly support the just and courageous struggle of South African and Namibian people. The Ethiopian trade union has taken positive steps in this direction, as is indicated in our report to the Director-General of the ILO.

The Ethiopian trade union is not only sensitising public opinion and its members against apartheid but the members have pledged to give financial support to the liberation movements.

Allow me to commend the International Labour Organisation for the effective action taken against apartheid in the past year. The decision made to include an agenda item on the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference to update the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa and the convening of a Tripartite Conference on Action against Apartheid in Harare last May is highly appreciated and is a significant contribution of the ILO to its constituent Members to encourage the patriotic struggle of the people of South Africa and Namibia.

We urge the International Labour Organisation further to enhance its efforts to promote the united action of member States and to strengthen its activities of technical co-operation to assist the national and trade union movements. The continuing efforts of the ILO to help abolish this blot against humanity must be applauded and more rigorous efforts must be made towards this direction.

The South African regime would have been more easily eliminated had the international community firmly decided to fight it and had some governments ceased to provide it with military, economic and political support.

We therefore call upon those governments which have direct or indirect economic relations with South Africa to take effective measures towards comprehensive mandatory sanctions, and strongly demand the racist Pretoria regime to end its barbaric atrocities against the indigenous population of South Africa and Namibia, to lift the repressive state of emergency and release political prisoners.

Allow me finally to commend the report of the Committee on Apartheid and request its unanimous adoption by the Conference.

Mr. TSAGAAN (Workers' delegate, Mongolia) – My delegation fully shares the concern of the majority of the participants at this Session about the situation prevailing in South Africa today, where the racist regime continues to ignore international public opinion and the relevant decisions of the United Nations and other international organisations, including the International Labour Organisation.

The racial discrimination against the majority of the population, restrictions and attacks on trade union movements, the illegal occupation of Namibia and acts of aggression against the neighbouring countries are flagrant violations of common recognised rules of international law and an open challenge to the international community.

Mongolian workers in trade unions support all the efforts of the international community to reinforce the action against apartheid. In this connection, we attach significant importance to the proposed Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia, as well as the Programme of Action against Apartheid, approved by the Tripartite Conference in Harare last May.

The elimination of apartheid is essential for the maintenance of lasting peace based on social justice in South Africa.

Mongolian trade unions and workers strongly condemn the economic and military assistance provided to the racist regime by certain western countries and by the transnational corporations.

Trade unions and other public organisations of my country are taking various measures to express solidarity and support the just struggle of the trade unions and peoples of South Africa.

Every year, meetings, public gatherings and exhibitions are held throughout the country to commemorate international days, such as the International Day of Solidarity with the Struggling People of South Africa, Human Rights Day, and the International Day of Trade Union Action for Peace. The mass media in our country give wide publicity or arrange special programmes devoted to unmasking the criminal policy of apartheid and shedding light on the international community's efforts to eradicate apartheid.

I would like to take this opportunity, on behalf of the working people in the trade unions of the Mongolian People's Republic, to express once again our full solidarity with the heroic struggle of the people of South Africa and Front-line States against the aggression of the Pretoria regime.

We hope that the International Labour Organisation will make its contribution to the efforts of the international community to isolate the racist regime of South Africa.

We are in favour of the immediate imposition of comprehensive and mandatory sanctions against South Africa, in accordance with chapter VII of the United Nations Charter.

Interpretation from French: Mr. HUG (Government delegate, Switzerland) – The delegation of Switzerland does not wish to oppose, should this procedure be followed, an adoption without vote of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia. Nevertheless, I would like to state that the Declaration and the Programme of Action contains certain recommendations to which it is impossible for us to subscribe, which, moreover, are not within the field of competence of the ILO.

The text calls for very clear reservations on our part and if there were to be a vote we would have to oppose.

Having said this, I would like to recall and firmly to underline the fact that Switzerland has, for a long time now, condemned the policy of apartheid. Recent developments have only reawakened our concern and once again show us, if it is still necessary, that this policy can only prolong and aggravate the crisis in South Africa. It is not therefore tolerable. That is why I would like to state here that if we disagree as regards the means to be used, we nevertheless share the objective contained in the Declaration which is to bring an end to the regime of apartheid. Our policy wishes to be a policy which favours an approach stressing positive actions in favour of the disadvantaged classes of the South African population, and aid to the States of the region within the framework of the Southern African Development Co-ordination Conference. We would also like this policy to be one which encourages dialogue between the parties concerned – a dialogue whose urgency cannot be concealed. We therefore ask the Government of South Africa to give us, through the decisions it takes and by practical measures, reason to believe that our policy still has its raison d'être.

Mr. HEWITT (Government adviser, United Kingdom) – Many delegates here today are aware of the position my Government took last year on the report and resolution of the Conference's Committee on Apartheid. Our position has not changed. We reject many aspects, both of the Committee on Apartheid's report and the Declaration and Programme of Action against Apartheid attached to the Declaration. Many elements of the Committee's report and the attached documents exceed the mandate of the International Labour Organisation. Many of the measures recommended in the report would only serve to make the situation in South Africa worse and would do nothing to hasten the end of apartheid by peaceful means. Practical measures, not empty gestures, are needed.

We share the view of the international community that the system of apartheid that prevails in South Africa is totally abhorrent. We endorse fully the views expressed by the European Community as set out in the statement made on behalf of the European Community earlier this afternoon.

Apartheid is a repulsive and detestable system and it must go. There has to be a fundamental change in South Africa, but it must come about through positive measures to improve the social and economic conditions for the Black workers in that country.

In this respect, the European Community's Code of Conduct to which the Twelve referred in their statement is an important instrument aimed at the abolition of discriminatory practices and of the apartheid system as a whole.

We reject the Committee's decision to include Namibia within the terms of the Declaration and the Programme of Action. The issue of independence for Namibia is a separate issue and requires a different response. Security Council resolution 435 is a cornerstone of the United Kingdom Government's policy on that question.

Given the lengthy debate which has already taken place both in the Committee on Apartheid and in this plenary session, we have no wish to delay matters further by calling for a vote today. I should like to emphasise, however, that our decision not to call for a vote should not and cannot be interpreted as a change of British policy on this critical issue.

Finally, in view of what I am saying, I would ask that this statement be recorded in full in the record of this meeting.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – I have no further speakers. The conference has had a thorough discussion of the report of the Committee on Apartheid. Can I assume therefore that the Conference adopts this report and the conclusions therein, the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia and the Programme of Action against Apartheid by consensus, with the reservations expressed by certain delegates.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – I have a request for the floor from Mr. Yankey, Workers' delegate, Ghana, to make a statement on behalf of the Workers' group.

Mr. YANKEY (Workers' delegate, Ghana) – On behalf of the Workers' group, I would like to propose that the Conference send the following message to President Botha of South Africa:

The Conference of the ILO, at its 75th Session, sends this urgent appeal to you concerning the Sharpeville Six. On behalf of the governments, employers and workers of the world, we call for clemency to spare these six young lives. Such a measure could be a spark of hope at a time when hope is desperately needed. It cannot be in any one's interest to add to the tragedy and suffering of mankind by these executions, nor is there any possibility that clemency could be misinterpreted. We make this urgent appeal to you in the name of mankind.

This is a proposal from the Workers' group and is a message that we wish the Conference to adopt and deliver to President Botha of South Africa.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – Thank you, Mr. Yankey, for having presented this text to us on behalf of the Workers' group. May I take it that the Conference agrees with the text of the telegram which has been read out to you? If there are no objections, therefore, the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference will send this message, signed by the Director-General, to President Botha.

(It is so decided).

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – Before adjourning the Conference, I would like to thank Mr. Nkomo, Chairman of the Committee, Mr. Hernandez, Employers' Vice-Chairman, Mr. Mercier, Workers' Vice-Chairman, Mr. Vollebaek, Reporter, and all the members of the Committee for the very intensive work which they have done in preparing the report for today's sittings.

(The Conference adjourned at 7.30 p.m.)

Credentials

Third report of the Credentials Committee

Objections concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Chile

1. The Committee had before it objections to the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Chile submitted by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU), the World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU) as well as by a group of organisations affiliated to the "Comando Nacional de los Trabajadores" (CNT) and by the President of the "Confederación Marítima de Chile" (COMACH).

2. The objecting organisations maintained that the Workers' delegation of Chile had not been nominated in conformity with the provisions of the ILO's Constitution. These arguments related, essentially, to the persistent absence of freedom of association in Chile and to the fact that the most representative workers' organisations in the country, which were the Comando Nacional de Trabajadores (CNT) and the Confederación Democrática de Trabajadores (CDT), had not been consulted. The organisations affiliated to the CNT stated that they had unanimously decided to reject the official delegation and the President of COMACH indicated that Mr. E. Madariaga, appointed as Workers' adviser of Chile, did not represent that organisation.

3. In a written communication to the Committee, Mr. Arthur Errázuriz, Under-Secretary of Labour and Government delegate of Chile to the Conference, reiterated the position taken by the Government in 1986, namely, that the objections should be declared irreceivable since the Conference had pronounced itself in 1985 on a similar proposal for invalidation, that the Committee had no competence in questions of freedom of association and that the nomination of the Workers' delegation had been made in strict conformity with the constitutional provisions of the ILO, since consultations were held with the 31 most representative workers' organisations of the country including the "Confederación de Trabajadores de Cobre" (CTC) and the "Confederación de Empleados Particulares de Chile" (CEPCH) as well as Mr. E. Ríos Arias, President of the CDT. The communication added that the CTC, the CEPCH and Mr. Ríos Arias had rejected the Government's invitation to propose candidates to represent the workers of Chile and that it should have been absurd in these circumstances to demand that Chile include in the delegation workers who had rejected the possibility of participating in it. In this regard, the communication referred to the statement in a press report of the Secretary-General of the CNT to the effect that if an opposition figure was present at the Conference as a member of the Workers' delegation, it would amount to support of the Government and indicated that Mr. Elías Madariaga had been expelled from the CDT despite his opposition to the Government, for having accepted to be included in the Workers' delegation. Attached to the communication was a notarised certificate which set out the consultations which had taken place with the trade union organisations as well as copies of correspondence and press articles to which the Government communication referred.

4. The Committee also received a communication signed by the Workers' delegate of Chile and six of his advisers stating that while it was legitimate for any organisation to exercise its constitutional right to object to the credentials of an accredited delegation to the ILO Conference, it did not consider it acceptable for an objecting organisation, the WFTU, to employ offensive language with reference to the Workers' delegation of Chile. It added that the entities referred to by the WFTU as the most representative were de facto organisations which did not take advantage of the possibilities of association granted to them under national legislation because they did not want to reveal their limited representative character. On the contrary, the entire Workers' delegation of Chile were all highly representative leaders and enjoyed the majority support of their respective trade unions.

5. The Committee recalled that in 1986 it had considered that the objections contained new facts and allegations relating essentially to the manner in which the consultations had been held and had thus declared the objections receivable even though a proposal for invalidation had been rejected by the Conference in 1985 for lack of quorum. It pointed out that in 1986 and 1987, the reports of the Committee having been unanimous, the decisions contained therein were final and did not give rise to any decisions of the Conference which would make the objection irreceivable for subsequent years.

6. The Committee noted, as it did last year, that although consultations were directed at a series of organisations which, according to the Government, jointly were largely representative, the nomination of the persons included in the delegation had not been made with the agreement of the most representative organisations. The documentation supplied both by the objecting organisations and by the Government indicated that the executive organs of the CNT and the CDT had ordered the leaders of their affiliated organisations not to take part in the Workers' delegation to the Conference. Such boycott by persons who were leaders both of legally constituted organisations such as the CTC and the CEPCH and of de facto organisations like the CNT and the CDT had already taken place in 1987. On that occasion, the Committee had reiterated the position it had taken in previous years that, given the unsatisfactory trade union situation in Chile, it was difficult for consultations to be held in an atmosphere of freedom which should ensure that the Constitution was respected in both letter and spirit.

7. The Committee considered the position adopted by the leaders of the CNT and the CDT understandable since these organisations were not recognised and consulted as such by the Government. In this connection, it recalled the constitutional obligation of the Government to respect the tripartite structure of the International Labour Conference and the constitutional provision requiring that the Workers' delegation be nominated in agreement with the most representative organisations. This constitutional provision was intended to allow these organisations to manifest themselves in the Conference with a voice, independent and separate from the Government and was particularly relevant in those cases in which the organisations maintained positions contrary to that of the Government in matters dealt with by the ILO, including freedom of association. In this respect, the Committee pointed out that to propose candidates as delegates of advisers to a delegation should not be considered as an act of adhesion to a Government but instead could allow the leaders of these organisations to be heard at the Conference.

8. Given the decision of the Conference in 1985 not to invalidate the credentials of the Workers' delegation of Chile, none of the members of the Committee suggested that invalidation should be proposed. However, the Committee expressed its concern at the gravity of the trade union situation in Chile as reflected in the 254th and 256th report of the Committee on Freedom of Association (Case No. 1309) and urged that the Government re-examine its consultation procedures with a view to ensuring that the nominations were made in agreement with the most representative workers' organisations.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Greece

9. The Committee had before it an objection to the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Greece contained in two telegrams dated 25 May and 10 June 1988 respectively, sent on behalf of 47 federations and trade union centres claiming to belong to the General Confederation of Labour (GSEE).

10. The objecting organisations stated that since 1985, when the Government had dissolved the GSEE executive and replaced it by an executive favourable to it, the representation of the Greek workers to the Conference by such executive was unacceptable. Through acts of interference in 1986 and 1987, the Government had frustrated all attempts to put an end to the existing irregular situation.

11. The Committee pointed out that in 1987 in examining a similar objection, it had noted that the objecting organisations had not included any data permitting the Committee to determine the representative character of the objecting organisations or to support their contention that the appointed Workers' delegation was not representative. The present communication, apart from certain allegations relating to freedom of association which fell within the competence of other ILO organs, contained no data either which would allow an assessment of the representative character of the objecting organisations.

12. In these circumstances, the Committee decided, as it did last year, not to accept the objection and again reminded Governments of the need to seek to consult all representative workers' organisations with a view to securing the widest possible agreement on the composition of the Workers' delegation to the Conference.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Nicaragua

13. The Committee had before it an objection to the Workers' delegation of Nicaragua from the "Confederación de Unificación Sindical" (CUS), the "Central de Acción y Unidad Sindical" (CAUS), the "Confederación General del Trabajo" (CGT independiente), the "Central de Trabajadores de Nicaragua" (CTN autónoma), organisations affiliated to the "Congreso Permanente de los Trabajadores" (CPT), supported by the World Confederation of Labour (WCL).

14. The objecting organisations maintained that the Government unilaterally appointed a workers' representative without consulting the CPT as required under article 3, paragraph 5, of the ILO's Constitution and that the official trade unions in Nicaragua did not defend or represent the workers but rather took part in repressive actions against the independent trade union movements. In a telegram subsequently received, the Secretaries-General of the "CGT independiente" and the CAUS stated that they were prevented from attending the Conference due to the unnecessary delays in the obtention of a passport.

15. The Committee noted that the objection of the CPT did not contain any data on the representative character of the four organisations comprising it in support of its statement that it should have been consulted with respect to the nomination of the workers' delegation of Nicaragua. On the other hand, and without examining other questions which fell within the competence of other ILO organs, the Committee had no information tending to prove that the organisations to which the Workers' delegate and the advisers belonged had lost the representative character which they had in the past years. The Committee decided therefore not to accept the objection but expressed the hope that the nomination of the Workers' delegation would be made with agreement of all the most representative organisations of Nicaragua.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegate of the Philippines

16. The Committee had before it an objection from the Labor Advisory Consultative Council

(LACC) to the nomination of Mr. Ernesto F. Herrera as titular Workers' delegate of the Philippines. The objection was signed by Mr. Gregorio del Prado, as Chairman of the LACC for the month of May, 1988 and by Mr. Roberto T. Ortaliz, Council Member of the LACC.

17. The authors of the objection stated that the LACC was composed of four major labour centres, the Kilusang Mayo Uno Labor Center (KMU), the Federation of Free Workers (FFW-WCL), the Philippines Affiliates of the World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU) and the Lakas Manggagawa Labor Center (LMLC), and was the most representative workers' organisation of the Philippines at the 73rd and 74th (Maritime) Sessions of the Conference. For the present session of the Conference, the LACC has proposed Mr. Crispin Beltran, President of the KMU, as the Workers' delegate of the Philippines. That proposal had not been accepted by the Government which nominated as Workers' delegate, Senator F. Herrera, Secretary-General of the Trade Union Congress of the Philippines (TUCP). Mr. Herrera was a member of the Senate of the Philippines, his work was mainly in the legislative branch and he did not represent the workers. This nomination having been made without consulting and without the agreement of the LACC, was not in compliance with article 3, paragraph 5, of the ILO Constitution.

18. In a written communication to the Committee, Mr. Franklin M. Drilon, Secretary of Labor and Employment of the Philippines, described the consultation process which had been carried out prior to the nomination of Mr. Herrera as Workers' delegate. In particular, Mr. Drilon had himself met with the leaders of the LACC on 17 May to discuss their recommendations. The claim by LACC to be the most representative workers' organisation was not supported by any verifiable records held by the Government. Moreover, the LACC was not a duly registered labour centre. While the Government has attempted in 1987 to update union membership figures, it had not been able to complete the exercise due to the failure of the labour federations to provide sufficient data.

19. The communication also indicated that Mr. Herrera, Secretary-General of the TUCP, was a true representative of the Philippine workers, notwithstanding his membership of the Senate; Senator Herrera was an elected parliamentarian and not a representative of the administration. The communication concluded by stating that four representatives of the objecting organisation were advisers to the Workers' delegation of the Philippines. One of them, Mr. del Prado, on the same day that he signed the objection as Chairman of the LACC for May, wrote separately as Chairman of the LMLC to Mr. Herrera accepting with deepest gratitude to be an adviser in the delegation headed by him.

20. In an oral statement before the Committee, Mrs. M. N. Confesor and Mrs. V. S. Bataclan, Government advisers to the Philippines delegation, reiterated that the consultation process with the LACC and the TUCP had taken place in the normal way. The Government had nominated four persons from each of the two organisations, with Mr. Herrera as delegate. There was no way of verifying which of the two organisations was more representative since the Government's attempts in 1987 to carry out a membership audit had failed through lack of returns from the unions. While the TUCP was a registered workers' organisation, made up of various federations, the LACC, which was more of a consultative body of federations and independent unions, was unregistered. Moreover, the dynamics of workers' organisations in the Philippines were such that in 1987 and 1988 developments and changes were taking place very quickly and it was not always easy to keep abreast of them. The KMU, the section of LACC from whom the objection came, was consulted as one of the constituents of LACC about the composition of the Philippine Workers' delegation and in fact one of its members, Mr. Malonzo, was included in the delegation. It was true, however, that the leading candidate of LACC, also a member of KMU, Mr. Beltran, had not been offered a place in the Workers' delegation.

21. In oral statements before the Committee, three representatives of the objecting organisation, Mr. Beltran, Mr. Arellano and Mr. de la Cruz, claimed the LACC was indeed the most representative workers' organisation in the Philippines, covering some 75-80% of organised labour. Mr. Beltran, proposed as Workers' delegate by the LACC, had not even been appointed as an adviser. Moreover, the fact that the Workers' delegate was a Senator effectively made the Philippines delegation a bipartite rather than a tripartite one.

22. In reply to questions from the Committee, the representatives of the objecting organisation indicated that the letter of 27 May from Mr. del Prado, one of the signatories of the objection, expressing pleasure at being appointed an adviser to Mr. Herrera, had to be seen simply as a personal letter written in his capacity as head of the LMLC. The fact that LACC was not a registered organisation was not important since the obligation to register applied only to individual unions and federations. In fact, TUCP's registration was not a formal registration in this sense but rather a notice of its existence. Moreover, some years ago TUCP had been a part of LACC but that neither the LACC nor the TUCP had the right to engage in collective bargaining. In their opinion no real consultations had taken place and the nomination had ignored the terms of a "gentlemen's agreement" between the various parties which had been in existence for the last two years.

23. The Committee noted that the absence of membership data did not permit it to take a position on which organisation was the most representative and that this absence was partly due to the fact that these organisations did not co-operate sufficiently with the labour administration on the matter. In 1986, in the absence of such data, the Committee had not been able to conclude that the objecting organisation (TUCP) which had nominated the titular delegate in the previous years had lost its representative character. This year, for the same reasons, the Committee was not able to conclude either that the LACC had lost the representative character it had in 1986 and 1987. The Committee noted, however, that the Government had conducted consultations and had nominated four persons from the LACC as advisers although, surprisingly, it had not included in the delegation Mr. Beltran who had been the leading candidate of the LACC.

24. In these circumstances, the Committee decided not to uphold the objection. At the same time, it expressed the hope that, in the future, the Government would provide data which would permit it to assess the representative character of the workers' organisations.

Late objection

25. The Committee received on 10 June 1988 a telegram from Mr. Orangzaib Durrani, President of an organisation whose name was illegible, objecting to the credentials of Mr. Rehmatullah Chaudhry, Workers' adviser of Pakistan.

26. As the name of the Workers' adviser appeared in the list of delegations published on 1 June 1988, this objection was lodged after the expiry of the time limit of 72 hours prescribed in article 26, paragraph 4(a), of the Standing Orders of the Conference and, as such, was not receivable.

27. The Credentials Committee submits the present report to the Conference in order that the Conference may take note of it.

Provisional Record

Seventy-fifth Session, Geneva, 1988

Fifth Item on the Agenda: Employment Promotion and Social Security

Report of the Committee on Employment and Social Security

1. The Committee on Employment and Social Security was set up by the International Labour Conference at its third sitting on 2 June 1988. It was originally composed of 184 members (71 Government members, 52 Employers' members and 61 Workers' members). To achieve equality of voting strength, each Government member was allotted 3,172 votes, each Employers' member 4,331 votes and each Workers' member 3,692 votes. The composition of the Committee was subsequently modified seven... times¹ during the session and the number of votes attributed to each member was adjusted accordingly.

2. The Committee elected the following Officers:

Chairman: Mr. van den Berg (Government member, Netherlands);

Vice-Chairmen: Mr. Rey (Employers' member, Mauritius) and Mr. Seidman (Workers' member, United States);

Reporter: Mr. Schneuwly (Government member, Switzerland).

The representatives of the Secretary-General were Mr. Tamburi and Mr. Perrin.

3. The Committee set up a Drafting Committee composed of Mr. Fontaine (Government member, Canada), Mr. Burge (Employers' member, United States) and Mr. Lambert (Workers' member, France). It was further agreed that the members of the Drafting Committee would be accompanied by Mrs. Samuel (Government member, Cyprus), Mr. van Holm (Employers' member, Belgium) and Mr. Seidman (Workers' member, United States).

4. The Committee had before it two reports: Report V(1) and V(2A) and (2B), prepared by the International Labour Office and entitled Employ- ment promotion and social security. The proposed Convention and proposed Recommendation submitted by the Office were contained in Report V(2B).

5. The Committee held 16 sittings.

General discussion

6. A representative of the Secretary-General noted that the proposed texts in Report V(2B) were based both on the replies received from governments summarised in Report V(2A) and on the discussions of the informal tripartite Working Party which met in November 1987, in accordance with the suggestion made by the Government member of Malta during the first discussion.

7. The Employers' members underlined the progress achieved since the previous year but stated that many problems still existed. They particularly recalled their strong desire for a Recommendation rather than a Convention. It was indispensable that the texts adopted reflected all necessary flexibility in accordance with article 19, paragraph 3, of the Constitution. In this respect existing international standards contained numerous precedents. The proposed texts, in particular Articles 5 and 11, already constituted an improvement in relation to those adopted last year, but Part VII which concerned new applicants for employment still appeared to be too ambitious.

8. The Workers' members recalled that according to the Director-General's Report "the realisation of the right to social security necessarily involves the progressive development of protection in accordance with available resources." Account should be taken in particular of different degrees of development without adopting double standards. Progress had been accomplished in this respect since the first discussion. It was hoped that the work of the Committee would result in a Convention and a Recommendation acceptable to the three groups.

9. The Government member of India stated that the insufficient resources of the developing countries did not enable them to finance employment promotion and unemployment benefits at the same time. In India there were social security schemes, but their scope was still limited and priority was given to employment promotion. The proposed Convention was too ambitious an objective for India and for developing countries in general. Rather than adopting a Convention, which might exclude developing countries, it would be preferable to adopt only a Recommendation.

- (a) 3 June: 194 members (72 Government members with 3,685 votes each; 55 Employers' members with 4,824 votes each; and 67 Workers' members with 3,960 votes each);
- (b) 6 June: 178 members (74 Government members with 675 votes each; 54 Employers' members with 925 votes each; and 50 Workers' members with 999 votes each);
- (c) 7 June: 176 members (74 Government members with 216 votes each; 54 Employers' members with 296 votes each; and 48 Workers' members with 333 votes each);
- (d) 8 June: 167 members (75 Government members with 2,107 votes each; 49 Employers' members with 3,225 votes each; and 43 Workers' members with 3,675 votes each);
- (e) 10 June: 160 members (76 Government members with 36 votes each; 48 Employers' members with 57 votes each; and 36 Workers' members with 76 votes each);
- (f) 13 June: 157 members (76 Government members with 799 votes each; 47 Employers' members with 1,292 votes each; and 34 Workers' members with 1,786 votes each);
- (g) 15 June: 174 members (76 Government members with 184 votes each; 46 Employers' members with 304 votes each; and 32 Workers' members with 437 votes each).

10. The Government member of Brazil emphasised that Brazil was a country of contrasts, characterised by regional imbalances. The two objectives of employment promotion and unemployment protection should be compatible. Brazil's experience with unemployment benefits was very recent, as its legislation, which was at present undergoing revision, was only two years old. It was important to adopt a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation, subject to a re-examination of the levels established in the proposed Convention.

11. The Government member of the USSR felt that the proposed texts were acceptable. The setting up of the Working Party had been justified. The part of the proposed Convention concerning the promotion of productive and freely chosen employment was welcome. In the USSR a Decree on employment, adopted in January 1988, provided in particular for retraining to enable workers to adapt their skills to technological changes and thus avoid unemployment. It also allowed workers who have been laid off or who have refused a job offered in their undertaking to request the assistance of an employment service or to set up their own employment. In addition, undertakings were required to announce envisaged lay-offs to this service and to indicate the characteristics of the jobs concerned. New applicants for employment (the subject of Part VII) should not be excluded from the proposed Convention and the obligation of governments to provide medical care to the unemployed should be specified more clearly.

12. The Government member of the United States believed that the new instruments should reflect current economic realities, namely, diminished economic growth, high levels of unemployment, in particular long-term unemployment, and strains on national financial resources. It was important to adopt a Convention and Recommendation based on sound general principles which recognised differing national circumstances, including those of economically developed countries, respected the necessity of a balance between employment promotion and unemployment protection, and took account of the great diversity of possible approaches. It was necessary, in particular, to make a distinction between contributory unemployment insurance schemes and non-contributory unemployment assistance schemes. In the United States 16 million jobs had been created in the past 65 months, unemployment had dropped to 5.4 per cent and policies intended to foster growth and to lower inflation had succeeded. However, there were still a substantial number of long-term unemployed workers, some geographic areas of high unemployment and a high budget deficit, and there was continuing concern about productivity and the competitiveness of the economy.

13. The Government member of Turkey expressed the firm hope that the texts of the proposed Convention and Recommendation would lead to the adoption of satisfactory instruments which responded to modern requirements. In Turkey, since the end of 1987, the Government had adopted several essential projects. The management of the employment organisation was to become tripartite, and special measures for training and retraining as well as appropriate facilities for the elderly, the disabled and women were to be provided. Courses for the entry into working life of youth were to be organised, more detailed information was to be supplied to a wider public with the use of modern information systems and part-time work was to be encouraged.

14. The Government member of Cyprus considered that the proposed texts were sufficiently flexible. Whilst there was still room for some more flexibility, care should be taken to avoid weakening the texts in the effort to make them even more flexible. The objective should be to adopt a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation which guaranteed genuine protection for the persons concerned.

15. The Government member of Japan felt that the texts of the instruments should be very flexible in order for them to be widely accepted and to take account of a diversity of employment situations, financial possibilities and the labour market. The content of the instruments should reflect their title as closely as possible. In Japan benefits were accorded with a view to guaranteeing an adequate standard of living for the unemployed while at the same time maintaining their possibilities of securing a new job.

16. The Government member of China stressed the need to revise the Unemployment Provision Convention, 1934 (No. 44), taking into consideration current realities, through the adoption of a revised Convention supplemented by a Recommendation. The creation of jobs and unemployment insurance were linked. In China, the provision of unemployment benefits was an incentive for the unemployed to register as applicants for employment.

17. The Government member of Canada was in favour of the proposed texts of the Convention and Recommendation. However, the Convention should be centred more on general principles and be sufficiently flexible to obtain a greater number of ratifications than Convention No. 44. Clear distinctions had to be established between different methods of protection.

18. The Government member of Australia expressed satisfaction that the proposed texts did not exclusively reflect a European model. An appropriate flexibility clause should nevertheless be introduced for the developed countries which were facing difficulties on certain particular points, but in which the system surpassed the requirements of the proposed texts on a number of points.

19. The Government member of Bulgaria emphasised that in this anniversary year of the adoption of international instruments on human rights, the Committee's responsibility to link the promotion of the right to work and the right to social protection was even greater. The proposed texts were satisfactory. Nevertheless, the provisions related to the promotion of productive employment should take account of the possibilities offered by co-operative forms of the organisation of production, especially in the Article on the scope of persons protected by the proposed Convention and in the light of the Occupational Health Services Convention, 1985 (No. 161). Concerning new applicants for employment, special priority should be given to those facing the greatest difficulty in finding employment either because they had never worked or because they lacked skills. The socialist countries of Eastern Europe, while conscious of existing difficulties, supported the adoption of a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation which, in any case, was a desirable objective.

20. The Government member of Malta expressed satisfaction with the work accomplished by the tripartite Working Party.

21. The Government member of Tunisia stated that his Government encouraged undertakings to create jobs by allowing them exemptions from contributions. Early retirement was encouraged and assistance was provided to the unemployed. The proposed texts, however, established objectives difficult to attain. A Recommendation would be preferable.

22. The Government member of Kenya favoured the adoption of a Recommendation.

Consideration of the proposed Convention in Report V(2B)

PREAMBLE

23. The Workers' members submitted an amendment (D.6) to include in the fourth preambular paragraph the Labour Administration Convention, 1978, as the proposed Convention also contained provisions of an administrative nature. This amendment was adopted by consensus.

24. The Employers' members submitted an amendment (D.39) to modify the text of the eighth preambular paragraph. This amendment led to a number of subamendments from the Workers' members. Their proposal to replace the words "non-inflationary" by the words "in real terms", which were in the initial text, was withdrawn as the wording of the Employers' amendment corresponded to the terminology used in the report of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment referred to on page 36 of Part I of the Report of the Director-General. The Employers' members supported, on the other hand, the proposal of the Workers' members to insert the words "and freely chosen" between "all forms of productive" and "employment". They also accepted the Workers' members' proposal to replace the words "developmental activities" by "activities which promote employment". In addition, the Employers' members supported the Workers' members' proposal to delete the adjective "transitional" with respect to "employment assistance", given that in the proposed Convention it was the benefits which were of a transitional character. Finally, the Employers' members supported the proposal of the Workers' members to delete the word "genuinely" with respect to the involuntary nature of the causes of unemployment at the end of this preambular paragraph, as this was implicit in the definition of the contingencies covered in Article 10, and in the case of refusal of benefits in Article 20. The Employers' members' amendment, as subamended, was adopted by consensus.

25. The Preamble, as amended, was adopted.

PART I. GENERAL PROVISIONS

Article 1¹

26. The Government member of Turkey submitted a drafting amendment (D.13) to add the definitions of "full unemployment" and "partial unemployment" which were contained in the provisions of proposal Article 10. The Committee decided however that it was not appropriate to amend Article 1 as there were other cases where certain terms were defined in the body of the proposed Convention. The amendment was rejected.

27. Article 1 was adopted without change.

28. An amendment submitted by the Employers' members concerning only the Spanish text was referred to the Drafting Committee.

29. The Committee then decided to give priority to the examination of an amendment submitted by the Government members of Denmark, France, Federal Republic of Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Spain and the United Kingdom (States Members of the European Community) to replace Article 2 by another text in which the term "social security system" was replaced by "system of protection against unemployment". They noted that this change corresponded to the title of the proposed Convention. The Government member of the Federal Republic of Germany specified that the expression "full employment" corresponded to a general economic situation and not to full-time employment. The amendment was adopted by consensus.

30. A discussion followed on the possibility of examining an amendment (D.42) submitted by the Government member of Hungary, in view of the priority which had been given to amendment (D.1) deemed to be of a more far-reaching character. The Legal Adviser specified in this respect that the exclusion of this amendment (D.42) could only be on the basis of its wording or of the conditions of this adoption. As the Committee had not specified the conditions under which it had given priority to amendment (D.1), the Committee should vote on its decision. A representative of the Secretary-General noted that the first part of the amendment of the Government member of Hungary connected the two sentences in Article 2 by the word "and", replacing the words "to this end, it shall seek", in order to make a single sentence. This was of a purely formal nature. This first part of the amendment was rejected by 64,557 votes in favour, 74,211 against, with 6,264 abstentions. The second part of the amendment aimed at replacing the words "methods of providing unemployment benefit" by "conditions of providing unemployment benefit". The Government member of Austria noted that in the German translation there was a third expression which corresponded to the French term mesures which had been used. After the discussion on the significance of this amendment and on the possibility of using jointly the words "conditions and methods" or "conditions or methods", it was agreed to leave the text unchanged. The amendment was thus rejected.

31. Article 2, as amended, was adopted.

Article 3

32. Article 3 was adopted without change.

Article 4

33. An amendment (D.43) was submitted by the Government member of Hungary, first to insert the word "temporarily" in paragraph 1 in order to limit the possibility of excluding Part VII, and second, to delete paragraph 2. The Employers' members were against this amendment, pointing out that the Office text was more flexible. The Workers' members stated that they would abstain on this amendment, although they were in favour of its substance, as they did not wish to see its adoption jeopardise that of the proposed Convention. The amendment was withdrawn.

34. Article 4 was adopted without change.

35. The Government member of the United States submitted an amendment (D.17) to delete the phrase "Where it is justified by the level of development" as there were reasons other than the degree of development which would justify recourse to the exceptions provided for under this Article. The Employers' members supported this amendment, which would eliminate the problems of determining the level of development and of supervising the use of this provision. A representative of the Secretary-General pointed out that the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations would only be called upon to decide on the recourse had to such a clause when it examined the first report of the government concerned. The Government member of Cyprus supported the amendment, pointing out that all States might have difficulties in applying one or two provisions of the Convention and consequently would have an interest in availing themselves of such a flexibility clause. The Workers' members were against the amendment, pointing out that it would leave the door open to a general lowering of the level of protection provided for under the proposed Convention. They recalled the precedent set by Convention No. 102, adopted in 1952, Article 3 of which authorised certain exceptions for Members "whose economy and medical facilities are insufficiently developed". The Government member of Finland was also against the amendment. The Government member of Sweden and the Workers' member pointed out that the flexibility which certain industrialised countries might need did not call for genuine exceptions but rather an equivalence clause allowing less advantageous provisions on certain points than those provided for under the proposed Convention, balanced by a higher level of protection guaranteed on other points such as those provided for in amendments (D.54) and (D.82) submitted by the Government of Australia, aimed at inserting new Articles 23 bis and 24 bis. As the amendments of the Government of Australia had a bearing only on certain particular points, the Committee decided to refer to a Working Party the examination of the question of flexibility clauses in amendments (D.17), (D.54) and (D.82), as well as in another amendment (D.7) to Article 5 submitted by the Workers' members. In addition, the Government member of Italy pointed out that the examination of this amendment should be deferred until amendment (D.79) was examined. He had submitted this amendment as Article 28 bis in order to introduce a new flexibility clause, but it had not yet been distributed when the Working Party was set up.

36. The text of Article 5 as prepared by the Working Party was as follows:

"1. Each Member may avail itself, by a declaration accompanying its ratification, of at most two of the temporary exceptions provided for in Article 10, paragraph 3, Article 11, paragraph 3, Article 15, paragraph 2, Article 18, paragraph 2, Article 19, paragraph 4, [Article 22 bis, paragraph 2, Article 22 ter, paragraph 2,] and Article 23, paragraph 2. Such a declaration shall state the reasons which justify these exceptions.

2. Each Member where it is justified by the extent of protection of its social security system, may avail itself, by a declaration accompanying its ratification, of the temporary exceptions provided for in Article 10, paragraph 3, Article 11, paragraph 3, Article 15, paragraph 2, Article 18, paragraph 2, Article 19, paragraph 4, [Article 22 bis, paragraph 2, Article 22 ter, paragraph 2,] and Article 23, paragraph 2. Such a declaration shall state the reasons which justify these exceptions.

3. Each Member which has made a declaration under paragraph 1 or paragraph 2 shall include in its reports (followed by the text proposed by the Office in paragraph 2, without change).

4. Each Member which has made a declaration under paragraph 1 or paragraph 2 shall, as appropriate to the terms of such declaration and as circumstances permit (followed by the text proposed by the Office in paragraph 3, without change)."

37. The Workers' members, while recalling that they favoured making the provisions of the proposed Convention flexible, wondered what was meant by the expression "Each Member where it is justified by the extent of protection of its social security system" in paragraph 2, and how it could be verified. In addition, they regretted that the balance between the more favourable provisions than those provided by the proposed Convention and the exceptions to it which characterised the amendment of the Government member of Australia, had been lost sight of, since the exceptions which would be authorised for each Member in accordance with paragraph 1 would constitute a regression for the industrialised countries with respect to Convention No. 102. On the first point, the Chairman and a representative of the Secretary-General, confirming the interpretation of the Workers' members, indicated that the "extent of protection" of a social security system referred to several criteria such as the scope of persons protected and the level of protection, as well as the branches of social security covered. The Chairman explained that in accordance with the intent of the Working Party, and as understood by the representatives of the Governments of Australia and the United States, this flexibility clause was not meant for industrialised countries. A representative of the Secretary-General explained that it was the role of the Office, upon registration of a ratification and of the declaration that might accompany it, to verify in the light of the details given in the Report of this Committee, whether the condition under which recourse to paragraph 2 depends is fulfilled. The Government members of Australia, Sweden and the United States expressed their support for the text proposed by the Working Party. The Government member of Italy, while accepting the proposal of the Working Party, was not entirely satisfied.

38. On the basis of a proposal made by the Government member of Cyprus, who was also in favour of this text, it was agreed to redraft the beginning of paragraph 2 as follows, in order to highlight the relationship between the two first paragraphs: "Notwithstanding the provisions of the preceding paragraph, each Member, etc."

39. While supporting the solution in paragraph 1 which enabled even the industrialised countries to avail themselves of exceptions, the Workers' members, although they would have preferred a more balanced solution, submitted a subamendment to replace the words "of at most two of the temporary exceptions" by "of one of the temporary exceptions". They wanted to limit the extent of the regression represented by this text. The Government members of Finland, Hungary, Norway and Sweden were in favour of this amendment. The Government members of the Federal Republic of Germany and the United States were, on the contrary, opposed as was the Government member of Switzerland, who pointed out the temporary nature of such exceptions and the variety of reasons by which they could be justified. The Government members of Australia and Cyprus, as well as the Workers' members, proposed to defer a decision until an examination had been made on whether or not Articles 22*bis* and 22*ter* would be maintained, as this might have an influence on the number of exceptions authorised. The Employers' members emphasised that, irrespective of the decision on Articles 22*bis* and 22*ter*, the exceptions envisaged were of a temporary nature. Following a first vote by show of hands, the subamendment of the Workers' members, which received 18,792 votes in favour, 0 votes against, with 21,392 abstentions, was rejected, the number of votes needed for a quorum, 19,181, not having been achieved. This result was confirmed following a record vote resulting in 19,008 votes in favour, 0 against, with 19,560 abstentions, the quorum again not having been achieved.

40. An amendment (D.41) introduced by the Employers' members, which concerned only the Spanish text, was referred to the Drafting Committee.

41. The text of Article 5 submitted by the Working Party was adopted as subamended.

42. Four amendments were submitted on this Article, including three concerning paragraph 1. First, an amendment (D.30) was proposed by the Government members of Denmark, Finland, Norway and Sweden, to refer to those cases of non-discrimination provided for under Convention No. 111, thereby deleting a reference to age; second, an amendment (D.48) was submitted by the Government members of Denmark, France, the Federal Republic of Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom (States Members of the European Community) to add "ethnic origin"; third, an amendment (D.27) was submitted by the Government member of Australia, the first part of which was to delete the reference to age. Two of the four amendments related to paragraph 2: amendment D.27 and an amendment (D.50) submitted by the Government members of Denmark, France, the Federal Republic of Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom (States Members of the European Community). The Government member of Finland, speaking on behalf of the Governments of the Nordic countries, pointed out that certain schemes did not provide coverage for workers who were over pensionable age. In addition, the Government member of Australia explained that, for those schemes where benefits were not proportionate to earnings, flat-rate benefits could be lower for young people than for adult workers, in order not to exceed the level of their earnings. These situations were not covered under paragraph 2 of the proposed text which is confined to allowing positive discrimination. The Employers' members and the Workers' members were opposed to deleting the mention of age in paragraph 1 and believed that paragraph 2 should be modified with a view to covering the situations mentioned by the Government members of Australia and of the Nordic countries. The Government member of Australia submitted a subamendment to amendment D.50, to refer to "special measures which are justified by the circumstances of identified groups or designed to meet the specific needs of categories of persons who have particular problems". This subamendment was supported by the Employers' members and the Workers' members. However, the latter noted that the circumstances of young people, mentioned by the Government member of Australia, could be covered under Part VII concerning new applicants for employment. The Government member of Australia pointed out that this was not necessarily the case. The Employers' members proposed in addition to mention health in paragraph 1. The Government member of the United States preferred a reference to disability. A combined text (D.135) prepared by a Working Party on the basis of these amendments, as subamended, was adopted unanimously, subject to replacing "state of health" by "disability" in paragraph 1 and to inserting the words "in particular disadvantaged groups" in paragraph 2.

43. Article 6, as amended, was adopted.

PART II. PROMOTION OF PRODUCTIVE EMPLOYMENT

Article 7

44. An amendment (D.8) submitted by the Workers' members specifying, by inserting a sentence taken from paragraph 2 of the proposed Recommendation, that the measures to be established should include employment services, vocational training and vocational guidance, was supported by the Employers' members and adopted by consensus.

45. Article 7, as amended, was adopted.

Article 8

46. An amendment (D.26) to include a reference to national priorities in paragraph 1, submitted by the Government member of Cyprus, was withdrawn.

47. Article 8 was adopted without change.

Article 9

48. An amendment (D.49) submitted by the Government members of Denmark, France, the Federal Republic of Germany, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom (States Members of the European Community) to limit the scope of this Article relative to the Convention and Recommendations which were cited to "previous national commitments", so as to avoid an indirect obligation to conform to these instruments on the part of Members who had not ratified them. The Government member of Cyprus and the Workers' members pointed out that this was not the intention of Article 9, which only established guidelines by referring Members to these instruments. As a result, the Employers' members opposed this amendment. A representative of the Secretary-General pointed out that two of the three instruments were in fact Recommendations which, in any event, were not binding. The amendment was withdrawn.

49. Article 9 was adopted without change.

PART III: CONTINGENCIES COVERED

Article 10

50. An amendment (D.25) submitted by the Government members of Denmark, Finland, Norway and Sweden to delete, so as to avoid overloading the text, the words "with due regard to the provisions of Article 21, paragraph 2" which referred to "suitable employment", was withdrawn following objections from the Workers' members.

51. An amendment (D.28) submitted by the Government member of Australia to transfer paragraph 2 to the proposed Recommendation was withdrawn.

52. In reply to a question from the Government member of Japan, a representative of the Secretary-General noted that nothing in the proposed text created a bar, in the event of partial unemployment as defined in paragraph 2, to reimbursing the employer for providing benefits directly to unemployed persons.

53. The Workers' members submitted an amendment (D.9) to include in paragraph 2(b) not only the suspension but also the reduction of earnings so as to encompass all contingencies. In reply to the objection raised by the Employers' members, the Workers' members assured them that there would be no risk of double payment of benefits where earnings were only reduced. The amendment was adopted by 221,235 votes in favour, 160,162 against, with 31,605 abstentions.

54. An amendment (D.46) submitted by the Workers' members to replace in the French version the expression mise à pied, which they believed had a purely disciplinary connotation, by chômage technique, was referred to the Drafting Committee.

55. The Workers' members submitted an amendment (D.47) to add a new subparagraph to paragraph 2 referring to the suspension of earnings due to "intermittent employment". In response to questions concerning the definition of this expression, the workers' members stated that it referred to discontinuous work while maintaining a continuous employment relationship. They accepted a subamendment proposed by the Government member of Australia to use the term "irregular", for a situation which certain workers might be forced to accept. The Government members of Finland and Norway supported this amendment and emphasised that the situation in the fishing industry would be encompassed. On the other hand, the Government members of Australia, Cyprus, France, the Federal Republic of Germany and Tunisia raised objections to this proposal as it corresponded to a wide diversity of situations including that of seasonal workers. The amendment, as subamended by the Government member of Australia, was rejected by 185,416 votes in favour, 200,165 votes against, with 27,391 abstentions.

56. An amendment (D.32) was submitted by the Government member of Canada to insert between paragraphs 2 and 3 a new paragraph, dealing with the case of unemployed persons who accepted part-time employment while continuing to seek full-time employment. This was to facilitate getting the unemployed to return to work. This amendment was supported by the Government members of Hungary, Norway and the United States, as well as by the Workers' members. It was, on the other hand, opposed by the Government members of Austria, Cyprus, the Federal Republic of Germany (speaking on behalf of the Government members of the European Community), Italy, Japan and the Employers' members. The Government member of Austria stressed that such a provision could lead to full-time work being replaced by part-time jobs. The Government member of Austria and the Employers' members stressed that this provision would be better placed in the proposed Recommendation, where it was already covered in Paragraph 10. The Government member of Canada stated that, in his country's experience, this solution aimed at promoting employment had not given rise to abuse. In reply to a request for clarification from the Government member of Australia, he pointed out that the second sentence was not intended to subordinate benefits to a means test, but instead to establish a maximum limit on the total earnings from new part-time employment and unemployment benefits. He accepted a subamendment from the Government member of Australia indicating that the methods of providing benefit should be such as to maintain an incentive to take up full-time work. Amendment (D.32) as subamended was adopted by 185,416 votes in favour, 14,749 against, with 214,914 abstentions.

57. Article 10, as amended, was adopted.

PART IV. PERSONS PROTECTED

58. The Workers' members had submitted an amendment (D.10) to paragraph 1 to add specific mention of "the unemployed who have previously been employed who are seeking employment" to the denominator of the fractional percentage used to determine the minimum scope of persons protected of the proposed Convention. They recalled that in the text submitted by the Office the previous year for the first discussion, the required percentage referred to the "labour force", which was an expression found inappropriate but which included in particular the unemployed. Their intention was to find more appropriate language without reducing the scope of the proposed Convention, which unfortunately was the effect of the text proposed for the second reading. The amendment was designed to eliminate this disadvantage. A representative of the Secretary-General explained that the proposed text did not include the unemployed in the denominator of the fraction any more than did Convention No. 102. It was important not to confuse the percentage of unemployed persons in receipt of unemployment benefits with the percentage of employees covered by an unemployment benefit scheme and exposed to the risk of unemployment, this latter percentage excluding, by definition, the unemployed. As several Government members, as well as the Employers' members, were in favour of retaining the text proposed by the Office, the amendment was withdrawn.

59. The Government member of Hungary submitted an amendment (D.45) to delete paragraph 2. He believed that if public employees became unemployed they would find themselves in an unfavourable situation, despite the employment guarantees from which they benefited. The amendment was rejected by 179,634 votes in favour, 220,696 against, with 0 abstentions.

60. The Workers' members submitted an amendment (D.11) to specify at the end of paragraph 2 that public employees whose employment was guaranteed could only be excluded from protection during the period of their employment. Their intention was to allow for periods of employment in the public service to be taken into consideration with respect to the qualifying period required for the entitlement to benefits in the case of unemployment occurring after the individuals concerned had left the public service, and had become employees. The Government members of the States Members of the European Community and the Government member of Cyprus stated that this amendment did not add anything of substance, which was also the view of a representative of the Secretary-General, as the exclusion authorised under this paragraph did not apply to individuals except when they were public employees. In consequence, the Workers' members withdrew their amendment.

61. The Government member of Japan had submitted an amendment (D.31) to extend the possibility of exempting public employees whose employment was not guaranteed, but who upon leaving employment received certain benefits at least equivalent to those given to other employees. He specified that these benefits were paid one time only. The Workers' members pointed out that these were severance payments which could therefore not be compared to wages or periodical unemployment benefits. The Employers' members were also opposed to the amendment as the public employees who were excluded were taken into consideration in any event in the denominator of the fraction used for the calculation of the total scope of protection. As a result, the amendment was considered to be rejected.

62. The Workers' members submitted an amendment (D.12) to extend the statistical reference serving for the calculation of the minimum scope of protection to industrial enterprises with at least 10 employees, instead of 20, for the benefit of developing countries which availed themselves of the flexibility clause under paragraph 3 (b). They believed that the scope proposed in the Office text was in fact, extremely limited for developing countries, where only a small percentage of employees were occupied in industry. The Employers' members pointed out that this enlargement would extend protection to workers in the informal sector, which would be a source of difficulties. The amendment was supported by the Government members of Brazil and the Islamic Republic of Iran. The Government members of Angola, Botswana, India and Tunisia, however, favoured retaining the Office text. Consequently, the Workers' members withdrew their amendment.

63. It was agreed that the text of paragraph 3 should be revised by the Drafting Committee, taking into account the amendments which had been made to Article 5.

64. Article 11 was adopted without change.

PART V. METHODS OF PROTECTION

Article 12

65. The Government members of Denmark, France, the Federal Republic of Germany, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom (States Members of the European Community) submitted an amendment (D. 51) to delete at the beginning of paragraph 1, the words "unless it is otherwise provided in this Convention". They pointed out that this restriction appeared superfluous. The Workers' members opposed this amendment. A representative of the Secretary-General stated that the part of the sentence under discussion referred in particular to Article 16, which had provisions specific to contributory schemes. The Chairman emphasised that the clause, while purely formal, could be useful in providing clarity in the text. The amendment was withdrawn.

66. Article 12 was adopted without change.

PART VI. BENEFIT TO BE PROVIDED

Article 13

67. Article 13 was adopted without change.

Article 14

68. Article 14 was adopted without change.

69. An amendment (D. 64) submitted by the Workers' members to replace in paragraph 1 of the French version the term mise à pied by chômage technique, was referred to the Drafting Committee.

70. An amendment (D. 14) submitted by the Government member of Brazil aimed at limiting in paragraph 1 the guarantee to provide benefits to a level corresponding to the minimum wage, the wage of an ordinary labourer or the minimum essential for basic living expenses, was not considered for lack of support.

71. The Workers' members submitted an amendment (D. 63) to make a distinction in paragraph 1 (b), where benefits were not based on contributions or previous earnings, between persons who had been previously employed who should receive benefits proportionate to their previous earnings or average earnings, and those who had not been previously employed who might receive flat-rate benefits such as proposed in the Office text. They pointed out that the proposed percentage of 50 per cent of the minimum wage or the wage of an ordinary labourer was very low when applied to industrialised countries. The Employers' members were against this amendment, as it was based on a new distinction which was not provided for in the Office text. The Government member of the United Kingdom indicated that this subparagraph also concerned his country where benefits were flat-rate. He emphasised that "persons who have not been previously employed" were new applicants for employment covered, not under this Article, but instead under Part VII. Consequently, the Workers' members supported a suggestion by the Government member of the United Kingdom to subamend their own amendment. They limited it to the addition of the words "whichever is the highest", to the end of subparagraph (b), which enumerated the different reference parameters. The Government members of the States Members of the European Community and the Government members of Finland, Norway, the United Republic of Tanzania and the Ukrainian SSR supported this proposal. However, the Employers' members opposed it, pointing out that its adoption would create an element of rigidity in the Convention. The amendment (D. 63), as subamended by its authors, was adopted by 238,091 votes in favour, 160,132 against, with 12,642 abstentions.

72. In reply to a question raised by the Government member of Cyprus relating to the reference period for the calculation of previous earnings mentioned in subparagraph (a), the Workers' members indicated that in their view the determination of this period was a matter for national legislation. The Chairman, in reply to a question from the Government member of Malta, also specified that it was up to national legislation to determine the minimum amount necessary for the basic living expenses referred to in subparagraph (b).

73. The Government members of France, Federal Republic of Germany, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom (States Members of the European Community), submitted an amendment (D.78) to insert a new paragraph 2 according to which, if the periodical payments were net of tax or contributions, the earnings to be taken into consideration for the calculation of benefits under paragraph 1 could be earnings net of taxes or contributions. This amendment was supported by the Government member of Austria. The Chairman questioned whether this new provision was necessary as the choice was normally left to governments if nothing was provided in the Convention. The Government member of the Federal Republic of Germany stressed that this provision was essential, recalling that similar amendments had been submitted for the corresponding paragraphs in the proposed Recommendation. The Employers' members stated that they supported the amendment unless it was proved not to be indispensable.

74. The Government member of Australia proposed to subamend the amendment (D.78) submitted by a number of States Members of the European Community as follows: "If appropriate, the percentages specified in this Article may be reached by comparing net periodical payments after tax and contributions with net earnings after tax and contributions". The Government member of the Federal Republic of Germany noted that the recourse to this paragraph would be just an option for the countries concerned. He proposed to further subamend this text by adding "In this case the percentage should be 55 per cent". The addition of this phrase was approved by 183,309 votes in favour, 0 against, with 214,785 abstentions, but was not adopted as the quorum had not been attained. The amendment (D.78), as subamended by the Government member of Australia, was adopted by 212,807 votes in favour, 0 against, with 191,737 abstentions.

75. Article 15, as amended, was adopted.

76. An amendment (D.18) submitted by the Government member of the United States to transfer this Article to the proposed Recommendation was withdrawn.

77. The Government members of France, the Federal Republic of Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom (States Members of the European Community) submitted an amendment (D.57) to add the words "to the extent that these conditions are not met by other benefits" to the end of the Article. The amendment was supported by the Government member of Switzerland, who indicated that in his country, after the expiration of entitlement to unemployment benefits, unemployment assistance or social assistance schemes might come into effect. The Workers' members proposed to subamend the amendment so that the last sentence would read "In any case, these benefits, in combination with any other benefits to which they may be entitled ..." (the rest of the sentence remained unchanged). This amendment, as subamended, was adopted by consensus.

78. Article 16, as amended, was adopted.

79. An amendment (D.15) submitted by the Government member of Brazil to transfer this Article to the proposed Recommendation was not considered as it was not supported.

80. The Government member of Finland submitted an amendment (D.3) to replace the words "the length deemed necessary to prevent abuse" by "six months". It appeared from the discussion that this precision would be far too rigid. The amendment was therefore withdrawn.

81. Article 17 was adopted without change.

82. Prior to the discussion of Articles 18 and 19, the Government member of Canada requested the following clarifications concerning the lengths of both the period in which unemployment benefits were paid and the waiting period. First, he questioned whether cases could be considered to be in conformity with Article 18 where the waiting period of a "contributory scheme" was ten working days but where only those persons who were not able to provide for their basic living needs and those of their families were in receipt of a social assistance benefit. Second, he wished to know whether cases could be considered in conformity with Article 19 where the length of payment of benefits was less than 26 weeks but where it could be compensated by the payment of social assistance benefits where the financial circumstances of the unemployed persons prevented them from being able to meet their basic living needs as well as those of their families. A representative of the Secretary-General replied in the negative to these two questions, but stated that there was always the possibility of the exceptions provided for under Article 5.

83. Article 18 was the subject of a number of amendments. One (D.33), submitted by the Government member of Canada, was aimed at increasing the maximum duration of the waiting period to ten working days in both paragraph 1 and paragraph 2. Another (D.52), submitted by the Government member of Australia, was intended to increase the maximum duration established in paragraph 1 to seven days. Two amendments submitted by the United States (D.19) and Japan (D.59), respectively, were aimed at replacing the establishment of a maximum duration by a more flexible formula under which the duration could not exceed that necessary to prevent abuse. The Workers' members warned the Committee against amendments which could undermine the substance of the proposed Convention. A representative of the Secretary-General recalled that it was important not to lose sight of the exceptions provided for under Article 5, paragraph 1. The Government member of the Ukrainian SSR emphasised that it would be difficult to establish a period above that provided for under Convention No. 102, which was seven days. The Government member of Norway noted that the solutions provided in national legislations with regard to the waiting period were far less diverse than those for the qualifying period, and thus it should be easier to establish a precise standard in the Convention. The Committee came to an agreement to combine the amendments submitted by the Government members of Australia and Canada by establishing a maximum period of seven days as a general rule in paragraph 1, and a maximum period of ten days in paragraph 2. It was nevertheless agreed that the waiting period thus established consisted of calendar days and not working days. As a result, the amendments submitted by the Government members of the United States and Japan were withdrawn.

84. The Government members of France, the Federal Republic of Germany, Greece, Italy, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom (States Members of the European Community) withdrew their amendment (D.58) which alluded specifically to Article 12, paragraph 2, and Article 15.

85. The Government member of Australia proposed by an amendment (D.53) that, after paragraph

1, a new paragraph be inserted under which Members would endeavour to protect workers who were experiencing hardship during a waiting period. The Employers' members pointed out that it appeared contradictory to authorise a waiting period and then to impose an obligation during this period. In reply to a question raised by the Government member of the Federal Republic of Germany, the author of this amendment stated that his proposal was not aimed at abolishing or reducing the waiting period for workers experiencing hardship. As this amendment did not create precise and formal obligations, it was agreed to consider it for the proposed Recommendation. While not opposing this decision, the Workers' members would have preferred to have the amended text (D.53) in the Convention.

86. An amendment (D.29) proposed by the Government member of Switzerland to add to paragraph 3 "or temporary" after the word "seasonal" was withdrawn as a result of the decision taken on the waiting period in paragraph 1.

87. Article 18, as amended, was adopted.

88. An amendment (D.65) submitted by the Workers' members to replace, in paragraph 1, the term mise à pied in the French version by chômage technique, was referred to the Drafting Committee.

89. The Government member of the United States submitted an amendment (D.20) to replace, in paragraph 3, the calculation of the duration of benefit payment on the basis of an average, by a general provision according to which the duration of benefit payment might vary with the duration of the qualifying period, where this was provided in national legislation. The Government member of the United States pointed out that the average duration of payment varied according to the economic situation. The Workers' members insisted on there being numerical standards with respect to the duration of benefit. In reply to a question from the Government member of Canada, a representative of the Secretary-General indicated that paragraph 3 referred to an arithmetical average between different maximum durations for qualifying periods provided under national legislations, and not to a weighted average based on the frequency of a given duration of unemployment, as had been the interpretation of the Government member of Austria. According to an example provided by the Government member of Canada, who pointed out that in his country there were two durations of payment, of 14 and 38 weeks respectively, the Committee noted that the arithmetical average of 26 weeks corresponded to the proposed standard. The amendment (D.20) was rejected by 137,428 votes in favour, 221,235 against, with 21,070 abstentions.

90. Article 19 was adopted unanimously without change.

91. Part (a) of an amendment (D.56) introduced by the Government members of France, the Federal Republic of Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom (States Members of the European Community) added the words "in particular" in the introductory section of the Article preceding the subparagraphs. The Workers' members firmly opposed this amendment which was, on the other hand, supported by the Employers' members. The Workers' members held the view that the provisions of Article 20 and especially subparagraph (d), should not be included in the proposed Convention and, moreover, that the adoption of the amendment (D.56) would allow national legislations total freedom of action. The Government member of Austria was also opposed to the amendment but subamended it in the form of a new subparagraph designed to prevent double payment of benefits. The authors of the amendment supported this proposal, as did the Workers' members, on the understanding that the list of cases enumerated under the various subparagraphs should be exhaustive. The Secretariat was therefore requested to submit to a Working Party, a proposal for a new subparagraph (g), based on these grounds, which would also take account of existing international instruments.

92. The Employers' members submitted an amendment (D.72) to delete the word "deliberately" in subparagraph (b). The Workers' members and a number of Government members opposed this amendment, pointing out that the determination of whether or not a worker deliberately contributed to his or her own dismissal was generally under the control, where appropriate, of the competent authorities and courts. As a result, the amendment was withdrawn.

93. The Employers' members also submitted an amendment (D.71) to delete the words "without just cause" in subparagraph (c). The Workers' members were against this amendment and recalled that a similar specification which corresponded to accepted practice appeared already in Convention No. 44. Several Government members also opposed this amendment. Consequently, the Employers' members withdrew their proposal.

94. The Government member of Canada proposed an amendment (D.34) to replace subparagraph (d) with the following text: "under prescribed conditions, when the person concerned has stopped work to take part in a labour dispute over issues which affect him or her directly, or when he or she has participated directly in the financing of this dispute." The Workers' members, while maintaining their opposition in principle to subparagraph (d), were against introducing the issue of financing a labour dispute, which would be contrary to workers' solidarity. They pointed out the difficulty of replacing it by another criterion, given the diversity of collective bargaining methods, and suggested overcoming the difficulty by having recourse to the phrase "under prescribed conditions" at the beginning of subparagraph (d). A representative of the Secretary-General recalled, at the request of the Government member of Canada, that the term "prescribed" was legally defined in Article 1. In response to a question from the Government member of Australia, he specified that the expression "has stopped work" was limited to strikers and could not apply to workers laid off as a result of a strike. The Government member of Finland proposed to subamend this text by adding "where he or she is prevented from working". This addition was accepted by the Workers' members and a number of Government members. The Government member of the Federal Republic of Germany would have preferred basing the discussion on Alternative A, restricting its scope through the addition of the words "during a labour dispute". As a result, the Committee decided by 3,531 votes in favour, 2,880 against, with 288 abstentions, to refer this question to a Working Party to which the Secretariat was requested to submit a combined text based on the amendment (D.34), subamended by the Workers' members and by the Government member of Finland, taking into account the suggestion made by the Government member of the Federal Republic of Germany as well as his proposal to subamend Alternative A.

95. The Working Party proposed the following text to the Committee: "(d) during a labour dispute, when the person concerned has lost his or her employment as a direct result of a stoppage of work due to this labour dispute;". The Workers' members were in favour of the adoption of this proposal subject to specifying, in the beginning, "during the period of a labour dispute" and to replacing the words "when the person concerned has lost his or her employment" by "when the person is prevented from working". They pointed out that it was not appropriate to penalise a worker who had lost his or her employment as a direct result of a work stoppage due to a labour dispute, as it was the employer who in such cases discharged the worker. The first proposal concerned only the drafting and was referred to the Drafting Committee. With regard to the second proposal, the Employers' members questioned whether being prevented from working was not included in the expression relating to the loss of employment used in Convention No. 102. A representative of the Secretary-General stated in reply that the text of Convention No. 102 did not appear to have been understood in this manner. This was why the texts proposed by the Office referred to three different situations: strikers, non-strikers prevented from working and non-strikers who lost their employment. As a result, the Employers' members supported the subamendment of the Workers' members. The text proposed by the Working Party, as subamended, was thus adopted by consensus.

96. The Workers' members and several Government members emphasised that it should be understood that this text be interpreted in the same manner as the corresponding provisions of Convention No. 102. This was confirmed by the Chairman of the Committee.

97. The Workers' members requested a record vote on retaining subparagraph (d) as drafted in the text of the proposed Convention. They believed that this subparagraph ran contrary to the spirit of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention (No. 87), as well as of the United Nations International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, which recognised the right to strike. This subparagraph discriminated against persons engaged in strikes or locked out and even workers who were not themselves on strike and could not benefit by the outcome of the dispute because they, like other workers, would be required to meet all the legal preconditions for entitlement to benefits including seeking work and meeting the qualifying period requirement. Inevitably, the weakest trade unions and the poorest workers would be the first victims because such unions did not have strike funds and low-paid workers were unlikely to have savings to tide them over the period of the labour dispute. Their right to strike would be further weakened by the deprivation their spouses and children would face and the pressures on them to return to work by the workers not on strike who were none the less unjustly denied benefits. Thus the Workers' members were convinced that that inclusion of subparagraph (d) in the Convention would be morally wrong and contrary to basic long-standing ILO principles. The Government member of Bulgaria, speaking on behalf of the socialist countries taking part in the work of the Committee, supported the position of the Workers' members. The Government member of Honduras stated that he would abstain as in his country, when a strike was declared to be legal, no one could be dismissed and the employment contract was simply suspended. The text proposed by the Working Party, as subamended, was retained with 3,954 votes in favour, 3,210 against, with 108 abstentions.

98. An amendment (D.22) was submitted by the Government member of the United States to add to the end of subparagraph (f) the phrase "in suitable work". The Employers' members did not believe that this amendment was indispensable, as the Office text was sufficiently clear. The amendment was adopted by 4,104 votes in favour, 2,772 against, with 324 abstentions.

99. Following the subamendment of the Government member of Austria to amendment (D.56), (see paragraph 91 above), the Working Party proposed a new subparagraph (g) as follows: "as long as the person concerned is in receipt of another [social security] cash benefit, other than a family benefit, subject to the part of the benefit which is suspended not exceeding the other benefit".

100. The Workers' members thought the words "social security" should remain in the text. The Government member of Australia felt, on the contrary, that it would be better to delete those words as payments could be made by different government services. The Government member of the United Kingdom underlined, in particular, the increasing importance of private pension schemes. He proposed to replace the words "another social security cash benefit" by "an income maintenance benefit provided for in the legislation of the Member concerned", as in his opinion the reference to family benefits served no purpose. The Employers' members and the Workers' members accepted this subamendment. The text proposed by the Working Party, as subamended, was adopted by consensus.

101. Article 20, as amended, was adopted.

102. The Workers' members tabled an amendment (D.68) to include in the criteria used in assessing the suitability of employment in paragraph 2, whether the employment is vacant as a direct result of a stoppage due to an on-going labour dispute. The Government member of the United States supported this amendment, subject to the addition of the words "of work" after "stoppage" in the English version. This subamendment was accepted by the Workers' members. The Employers' members accepted it under the condition that it also included in the corresponding provisions of Paragraph 13 of the proposed Recommendation. The amendment was also approved by the Government members of the States Members of the European Community and of the Nordic countries as well as of Australia. As a result the Employers' members, while expressing their preference for including this point as part of the proposed Recommendation alone, supported the amendment, which was adopted by consensus.

103. Article 21, as amended, was adopted.

104. An amendment (D.4) introduced by the Government member of Finland to transfer this Article to the Recommendation was withdrawn.

105. The Government member of Brazil proposed an amendment (D.16) to delete the words "directly from their employer" as this excluded severance pay financed from a fund set up jointly by several undertakings. The Employers' members proposed adding "directly from their employer or from any source". The Government member of the Federal Republic of Germany supported the amendment but would have preferred adding "or by virtue of an individual employment contract". The Workers' members wondered whether this was not superfluous, given the subamendment of the Employers' members. The amendment, as subamended, was adopted by consensus.

106. Article 22, as amended, was adopted.

107. The Government member of the United States proposed an amendment (D.23) to delete this Article, given the wide variety of national practices and the fact corresponding provisions were included in the proposed Recommendation. The Employers' members supported this amendment so as not to overload the proposed Convention with too many provisions. This point of view was shared by the Government member of Cyprus. The Workers' members pointed out that the proposed Article was already very flexible as its application was dependent on the existence of legislation covering medical care. The Government member of Japan stated in his country there were two distinct schemes, one for employees and the second one for all residents, including the unemployed. He wondered whether this system would be in conformity with the provisions of the proposed text. The Chairman observed that the Japanese system covered all situations and was applicable to this text. The Government members of the States Members of the European Community and of Australia were in favour of maintaining Article 22 bis in the proposed Convention. The amendment was rejected by 63,920 votes in favour, 88,689 against, with 7,990 abstentions.

108. As a result, an amendment (D.75) presented by the Employers' members to transfer the provisions of Article 22 bis to the proposed Recommendation was considered unnecessary.

109. In the light of the explanations provided by the Chairman, the Government member of Japan withdrew an amendment (D.60) to add at the end of the first paragraph the words "unless they are provided for such right by other legislation".

110. As a result of the vote on the amendment (D.23), Article 22 bis was considered adopted.

111. An amendment (D.24) was submitted by the Government member of the United States to delete this text from the proposed Convention, given that corresponding provisions were included in the proposed Recommendation. She observed that this Article did not distinguish between contributory and non-contributory schemes and left open the question of who should pay the contributions for the unemployed in the case of contributory schemes. The Employers' members supported the amendment for the same reasons put forth with regard to the amendment to Article 22 bis. The Workers' members were opposed to the amendment and pointed out that there were many ways in which the Article might be given effect, such as the method applied in the United States where up to five years, which might be those corresponding to periods of unemployment, could be excluded from the calculation of statutory pensions. The Government member of Japan questioned whether the system in effect in his country was in conformity with these provisions, as there was both a universal pension scheme covering all residents, including the unemployed, and a scheme applicable to employees, with co-ordination between the two schemes. A representative of the Secretary-General confirmed that this was the case as the unemployed were protected. The Government members of the States Members of the European Community were against the amendment. The Government member of the Federal Republic of Germany would have preferred subparagraph (a) to read "for acquisition of the right to or the calculation of benefits". The Chairman noted that this was unnecessary as the words "where appropriate" in the proposed text admitted this alternative. The amendment was rejected by 65,518 votes in favour, 86,292 against, with 6,392 abstentions.

112. Consequently, two amendments submitted by the Government member of Canada (D.35 rev.) and by the Employers' members (D.76), respectively, to transfer this Article to the proposed Recommendation were considered unnecessary.

113. Following the explanations which were provided to him, the Government member of Japan withdrew an amendment (D.61) to insert at the end of the first paragraph the words "unless such persons are guaranteed for such benefits by other legislation".

114. By virtue of the vote on amendment (D.24), Article 22 ter was considered adopted.

115. An amendment (D.36) was submitted by the Government member of Canada to limit the scope of this Article to the adjustment of schemes for the promotion of employment and for unemployment benefits and to transfer the provisions to the proposed Recommendation. The Workers' members did not object to making a specific mention of schemes for the promotion of employment and for unemployment benefits, provided that it was an illustration of the term "statutory social security schemes". They were opposed, however, to transferring the provisions to the proposed Recommendation. The Employers' member also felt that this Article should remain in the proposed Convention. Consequently the amendment was not adopted.

116. An amendment (D.62) submitted by the Government member of Japan to replace the words "social security" by "unemployment benefits" was withdrawn.

117. An amendment (D.55) introduced by the Government members of France, the Federal Republic of Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom (States Members of the European Community) to add "under prescribed conditions" before the words "as negligible" at the end of paragraph 1 was adopted by consensus. Amendment (D.77) submitted by the Employers' members on the same issue was therefore withdrawn.

118. Article 23, as amended, was adopted.

VII. SPECIAL PROVISIONS FOR NEW APPLICANTS FOR EMPLOYMENT

119. An amendment (D.5) submitted by the Government member of Finland was withdrawn in favour of an amendment submitted by the Government members of Denmark, Finland, Norway and Sweden. This amendment (D.88) combined subparagraphs (a), (b) and (c) in an introductory paragraph, and deleted subparagraph (f). They pointed out that divorced persons were included in the categories covered by other subparagraphs. The Workers' members objected that this was not the case of all divorced persons, some of whom might never have been employed. They therefore suggested, and the Government members of the Nordic countries agreed, that divorced and separated persons should be included. The Employers' members objected to the proposed regrouping of categories as it restricted the choice of available to Governments. The amendment as subamended by the Workers' members was rejected with 67,116 votes in favour, 83,895 against, with 7,191 abstentions.

120. An amendment (D.85) to refer in the second sentence of paragraph 1 to at least one-third of the categories, submitted by the Government member of Japan, was withdrawn.

121. An amendment (D.69) was proposed by the Workers' members to combine subparagraphs (a), (b) and (c) into one subparagraph. The Employers' members noted that this was not a minor amendment, as it would result in restricting the choice of governments and in making the text of the Article less flexible. Following the observation by the Government member of the United Kingdom that studies could be interrupted by periods of employment, the Workers' members modified their amendment so as to refer to young persons who had not been previously "or recently" employed. The amendment was rejected by 69,513 votes in favour, 82,297 against, with 4,794 abstentions.

122. The Government members of France, the Federal Republic of Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom (States Members of the European Community) proposed an amendment (D.89) to delete from subparagraph (h) of paragraph 1 the words "or other persons" and to add a new subparagraph (k) relating to persons who, after a period of retraining or advanced training, had acquired new qualifications. The Employers' members, who had submitted an amendment (D.80) to transfer Article 24 to the proposed Recommendation, withdrew this amendment in favour of the amendment (D.89). The Workers' members recognised the desirability of making special mention of persons who had to undergo new training after restructuring. They were opposed, however, to the introduction of a new subparagraph which would have the effect of restricting the choice resulting from the minimum number of commitments required. Taking account of an observation made by the Government member of the United Kingdom, they subamended the proposal so as to refer in subparagraph (h) to adults, including the disabled who have completed a period of training, it being understood that "training" also covered rehabilitation. The Employers' members supported this suggestion. The amendment, as subamended, was adopted by consensus.

123. Article 24, as amended, was adopted.

VIII. LEGAL, ADMINISTRATIVE AND FINANCIAL GUARANTEES

Article 25

124. Article 25 was adopted without change.

Article 26

125. Article 26 was adopted without change.

Article 27

126. The Government member of Canada proposed an amendment (D.37) to limit the scope of this Article to contributory schemes, in which the right to participation in the administration is justified by the payment of contributions. The Workers' members were opposed to this amendment, which related especially to paragraph 1, given the "prescribed conditions" clause which provided for consultation with employers and workers. This point of view was shared by the Employers' members. The amendment was not accepted.

127. Article 27 was adopted without change.

Article 28

128. Article 28 was adopted without change.

New Article 28 bis

129. The Government members of Greece, Italy and Portugal proposed by an amendment (D.79) to insert as a general flexibility clause a new Article 28 bis based on the new principle of equivalence which would allow governments to adopt, in no more than two cases, solutions which differed from those provided for under the proposed Convention, but which went beyond them in certain respects and offered, on the whole, an equivalent level of protection without being in violation of the Convention. The Government member of Norway, speaking on behalf of the Nordic countries, pointed out the risk of setting a precedent by the adoption of this Article. The Government member of Australia was in favour of the principle of equivalence but pointed out that the Committee had already reached a compromise on a number of Articles and that the proposed clause could result in undermining the solutions agreed upon. This point of view was shared by the Government member of Cyprus and by the Workers' members. The Employers' members, on the other hand, supported the amendment. The amendment was rejected by 67,728 votes in favour, 88,077 against, with 5,593 abstentions.

Article 29

130. Article 29 was adopted without change.

Consideration of the proposed Recommendation in Report V(2B)

PREAMBLE

131. An amendment (D.98) introduced by the Government member of France on behalf of the States Members of the European Community to replace the words "social security" by "protection against unemployment" in the third preambular paragraph, so as to bring the Preamble in line with the new title of the instrument, was referred to the Drafting Committee.

132. Subject to the decision of the Drafting Committee, the Preamble was adopted.

I. GENERAL PROVISIONS

Paragraph 1¹

133. Paragraph 1 was adopted without change.

II. PROMOTION OF PRODUCTIVE EMPLOYMENT

Paragraph 2

134. Paragraph 2 was adopted without change.

New Paragraph 2 bis

135. The Government member of Brazil proposed an amendment (D.117) to insert a new paragraph 2 bis relating to special policies for periods of economic crisis. The Employers' members were in favour of this amendment, subject to the deletion of the words "measures designed to protect existing jobs". The Workers' members supported the amendment in its entirety. The amendment, as subamended on the basis of the proposal of the Employers' members, was adopted.

¹The numbering of the Paragraphs reproduces that of the proposed Recommendation in Report V(2B). It does not necessarily correspond in every case to the numbering of the Paragraphs in the proposed Recommendation reproduced at the end of the Committee's report, which is based on the decisions of the Committee and, in some cases, of the Drafting Committee.

136. The Employers' members introduced an amendment (D.115) to replace the word "endeavour" in the introductory phrase by "consider". The Workers' members preferred retaining the proposed text. This first part of the amendment was rejected by 66,317 votes in favour, 75,106 votes against, with 19,176 abstentions. The second part of their amendment was withdrawn in favour of another amendment (D.102).

137. The Government member of the United Kingdom proposed an amendment (D.102) to limit clause (a) to the two first subclauses, and to insert a new paragraph 3 bis containing the third subclause of clause (a) and the three subclauses of clause (b). He noted that this regrouping included measures which were still in an experimental phase. The Government member of Cyprus proposed to replace the words "should give due regard" by "should consider granting" in the introductory phrase. The Employers' members proposed replacing the words "installation grants" by "resettlement grants" in the last subclause. This amendment, as subamended, was adopted.

138. Paragraph 3, as amended, was adopted unanimously.

139. The Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, the Federal Republic of Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, Portugal and the United Kingdom (States Members of the European Community) submitted an amendment (D.99) to specify that Members should be limited to "endeavouring" to encourage co-ordination with private pension schemes. The Workers' members opposed this modification as the proposed text already admitted a difference between the obligations applicable to statutory pension schemes and to private pension schemes. The Employers' members emphasised that in certain countries the Government could not intervene in private pension schemes. The amendment was withdrawn.

140. Paragraph 4 was adopted without change.

141. The Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, the Federal Republic of Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, Portugal and the United Kingdom (States Members of the European Community) submitted an amendment (D.100) so that temporary work by unemployed persons would not endanger any other employment, not only permanent employment. This amendment was adopted subject to specifying that the temporary work was remunerated.

142. Paragraph 5, as amended, was adopted.

143. The Government member of the United States submitted an amendment (D.90) to add a sentence specifying that financial assistance, in the form of continuing unemployment benefits, could be granted to unemployed persons wishing to set up their own business or to engage in another economic activity. This proposal was accepted by the Workers' members. However, as the Employers' members had noted that the expression "financial assistance" in the proposed text was very general and could include the payment of unemployment benefits, the amendment was withdrawn.

144. Paragraph 6 was adopted without change.

145. The Government member of the United States proposed an amendment (D.91) to delete Paragraph 7, pointing out that foreign workers were better protected by bilateral and multilateral agreements than by the provisions of a Recommendation. She withdrew this amendment in favour of amendment D. 83.

146. The Government member of Australia proposed an amendment (D.83) under which Members should give consideration to bilateral or multilateral agreements which provided assistance to foreign workers who freely wished to return to their country of origin. He emphasised that the Office text posed a technical problem of determining the level of the lump sum payment to be granted, and ran the risk of leading to the exporting of unemployment. The Government members of Spain and Morocco supported maintaining the Office text. The Government member of Tunisia pointed out that the amendment did not provide a solution where bilateral or multilateral agreements did not exist. The Government member of Zimbabwe consequently proposed a subamendment to provide that, where such agreements did not exist, each Member should provide, through national legislation, financial assistance to the persons concerned. The Workers' members, while emphasising their preference for the text proposed by the Office, supported the amendment of the Government member of Australia, as subamendment by the Government of Zimbabwe, it being understood that the financial assistance mentioned under this subamendment included assistance for reintegration. Amendment D. 83, as subamended by the Government member of Zimbabwe was adopted by 79,356 votes in favour, 66,062 against, with 11,985 abstentions. Consequently, an amendment (D.101 rev.) presented by a number of States Members of the European Community became unnecessary.

147. Paragraph 7, as amended, was adopted.

148. An amendment was submitted by the Government member of Japan (D.86), to delete this Paragraph, as the interest of beneficiaries in the relevant schemes should be the only criteria for investments. The Employers' members and the Workers' members were against this amendment, considering the guarantees of security and yields provided for under the proposed text. The amendment was therefore not adopted.

149. The Government member of the United States proposed an amendment (D.92) to delete all reference to the promotion of employment in this Paragraph. The Workers' members noted that the deletion would affect the main purpose of the Paragraph. The Employers' members stated that if it were so amended the Paragraph would no longer belong in the proposed Recommendation. The amendment was not adopted.

150. The Government members of Ireland and the United Kingdom proposed an amendment (D.103) to refer to the reserves of "private sources" and not to those of "private pension schemes". They pointed out that the reference to these schemes was the only one which interested the majority of industrialised countries, but that it was restrictive. The Workers' members accepted this amendment, subject to adding "including private pension schemes". The amendment was adopted by consensus.

151. Paragraph 8, as amended, was adopted.

152. The Government member of Japan submitted an amendment (D.87) to delete this Paragraph as he felt it difficult to accept the idea that social security resources were to be used for the direct purpose of increasing employment. As the Employers' members and the Workers' members opposed this amendment, it was rejected.

153. The Employers' members proposed a different drafting of Paragraph 9 aimed mainly at broadening its scope to all "community services". The Workers' members accepted this amendment (D.116) on condition that it would be specified "including, in particular, health care services". This amendment was accepted by consensus.

154. Paragraph 9, as amended, was adopted.

III. PROTECTION OF UNEMPLOYED PERSONS

155. The Employers' members had proposed an amendment (D.126) to delete this Paragraph. They pointed out that following the adoption of the amendment (D.32) of the Government member of Canada to introduce a new paragraph in Article 10 of the proposed Convention concerning the contingencies covered, Paragraph 10 had become superfluous in the Recommendation. The Workers' members stated that this Paragraph would nevertheless be important for inclusion in the Recommendation even though it was already in the Convention. The Employers' members recalled that even for States which did not ratify them, Conventions had the value of Recommendations. Consequently, Paragraph 10 was not adopted and the amendments (D.104) and (D.119) submitted by the Workers' members and the Government member of Japan, respectively, were unnecessary.

156. Two amendments (D.134) and (D.81) introduced by the Employers' members and the Workers' members respectively, were referred to the Drafting Committee.

157. Subject to the decision of the Drafting Committee, Paragraph 11 was adopted.

Paragraph 12

158. An amendment (D.93) submitted by the Government member of the United States to delete this Paragraph was withdrawn as a result of the amendment to Article 15 of the proposed Convention.

159. An amendment (D.131) submitted by the Government members of the Federal Republic of Germany and the United Kingdom to delete, in subparagraph 2, the phrase "if the periodical payments are subject to tax or social security contributions in accordance with the legislation of a Member" was referred to the Drafting Committee for the same reason.

160. Subject to the decision of the Drafting Committee, Paragraph 12 was adopted unanimously.

161. The Government member of the United States had proposed an amendment (D.94) to add the words "Members should endeavour to ensure that" to the beginning of subparagraph (1). The Government members of the Federal Republic of Germany and Malta, as well as the Workers' members, were against this amendment, and it was withdrawn.

162. The Government members of the Federal Republic of Germany and the United Kingdom had proposed an amendment (D.130) to delete clause (e) of subparagraph (1) and to incorporate its substance into the preliminary provisions of this subparagraph. The Workers' members were against this amendment as they considered it restrictive. The Employers' members were also against it, given amendment (D.127) which they had submitted. The amendment was thus not adopted.

163. The Employers' members proposed an amendment (D.127), the first part of which was to replace in clause (b) of subparagraph (1) the words "housing" by "accommodation" in the English version. This was referred to the Drafting Committee. The second part of the amendment added the words "in accordance with national law and regulations" to clause (d) relating to employment vacancies as a direct result of a stoppage of work due to an on-going labour dispute. The Employers' members stated that only legal strikes should be taken into consideration. It nevertheless appeared, as was pointed out by the Government member of France, that this clarification was superfluous, taking into account the phrase "under prescribed conditions" which was part of the preliminary provisions of subparagraph (1). The third part of the amendment deleted clause (e), which the Employers' members found too vague. It was rejected by 55,556 votes in favour, 88,689 against, with 7,990 abstentions.

164. An amendment (D.105) concerning only the English version was referred to the Drafting Committee.

165. Subject to the decision of the Drafting Committee, Paragraph 13 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 14

166. An amendment (D.106) was presented by the Workers' members to replace the word "scale" by "level or duration". The Employers' members stated that they saw no justification for mentioning the duration of the benefits. The amendment was adopted by 84,694 votes in favour, 62,322 against, with 4,794 abstentions.

167. An amendment (D.95) submitted by the Government member of the United States to limit the scope of this Paragraph to non-contributory unemployment assistance was not considered as it did not receive support.

168. An amendment (D.120) which was submitted by the Government member of Japan, to replace the word "employment" by the word "work" in order to be in conformity with the other provisions of the proposed Convention concerning part-time work, and to insert the words "under prescribed conditions" in the final part of the sentence, was referred to the Drafting Committee.

169. Paragraph 14, as amended, was adopted.

170. The Workers' members had tabled an amendment (D.107) to delete in the first line the words "endeavour to", which appeared to them to be superfluous in a Recommendation. This amendment was rejected by 65,518 votes in favour, 83,096 against, with 6,392 abstentions.

171. An amendment (D.121) presented by the Government member of Japan to extend the scope of the second sentence of this Paragraph to public employees who receive, at the time of leaving their jobs, certain benefits at least equivalent to those afforded to other employees, was withdrawn as a corresponding amendment to Article 11 of the proposed Convention had been rejected.

172. An amendment (D.108) submitted by the Workers' members to add to the end of the Paragraph "during the period of their employment", was withdrawn as had been a corresponding amendment to Article 11, of the proposed Convention.

173. Paragraph 15 was adopted without change.

174. The Workers' members had proposed an amendment (D.109) to specify that this Paragraph applied not only to persons newly seeking work, but also to persons trying to re-enter the labour force. The Employers' members noted that this was superfluous considering that explicit reference was made to Article 24 of the proposed Convention. The Government member of the United Kingdom made a proposal, accepted by the Workers' members, to delete only the word "newly" before "seeking work". As a compromise, the Government member of Cyprus proposed that reference should be made to the categories of persons mentioned in Article 24. The amendment, as subamended, was referred to the Drafting Committee.

175. Paragraph 16 was adopted, taking into account the change in drafting.

176. An amendment (D.96) introduced by the Government member of the United States to limit the scope of this Paragraph to unemployment assistance was not considered as it was not supported.

177. Two amendments, (D.38) and (D.128), submitted by the Government member of Canada and the Employers' members respectively, to replace the verb "should" by "might" were withdrawn after the Workers' members pointed out that the proposed terminology was not appropriate for a Recommendation and, furthermore, that the text of the Paragraph was sufficiently flexible.

178. An amendment (D.122) submitted by the Government member of Japan to limit the extension of the payment of benefits to the duration necessary for obtaining suitable employment, taking into account the difficulty of obtaining such employment, was not considered as it was not supported.

179. Paragraph 17 was adopted without change.

180. The Workers' members submitted an amendment (D.110) to delete the words "endeavour to" before "ensure" and to extend the scope of this Paragraph to all unemployed persons whether or not they were in receipt of unemployment benefits. The Employers' members pointed out that this proposal went beyond the aim of the proposed Recommendation, which referred to unemployment benefits. The Workers' members, without pressing for the first part of their amendment, subamended the second part in the following way, "the unemployed, including, if possible, those who are not in receipt of unemployment benefits". This proposal was approved by the Government members of Australia, Canada, the European Community and the USSR, as well as by the Government member of Brazil, who specified that in her country medical care was granted for one year following the end of the contract of employment. The amendment (D.110), as subamended, was adopted by 101,847 votes in favour, 55,556 against, with 799 abstentions. Following an observation by the Workers' members, the Chairman emphasised that Paragraph 18, even as amended, did cover dependants.

181. An amendment (D.123) of the Government member of Japan to add to the end of this Paragraph the words "unless they are provided for such right by other legislation", was withdrawn as had been the corresponding amendment submitted with regard to Article 22 bis of the proposed Convention.

182. Paragraph 18, as subamended, was adopted.

183. An amendment (D.111) introduced by the Workers' members to delete the words "endeavour to" in the first line was withdrawn.

184. An amendment (D.97) submitted by the Government member of the United States to replace the word "guarantee" by "provide" and to delete the last three lines was withdrawn.

185. An amendment (D.129) was presented by the Government members of the Federal Republic of Germany and the United Kingdom to limit the scope of this Paragraph to statutory schemes and to replace the word "and" by "or" in clause (a). This amendment was withdrawn after a representative of the Secretary-General stated that the reference to the "legislation of the Member concerned" made it superfluous and that the words "where appropriate" permitted either alternative.

186. An amendment (D.124) submitted by the Government member of Japan was withdrawn for the same reason as the corresponding amendment (D.61) to Article 22 ter.

187. Paragraph 19 was adopted without change.

188. An amendment (D.112) submitted by the Workers' members to delete the words "endeavour to" in the first line was withdrawn.

189. An amendment (D.125) proposed by the Government member of Japan to limit the scope of this Paragraph to unemployment benefit schemes and to delete clauses (b), (c), (d) and (e) was not considered as it received no support.

190. The Employers' members submitted an amendment (D.133) to replace in clause (a) the words "membership" by "the entitlement to benefits" taking account of the problem of translating the French term "assujettissement" into English, and to delete the word "guaranteed" in clause (e), deemed superfluous. The Government member of France noted that it was preferable to adapt the English version to the term "assujettissement" in French. A representative of the Secretary-General explained that the words "la garantie du" were necessary in French. The amendment was referred to the Drafting Committee.

191. An amendment (D.132) introduced by the Employers' members concerning only the Spanish version was referred to the Drafting Committee.

192. Subject to the decision of the Drafting Committee, Paragraph 20 was adopted without change.

193. An amendment (D.114) proposed by the Workers' members concerning only the French version was referred to the Drafting Committee.

194. The Workers' members stated that this was a very important Paragraph, aimed at securing general recognition of the plight of the unemployed and their families and its wording should fully reflect this objective. They therefore submitted an amendment (D.113) to delete in the first line the words "endeavour to" and to replace the word "situation" by "hardships" and the words "dependent upon income support" by "and their need for sufficient income". The Workers' members withdrew their first proposal. The amendment, as subamended, was adopted.

195. Paragraph 21, as amended, was adopted.

IV. DEVELOPMENT OF SYSTEMS OF PROTECTION

Paragraph 22

196. Paragraph 22 was adopted without change.

197. The Government member of Australia presented an amendment (D.84) to replace the title of Part IV by "Development and improvement of systems of protection" and to insert a new Paragraph to emphasise that the issue of the development and the evolution of schemes was not limited to developing countries and that a variety of approaches was necessary. This amendment was adopted.

198. The Workers' members submitted an amendment (D.118) to delete the words "seek to" in subparagraphs 1 and 2 respectively; to specify in clause (a) of subparagraph 1 that the facilities of a public employment service should be free of charge; and to add in subparagraph 2 that the goal of a sufficient level of employment must include reference to adequate wages and working conditions. The Workers' members agreed to withdraw the first part of their amendment. The second part of the amendment was accepted. The Employers' members noted that increasing the requirement to be met in this respect could only delay the introduction of some form of unemployment benefit. The Government members of Brazil, Morocco, Tunisia and the United States indicated their preference for the text proposed by the Office. The Government member of Cyprus pointed out that given the introduction of new Paragraph 22 bis, it should be understood that Paragraph 23 concerned only those countries which were in an initial phase of developing their social protection scheme. The final part of the amendment was approved by 75,905 votes in favour, 63,920 against, with 11,186 abstentions.

199. An amendment (D.136) presented by the Employers' members concerning the French version only was referred to the Drafting Committee.

200. The Employers' members submitted an amendment (D.137) to add to subparagraph 2 the necessity of measures for vocational guidance and training to facilitate adapting the skills required to job vacancies, and to add to subparagraph 4 a reference to paragraph 2. The Workers' members proposed to subamend the first part of the amendment by adding at the end of subparagraph 2 the words "with adequate wages and working conditions", but were opposed to the second part of the amendment. The Employers' members did not accept this subamendment. The Government members of Tunisia and Morocco supported the amendment of the Employers' members in its original version. The Government member of Brazil emphasised that countries such as her own were in an intermediary situation where a benefit scheme could be introduced without the prior condition of a high level of stable and remunerated employment. The Workers' members' subamendment received 70,006 votes in favour, 2,397 votes against, with 80,206 abstentions, but was not adopted as the total number of votes cast did not reach the quorum of 72,869 votes. The second part of the Employers' members amendment received 63,121 votes in favour, 799 against, with 92,684 abstentions, but was not adopted as the total number of votes cast was lower than the quorum.

201. An amendment (D.138) submitted by the Employers' members in relation to the amendment (D.137) was withdrawn.

202. Paragraph 23, as amended, was adopted.

203. Paragraph 24 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 25

204. Paragraph 25 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 26

205. Paragraph 26 was adopted without change.

206. The Employers' members submitted an amendment (D.139) to draft this Paragraph in such a way as to subordinate its application to cases where the conditions mentioned in Paragraph 23 were not met and to replace the word "should" by "could". They recalled that this Paragraph originated from a proposal formulated during a tripartite meeting in Africa. The recommended solution, however, met very firm objections from the Latin American employers, which were stated by the Employers' member of Ecuador. In their view, the imposition of new social charges on employers did not take account of the situation of developing countries. The Workers' members noted that the proposed provisions were dependent on the existence of legislation relating to severance payments. They submitted a subamendment to delete the reference to Paragraph 23 in the beginning. The Government member of France inquired as to the scope of the provision under which the loss of employment giving entitlement to severance payments could be independent of the will of the employer. The Employers' members confirmed that the employers' "responsibility in common" provided for under their amendment implied the financing of a compensation fund by the employers. The subamendment proposed by the Workers' members received 60,724 votes in favour, 0 against, with 93,483 abstentions, but was not adopted for lack of a quorum. The Employers' members' amendment in its original form received 60,724 votes in favour, 0 against, with 95,081 abstentions, but was not adopted for lack of a quorum.

207. Paragraph 27 was adopted without change.

Proposed new Paragraph

208. During the consideration of Article 18 of the proposed Convention an amendment (D.53) presented by the Government member of Australia was set aside, in view of its possible inclusion in the proposed Recommendation. The Employers' members recalled their opposition to this amendment. The Workers' members supported it. The amendment was adopted by 81,498 votes in favour, 61,523 against, with 5,593 abstentions. As there was no paragraph in the proposed Recommendation concerning the waiting period, the Chairman indicated that this amendment could be preceded by a reference to Article 18 of the proposed Convention.

Examination of the resolution concerning the promotion of employment and social security submitted by the Government delegation of Italy

209. The Committee had entrusted to a Working Party the examination of a draft resolution concerning the promotion of employment and social security, presented to the Conference by the Government delegation of Italy (Provisional Record No. 1) which was transmitted to the Committee by the Resolutions Committee. During its last session the Committee examined the simplified text prepared by the Government member of Italy following the examination by the Working Party. The Government member of Italy explained that this draft resolution was a follow-up to the European Regional Conference and the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment. The Government member of Finland, expressing a widely held opinion, emphasised that the main aim of the draft resolution was, to a large extent, reflected in the provisions of the proposed Convention and Recommendation. He felt that the Committee could not examine such an important proposal at the last minute. The Employers' members felt they were taken at short notice by the text which had been submitted to them. The Workers' members expressed their sympathy for the general goals of the draft resolution but stated that for lack of time for a sufficient examination, they would be compelled to abstain. They felt that it would be preferable that a similar resolution be presented again to the Conference one or two years after the adoption of the proposed Convention and Recommendation on which it was based. The Government member of the United States pointed out that a certain number of measures proposed in the provisions of the draft resolution were already included in the ILO's Medium-Term Plan. The Government member of the Federal Republic of Germany, speaking on behalf of the Government of the European Community, hailed the initiative of the Italian Government and declared that they were prepared to support it. In light of the various interventions, the Government member of Italy stated that he acknowledged the various statements of the members of the Committee, which would be reflected in the report, and withdrew the draft resolution. In addition, he announced that his country intended to submit a revised draft resolution to the next session of the Conference.

Adoption of the Report, the Proposed Convention and the Proposed Recommendation

210. The Employers' members recalled that last year they had favoured the adoption of a Recommendation only, and that they had reserved their position for the second discussion. Although several of their group had reservations with regard to certain provisions of the proposed instruments, in particular Paragraph 10 and 13 of the proposed Recommendation, the Employers' members recognised that on the whole a great effort at mutual understanding had been made. They were thus in the position this year, despite several reservations, to support the proposed Convention and Recommendation.

211. The Employers' member of Venezuela, speaking on behalf of the Employers' members of the Latin American countries, expressed fear that the proposed instruments raised unjustified expectations. While in agreement in principle with the objectives of the proposed Convention and Recommendation, these countries could accept them only with reticence. In developing countries, which were heavily burdened by external debts, priority had to be given to the promotion of employment, taking account of the importance of underemployment and of the informal economy. The Latin America employers were unanimously opposed to the utilisation of social security funds for the promotion of employment. It was extremely difficult for Latin American countries to accept new social charges which, despite the best intentions, would endanger their priorities and threaten needed investments. It was only through these investments that they could implement the principles of the instruments relating to human rights, by ensuring productive employment for their populations. This was why these countries supported the draft resolution, in its revised version presented by the Government of Italy. They hoped that its objectives would be taken into consideration by the ILO in the near future. The Latin American countries approved the conclusions of the High-Level Meeting on Structural Adjustment as well as the conclusions of the Meeting of Latin American Employers (Quito, March 1988), which rejected the creation of funds financed by employers such as those provided for in Paragraph 30 of the proposed Recommendation. The Latin American employers nevertheless confirmed their support for the document approved by the Committee.

212. The Workers' members, while expressing satisfaction with the adoption of the proposed Convention and Recommendation, restated the reservations they had expressed with respect to subparagraph (d) of Article 20 of the proposed Convention.

213. The Government member of Japan expressed his reservations on Paragraphs 10 and 11 of the proposed Recommendation and on the utilisation of social security resources for the promotion of employment. The Government member of Brazil had reservations concerning Article 15 and 19 of the proposed Convention. The Government member of Italy expressed reservations about Article 15 of the proposed Convention.

214. On a proposal from the Employers' members, it was agreed to expand in Article 10, paragraph 3, in accordance with Article 10, paragraph 4 of the proposed Convention, the scope of exceptions which it was possible to make, as this Article had been introduced only after the discussions relating to Article 5, on which it was based.

215. The Drafting Committee questioned whether it was not advisable to add to Article 15, paragraph 2, the words "whichever is highest", as in paragraph 1 of this Article. While considering such a solution defensible, the Employers' members raised objections to it, as it reduced the possibility of developing countries, to which paragraph 2 related, being able to apply it. On the basis of a proposal by the Workers' members, it was agreed, as a compromise to insert in the place of "or" the words "but no less than".

216. The Government member of Canada noted that there was a contradiction between paragraph 56 of the Report, which referred to "unemployed persons who accepted part-time employment" and paragraph 3 of Article 10 which applied to all part-time workers, whereas the amendment (D.32) he had proposed and which had been adopted referred, in the French version, to "prestataires". It was decided nevertheless not to modify the text adopted by the Drafting Committee.

217. In reply to a request from the Government member of the United States concerning the scope of the expression "the level and duration of unemployment benefit paid", in Paragraph 15 of the proposed Recommendation, it was agreed that the word "and" included "or".

218. Following a proposal by the Government member of Japan to introduce the expression "under prescribed conditions" in Paragraph 15 of the proposed Recommendation, it was agreed that such an addition was not necessary in a Recommendation.

219. During these last two sittings, the Committee unanimously adopted its Report and the proposed Convention and Recommendations.

219. During these last two sittings, the Committee unanimously adopted its Report and the proposed Convention and Recommendation, with due regard to the changes proposed during the discussion.

Proposed Convention concerning Employment Promotion and Protection against Unemployment

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,
Having been convened at Geneva by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and having met in its Seventy-fifth Session on 1 June 1988,
and

Emphasising the importance of work and productive employment in any society not only because of the resources which they create for the community, but also because of the income which they bring to workers, the social role which they confer and the feeling of self-esteem which workers derive from them, and

Recalling the existing international standards in the field of employment and unemployment protection (the Unemployment Provision Convention and Recommendation, 1934, the Unemployment (Young Persons) Recommendation, 1935, the Income Security Recommendation, 1944, the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952, the Employment Policy Convention and Recommendation, 1964, the Human Resources Development Convention and Recommendation, 1975, the Labour Administration Convention and Recommendation, 1978, and the Employment Policy (Supplementary Provisions) Recommendation, 1984 and

Considering the widespread unemployment and underemployment affecting various countries throughout the world at all stages of development and in particular the problems of young people, many of whom are seeking their first employment, and

Considering that, since the adoption of the international instruments concerning protection against unemployment referred to above, there have been important new developments in the law and practice of many Members necessitating the revision of existing standards, in particular the Unemployment Provision Convention, 1934, and the adoption of new international standards concerning the promotion of full, productive and freely chosen employment by all appropriate means, including social security, and

Noting that the provisions concerning unemployment benefit in the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952, lay down a level of protection that has now been surpassed by most of the existing compensation schemes in the industrialised countries and, unlike standards concerning other benefits, have not been followed by higher standards, but that the standards in question can still constitute a target for developing countries that are in a position to set up an unemployment compensation scheme, and

Recognising that policies leading to stable, sustained, non-inflationary economic growth and a flexible response to change, as well as to creation and promotion of all forms of productive and freely chosen employment including small undertakings, co-operatives, self-employment and local initiatives for employment, even through the re-distribution of resources currently devoted to the financing of purely assistance-oriented activities towards activities which promote employment especially vocational guidance, training and rehabilitation, offer the best protection against the adverse effects of involuntary unemployment, but that involuntary unemployment nevertheless exists and that it is therefore important to ensure that social security systems should provide employment assistance and economic support to those who are involuntarily unemployed, and

Having decided upon the adoption of certain proposals with regard to employment promotion and social security which is the fifth item on the agenda of the session with a view, in particular, to revising the Unemployment Provision Convention, 1934, and

Having determined that these proposals shall take the form of an international Convention;

adopts this day of June of the year one thousand nine hundred and eighty-eight the following Convention, which may be cited as the Employment Promotion and Protection against Unemployment Convention, 1988:

I. GENERAL PROVISIONS

Article 1

In this Convention:

- (a) the term "legislation" includes any social security rules as well as laws and regulations;
- (b) the term "prescribed" means determined by or in virtue of national legislation.

Article 2

Each Member shall take appropriate steps to co-ordinate its system of protection against unemployment and its employment policy. To this end, it shall seek to ensure that its system of protection against unemployment, and in particular the methods of providing unemployment benefit, contribute to the promotion of full, productive and freely chosen employment, and are not such as to discourage employers from offering and workers from seeking productive employment.

Article 3

The provisions of this Convention shall be implemented in consultation and co-operation with the organisations of employers and workers, in accordance with national practice.

Article 4

1. Each Member which ratifies this Convention may, by a declaration accompanying its ratification, exclude the provisions of Part VII from the obligations accepted by ratification.
2. Each Member which has made a declaration under paragraph 1 above may withdraw it at any time by a subsequent declaration.

1. Each Member may avail itself, by a declaration accompanying its ratification, of at most two of the temporary exceptions provided for in Article 10, paragraph 4, Article 11, paragraph 3, Article 15, paragraph 2, Article 18, paragraph 2, Article 19, paragraph 4, Article 23, paragraph 2, Article 24, paragraph 2, and Article 25, paragraph 2. Such a declaration shall state the reasons which justify these exceptions.

2. Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph 1 above, a Member, where it is justified by the extent of protection of its social security system, may avail itself, by a declaration accompanying its ratification, of the temporary exceptions provided for in Article 10, paragraph 4, Article 11, paragraph 3, Article 15, paragraph 2, Article 18, paragraph 2, Article 19, paragraph 4, Article 23, paragraph 2, Article 24, paragraph 2 and Article 25, paragraph 2. Such a declaration shall state the reasons which justify these exceptions.

3. Each Member which has made a declaration under paragraph 1 or paragraph 2 shall include in its reports on the application of this Convention submitted under Article 22 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation a statement in respect of each exception of which it avails itself—

- (a) that its reason for doing so subsists; or
- (b) that it renounces its right to avail itself of the exception in question as from a stated date.

4. Each Member which has made a declaration under paragraph 1 or paragraph 2 shall, as appropriate to the terms of such declaration and as circumstances permit —

- (a) cover the contingency of partial unemployment;
- (b) increase the number of persons protected;
- (c) increase the amount of the benefits;
- (d) reduce the length of the waiting period;
- (e) extend the duration of payment of benefits;
- (f) adapt statutory social security schemes to the occupational circumstances of part-time workers;
- (g) endeavour to ensure the provision of medical care to persons in receipt of unemployment benefit and their dependants;

- (h) endeavour to guarantee that the periods during which such benefit if paid will be taken into account for the acquisition of the right to social security benefits and, where appropriate, the calculation of disability, old-age and survivors' benefit.

1. Each Member shall ensure equality of treatment for all persons protected, without discrimination on the basis of race, colour, sex, religion, political opinion, national extraction, nationality, ethnic or social origin, disability or age.

2. The provisions of paragraph 1 shall not prevent the adoption of special measures which are justified by the circumstances of identified groups under the schemes referred to in Article 12, paragraph 2, or are designed to meet the specific needs of categories of persons who have particular problems in the labour market, in particular disadvantaged groups, or the conclusion between States of bilateral or multilateral agreements relating to unemployment benefits on the basis of reciprocity.

II. PROMOTION OF PRODUCTIVE EMPLOYMENT

Article 7

Each Member shall declare as a priority objective a policy designed to promote full, productive and freely chosen employment by all appropriate means, including social security. Such means should include, inter alia, employment services, vocational training and vocational guidance.

Article 8

1. Each Member shall endeavour to establish, subject to national law and practice, special programmes to promote additional job opportunities and employment assistance and to encourage freely chosen and productive employment for identified categories of disadvantaged persons having or liable to have difficulties in finding lasting employment such as women, young workers, disabled persons, older workers, the long-term unemployed, migrant workers lawfully resident in the country and workers affected by structural change.

2. Each Member shall specify, in its reports under article 22 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation, the categories of persons for whom it undertakes to promote employment programmes.

3. Each Member shall endeavour to extend the promotion of productive employment progressively to a greater number of categories than the number initially covered.

Article 9

The measures envisaged in this Part shall be taken in the light of the Human Resources Development Convention and Recommendation, 1975, and the Employment Policy (Supplementary Provisions) Recommendation, 1984.

III. CONTINGENCIES COVERED

Article 10

1. The contingencies covered shall include, under prescribed conditions, full unemployment defined as the loss of earnings due to inability to obtain suitable employment with due regard to the provisions of Article 21, paragraph 2, in the case of a person capable of working, available for work and actually seeking work.

2. Each Member shall in addition endeavour to extend the protection of the Convention, under prescribed conditions, to the following contingencies –

- (a) loss of earnings due to partial unemployment, defined as a temporary reduction in the normal or statutory hours of work; and
- (b) suspension or reduction of earnings due to a temporary suspension of work, without any break in the employment relationship for reasons of, in particular, an economic, technological, structural or similar nature.

3. Each Member shall endeavour to provide the payment of benefits to part-time workers who are actually seeking full-time work. The total of benefits and earnings from their part-time work may be such as to maintain incentives to take up full-time work.

4. Where a declaration made in virtue of Article 5 is in force, the implementation of paragraphs 2 and 3 above may be deferred.

IV. PERSONS PROTECTED

Article 11

1. The persons protected shall comprise prescribed classes of employees, constituting not less than 85 per cent of all employees, including public employees and apprentices.

2. Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph 1 above, public employees whose employment up to normal retiring age is guaranteed by national laws or regulations may be excluded from protection.

3. Where a declaration made in virtue of Article 5 is in force, the persons protected shall comprise –

- (a) prescribed classes of employees constituting not less than 50 per cent of all employees; or
- (b) where specifically justified by the level of development, prescribed classes of employees constituting not less than 50 per cent of all employees in industrial workplaces employing 20 persons or more.

V. METHODS OF PROTECTION

Article 12

1. Unless it is otherwise provided in this Convention, each Member may determine the method or methods of protection by which it chooses to put into effect the provisions of the Convention, whether by a contributory or non-contributory system, or by a combination of such systems.

2. Nevertheless, if the legislation of a Member protects all residents whose resources, during the contingency, do not exceed prescribed limits, protection afforded may be limited, in the light of the resources of the beneficiary and his or her family, in accordance with the provisions of Article 16.

VI. BENEFIT TO BE PROVIDED

Article 13

Benefits provided in the form of periodical payments to the unemployed may be related to the methods of protection.

In cases of full unemployment, benefits shall be provided in the form of periodical payments calculated in such a way as to provide the beneficiary with partial and transitional wage replacement and, at the same time, to avoid creating disincentives either to work or to employment creation.

1. In cases of full unemployment and suspension of earnings due to a temporary suspension of work without any break in the employment relationship, when this contingency is covered, benefits shall be provided in the form of periodical payments, calculated as follows:

- (a) where these benefits are based on the contributions of or on behalf of the person protected or on previous earnings, they shall be fixed at not less than 50 per cent of previous earnings, it being permitted to fix a maximum for the amount of the benefit or for the earnings to be taken into account, which may be related, for example, to the wage of a skilled manual employee or to the average wage of workers in the region concerned;
- (b) where such benefits are not based on contributions or previous earnings, they shall be fixed at not less than 50 per cent of the statutory minimum wage or of the wage of an ordinary labourer, or at a level which provides the minimum essential for basic living expenses, whichever is the highest;

2. Where a declaration made in virtue of Article 5 is in force, the amount of the benefits shall be equal—

- (a) to not less than 45 per cent of the previous earnings; or
- (b) to not less than 45 per cent of the statutory minimum wage or of the wage of an ordinary labourer but no less than a level which provides the minimum essential for basic living expenses.

3. If appropriate, the percentages specified in paragraphs 1 and 2 may be reached by comparing net periodical payments after tax and contributions with net earnings after tax and contributions.

Article 16

Notwithstanding the provisions of Article 15, the benefit provided beyond the initial period specified in Article 19, paragraph 2(a), as well as benefits paid by a Member in accordance with Article 12, paragraph 2, may be fixed after taking account of other resources, beyond a prescribed limit, available to the beneficiary and his or her family, in accordance with a prescribed scale. In any case, these benefits, in combination with any other benefits to which they may be entitled, shall guarantee them healthy and reasonable living conditions in accordance with national standards.

Article 17

1. Where the legislation of a Member makes the right to unemployment benefit conditional upon the completion of a qualifying period, this period shall not exceed the length deemed necessary to prevent abuse.

2. Each Member shall endeavour to adapt the qualifying period to the occupational circumstances of seasonal workers.

Article 18

1. If the legislation of a Member provides that the payment of benefit in cases of full employment should begin only after the expiry of a waiting period, such period shall not exceed seven days.

2. Where a declaration made in virtue of Article 5 is in force, the length of the waiting period shall not exceed ten days.

3. In the case of seasonal workers the waiting period specified in paragraph 1 above may be adapted to their occupational circumstances.

Article 19

1. The benefits provided in cases of full unemployment and suspension of earnings due to a temporary suspension of work without any break in the employment relationship shall be paid throughout these contingencies.

2. Nevertheless, in the case of full unemployment—

- (a) the initial duration of payment of the benefit provided for in Article 15 may be limited to 26 weeks in each spell of unemployment, or to 39 weeks over any period of 24 months;
- (b) in the event of unemployment continuing beyond this initial period of benefit, the duration of payment of benefit, which may be calculated in the light of the resources of the beneficiary and his or her family, in accordance with the provisions of Article 16, may be limited to a prescribed period.

3. If the legislation of a Member provides that the initial duration of payment of the benefit provided for in Article 15 shall vary with the length of the qualifying period, the average duration fixed for the payment of benefits shall be at least 26 weeks.

4. Where a declaration made in virtue of Article 5 is in force, the duration of payment of benefit may be limited to 13 weeks over any period of 12 months or up to an average of 13 weeks if the legislation provides that the initial duration of payment shall vary with the length of the qualifying period.

5. In the cases envisaged in paragraph 2(b) above each Member shall endeavour to grant appropriate additional assistance to the persons concerned with a view to permitting them to find productive and freely chosen employment having recourse in particular to the measures specified in Part II.

6. The duration of payment of benefit to seasonal workers may be adapted to their occupational circumstances, without prejudice to the provisions of paragraph 2(b) above.

The benefit to which a protected person would have been entitled in the cases of full or partial unemployment or suspension of earnings due to a temporary suspension of work without any break in the employment relationship may be refused, withdrawn, suspended or reduced to the extent prescribed—

- (a) for as long as the person concerned is absent from the territory of the Member;
- (b) when it has been determined by the competent authority that the person concerned had deliberately contributed to his or her own dismissal;
- (c) when it has been determined by the competent authority that the person concerned has left employment voluntarily without just cause;
- (d) during the period of a labour dispute, when the person concerned has stopped work to take part in a labour dispute or when he or she is prevented from working as a direct result of a stoppage of work due to this labour dispute;
- (e) when the person concerned has attempted to obtain or has obtained benefits fraudulently;
- (f) when the person concerned has failed without just cause to use the facilities available for placement, vocational guidance, training, retraining or redeployment in suitable work;
- (g) as long as the person concerned is in receipt of another income maintenance benefit provided for in the legislation of the Member concerned, except family benefit, provided that the part of the benefit which is suspended does not exceed that other benefit.

1. The benefit to which a protected person would have been entitled in the case of full unemployment may be refused, withdrawn, suspended or reduced, to the extent prescribed, when the person concerned refuses to accept suitable employment.

2. In assessing the suitability of employment, account shall be taken, in particular, under prescribed conditions and to an appropriate extent, of the age of unemployed persons, their length of service in their former occupation, their acquired experience, the length of their period of unemployment, the labour market situation, the impact of the employment in question on their personal and family situation and of whether the employment is vacant as a direct result of a stoppage of work due to an on-going labour dispute.

When protected persons have received directly from their employer or from any other source under national laws or regulations or collective agreements, severance pay, the principal purpose of which is to contribute towards compensating them for the loss of earnings suffered in the event of full unemployment—

- (a) the unemployment benefit to which the persons concerned would be entitled may be suspended for a period corresponding to that during which the severance pay compensates for the loss of earnings suffered; or
 - (b) the severance pay may be reduced by an amount corresponding to the value converted into a lump sum of the periodical payments to which the persons concerned are entitled for a period corresponding to that during which the severance pay compensates for the loss of earnings suffered,
- as each Member may decide.

Article 23

1. Each Member whose legislation provides for the right to medical care and makes it directly or indirectly conditional upon occupational activity shall endeavour to ensure, under prescribed conditions, the provision of medical care to persons in receipt of unemployment benefit and to their dependants.

Article 24

1. Each Member shall endeavour to guarantee to persons in receipt of unemployment benefit, under prescribed conditions, that the periods during which benefits are paid will be taken into consideration—

- (a) for acquisition of the right to and, where appropriate, calculation of disability, old-age and survivors' benefit, and
 - (b) for acquisition of the right to medical care and sickness, maternity and family benefit after the end of unemployment,
- when the legislation of the Member concerned provides for such benefits and makes them directly or indirectly conditional upon occupational activity.

2. Where a declaration made in virtue of Article 5 is in force, the implementation of paragraph 1 above may be deferred.

Article 25

1. Each Member shall ensure that statutory social security schemes which are based on occupational activity are adjusted to the occupational circumstances of part-time workers, unless their hours of work or earnings can be considered, under prescribed conditions, as negligible.

2. Where a declaration made in virtue of Article 5 is in force, the implementation of paragraph 1 above may be deferred.

VII. SPECIAL PROVISIONS FOR NEW APPLICANTS FOR EMPLOYMENT

1. Members shall take account of the fact that there are many categories of persons seeking work who have never been, or have ceased to be, recognised as unemployed or have never been, or have ceased to be, covered by schemes for the protection of the unemployed. Consequently, at least three of the following ten categories of persons seeking work shall receive social benefits, in accordance with prescribed terms and conditions:

- (a) young persons who have completed their vocational training;
- (b) young persons who have completed their studies;
- (c) young persons who have completed their compulsory military service;
- (d) persons after a period devoted to bringing up a child or caring for someone who is sick, disabled or elderly;
- (e) persons whose spouse had died, when they are not entitled to a survivor's benefit;
- (f) divorced or separated persons;
- (g) released prisoners;
- (h) adults, including disabled persons, who have completed a period of training;
- (i) migrant workers on return to their home country, except in so far as they have acquired rights under the legislation of the country where they last worked;
- (j) previously self-employed persons.

2. Each Member shall specify, in its reports under article 22 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation, the categories of persons listed in paragraph 1 above which it undertakes to protect.

3. Each Member shall endeavour to extend protection progressively to a greater number of categories than the number initially protected.

VIII. LEGAL ADMINISTRATIVE AND FINANCIAL GUARANTEES

Article 27

1. In the event of refusal, withdrawal, suspension or reduction of benefit or dispute as to its amount, claimants shall have the right to present a complaint to the body administering the benefit scheme and to appeal thereafter to an independent body. They shall be informed in writing of the procedures available, which shall be simple and rapid.

2. The appeal procedure shall enable the claimant, in accordance with national law and practice, to be represented or assisted by a qualified person of the claimant's choice or by a delegate of a representative workers' organisation or by a delegate of an organisation representative of protected persons.

Article 28

Each Member shall assume general responsibility for the sound administration of the institutions and services entrusted with the application of the Convention.

Article 29

1. When the administration is directly entrusted to a government department responsible to Parliament, representatives of the protected persons and of the employers shall be associated in the administration in an advisory capacity, under prescribed conditions.

2. When the administration is not entrusted to a government department responsible to Parliament—

- (a) representatives of the protected persons shall participate in the administration or be associated therewith in an advisory capacity under prescribed conditions;
- (b) national laws or regulations may also provide for the participation of employers' representatives;
- (c) the laws or regulations may further provide for the participation of representatives of the public authorities.

Article 30

In cases where subsidies are granted by the State or the social security system in order to safeguard employment, Members shall take the necessary steps to ensure that the payments are expended only for the intended purpose and to prevent fraud or abuse by those who receive such payments.

This Convention revises the Unemployment Provision Convention, 1934.

Proposed Recommendation concerning employment promotion and protection against unemployment

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,
Having been convened at Geneva by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and having met in its Seventy-fifth Session on 1 June 1988,
and

Having determined that these proposals shall take the form of a Recommendation supplementing the Employment Promotion and Protection against Unemployment Convention, 1988; adopts this day of June of the year one thousand nine hundred and eighty-eight the following Recommendation, which may be cited as the Employment Promotion and Protection against Unemployment Recommendation, 1988.

I. GENERAL PROVISIONS

1. In this Recommendation—

- (a) the term “legislation” includes any social security rules as well as laws and regulations;
- (b) the term “prescribed” means determined by or in virtue of national legislation;
- (c) the term “the Convention” means the Employment Promotion and Protection against Unemployment Convention, 1988.

II. PROMOTION OF PRODUCTIVE EMPLOYMENT

2. The promotion of full, productive and freely chosen employment by all appropriate means, including through social security, should be a priority objective of national policy. Such means should include, inter alia, employment services, vocational training and vocational guidance.

3. In periods of economic crisis, adjustment policies should include, under prescribed conditions, measures to encourage initiatives which involve the maximum use of labour on a large scale.

4. Each Member should endeavour to grant in particular, under prescribed conditions and in the most appropriate manner, by way of occupational mobility incentives—

- (a) allowances towards the costs of travel and equipment necessary to take advantage of the services provided for in Paragraph 2 above;
- (b) allowances in the form of periodical payments calculated in accordance with the provisions of Article 15 of the Convention for a prescribed period of vocational training or retraining.

5. Each Member should in addition consider granting in particular, under prescribed conditions and in the most appropriate manner, by way of occupational or geographical mobility incentives—

- (a) temporary degressive allowances designed to offset, where appropriate, a reduction in pay as a result of redeployment;
- (b) allowances towards travel and removal costs;
- (c) separation allowances;
- (d) resettlement grants.

6. Each Member should ensure co-ordination of statutory pension schemes and encourage co-ordination of private pension schemes in order to remove barriers to occupational mobility.

7. Each Member should offer to protected persons, under prescribed conditions, facilities to enable them to engage in remunerated temporary employment without endangering the employment of other workers and with the purpose of improving their own chances of obtaining productive and freely chosen employment.

8. Each Member should, as far as possible, offer to unemployed persons who wish to set up their own business or take up another economic activity, financial assistance and advisory services under prescribed conditions.

9. Each Member should give consideration to the conclusion of bilateral and multilateral agreements which provide for assistance to foreign workers protected by its legislation who freely wish to return to the territory of the State of which they are nationals or in which they formerly resided. Where such agreements do not exist, each Member should provide, through national legislation, financial assistance to those workers affected.

10. Each Member should, in accordance, if appropriate, with provisions in multilateral agreements, invest any reserves accumulated by statutory pension schemes and provident funds in such a way as to promote and not to discourage employment within the country, and encourage such investment from private sources, including private pension schemes, while at the same time affording the necessary guarantees of security and yield of the investment.

11. The progressive introduction in rural and urban areas of community services, including health-care services, financed by social security contributions or by other sources should lead to increased employment and the provision of training of personnel, while at the same time making a practical contribution to the achievement of national objectives regarding employment promotion.

III. PROTECTION OF UNEMPLOYED PERSONS

12. In case of partial unemployment and in the case referred to in Article 10, paragraph 3, of the Convention, benefit should be provided, under prescribed conditions, in the form of periodical payments fairly compensating for the loss of earnings due to unemployment. These benefits might be calculated in the light of the reduction of hours of work suffered by the unemployed persons or so that the total of the benefit and the earnings from the part-time work reaches a sum between the amount of the previous earnings from full-time work and the amount of the full unemployment benefit, so as not to discourage part-time or temporary work, when these forms of work may assist in a return to full-time work.

13. (1) The percentages specified in Article 15 of the Convention for the calculation of benefits should be reached on the basis of the gross earnings of the beneficiary before tax and social security contributions

(2) If appropriate, these percentages may be reached by comparing net periodical payments after tax and contributions with net earnings after tax and contributions.

14. (1) The concept of suitable employment should, under prescribed conditions, not apply to—

- (a) employment involving a change of occupation which does not take account of the abilities, qualifications, skills, work experience or the retraining potential of the person concerned;
- (b) employment involving a change of residence to a place in which suitable accommodation is not available;
- (c) employment in which the conditions and remuneration are appreciably less favourable than those which are generally granted, at the relevant time, in the occupation and district in which the employment is offered;
- (d) employment vacant as a direct result of a stoppage due to an ongoing labour dispute;
- (e) employment such that, for a reason other than those covered in clauses (a) to (d), and with due regard to all attendant circumstances, including the family responsibilities of the person concerned, the refusal of the employment is not unreasonable.

(2) In assessing the criteria specified in clauses (a) to (c) and (e) above, account should be taken in general of the age of the unemployed persons, of their length of service in their former occupation, of their acquired experience, of the duration of their unemployment, of the state of the labour market and of the repercussions of the employment on their personal and family situations.

15. If an unemployed person has agreed to accept, for a prescribed maximum period, temporary employment which cannot be regarded as suitable within the meaning of Paragraph 14 above, or part-time employment in the circumstances covered in Article 10, paragraph 3, of the Convention, the level and duration of unemployment benefit paid at the end of such employment should not be adversely affected by the earnings of the unemployed person from that employment.

16. Members should endeavour to extend progressively the application of their legislation concerning unemployment benefit to cover all employees. However, public employees whose employment up to normal retirement age is guaranteed by national laws or regulations may be excluded from protection.

17. Members should endeavour to protect workers who are experiencing hardship in a waiting period.

18. The following provisions should be applicable, as appropriate, to the categories of persons mentioned in Article 26, paragraph 1, of the Convention:

- (a) in cases of full unemployment, the benefit may be calculated in accordance with the provisions of Article 16 of the Convention;
- (b) the qualifying period should be adapted or waived, under prescribed conditions, for certain of the categories of persons newly seeking work;
- (c) when benefit is provided without a qualifying period—
 - (i) the waiting period may be increased to a prescribed length;
 - (ii) the duration of payment of benefit may be limited under prescribed conditions notwithstanding the provision of Article 19, paragraph 1, of the Convention.

19. When the duration of payment of benefit is limited by national legislation, it should be extended, under prescribed conditions, until pensionable age for unemployed persons who have reached an age, prior to the pensionable age, prescribed by national legislation.

20. Each Member whose legislation provides for the rights to medical care and makes it directly or indirectly conditional upon occupational activity should endeavour to ensure, under prescribed conditions, the provision of medical care to unemployed persons including, if possible, those who are not in receipt of unemployment benefit and to their dependants.

21. Each Member should endeavour to guarantee to persons in receipt of unemployment benefit, under prescribed conditions, that the periods during which benefits are paid will be taken into consideration—

- (a) for acquisition of the right to and, where appropriate, calculation of disability, old-age and survivors' benefit, and
- (b) for acquisition of the right to medical care and sickness, maternity and family benefit after the end of unemployment, when the legislation of the Member concerned provides for such benefits and makes them directly or indirectly conditional upon occupational activity.

22. Each Member should endeavour to make adjustments of statutory social security schemes which are based on occupational activity to the occupational circumstances of part-time workers. Such adjustments, provided for in Article 25 of the Convention, should relate in particular, under prescribed conditions to—

- (a) the minimum hours of work and minimum earnings necessary for the entitlement to benefits under the basic and supplementary schemes;
- (b) maximum earnings for the calculation of contributions;
- (c) the qualifying period for entitlement to benefit;
- (d) the methods of calculating cash benefits, in particular pensions, on the basis of earnings and of the length of the period of contribution, insurance or occupational activity;
- (e) entitlement to non-reduced minimum benefits and flat-rate benefits, in particular family allowances.

23. Members should endeavour to promote a real understanding of the hardships of unemployed persons, particularly those who have been unemployed for a long period, and their need for sufficient income.

IV. DEVELOPMENT AND IMPROVEMENT OF SYSTEMS OF PROTECTION

24. Since the systems of protection for the unemployed of some Members are in the early stages of development and others may have to consider changes to existing schemes in the light of changing needs, a variety of approaches may legitimately be taken in assisting the unemployed, and Members should give high priority to a full and frank exchange of information on programmes of assistance for the unemployed.

25. With a view to reaching at least the standards laid down in Part IV (Unemployment Benefit) of the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952, Members which intend to develop their system of protection against unemployment should be guided, in so far as is possible and appropriate, by the following provisions.

26. (1) Members should be aware of the technical and administrative difficulties involved in the planning and introduction of social security mechanisms for the compensation of unemployment. In order to introduce forms of unemployment compensation through the payment of benefits of a non-discretionary nature, they should seek to meet the following conditions as soon as possible—

- (a) the introduction and satisfactory operation of a free public employment service containing a network of employment offices and having acquired sufficient administrative capacity to collect and analyse information on the employment market, to register job offers and jobseekers and to verify objectively that persons are involuntarily unemployed;
- (b) a reasonable level of coverage by and extensive experience in the administration of other branches of social security deemed to have priority on social and economic grounds, such as primary health care and compensation for employment accidents.

(2) Members should, as a major priority, seek to meet the conditions set out in subparagraph (1) above by promoting a sufficiently high level of stable employment offering adequate wages and working conditions, in particular through necessary and appropriate measures, such as vocational guidance and training, to facilitate voluntary matching of skills on the labour market to available job vacancies.

(3) The co-operation and technical advice of the International Labour Office should continue to be put to good advantage in supporting any initiative taken by Members in this respect in cases where there is insufficient national expertise.

(4) When the conditions specified in subparagraph (1) above are met, Members should, as rapidly as their resources permit, and if necessary in stages, introduce programmes for the protection of the unemployed, including social security mechanisms for the compensation of unemployment.

27. In cases where the conditions referred to in Paragraph 26 are not met, Members should give priority to special assistance measures for the most needy unemployed persons, to the extent permitted by the available resources and in the context of national conditions.

28. Members which have set up a national provident fund might examine the possibility of authorising the payment of periodical cash benefits to the holders of accounts whose earnings are interrupted by long-term unemployment and whose family situation is precarious in order to provide for their essential needs. The level of this benefit and the period during which it is payable might be limited according to the circumstances, in particular the amount credited to the account.

29. Members might also encourage employers' and workers' organisations to set up assistance funds at the enterprise or inter-enterprise level. These could advantageously be introduced in the enterprises and sectors of activity which have sufficient economic capacity.

30. Members whose laws or regulations require employers to make severance payments to workers who have lost their jobs should envisage making provision for the employers to bear this responsibility in common through the creation of funds financed by employers' contributions, so as to ensure the receipt of these payments by the workers concerned.

Report of the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations

PART ONE

GENERAL REPORT

A. Introduction

1. In accordance with article 7 of its Standing Orders, the Conference set up a Committee to consider and report on item III of its agenda; "Information and reports on the application of Conventions and Recommendations". The Committee was composed of 184 members (100 Government members, 34 Employers' members and 50 Workers' members). It also included 12 Government deputy members, 29 Employers' deputy members and 80 Workers' deputy members.¹ In addition, 28 non-governmental international organisations were represented by observers.² The Committee elected its officers as follows:

Chairman: Mr. A. El Assar (Government member, Egypt);

Vice-Chairmen: Mr. A. Wisskirchen (Employers' member, Federal Republic of Germany) and Mr. J. M. Houthuys (Workers' member, Belgium);

Reporter: Mr. J.-J. Elmiger (Government member, Switzerland).

The Committee held 21 sittings.

2. Pursuant to its terms of reference, the Committee considered the following questions: information on the submission to the competent authorities of Conventions and Recommendations adopted by the Conference, supplied under Article 19 of the Constitution; reports on the application of ratified Conventions, supplied under articles 22 and 35 of the Constitution; and reports requested by the Governing Body under article 19 of the Constitution and the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention (No. 111) and Recommendation (No. 111), 1958.³

3. As usual, the Committee began its work with a discussion of general questions relating to the application of Conventions and Recommendations and the discharge by member States of their obligations under the ILO Constitution in regard to such instruments. The Committee then discussed the general survey made by the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations of the effect given to Convention No. 111 and Recommendation No. 111. Finally, it considered a number of individual cases in respect of which the Committee of Experts had made observations in its report, concerning the application of ratified Conventions or compliance with the obligations to supply reports and to submit Conventions and Recommendations to the competent national authorities. The examination of these cases took as a starting point the observations made by the Committee of Experts, the observations of the Conference Committee in previous years and comments received from employers' and workers' organisations and, where appropriate, the reports of other ILO supervisory bodies; it involved consideration of written and oral explanations provided by the governments concerned. In view of the short time available, the Committee followed its usual practice of selecting a limited number of cases among the observations made by the Committee of Experts. A summary of the information supplied by the governments, of the discussions in the Committee and of any conclusions reached by it is set out in Part Two of this report.

B. General questions relating to international labour standards

Member States of the Organisation

4. The Committee welcomed the fact that Poland had decided to remain within the Organisation. The Government member of Poland stated that her Government was fully aware of the significance of this decision and of the scope of the obligations it imposed. After having informed the Committee of the major changes under way in her country in the political, economic and social fields, she stated that her Government, influenced by trade unions and benefiting from expert advice, was aware of certain imperfections in its legislation and of the problem of compliance with ratified Conventions. She expressed the hope that Poland would be given a reasonable period of time to revise its legislation without undue outside pressure.

40th Anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights

5. This year the Conference commemorated three anniversaries which were of particular importance for the ILO: the 40th Anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the 40th Anniversary of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Rights to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the 30th Anniversary of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111). Like the Committee of Experts, the Conference

2. For the list of organisations, see the reports of the Selection Committee, Provisional Record, Nos. 5A to 5H.

3. Report III (Parts 1 to 3) to the International Labour Conference: Summary of reports (articles 19, 22 and 35 of the Constitution); Report III (Part 4A): Report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations; Report III (Part 4B): Equality in Employment and Occupation.

Committee welcomed the fact that the Director-General had devoted his Report to the Conference to human rights, and considered it particularly appropriate that this year the Committee of Experts' general survey dealt with the instruments on discrimination, for which reports had been requested under article 19 of the Constitution. The commemoration of these anniversaries gave occasion for an evaluation of the ILO's action in the field of human rights for which the Organisation had special responsibility and of the situation regarding the implementation of these rights throughout the world. This evaluation should, without complacency, measure the ground covered, but it especially should show what remains to be done before the rights recognised in the basic instruments become a reality for everyone everywhere.

6. The Committee recognised the vital contribution which the ILO had made towards the implementation of human rights through its action to define these rights and to have them applied. Since the ILO's creation and that of its supervisory procedures, international labour standards had had a profound influence on national legislation and practice and had improved the condition of workers in the world. In certain cases, as stated by the Government member of Argentina, referring to his country's experience, it was not only a question of fuller respect for rights or freedoms, but of human lives which had been saved. The Committee was convinced that to promote human rights, the ILO had to continue to establish standards adapted to developments in the world and to endeavour to improve the application of the procedures by which it ensured respect for these standards.

7. Several members made mention of the multiplicity of international instruments devoted to human rights, whether universal instruments such as the Universal Declaration, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, or regional instruments such as the European Convention on Human Rights or the European Social Charter. The Workers' members recalled the special responsibility vested in the ILO in the field of economic and social rights. They stressed the importance of the Office's presence and participation in the organs of the United Nations, the Council of Europe and other international forums so as to avoid divergent interpretations between the organisations. The Government member of Spain paid homage to the valuable collaboration that the Office had given to the supervision of the European Social Charter; the 25th Anniversary of that instrument had been celebrated by a symposium held in Granada in October 1987.

8. The Committee considered that the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the ILO Conventions on the basic human rights were as valid today as ever. They should not merely exist as instruments, but should be respected in practice. In this regard, numerous speakers, echoing the Director-General's Report to the Conference, deplored the gaps which existed between the acceptance of the principles and actual practice, as well as the numerous and at times massive violations of human rights which continued in all parts of the globe. The Government member of the USSR observed that the ILO's basic Conventions – those relating to forced labour, freedom of association, discrimination and employment policy – had only been ratified by two-thirds of the member States of the ILO. The Government member of Australia pointed out that over half of the observations made by the Committee of Experts in this year's report concerned these Conventions; on the other hand he noted that one-third of the cases in which progress was noted also related to these instruments. Placing the discussion in a historical perspective, the Government member of the Federal Republic of Germany referred to the progress achieved when human rights, which had previously been considered as moral rights, were recognised as positive laws. The Government member of Saudi Arabia emphasised the importance for respect for human rights of the observance of the precepts of Islamic law (the Shari'a), which prohibited discrimination and injustice.

9. The Employers' and Workers' members highlighted the interdependence and universality of human rights. They stressed that the economic and social rights which concerned the ILO could only become a reality when they were founded on civil and political freedoms, and considered that human rights could not be the privilege of certain groups. The Government members of the German Democratic Republic, as well as the Workers' members of the German Democratic Republic and the USSR, indicated the specific responsibility of the ILO in the field of human rights and stressed the importance of the right to work, without which all the other rights remained baseless; they cited in this respect the Director-General's Report, which stated that as long as large sections of the world's labour force were deprived of the opportunity to earn a decent living, they lacked the basis for freedom, dignity, economic security and equal opportunity. The ILO, however, had not expressly recognised the right to work in any instrument, although the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) could make a very useful contribution to the solution of employment problems. They hoped that the ILO would give greater priority to the struggle against unemployment and the quest for full employment since it was the most appropriate forum to collect and exchange information and experience concerning these problems, which affected all countries in one way or another, and to make recommendations on this subject. The Workers' member of the USSR indicated that the trade unions of his country were aware of the possible effects of the current structural transformations and technological changes and were following with interest the experiences of other countries which could be of advantage to his country. The Government member of Hungary thanked the Employment and Development Department of the Office for the assistance received in this field.

10. Reference was made to the effects of the economic crisis on the effective enjoyment of human rights. The Workers' members considered that the crisis should not be used as a pretext for threatening workers' basic rights, whether relating to freedom of association, the right to work or protection against discrimination. The Government member of Venezuela was of the opinion that on the anniversary of certain basic instruments relating to human rights, finding a solution to the economic crisis, which increased the inequalities between individuals and between nations, was the key to ensuring respect for human rights, and in particular the right to development (concerning the application of the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), see paragraphs 50 to 58 below).

40th anniversary of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87)

11. On the occasion of the 40th anniversary of the adoption by the International Labour Conference of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Committee reiterated the special importance that it attached, just as the Committee of Experts had, to this Convention. Freedom of association was an indispensable condition for social progress. Moreover, it was the foundation of the ILO because of its tripartite structure.

12. The Workers' members were pleased at the high number of ratifications (98) reported to date for Convention No. 87. Recalling the resolution adopted on this subject by the Conference in 1987, they addressed an appeal to member States to ratify the Convention, if they had not already done so, and to ensure its full application.

13. The considerable impact that Convention No. 87 had had on national legislation and practice was stressed. The Government member of Spain stated that the ratification of the Convention by his country has enshrined the principle of pluralist representation in the field of labour, and that the Convention had inspired the 1978 Constitution and its implementing laws. The Workers' member of Japan, describing the efforts made by the unions in his country to have Convention No. 87 ratified, and the difficulties encountered in having it applied, highlighted the role played in this regard by the ILO's supervisory system, in particular the Committee on Freedom of Association and the Conference Committee. In his opinion, the case of Japan's application of the Convention on freedom of association illustrated the importance of international labour standards when supported by effective supervisory machinery. Several speakers stressed the important role played by the unions in their countries. The Workers' member of the German Democratic Republic observed that a certain number of countries had devoted considerable efforts to implementing trade union rights and had provided an outstanding legislative basis for effective trade union representation; these positive experiences should be taken more into account during discussions at the international level.

14. In paragraph 17 of its general report, the Committee of Experts noted with concern that restrictions on freedom of association were often the consequence of general limitations to civil liberties and emphasised that the fundamental guarantees of civil liberties conditioned the effective exercise of the principles of freedom of association. The Employers' and Workers' members associated themselves with these observations.

15. The Employers' and Workers' members stated that only respect for the fundamental principle of Convention No. 87 – that workers and employers should be able, without previous authorisation, to establish and join organisations of their own choosing – would ensure fruitful social dialogue which would in turn be the basis for sharing responsibilities and tasks. By virtue of this principle, governments should tolerate the existence of social forces which enjoyed independence from the State.

16. The Workers' members noted that the application of Convention No. 87 continued to meet with serious difficulties in many countries. They regretted that the economic crisis which raged throughout the world was at times used as a pretext for anti-union repression and they stressed that in some countries trade union delegates were the first to be dismissed, clearly a discriminatory practice. In their opinion, the weakening of trade unionism did not lead to a more efficient functioning of the economy. On the contrary, strong unionism was needed to overcome the crisis and to carry out an effective employment policy. Referring to the situation in Africa, the Workers' member of Senegal welcomed the restoration of trade union freedoms in several countries of that continent, but regretted the persistent violations of those freedoms in others. He pointed out that the conditions imposed on the governments of developing countries by the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank were sometimes at the root of violations of freedom of association and the right to work.

Ratification of Conventions

17. The total number of ratifications at 31 December 1987 was 5,308. In 1987, as in 1986, 35 ratifications had been registered.

18. The Workers' members and many Government members expressed concern at the slower pace of ratifications. It was pointed out that only two-thirds of the ILO's member States had ratified the basic Conventions on human rights and that for these Conventions as well, the pace of ratifications had slowed down. The Government member of the Federal Republic of Germany stated that ratification was a sovereign act which had to be preceded by serious consideration; it was at least a moral duty for members of the Organisation to aim seriously at ratification. The Government member of Czechoslovakia pointed out that non-ratification provided governments with immunity from supervision.

19. Several members considered that the Office should actively endeavour to investigate the causes for this slowing down and seek ways of remedying it. Two main explanations were put forward: the economic crisis and the administrative problems of newly independent countries. For their part, the Government members of Bulgaria and the German Democratic Republic thought that the reasons for the slowing down in ratifications should rather be sought in the way the supervisory machinery worked, and that an improvement in this connection would no doubt stimulate ratification. The Government member of Iceland, speaking also on behalf of Denmark, Finland, Norway and Sweden, suggested that the Office, with the support of the social partners, envisage setting annual ratification objectives by region, aiming particularly at the instruments having a global significance. The Workers' member of the United States suggested using tripartism as the catalyst for new ratifications and gave the example of his country which, after 35 years' of abstention, had recently decided to ratify two Conventions – the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) and the Merchant Shipping (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 147). In his opinion, it was the lack of consensus between the social partners which hindered any progress, and it was the dynamism of tripartism – a more effective, better organised and more coherent tripartism – which unblocked the situation. A procedure now existed for examination, on a continual basis, of non-ratified Conventions through a tripartite consultative committee, and three new ratifications were under study. The Government member of the United States confirmed this statement and emphasised that the ratification by her country of Convention No. 144, which embodied the systematic co-operation between government, employers and workers, was proof that it took the principles and procedures of the ILO very seriously.

20. Other speakers mentioned the ratification of certain Conventions by their countries in 1988. Argentina had ratified the Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention, 1981 (No. 156) and had approved the ratification of the Collective Bargaining Convention, 1981 (No. 154). Belgium had ratified the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138), the Nursing Personnel Convention, 1977 (No. 149) and the Collective Bargaining Convention, 1981 (No. 154); the ratification procedure was under way for three other Conventions. China had ratified the Vocational Rehabilitation and Employment (Disabled Persons) Convention, 1983 (No. 159). In the Federal Republic of Germany ratification procedures were underway for three Conventions. Hungary had ratified the Occupational Health Services Convention, 1985 (No. 161). The Netherlands had ratified the Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention, 1981 (No. 156) and the Vocational Rehabilitation and Employment (Disabled Persons) Convention, 1983 (No. 159). The USSR had ratified the Working Environment (Air Pollution, Noise and Vibration) Convention, 1977 (No. 148) and the Vocational Rehabilitation and Employment (Disabled Persons) Convention, 1983 (No. 159).

21. The Committee was informed that, since the beginning of the year, the Office had received 68 new ratifications so that the number of ratifications for 1988 would be higher than in 1987 or 1986. It was recalled that the Office helped governments and organisations of employers and workers to take decisions in full knowledge of the facts and that certain Conventions had considerable impact which went well beyond the number of ratifications they had received.

22. The Government member of Australia observed that the rate of ratifications fluctuated and that the importance of the number of ratifications should not be overestimated. The number had no significance in itself, for what was important was the way in which the Conventions were applied in practice. The fact that governments appeared less inclined to ratify was perhaps a sign of the seriousness with which they regarded their obligations. The Employers' members considered that while ratification was important, because it was the basis for supervision, the goal was implementation of standards in practice.

Denunciations

23. In 1987, one denunciation was registered concerning the Underground Work (Women) Convention, 1935 (No. 45). Since the beginning of 1988, five further denunciations had occurred, four of which concerned Convention No. 45. The Government member of Australia stated that he was somewhat concerned that this was the first time that his country had denounced a Convention, namely Convention No. 45. In so doing, it had recognised that it could no longer apply it, which was preferable to non-observance of obligations. The Workers' member of the Netherlands regretted that his country appeared to have developed a habit of announcing possible denunciation whenever difficulties in application arose. He stated that his country's intention to denounce the Employment Injury Benefits Convention, 1964 (No. 121) had been preceded by hasty consultations, which were not worthy of the seriousness that should be given to denunciations. The Government member of the Netherlands indicated that the denunciation of Convention No. 121 had become necessary because the system in force in the Netherlands was not in conformity with the Convention, and affirmed that the consultations required had taken place.

Review of special protective standards concerning women

24. Noting the high number of denunciations relating to the Conventions on night work for women and the Underground Work (Women) Convention, 1935 (No. 45), a number of speakers saw this as a sign that a re-examination of the instruments according special protection to women had become necessary. They noted with interest that this year, as had been done in 1986 for the Conventions on night work, the Committee of Experts had requested the Governing Body to seek a solution to the growing difficulties encountered in the application of Article 3, paragraph 1, of the White Lead (Painting) Convention, 1921 (No. 13), which prohibits the employment of women in any painting work of an industrial character involving the use of white lead.

25. It was recalled that the path to follow as concerned special standards on the protection of women had been indicated by the Conference in its 1975 Declaration and 1985 resolution concerning equality of opportunity and treatment between men and women, which requested member States to review protective legislation in the light of recent scientific knowledge and technological changes, and requested the Office to review periodically the instruments on protection, such as Convention No. 89, so as to determine whether their provisions were still adequate and appropriate. The instruments concerned were those providing standards of protection not linked to maternity and the reproductive function. The Governing Body had included on the agenda of the 1989 Session of the Conference the revision of Convention No. 89 and the adoption of new standards on night work in general.

26. The Employers' members and several Government members stressed the contradiction existing between special standards of protection and the principle of equality between women and men and considered that certain employment prohibitions had to be re-examined in the light of technical and medical progress. In the opinion of the Government members of Spain and Tunisia, the review of protective standards should not, however, call into question the protection of maternity. These members, as well as the Government member of Portugal, welcomed the forthcoming revision of Convention No. 89. The Government member of Belgium indicated that this revision was the subject of broad consultations in his country which demonstrated the complexity and importance of the problem. The Employers' members agreed that the protection of maternity should be maintained but stressed the cost of this protection should be borne by society at large and not only by the employers, failing which the employment prospects of women might come under threat.

27. The Workers' members recognised that a re-examination of Conventions Nos. 89 and 13 was justified. Nevertheless, they regretted that certain countries had denounced Convention No. 89 without waiting for its revision; they stressed that, while awaiting the review of Convention No. 13, its application should continue to be supervised. They expressed the hope that the new standards which would be adopted would not amount to a step backwards for the workers (see also paragraph 82 below).

28. A great number of speakers paid homage to the quality of the Committee of Experts' report. The spokesmen of the Workers' members and the Employers' members, speaking on behalf of their members, as well as the Government members of Australia, Austria, Belgium, France, the Federal Republic of Germany, Iceland (speaking also on behalf of Denmark, Finland, Norway and Sweden), Netherlands, Nigeria, Portugal, Saudi Arabia, Spain, Switzerland, United Arab Emirates and the United States stated that the Committee of Experts had once again given proof of its principles of independence, objectivity and impartiality, to which they reiterated their attachment.

29. The Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic stated that the principles of independence, objectivity and impartiality to which his Government also was attached, did not prevent account being taken of economic and social conditions in the evaluation of the effect given to the standards of the ILO. The Government member of the Ukrainian SSR was in favour of a flexible interpretation of these standards. The Government members of Australia, the Federal Republic of Germany, Iceland (speaking also on behalf of Denmark, Finland, Norway and Sweden) and Portugal reaffirmed their support of a uniform interpretation of standards, without which there could be no equality of treatment.

30. The Government member of the German Democratic Republic stressed the difficulties involved in comparative law, and expressed his respect for the work of the Committee of Experts, not only for the volume of its work, but also for the courage with which this Committee examined the application of Conventions in such different States. The Government member of the Ukrainian SSR acknowledged the considerable work accomplished by the Committee of Experts and considered it a positive fact that in its report this year, it had noted new elements and had reflected to some extent the discussions in the Conference Committee. The Government member of the USSR welcomed the fact that in its evaluation of the application of the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), the Committee of Experts had adopted a differentiated approach to the problem of employment in which it took account of the diversity of economic and social conditions. The Workers' member of the USSR noted that this year the report of the Committee of Experts showed a certain understanding of the difficulties which certain countries encountered in the application of Conventions.

31. Nevertheless, these members, as well as the Government members of Bulgaria and Czechoslovakia and the Workers' member of the German Democratic Republic, drawing attention to the continued drop in the number of ratifications registered and of reports and replies supplied by governments, and to the problems encountered during discussions within the Conference Committee, considered that it was necessary to improve the supervisory system in order to increase the number of ratifications and the participation of governments in the supervisory procedures. These members were of the opinion that a system giving greater importance to dialogue and to a spirit of understanding would be more efficient in ensuring the implementation of the ILO's standards, since the role of the supervisory system should be to assist member States in fulfilling their obligations, and not to judge or condemn. That was why it was necessary to give a more important role to the Conference Committee and to promote dialogue within this committee. The Government member of Czechoslovakia compared the ILO supervisory system with that of the United Nations and pointed out that the former, in spite of emphasising the importance of dialogue, relied predominantly on assessment by experts.

32. As regards the respective roles of the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee, the Government member of the USSR stated that the tripartite Conference Committee, which was provided for in the Constitution and whose terms of reference were governed by the Standing Orders of the Conference, had a major role to play. However, there was barely a reference to the Conference Committee's report in the report of the Committee of Experts. He recalled that in the report of the 1986 Session, two questions had been put to the Committee of Experts: the first concerned the right of the Committee of Experts to establish for itself its principles and methods of work, and the second inquired whether these principles and methods should be governed by the Constitution and the Standing Orders of the Conference and, if not, why not. The Committee of Experts had provided a de facto reply to the first question by adopting its principles and methods of work, but the second question still warranted a reply. He considered that the relationship between the Conference Committee and the Committee of Experts should be governed by a Standing Order and proposed that at least one representative of the members of the Committee of Experts should attend the Conference Committee. The Government members of Czechoslovakia and the Ukrainian SSR regretted the absence of an organic link between the supervisory bodies. The former stressed that, in practice, the only co-ordinating element between the various supervisory bodies was the Office; the latter suggested that the Chairman of the Committee of Experts should come and present his Committee's report before the Conference Committee and that certain experts – including those responsible for the most important Conventions – take part, in an individual capacity, in the work of this Committee.

33. As regards the working methods of the Conference Committee, the Workers' member of the USSR stated that the Committee should not proceed like a court and condemn governments. He proposed that over the next two or three years, as an experiment, the Committee should no longer use special paragraphs in its report, while continuing to draw governments' attention to the need to improve their legislation and practice and showing them the ways and means to surmount existing shortcomings. In this way, governments would be less hesitant in appearing before the Committee and the recommendations and proposals to improve the situation would enable the trade unions to bring pressure to bear on their governments. The Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic drew a distinction between the nature and the work of the Conference Committee under the terms of the Constitution and the Standing Orders of the Conference, and those of commissions of inquiry provided for under articles 24 to 34 of the Constitution, and stated that it was not for the Conference Committee to make judgements; it should consequently limit itself in its conclusions to expressing a wish, a regret or a preoccupation, according to the seriousness of the case, and should not include in its report special paragraphs on specific countries. The Government member of the German Democratic Republic stated that it was preferable to have an exchange of experiences rather than to make criticisms in special paragraphs, although these did not amount to sentences or judgements. The Government member of the Ukrainian SSR stated his preference for an approach based on co-operation and well-intentioned dialogue rather than formalist statements such as those which appeared in the special paragraphs.

34. Another possible change in the procedure followed by the Conference Committees was put forward by the Government member of Czechoslovakia. He observed that the procedures followed by the Conference Committee to adopt conclusions on individual cases did not take sufficient account of the importance of these conclusions for the government concerned, and suggested that in certain cases the Committee carry over the adoption of proposed conclusions to its next sitting, so as to enable the Government representative to reflect on them without reopening the discussion. Exceptionally, minor changes could be made to the proposed conclusions, but only with the prior agreement of the Chairman and the Vice-Chairmen of the Committee.

35. The Government member of France stated that the supervisory system was alive and functioning well thanks to its pragmatic approach, which had allowed it to evolve over its 60 years of existence. A spirit of pragmatism had led to the creation of the Committee of Experts in 1926, because it was not possible for the Conference itself to examine the reports of governments. There was also pragmatism in the sharing of roles between the supervisory bodies, the technical study being vested in the experts, tripartite consideration in this Committee and political sanction in the plenary of the Conference. These roles were clear and complementary. Since the Committee of Experts was a technical and legal, but not a judicial body, and had a collegial nature, it would hardly be useful to have one or two experts appear before this Committee. Furthermore, a reading of its report clearly showed that the Committee of Experts took thorough account of the work of this Committee. And finally, there was legal pragmatism, as the methods of work of the ILO were the result of a combination of two legal systems, that of written law and that of common law. The Committee of Experts had worked for over 60 years by virtue of the principles of common law, without having any written regulations.

36. The Employers' members and the Workers' members, as well as the Government members of Australia and the Federal Republic of Germany associated themselves with this statement. The spokesmen of the Employers' and Workers' members repeated that it was for the Committee of Experts itself to establish its working methods. The Government member of Uruguay considered that asking members of the Committee of Experts to come before this Committee to give explanations would not encourage the independence and impartiality of the Committee of Experts, in that it was a body having quasi-judicial functions.

37. Many speakers from the three groups stressed the importance of dialogue. The Employers' members and the Government member of the Federal Republic of Germany recalled that the supervisory system was not based on constraint but on obligations freely assumed by member States. The Employers' members recalled that these obligations included that of supplying reports and that of appearing before the Conference Committee to discuss problems of application; furthermore, dialogue did not mean that violations of standards were accepted, or that distinctions were not drawn between these violations according to their degree of seriousness. The Workers' members recognised that it was not for the supervisory bodies to condemn but to assist, and that it was therefore necessary to show understanding. They considered, however, that this should not prevent the Conference Committee from highlighting the most serious violations so as to encourage governments to make progress in the future. The Government member of the United States also believed that the supervisory process should be based on constructive dialogue and co-operation and that the objective of the supervisory machinery was not to criticise but to bring about improvements. That was why she hoped that, in its report, the Conference Committee would place more emphasis on cases of progress achieved following its discussions.

38. The Workers' and Employers' members, as well as the Government members of Australia, Belgium, France, the Federal Republic of Germany, the Netherlands and the United States, stated that they were in favour of maintaining the working methods currently used by the Conference Committee. The Government member of France, supported by the spokesmen of the Employers' members and the Workers' members, and by the Government members of Australia and the Federal Republic of Germany, recalled that, in 1980, the Conference Committee had already modified its methods of work so as to strengthen dialogue, and that the conclusions set forth by the Chairman of the Committee after the discussion of a particular case are only a factual statement and not a judgment. To a delegate concerned to discuss the formulation of this factual statement would be unacceptable and would prolong the debate. As for special paragraphs, they were a way of attracting the Conference's attention to particularly important cases, emphasising both the difficulties and progress. The Committee should not deprive itself of this procedure. The Government member of Nigeria stated that he was not opposed in principle to the idea of allotting more time for the adoption of conclusions. The Government member of the Netherlands considered that the formulation of conclusions by the Chairman should not be the subject of negotiations with the Government member involved and that it was premature to envisage the suppression of special paragraphs. The Employers' members observed that if, instead of special paragraphs, the Committee were to make recommendations to governments on the specific measures to be taken to ensure the application of a Convention, this might be perceived by the government as greater interference in their internal affairs.

39. The Workers' members of Norway expressed the hope that the Committee of Experts, in one of its next reports, would study the problem of divergencies which might exist between the interpretation of the ILO's standards by the ILO's supervisory bodies, on the one hand, and the interpretation given by governments and national courts, on the other. Such divergencies, if they led to a rejection by the government concerned of the conclusions of the supervisory body as had recently occurred, prejudiced the credibility of the supervisory bodies. In his opinion, the risk of such divergencies was greater for the so-called promotional Conventions – which did not lay down self-executing standards, but rather goals to be promoted through measures left to the discretion of each member State – and where the Constitution of a country did not provide that ratified instruments were automatically to be incorporated into the internal legal system. It would be desirable for the Committee of Experts to examine whether in the future Conventions should be formulated in the form of instruments capable of being directly applied through national laws, and to discuss the pros and cons of the different systems of incorporating instruments into national law. He also drew the Committee of Experts' attention to the consequences of the failure to publish texts of ratified Conventions in official gazettes.

40. The Workers' members, the Employers' members and a number of Government members were concerned at the statistics contained in the report of the Committee of Experts concerning the manner in which governments were fulfilling their obligation to supply reports. These statistics showed that a growing number of governments were not supplying the reports due or were supplying them only a long time after the date fixed, or were not supplying the information requested. Pointing to the particularly low percentage (9.5 per cent) of reports received by the due date (15 October), the Government member of India, supported by the Government member of Bulgaria, wondered whether it would not be better to advance it, so as to ensure that the reports would arrive in good time to be examined with the necessary care. The Employers' members, stressing with a number of other members the considerable volume of work which fell on the Committee of Experts, stated that perhaps the time had come to review again the periodicity of reports with a view to lightening the workload both of the supervisory bodies and of the governments.

41. The Workers' member of the Netherlands, supported by the Government members of the German Democratic Republic, India and Venezuela, regretted that the Committee of Experts' report had only been received shortly before the opening of the Conference and that this had not allowed sufficient time for adequate consultation. The Government members of India and Venezuela suggested that the date for the meeting of the Committee of Experts be advanced. The representative of the Secretary-General pointed out that between the end of the session of the Committee of Experts and the date on which the report was sent out, considerable work had to be done. Since 1926, almost all the meetings of the Committee of Experts had taken place in the month of March; for various reasons, a change to this date would involve numerous difficulties. Over the past few years, the Office had looked at this problem and had tried to find solutions. Some measures had already been taken in this regard, such as the sending to each government of advance copies of the Committee of Experts' general report and of the observations concerning that country immediately after the Committee of Experts' session.

Constitutional procedures of complaint and representation and other procedures

42. The report of the Committee of Experts supplied indications on the cases in which there had been recourse to the constitutional procedures of complaint and representation, and on the conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association drawn to the attention of the Committee of Experts. The Workers' members and several Government members noted that the number of these cases continued to increase, which showed that the employers' and workers' organisations were more aware of the procedures available to them to enforce respect for the Conventions of the ILO. The Government member of Spain, referring to the representations presented under article 24 of the Constitution by Spanish trade union organisations concerning the observance by Spain of Conventions Nos. 111, 117 and 131, stated that his Government was complying with all these procedures but would propose a change in the Standing Orders governing the representations procedure so that the examination of the receivability of a representation would no longer be limited to an examination of the form, but could also involve questions of substance, so as to avoid losing time when representations were clearly unfounded.

The role of workers' and employers' organisations

43. The Employers' members, the Workers' members and a large number of Government members welcomed the ever-growing participation of employers' and workers' organisations in the functioning of the supervisory machinery, as evidenced by the record number (182) of observations received this year by the Committee of Experts from such organisations. The Employers' and Workers' members approved the importance that the Committee of Experts attached to the ratification and implementation of the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144). They stressed that tripartism, which was at the basis of the ILO and which was provided for in many Conventions, presupposed the independence and autonomy of each party. Several speakers indicated that their countries had ratified this Convention and were putting into practice the consultations required by it. The Government member of the United States stated that the recent ratification of this Convention by her country showed its attachment to the principles of the ILO, and the Worker member of this country indicated that the process by which this ratification, together with the ratification of the Merchant Shipping (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 147), had been obtained was an example of the efficiency of tripartism.

Action by the Office: direct contacts and other forms of assistance to governments

44. During 1987, direct contacts missions concerning freedom of association visited the Dominican Republic and Turkey; the Regional Advisers for standards, whose task is to assist governments in fulfilling the obligations arising from the ILO's Constitution and ratified Conventions, visited 34 countries in Africa, America and Asia and the Pacific; ten officials from nine countries undertook training in the International Labour Standards Department; this department organised three regional seminars on international labour standards for government officials directly responsible for questions related to international labour standards, and the Regional Advisers participated in the work of several seminars organised by other ILO departments in various regions of the world. The Office organised tripartite national seminars on international labour standards in ten countries. Five seminars were held for organisations of employers or workers, including one on freedom of association and one on human rights.

45. The Committee welcomed the continuation of these activities which were aimed at assisting member States of the Organisation to fulfil better their obligations regarding standards and to promote a greater understanding of standards and the standard-setting procedures of the ILO. It agreed that these activities, which should be strengthened, were particularly useful for developing countries, whose problems concerning standards often arose from administrative and financial difficulties. The Government member of Belgium, supported by the spokesman of the Workers' members, considered that a better knowledge by the public at large of the ILO's standard-setting action would reinforce its efficiency and that activities in this connection, using the media, should be undertaken.

46. Several speakers stressed the considerable and growing volume of work entrusted to the Office to enable the supervisory bodies to fulfil their functions and to assist governments in respecting their obligations. The Government members of Australia, Austria, the Federal Republic of Germany, the Netherlands and Switzerland expressed the hope that, despite the current budgetary difficulties, sufficient resources would be given to the responsible department reflecting the fundamental importance of standards and of the supervisory system, as well as the volume and increasing complexity of work relating to these questions.

47. The Government members of Morocco, Saudi Arabia, the Syrian Arab Republic and the United Arab Emirates congratulated the Office on the fact that this year, for the first time they had received translations in Arabic of the Committee of Experts' comments. They considered that this measure would help the government concerned to comply better with their obligations and hoped that the Office would continue this practice in the future. They also hoped that the texts of the ILO Conventions and Recommendations would also be translated into Arabic. The representative of the Secretary-General stated that this translation was under way and that Arabic texts should be available by the next session of the Conference. The Government member of Uruguay, supported by the Government member of Venezuela, expressed the wish that the Office send to governments the report forms on ratified Conventions in good time, so that they could use them in the procedure of submitting the instruments adopted by the Conference to the competent national authorities. The Government member of Portugal suggested that the Office send consultants for short visits to assist governments in preparing their reports.

Standard-setting activity and technical co-operation

48. In paragraphs 51 and 73 to 75 of its general report, the Committee of Experts welcomed the administrative measures recently taken by the Office to strengthen the links between international labour standards and the technical co-operation activities of the ILO. It noted the measures taken to inform external services and experts of the Office regarding developments in the field of standards which might concern their local projects and activities, including – where appropriate – the comments made by the Committee itself, and the special contribution that certain regional and national technical co-operation projects could make to the achievement of the objective set by international labour standards. The Committee of Experts encouraged the Office to continue its efforts, and it expressed the hope that the bodies which financed technical co-operation would be able to support them with adequate resources.

49. Numerous speakers from all three groups supported the Office's initiative. The Workers' members observed that technical co-operation should always go hand in hand with international labour standards. The Government member of Australia considered that the technical co-operation activities of the Organisation should be used to encourage member States to implement the standards adopted by the Organisation. The Government member of Tunisia suggested that priority be given to projects encouraging the realisation of promotional standards such as those relating to employment, vocational training, or equality of opportunity and treatment, which required practical measures involving large financial resources; he also suggested that the Office do more to sensitise the development assistance organisations which financed technical co-operation projects, so that they would steer their action towards fields having a direct link with the implementation of international labour standards. The Government member of Bulgaria considered that technical co-operation in the field of employment should be the subject of careful study, and stressed the contribution made by the Office in the field of vocational training by the creation of institutes for vocational training in the framework of various technical co-operation projects both at the national and regional level.

Application of the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122)

50. As in previous years, the Committee of Experts this year included in paragraphs 50 to 57 of its general report, general comments on the application of this Convention based on an examination of the reports supplied by 44 countries. In these comments, the Committee took account of the information contained in the reports, the discussions at the previous session of the Conference Committee and the development which had occurred in the field covered by the Convention; it described the changes in the various countries and set out its approach to the problems raised by the application of the Convention. Many speakers congratulated the Committee of Experts for these general comments and for the way in which it had gone about evaluating the implementation of the Convention. In particular, the dialogue which was taking place between the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee on these problems was considered to be exemplary. The Government member of the USSR praised the Committee of Experts for taking a differentiated approach to the problems of employment by considering the variety of situations and possible solutions.

51. Once again, emphasis was placed on the magnitude and seriousness of the problem of employment. As the Director-General pointed out in his Report to the Conference, the rates of growth of the world economy remained modest and the long-term trend was towards a decline. Unless the principal industrialised countries took major decisions to counteract that trend, it appeared set to continue – if not indeed to worsen in the years ahead. In addition, as several members of the Committee had stated, the problem of employment which until now also arising, increasingly, in countries having centrally planned economies which were confronted with the huge task of restructuring their economy and reforming their methods of economic management. Therefore, employment should be a major concern for the ILO, and the Organisation's resources should be mobilised to assist member States in this sphere.

52. The Committee was convinced that in today's world, as the Director-General stated in his Report to the Conference, full, productive and freely chosen employment was not an outdated notion and should remain a vital goal of national policy for all States, as required by Convention No. 122. The Government member of Bulgaria agreed with the analysis made by the Committee of Experts that Convention No. 122, which was generally considered as the classic example of a promotional Convention, also had the nature of a legal instrument giving rise to concrete obligations. Among these obligations, the Committee of Experts had rightly highlighted the consultation of employers' and workers' organisations and representatives of the persons affected by the measures to be taken. Several speakers mentioned the tripartite co-operation existing in their countries on employment problems.

53. The Employers' members repeated the opinion they had expressed at the last session of the Conference, to the effect that employment questions were closely linked to economic, fiscal and monetary policies. They supported a balanced relationship between the various policy areas and opposed the misconception that an isolated or single-focused labour market policy could be successful; a policy which generated growth without inflation would lead to better results in the employment field as well. The Government member of Belgium repeated his Government's doubts concerning the ability of the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee to evaluate the overall economic policies of States.

54. In paragraph 54 of its general report, the Committee of Experts referred to the conclusions of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment which was called by the ILO in October 1987. The meeting took note of the serious consequences for employment of the heavy indebtedness of developing countries, a problem which had to be handled through international co-operation within the framework of an open international commercial system. It recommended that structural adjustment policies include measures to augment the employment opportunities of the vulnerable groups of the population and that they give priority to the rural sector. It considered that the ILO could intensify its action, in co-operation with other agencies, to help countries in their efforts towards structural adjustment, for example, by developing employment statistics, assisting the poorest people to increase their productive capacity, and studying the structural adjustment programmes which had created jobs and which had had so much success in both industrialised and developing countries. It concluded that the ILO should promote tripartite consultation and co-operation on adjustment and remain vigilant in ensuring full respect for its standards on employment, basic human rights and tripartism. In paragraph 55 of its report, the Committee of Experts noted that among developing countries, many governments had referred in their reports to stabilisation or structural adjustment programmes, sometimes adopted as a result of consultations with international financial institutions, which had involved measures of austerity having negative effects on employment. It seemed to the Committee that such cases were prime examples of situations where the conclusions adopted by the High-Level Meeting could be directly applied. The Committee of Experts also observed that it was clear from the reports of governments that the effect of the ILO's technical assistance in employment – which had been very positive in several fields – might be greatly diminished when austerity programmes were imposed on developing countries to the point where unemployment and underemployment continued unchecked. It expressed the hope that countries in this situation would soon be able to feel the benefit of international and inter-organisational co-operation which had been called for by the High-Level Meeting.

55. The Workers' members and the Government members of Morocco and Venezuela stressed the importance of the conclusions of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment, and expressed the hope that these conclusions would be implemented. They drew particular attention to those concerning the need for better co-ordination at the international level between economic, financial and monetary policies and social policies, and those concerning the ILO's role in this regard, to ensure that structural adjustment policies did not run counter to the ILO's objectives, in particular to those relating to full employment. The Workers' members were of the opinion that the ILO should ensure that these policies not cause a deterioration in the living standard of the population. The Government member of Venezuela stated that the economic crisis due to the external debt and international trade gave rise, above all, to political problems which had to be resolved by the political will of member States; she invited the Committee of Experts to continue to study the problems of indebtedness and international trade. The Government member of Nigeria emphasised that a number of developing countries had had difficulties in implementing Convention No. 122 because of their numerous economic problems, and particularly those relating to debt and the balance of payments. In those countries, structural adjustment policies had had far-reaching implications for employment and growth. The Government member of Bulgaria suggested that the Committee of Experts study more thoroughly the problems of debt and unemployment in the rural sector and the relationship between social security and employment.

56. In paragraph 56 of its general report, the Committee of Experts indicated that this year it had been pleased to find signs of a reversal of the continuous advance of unemployment in several industrialised countries, but stated that it would still carefully monitor several problem areas, including growth of long-term unemployment and irregular forms of employment, such as part-time work, temporary work and short-term contracts, which were not always what workers would voluntarily choose and could be used to avoid compliance with basic minimum standards.

57. The Employers' members and the Government member of the United Kingdom regretted the pejorative connotation of the word "irregular", used by the Committee of Experts to describe flexible forms of employments, since these were preferred by an increasing number of persons and made a not unsubstantial contribution to the absorption of unemployment in certain industrialised countries. The Employers' members observed that the development of these forms of employment was an irreversible phenomenon resulting from changes in the organisation of work, brought about by structural and technological developments. The problem currently facing governments and employers' and workers' organisations was how to master this phenomenon and to adapt the standards and mentalities which reflected other types of work organisation and employment. Some trade unions were hostile to these forms of employment, whereas others adopted a more positive attitude and had already concluded collective agreements on the subject. It was true that these new forms of employment means that it would be more difficult for the union to organise such workers. But it would also be more difficult to organise the employers. The solution to this problem should be left to the free choice of the workers and employers, as provided for in the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87). The Government member of the United Kingdom noted the progress achieved in his country and stated that his Government welcomed the creation of jobs of all types, including flexible forms of jobs, as long as they corresponded to the needs of expanding economies and the wishes of the labour force. The Government member of Bulgaria mentioned that these forms of employment were now recognised in the legislation of several countries and often corresponded to the wishes of the workforce.

58. The Workers' members observe that where the employment situation had improved, this had not come about by curtailing trade union rights, but by positive and concerted employment policies adopted by the governments concerned in line with the requirements of the Convention; an effective employment policy should be based on consultations and required a strong trade union movement. As for new forms of employment, they emphasised that flexibility should not mean the destruction of workers' rights. Unions accepted these new forms of employment on the condition that they corresponded to the free choice of workers, that they respected the standards set by law or collective agreements and were supervised by adequate inspection machinery. However, in many industrialised countries workers were forced to accept unstable, part-time or fixed-term work and poorer conditions of work and wages; small and medium-sized undertakings which created the most jobs by using these forms of employment were often the ones with little trade union representation and where safety standards were not adequately respected owing to insufficient inspection. Unions should fight to have these forms of employment covered by collective bargaining and to reduce the hours of work for everyone through collective agreements.

59. In paragraphs 58 to 60 of its general report, the Committee of Experts noted with concern that in many countries which had ratified one or the other of the labour inspection Conventions some of the fundamental provisions of these Conventions were not fully applied. The provisions in question were those laying down measures of a practical nature to ensure the effective functioning of the labour inspection services (namely, the recruitment of sufficient numbers of inspectors capable of performing the various tasks, and the provision to inspectors of transports and other material resources indispensable for the performance of their duties), and the provisions relating to the publication and transmission to the Office of the annual reports on labour inspections activities.

60. The Workers' members and the Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic thanked the Committee of Experts for having drawn attention to these difficulties; the Workers' members shared the Committee of Experts' hope that the governments concerned would not fail to take the necessary measures, possibly with the assistance of the International Labour Office, to improve the situation. The Workers' member of the USSR stated that the ILO should give special attention to labour inspection, on which depended the effective application of measures of protection taken for workers. He indicated that in his country labour inspection was the responsibility of the trade unions and had considerable prerogatives, including the right to close undertakings when the life and health of the workers was in danger. The Workers' member of the United Kingdom observed that certain governments which encouraged irregular forms of employment reduced, at the same time, labour inspection personnel, whereas it was in undertakings which used these forms of employment that inspection was the most necessary. The Workers' member of Chile stated that when labour inspectors did not enjoy trade union protection as provided by the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151), they were not in a position to perform the duties entrusted to them by the labour inspection Conventions without fear of reprisals.

Application of Conventions to offshore industrial installations

61. The Workers' members noted that the Committee of Experts intended to examine this question further when the preliminary study initiated by the Office on this subject had been completed. They expressed the hope that this study would be completed before the next session of the Conference.

Seafarers

62. The Workers' members were concerned that a new Maritime Session of the Conference did not appear to be envisaged before the end of the century. The Workers' member of Argentina stressed the very difficult and special problems facing seafarers in the present serious crisis of the merchant marine. He drew attention to the recent trend in industrialised countries having a maritime tradition of establishing special registration systems to reduce labour costs; such systems allowed them to avoid the application of international standards and collective agreements, and resulted in a worsening of the working and living conditions of the seafarers concerned. Such systems had been established by France, which created the flag of Kerguelen Islands, and the United Kingdom using the Isle of Man, and Norway. He considered that since there was not a committee on the application of standards within the Maritime Session of the Conference, it was indispensable for the present Committee to ensure supervision of the application of the maritime Conventions. He addressed an appeal to countries at war to apply the 1987 (Maritime) Session of the Conference resolution urging them not to attack ships flying the flag of a neutral country. It was recalled that the general survey to be carried out by the Committee of Experts at its 1990 session would cover the Merchant Shipping (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 147), which had an extensive scope, especially in view of all the instruments listed in its annex.

Submission of certain instruments to the competent authorities of the European Communities

63. Referring to paragraphs 124 and 125 of the general report of the Committee of Experts, the Workers' members expressed their concern that, owing to problems of division of competence between the European Communities and their member States, the Hours of Work and Rest Periods (Road Transport) Convention, 1979 (No. 153) had not yet been ratified by any of the States which were members of the European Communities at the time of the adoption of that Convention, and that, with the exception of Italy, none of the member States of the EEC had apparently yet submitted the Asbestos Convention, 1986 (No. 162) to the competent authorities. They invited the Office to intensify its discussions with the Secretariat of the European Communities so as to reach a rapid solution to these difficulties which were liable to recur in the future for each new instrument. The representative of the Secretary-General recalled that the Conventions, whose ratification by member States of the European Communities might depend on an internal Community procedure, could only be those involving fields within the exclusive competence of the Communities; only a relatively limited number of Conventions might therefore have their ratification delayed by the intervention of the Communities. He also recalled that the ILO Constitution permitted no ratifications other than those effected by member States of the ILO and that the European Communities as such did not meet this requirement. In addition, several Community countries had ratified Convention No. 144, which provided for the consultation of the social partners during submission and ratification of ILO instruments. These characteristics which were peculiar to the ILO had to be reconciled with the internal legal requirements of the Communities. Meetings had recently taken place between the Secretariat of the European Communities and the Office with a view to overcoming these difficulties. Solutions were envisaged which should ensure respect for the constitutional provisions of the ILO as regarded submission and ratification, as well as the full application of the provisions of Convention No. 144 relating to consultations with the social partners.

C. Reports requested under article 19 of the Constitution

Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention (No. 111) and Recommendation (No. 111), 1958

64. The Committee examined the Committee of Experts' general survey on the application of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention (No. 111) and Recommendation (No. 111), 1958. In accordance with the established procedure, the general survey took account of information from 139 States and 17 non-metropolitan territories supplied under article 19 of the ILO Constitution or submitted in regular reports under article 22 of the Constitution by States which have ratified the Convention. Comments received from 18 employers' and workers' organisations were also taken into account.

General observations

65. The Committee stressed that the general survey was remarkable in analysing comprehensively and in depth the content of the 1958 instruments and the approaches taken to them, as well as the problems encountered at the national level in application of the principle of equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation. The large number of examples drawn from almost all member States – regardless of whether they have ratified the Convention or not – made it possible to undertake a comprehensive study of the application of these instruments. Many speakers considered the general survey an important contribution to the 40th anniversary of the Convention and Recommendation and the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. The Employers' members thought that the list of examples highlighted the variety of situations in which discrimination can arise and showed that discrimination exists in all countries. Although this didactic approach was justifiable, it made the task of assessing the seriousness of infringements of the Convention in each country a delicate one. Some Government members saw evidence of misunderstandings in the opinions expressed on some aspects of the situation in their respective countries, whilst at the same time expressing appreciation of the Committee of Experts' general survey as a useful guide for member State's policies in the promotion of equality in employment and occupation. The Workers' and Employers' members regretted that despite the great interest attached to the question there had been insufficient time for the report to be studied more closely.

66. The Workers' members stated that the interval of 17 years since the last general survey of this subject by the Committee of Experts was too long and should be shortened in the future. The Workers' member of Portugal thought that general surveys concerning the basic rights of workers should be made at shorter intervals both because of the basic nature of the rights concerned and because of rapid and far-reaching changes in the labour sphere.

67. The Government member of the Islamic Republic of Iran indicated his Government's view that the Committee of Experts had not been impartial or objective in the parts of the general survey dealing directly with the situation in his country.

68. Many speakers in the discussion gave further information on the application of the principle of equal opportunity and treatment in their respective countries. In most cases this information concerned either measures taken to overcome discrimination in employment and occupation since the Committee of Experts' report was prepared, or details of the individual situations described in the report.

69. As the Committee of Experts noted in paragraph 15 of the general survey, information supplied is often incomplete, because the scope of the instrument has not always been accurately gauged either as to the types of measures to be taken to promote equality and eliminate discrimination or as to the diversity of the forms of discrimination covered. The Employers' members noted that the reports submitted by member States were not always sufficiently detailed to enable a suitably thorough analysis of the practice. The Workers' member of Finland pointed out that the various grounds of discrimination under the Convention did not receive an equal degree of attention. He pointed out that governments' reports should always be prepared in collaboration with employers' and workers' organisations, whose comments should be included in the reports.

70. The Committee noted that the principle of equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation laid down in the 1958 instruments was a fundamental one: it is included in the ILO Constitution, reaffirmed in several instruments and resolutions, and further developed in the Convention. The Workers' members pointed out that equal opportunity and treatment were founded in the values of solidarity and respect for the human condition. They recalled that the precondition for the promotion of equality was the existence of a sound political climate and a state of true liberty. In certain cases, the contention of threats to national security were used as pretexts which could lead to discrimination against workers. Martial laws could also lead to abuses. The Employers' members stated that the Convention's aim was to ensure human dignity and freedom by prohibiting discrimination based on race, colour, sex, social origin, national extraction, religion or political opinion. Its objective was to enable people to live as they saw fit, or in other words, to give everyone the freedom to be different. The Government member of the United States stated that the fact that the Convention applied the principles of equality, dignity and freedom to all fields of labour made it a key Convention at the core of the ILO's standard-setting activities. The Government member of the USSR stressed the importance of Convention No. 111, which had a direct relation to human rights and touched all aspects of labour relations. The Government member of Czechoslovakia stated that human rights were indivisible and that equality of opportunity depended in large measure on the general economic and social environment, particularly the employment situation. This opinion was shared by the Government members of Bulgaria and the German Democratic Republic – who considered that high unemployment tended to make discrimination worse – and the Workers' members of the Byelorussian SSR, Spain and the Netherlands. The last of these pointed out that the general survey stressed the need to declare and pursue an active policy for freely chosen employment in order to ensure equal opportunity and treatment. The Government member in order to ensure equal opportunity and treatment. The Government member of the Federal Republic of Germany stated that the prohibition of discrimination was a question of human rights, but that a number of human rights did not have an absolute value: this was reflected in the exceptions to the principle of equality allowed under Article 1, paragraph 2, Article 4 and Article 5 of the Convention, although these should not lead to undue limitations being placed on the protection which the Convention seeks to guarantee. The same speaker wondered whether a Convention aimed at guaranteeing human rights could be interpreted in such manner as to give complete protection to those who condone the suppression of human rights. The Government member of Morocco considered that the Convention had had a marked influence on national legislation, since nearly all national enactments on the subject appeared after the Convention came into force. The Workers' members raised the point that the question of equality of opportunity and treatment in the public sector had hardly been addressed and they wished to make reference to the provisions of the Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151).

71. The general survey and the discussion in the Committee both demonstrated clearly the connection between Convention No. 111 and several other international standards. The Workers' member of Colombia questioned the scope for practical application of a Convention aiming at the promotion of equal opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation when Conventions on related subjects were not ratified or observed. The Employers' and Workers' members and several other speakers identified the connections between Convention No. 111 and the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100), the Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention, 1981 (No. 156), as well as the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98). The Employers' members and several other members, however, regretted that the general survey did not give greater attention to discrimination based on membership or non-membership in an employers' or workers' organisation. It was recalled that these matters were dealt with specifically in the 1983 general survey of instruments on freedom of association and collective bargaining. Some speakers also referred to the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) and the instruments on labour inspection and employment services. Attention was drawn also to the connection between the Conventions on forced labour and Convention No. 111. The Workers' member of Chile referred to the Termination of Employment Convention, 1982 (No. 158), which excluded race, colour, sex, marital status, family responsibilities, pregnancy, religion, political opinion, national extraction and social origin from the valid grounds for dismissal. The Government member of the Federal Republic of Germany stated that in the interpretation of Convention No. 111 account should be taken of other ILO Conventions and human rights instruments adopted by other organisations, so as to ensure a coherent legal order. The Government member of Tunisia referred to various instruments dealing with equal opportunity and treatment adopted by other international organisations. The number of supervisory bodies for such instruments had increased, leading to problems of co-ordination. The same speaker raised the question of how the ILO participated in the supervisory bodies of other organisations. Reference was made to paragraphs 38 to 47 of the Committee of Experts' general report, which dealt with functions regarding other international and regional instruments and collaboration with other international organisations.

Ratification

72. The Committee noted with satisfaction that there had been 109 ratifications of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), making it one of the five most ratified of all ILO Conventions; however, it was particularly concerned that still further progress should be made in this respect. It noted the significant results arising from the Governing Body's decision in 1979 to invite countries which had not yet ratified the Convention to supply four-yearly reports dealing exclusively with ratification difficulties, measures proposed to overcome them, and ratification prospects. This procedure should be maintained because it had contributed to eleven new ratifications. Several members recalled that tripartite consultations could help the ratification process. The Employers' member of the United States referred to the tripartite consultation system in his country and indicated that tripartite legal review prior to a decision to ratify would be impossible without such outstanding and comprehensive general surveys. The Employers' member and Workers' member, as well as the Government member of Japan and the Employers' member and Workers' member of the United States, stressed the need to ensure stability and continuity in the conclusions and interpretations contained in general surveys, so that the validity of the undertakings made or envisaged by member States would not be put at risk. Many speakers pointed out that nearly a third of the member States had not yet ratified the Convention, and urged that an appeal should be made to them to make every effort to examine the case for ratification.

73. The Committee therefore proposed that on adoption of the present report the Conference should appeal to all member States to ratify the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation), 1958 (No. 111).

Practical application

74. The Workers' members drew attention to the potentially wide gap between the principle of equal opportunity and treatment – with which everyone could agree – and its practical application. The Committee of Experts had adopted a positive approach to the general survey, but there still seemed to be cases of discrimination in very many countries at various stages of development and with various economic and political systems. Similarly, many speakers pointed to cases of failure to apply the Convention – sometimes involving serious breaches of its principle – referring particularly to apartheid in South Africa and the situation of Palestinian workers in the occupied Arab territories. These problems were dealt with in separate reports of the Director-General. The Workers' member of Portugal considered that the gap between the principle and its practical application was due to the fact that governments often follow contradictory policies in this area. She said that the promotion of equality required a variety of measures which must be co-ordinated to avoid losing sight of the ultimate aim in the specific fields of employment, education, vocational training, social security, taxation, culture, etc. The Government member of Italy stated that the principle should be implemented not just formally in the law but through the promotion of real equality in practice. Several speakers thought that practical application of the principle depended on supervision, sanctions and remedies which States that have ratified the Convention should develop and apply to ensure that the principle is implemented.

Grounds of discrimination

75. The great majority of interventions concerned discrimination based on sex, reflecting the scope of direct and indirect discrimination and the importance of measures to be taken to ensure equality of opportunity and treatment. The Employers' and Workers' members recalled the existence and, in certain cases, the worsening of discrimination based on grounds such as race and colour, national extraction, social origin, religion or political opinion. On this latter criterion, an observer representing the International Federation of Free Teachers' Union expressed his concern at the situation of teachers and referred to the numerous cases of dismissal for political reasons cited in the general survey. He stated that teachers, by their very function, were more threatened than other occupational categories by these discriminatory measures. It was essential that the member States adopt and apply provisions enabling the teaching profession to benefit from the protection stipulated in the Convention. The Workers' members referred to the situation of migrant workers, handicapped workers and members of minority groups, who encountered many difficulties in training and employment. Continuous efforts should be made to reduce the obstacles they faced in relation to equality of opportunity and treatment.

76. Although nationality was not a ground of discrimination listed in the Convention, the Government members of Hungary and Italy indicated that the labour legislation in their countries applied both to national and foreign workers without any form of discrimination and they mentioned the measures adopted in this connection by their governments and court decisions.

77. The situation of older workers and young workers was also considered by the Committee. The Government member of Spain referred to the mandatory retirement age and pointed out that it was not reasonable to presume general incapacity for all persons of a certain age; however, in view of the necessity of creating job opportunities, it was acceptable to set a maximum number of years of employment. The Workers' member of Chile, referring to the situation of older and young workers who had experienced discrimination in employment and wages, expressed the hope that the attention of the Conference would be drawn to this type of discrimination and to the search for measures to remedy it.

Continuity and scope of action

78. The majority of speakers emphasised the need for continuous action and openness to progress in the fields where the national policy of equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation should be applied. The possibility of improving the application of the principle was ever-present and required a continuous process and constant vigilance. Taking the example of persons suffering from the AIDS virus, the Government member of the Byelorussian SSR indicated that the emergence of new problems liable to be the basis for discrimination required the adoption of measures on a national scale within the framework of the Convention. A few speakers referred to the flexibility available in the application of the Convention, and especially to the application of the principle of equality through measures adapted to national conditions and practice. In this regard, it was recalled that adjustment to national conditions and practice concerned the methods by which the principles of the Convention were to be implemented within the framework of the national policy of equality, and not to the objectives set by the Convention. The Workers' member of Spain indicated that flexibility in the application of the Convention could not amount to an excuse for the fact that the result obtained was completely different to that envisaged by the Convention.

79. Numerous speakers referred to the very great diversity of measures aimed at ensuring the application of a national policy of equality of opportunity and treatment: repeal of the legislative provisions and discontinuance of the administrative measures which might have discriminatory effects; appeal and remedial procedures; the creation of bodies responsible for the application and supervision of the national policy on equality; positive action aimed at promoting equality in fact; education and information activities with a view to preventing discrimination; co-operation between all the appropriate social institutions and particularly between the employers' and workers' organisations. These measures should be co-ordinated within the framework set by the national policy of equality of opportunity and treatment. The diversity of measures reflected the breadth of the fields covered by the Convention: access to training; access to salaried and non-salaried employment; working conditions, etc. Numerous members stressed that training was the essential means of promoting equality. The elimination of discrimination implied continuous action in this field, particularly for vocational training which had to be accessible to everyone, adapted to the requirements of the undertaking with the aim of preparing the recipient for active life, and should enable the attainment of freely chosen and productive employment. The Government members of Bulgaria and Hungary recalled that free training and other measures in this field were the basis which should allow everyone, including disadvantaged persons, to have access to training and education. Several speakers mentioned the various means of action taken by workers' organisations in the field of equality of opportunity and treatment in employment. The Government member of Morocco suggested a strengthening of the workers' education programmes based essentially on training in drawing up collective agreements covering, inter alia, the determination of objective criteria for wage levels and internal promotion. The Government member of Ethiopia referred to the specific role played by the women's organisation in her country in adopting and implementing policies, programmes and measures which contributed to equality between women and men.

80. The issue of indirect discrimination, which referred to apparently neutral regulations or practices resulting in unequal treatment of persons having certain characteristics or belonging to groups capable of being identified by determined characteristics (for example, sex, race, colour, religion) was addressed by several speakers. The Employers' members reaffirmed the special importance they attached to the suppression of indirect discrimination, which was not always easy to prove or to define. As regarded discrimination based on sex, practical measures should be taken so as to eliminate a too rigid division of work between men and women, particularly by breaking down the prejudices which still existed today regarding women's work. A few speakers remarked that the consequences of the concentration of women in some types of jobs or certain sectors of activity led to disparities in wages and conditions of employment. The Government member of Senegal thought that the persistence of indirect discrimination based on pregnancy, family responsibilities, civil status or professional experience warranted the adoption by governments of positive measures.

Affirmative action

81 The adoption of affirmative action programmes or correctional programmes stemmed from the observation that the banning of discrimination was not enough to eliminate it in actual practice. Several speakers stressed the great impact that the adoption of legislation had on the practical implementation of equality of rights and on the prohibition of discrimination, or the pedagogic strength that it could have in eliminating stereotypes. However, legislation or standards adopted through collective agreements did not suffice to eliminate discrimination in fact. The Workers' member of Sweden stressed that only the joint action of regulation and affirmative action encouraging the understanding and acceptance of the principles of non-discrimination could allow the elimination of the various forms of discrimination. The Employers' members supported this point of view and emphasised that certain positive measures – particularly in the framework of recruitment policies – should be carefully considered so as to avoid creating new discriminations. The Government member of Sweden wished to draw the Committee's attention to the distinction between "affirmative action" and "protective measures" proposed by the Committee of Experts. Protective measures were established on a permanent basis, whereas affirmative action became unnecessary as soon as the special target groups were able to exercise their rights of equality in practice. She also noted with great interest the account in the general survey of the question of sexual harassment and the measures which should be adopted in this connection.

Measures of protection

82. Numerous speakers referred to the relationship between certain protective measures – particularly relating to female labour – and equality in employment without distinction based on sex. The Employers' members indicated that the provision of Article 5 of the Convention, according to which special measures of protection shall not be deemed to be discrimination, was the expression of a legal fiction which was of little usefulness in practice if those who were supposed to benefit from the protection were in fact placed in a less favourable position because of it. They considered that a revision of the obsolete measures of protection, such as the ban on night work by women, was a better solution than that of seeking refuge in the Utopia of a general ban on night work. The Government member of Sweden recalled the position of her Government regarding the protective provisions which might be more of a brake on progress towards complete equality between women and men at work. The Government member of Venezuela noted that the Committee of Experts had pointed out that the abolition of the ban on night work by women was not the only way of achieving equality and that other considerations also had a role to play in this connection. Several speakers emphasised the need for careful study before abolishing the protective provisions so that account would be taken not only of the principles which underlay them, but also of the realities facing women workers. The Government members of Belgium and Venezuela recalled that at the present state of play it was necessary to ask whether, for medical or social reasons, certain protections ought not to be extended to all workers and whether the suppression of some forms of protection might not be accompanied by the appearance of new discrimination, for example, due to a lack of community services. The representative of the World Federation of Trade Unions was of the opinion that the removal of existing protections might aggravate the discrimination existing in fact by creating a purely formal equality. As regarded the measures adopted for ethnic minorities and other social groups, the Government member of India recalled that the provisions of Article 5 of the Convention gave legitimacy to the measures permitting the reservation of posts in the administration to members of disadvantaged groups.

Appeal and remedial procedures

83. Observance of a policy of equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation depended in part on appeal procedures and available means of compensation. In this regard, the Committee looked at several questions: the burden of proof; conciliation procedures; protection against reprisals; and means of compensation. As regarded the question of the burden of proof in judicial proceedings, the Workers' member of Norway considered that experience had shown the difficulties faced by an employee in proving discriminatory behaviour, and stated that it was therefore vital to reverse the burden of proof on to the employer in all cases of discrimination in employment and occupation. The Employers' members indicated that they could not accept a solution which, to some extent, prejudiced employers in all cases. Referring to the examples of solutions to the problem of sharing the burden of proof contained in the general survey, they considered that the proof did not always have to fall exclusively on employers or workers and that, for example, the establishment of objective proof might be required, or the courts might be able to decide freely. The Workers' member of the Netherlands stated that conciliation was preferable to drawn out legal proceedings in that it was efficient, quick, less onerous and encouraged action by the unions on behalf of the workers. The Workers' member of the Ukrainian SSR stressed the importance of supervision for avoiding discrimination against workers and the activities which the trade unions undertook in this connection. He referred to the situation in his country where trade union legal consultation services informed the workers of their rights, while labour inspection could take adequate measures to abolish violations which were observed. The Government members of Hungary and Sweden recalled the importance of guarantees against measures of reprisal. Very often, persons who had suffered discrimination would hesitate in using appeal procedures for fear of measures of reprisal. The Workers' member of Portugal highlighted the role that labour inspection could play in this field and expressed the wish that specific training on this question be provided for inspectors. Compensation for discrimination should meet two requirements: it should amount to adequate compensation, not necessarily financial, for the person discriminated against, and it should have a dissuasive effect on persons wishing to practise discrimination. The Government member of Belgium noted in this regard that the effectiveness of civil, penal and administrative sanctions depended on their severity and on the conviction with which the authorities applied them.

Co-operation with employers' and workers' organisations

84. The Workers' members regretted that the discussion within the Committee had not touched in sufficient detail on the co-operation of governments with employers' and workers' organisations with a view to ensuring the promotion of equality of opportunity at the national level. They considered that the International Labour Office should look at this question in more detail to study solutions in conformity with the Conventions. They urged member States to ratify and to apply the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) with a view to improving collaboration between the social partners and governments.

Conclusions

85. Many members expressed the wish that the work accomplished by the Committee of Experts could continue to be used in the future. The Workers' members proposed that the general survey be broadly disseminated to all interested parties and that it be used in the framework of the promotional activities undertaken by the Office, activities which should, in the opinion of the Workers' member of China, be further developed. They also expressed their agreement with the proposal to use the conclusions of the Committee of Experts to encourage and promote the ratification and application of Convention No. 111 in the framework of tripartite consultations.

86. By virtue of the Constitution of the ILO, and particularly the principles set forth in the Declaration of Philadelphia which is an integral part of it, all member States are called upon to act in favour of equality of opportunity without discrimination. This principle, reaffirmed in many instruments, was specified in the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111). Equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation without distinction based on race, colour, sex, religion, political opinion, national extraction and social origin, is based on the values of solidarity, dignity, respect for human beings, and freedom which were recalled by most of the members of the Committee. Given the fundamental nature of the principle in the Convention, the Committee proposed that the Conference, in adopting this report, address a solemn and urgent appeal to all countries which had not yet ratified the Convention to give careful study to the explanations and conclusions of the general survey so as to envisage the possibility of ratifying the Convention in the near future, and to ensure its full observance.

D. Compliance with specific obligations

87. The Committee decided that, in examining individual cases relating to compliance by States with their obligations under or relating to international labour standards, it would follow the same working methods and apply the same criteria as last year.

Submission of Conventions and Recommendations to the competent authorities

88. In accordance with its terms of reference, the Committee considered the manner in which effect was given to article 19, paragraphs 5 to 7, of the ILO Constitution. These provisions require member States within 12 months, or exceptionally 18 months, from the closing of each session of the Conference to submit the Conventions and Recommendations adopted at that session to "the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies, or the enactment of legislation or other action", and to inform the Director-General of the ILO of the measures taken to that end, with particulars of the authority or authorities regarded as competent.

89. The Committee noted from the report of the Committee of Experts that considerable efforts had been made in a number of countries in the fulfilment of their obligations in regard to submission, namely Brazil, Burkina Faso, Equatorial Guinea, Indonesia, Qatar, Somalia, Tunisia and Uganda. In the course of its session, the Committee was informed by various other States of measures taken to bring Conventions and Recommendations before the competent national authorities. It welcomed the progress which had been achieved, and expressed the hope that improvements would occur in States that still experienced difficulties in complying with their obligations.

Failure to submit

90. The Committee noted with regret that no indication was available that steps had been taken to submit the Conventions and Recommendations adopted during the 66th to 72nd Sessions of the Conference (1981 to 1986) to the competent authorities, in accordance with article 19 of the Constitution, by Grenada, Islamic Republic of Iran, Mauritius, Papua New Guinea, Saint Lucia, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Suriname, United Republic of Tanzania, Trinidad and Tobago.

Supply of reports on ratified Conventions

91. The Workers' and Employers' members and many Government members expressed their concern at difficulties still being encountered by some governments in complying with their obligation to report on the application of ratified Conventions. Only 9.5 per cent of the reports due had been received by the date fixed by the Governing Body. By the date of the meeting of the Committee of Experts, however, this percentage had risen to 78.4 (which represented a drop compared to 1986 and 1987, for which the figures were 79.2 and 78.7 per cent respectively). Since then, further reports have been received, bringing the figure to 86 per cent (as compared to 87.1 in 1987).

92. This year, only 46 per cent of the reports for which information on practical information had been requested contained such information; this represented a considerable decrease over previous years (53 per cent in 1987 and 52 per cent in 1986). Several speakers regretted this decrease. The Employers' members emphasised the importance of sending such information, since without it, it was impossible to know if the Convention was being applied.

93. It was recognised that shortcomings in complying with the reporting obligations were often due to a shortage of staff having the requisite knowledge and experience, particularly in developing countries. This underlined the importance of measures of training and assistance by the International Labour Office, to which reference has been made earlier in this report. (See also paragraph 40 above.)

Failure to supply reports and information on the application of ratified Conventions

94. The Committee noted with regret that no report on ratified Conventions had been supplied for the past two years by Fiji and Sao Tome and Principe.

95. The Committee noted with regret that first reports on ratified Conventions had not been supplied since 1986 by the following States: Jamaica, (Conventions Nos. 149 and 150) and Yugoslavia (Convention No. 158). It stressed the special importance of first reports, on the basis of which the Committee of Experts could make its evaluation of compliance with the Conventions.

96. In this year's report the Committee of Experts had noted that 34 governments had not communicated replies to most or all of the observations and direct requests relating to Conventions on which reports were due for examination this year, involving a total of 224 cases (compared with 185 cases last year and 127 the previous year). The Committee expressed its concern at the increase in these cases. It was, however, informed that, since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, 12 of the governments concerned had sent replies which would be examined by the Committee of experts next year.

97. The Committee noted with regret, however, that no information had yet been received regarding all or most of the observations and direct requests of the Committee of Experts to which replies were requested for the period ending 30 June 1987 from the following countries: Brazil, Cape Verde, Congo, Democratic Yemen, Djibouti, Fiji, Haiti, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Mauritania, New Zealand (Niue Islands), Niger, Papua New Guinea, Romania, Sao Tome and Principe, Seychelles and Yemen.

98. Again this year, the Committee did not have to apply the criterion "The government has failed during the past three years to indicate the representative organisations of employers and workers to which, in accordance with article 23 (2) of the Constitution, copies of reports on information supplied to the ILO under articles 19 and 22 have been communicated".

99. The Committee noted the explanations provided by the governments of the following countries concerning difficulties encountered in discharging their obligations: Brazil (problems of communications and language difficulties), Cape Verde (communications problems), Grenada (administrative difficulties), Haiti (political situation), Islamic Republic of Iran (state of war), Jamaica (human and financial resources), Mauritania (administrative difficulties), New Zealand (Niue Islands) (limited local resources), Niger (administrative difficulties), Papua New Guinea (administrative difficulties), Sierra Leone (administrative difficulties), Suriname (political and constitutional situation), Yemen (human resources and language difficulties). (Details of these explanations appear in the reports of the discussions of these cases, in Part Two of this report.)

Application of ratified Conventions

100. The Committee noted with particular interest the steps that had been taken by a certain number of governments to ensure compliance with ratified Conventions. It welcomed the fact that this year the Committee of Experts had been able to list, in paragraph 105 of its report, a major increase in the number of such cases, in which governments had made changes in their law and practice following comments made by the Committee. There were 67 such cases, relating to 36 States and 4 non-metropolitan territories from all regions having different social and economic systems. Over 1,730 cases of progress have been recorded since the Committee of Experts began listing these cases in its report in 1964. These results are a tangible proof of the effectiveness of the supervisory system, and of the willingness of member States to participate in the supervisory procedures.

101. In the course of the present session, the Conference Committee was informed of a certain number of other instances in which legislative or practical measures had recently been taken or were about to be adopted by governments with a view to ensuring the implementation of ratified Conventions. While it was left to the Committee of Experts to examine these measures, the Conference Committee welcomed these renewed indications of the efforts made by governments to comply with their international obligations and to act upon the comments of the supervisory bodies.

102. The Committee thought it appropriate to draw the attention of the Conference to a number of important cases which it had considered.

103. The Committee considered it appropriate to draw the attention of the Conference to the discussions which it had regarding the cases mentioned in the following paragraphs, the full record of which will be found in Part Two of this report.

104. As regards the application by the Central African Republic of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Committee took note of the information provided by the Government representative as well as of the detailed discussion which took place within the Committee. It recalled that it had been discussing this case for a great number of years. It regretted that the direct contacts mission agreed to by the Government these last two years had not taken place. The Committee expressed the firm hope that the Government would take the necessary measures to eliminate the existing discrepancies and that a direct contacts mission would take place in the very near future so as to enable the Committee of Experts and the Committee on Freedom of Association to be informed of the legal and factual situation in the country, in particular regarding the recently adopted legislation. It duly noted the readiness of the Government to welcome such a mission and hoped that the Government would take all the practical measures required for this in the very near future.

105. As concerns the application by the Dominican Republic of the Protection of Wages Convention, 1949 (No. 95), the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) and the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105), the Committee took note of the information provided by the Government representative, as well as the extensive and detailed discussion which took place in the Committee while expressing its concern as regards the situation. The Committee welcomed the proposal made by the Government to invite an ILO direct contacts mission. It expressed the hope that this mission would assist in removing the discrepancies which existed regarding the application of these Conventions as well as the other questions covered by the Commission of Inquiry in 1983, and that the Government would be able to report progress in law and practice the following year.

106. As regards the application by Ecuador of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Committee took note of the explanations provided by the Government representative and of the indications supplied on the questions posed by the Committee of Experts. The Committee noted that the Government had accepted several of the recommendations which had been made in the course of the direct contacts mission. The Committee hoped that the other discrepancies would be eliminated on an urgent basis so as to bring the legislation and practice into full conformity with the Convention. It requested the Government to provide full information in reply to all the points raised by the Committee of Experts, and in particular regarding any measures taken or envisaged in connection with the application of the Convention. As for the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105), the Committee took note of the information supplied by the Government representative. It recalled that this case had been examined in 1987 and on many previous occasions. It noted that the current information showed that the Government was not willing to amend one aspect of the shortcomings mentioned by the Committee of Experts. The Committee expressed the hope that the Government would soon take the necessary measures to amend Decree No. 105 and the Maritime Police Code so as to ensure full conformity with the Convention, and that at the next session of the Conference it would be able to note real progress.

107. As regards the application by Pakistan of the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), and the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105), the Committee noted the explanations given by the Government representative. As the main issues raised had been repeatedly discussed previously, the Committee again expressed its serious concern and urged the Government to take very shortly the necessary measures to bring its legislation and practice into conformity with the Convention, and to supply the detailed information requested by the Committee of Experts. As regards the application of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Committee took note of the information supplied by the Government representative and of the discussion within the Committee. The Committee observed with concern that there had been no progress towards bringing the legislation into conformity with the requirements of the Convention. The Committee consequently expressed the firm hope that efforts would be made to re-consider the legislation in the light of the comments of the Committee of Experts with a view to eliminating the serious divergencies which had existed for many years.

108. The Committee trusted that the governments concerned would take all the measures necessary to correct the deficiencies noted and invited them to use appropriate forms of ILO assistance, including direct contacts, to ensure that real progress is achieved by next year in regard to the observance of their obligations under the ILO Constitution and the Conventions in question.

109. During the examination of the application of certain Conventions, the Committee noted with grave concern that there had been continued failure over several years to eliminate serious discrepancies in the application by the Islamic Republic of Iran of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111).

* * *

110. The Governments of the countries to which reference is made in paragraphs 104 to 109 are invited to supply the relevant reports and information which will permit the Committee to follow up the above-mentioned matters at the next session of the Conference.

Supply of reports on unratified Conventions and on Recommendations

111. As already indicated, reports had been requested in 1987, under article 19 of the Constitution, on the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention (No. 111) and Recommendation (No. 111), 1958. The Committee noted that, of the 191 reports requested, 139 (or 72.7 per cent) had been received.

112. The Committee noted with regret that, during the past five years, none of the reports on unratified fied Conventions and on Recommendations requested under article 19 of the Constitution had been supplied by: Saint Lucia, Trinidad and Tobago and Yemen

Participation in the work of the Committee

113. The Committee welcomed the fact that, this year, all the governments present at the Conference replied to the invitation extended to them to participate in its work. It expressed its appreciation of the collaboration that it had received from 46 governments which provided information on the situation in their countries and took part in the discussions of individual cases which concerned them.

114. The Employers' members and the Workers' members regretted that the discussion of individual cases had been delayed this year because government representatives were not prepared in time for the discussion. At their initiative, the Committee held an informal discussion to examine the various means that could be taken, if necessary, to improve the organisation of its work and allow for a more rational use of the available time for the discussion of individual cases. The Secretariat was requested to prepare a document on the basis of the suggestions made with a view to preparing the work of the Committee for next year.

115. The Committee noted with regret that certain countries which were not represented at the Conference (Djibouti, Fiji, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Saint Lucia and Seychelles), as well as Sao Tome and Principe, whose representatives had had to leave the Conference before its closure, had consequently been unable to participate in the Committee's examination of the cases relating to them. It agreed that any mention of cases concerning those countries should be made in the appropriate paragraphs of this report and should be made known to the countries concerned in accordance with the usual practice.

116. This year, the discussions in the Committee were inspired by three anniversaries which were of special importance for the ILO: the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the 40th anniversary of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) and the 30th anniversary of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111). From these discussions, unanimous agreement emerged on certain points: the continued validity of the principles of dignity, freedom and equality proclaimed in the above-mentioned instruments; the divergence existing between adherence to these principles and reality; and the need for the ILO to continue to act with all the means at its disposal to ensure the observance of these principles. In this regard, the machinery and procedures aimed at ensuring the application of international labour standards constituted an indispensable means of action whose effectiveness has been shown on many occasions. The Committee was conscious of the unique role it had to play in this machinery and procedures, a role which consists in practising dialogue between the representatives of governments, employers' organisations and workers' organisations with the aim of assisting member States to make progress in the observance of their obligations relating to international labour standards. Despite the importance of the questions of principle and the complexity of certain cases that the Committee had had to debate this year, a spirit of understanding and goodwill had prevailed, which justified the hope of reaching solutions acceptable to all. The Committee welcomed this, for it had not lost sight of the fact that, beyond the texts for whose respect the supervisory bodies were responsible, it was freedom, dignity and the conditions for existence, even, at times, the lives of men, women and children which were protected.

Geneva, 17 June 1988.

PART TWO

OBSERVATIONS AND INFORMATION CONCERNING PARTICULAR COUNTRIES

I. OBSERVATIONS AND INFORMATION CONCERNING REPORTS ON RATIFIED CONVENTIONS (ARTICLE 22 OF THE CONSTITUTION)

A. General Observations and Information concerning Certain Countries

Afghanistan. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the reports containing replies to the Committee of Experts' relating to the application of Conventions Nos. 13, 100, 105, 111, 139, 140, 141 and 142.

Brazil. A Government representative pointed out, with regard to the delays in sending information to the Office, that during the present session of the Conference his Government has furnished reports to the Office on Conventions No. 5, 29, 91, 98, 107, 122 and 131. In order to reduce the delays in providing information, the responsible services in the Ministry of Labour were being improved. An official from the Ministry of Labour was currently partaking in a training course in the International Labour Standards Department. With regards to the sending of reports to the supervisory bodies, his Government has detected shortcomings and intended to propose a change in this system; this should resolve an important part of the difficulties his country faced in meeting the necessary deadlines. Finally, he emphasised the fact that Portuguese was not one of the official ILO languages and therefore Brazilian officials also had the task of overcoming language barriers in replying to the comments and preparing the reports.

The Workers' members thanked the Government representative for appearing before the present Committee to discuss the administrative difficulties which his Government faced. They noted with regret that replies had not been received with respect to the Committee of Experts' comments on Conventions Nos. 53, 94, 98, 100, 105, 107, 117, 118, 122, 125 and 131. They noted that the Government was prepared to make a major effort to improve this situation and this was welcomed because replies were needed in order to evaluate the progress which had been achieved with regard to the application of Conventions. The Workers' members hoped that, in the future, solutions should be found to the reporting difficulties.

The Employers' members fully supported the comments made by the Workers' members. They noted the fact that replies had not been received with regard to 11 Conventions, which was a large number. They hoped that the preparation concerning the ratification of new Conventions which had been indicated by the Government representative would not compound the difficulties encountered with respect to reporting. The Conventions which had been ratified and which should be examined should be dealt with so that obligations in this connection could be met.

The Committee noted the explanations given by the Government representative of Brazil and the difficulties he had reported. It noted that even though certain reports had been received, most of them had not, and it hoped the reports containing the replies requested would be communicated in the near future. It decided to include this case in the appropriate section of its report.

Cape Verde. A Government representative admitted that the comments had not been timely sent. In his opinion a problem of communication existed. He stated that his Government would take note of the comments made by the Committee and he hoped that his Government could count on the understanding of the Committee because it had always complied with the deadlines. His Government undertook to prepare the reports in question as soon as possible.

The Employers' members took note of the information provided and stated that it should be included in the record.

The Workers' members associated themselves with the comments made by the Employers' members.

The Committee noted the explanations given by the Government representative of Cape Verde and the difficulties he had reported. It noted that even though certain reports had been received, most of them had not and it hoped the reports containing the replies requested would be communicated in the near future. It decided to include this case in the appropriate section of its report.

Central African Republic. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government sent reports containing information in response to comments made by the Committee of Experts concerning the application of Conventions Nos. 18, 19, 29, 33, 62, 81, 87, 100, 105 and 118.

Congo. A Government representative stated that his Government had regularly met its obligations under Article 22 of the Constitution of the ILO. The reports due for the period which ended 30 June 1987 had been prepared but it was not been possible to submit them to the ILO because of administrative reasons. At the beginning of the Conference his Government had submitted copies of the reports to the Office. His Government would nevertheless make every effort to comply with its obligation to supply reports as rapidly as possible.

The Employers' members regretted that the report had not been received by the Office because the Committee had examined this question in 1987, the year in which reports on Convention No. 87 were due. The Employers' members hoped that this was the last time the report would not be received as Convention No. 87 was of particular importance with regard to the Congo. It was essential for reports to be received in times and therefore note should be taken of this shortcoming in the report of this Committee.

The Workers' members supported the statements of the Employers' members regarding the late receipt of reports and they hoped that in the future the deadlines would be respected.

The Committee took note of the information given by the Government representative of the Congo as well as of the difficulties to which he related. It took note of the fact that the report which should contain replies to the questions of the supervisory body had not been received. It hoped that the reports containing the required replies would be sent in as soon as possible. It decided to include this case in the relevant section of its report.

Democratic Yemen. In reply to the comments made by the Committee of Experts, the Government has indicated that for administrative reasons its reports have been sent late.

It is hoped that work methods will be significantly better due to the Council of Ministers' adoption on 24 May 1988 of new draft legislation concerning the reorganisation of the Ministry of Labour and the public administration. This draft provides for establishment of a legal department having as its task, inter alia, to examine international labour Conventions and Recommendations and to respond to reports and to observations of the Committee of Experts. The Government appreciates that the Arab language be the means of communication with the Committee of Experts; it equally appreciates the increase in technical co-operation furnished by the Organisation.

Given the progress brought about at the level of the Ministry of Labour's organisation, replies to the comments of the Committee of Experts will certainly be sent more regularly and in a more consistent manner.

In addition a Government representative assured the present Committee of his Government's interest in presenting reports and replying to the observations of the Committee of Experts. Delays had been due to technical difficulties, in particular those concerning the use of Arabic. His delegation appreciated that certain parts of the Committee of Experts' report had been translated into Arabic. He reported that a new legal division had been established in his country to study international labour Conventions and prepare replies to the observations of the supervisory bodies. He hoped that this institutional change, as well as the use of Arabic by the ILO, would help improve the working methods and the transmission of reports.

The Workers' members expressed their hope that the co-operation between the Government and the ILO, along with the use of the Arabic language and the organisational restructuring of the Ministry would permit the Government to fulfill its obligations. It was necessary to note, however, that no reply had been received in response to the observations by the Committee of Experts on Conventions Nos. 29, 59 and 105. They hoped that the Government would supply this information next year. They proposed that the case be mentioned in the appropriate part of the general report.

The Employers' members stated that in the absence of any information on the Convention, no real evaluation was possible. They asked that the case be mentioned in the appropriate part of the Committee's report.

The Committee noted the explanations of the Government representative in particular in connection with the difficulties existing to date concerning the compliance of the obligation to report. It found that reports and replies for the period under review had not been submitted. It hoped that in the future all reports containing full information would be sent on time. The Committee decided to mention this case in the appropriate section of its report.

France. The Government has communicated the following information:

The Order of 17 June 1986, implementing article 10 of Decree No. 60-600 of 22 June 1960, has been repealed by the Order of 20 March 1987 implementing article 4 of Decree No. 87-190 of 20 March 1987 concerning the registration and the commission of vessels in the French Southern Antarctic Territories (TAAF).

The aforementioned Order of 20 March 1987 prescribes in its first article that the proportion of crew members of French nationality on board vessels registered in the French Southern Antarctic Territories, may not be less than 25 per cent of the seafarers registered on the crew list, in accordance with the first article of the Decree of 26 May 1967.

This concerns a provision of internal law designed to preserve a minimum number of jobs for citizens of France or the European Community on board vessels registered in the French Southern Antarctic Territories. No legal relationship, therefore, can be made between this provision and the application or non-application of various maritime Conventions ratified by France. The ILO Conventions do not prohibit a State from reserving certain jobs on board its commerce vessels for its own citizens or nationals of other States to which that State may be linked by agreements.

Looking at it from another angle, article 35 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation provides that Conventions ratified by States are not applicable to non-metropolitan territories, for whose international relations a State is responsible, until after a declaration has been communicated to the Director-General of the International Labour Organisation. This has not yet been done for the French Southern Antarctic Territories.

All the same, it is the Government's intention to study the possible application of maritime Conventions ratified by France to this territory.

In any event, it is fitting to recall that the meaning of the term "discrimination" in Convention No. 111 aims at all distinction, exclusion or preference based on race, colour, sex, religion, political opinion, or national or social origin which has the effect of nullifying or impairing equality of treatment in employment or occupation.

In the case of personnel on board the vessels in question, differences in remuneration or social security coverage are not based on any of the elements enumerated above. Such differences are only based upon distinctions in professional qualification and, as a consequence, the posts occupied on board the vessel.

It is also fitting to emphasise the registration of a vessel at Port-aux-Français cannot be done until a certain number of specific indications have been provided to the maritime authorities on the social protection of foreign seafarers. Two contracts must also be agreed to by the commissioned vessel: one, agreeing to respect international labour Conventions ratified by France; the other, agreeing to respect the regulation requirements of Port-aux-Français.

The navigation companies where one or more vessels are registered to the TAAF have been notified of the fact that lack of respect for their contracts will constitute a sufficient reason for removing a vessel from the Port-aux-Français registry.

In addition a Government representative recalled that in a letter dated 9 July 1986 the National Federation of Maritime Trade Unions (FNSM) drew the Committee of Experts' attention to a decree dated 17 June 1986 which extended the possibilities of registry for certain categories of ships to the newly opened registers in the French Southern Antarctic Territories. The decision to extend the registration of vessels engaged in international navigation to this territory implied a revision of hitherto unchallenged texts. The FNSM had asked about the applicability of a series of Conventions ratified by France. The Government of France had delayed its reply to the Committee of Experts, and this delay triggered two new letters from the FNSM. The delay was due to certain administrative difficulties encountered in the setting up of this new register. In a letter dated 28 March 1988, which arrived too late to be considered by the Committee of Experts last March, his Government gave a written communication on this subject. He wished nevertheless to provide further information. First, the international labour Conventions ratified by France and mentioned in the Committee of Experts' report were applicable in the French Southern Antarctic Territories. Second, the obligation of observing these Conventions was recalled in the application circular of the Decree dated 20 March 1987 which updated all the rules governing the new register. Third, everything indicated that these Conventions were currently observed in practice. Fourth, his Government would make every effort to send regular reports on the application of these Conventions, especially in its report on the period ending 30 June 1988, in line with the request of the Committee of Experts.

The Employers' members stated that this was a communications problem, because according to the report of the Committee of Experts the Government of France had received the comments of the FNSM in August 1986, but had been delayed in communicating its reply. The real question, which remained unanswered, was how many Conventions were involved in this case. The Committee of Experts gave no opinion on this, and the union concerned referred to a whole series of Conventions that could not be studied in detail. According to information supplied by the Government representative of France, and reproduced in the above-mentioned written communication, these Conventions were applied. In this case the problem was solved. The Employers' members therefore requested the Government to communicate its report to the Committee of Experts which would study the matter in the light of the information provided. Following this examination, the Employers' members would decide whether to revert to this question in a future session. Accordingly, they wished to reserve their decision in this case.

The Worker member of Argentina underlined that according to the Government, the decision to create a new port of registration under its flag was not aimed at transgressing the provisions of the Conventions ratified by it, nor the provisions of the French labour legislation. He wondered, therefore, whether this decision was aimed at favouring French citizens who, being out of work far from the metropolitan territory, would thus find work on French ships flying French colours, registered in the Kergelen Islands, and thus enjoy the benefits of international Conventions and French labour legislation. If one knew how many unemployed there were in the Kergelen Islands, it would be possible perhaps to guess why a Government which had always respected its international obligations would create a port of registry in such a remote location from the metropolitan territory. It had been stated that the personnel on board these ships would not be discriminated against. He wondered nevertheless whether seamen of other nationalities who embarked on French ships registered in the Kergelen Islands would benefit from the same working conditions as French seamen. It was indeed a very subtle means for avoiding the application of collective agreements to which French seamen had greatly contributed. In fact, the objective was to reduce costs in response perhaps to the demands of French shipowners. In this context there would be violation of Convention No. 98 for failure to apply collective agreements signed by French seamen unions. He wanted a reply to these questions because they applied not only to France, but also other countries.

The Workers' members stressed the relevance of some of the questions asked by the Workers' member of Argentina which deserved the Committee of Experts' full attention. They noted in this respect that the Government representative of France had stated that his country had pledged to supply all the requested information. They stressed that one of the reasons for establishing a shipping register in other countries could be linked to taxation. These matters should be settled once and for all. They noted nevertheless that the figure of 25 per cent of French seamen was in fact a minimum and this reassured them more than if it were a maximum. They were nevertheless interested to know to what extent France would respect the application of ratified maritime Conventions under such a system. It should be verified whether the principle of equality of opportunity and treatment for the same skills was indeed observed, and whether identical working conditions were granted to French and foreign workers. It was important that the Government of France continued to supply information requested by the Committee of Experts in order to give a clear answer to the FNSM and to all those who were concerned with the conditions of workers engaged in merchant shipping.

The Government representative of France recalled that his Government had every intention of sending reports on the application of the numerous maritime Conventions ratified by France, which was certainly one of the countries that had ratified the highest number of Conventions in this sphere. The Conference Committee would be informed of the real situation following the examination of the Committee of Experts. In reply to the Workers' members he asserted that the Government to France would remain responsible for applying the Conventions.

The Committee took note of the written and oral information supplied by the Government. The questions referred to in the Committee of Experts' observation, following comments received from the National Federation of Maritime Trade Unions, concerned important questions relating to the legal position as regards the application of ratified Conventions to non-metropolitan territories, and to the situation in practice as regards the protection of the seafarers concerned. The Committee hoped that the Government would re-examine the question, taking into account any comments that the Committee of Experts would make on the basis of the information that had been supplied.

Ghana. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has provided information in response to the comments made by the Committee of Experts concerning the application of Conventions Nos. 29, 100 and 105.

Grenada. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the reports containing replies to the Committee of Experts' comments relating to the application of Conventions Nos. 14, 29, 81, 94, 95, 98 and 105.

Guyana. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has provided information in response to the comments made by the Committee of Experts concerning the application of Conventions Nos. 29, 42, 129, 136, 137, 139, 141 and 149.

Haiti. A Government representative stated that his Government was approaching the examination of the case of Haiti in a spirit of co-operation. The Government stressed that the acceptance of the direct contacts mission should not lead to a suspension of the examination of the case. The Government's change in attitude was important; it no longer viewed appearance before the present Committee as a test, but rather as a means of having a more thoroughgoing dialogue. There were problems, and that was what had led the Government to seek as much technical assistance as possible from the Office. The present government had inherited a difficult situation in which relationships with the ILO and other international organisations had been allowed to stagnate. The speaker noted that since Haiti was the only French-speaking country in Latin America, it was excluded from seminars and other activities organised for that region. His Government had contacted the Office with a view to finding solutions, but first it was necessary to reinstate the dialogue on a constructive basis. The situation of Haitian workers in the Dominican Republic was a very troublesome one which should be examined in a calm manner. Since 1986, he assured, no agreement between the two countries had existed in relation to recruitment in Haiti of workers to cut sugar cane in the Dominican Republic. His Government wished an immediate improvement in the workers' fate. Fortunately, there was now a framework to the direct contacts mission to follow up on the recommendations made by the Commission of Inquiry. The Government wished to avoid confrontation and wanted to ensure compliance with international labour Conventions. As regards the obligation to submit reports under Articles 19 and 22 of the ILO Constitution, the tardiness was due to events over the last two years. His Government would take all necessary steps to remedy the situation. A request for the assistance of the Office had been made for the training of personnel of the Ministries of Labour and Social Security in the preparation of reports.

The Workers' members thanked the Government representative for recognising that the problem of supplying reports and replies was an important one. Without them, a dialogue could not even commence, and progress became stalemated. They noted that the Government had pledged to provide the reports soon; under the governing criteria, this case would be mentioned in the appropriate part of the report of the Committee.

The Employers' members associated themselves fully with the comments made by the Workers' members in relation to paragraph 99 of the Committee of Experts' report. The Employers' member had welcomed the statement that the Government wished to make a new beginning in its relationship with the ILO. Hoping that all past difficulties could be ironed out, they welcomed the reopening of the dialogue which the Government representative had mentioned. They looked forward to replies being received soon.

The Committee noted that explanation given by the Government representative and the difficulties he had reported. It noted, however, that no reports or replies had been received and hoped that the reports and replies required would be communicated in the near future, with the assistance of the ILO as requested by the Government. The Committee decided to include this case in the appropriate section of its report.

Jamaica. A Government representative stated that the Government, like the Committee of Experts, regretted the fact that the first reports on the application of the Nursing Personnel Convention, 1977 (No. 149), and the Labour Administration Convention, 1978 (No. 150), had not yet been communicated. The Government recognised that a serious obligation was involved; non-reporting was due to a temporary inability to put together the necessary financial and human resources to produce accurate and substantial reports. The Government pledged to make special positive efforts to ensure that the outstanding reports would be submitted without further delay.

The Employers' members noted that this case provided an opportunity to recall the importance of first reports regarding the legislative and practical measures taken to apply ratified Conventions. Such reports constituted the starting point of the supervisory machinery, providing the basis on which the Committee of Experts could point out even minor discrepancies which might exist between national legislation and the Convention. The Employers' members wished to communicate to the Government the importance of the duty to provide first reports so that these reports be provided soon.

The Workers' members welcomed the opportunity to draw attention to the contents of paragraph 96 of the Committee of Experts' general report. First reports were the basis on which the Committee of Experts could initially evaluate the application of ratified Conventions. Although the Workers' members understood the difficulties faced by the Government, they urged it to make a special effort to provide these reports. Unfortunately, this case would have to be mentioned in the appropriate paragraph of the Conference Committee's report.

The Committee noted the explanation given by the Government representative of Jamaica and the difficulties he had reported. It noted that no first reports on Conventions Nos. 149 and 150 had been supplied for the past two years. The Committee hoped that these reports would be communicated in the near future. The Committee decided to include this case in the appropriate section of its report.

Kenya. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts the Government has sent the reports due on Conventions Nos. 29, 105, 129, 138 and 142.

Kuwait. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the reports containing replies to the Committee of Experts comments relating to the application of Conventions Nos. 29, 81, 105 and 136.

Mauritania. A Government representative stated that his Government had taken note of all the remarks made by the Committee of Experts in its report. He further stated that the requested information was now being prepared and would reach the Committee within a reasonable period of time. He added that his Government's failure to communicate that information was not due to bad will but to slow internal administrative procedures involving other ministerial departments.

The Workers' members, following the declaration of the Government representative, noted that his Government was conscious of the importance of replying to the comments of the Committee of Experts.

The Employers' members noted that the Government representative had provided comments concerning a number of Conventions. Such information should be communicated in writing for examination by the Committee of Experts in its report. If the Committee received incomplete reports, or no reports at all, it could not check on the legislation and practice in the country concerned. This case concerned five important Conventions, among which Convention No. 29. It should be recalled that the application of this Convention had given rise to very serious problems in the preceding years. It was therefore important to reply to the questions asked by the Committee of Experts, not merely by sending it the requested information, but enumerating the steps taken by the Government in relation to the questions asked. It was insufficient merely to take note of the comments of the Committee of Experts. They expressed the hope that the comments provided by the Government representative would be presented in written reports and that the Committee of Experts would receive full and detailed reports in the future.

The Committee noted the explanation given by the Government representative and the difficulties he had reported. It noted that no reports or replies had been received and it hoped that the reports and the replies requested would be communicated in the near future. The Committee decided to include this case in the appropriate section of its report.

Niger. A Government representative stated that his Government had received the request of the Committee of Experts concerning his country in time, however, the two officials who were responsible for all questions concerning international obligations, including the ILO, were not able to meet these obligations without some delay because of their heavy workload. Following receipt of a reminder from the ILO last April, the officials had prepared the reports and sent them to Geneva. Unfortunately, these reports had not yet arrived in Geneva. However, a copy of the report on Convention No. 81 had been given to the Standards Department during the Conference. The Government representative assured this Committee that his Government would take the necessary measures to ensure that this delay would not occur again.

The Employers' members thanked the Government representative for his explanations. It was true that a great number of developing countries had difficulties preparing their reports. However, it was recalled that efforts should be made because, in the absence of information, the Committee of Experts was not able to determine the extent to which ratified Conventions were applied. The Employers' members hoped that the reports in question would be received by the Office in the near future and that the Government would reinforce its efforts to meet the obligations imposed on it as a result of its ratification of Conventions and its participation in the ILO. This shortcoming should be noted in the appropriate section of the report of the Committee.

The Workers' members also thanked the Government representative for his explanations and expressed the hope that the report in question would be received by the Office very soon. They recalled that during the course of the general discussion the Workers' members had already drawn the Committee's attention to the fact that the number of cases in which replies to comments of the supervisory bodies had not been received, had increased year after year and was 224 this year. The workers' members regretted the situation and hoped that reports would be received on time in the future.

The Committee noted the informations given by the Government representative and the difficulties he had reported. It noted that even though certain reports had been received, most of them had not, and it hoped that the reports containing the replies requested would be communicated in the near future. It decided to include this case in the appropriate section of its report.

Panama. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the ILO has received on 3 June 1988 the reports sent on 26 January 1988, containing information in response to the comments made by the Committee of Experts concerning the application of Conventions Nos. 10, 13, 16, 19, 27, 29, 32, 52, 53, 63, 69, 73, 74, 81, 100, 105, 107, 113, 114, 122, 123, 125.

Papua New Guinea. A Government representative stated that the Government had had the opportunity to benefit from the assistance of an ILO Regional Adviser who conducted a one-day national tripartite symposium on Labour standards and related matters in August 1987. The aim of the symposium was to promote awareness of the reporting obligations and ILO standard-setting activities. As regards the obligation to report, replies to direct requests and observations concerning legislative amendments or other information were the responsibility of other government agencies whose replies had to be incorporated into the government report. These agencies had been contacted repeatedly concerning replies to comments but no response had been received from them as yet. The Government representative assured the present Committee that every effort would be made to supply reports for consideration by the Committee of Experts in the future.

The Employers' members stressed the importance of the obligation to submit reports to the Committee of Experts. Without information from governments the Committee of Experts could not evaluate the legislative situation and the practical application of ILO standards in the various countries. The Committee of Experts had so far received no relevant information from the Government on the situation regarding four Conventions. The difficulty caused by having different government agencies responsible for providing those replies was understandable, but unless communications functioned properly the ILO supervisory machinery could not function. The report of the Committee of Experts had stated that the number of failures to reply had considerably increased. The Employers' members felt strongly about that and about mentioning failures to reply to certain questions and observentions in the report. They hoped that the Government would provide the relevant replies and perhaps explain the practical measures envisaged to ensure such replies in future.

The Workers' members agreed entirely with the Employers' members. They added that they hoped the Government would do its utmost to follow the ILO procedure, and that following the ILO tripartite seminar the Government would be able to provide the necessary information.

The Committee took note of the difficulties reported by the Government representative of Papua New Guinea and noted that no reports or replies had been received; it hoped that the reports and the replies requested would be communicated in the near future. The Committee decided to include this case in the appropriate section of its report.

Poland. The Government has communicated the following information: The Government recalled that Poland is one of the countries which has ratified the greatest number of ILO Conventions as well as other conventions and international human rights covenants. This year marks the anniversary of the proclamation of these rights, which is expressed in the report of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. The Government is a sincere believer in the respect of international standards and this is why the Government would like to point out that a group of experts has been charged with appraising the legislation and examining the possibilities of making it fully conform with the requirements of the ratified ILO Conventions which relate to the protection of human rights.

The task of this group, composed of eminent academics and labour and international law specialists will be among others to analyse the conformity of the laws in force in Poland with the Articles of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 ratified by Poland, as well as other ILO standards concerning human rights, and then, to submit the results with the proposed recommendations to the Legislative Council in the office of the President of the Council of Ministers.

It is with great respect for the experience and competence of the International Labour Office that the Government expresses its hope that during the course of the work of the above-mentioned group of experts, it will be possible to take advantage of the Office's help in the form of advice and appraisal.

The Government will inform the Committee on the progress accomplished by this group in due course.

Furthermore the Government indicated that during the 73rd Session of the International Labour Conference (June 1987) in the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, and then in the report submitted to the International Labour Office in October 1987, the Government of the Polish People's Republic presented its detailed reply to observations and questions of the Committee of Experts for the Application of Conventions and Recommendations concerning the implementation in Polish legislation and practice of Conventions Nos. 11 and 87.

Since that date no changes have taken place in Polish legislation as regards the observations formulated by the Committee of Experts respecting implementation of Conventions Nos. 11 and 87.

Romania. A Government representative stated that his Government agreed with the questions asked by the Committee of Experts which concerned the lateness and inadequacy of their replies in response to the requests of the Committee. The Labour Standards Branch had been consulted on the manner in which reports should be presented and he assured the Committee that in the future replies would be more explicit.

The Employers' members stated that Conventions Nos. 29 and 81, both important Conventions, were amongst the six Conventions on which the Government had not responded. They were pleased that the Government representative was now ready to answer the different questions which had been asked by the Committee of Experts. They stressed that the acceptance of the supervisory machinery implied that reports would be sent and that answers would be given and they hoped that in the future the reports would be communicated on time. They considered that the case should be mentioned in the general report.

The Workers' members indicated their agreement with the remarks by the Employers' members. They stressed that the Committee should examine during the present session the application of the Conventions for which the Government had neither sent a report nor replied to the observations. They believed that the responsibility of sending reports and replying to the observations should not be taken lightly and that if the supervisory system was not stringent it would lose its efficacy. They considered that the case should be mentioned in the appropriate part of the report.

The Committee noted the explanations given by the Government representative. It noted that most reports and replies had not been received, and it hoped that the reports and the replies requested would be communicated in the near future. The Committee decided to include this case in the appropriate section of its report.

Sao Tome and Principe. In response to the comments made by the Committee of Experts concerning the absence of reports on the application of Conventions Nos. 18, 19, 81, 100 and 111, the Government explained that Sao Tome and Principe had to face some vast difficulties, particularly a serious economic and financial crisis which, among others, prevented a regular and continual presence of national delegations to the Conference; the absence of qualified staff with regard to questions concerning international Conventions and Recommendations in the labour field also has a part of the responsibility in this situation. In order to surmount these difficulties, particularly in respect of qualified staff, the Government has requested the assistance of the ILO and the regional adviser on standards will visit the country in the next months. Furthermore, the Government has begun a process of reorganisation and efforts are under way to ensure regular and adequate functioning of its services in relation with the ILO in a manner in which the country can fulfil its constitutional obligations.

Trinidad and Tobago. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the reports on Conventions Nos. 102 and 128 and Recommendation No. 131 (as regards old-age benefits) under article 19 of the ILO Constitution.

In addition, a Government representative apologised that his delegation had not been able to appear before the Committee at the 73rd Session of the International Labour Conference. This should not be interpreted as a lack of respect for the work of the Committee. An official with responsibility for relations with the ILO had been recently appointed and had participated in a regional seminar for Caribbean countries which had enabled him to become more aware of ILO procedures and his country's obligations thereto. The reports requested under article 19 of the Constitution on non-ratified Conventions had been sent on 30 May 1988 and covered the period ending 31 December 1987.

The Employers' members pointed out in regard to the reports to be submitted under article 19 of the Constitution on non-ratified Conventions which had not been sent, that in the Government's written reply to the Committee of Experts, reports had been communicated on two Conventions and one Recommendation.

The Workers' members also stressed the importance of the general survey and the necessity that countries send the required reports on non-ratified Conventions. They hoped that the attendance by the official responsible for ILO-related questions at the seminar mentioned by the Government representative would help improve the situation. In order to encourage the Government to persevere, the case should be noted in the appropriate section of the general report.

The Government representative spoke of the establishment of a new administrative framework and his Government's commitment to fulfil its obligations to submit reports. The observations of the Employers' and Workers' members would be communicated to the Government.

The Committee noted the explanations given by the Government representative of Trinidad and Tobago and the difficulties he had reported. It noted that no reports under article 19 of the Constitution had been received for the past five years. It noted that the report due this year was received and it hoped that the requested reports would be communicated in the near future. The Committee decided to include this case in the appropriate section of its report.

Yemen. A Government representative informed the Committee that Yemen had ratified during the last months Conventions Nos. 156 concerning workers with family responsibilities, 1981, and 1958 concerning termination of employment 1982. In response to the observations of the Committee of Experts concerning the lack of reply to the comments of the supervisory bodies he noted that his Government placed full confidence in the ILO Recommendations and Conventions and that these instruments were being applied in spite of the technical difficulties hindering the preparation of reports. He stated that it would be beneficial to the countries experiencing such difficulties if technical assistance would be extended to help alleviate these difficulties. He requested this Committee to take into consideration the importance of Arabic and noted that the translation of ILO documents into Arabic would also help countries with their reporting obligations.

In response to the comments of the Committee of Experts concerning the failure to submit reports under Article 19, he promised the Committee that the report for next year would be received by the Office in the near future.

The Employers' members noted that, once again, the Committee had been confronted with the typical difficulties that countries, particularly developing countries, faced with regard to the submission of reports and the answering of specific questions and comments. The ILO had a broad scale of different types of assistance, such as seminars and regional advisers. It was hoped that countries meeting these difficulties could make use of this assistance because both of these reporting requirements were important. The Employers' members took note of the good will shown by the Government and they had no doubts that all efforts would be made to ensure that these commitments were fulfilled. This case should be noted in the appropriate place in the report.

The Workers' members fully agreed with the comments made by the Employers' members. They noted that this was not just an administrative obligation but it was a matter of co-operation and they hoped that the answers to the questionnaire for the General Survey of next year would be soon received.

The Government member of the United Arab Emirates noted that the difficulties described by the Government representative of Yemen in replying to the comments of the supervisory bodies also applied to the reporting on unratified Conventions. He noted that these problems were related to human resources and the need for language translation. It was difficult to get the comments made by the supervisory bodies translated into Arabic. The ILO should extend assistance in this field, particularly in regard to translation into Arabic, in order to allow Governments to respond to their commitments of international co-operation.

The Committee noted the explanations given by the Government representative of Yemen and the difficulties he had reported. It noted that no reports or replies had been received and it hoped that with the assistance of the ILO, the reports and the replies requested would be communicated in the near future. The Committee decided to include this case in the appropriate section of its report.

The Committee noted the explanations given by the Government representative of Yemen and the difficulties he had reported. It noted that no reports under Article 19 had been received for the last five years. It hoped that these reports would be communicated in the future, if necessary, with the assistance of the ILO. The Committee decided to include this case in the appropriate section of its report.

Yugoslavia. A Government representative of Yugoslavia stated concerning the comments of the Committee of Experts with regard to the failure to submit the first report of his Government on Convention No. 158 on termination of employment, 1982, ratified by Yugoslavia on 21 November 1984. The application of Convention No. 158 was fully guaranteed by the Federal Constitution as well as by the Constitutions of the republics and autonomous regions. This situation was one of the main reasons for the ratification of this Convention; Yugoslavia is among the eight member States that had ratified it so far. The delay in supplying the first report of this Convention was due to the following reasons. In 1986 a procedure for revising the constitution and legislation on industrial relations had been undertaken. During that period, the revision of the labour law that governed industrial relations at the federal level had also been undertaken. The labour relations law in the republics and in autonomous regions were now being unified with the aim of achieving uniformed rules of industrial relations in particular as regards appeals concerning the relationship between termination of employment and dismissals. This co-ordination of the legislation of the republics and the autonomous regions would be over next autumn, and it was for that reason that the Government of Yugoslavia, in consultation with the Yugoslav trade union and the Economic Chamber representing the employers, had thought it better to delay the despatch of the first report concerning the present Convention. He wished to inform the Conference Committee that the legislative and constitutional changes would present no problem for the application of Convention No. 158 and that the first complete report to which would be attached the new legislative texts would be despatched during the fourth quarter of 1988.

The Workers' members noted with interest the information communicated, in particular the fact that Yugoslavia was among the first ILO member States which had ratified Convention No. 158. They nevertheless underlined that a first report had to reach the Committee of Experts so that it could examine the application of a newly ratified Convention. While they understood the real administrative difficulties facing the Government of Yugoslavia was among the first ILO member States which had ratified Convention No. 158. They nevertheless underlined that a first report had to reach the Committee of Experts so that it could examine the application of a newly ratified Convention. While they understood the real administrative difficulties facing the Government of Yugoslavia – and perhaps the Government should envisage some assistance in this respect – the Workers' members were compelled to mention the failure to supply a first report in an appropriate section of the Committee's report.

The Employers' members appreciated being able to discuss this very important question of the supply of the first report with the Government representative. They were also pleased with the quick ratification of this Convention. They were fully conscious of the difficulties facing a federal State in co-ordinating various state actions. The Government representative had stated that one of the causes of this delay was that no all the legislative instruments of the different states of the federation had been adopted so far. So without this new legislation, Convention No. 158 could not be incorporated in its entirety in national legislation and practice. They hoped that the steps announced to this end would soon become effective and that the report would be communicated to the Committee of Experts during the fourth quarter of 1988, as was indicated by the Government representative. In its report, the Conference Committee should nevertheless mention that this first report had not been supplied according to the provisions of the ILO Constitution.

The Committee noted the explanation given by the Government representative and the difficulties he had reported. It noted that no first report on Convention No. 158 had been supplied for the last two years, and hoped that this report would be communicated in the near future. It decided to indicate this case in the appropriate section of its report.

B. Observations and Information on the Application of Conventions

Colombia (ratification: 1933). The Government has communicated the following information:

The Government is carefully considering in special committees the amendments necessary for the social changes as part of a wider-ranging and integrated programme to improve Colombians' conditions of life and work. The co-ordinated social policy in force requires global reforms adapted to the context. Thus the Government is continuing to study how to bring national legislation closely in line with the Convention, especially in the light of general provisions on women and socio-economic reality.

In addition, a Government representative stated that the Committee of Experts' observations dealt with two aspects: the first on the duration of maternity leave and the second on benefits provided to mothers in the post-natal period. With regard to the Convention, the Government had stated to the ILO, and now restated, that one of the current administration's proposals was to bring the Labour Code into line with modern principles and exigencies of social security. In addition, the Government proposed to take measures aimed at achieving full coverage of the population in relation to social security. This implied the need to adopt a list of priorities providing for decisions which could be applied on a gradual basis. There was a guarantee of post-natal leave. The law provided for a total of eight weeks of leave, with a guaranteed leave of six weeks counting from the birth of the child. Maternity was also the object of other collateral benefits, among which could be mentioned three principal ones: (1) six months for nursing, counted from the termination of maternity leave, during which the woman worker could work two hours less per day to nurse her child; (2) child-care centres and family care, administered by the Colombian Institute of Family Welfare in which it was possible to leave a child in good hands, free of charge or for a modest fee, while the worker went to work; and (3) administrative procedures concerning protection against dismissals, even justified ones. All of this fell within the framework of Convention No. 111, establishing non-discrimination against women, which Colombia had adopted in 1969.

The Government representative stated in addition that in 1986, section 236 of the Labour Security Code had been amended to provide that the benefits provided to biological mothers be extended to mothers who had adopted children of up to 7 years of age, i.e. the provision of paid leave of eight weeks, protection in relation to dismissals and indemnities. But other additional measures had been taken, as follows: extension of social security entitlement to the family members of direct beneficiaries, whereas in the past only pregnant women and children up to the age of 1 year had been covered. These benefits had now been extended to the woman or wife, to children up to the age of 18 (or 25 if they have not completed their studies) and to persons who were temporarily incapacitated. Self-employed workers and with low incomes had also been linked to the social security scheme and social security had been provided for domestic workers, with a hefty subsidy from the State, and for members of religious orders. The geographical area had been extended to cover additional zones and the rules governing industrial diseases and accidents had been expanded. These decisions would permit 6.5 million beneficiaries to be covered by 1990, as compared with the 3 million covered when the present administration took office. In addition, present Government intended to extend social security benefits to the entire population, whereas it only covered 16 per cent of the economically active population at the moment. It was important to note that because of scarce resources in both the public and private sectors, the Government had to set priorities. Other measures, such as protection for under-age workers and workers engaged in mining, as well as the expansion of the occupational diseases which were covered, had contributed to an improvement in the spectrum covered by social security and the protection of women. The Government representative said that the Government was making efforts to put into place a financial structure which would permit recognition of the entitlement to benefits and their payment during the period of leave. These benefits were established, but their recognition and payment on time still posed difficulties. This plan of financial structuring had made it possible for employees in the private sector to have their entitlement to benefits determined immediately; for public employees it was projected that this would be possible at the latest within 15 days of the expenses having been incurred. He explained that this was a matter that had the Government's attention; it should be understood that due to the necessity of establishing priorities concerning social security and due to the high level of unemployment, it would not be desirable to establish a scheme which produced still more unemployment among working mothers because of the impossibility of providing for all the benefits required. But all the directors of the Social Security Institutes were studying the situation in the hope of finding a lasting solution soon.

The Workers' members thanked the Government representative for the information provided. He had spoken of an ambitious plan for the social security system; it was of course desirable to have a system which could provide all workers' insurance in case of unemployment and sickness. With regard to maternity protection, this Convention, which had been ratified in 1933, called for 12 weeks of maternity leave, six weeks prior to confinement and six weeks following it. When this case was under discussion in 1983, the Government had made promises to add one week's additional maternity leave per year, to arrive at a total of 12 weeks in a four-year period. Since then, however, the total had remained at eight weeks. The promise should be kept and measures should be taken. The Workers' members were interested in the ILO study mission to be sent to Colombia in September 1988. They hoped it would deal with the question under discussion and not only with freedom of association, and that it would involve contact with employers' and workers' organisations as well as with the Government. They looked forward to seeing social progress in relation to the general application of Conventions in this country.

The Employers' members recalled that the Government had not yet fulfilled the requirements of the Convention, requiring six weeks of leave prior to confinement and six weeks afterwards. It had been stated in the Committee of Experts' report that amendment of the Labour Code was under consideration, with far-reaching aims in many fields. The Government representative had spoken of a number of plans which did not necessarily deal with maternity protection. Regarding the leave period, the Government representative had carefully indicated that, for the time being, the Government was not in a position to comply entirely with the provisions of the Convention because the social security problems involved were manifold and interlinked with economic and financial matters which as a whole could only be solved on a progressive basis. The Employers' members understood that social policy in this field was an expensive affair, but they considered it a step backward that the assurance given by the Government in 1983, namely to adjust the maternity leave provisions on a step-by-step basis, had not been repeated in the current discussion. They expressed the hope that, more than 50 years after ratification, the requirements of this Convention would be put into actual practice, even if on a step-by-step basis. But the first step still had to be taken.

The Worker member of Colombia stated that the explanations provided by the Government representative of his country had corresponded to the actual situation under Colombian labour legislation. But he noted that although the Government did have good intentions to resolve the situation, Colombian workers and other workers in Latin America unfortunately always heard the same type of information year after year. The constant changes in government which occurred in Colombia were prejudicial to the workers, with one government promising things for four years and four years later another government coming in, which meant a change at the ministerial level with prejudicial repercussions for workers' rights. Making promises which were not kept created rising mistrust among the workers with regard to bringing labour legislation into conformity with international labour Conventions and Recommendations. The workers acknowledged the Government's good faith but in Colombia another ministerial crisis was looming, which meant that they would be facing promises from a new minister who did not know the situation. Years had passed in this way, with no solutions to problems found. The workers were concerned about this; besides the problem of 12 weeks' maternity leave, there were other ILO Conventions and Recommendations which were not ratified or, if they have been ratified, the legislation has not been brought in conformity with the dispositions of the Convention; this was detrimental to the rights of workers in the country. In conclusion, the mission which would go to Colombia soon should really check into the situation and seek solutions to these problems.

The Workers' members recognised that a rapid turnover in governments posed difficulties for durable and lasting work. But when one government made promises to make improvements, including legislative changes, the government succeeding it should not go back on this.

The Government representative expressed interest in the comments which had been made and reiterated that his Government had the best intentions with regard to extending social security coverage within the near future. He also reiterated that specific benefits were one of the principal concerns of the Government and that the matter was now under study. He stated that in the current administration, which was strong from a technical and methodological viewpoint, changes at the ministerial level did not mean changes in fundamental policy. In relation to the observations made by the spokesman of the Workers' Group at the Committee, two comments were necessary: firstly, an explanation of the situation in Colombia, which was going through serious difficulties but which the Government had every intention of resolving, had been presented yesterday in the plenary session of the Conference; secondly, the Government had accepted with pleasure the experts' visit planned for September. This would present an excellent opportunity to study the situation of trade unions in Colombia and to analyse freedom of association and industrial relations and to listen to the advice offered by the mission.

The representative of the Secretary-General confirmed that the mission which was to visit Colombia soon was not in relation with the application of Convention No. 3. The high-level direct contacts mission would examine cases pending before the Committee on Freedom of Association and questions involving application of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

The Committee noted the written and oral explanations supplied by the Government. In view of the serious shortcomings which had been the subject of comments by the Committee of Experts for a number of years, the Committee expressed its concern and urged the Government to take the necessary measures in the near future and with the assistance of the ILO to ensure the full application of the Convention, which had been ratified more than 50 years ago, and to report on the progress made.

Convention No. 5: Minimum Age (Industry), 1919

Bolivia (ratification: 1954). A Government representative stated that the provision of General Labour Act concerning the employment of children under 14 years of age as apprentices in workshops and other types of industrial undertakings, referred to situations of remunerated and supervised apprenticeship. The Act also provided that the apprentices could adequately follow training and educational courses. He added that his Government was prepared to receive ILO officials, in particular the Director of the International Standards Department, to exchange views, analyse the situation and study the measures that should be taken. This mission could be linked to the preparation of a revised Labour Code, due to be presented to the legislative authority soon, and to the future seminar in which government experts would participate. Thus, it would be possible to provide the right legal form for the somewhat outdated legislation in response to the request of the Committee of Experts concerning the application of this Convention. Likewise, a document clarifying matters concerning the situation of the employment of children would also be communicated to the ILO in the near future.

The Workers' members believed that the situation concerning the application of the Convention was serious, deplorable and sad. The Government representative had stated that his Government would welcome an ILO mission, organise a seminar and provide information. He had also stated that the General Labour Act was somewhat outdated and was about to be modified. The Workers' members recalled nevertheless that for the past 15 years the Government had been stating that it was going to modify the law, and that for the past 25 years the Committee of Experts had been stressing the need for modifying it; a direct contacts mission in 1973 had yielded no result. Consequently there had been no change in the situation. They underlined that under the Convention children under 14 years of age could not be employed as apprentices either, while the fact that they were remunerated, as stated by the Government representative, implied a definite contradiction as regards these apprentices. Given the seriousness of the situation they reiterated the need for real change in legislation and practice and not just vague promises.

The Employers' members stated that, from a legal and technical point of view, it was easy to modify the law as requested by the Committee of Experts. The texts in question were article 58 of the General Labour Act, which authorised the employment of children under 14 years of age as apprentices while Article 2 of the Convention did not allow for such an exception to the minimum age of 14 years, and the Presidential Decree of 21 September 1929, which authorised in some cases the employment of children under 14 years of age. The economic problems caused by the great poverty of the country were more pertinent than the technical and legal difficulties. Technical assistance was given to Bolivia in 1973 through a direct contacts mission, but no concrete steps had been taken. The Government had stated that the Presidential Decree had been implicitly superseded by other laws, but it was necessary to abrogate it explicitly and to give maximum publicity to this abrogation. In view of the seriousness of this situation and the fact that the Committee of Experts had been asking the same questions for 25 years without any change on the part of the Government, the Employers' members expressed their concern with this serious situation and requested the Government representative to indicate the intentions of his Government concerning the necessary changes and improvements.

Another Government representative stated that the situation was neither serious nor in contradiction of the present Convention. Article 58 of the General Labour Law had been implicitly abrogated with the ratification of Convention No. 105 which was incorporated in the legislation. This implicit abrogation was based on the principles that the new law supersedes the old law, and that the specific law had precedence over the general law. In addition, there were no complaints concerning a great number of children supposedly working as apprentices. Nevertheless the Government understood the need for more clarity in legal texts and hoped that the above-mentioned provision would be abrogated formally. The best way to do that was through the revision of the Labour Code since there was no purpose in making modifications of detail when a general reform was about to be undertaken. The draft Labour Code was now under examination by a study group consisting of three national experts and two ILO consultants, within a project financed by the UNDP. The study group has begun its work on 1 March 1988 and will finish it at the end of 1988. Subsequently, the project would be brought to the attention of the employers and workers' organisations. Finally, it would undergo legal processing. As regards the Presidential Decree of 1929, it was clearly abrogated by the 1942 General Labour Act and by the Minors' Code of 1973, which prohibited the employment of children under 14 years of age. In addition, the ILO was invited to participate at a national tripartite seminar, to be held probably in October 1988, where the modifications proposed by the Committee of Experts could be examined with reference to the Conventions ratified by Bolivia.

The Workers' members were grateful for that supplementary information and hoped that following the ILO's technical assistance and the seminar, which should be tripartite, prompt changes could be made in legislation and practice. The application of the Convention gave rise to serious concern, especially in view of the deplorable economic situation and the number of unemployed. Work should be given to adults rather than to children. They were dissatisfied with the perennial explanation that the provisions referred to by the Committee of Experts were implicitly abrogated. They requested the representative of the Secretary-General to provide details concerning the above-mentioned seminar.

The Employers' members also appreciated the supplementary information given by the Government representative. Now that he has clarified that the Government was engaged in a complete revision of the General Labour Act, and not only a partial reform, the request for ILO technical assistance should be welcomed. They stressed that the present legislation was in contradiction with the present Convention, and hoped that ILO assistance would yield concrete results that will bring the legislation into full conformity with the Convention, in contrast to the lack of progress after the direct contact mission in 1973.

The representative of the Secretary-General confirmed the statement by the Government representative concerning the UNDP-financed technical co-operation project in Bolivia for the total revision of the General Labour Act in the light of ILO standards. The draft General Labour Law should be completed by the end of 1988. He also stated that a Government representative of Bolivia had requested ILO assistance in organising a tripartite seminar, that this request had been accepted and that the modalities of the seminar were now subject to consultation.

The Workers' members stated that in the light of the latest information concerning technical co-operation and a seminar, it was now possible to hope for fundamental changes that would bring the legislation and practice into line with the Convention.

The Committee took note of the information provided by the Government representative. It noted with concern that there was no change for many years. It hoped that the Government would very soon take all necessary measures, with the assistance of the ILO, to eliminate existing legislative discrepancies and serious problems in practice, so as to ensure full application of the Convention. The Committee hoped that the current legislative review and the proposed tripartite seminar would permit progress to be achieved and that the Government would provide full information in this regard.

Brazil (ratification: 1934). The Government has communicated the following information:

In view of the contraventions concerning the work of under-14-year-olds in Brazilian industry, the labour inspectorate is expanding its services to ensure the application of provisions on the work of minors. The Government is communicating statistics on the numbers of minors covered by inspection in 1987 and the numbers in the formal sector, broken down by age and state of the Federation.

The labour inspectorate supervises the implementation of standards for the protection of minors relating to prohibition of night work, working time, and minimum wages.

The work of minors who are apprentices in the industrial sector is regulated by section 429 of the Consolidated Labour Laws, and that of those in the commercial sector by Law Decree No. 8622 of 10 January 1946.

A draft approved by the National Constituent Assembly and now being promulgated will raise the minimum age for work to 14 years (presently a minor is someone between 12 and 18 years, and work is prohibited for under-12-year-olds).

In addition a Government representative referred to the information supplied by his Government in its written communication. With regard to the Committee's observations concerning work by children of under 14 years of age in Brazilian industry, he assured the Committee that Brazil had strengthened the inspection services with the objective of fully observing the legal provisions relating to work by minors. In 1987, more than 500,000 minors were the subject of labour inspection. In this respect, his Government had submitted detailed statistical information to the Office. The work of the labour inspectorate was to verify the fulfilment of the protective standards relating to work by minors with respect to the prohibition of night work, the duration of the working day and minimum wages. The Constitution and labour legislation in Brazil prohibited night work by minors. No information regarding a violation of this prohibition had been reported. The hours of work for a minor were eight hours and the minor received the same wage as that of other workers. Exceptions were made in cases of apprenticeship.

The Brazilian law presently in force allowed for work by minors between the ages of 12 and 18 years and prohibited work to those less than 12 years of age. Work by minors between the ages of 12 and 14 years had to be appropriately adjusted to the physical condition and the presence of minors at school had to be guaranteed. He pointed out that most of the work of minors aged between 12 and 14 years was in family enterprises. In this respect the comments in the Committee of Experts' report should refer to the clothing industry and not the textile industry. Night work, work in unhealthy places and work dangerous to moral health was prohibited to minors. Minors were not allowed to work overtime except in cases fixed by collective agreements.

The Government representative highlighted that his country was in the final stages of elaborating a new Constitution which will include a provision raising the minimum age of work by minors to 14 years of age. Therefore this new constitutional text that would be promulgated in the next few weeks would be in accordance with the provisions of the present Convention.

The Workers' members noted that international associations had documented the existence of child labour in Brazil, in other words the proof existed. This practice not only included minors over 12 years of age but also those between six and 14 years of age, in all types of industrial enterprises. The Workers' members agreed with the Committee of Experts that they were not necessarily concerned with the legislation, but they were concerned with the practice. They noted that there was a need to strengthen inspection services. They stressed that the Committee of Experts, along with the other international and national organisations, needed to insist that an end be put to the situation of child labour in Brazil, even if this labour was remunerated.

The Employers' members noted that the Government representative had spoken a great deal about the legal situation in his country. However, the Committee of Experts had not called the legal situation into question; it was the practice and functioning of labour inspection which was questioned. They noted the information supplied by the Government and hoped that further information would continue to be supplied to the Committee of Experts. They hoped that as a result of various measures that would be taken, the ground would be prepared to improve this situation.

The Government representative stated that his Government recognised that verification was important. It was difficult to prevent the breaching of laws in certain cases. In concluding, he highlighted the fact that the new Constitution would be promulgated within the next few months and, therefore, the minimum age of 14 years would come into force.

The Committee noted the written and oral information given by the Government representative. It hopes that the Government will examine the situation in the light of comments of the Committee of Experts, and will take all appropriate measures such as labour inspection and tripartite consultation for the effective application of national provisions on minimum age, so as to ensure full compliance with the Convention, in legislation as well as in practice.

Poland (ratification: 1924). The Government has communicated the following information:

The Government's general remarks (see general observations) concerning the prospects of political and trade unions' pluralism in Poland with reference to the application of Convention No. 87 apply respectively to Convention No. 11.

Referring to its 1987 explanations, the Government states once again that individual farmers, members of their families, as well as persons directly connected with agriculture by the nature of their work can freely organise for defending their occupational and social interests. Farmers' organisations – in accordance with the Act of 8 October 1982 respecting the socio-occupational organisations of farmers – are the following: (1) agricultural circles, (2) circles of rural housewives, (3) agricultural branch associations, (4) unions of farmers, circles and agricultural organisations, and (5) unions of agricultural branch associations. These organisations, apart from their functions as regards representation of the needs and defence of the social and occupational interests of farmers, fulfil the other tasks which may be generally described as acting in favour of the development of individual agriculture. The Act of 8 October 1982 guarantees to these organisations the independence from the state administration organs, as well as state and social organisations, and the right to determine their own statutes and to act through democratically elected bodies, as well as the right to determine independently the scope and form of their activities – within the framework of the legal acts in force.

The observations of the Committee of Experts suggesting that the legislation imposes the only central organisation of rural workers in Poland do not take into account the fact that, although the National Federation of Farmers, Agricultural Circles and Agricultural Organisations is – in accordance with the 1982 Act – the central representation of individual farmers, such socio-occupational organisations of farmers as agricultural branch associations and unions of agricultural branch associations are not obliged to join this National Federation if they do not wish to do so. They can choose the other way of associating: an agricultural branch association may join the union of agricultural branch associations or a competent national branch union (section 26 of the Act) and unions of agricultural branch associations may join, or not join, the National Federation of Farmers, Agricultural Circles and Agricultural Organisations (section 32, para. 3). The other farmers' organisations are also entitled not to join the National Federation (section 33, para. 1, of the Act).

It should be also recalled that the socio-occupational organisations of farmers, which in accordance with the 1982 Act may join the National Federation of Farmers, Agricultural Circles and Agricultural Organisations, do not concern workers employed in the socialised sector of agriculture as well as in individual agriculture and members of productive co-operatives, who may join the competent trade unions acting in accordance with the Trade Union Act of 1982.

In addition, see Convention No. 87.

Convention No. 19: Equality of Treatment (Accident Compensation), 1925

Portugal (ratification: 1929). The Government has communicated the following information:

The 1976 Constitution of the Republic of Portugal guarantees in article 15 full equality of rights and duties for all individuals, irrespective of nationality.

In accordance with this principle of full equality, article 293 of the Constitution declares any previously existing legislation which is inconsistent with the Constitution to have been repealed. Such repeal flows, without any doubt, from the following: "Previously existing legislation ... remains in force provided it is not contrary to the Constitution or to the principles consecrated in it."

In this way, and owing to the overriding legal force which constitutional provisions necessarily possesses, this provision means that in Portugal foreign workers can receive no less favourable treatment than that received by workers who are Portuguese nationals.

Taking into account this new examination of the problem posed by the Committee of Experts' observations, official Portuguese bodies competent on the subject of compensation for employment injuries have been consulted. These were the General Labour Inspectorate and the National Insurance Institute (a body under the Ministry of Finance supervising the activities of insurance companies, through which protection against employment injury is still guaranteed, since this matter has not yet been transferred to the social security system, as reported earlier).

The General Labour Inspectorate, in the course of its systematic oversight of employment injuries, their consequences and compensation in respect of them, has not detected any exclusion of foreign workers employed in Portugal from the general scheme of protection provided for by Act No. 21/27 and the regulations issued under it (Decree No. 360/71).

With regard to the National Insurance Institute, it was corroborated that the staff lists which employers were required to send to the insurance companies with which they have employment injury insurance contracts for their workers had to contain the names of all persons in the employers' service, irrespective of the workers' nationality. Therefore, all workers, whether nationals or foreigners, enjoy the same social protection in case of employment injury.

With regard to the observation made concerning section III, paragraph 3, of Act No. 21/27, the Government considers that the apparent lack of conformity with Article 2 of the Convention is illusory. In fact, a foreign enterprise which does not "become national" by establishing an associated enterprise in accordance with Portuguese law, or by establishing a representative or an agency, may only engage in activities in Portugal on a temporary basis to execute a concrete and specified type of work. If it "becomes national", it is subject to the same duties and rights as a national enterprise.

By contrast, the conditions under which it operates are temporary in character and lack a continuous nature. Therefore, the compensation scheme for employment injury (provided for in section III, paragraph 3, of Act No. 21/27), to which all foreign workers are subject, and for which the enterprise and the country are responsible, is in conformity with Article 2 of the Convention.

As a matter of fact, the guarantee of compensation for all foreigners, except for those having entitlements under the law of their own country, produces the same effect as guaranteeing the compensation to be paid, without prejudice to there being a special agreement applying the legislation of the country in which the enterprise is established.

In addition, a Government representative spoke of the written communications sent by his Government to the present session of the Conference and his agreement with the principle that modifications to bring law into compliance with ratified Conventions should be done explicitly and not tacitly. Nevertheless the law in his country permitted implicit abrogation, and the 1976 Constitution which took precedence over ordinary law, abrogated all earlier law which was contrary to its provisions and principles. In practice, therefore, the provisions of Act No. 21/27 of 1965 on industrial accidents had clearly been abrogated by the Constitution. Legislative modifications were within the competence of Parliament and was outside the jurisdiction of the Government. Nevertheless, it could not be ruled out that when accident compensation was integrated into a unified social security system, the provisions would be modified to make them compatible with the Convention as well as with their obligations deriving from his country's membership of the European Communities.

The Employers' members noted that certain discrepancies still existed between the law and the provisions of the Convention. Even if Constitutional provisions took precedence over ordinary legislation, the necessity to bring into conformity legislation with the Convention still remained. According to provisions of the 1965 law on industrial accidents, mentioned in the report of the Committee of Experts, certain foreign workers were still excluded from its scope. The Government had supplied written information on the subject, however clarification of the law was still needed. The provisions of community law provided complementary protection to citizens of member States of the European Communities, but the provisions in questions were obviously of importance to workers from other States. The Government must clarify what the situation is in practice.

The Workers' members stated that according to the General Confederation of Portuguese Workers (CGTP) it was possible that the provisions of the Convention (which was of interest to all citizens of member States who had ratified it) could be applied in full, but that the will to adopt the necessary provisions was lacking. They hoped that this question would be resolved and stressed the value of tripartite consultations.

The Worker member for Portugal agreed with the statement made by her Government that the provisions of Act No. 21/27, Article III, which was the subject of observations by the Committee of Experts, could be considered as abrogated by the Constitution. There remained, however, the need to draw up regulations for the implementation of Act No. 28, 1984, to give full effect to the Convention. After four years' delay a commission to draw up these regulations had still not been set up. The Government must assure the workers' and employers' organisations of their right to participate as has been provided by the law. She hoped that measures would be taken to integrate accident compensation into the social security system.

The Government representative, stressing that practice did conform with the provisions of the Convention, added that a draft Social Security Code had almost been finished and that the social partners would be consulted on this subject at the permanent council for tripartite consultation.

The Committee noted the written and oral explanations supplied by the Government. Since the comments of the Committee of Experts referred to specific discrepancies in the relevant national legislation, the Committee hoped that the Government will re-examine the position and will take appropriate measures to ensure full conformity with the Convention, in legislation as well as in practice.

Convention No. 20: Night Work (Bakeries), 1925

Chile (ratification: 1933). A Government representative stated that shortly following ratification of the Convention, the pertinent regulations had been approved (Nos. 445 of 1936, 739 of 1937 and 276 of 1947), some of which had been repealed on the occasion of the promulgation of the new Labour Code in 1987. His Government had examined the Committee of Experts' comments in relation to this Convention. In conformity with Article 2, which stipulated that States should consult employers' and workers' organisations, tripartite consultations had been initiated with the aim of drawing up the pertinent regulations.

The Employers' members recalled that this Convention provided for adequate night rest of a certain length and during certain hours for workers employed in bakeries. As the Committee of Experts had noted, workers' organisations, in communications which had been transmitted to the Government in December 1987, had complained that rules providing for such rest were lacking in Chile. The Government representative had stated that the long process of drawing up a new Labour Code had recently been completed. The Employers' members did not know whether the requirements of the Convention were satisfied thereby. The Government representative had also said that tripartite negotiations had begun on this subject and that the Government's next report would refer to it. This was the right approach. If laws or bills existed, the Committee of Experts should have the opportunity to review them so that the situation could be re-examined in the Conference Committee if necessary. The Employers' members were certain that the Government would provide the required information and they hoped that the substantive problem would be resolved.

The Workers' members noted that although the ILO Governing Body had characterised this Convention as obsolete, the topic of night work was on the agenda of the International Labour Conference in 1989. The fact remained that this Convention still existed and Chile had ratified it. It should therefore be applied. In addition, an organisation had complained of the legislative void. The protection of workers in small enterprises such as bakeries was essential. They hoped that the Government's promise would become reality by next year.

The Committee noted the information given by the Government representative. In the observation made by the Committee of Experts, reference had been made to comments received from organisations of bakery workers according to which the Convention had not been given effect for several years. The Committee hoped that the Government would examine the situation with a view to taking appropriate measures to give effect to the Convention and would provide information in this regard.

Convention No. 29: Forced Labour, 1930

Bahamas (ratification: 1976). The Government has communicated the following information:

No amendment to the Prison Rules along the lines indicated by the Committee of Experts has yet been made. The Office will be informed of any changes in due course. General orders (governing the public service) provide for the police and others employed by the State to leave with one month's notice. The Government will endeavour to send a copy. Even if a public servant left without notice, no action against him would be taken.

Central African Republic (1960) See under Convention No. 105

In addition a Government representative stated that his country was aware of the necessity to bring its law and practice in conformity with the provisions of ratified Conventions. That was why the Government had never hesitated to give the requested information so that the efforts that were being made were recognised. He recalled that the ordinances which were the subject of the observations by the Committee of Experts had been adopted at a time when executive and legal powers were totally concentrated in the hands of the Emperor. During this period ordinances were adopted by force of law. These texts had since become null and void and were no longer applied. Although they were not yet abrogated formally his Government was attending to this. The 1960 law concerning rural development had never introduced forced labour. It was simply a means by which the Government assured a technical support structure to cultivators in order to supply them with the basic services which would help them increase their production.

The Workers' members, while understanding the difficulties that the country had gone through, its instabilities and the necessary restructuring, noted however that for many years the Committee of Experts had not received any information on the application of this basic Convention, or any indication that these former provisions, which permitted direct or indirect forced labour, had been abrogated or replaced. In regard to the observations concerning the law on the development of the rural economy, the Government indicated that it was a matter of assuring technical support to agricultural workers. In the field of agriculture, it should be noted that compulsory cultivation had been imposed on the local community. The Workers' members would like, therefore, to have clarification as quickly as possible in regard to those questions which had been dealt with in the Committee for some time. The Government should supply information which would indicate whether the present Convention was being applied fully. ILO assistance might be able to clarify this situation.

The Employers' members stated that the application of this Convention had been discussed since 1966, and it was apparent that a whole series of laws did not conform to the Convention. Two categories of provisions were concerned: legislation concerning the elimination of idleness, and provisions concerning minimum surfaces for cultivation. For several years the Government had indicated that provisions would be adopted and the Committee of Experts had referred to these possible provisions since 1966. The report of the Committee of Experts had not mentioned any changes since 1966 and this should be noted in the report of the present Committee.

The Government representative stated that his Government had always hoped that the ILO would be able to give aid in regard to the draft texts concerning the issues raised and indeed this assistance had taken place. In order that the Committee would be better able to understand the situation, he explained the legislative procedure which had been introduced by the new Constitution. The National Assembly, which was elected in July 1987, had adopted certain urgent texts, in particular the investment code, the law on small and medium-sized enterprises, and the law on freedom of association and the protection of trade union rights. The Government was ready to accept the assistance of ILO in all matters. In regard to idleness, a draft text had been sent to the National Assembly and should be examined in the near future.

The Workers' members commented that the manner in which laws were drawn up and voted upon showed the responsibility of the authorities of the country. However, ILO assistance should be requested before the laws are adopted so that they are effective from the beginning and conform with ratified Conventions.

The Committee took note of the information provided by the Government representative as well as the written information which had been communicated by the Government. The Committee had examined this case on many occasions and had noted considerable divergencies between the Convention and the legislation and practice in the Central African Republic. The Committee noted with regret that considerable difficulties still remained. The Committee hoped that the Government would in the near future take all necessary measures, with the assistance of the ILO if appropriate, to comply fully with its obligations under Convention No. 29. The Committee hoped that the next report would show that real progress had been made.

Pakistan (ratification: 1957). A Government representative indicated that the latest position of his Government was stated in its most recent report to the Committee of Experts. He reiterated that the Essential Services (Maintenance) Act, 1952, was being retained by way of enabling provisions to be applied in cases of emergency to essential services only. The Government was strictly following a policy of minimum reliance on the provisions of this Act. Some of the industrial units which had been operating under this Act had been removed from its purview and this process of review was continuous. There was no shortage of skilled or unskilled labour in Pakistan, so the Government was under no economic compulsion to keep an employee in forced employment against his will. In actual practice, voluntary termination of employment at three months' notice had never been restricted. As regards the Committee of Experts' comments relating to the alleged use of bonded labour, his Government had unequivocally stated in its report that no labour camps were allowed to operate anywhere in Pakistan. Any attempts to employ forced labour resulted in prosecution under the law.

The Workers' members observed that the explanations of the Government representative were disappointing because they were identical to the ones given at preceding sessions. At its last session, the Committee had decided to mention this case in a special paragraph of its report in the hope that the Government would be able to provide more detailed information on some of the questions. They pointed out that in this year's report, the Committee of Experts referred to the 1986 ILO Sectoral Review Mission and its conclusions which were in contradiction to the Government's statements. The Workers' members observed that the explanations given by the Government representative were disappointing and did not enable the Committee to note progress.

The Employers' members stated that the indications provided by the Government representative were in strange opposition to the long history of this case. For more than 30 years, certain laws in Pakistan prohibited workers from terminating their employment without the employers' consent. This was tantamount to forced labour without any doubt. Furthermore, those laws applied to a wide sector of the public service including public enterprises. This was what the Committee of Experts had observed. It was necessary to modify these laws and this Committee had already stated that it was not enough to hear every year statements that the practice in Pakistan was different from the law, that there was enough labour available and that the worker could leave his employment at three months' notice. If this were true, one should write it into the legislation and thus, the situation would be clearer, but, on the contrary, there had been no change in the situation and the statements by the Government of Pakistan became increasingly stereotyped. Moreover, the Government's comments gave no reply to the question of the Committee of Experts regarding the use of forced labour in the construction of canals or dams. The Employers' members shared the Workers' members' views and expressed their disappointment at this lack of progress.

The Government representative replied that his brief statement had virtually covered all the points raised by the Committee of Experts. The Government did not resort to the Essential Services (Maintenance) Act at all, it was only being kept by way of enabling provisions on the statute book for meeting emergency requirements only. He reiterated that the Government was following a policy of minimum reliance on the provisions of this Act, and that a committee instituted by the Government was reviewing all the 18 establishments covered by this Act. During a recent review, five establishments had been removed from the scope of this Act, so only a very negligible minority of workers were covered by it. As there was no shortage of labour in Pakistan, the Government was under no economic compulsion to keep an employee in forced employment against his will. The speaker emphatically reiterated that labour camps and bonded labour did not exist and were prohibited by law, and that any attempt to use forced labour would result in prosecution. The report of the Committee of Experts was based only on allegations, and there was no substantive evidence on the existence of labour camps in Pakistan.

The Workers' members noted that the present Committee was now in a very difficult situation, because the declaration of the Government representative of Pakistan was in contradiction with the observations of the Committee of Experts which corresponded to the findings of the ILO mission. These had not been discussed in any detail by the Government representative. It was not sufficient simply to have a declaration from the Government that these conclusions were incorrect. The Workers' members reiterated the very great importance they attached to the indications concerning the use of bonded labour in "Kharkar" camps in paragraph 2 of the observations, which could not be dismissed by simple denial. The situation remained unsatisfactory. For the last two sessions, the Conference Committee had decided to mention this case in a special paragraph. Perhaps it was time to think what different measures were required to urge the Government to make progress on this matter in the future.

The Committee noted the explanations given by the Government representative. As the main issues raised had been repeatedly discussed previously, the Committee again expressed its serious concern and urged the Government to take very shortly the necessary measures to put its legislation and practice into conformity with the Convention, and to supply the detailed information requested by the Committee of Experts. The Committee decided to mention this case in a special paragraph of its general report.

Romania (ratification: 1957). A Government representative said that he could only repeat, in a more explicit manner, what the Government had stated on many occasions in reply to the questions raised by the Committee of Experts. This had also been the case last year in the Conference Committee. For this reason he did not agree that the Government did not communicate with the Committee of Experts. In the first place, he stated that Act No. 24 respecting the recruitment and placement of labour and Act No. 25 respecting the assignment of able-bodied persons to useful work, both of 1976, could not be considered to be legislation imposing an obligation to work, under the menace of penalties, on all able-bodied citizens. Under the provisions of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (Article 8, paragraph 3(f), and of Convention No. 29 (Article 2, paragraph 2(b), work or service which form part of the normal civic obligations of the citizens of a fully self-governing country could not be considered to be forced labour. In Romania, the right to work and the general duty to work were basic constitutional principles of the State. Since the exploitation of one human being by another had been abolished long ago, work which represented an honourable duty for every able-bodied citizen had become the sole source of existence for all social classes and for the full expression of each individual. These principles were enshrined in a more detailed manner in the Labour Code, which provided as follows in section 1, paragraph (2): "The workers, both as producers of material and spiritual values and as owners of the means of production and the whole national wealth, have a right and a duty to engage in a type of work that is useful to society, since the welfare and interests of each are linked organically with the welfare and development of society as a whole". Section 6 provided: "Any form of appropriation of another's labour and all manifestations of social parasitism are prohibited as being incompatible with the socialist system and with socialist ethical principles and equity". In his country, there was no work without bread and no bread without work. Therefore the provisions of the 1976 Acts did not have forced labour as their purpose; rather they were a means of encouraging and helping certain able-bodied persons carry out their elementary civic duties. Moreover, the provisions of Act No. 25 governed the placement of individuals living at the expense of other persons – social parasites to whom work had been offered many times; these provisions contained a message of education and prevention for those who found themselves in such situations. Secondly, refusal to report at the workplace indicated by the court was never followed by sanctions; no coercive measure was taken in regard to the persons concerned. In the 12 years since the application of those Acts, there had been no case of a person being subject to a penalty. Thus there was no obligation to work under menace of a penalty. In the third place, a person falling within the scope of Act No. 25 who accepted placement in a workplace indicated by the court had to conclude a contract of employment with the employer. This voluntary act by the two parties was governed by section 64 of the Labour Code, as follows: "Appointment is effected by the formulation of a written individual contract of employment". Signing this contract was a voluntary act, without any obligation. No legislative provision in Romania required a person to conclude a contract of employment. In the fourth place, a contract of employment, once concluded, was governed by section 135 of the Labour Code, which provided that the contract could be terminated on the initiative of the person employed. Thus a person who was subject to Act No. 25 could freely leave the enterprise the day after the contract had been signed. The Government was presenting these arguments following consultations with the Legislative Council, the Central Council of the General Confederation of Romanian Trade Unions and the division of managers of economic units in the Chamber of Commerce and Industry. Acts Nos. 24 and 25 of 1976 did not violate the spirit of the Convention. On the contrary, they contributed to ensuring full employment and facilitated, by purely educational means, the incorporation in useful work of persons who, in increasingly rare cases, were still straying from the Government's general principles on life and society. Nevertheless, since the cases which were the subject of this Convention had become increasingly rare – in 1987, for example, there were only 23 cases – the Government had reached the conclusion to propose in the legislative programme for the next period the revision of these two Acts, in the light of the observations made by the Committee of Experts. The Government representative reaffirmed his Government's openness to dialogue and stated that he would inform the Government again of the opinions expressed by the Committee of Experts on this issue.

The Workers' members with the Worker member of the United States as their spokesman in this case recalled the background of the observation made by the Committee of Experts, which had appeared consistently since 1985. By virtue of Acts Nos. 24 and 25 of 1976, read together, all able-bodied people over 16 years of age who were not in training or otherwise gainfully employed were obliged to register and be placed in employment and to present themselves for the employment at the workplace assigned. Measures of persuasion were provided for; if refusal to take up employment was persistent, a court order could compel the persons to take up a specific post which they could not leave before one year, under menace of sanctions. The Government had repeated that in fact these sanctions were not enforced; if that were the case, then the legislation requiring it should be repealed. The Committee of Experts simply did not share the Government's view that this situation involved performance of a normal civic obligation under Article 2, paragraph 2, of the present Convention. Referring to paragraph 45 of the 1979 general survey of the Committee of Experts, the Workers' members noted that this exception must be strictly interpreted; it had a much more limited scope than that suggested by the Government and could not be invoked to justify resort to forms of service or compulsory labour contrary to the present Convention. The Government representative had contradicted himself by saying that the sanctions were not invoked but that there were about 23 cases still pending. The Government representative had, however, also said that amendments would be proposed soon to comply with the Committee of Experts' observations. This was a new development which had long been lacking. If this were a true promise of remedial action, it was desirable to have a more detailed assurance from the Government.

The Employers' members corrected their earlier remark with regard to an absence of discussion; that had referred to 1986, not 1987. Regarding the present Convention, they reviewed the provisions of the two Acts cited by the Committee of Experts. The Government representative had mentioned the right to work, which was seen at the same time as an obligation to work. As long as that was considered a moral obligation, the Employers' members could accept it. But where that moral obligation was made binding in law, it became forced labour, and it remained forced labour when words from the animal kingdom – such as parasites – were used to describe people. All societies had problems with certain individuals, but the Employers' members questioned whether they should be solved through forced labour. The Committee of Experts had repeatedly observed that the legislation referred to provided for forced labour and therefore had to be amended. If there were no violation of the Convention, the Government would not be considering the possibility of amending or revising the legislation. Since the statement to this effect had been expressed perhaps somewhat more cautiously than usual, the Employers' members requested a clearer statement of whether the Government was indeed prepared to revise and amend the provisions.

The Government representative reiterated that there was no obligation to work. The duty to work was a general civic duty. No sanctions were applied; all measures were educational in nature. The Government had been repeating these arguments but the Committee of Experts had not understood them. It was for this reason that amendments were being considered. The Ministry of Labour, the Ministry of Justice and the Legislative Council, with the agreement of the workers' end employers' organisations, had decided to propose placing the matter of revising this legislation on the agenda for the next Five-Year Plan.

The Workers' members agreed with the statement made by the Worker member of the United States and the Employers' members. They thought that the Government's reply was still too nebulous. Year after year there had been a clear violation of the Convention. Civic duties could not be invoked for imposing any sort of employment whatsoever; they had to be construed in a much more limited manner. The argument that the other social partners were in accord carried no weight in the face of violations. They hoped that the Government truly desired to bring legislation and practice into conformity with the Convention ratified. They asked for a more specific statement on that point and hoped the Committee would have the occasion to review the situation at next year's Conference.

The Workers' members with the Worker member of United States continuing as their spokesman agreed that a clear commitment to remedial action by way of repeal or amendment had not been forthcoming from the Government. Its statement had been vague. The Committee of Experts' observation in this case, which involved a very important Convention, had been clear and decisive. Unfortunately, the Government representative had gone back to saying that these were civic duties, not compulsory labour. There had been no assurance or indication that the Government accepted the Committee of Experts' conclusion that the legislation was incompatible with the Convention. The Workers' members had hoped for the Government's promise that it would re-examine the matter. The Committee of Experts' conclusion on the matter had been unequivocal. Everyone lauded the principle of full employment, but it had to be freely chosen and not forced at the expense of penal sanctions. In the absence of assurances by the Government, the Workers' members considered that this case deserved to be noted in a special paragraph as a matter of extreme importance.

The Government member of Bulgaria thanked the Government representative of Romania for the clarifications he had provided. The Government representative has stated that in practice these provisions were not applied. The Government representative had also said that a revision of the legislation was envisaged so as to remove the possibility of forced labour. These statements had demonstrated the Romanian Government's willingness to engage in a dialogue which should be continued.

The Employers' members agreed with the Workers' members that it was in line with their arguments that the case should be mentioned in a special paragraph, given the lack of progress up to now, but the conclusions should also express the hope that in future, the improvements which had been under discussion for so long could appear in the report of the Committee of Experts.

The Government member of the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic stated that, having listened to various viewpoints expressed, he thought that the role of labour and the attitude towards labour as a social value in the eyes of the legislature were involved here. In contrast to other speakers, his Government believed that the statement made by the Romanian Government had given reason to believe that there would be a revision of their legislation. Before considering a special paragraph, there should be a reconciliation of views based on a constructive dialogue.

The Workers' members said they had just heard two statements that were much clearer than the reply first given by the Government. They called upon the Government representative to restate his position and to report to his Government that legislative changes were necessary and that they should be acted upon.

The Government representative repeated that the conclusion had been reached that a repeal or an amendment of the laws referred to should be proposed and would be proposed for the legislative programme in the five-year period coming up. This conclusion had been reached not only because of observations by the Committee of Experts, but also in light of analysis done by the Ministry of Labour, the Ministry of Justice and other bodies. He thought that this provided a clear reply.

The Worker member of the United States, speaking on behalf of the Workers' members, said that that was the sort of definitive assurance that he had been hoping to hear. The Workers' members wanted the Committee's conclusions to reflect the assurance that amendments would be sought and that a discussion would take place in the Committee next year. On this condition, they were willing to withdraw the request for a special paragraph.

The Committee noted the indications provided by the Government representative and the discussion that had taken place. The Committee noted that important divergencies continued to exist between legislation and practice and the Convention. It noted the Government's assurance that the legislation referred to is to be re-examined in the light of the comments of the Committee of Experts and urged the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure compliance with the Convention and to supply full and timely information on the action taken so that it could be considered next year.

The Government representative wished the record to reflect that the promise made was based on legal obligations in his country. He had stated that the legislative programme would be for the years 1991 to 1995. Thus next year he would only be able to give a reply concerning proposals for amendments. In his country it was not possible to include the revision of a law in the legislative programme from one year to the next.

Convention No. 55: Shipowners' Liability (Sick and Injured Seamen), 1936

Panama (ratification: 1971). The Government sent the following information:

As regards Article 8 of the Convention requiring the shipowner to safeguard the property left on board by sick, injured or deceased persons, the Government states that the draft maritime labour legislation referred to in its previous report has not been approved, not through any fault of the Government, but rather because of objections raised firstly by the employers and then by the workers. At the present time this draft law is undergoing study by the Legislative Branch. Nevertheless, faced with this situation, the Government has, over the last few years, been adopting ways of finding individual solutions for each of the maritime Conventions ratified.

Thus, for the present Convention, the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare has carried out the relevant negotiations with the Ministry of Finance and Treasury, which has jurisdiction over the National Merchant Marine, so that the necessary measures will be adopted shortly to enable the ships' captains to fulfil the obligation to protect the property left on board by a sick, injured or deceased worker. In due course, the government will supply information on the outcome of these negotiations and on the measures which will have been adopted in this connection.

As regards the inspection measures required on ships flying the Panamanian flag under Act No. 39 of 8 July 1976, the Government states that Executive Decree No. 56 of 8 October 1976, which sets out the regulations under this Act, provides in section 1, subsection 2, that: "In addition, the environmental, hygienic and working conditions of crews shall be determined in accordance with the international Conventions ratified by the Government of the Republic of Panama".

This provision clearly stipulates the practical implementation of inspections in accordance with the application of ratified ILO Conventions, including Convention No. 55. According to this new system the inspection relates not only to the application of the above-mentioned Convention but also to all other aspects of the standards quoted. Its implementation is obligatory for all ships inscribed in the register.

In addition, a Government representative stated that the Government had unfortunately not been able to report any progress in relation to the present Convention. As the Committee of Experts had observed in its report, the tripartite maritime labour commission had been reactivated with a view to resolving the main points contained in the draft Maritime Labour Law, which had been drawn up with ILO assistance in 1981. She referred to the difficulties this draft had faced in an attempt to have it approved as a whole. She underlined that the Government had made serious efforts to continue addressing each point which involved a conflict with the Convention. The Government recognised the importance of the Convention and it expressed the hope that the tripartite commission, which had suspended its work for a year, would resume it shortly. The Government representative referred to the tense political situation and the economic crisis the country was undergoing; the Government had asked the Director-General to send an ILO expert mission to provide assistance in seeking ways out of the crisis which the country was facing, without diminishing existing labour conditions. She stated that the Government had seen the need for adopting emergency legal measures to supervise and watch over the observance of the most important labour provisions. Given the current situation in the country, the appropriate conditions did not exist to devote attention to, and renew the examination of, the maritime matters in question. The Government promised that once the country had returned to a more normal situation, the examination of the pending subjects would be resumed.

The Employers' members noted that the Government representative's brief, clear statement had not tried to make things appear better than they were; still, the situation was far from satisfactory. In relation to shipowners' obligations towards seafarers in the case of disease or accident as provided by the Convention, there were still many gaps in the national legislation. The Government had been asked to fill these gaps for many years now. The tripartite procedure being used was welcome, but it had not yet led to any conclusions. In view of the large number of ships which flew the Panamanian flag, the questions in abeyance had to be resolved soon. In reference to the political and other difficulties the Government representative had mentioned, the Employers' members hoped that the crisis would be a passing one and that after its resolution, progress could be seen. They regretted the lack of progress and requested the Government to do everything in its power to ensure that the necessary changes could be made in the legislation.

The Worker member of Argentina recalled that the ILO had been dealing with Panama's failure to meet its obligations in the maritime field for 40 years. He referred to an ILO publication on the general boycott of Panamanian vessels which had been called in 1948. More recently, France had lodged a complaint against Panama which had been suspended by an agreement providing for ILO technical assistance which had been supplied. Year after year, the Conference Committee dealt with the Government's failure to meet its obligations under maritime Conventions. Convention No. 55 was a fundamental one for seafarers. The arguments presented were not sufficient; the case should be treated in an appropriate paragraph so as to draw the necessary attention to it. The situation was deteriorating. Everyone knew what resort to flags of convenience meant: avoidance of obligations in an effort to avoid expenses. Under flag of convenience registration, there was no link between the vessel and nationality. Other Governments had had to step in to help crews which had been abandoned by flag of convenience States, including by Panama. The numerous violations of the Convention had to be remedied.

The Workers' members supported the remarks of the Workers' member of Argentina. Maritime questions in relation to Panama had been a concern of the Conference Committee for some time. Perhaps next year there could be a paragraph listing countries which for a certain number of years had repeated their promises to change their labour code or which had stated that they had a tripartite committee working on a matter. The obligations laid down by this Convention, to provide coverage against sickness and accidents, were extremely important for seafarers who found themselves in a weak position far from home. In spite of the country's political difficulties, the tripartite commission mentioned by the Government representative could continue to do preparatory work to ensure that it would not be long before the legislation was brought into line with the Convention. They insisted that this be done quickly because of the importance of Panama's merchant fleet. This problem had gone on for too long and they hoped that a special effort could be made to resolve it.

The Government representative thanked the Workers' member of Argentina for his historical review. Panama had requested the ILO's assistance in drawing up a draft maritime labour code. The fact that it had not been adopted did not mean that the Government had failed to take action. The Government had wished to preserve the tripartite mechanism by conducting discussions with the social partners. When the legislation was first introduced, it encountered resistance among employers; when it was introduced a second time, the workers had found certain points they wished to have ironed out. The tripartite commission had been established to reconcile these views. The Government had done more than make promises; the Conference Committee had noted progress in maritime legislation. The speaker mentioned in particular the measures in relation to officers' certificates of capacity, which had involved a lot of money and work to put into place. The Government would continue to take steps forward. She had not mentioned the country's difficulties as a pretext, but merely to provide a description of the current situation.

The Committee noted the written and oral information supplied by the Government and the difficulties encountered. As provisions to apply several Articles of the Convention had not yet been adopted, no progress could be registered in the application of this Convention and the Committee hoped that the Government would soon take appropriate measures to give full effect to the Convention and would report next year on the progress made.

Liberia (ratification: 1960). A Government representative for Liberia in reply to the Committee of Experts' observation concerning the necessity to bring the new draft Labour Code into conformity with Article 1, paragraph 2; Article 2, paragraphs 1 and 3; and Article 6, paragraph 2(d) of the present Convention, reported that the competent authority had, after taking note of the Committee of Experts' comments, decided not to adopt the Code until it had been re-examined by the ILO and the necessary adjustments made to bring it into conformity with the Convention. To this end, the Director-General had been requested in a letter dated 13 June 1988 to send a direct contacts mission.

The Employers' members reminded the Committee that this particular case had now been under discussion for 22 years and that during that time the Government had repeatedly spoken of a new draft Labour Code which would amend current legislation. This year, once again, the Committee of Experts had indicated in its report that the same problems remain unresolved. Furthermore, the Employers' members noted another discrepancy between the draft Labour Code and the Convention concerning coastal shipping. Given the large number of ships which this legislation affected they insisted, that after such a long time, the relevant legislation be amended. They hoped that the direct contacts mission would be carried out quickly so that these outstanding questions could be finally settled.

The Workers' members, in agreement with the Employers' members, insisted that the adoption of the new Labour Code, which had been promised years ago, should not be further postponed. Liberia was responsible for a large number of ships and it was important that the draft Labour Code, which should comply with the Convention, be adopted. They urged Liberia to make good use of the direct contacts mission and the assistance of the ILO to resolve the remaining problems so that next year the matter would be finally settled.

The Government representative assured the present Committee that everything would be done by his Government to ensure that legislation would comply with all the ratified Conventions.

The Worker member of the United States, on behalf of the Worker member of Liberia, who was not present, welcomed the fact that a direct contacts mission would take place.

The Committee took note of the information supplied by the Government representative and hoped that the Government would be able, with the assistance of the ILO, to adopt in the near future provisions to give full effect to the Convention on the points raised for many years by the Committee of Experts and to indicate progress in its next report.

Convention No. 68: Food and Catering (Ships' Crews), 1946

Peru (ratification: 1962). The Government has communicated the following information:

The collective agreements provided in 1987 were concluded between the Association of Peruvian Shipowners and the Peruvian Federation of Seafarers. In accordance with Peruvian legislation, "seafarers" means those who show they have satisfactorily completed the corresponding training course organised by the National Merchant Marine School as well as the Training, Qualification and Watchkeeping for Seafarers Standards and obtained the boarding document from the maritime authorities (section B-030308 and following of the Captaincy and Marine, River and Lake Activities Regulations). Thus, the collective agreements in question only apply to ordinary seafarers, since officers are covered by other collective agreements.

The above-mentioned Regulations, approved by Supreme Decree No. 02-87-MA of 9 April 1987, brought the Peruvian maritime legislation up to date and regulate the organisation, jurisdiction and functions of the maritime authority in maritime, river and lake activities in Peru and the supervision of activities in navigable waters, as well as personnel and material questions in the national merchant marine, fishing and water sports; maritime labour and similar activities; protection of the marine environment and its resources and wealth; safety of life at sea and on navigable rivers and lakes, safety and supervision of ports and docks; and the struggle against smuggling and other illegal activities within its competence. It also decides on administrative procedures for the investigation of damage or accidents to ships or persons, damage to cargo and contamination of waters.

The Regulations are obviously wide-ranging and comprehensive and they include the working conditions of seafarers on board ship.

As regards the Convention, the Regulations deal with the quantity and quality of food and catering on board ship and the right of crew members to make complaints to the competent authorities in respect of the quality and quantity of food provided on board. Yet there are some gaps and some unclear provisions in the Regulations which are being studied in detail by those concerned with a view to amending them.

Legislation dealing specifically with food and catering on board ship is envisaged.

Besides this, Parliament is studying a law to regulate working conditions of seafarers on board ship. Further, the present Committee should be informed that a tripartite seminar is taking place in Peru this month with participation of all professional maritime organisations in order to lay the foundations for working conditions on board ship.

In addition, a Government representative stated that, with respect to the observations made by the Committee of Experts on the necessity to adopt legislation on food and catering arrangements and to establish a labour inspection system, two legal provisions existed. The first, Supreme Decree No. 012-77-SA of October 1977, contained rules concerning the approval by the Ministry of Health for water for human consumption and the periodic control of equipment. As well, it set out the rules which must be observed in the supply, storage and handling of food. The other legal provision which covered ships' crews was the Captaincy Rules issued in 1987 which were intended to bring into conformity national legislation with ratified Conventions, including the present Convention. These rules specified that before ships set sail verification must be made that, according to the route, time of year, duration of the voyage and other foreseeable factors, sufficient supplies were on board. They also established the responsibilities of the administration. In regard to the establishment of an inspection system, the rules also required periodic inspection. Inspectors must record any deficiencies found, and these would be subject to sanctions. The rules also established the right of ships' crews if they numbered no less than one-third, to protest against the quantity and quality of the food supplied to them to the Maritime or Consular Authorities. The directorate of the Captaincy would take into consideration the comments made by the sectors affected by the rules so that any necessary modifications could be made. The Maritime Authorities had stated that with respect to the observations made by the Committee of Experts, that one of the issues which would be completed would be the supply of food and catering services. In conclusion, the Government representative stated that studies were being carried out with the aim of eventually enacting a law which would regulate the working conditions of ships' crews and that assistance in this matter had been requested from the ILO.

The Employers' members stated that collective agreements were also a means of applying the Convention, but what needed to be known was who were covered by these agreements. They asked if in Peru there existed the possibility to extend collective agreements by national legislation. They thought that the legal texts which had been referred to should be communicated to the ILO in order that they could be examined for any shortcomings and the means by which these could be overcome. They hoped that in the next report the Government would reply to the observations made by the trade unions in regard to the application of this Convention.

The Workers' members associated themselves with the comments made by the Employers' members. They remarked that this case had been discussed in 1983, 1984 and 1986, and that it had been the subject of a special paragraph in 1984. They hoped that the law to which the Government representative had referred would be enacted as quickly as possible and that the information requested from the Government, especially on the points raised by the Peruvian trade unions, would be sent as quickly as possible to the ILO.

The Worker member of Argentina expressed his agreement with the remarks made by the Workers' members' spokesman. He stressed the importance that food supplies and catering arrangements had for seafarers given the nature of their work which obliged them to live away from their families for long periods of time. He asked the Government representative to urge her Government to undertake the necessary legislative measures to fulfil the provisions of the present Convention.

The Government representative stated that her Government recognised that the provisions of the Convention had not been fully complied with, but that they were endeavouring to bring into conformity all legislation with the provisions of international Conventions. She referred to the problems that arose when responsibilities were shared with other sectors; in the present case the Ministry of Defence of which depends also the Merchant Navy. In reply to the Employers' members on the question of collective agreements, she stated that collective agreements which applied to ships' crews members had been sent to the ILO; those which applied to officers would be sent shortly.

The Committee takes note of the detailed written and oral information supplied by the Government. As pointed out in the observation of the Committee of Experts, laws or regulations should be adopted to give effect to several Articles of the Convention. The indications given by the Government show that the regulations adopted in 1987 do not meet all these requirements, especially since the case was discussed for many years. The Committee hopes that the Government will take all necessary measures in the near future, with the assistance of the ILO, and supply full information in this respect.

Bahamas (ratification: 1976). The Government has communicated the following information:

The Government has recently completed review of labour legislation on several subjects where drafting should be done soon (severance pay, unpaid dismissals, domestic service). A law on maternity protection has been enacted. It is envisaged that legislation dealing with problems of labour inspection can be considered next: proposals are made by the Labour Department, considered by the Tripartite Joint Advisory Committee, then Cabinet, before being sent for drafting. The comments of the Committee of Experts will be taken into consideration in this process.

Copies of annual reports on labour inspection will be made available to the ILO. Publication is proving difficult because of printing costs.

Italy (ratification: 1952). The Government has communicated the following information:

Following the comments made by the Committee of Experts, the Government has conveyed to the ILO the documentation which constitutes a partial reply to the observations of the Committee concerning the present Convention.

In addition, a Government representative stated that at the outset of this Conference, the Government had provided the Office with the documentation which the Committee of Experts had requested concerning the application of the Convention. Detailed information was contained in the 1987 annual general report on the activities of the inspection services. The bulk of the information requested under Article 16 of the Convention was provided in this report, as regards both the number of inspections carried out and their frequency. The data also permitted an evaluation of the types of inspection by sector of activity to be made. The Government had also supplied the text of the Act on the status of the staff of local health units which are assigned labour inspection functions, in response to the request made by the Committee of Experts regarding Article 6 of the Convention. In reflecting upon the contents of the report on labour inspection activities, the Government had noted that although the inspection services are staffed by highly qualified personnel, the services should be reinforced in order to meet the growing requirements of inspection and oversight. In regard to the problem of co-ordination between the various services which had been assigned inspection functions, the Government agreed that this fell within the scope of Article 5 of the Convention. A misunderstanding had developed, however, over replies furnished by the Government several years ago. Several institutions were engaged in co-ordination at different levels: local, regional and national. Local health units, while they were legal entities enjoying complete autonomy, were organisationally part of local and territorial structures (i.e. regions and communities). At the national level, the application and interpretation of standards of protection at the workplace were within the competence of the Ministry of Labour which, on request or on its own accord, could draw up directives and instructions which were discussed by a permanent commission on the prevention of accidents and on occupational health. There were obviously some problems of co-ordination when matters concerning workers' health and the observance of technical standards at the workplace were concerned. For those aspects, the local health units had access to an interregional standing committee with branches in the most significant zones of economic activity. In reply to the point raised in the Committee of Experts' report regarding Article 9 of the Convention, the Government stressed that in practice technicians specialising in various sectors, such as industrial hygienists, engineers and doctors, collaborated in every standing committee branch. The Government had provided annual reports under Articles 20 and 21 of the Convention on a regular basis, except for during a certain period in which there had been operational difficulties owing to the entry into force of new legislation. The Government remained attentive to problems of the effectiveness of labour inspection. In the past few years, there had been thorough discussions on measures which could be taken in response to the large-scale introduction of new technology in production processes. Efforts had been launched to seek more efficacious means to ensure maximum protection for workers and to preserve the environment. The Government pledged to provide any other documentation which might assist in an evaluation of the extent of application of the Convention.

The Employers' members thanked the Government representative for her statement. There had for some years been several shortcomings in respect of a number of Articles of this important Convention. Sufficient information on the frequency of inspections, on co-operation between the labour inspectorate and the local health units and on the status of their staff was still lacking. Despite problems of co-ordination, the Committee of Experts should have the proper information at its disposal especially considering the importance of annual inspection reports; for ten years now, this had not been the case. Although the Government representative appeared to have said that reports were being sent regularly, the Committee of Experts had observed that no annual reports had been received by the Office since 1978. According to written information recently supplied by the Government, a substantial report had now been communicated. They hoped that it would contain all the necessary information and that such information would be submitted on a regular basis from now on, to avoid having another gap of several years during which the Committee of Experts had no information at its disposal.

The Workers' members welcomed the new information provided by the Government. A partial reply to the points raised by the Committee of Experts had been given, but this was still not fully satisfactory. They found the failure to send reports since 1978 to be irregular and abnormal. This led them to wonder if there were also other shortcomings in regard to labour inspection. They recalled the vital role it played in verifying that laws were in fact being respected, as for example, in the field of ensuring equal opportunity. The Workers' members welcomed the Government's statement that it wished to equip the inspection staff sufficiently in order to meet the obligations under the Convention.

The Worker member of Italy expressed his surprise at both the optimism which had been voiced and the Government's statement that it was now providing the information requested by the Committee of Experts. He had hoped to hear a statement of commitment on the part on the Government to prevent the large number of occupational accidents occurring in Italy. He wondered how those accidents could be explained if everything was going so well. In 1987 there had been 1 million occupational accidents, resulting in 1,500 deaths and 50,000 cases of permanent invalidity. He hoped the Government would reinforce the labour inspection services before it was too late for other workers. The absence of labour inspection gave employers a licence to violate labour laws. The unions had often asked the Government to take steps to redress the situation. He added in closing that the Senate had recently set up a commission of inquiry on labour inspection and workplace conditions.

The Government representative acknowledged that the reply given has been a partial one, but she had attempted to provide additional information, in particular on co-ordination. All the information requested on the frequency of inspections was included in the report mentioned. Unfortunately, it can be confirmed that the number of accidents at work and their quite serious consequences are very high. The Government was making an effort to find a solution to the problem of inspection. Unfortunately, the number of persons engaged in labour inspection was still too low and regular, timely inspections could not be guaranteed. The commission of inquiry to which the Workers' member of Italy had referred stood as testimony to the efforts being made by the Italian authorities to ensure the full application of the Convention.

The Workers' members thought that the comments made during the discussion pointed to the absolute necessity of having properly functioning labour inspection services and of providing information regularly in this regard. In the light of the accident statistics cited, there were steps to be taken above and beyond labour inspection, steps involving improved protection for workers under provisions contained in laws and freely concluded collective agreements.

The Committee noted the written and oral information given by the Government and the discussion which had taken place. It hoped that the Government would be able to provide full particulars on all the points raised by the Committee of Experts, and that real progress would be able to be noted in these respects, in particular as regards the regular publication and communication to the ILO of annual labour inspection reports in conformity with the requirements of the Convention and as regards measures to strengthen the equipping and personnel of the labour inspection services and the prevention of accidents.

Libyan Arab Jamahiriya (ratification: 1971). The Government has communicated the following information:

In response to the comments of the Committee of Experts, the Government indicates that the decision of the Secretary of the General Peoples Committee of the Public Service No. 163 of 1985 deals with all questions which have been raised by the Committee of Experts in comments during previous years. The Government is currently gathering information on the subject of application of legislation currently in force. It will communicate to the Office, in the near future, a report as required by Articles 20 and 21 of the Convention.

In addition a Government representative referring to the observations made by the Committee of Experts on the non-receipt of the Government's report, stated that it had been sent to the ILO after the meeting of the Committee of Experts. Amendments had been made to national legislation in June 1985 which corresponded to the spirit of the Convention. Labour inspection was carried out with the aid of several bodies although this activity fell within the competence of the popular committees for public service at the municipal level through their sections for inspection. As the Government had indicated in its reports, competent people in the Social Security Fund regularly inspected workplaces, and in urgent cases checked working conditions in regard to the health and safety of workers. A technical committee had been set up which carried out regular inspections in factories and was responsible for working conditions and the implementation of health and safety programmes in industrial enterprises. This Committee submitted reports and made observations and recommendations. In future reports the Government would communicate detailed information on the application of the Convention with particular regard to Articles 20 and 21. The Government representative thanked the ILO and the Committee of Experts for their efforts and assistance.

The Workers' members noted the information provided by the Government on their efforts to make labour inspection more efficient and to apply the Convention fully. Technical assistance in this matter had been welcome. This was not the first time that the question of non-submitted reports in accordance with Articles 20 and 21 of the Convention was dealt with. They emphasised the importance of these reports which should contain statistics and information on the subjects listed in Article 21. In agreement with the Committee of Experts, the Workers' members considered that the communication of these reports was important as a means of assessing the practical results of labour inspection activities. They regretted that reports on labour inspection activities had not been sent, and insisted that these reports be sent in the future.

The Employers' members also emphasised the important function of labour inspection. They noted that no report on these activities had been sent for 17 years and hoped that the Government would provide these reports shortly.

The Government representative said that reports had been sent in previous years but these had not followed the model required by the ILO, though they did contain a large amount of detailed information. Reports would be sent in time for the next meeting of the Committee which would include reports on labour inspection in factories and industrial enterprises.

The Committee noted the written and oral information provided by the Government, in particular the explanation on the difficulties in the elaboration and despatch of the reports. The Committee noted that the yearly reports on labour inspection had not been submitted since the ratification of the Convention. The Committee hoped that the Government would comply completely with its obligations arising out of the present Convention.

Romania (ratification: 1973). See under Convention No. 129.

In addition, a Government representative referred to the written information which his Government had supplied and stated that it wished to assure the Committee that in the future the Government would provide the information available, in accordance with Articles 20 and 21 of the Convention.

The Worker member of the United States was glad to hear the promise of progress in relation to the required publication of an annual general report on the work of the inspection service, containing the information enumerated in Article 21 of the Convention. These reports were extremely important, since their communication to the ILO permitted an assessment of the practical results of labour inspection. The Committee of Experts had formulated a general observation on this matter in 1986, and this year it had noted with concern in paragraph 59 of its general report that a number of countries were not applying the provisions of Articles 20 and 21. Since ratifying this Convention in 1973, Romania had not sent a single labour inspection report to the ILO. The speaker stressed the need to remedy this situation. He wished to have confirmation of his understanding of the Government representative's statement, i.e. that the Government intended to comply immediately.

The Workers' members supported the statement of the Worker member of the United States; they wished to add, however, that the written information which the Government had supplied did provide some information on inspection in various sectors. A country had to know what its obligations were under this most important Convention. To date, those obligations had not been satisfied.

The Employers' members concurred that the Convention on labour inspection was a very important one. Practically nothing was known about Romania in regard to labour inspection because no reports had been provided. The Committee of Experts' observation was short because of this lack of information. The Government had been failing to provide inspection reports for 15 years now. The Employers' members hoped that the information which the Government had provided in writing denoted a beginning and that full reports meeting the requirements of the Convention would be provided henceforth. These yearly reports also were one of the most important sources for determining whether requirements under other Conventions were being met.

The Government representative wished to correct a misunderstanding. There was no legislation in Romania providing specifically for the publication of a special labour inspection report. These reports were published in general reports on the accomplishment of the Plan and in other documents. Up to now, the Government had believed that this was sufficient. In the future, the Government would prepare a special report for the ILO, based on data published in various state documents, which would reply to all the questions posed.

The Workers' members thanked the Government representative for his promise that as from now, the terms of Articles 20 and 21 of the Convention would be strictly applied and that the Government would send labour inspection reports. The Workers' members attached great importance to labour inspection and believed that sometimes it was not given sufficient attention.

The Committee noted the written and oral information supplied by the Government. It regretted that no inspection report had been supplied and that no reply had been sent in time for examination by the Committee of Experts. It had to urge the Government to take the necessary measures to meet the requirements of the Convention as regards the regular publication and communication of annual labour inspection reports.

Convention No. 87: Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise, 1948

Central African Republic (ratification: 1960). A Government representative stated that the law on the freedom of association and protection of the right to organise had been promulgated on 19 May 1988 and that it conformed, on all points, with Convention No. 87. Trade unions should be represented in the Regional Economic Council, which was a consultative body made up of regional representatives and socio-professional organisations. It was therefore urgent to allow the establishment of trade unions in order that they could be represented in this body. This would also permit them to be more effectively represented within other bodies such as the National Consultative Committee on Labour.

The Workers' members said that difficulties regarding freedom of association had existed for several years. Last year the Government had said that a draft law on the freedom of association, which conformed to the Convention, was in preparation and that a direct contacts mission would take place in order to help with the drawing up of this law and ensure its conformity with the Convention. The Government had not replied to the proposals made to it by the ILO regarding the date of a direct contacts mission. The Government made contacts with the ILO's Freedom of Association Branch in regard to the draft law and the mission. However, the Workers' members observed today that the law had been adopted and that it was in total discrepancy with Convention No. 87 because it had allowed for a single union only. The Workers' members regretted that no one had been kept informed of the adoption of the draft text.

The Worker member from Colombia stated that a crisis that a country is facing should not serve as a permanent excuse for the non-application of a ratified Convention. The report of the Committee of Experts was clear and precise. The position of the Government representative was astonishing in that he had spoken of a democratic process when in fact there was no actual or genuine participation by the workers. He considered that the conclusions of the Committee should make special mention of this case.

The Employers' members stated that this case had been under discussion for a number of years. They pointed out, in particular, the case examined by the Committee on Freedom of Association which had noted numerous discrepancies in the law and practice. No information was available to know if these discrepancies had been eliminated, nor was there any information on the content of the legislation. If the law did indeed impose a single trade union then it did not comply with Convention No. 87.

The Government representative of Mauritania said that in examining this case it was necessary to take into account the information which had been given by the Government representative. The Central African Republic had passed through a difficult period; reconstruction was a long process which demanded not only a national effort but an international effort as well, and the ILO should also participate in rectifying some of the shortcomings.

The Government representative, referring to the law on freedom of association and protection of the right to organise, stated that the law promulgated on 19 May 1988 (No. 88/009) did not impose a single trade union on workers. The right to organise was guaranteed by article 8 of the law. He felt that substantial progress had been made by the promulgation of this law.

The Workers' members recalled the statement made last year before the Conference Committee by the Government representative on the recognition of trade unions, and the assistance of the ILO in the preparation of this text. Today the law was promulgated, article 4 of which provided for a single national federation only to which the unions could affiliate. The questions which were now raised were whether a direct contacts mission could take place rapidly, if this mission would examine whether or not the legislation did conform with the Convention, and finally whether the Government would make all efforts to apply the present Convention.

The Government representative stated that article 4 of the law did not oblige workers in any way to set up a single union because the text said "could" and not "must".

The Workers' members considered that when a law "permits" the establishment of a single federation, that implied that another federation could not be established.

The Committee took note of the information provided by the Government representative as well as of the detailed discussion which took place within the Committee. It recalled that it had been discussing this case for a great number of years. It regretted that the direct contacts mission agreed to by the Government these last two years had not taken place. The Committee expressed the firm hope that the Government would take the necessary measures to eliminate the existing discrepancies and that a direct contacts mission would take place in the very near future so as to enable the Committee of Experts and the Committee on Freedom of Association to be informed of the legal and factual situation in the country, in particular regarding the recently adopted legislation. It duly noted the readiness of the Government to welcome such a mission and hoped that the Government would take all the practical measures required for this in the very near future. The Committee decided to mention this case in a special paragraph of its report.

The Government representative stated that the problem of a single trade union had not been discussed these past two years. He added that he could not see any discrepancy between the Convention and the law on freedom of association which the Conclusion seemed to say, and which also referred to the aid which the mission would give to the Government to eliminate these discrepancies. He wondered what particular effort was being asked of the Government to eliminate non-existent discrepancies.

Congo (ratification: 1960). The Government representative recalled that his country had been the subject of comments concerning the application of Convention No. 87 for some years. The trade unions' rights were not violated in practice but there existed a legal discrepancy between certain provisions of the legislation in the Congo and provisions in the Convention. His Government had taken note of the observations of the Committee of Experts in this regard. He reaffirmed that the present situation of trade union unity was established by the workers themselves in the particular historical circumstances that his country had known. Therefore it was the task of the workers to change this situation if they so desired.

The Workers' members thanked the Government representative for his brief but disappointing explanation. They recalled that this case concerned two problems, one concerning the question of the check-off system and the other concerning the ministerial Decree adopted on 21 December 1976. With regard to the first point, the Workers' members hoped that the Government representative would indicate the progress which had been accomplished in this respect. With regard to the revision of legislative provisions concerning trade union monopolies, the Committee of Experts had requested the Government to reexamine the provisions and to bring the legislation into line with Article 2 of Convention No. 87. The Workers' members were not able to subscribe to the argument of the Government that the trade union unity had been introduced at the request of the workers because, as underlined by the Committee of Experts, a factual situation of trade union monopoly should not be institutionalised by the law. The workers should be able to safeguard for the future the free choice to create trade unions outside an established structure. The Workers' members hoped to receive clarification from the Government representative on these two questions.

The Employers' members supported the comments which had been made by the Workers' members. This Committee had dealt with this question in 1985 and, despite the fact that time had passed, the situation had not changed. The Government had only repeated the statements which it had made a few years ago, and the Employers' members felt that the Government had not shown any willingness to translate the provisions of the Convention into the national legislation in order to guarantee workers' freedom to create trade unions. They were not opposed to trade union unity but they felt that a system of trade union monopoly imposed by legislation constituted a violation of the Convention and that the Government did not indicate any intention to revise that system.

The Government representative recalled what he had said earlier, that his Government had taken note of the observations which had been made and that it was up to the workers' organisations with regard to the revision of the system. He stated that his Government was prepared to continue discussions with the ILO in the form of direct contacts.

The Committee noted with regret that the report of the Government had not been received. Taking into account the information provided by the Government representative, the Committee noted with regard to the legislation, which the Committee of Experts has been examining for a long time and which this Committee dealt with in 1985, that no progress had been made since then. The Committee noted that there are a number of points contained in the legislation which were in contradiction to Convention No. 87, ratified by the Congo. The Committee hoped that the report of the Government will be received in the very near future and that it would contain information on the progress which had been made in order to bring the legislation into conformity with Convention No. 87.

Work of the Committee

The Employers' members made several comments concerning the contents of the report of the Committee. A number of countries should be mentioned in our report in the appropriate place as having been invited and not having appeared because they were not represented at the Conference. The countries concerned were Djibouti, Fiji, the People's Republic of Laos, St. Lucia and the Seychelles. Two other countries, Chad and Sao Tomé and Príncipe, which were prepared to enter into a discussion but whose representatives had to leave before this Committee was able to consider their cases, should also be mentioned in the appropriate section. The Employers' members noted that fortunately this year there had not been any cases of governments which did not appear before the Committee after they had been asked to do so. It should also be mentioned that a series of cases of progress had been noted and in this connection paragraph 105 of the Committee of Experts' report should be referred to generally.

The Worker member from the United States (Mr. Hickey) compared the list of the cases of progress and the list of cases before this Committee for examination and noted that only one case overlapped. This was understandable because the cases on the latter list were cases which presented difficulties. However, in addition to making a general reference to the cases of progress noted by the Committee of Experts, he suggested noting cases where progress had been noted in the discussions before this Committee. This applied to two countries: Spain and Portugal.

The Employers' members stated that in general terms in the general part of the report it could be noted that during our general discussion cases of progress had been noted. However, individual countries should not be named.

The Workers' members agreed with the suggestions of the Employers' members. Cases of progress should be noted in general terms and reference should be made to paragraph 105 of the Committee of Experts' report.

It was decided that it would be noted in general terms that progress had been achieved concerning a record number of cases since 1982 and that reference would be made to paragraph 105.

Ecuador (ratification: 1967). A Government representative wished to recall that a new administration was to assume power on 10 August 1988; it would be up to this new Government to take decisions in relation to the matters being addressed by the present Committee. He asserted that there was full freedom of association in Ecuador, as guaranteed by its Constitution and labour laws, in accordance with the provisions of the Convention. For many years now, the ILO had been informed of this; he stressed that the Labour Code predated the adoption of the present Convention by ten years, and that it incorporated the ideals promoted by the Convention. He stated that in Ecuador the provisions of Convention No. 87 were applied on an active and intensive basis in everyday life; the Convention was not a mere legal fiction, but rather a tool in daily use. He said that the Government had encouraged dialogue between labour and management, promoted the conclusion of collective agreements as the proper instrument for governing labour relations and speeded up wage-fixing procedures, all of which showed trust in the effectiveness and usefulness of trade unionism. In the past eight months, 157 labour organisations had been registered, which showed that the current Government's term (1984 to 1988) had been a period of labour harmony. This was true in spite of the picture painted by some in paying attention to so-called general "stoppages" which involved no labour demands whatsoever and which the Government had felt obliged to carefully control in order to avoid vandalism and to ensure the protection of the country's citizens. The Government representative indicated that the situation could be improved and that the Government was open to taking account of the observations made by the Committee of Experts in relation to the present Convention, without implying any compromise of the country's independence or national sovereignty or of the uppermost interests of the people, such as public peace, internal order and security from outside threats. Reasonable observations would be given full attention. The Government representative enumerated the observations made by the Committee of Experts and called attention to the fact that although the Committee had referred to the Government's reply to the first four points of the observation, it had not indicated whether the reply was sufficient or not, since the Executive Branch had not been able to exercise its right to put legislative proposals before Congress meaning that these four points had not been definitively resolved. Now the current Government found itself in the situation that these matters were in the hands of the recently elected Government which would be exercising power within a few weeks. Finally, in regard to the observation on the need to have provisions guaranteeing protection against acts of anti-union discrimination at the time of recruitment, his Government believed the Committee of Experts had to clarify its position so as to state what they were really asking. In the Government's view, the legislation in force was effective and more than sufficient, since if a contract of employment contained any clause contrary to freedom of association, it would be null and void; moreover, if anti-union acts took an extreme turn, the matter would be dealt with in the penal sphere because a violation of constitutional rights would be involved. The Government representative concluded by saying that Ecuador was fully complying with all provisions of the Convention and that the Government had taken into account the Committee of Experts' observations with the intention of translating them into practice within the possibilities and means of the internal legal order.

The Workers' members saw many contradictions in the Government representative's statements: the Government recognised that changes were needed, yet everything was in order; the Committee of Experts had not clearly explained what the Government needed to do, yet the representative had quoted from the list of shortcomings set forth in the observation. In short, nothing had been done. Direct contacts had taken place in 1980 and 1985, leading to recommendations, but unfortunately no progress had been made. While it was true that free trade unions existed in Ecuador, those very unions had pointed out the need for legislative changes. The Government was interfering in trade union affairs and this was impermissible under the Convention. Public officials were denied the right to establish trade unions, a nationality requirement was applied to trade union leadership, works councils could be automatically dissolved if membership fell below a certain level, and collective work stoppages could be punished by imprisonment. The Government's argument that all of this was necessary in the interests of order, security and protection of the population was simply unacceptable. In the years since the last direct contacts, the Government had done nothing to ensure conformity with the Convention. Now that a new administration was coming in, the Committee ran the risk of facing the same lack of progress next year.

The Worker member of Ecuador declared his solid support for the statement made by the Workers' members. He also thought that the Government's statement was full of contradictions, which did not help in finding a solution to the problems of divergencies in relation to the Convention. The Government's statement was general and contradictory and did not mention any progress made in relation to the matters raised in the Committee of Experts' observation. It was no excuse to say that legislative improvements could not be made since the Government's term was ending and that it was up to the new Government to act. The conditions faced by workers had not only failed to improve, they had worsened. There was freedom of association but there were explicit prohibitions on the right to establish trade unions, on collective bargaining and on strikes in the public service. The situation had become more acute as well because of the current economic crisis, as reflected in the figure of more than 2 million persons unemployed or underemployed, which had led to the creation in certain enterprises of parallel enterprises which took advantage of the high unemployment rate by contracting workers at wages lower than those stipulated in collective agreements. The workers of Ecuador had lost faith in the Government. The speaker indicated that in 1987 the Government had proposed amendments to the Labour Code which would have limited the right to engage in sympathy strikes and which, in relation to part-time work, would have violated express provisions on equality of treatment of various forms of work. Congress had fortunately rejected these amendments. The Worker member also referred to the legal minimum wage which in 1984 amounted to US$96 and today was only the equivalent of US$30 for a typical family of five. He said that the Government's statement alleging that absolute and total freedom of association existed in the country was not true. As an example he cited the demands of workers presented by the three central trade union organisations which made up the Unified Workers' Front (Frente Unitario de Trabajadores), categorised by the Government as an illegal political activity, which had sought wage increases, the resolution of labour disputes, a price freeze on food products, loans and technical assistance for small-scale farmers, improvements in the social security system, no increase in transport fares and non-payment of the foreign debt. To support these demands, a nation-wide strike had been called on 1 June 1988 which had led to the arrest of six workers, including José Chavez, President of the CEOSL, of which the speaker is a member. In conclusion, he stated that Ecuador's social problems needed to be resolved as a priority in the face of the foreign debt. Although, given the severe economic crisis, the workers did not hold out much hope with the new Government which was to take Office on 10 August 1988, they were hopeful that it would respect human rights.

The Employers' members considered that it was clear that there had been no progress in this case. The Government had indicated in its report that it was prepared to make changes in three of the six problem areas (public servants' right to organise, foreigners' eligibility to become members of executive committees of trade unions and non-dissolution of works councils), but the Government representative had not mentioned that any Bill or decree had been submitted to a competent authority to correct these difficulties. The direct contacts mission in 1985 had prepared draft legislation in all of these areas. The case was in the same posture as last year, with no indication of any real will on the part of the Government to correct the deficiencies.

The Government representative had been unable to recognise his own country in much of what had just been said. He admitted that while his country was poor and wages were low, the average wage was in fact three times more than the legal minimum wage. Congress was now discussing an increase in the minimum wage, so the work stoppage mentioned by the Worker member of Ecuador had been called just in case that increase was not adopted. The stoppage had been occasioned by an increase in transport fares, which were very low. The speaker referred to overall economic conditions in the country, which he said were not the worst in the region. He denied that the Government had committed economic crimes against the workers, whose situation was, if not good, at least stable. The workers had freedom of association and freedom of expression; as an example he referred to a newspaper account of a trade union leader referring to the "stupidity of the Minister of Labour" in connection with demands made by transport workers. The Convention was adhered to by the latter in his country although the changes recommended by the direct contacts missions had not been made. Noting that the Ecuador Central of Working Class Organisations had made comments (referred to in footnote 1 to paragraph 79 of the Committee of Experts' general report) in relation to this Convention, he stated that the Government had a clear idea of what needed to be done. The Government was open to amending its legislation but it could not do so every day. Due to opposition, it had not been possible to make the changes. He admitted that there were certain contradictions in the situation.

The Workers' members stated that in view of the importance of the Convention and the long period during which this problem had been under discussion, the deplorable situation justified mentioning this case in a special paragraph of the present Committee's report. The Employers' members agreed with this proposal, given the importance of the issues involved and the evident lack of progress.

The Committee took note of the explanations provided by the Government representative and of the indications supplied in relation to questions posed by the Committee of experts. The Committee noted that the Government had accepted several of the recommendations which had been made in the course of the direct contacts mission. The Committee hoped that the other discrepancies would be eliminated on an urgent basis so as to bring the legislation and practice into full conformity with the Convention. It requested the Government to provide full information in reply to all the points raised by the Committee of Experts and, in particular, regarding any measures taken or envisaged in connection with the application of the Convention. It decided to mention this case in the appropriate part of its report.

Haiti (ratification: 1979). The Government has communicated the following information:

Workers and employers may establish organisations without receiving authorisation from public authorities; provided that there are a minimum of ten members for the workers' group and five for those of employers. Nevertheless, these organisations must register with the Labour Directorate within 60 days of their establishment, providing a copy of their Constitution, and two copies of by-laws, the document creating the organisation, a list of the directors of the organisation as well as the minutes of the election of the directors. Moreover, the Constitution of 1987 authorises the formation of trade unions by civil servants and personnel employed by public enterprises (Article 2 of the Convention).

Articles 235 and 238 of the Labour Code are clear in the event of a union's formation: the union may establish and administer relief funds, open offices for offers and requests for employment, establish educational and vocational training centres, provident societies, co-operatives and laboratories, but may not engage in commercial activities or concern itself with matters unconnected with its objective of the defence of workers in the improvement of economic, social and moral interests common to workers or employers (Article 3).

Article 242 of the Labour Code provides that sanctions eventually taken against a union may be imposed by the labour court upon the request of the Ministry of Social Affairs (Article 4).

There is no text prohibiting the constitution of associations and confederations. Moreover, in practice, some of them are affiliated with international organisations (Article 5).

It is important to mention that according to article 246 of the Labour Code, federations and confederations of unions are governed by provisions of the chapter relating to unions in so far as those provisions are applicable (Article 6).

National legislation on the whole provides that unions enjoy legal recognition as soon as they are registered with the Labour Directorate (Article 7).

At the level of the Ministry of Social Affairs and in the spirit of the Labour Code, the Labour Court is empowered by the Ministry to sanction unions found guilty of the offences in Article 242. Nevertheless, all citizens remain subject to national laws no matter what their nature and incur the penalties provided for in cases of infractions (Article 8).

The members of the armed forces and the police are covered by Regulations Particular to the Army (Article 9).

It is sufficient to take stock of the number of unions registered by the Labour Directorate to understand the total independence enjoyed by them in the management of their resources and to have an idea of the manner in which the Convention is applied.

In addition a Government representative noted that the Committee of Experts had emphasised the provisions in the 1987 Constitution guaranteeing workers in the public and private sectors freedom of association and recognising the right to strike. In relation to the other legal provisions cited by that Committee, the Government had been requesting technical assistance from the ILO since 1986 to revise sections which were not in compliance with the Convention. A preliminary attempt at revision had begun in March and June 1987, but it had not been able to accomplish the task. A new national committee had now been set up to draw up amendments to the provisions in question; the Government would be making a renewed request for assistance. It would be appreciative if the upcoming direct contacts mission could also provide suggestions on the legislative changes needed. The Government representative stated that since February 1986, the Haitian people had enjoyed freedom of expression and the right to organise; tripartism and discussions and negotiations among the social partners were also being promoted.

While welcoming the Government's expression of good intentions, the Workers' members said that they had to be reconsidered against the very sorry background of what had taken place in the country. The Committee of Experts had, in the absence of a report, repeated the points raised earlier; now, the Government had not provided much detail beyond its intent to amend the Labour Code. The Committee of Experts' report had contained, in addition to the mention of legislative shortcomings, very disturbing information about grievous interference in trade union affairs, arrests of trade union leaders and lay-offs of workers attempting to establish trade unions. The unusually strong and critical language used in the observation highlighted the grievous nature of the violations of the Convention. The Workers' members welcomed the Government's statement that it wished to make amends for the lack of co-operation which the Committee of Experts had deplored. The Workers' members looked forward to the Government taking steps to eliminate "reprehensible anti-trade union activities" and to develop "a climate free of insecurity and fear". They wanted more details from the Government concerning anti-union activity.

The Employers' members noted that the situation with regard to the legal situation in this case was clear; the Committee of Experts' report had pinpointed the many persisting discrepancies the Government had now admitted between the legislation and the Convention. The Employers' members noted the written information which the Government had supplied, as well as the government representative's statement that more technical assistance was needed to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention. They welcomed this request and hoped that this would lead to the guarantees contained in the new Constitution being translated into ordinary laws as well. As regards the factual situation in the country, the Committee of Experts had briefly listed concrete measures taken which were far from being in accordance with freedom of association principles. The Government had provided no answers in relation to the allegations made, and its co-operation with the Committee on Freedom of Association left a lot to be desired. The Employers' members hoped that important changes would take place and that the Government would reply in writing on both of the legal and factual situations.

The Worker member of Austria, referring to the Committee on Freedom of Association case cited by the Committee of Experts (Case No. 1396, 254th report), emphasised the difficulties which the absence of information from the Government had posed. That is why the Committee on Freedom of Association had reached the conclusions quoted in relation to repressive measures imposed on the trade union movement in Haiti. The Government representative's statement that since February 1986 freedom of association had been respected was incorrect. In June 1987, the Autonomous Confederation of Haitian Workers (CATH) had called a 48-hour strike which was broken by military intervention; trade union premises had been looted and eight trade unionists had been imprisoned. Later, in July 1987 the military had again occupied the premises of the CATH. More information was needed from the Government; he hoped that the direct contacts mission would be able to shed light on the situation in relation to freedom of association.

The Government member of the United States associated herself with the remarks of the previous speakers. She was pleased to note the good intentions of the Government, but wished to stress that the matters under discussion were extremely critical. Also the Government had again failed to supply a report and had not cooperated with the Committee on Freedom of Association. The language employed in the observation in this case by the Committee of Experts, which usually cast its observations in a calm, dispassionate way, was truly astounding. Her Government hoped that the situation in relation to this Convention would not continue to deteriorate and that with the assistance of the ILO, there would be significant progress on the application of the Convention.

The Government representative recalled the extremely troubled period the country had been going through in the past two years. There had been three months of intermittent strikes; it could be stated that all of the social partners had some responsibility for the reprehensible events. The good faith of this Government, which had taken office only in February 1988, was demonstrated by its request for assistance and by its desire to benefit from the direct contacts mission.

The Workers' members welcomed the new regime's request for assistance from the Office but also noted that direct contacts had taken place on earlier occasions, and that a Commission of Inquiry was established under article 26 of the ILO Constitution to examine the advances of certain Conventions, including the present Convention, without producing results. They hoped that the forthcoming mission would lead to remedial steps being taken in this long-standing situation.

The Committee took note of the information provided by the Government representative and of the discussion which had taken place. While expressing its great concern as regards the very serious situation, the Committee welcomed the request for ILO assistance and the request for a direct contacts mission. The Committee expressed the hope that this mission would assist in removing the various discrepancies which exist regarding the Convention, and that the Government would be able to report progress in the following year.

Pakistan (ratification: 1951). A Government representative, referring to the observations of the Committee of Experts concerning the restrictions on the right to strike, stated that under section 32 of the Industrial Relations Ordinance 1969, if no settlement was reached during bilateral negotiations, or conciliation, and the parties to the dispute could not agree to refer the matter to an arbitrator under section 37 the workers could go on strike on the expiry of the period of notice or after a declaration by the conciliator that the conciliation proceedings had failed. Consequently the right to strike was recognised by legislation and was not prohibited. At any time either before or after the strike began the parties to the dispute could apply to the labour courts for adjudication. The right to strike was therefore applicable to all workers under the law of the land but was subject to reasonable restrictions. On their part, the employers had the right to lockout. The Government could intervene and submit the conflict to arbitration only in cases where the strike lasted for more than 30 days and if the public interest was at stake. The only exception to that rule were the five public utility services listed in the Ordinance where the federal government could intervene if it considered that the strike endangered the security of Pakistan or caused damage to the national economy. Judicial review of any action on the part of the Government was available to determine whether the government action was in the public interest or not. These powers had been exercised by the Government very sparingly in the past, and not a single case had recently occurred. The Government representative stated that his Government had already submitted a detailed report which dealt with other questions.

The Workers' members thanked the Government representative for his declaration which referred mainly to the question of the right to strike. Unfortunately he had indicated nothing about the observation of the Committee of Experts concerning trade union rights and related topics. The Committee on Freedom of Association had just examined a series of cases dealing with violations of trade union rights in Pakistan during the period of martial law (1981-85). During this period laws were adopted concerning Pakistan International Airlines Corporation (PIAC) that prohibited trade union activities in this corporation. The Committee on Freedom of Association had criticised this legislation on several occasions and had requested that it be modified. The Governing Body of the ILO had also expressed the same views. This matter had also been discussed last year and still remained unsolved. The observation of the Committee of Experts also mentioned the problem of the supervision of trade union funds by the authorities, but the Government representative had not referred to this in his comments. The Committee of Experts had expressed its hope that the Government would do its utmost to adopt the necessary measures for the full application of the Convention in the very near future but nothing had been done and nothing in the declaration of the Government representative appeared to indicate any reasons to believe that something would be done. Consequently, since the present Convention was not being observed and since the case had been discussed the preceding year, and given the lack of progress, the Workers' members requested that this case be included in a special paragraph.

The Employers' members stated that the Committee of Experts had mentioned several points concerning restrictions on trade union rights. Following the abolition of martial law, the situation should have slowly returned to normal. But for the personnel of (PIAC) the prohibitions against forming trade unions and belonging to them had remained. These restrictions were certainly excessive even if PIAC was considered to be a public service which might be subject to certain restrictions. The Employers' members did not want to go into great detail about restrictions on the right to strike, but wished to recall that the Government had stated the necessity to have such restrictions in export processing zones, and that it was nevertheless necessary to consider whether certain changes should be introduced. Today the Government representative had said nothing on that point nor about the excessively strict supervision of trade union funds provided by legislation, that gave rise to arbitrary interference by the authorities, and ran counter to the principles of the present Convention. Nor had he said anything about minority trade unions which should have the same rights as majority trade unions, and should not be underprivileged. Since the Government representative had said nothing about possible changes in this respect, the situation remained in contradiction with the principles of the Convention and the Employers' members considered that this case should be mentioned in a special paragraph.

The Government representative recalled that the various questions referred to by the Committee of Experts were dealt with in the report submitted by his Government and for that reason he had not explicitly referred to those points in his preceding statement but would do so now since there appeared to be a misunderstanding. He categorically stated that his Government had not supervised or controlled trade union funds, but that the law provided that the Registrar might have the audits of a trade union produced at any time. In the last 30 years since the independence of Pakistan there had not been a single allegation of interference in trade union funds. The legal provision was designed to protect trade unions and their affiliates. In this respect he recalled that the illiteracy rate in his country was about 26 per cent and that the funds in question are levied by a check-off system. Whether the right to produce the audits was exercised or not was something for the workers to say on a case-by-case basis. As regards minority trade unions, he indicated that there were more than 6,000 registered trade unions in Pakistan. The minority trade unions were trying to destabilise the collective bargaining agents. The fact that an employer would not negotiate with the minority union was because the workers themselves had requested that through the tripartite bodies at the national level. He stated that legislation in Pakistan divided rights into two categories according to whether they referred to matters of right or matters of interest. The collective bargaining agent could negotiate with the employers on matters of interest, but concerning matters of right, the legislation stipulated that in case a right was violated by law, a collective agreement or arbitration, the worker could appeal to court individually in order that his rights be restored. For these individual complaints article 25(a) of the Industrial Relations Ordinance stipulated that the worker or the collective bargaining agent could apply to the courts. The Committee of Experts stated that the workers belonging to minority trade unions could not be represented by a minority trade union in their individual complaints. But the law grants the right to lodge individual complaints before the courts to the worker himself. The provision referred to by the Committee of Experts had been adopted in good faith and at the request of workers and employers and not as a result of a government proposal. As regards the trade union activity in PIAC the Government representative acknowledged that no trade union activities were allowed so far. This was due to objective conditions and particular circumstances that did not permit such activities, as stated by the Government to the Committee of Experts. It should not be forgotten that Pakistan was the only country in South Asia that had ratified the present Convention and that PIAC was only one enterprise in a population of 100 millions, and that all the workers in industry and commerce enjoyed the rights of freedom of association and collective bargaining.

The Committee took note of the information supplied by the Government representative and of the discussion within the present Committee. The Committee observed with concern that there had been no progress towards bringing the legislation into conformity with the requirements of the Convention. The Committee consequently expressed the firm hope that efforts would be made to reconsider the legislation in the light of the comments of the Committee of Experts with a view to eliminating the serious divergencies which had existed for many years. It decided to mention this case in a special paragraph of its general report.

Poland (ratification: 1957). The Government has communicated the following information: Measures will be taken to define the position of the Government concerning observations by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and the World Confederation of Labour relative to the application of the present Convention in Polish legislation.

Trade union unity or pluralism

The legal situation has not changed since the 73rd Session of the Conference. It is characterised by two elements:

- trade union pluralism assumed by the provisions of the Trade Union Act (section 37(1): "In an enterprise in which more than one trade union organisation acts, each of them ..."); and
- temporary suspension of the above legal construction (section 60(3): "In the period, the end of which will be determined by the Council of State, only one trade union organisation shall act in an enterprise.").

Thus, in the transitory period which will expire when the Council of State so decides - the principle of trade union unity is in force in enterprises.

The problem of trade union unity or pluralism at the enterprise level which, in the light of Polish legislation, remains open in the longer perspective is connected with the general social, political and economic situation of Poland and directions of its future evolution. It also is one of the elements of the broad sphere of political pluralism in the public life of the country. Future solutions in this regard will be undoubtedly dependent upon more general ones in the field of policy which are at present being prepared in Poland and which cover the considerable broadening of the so called "dialogue with the political opposition", concluding of the "anti-crisis pact", etc. At the beginning of June 1988, in connection with the initial stage of these political activities it is difficult to forecast their final direction and scope; it is only known that they are being carried out in an unprecedented scale for Poland and with the bold will of achieving completely new qualities in the political system of Poland. In this situation Polish authorities ask the International Labour Organisation for understanding and patience in waiting for the further political evolution in this regard, concerning also the problem of trade union pluralism.

In the years 1987 and 1988, the Polish economy entered a second stage of broad economic reform. This period is not free from difficulties and tensions, which are to a considerable degree understandable in the situation of inflation and lack of balance in the internal economic market, as was reflected in the results of the nationwide referendum in November 1987, and was the basis of the strikes in May 1988.

Together with the economic reform and for its support the Government started the broad activities based on a sound scientific basis aimed at the general reform of the labour law, which will also cover the trade union law. To this end, the National Committee for the Labour Law Reform has been appointed, composed of representatives of governmental, scientific and trade union organisations. The Committee has up to 1990 to elaborate the draft of the new labour law, based on comparative legal knowledge and ILO standards. With a view to examining the ways of full adjustment of Polish labour law to the ratified ILO Conventions in the field of human rights, in particular those concerning the right to organise. In May 1988 a group of experts was established at the Ministry of Labour and Social Policy for examining the conformity of Polish law with the ratified ILO Conventions in the field of human rights' protection. The group of experts is composed of eminent scientists and experts in the field of labour law and international law. The results of its work will be submitted to the Legislative Council by the President of the Council of Ministers together with its proposals. The work of the group will take into account the observations of the Committee of Experts, as well as the remarks of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and the World Confederation of Labour in the context of application of the present Convention.

As regards the observation of the Committee of Experts concerning an appeal which was submitted to the Constitutional Tribunal in respect of section 60(3) of the Trade Union Act, the Government repeats that on 28 November 1986 a group of seven persons appealed to the President of the Constitutional Tribunal to make use of his power to initiate proceedings for examining the conformity of section 60(3), sentence 2, of the Act of 8 October 1982 with section 84(1) and (2) of the Polish Constitution. After examining the case, the Tribunal informed the appellants that their appeal had no basis under the current legal provisions and thus the proceedings would not be instituted.

In the present period of socio-economic difficulties, according to the prevailing opinion which finds its reflection in public opinion polls, the activity of only one trade union organisation in an enterprise favours the integration of staff and the fulfilment by the trade unions of their proper function, i.e. that of defender and representative of the workers' occupational interests. It should be emphasised that the existing laws in Poland create the premises for a broad democracy at the enterprise level. In addition to the trade unions, there exist self-managing bodies elected by the staff which enjoy broad rights permitting them to influence the enterprise management and to control the activities of the manager.

Trade union rights of civil servants

The Act of 16 September 1982 on civil servants employed by the State provides in section 40 that they have the right to organise in trade unions. Thus, the Act does not impose a trade union monopoly, but admits the possibility of joining different trade unions that would cover civil servants.

Section 40 of the Act of 16 September 1982 on civil servants employed by the State provides that they have the right to organise in trade unions with the following exceptions:

- high-level employees whose functions are normally considered as policy-making or managerial;
- employees whose duties are of a highly confidential nature. (These exceptions are in accordance with the provisions of Convention No. 151 concerning protection of the right to organise and procedures for determining conditions of employment in the public service of 1978.)

The above-mentioned civil servants, as well as other non-unionised public employees are entitled to form employees' councils. The task of these councils is to protect and represent the occupational and social interests of public employees who formed them vis-à-vis the heads of the respective administrations. The employees' councils act on the basis of the Act on civil servants employed by the State and statutes which they adopt themselves (section 41 of the Act).

Heads of administrations and their higher bodies are obliged to create proper conditions to enable the employees' representatives to fulfil their statutory tasks. They are also obliged to examine the proposals of the employees' councils and inform the councils of their follow-up action (section 42 of the Act).

The detailed rules and the scope of co-operation of the heads of the civil servants' administrations with the employees' councils are determined by the Order of the Council of Ministers of 8 November 1982 (published in Dziennik Ustaw No. 39, text 261).

Trade union rights of prison service staff

Article 9 of the present Convention states that the extent to which the guarantees provided for in this Convention shall apply to the armed forces and the police shall be determined by national laws or regulations.

For many years the officials of prison establishments were part of the militia. After the reform and placing of the prison establishments under the Minister of Justice, a separate formation was established: the prison service. From the standpoint of hierarchy and discipline it is similar to the militia and also, due to character of service, its hierarchy and duties, it is treated as the militia.

It should be added that both in doctrine and in practice the opinion prevails that the functionaries of the prison service - just as the functionaries of the militia and professional soldiers are not workers in the sense of section 2 of the Labour Code. If the right to form and join trade unions is granted only to workers, the exclusion of persons being the functionaries in the sense of section 13 of the Trade Union Act does not justify any eventual complaints because it is in accordance with the legal order existing in Poland and corresponds to the spirit of the Convention.

Structure of the trade unions

The structure of the trade unions covering at present over 7 million members (over 60 per cent of the total number of workers covered by the right to organise) is not uniform and its picture is the result of a kind of spontaneity in the process of forming the trade union structure at the over-establishment level. The majority of trade union organisations at the enterprise level, independent, self-managing and having legal personality are grouped into federations. In 1987-88, 116 federations functioned in Poland. Thus, in different branches there were several federations in each one and the problem arises of principles and forms of their co-operation (or its absence). Some trade unions (17) formed the nationwide uniform trade unions, for example the Union of Polish Teachers and the National Trade Union of Workers of the Polish Academy of Sciences. Some trade unions have not formed the over-establishment structures, nor have they joined such structures; thus, they are not associated in the All-Poland Trade Union Alliance. Changes towards trade union organisational pluralism are obvious when compared with the pre-1980 situation when the Act of 1949 provided for the uniform, centralised trade union structure and only 14 national branch unions existed.

The right to collective labour disputes and to strike

Polish legal provisions governing the right to strike are the first and unprecedented legal regulation in this field in the system of socialised ownership, differing from the system of market economy. It is thus difficult to compare Polish regulation with the known – and rarely existing – strike regulations of other countries. It is also worth noting that there are no detailed international standards in this field which could serve as patterns for the legal solutions and practical procedures.

The Trade Union Act of 1982 permits strikes aimed at defending the economic and social interests of a given group of workers. Political strikes are prohibited. The Committee of Experts recalled in 1988 that the exclusion of strictly political strikes from the scope of the principle of freedom of association cannot concern strikes expressing criticisms of the economic and social policy of the Government. However, although the terms “political strike” and “strike in defence of the economic and social interests” are not specified in the Act or in current interpretations of this Act, the Government supposes that the strikes which the Committee of Experts had in mind in its 1988 observation would be legally admitted in Poland – if the other conditions determined by the Act were fulfilled.

The 1982 Act guarantees to workers the right to strike and to trade unions the right to organise strikes. The right to strike is the individual right of each worker used according to his will. The right to organise strikes is the exclusive right of the trade union.

The Act excludes from the right to strike workers of the specific categories of enterprises or occupying specific posts. These exclusions are justified by general considerations connected with necessity of ensuring during the strike:

- benefits and means necessary for the normal existence of the society;
- state safety and defence;
- normal functioning of state bodies and public services; and
- fulfilment of the international obligations of fundamental importance.

Taking into account the suggestions of the ILO Committee of Experts that broad exclusions from the right to strike by various legislative systems are not appropriate, the Government emphasised that after some time of application of the Trade Union Act and in the light of acquired experience, possibly in the course of elaborating the above-mentioned general reform of the labour law, the possibility of revision of the determined exclusions will be analysed.

Polish regulation of strikes unequivocally determines that in the model of economy of Poland the strike is the final means of settling a collective dispute if the other possibilities of settling the dispute are exhausted. The 1982 Act established three stages of settling collective disputes (direct negotiations, conciliation and social arbitration) and only after these are exhausted may the trade union organise a strike.

Among the conditions of admissibility for a strike, the Polish legal regulation requires the consent of the majority of the personnel expressed through secret voting (majority of votes of all the workers employed in a given enterprise and not only the majority of workers taking part in voting). The Act considers that if the strike is to be the expression of will of the collectivity, then refraining from taking part in a vote means that there is a lack of support for the strike. It would be pointless to allow strikes not supported by the majority of the collectivity. The Committee of Experts is of the opinion that the majority of persons voting should be enough to consider the strike as acceptable by the collectivity. Since there are no international standards in this regard, the opinion of the Committee of Experts is worth noting and analysis; it will thus be analysed in the framework of work on the reform of the labour law.

In order to demonstrate the practical functioning of the Polish three-stage machinery for settling collective labour disputes (direct negotiation, conciliation and social arbitration), as well as the right to strike, the Government submits selected information on collective labour disputes and strikes for the years 1985 to 1988 in Poland, according to trade union sources:

Firstly, the following are examples of collective disputes between national trade union organisations and central administration:

- Federation of Ship Repair: a dispute arose with the former Minister of Labour, Wages and Social Affairs concerning the distribution of working time; in autumn 1986 arbitration procedure accepted the claims of the trade unions.
- Federation of Tourism: a dispute arose with the former Chairman of the Committee for Physical Culture and Tourism concerning increased meat coupon norms for the manual staff of hotels; the dispute was lost.
- Federation of Open-Pit Miners (Rock Miners): a dispute with the Government commenced in October 1986 and was aimed at extending the “Miner’s Charter” to the miners employed in granite and basalt quarries (miners employed in sedimentary rock quarries were already covered by the “Miner’s Charter”). The issue had been in existence for many years. Despite recent work on amendments to the Regulation of the Council of Ministers dated 30 December 1981 concerning the “Miner’s Charter”, the council of the Federation decided to announce protest action and strike stand-by. On 16 March 1987, as an expression of the protest, all enterprise buildings were equipped with flags. On 19 March 1987, the Chairman of the Council of Ministers signed a decision which extended to rock miners the provisions of the “Miner’s Charter”, thus accepting the rock miners’ protest.
- Federation of Construction Workers: a dispute arose with the Minister of Construction concerning an unlawful (as maintained by the Federation) limitation of allowances to pensions secured for some professions by the “Charter of Construction Workers”. The Board of Social Arbitration is in favour of the claim, yet the dispute continues; on 9 May 1988 another round of talks advanced the possibility of a final settlement of the dispute in the near future.
- Federation of Energy Workers: a dispute with the Minister of Industry commenced on 20 April 1988 concerning wage increases to the level existing in other industries. Claims have been made to implement the provisions of the 1980 agreements which guaranteed a wage level corresponding to that of steel-mill workers. The dispute was settled on 3 May 1988, with the signing of an agreement in which preferences were made in order to reach a 50 per cent wage increase.
- Federation of Communications Branch: a dispute arose with the Minister of Transportation, Maritime Economy and Communications concerning an average wage increase in order to make it close to the national average. On 3 May 1988 an agreement was signed before the Board of Social Arbitration which secured additional means for a motivation fund, an increase of exports and improved quality of services.
- Federation of Municipal Transportation: a dispute arose with the Minister of Transportation, Maritime Economy and Communications concerning the wage increase and an adjustment to that of other branches. The dispute commenced on 17 March 1988 and was settled with an agreement signed after a strike in Bydgoszcz. The wage increase for municipal transportation workers by some 50 per cent was made possible through concessions in the excessive wage increase tax and an efficiency improvement programme.
- Federation of Miners’ Trade Unions: a dispute arose with the Government in May 1988 concerning a revaluation of real wages and system of wages determination. According to the Federation, the fixed 30 per cent threshold for wage increases free of the excessive wage increase tax does not secure the possibility of keeping up with the increasingly rising cost of maintaining living standards. Claims were made to increase by 50 per cent the wages in mining. In the course of negotiations it agreed that, in view of recent decisions fixing the tax-free threshold of wage increases, it was possible to provide a wage rise of 49 per cent on the average. In the final agreement signed on 10 May 1988 it was provided that, after the second quarter, an analysis of wages and living standards costs in mining would be carried out in order to take further appropriate decisions.

Secondly, the following are examples of collective disputes at the enterprise level:

- Mechanical Equipment Factory “PONAR” in Ostrzeszów: (March – April 1987). A dispute arose concerning a change in the wage system. After having exploited the entire legally prescribed procedures, including a strike stand-by, the trade union won concessions in an agreement: the wage increase reached was 7,071 zlotys ($1 = 624 zlotys at 6 June 1988), i.e. close to that claimed (8,000 zlotys). The dispute was announced after the management stated that wages for 1987 may increase only by 500 zlotys and 4 per cent of the bonus per employee (the average wage at that time was 19,600 zlotys). Any wage increase higher than that might have caused bankruptcy of the enterprise due to the danger of exceeding the 12 per cent wage increase threshold and subsequent 500 per cent tax on any wage increase above that, which would result in lost crediting abilities in spite of the high performance of the enterprise. The agreement was signed and announced 20 minutes before the strike was to commence. The strike was declared – according to legal provisions – by the enterprise workforce in a secret ballot in which 992 workers took part (the total enterprise workforce being 1,400 persons) – 721 were for the strike, 109 against and 18 votes were not valid. In this case, the rules of the economic reform were observed, and the dispute was settled within the enterprise though it necessitated extra work having a total value of about 700 million zlotys (this provision was mentioned in the agreement).

- Electric Machine Factory EDA in Poniatowa: (April – October 1987). The dispute concerned a wage increase of 3,500 zlotys. In accordance with the legal provisions, the course of the dispute involved a referendum, strike stand-by and warning strike. The final wage increase amounted to about 1,300 zlotys per worker. In the referendum, 72 per cent of those entitled to vote cast their votes, 92 per cent of whom voted “for”. Financial means for the wage increase were taken from the part of profits devoted to investment and paid in the form of monthly motivation bonuses, but part of them must have been spent on the excessive wage increase tax. Additionally, a proportion of the wage increase was paid due to reduction of employment. It should be mentioned that the Workers Council objected against such allocation of financial means out of profits, but finally changed its attitude after the explanations of the management.

At the end of April and the beginning of May 1988, trade union organisations in enterprises increased the number of collective disputes in view of social discontent with the falling value of real wages and economic difficulties of the enterprises. The majority of these conflicts commenced before the government decisions were announced increasing by 7 per cent the threshold of wage increase free of the tax on excessive wage increase.

In the “Lenin” (Krakow) and “Stalowa Wola” steel mills, as well as in some other local enterprises of municipal transportation (Bydgoszcz, Szczecin), trade unions declared collective disputes with the management after strike actions of part of the workforce undertaken apart of trade union organisations. In those cases trade unions have taken over negotiating the economic claims of those related to working conditions, not expressing, however, their attitude towards political issues raised by the strikers.

According to trade union sources, the causes of the majority of disputes were as follows:

- unstable and delayed regulations and legal provisions concerning general economic issues, especially related to the enterprise wage fund;
- incompetence and disregard of the Trade Union Act by state administration organs;
- lack of information and consultations in the process of introducing wage, bonuses and awards systems;
- lack of reaction to trade union protests;
- prolonging and time-consuming settlement of numerous issues by a part of central, intermediate and lower levels of the administrative apparatus as a result of their incompetence and bureaucratic attitudes.

The Government informs the present Committee that on 11 May 1988 the Sejm adopted the Act on the extraordinary rights and entitlements for the Council of Ministers – of the economic character – aimed at eliminating obstacles in the implementation of the economic reform and accelerating the rate of this reform. The Act introduced – for the transitory period from May 1988 to the end of 1988 – additional limitations on the possibility of starting collective disputes (thus also of organising strikes) in matters resulting from the application of these extraordinary rights of the Government, unless the starting of such a dispute is supported by the All-Poland Trade Union Alliance after consultation with competent federations, or is supported by the National Federation of Farmers, Agricultural Circles and Agricultural Organisations. This limitation will remain in force until the end of 1988 and its aim is radically to support the implementation of the economic reforms.

Other activities in favour of the protection of human rights and basic freedoms

The Government stresses that – despite the difficult socio-economic situation – it attaches great importance to full observance in Poland of human rights and development of public institutions serving this aim. It has already mentioned the establishment, in February 1988, of the National Committee for the Labour Law Reform, which has until 1990 to prepare the draft of the labour law codification. At the same time, at the Ministry of Labour and Social Policy, the Group of Experts was established for examining the conformity of Polish legislation with the ratified ILO Conventions in the field of human rights.

The whole legal system of the Polish People's Republic is at present the subject of important modifications. Many changes have been introduced to the penal, civil and rural law. The influence exerted by citizens upon the activity of the State and administration organs in the form of social consultations and the national referendum received legal standing in 1987. The right of citizens to participate in social control has been increased thanks to an increase in the role of various social organisations (especially trade unions) as well as the forms of social self-management (especially workers' self-management) and development of their control functions. It also mentions the changes in the legal provisions on elections of people's councils, which increased the citizens' possibilities to influence the selection of candidates. Essential progress can be noticed in the field of implementation of rights of association. Legal provisions in this field (of 1982) will be modified. Besides, the institutional guarantees of implementation of rights of citizens and law and order have been developed. The Supreme Administrative Court has been established as an organ independent of the administrations, which controls the legality of administrative decisions. In 1986, the Constitutional Tribunal started its work. It examines conformity with the Constitution of legal acts and other acts of the central state organs. Of particular importance from the standpoint of citizens' rights and freedoms is the activity of the Ombudsman for Citizens' Rights who is to guard the rights and interests of citizens set out in the Constitution and legal provisions. The social basis of the institution of the Ombudsman is reinforced by the establishment of the Social Committee of Human Rights, composed of persons having high moral authority.

The above activities show that the Government does not treat human rights and methods of their implementation. The humanistic aims of the socialist system oblige the Government to meet better the growing aspirations, with the essential role played by the feeling of real justice in the social sphere, political democracy and subjectivity of citizens.

The Ministry of Labour and Social Policy, as in the past, will inform the ILO of the progress in the work in the field of adjusting the national legislation to ILO standards in the matters raised by the Committee of Experts.

In addition, a Government representative, with respect to the application of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98, referred to the written communication submitted by the Government which contained a description of the present legal situation in this country. This situation was characterised by two elements: firstly, the Law of 8 October 1982 on trade unions which, in its general part on the prospects, assumed the existence of trade union pluralism and dealt with situations where there were more than one trade union organisation in an enterprise; and, secondly, the transitory provision of the same law which had temporarily suspended the legal construction of pluralism. This provision stipulated that “in the period, the end of which would be determined by the Council of State, only one trade union organisation shall act in an enterprise”. In spite of the fact, that the necessary suspension of trade union pluralism was based and justified by the general political, social and economic situation in Poland, the Government did not deny that there was a problem of discrepancy between the transitory provision suspending pluralism and Convention No. 87. A group of experts in Poland, which had been previously referred to in this Committee, had the mandate to carry out an in-depth analysis of this problem, considering its political, social and economic aspects and to suggest to the authorities proper ways of overcoming the difficulties. At present, there was a favourable political climate in Poland towards achieving progress in resolving the open problem of compliance with Convention No. 87. In this regard, the Minister of Labour and Social Policy of Poland had announced several days ago in the Plenary of this Conference that the authorities of the State had recently declared that they were for a pluralistic pattern of co-operation and common responsibility and that a reform-orientated coalition, covering the representatives of different political and moral orientations, was expected in Poland. He had further stressed that Polish authorities were looking towards the ILO for understanding and patience, particularly in the Committee on the Application of Standards with regard to their examination of the problem of trade union pluralism, as well as pluralism of farmers' organisations. With respect to the observations of the Committee of Experts on trade union rights of officials in prison establishments, the Government representative referred to the explanations contained in the above-mentioned written communication. In Polish labour law theory, as well as in practice, the opinion prevailed that the officials in prison establishments were not workers as defined by Article 2 of the Labour Code. This was also true for the officials in the Polish police, militia and professional soldiers. For many years, the officials of prison establishments were part of the police. From an organisational point of view, they were separated from the police after the reform when they were placed under the Minister of Justice. The prison establishment officials, however, preserved the legal status, hierarchy and discipline similar to that of the militia. In light of Article 9, Convention No. 87, it was the Government's conviction that article 3. of the Polish Law on trade unions, which provided that the workers' right to organise in trade unions did not apply to officials in the militia or prison establishment, was in conformity with the spirit and meaning of Convention No. 87. With regard to the Committee of Experts' observations concerning restrictions on the right to strike, the Committee had noted that the Polish legal provisions governing the right to strike were unprecedented in a socialist country. The Government representative noted that when these provisions were enacted the legislative authorities had not been able to take advantage of foreign experience since strike regulations contained in the legislation of other countries were very scarce and there were no international standards in this field. It was the Polish conviction that a strike was the ultimate measure in settling a collective labour dispute and it should only be applied if other possibilities of settling the dispute had been exhausted and had failed. The Trade Union Law of 1982 established three stages of settling collective labour disputes: direct negotiations, conciliation and social arbitration. Only after these stages had been applied and failed could a trade union organise a strike. The Government representative indicated that the above-mentioned written information demonstrated the practical functioning of the Polish three-stage machinery of settling labour disputes, as well as the practical functioning of the strike regulation. Furthermore, with respect to the observations of the Committee of Experts on restrictions on the right to strike, the Government representative indicated that her Government took a fully positive attitude towards at least two of the three observations made on this point. With regard to the observation concerning the extent of exclusions from the right to strike, the Government considered that, as a result of the general reform of Polish labour law, the list of essential services in which strikes were excluded may be revised and reduced, taking into consideration the suggestions of the Committee of Experts. The reform of the labour law was envisaged to be completed in the early 1990s. In regard to the exclusion of political strikes, the speaker noted that the Committee had recalled that the exclusion of strikes that were purely political in character from the scope of principles of freedom of association did not cover strikes which were aimed at criticising a government's economic and social policies. It was the Government's opinion that, although the term "political strike" and the term "strike in defence of the economic and social interest" were not explained in the law on trade unions, the strikes which the Committee of Experts had in mind in its observations would be legally permissible in Poland provided that the other conditions of the legality of a strike were fulfilled. Thus, the Government's position was positive towards this observation of the Committee of Experts. With respect to the Committee of Experts' comment concerning the Polish requirement of a consent of the majority of all the workers employed in the enterprise for a strike to be called, the Committee of Experts was of the opinion that a simple majority of the persons voting should be sufficient. In this respect, the Government considered that a strike should be the expression of the will of the collectivity and that refraining from taking part in a vote meant lack of support. However, in spite of such conviction, the Government gave its assurance that the opinion of the Committee of Experts would be brought to the attention of the national committee elaborating the general reform of the labour law in Poland. Thus, the Government did not reject this observation of the Committee of Experts.

The Workers' members welcomed the dialogue which had been resumed with the Government of Poland since last year, and that Poland had rescinded its notice to withdraw from the ILO. Despite differing views it was through meeting and re-establishing dialogue that solutions were able to be achieved. This case concerned two essential Conventions – Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 – and these were vital with respect to relations between the social partners and the Government. In light of the oral and written replies provided to the present Committee and the dialogue which occurred last year it would appear that there was a desire on the part of Poland to seek ways of resolving the problems which existed. However there were certain aspects which must continue to be examined. Firstly, certain legal provisions needed to be amended despite the existence of special situations. Based on the statement made by the Government representative, it appeared that good will to change clearly existed. It was necessary to translate this good will into practice. Secondly, the Workers recalled that even though there existed a number of trade unions, trade union pluralism desired by the workers did not exist in fact because only one trade union organisation could exist in an enterprise. Requests had been made by workers in many enterprises to establish new trade unions, and to date, these requests had been refused. The Workers' members were concerned by this situation but they hoped that the Committee charged with the reformation of the labour legislation as well as the good will demonstrated by the Government representative of Poland by resuming membership in the ILO would contribute to an improvement in this situation. The Workers' members further noted the problems which existed with regard to trade union officials in prison establishments. Despite the changes which had taken place in the law and the reassignment of these officials to the Ministry of Justice, this situation still needed to be clarified. The Workers' members recalled that the right to strike was a fundamental right which should be respected and which should not be used lightly because it could damage the interests of workers as well as the economy of the country. A strike was not a goal in itself. There existed agreements between the social partners in industrial and commercial enterprises as well as in public administration which included the possibilities of recourse. It was true that a strike should be the last recourse, but in certain cases strikes were justified particularly in serious situations such as in the dismissal of trade union leaders. Trade union organisations should remain within their sphere of competence with an awareness of the economic and social spheres; however, certain economic, political or social measures taken by governments could justify recourse to a strike. With regard to legislation, the Government seemed inclined to take measures which would be in conformity with the legislation. The Workers' members hoped that this situation would be improved and that Poland would be able to give full satisfaction to the Committee of Experts' observations as well as to the views expressed during the discussions in the present Committee.

The Employers' members noted the information contained in the report of the Committee of Experts, the written documents and the oral statement of the Government representative concerning this case. It was clear that Convention No. 87 entitled workers and employers to constitute organisations of their own choosing and thus guaranteed pluralism. It was to be decided by the workers and employers themselves whether they would make use of that possibility. The legal provision which required one single trade union was a very serious violation of the Convention. The argument that the workers at a certain time in history wanted only one trade union was not applicable because this would effectively mean that workers in the future would no longer have the right, guaranteed to them by the Convention, to create more unions of their own choosing. It was positive this Committee no longer needed to hold this discussion and that the Government recognised that it was not in conformity with the Convention. The Employers' members noted the Government representative's statement that the current non-conformity with the Convention was a transitional situation and that the trade union law recognised pluralism, but that these provisions were suspended for an indefinite period of time. Theoretically, improvements may have occurred, however, in practice a single trade union continues to exist. It should be noted that in his written communication the Government established the relationship between that question and the subsequent questions concerning political pluralism. Again, despite the theory, the Employers' members stressed that there were trade unions in Poland which were prohibited, not consulted and not represented in the Workers' delegation of Poland at the ILO Conference. It was noted from the report of the Committee of Experts that a certain number of protective measures existed against dismissals and thus the Employers' members agreed that certain matters were on the right path. Moreover, a certain number of comments concerning the protection of the right to organise were noted from the report. However, these improvements were only applicable to the authorised unions and not to the prohibited or non-authorised unions. For this reason the Committee of Experts quite rightly concluded that in the long run everything depended upon the practice and this will remain to be seen in the future. It was noted that since June 1987 no collective agreements had been concluded and the Employers' members wanted to know why this was the case. They expressed the hope that the road from the recognition of the need to apply, in practice, certain legal tenets would not be too long and that improvements in theory will become improvements in practice. Freedom of association was not yet guaranteed in Poland. Not without some concern, the Employers' members expressed their interest in the information which would be contained in next year's report.

A Worker member of the United States found the Polish Government's replies to the comments made by the Committee of Experts rather interesting but full of contradictions. For example, the Polish Government had stated that workers could freely organise to defend their occupational and social interests yet it was stated that as a temporary measure only one trade union organisation could act in an enterprise. The Workers' members posed the question as to what was the Polish Government's definition of temporary. With regard to the Polish Government's remarks concerning broad democracy at the enterprise level, he noted the statement in the written communication of the Government on the existence of self-managing bodies elected by the staff which were said to enjoy rights permitting them to influence the enterprise management and to control the activities of the manager. It should be noted that the so-called workers' self-management councils were intended to represent the collective employer, within the context of a planned economy, rather than the workers, therefore they could not be considered a replacement for trade unions. He noted that the Polish Government attempted to differentiate workers' rights between a system based on socialised ownership and one based on market economy with regard to restrictions on the right to strike. Workers' rights were workers' rights regardless of the economic system and that principle should be reflected in the conclusions of the present Committee. He noted that the trade union law forbade the organisation of more than one trade union in any one enterprise. Moreover, it defined the terminology by which a trade union must be known and thus excluded the usage of the name "Solidarnosc". It also required that any founding committee of a trade union must comprise a minimum of ten persons and a minimum of 50 members to be eligible for registration. In almost all enterprises the authorities established constitutive committees and thereby blocked the possibility of workers to legally organise unions themselves. However, some of the founding committees had failed to obtain the required number of members. Therefore, they remained unregistered and claimed to be independent since they were not linked with the official trade union movement. It was noted that in the list of examples of collective disputes contained in the written communication of the Government, no mention was made of the major strike at the Lenin Gdansk shipyard where the workers' main demand was the renewed legalisation of the NSZZ "Solidarnosc". He also noted the situation at the Catholic University of Lublin, an institution devoid of any trade union organisation, where the Government refused to register the workers' choice of a union simply because they wanted the word "Solidarnosc" in its name. With regard to the exclusions from the right to strike of categories of enterprises or occupations, the speaker requested clarification as to what was meant in the written communication of the Government by "benefits and means necessary for the normal existence of the society". With regard to the terminology of "excessive wage increase tax" as stated in this communication, he pointed out that this provision was confiscatory five times over even though it was the enterprise which had to pay it. Essentially this was an effective wage control because an enterprise would have to be extremely profitable in order for the workers to be able to negotiate wage increases above the Government's threshold of 12 per cent. This so-called excessive wage increase tax forces compliance with the economic policy of the Government and represents serious interference in the collective bargaining process and the rights to collective bargaining as enshrined in Convention No. 98. The speaker regretted to note that in this year's Committee of Experts' report on Poland, no mention was made of the 1983-84 Committee of Inquiry set up by the ILO in 1983 regarding the application of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98.

A Worker member of the Byelorussian SSR noted that a sufficient amount of clear information had been put forward by the Government of Poland concerning the implementation of Convention No. 87. He pointed to the good co-operation of the Government of Poland with the International Labour Organisation and in this respect he referred to the very open and candid information contained in the written communications of the Government. He stated that the Government recognised certain differences which existed between national legislation and the Convention and in his view these differences were not as great as in some other cases already considered by this Committee. In respect of the legislation of Poland, and its conformity with Article 2 of the Convention No. 87, the Government had very clearly put forward its motives for its certain degree of divergence from Convention No. 87. The situation in Poland was not a simple one. At this stage, the Government had not been successful at doing everything that had been thought of or desired in order to bring national legislation into conformity with the Convention. In practice, Polish workers were guaranteed broad political rights and freedoms and they actively made use of them. This was clearly shown by the information contained in the written communication of the Government submitted to the present Committee. He noted satisfaction with the readiness of the Government to bring national legislation into conformity with the ILO Convention No. 87. He highlighted the fact that the Government had set up a national committee on reform issues of labour legislation and that a group of experts had been set up under the Ministry of Labour with similar objectives. This indicated the serious intentions of the Government. However, more effort and time will be required. He stressed that this Committee could take note of a certain amount of progress in the position of the Government and that patience should be shown with a view to the further evolution of this situation.

The Worker member of the United Kingdom noted the very comprehensive explanations provided by the Government and submitted before this Committee. With regard to the rights of civil servants to join trade unions, the written communication of the Government contained a list of exclusions which included employees whose duties were of a confidential nature. He drew attention to the fact that the Government of Poland was using the same argument as the Government of the United Kingdom in stating that Convention No. 151 overrode Convention No. 87. Convention No. 151 did not override Convention No. 87 and he hoped that the Government of Poland would recognise this in its revision of the labour legislation. It should be remembered that civil servants had rights the same as everyone else and that those rights were enshrined in Convention No. 87. With regard to the right to strike, he noted that the exclusions contained in the written communication of the Government, including areas such as safety and defence, the normal functioning of state bodies and the fulfilment of international obligations, seemed to comprise a definition of the work of the civil service. Thus the law appeared to virtually exclude civil servants from having the right to strike. He wished to remind the Polish Government that civil servants had the same right to strike as other workers.

The Workers' members, with respect to the applications of Convention No. 98, noted their concern with regard to the questions raised by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) and the World Confederation of Labour (WCL) concerning former trade unionists who have been interned, arrested or sentenced and then amnestied and who had difficulty in recovering their employment. These measures were said to have occurred for political reasons and not for reasons of involvement with a trade union. However, it was clear that when workers participated in trade union activities within the framework of Solidarnosc they were treated accordingly. Solidarnosc was a trade union organisation and it should be recognised as such and the activities of its members should not be considered political. Such discrimination against trade unions should not continue to exist. With respect of the implementation of Conventions, all Members of the ILO were beholden to the same duties irrespective of whether they were socialist or capitalistic countries. The Workers' members further noted that there was no comment made by the Polish member of the Committee of Experts concerning the observations of the Committee of Experts on Conventions Nos. 87 and 98. This may be seen as significant; efforts have been made and the Workers' members looked forward to more information and hoped for progress to be achieved in accordance with the Committee of Experts' comments.

The Worker member from the Netherlands noted his satisfaction that this year the present Committee was able to discuss the substance of the Polish case. It was important to note that this Committee stood, at the present time, at the point where the Committee of Inquiry left off. In previous years the Committee of Experts' reports contained the conclusions of the Committee of Inquiry. In this regard it would have been useful this year if the Committee of Experts' reports had made an effort to take stock of what had been realised up to the present time. Next year, he would like to see the Committee of Experts make an effort in this regard. He stated that the Polish Government had explained its present difficulties in terms of denying the right of Solidarnosc to represent the interests of its members on the basis of its economic situation. Many Governments had run into such difficulties, however, the argument in this case was not very impressive. Before Solidarnosc existed and during its existence there were major economic difficulties. Since Solidarnosc had been prohibited the economic situation had not improved. Moreover, it should be pointed out that the leadership of Solidarnosc had tried to participate in the national debate of the economic difficulties and they had taken a very responsible attitude. Therefore it was not this organisation's attitude which could have given rise to the repressive position taken by the Government. Further, the speaker regretted that the leadership of Solidarnosc had been prevented from joining delegations of international trade union organisations and from being represented at this Conference. This was also a violation of Convention No. 87.

The Government member of the USSR welcomed the return of Poland to the ILO and their participation in meetings. This proof of goodwill as well as the interesting dialogue in which they engaged demonstrated Poland's respect towards the ILO. Poland had ratified 74 Conventions, not only seven or nine Conventions. Of the 150 Members of the ILO only 11 countries had ratified as many or slightly more Conventions. In the present situation in Poland, it was not a simple matter for Poland to take on all these responsibilities. He noted the great praise which had been addressed to Poland this year as compared to last year. In this Committee the Polish Government had given an open and candid reply concerning the situations which have arisen in its country, including in the trade union movement. The complete information supplied by Poland in the written communications was much appreciated. Moreover it should be highly valued that the Government representative of Poland addressed the comments made by the Committee of Experts. In this respect there were certain matters being studied and there was a temporary decision regarding the question of trade union pluralism. The openness with which this situation was discussed showed the degree of responsibility taken by Poland. The fact that Poland had established a special committee to review legislation showed its full awareness that the measures which have been taken were of an emergent and transitory nature. This Committee should avoid giving lessons or recommendations as to how the Polish Government should act in every specific case. The comments which had been heard today concerning what the Committee of Experts did not fully do were not of reasonable analysis and they should not exist in this Committee's dialogue. Moreover, in the past, explanations of unemployment and economic difficulties had been accepted by this Committee as to why Conventions had not been applied, therefore it should not be said in this case that economic difficulties could not provide explanations. It was also noted that the need for compliance with Convention No. 87 was emphasised by various members who came from countries which had not ratified the Convention. In concluding, the speaker stressed that account should be taken of all the different facets of the situation prevailing in Poland.

The Worker member of the German Democratic Republic agreed with the statement made by the Workers' member of the USSR. The trade unions in the German Democratic Republic had very close relations with their Polish colleagues and they knew that the trade unions in Poland defended the interests of the workers under the very difficult conditions that existed in that country. It was one of the main duties of the ILO to give its greatest support to these endeavours and such support should include the taking note of the very constructive report of the Polish Government representative.

The Government member of the United States noted the good intentions that the Government of Poland had expressed. She suggested that in its review of the labour legislation, the Polish Government might also take into account the recommendations of the Committee of Inquiry which examined the Polish trade union situation in 1984. Even though all references to the Commission of Inquiry had been purged from ILO reports, its conclusions and recommendations were as valid today as the day they had been published. With respect to ratification, she noted that ratification was no substitute for implementation of international labour standards.

The Worker member of Austria was pleased to note that Poland had ratified 74 Conventions; however, if they had only ratified 72 he would have also been happy. He expressed concern over the problems concerning the application of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 and he hoped that the Polish Government would seriously consider the recommendations of the Committee of Experts and of the Committee on Freedom of Association so that some progress could be recorded next year.

The Government representative of Poland, concerning the application of Convention No. 98, noted that the Committee of Experts had made two observations: one concerning the field of anti-trade union discrimination, and the second regarding the procedure of registration of collective agreements in Poland. With regard to the first observation of the Committee of Experts, the speaker referred to the extensive information which had been submitted to this Committee in writing. With regard to the second observation concerning the procedure of registration of collective agreements she noted that it had been a long tradition in Poland – never contested by the ILO – that collective agreements had entered into force after being introduced in a register kept by the Minister of Labour who, before registration, controlled the conformity of the agreement with the law. Prior to the social and economic reform in Poland, both parties to the collective agreement negotiated the agreement and as far as the economic aspects of the agreement were concerned – they were controlled by their respective high-level supervisory organs. As a result of the recent social and economic reforms in Poland, both bargaining parties were independent of any high-level supervision; thus, theoretically, they were able to bargain for wages and other benefits which did not have a basis in the Polish economic situation or any accepted rules of economic reform. Yet, the Polish economy was based on social and economic plans established by negotiations and consultations between the Government and the trade union. Both of these parties – the Government and the Trade Union Alliance – were interested in ensuring that collective agreements complied with these economic plans. She noted that that was why the law of November 1986 on collective agreements had admitted the control of the conformity of collective agreements with the law as well as with the social and economic plans. The refusal to register a collective agreement by the Minister of Labour enables him to indicate the non-conformity of a collective agreement submitted to him for registration. The final appraisal with regard to whether a collective agreement was in conformity with the law was within the competence of the Supreme Court. The final appraisal of compliance with the social and economic plans as entrusted to a special committee, half of which was comprised of representatives of the Presidium of the Government and half from the Polish Alliance of Trade Unions. This committee had to settle any dispute expeditiously, within a certain time period, and its decision was binding on the Minister of Labour. This mechanism of appraisal of the conformity of collective agreements had been the subject of long discussions and negotiations within the mixed governmental and trade union committee charged with the preparation of the draft law on collective agreements during 1985 and 1986. Following many months of controversy within this committee, the solution had finally been found and agreed to be included in the draft of this law. This solution was regarded as assuring the proper protection of rights and interests of workers, of trade unions and of the collectivity. Thus the Government appreciated the social values of this solution and at this time could not perceive any non-compliance with Convention No. 98 in this respect. The Government representative noted her satisfaction with the statements of both the Workers' and Employers' members and was particularly pleased with the Workers' declaration which proved that they understood the philosophy of the Polish strikes regulations. She wished to point out that the Polish Government did not deny the fact that the temporary suspension of trade union pluralism had raised problems of compliance with Convention No. 87. She referred to the task of the group of experts established in Poland to consult the Government and the authorities on the ways of overcoming this non-compliance. With respect to the remarks of the Worker member from the United Kingdom concerning the expression "benefits and means necessary for the normal existence of society", she explained that this included occupations such as fire brigades, state defence and security positions, manufacturing, storing and distributing foods, public health and social welfare, pharmacies and educational institutions. Moreover, with regard to civil servants, she pointed out that the law on civil servants acknowledged the right of Polish civil servants to organise in trade unions. It was not right to state that the law on civil servants imposed the monopoly of one trade union on Polish civil servants. With regard to the comments made by the Worker member of the United States, she noted that he had some legal misunderstandings or perhaps misinformation concerning the trade union situation in Poland and suggested that he discuss these with the Polish trade union member in this Committee.

Another Government representative of Poland recalled some basic facts about the trade union situation in Poland and the use of the right to associate in trade unions. There were more than 7 million members of trade union organisations in Poland and more than 27,000 trade union organisations. He noted that while pluralism in trade union organisations did not exist at the enterprise level, it could exist on a higher level, for instance on an industry-wide basis. Recent data indicated that only 50 applications had been made for the establishment of a new trade union organisation in enterprises. With respect to the problem of the so-called Solidarity organisation, he noted that it had once been recognised as a trade union organisation, but because it had diverged from its trade union aims, it had been dissolved. It was true that there were some groups that called themselves Solidarity, but he questioned whether they were trade union organisations. There were three types of situation involving trade unions and political activities. One was when a trade union took a position on some political issue and in such a case, trade unions should be allowed to publicly make their position known. The second situation was when an established trade union diverged from the trade union activities and became a political organisation. The third type of situation was when a political group pretended to have the status of a trade union and this was the situation that existed with many groups which named themselves Solidarity. For this type of activity there were forums other than trade unions. With respect to the concern as to how the Government intended to change or revise the law on trade union association, the Council of State would decide when pluralism of trade union organisations on the enterprise level should be restored. In this regard, account would be taken of the work of the expert group in Poland, the general evolution of social and political life in Poland and the economic situation. With regard to this latter factor the speaker noted that at the beginning of the 1980s Poland suffered a severe economic and social crisis, particularly with respect to their external economic relations. With respect to the questions raised concerning the participation of Mr.

Walesa in this Conference, he noted that Mr. Walesa had applied to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs for a passport and that the passports given by that office were only to persons who were on an official mission; and, as Mr. Walesa was not on such a mission, the application was not admitted.

The Workers' and Employers' members noted that it was not appropriate to bring up the past or, in other words, to give reasons for the prohibition of Solidarity. It would be better to look toward the future with the hope that there would be changes and that the past would remain the past.

The Government representative of Poland who has just spoken noted that it was not his intention to bring up the past but rather to respond to issues that had been raised. He stressed that his Government's oral and written statements before this Committee had been future-oriented.

The Committee noted the extensive written and oral information supplied by the Government and the detailed discussion which took place within the Committee. It noted that the Government of Poland did not deny that there were discrepancies between the Polish legislation and the provisions of the Conventions. It noted in this connection the assurances given by the Government as to its intention to take measures to comply with the Conventions and the establishment of a group of experts entrusted with the task of analysing the conformity of current Polish legislation with the Conventions. The Committee has to note, however, that no changes have been recorded with regard to the long-standing comments of the Committee of Experts on the non-conformity of several legislative provisions with the requirements of the Conventions. The Committee urged the Government, in the spirit of dialogue the latter has demonstrated, to take the necessary steps to ensure that the principles contained in both Conventions were fully applied in law and in practice so that next year the Committee of Experts would be able to note progress towards removing the present divergencies.

United Kingdom (ratification: 1949). A Government representative recalled that this case arose from the action taken by the Government in 1984 in regard to the staff employed at a Government establishment known as Government Communications Headquarters (GCHQ) in Cheltenham. GCHQ was one of the security and intelligence agencies upon which the United Kingdom's national security depended. The staff were, however, all civilians, members of the Civil Service and were not subject to military discipline. It was in the interests of national security that the operations and activities of GCHQ be maintained at all times without interruption and interference. The work of the individual members of the staff was of vital importance to the operational effectiveness of GCHQ as a whole. The policy of successive governments had been to encourage membership of national unions among to staff of GCHQ, to recognise such unions where appropriate and to negotiate with them. However, between 1979 and 1981 industrial action had been taken at GCHQ on several occasions leading to a loss of over 10,000 working days. Most of this industrial action arose from disputes between the Government and national unions over the pay and conditions of service applicable to civil servants generally. This disruption to the work of GCHQ was co-ordinated and encouraged by national unions. Whenever a threat of industrial action existed, GCHQ sought informally to dissuade staff from taking action which would adversely affect the conduct of operations. In 1981 the national unions refused to co-operate. The Government was convinced that industrial disruption of the kind which took place could do real damage to national security and thus decided that the conditions of service of GCHQ staff should be brought into line with those for other staff engaged on security and intelligence duties. The Prime Minister therefore issued an instruction in January 1984 under Article 4 of the Civil Service Order-in-Council, 1982, providing that civil servants employed at GCHQ should not be members of any trade union other than a departmental staff association. Various rights under employment protection legislation were also disapplied. Existing staff were given the choice between remaining at GCHQ under the new terms and seeking a transfer to other suitable posts. This decision was reached after long and careful consideration of all aspects including obligations under ILO Conventions to which, it was concluded, there was no infringement. In discussion held with the national unions following the Government announcement, the trade unions proposed a no-disruption agreement. However, the Government had to reject these proposals as they did not provide sufficient guarantee that difficulties would not arise in the future. The Government representative further recalled that these measures were considered by the courts of the United Kingdom at three separate levels and the Government's decision was upheld. The European Commission of Human Rights concluded that no breach of Article 11 of the European Convention on Human Rights had occurred. The Government had explained to the Conference Committee in detail in 1985 why its actions did not represent a breach of Convention No. 87. The basis of the Government's position was that where a government had ratified two International Labour Conventions dealing with the same subject, the provisions of both Conventions must be considered when deciding whether the Government was meeting its obligations. In the present case the two relevant Conventions were No. 87 concerning freedom of association and protection of the right to organise and No. 151 concerning labour relations in the public service. Under Article 1(2) of Convention No. 151 the extent to which the guarantees concerning the protection of the right to organise applied to certain high level employees or to employees whose duties were of a highly confidential nature was to be determined by national laws or regulations. It was therefore clear that the protection, under Article 4 of the same Convention, against acts of anti-union discrimination should be a matter for governments to determine when employees in highly confidential work were concerned. The United Kingdom had exercised its rights under national laws to make regulations in respect of employees at GCHQ in the interests of national security and it had done so lawfully. In response to the Committee of Experts' request, the Government had regularly reported on developments in this matter, but there were no recent developments on this case.

The Worker representative of the United Kingdom pointed out the length of time this case had been before the present Committee. He stressed that any offence under Convention No. 87 was a grave offence to all workers throughout the world. This matter was particularly grave because if such a problem could not be solved in a country with an advanced economy and with a history as one of the birthplaces of trade unionism in the world, then what hope was there for workers in less developed countries, under military dictatorships or under martial law. He emphasised the difficulty in pursuing, in the Committee, a dialogue with a Government that listened but apparently had no intention whatsoever of complying with the requests of the Committee of Experts and the Committee on Freedom of Association. In his view, the Government spoke as though it had the right on its side and it was the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee which year after year had been all wrong. Human rights could not be preached to the rest of the world without accepting the same human rights enshrined by Convention No. 87 in the United Kingdom. With respect to the history of this case he recalled that a group of civil servants employed, admittedly, on secret work at GCHQ were for more than a quarter of a century in membership of nationally recognised trade unions. They found no conflict between their work and their membership of trade unions, and trade unions found no difficulty in negotiating on their behalf. Indeed, trade union officers were given security clearance to examine part of the work, to ensure that the jobs were correctly graded and paid, to ensure that they were getting their full trade union rights. When they were originally recruited to membership of the trade unions, the Government never suggested at any stage during that period that there should be no-strike agreements. The industrial action which took place resulted from unilateral withdrawal by the Government of a 25-year standing pay agreement; this led to a series of one-day strikes in most civil service departments and a warning from employees at GCHQ that they were to take part in this action. Some years after the event the Government withdrew the right of national unions to organise at GCHQ. At this time the Government offered £1,000 to those employees who would give up their trade union rights. If the employees decided to stay with the trade union they were threatened with dismissal or transfer to other parts of the country where their special skills could no longer be used. Those who stayed with their trade unions were denied rights and suffered discrimination. The company or house union which was established was not allowed to have contact with any other union or any national centre. Convention No. 87 was agreed by all to be a keystone to the standard-setting activity. In this case there was a deliberate and conscious infringement of this Convention. The question of the relationship of this case to Convention No. 151 had in fact been considered by the Committee of Experts, which had rejected the argument put forward by the Government. Under no circumstances did Convention No. 151 override Convention No. 87, which applied to employees at GCHQ, since Article 9 allowed only for the exclusion of the armed forces and the police. In its 235th Report, the Committee on Freedom of Association had stated in its Recommendations that steps should be taken by the Government to pursue negotiations with the civil servants' unions involved, with a view to restoring the rights of freedom of association as laid down in Convention No. 87. This was a simple request and it required a simple answer which this Committee had not received. The speaker thus requested the Government representative to state whether he had the authority of his Government to agree that discussions would be initiated by the Government urgently. If he had no such authority, then the United Kingdom had no intention of fulfilling its commitments under Convention No. 87 and thus would be a Government refusing a request both by the Committee on Freedom of Association and the Committee of Experts. Special paragraph procedures had been introduced for cases of this particular nature, and if the Government representative was unable to give assurances a special paragraph must be considered; otherwise the present Committee would be accused of discrimination.

The Employers' members noted that it was difficult to keep up with the details and committed positions in this dispute between the Government and the workers of the United Kingdom. It would be desirable if the two parties could find an internal solution to this problem as the Employers could not contribute much in this regard. The Government stated that GCHQ was part of military security, and that was why Convention No. 87 did not apply. With respect to the relationship between Convention No. 87 and Convention No. 151, the Committee of Experts had already commented upon this relationship. Previously it appeared that a practical solution had been found but this proved not to be the case. The Committee of Experts had requested the Government to report on new developments, and there was no doubt that this would be done. However, for the time being there were no new developments in this difficult case.

The Workers' members added that all the arguments restated by the Government representative had been before the Committee of Experts, which had squarely come to the conclusion that Convention No. 87 granted the right to organise and made exception only for members of the armed forces and the police. There was no exception for confidential employees, no matter how important they were. With respect to the relationship between Convention No. 151 and Convention No. 87, the Committee of Experts had concluded that Convention No. 87 guaranteed the workers, including those in public service, the right to freely establish and join organisations of their own choosing and that exceptions were not applicable to the present case. Moreover, the Committee of Experts had associated itself with the decision approved by the Governing Body in Case No. 1261 of the Freedom of Association Committee. The Committee of Experts pointed to the recommendation contained in that case, and reiterated it as their own, calling upon the Government to initiate negotiations with the trade unions of the public servants concerned.

The Government representative stated that the United Kingdom had always had, and he hoped would always have, total confidence in the integrity of the supervisory system of the ILO and that it had always tried to fully participate in that system. But any system was composed of individuals which were human beings, and on this one particular point the Committee of Experts was not correct. His Government respected their view but its opinion differed from theirs. The United Kingdom could not accept that Convention No. 87 could or should be examined in isolation from Conventions Nos. 98 and 151. It was perfectly clear from the Preamble to Convention No. 151 that it was adopted with the two earlier Conventions in mind. Convention No. 87 should not continue to apply to the public service, where it would be incompatible with the purpose of the more specific Convention No. 151. Article 1(2) of Convention No. 151 meant what it stated, namely that it was for governments to determine by national laws or regulations the extent to which the guarantees provided for in the Convention applied to public service workers who were engaged in highly confidential work. The Court of Appeal in the United Kingdom specifically held that Article 1(2) of Convention No. 151 took precedence over Convention No. 87. This decision was at odds with earlier decisions of the Committee on Freedom of Association. The Committee of Experts, while not addressing these issues, had noted elsewhere that the interpretation of Conventions involved difficulties in respect of which the international Court of Justice might more appropriately be requested to provide an opinion. This was a recognition by the Committee of Experts that the interpretation of the Conventions by the Committee on Freedom of Association was not the only sustainable one and was not necessarily definitive. In its 1985 Report the Committee of Experts specifically referred to the Recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association. The Government representative noted that the Committee of Experts endorsed the view that, if appropriate negotiations with the national unions had taken place, the Government's objective of guaranteeing the uninterrupted operation of the work at GCHQ could have been achieved in an atmosphere of good industrial relations and without any need to consider the compatibility of government measures with ILO Conventions. It also drew attention to the limitations which might, in accordance with ILO principles, be placed on the rights of public servants to organise and on the means of action available to public servants. The Government noted this helpful and constructive suggestion from the Committee of Experts. The Government had seriously considered whether a solution to the GCHQ problem could be found through renewed negotiations and had decided that this would not serve a useful purpose. This position was reinforced by the trade unions' rejection of concluding a no-strike agreement. The Government concluded by stating that giving the most careful consideration to the comments both of the Committee on Freedom of Association and the present Report of the Committee of Experts, the Government remained firmly of the view, regretfully, that further negotiations with the unions would serve no useful purpose.

The Worker member of Argentina noted that this was a problem which had already been discussed in depth by a body with the highest standing in the Organisation, the Governing Body Committee on Freedom of Association. There, the matter had been studied and conclusions had been reached which were being followed up by the Committee of Experts. This case involved a Government which, after many years' collective bargaining, one day changed the entire system and prevented staff from having any trade union rights. The Government representative of the United Kingdom had clearly stated that his Government was not going to accept any conclusion other than their own interpretation. The workers in the United Kingdom were protected by Convention No. 87, Convention No. 151 was there to protect the right to organise of public servants who are not covered by Convention No. 87. The Government of the United Kingdom was trying to apply a restrictive clause contained in Convention No. 151 over the vested rights of workers under Convention No. 87. He regretted the position taken by the Employers' members that an internal solution should be found to this problem, and that they could not contribute much. If this position were taken each time public servants were involved the ILO tripartite supervisory system would no longer be operative.

The Workers' members noted that the Government representative had stated his Government's open disagreement with the Committee of Experts on this case. Therefore there was no other recourse than to highlight this as an important case presenting great difficulties in a special paragraph in the Report.

The Worker member of Austria pointed out, as a member of the Committee on Freedom of Association, that the Committee, with the support of the Governing Body, had for the past three years asked the Government to start negotiations with the trade unions in connection with GCHQ and Convention No. 87. From the outset, the Government had questioned the applicability of Convention No. 87 as compared with Convention No. 151, and the Committee on Freedom of Association had asked the Committee of Experts to bring more light into this question, which indeed was treated very clearly in their Report. The present Committee could not continue dialogue or expect to make any progress in this case when the Government representative stated that the opinion of the Committee on Freedom of Association and of the Committee of Experts was a mistake. A special paragraph would be appropriate in this case.

The Worker member of Spain noted that there should not be a national solution which contradicted the standards clearly expressed in the Convention. Convention No. 87 entitled civil servants to create and join trade unions. In this case a rather suspect interpretation with a suspect criterion such as national security was being applied at the national level, as was done in countries lacking democracy. The Committee on Freedom of Association had clearly stated that public service officials could enjoy freedom of association although there may be restrictions on the exercise of the right to strike. Therefore, in order to restrict the right to strike, the Government could not suppress freedom of association, which was what the United Kingdom Government had done. Convention No. 87 expressly prohibited this type of interference and the conclusion of the present Committee should be that either the Government representative should accept the negotiations as proposed by the Worker member of the United Kingdom or the Committee would have to adopt the special paragraph.

The Employers' members declared their abstention on the proposal that the conclusions should be contained in a special paragraph. They stated that, on this proposal, they did not hold the same opinion as the Workers' members and sometimes such small differences of view had an effect on the subsequent procedure, as would perhaps be seen next year.

The Workers' members expressed their deep regret over the Employers' members abstention. A failure to mention this case in a special paragraph could give the unfortunate impression that there were two standards operating: one for the less developed countries and another for rich European countries. They could see no point in having the Committee vote on their proposal.

The Committee noted the information supplied by the Government representative, as well as the detailed discussion within the present Committee. It noted with concern that, despite the time which had elapsed, no measures had been taken to implement fully the right to organise of workers without distinction whatsoever, as provided by the Convention. It expressed the firm hope that discussions would be commenced rapidly between the Government and the unions concerned so as to enable solutions to the legislative and factual situation to be found. It trusted that the Government's next report to the Committee of Experts would contain information on positive developments in this respect.

Dominican Republic (ratification: 1973) See under Convention No. 105

Portugal (ratification 1983) The Government has communicated the following information: it was convinced that it should wait for the year in which the report is normally due in order to reply to the comments of the General Confederation of Portuguese Workers, Intersindical Nacional - (CGTP-IN). The information refers to that previously given and brought up to date on 31 March 1988. The Government considers that the observations made by the CGTP-IN rest on an erroneous foundation. Several annexes are furnished, particularly concerning labour inspection activities.

In addition, a Government representative stated that his Government understood the anxieties of the General Confederation of Portuguese Workers (CGTP) in regard to the regular and timely payment of wages. The 1969 Act had, in fact, conformed to the provisions of the Convention prior to its ratification in 1983. This law provided for the mandatory payment of timely and regular wages and imposed fines for non-compliance. The labour inspection system was responsible for the control of the implementation of the law. Legislative Decree 491/85 established a new system of penalties. During the 1980s his country had experienced a serious economic crisis and the non-payment of wages was one of the methods used by small enterprises to reduce their financial outlay. It was often abused and caused an excessive number of wages to be paid in arrears and brought about a serious social situation of which the present Committee knew, both from the representation made by the CGTP and by the information supplied regularly by the Government. The situation had now returned to normal and written information has been sent by his Government on this subject to the Committee of Experts. Some of the significant factors in this improvement were the upswing in economic conditions, the adoption of deterrent legislation, control by the labour inspectorate, the awareness of the population (to which the observations presented to the ILO and information published on this subject had contributed decisively), and the dynamic action taken by the trade unions and debates in Parliament. The legal provisions adopted in 1985 and 1986 had been noted with satisfaction by the Committee of Experts, who had mentioned the modifications made in the cases of progress. Although the number of workers affected by the payment of wages in arrears had decreased from some 64,000 in 1986 to some 20,000 in March 1988, that is 0.72 per cent of wage earners, the Government continued to be concerned over the situation of these workers.

Referring to the observations made by the CGTP and to the subsequent information communicated by his Government in regard to the role played by the labour inspectorate, the Government representative stated that the labour inspectorate exercised its powers in regard to both basic wages and allowances. He hoped that, in accordance with the spirit of tripartite dialogue which was the basis of the ILO, certain doubts which remained would be clarified and resolved in his country through the strengthening of contacts amongst workers' and employers' organisations and labour administration bodies.

The Employers' members believed that progress had taken place, in particular in regard to the adoption of legislation provisions, and they were pleased to note the positive attitude of Government which had allowed a true dialogue to take place. Certain questions, which the Committee of Experts had raised, remained outstanding, but the main thing was that the continuation of contact between the Government and the Committee of Experts would allow a solution to be found. Problems which arose from arrears in the payment of wages, which were sometimes considerable, remained. Although the number of wages in arrears was less, progress needed to be made. The Government had indicated that measures had already been taken or were envisaged. It was necessary that observations made by the employers' and workers' organisations be taken into account and to continue the tripartite dialogue which was established. Questions also remained on statistics, and the calculations of wages. Much information was available and this should permit the Committee of Experts to properly evaluate the situation. The Employers' members were convinced that the Government would reply to the specific questions addressed to it and would clarify those points which needed explanation.

The Workers' members considered that the statement by the Government representative showed the positive attitude and good intentions of his Government. They were pleased to note the agreement that existed between the Government and the trade unions, which had certainly come about as a result of the representation made by the CGTP. The Government had confirmed that the situation had improved and that measures were being taken to remedy the situation. They appreciated this sign of goodwill.

The Worker member of Portugal stated that in the four years that had passed since her organisation had presented their representation to the ILO on the non-payment of wages, an observation which was based primarily on the violation of the Convention, the incidence of non-payment had decreased noticeably, although it still continued to exist. She stressed the important role played by the ILO and by the present Committee in this decrease. Currently there still remained a large number of workers whose wages had not yet been paid as the decrease in the number of workers had been mostly due to the close down of firms and the high amount of wage losses suffered by these workers. The number of workers concerned was estimated by the Government to be 20,000 but was estimated by her organisation to be 80,000, that is, 2.8 per cent of all wage earners. The figures of her organisation were based on 500 enterprises in different economic sectors throughout the country. The difference in the figures resulted from the different definitions of wages that were used. The Government excluded from their figures stagnating firms or those which had closed down, as well as those workers who were presently receiving their wages but to whom arrears were due. The situation was very serious and the figures indicated an average debt of eight to ten times the value of the minimum salary for each worker for the past two years. Unpaid wages continued to be used by employers as a means of putting on pressure, and as a check to worker protests. Unemployment had increased, and employment which was offered was often casual. The Government had tried to show that the situation was not serious, but what could be more serious for a worker than to work and to not receive his wages: it was his own and his family's life that was in question. The lenient attitude to which the Government representative had referred was unacceptable and measures should be taken in order to resolve the situation definitively. This also concerned public enterprises and the Government should, at least, redress its own shortcomings. The labour inspectorate lacked personnel and technical resources, and no measure had been taken in this area. The situation should be the subject of an examination by the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee next year.

The Government representative stated that the observations made in 1987 by the CGTP had been sent immediately to the labour inspectorate which had presented their first report. This is adjoined to the additional information furnished by his Government to the present session of the Conference. In regard to the figures of 20,000 or 80,000, there was no document to confirm or disprove those supplied by the CGTP. He had used those supplied by the labour inspectorate. In regard to the allegations concerning the situation in a public enterprise mentioned by the Worker member of Portugal in the present Sitting, he said that as he had no information on this matter, he could not comment.

The Committee takes note of the written and oral information provided by the Government. Although legislative measures have been adopted to guarantee the payment of wages and progress noted by the Committee of Experts, the problem of arrears in payment has not been totally overcome. The Committee again must stress the importance of solving this serious problem, not only in legislation, but also in practice. It hopes that the Government will continue its efforts and will report the progress achieved.

Dominican Republic (ratification: 1953) See under Convention No. 105.

Morocco (ratification: 1957). A Government representative stated that national law and practice did not tolerate any form of anti-union discrimination. The courts considered dismissal on the ground of union activity to be abusive and required the reinstatement of the worker concerned. In addition to using appeals and the right to go to court, unions which are represented in Parliament participated directly in the supervision of government action, and, in particular, those activities which concerned the application of labour legislation. The Committee of Experts had requested that penal sanctions against those who carried out anti-union discrimination be provided for in the legislation. Although the necessity to include such provisions was not apparent from the text of the Convention, the Government had included the appropriate provisions in the draft Labour Code, which had since been adopted by the Government.

The Workers' members stated that the Government had indicated to last year's Conference Committee that a new Labour Code would include legislation in conformity with the Convention. This year, the Committee of Experts had noted that the Government had not yet sent the draft code. This meant, therefore, that another year had gone by without being able to examine whether or not the Labour Code was in conformity with the provisions of the Convention; that in this crisis period trade unionists were even more exposed to discriminatory acts and had indeed lodged complaints of such acts. There also existed problems concerning workers in agricultural enterprises with fewer than ten workers and problems concerning the intervention by the Government in collective bargaining. It was therefore necessary that the Government send the draft Labour Code as well as carry out discussions with employers' and workers' organisations on the modifications to current law and practice.

The Employers' members recalled that the Committee had discussed this case last year. They insisted that the necessary protective measures be taken and that the Government supply detailed information on the measures adopted. They pointed out that in its observations last year, the Committee of Experts had indicated that legislation must guarantee workers an adequate protection through either civil or penal sanctions. They asked what were the real requirements of the Convention. These should give workers adequate protection, require governments to fulfil this obligation, and allow the Committee of Experts to control whether the measures taken had been adequate. Whether or not sanctions should be civil or penal could not be deduced from the text of the Convention and depended on the legal system of the country. The Committee of Experts should clarify this situation.

The Government representative indicated that the draft Labour Code had been drawn up with the assistance of the ILO and that his Government had no objection to forwarding another copy. The Committee of Experts had required that sanctions be provided for and this was in fact the only point mentioned in its observations in spite of the fact that the Employers' group is not quite in agreement with the obligation of penal sanctions.

The Workers' members remarked that it was not certain that the advice given by the ILO in the drafting of the Labour Code had been followed; it was therefore necessary that the draft code be sent for examination by the Committee of Experts.

The Committee took note of the information provided by the Government representative and of the discussion which had taken place in the Committee. It noted the indications that the draft Labour Code was to be adopted by the Parliament. The Committee trusted that the adoption of this legislation would grant a full protection against acts of anti-union discrimination, as required by the Convention. It invited the Government to send the text of the Code so as to enable the Committee of Experts to make a thorough examination of the situation at its next session. The Committee expressed the firm hope that progress would be achieved soon, in law as well as in practice, and that full information would be supplied next year in this regard.

Poland: (ratification: 1957). The Government has communicated the following information: As the ILO Committee of Experts suggested an analysis of the sufficiency of the legal machinery existing in Polish legislation, i.e. in civil and penal law – which protect workers against acts of anti-union discrimination, the Government presents the legal situation in this field.

1. Reinforcement of the national legislation and machinery of protection against the acts of anti-union discrimination

Polish legislation provides for the following machinery of protection of the workers against the acts of anti-union discrimination:

- in the Polish labour law system there exists workers' protection against "unjustified" termination with notice of contracts of employment by establishments as well as an established interpretation of the term "unjustified termination" which ensures that the termination of a contract of employment caused by anti-union discrimination would be considered in legal proceedings as unjustified, and the worker may claim the reinstatement of his previous conditions (section 45 of the Labour Code);
- section 53 of the Act of 8 October 1982 (Trade Union Act) provides that "whoever, in connection with an occupied post or fulfilled function, does not fill his obligation or in any other way infringes the provisions of the Act, shall be liable to a fine..." This regulation may be also applied to infringement of section 39 of the Trade Union Act which protects the employment relationship of elected trade union officials for a period of one year after the expiration of their term and section 4 providing that "no one can bear negative consequences due to his membership of a trade union, being elected to a function in this trade union or staying outside the union. In particular it cannot be a condition for concluding an employment contract, staying in employment or promotion, unless the provisions of the Act prohibit membership (in a trade union) of workers employed in a given enterprise or at a given post";

- section 190 of the Penal Code provides that: "Whoever, when responsible in an enterprise for matters connected with employment, malevolently or persistently infringes workers' rights resulting from the labour relationship or social insurance provisions and thus creates the danger of serious prejudice to a worker is liable to imprisonment of up to three years";
- section 415 and following of the Civil Code introducing the universal principle of responsibility: "Whoever through his fault harms another person shall redress it", may be also a ground for action in the civil procedure for redressing the damage caused by acts of anti-union discrimination against trade union leaders;
- section 281 of the Labour Code provides that "Any person acting on behalf of an enterprise who terminates an employment relationship with a worker without notice, and in doing so contravenes the provision of labour law shall be liable to a fine..."

In the light of the above it should be stated that the current legal system, also in the form of civil and penal sanctions, guarantees the prevention of anti-union discrimination of workers and their protection.

2. Registration of collective agreements (Article 4 of the Convention)

Complementing the information submitted to the 73rd Session of the International Labour Conference and the report of the Government of the Polish People's Republic (October 1987), the Government explains that, in the light of the Act of 24 November 1986, amending the Labour Code, the Minister of Labour and Social Policy, as the organ registering a collective agreement, is not an organ of the last instance in the field of appraisal of inconsistency of the contents of an agreement with the socio-economic policy of the State determined by the Sejm in the national socio-economic plan. In accordance with section 242(4) of the Labour Code, if the Minister of Labour and Social Policy discovers that a collective agreement submitted for registration is not in conformity with this policy, each of the parties to the agreement may ask for a settlement of the dispute in this regard by the Committee, half on which is made up of candidates from the Presidium of the Government and half from the competent organ of the national inter-trade union organisation. The Committee settles the dispute expeditiously within a period not exceeding three months and its decision is binding on the Minister of Labour and Social Policy.

Examination of conformity of collective agreements with the national socio-economic plan is based on the generally formulated principles of central policy of wages negotiated and agreed between the Government and the trade unions and then adopted by the Parliament (Sejm) within a national socio-economic plan; consideration is taken of the general state, the necessary directions of development and the needs of the economy, as well as ensuring the motivation function of incomes from work leading to stimulation of the growth of production and services through the increase of labour productivity and closer connection of pay with effects and results of enterprises' work. In addition, unjustified pay disproportions are eliminated through the application of objective methods of job evaluation.

The principles of implementation of the central wage policy in collective agreements are determined in Part III, Chapter 2, paragraph 4, of the parliamentary resolution of 18 December 1986 on the national socio-economic plan for the years 1986-90 (Dziennik Ustaw No. 45 of 1986, text 224). Chapter 2, paragraph 4, provides, inter alia, that collective agreements are an essential instrument for the implementation of the objectives of the wage policy. They should allow for the creation of proper relations between pay in different occupations and work posts in different branches and contribute to a closer connection of the level of pay with the quality and quantity of work and the conditions in which it is performed. Thus, before they conclude a collective agreement, competent ministers (heads of central offices), central co-operative organisations, central social organisations (nation-wide) as well as associations of non-socialised enterprises, should analyse in detail the financial effects of this agreement.

To sum up, in the light of legal provisions in force, the Minister of Labour and Social Policy has no final power in contesting the conformity of the agreement with the socio-economic policy of the State, and the arbitration provided for in the case of a dispute concerning registration of an agreement guarantees the protection of the workers' interests through the trade union's participation in the arbitration.

The Ministry of Labour and Social Policy wishes to add that the Group of Experts mentioned under Convention No. 87 will also consider the methods of implementation of Convention No. 98.

See also General Observations.

In addition, see Convention No. 87.

Turkey (ratification: 1952). The Government has communicated the following information:

The Government wishes to inform that the Parliament has approved on 25 and on 27 May 1988 the Laws Nos. 3449 and 3451 containing amendments proposed both by the Government and by the legislators during the legislative process to the Laws Nos. 2821 and 2822.

It explains that the work on the amendments which has been carried out on a tripartite basis started immediately after the Government took office at the end of last year. The objective followed has been to adapt the existing industrial relations legislation to Turkey's international commitments without prejudice to the need for sound industrial peace. Utmost efforts have been deployed to incorporate in the amendments, to the extent possible and within the limits allowed by the Constitution, the views of all parties and the suggestions made by the ILO mission.

The Government states that the following elements have been taken into account: the shortcomings observed during almost five years of implementation of two Acts; the amendment proposals put forward by the workers and employers and conformity with the principles laid down by relevant ILO Conventions ratified by Turkey, as well as the relevant court decisions and the views of academics. With a view to protecting industrial peace, particular attention was paid to the preservation of the balancing role of the State in the relations between workers and employers as well as the codification requirements.

Within the context of the above approach, the following changes were made to the Trade Union Act No. 2821:

- conditions required for founding members will be simplified;
- it will be possible for the executive officers of the trade unions to assume functions in the management or audit boards of public undertakings and establishments;
- conditions required for being elected to the mandatory organs of the trade unions have been further facilitated;
- continuity has been established with respect to the duration of the functions of the shop stewards;
- possibility of being re-elected to the mandatory organs of trade unions has been increased from four to eight terms;
- the scope of the mandate for auditing the trade unions has been limited and clearly defined;
- conditions required for opening new trade union branches have been facilitated;
- persons carrying out religious functions and students will be able to join trade unions;
- in cases where an employer terminates the employment contract of a worker because of his membership to a trade union, the employer shall be liable to pay compensation which shall not be less than the worker's total annual wage;
- the definition of the political activities of the trade union will be clarified;
- trade unions will be authorised to spend a part of their revenues for social purposes;
- the provision which stipulates that the assets of dissolved organisations shall be transferred to the State Treasury will be repealed; the fate of the assets of dissolved organisations will be determined by the organisations themselves. If this cannot be materialised, or if the organisation is closed by a court decision, its assets shall be transferred to a fund to be administered on a tripartite basis and these funds shall be used for occupational orientation, vocational training and rehabilitation of the workers;
- trade unions will be audited once in each election period, instead of yearly auditing;
- members' contributions will also be paid to the trade unions which have obtained the certificate of competence;
- the shortcomings observed and the abuses made in the determination of the competent trade unions will be eliminated by amending some sections in favour of trade unions;
- the controversies faced in the acquisition of membership will be removed by assuring the right to the membership. Moreover, the inconveniences encountered by the trade unions in their organisation in the workplaces will be completely eliminated by repealing the obligation of the trade unions to transmit one copy of the workers' membership registration forms to the employer;

In the Collective Bargaining Strike and Lock-out Act No. 2822 the following changes have been made:

- the collective labour agreement will not be extended in cases where a competent trade union exists and the implementation will be brought in line with the collective labour agreement system;

- the scope of strike and lock-out prohibitions on certain activities and services has been further narrowed;
- the rules to be observed by the employers during a lawful strike have been clearly defined;
- the number of authorised strike pickets has been doubled;
- the provision concerning temporary strike prohibition applicable in a state of emergency or under the martial law has been annulled;
- the prohibition of forming groups around the establishment during a lawful strike or lock-out will be annulled;
- the possibility of having access to shelter for the strike pickets will be provided;
- the amount of fines to be paid by any employer recruiting a worker during a lawful strike will be increased;
- the Parliament has also annulled the provision granting authority to the Supreme Arbitration Board to renew any expiring collective labour agreement with the changes it deems necessary, in case a strike or a lock-out is not permitted, or whenever emergency administration rules apply, as in time of war or general or partial mobilisation;
- the composition of the Supreme Arbitration Board will be changed so as to provide for equal numbers of representatives of workers, employers and government, under the chairmanship of the Chief Judge of the Labour Division of the Court of Appeal.

In addition a Government representative stated that his Government firmly believed in pursuing constructive dialogue with the ILO, and recalled that in its report, the Committee of Experts referred to Act No. 2822 on collective bargaining, strikes and lockouts, in particular to article 12 concerning numerical criteria required from unions in order to obtain collective bargaining certificates and article 33 concerning the possibility of imposing compulsory arbitration under certain conditions. These issues had been under consideration by the Conference Committee since 1984. On every occasion, the Government had informed the Committee extensively of the developments taking place in Turkey. In the dynamic process whereby important political, economic and social developments had taken place in Turkey in recent years a primary objective was giving priority attention to freedom. In this process the perfection of labour legislation had naturally been given due consideration. Within this framework, amendments were made in labour legislation in June 1986 and 1988, taking into account the views of the workers' and employers organisations. Since the International Labour Conference in 1987 Turkey had a particularly loaded political calendar which included an important national referendum in September 1987 resulting in the lifting of all the remaining restrictions on the participation of some political leaders in elections, which were in fact held immediately after this referendum. Acts Nos. 3449 and 3451 adopted on 25 and 27 May 1988 contained amendments to Acts Nos. 2821 and 2822 respectively on trade unions and on collective bargaining, strikes and lockouts. The Government representative stated that he was confident that the Committee of Experts would study these amendments carefully and refer to several of the improvements that these amendments contained in his written communications. The Government believed that the recent amendments together with the improvements already achieved in 1986 correspond to many aspects which had been previously raised in the present Committee with regard to Turkey's labour legislation. The new amendments also contained certain improvements which had not been discussed by the Conference Committee. The Government had been successful in its efforts to honour its promises of reviewing and improving the labour legislation. The Government had primarily directed its efforts towards adapting the legislation to the changing needs and the new developments in that country. The views of the ILO had also been taken into consideration. As to the numerical criteria required from unions to negotiate collective agreements (article 12 of Act No. 2822, mentioned by the Committee of Experts), the Government representative stated that his Government had duly considered this issue, and had closely consulted the workers' and employers' organisations. The Government's position was that a social consensus on this issue would be a prerequisite for any legislative initiative. In the absence of any written request either from workers' or employers' organisations to amend the existing provisions concerning numerical criteria and in view of the insistent verbal representations of those organisations to maintain the existing provisions the Government had found no grounds at this stage for initiating any legislative modifications. What mattered was that the collective bargaining process had actually reached a level of unprecedented effectiveness in Turkey. There now existed in every branch of activity a number of trade unions which met the 10 per cent requirement and that these trade unions had been able to negotiate an increasing number of collective agreements concluded in 1964-1979 before the adoption of the new legislation, was 1,751 per year, whereas since the adoption of the present law, from 1984 to 1987 an average of 2,577 collective agreements had been signed each year. This constituted a solid indication that the machinery for voluntary negotiation of collective agreements was more fully used under the present legislation. As regards the comments of the Committee of Experts concerning the intervention of the Supreme Arbitration Board in the settlement of disputes (articles 33, Act No. 2822), the Government representative stated that this article had a very limited scope of application for the following reasons: it was provided only for exceptional cases of public health and national security; it could only be implemented if those exceptional circumstances continued to prevail; the Supreme Arbitration Board consisted of an equal number of representatives from the government and the employers' and workers' organisations, guaranteeing a balanced judgements; it did not only apply to strike but also to lockouts; and under the law, it was possible to lodge an appeal with the Administrative Court of Appeal, against the decrees of the Council of Ministers and thereby to request the suspensions of proceedings. This provision was also embodied in the national constitution. Article 33 had only been used by the Government once but before the Supreme Arbitration Court could intervene the parties concerned had reached agreement. The Government representative added that the right to strike was currently used very widely and was subject to no serious restrictions in Turkey. The Government representative provided some figures which illustrated a very considerable and gradual increase in the number of strikes since 1979. As a result of the recent amendments to Act No. 2822, 165,000 workers had obtained the right to strike following the lifting of the prohibition on strikes in certain activities. In conclusion, he stressed that freedom of association, collective bargaining and strikes had now materialised in Turkey to a much greater extent than before, and had certainly reached a respectable level compared to other member States of the ILO. He reiterated his Government's interest and determination in pursuing its efforts to achieve further progress and stated that his Government was also determined to maintain its fruitful co-operation with the ILO to achieve those objectives. The Government was confident that it could count on the ILO's constructive criticism as well as on its encouragement.

The Workers' members recalled that the issues of freedom of association and collective bargaining in Turkey had been discussed for quite a number of years. Turkey had been under martial law during which numerous trade union leaders were prosecuted and persecuted. They hoped that Turkey would shortly ratify Convention No. 87 and noted that this Convention was closely linked to Convention No. 98, the application of which was being discussed. They recalled that this case was not discussed in 1986 in view of the promises made by the Government, and that in 1987 this problem gave rise to a very long and difficult discussion that concluded with a statement that there were serious discrepancies between the Convention and national legislation and practice despite the previous promises that the Government had made on several occasions. It was stated that if these promises were not fulfilled in the near future, the Conference Committee would be obliged to use other measures. In this respect they underlined that there were still complaints against the Government of Turkey before the Committee on Freedom of Association, and that the new laws enumerated in the written communication of the Government which appeared to contain improvements, in fact perpetuated a totally deplorable situation. Finally, they requested the Worker member of Turkey to provide some additional information in this respect.

The Worker member of Turkey stated that the declaration by the Government representative did absolutely not reflect the real situation in Turkey. None of the amendments introduced responded to the comments of the supervisory bodies which had referred to basic provisions of the legislation that were not in line with the principles of the ILO. Once more the Government had not fulfilled the promises it had made in 1986 and 1987 when it had pledged to take the necessary steps to apply the Convention and the principles of freedom of association. Perhaps the Government had taken into consideration the observations of representatives of employers' and workers' organisations when it had elaborated these amendments, but it was obvious that these observations had generally been ignored and that the observations of the Confederation of Turkish Trade Unions were totally or almost totally ignored. These amendments had not solved the major problems: the exclusion of important categories of workers (public servants, teacher etc.) from the right to organise; the interference of the public authorities in trade union activities; the right to freely elect trade union representatives, the excessive restrictions on the right to strike and the problems affecting collective bargaining. As regards, for example, political activities of trade unions, or the so-called elimination of the provision that allows for temporary prohibition of strikes during emergencies or martial law – that the Government considers as amendments introducing improvements – the present situation was in fact no different at all from the one under the military government. In fact, the series of laws and decrees that had been introduced actually aggravated the situation, e.g. Decree No. 308 concerning State enterprises which prohibited their workers from exercising collective bargaining. Another government decree had established three employers' organisation for the public sector (all types of public institutions, State enterprises, etc.) and imposed compulsory affiliation to these organisations which depended on the Minister of State, and were led by high-level officials. The objective of these three organisations as mentioned in the Government's programme for 1988 was to carry out the functions previously assigned to the Government Committee for the co-ordination of Collective Agreements in the Public Sector with the aim of imposing the remuneration policy of the Government. There existed serious restrictions on the right to strike as well. The Government representative had said that the possibility of postponement of strikes had been used only on one occasion. This only proved that none of the strikes that had taken place had endangered the public health or national security. Furthermore, almost everything was considered to be essential service for the purposes of prohibiting the right to strike with the result that this right was in effect denied to about 500,000 workers. Solidarity strikes were also prohibited and so were go-slow action and general strikes. All violations of these prohibitions resulted in penal indictment. These restrictions had not existed before 1980. Finally, the speaker reiterated that nothing had improved and that there remained only empty promise. He requested the Government representative to indicate whether the Government considered itself at all bound by the principles of freedom of association embodied in the ILO Constitution.

The Workers' members considered that in the light of the supplementary information given by the Workers' member of Turkey it would have actually been better had those recent laws not been adopted at all. It was obvious that a profound change in the legislation was still necessary. The Workers' member referred to recent information from trade union sources and stressed that the new laws seriously restricted collective bargaining and trade union action. A few days ago, the European Confederation of Trade Unions had adopted a declaration on these points. The Workers' members added that Turkish trade unions were not allowed to draft their own statutes or freely elect their representatives; nor could they freely exercise their activities since it was possible to dissolve or suspend them by simple administrative order. The activity of DISK was in fact prohibited and the leaders of this organisation, who faced trial, or who were condemned because of their trade union activities, were unable to resume their trade union tasks. Under these conditions one should stress that the so-called improvements were really limited to a very small percentage of the points that had been mentioned in the course of ILO technical assistance, and that the new laws had considerably complicated the situation as regards the remaining points. Nor had there been any true tripartite consultations although this had been promised by the Government. Collective bargaining and trade union activity had been blocked through the interference of the authorities. Workers' organisations were unable to structure themselves in a logical way. Consequently, the new reforms did not really fulfil the promises of the Government and implied that the Conference Committee was back to square one.

The Employers' members summarised the questions raised in the observation of the Committee of Experts concerning the application of this Convention. The Committee of Experts had as yet not had the opportunity to examine the new laws adopted this year following tripartite consultation. In the previous year, the Committee of Experts had considered that certain improvements had been made in the legislation, but that restrictions had remained on free collective bargaining. If one compared the present situation to the one prevailing at the beginning of the discussions, it was obvious that there had been some progress. Free collective bargaining could only be achieved gradually, especially in a country that had just emerged from a very long period of martial law, a period that was radically different from the present as regards freedom of association. The Government representatives had provided recent figures that showed some results in the sense that the number of collective agreements had gradually increased. He had also stated that the procedure of compulsory arbitration had been applied only once. Under these conditions one did wonder why the Government did not repeal the provisions concerning compulsory arbitration, as requested by the Committee of Experts. In contrast, the employers did not believe that an increase in the number of strikes was a sign of progress. The Government representative and the Workers' member of Turkey had delivered radically different statements concerning the fulfilment of the promises of the Government as regards the application of the Convention, and it was not up to the Employers' members to decide who was right. It was obvious that was up to the Committee of Experts and not to the Conference Committee, to examine the new amendments in the new laws. On the other hand, the Employers' members viewed positively the lifting of the state of emergency and the holding of elections, which were linked to the topics referred to by the Committee of Experts, and that constituted progress towards democracy. In conclusion, they stressed that the remaining restrictions on the application of Convention No. 98 should be eliminated and that this should be achieved on a tripartite basis.

The Worker member of Finland, speaking also on behalf of the Workers' members of Denmark, Norway and Sweden, recalled that the conclusions of the Committee of Experts pointed to the existence of serious limitations and contradictions between legislation and Convention No. 98, and that the Conference Committee had indicated the possibility of resorting to other measures if it found that there was lack of progress. The reply of the Government of Turkey contained some minor improvements, which were amendments to the Trade Union Act No. 2821 and to the Collective Bargaining Strike and Lockout Act No. 2822. These amendments were incorporated in Laws No. 3449 and 3451 adopted on 25 and 27 May 1988. The above-mentioned Workers' member had compared the amendments to these laws with the principles of Convention No. 98 and had concluded that these amendments did constitute some progress, but did not in any way satisfy the principles in Convention No. 98 and in the ILO Constitution relating to freedom of association and trade union rights. The Workers' member of Turkey had already pointed this out and the above-mentioned Workers' members associated themselves entirely with his comments. They reminded the present Committee that the 1982 Turkish Constitution also contained several provisions that were in contradiction to Convention No. 98 and the principle of freedom of association embodied in the ILO Constitution. As examples he cited section No. 51 prescribing that only employees with ten years' of service were entitled to be elected as trade union officials, section No. 22 prohibiting trade unions from participating in any political activities whatsoever, section No. 53 prescribing not more than one collective agreement per enterprise and section No. 54 prohibiting solidarity strikes, as well as several other provisions. In the Trade Union Act No. 2821 several provisions which were applied to trade unions subjected trade unions to supervision by governments, to police searches on union premises, and stipulated that trade union leaders had to seek the permission of the Ministry of the Interior before leaving Turkey on any trade union conference, that all press releases had to be submitted to the Public Prosecutor twenty-four hours in advance, and that all political activities were prohibited for trade unions. In conclusion, he reminded the present Committee that the Government representative had not indicated whether his Government intended to repeal these provisions; however, the above-mentioned Workers' members strongly felt this should be done as soon as possible.

The Worker member of the United Kingdom stated that when he first saw the list of amendments brought by the Government representative of Turkey, outlined in the written communication of the Government he did hope that the matter would finally be settled and that Turkey could be welcomed to the free world as a State having complete trade union freedoms. Of course, the Committee of Experts should examine all the new laws but that did not prevent the Conference Committee from expressing its views too. What the written communication of the Government revealed was interesting, but what it concealed was vital. He would like to ask several questions in this connection. First, did Turkey recognise the right of public servants to organise freely? The answer was no because the Workers' member of Turkey told the Committee that this was not so. The legal restrictions he had described affected some 1.8 million Turkish workers. To what extent were strikes affected by those restrictions? The Government representative had told the Conference Committee that only essential services were prohibited from striking. However, a closer look at the list of the essential service revealed that it covered water, electricity, gas, coal mining, land, sea and air transport systems, health services, chemist's shops, educational institutions, day nurseries, old-age homes, etc. In fact, strikes were either prohibited or seriously restricted for all public services. Second, did Turkey recognise the right of workers to choose their own trade union leaders? Perhaps it did, but he had noted one vital point. The law stipulated that a trade unionist who had spent more than six months in jail for offences under this law could not be elected as trade union leader or as trade union founder. Yet some of the most courageous, heroic and devoted trade unionists he had known had spent more than six months in jail, fighting for what they believed in. Third, did Turkey recognise the right of trade unions to establish their own constitutions, laws and regulations? The answer was, again, no. The Trade Unions Act in Turkey provided detailed model laws and rules that trade unions had to follow. In his opinion, this was contrary to the principles of freedom and trade union rights. So the Committee of Experts might eventually examine those new laws and give its opinion on them, but the present Committee could already state that they did not fully meet the request made by the Committee of Experts in its report. There had been great hope that after a period of dictatorship, one of the first things that Turkey would do as a free country, would be to restore trade union rights, because that was the hallmark of a true democracy. Yet he had to express his deep concern that the omens were not very good for trade unions in Turkey. The Government of Turkey was exhibiting the new laws almost like a proud father, but in his opinion, the legitimacy of the offspring had yet to be established. The Government had still a long way to go towards real progress, and one tentative, timid step in this direction was not enough.

The Worker member of Greece recalled that at this very time the Prime Minister of Turkey was on an official visit to Athens, and that everyone could imagine the significance of this event for the relations between Greece and Turkey. The Greek workers supported an improvement in these relations. Yet this spirit would not prevent the speaker from supporting the Workers' member of Turkey in its comments regarding legal restrictions and prohibitions on trade union activities in Turkey. In this respect he noted that a joint declaration had been adopted on 10 June 1988 in which the two main trade union organisations in Turkey, TURK-İS and DISK, declared that trade union organisations in Turkey were prohibited from functioning normally, and called for the presumption of all activities of DISK. The Government representative had told the Committee that the right to strike existed, that progress had been made, and that trade union freedoms existed as well in Turkey. The speaker asked whether the Government could indicate when DISK would be able to function again, and when would its assets that had been confiscated by the dictatorship be returned to it.

The Worker member of the United States was impelled to make several comments after the statements of the Vice-Chairman of the Workers' members and the Worker member of Turkey. The Workers' members always welcomed remedial measures to rectify persistent offences to international labour Conventions, and so they welcomed the steps taken by the Government of Turkey. Yet such remedial measures often contained hidden dangers, namely, that they were more cosmetic than real. An example was the provision enabling the Government of Turkey to prohibit or postpone any strike that appeared to be harmful to public health and national security. The Government representative stated that this provision had never been used, and should not give rise to concern. Yet the speaker felt deeply ill at ease with such a provision. He pointed to the existence of the Supreme Arbitration Court and its powers under Article 54 of the Turkish Constitution and stated that the very existence of this provision had a chilling effect and was a deterrent for any strikes. For that reason all those laws should be repealed.

The Worker member of Austria recalled that at about the same time that the Parliament of Turkey had adopted the two laws in May 1988, the report of the Committee on Freedom of Association was approved by the Governing Body of the ILO. This report cited Act No. 2821 among the laws needing review in order to bring it into line with Convention No. 98. Thus, the Committee on Freedom of Association expressed the same concerns as the Conference Committee. Consequently, when the Committee of Experts would analyse these laws, its conclusions would be obvious, that these laws go only half way towards meeting the recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association and that the Government had only partly met these recommendations. In conclusion, he recalled that a number of public service trade unionists had been condemned under this law, yet no motives for this condemnation had been published, and they could not defend themselves. He asked the Government representative when these motives would be published.

The Employer member of Turkey considered that the criticisms which had been expressed during the discussion had not been justified. In this regard he cited two observations made by the Committee of Experts in their report: (1) that the Government should adopt legislative amendments to promote collective bargaining; and, (2) the Government should furnish information on the evolution of the situation in this regard. The speaker noted that on the one hand a new law amending several provisions of the law on collective agreements had just come into force. Therefore, the first request of the Committee of Experts had been acted upon. On the other hand, it was necessary to await the opinion of the Committee of Experts on this new law before adopting Conclusions in this respect. He felt that it was preferable to await the information furnished by the Committee of Experts next year on the legitimacy of these new laws.

The Worker member of the Netherlands noted the information given by the Government in its written communication, particularly the long list of changes made to the Trade Union Act, No. 2821. He observed that this list did not contain the repealing of restrictions on trade union freedoms; it contained only the easing of such restrictions. In this regard he pointed to terms such as "conditions will be simplified" and "further facilitated". This easing of impediments was not enough when the legislation was tested against the provisions of Convention No. 98. He further noted with respect to the experiences of the last few years in this Committee that some Governments had received a special paragraph while others, whose behaviour had not been much better, had avoided this special paragraph by handing in lengthy replies, by participating in the dialogue in a soft spoken and sympathetic way and by making one small promise or expressing vague expectations. He stressed that governments should be evaluated on the basis of facts and not on the basis of their presentation.

The Government representative noted that, with respect to the observations of the Committee of Experts, tripartite consultations had been undertaken with regard to the points raised in the report. The Minister of Labour and the Prime Minister had discussed these matters with representatives of the Workers' and Employers' organisations. The outcome of these consultations had not had an impact on the two points raised in the report of the Committee of Experts because: firstly, both the Workers' and Employers' organisations had insisted that the Government maintain the positions of numerical criteria for qualifying for collective bargaining; and, secondly, with regard to the Supreme Arbitration Board intervention, the constitutional provision could not be amended until due process had been completed. With regard to the observations raised outside the scope of Convention No. 98, a very distorted picture had been painted before this Committee. Important progress had been made in the laws and it would be premature in this Committee to pass any judgement on the merits of the new amendments before the Committee of Experts had actually examined their contents in a very objective and impartial way. In concluding, he cited figures which indicated the extent to which the tripartite consultations actually reflected the Turkish workers' views in the new amendments. In Law No. 2821, out of a total of 18 recommendations made by the Turkish workers' associations, 11 had been accommodated, either partially or completely, in the new amendments. Furthermore, the Government brought four amendments which had not been raised by the workers' associations. Under Act No. 2822, out of 17 recommendations made by the workers' associations, seven of them had been accommodated. Furthermore the Government brought four other improvements which had not been raised by the workers' associations. Therefore, 52 per cent of the workers' recommendations had been accommodated in the new amendments.

The Workers' members welcomed the frank and open dialogue which occurred in the present Committee in this case. The Workers' members therefore proposed, in the light of the interventions by the Employers' members and the Employer member of Turkey, the following conclusion:

The members of the Committee had been able to have a dialogue on the subject of two Acts adopted at the end of May which should provide solutions to the majority of concerns that had been expressed over a period of years. The discussion in the Committee showed that there was a number of positive elements but also a large number of unsatisfactory points. As the Acts had not been in force until May, the Committee of Experts was requested to examine them closely and compare them with the promises made earlier with the recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association as well as with those of the ILO which provided assistance in this respect. Real tripartite consultation should be resumed and the Government should be prepared to revise the present Acts to align them more fully with Convention No. 98 as well as with the principle of freedom of association. The Workers' members formally proposed that these conclusions be included in a special paragraph. This request was justified in light of the importance of this case which had been the subject of discussion for a number of years. A special paragraph did not contain a judgement or condemnation; it contained positive as well as negative aspects. The objective of these conclusions and their inclusion in a special paragraph was to give a mission to the Committee of Experts and to indicate clearly to the Government the orientation of new tripartite dialogue.

The Employers' members noted that a number of questions that had been raised concerning this case had still not been completely solved. However, the focal point in this case was now the new Acts which had been adopted and they would have to be examined by the Committee of Experts. The Employers' members were convinced that the Committee of Experts, when examining this case next time, would not only look at the Acts but would also bear in mind the views and information mentioned in the course of this discussion. With regard to the conclusions proposed by the Workers' members, the Employers' members were not able to support the proposal in its present form, especially if it was to be included in a special paragraph, because it contained an evaluation of a new Act which the Experts had not been able to examine.

The Workers expressed their regret over the Employers' members' failure to agree to the proposed conclusion and its inclusion in a special paragraph. Although they would not call for a vote, they indicated their intention to initiate an information campaign, through regional and international trade unions, on their position concerning this situation and its examination in this Committee.

The Government representative could not fully agree with the merits of the proposal. Firstly, because there had been no conclusion reached in this Committee on the matters contained in the proposal. Secondly, because it would not contribute to the undertaking of tripartite consultations as such consultations would be pursued in any case.

The Worker member of Austria addressed a question to the Government representative of Turkey concerning information as to when the grounds for the ruling on the dissolution of the DISC organisation would be published.

The Government representative replied that, according to relevant authorities, the text of the decisions together with the justifications would be published by the end of the summer, 1988.

The Committee noted the written and oral information supplied by the Government and the detailed discussion which took place within the Committee. It noted, in particular, that Parliament recently had approved amendments to the trade union legislation, which will be examined by the Committee of Experts on the basis of the previous discussions held in this Committee, the recommendations of the ILO missions, the promises made by the Government and the conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association. It hoped that these amendments would meet the concerns expressed last year by the Committee of the Conference. It further expressed the firm hope that, in view of the fact that serious divergencies had existed for many years, the Government would soon take all necessary measures, after real tripartite consultation, to give full satisfaction to the comments of the Committee of Experts and to ensure full compliance with the Convention, both in law and practice.

Convention No. 100: Equal Remuneration, 1951

India (ratification: 1959). A Government representative stated that the Equal Remuneration Amendment Act 1987 had entered into force on 17 December 1987. Section 10 of the Act had been amended to provide enhanced penalties. In cases of serious violations of the law, fines up to 20,000 rupees or imprisonment up to one year could be imposed, and up to two years' imprisonment for a subsequent offence. According to section 12 of the amended Act, complaints could be made by any recognised welfare institution or organisation as well as by the individual concerned. The problems raised in paragraph 2, point (a) to (d) and point (f) of the Committee of Experts observations concerned certain state governments which had been requested to provide information. Of these Governments, Maharashtra, West Bengal and Uttar Pradesh had sent information on the submission of complaints concerning the violation of minimum wage and equal pay requirements in the agricultural and construction sectors. The Government of Maharashtra had taken measures to reinforce the supervisory machinery and the application of the provisions of the Equal Remuneration Act. Since the above mentioned sectors are scheduled employments under the Minimum Wage Act, 1948, the Government has fixed or revised minimum wages. The wages were the same for women and men and claims could be filed if lower wages were paid. In regard to paragraph 2, point (e) of the observations by the Committee of Experts, 129 out of the 134 casual women workers employed in the South Central Railway had been registered for regular employment. The number of registered workers who had been given regular employment was being examined. He emphasised the importance that his Government attached to the observations of the Committee of Experts and the comments and requests of the Conference Committee, as well as to the correct application of ratified Conventions. The Government has requested the state governments to strengthen their supervisory machinery to ensure that female and male workers receive their wages. Efforts have been made to improve the situation in the unorganised sector where difficulties existed and the 20-point programme announced in 1986 included the enforcement of the minimum wage for agricultural workers. A National Commission on Rural Labour had been set up which would report on fixing a minimum wage and on the supervisory machinery.

The Employers' members remarked that the difficulties in the application of the principle of equal wages was due in part to gaps in the legislation, but mainly to difficulties in the practical application of the law. It was the duty of a member State to ensure that ratified Conventions were being applied. The Government, which had not denied its difficulties, was endeavouring to overcome them and to resolve the problems which, in this country take increased proportions. The statement by the Government representative fostered positive expectations. As the Committee of Experts had stated, the Government should re-examine the question, and send a detailed written report on the measures being taken to close the gaps in law and practice.

The Workers' members emphasised the importance that they attached to the principle of equal treatment and of equal wages for work of equal value. They noted that the Government had recognised that inequalities did exist for women and that efforts were necessary to eliminate the discrimination which the Centre of Indian Trade Unions had referred to in its observations. These were particularly serious in the case of rural workers, and especially for women. The trade union and the Committee of Experts should verify if the new penalties would be sufficiently high and effective. They feared that women would not dare to complain on an individual basis to obtain compensation for harm suffered, and believed that it would be important that trade unions could lodge complaints on behalf of the complainant. By strengthening employers' and workers' organisations, and, consequently collective bargaining and tripartism, equal pay would be attained progressively.

The Government representative emphasised again the willingness of his Government to supervise the full and strict application of the laws on equal pay and minimum wages. He repeated that legislative amendments had been made recently, and stressed that imprisonment was obligatory for subsequent violations and that the value of the fines had been increased 20 times. The practical application of the legal provisions on equal pay had encountered numerous difficulties; women did not have bargaining power and feared reprisals. It was therefore necessary to attack this exploitative system in various ways. The co-operation of employers' and workers' organisations and non-governmental organisations was vital. The help of these organisations was indispensable for supervising that legal provisions were applied fully, creating an awareness of this problem, and helping organise the workers so that they had the necessary bargaining strength. In reply to the Workers' members' question he replied that India had ratified Convention No. 144 and that the advisory committee set up under the Equal Remuneration Act included employers' and workers' representatives. The National Commission on Rural Labour would examine all problems in depth and would, as well, consult with employers and workers.

The Committee noted with interest the detailed and positive information supplied by the Government representative on the various points, raised in the observation of the Committee of Experts, in which reference is also made to comments received from Indian workers' organisations, as regards the practical application of the Convention. It hoped that the Government will continue to furnish information on measures taken towards further progress in respect of all the points raised as regards the enforcement of legislation on equal pay, particularly in the rural sector.

Switzerland (ratification: 1972). A Government representative stated that his Government which had presented a detailed report on the application of the present Convention in October 1987, was ready to pursue the dialogue on the application of this Convention. The working group on equal remuneration, created by the Federal Department of Justice and Police, consisted of officials from the Swiss federal administration, and representatives of employers and workers. It studied not only the different aspects of equal pay but also other areas where inequalities could still persist. The results of this study concerned inter alia the following topics: the ability for associations, and not only individual women, as as the case nowadays, to initiate legal action so as to assert the right of equal pay for work of equal value. There was much room for improvement in this area; the possibility of creating cantonal public offices responsible for promoting equality between men and women; these offices could provide information on legal practice and act as experts at courts in cases of disputes; government encouragement for the social partners to include provisions promoting equal remuneration for men and women in collective agreements. The collective agreements could provide for the creation of arbitration bodies for settling individual cases submitted to them. These measures would be in the spirit of the preceding recommendations made by the Committee of Experts. The report that would be drafted on the basis of this research will incorporate proposals that the working group will submit to the Federal Council and which would have to be followed up by concrete measures to ensure the application of the principle of equal pay between men and women. It was too early to know what these concrete measures were and one had to wait for the report. The Government member believed that the Committee of Experts was right in pointing out that the explicit application in Switzerland of the principle of equal remuneration for work of equal value between men and women in collective agreements was incomplete, and subject to reservations. Distinctions on grounds of sex could reappear or persist in other forms. The principle of equal pay for work of equal value which was embodied in the Federal Constitution constituted an individual right that every woman worker could directly invoke before the courts. The small number of legal actions initiated with the aim of ensuring the full application of this right, even in cases of applying collective labour agreements, had been the motive for creating the above-mentioned working group. However, given the current situation of the national legal system, collective labour agreements were contracts governed by private law, concluded and implemented by the social partners. Public authorities took no part in negotiating them and had no power to influence their contents or application. Only agreements whose extension was requested by the contracting parties were subject to a certain control on the part of the authorities, but this control was only formal. The agreements so extended remained private law contracts whose application was the responsibility of the parties concerned alone, and if necessary, the civil courts. The possibility of state intervention in order to put pressure on the social partners remained relatively limited. In this respect the Government believed that the social partners had at their disposal a wide range of intervention possibilities under Convention No. 100 for setting up traditional machineries. It was regrettable that they had not resorted to this more extensively. The Government would make available to the ILO the texts of all the decision taken by the courts concerning the application of the principles of the Convention.

The Worker member of Switzerland recalled that since 1981 the Swiss Constitution had included a provision that prescribed equality of remuneration between men and women, that could be invoked directly by men and women alike. The dialogue in the present Committee had started in 1986 and would not end today. This showed how long and difficult was the application of the principle of equality of treatment, and how it was directly linked in most of the arguments and conclusions to the discussion on Convention No. 111. The constitutional provision had brought about some progress but was still far short of resolving all problems. As mentioned by the Committee of Experts in its report and confirmed by the Government member, a working group had been created to formulate proposals on the need for, and nature of, measures for accelerating the application of the constitutional provision. The conclusions of this group, the proposals it would make to the Federal Council and above all the effect given to those proposals were not yet known. The Government representative had mentioned some possibilities, but the proof of the pudding was in the eating. The speaker then drew attention to certain important points for applying equality of remuneration. First, the practical impact of legal provisions; rules were valuable only to the extent that they were applied. In practice, women workers would either hesitate to or refrain from asserting their rights if by doing so they had to fear some disadvantages in their labour relations, such as dismissal, being refused promotion, etc. Parallel provisions such as protection against dismissal for the duration of the court or arbitration procedures, or the possibility mentioned by the Government member that workers' or women's organisations could lodge complaints were therefore of the highest importance. Another problem exposed in detail by the Workers' member of Norway on the discussion of Convention No. 111, was that women workers would face great difficulty in the majority of cases if they had to assume the burden of proof when lodging a complaint. It was therefore urgently needed to find other solutions such as the reversal of the burden of proof in cases of complaints concerning equal treatment in remuneration. Convention No. 100 demanded equal remuneration for work of equal value. In practice there were still jobs which were traditionally occupied by women and which also by tradition were linked to a lower level of remuneration than the so-called masculine occupations. Great attention should therefore be paid to re-evaluating these jobs. Likewise, equality of remuneration could only be implemented in the context of equality of opportunity between men and women. Accordingly it was necessary to harmonise all the legislation in such areas as social security and taxation in order to eliminate all types of direct disadvantages based on sex as well as indirect disadvantages which affected women workers, particularly those with family responsibilities. Several of those indirect disadvantages were caused by the lower level of training of women and in this respect urgent legislative and practical measures should be considered, with the aim of giving grants and eliminating age restrictions on vocational training. As an employer, the State should set an example to other employers by adopting such means of promotion. Collective bargaining and collective agreements played an important role in equality of remuneration since remuneration was part of bargaining. Equality of remuneration was part of a gradual process and workers, employers and governments should act in concert to implement these objectives. The intermediate phases should be subject to regular control. Finally the speaker reiterated the importance of having effective proposals for the application of constitutional standards concerning equality of remuneration. The Workers' members wished again on this occasion, on the basis of a concrete case, to draw the attention not only of Switzerland but of many other countries to the discussion of the General Survey concerning Convention No. 111 during which the inequalities, discrimination and difficulties faced by women workers had been mentioned. The application of Convention No. 100 in Switzerland had been discussed in 1982, 1984 and 1986. Three problems stood in the way of the full application of this Convention. First, collective agreements which sometimes included job classifications that established distinctions based on sex under other names. Second, rates of remuneration which could also become sources of discrimination on grounds of sex and finally, as mentioned by the Worker member of Switzerland, the burden of proof. Due to the existing difference of views and shortcomings in the application of the Convention No. 100 a tripartite working group had been set up and its report was expected in the very near future. In this context the Workers' members expressed the hope that existing and future possible discrimination would be eliminated both in legislation and in practice.

The Employers' members replied first to the comments made by the Workers' member of Switzerland. They had had some doubts initially as to the actual purpose of those comments but now understood that they dealt with the problem of equal treatment in general. All those who had heard the Employers' statements in previous debates knew that they could agree to some of those comments but not to all of them. The reversal of the burden of proof had been amply discussed several days ago and the Employers' members had already cautioned against considering this problem in too global and simplistic a manner. They noted that the observation of the Committee of Experts was divided into five points. The first was a brief statement of fact which appeared to cause no problems. The second had been dealt with by the Government representative who informed the present Committee that a working group was now examining a number of questions in detail. The present Committee should await the findings of this working group and then check its report on the need for further action. They had some difficulties with point 3 of the observation of the Committee of Experts which stated that a Worker member at the Conference Committee in 1986 had stated that there were no longer any sex-based salary clauses in collective agreements which, however, covered only minimum wages. The Employers' members saw nothing unusual in the fact that collective agreements referred only to minimum wages. In this respect the collective bargaining system of Switzerland seemed in no way different from those of its neighbours and it appeared to be normal for collective agreements to apply only to minimum wages. However, perhaps they misunderstood something there. Further, the Committee of Experts had stated that direct discrimination based on sex had disappeared only to reappear in different forms. This point was not developed any further, and it was only said that women were excluded from collective agreements, as a matter of principle, but again the Employers' members could not really understand how, so perhaps the report was not sufficiently clear on this. They also had difficulty with the statement in the report of the Committee of Experts that the principle of equality of remuneration was not expressly mentioned in collective agreements. In their opinion that did not mean that inequality of remuneration was established in collective agreements. However, the Workers' member of Switzerland did not elaborate on that point, so perhaps that was not a major problem. Generally the Convention certainly required positive action, but here the Employers' members saw a difficulty in reconciling the promotion of equal remuneration which was the purpose of Convention No. 100, and the promotion of free and autonomous collective bargaining. There were always two signatures in a collective agreement and the possibility of third parties – that of the State – to intervene was very limited. There was a conflict of purpose here which had to be kept in mind. As regards points 4 and 5 in the observation of the Committee of Experts, the Employers' members considered that the two rulings issued by the Swiss Federal Tribunal were specific cases and they doubted whether general conclusions could be drawn from them. They were grateful to the Government representative for expressing his readiness to make available any additional tribunal rulings. Only then it would be possible to judge whether general conclusions should be drawn from those rulings for further legislative or other action. The Employers' members agreed that this complex problem with its numerous aspects would probably come up in the Conference Committee many times in the future, and that no country was exempt from promoting equal remuneration. There was always room for progress in this field.

The Worker member of Switzerland wished to make a few supplementary comments on the report of the Committee of Experts. For the present, her organisation had addressed no specific demands to the Government of Switzerland. They preferred to wait for the proposals of the Government which could relate to legislation and to promotional measures. In their opinion there should not be any state intervention in collective agreements or collective bargaining, and the Government member shared this opinion. The two rulings issued by the Federal Tribunal indeed concerned individual cases and since they were not yet available it was too early to conclude whether they could be taken as a precedent for general legislation. As regards the situation of women and collective agreements, the speaker had not meant to say that women were generally excluded from collective agreements, but that women were very often recruited in conditions that were not covered by collective agreements and therefore were in practice often excluded from the scope of collective agreements. As regards collective agreements proper, they did sometimes include job descriptions which in themselves did not contain any direct discrimination against women. However, in job classifications there could be indirect discrimination, and in practice women did suffer from this. For that reason her organisation had asked that the practice of job descriptions and job evaluation be reconsidered.

The Committee noted with interest the various measures and decisions taken by the Government of Switzerland concerning the application of the Convention, and described in detail in the report of the Committee of Experts. It also noted the supplementary explanations given by the Government and the discussion which took place which would be transmitted to the Committee of Experts, so that it could re-examine the question more deeply, taking into account this discussion. The Committee also hoped that the Government would be able to report further measures taken and progress achieved in the application of the Convention.

United Kingdom (ratification: 1971). A Government representative noted that three separate points in the Committee of Experts' observation called for a response. The Committee of Experts had referred to the repeated concerns expressed by the TUC that class actions were not admissible in the United Kingdom and that tribunals may therefore have to consider large numbers of applications by individuals. This issue had been fully considered by the Conference Committee in 1986. He emphasised that his Government saw major problems of both principle and practice in providing for class actions. By the term class actions he referred to the possibility of challenging an allegedly discriminatory condition of employment embodied in a collective agreement by taking proceedings based on the circumstances of a single person which if successful would apply to the whole class of workers covered by the collective agreement. To provide for class actions would require a fundamental change in the United Kingdom's judicial procedure. Moreover there would be a general difficulty of ensuring that a plaintiff in a class action was wholly representative of all the individuals in that class. His Government therefore believed that the traditional, established "test case" procedure was a more satisfactory way of approaching this problem. Under the 1986 Sex Discrimination Act, provisions in non-legally binding collective agreements and rules of undertakings which provided for acts unlawful under either the Equal Pay Act or the Sex Discrimination Act were to be automatically void. In view of this Act and of his Government's views on class actions, it was difficult to see what purpose would now be served by giving the Central Arbitration Committee new powers to consider equal value cases. Reference to the Central Arbitration Committee could, in fact, slow down the process. Equal value issues were complex and there were different ways of removing this particular form of discrimination, such as negotiation. The Central Arbitration Committee was not likely to attempt to solve issues of equal remuneration in collective agreements at great speed or without extensive consultation. It would therefore be much quicker and far more satisfactory for the parties to get together and sort out their own solution, if necessary with a variety of different arrangements at local level. The Government representative did not accept the TUC's comments that there would be a need for numerous applications following a decision that a term in a collective agreement was discriminatory and therefore void. This suggested that employers would deliberately refuse to amend agreements unless faced by large numbers of individual applications to an industrial tribunal. Employers who would do this would be foolhardy as they would incur costs as well as pressure from the unions which were parties to the collective agreement. The Government representative stated that his Government would be most pleased to continue to supply copies of all appropriate decisions, both of tribunals and of the higher courts as requested by the Committee of Experts. Another point referred to in the Committee of Experts' report concerned the concept of the hypothetical man or hypothetical woman; this issue also had been fully discussed by the Conference Committee in 1986. The Government representative indicated, as he had done in 1986, that he would be very pleased to hear of any situation where the concept of the hypothetical man had been successfully applied. His Government was quite confident that the arrangements established in the United Kingdom for applying the principle of equal pay were in full compliance with the Convention.

The Worker member of the United Kingdom, speaking on behalf of the Workers' members, noted that the principle of equal pay was at present accepted in many countries, but its application had proven to be somewhat difficult and the issues involved were complex. He emphasised that Convention No. 100 could usefully be served by tripartism. It was unhelpful to have discussions on very complex issues in the present Committee if they had not been preceded by intensive tripartite discussions at the national level. There had been some tripartite discussions on the Convention but they had taken place before or during a general election period when the civil servant representing the Government was not in a position to make any commitment. The Workers' members therefore requested the Government to reintroduce tripartite discussions on this particular Convention in the hope of solving the issue.

The Employer member of the United Kingdom, speaking on behalf of the Employers' members, indicated that while the employers in the United Kingdom subscribed to the virtues of tripartite discussions, the issues which were presently before the present Committee would not necessarily benefit from further tripartite discussion. The issues which the trade unions had referred to this Committee and the Committee of Experts were in fact already satisfactorily resolved by the existing legislation in the United Kingdom. With respect to class actions she pointed out that they depended upon the validity of the membership of the class of persons who sought to be included within it. Employers might well wish to challenge that validity and this would take just as long as repeated and unnecessary tribunal cases. With respect to the concept of the hypothetical man, she could not support the notion of using the hypothesis that a man exists who does the same work or work of equal value as that of a woman and who gets more money for doing it when in fact there was no such man. On the basis of experience, she supported the law in existence which would not be improved by the proposals put forward by the trade unions, and she asked the present Committee to consider carefully before accepting the seemingly innocuous and obviously very tempting solution put before it by the Workers' members.

The Committee noted the measures taken in the field of equal remuneration which had been the subject of the Government's report and comments by the TUC on complex matters, reflected in the Committee of Experts' observation. It also noted the exchange of views on these measures which had taken place in the present Committee. It hoped that the Government would give further consideration in tripartite consultation to the possibility of adopting additional positive action and that it would supply information on measures taken or contemplated.

Bahamas (ratification: 1976). The Government has communicated the following information:

The Legal Officers will be consulted as to how the necessary amendments can be made. Meanwhile the provisions in question are not applied.

The Industrial Relations Act is now up for review in the Legal Department, which is also considering provisions as to recognition, strikes, lock-outs. Section 73 will be reconsidered in this context. Section 72 is impossible to apply in practice.

Central African Republic (ratification: 1964).

The Government has communicated the following information:

The responses to observations concerning Conventions Nos. 29 and 105 which were provided in earlier reports remain valid to the extent that, within the context of significant institutional changes within the country, the draft texts have been taken up anew and submitted to the competent authorities. The draft texts are following the procedures used by national authorities for adoption of legislation.

The Government will provide new information concerning development of the situation in due time.

In addition a Government representative acknowledged that the Committee of Experts' observations on Conventions Nos. 29 and 105 addressed analogous subjects, but they did not necessarily overlap. In relation to Convention No. 105 the Committee had referred to legislative texts on intellectual freedom dating from 1960, 1963 and 1969. Moreover, the 1986 Constitution guaranteed fundamental freedoms to individuals and to groups, albeit within the framework of laws and regulations. In reply to the Committee of Experts' request for a copy of texts relating to the dissolution of the "MESAN" national movement, the Government representative noted that this movement had been a party and then a state organ under the regime of the former Emperor. The movement had been automatically dissolved upon the fall of the Emperor's regime and the abrogation of its Constitution. Since two different problems were involved, the Government did not believe that the conclusions under Convention No. 105 could be identical to those reached under Convention No. 29.

The Workers' and Employers' members expressed the wish that the conclusions of the present Committee concerning Convention No. 29 apply also to this Convention.

The Committee took note of the information provided by the Government representative as well as the written information which had been communicated by the Government. The Committee had examined this case on many occasions and had noted considerable divergencies between the Convention and the legislation and practice in the Central African Republic. The Committee noted with regret that considerable difficulties still remained. The Committee hoped that the Government would, in the near future, take all necessary measures, with the assistance of the ILO if appropriate, to comply fully with its obligations under Convention No. 105. The Committee hoped that the next report would show that real progress had been made.

Dominican Republic (ratification: 1958). A Government representative stated that since 16 August 1986 his country had entered into a different political and economic period and that they were now concerned to correct fundamental errors and to reconstruct the nation's forces. This did not imply recognition of the accusation made with respect to non-compliance with Conventions Nos. 98 and 105. In relation to Convention No. 105. In relation to Convention No. 105 it had not ruled out that violations of this Convention had been committed in the past, but the Government had now adopted remedial measures which respected human rights. Amongst others these included the need to seek out and repress the recruitment of foreign workers and their clandestine employment. At present, they were carrying out periodic investigations in regard to clandestine employment in the sugar plantations. Illegal immigration from Haiti was very difficult to control. His country did not wish to carry out mass repatriation in applying, with police help, the laws concerning migration and health. Clandestine employment and its inherent wrongs derived from the social and economic conditions of Haiti.

In regard to Convention No. 98, he stated that no legal text prevented a worker, national or foreign, from enjoying the rights to live and to work, or to join a trade union, the organisation of which was provided for in the Labour Code. Haitian workers were, in every respect, entitled to the same rights in regard to employment as foreign or Dominican workers. Labour legislation was applied without any difference to foreign workers. Given that the 1983 Commission of Inquiry had taken place in an era in which Government authorities neglected to show the attention that it should have to a number of crucial problems, his Government had made a request to the Director-General of the ILO for a direct contacts mission to be undertaken in the Dominican Republic as soon as possible.

The Workers' members stated that this case had been discussed for several years but that the situation remained unchanged. A new and interesting element in this case was the official request by the Government for a high-level direct contacts mission to be carried out. This mission should look into all problems, it should involve the Government, employers' organisations and trade unions, and it should draw up recommendations in order to bring about the necessary changes in law and practice. Referring to Convention No. 95 they stated that this Convention represented protection for people who lived in acute poverty. As yet no satisfactory reply had been given, either to the observations of the Committee of Experts or to the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry in regard to this intolerable situation. In regard to Convention No. 98, they regretted the violation of the trade union rights of rural workers who had been excluded from the provisions of the Labour Code, and that the Government had merely given a promise to consider draft legislation. They stressed the importance of the agricultural sector which in their opinion merited special attention. In relation to Convention No. 105 they referred to the unacceptable situation of Haitian plantation workers, which, although frequently illegal, was tolerated by the Government as well as exploited by employers. Having taken into consideration the good will that the Government had shown, they proposed that the case be mentioned in a special paragraph in order to emphasise the importance both of the problem and the Government's willingness to resolve it. They hoped that the mission requested by the Government would contribute to the improvement of the situation in the two countries.

The Employers' members observed that this case had been under discussion since 1973 and that according to the report of the Committee of Experts specific replies to important questions had still not been received. In regard to Convention No. 95, the 1983 Commission of Inquiry had made specific recommendations for wage protection. In particular, this concerned the payment of wages in negotiable vouchers, and the observance of minimum wages on sugar plantations where wages were based on output, that is, on the quantity of sugar cane harvested. The Government representative had not replied in a specific manner to any of these questions. The situation was the same for Convention No. 98. The Commission of Inquiry had drawn up a series of recommendations in regard to the application of this Convention to Haitian workers who were employed on sugar cane plantations. No specific measures had been taken in response to these, and the statement by the Government representative confirmed previous statements on the difficulty in controlling those people who had entered the country illegally. In reference to Convention No. 105 the Report of the Committee of Experts indicated that although Haitian workers were not legally hired but were obliged by force to carry out the work in the Dominican Republic. The Government had mentioned illegal immigration and the problems therein, but had not given any information on whether or not new agreements between Haiti and the Dominican Republic had been concluded. The Employers' members considered that the only new item in the discussion had been the proposal to send a direct contacts mission, but this did not alter the fact that the Government representative had not mentioned anything which had actually changed the situation or would change it in the future. They remarked that three important Conventions had been violated in the Dominican Republic and regretted the discrepancy that existed between the standards and their application.

The Government representative of Haiti announced his satisfaction with the statement made by the Government representative of the Dominican Republic in which he spoke of the willingness of his Government to put an end to the errors which had been made in the past. However, he was surprised that the requirement to observe the Conventions was considered to be a punishment and that Haitians had benefited from the good will of the Dominican Republic when this behaviour was in any case required by the Conventions. The case caused great anxiety to his Government and was of great interest to Haitian citizens. He considered it opportune that a direct contacts mission was to be undertaken but stressed that the carrying out of this mission should not end the discussion of this case by the Committee.

The Worker member of the Dominican Republic stated that Convention No. 98 continued to be violated by private and public employers and that the Labour Code contained provisions which did not comply with the Convention. As well, in one specific case, in the Dominican Republic the Executive Power had frozen the application of a collective agreement. Notwithstanding this, the present Government could not be accused of having an anti-trade union attitude. Recently tripartite dialogue had taken place and had led to a draft amendment being presented to the National Congress to change those provisions which did not comply with Convention No. 98. She stated that Haitian workers were members of trade unions, with rights to vote and be elected. The problem which did exist affected all workers and concerned the establishment of trade unions.

Referring to Convention No. 95 she said that the problem of the exclusion of agricultural workers from the Labour Code continued to exist. In relation to Convention No. 105 she remarked that there was a problem, which was widely known. She believed that if the Dominican Republic was traditionally going to seek Haitian workers for sugar cane harvesting, the Government was obliged to offer these workers normal and adequate living and working conditions. She stated she was satisfied with the present positive attitude of the Government, which was aware of the problem and had proposed that a mission visit the country in order to find a solution to the problem.

The Worker member for the United States of America emphasised the importance of the case which had now been discussed by the present Committee for the fifth consecutive time. Noting that the case concerning Convention No. 105 had appeared in a special paragraph in 1984 and 1987, he insisted on the necessity to undertake action, which could take the form of a direct mission.

The Workers' members proposed that the text of the conclusion appear in a special paragraph of the report of the present Committee. They stated that they were satisfied with the frank and constructive discussion which had taken place.

The Employers' members agreed to the Workers' members' proposal. They repeated that the special paragraph was not a penalty but highlighted a particular problem. They hoped that the text of the special paragraph would reflect the hopes that the direct contacts mission had given rise to.

The Committee took note of the information provided by the Government representative, as well as the extensive and detailed discussion which took place in the Committee while expressing its concern as regards the situation. The Committee welcomed the proposal made by the Government to invite an ILO direct contacts mission. The Committee expressed the hope that this mission would assist in removing the various discrepancies which existed regarding the application of these Conventions as well as others covered by the Commission of Inquiry in 1983, and that the Government would be able to report progress in law and practice the following year. The Committee decided to include this case in a special paragraph of its general report.

Ecuador (ratification: 1962). A Government representative stated that his country had ratified the Convention freely and in good faith, with no reservations whatsoever, since both the wording and the spirit fully coincided with national legislation and with the guiding principles of its democratic life. From the very beginning of its existence as an independent and sovereign State in the first part of the 19th century, Ecuador had proceeded to abolish and penalise all forms of slavery. During 150 years it had developed its institutions in such a way as to render impossible any form of forced or compulsory labour in its territory. The legal system and Constitution of Ecuador guaranteed the exercise of all political rights and the basis human rights to all citizens. Nevertheless, work was considered to be a right, a duty and a social honour which was not imposed on anyone except in cases of force majeure that might affect the community and ought not, could not, be considered as forced labour. This was in line with Convention No. 29, which his country has ratified as well. The right to strike was constitutionally guaranteed and fully protected by Ecuador's labour legislation, which was one of the most advanced in the world. Striking workers had the right to remain in the enterprises; the public authorities were obliged to protect them and stop any strike busters. Job security was also guaranteed by legislation for strikers, and if the strike was declared legitimate the employers was obliged to pay his workers their wages for the duration of the strikes. When Ecuador has ratified the Convention no one had any idea that this instrument could be used as a pretext for destabilising the legal order of the State as regards the provisions protecting internal public order and guaranteeing the practical exercise of human rights. If the legal provisions enabling the State to exercise its authority in guaranteeing social order were eliminated, the rule of chaos and violence would only be hastened. The Committee of Experts had requested the repeal of Decree No. 105 which prohibited and penalised acts of rebellion, sedition or resistance to the authorities. The Government representative stated that this Decree applied to situations in which individuals obstructed public roads by setting up obstacles, lighting fires, throwing incendiary bombs, etc., and forcing workers to leave their jobs against their will. This had nothing to do with the right to strike. There were offences, yet the penal law of Ecuador actually sanctioned such acts in a very benevolent manner. The Government representative noted with satisfaction that the report of the Committee of Experts no longer required, as it had previously, that the articles stipulating the sanctions which could be applied to such acts should be deleted from the Penal Code. He explained that these sanctions allowed the re-education of the convicted person, hastened their probation and contributed to their rapid reinsertion into society through freely chosen work. The demands of the Committee of Experts were tantamount to pressure for dismantling the State and were based on an exaggerated interpretation of the Convention's provision. He asserted, that by refusing to consider these unfounded claims, his Government, whose term of office would end in a few days, had only done its duty of safeguarding the national interest. As regards the request for deleting Article 165 from the Maritime Police Code, the Government had already informed the Committee a few years ago that a new Code was in preparation. This was a complex and technical topic which was of special interest and relevance for the national armed forces. The Government did not wish to obstruct this delicate process which should end before the National Congress, but wanted to make it known that it was in favour of eliminating the article in question. Nevertheless, merchant marine crews were subject to the Labour Code as regards their working conditions, including the right to resign subject to giving due notice to their employer. Only when the ship was away from its home port would the crew be subject to Article 165 which prohibited them from deserting and required them to obtain their captain's consent before leaving ship in a foreign port.

The Employers' members noted that the report of the Committee of Experts raised two questions on Convention No. 105. The first which was closely linked to Convention No. 87 was discussed this morning. A 1967 Decree (No. 105) allowed for the imposition of prison or forced labour sentences for all offences related to collective stoppage of work. The prerequisites for invoking this Decree were paralysis of communication networks and similar anti-social acts. The Decree therefore allowed for a vast number of possibilities for imposing such sanctions if the Government wished to do so. The Employers' members were obviously not in favour of unlimited freedom to strike, but Decree 105 imposed rather excessive restrictions on trade union activities. For this reason, the Committee on Freedom of Association had also recommended the abrogation of this Decree, although it seemed that the Government of Ecuador was rather reluctant to do so. The Employers' members could not accept the position of the Government and fully supported the conclusions of the Committee of Experts that the Decree contained excessive possibilities for imposing prison labour and forced labour sentences, in contradiction with Convention No. 105. The second question concerned the prohibition for crew members to ask to leave ship in any port; offences were punishable by forced labour or prison sentences. For obvious safety reasons desertions should be prevented or stopped but this could be done through dismissals or other sanctions, and not necessarily by automatically imposing prison or forced labour sentences. It would be desirable to modify this Decree during the revision of the Maritime Police Code; all the more so because such a modification had been announced in 1971. If they understood the Government representative correctly, his Government was favourably inclined to consider such a modification. The Employers' members therefore believed that the Government should provide more precise information on its intention. They expressed the wish that these modifications would be introduced in the Maritime Police Code.

The Workers' members also referred to the same two points and recalled the conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association on Decree No. 105. They noted that the Government of Ecuador had already been mentioned in a special paragraph last year in connection with Conventions No. 98, 105 and 87. On that occasion the Committee had requested the Government to take all the necessary steps to modify the relevant provisions in national legislation in order to ensure conformity with the Convention. In the meantime, the Committee of Experts, having considered the comments supplied by the Government, had made a further appeal to the Government to amend Decree No. 105. The Government representative had not indicated in this discussion that this would be done. They also hoped that the Government would give effect to the recommendations of the Committee of Experts and the Committee on Freedom of Association to modify Decree No. 105. As regards the second point, the Government representative had stated that his Government was preparing a new version of the Maritime Police Code but that it had not been finalised. He had also insisted that the supervision of the application of international Conventions should not have a negative effect on this process. The Workers' members regretted this statement, because the Committee's work was intended to help governments bring their legislation into conformity with ILO Conventions and not to obstruct such efforts. They hoped for progress in the very near future on the Maritime Police Code.

The Employers' members, in the light of the preceding discussion concerning the Government's position and the lack of progress noted with regard to the recommendations of the Committee of Experts and of the Committee on Freedom of Association, requested that this case be mentioned in a special paragraph.

The Workers' members supported the request of the Employers' members.

The Employers' members, in the light of the preceding discussions, the position of the Government, and the lack of progress observed with regard to the recommendations of the Committee of Experts and the Committee on Freedom of Association, requested that their case be mentioned in a special paragraph.

The Worker member of Ecuador thanked the Employers' and Workers' members for their statement which faithfully reflected the real problems in his country. Referring to the statement by the Government representative, he indicated that legislation in his country did provide for the right to strike, except for public servants, but in order to strike it was necessary to follow a tortuous procedure provided for in the Labour Code. Even when strikes were legal, employers had used mercenaries to remove workers on several occasions. In 1986 when the workers of Plásticos Naciones were on strike, a trade unionist named Bernardo Soledispa was killed while escaping from mercenaries. As regards Decree No. 105, he stated that many of its provisions had been inserted in another decree concerning national security. Since political violence was punishable under that latter decree, it was necessary to repeal Decree No. 105 which had been applied in particular against strikes by teachers in 1975, and workers of the Astra sugar refinery in 1976.

The Worker member of Argentina stated that he supported the request of the Committee of Experts to remove Article 165 from the Maritime Police Code. This article, which required workers to obtain the captain's consent before leaving ship, gave rise to situations of forced labour. In Ecuador's case the situation was all the more serious because Ecuador had ratified only a few ILO maritime Conventions, if any at all. He stressed that if a crew member left ship or resigned this did not endanger the lives of the crew, the cargo or the boat since regulations provided that any member of the crew should be replaced. Moreover, Article 165 was inhumanitarian as it took no account of family or other personal reasons that might cause a crew member to leave ship.

The Government representative was pleased that it was possible to continue the dialogue on the application of the Convention, but recalled that last year he had been unable to speak on the issue since he had not been given the floor. He stressed that Article 165 of the Maritime Police Code had nothing to do with the Convention. ILO Conventions were interlinked and Convention No. 29, Article 2, stipulated that the expression "forced or compulsory labour" did not any work or service that was required of any person as a consequence of a conviction include in court, provided that the said work or service would be carried out under the supervision and control of a public authorities, and that the said person would not be hired or placed at the disposal of private individuals, companies or associations. Consequently he could not understand why the Committee of Experts had considered as forced labour what Convention No. 29 did not consider as such. The special law for the application of sanctions had modified the corresponding provisions of the Penal Code, and this special law prescribed work as a tool of rehabilitation. The convicted person could maintain the upkeep of his family with the remuneration he received for his work, and obtain probation before the end of his sentence. Such work was also humanitarian as it allowed the convicted person to be busy and reinsert himself into society after he had served his sentence. Consequently, work was something that was beneficial for the convicted person. Decree No. 105 applied to situations of collective violence and collective work stoppages. In regard to prescribed sentences Article 606 of the Penal Code, which concerned third-class offences, was applied. In conclusion he stated that the debate had drifted into areas which were completely outside the terms of the Convention.

The Committee took note of the information given by the Government representative. It recalled that this case had been discussed in 1987 and on many previous occasions. It noted that the current information showed that the Government was not willing to amend one aspect of the shortcomings mentioned by the Committee of Experts. The Committee expressed the hope that the Government would soon take the necessary measures to amend Decree No. 105 and the Maritime Police Code so as to ensure full conformity with the Convention, and that at the next Conference it would be possible to note real progress. The Committee decided to mention this case in a special paragraph of its report.

The Government representatives made the following declaration: The Government of Ecuador could only express its concern with the fact that it was possible to use Conventions such as this so as to interpret them in a spurious fashion, outside the obligations established in the text in order to demand idiosyncratic reforms to national legislation, by exerting pressure through inquisition-like procedures.

Haiti (ratification: 1958). A Government representative wished to recall that the direct contacts mission had been sought by the Government, which believed that the best means of obtaining results lay within a precise legal framework, such as the procedure, standards and practice of the Committee offered. Concerning the question of the recruitment of Haitian workers for the Dominican Republic for work in sugar cane fields, no accord existed between the two countries since 1986.

The Workers' members lamented the fact that despite consistent examination of the problems through direct contacts and the Commission of Inquiry in 1983, and full discussion of the matter in the Conference Committee, there had been a tortuous succession of grievous infractions of this Convention. In 1986 the Workers' members had emphasised the serious conditions which persisted in spite of the political change which had taken place. Understanding that the Government had now formally requested direct contacts, they called for real progress in this particularly egregious case.

The Employers' members did not think that the Government representative had provided much information, and no report had been provided by the Government. The Government was making things somewhat too simple for itself; when this case was last under discussion in 1986, it had already stated that there was no more recruitment of Haitian workers to work in the Dominican Republic. Then in October 1986 the Minister of Labour had amplified this by saying that no more migration programmes were to be organised. Yet without doubt there were still many Haitian workers in the Dominican Republic. The point was not whether a legal migration programme for seasonal workers was to be organised; it was the existence of considerable problems involving Haitian workers in the Dominican Republic that mattered. The citizens of Haiti need the protection of their Government. The Employers' members urged the Government to reach an agreement with the Dominican Republic aimed at protecting these workers. In their view, the matter had not been satisfactorily settled.

The Worker member of the Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic thought that the view of the Workers' members had been put forward well enough. He believed that the present Committee should not confine itself to a discussion of Conventions Nos. 87 and 105 since, as pointed out in the Director-General's report to this session of the Conference, the situation involving freedom of association under Convention No. 87 was very closely connected with the over-all human rights situation in a given country.

The Government representative repeated his Government's concern regarding the question of Haitian workers in the Dominican Republic. Its citizens were, after all, at stake. A suggestion had been made that reaching an accord with the Dominican Republic would solve the problem; he wondered how that could be so when the reprehensible events took place principally on the other side of the border. His Government wished to have such an accord and thought that the direct contacts mission would clear the way for one to be reached. One approach did not exclude another.

The Committee took note of the statement made by the Government representative. The Committee noted that although no recruitment was being organised in Haiti, there remained grave problems affecting Haitian cane-cutters in the Dominican Republic. The Committee therefore welcomed the request for a direct contacts mission and hoped that it would be possible to make arrangements for the Government to be informed about the situation of Haitian cane-cutters in the Dominican Republic, and to intervene for their protection. The Committee hoped that the Government would be able to report positive development in this respect in the near future.

Pakistan (ratification: 1960). A Government representative stated that, under the provisions of the Industrial Relations Ordinance 1965, violations of collective agreements by employers and workers alike were punishable by law. He reiterated the position of his Government that nobody had been punished in the recent past under the provisions of that Ordinance. The penalties provided therein were only to ensure that employers and workers respected the collective agreements they concluded through the process of collective bargaining. As regards the observations of the Committee of Experts on the provisions of section 298(b) and 298(c) of the Pakistan Penal Code, he explained that forced labour as a result of religious discrimination did not exist and was forbidden under the Constitution and laws of Pakistan. With regard to the observations of the Committee of Experts on certain provisions of the West Pakistan Press and Public Ordinance 1963, he reiterated the view of the Government as stated in its latest report that the conviction of offenders by courts of law for specific offences did not fall within the scope of the Convention. The courts therefore had discretion in awarding punishment according to the gravity of the offence.

The Workers' members observed that, once again, the statement of the Government representative was disappointing, being identical to the ones given in the preceding sessions of the Conference Committee. They could see no progress, not even in the co-operation with the Conference Committee. The Committee of Experts had specifically recommended to the Government of Pakistan to revise sections 298(b) and (c) of the Penal Code, yet the present Committee had been given no indication about any follow-up to this recommendation. The situation in this case was no different from the one regarding Convention No. 29 and the Workers' members suggested that this case be mentioned in a special paragraph in the report together with the indication that other measures would have to be taken at the next session should no change occur by then.

The Employers' members stated that they agreed with the Workers' members. The Government representative of Pakistan did not provide any satisfactory reply to the four separate questions listed in the Committee of Experts' report. First, there were excessive powers of the authorities which could lead to forced labour, in particular on political grounds; the Committee of Experts had requested details on the practical application of this law. No such details had been given, in spite of the declaration that the law was not being applied to impose forced labour. At the very least, the Government should have provided copies of court decisions that had been made in practice. Second, compulsory labour could be imposed to enforce labour discipline under various provisions of the Industrial Relations Ordinance and the Merchant Shipping Act. If, as the Government stated, this was not applied, then the law should be modified accordingly. As regards the Merchant Shipping Act, amendments had even been envisaged previously but there had been no more reference to these at the present sitting of the Committee, so there was a step back. As regards the sanctions concerning anti-Islamic activities, the Government had stated that there did not exist any practice leading to forced labour as a result of religious discrimination; in that case also, the law should consequently be revised if it was not used, but no such plans had been announced by the Government. Therefore, the Employers' members shared the view of the Workers' members that no progress had been accomplished, and that the present Committee had to maintain its position as in the previous year.

The Government representative reiterated his Government's declaration that the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan guaranteed certain fundamental rights. As regards sections 298(b) and 298(c) of the Penal Code, the Constitution forbade discrimination on grounds of race, religion, etc. The Superior Courts had judicial review powers and if any party claimed that certain laws were discriminatory they could challenge those laws in court. He had already explained that forced labour as a result of religious discrimination was non-existent and forbidden under the Constitution and the laws of Pakistan. As regards the Merchant Shipping Act, a Bill had been introduced in the National Assembly to amend the relevant sections (100-103), but, due to the dissolution of the Assembly and the forthcoming elections, no progress could be made. He concluded by stating that the position of his Government had already been explained in its latest report, so he felt no need to repeat something that had already been submitted to the Committee in that report.

The Committee noted the explanations given by the Government representative. As the main issues raised had been repeatedly discussed previously, the Committee again expressed its serious concern and urged the Government to take very shortly the necessary measures to put its legislation and practice into conformity with the Convention, and to supply the detailed information requested by the Committee of Experts. The Committee decided to mention this case in a special paragraph of its General Report.

Syrian Arab Republic (ratification: 1958). A Government representative recalled that in its observation the Committee of Experts had taken note of Article 43, of the State Personnel Act No. 1, 1985, which referred to the weekly rest of such personnel. On the other hand the Committee of Experts had regretted that the Government's report provided no new elements on Article No. 120 of the Labour Code concerning the temporary exceptions to the weekly rest and insisted on the necessity to ensure compensatory rest to all the workers affected by such exceptions. The question here was simple and clear. The Government representative asserted that the legislative provisions in the Syrian Arab Republic totally conformed to the provisions of the Convention. In support of this information he referred in great detail to the various laws that concerned the problem of weekly rest, the violations of which were punishable according to the Labour Code. The Committee of Experts had only requested that Article 120 be modified in order to establish clearly the obligation to grant one day of compensatory rest to workers working on the weekly day of rest. The Government representative referred to a series of considerations in relation with the interpretation of Article 120 stating that it was in conformity with the Convention. He added that in response to the Committee's request, a draft amendment to Article 120 has been introduced in 1984 and that it was still being examined. The Committee of Experts would be informed of the results of this examination.

The Employers' members thanked the Government representative for his statement and observed that, as he said, this was indeed a very simple matter: ensure compensatory rest to workers affected by the provisions of Article 120 of the Labour Code concerning temporary exceptions to weekly rest. This matter was dealt with by the Committee of Experts for a long time and it was still not clear that the compensatory rest was guaranteed. The very detailed information on the legal provisions and their interpretation provided by the Government representative should be communicated by the Government to the Committee of Experts, which dealt with the complex legal questions that the Conference Committee was unable to examine. The Government has indicated, and this was confirmed by the Government representative, that a draft modification of Article 120 was being examined to clarify the matter of compensatory rest. The Employers' members expressed the hope that the Government could carry out its intention of clarifying the matter of compensatory rest and that it could soon be able to indicate this to the Committee of Experts so that the present Committee would finally be able to decide to terminate the debate on this matter, after so many years. In the present circumstances the Committee was unable to say that there was no need to bring this question up again for discussion.

The Workers' members associated themselves with the comments made by the Employers' members. They were surprised by the statement of the Government representative that there was total conformity between the legislation and the Convention since it concurred neither with the observations of the Committee of Experts, nor with the fact that a draft modification to Article 120 of the Labour Code was being examined in his country. They underlined that this matter had been discussed for many years and although the Government had stated on several occasions to the Committee of Experts that it would give effect to paragraph 3, Article 8 of the Convention, it had still not adopted the measures required to guarantee the application of this Convention. Referring to the complex legal topics mentioned by the Government representative, the Workers' members stated that these comments should have been considered by the Committee of Experts prior to being discussed by the present Committee.

The Government representative stated that the draft amendment of Article 120 of the Labour Code had first to go through the Council of Ministers and then through the People's Council. That was why, just like in other countries, this modification could not be done overnight. Nevertheless, the Government was following this question very closely.

The Employers' members thanked the Government representative for having clarified that his Government was taking the necessary measures to modify the legislation with a view to bringing it in conformity with the Convention. They requested him to transmit to the Government their wish that this process be accelerated.

The Committee took note of the details and explanations given by the Government representative. Since the Committee of Experts had referred for many years to discrepancies in the national legislation, it hoped that the Government would soon take the necessary measures in the light of the comments of the Committee of Experts.

Convention No. 107: Indigenous and Tribal Populations, 1957

Bolivia (ratification: 1962). A Government representative recalled that the Committee of Experts requested information in reply to questions on the situation of forest-dwelling indigenous populations and expressed its concern with the ownership rights of these populations and on the demarcation of lands occupied by them. He stated that the detailed information requested by the Committee of Experts had not been processed yet but would be dispatched within the period ending 30 June 1988, as requested by the Committee of Experts. They could nevertheless give some information of a general nature. Bolivia was a pioneer country in helping and protecting rural populations. In 1952 it proceeded with an agrarian reform which constituted one of the most significant and extensive actions in the region. In this manner ownership rights were granted to indigenous populations and this coincided with the introduction of universal vote in the country, through which unqualified rights of citizenship were granted to indigenous populations in order to enable them to preserve their culture, and their economic, political and social rights. This reform enabled the country to evolve out of its semi-feudal situation. The agrarian reform was very successfully applied especially in the Andes and the valleys, where 95 per cent of the indigenous populations were living. In the eastern zones of the Amazon, inhabited by few indigenous communities, the agrarian reform had not been applied, due to structural reasons, in particular insufficient state resources, the vastness of these Amazonian regions, and the dispersion of indigenous groups which were mostly nomads. There was therefore a lot to do still in the Amazon regions. The President of the Republic followed this matter with interest as illustrated by the dialogue he recently held with representatives of the populations concerned, and he proposed to complete the agrarian reform that he himself had begun in 1952. Following a meeting of the President of the Republic with the Centre of Indigenous People and Communities of the Bolivian people in December 1987, a joint committee was set up, consisting of representatives of the Government and of the Amazon groups with the aim of undertaking the necessary action for solving the problems of populations in the Amazon regions. The Government had also requested the technical assistance of the Inter-American Indigenous Institute, organised by the Organisation of American States (OAS), in order to attend to the demands of the Amazon population. Finally, he thanked the ILO for having assigned an expert on indigenous population to the regional office in Lima. His country would certainly be able to benefit from the technical assistance of this expert.

The Employers' members recalled that the Government's report for 1986 had not provided full replies to the detailed questions raised by the Committee of Experts, although these questions had been discussed since 1982, and regretted that the Government did not have enough time during that period to prepare detailed reports. They expressed their concern with the impact of the agrarian reform on the drawing of land and property boundaries in forest areas inhabited by indigenous populations. The situation had become more complicated in view of the existence of programmes of colonisation and settlement for other non-indigenous populations in the same regions. They stressed the importance of drawing up clear borders so as to respect the rights of the indigenous populations and their ownership of their land. The Employers' members understood from the declaration by the Government representative that the Government of Bolivia was undertaking global efforts to solve this problem in the country in general, but the concern focused on regions that presented difficulties for the application of the present Convention such as the Amazon. They pointed out that the Government representative himself had recognised the existence of problems in that region and therefore invited the Government to provide a complete report on this issue, which should be solved as soon as possible, if necessary with external help. The ILO assistance requested by the Government in the framework of Convention No. 5, and in particular the direct contacts, should also cover Convention No. 107 so as to study this problem and take the measures required to apply the Convention in that region. They hoped that they would be able to note an improvement in the situation next year. In conclusion they noted that the problem was mainly due to a combination of discrepancies in the legislation and practice of the country and there could be no solution without taking account of the traditional rights of the natives. The ILO should contribute its experience and help in this. As the Government had provided no information in reply to the questions of the Committee of Experts, the Employers' members proposed that the application of the present Convention should be placed on the agenda of the seminar, as was mentioned in the discussion on Convention No. 105, so that progress could be observed next year.

The Workers' members regretted to have to discuss the application of the present Convention yet again this year. The situation is not satisfactory, since media reports testified as to how the indigenous and tribal populations were being chased away from lands they had occupied for a long time, because they had no ownership deeds. However, Article 7 of the Convention mentioned custom law. The situation was therefore not satisfactory. For several years, the Committee had stated that both legislation and practice had to be modified. This year, the General Survey on Convention No. 111 had described minority groups that were subject to discrimination, and a special Committee of the present Conference was reviewing Convention No. 107. They regretted that both legislation and practice were not in conformity with the Convention. On the basis of information received they feared that the agrarian reform would help certain illicit trades and cultivations that were causing great harm to the world, rather than help indigenous populations. The Workers' members asked the Government representative whether the future seminar referred to in the discussion on Convention No. 5, would also cover Convention No. 107. If these two activities were aimed at clarifying standards, it was absolutely necessary not only to discuss Convention No. 5, but also Convention No. 107 and Convention No. 111, for which a General Survey on discrimination had been prepared.

The Government representative stated that the agrarian reform undertaken in 1952 had granted land to 95 per cent of the rural population. The fact that the rest of the indigenous population had been unable to benefit from this reform was due to the vastness of the territory they inhabited, which was as big as France, for example. It was also due to the very difficult economic period that the country had experienced until 1985 with a hyper-inflation of 2,400 per cent a year. This situation had been overcome but has then been seriously shaken by the collapse of tin prices which had eroded 25 per cent of the national exports. He also underlined that coca did not grow in the Amazon regions. The Government had every intention of solving the problems of indigenous populations in the Amazon and therefore the President of the Republic had ordered the creation of a committee to study the matter. In reply to the question of the Workers' members, he indicated that in principle Convention No. 107 will be dealt with in the national tripartite seminar, but would not be its main theme. It would be dealt with in the same way as the other Conventions. He recalled again that the Government had asked the Inter-American Indigenous Institute for technical assistance and stated that his Government was thinking of establishing contacts with the ILO Regional Office in Lima to set up a new special programme concrete for Bolivia, benefiting from the appointment of an expert in indigenous populations.

The Workers' members hoped that the national tripartite seminar would give particular attention to all the important Conventions whose application presents difficulties, including Convention No. 107.

The Committee took note of the detailed information provided by the Government representative. It expressed its concern about the situation and hoped that the Government, taking into account the comments of the Committee of Experts, would take all necessary measures, with the help of the ILO and other organisations to protect the rights of the indigenous populations concerned in conformity with the requirements of the Convention. The Committee hoped that the Government would soon provide full information in this regard. The Committee hoped that the proposed tripartite seminar would also pay attention to this Convention and would permit progress to be achieved.

Brazil (ratification : 1965). The Government has communicated the following information :

The National Indian Foundation (FUNAI) is assisting 221,194 Indians at the present time. It is pursuing two systems for protecting isolated Indians. The by-laws of FUNAI provide for the establishment of an indigenous council as a scientific and cultural advisory body to the President. However, this council has not yet been established. The aim of decentralisation is to initiate projects designed by the community concerned.

There are various regulatory standards applicable to access to indigenous areas. In general, the authorisation of the President of FUNAI, following the express agreement of the leaders of the indigenous community affected, is required. The means of granting authorisation differ when the exploitation of minerals or natural resources or the presence of religious missions or missionaries are involved.

In the case of new requests for emancipation, the procedure is the same as in the case of IBIRAMA. Any Indian who observes the requirements of the Brazilian Electoral Code may be a candidate for elective office, whether federal, state or municipal.

The draft Code will be voted upon only once the new Constitution has been promulgated. Various articles (some approved, some not) of that Constitution deal with indigenous populations. The Constituent Assembly has been concerned with the rights to land, the exploitation and exploration of resources and energy sources, the protection of the integrity and development of indigenous cultures, etc. There is effective participation of Indians in the local and regional administration of FUNAI. They are or may be consulted at all levels, including the legislative level. Parliamentary committees dealing with indigenous matters have suspended their activities for the moment.

FUNAI works actively in studying the repercussions of projects concerning indigenous populations and in finding solutions to problems. Projects developed by licensees of the Electric Company now involve FUNAI participation from the outset.

FUNAI has initiated legal proceedings seeking to restore land to the Pataxo Indians. The General Directorate of Lands (SUAF/FUNAI) is responsible for matters relating to clearing up land titles. With the aim of limiting the risks of invasion of land, FUNAI is seeking to prohibit entry to the areas of the indigenous populations and to install watchkeeping posts. FUNAI is actively participating in the process of marking boundaries of indigenous lands. There is no general standard for determining the form of indemnity.

Regulations have been issued under Decree No. 88,985. Various means of protection of indigenous communities have been adopted. The agrarian reform programme cannot affect indigenous lands in relation to the redistribution of national lands.

At the present time, there are 66 associations directed by Indians and advised by FUNAI which assess the value of rubber production, paying better wages and providing merchandise at lower prices. FUNAI does not encourage work by Indians outside the indigenous areas; it affords legal protection when necessary.

There has been no proposal drawn up for realising the objectives of the JURUMA Institute in concrete terms.

In addition a Government representative informed the Committee that the Brazilian Government had submitted its comments on the 1988 direct request of the Committee of Experts to the International Labour Standard Department. Referring to paragraph 4 of the observation of the Committee of Experts concerning the application of the present Convention he stated with the National Federation of Industry (CNI) considered that the Convention included principles the application of which would be extremely difficult, in particular, those provisions that referred to national sovereignty. Taking into account the fact that the CNI in Brazil was a very prestigious institution and represented a very important section of Brazilian society, its criticisms of Convention No. 107 clearly demonstrated the difficulties facing the Brazilian Government in applying a number of its provisions and in developing a consistent and appropriate policy regarding indigenous communities. The Brazilian Government did, however, not agree with the comments made by the CNI as regards the occupation of the indigenous lands. Such comments, on the contrary, indicated the correctness of the Government policy which, in its application, very often would run counter to strong interests. This was evident if one thought that the Government's goal was to guarantee about 80 million hectares of territory to the indigenous communities. The CNI mentioned that the conflicts with respect to the occupation of indigenous lands were due, inter alia, to the lack of proof of immemorial possession of many areas by indigenous populations which in his opinion was incorrect. The territory of an indigenous community was determined by a finding, prepared by anthropologists which defined the area to be delimited, taking into account a number of factors, such as the area occupied over the past years, archeological sites and cemeteries, hunting lodges, and raw materials necessary for the cultural activities of indigenous groups, the area over which they ranged, etc. On the basis of this finding, a decree by the executive power declared the territory as indigenous in order to guarantee it as a lifetime usufruct for the indigenous community. The problem of the legal situation of the indigenous lands was something that provoked many comments. Consequently it was not superfluous to clarify that according to the Constitution all indigenous territories belonged to the Federal State. Such territories were inalienable and their permanent usufruct was only attributed to the indigenous communities.

Paragraph 5 of the observation of the Committee of Experts dealt with the comments made by the National Confederation of Industrial Workers (CNTI) according to which it recognised that the work of delimitation of the indigenous lands was continuing in Brazil, but it mentioned slowness of the process. It was a priority of the Government to guarantee the indigenous lands, whose delimitation was essential. Between 1910 and 1984 about 12 million hectares were delimited. Between 1985 and 1987 another 20 million hectares were delimited, which demonstrated the priority that the Government gave to this problem, especially considering the conflicts and the occupation of indigenous lands. It had to be taken into account that the continental dimensions of Brazil in many cases made efficient and rapid action of the Government difficult. Furthermore delimitation was an onerous process that often required financial resources which were not readily available. It also was a complex process because it meant that first the ever increasing number of invaders had to be removed, which sometimes made it necessary to have recourse to the support of the public forces. In many cases it was also necessary to displace the occupiers of the indigenous lands to other areas of the national territory, in a co-ordinated action between the National Indian Foundation FUNAI and the Ministry of Agrarian Reform.

Referring to the establishment of the Yanomami reserve (section 6 of the report of the Committee of Experts) he stated that its delimitation was not an easy task which would not be completed with the desired speed. He pointed out that this community was not to be found only on Brazilian territory; he affirmed that the process of delimitation was well advanced, in the concluding stage. The recognition of the territory which would be delimited by an Act of the Federal Government was concluded. The Government had adopted measures to guarantee the integrity of the Yanomami. To this end about 1,200 invaders had been removed who had occupied the area, and to this effect, the Government had to have recourse to the support of the military forces. The Government was fully conscious of the threats against the existence of the Yanomami. To the extent of its possibilities it would not allow this sort of threat to continue and with this objective, the delimitation and the conservation of the reserve, in spite of its cost, had priority for FUNAI. One project that recently was the subject of observations regarding Government action was the "Calha Norte" project. This project comprised the co-ordinated action of a number of Federal Government bodies. The goal of which was to implement a rational and integrated development process. Contrary to the concern of the ICFTU, the project would not have as a consequence the expulsion of the indigenous populations from their territories which were in the extreme north of the country, but would guarantee their permanency on those lands and would protect them from undue invasion. In the framework of the project, the FUNAI had been able to guarantee the demarcation of the indigenous lands as was the case of the lands of the Yanomami Indians. This process of demarcation had never been suspended as was affirmed by the ICFTU.

As regards paragraph 7 of the observation of the Committee of Experts, the speaker stated that the Presidential Decree to which the ICFTU referred, defined the demarcation activity of all indigenous lands of the country as a priority. The reference that was made to the fact that it was impossible to modify indigenous lands that had already been demarked before this process had been concluded resorted from the concern of the Government to develop intensive demarcation work and to use in the best possible way the resources available for this purpose.

As regards paragraph 8 of the observation of the Committee of Experts, he stressed that the "Calha Norte" project in no way banned indigenous presence in the frontier strip of 150 kilometres, but that this was destined to promote the demarcation of these lands. The principle of the preservation of this strip was not an innovation in the Brazilian legislation. Since the last century this strip was already provided for as a national security zone. Consequently, there was no intention of the Government to remove groups of indigenous populations from the frontier strips. Therefore, the permanence of the Yanomami in a territory of eight million hectares was guaranteed.

With regard to the observations made by the ICFTU in relation to the construction of highway BR-364 (paragraphs 9 and 10 of the report of the Committee of Experts), the Government representative stated that contrary to what was affirmed, the construction of this highway had made the demarcation of the indigenous lands possible and had not provoked their expropriation. Furthermore, the Brazilian legislation did not permit the indigenous areas being summarily expropriated for purposes of building roads. As regarded the suspension of financing of the road project by the Inter-American Development Bank, he pointed out that what in fact took place was the reprogramming of the Bank's resources with respect to the demarcation of the indigenous lands, for action in the fields of education.

Finally, with reference to paragraph 14 of the report of the Committee of Experts, the speaker indicated that the new Constitution which was being drawn up at the moment and the promulgation of which could occur in the next few weeks, provided for a specific chapter on indigenous populations and their rights. The already approved draft recorded important achievements for the indigenous populations which, if they were maintained, would represent tangible progress as regarded the indigenous problem in Brazil. Amongst the measures which already were approved he mentioned the following: (a) the guarantee of demarcation of the entire area traditionally occupied by indigenous groups; (b) the possibility given to the indigenous groups to decide themselves on any activities that would take place on their lands; the right to charge royalties for the exploitation of mineral resources on their lands, which may occur with the approval of the indigenous populations concerned and with the approval of the National Congress; (c) the possibility was granted to the indigenous persons to have recourse to justice for defending their rights, free of charge, through the Federal Public Ministry; (d) the Federal Government committed itself to preventing any process of social disorganisation which could result in the loss of the indigenous communities' identity.

The Employers' members thanked the Government for the detailed information furnished but at the same time indicated that unfortunately this information could not substitute a report to the Committee of Experts which had not been presented for the second consecutive year. It was not the present Committee's task to examine such detailed information. The observation of the Expert Committee showed a great number of problems which undoubtedly were related to the country's dimension. In fact, 14 points had been raised which finally could be summarised in one sentence: the protection of the indigenous population. The details which were brought forward by the Government representative should be examined by the Committee of Experts. It was a problem as big as the size of the country; a question of organisation and delimitation of regions reserved for the indigenous population, and the supervision of the borders of these lands. It seemed that delimitation had not yet completely been carried out. Supervision was in the competency of the National Security Council. The 150 kilometres strip in the frontier zone in which, according to the Government representative, the presence of the indigenous population was at no time prohibited, also was in the competency of that Council. The information which should be sent to the Committee of Experts should be extremely accurate on this point. The protection of indigenous populations should be a permanent task. The increasing industrialisation of a country made this task even more difficult and the more this industrialisation developed the better measures of protection were required. According to the report of the Committee of Experts much was left to be done. Consequently, this problem required much energy and resources. Information on the adoption of the new Constitution had been presented and it was to be hoped that it would indeed be an improvement and not lead to further deterioration of the situation of the indigenous population. Once again, even though legal texts were important, they were of no use if they were not accompanied by concrete measures. For that reason they hoped that the Government would supply detailed information that would permit the Experts once again to examine the case and to note positive changes.

The Workers' members expressed their concern for the situation of the indigenous population. A Conference Committee is responsible for the revision of Convention No. 107 on Indigenous and Tribal Populations and they were confident that their work would advance quickly. Just as the Employers' members, they regretted that the oral information furnished by the Government had not been sent in good time to the Committee of Experts since at present it was not possible to examine it in total. The problem of indigenous populations particularly preoccupied the Workers' members since these minorities were subjected to ill-treatment not only in Brazil but in many other countries too. Very often, they were badly protected, their lands were invaded and they were killed. He referred to two telegrams in which the assassination of indigenous persons and the invasion of their lands by 20,000 people were reported. The problem of saving and protecting them did not only consist of delimitating the land but to ensure that this was respected, and that the invaders were chased out and punished. Together with "Survival International", "Amnesty International", the National Federation Industrial Workers and the ICFTU they were concerned about the daily danger facing these populations and they agreed that the lands had to be delimited. It was necessary to adopt very concrete measures. The country was immense and there was a desire from many sides to exploit the natural resources very quickly. Thus it was to be hoped that the Brazilian Government would collaborate with the Committee revising Convention No. 107 and that it would not wait with delimitating the lands and protecting the indigenous populations until the Constitution would be adopted. They hoped that the Government would furnish better information than they had up to now.

The Worker member of the United Kingdom considered that it would have been more helpful for the present Committee if the Government representative, instead of giving his statement orally before the Committee, would have sent his report to the Committee of Experts. He regretted the Government's failure, over a member of years, to reply to the observations made by employers, trade unions, national and international, and the Committee of Experts itself. He also expressed his concern about the changing fate of the National Indian Foundation (FUNAI) since from time to time the Committee heard from the Government representative that the foundation had been strengthened, sometimes that offices had been sacked and that it had been reorganised. He also expressed his concern that there had been and there was a serious threat to the existence of Indians due to the occupation of their lands by mining concerns and other exploiters. To underline his concern, he quoted a letter from Amnesty International which he had received only recently:

On 8 January 1988, 60 Indian chiefs sent a joint letter to the President and to all members of the Brazilian Congress complaining about the FUNAI's improper handling of Indian affairs. They accused FUNAI of completely failing to assist the Indian communities which they complained are in a state of total neglect and destitution. Medical assistance is almost totally non-existent and work, health and education projects have virtually all be dropped. Apart from this, in Indian Communities there is increasing danger from invasion of their reservations by miner prospectors, timber merchants and small farmers. They also accuse FUNAI of misusing funds allocated by the International Development Bank for Indian assistance for paying overly generous expenses to their employees. In addition, the Chiefs allege that corruption is widespread and that many FUNAI staff receive bribes from mining and timber companies installed in the areas.

By quoting this letter he did not want to accuse the Government of perpetrating the crimes, but they existed and he felt bound to ask whether the Government was doing everything possible under the Convention to prevent abuses to the indigenous population. He requested the report to be placed on record because he thought that the Committee of Experts should examine that statement. It seemed to him that the case continued to be filled with contradictions and that despite the Government's statement both this year and on previous occasions the Indian population was still suffering. Even if these people were unable to speak for themselves and would not hear what was said in the present Committee, he hoped that the Committee could apply the necessary pressure on the Government to introduce the much needed reforms. The Government representative stressed that his Government was aware of the difficulties and problems involved in this matter but it was also firmly determined to face and resolve them.

The Committee noted the written and oral information supplied by the Government. In discussing this case last year, the Committee had expressed its concern about the situation. This year, the observation of the Committee of Experts referred again to comments received from national and international workers' organisations concerning allegations of serious violations of the rights of indigenous populations. The Committee noted the assurances of the Government that some positive developments were in the final stages of discussion as regarded constitutional arrangements for indigenous populations affairs. It must, however, again express its deep concern at the allegations of serious abuses and firmly hoped that the Government would provide full information on all the points raised in the comments of the Committee of Experts so as to enable the supervisory bodies to determine whether the requirements of the Convention were observed as regarded the legal and in particular physical protection of the indigenous populations concerned, and would take the measures necessary to ensure this protection.

India (ratification: 1958). A Government representative stated that the Government was keen to see that tribals displaced as a result of the Sardar Sarover Dam and Power Project were, as far as possible, being properly rehabilitated according to their wishes.

In regard to Article 6 of the Convention, the Committee of Experts had observed that it was too early to judge whether or not arrangements met with requirements of the Article. No comment was therefore required at this time. In regard to the observations based on Articles 11, 12(1), and 14 the Government did not agree with the view expressed by the Committee of Experts that recent occupation of government-owned lands did not mean that tribals had no land rights. The Government considered that traditional occupation of lands was different to the unauthorised occupation of clearly defined government or forest lands. Encroachment could not be considered either as "traditional occupation" in the meaning of Article 11, or as "habitational territories" in the meaning of Article 12(1) of the Convention. Ownership rights of the tribal populations for lands which they had traditionally occupied were recognised, but tribals who have illegally encroached upon government or forest lands could not now claim ownership rights under the Convention. As far as Article 14 was concerned the Government was fully committed to the provisions of the Convention and did not believe that there was any ground for complaint. Nevertheless the Government of Gujarat had been generous in regard to compensation. Under the Liberalised Rehabilitation Policy (dated 14 December, 1987) tribals who were illegally cultivating government or forest lands have been given substantial concessions. This policy has been well received by non-governmental organisations. The Governments of Maharashtra and Madhya Pradesh have updated their rehabilitation policies along similar lines. In reply to the points raised by the letters sent by the International Federation of Plantation, Agricultural and Allied Workers (IFPAAW) to the ILO, and by Survival International to the World Bank, he stated that all tribals willing to settle in Gujarat would be treated on par. The standard of living of oustees would be improved until they were integrated with the host population. Compensation for assets lost would be based on fair evidence and in accordance to current laws and individual grievances arising from resettlement would be looked into by the Narmada Control Authority. Efforts were being made by the three state governments to buy large tracts of land of acceptable quality so that resettlement of the oustees would not be fragmentary and that their communities would not be dispersed. Relocation to Gujarat had been proposed as it was there that new lands were to be brought under irrigation, but oustees would be resettled in their own state if they preferred. Encumbered land had not been sold to oustees except in one case which was now resolved. Land transfer to oustees was transferred to them in full and legal documents were only retained to safeguard them from further transfers.

The Workers' members stated that it was difficult to give an immediate response to the wealth of information which had been given by the Government representative. This information should be examined by the Committee of Experts. The various projects should be discussed with the interested organisations and with the representatives of the people directly affected by resettlement. They stated that it was of concern that those who were occupying land illegally had been excluded from making claims for the land being offered in compensation. They were also concerned that the three states were offering different solutions to the problem. The Government should ensure that treatment of the oustees by the three governments was uniform.

The Employers' members stated that a final evaluation could not yet be made on this issue. The dialogue on these numerous and complex problems should continue, especially in regard to the ownership of land and to compensation. It was not clear whether the provisions of the Convention were being respected or what concrete measures were being taken to ensure that adequate levels of protection and compensation were being offered. They emphasised that more detailed information and further discussion were needed.

The Government representative replied that the distinction between occupation over a long period and recent occupation must be maintained. Nevertheless, in Gujarat, oustees who were unauthorisedly cultivating land would be paid compensation and offered land, for which the cost would be recovered from the compensation paid. Landless oustees would also be entitled to land free of cost. The details of these measures would be given to the Office.

The Committee notes the detailed information supplied by the Government representative. It notes the very important human issues raised in the observation of the Committee of Experts which referred to comments received from the International Federation of Plantation, Agricultural and Allied Workers, and also to the real and considerable efforts made by the Government to alleviate the effects of displacement and settlement on the tribal populations affected by the dam project. It hopes that the Government will continue to supply information on measures taken with a view to ensuring the full application of the Convention in respect of all the points raised, taking into account the views and needs of the populations concerned and the comments received from the International Federation of Plantation, Agricultural and Allied Workers.

Convention No. 111: Discrimination (Employment and Occupation), 1958

Chile (ratification: 1971). A Government representative stated that the Constitution of his country prohibited any form of discrimination which was not based upon individual capacity or ability and that this prohibition was guaranteed by an effective right to appeal to the courts. He recalled that Chile had appeared in the list of cases of progress in relation to this Convention, in view of the repeal of legal provisions which had in the past been the object of comments by the Committee of Experts. Referring to section 157(6) of the Labour Code, which the Committee of Experts had cited in its observation, he stated that this particular reason for termination of an employment contract referred to acts which had an effect on work and that there had been persons found guilty of having violated Act No. 12927 on state security whose employment contracts had remained in force even in state enterprises. In reference to article 8 of the Constitution, he stated that, in the eight years that provision had been in force, it had been applied only once to a person who was not an official and who had been found by the Constitutional Court to have engaged in constitutionally impermissible acts following a trial on charges of agitating for basic change by means of the use of force. As regards Act No. 18662 which issued regulations under article 8 of the Constitution, he indicated that this Act had the very purpose of defining the scope of the constitutional provision with greater clarity and precision. He then gave indications which, in the view of his Government, would clarify the concerns voiced in relation to article 8 and its regulatory Act. The first referred to freedom of opinion which existed in Chile and which extended as well to persons proposing significant reforms of the Constitution and of the institutions established under it. He then gave indications which, in the view of his Government, would clarify the concerns voiced in relation to article 8 and its regulatory Act. The first referred to freedom of opinion which existed in Chile and which extended as well to persons proposing significant reform of the Constitution and of the institutions established under it. He recalled that ten or so political parties, mostly opposition parties, had been founded in Chile. He stated in the second place that exclusions resulting from article 8 always required a court ruling and, in the third place, that article 8 penalised acts and not a person's intent. With regard to the powers granted to university rectors under certain decrees whose repeal the Committee of Experts had called for, he stated that, although there was no uncertainty in the situation, the Government would submit the matter to the competent authorities for consideration. In the case of the University of Chile, he affirmed that the rector of the university had given guarantees in relation to the just and equitable exercise of the powers conferred and that the special powers would be repealed automatically before the end of 1988. In reference to section 55 of the Statute of the University of Chile, he stated that in Chile no one was expelled from the university on the grounds of his or her political opinion, since that would be incompatible with the legal standards in force.

The Workers' members recalled that the application of this Convention by Chile had long been discussed by the Conference Committee, just as it had long been of concern to the Committee of Experts. The dialogue had been going on since at least 1978. The acceptance of dialogue was positive, but the situation in the country with regard to freedoms in general, and the application of this Convention in particular, were a cause for serious concern. While from time to time some progress or other act of goodwill could be noted from one year to the next, the situation remained truly worrisome. The Workers' members congratulated the National Grouping of Workers (CNT), who knew the situation from inside, for daring, under current political circumstances, to present comments which could in turn assist the Committee of Experts in relation to the application of the Convention. Where the Workers' members had looked for possible changes, the Government had instead confirmed a number of points. They could not accept the Government's argument that a legal provision which was recognised as being in non-conformity with the Convention was not being applied in practice and therefore had been tacitly repealed. As long as such legislation remained on the books, its misuse remained a possibility. This meant that article 8 of the Constitution (prohibiting any act of any person or group intended to propagate, inter alia, a doctrine advocating a conception of society, the State or law "of a totalitarian character or based on class warfare") was a catch-all for anyone who did not agree with the regime in power. The Workers' members, well aware of the dangers of applying criteria of political opposition in access to training, employment or occupation, would continue to object to such provisions as long as they remained in force. In Chile, there was unfortunately still a risk that a person who did not agree with the president, the party or the trade union did not have access to appropriate employment and could be dismissed on that basis. Article 8 of the Constitution also provided that persons who had committed such offences were barred for ten years from access to any public post or position, and so forth. As the Committee of Experts had noted, this was in contradiction to the Convention. Although the Government representative had said that the provisions were not applied, and only involved persons excluded for reasons of security, individuals had in fact been affected by these provisions. Moreover, under section 157(6) of the 1987 Labour Code, an employer could terminate a contract of employment, without entitlement to compensation, on the grounds that an offence had been committed under the Act on state security. The Workers' members found the very possibility of resorting to such abuses to be unacceptable. In addition, the Government had said that there was nothing irregular going on in the universities, yet decrees granted broad powers to university rectors to terminate professors' and officials' contracts and to expel students without having to give any reason for the decision. The Workers' members would not be satisfied until such legislative provisions had been amended and the concrete facts had changed. They once again called upon the Government to take the steps necessary to ensure that, in accordance with the Convention, no one could be denied access to the university or other institution, or be expelled therefrom, for having expressed a political opinion. They asked the Government to state when and how the modifications in various laws and in practice would be made.

The Employers' members noted that in the course of the periodic discussions of this case the Conference Committee had always been able to see changes. Last year, in view of the adoption of a new law principally governing the public service, Chile had been cited as a case of progress in relation to this Convention. The remaining concerns the Committee of Experts had expressed in its pending observation began with article 8 of the Constitution, and a state security provision which did not seem to be self-executing but rather was applied by means of court decisions. The Government representative had confirmed that this has been applied in only one case to date. The Employers' members supported the Committee of Experts' request for information about any decisions reached in practice under those provisions and on any measure taken or contemplated to amend or repeal article 8 of the Constitution and Act No. 18662. The Employers' members also drew attention to the provision in the new Labour Code permitting termination of an employment contract under circumstances regarding which the Committee of Experts had expressed concern over the danger that political opinion could be the basis for such a decision. The Government representative had stated that this related only to punishable offences which had a direct bearing on work. The Employers' members seconded the Committee of Experts' doubts as to whether this provision was precise enough, and joined in the request for additional information. They recalled that the Committee had urged the government to re-examine provisions allowing for the termination of a worker's contract for conduct which had no bearing on the performance of duties arising from the employment relationship. In relation to the two points in the Committee of Experts' observations concerning universities, the Employers' members noted the Government representative's statements that the rectors' powers were confined to academic affairs and that no student had been expelled under the provisions in question. They welcomed the Government's assurance that it was open to re-examining this matter and hoped that the text of any new rules would be forwarded. They also supported the Committee of Experts' request for copies of court decisions; these would help to clarify the scope of application of the various legislative provisions at issue. The Employers' members noted that changes had taken place in the past. They took note of the Government's pledge to re-examine certain matters and of its mention of new rules to be drafted. Recalling the important referendum scheduled for late 1988 which might have an indirect effect on the application of this essential human rights convention, they looked forward to continuing the dialogue and to seeing positive developments in connection with ensuring full application of the Convention.

The Worker member of Colombia stated that taking account of the clear, precise comments of the Committee of Experts, the arguments presented by the Government representative of Chile were unacceptable. He considered that once again a statement of goodwill and promises was being made which, as experience had shown, would to a large extent remain unfulfilled. He considered that article 8 of the Constitution of Chile violated not only Convention No. 111 but also Conventions on freedom of association. He stressed that in the year marking the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration on Human Rights, violations of these rights in Chile could not be passed over lightly. He referred to the case of the Socialist Party leader Clodomiro Almeyda, who had been found by the constitutional court to have personally violated article 8 of the Constitution and who had been made subject to the occupational prohibitions provided for in that article. He also thought that the provision of the Labour Code which permitted a worker to be dismissed without compensation on the basis of having committed a crime under the Act on national security, even if there was no direct bearing on work, also violated Conventions Nos 87 and 98 since a call for collective public action could be a crime under that Act. He noted that the provision referred to had not been amended when the new Labour Code was adopted.

The Worker member of Spain, referring to the Labour Code provision which permitted termination of a workers' employment contract on the basis of the commission of a crime under the Act on national security, esteemed the explanations provided by the Government representative to be insufficient. In fact, if exercise of trade union activities and the calling of strikes or work stoppages led to dismissal, this was in contradiction to the Convention ratified by Chile. This was also the case if workers were dismissed because they had been absent from work owing to their arrest or interrogation as a result of their political activities. He sought clarification of the situation of Messrs. Bustos, Labraña and Martínez, members of the national Grouping of Workers (CNT), who had been arrested for organising a strike in 1987, and of the present situation of about a 100 workers, including 17 trade union leaders, who had been dismissed from employment with the public railway company during negotiations seeking to have the company remain a public enterprise. He also referred to the Constitutional Court ruling involving Clodomiro Almeyda under article 8 of the Constitution, which amounted to a violation of Convention No. 111. He asked the Government representative to indicate if the Government would be in a position to amend article 8 and requested explanations in regard to the facts surrounding the killings of various teachers and trade unionists.

The Government representative reiterated his Government's position to the effect that the dialogue should lead to concrete action in terms of progress regarding harmonisation of the national legislation with international labour Conventions. Referring to the risk, mentioned by the Workers' members, that article 8 could be applied to anyone who expressed disagreement with the regime, he stated that this article penalised acts contrary to the legal and constitutional order and not criticism of the regime. He insisted that the Labour Code provision on reasons for terminating employment contracts was applied strictly within the framework of the labour relations system. He stated that in his country the workers enjoyed the right to strike, which, however, could be declared illegal if not exercised within the framework of collective bargaining; in such a case, the workers could always appeal. He indicated that a referendum on the presidency of the Republic was scheduled to take place at the end of 1988. As regards the three trade unionists referred to by the Workers' member of Spain, he stated that the Santiago Court of Appeals had overruled the decision of the court of first instance and that these people were now free. In connection with the strike at the railway company, which had taken place outside the context of collective bargaining, he confirmed that a certain number of workers had in fact been dismissed but that an appeals court was now examining their situation. He reaffirmed the willingness of his Government to hear the opinions of the Committee of Experts and the present Committee so that their views could be transmitted to the competent bodies with the aim of ensuring respect for international labour standards within the framework of national legislation.

The Workers' members had been very concerned about this case for a number of years, and their concern persisted. The Conference Committee had discussed the case in 1976, mentioned it in a special paragraph of its report in 1977 and 1978, discussed it again in 1979 and mentioned it in a special paragraph in 1981 and 1982. A mission had taken place in 1983 and the discussion had continued thereafter. On some occasions, it had been possible to note some progress. The Workers' members maintained their serious concern, however, particularly in view of the comments made by the National Grouping of Workers to which the Committee of Experts' report had referred. Despite all that the Government representative had said to minimise the possible application of article 8 of the Constitution, the danger remained that political criteria would be used to penalise workers in the social sphere. For this reason, the Workers' members wished the Committee's conclusion to be firm and crystal clear. If serious progress could not be noted next year, there would be a need to apply more stringent criteria in this case.

The Worker member of Chile referred to the extensive discussions which had taken place in the present Committee on the application of this Convention in his country. He recalled that many international instruments enshrined the protection of human rights: the Universal Declaration on Human Rights of 1948, the International Covenant on Social, Economic and Cultural Rights, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and, at the regional level, the Declaration of Bogotá. He thought the 1987 Labour Code contained provisions contrary to the Convention and should be amended. He believed that the constitutional provision that it took a plebiscite to amend the Constitution should be repealed.

The Worker member of Uruguay agreed with the statements made by the Workers' members of Colombia and Spain as well as by the Workers' members collectively. It would have been desirable to have present in the Committee the representatives of the National Grouping of Workers (CNT) who had made the comments regarding the non-observance of the Convention, but he was familiar with such situations since not so long ago his country had been under a dictatorship and at that time, the representatives who came from his country did not in fact represent anyone. In addition, he indicated that in Chile workers were dismissed for exercising the right to strike, as was very well known. He referred to the Government representative's statement that an appeals court had overturned the decision of the court of first instance in relation to the three trade union members of the National Grouping of Workers (CNT); the Government representative had failed, however, to mention that the Government had insisted upon going ahead with the proceedings. He wondered whether true representatives of Chilean workers would be able to participate in the Conference Committee next year.

The Committee took note of the information supplied by the Government representative. It recalled that this case had been discussed in 1987 and on many previous occasions. It noted with regret that recently adopted legislation had not eliminated existing problems, but had introduced further discrepancies with provisions of the Convention. The Committee again expressed its great concern about the serious problems that remained in legislation and in practice. The Committee again expressed the firm hope that the Government would very soon adopt the measures necessary to ensure full conformity with the Convention in respect of all the point raised, and that next year it would provide full information in this regard.

Czechoslovakia (ratification: 1964). A Government representative expressed the hope that the discussion would clarify a number of points which remained outstanding. His Government was not sure that the rather lengthy observation by the Committee of Experts provided the present Committee with sufficient insight concerning the issues under discussion. The Government did not object to the fact that the report concentrated on those partial aspects of implementation of the Convention where certain doubts had been expressed. Nor did it have objections to points 1(a) and (b) of the observation, which contained a chronological summary of the dialogue which had taken place over the past ten years. Subject to minor inaccuracies, that summary was an objective one. However, it referred to a situation which had been discussed a number of years ago. For the sake of the deliberations of the present Committee, his Government wished to explain briefly the nature of the problems involved. In reference to point 1(a) of the observation, involving the possible dismissal of a worker for engaging in activities prejudicial to the security of the State, as provided under section 53(1)(c) of the Labour Code, the problem had arisen in the past when, in a few instances, certain employers had interpreted this provision incorrectly. The Government had taken steps to avoid future misinterpretation. The only persons who could be dismissed under this provision were those who "endanger the integrity of the state order, the integrity of the state territory, defence capacity, international relations of the State and of state bodies and state secrets." In the Government's view, this definition was sufficiently narrow. This reason for dismissal had been intended for use in entirely exceptional cases connected with penal proceedings. Since the Government believed the respective provision of the Labour Code and the practice to be fully consistent with the exceptions provided for under Article 4 of the Convention, it saw no need for further discussion on this particular subject. Under point 1(b) of the observation, the Committee of Experts had referred to dismissal on the basis of a worker's failure to meet the criteria laid down by law for the performance of the job or for his or her non-fulfilment of requirements essential for the proper performance of his or her work. It was true that in the past certain wage regulations had contained a reference to political engagement. The Government had reviewed these regulations and certain other instruments. Copies of the respective texts had been sent to the Secretary-General and the Committee of Experts had taken them into account. The Government was disappointed that these amendments to legislation had not been cited as cases of progress by that Committee. As regards requirements of employment, the Government's position was that they were connected with the nature of the various jobs existing and could not therefore be laid down by law. Non-fulfilment of these particular requirements, that is, of the inherent requirements of the job, led to non-fulfilment of the tasks at work and could become a reason for dismissal. One problem had arisen in this respect: was the employer entitled to put forward, in addition to requirements manifesting themselves immediately in results at work, other types of requirements such as a moral or even political qualities? The Supreme Court of the Socialist Republic of Czechoslovakia had made a relevant interpretation concerning section 46(1)(e) of the Labour Code to the effect that in exceptional cases it was indeed possible, depending upon the nature of the job concerned, and that in a dispute submitted to a court of law, the employer had to prove that the fulfilment of such requirements constituted an essential condition for the proper performance of the job. Since that ruling, no cases had been handled by the courts, suggesting that for practical reasons employers were not using such reasons for dismissal. For a number of years the Government had had no problem with inherent requirements of the job, either in legislation or in practice. Turning to the newly introduced item appearing under point 1(c) of the observation, the Government noted that its attention had been drawn to the fact that in the Labour Code, "an improvement in ideological and occupational standards..." was mentioned in connection with labour discipline. It had never occurred to the Government that this statement of a general nature in section 72 could be related to section 77 of the Code, which dealt with penalties for breaches of labour discipline, or to section 46, which dealt with dismissals. The Director of the Labour Legislation Department of the Ministry of Labour had given firm assurance that there were no such cases in practice. The Committee of Experts had referred in this connection to the programme proclamation of the Government of the Slovak Socialist Republic in which adherence to the long-term political line was underscored. Although the Government failed to see any direct or remote link here with the issues of labour discipline, it understood that the Committee of Experts attached some importance to the matter. A discussion was now going on in the country concerning various changes to be made in the Labour Code as a consequence of current economic changes. In order to prevent various possible interpretations, an amendment concerning sections 72 and 74 dealing with labour discipline and with the matters referred to by the Committee of Experts was now under consideration. In conclusion to this section of the observation, the Committee of Experts had requested the Government to continue to supply information on statutory instruments, administrative instructions and court decisions made under the relevant provisions of the Labour Code. The Government would comply with that request. The Government had already looked into instruments governing the remuneration of workers who were excluded from the scope of the decree concerning technical and economic employees, and it would take up this subject in its next report under article 22 of the ILO Constitution. The Government did not, however, understand the request to indicate the measures taken or contemplated to repeal or amend all provisions which were inconsistent with the policies of equal opportunity and treatment. In the Government's view, this suggested that such provisions existed, whereas it was not aware of any. Nor apparently was the Committee of Experts; otherwise the observation would have mentioned them explicitly. The speaker then referred to point 2 of the observation, which had mentioned the Resolution of the Presidium of the Central Committee of the Czechoslovak Communist Party on cadres and personnel work. The Government wished to note that the Committee of Experts had not been unanimous in its view on this point. As stated by the Government in 1984 and 1985, both in writing and orally before the Conference Committee, in its opinion questions concerning the personnel policies of political parties did not fall within the scope of the present Convention. The Government's view was that its obligations under the Convention referred to national policies, that is, to the policies of the Government which found expression in legislation and practice (understood to mean the day-to-day implementation of legislation, the results of which were reflected, inter alia, in judicial decisions). All these areas were covered by the Government's regular reports under article 22 of the ILO Constitution. The Government did not believe that any reasonable conclusion would be reached by trying to develop the discussion any further in the present Committee. The Government considered that resolutions adopted by political parties had never been subject to scrutiny by supervisory bodies of the ILO, and it did not see why Czechoslovakia should be an exception. The Government therefore appealed to the members of this Committee not to discuss the role of political parties in personnel policies in connection with the case of Czechoslovakia. Such a discussion could take place, if at all, in a general framework, and should not relate to one selected country.

The Workers' members welcomed the opportunity to engage once again in a dialogue with the Government. It should come as a surprise to no one that the application of this Convention was coming under examination. Everyone agreed on the general principles, but in practice there were still serious difficulties to overcome. As the Government had noted, this case had been under discussion for many years, during which certain progress had occurred through the adoption of a certain number of amendments to legislation and regulations. There was a growing openness in Czechoslovakia, but the situation remained delicate. This was perhaps due to the unitary political system or to the political party. It was difficult to keep quality of opportunity in employment distinct from problems arising on account of politics or political attitudes. There remained a major problem, in spite of the fact considerable efforts had been made. The dividing line between security of the State on the one hand and purely political opposition on the other was a fine one. The Workers' members questioned whether reasons involving the security of the State were really involved here; if they were, the Government was correct. But if it was a matter of political opposition which was punishable in the fields of vocational training, employment or professional qualifications, a contradiction with the Convention had to be recognised. The Government, in its report, had attempted to show that when problems existed, they were linked to inherent job requirements. In any country, it was the quality of work and occupational qualifications – purely occupational qualifications – which mattered; these had nothing to do with violations of the Convention. But once officials, i.e. persons having a certain level of professional responsibility, were considered, there was a problem if a person were deemed to be less qualified because of his or her political outlook. Being a good foreman or manager should have nothing to do with ideology or faithfulness to a party. Obviously, when persons were being hired by a political party itself, the Workers' members recognised that the party could not be forced to accept persons who were not loyal to it. But the Convention concerned all sorts of employment, in industry, services and administration, in which equality of opportunity had to be respected. As the Committee of Experts had noted, the situation in relation to officials had to be examined in regard to both law and practice. The Workers' members then cited section 72 of the Labour Code, which referred to "an improvement in ideological and occupational standards," inter alia, as a corollary of labour discipline. They could not swallow such a text. The Committee of Experts had clearly stated that a reference to ideological standards among the criteria for assessing compliance with labour discipline involved the possibility of discrimination based upon political opinion. Thus in spite of all that had been done by the Government, there was still a need to reflect on this matter as well as on the question of job requirements involving political or moral qualities. The Workers' members called all concerned to remain attentive to these problems which, they acknowledged, were delicate. But the Convention remained the Convention, and its interpretation could not vary from country to country. The adaptations already made by the Government were a good sign, as was the fact that the case could be discussed. The Workers' members considered that there were reasons for continuing to consider it in more depth.

The Employers' members pointed out that the case under discussion had long-standing origins, but recalled that there had been interruptions in the dialogue. The question had been discussed often but the heart of the matter remained unchanged: equality of treatment in occupation and employment without discrimination on the basis of political opinion. If the Employers' members had understood the Government representative correctly, the portion of the observation which provided a historical review was essentially accurately presented. The starting point had been the dismissal of workers because they had signed a document criticising the Government. The question was then posed as to the grounds on which workers could be dismissed. Three factors involving dismissals were noted under point 1 of the observation: (a) activity endangering the security of the State, (b) requirements of service and employment and (c) labour discipline questions. As regards requirements of employment, although the legislative provisions cited in point 1 (b) of the observation were almost neutral, the 1978 Supreme Court decision had stated that employees' civic engagement and moral and political qualities could be taken into account in relationship to employment. The Court had also indicated that the majority of cases related to requirements of a permanent character, such as moral and political qualities. In this connection the Employers' members disagreed with the Government; these points should not be neglected, because in many cases these requirements could play an important role. They believed the question posed by the Committee of Experts in seeking a more precise definition of the nature of the jobs for which there were requirements regarding civic engagement and moral and political qualities was entirely justified. The report of the Committee of Experts had also taken note of a clarification provided by the Government which had formally distinguished "criteria" from "requirements" in relation to the recruitment of workers. Here again were the criteria of political engagement, civic engagement and political and moral qualities. The Government had stated on many occasions that this only concerned top management and only exceptionally other functions, thus somewhat minimising the political requirements. The Committee of Experts had rightly called for a more precise definition, and for a specification of the activities concerned here, and had therefore requested that the present provisions, rules and regulations be amended. In reference to point 1 (c) of the observation, regarding what is termed socialist labour discipline, the Employers' members drew attention to the fact that here, too, ideological standards were used. This warranted further reflection. The Employers' members had welcomed the Government's statement that provisions concerning labour discipline were under review. In contrast to denials made in the past, this showed that consideration was being given to improving the situation. They wished to hear more details about the direction the changes were going to take, their timing and so forth. Taking up point 2 of the observation, concerning the effect given to the Resolution of the Presidium of the Central Committee of the Czechoslovak Communist Party of 1970 on officials and personnel management, the Employers' members pointed out that the notion of officials, in relation to which political standards were applied, could be quite broad. In addition, its application was not limited in scope to party offices or highest political functions, but there were a number of decisions to give effect to the views of the party in other fields too. Addressing this topic, the Government had merely repeated its previous position: that this matter should not be under discussion because it was up to political parties to govern their own affairs. However, as the Committee of Experts had pointed out, party resolutions were given application far beyond the sphere of the party throughout society. This could hardly be otherwise in a country Constitution of which provides that the Communist Party plays the leading role in the State and in society. There was a close inter-relationship between the issues dealt with in point 2 and the labour law questions of job requirements and labour discipline considered in point 1. Separate treatment of point 1 and point 2 in the observation had given a distorted picture, which might be redressed in the future. When seen in context, political requirements in relation to labour discipline and party resolutions played a great role in the whole field of labour. As regards the comments mentioned in point 3 of the observation, it was no secret that it concerned job vacancy notices showing that adherence to a political line was required for altogether ordinary employment. The Employers' members were awaiting changes. For the moment, they had to settle for the Government's announcement that an examination of discrimination in employment was being undertaken – a very modest result. They hoped for improvements in the near future.

The Worker member of the United States associated himself with the remarks made by the Workers' and Employers' members. In relation to the comments received from the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) on the application of the Convention in Czechoslovakia, he drew attention to Case No. 1402 of the Committee on Freedom of Association (253rd Report, November 1987). The Committee had reached conclusions, which were interim at the time, that the Government had dissolved a certain section of the Musicians' Union and had detained members and leaders of that section for continuing to engage in trade union activities. There had also been a seizure of the union's files and membership lists and the dismissal from employment of the chairman of that section. The speaker then reviewed the points the Committee of Experts had raised in relation to the leading role of the Communist Party, including responsibility for the selection and deployment of personnel and top management, which was however encroaching on other than policy-making functions and permeating other employment. He wished to have further elaboration from the Government on these points.

The Government representative stated that comments made in this discussion would be taken into account when the Government drew up its report under article 22 of the ILO Constitution. In regard to the dissolution of the section mentioned by the Workers' member of the United States, the Government of Czechoslovakia had submitted a detailed written reply to the Committee on Freedom of Association, and the case had been discussed at some length in the Governing Body. The Government considered it had demonstrated that the association in question was not a trade union and had never engaged in trade union activities. The dismissal from employment of the leader referred to had occurred in connection with penal proceedings for tax evasion and similar offences. In relation to the remarks made concerning requirements, and especially political requirements, his Government believed this had generated so much discussion because Czechoslovak labour legislation contained a concept concerning termination of employment which was different in comparison to that contained in the respective ILO Conventions and also that of most of the market-economy countries. Czechoslovak labour law did not refer to the concept of valid reason for dismissal. Instead, a number of reasons were specifically enumerated in sections 46 and 53 of the Labour Code and only these reasons – and no others – could be invoked in letters of dismissal. On the one hand this was a guarantee for workers; on the other hand there were some difficulties. If the few reasons for dismissal provided for in the Labour Code were to cover the diversity of all the valid reasons, the provisions had to be worded in a fairly general manner. This involved the risk that they might be interpreted too broadly in practice. As the Employers' members had mentioned, past experience in the country had provided a few examples of this. Ever since Czechoslovakia had been regarded as having difficulties with discharging its obligations ensuing from ratification of the Convention, the courts, and especially the Supreme Court, had recognised the danger of a too extensive interpretation and had formulated an opinion or a clarification showing how the text of the law should be interpreted correctly. The crux of that interpretation appeared in the Committee of Experts' observation. To make things more complicated, that interpretation had been misunderstood by the ICFTU, and it had taken some time for the Government to explain and clarify the various elements contained in it. The Government hoped that the Supreme Court had now been able to achieve its objective of confining the practice of enterprises or organisations within the boundaries of the ILO concept of valid reason for dismissal. There was an additional guarantee of non-discrimination, namely that in judicial proceedings concerning a dismissal, the burden of proof always lay on the employer. On the distinction between requirements and criteria, one had to consider that criteria were laid down in legal instruments, for example in those covering the remuneration of workers. It was the job of the Government, in co-operation with employers and workers, to see to it that there were no criteria of a political nature in these legal instruments. With the amendments already referred to, these instruments now contained only occupational requirements for the performance of specific jobs, such as a diploma, occupational safety training and a minimum period of practice. Such criteria should be for specific jobs or for which jobs the political requirements were admissible or not. In 1985 the Government had tried to describe very generally the nature of jobs for which the requirements of political qualities and similar requirements might exist or be considered by the employers concerned. It could not be said that such requirements existed or not; this must always be decided on a case-by-case basis. As an example, many employees had access to state secrets but certainly not all of these jobs were subject to requirements of this type. It was the role and duty of the courts of law to decide, after full consideration of the cases involved, whether a specific requirement was inherent to the job or whether such a requirement was discriminatory in nature. With reference to the provisions of the Labour Code concerning labour discipline, the Government reiterated that an amendment was under consideration; it hoped to be able to report favourably on this in the next written report on the application of the Convention. On the remarks regarding the policy of cadres and of the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia, the Government representative stated that he was not authorised to discuss internal procedures of the Communist Party and of its organs. The comments made would, however, be brought to the attention of the people concerned. It should be taken into account in general that resolutions and other documents of political parties were not legally enforceable. They could not be treated on the same basis and on the same level as laws. If such resolutions or documents were to be evaluated by the supervisory bodies of the ILO, no member State would have a clear idea of the obligations it was undertaking when ratifying a Convention or of what it was supposed to do. The Government therefore asked the Committee of Experts to clarify in a general manner, for example in the general part of its report, the issue of relevance of political party documents with respect to the application of Conventions. His Government hoped that the dialogue had contributed to a better understanding of the situation in Czechoslovakia, that certain misunderstandings had been clarified and that some concerns had been dispelled.

The Workers' members thanked the Government representative for replying to most of the questions posed. The issue of cadres was admittedly delicate, but the Party also had to respect legal texts and the Convention. It should be borne in mind that certain job requirements were being imposed on some persons in relation to political, civic and moral aspects. There should be no confusion of these aspects; nor should there be abuses. The Workers' members strongly believed that a full application of this Convention contributed to the economic efficiency of a country, since it was the professional efficiency and productivity of workers which should count above all.

The Committee took note of the information and explanations supplied by the Government in the discussion which had taken place. It noted that this discussion had begun many years ago. It also noted that progress had occurred over the years concerning some legislative provisions. However, the Committee noted, with the Committee of Experts, that there remained certain legislative and other provisions and government programmes in force in the field of employment which raised questions concerning the implementation of the policy giving effect to the Convention. The Committee noted with interest the assurance given by the Government representative that certain legislative provisions referred to would be re-examined with a view to their amendment. It hoped that the question raised with regard to government policy and administrative practice concerning officials would also be re-examined, in the light of the comments of the Committee of Experts, with a view to taking appropriate measures to ensure full compliance with the provisions of the Convention. The Committee hoped that the Government would soon be able to indicate measures taken or contemplated to this end.

Federal Republic of Germany (ratification: 1961). A Government representative welcomed the chance to answer on behalf of his Government the questions raised in regard to Convention No. 111, and to once again discuss this important issue which concerned human rights and which was a central concern in the Constitution in his country. The theme of human rights had received special attention this year as it was the 40th anniversary of important human rights instruments and was the subject of the Director-General's report. In the case of individual human rights questions it was necessary to take account of its relationship to other human rights instruments. The discussion with the Committee offered the occasion to analyse again, through dialogue, the multiple aspects of this complex questions. His Government had always made it clear that it considered that co-operation and dialogue with the supervisory bodies on standards were the decisive elements of the entire supervisory procedure, and its participation in this dialogue was not merely a formality. The Government respected the high political and moral level of the considerations and evaluations of the supervisory bodies, including those of the Commissions of Inquiry. The purpose and aim of such a dialogue was justified by the fact that by continuing and enlarging exchange of views all arguments would be taken duly into consideration. The Government was ready to participate in the necessary comprehensive dialogue but wondered whether the base required for such a full discussion existed already this year, mainly for the following three reasons: in the first place the Committee of Experts' report deals principally with the Governments' report which covers at the request of the Committee of Experts, the period ending 30 June 1987. However, it was only on 23 May 1987 that the Governing Body took note of the report of the Commission of Inquiry under article 26 of the ILO Constitution. The Government was therefore only given the opportunity to report on a period of five weeks. Secondly, the Commission of Inquiry did not fix a deadline according to article 28 of the Constitution and thus decided not to impose a deadline on the Government for the implementation of measures. It recommended, inter alia, that the Government supply detailed information in its annual reports on all the developments which had taken place, and the Government would fulfill its obligations to report. Thirdly the questions before the Committee were not only vitally important to his country, but were also of an extremely complex nature, which could be seen in the different evaluations made in the framework of the supervisory machinery. A first representation in 1979 did not lead to a negative evaluation of the legal situation. After a second representation, in 1985, the Governing Body, within the scope of its own competence, also was unable to establish that his country had infringed the Convention, but due to the complexity of the problem, it referred the question to a Commission of Inquiry. This Inquiry, carried out by three eminent international experts, failed to yield an unanimous result. Two of the experts considered that the practice at the federal level and in certain Länder was not in complete conformity with the Convention. The third expert stated that he was unable to accept these observations, conclusions and recommendations, as he felt that the Commission should have examined whether the measures adopted in the Federal Republic of Germany had been taken in order to protect basic human rights. His objection therefore fundamentally brought into question the basic findings of the other members of the Commission. In view of these fundamental contradictions it was not possible to conclude the dialogue by formally referring to the fact that there was majority opinion. The fundamental issues in question should also be discussed extensively in this Committee.

The Government hoped that a dialogue, based on detailed annual reports as the Commission of Inquiry had recommended, could be pursued in the future. Future reports would cover a longer period and offer the opportunity to discuss again all of the issues in order that this Committee would be fully conversant with the arguments of the Government and the manner in which the Government appreciates and respects the arguments of the supervisory bodies.

The Workers' member of the Federal Republic of Germany recalled that the Government had already had to reply to the present Committee on the application of the Convention; in 1981, 1982 and 1983, national practice in the application of provisions to examine observance of the duty of faithfulness to the free democratic basic order had been the subject of dialogue. The discussions on this questions were suspended while the issue was being examined under the representation procedure according to article 24 of the Constitution, and subsequently by a Commission of Inquiry set up under article 26 of the Constitution. The results of this in-depth inquiry were presented in February 1987. The Commission concluded that in several respects, measures taken to implement the duty of faithfulness to a free democratic basic order in regard to employment in the public services were not within limits authorised in Article 1, paragraph 2, of the Convention, which referred to inherent requirements of a particular job. Furthermore, the report noted that in all the cases examined there had been discrimination on the basis of political opinion and none involved anti-constitutional acts, let alone activities prejudicial to the security of the State.

The German Trade Union Confederation (DGB), following the publication of the report, asked the Federal Government as well as the Länder governments to bring their administrative practices into conformity with the provisions of the Convention, and it called on policy makers to amend national legislation, where necessary, if its application did not comply with the requirements noted by the Commission of Inquiry. At the same time, it emphasised that mere membership of a political party alleged to pursue aims hostile to the Constitution did not warrant general doubts about faithfulness to the Constitution. Likewise mere activities or candidacy for such a party could not, on its own, be considered as a violation of duties which it would justify exclusion from the public service. In order that disciplinary measures could be taken, it must be a necessary prerequisite to prove that the person concerned had engaged in activities which were concretely directed against a free democratic basic order. Political activity by public service employees should not be protected if violent or unconstitutional methods were used or advocated. This comment was communicated to the Federal Government in May 1987. In regard to the possibility of having a discussion at the present time, he believed that the report of the Commission of Inquiry, on which the report of the Committee of Experts had been based, provided an adequate basis for the discussion as it was the most complete and thorough documentation on these difficult problems. It had to be acknowledged that the Government had always supported the work of the Commission of Inquiry and had not only accepted the procedure but had also arranged contacts with all concerned. The DGB as well as its member unions of teachers and of persons employed in the postal service had had an opportunity to express their point of views. The DGB did not doubt that the Government had a legitimate interest to protect itself against activities turned directly against state security; these activities fell anyhow within the exclusion provided for in Article 4 of the Convention. However, the issue of security had never been concerned in the cases examined by the Commission of Inquiry.

The DGB was, however, concerned about the absence of action by the Federal Government, certain Länder, as well as subordinate authorities to heed the conclusions from the report and to remove those restrictions from employment which did not comply with the provisions of the Convention. In its report for the period 1 July 1986 to 30 June 1987, the Government reconfirmed its legal position without showing an intention to draw consequences from the report of the Commission of Inquiry. On the contrary, it had once again tried to demean the binding nature of the recommendations by referring to the minority position taken by one member of the Commission. The Government representative had done this again today. The DGB recognised that a fundamental change in practice could not be implemented rapidly in all cases, but it noted that in certain Länder where the parliamentary majority and governmental responsibility were held by other parties than at the federal level, practice did conform to the Convention, and following recent elections in one Land, the former opposition had, on assuming governmental responsibility immediately introduced changes to modify the practices which had been followed up to that date.

The DGB thus looked for a practice which was in conformity with the Convention to be extended to other Länder and to the Federal Government as well. It was up to the Government to indicate that it recognised its obligation to change administrative practice and to show up a way towards the adoption of rules which take account of the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry. If according to the Government, that would require legislative amendments, these should be introduced. The Government could not hide behind the interpretation of present statutes by independent courts. This was not to place to explain the positions of the different constitutional bodies in the country, but legislation as applied by the courts must be in conformity with the Convention which, following ratification, forms part of the law in force in the country. However, it was precisely the decision by the Labour Court of Oldenburg that had been referred to by the Committee of Experts in a positive sense which was quashed by a superior Court, and the Federal Administrative Court maintained its previous practice which denied the obligations noted in the report of the Commission of Inquiry. A considerable number of concrete cases were actually before the courts, but unfortunately developments should no tendency towards improvement. Moreover, if persons concerned had not gone before the Federal Constitutional Court it was because this Court had refused to consider similar complaints over the last years, as had been pointed out by the Commission of Inquiry in paragraph 456 of the report.

However, the Government representative might explain why the Government had not gone before the International Court of Justice in accordance with article 29 of the ILO Constitution, under which a government which did not accept the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry could submit its case to the Court. Furthermore, the subject-matter of Convention No. 111 had not been considered in the decision of the European Court of Human Rights to which the Government had referred.

As the Committee of Experts noted in their conclusions, the Government had not taken any measures towards the amendment of existing legislation or current practices and it had stated the view that it was not bound by the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry either in international law or in domestic law. A similar position had been taken by certain Länder governments. He stressed that a clear indication was expected now from the Federal Government that it recognised the conclusions and recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry as binding. It was for the Government to apply these recommendations and to change national practice. These recommendations could be applied in different ways but if the choice of means belonged to the Government, it was the result which counted, and the Commission had the right to expect that the Government would indicate basically a direction chosen which would show its willingness to overcome the existing difficulties. In the general debate on the Convention, the spokesman for the Employers' members stated that it was a principle of enlightened humanism that discrimination based on political opinion would not be tolerated. The trade unions would welcome that an administrative practice which had damaged the reputation of the country would finally be ended. In his report the Director-General had asked the member States to show a willingness within a common effort to respect the obligations which they had freely undertaken. This should also be valid for the elimination of discrimination in employment and occupation in the Federal Republic of Germany.

The Workers' members stated that they treated the problems raised by the application of Convention No. 111 by the Federal Republic of Germany with great seriousness and grave concern. Unfortunately violations of human rights did occur in democratic countries even where there was a will to protect them well. This question had been discussed in this Committee since 1981. Discussion was suspended in 1983 while the issue was first examined under the representation procedure and then by a Commission of Inquiry under article 26 of the Constitution. The Commission of Inquiry, which presented its detailed and complete report in February 1987, concluded that Convention No. 111 had not been fully complied with. It was unfortunate to have to note that as new cases had occurred after the adoption of the Commission's conclusions, the Convention was still not being complied with, and the problem remained. There existed notable differences in the manner in which the legislation was implemented in regard to the duty of faithfulness to a free democratic order imposed on public servants and applicants to public service. The Commission of Inquiry had concluded that actual practice in certain Länder and by certain federal authorities amounted to exclusions from the public service which could not be justified either by the inherent requirement of a particular job (Article 1, paragraph 2, of the Convention) or on the basis of activities prejudicial to the security of the State (Article 4). Although the Government had referred to the minority opinion expressed by one member of the Commission, the fact remained that all the supervisory bodies which had examined the case, and this comprised the Committee of Experts, the Conference Committee when it examined the case previously, the Governing Body Committee and the Commission of Inquiry, had consistently reached the same conclusion on the matter.

The Workers' members recalled that the Government had confirmed its support for the supervisory machinery of the ILO and its wish to co-operate. However, it did not accept the conclusions of the Commission of Inquiry. If it disagreed with the conclusions it could have submitted the matter to the International Court of Justice in accordance with the Constitution, but it has decided not to avail itself of that possibility. The position of the Government was not satisfactory. A State which claims to be a State ruled by law should either use the avenue of appeal open to it or should accept and implement the conclusions of the Commission of Inquiry. There was no other choice. A Government which only participated in the supervisory procedures as a formality and which ignored the outcome undermined these procedures. For declarations of support to ILO supervisory procedures to have real significance, they must include willingness to take account of conclusions adopted. The Workers' members expected solutions from the Government; these were diverse but the Government should propose appropriate legislation to the Federal Parliament. That the problem was complex because of the federal structure of the country was acknowledged, but this complexity did not reduce principles to nothing. It was, after all, the federal State that had ratified the Convention and it must therefore take responsibility. It could not content itself with vague promises of information. It was necessary that information be given on intentions, on steps to be followed, on the means by which the objective was to be achieved and on a time-table, and the Workers' members, who were extremely concerned by this issue, wanted to see concrete results in the near future.

The Workers' members were in complete agreement with what had been very clearly stated by the Committee of Experts in this regard in paragraph 7(g) of their observations. The Workers' members joined in the hope expressed by the Committee of Experts that the Government should re-examine the situation as a whole with representatives from the workers' organisations involved and, taking account of the Convention and the remarks made by the Commission of Inquiry in its report, should adopt appropriate measures to eliminate the remaining difficulties in the application of the Convention. They stressed the importance of discussion for democracy in general, for the application of the Convention, and for equal opportunity.

The Employers' members recalled that no principle was more important than non-discrimination and certainly with respect to political opinion. On the other side a State must be able to count on the loyalty of its own employees. This was an important and difficult case. For the first time in the ILO's history a commission of inquiry had not been unanimous in its decision. The case had a long history beginning in the mid-1970s and it had been discussed regularly in the Committee in 1981, 1982 and 1983, and the issue concerning the requirement of all public employees to abide by a duty of faithfulness to a free and democratic society had resisted resolution over a long time. This was a positive example of how the ILO's supervisory machinery should work; while at this time the difficult problem had not been solved, the Government had co-operated at all stages by providing information and consenting to a commission of inquiry on its soil. The Employers' members noted that the Commission of Inquiry recommended that the existing measures relating to the duty of faithfulness be re-examined by the Federal Republic and they took it from the statement of the Government representative that it was the Government's intention to do so, although in the English translation they did not hear him say that, so they asked the Government representative to make clear that, in the context of annual reports, the Government intended to do so. The issue in this case really related to the broad brush the Government had applied to public service applicants and employees without following, as the Commission of Inquiry had criticised, the principle of proportionality found in national law and practice. From the employer perspective, the issue came down to the proper balance of the first paragraph of Article 1 of the Convention, dealing with the principle of non-discrimination on the basis of amongst other things, political opinion, and the second paragraph, which made room for distinctions and exclusions based on the inherent requirements of a particular job. In her statement to the Conference, Mrs. Aquino had referred to the benefits and liabilities of free and democratic societies and the problem of spaces created when there was freedom for good and evil, and the question here seemed to be the amount of space provided in free societies for evil. These were complicated issues; the Employers' members had looked at the entire record of the case in some detail, and while it had been repeated that the Committee's task was not to make fine judicial decisions, they considered that in view of the split of the Commission of Inquiry and the decisions of the European Court of Human Rights, there was room for disagreement on the result in this case. Moreover there was a question relating to the uniformity of application of all human rights instruments including Convention No. 111. The Employers' members knew in particular the Government's unique historical and geographical position and they also noted that applicants for employment who were denied that employment and officials who were disciplined or discharged were provided with extensive due process rights including the resort to the courts, as shown in the Commission of Inquiry report. Article 2 of the Convention provided for a number of alternative methods of implementing its requirements, one of which was through the courts, and this was also recognised in paragraph 558 of the Commission of Inquiry report. Reference had been made to court decisions which were applying current legislation in a way that protected employee rights, so legislation was not the only way to approach the case. Moreover the highest court in the Federal Republic had not considered an application on the cases involved. The Employers' members were encouraged that the Government had agreed to provide detailed reports for consideration by the Committee of Experts in the future, and they hoped that measures for implementing the Convention would indeed sincerely be re-examined and that this would lead to solutions to the problem in the near future through appropriate action, in consultation with employers' as well as workers' organisations.

The representative of the World Federation of Trade Unions reminded the Conference of the representation his organisation had made in 1984 and the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry which had invited the Government to take the necessary measures to implement this Convention. These recommendations which were binding had been reconfirmed by the Committee of Experts in its report. His organisation fully supported the observations made by the Committee of Experts and asked the Government to take appropriate action. They noted, as had the Committee of Experts, that over the past year since the Commission of Inquiry had presented its report, the Government had made no step in the direction of the changes required, and the continued practice of "work bans" was confirmed by developments in individual cases over the last few months, notably those concerning official H. Bastian and the teachers M. Schachtschneider, U. Foltz, U. Lepa, R. Schön and Mrs. I. Schachtschneider, and many others. The latest case concerned Mr. K. O. Eckartsberg, an English and sports teacher and active trade unionist, whose case had already been mentioned in the report of the Commission of Inquiry and who had been banned for life from the public service in May 1988 by the Hanover Administrative Tribunal which refused to consider comprehensive evidence of the professional and democratic commitment of the accused. His organisation supported the requested made by the Committee of Experts and the DGB that the recommendations made by the Commission of Inquiry be applied without delay.

The representative of the International Federation of Free Teachers' Unions stressed the importance of the report of the Commission of Inquiry for the whole field of education, since most of the individual cases examined concerned teachers or applicants for teachers' posts. Moreover, that report contained in paragraphs 566 et seq. very important indications concerning the political rights of teachers, drawn from the UNESCO/ILO Recommendation concerning the Status of Teachers, adopted in 1966. This Recommendation indicated, in particular, "that the participation of teachers in social and public life should be encouraged in the interests of the teachers' personal development, of the educational service, and of society as a whole" and that "teachers should be free to exercise all civic rights generally enjoyed by citizens and should be eligible for public office". His organisation welcomed the results and the detailed and well informed reasoning of the report of the Committee of Inquiry, and stressed the importance of the procedure provided for in article 26 of the Constitution and the legal force of the recommendations. It expressed its great concern that the Government had not yet taken the necessary measures to implement these recommendations; this had to be taken as contempt for international legal standards. Dismissals continued and had been confirmed by the courts without regard to the recommendations of the Commission. Although the generally negative situation regarding recruitment of teachers tended to hide the dimension of the problem, new cases, for instance in Baden-Württemberg, showed that the authorities had not abandoned their position of principle, which consisted of excluding from employment those people who for example stood as candidates for certain legal political parties. His organisation called upon the Government to put into practice, as quickly as possible, the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry.

The Workers' member of Norway stated that the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany, by opposing the conclusions of the Commission of Inquiry, had behaved flagrantly in contradiction to the Constitution of the ILO and the basic rules on which the ILO supervisory machinery was based. This fundamental lack of respect for the ILO supervisory bodies represented a serious attack on the very authority and integrity of the ILO as a tripartite organisation established by States. The Committee of Experts had in an independent, objective and impartial manner clarified in its report the issues on which the Federal Republic of Germany had not acted in accordance with the law, by neglecting the ILO legal system for supervision and by not complying with Convention No. 111. The Government had expressed its agreement with a member of the Commission of Inquiry who represented a minority opinion, thus showing that Germany was not willing to co-operate with ILO supervisory bodies in accordance with the ILO Constitution. It was not accepted in any civilised legal system that the respondent who had been found failing was entitled to escape from legally-binding conclusions drawn up by a juridical organ in a majority decision by holding to the minority which had expressed the views of the respondent. The Government by flagrantly neglecting the ILO legal system on grounds of political convenience, joined others who had previously sought to undermine the present Committee's confidence in the ILO supervisory bodies and its respect for opinions on legal questions given by these bodies. In a statement made in July 1987 to the Federal Diet the Government stated that the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry had no binding force either in international law or in domestic law. The Committee of Experts refuted that view, in stating in its report that while a Government retained considerable freedom in choosing the means of ensuring compliance with a ratified Convention, this did not diminish its obligations under article 19 of the ILO Constitution, to make the provisions of the Convention effective. By these comments the Committee of Experts expressed the opinion that the conclusions drawn by the Commission of Inquiry are based on the provisions of the Convention No. 111 which must be implemented in the domestic law of the Federal Republic of Germany. This could not be questioned by the Federal Republic of Germany by any other means than by the procedure established in article 29 of the Constitution, by requesting an interpretation from the International Court of Justice, and as long as the Government had not done so, it had to act in accordance with the conclusions of the Commission of Inquiry. Given the negative consequences of the Government's attitude for the legal status of civil servants in the Federal Republic of Germany, and for the whole supervisory machinery of the ILO, he proposed that the Committee should discuss next year whether the case of the Federal Republic of Germany should be mentioned in a special paragraph.

The Workers' member of the Byelorussian SSR noted with satisfaction the readiness of the Government to co-operate with the Committee but he felt that the explanations which had been given were entirely unsatisfactory. The administrative practice of the country did not comply with the Convention, violated fundamental human rights and did not correspond to the standards of modern civilised society. He agreed with the statements of the Workers' members from the Federal Republic of Germany and other countries who had spoken before him, and hoped that the Government was ready not only to participate in a dialogue but also to take the necessary measures which would eliminate the discrepancies pointed out in this Committee, and that it would explain concretely what measures it intended to take in the near future to bring administrative practice into conformity with the Convention.

The Workers' member of Spain welcomed the scope of Convention No. 111 which was larger than that of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. Convention No. 111 protected even those who expressed political ideas or opinions which were in contradiction with the constitutional legal order. An applicant or official should therefore benefit from this protection unless he occupied a post of a highly confidential nature which was an exception in all political systems.

The Worker's member of the Federal Republic of Germany, referring to the statement by the Employers' spokesman that persons concerned could seek legal redress, noted that the persons concerned had indeed turned to independent courts but, in many instances, they had lost their cases. The principle of independent courts was important for the German trade unions, but a formal legal question should not cover an unlawful practice, and the legislation, as applied by the courts, should comply with the Convention. As the Labour Court of Oldenburg had noted in a decision quoted by the Committee of Experts in its observation, national legislation and even the national Constitution of the country should, as far as possible, be interpreted in a manner which would ensure respect of obligations under international law. Having considered the provisions of Convention No. 111 and the conclusions of the commission of inquiry, the court examined the case in the light of inherent requirements of the particular job and made a decision in favour of the complainant. It must be stressed that this decision was quashed by the Land Labour Court. Also, the Federal Administrative Tribunal has not changed its earlier case law.

The Workers' member of the United Kingdom had had no intention of joining in the debate because the case had been expressed admirably both by the Workers' member of the Federal Republic of Germany and the spokesman of the Workers' members, but elements were emerging in the discussion which concerned and indeed provoked him. This particular case was not going to be solved by fudging, by talking about geography, by talking about spaces in which freedom can operate, or other equivocations. The Committee was dealing with hard facts and it had to deal with the situations as revealed by the Committee of Experts. Of course the issue was complex. Issues always seemed to be complex when a government did not want to implement a Convention. There were difficulties sometimes because governments were unable to make legislative changes because the legislature would not allow them to do so. That could be understood, but it could not be condoned by the Committee. Employers' and Workers' members were not to make excuses for governments, nor did it help in the work of the Committee if some criticised other governments but did not join in when their own government was being criticised. In some countries there was a requirement to respect a democratic society before getting a public service job; in other countries, there were particular cadre requirements before getting a public service job; in yet others one must not be a Baha'i or a freemason if one wanted a job. These were all difficulties the Committee had to deal with and it was not to deal gently with one case and lash out in another. Gentlemanly behaviour by a Government representative was no substitute for action, nor could governments be congratulated merely because they turned up to the Committee. What was important was in fact observing the Convention, listening to the Committee of Experts, having a dialogue with the present Committee. Of course this dialogue would have to be continued by the Committee in this most difficult case, but it should be conducted with a measure of honesty. He agreed with the Workers' member of Norway in recognising the difficulties in accepting on this occasion that the case was not yet going to be solved as could be seen from the statements made. But as the workers had had to remind many governments before, there had to be an end to the discussion at some stage or other, and a solution had to be found, and the Committee was rapidly approaching that position in this case.

The Government representative of the Federal Republic of Germany stated that it followed from the discussion that none of the speakers had questioned that the Federal Republic of Germany was a free democratic and social constitutional State. This State provided every citizen the right to go before court and, where constitutional issues were involved, to seek redress from the Federal Constitutional Court. As he had indicated in his introductory statement, there was indeed a fundamental question concerning the Constitution involved here. Precisely because the Federal Republic of Germany was a State under the rule of law, citizens should defend their rights. The Constitution of the Federal Republic of Germany contained an anti-discrimination provision which applied to free political opinion as well, the scope of which was equivalent to the legal protection given in Convention No. 111. Why have the individuals concerned not exercised their democratic rights and gone before the Federal Constitutional Court, which last happened in 1975. It has been said that the parties of which they were members were not outlawed. This was merely an expression of the liberal political system in the country.

The fact that the parties of which the officials concerned were members were not pronounced unconstitutional could not be turned round and used as an argument to say that they were not being liberal. Parties could stand for elections and it was up to the voters to decide. This party privilege, i.e. that parties could freely stand for elections unless they are outlawed, could not be invoked by an individual civil servant because he was not a party. The majority opinion of the Commission of Inquiry stated that on the whole the laws of the Federal Republic of Germany were in order but that there were shortcomings in practice. Even if practice was not uniform it should be asked who was responsible for ensuring legal unity in practice. This was within the competence of the Constitutional court of the Federal Republic and had not been done yet in all the cases mentioned by the previous speakers.

It has been claimed that the Government has not complied with procedures or conclusions or that it has only adopted a formal position. However, the Government has taken actively part in the procedures and it did believe in the moral force of the supervisory system, including the recommendations of a Commission of Inquiry. With regard to the quality of these recommendations, no one had claimed that the recommendations of a Commission of Inquiry under article 26 had the same effect as court rulings. In the discussion at the 1984 International Labour Conference, when the entire supervisory machinery was discussed, the Office stated in concluding the discussion that none of the supervisory bodies of the ILO were tribunals. This should not be interpreted as an attempt to devalue the recommendations and conclusions which had an important moral force.

The Government held a great deal of respect for them in the same way that it had a great deal of respect for the findings of the majority of the Commission of Inquiry in its report. It also respected, however, the minority view within the Commission and believed that dialogue should be continued when a supervisory body such as this one was unable to reach agreement in the Inquiry concerning the Federal Republic. The Government would continue the dialogue, abiding by the procedures, and it would provide all the necessary information so that an appropriate conclusion could be reached on the substance of the case which the Government felt was not yet possible at this stage.

The Workers' members noted that their previous statements would be reflected in the report and in the conclusions. They recalled the great importance of the problem, not only within the Federal Republic of Germany, but also because of its possible repercussions at the level of the European Communities. If case law was not yet well established because the higher courts had not yet had to give an opinion, this should be done quickly. However, besides the legislation and case law there were other methods which could permit results to be reached in the application of the Convention. The Committee of Experts had referred there to in its report in stating that it was necessary to try to find a solution with all the parties concerned, if not at the legal legislative level at least in practice to reach compliance with the Convention. The Workers' members hoped that this would take place soon. The Government had a moral obligation. Dialogue would be resumed in the present Committee next year.

The Employers' members stated their agreement with the Workers' members.

The Committee took note of the detailed information supplied by the Government representative and of the extensive discussion that took place. The Committee noted that the Government referred to its desire to support the ILO procedures of supervision and to promote the dialogue with the supervisory bodies. The Committee noted, however, with regret, that the Government maintained its position of disagreement with the conclusions of the Commission of Inquiry. The Committee shared the views expressed by the Committee of Experts that the Government's position did not affect the validity of the conclusion of the Commission of Inquiry. While welcoming the opportunity to resume the dialogue with the Government, it associated itself with the hope expressed by the Committee of Experts that the Government would review the situation in consultation with the workers' organisations concerned and the employers' organisations and would adopt appropriate measures to overcome the existing difficulties, having due regard to the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry, to the comments of the supervisory bodies of the ILO and to the dialogue within the Conference Committee.

Islamic Republic of Iran (ratification: 1964). The Government has communicated the following information:

According to the Constitution of the ILO and the spirit of non-interference in the political affairs of independent member States, involvement in political affairs deviates from technical, professional and progressive objectives of the ILO. Unfortunately, the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, acting beyond its competence, has protected groups which plot to prejudice the national security and overthrow the legitimate and lawful Government of the Islamic Republic of Iran. This approach has led the members of the Committee of Experts to make unjust observations, which is unexpected from such an experienced and high-level legal body. This attitude is also partially followed in tripartite discussions at the Conference.

Laws and regulations in the Islamic Republic of Iran are compatible with the national Constitution, of which article 3, paragraphs 9 and 14 and articles 19, 20, 23 and 28 prohibit all forms of discrimination and are completely applied.

Also, article 173 of the Constitution provides that "in order to review appeals, complaints and grievances of people against authorities, public departments and rules, and to enjoy their rights, the Court of Administrative Justice is established under the auspices of the Supreme Judicial Council ...". Fortunately, these bodies have been performing their duties successfully for years. Further, Article 174 provides that "based on the supervision right of the Judicial Power to ensure the proper performance and application of laws and regulations in the public administration sector, an organisation entitled the Organisation of Inspection of the Country is also organised under the auspices of the Supreme Judicial Council ...". This Organisation has carried out its responsibilities since 1981. It will be noted that essential guarantees are thus provided to review the appeals, complaints and grievances of misguided groups such as the Bahai'is; cases have been considered, and complainants may, if they desire, appeal to the competent courts. Legal procedures recognised around the world require that the identity and other particulars of plaintiffs bringing lawsuits to a court should be publicly known and that the defendant be informed of it before a case is determined. The anonymity of those who have referred their cases to the ILO makes those cases suspicious; reviewing such cases, even allowing preliminary examination of them by the Experts of the Committee, is far from expected. Notwithstanding the competence of national courts, these complaints have been appealed to the ILO; they are wholly motivated by policies.

The misguided group of Bahai'is not only patronised the former regime in Iran but also benefited from the oppression of elements within our nation during the beginning of the Islamic Revolution in 1963. It should be known that more than 15,000 Moslems were martyred and massacred in that revolt. Since then, this misguided group has collaborated and assisted in holding the anniversary ceremonies of 2,500 years of the notorious Imperial dynasty in Iran in 1971, during which billions of dollars were spent for ceremonies and festivities with the financial support of the Bahai'i group. These sums were spent despite the large population of disadvantaged persons living in rural areas of the country, who are deprived, for example, even of drinking water. In addition to propagating corruption and sedition in our country, this group has been directly involved in arresting, depressing and torturing revolutionaries and agents of the revolution. Further, they have been at the head of the ruling party of the former Iranian Government, a government which prejudiced the country's sovereign independence and, during the last days of the deposed regime in 1979, caused severe deterioration of the national economy by the illegal transfer abroad of hundreds of millions of dollars.

At the international level, this misguided group has had, from the beginning, illegitimate relationships with Great Britain; its founder was one of the obedient servants of the King of Britain, who granted him the title of "Sir".

An article of the Bahai'i group's constitution promotes relations with the regime occupying Palestine, as evidenced by a letter written by the Leader of the Group (Shoqi Afandi) to Ben Gurion (founder of Israel). Along with these developments, during the Arab-Israeli Wars, Bahai'i pilots intended to shell Arab positions. New documentary evidence indicates close and friendly relationships between the Bahai'i and the United States (great Satan). Current international assistance provided to this misguided group by arrogant world powers should not be ignored by the ILO.

Today, the above-mentioned group is a serious threat to Islam and Moslem people in all Islamic countries. Along with combating the atheistic group, the organisation of Islamic countries has called on the affiliated International Council for Islamic Theology to investigate the threat posed by Bahaism. Fortunately, this Council, in a recent session, adopted resolution (9) D4/8/88 on Condemnation of the Bahai'i Group.

The provisions of Convention No. 111, in particular Article 4, provide that measures taken against those who prejudice the security of the State ought not be regarded as discriminatory. The Bahai'i Group has so acted and is acting against the security of millions of Moslems. Unfortunately, the Committee of Experts has not carried out investigations of the nature of this group and has thus unintentionally supported their aims in a manner which is unexpected for such experienced experts. Before the establishment of the Islamic Republic of Iran, arbitrary dismissals, employment terminations and actual discrimination during the ex-regime were considered fair by the Committee of Experts. Matters such as these raise questions about the Committee's activities.

At present, there are no restrictions applied to education in the Islamic Republic of Iran; all are entitled to a free education without any discrimination. In the Iranian system, through a system of divided powers, the principle of non-discrimination is enforced in all fields by the Court of Justice, as well as the Court of Administrative Justice and National Inspection Organisation.

Hasty decisions by the Committee of Experts (including some with a Western-bias), made in absentia and without a view of the conditions and practices in the Islamic Republic of Iran, will not resolve existing problems or help maintain justice in member countries.

On the other hand, the Islamic Teachings, the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Iran and other laws are founded on abolition of all forms of discrimination based on colour, race, sex, creed and on other material advantages.

In addition a Government representative expressed the opinion that the discussion on discrimination in employment and occupation in the present Committee had gone beyond the normal technical and legal grounds that otherwise formed the basis for discussion. He felt that the issue had originally been raised with political motives behind it which had made it difficult to engage in a normal dialogue. Nevertheless, he was prepared to engage in a debate on grounds of common understanding. He noted that the Committee of Experts' report had been drawn up on the basis of three major sources of reference, namely the Government's report on the application of the present Convention, the discussions held at the Conference Committee in 1987, and the Economic and Social Council report on the human rights situation in the Islamic Republic of Iran submitted to the United Nations General Assembly, document A/42/C48. He felt that since a direct reference had been made to document A/42/C48 the Committee of Experts should have made direct reference also to the statements made by the Government to the same United Nations organs and which had been documented by them. Referring to the Committee of Experts' request that his Government should supply full particulars to the Conference Committee, he stated that this had been done through the written communication which was presently available. The speaker then turned to Section 3 of the Committee of Experts' report in which the Committee had requested the Government to provide copies of any statutory instruments concerning the exclusion of certain categories of persons from governmental organisations. In another section of the report, however, the Committee had considered that the general provisions of the laws and regulations of the country indicated clearly that the dismissal of certain persons from their posts in the public service and State-controlled bodies was based on their adoption of and holding onto a certain faith. The Committee had then requested the Government to repeal all the statutory provisions which were inconsistent with the policy of non-discrimination. To the Speaker, it was not clear on what grounds the Committee of Experts had come to the conclusion that certain statutory provisions of the national laws were not consistent with the present Convention. For if the national legislation had been available to the Committee of Experts there would have been no point in requesting the Government to supply copies of other texts; and if these texts had not been available to the Committee of Experts its judgements have been passed in vacuum or on the basis of certain preoccupations. In the same part of the report reference had also been made to article 163, paragraph 1, of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Iran under which, according to the Committee of Experts, women were barred from serving as judges. The speaker informed the present Committee that there was no such stipulation in that article and that the text of the Constitution could be made immediately available. He added that in practice women were engaged in and pursued their occupations in the national juridical apparatus. Referring to Section 2 of the report according to which primary and secondary schools were gradually being opened to Baha'i children but that the latter were subject to pressure unless they renounced their faith, and that admission to universities or any other higher education establishment was prohibited to Baha'is, the Government representative affirmed that no primary or secondary, nor any other levels of training and education, had ever been closed to any children on the grounds of their holding to a certain opinion and that no measures of harassment based on religion had been or were intended to be taken by the Islamic Republic of Iran. Turning to Section 1 of the report, the Government representative stated that the directive of the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs according to which "the courts were bound to withhold the issuance of any judgment in favour of dismissed employees whose membership of the "misguided Baha'i group" or the organisations whose constitution implied atheism had been ascertained", had been misunderstood by the Committee of Experts. In fact, following the victory of the Islamic Revolution, in a considerable number of productive undertakings certain persons' mostly holding key positions had decided to leave their jobs. These resignations and arbitrary work stoppages had resulted in a difficult situation for the national economy and were later coupled with a large number of appeals to the conciliation and arbitration bodies claiming compensations under the pretext of dismissal from work. This had resulted in even more economic and political pressure against the newly established Government. Under these circumstances, the Ministry issued the said circular to ascertain that claims under the guise of appeal for the consideration of dismissal from work would not distract its affiliated organs from their work. He stressed that the right of appeal did exist in accordance with constitutional provisions as well as other international laws and regulations and that pertinent organs had been created and were available to all those who chose to petition to them. The decision to maintain ratification of the present Convention was made by the Islamic Republic of Iran once it was established that the Convention called for non-discrimination, which fell in line with the objectives and the text of the Constitution. He considered that the Committee of Experts' request to repeal the terms of the Constitution was therefore tantamount to undermining the basis upon which the decision to remain a party to the Convention was made and that the Committee was not legally or constitutionally in a position to decide or impose on governments to recognise certain groups as religions. In view of what was said, the report of the Committee of Experts is unsubstantiated as regards the compatibility of the present Convention with the national laws, regulations and practice. Nevertheless the criterion of his Government is to invite the Committee to create appropriate grounds for constructive dialogue; a proposal aiming at establishing direct dialogue with the Committee of Experts was accepted by his Government. The Government representative requested that the case of the Islamic Republic of Iran be removed from the special clause in the Report of the Committee.

The Worker member of the Islamic Republic of Iran described the useful contacts that he had had with other members of the Workers' group. With respect to the present Convention, in his opinion, the real situation in the Islamic Republic of Iran could only be tangibly realised by persons who could witness the actual events. In fact, there was no discrimination at all in the country. At present, Baha'i children were studying like others and Baha'i workers were working in factories and other workplaces. He stressed the readiness of the workers of the Islamic Republic of Iran to receive some members of the Workers' group to ascertain these facts. However, he explained his understanding for the Government's inability to officially declare any positive measures in relation to the Baha'is and the Freemasons' organisations since these groups, in the last 120 years, had committed innumerable acts of treason and crime. Under these circumstances, it was not easy to change the prevailing negative atmosphere in the country. This would be noted as one of the major difficulties facing the Government in connection with the present Committee's discussion.

The Employers' members recalled that this Committee was dealing with this question for the seventh consecutive time. Basically the Committee's questions were always the same and always based on the report of the Committee of Experts which guided all their discussions. The matter here concerned discrimination and employment, access to professions, training, and working conditions. Those who suffered from discrimination were the Baha'is, the Freemasons and the atheists. The Employers' members recognised that the Government had always accepted discussion but that is where the positive aspect of the matter stopped. The Government never gave the Committee any information beyond the statements made to date, particularly concerning the most discriminated group, the Baha'is. The Government had given different versions for its accusations against the Baha'is. First they accused them of being a political organisation then they said they were spies and finally that they only had to give up their religion for discrimination to cease. For the Government the Baha'is' friendly relations with the United States constituted proof of the danger that the Baha'i group represented. The Committee of Experts had repeatedly proved that this discrimination was on religious grounds and that the Baha'is lacked constitutional guarantees to defend themselves because the courts were bound by a decree of the Ministry of Labour. The same applied to Freemasons and atheists. There was no change in the statement of the Government representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran. Further, his arguments focused on the last part of the report of the Committee of Experts while the heart of the matter appeared at the beginning of it and concerned the discrimination against the Baha'is which had become a long-standing tradition with the consequence that they were also discriminated against in training. The Government representative corrected the statement concerning the access of women to the position of judge and claimed that the Constitution had been misquoted. This proved that some things could be clarified if they were made clear. The Committee's questions and conclusions had remained unchanged but unfortunately so did the answers of the Government. The Employers' members felt that one could talk reasonably to every man, but had the impression that this was not yet the case today. The continued stalemate made the discrimination all the more serious, and the Employers' members concerns were not the lesser for it.

The Workers' members stressed the principles of the Convention and the uncooperative approach of the Government of the Islamic Republic of Iran. The Government has stated that it would do nothing, that it disregarded the Committee of Experts' conclusions, and the Conference Committee's views. The Government believed that its ideological values had precedence over the values professed by the Conventions and it regarded the information of the Committee as partial merely because it came from Western sources. Furthermore, as regards the ability to judge the conformity of Islamic legislation and practice with the Convention, the Government had argued that the Committee of Experts should have Islamic members. The Workers' members believed that this would result in arbitrary interpretations of international Conventions, and strongly rejected this idea. They recognised only one interpretation for International Labour Conventions, that issued by the ILO supervisory bodies. The present Convention had existed for 30 years, long enough to create a solid basis for its interpretation. One should accept it or reject it but not compromise over it. The Workers' members could not but disagree with the reiterated statements, that the Constitutions was entirely in line with the principles of the ILO Convention, and responded completely to the aspirations of the Iranian people. Discrimination against any group and on any grounds is unacceptable. In their view, it was clear that the present Convention was not applied either in legislation or in practice. They requested the Government representative to give a clear answer on three questions: would the Government recognise the contradiction between the Convention and national legislation and practice? Was the Government ready to change legislation and practice? If so, would the Government inform the Committee of Experts accordingly?

An adviser wished to add some brief comments with reference to the application of the present Convention. Before the Islamic Revolution, Baha'is, Freemasons and Zionists monopolised the issue of certificates for the establishment of industrial enterprises and dominated every sphere of public life, including banking and credits, government facilities and public services. After the revolution, all Iranian people regardless of their ethnic or social origin, had gained access to all public services and social and economic activities. He himself established a modern factory after the revolution and there were now hundreds of modern factories run by people who had formerly been discriminated against. Before the revolution many workers in Iranian factories had been fifth columnists, and had sabotaged the Iranian economy. Having gradually been identified by revolutionaries, the fifth columnists had to leave their jobs, and they chose to do so freely. Later they began lodging false complaints with the authorities. However, under article 34 of the Labour Code those who left their jobs freely were not entitled to any dismissal compensation from the employers. If the Committee compared the situation before and after the revolution, would it still interpret this as discrimination, taking account of the above facts? As an answer, he extended an invitation to some of the Committee members to come to his country and see for themselves how modern production units were operating with the co-operation of devoted revolutionary workers without any discrimination.

The Government representative stated that this debate, like many previous ones, mentioned the same concerns that the Government of the Islamic Republic of Iran had clarified formally, technically, and substantively. He reminded the Conference Committee that the Committee of Experts requested the Government to provide full details at the 75th Session. In the debate, he had presented a number of technical points and would have expected some logical and technical response, but the judgement that was passed here was unsubstantiated, in the same way as it was done in the report of the Committee of Experts. The comments of the Workers' members were also emotional and unsubstantiated and did not match the technical quality of his own arguments. He wondered how the Conference Committee could discuss the aspects of the phenomena without taking account of the factors that had led to its creation. He reiterated that in the view of his Government, the Committee passed generalised judgements and made vague requests for unspecified information. For example, how would the ILO react to a request of all the literature about employment? The same held for the Government of the Islamic Republic of Iran when it was requested by the Committee of Experts to provide unspecified information. He asked the Committee to specify what information was requested from the Government. He wished to reply to the three specific questions asked by the Workers' members. To the first question he replied that there was no contradictions between national legislation and practice and Convention No. 111, because otherwise the Government would have denounced it. To the second question, he replied that the Constitution was the essence of the Iranian people, and that this notion stemmed from the very essence of Convention No. 111 itself, which was meant to be ratified by States according to their individual national laws and practice. In reply to the third question, he stated that a direct contact mission according to ILO terminology was unnecessary in his Government's view because it strongly believed that there was no difficulty in the application of the present Convention. If there had been any difficulty the government would follow ILO procedures, which included direct contacts but was not the case. All of the three replies had been the same before, and remained the same now. He reiterated the invitation by the Employers' member of the Islamic Republic of Iran to the Workers' spokesman so that he could see for himself the real situation.

The Workers' members noted that they now had three clear negative replies. It was with great sadness, and great regret that they had to state that for the third time that there was continued failure to apply the Convention and that the Committee's conclusion should be the same as in 1986 and 1987. They nevertheless hoped for an understanding on this matter one day.

The Employers' members wished to make two comments. First, the speaker who claimed he was an Employers' member of the Islamic Republic of Iran was not an Employer member of the Committee, although the Employers' members knew that before he took the floor. Second, the Employers' members noted no change in the situation, so they entirely supported the Workers' members' view, and agreed to state that there was continued failure to apply the Convention and that the legislation and practice in the Islamic Republic of Iran were not in conformity with Convention No. 111.

The Worker representative of the USSR believed that the source of the misunderstanding might be the consideration of two different dimensions of the problem. He himself had a very confused idea of what Baha'is were, and admitted that he did not understand their role before or after the revolution in the Islamic Republic of Iran. However, he shared the views of the Vice-Chairman of the Workers' members that a Convention should be applied. In this case, nevertheless, the Committee should perhaps analyse the situation in greater detail, as the Islamic Republic of Iran was a very special, particular example that could not be compared to any other country as regards its legal system. Perhaps the Committee should establish a special study group that could examine this question, or ask the Committee of Experts to deal with this question in greater depth and provide the Conference Committee with precise definitions so as to enable it to carry out its next discussion in greater precision. In any case, the question required further thought and study.

The Government representative noted that his Government was still waiting for replies to the question asked in his introductory remarks. He wondered whether these questions had been heard at all. He thought that it would be best to ask the Committee of Experts, whose repeated allegations were based on unsubstantiated reports of discrimination, who were those groups that were being discriminated against, and how did the Committee of Experts define a minority group? As far as he knew, there was no such definition in any United Nations literature. He would welcome such a definition in future. In addition, the Government had communicated a sufficient number of documents in its first report to the Committee of Experts. He was surprised to infer from the discussion that those documents had probably not been read or reviewed. In his opinion, the conclusion of the Committee of Experts and of the Employers' and Workers' members was indeed a foregone conclusion.

The Employer member of the Islamic Republic of Iran wished to state that he had asked his adviser to take the floor on his behalf.

The Committee noted with regret that the written and oral explanations given by the Government had not shown any change in the situation. As in 1983, 1984, 1985, 1986 and 1987, the Committee again expressed its deep concern regarding the problems which continued to exist in connection with the application of the Convention. The Committee again emphasised that the Government should abolish discrimination, particularly discrimination based on sex, religion, political opinion, and national or social origin, since such discrimination contravened the Convention. The Committee decided to mention this case of continued failure to implement in the general part of its report.

The Government representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran put on record his strong objection to the conclusions and the manner in which they were drawn up.

Convention No. 119: Guarding of Machinery, 1963

Sierra Leone (ratification: 1964). The Government has communicated the following information:

In reply to the Committee of Experts' comments, the Government communicated that appropriate measures were taken to ensure workers' safety in industries. Regular safety inspections were carried out by factory inspectors. Supervisors were given safety instructions and employers were constantly reminded of safety precautions.

In addition, a Government representative stated that the Factories Act had been enacted by Parliament in 1987, and would enter into force in 1988. The Act dealt with the guarding of machinery and a copy would be provided to the ILO as soon as possible.

The Employers' members expressed their satisfaction that this problem would soon be solved, having been discussed in the present Committee for many years. There were certain shortcomings in the legislation concerning the guarding of machinery and the prohibition of using unprotected machines. The Employers' members welcomed the Government representative's statement concerning the 1987 Factories Act and hoped that a copy would be communicated soon to the ILO in order to verify that the above-mentioned shortcomings were indeed eliminated.

The Workers' members associated themselves with the comments of the Employers' members. They regretted the lack of progress over such a long period of time and stated that Sierra Leone might not be the only country to experience difficulties in this technical field. They reminded the governments that they could draw on ILO assistance to overcome such difficulties in future.

The Committee noted the information given by the Government representative. The lack of legislation to give effect to Part 2 of the Convention had been outstanding for many years. The Committee noted that a new legislation had been adopted recently and hoped that the Government would communicate this text to the ILO, and that the new provision would meet all the requirements of the Convention.

Convention No. 122: Employment Policy, 1964

Brazil (ratification: 1969). The Government has communicated the following information:

The Ministry of Labour, through the Secretariat of Employment and Wages and the National Employment Scheme (SINE) linked to it, has been developing a policy of acting as an intermediary for labour resources in application of Act No. 4923 of 26 December 1965; this has produced positive results, such as appropriate assistance being provided to unemployed workers by means of unemployment insurance and financial aid.

The data required for the implementation of employment policy are obtained from the General Registry of Employed and Unemployed Persons, which is established on the basis of information provided by enterprises each year. Using this registry, the Ministry of Labour administers the process of admission to employment and distribution of employed persons, which permits it to adopt measures to combat unemployment. The data obtained permit the level of employment to be determined, along with its monthly fluctuations, the level of monthly variation in employment, the level of unemployment, etc., as can be verified in the documents which have been communicated. For example, in the period 1985-1987, more than 2.6 million workers were registered with SINE offices, 820,000 of whom actually obtained employment through that scheme.

In addition, the Minister of Labour is making an effort to extend the formal links involving employment by means of campaigns to provide workers with employment cards. During the years 1985, 1986 and 1987, 19 million employment cards were issued. In 1985 and 1986, 1.8 million jobs, a significant figure, were created; this represented an average increase along the lines of 5 per cent per year.

In 1987, the development of the economy showed signs of stagnation, with a negative impact on the level of employment. The average level of unemployment in 1987 - 3.8 per cent - was lower than for the period 1984, 1985 and 1986, when it was 7.45 per cent, 5.60 per cent and 3.85 per cent respectively.

The intermediary function developed by the SINE, is implemented by means of two forms of assistance. The first is directed towards the organised sector of the labour market, and the second towards handling the performance of services linked to the non-organised (informal) sector.

The procedure for the formal sector involves maintaining a registry of candidates who are subjected to a pre-selection process, classified and later referred for jobs offered by enterprises or vocational training institutions.

Alongside performing this function for the formal sector, the scheme also responds to the needs of labour resources in relation to informal activities, chiefly for independent workers who provide services, with an emphasis on home work, as stipulated in new decrees adopted by the National Constituent Assembly.

Some of the offices performing the function of intermediaries also engage in activities involving assistance and support for workers, activities which run from employment guidance in relation to legislation and the labour market, to the despatch of employment cards and certificates of unemployment.

The actions undertaken through SINE to promote employment basically address the implementation of programmes aimed at providing job opportunities and guaranteeing greater degrees of occupational activity and higher wages to populations linked to the non-organised sector of the economy.

The operational units of SINE are acting to support the founding of co-operatives of small producers and self-employed workers, and the development of jobs for the accomplishment of work involving infrastructure in the community interest, micro-communities of production, and product marketing mechanisms which are administered by small producers and community enterprises. In this field the following works have been accomplished in the past few years: a programme to meet the needs of low-income populations in the areas of vocational training and employment; a special project for medium-sized cities (PECPM/BIRD); a programme for the development of the metropolitan regions of the North-east; a programme of co-operatives for mobile rural workers (COTRAVAN) and the social priorities programme (PPS).

The Government has communicated additional information on the "Development of Wages and Earnings in the Urban Sector" as well as labour statistics for 1987-88 relative to the movement of labour resources in various sectors.

In addition taking into account the fact that for two years no report had been sent, the Workers' members suggested that the present Convention should not be treated but that there should be an indication in the report that the Committee of Experts could examine it and that the present Committee could discuss the case next year. The Employers' members supported this suggestion. It was so decided.

Spain (ratification: 1970). A Government representative shared the concerns of the present Committee in relation to a problem which was of utmost importance to his Government as well. The speaker indicated that a careful reading of the Committee of Experts' comments suggested that several considerations should be taken into account. Firstly, the Committee of Experts, as stated in its observation, had not been able to examine the latest data submitted by a workers' organisation and by the Government of Spain. As a result, there was reason to doubt a real interest on the part of the present Committee to engage in a dialogue. Secondly, since the Committee of Experts' comments had for the most part been positive, the application of the Convention by the Government could have been mentioned as a case of progress in the Committee of Experts' general report. Thirdly, the Committee of Experts had noted the level of unemployment and had requested the Government to continue providing reports. The speaker stressed that the frequency with which reports on the application of the present Convention were supplied was greater than that which the Committee of Experts had requested. The speaker indicated that this Convention only laid down tendencies and orientations which all agreed were desirable, without mathematically determining the goals which governments should meet. Employment policy depended on complex circumstances which required the assistance of economic theory. In any event, the Committee of Experts' comments were general and did not address the detailed information sent by his Government in its extensive report, which had appended legislative texts and statistical data. The Government's report for the period ending 30 June 1986 took into account standards and actions undertaken and carried out in compliance with the Convention. There had been no change in the basic legal provisions in the year-and-a-half since then. His Government did not consider it opportune to amend constantly the legislation, given the fact that the goal was to provide a climate of stability and permanence so that enterprises could embrace the economic policies in the short and long term so as to promote employment. The Government periodically brought its plans and programmes up to date, thus developing the basic standards in this field. The periodic reports updated the information on the measures the Government adopted on a regular basis. The Committee of Experts' observation led one to conclude that his Government was meeting the formal obligations arising from ratification of the Convention and that the measures adopted by the Government were in conformity with the substantive contents of the Convention, in particular its Article 1. As regards the level of unemployment, the speaker stated that this was a constant concern on the part of the Government; the majority of countries faced this phenomenon, particularly those with market economies. The speaker indicated that after a decade in which employment had fallen, in 1986 it had been possible to create 332,200 additional jobs with an increase in the gross domestic product of 3.5 per cent - the highest in the OECD. The increase in employment had been seen as being stimulated not only by economic growth but also by employment promotion measures introduced in the legislation and by the conclusion of a tripartite accord, the Economic and Social Accord. The Government representative stated that between 1985 and 1987 the Spanish economy had generated more than 900,000 jobs. In the past two years, the labour market had shown a marked increase in the number of women and young workers. As a result, the extent of the jobs created had not automatically been reflected in a reduction in the unemployment figures, which had nonetheless been reduced by 1.5 per cent in the period 1986-87, with a particularly important fall in unemployment among youth. The speaker said that in 1987, the number of unemployed young persons had decreased by 49,200, thus reducing the level of youth unemployment by 2.8 per cent. In the same way, there had been a growing increase in economic activity on the part of women. The speaker concluded by making the assurance that his Government would continue to study all measures which could increase employment while seeking a balance between the social and economic forces present in Spanish society.

The Employers' members expressed the opinion that there should not be a general discussion on the present Convention but rather specific examples should be given. Governments were to appear before the present Committee so that questions could be asked. While the discussion in this Committee may have to emphasise negative events on certain occasions, they also considered positive developments. The case of Spain fell into this latter category in connection with the present Convention. The Em-employers' members noted that the report of the Committee of Experts contained four points. With regard to the first point, the Government had supplied information but the Committee of Experts and, thus this Committee, had not yet been in a position to examine this information. In the second point the Committee of Experts had noted with interest the employment market policy of Spain. The Committee of Experts had not criticised this policy and the Employers' members had no criticism of it as it seemed to contain the right mix of measures to combat the problems which existed. In the third place, a number of figures had been mentioned which showed that there had been positive developments; more positive than in other countries although in absolute terms the unemployment figures were still fairly high. With regard to the remaining problems, there were understandable reasons for these, just like in other countries. There were more applicants in the labour market as a result of a change in society as a whole and, in particular, a change in the role of women in society. Moreover, there was an increase in the number of younger people in the labour market. As the Committee of Experts noted, because of these reasons there was still fairly high unemployment—particularly youth unemployment and long-term unemployment. The Employers' members expressed their concern over this situation but noted that the Government had recognised this problem and was trying to tackle it. They looked forward to receiving more information on the employment policy in his country and hoped that the achievements in the past would be continued in the future.

The Workers' members agreed with the comments of the Employers' members. They noted that in the field of youth unemployment, tremendous efforts were being made by the Government and hoped that these would continue in the future. Similar efforts were also being made with regard to the unemployment of women. However, with reference to the figures contained in the report, they pointed out that no progress had been achieved from 1985 to 1987 to reduce the average unemployment rate. They noted that this figure was still extremely high compared to other countries in Europe. Therefore, they hoped that the efforts described by the Government representative would be intensified in order to bring the unemployment rate down to an average European level.

The Worker member of Spain thanked the Government representative for his explanations. His organisation, the Trade Union Confederation of Works' Committees, considered that the dialogue with the Government was justified given the fact that comments to the Government's report had presented. He recognised that economic progress had been made in the country. However, he noted that the rate of unemployment was the double of that of other European countries. The Worker member of Spain provided supplementary information concerning unemployment in the country. According to available information known to his organisation, and the Spanish Human Rights Association, 1,875,500 workers had lost their jobs between December 1982 and December 1987. This was referred to by the Committee of Experts in its report when it indicated that the rate of unemployment continued to be very high. Unemployment affected, in addition to women, two other categories of workers: young persons who were looking for first employment and the long-term unemployed. He requested the Government representative to provide information on the draft youth employment plan which, according to the information available in the press, entitled enterprises, who took on workers under the age of 26 years, to receive a subsidy from the Government and exoneration from social security payments. Moreover the young employees would be excluded from collective bargaining agreements. With regard to the long-term unemployed he recalled with concern that in the economical and social agreement it was proposed to increase the rate of social security benefits to long-term unemployed but that since 1985 the percentage of benefits for the long-term unemployed had been 26 per cent. With respect to the employment policy the fundamental measures implemented by the national authorities introduced flexibility in the labour market by developing temporary jobs. In this regard he pointed out the particular problem created by the so-called effect of substitution of flexibility measures: the precarious jobs had a negative influence on stable and permanent employment; employment flexibility caused enterprises to implement internal adjustment through means of terminations; a number of enterprises had dismissed large numbers of workers who occupied stable posts in order to hire others based on temporary contracts. It was regrettable in this regard that information was lacking concerning this situation. In conclusion the speaker referred to three situations which required attention. Firstly, he warned that the legislation in force with regard to temporary workers consisted of degrees which in a few cases contained dispositions with a view to prevent precarious employment from having a negative effect on stable employment. He hoped to have the assurance that the courts would not have difficulty in applying the law which accorded a greater protection to workers in fixed or stable employment than did the decrees concerning temporary contracts. Secondly, he requested that information should be provided from the labour inspection concerning the application of the legislation in force with regard to the substitution of permanent workers by temporary workers. Finally he stressed the necessity of ensuring that trade unions would have the right to information on temporary contracts.

The Government representative thanked the Employers' and Workers' members for their statements. He recognised the necessity of progressively improving the situation in the labour market. The Minister of Labour had prepared economic policy plans which would be the subject of consultations with employers' and workers' organisations. He ensured in particular that the youth employment plan would be the subject of tripartite discussions, specifying that its elaboration and execution would take into account the obligation to fully respect all Conventions ratified by his country. Although imperfections did exist, the speaker indicated that the legislation concerning temporary contracts was not any different from those provisions applied in neighbouring countries. The objective of the Government with respect to the employment policy was to modernise labour relations. The speaker indicated that the reports which his Government had supplied contained detailed information on the above questions.

The Worker member of the Federal Republic of Germany emphasised that the Spanish case could serve as an example for other countries in Western Europe. All countries in this region had the problem of flexibility and deregulation which led to a reduction of full-time jobs. The number of part-time and short term jobs is increasing. There was no right to guaranteed employment nor to education or training for young persons. He further pointed out that a number of multinational enterprises operated in Spain, and countries like Spain, because the working conditions and salaries were lower. In this respect, unions in different countries needed to work together to ensure that multinational enterprises would not succeed in pitting workers in one country against those in another. Moreover, Governments in fighting unemployment, should not lower salaries or allow the deterioration of working conditions because the jobs they were creating in one country were jobs that would be lost in another. Therefore, co-ordinated action was required and a minimum level needed to be established. In this regard, ILO standards are of great importance.

The Committee took note of the detailed information provided by the Government representative. As noted by the Committee of Experts, the positive results achieved in the overall level of employment had not led to a fall in the unemployment rate, which remains a serious cause of concern. The Committee shares the hope expressed by the Committee of Experts that the Government will maintain its endeavours in co-operation with the representatives of the organisations and persons concerned to secure productive employment, and that it will supply full information in this respect.

Convention No. 128: Invalidity, Old-Age and Survivors' Benefits, 1967

Uruguay (ratification: 1973). A Government representative indicated that legislation as well as the practice were in line in Article 29 of the present Convention. In effect, on 21 October 1987 Law No. 15900 was adopted according to which the cash benefits, pensions and old-age pensions paid by the Bank of Social Welfare would be adjusted on 1 April of every year in relation to the increase in production in the civil year immediately before, in the median wage index, established in conformity with Article 39 of Law No. 13728 of 17 December 1968 (Article 1), and that pension benefits would be adjusted within the two months following the month in which the general adjustment of the wages of the civil servants of the central administration occurred (Article 2). This means, at present, that benefits are readjusted every four months. This law which already included the principles according to which the benefits were to be adjusted and which entered into force on 1 April 1988, corresponds entirely to the provisions of the Convention. Furthermore the assertion of the National Vanguard Movement of Retired Persons and Pensioners according to which it was impossible to have recourse to judges or tribunals to file complaints, as indicated in their comments, was inexact. In fact, since 1 March 1985 a state of law and of all the constitutional and legal guarantees was prevailing. Furthermore, there existed a recent jurisprudence of the Administrative Tribunal under which complaints of retired persons and pensioners against the State had been settled. A report with the text of the law and the other statistical information as required by the Committee of Experts, would be furnished to the Office.

The Worker member of Uruguay stated that with the adoption of Law No. 15900, one of the most acute problems concerning retired persons and pensioners in his country, had been resolved. A precise system of adjustment had now been established to which the executive power would have to submit in the future. Nevertheless it followed from Article 2 of the aforementioned law that the old-age pension benefits would be adjusted within the two months following the month in which the general adjustment of the wages of the civil servants of the central administration occurred. He pointed out that through the system of these advances, in relation to the amounts of the respective pensions and through the backlog in their adjustment, all pensioners together lost many millions of pesos without any justified reason. Furthermore, referring to a problem that had arisen as a consequence of the re-evaluation of pensions in the year 1985, the speaker indicated that the present Government had not undertaken a re-evaluation in keeping with the legal provisions and had omitted for that reason to pay 1,196,000 pesos which were increased by later adjustments. Finally referring to a judgement by the corresponding tribunal, he stated that the administrative tribunal ruled in favour of the plaintiffs and the administration had decided not to pay the benefits to all the persons concerned, as it should have.

The Workers' members stated that since 1986 there had been no reaction on the part of the government which to this day, have provided no explanation. It had been not until the Conference Committee came together that a reply was obtained. It was a very important event when a trade union submitted comments to the ILO to obtain a full and real application of the Conventions. There had been indications of an adjustment but this was a very partial one, and it had to be asked whether it was a total adjustment. Taking into account the galloping inflation prevailing in many countries, it was necessary to carry out regular adjustments to adapt them to the cost of living. The present Convention was an important one which was to permit the persons who stopped working to continue to live in dignity. They hoped that these replies would be submitted to the Committee of Experts and to the trade union to allow them to ascertain the application of the Convention.

The Employers' members stated that there existed a problem of communication. Since 1986 the Committee of Experts had requested concrete information relating to the adjustment of old-age pensions. In March 1986 the representative of the National Vanguard Movement of Retired Persons sent their comments to the Committee of Experts which in turn requested statistical information. This was of utmost importance in a country in which inflation was high and had devastating effects. The Government representative had furnished information, indicating that the adjustments were carried out regularly and had promised to again furnish all information required. They hoped that the Government would furnish the requested information so that the Committee of Experts could examine it.

The Government representative stated that, with reference to the amount of the four monthly advances on the annual adjustments, account had to be taken of the fact that Law No 15900 did not impose an automatic application of any index, but that account had to be taken of the variation of the general consumers' index and the funds at the disposal of the Bank of Social Welfare and the National Treasury. Since the installation of the democratic Government a steady decrease in the inflation rate and an increase of wages in real terms could be observed and the purchasing power of the old age and survivors' benefits had undergone a significant increase, exceeding the one prescribed by the Convention. Thus from April 1985 to April 1988 pensions had risen at an average of 43 per cent in real terms. As far as the court sentences were concerned, acquitting the claims of some retired persons and pensioners, which were submitted before the entry into force of Law No. 15900 they showed the inaccuracy of the statements according to which recourse could not be had before judges of tribunals. The statement of the Worker member of Uruguay showed also that the Government had complied with the adverse sentences which, because of the jurisdictional control of the administration, were of particular and not of general significance.

The Committee noted with interest that new legislation has been enacted in October 1987 in order to fully comply with this Convention. It also noted that the required statistical information would be provided in the near future. The Committee noted the explanations given by the Government and the discussion which took place which would be transmitted to the Committee of Experts so that it could reexamine the question, taking into account this discussion. It hoped that contacts or conversations would take place in the country to solve this problem.

Convention No. 129: Labour Inspection (Agriculture), 1969

Romania (ratification: 1975).

The Government has communicated the following information:

Under Romanian legislation, labour inspection is carried out and co-ordinated by the Ministry of Labour and in the territories by the "Labour and Social Services Sections" and the Territorial Labour Protection Inspectorates.

The organisation, responsibilities and functioning of the above-mentioned bodies are described in the Labour Code, Decree No. 783/1969 of the Council of State concerning the organisation and functioning of the Ministry of Labour, Law No. 5/1965 on the protection of labour and Law No. 57/1968 on people's councils.

Section 181 of the Code regulates the responsibilities of the Ministry of Labour as labour inspection body by providing:

"The Ministry of Labour, as the specialist central organ for labour questions, supervises the application of the legal provisions concerning the labour relations of persons on the work staffs of all state units, co-operatives and other non-state organisations and the legal provisions concerning labour relations formed with legal entities other than those mentioned above and with individuals.

The Ministry of Labour and the Labour and Social Services Sections supervise the application of legal provisions on work remuneration, labour standardisation, employment, the conclusion, execution and termination of labour contracts, and social insurance. The State Inspection Department for the Protection of Labour was created in the Ministry of Labour for problems of safety and protection of labour. This Department works at the central level - with specialised branches for various branches of the economy - and the territorial level, and has the following competences: to direct and supervise safety at work in order to guarantee proper conditions and prevent occupational accidents and diseases; to lay down together with the Ministry of health standards for safety at work and the setting up and use of equipment for protection at work and to supervise these; to control whether occupational safety measures are ensured when new production units or capacity are introduced and, together with the Ministry of Health, to deliver authorisation for full or partial operations; to verify the application of standards and work protection measures when drafting plans or new objectives for plant and machinery, as well as the methods for the attribution and utilisation of funds for occupational safety to study the causes of accidents and lay down preventive measures, supervising the registration, proof and reporting of occupational accident and diseases, to verify the proliferation of better equipment, operations, plant and other means of work protection throughout the economy; to direct and supervise information on occupational safety.

Inspectors for labour protection have the right to request enterprises to take measures to eliminate deficiencies in work safety; to require a total or partial stoppage of work in the units or on the machines concerned where non-observance of safety standards poses an immediate risk to the life, corporal integrity or health of the workers or the population; to detect offences of work safety standards and apply the corresponding sanctions provided by the legislation; to take and retain samples for analysis of materials and substances used or handled.

There is also a system of health centres for the control of epidemic diseases in administrative and territorial units. Under section 41 of Law No. 3/1978 concerning public health, these centres carry out health inspections as well as: authorising the functioning of all kinds of economic and social activities from the health angle; and withdrawing sanitary authorisation and ordering a stoppage or temporary restriction of activity in any kind of enterprise, as provided by the law.

The State Inspection for the Protection of Labour supervises all economic and social units (employing 10,600 people in 1985). In the same year, the number of units and workers in the main branches of the economy were as follows.

Branch	Number of units	Number of workers
- Industry	1 913	3 503 952
- Handicrafts	31 200	41 600
- Construction	-	692 700
- State agriculture	992	431 000
- Agriculture (co-operatives)	4 363	2 045 400
- Railways	-	173 000
- Road transport	-	369 900
- Transport (fluvial and waterways maritime)	-	41 000
- Air transport	-	8 600
- Telecommunications	4 979	81 000
- Commerce	82 707	457 800
- Teaching, culture	64 724	412 800
- Science	-	134 800
- Health, social services, sport	-	286 100

Staff of the State Inspection for the Protection of Labour (central and territorial) normally have to spend four days per week on the supervision of economic and social units to verify how standards and technical safety requirements are met.

In 1985 there were 95,676 inspection units: 19,165 in industrial undertakings, 2,765 in construction enterprises, 15,900 in agriculture, 1,987 in transport, 5,900 in telecommunications, 16,085 in commerce, 17,000 in handicrafts units.

There have been about the same numbers of work accidents in recent years – fewer than 2 per 1,000 workers. But the number of fatal accidents decreased each year: reaching in 1987 a level of 0.100 for 1,000 workers, that is 3 per cent less than in 1986. There is also a general tendency for the serious cases to diminish. Similarly the number of days lost per worker following work accidents was 3.2 per cent lower in 1987 than in 1986 and the average time lost through temporary incapacity was 2.5 per cent less.

As a result of the inspections, 48,500 infringements of safety standards – most technical only – were detected: 38,442 fines worth 26,535,400 lei and 6,100 disciplinary sanctions were imposed. Eighty per cent of these sanctions were applied to management personnel at the unit or sector level. For non-observance of work safety standards 107 persons were dismissed from posts of responsibility. Three hundred and seventeen persons of the same category were referred to the courts. Work was stopped in 5,600 places.

Morocco (ratification: 1972). A Government representative stressed the importance which his country attached to the prevention of occupational accidents and occupational diseases. Legislation provided for a large number of measures to protect workers against benzene intoxication which was considered an occupational disease and for which compensation was mandatory. Enterprises using this product must either have their own medical service or belong to an inter-enterprise medical service. As well, other protective measures must be taken in regard to both the individual and the enterprise. The economic and social development plan for 1988-92 had included a special section on the improvement of working conditions. Workers' and employers' organisations had participated in the drawing up of these proposals. The present Convention provided for specific measures to be taken such as the substitution of less harmful products and the obligation to fix a maximum permissible concentration of benzene in the air. An ILO technical assistance programme which covered the revision of health and safety provisions in regard to all ratified Conventions would also aim to align legislation with the provisions of the Convention. The expert in charge of this was due to make his proposals at the beginning of 1989.

The Employers' members stated that the Committee of Experts had examined this problem for the past ten years which, while certainly technical, was of extreme importance to the workers concerned. The Government recognised the necessity of protective measures; these should therefore be incorporated into legislation and be effectively applied. As these provisions were to be included in the regulations of the Code, the draft should be sent as quickly as possible so that their conformity with the Convention could be examined.

The Workers' members stated that this issue, which was very important to workers' health, had been discussed since 1977 and they regretted that provisions had not yet been adopted. ILO assistance had been given and it was time that the country undertook its obligations.

The Government representative reminded the present Committee of the various protective measures which he had mentioned previously. What remained to be known was whether or not a harmless substitute for benzene existed. This was a highly technical question.

The Workers' members pointed out that the Committee of Experts had asked for specific information on the use of benzene and they hoped that the Government would take the necessary measures as soon as possible.

The Committee noted the information supplied by the Government representative. It regretted the long-standing absence of provisions to apply the Convention. The Committee hoped that, with the assistance of the ILO, the Government would take all necessary measures in the very near future to give full effect to the Convention and would report the progress made.

II. OBSERVATIONS AND INFORMATION CONCERNING THE APPLICATION OF CONVENTIONS IN NON-METROPOLITAN TERRITORIES (ARTICLES 22 AND 35 OF THE CONSTITUTION)

A. General Observations and Information concerning Certain Territories

New Zealand

Niue A Government representative of New Zealand assured the Committee that his Government had not been ignoring its reporting responsibilities. New Zealand had an ongoing concern to meet such responsibilities. However, this case provided certain real and practical difficulties. Niue had become self-governing in free association with New Zealand. Thus, the implementation of treaties by which Niue was bound and any reporting thereon was the responsibility of Niue, not New Zealand. The practical impact of that was that New Zealand could not compile the report. However, it must be pointed out that the Niue Government faced difficulties in meeting its reporting requirements due to resource constraints. The Niue Government had sought the help of the ILO office in Suva to complete the report. However, that call for assistance was unfortunately refused. Since then, his Government approached the regional office for Asia and the Pacific on this matter as that office should be taking a more positive approach in meeting the needs of those in the region, particularly needs such as complying with this type of responsibility. The Government representative concluded by stating to the best of his knowledge the situation in Niue gives no cause for concern in relation to Convention No. 105.

The Workers' members regretted that assistance from the Office had been refused. They wished to emphasise the importance of the obligation of replying to the supervisory bodies concerning Conventions and regretted that no reply had been forthcoming on Convention No. 105 as it was a fundamental Convention. They requested the Government of New Zealand to give assistance to Niue in providing information on the application of this Convention.

The Employers' members noted the statement given by the Government representative as to the endeavours which had been taken to meet its obligations. The Employers' members wished to point out that State members of the ILO were responsible for the obligations they had accepted and in the case of New Zealand this responsibility is extended to the obligations in respect of Niue. This year the present Committee must pay particular attention to the problem of replies because paragraphs 98 and 99 of the Report indicated that the number of cases in which insufficient answers or no answers had been given had almost doubled. It was the specific questions and the answers to those questions which formed the very basis of the supervisory system. The Employers' members hoped that the difficulties with respect to the replies from Niue would be overcome and that the report would be forthcoming.

The representative of the Secretary-General indicated that Headquarters of the International Labour Office had only recently received the request for assistance to be given to Niue and that the request would be responded to favourably.

The Government representative indicated that he was pleased to hear that favourable consideration would be given to the request for assistance as such assistance had been useful in the past.

The Committee noted the explanations given by the Government representative of New Zealand and the difficulties and doubts he had reported. It noted also that the Government asked the regional office of the ILO for assistance. It hoped that the reports containing the replies requested would be communicated in the near future. It decided to include this case in the appropriate section of its report.

B. Observations and Information on the Application of Conventions

Convention No. 33: Minimum Age (Non-Industrial Employment), 1932

Netherlands

Netherlands Antilles The Government has communicated the following information:

In reply to the Committee of Experts' comments, the Government regrets that the draft Bills, mentioned in former reports, have not yet been drawn up. The Government shall nevertheless strive to realise these drafts as soon as possible.

In addition, a Government representative of the Netherlands Antilles stated that efforts were being made to establish a new tripartite Labour Committee to deal with the draft Order on dangerous and unhealthy activities prohibited to young persons under the age of 18 years. This Labour Committee was established by the Ordinance of 6 May 1988, No. 11, and the Government looked forward to the findings of this Committee and trusted that the obligations of the Convention would be fulfilled within a reasonable time.

The Employers' members noted that the Government representative had not provided a clear explanation of the situation. For over 30 years now the ILO had been concerned with the establishment of a minimum age of least 18 years in this territory. This was a particularly important subject as it involved the prohibition of dangerous and unhealthy work to children. For many years now this Committee had heard statements concerning the draft Order and the establishment of a commission and the statement given today did not indicate any further progress in this regard. More specific information was needed and the Employers' members requested the Government representative to provide more detailed information in written form to this Committee next year.

The Workers' members noted that they had received a very short oral report from the Government representative. This was an important question that was being dealt with as it concerned the setting of a minimum age of at least 18 years for dangerous and unhealthy work. As the Employers' members had pointed out, this case had been ongoing for over 30 years. The efforts being made by the Government should go beyond those of establishing Committees. It should not be that difficult to ensure that the minimum age for dangerous work was set in conformity with the present Convention. The Workers' members stated that perhaps the Government of the Netherlands should assist the Netherlands Antilles to act more quickly in this regard. It would also be advisable to ask the ILO for assistance.

The Worker member of Argentina expressed his concern over the situation in the Netherlands Antilles, particularly because this problem had been ongoing so long. It was impossible to justify the fact that a country such as the Netherlands, which applied certain standards in its own national territory, did not have sufficient intent to extend this to non-metropolitan territories. This was a serious situation, as it concerned young people under 18 years of age, working in dangerous conditions. Therefore the present Committee needed more detailed explanations on this subject.

A Government representative of the Netherlands, stated that this Government gave all sorts of assistance to the Netherlands Antilles. However, he wished to clarify that the Kingdom of the Netherlands consisted of three equal parts: the Netherlands part in Europe; the Netherlands Antilles; and Aruba. These three parts of the Kingdom were completely independent; they had their own governments and laws. The Netherlands part in Europe did not want to interfere in the internal matters of the other parts.

The Government representative of the Netherlands Antilles stated that the labour law required the Government to hear the report of the previously mentioned tripartite committee before it could take any decision. He indicated that he would bring the comments of the present Committee to the knowledge of the authorities in his country and try to expedite the matter as much as possible so that as soon as possible the obligations if the Convention would be enshrined in national legislation.

The Workers' members noted that since a Committee had now been established, it was hoped that by next year the necessary legislative measures will have been taken.

The Committee noted the written and oral information communicated by the Government of the Netherlands Antilles. It noted that the question was discussed for some time past. It was also noted that an order on dangerous and unhealthy activities was expected to be ready soon and the Committee expressed the firm hope that the Government would submit for consideration by the Committee of Experts at its next meeting a report reporting genuine progress in the implementation of the Convention.

III. SUBMISSION TO THE COMPETENT AUTHORITIES OF THE CONVENTIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS ADOPTED BY THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE (ARTICLE 19 OF THE CONSTITUTION)

Observations and Information

Ghana. In reply to the comments made by the Committee of Experts, the Government has indicated that the instruments adopted at the 66th, 67th, 68th, 69th, 71st and 72nd Sessions of the Conference had been submitted to the competent authorities.

Grenada. In reply to the comments made by the Committee of Experts, the Government has indicated that all of the submission documents have now been prepared, and when the Grenada delegation left home for the present Conference the papers were merely awaiting the Minister's signature. After the matter has been discussed by Cabinet, it is expected that submission can be made to Parliament very shortly.

The responsible official of the Ministry attended the ILO seminar on standards in Antigua (May 1988), following which the regional adviser on standards made an informal advisory mission to Grenada. It is hoped that this training and advice will improve the knowledge of standard-related questions in Grenada and enable the submission and reporting requirements to be fulfilled in future.

In addition, a Government representative apologised on behalf of his Government for having failed to comply with its obligations under the ILO's Constitution for so many years. The present Government assumed office in December 1984, and had inherited a backlog of unimplemented measures. As Minister of State with responsibility for labour since March 1988 he had personally issued instructions to settle all outstanding ILO matters, including the completion of the Labour Code. Unfortunately the death of the Labour Commissioner in April 1988 had caused a further delay in this process. He was nevertheless pleased to inform the present Committee that all the submission documents had been prepared and delivered to the Cabinet in early June 1988. He assured the Committee that the Government of Grenada will make the decision on those instruments known to the ILO in its next report in the very near future.

The Workers' members welcomed this supplementary information given by the Government representative. They were confident that following consultation with the Regional Adviser of the ILO the Government of Grenada was now more aware of the importance of complying with obligations concerning submission. They were pleased that the submission process had been improved, but the Committee was nevertheless technically required to note, with the additional information supplied by the Government representative, that actual submission had not yet taken place in the appropriate part of the report.

The Employers' members were grateful to the Government representative for his statement indicating improvements in the submission process. They understood the administrative difficulties caused by a change of government and other particular circumstances. As regards the government proposals that should accompany the submission documents and the instruments, the Employers' members recalled that the ILO Constitution gave the governments complete freedom in this respect, including the possibility of submitting the text with no proposals at all, which was still better than opposing ratification. The Committee should draw the governments' attention to this option, and in the case of Grenada note in its report that it expected the backlog to be eliminated.

The Government representative thanked the Workers' and Employers' members for their observations and stated that following the technical assistance given by the ILO his Government was now fully aware of the measures it could take to comply with its obligations under the ILO Constitution.

The Committee took note of the information supplied by the Government of Grenada and the difficulties mentioned by it. It noted that certain steps had been taken with regard to the submission of the instruments adopted by the Conference to the competent authorities but that submission had not yet taken place. It decided to make a special reference to that fact in the appropriate section of its General Report in the hope of being able to note real progress next year.

Islamic Republic of Iran. A Government representative stated that in the ten years since the Islamic revolution and the establishment of a new Government a great amount of progress had been achieved including the adoption of a new Constitution and of new labour laws. Considering the fact that the country was in a war situation there were, besides the submission of international labour Conventions and Recommendations, other major priorities. Nevertheless, the Government was doing its best to fulfil its obligations of submitting the ILO instruments which it had not yet submitted to the competent national authorities. A tripartite commission had been set up to examine the provisions of these instruments. However, since many of the provisions of these instruments of the international labour Conventions were of a very fundamental nature and affected large areas in the social and economic fields, the submission procedure naturally required a certain amount of time.

The Workers' members felt that it was a pity to have to discuss this question in the Committee. Everybody knew that new Conventions and Recommendations had to be submitted to the competent authorities within 18 months. In the present case no submission had taken place since the 62nd Session of the Conference, which meant that for 11 years the Government had not fulfilled its obligations and the Committee had been left without any information as to whether the appropriate steps had been taken or not. Even though the Government representative had indicated that a tripartite commission had been created for the examination of the instruments to be submitted to the competent authorities, this did not necessarily mean that submission would in fact take place in the foreseeable future. The Workers' members strongly urged the Government to accelerate the pace of submission. The case should be mentioned in the appropriate part of the Report.

The Employers' members noted that the non compliance with the obligation has lasted for a long time and that the limit of seven years has been exceeded. They expressed the opinion that no long consultations were necessary before submission of new instruments to the competent authorities. Only the situation of the national legislation in relation to the instruments submitted was to be made known. Even though tripartite consultations were a desirable procedure, as far as ratification and subsequent measures in the country were concerned, they were not indispensable for the submission procedure. The presentation to the legislature could also be undertaken before such consultations took place and they expressed their regrets about this shortcoming, which should be mentioned in the Committee report.

The Committee took note of the information supplied by the Government of the Islamic Republic of Iran and the difficulties mentioned by it. It noted that certain steps had been taken with a view to the submission of the instruments adopted by the Conference to the competent authorities, but that submission had not taken place for many years. It decided to make a special reference to that fact in the appropriate section of its General Report in the firm hope of being able to note real progress in the near future.

Mauritius. In reply to the observation made by the Committee of Experts the Government has indicated that the documents necessary for the submission to Parliament of the vast majority of the Conventions and Recommendations in question have been prepared and are waiting for parliamentary time to be made available. It is now expected that submission can be made in September 1988. The Government delegation to the Conference has made contact with the Office with a view to obtaining a further informal advisory mission by the regional adviser on international labour standards. It is hoped that this will help overcome the problem of submission and those related to international labour standards.

In addition, a Government representative explained to the Committee that his Government had not been able to present the Conventions and Recommendations adopted by the ILO to Parliament because of internal problems and timing. Although two years ago it had been announced that within the following year the Government would fulfil its duty, this had not been possible due to the general election which had changed the pattern of parliamentary work, and the changed orientations of the new Government. The celebrations for the 50th anniversary of the setting up of labour administration which were held in 1988 had further delayed their submission. However, all papers were ready and were awaiting submission to Parliament. According to the provisional parliamentary programme, this should take place in September, and, in any case, before the end of 1988.

The Workers' members considered that a delay of seven years in the submission of the adopted ILO instruments to the competent authorities could not be explained by temporary political problems. They regretted that the Government had not used the occasion of the 50th anniversary to fulfil its constitutional obligations. Ratification of ILO instruments could not proceed until this first step was taken and they therefore urged the Government to take the measures necessary for their submission and their eventual ratification.

The Employers' members, while recognising that a number of countries did encounter problems in the submission of ILO instruments, agreed with the Workers' members that such a long delay was not warranted. They also stressed the importance of taking this first step toward eventual ratification. They urged the Government to ensure submission in September 1988 as they had pledged in his written communication.

The Worker member of Mauritius noted with regret that over the past eight years the Government of Mauritius had always found some reason for not submitting to Parliament the instruments adopted by the ILO.

The Government representative stressed that it was due to particular circumstances which had, coincidentally, prevailed year after year during the past seven years that his Government had not complied with its constitutional obligations. He repeated that his Government would fulfil its obligations during 1988.

The Committee took note of the information furnished by the Government of Mauritius and of the difficulties mentioned by it. It is noted that certain steps had been taken with a view to the submission of the instruments adopted by the Conference to the competent authorities but that submission had not yet taken place. It decided to make a special reference to that fact in the appropriate section of its General Report, in the hope of being able to note real progress next year.

Papua New Guinea. A Government representative stated that the documents concerning the instruments adopted between the 66th and the 72nd Session of the Conference had been submitted to the Clerk of Parliament for the November 1987 session of the National Parliament. The instruments were not presented to Parliament at the November 1987 session due to the discussion on the national budget which took up the full Parliament session. The first Parliament session in 1988 took place in April but was unfortunately adjourned after two hours to reconvene in June 1988. The Government representative assured the Committee that all efforts would be made to have the instruments presented to the National Parliament. The documents on submission had been prepared by the Labour Ministry and it was now up to the Office of Parliament to place these documents on the agenda.

The Workers' members expressed their understanding of the particular circumstances in Papua New Guinea but hoped that, as the submission had already been postponed a number of times, these documents would be discussed by the Parliament in June 1988.

The Employers' members also noted with regret the failure to submit. They admitted that in some cases the 18 months' deadline for submission could cause problems, but as no instrument had been submitted after seven years this gave cause for concern and some measures were required. The Employers' members proposed to mention this case in the Committee's report and expressed their hope that the submission would take place sooner in future.

The Committee took note of the information supplied by the Government representative and the difficulties mentioned by him concerning submission. It noted that certain steps had been taken with a view to the submission of the instruments adopted by the Conference to the competent authorities but that submission had not yet taken place. It decided to make a special reference to that fact in the appropriate section of its General Report in the hope of being able to note real progress next year.

Saint Lucia. In reply to the comments made by the Committee of Experts, the Government has indicated that due to changes in personnel in the Labour Department, it had not yet been possible to complete the submission procedure. Following further training received at the regional seminar and the visit of the regional Adviser on Standards, it was hoped to complete the procedure soon.

Sierra Leone. In reply to the comments made by the Committee of Experts, the Government has indicated that the necessary submission documents have now been prepared.

In addition, a Government representative recalled that the latest position of his Government was presented to the present Committee in a written communication. He added that the Department of Labour of Sierra Leone was very short staffed due to the death of the Labour Commissioner in March 1988 and because the official trained by the ILO Regional Adviser in 1987 was now on study leave. It was hoped that a new official could be recruited soon. The Cabinet had already approved the submission of the Conventions and Recommendations referred to in the report of the Committee of Experts, and some of the submission documents had been sent to Parliament. The Government hoped that submission could be completed soon.

The Workers' members stated that they had taken note of the written information provided by the Government of Sierra Leone as well as the further explanations given by the Government representative. They expressed satisfaction with the improvements indicated by the Government representative concerning the submission process, and understood the unfortunate reasons for the delay. The Workers' members proposed to mention this case in the appropriate place in the Committee's report.

The Employers' members stated that the difficulties outlined by the Government representative were typical of many developing countries whose administrations were understaffed. The Employers' members regretted this situation and hoped that the Government would be able to comply with its submission obligations and inform the ILO about the measures taken to this effect. The Committee should note this case in the appropriate paragraph of its report.

The Committee took note of the information supplied by the Government of Sierra Leone and of the difficulties mentioned by it. It noted that certain steps had been taken with a view to the submission of the instrument adopted by the Conference to the competent authorities but that submission had not yet taken place. It decided to make a special reference to that fact in the appropriate section of its general report, in the hope of being able to note real progress next year.

Suriname. In reply to the comments made by the Committee of Experts concerning the submission to the competent authorities of the instruments adopted at the 65th to 72nd Sessions of the Conference, the Government had indicated that, since its independence in 1975, Suriname experienced some political instability which resulted in the suspension of the Constitution and the Parliament in August 1980. During the period 1980 to 1987, the conditions for the submission of ILO instruments had not been favourable, among others, due to several changes of Government. As a result of the democratisation process starting in 1984, the new Constitution of the Republic finally entered into force on 30 October 1987, and, according to the Constitution, the National Assembly was constituted, based on free, general elections held in November 1987. According to sections 72 (sub-section (a)), 103 and 104 of the Constitution, Conventions are ratified by the President of the Republic, after approval by the National Assembly.

Furthermore, the Government is confident that the situation can shortly be improved, taking also into account the preparatory work done by the Ministry of Labour with a view to submitting a number of ILO instruments such as Conventions Nos. 154, 155, 158 and 162.

The translation of Conventions and Recommendations into Dutch has been difficult, and it is hoped that some international assistance can be obtained soon in this respect.

The officials responsible for reporting and fulfilling the submission obligations have received some training from the ILO at regional seminars on standards (Barbados in 1982, Antigua in May 1988) and it is hoped that further assistance in relation to standards will be forthcoming from the ILO and such training will continue in the future, so that the obligations can be complied with.

In addition, a Government representative referred the Committee to his Government's written reply. As regards the comments of the Committee of Experts concerning the submission to the competent authorities of the instruments adopted at the 65th to 72nd Sessions of the Conference, his Government wished to recall that since its independence in 1975 Suriname had experienced some political instability. During the period 1980-87 the conditions in Suriname for the submission of ILO instruments had not been favourable. In 1987 the new Constitution of the Republic finally entered into force and the National Assembly had been constituted. According to sections 72(a), 102 and 104 of the Constitution, Conventions were ratified by the President of the Republic after approval by the National Assembly. The Government was confident that the situation regarding submission could shortly be improved taking into account the preparatory work that had been done by the Ministry of Labour with a view to submitting a number of ILO instruments such as Conventions Nos. 154, 155, 158 and 162, and the training responsible officials had received from the ILO. He hoped that further assistance in relation to standards would be forthcoming from the ILO.

The Workers' members thanked the Government representative for having responded quickly to the appeal launched by this Committee for dialogue on difficulties which existed in member States and for having submitted a written statement on the situation which existed in his country. The Workers' members were well aware of and saddened by the events which had occurred in Suriname. However, it would now appear that there was a possibility of having a stable Government and restoring a normal situation in the country. Based on the information received it would appear that Suriname wished to fully co-operate with the ILO and fulfill its obligations. Conventions and Recommendations should be submitted to the competent authority so that the National Assembly and public could have knowledge of these instruments. Moreover the failure of submissions jeopardised the possibility for ratification. The Workers' members regretted that submission in Suriname had not been possible for seven successive years and they urged the Government to make up for lost time, and improve the situation as soon as possible.

The Employers' members emphasised that the obligation under the Constitution to submit instruments to the competent authorities was quite rightly intended to ensure that the bodies responsible for implementation of standards in individual countries would be aware of the contents of such instruments and respond accordingly. Although the constitutional obligation of submission within 18 months was often difficult for member States to meet, Suriname had not met this obligation for seven consecutive years and that was why it was before the present Committee. They noted the Government representative's statement of the difficulties that had existed in Suriname, particularly regarding the political situation, and had an understanding as to how this had hindered the Government in meeting its constitutional obligations. They were grateful for the promise made by the Government representative that Suriname would comply with its obligations in the future.

The Committee took note of the written and oral information furnished by the Government of Suriname and of the difficulties mentioned by it. It noted that certain steps had been taken with a view to the submission of the instruments adopted by the Conference to the competent authorities but that there was still a delay in that respect. It decided to make a special reference to that fact in the appropriate section of its General Report, in the hope of being able to observe real progress next year.

Trinidad and Tobago: A Government representative referred to the administrative difficulties his Government is facing. He also stated that on 9 June 1988 instruments adopted at the 66th and 67th Sessions of the Conference had been submitted to the competent authorities. An effort to submit the instruments adopted at the 68th to 72nd Sessions would also be made by the official in charge of ILO-related questions.

The Employers' members pointed out that the maximum delay for submission to the competent authorities was 18 months and that the Committee of Experts had reported that no information had been communicated that the Conventions and Recommendations adopted during the past seven years had been thus submitted. While understanding the difficulties mentioned by the Government representative, they hoped that the Government would respect its obligations for their submission.

The Workers' members stressed the importance of the obligation to submit instruments adopted by the Conference to the competent authorities, whether or not these were to be ratified.

The Committee took note of the information supplied by the Government of Trinidad and Tobago and of the difficulties mentioned by it. It noted that certain steps had been taken with a view to the submission of the instruments adopted by the Conference at its 66th to 72nd Sessions to the competent authorities but that submission had not yet taken place. It decided to make a special reference to that fact in the appropriate section of its General Report, in the hope of being able to note real progress next year.

United Republic of Tanzania. In reply to the comments made by the Committee of Experts, the Government has indicated that in November 1987 the ILO Regional Adviser for Africa paid a visit to the United Republic of Tanzania. The object of his visit was, inter alia, to enlighten the Government on its obligation to submit instruments before the competent national authority. The Regional Adviser held discussions with the officials of the Ministry of Justice. During the early stages of the said discussions, the government officials pointed out that, although the National Assembly is legislatively omnipotent, the Cabinet – which is a more limited body than the full assembly – does exercise certain legislative functions e.g. on matters which do not call for a full parliamentary discussion. In this regard therefore, it was the view of the Government that ILO instruments can be taken care of and be given effect by the Cabinet. All in all, at the final stage of the discussions, it was agreed in principle, that in order to give full effect to article 19 of the ILO Constitution, all Conventions and Recommendations should be brought before the legislative authority.

In the light of this agreement, coupled with the fact that one of the officials responsible for reporting and fulfilling the submission obligation has recently received training on international labour standards in Geneva, the Government has very high hopes that the submissions obligation in respect of the instruments adopted at the 54th to the 72nd Sessions of the Conference will soon be complied with.

The Government wishes to point out that the information and documents called for by the Committee of Experts in respect of the instruments adopted at the 66th to the 71st Sessions have already been prepared and will be submitted to the Office immediately. Further, the information and documents called for in respect of the instruments adopted at the 47th to the 53rd Sessions and those of the 72nd Session are being compiled and will be submitted to the Office in due course.

In addition, a Government representative said that his Government, which had supplied information in writing, had taken cognisance of the Committee of Experts' observations regarding submission to the competent authorities. The Government did not deny that the instruments adopted at the 54th to the 65th Sessions of the Conference had not been submitted to the National Assembly; the same was true for instruments adopted at the 66th to the 72nd Sessions as well. The instruments in question had been submitted to the Cabinet, which the Government had viewed as the competent authority in such matters. Since the visit of the Regional Adviser for International Labour Standards in November 1987, an agreement had been reached to the effect that all ILO Conventions and Recommendations should be brought before the National Assembly. The Minister of Labour had prepared a draft submission document for review by the Ministry of Justice. The Government would communicate further developments on this matter in the near future. The Government representative also noted that the information and documents in respect of the instruments adopted at the 66th to 71st Sessions of the Conference had been prepared and would be submitted in the Government's report for the period ending on 30 June 1988. The information and documents called for in respect of the instruments adopted at the 47th to the 53rd Sessions and those of the 72nd Session were being compiled. The Government hoped to submit them to the Office in due course. Finally, the Government expressed its gratitude for the training provided by the International Labour Standards Department recently for two officials from Tanzania (one from Zanzibar and the other from the mainland).

The Workers' members noted the very interesting statement to the effect that submission would be occurring as soon as possible. They noted that governments often confused the obligation to submit instruments to the competent authorities on the one hand with the non-mandatory process of ratification on the other. Submission had to be made to the authorities who were competent to legislate. The Workers' members looked forward to seeing progressive improvement in relation to submission.

The Employers' members recalled that an obligation under the ILO's Constitution was at stake here. Now that the Government had sorted out who the proper competent authorities were, the Employers' members were hopeful that they would be able to see progress on submission.

The Committee took note of the information supplied by the Government of Tanzania and of the difficulties mentioned by it. It noted that certain positive steps had been taken with a view to the submission of the instruments adopted by the Conference to the competent authorities but that submission had not yet taken place. It decided to make a special reference to that fact in the appropriate section of its General Report, in the hope of being able to note real progress next year.

No. 28 – Monday, 20 June 1988

PRINTED IN SWITZERLAND

Provisional Record

Seventy-fifth Session, Geneva, 1988

Twenty-eighth sitting

Friday, 17 June 1988, 10.15 a.m.

Presidents: Mr. Beyreuther, Mr. Aitken

COMMUNICATION TO THE CONFERENCE

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – Before we embark on our agenda for this morning, I should like to ask the Clerk of the Conference to make some announcements.

The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE – I have to inform the Conference that the Workers' electoral college of this 75th Session of the International Labour Conference met yesterday, 16 June 1988, and in accordance with article 54, paragraph 5, of the Standing Orders of the Conference confirmed the following appointment made by the Workers' group of the Governing Body: Deputy member: Mr. Fang Jiade (China) to replace Mr. Wang Jiachung (China).

Furthermore, in accordance with the announcement made in the Daily Bulletin of yesterday, 16 June 1988, the electoral college considered and adopted internal rules for the election of the Workers' members of the Governing Body of the International Labour Conference, to be effective as and when the new amended article 7 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation comes into operation. A copy of the rules adopted by the electoral college will be duly deposited with the Director-General in accordance with the requirement of the new article 52 of the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference.

The full text of the internal rules for the election of the Workers' members of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office will be found at the end of this Provisional Record No. 29.

RATIFICATION OF CONVENTIONS BY CANADA, GUATEMALA AND THE UNITED STATES

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – I have pleasure in announcing to the Conference that the Director-General of the ILO has registered the ratification of the following international labour Conventions:

Canada

Asbestos Convention, 1986 (No. 162)

Guatemala

Hours of Work (Industry) Convention, 1919 (No. 1)

Minimum Age (Agriculture) Convention, 1921 (No. 10)

Right of Association (Agriculture) Convention, 1921 (No. 11)

Weekly Rest (Industry) Convention, 1921 (No. 14)
Abolition of Penal Sanctions (Indigenous Workers) Convention, 1955 (No. 104)
Minimum Wage Fixing Convention, 1970 (No. 131)

United States

Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144)
Merchant Shipping (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 147)

This brings the total number of ratifications of international labour Conventions to 5,379.

RATIFICATION OF THE INSTRUMENT FOR THE AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANISATION, 1986

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – I have pleasure in announcing that the Director-General of the International Labour Office has registered the ratification by Saudi Arabia of the Instrument for the Amendment of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation, 1986.

This brings the total number of ratifications and acceptances of the Instrument to 42.

TWELFTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – The first item of our agenda this morning is the twelfth report of the Selection Committee. I would ask Mr. Vargas Escobar, Government delegate, Nicaragua, Chairman of the Committee, to submit the report.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. VARGAS ESCOBAR (Government delegate, Nicaragua; Chairman of the Selection Committee) – I have the honour to submit to the Conference the twelfth report of the Selection Committee, which is to be found in Provisional Record No. 5K.

The report deals solely with changes in composition of the committees of the Conference.

I recommend to the Conference the adoption of this report.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – The twelfth report of the Selection Committee is now before the Conference. If there are no objections, I take it that the report is adopted.

(The report is adopted.)

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – The second item on our agenda is the continuation of our discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Interpretation from French: Mr. OECHSLIN (Employers' delegate, France) – Allow me, Mr. President, to congratulate you and my colleagues for the way in which you are directing our debates.

Let us once more thank the Director-General for inviting us to think about and express our feelings on the major theme which concerns me as a citizen and as spokesman of a group represented as an entity in this great Organisation.

Human rights – what an inspiring, yet irritating subject. The Director-General's Report does not attempt to gloss over the increasingly unacceptable contradiction between the unanimous lip service paid to human rights in every international gathering and the cynicism with which the same rights are daily flouted in so many countries, the spokesmen of which are the first to indulge in inflated and hypocritical rhetoric.

How many times have we not been tempted to withdraw from a debate apparently divorced from reality, manipulated for political ends, derisory episodes in conflicts between blocs of States, whose indignations are selectively expressed and carefully calculated with an eye to ephemeral alliances and converging interests?

At least, as regards the International Labour Organisation, I should not like to give in to such a defeatist and pessimistic attitude. Breaches of human rights are no fewer today than before – but perhaps they are not more frequent either. But there was a time when distances were such that people were not aware of events in distant countries, even in provinces of the same country. Today, aggressive television brings in live, barely tolerable pictures of what is happening. More and more often, we are getting to know men and women from other cultures. Perhaps we are becoming more aware that we all belong to the same species. While world-wide planet solidarity is perhaps not actively expressed, it has begun to exist and that is a first step.

If the ILO, as I believe, is able to go beyond a purely verbal eulogy of human rights, it is for two major reasons.

Firstly, it is that we have been able to define in writing specific rights which it is our constitutional mandate to defend and to illustrate, namely those which affect the world of labour. Freedom of association, for instance, is no abstract idea for us but is broken down into specific components of everyday life: the right to meet, the right to elect representatives, to receive contributions, and to travel in order to take part in international conferences.

Secondly, we have available well-defined procedures to monitor the effect given to the standards set forth in our instruments and to intervene whenever they are threatened or infringed. We cannot force a member State to honour obligations which it has thus freely accepted, but our methods are not devoid of practical effect. More than one delegate to this Conference has been or is indebted to the ILO for his freedom of expression and action, or even for his very life.

Personally, I am proud of the privilege of taking part in the work of a body set up to this end, namely the Committee on Freedom of Association. The Employers' group has been involved right from the beginning, and in many cases has undertaken to contribute to the recognition of the rights of activists working against the interests which we represent. But the defence of human rights is indivisible. In this connection, I recall with emotion the name of my predecessor and teacher, Pierre Waline, who committed us to this approach.

Speaking now as an Employers' delegate of my country, I wondered what exactly a representative of business could contribute to this debate. I think my contribution has two main aspects.

Firstly, I affirm that I consider that free enterprise is a basic human right. By this I mean the right to engage without let or hindrance in a lawful economic activity, to accept the risks and responsibilities inherent in the life of an undertaking, to enter into contractual relationship with others in order to set up a production team, and to offer the fruits of one's labour at a reasonable price.

The French Revolution, of which will be celebrated the 200th anniversary a year from now, was also a revolt against red tape and in favour of economic freedom. During the celebrated night of 4 August, the Constituent Assembly in France not only abolished the privileges of birth but also the various corporations and entities which at that time hampered the right of citizens to set up or to manage a trade or industry. In March 1791, the law known as the "Allarde Act" laid down the contractual relationship as the basis on which economic life is organised. This hostility to corporatism and red tape gave rise to a good deal of distrust with regard to occupational organisations, whose later role in a pluralist society could not be foreseen at the time.

It is true that the right to free enterprise, like all rights, is not unlimited. Incidentally, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights of citizens proclaimed in 1789 that the exercise of the natural rights of every man has no other limits than those which are necessary to secure to every other man the free exercise of the same rights.

But if free enterprise is not explicitly mentioned in the catalogue of rights guaranteed by our instruments, it is certainly implicit in the recognition of the right of association of employers and of the free choice of employment. This is part of an approach which emphasises the rights and responsibilities of every human being and transfers them to the community only in so far as the common weal requires.

Other considerations will occur to an Employer representative for whom economic efficiency is a natural concern.

Some hold that human rights are a kind of luxury enjoyed by rich, stable countries not subject to threat. They are, it is maintained, a kind of reward for reaching a certain degree of economic prosperity and development. And of course the first thing which a State at war almost always does is to suspend public freedoms which seem incompatible with the mobilisation of the nation's energies.

But I think that the contrary is true. The experience acquired in the last World War does not show that States obtained any significant advantages from enslaving their own peoples over those who tried to maintain human rights. The ancient Greeks said that men, not stone walls, protected a city. The historian Thucydides attributes to Pericles a famous discourse on the merits of Athenian democracy to convince his compatriots of their superiority over their enemies.

History, I think, shows that systems based on denial of human rights are in the long run economically ineffective. After all, slavery in ancient times and today has disappeared slowly, not because it was morally untenable, but because it was in conflict with other forms of labour organisation which are both more effective and more humane.

Seen from this angle, an organisation of labour and society based on racial discrimination is not only scandalous to our moral sense. It is also an incredible waste of human resources. Hence, the Employers, and in particular their group in this Conference, cannot but combat it with determination and support the efforts made by the ILO in this field, even if some of us do express reservations on specific points which, in their view, go beyond the terms of reference of the ILO.

The development of modern production techniques, especially the progress made in information technology, confirms this view. By eliminating repetitive, unskilled jobs by a better mastery of time and space, they offer the working man a new realm of freedom. If they are to fully mobilise the energies of men and women and the resources of their intelligence and their imagination more than their physical strength, they can be applied only by free people who are keen on what they are doing. Modern organisations, whether undertakings or political societies, are too complicated to be managed in an authoritarian or centralised way. The social disputes which are bound to arise are more lastingly settled by talks between freely chosen organisations than by repression and state-imposed constraints. In a word, respect for human rights in modern society is, in point of fact, the only means whereby these societies can be rationally governed. Dictatorship is an 'anachronism'.

That is why I would conclude with an optimism which is not just an act of faith, but a conclusion based on observation of facts.

The Athenian democracy, to which I referred a moment ago, had of course its shady side, namely, slavery. We, too, have our contradictions which will astonish our descendants, but our campaign for human rights will remain a witness to history in the making.

Mr. PRICE (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour, Canada) – On behalf of the Government of Canada, may I extend warm congratulations to the President on his election to the presidency of this 75th Session of the International Labour Conference and to offer him our best wishes for a successful Conference.

The year 1988 marks the 40th anniversary of both the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the adoption of the ILO Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention (No. 87). The latter instrument, and many more of the standards and procedures developed by the ILO, constitute an essential part of the body of human rights legislation adopted by the international community since the Second World War. It is therefore most appropriate for the Director-General to have chosen human rights as the theme of his Report to this year's session of the Conference.

I believe, however, that one must make a distinction between fundamental human rights which are of universal application, regardless of economic circumstances, and other rights, the implementation of which – being dependent upon the economic capacity of individual countries – must often be a gradual, progressive process.

Fundamental and universal human rights include freedom of association, the prohibition of discrimination in employment, equal pay for work of equal value and the abolition of forced labour. I need not stress the outstanding contribution made by the ILO in the promotion of these essential rights from the time the Organisation was founded in 1919. The development of ILO standards in these areas has had a deep influence on the subsequent adoption of human rights laws and practices in many countries.

In my own country, for example, the adoption of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention (No. 111), which Canada ratified in 1964, was a spur to the enactment of anti-discrimination legislation, both by the Federal Government and the provinces.

Similarly, when the Equal Remuneration Convention was being discussed in the 1950s, neither the Federal Government nor the ten provinces had matching legislation. Here again, the ILO Convention served as a rallying symbol and Canada was eventually able to register its ratification in 1972.

In the same year, Canada also ratified the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention (No. 87). Since then, the right of freedom of association has been embodied in the Canadian Constitution.

Over the years, the ILO's struggle to entrench universal respect for human rights has led it to address many forms of discrimination.

Yesterday, the Conference plenary devoted most of its time to discussing the report of the Committee on Apartheid. Canada's position on this is well known. We continue to play a leading role in efforts to help bring about an end to the abhorrent system of apartheid in South Africa.

Under the chairmanship of Canada's Prime Minister, the Commonwealth Heads of Government, at their October 1987 meeting in Vancouver, decided on a broad programme of action to combat apartheid. In recognition of the increasingly important role of the South African trade union movement as a vehicle for change, Canada's programme of assistance to victims and opponents of apartheid will, this year, include an additional US$500,000 for labour education assistance.

If the ILO's record in the field of fundamental human rights is outstanding, it is no less so in the field of labour rights, namely, just and favourable conditions of work and social security, which the Director-General focuses upon in his Report.

By far the largest number of Conventions and Recommendations adopted by the ILO over the years have dealt with various aspects of working conditions, such as the minimum wage, hours of work, the minimum age of employment, night work, maternity protection and occupational safety and health.

In this regard, the inclusion on the Conference agenda of an item on safety and health in construction is very timely. I would hope that the Convention that will emanate from the discussion on this issue will make an important contribution to the welfare of the millions of workers employed in the construction industry.

The rights of workers to a safe working environment is a fundamental right and one which is commanding increased attention in many countries, including my own. I would like to take this opportunity to inform the Conference that yesterday I deposited, on behalf of the Government of Canada, the instrument of ratification of the Asbestos Convention, 1986 (No. 162).

As a major producer of asbestos, Canada is in a good position to know the danger associated with asbestos. But our long-term experience with this substance has also demonstrated that it is possible to use asbestos safely, provided that it is used in strict and rigorously controlled conditions, as provided for in the ILO Convention.

I would hope that the Convention will attract many ratifications so as to ensure that the health and safety of workers engaged in asbestos-related activities throughout the world are protected.

The Director-General devotes part of his Report to the discussion of a major problem which affects and preoccupies both industrialised and developing countries. I refer to the problem of unemployment and underemployment. The discussions which are being held at present in the Conference Committees on Employment and Social Security and on Rural Employment will no doubt provide further guidance to member States on possible ways to deal with this major problem.

The question of the impact of structural adjustment on employment was discussed in considerable depth at the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment, which the ILO convened in November 1987, and in which Canada participated.

This is an area of legitimate concern for the ILO in the light of the objectives of social justice and social progress which are so fundamental to the Organisation.

We welcome the proposed ILO action, recommended by the High-Level Meeting and subsequently endorsed by the Governing Body, which aims at assisting member States to balance the need for adjustment measures and the need to protect the most disadvantaged groups in society.

It is a well documented fact that one group which is often most affected by adverse economic conditions is that of women workers, a group which represents an increasingly important segment of the world's labour force. My Government attaches high priority to the improvement of the status of women, both at the national level and in its international activities.

As the Director-General notes in his Report, the goals of equality of opportunity and equal treatment of men and women workers, which were reaffirmed in both the Nairobi Forward-Looking Strategies for the Advancement of Women and in the 1985 resolution adopted by the ILO on this question, are far from being achieved. Much remains to be done to ensure that women are able to participate fully and equitably in all facets of human activity. Canada welcomes the increased attention the ILO is giving to this area and we urge the ILO to continue and intensify its efforts in this regard.

I have just referred to the increasing participation of women in the labour force of many, if not all, ILO member States. Another demographic trend which must be kept in mind is the change in the median age of the population in many countries.

In Canada, it is expected that by the year 2000 the number of workers over the age of 55 will increase from 1.4 million to 2 million. Older workers are often confronted with special difficulties when faced with the loss of their employment. It is often not as easy for them as it is for younger workers to relocate, to learn new skills and to adapt to a different work environment.

In Canada, a new programme for older worker adjustment is currently being developed with the provinces to provide income support for older workers who are permanently displaced by major lay-offs, and who have exhausted their employment insurance benefits.

The ILO's efforts to improve the working conditions of men and women everywhere have encompassed many groups and many segments of the world's population. At various times in its history, the ILO has concerned itself with the situation of migrant workers and older workers, of child labour, of women workers and of workers in specific industries and specific occupations.

This year the International Labour Conference has started the process of revising a Convention which covers a significant segment of the population of many countries, including my own, namely the indigenous populations. While the situation of indigenous populations varies from region to region and from country to country, they all share the common and legitimate aspiration of preserving their unique heritage and identity while at the same time participating on an equal footing in the development of the larger society they are part of.

In Canada, indigenous populations have had a key role in our history and they continue to play an important role in contemporary society. In addition to all the rights enjoyed by other Canadian citizens, special recognition and affirmation of existing aboriginal and treaty rights are entrenched in the Canadian Constitution.

Over the last several years, a series of constitutional conferences on aboriginal questions were held between indigenous leaders and the Canadian federal and provincial heads of Government for the purpose of defining these constitutional rights. In addition, claim processes have been instituted to deal with indigenous land issues. The negotiated agreements that have resulted have involved more than 100,000 square kilometres of land and many millions of dollars in compensation.

General government expenditures on aboriginal programmes are also significant. In the decade ending in 1986, government expenditures for indigenous education, housing, community infrastructure, health and social services and economic development have increased by 76 per cent to a total of $2.8 billion.

I have just referred to the important and complex technical items which the Conference will discuss at its present session. But the Conference will also deal with a number of other important and difficult issues.

It is the hope of the Canadian delegation that the conclusions which will be reached on these issues will reflect the well-established ILO tradition of promoting constructive dialogue as well as respect for due process.

Mr. WILLIS (Minister for Industrial Relations, Australia) – I am pleased to participate once again in the plenary debate on the Director-General's Report.

Mr. President, you have presided over the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference in a most effective and helpful manner. I was greatly encouraged by your comments in your presidential address, which underlined the universality of this great Organisation. We particularly welcome your recognition of the principle of tripartism and we share your concern that member States should not only ratify but actually implement and adhere to ILO Conventions.

The Director-General's Report, Human rights – A common responsibility is particularly timely. Human rights are violated daily in a disturbing number of countries. In many other nations they are under threat and their preservation requires constant vigilance on the part of us all.

This year not only marks the 40th anniversary of the adoption of the both the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the ILO Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), but is also the 30th anniversary of the adoption by the International Labour Conference of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111).

These particular Conventions provide the cornerstones upon which the ILO has been built. One protects the rights of workers and employers to organise and carry out their activities. The other focuses on the rights of individuals to maximise their potential without discrimination in their chosen vocation.

It is disturbing that, after so many years, much remains to be done to secure these basic rights. As evidence of this, the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations has devoted more than half of its report to infringements of ILO Conventions concerning basic human rights.

In addition, the ILO Governing Body Committee on Freedom of Association, of which Australia is a member, is dealing with a continuing stream of complaints alleging infringements of the freedom of association Conventions. Increasing recourse is being made also to ILO constitutional complaints procedures.

In these circumstances, it is indeed appropriate to take stock of our situation. We need to ask ourselves why such rights, which have been accepted by the international community as a whole, find limited acceptance at the national level. Facing such questions squarely will provide us with a firmer basis on which to proceed in the future.

Australia regards realisation of basic human rights as a goal which must be pursued as the first priority. Consistently with this objective, Australia has ratified and implemented ILO Conventions dealing with fundamental human rights, including the abolition of forced labour, just and equitable remuneration, freedom of association and the right to organise, and the elimination of discrimination in employment and occupation.

We also ratified the relevant United Nations Conventions on the Elimination of all Forms of Racial Discrimination and All Forms of Discrimination against Women, as well as the United Nations Covenants on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights and on Civil and Political Rights.

Australia agrees with the Director-General that the right to freely chosen and productive employment is a fundamental human right which all nations should strive to implement to the fullest possible extent. It is not achievable, however, simply by ratifying Conventions or passing laws. Its implementation requires the adoption by governments of effective economic and employment policies, with maximum priority being given to employment growth.

The Australian Government has successfully pursued this policy over the last five years. Despite being very adversely affected by the collapse of commodity prices a few years ago, Australia has achieved a high rate of economic and employment growth.

Since 1983 economic growth has averaged 4 per cent per annum, and employment growth, at 3 per cent per annum, has been the fastest of any OECD country. That this has been achieved through policies which have emphasised consensus and tripartism is especially satisfying and an example to others of what such policies, which are very much in tune with ILO principles, can achieve.

Concurrently with obtaining rapid growth in employment overall, we have been concerned to implement policies to expand employment among disadvantaged groups and to remove discrimination in employment.

Thus, in recent years Australia has implemented imaginative and extensive policies to expand the employment of Australian aborigines and assist them to develop productive enterprises. Such policies will take time to produce substantial results but represent a major effort to provide productive and freely chosen work to a group of Australians who have suffered considerably from denial of that right in earlier years.

In addition, the Government intends to set up a statutory commission which will be responsible for the management of government programmes and initiatives in aboriginal affairs. This will enable aboriginal people to be responsible for deciding their own priorities and will result in their achieving economic, social and cultural development at the pace chosen by them.

Unemployment relief and training programmes have been focused on other disadvantaged groups as well, such as non-English speaking migrants, the physically and mentally handicapped, the long-term unemployed and women in general.

Recognition of the right of women to equal employment opportunity has had concrete expression through the recent introduction of programmes of affirmative action for women in the private and public sectors and legislation to prohibit discrimination in employment based on sex. It has been particularly gratifying to us that the female labour force participation rate has increased rapidly in recent years to 50 per cent and that female employment has increased in the last five years by an extraordinary 25 per cent.

We recognise, however, that for many countries, especially many developing countries, beset by low commodity prices and a crushing burden of debt, the prospects of significant economic and employment growth remain dismal. In these circumstances, fulfilment of the right to productive employment remains largely unachievable for hundreds of millions of people.

Further, as President Aquino so wisely observed when she addressed this forum earlier this week, without a fair resolution of the debt problem "the tightening grip of its austerities threatens to strangle the life out of the new democracies of the Third World." That is to say, without a resolution of the debt and development problem, human rights are unlikely to be enhanced and may well be lost.

It is imperative therefore that all possible steps be taken to increase world economic development. This includes the adoption by major industrialised countries, particularly those with large trade surpluses, of more expansionary domestic economic policies; reduction in levels of protection; preparedness to accept major structural adjustment to their economies and a willingness to provide substantial and effective aid to debt-burdened countries.

For developing countries the challenge is to utilise their resources more effectively and to take maximum advantage of whatever opportunities arise in a more favourable world economic environment. Only in this way can they hope to achieve higher living standards and secure basic human rights for their people.

In the area of equal employment opportunities and other basic human rights, Australia shares the concern of the Director-General regarding the situation of Arab workers in the occupied territories. The Australian Government has, on a number of occasions, publicly expressed its deep concern about the continued unrest in the occupied territories of the West Bank and Gaza, with the consequential loss of life, injury and destruction of property.

In particular, we have expressed concern at the deportation of Palestinians from the occupied territories to Lebanon in contravention of Article 49 of the Fourth Geneva Convention and clear disregard of Lebanese sovereignty. Another serious matter is the now well-established pattern of harassment of trade unionists in the occupied territories as well as the restrictions being placed on trade union activities.

We note the Director-General's view that the problem has taken on a different dimension and that solutions should be looked at from two directions, that is political settlement and economic development.

As regards a political settlement, the Australian Government considers that, if the conflict is to be resolved, it is essential that the rights of the Palestinians to self-determination and independence, if they so wish, be accepted, within the framework of negotiated settlement which is based on the right of all countries of the region to secure and recognised boundaries in accordance with United Nations Security Council resolution 242. The democratic, humanist principles on which Israel was built do not sit comfortably with its ongoing control of occupied territories in contravention of Security Council resolutions.

Whether a political settlement can be achieved or not, Australia agrees that measures to promote economic development in the territories are highly desirable. In this context we believe the ILO should play a direct and positive role within its mandate. Issues to be addressed would include measures to eliminate inequalities of opportunity and treatment in relation to such matters as vocational training and social security; the implications of the system of work permits for job security, and the need to ensure the exercise of legitimate trade union activity free of interference by the civil and military authorities.

The protection and promotion of human rights is, of course, both an ongoing and a dynamic process. An emerging issue of direct concern not mentioned in the Director-General's Report is the problem of workplace discrimination against people suffering from AIDS.

In the circumstances of rapidly increasing numbers of workers affected by AIDS, it is imperative that the ILO, in conjunction with other agencies, continue to develop appropriate policy responses. Although some steps have been taken, more needs to be done to encourage governments, workers and employers to formulate workplace policies to deal with this problem in a humane, informed and productive way.

In the course of this address I have focused particularly on the human rights Conventions adopted by the ILO and ratified by its member States. The concomitant of ratification is implementation, and we have seen that even with sophisticated supervisory procedures, all too often basic human rights standards are violated or ignored at the national level.

It is decidedly unfortunate that, at the very time ILO services are most needed, the activities of the Organisation are threatened by the most severe financial crisis it has experienced in its history. While the Organisation is moving to resolve the difficulties stemming from exchange rate problems, it is the political will of its Members that is required to resolve the question of payment of contributions.

Australia urges all Members of the ILO to ensure that contributions assessed by, and owed to, the Organisation are paid in full and on time. Without this commitment, it is inevitable that ILO activities to support, defend and promote human rights will necessarily be curtailed. Were this to occur, it would not only be a tragedy for this Organisation, it would be an even greater tragedy for many millions of people in the world and the cause of human liberty.

COMMUNICATION BY THE PRESIDENT TO THE CONFERENCE

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – I would like at this point to come back to a question which we have already discussed and on which we agreed in principle yesterday. I refer to the reaction of the Conference to a telex message which the President of the ANC, Mr. Oliver Tambo, sent to me as President of the Conference. You will remember that I informed the Conference about this and the Conference referred the telex message to the Conference Committee on Apartheid.

Now we have a proposal from the Committee on Apartheid indicating how Mr. Oliver Tambo's legitimate request could be met, on the basis of point 1 of the conclusions of the Committee on Apartheid in Provisional Record No. 19. It is recommended that the Conference send a telex message to President Botha referring essentially to the wording of point 1 of these conclusions. The telex would read as follows:

From Mr. Wolfgang Beyreuther, President of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference.

To Mr. P.W. Botha, President of the Republic of South Africa. I have the honour to inform you that last night the Conference resolved, inter alia, to call "upon all governments, employers' and workers' organisations and the International Labour Office to make representations to the South African authorities in order that they refrain from promulgating the proposed amendments to the Labour Relations Act and from enacting the Promotion of Orderly Internal Politics Bill and other measures that threaten the very existence of the independent Black trade union movement". In consequence I would ask you on behalf of the Conference to withdraw the said amendments and enactment.

If you agree, a copy of this telex will be sent to Mr. Tambo, President of the ANC, and to the press.

(It is so decided).

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL (cont.)

Interpretation from German; The PRESIDENT – We shall now resume the discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Mr. SMITH (Employers' delegate, United States) – I would like at the outset to thank the Director-General for his wisdom and foresight in choosing human rights as the focal point for our debate this year. Of course none of us should be surprised at this selection because, as the Director-General points out in the Preface to the Report: the concept of human rights "underlies all the activities of the Organisation." And yet, as he points out in that same Preface; "it cannot be denied that fundamental human rights, like human freedom and dignity, far from being more widely respected, are being flouted, often in dramatic circumstances."

It is ironic that 40 years after the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights by the United Nations without a single dissenting vote, no method of systematic analysis as to the extent to which member States honour their obligations to respect human rights has been established by the United Nations or any of its specialised agencies. From time to time, proposals have been made to establish a survey of the degree to which each member State respects the individual human rights called for by the Declaration, but each time such a proposal is put forward, it has been defeated. One cannot help but suspect that there are many governments that are not anxious to allow their record of human rights observance to be exposed to the public scrutiny that such a world survey would ensure. Perhaps the failure of the United Nations to undertake such a periodic study suggests an opportunity for the International Labour Organisation.

After all, the concept of human rights underlies all the activities of this Organisation, as the Director-General notes. In the ILO we have the experience and capability to undertake such a task. Our long-established supervisory machinery culminating in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards is unique, and provides a model for parallel machinery to review the manner in which human rights are being honoured in the member States of the International Labour Organisation. The unique tripartite structure of our Organisation might prove useful in overcoming the reluctance of some governments to expose their human rights record to world scrutiny.

Nothing but good can come to our Organisation from a detailed examination of those circumstances where fundamental rights are being flouted – an examination that not only calls attention to violations in specific member States but attempts to seek the reasons why the governments of such States are willing to allow the flouting of fundamental human rights. It is time that we move from pious statements of support and take action aimed at truly protecting the rights of individuals. If we, in this International Labour Organisation, are not prepared to create a mechanism to defend human rights, then who will? Let us applaud those who respect human rights, and be prepared to expose and condemn those who do not!

Why is it that so many governments are afraid to have their human rights record examined and publicly exposed? Could it be article 13, paragraph 2, of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, a simple statement that reads "Everyone has the right to leave any country, including his own, and to return to his country", – could it be that this article would pose a real problem to nations that build immense walls of concrete, steel and barbed wire to prevent their citizens from exercising this right to leave?

Could it be that there are a number of States that are in clear violation of article 17 which states "everyone has the right to own property alone as well as in association with others" and "no one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his property"? Could it be that States that proudly assert that the State shall own all the means of production, and deny the right to own private property, realise that such policies are a clear violation of a universally accepted declaration of human rights which in many instances these very same States have endorsed.

Could it be that the practices of the Gulag Archipelago, so vividly described by Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn, do not conform to article 9 of the Declaration which states: "no one shall be subjected to arbitrary arrest, detention, or exile"?

Or are some States unwilling to honour article 23, paragraph 4, which states: "Everyone has the right to form and to join trade unions for the protection of his interests"? I would like to emphasise the words "right to form trade unions". Surely the dismantling of the trade union, Solidarity, whose primary organiser, Lech Walesa, addressed this Conference only a few short years ago, as the representative of the workers of his country; and the recent suppression by the authorities of attempts to reorganise Solidarity demonstrates that some member States would be uncomfortable about having their human rights record publicised because of article 23, paragraph 4.

Or is it that some States fear they might be in violation of article 5 which calls out: "No one shall be subjected to torture or to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment"? Certainly Armando Valladares in his recently published book

Beyond all hope documents that the use of torture and cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment has not been abandoned in his homeland.

Clearly, there are many possible reasons why a large number of governments desperately struggle to prevent any analysis taking place that would throw light on the manner in which they honour (or dishonour) the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

Could it be that there are a number of States which know full well that they cannot fulfil article 7, which reads: "All are equal before the law and are entitled without any discrimination to equal protection of the law"? Surely, those States that routinely send to psychiatric hospitals those who are in major political disagreement with the government would be unwilling to face examination on the manner in which they fulfil article 7, and yesterday's plenary sitting demonstrated that the non-member State that enforces the abhorrent practice of apartheid cannot stand scrutiny for the manner in which it honours the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

Fortunately, such governments are in a minority. They still can be brought to account before the most important tribunal in the world: the court of public opinion. But to do so requires a determination to overcome the obstacles that have prevented a thorough analysis of each State's human rights record. Perhaps the ILO with its structure which accords delegates representing both workers and employers an equal voice with that of governments can be the instrument to accomplish what the United Nations has been unable or unwilling to do.

In his address to this Conference a week ago, His Excellency Felipe Gonzalez, Prime Minister of Spain, while discussing the problems of the United Nations and its specialised agencies referred to "a crisis of credibility". Certainly the manner in which a number of member States flout many important human rights recognised and agreed to in the Universal Declaration is an important contributor to the crisis of credibility called to our attention by the Prime Minister. Would it not be a significant contribution towards overcoming the credibility crisis and thereby protecting the concepts of international co-operation through the United Nations system, if our Organisation were to establish supervisory machinery to measure and record the degree of compliance of each member State with the principles clearly endorsed by all in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights?

The subject of human rights is important beyond ensuring that individuals are protected from arbitrary actions by governments or other individuals. Economic growth and development so important to our Organisation depend to a large measure on the observance of a respect for human rights. It is no coincidence that the States that provide their citizens with the most favourable standard of living are those States with the longest record of respect for human rights. Pope John Paul II in his encyclical letter, Sollicitudo rei socialis states: "It should be noted that in today's world, among other rights, the right of economic initiative is often suppressed. Yet it is a right which is important not only for the individual but also for the common good. Experience shows us that the denial of this right, or its limitation in the name of an alleged 'equality' of everyone in society, diminishes, or in practice absolutely destroys the spirit of initiative, that is to say the creative subjectivity of the citizen. As a consequence, there arises, not so much a true equality as a 'levelling down'. In the place of creative initiative there appears passivity, dependence and submission to the bureaucratic apparatus which, as the only 'ordering' and 'decision-making body' – if not also the 'owner' – of the entire totality of goods and the means of production, puts everyone in a position of almost absolute dependence. This provokes a sense of frustration or desperation and predisposes people to opt out of national life, impelling many to emigrate and also favouring a form of 'psychological' emigration."

That "bureaucratic apparatus" referred to by His Holiness not only includes the staggering bureaucracy required by central planning, but also includes the bureaucracy that many developing countries have put in place in a misguided attempt to protect the "out-dated mercantilistic system" that is the pattern in so many of these States; – a system that is described in great detail by the Peruvian economist, Hernando de Soto in his book, The other path.

Pope John Paul went on to point out that in today's world there are many forms of poverty. He defines some of these forms as follows: "the denial or the limitation of human rights – as for example the right to religious freedom, the right to share in the building of society, the freedom to organise and form unions, or to take the initiatives in economic matters – do these not impoverish the human person as much as, if not more than, the deprivation of material goods?"

There are many governments which attempt to confuse us by emphasising their record of meeting human needs even though this is often accomplished at the expense of human rights. It is the view of the United States Employer delegation that strict observance of all of the human rights is the best way to ensure that the equally important (but distinctly different) effort to fulfil human needs will be met. Those who are willing to try to achieve the fulfilment of human needs at the expense of human rights run the risk of eventually losing both. In fact it is crystal clear that those States that are the worst offenders in the human rights field prove to be the same States that have the most difficulty in fulfilling the human needs of their citizens.

Let me close my remarks by expressing my personal pleasure that you have been chosen to preside over this debate on the subject: Human rights – A common responsibility. I hope this thorough exposure to world opinion on this vital subject will cause you to do two things: first to use your leadership role both in your own country and in this International Labour Conference to cause this Organisation to take more effective action to defend human rights; and second, to return to your capital at the end of our Conference with a strong recommendation to your Government that it tear down that monument of steel, concrete and barbed wire that is a constant reminder of the denial of human rights, the Berlin Wall. I can think of no other action that would give such a strong and dramatic signal to the rest of the world that your Government is prepared to back up its verbal commitments to human rights with appropriate action.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – Thank you, Mr. Smith. May I just urge you to consider very carefully the points you have raised this morning as they relate to your own country.

Mr. MORTON (Workers' delegate, United Kingdom) – We welcome the Report of the Director-General to this session, which is a sober assessment of the issues which confront us in 1988, the anniversary year of the United Nations Declaration of Human Rights. It reminds us of the achievements and difficulties of the United Nations system. And it reminds us of the continuing need to uphold international standards in the field of trade union rights.

We particularly welcome the way in which it draws attention to the interdependence of human rights: that close relationship between freedom from oppression and freedom to choose. It outlines the full implication of the right of freedom of association, the right, that is, to balance economic power with collective action by the workers. We are reminded that vigorous, balanced and fair societies need independent trade unions which respond to the interests of their members, indeed that no society can truly be called free in which such trade unions do not exist, or are impeded. This Report builds on the work of the ILO to proclaim and promote the exercise of basic trade union rights. It deals with the rights of their members and the relations between trade unions, the State and political parties.

We entirely agree with the points about the economic efficiency and flexibility of collective bargaining and about the essential need in democratic societies for the right to strike to be upheld. These principles need restating. They are under attack in my own country where it seems that the right to strike is acceptable in principle but only if it is never exercised.

We have taken up a number of issues separately in the ILO, and they will come once again before this Conference.

In industrial countries, it is not our experience that governments are better suited than trade unions to determine fundamental democracy, particularly when those governments were wedded to nineteenth-century economic philosophies. Trade unions are responsive and responsible institutions; they have effective democratic structures. That is not true of many other institutions. Intervention by governments to regulate trade union functions is rarely disinterested.

I listened with interest to my own Government's claim to have "improved the industrial relations climate by introducing legislation to redress the balance of bargaining power between employers and trade unions and to give trade union members a greater say in their union affairs". This is the view of the United Kingdom Government. A more accurate way of putting it is, in our view, to say that that Government has sought by legislation to reduce the rights of British workers to freedom of association and collective bargaining and to reduce those rights to a level that has been specifically criticised within this Organisation in two cases and is the subject of a further complaint in general. As to the rights of members within their trade unions, the United Kingdom Government has legislated to override the democratic constitutions of trade unions, whatever the wishes of the members.

So you see, there are differences of perspective in the matter of human rights. In considering the other basic rights, the Report underlines the need for equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and other spheres of work and outlines ILO activities designed to end all forms of discrimination. In this respect, we address ourselves once again to the denial in southern Africa of basic rights to the majority of the population. In a report on human rights, it is worth pointing out that the independent trade union organisations in South Africa and Namibia, operating in the most wicked system of discrimination in the world, are nevertheless sufficiently well based and supported by working people to offer the best hope for a reasonably peaceful transition to a just and democratic system of government and society, and to give even now Black people some say in the decisions which affect them. I salute COSATU and NACTU and their members on the outstanding success of their peaceful protest last week. Trade unionists everywhere support their just cause. As this session has declared, overwhelmingly, only yesterday, there is also a clear need for action from governments and employers.

We have also before us a report on the situation of working people in the occupied territories. The Trades Union Congress entirely supports the Director-General's conclusion that there is a most urgent need for an initiative to involve the authentic representatives of the people concerned within an international framework in order to find a just, peaceful and lasting solution which would accord to all the people concerned their basic rights.

In the debate about discrimination on grounds of sex we are sceptical of attempts to create equality by removing the few protections which women have gained. Too often in reality men and women are segregated in the occupational caste system described by the Director-General in his very sharp analysis of the informal sector. On our side we will continue to argue the need for new instruments and new efforts to counter discrimination wherever it occurs.

In the British trade union movement we would also emphasise the commitments entered into by governments to the right to full, productive and freely chosen employment. We too, see Convention No. 122 as a key Convention. As does the Director-General, we resist the counsels of despair. We repudiate those who suggest that the achievement of full employment is an impossible dream. The real tragedy is that the remedies that are available have not been properly tried. We stress the need to intensify national and international efforts to bring about full employment as an essential ingredient in the struggle for democracy, human rights and peace.

I was privileged to attend the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment held under the aegis of the ILO. That meeting affirmed the importance of consultation and interdependence. The Director-General returns to these themes in his Report. He makes the essential point that the social objectives of governments and their duties to provide citizens with jobs cannot be abandoned in lean years. It is true that we in the industrialised countries must accept our responsibility in this field. At the national level we – that is, governments, trade unions and employers – must work together to promote dynamic economic and employment growth and that really means involvement and willingness to involve, on the part of governments, the trade union movement. Internationally that growth must be harnessed to promote growth in developing countries. Those concepts of consultation and interdependence lie at the heart of any global strategy for employment and social justice.

I want to refer also to the role of minimum labour standards in international relations. The trade union representatives in the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment wanted its conclusions to refer to the positive effects on international trade of governments' observing basic labour standards. On the trade union side we have argued that respect for trade union and other basic human rights should be guaranteed under trade agreements. It is, after all, difficult to persuade working people in industrialised countries to accept that goods produced under conditions of exploitation should be freely imported.

The Director-General in his Report responds to that issue in a measured way. He sees the need to preserve the existing ILO mechanism and to work from that base. We think that more should be done to encourage respect for basic rights in those countries where they are consistently and flagrantly violated.

The same should go, we believe, for technical co-operation activities. The general discussion of ILO field work at the session last year enabled us to focus on the thriving activities of the Organisation designed to enable States to develop practical means of implementing ILO standards. That must remain the basic goal, and again where States consistently violate rights it must be a responsibility of this Organisation to consider whether to continue to provide technical assistance.

Reading the Report, one is struck by the need – which is now greater than ever – for concerted action by the international community to regulate disputes and promote peace and security of people in the world. The essential rights in employment guaranteed in ILO and United Nations instruments are one means of action. They are designed to protect working people from arbitrary exercise of power by employers or governments and to enable them through legitimate means to take greater control of their destinies.

The Report makes clear the coherence of the structures and systems which have been established. And yet here we are faced every year at this Conference and elsewhere with evidence that governments fail to ensure respect for trade union and other human freedoms. Worse, they actively conspire to repress them. We hear of appalling human rights violations in countries where no democratic freedoms exist and where to be a trade unionist is to endanger one's life. We hear also of countries where poverty can nevertheless not excuse the flagrant abuse of basic freedoms. Perhaps most disturbing, there are also long-established industrialised countries whose governments have decided unilaterally to by-pass the collective wisdom of the international system. Those governments out of outdated individualist ideology are eroding freedoms hard won by past generations. They insolently defy the judgements of the ILO's supervisory authorities. They devalue the essential currency of the ILO. They undermine the international rule of law to which in other places they so eloquently commit their undying support. In that way they diminish the essential bastion for fair dealing and peace between nations.

We have called for governments to rededicate themselves to the United Nations Charter. This year a new rededication to uphold the human rights standards of the ILO is needed also. It is desirable that governments should ratify the instruments referred to by the Director-General. It is more important that they should apply them.

As the title of the Report makes clear, human rights are a common responsibility. Trade unions are internationally prepared to play their part to the full in ensuring respect for these rights. We call on all participants in this session to do likewise.

Miss HANCHAREONSUK (Employers' adviser, Thailand) – On behalf of the Employers' Confederation of Thailand, I wish to take this opportunity to express my sincere congratulations to Mr. Beyreuther on his election to the presidency of this Conference. I also congratulate the other Officers of this session. I, as well as other participants, are confident that their abilities and experience will ensure that the Conference is a success and fully achieves the objective of this 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. The Report of the Director-General on Human rights – A common responsibility is excellent. I should like to comment on three particular topics included on the agenda, health and safety, social security, and equal employment. May I take this opportunity to summarise the development and status in Thailand of these three topics.

First, health and safety. According to Thai labour laws, employers are required to provide appropriate health, sanitation and safety measures for their employees. A new Act specifically covering safety practices relating to construction work has recently been enacted. The Labour Department manages and administers the Workmen Compensation Fund, which provides protection to employees receiving on-the-job injury. The total accumulated in the Workmen Compensation Fund in 1987 is US$65 million, increased from US$56 million in 1986. The number of on-the-job injury cases has dropped sharply due to the employers' promotional activities on safety measures. The Employers' Confederation of Thailand continually organises seminars and conferences on Employees' Health and Safety. Safety measures have been effectively carried out. Safety signs are normally posted around workplaces. In 1986 and 1987, the Employers' Confederation of Thailand and the Labour Department jointly organised "National Safety Week", holding a series of seminars and workshops on safety matters, including the 1986 contest "Employer with the Best Safety Practice of the Year". These measures have effectively stimulated the interest of both employers and employees in developing and implementing better work safety measures.

Second, social security. Employers in Thailand agree and accept that the Social Security Law should be enacted with provisions that can be practically implemented. We have confirmed our basic support for tripartism. This principle was agreed by members of the Employers' Confederation of Thailand during its general meeting, held in March 1988. A reasonable rate of equal contributions should be carefully considered in order to make it least disruptive to all three parties, especially small-scale employers and employees on low paid jobs. The Royal Thai Government has attached much importance and made a sincere effort in trying to propose a social security law which will provide benefits to a majority of the people concerned. It is hoped that Thailand will have a social security law in the near future.

Third, equal employment. Fortunately, Thailand is one of the few countries having no recorded problems in this area. Employment in Thailand usually emphasises the qualifications of employees, the level of education, skills and experiences rather than race, sex or age as found in many countries. There are no minority groups in terms of race or sex in Thailand. Other nationals with permanent residence mix well with Thai society. Female employees are found in all levels of occupations, from unskilled to managerial levels. Many of the top executive positions in Thailand are occupied by women.

Let me go on to speak about the overall economic and employment picture of Thailand, which may be of interest. The investment climate in Thailand is now highly favourable for foreign investors. The drop in the value of the Thai currency against foreign currencies such as the Japanese yen, the Swiss franc and the German Deutschmark has facilitated foreign investment in Thailand. The agro-industry, the petro-chemical industry, textiles and assembly manufacturing have high potential for investment. The Royal Thai Government welcomes long-term foreign private investment and provides substantial promotional assistance, particularly to projects which are labour-intensive, export-oriented, and agro-based. The Thai promotional campaign to attract investment has received a positive response from Japan, America, the United Kingdom, Switzerland, Taiwan, Hong Kong and many others. The number of projects approved by the Board of Investment for promotional privileges in 1987 was greatly increased. Capital investment from approved applications was US$1.3 billion in 1986, while in 1987 it increased to $2 billion and over 100,000 workers were employed.

The Royal Thai Government trade and commercial policies are based on a liberal, export-oriented, free market philosophy. The major economic goals are geared to developing Thailand as a highly industrialised country and increasing its exports. As such, the Royal Thai Government has adopted more workable trade and commercial policies and procedures which have greatly assisted local and foreign investors. Important benefits available to the foreign investor in Thailand are the natural resources, low interest rates, the skilled workers available, good labour relations, the low-cost of worker supply and sophisticated communication systems. Moreover, Thailand's rising energy sector, domestic hydrocarbon production which has attracted substantial foreign investment, now provides approximately 60 per cent of the total energy requirements of the country. Thai workers are available at all levels, from unskilled, skilled, technical, professional up to supervisory and management levels. Thailand is an education-oriented country. A large number of Thai people are university/college graduates, with many of them furthering their study overseas. The supply of Thai workers should be sufficient to fulfil the needs for supporting foreign investment for the next 5 to 10 years.

May I take this opportunity to invite foreign investors, particularly those who represent employers' organisations attending this convention, to visit Thailand to examine the possibility for a long-term investment. I am confident that there are many Thai employers who are technically and financially qualified for joint ventures with foreign investors. If we can be of any assistance, please do not hesitate to contact the Employers' Confederation of Thailand so that we may not only share trade relations but also extend personal relations through employing and working with Thai people. This will enable us to improve the overall employment situation of Thais, while your investment in Thailand will contribute to growth in the economy of your own country.

(Mr. Aitken takes the Chair.)

Mr. SALIMIAN (Workers' delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran) – In the Name of Allah, the Merciful, the Compassionate! "O ye who believe! Be steadfast witness for Allah in equity" [Koran].

Proud of representing the workers of the Islamic Republic of Iran, I wish to express my views as well as the views of my colleagues and the workers' organisation of my country, concerning the Report of the Director-General to this 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. I hope that this Conference will, for its part, be able to resolve social problems, remove prevailing obstructions, and overcome the defiance of human rights and dignity.

The main theme of the Director-General's Report is based on a foundation, the defiance of which has jeopardised human relations, caused the further spread of corruption and injustice, and become the underlying factor for all the inhumane acts committed by arrogant rulers.

Human rights, in its broad sense, is not a novel subject. Its history goes back to the time when those pretending to be civilised, brought human societies under their domination to perpetuate their illegitimate rule.

One of the main objectives of the Divine Prophets who were sent for the guidance of man was to acquaint people with their genuine rights and to define just social relations. Unfortunately, with the passage of time, human social relations were distracted by poisonous interpretations and justifications of the power-seekers until the divine path was replaced by the path of falsehood in a gradual procession, so that, today, the prevailing whirlpool of corruption, fooling the masses, colonisation, exploitation, and the expansion of dominated territories has become a main feature of the unjust rulers.

The impudence and incursion of the force-oriented have gone so far that they even consider their own views as the criterion for the observance or non-observance of human rights as they wish, as they attempt to impose their own views in various international forums. This has been caused mainly by lack of sufficient attention on the part of the world organisations.

On the 40th anniversary of the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and despite the existence of the responsible world organisations, it seems that no decisive measures have been taken towards the abolition of oppression against the natural rights of human beings, nor have the natural expectations of mankind from those organisations been realised.

While emphasising the necessity of the existence and continuation of the functions of the international organisations, it should be noted that the main cause for the failures of those instruments and conclusions which have not been inspired by the ruling powers, let alone the rest, has been the fact that those provisions have been intensely overwhelmed by economic justifications in the majority of the bodies, a fact that has basically rendered all the positive efforts null and void.

Different forms of visible and invisible oppression exercised against the fate of the held-back nations – or, as termed by the international gatherings, the developing countries – followed by the formal international positions taken, and thus by the nullification of the resolutions due to the monopolisation of politico-economic potentials by the oppressors who force the world organisations to provide the same sort of justifications, for the lack of observance of the adopted provisions, have all led to a situation where the general public doubts indeed the credit and relevance of those organisations.

What does the plunder of the resources and assets of the oppressed nations mean though a small part of their usurped wealth might be returned to them in the form of the so-called humanitarian assistance – if not an obvious offence against human rights, since such attempts are intended to prepare grounds for the continuation of anti-humanistic impositions.

Nevertheless, the awakened peoples of the world will not be deceived by those investigations which have a long history in various places in the world.

In our country, before the Islamic Revolution, the Iranian people deeply experienced those types of obstruction over long years – our story, the story of the Iranian workers – begins long ago and is mingled with sufferings and struggles. It is the story of the women and men who are still struggling, with faith and devotion, for the preservation of their human dignity and the prosperity they deserve. We have suffered too much throughout the oppressive rule of kings, while the plunderers through transnational enterprises accumulated legendary treasures out of our hard labour.

The owners of capital, backed by the leadership and support of the international trusts and cartels, seized our most fundamental holdings and suffocated the cries of our burning souls by the deafening noise of their stock markets and the roaring of their tankers which carried away our oil, and their trains that took away the gold, silver, nickel, lead and copper of our mines.

It might sound surprisingly hard to believe that, during the former regime, the Iranian workers had not even heard of the title of the International Labour Organisation, while those who attended its sittings, under false credentials, as the workers' representatives, were neither working people themselves, nor had any understanding of workers' real problems.

Under those circumstances, either nothing was mentioned of the violations of human rights in the country, or allegations were easily dismissed without further detailed investigation.

The Director-General states in his Report that, in the Third World, only the countries of South-East Asia can manage to exist somehow through the economic depression, while over 70 million are unemployed, around 500 million are underemployed and approximately 900 million live in absolute poverty. This is just a trifle in all the pressure which is being exerted upon the oppressed nations and is nothing but the result of the modern material as well as spiritual exploitation of those nations.

The international organisations, if truly demanding the full realisation of the Human Rights Declaration, should mobilise all their possibilities in an all-out combat against the causes of corruption. If the international instruments are expected to be fully realised, it is the force-oriented and the world power-seekers who must be held responsible for the crimes committed by their own puppets, because they are the ones who neglect human rights only because they possess the wealth and material prosperity which are in fact the fruits of the same usurped resources of the so-called Third World.

The Director-General's Report places emphasis on the basic international labour standards to be fully applied, as they are necessary for the realisation of human rights. This is true, but the comprehensive application of those instruments should also be taken note of.

The Palestinian workers have long been oppressed in their homeland, in all forms, by the foreigners and the occupiers. They have been indoctrinated, tortured, massacred, discriminated against and put under forced labour, while the international organisations have not been able to give them any assistance mainly because of the existence of the right of veto for the big Powers.

The southern borders of Lebanon that are being assaulted in an obvious aggression, and the people whose blood is being spilt, their villages, farms and undertakings that are being destroyed, mean nothing but the defiance of their right to life and to freedom; namely the most essential of human rights; if not, what else can they mean?

The Afghan workers suffer from a double oppression, imposed against them both by the occupiers and by a puppet ruler. They have never been taken into account in the lengthy negotiations held.

Innumerable other examples could easily be given. The main causes and the principal motives behind all of these are rooted in the arrogant acts committed by those who have infiltrated the international organisations under the guise of defence for human rights, with the intention of being their unseen manipulators. It is a pity, indeed, that they have, in many instances, succeeded in achieving their illegitimate objectives. Hiding behind the false justifications provided by the same arrogant aggressors, the violators of human rights have found other ways to escape any relevant allegations by trying to gain the support of some big Powers, in one way or another.

The Director-General in his last year's Report made reference to the same acts which have alarmingly given rise to the increased lack of popular confidence in the international organisations. Such lack of confidence can definitely not be irrelevant to violations of human rights and the ineffectiveness of those organisations. How can the Black majority in South Africa remain confident in such organisations while all the international fundamental instruments are being continuously nullified by a handful of industrialised States which at the same time claim to be the most serious defenders of human rights?

It is unfortunate that the States that exercise the most serious and the most extensive discrimination in employment, who have institutionalised such criteria as colour or sex in their own countries, in addition to their continued cultural, political and economic aggressions against other nations, and violate human rights most openly, deliver colourful speeches on the application of international labour standards too. It is even more unfortunate that, because of their economic potential or their political influence, they are never questioned.

We strongly believe that respect for human rights should not remain a dead letter; on the contrary it should be widely exercised in practice, free from baseless political inclinations.

The big Powers, following the direction of the transnational enterprises, shed crocodile tears for the violations of human rights on the one hand, and devour the resources of the dominated countries on the other, only to add to their inflated treasures accumulated in line with the ever-growing reduction of the wealth of the held-back nations.

I have the honour to declare that the achievements of the Islamic Republic of Iran are indeed outstanding examples that world history should be proud of. Great measures have been taken following the victory of the Islamic Revolution in Iran, despite all the difficulties resulting from the imposed war, the natural difficulties following the Revolution, the sanctions imposed by the arrogant powers, and the military attacks by the Great Satan against our economic resources.

The new Labour Law, in all the processes of which the views of the Muslim working community has been included, in addition to the provisions of the Islamic Constitution, has already met the approval of the Consultative Assembly and is now undergoing its final processes. It is one of the most progressive labour laws in the world.

The Unemployment Insurance Act, which is now being enforced, is an outstanding example in comparison with similar provisions elsewhere.

Our recognised national workers' organisation nominated its own candidates who were mostly elected at the recent parliamentary elections. This is also indicative of the fact that the workers do participate fully in all stages of social life.

I also declare here that creative innovations of the Iranian workers have developed to an untold extent so that under any circumstances they have been able to keep the productive and industrial undertakings fully dynamic and progressive. They have overcome all the instigations of the big powers and their regional agents, and are taking immeasurable steps forward towards the full economic independence of our country.

Co-operation, which is among the direct instructions in the glorious Koran, has been exercised to a great extent in practical terms in the Islamic Republic of Iran. The Supreme Labour Council in which the workers' representatives, elected at the national labour congress held by the workers' organisation, participate has adopted, in addition to wages and overtime payment regulations, special provisions according to which the workers and their families are freely provided with commodities for their basic needs. All these measures have been taken for the promotion of social justice and, in addition to numerous other fundamental measures, have been realised at a time when around eight years have elapsed since the beginning of the all-out war imposed by the Iraqi regime against the Islamic Revolution, our people and our country. The aggressor has used and still uses all the facilities and destructive weapons, including the long-range missiles and chemical weapons, provided to it by the arrogant powers, against our cities, villages, natural resources, factories and productive undertakings. In spite of that, our brave nation, and particularly our devoted workers, have never ceased their efforts towards further production and the preservation of the fruits of the Islamic Revolution, nor have they ever ceased, or shall ever cease, to perpetuate their holy defence until the cause of aggression has been uprooted.

We witness all these great achievements in various fields at a time when the military machine of the Great Satan has openly attacked our economic facilities and civilian areas – a fact which is no secret for the liberal-minded people of the world. All the attempts made at terminating the war, which in fact aim at the imposition of peace, are in reality intended to take the part of the aggressor regime in the form of resolutions.

We strongly believe that the issue must be resolved radically and that tension will not cease in the region unless the aggressor is truly punished.

Peace be upon us and the true followers of Allah.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. DELPINO (Workers' delegate, Venezuela) – I should like to start by extending to you my sincerest congratulations upon your appointment to preside over the work of this 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. I am convinced that your work will be extremely effective.

The main part of the Report of the Director-General submitted for consideration and study to this assembly is on human rights. It may be supposed that the choice of this subject is in keeping with the significant fact that we are commemorating the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights this year, as well as – and this is of vital importance to workers – the 40th anniversary of the adoption by the ILO of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention (No. 87).

By focusing on such important events, it might be thought that the ILO is profiting from these anniversaries which have a social and political impact to concern itself with human rights. Fortunately, none of the speakers who have preceded me have made any reference to this effect because it would have been unjust. The fact that we are celebrating the 40th anniversary of these events has only been one of the many aspects of the discussion on human rights.

Despite the fact that "human rights" are not mentioned in the ILO Constitution, they are closely bound up with and reflected in the ILO's aims and objectives. They are almost its leitmotiv; because the failure to respect human rights does not only imply the reduction of citizens' rights in the political sphere but has repercussions on several aspects of social life. It results in: discrimination in all its forms; the difficulty for a worker to find remunerative work in an environment which does not undermine his dignity; the impossibility for a worker to find decent housing to provide shelter for his family; and, last but not least, obstacles which prevent the worker from developing his inherent ability for creative work and employment on an equal footing. The ILO has dealt with these matters with such dedication and care over the past 69 years that it is an expert on them.

The Report of this year, which has been submitted to us and with which we are all familiar is not a list of things that have been done and things that remain to be done, a collection of vague wishes and uncertain possibilities. On the contrary, it is an objective and thorough document based on facts. For this reason, I should like, on behalf of the Venezuelan workers, to express my appreciation to the Director-General for the invaluable support he has given to our peoples, which will further strengthen them in their permanent struggle for the well-being and happiness of their citizens.

We have almost all agreed that the greatest problem that our countries face today is unemployment. All governments without exception have undertaken measures to combat unemployment and, in some places, with more success than in others. In Venezuela, the efforts of the Government have been astronomical in order to keep unemployment at tolerable levels. Perhaps we are not registering with due enthusiasm the success obtained by the Venezuelan Government in its struggle against unemployment. But, probably, our demands are unjust or exaggerated. In any case, a large part of the Venezuelan labour force is unemployed or employed in precarious jobs, which do not provide the workers with enough to live on. This problem is accompanied by another one: the high cost of living. This and unemployment make an insidious pair. The high cost of living reduces the wages of those that have a job; and this situation exists in countries in which there is no social protection or unemployment coverage whatsoever. In countries where this coverage exists, the situation of the unemployed worker is more tolerable.

Unemployment and the high cost of living in our countries make hunger and poverty more acute and open the door to unrest. We are aware that it is not only up to governments to look for solutions to these severe problems; it is well known that they will not be solved by governmental decrees. The creation of sufficient and well-remunerated jobs will not be achieved because employers make their wishes known, since they are also affected by the situation. Unemployment and inflation – this pair which I have already called insidious – afflict implacably the least advantaged sectors of the population and will not be overcome through unrest in the streets, strikes of all kinds or marches called by the workers. There is only one way we can solve this problem: there must be solidarity on the part of all sectors of the society and, in particular, factors of production. We must join together in full knowledge of the facts to undertake, with determination and without fearing to make sacrifices, the task of eliminating problems that will cause irreversible harm not only to specific social strata but also to political and social stability, and even to the sovereignty of many of our countries. This calls for understanding and intelligence.

The fact of believing in and being united in support of this idea of concerting our efforts and of sharing responsibilities and sacrifices to find a way out of the lamentable situation in which we find ourselves must not prevent us from recalling the circumstances which created and exacerbated it.

One of the reasons – but, in our opinion, the most important – for the dangerous levels reached by unemployment and inflation is the external public debt, whose repayment has been demanded in an almost compulsive fashion by the creditor banks. For some governments, the debt has become a sort of syndrome, and they have proposed to repay it despite the suffering this entails for their peoples. As far as my country is concerned, we trade unionists have not advocated extreme positions on this particular matter. On the contrary, our actions have been guided by the results of the exhaustive examination of the problem made by organisations such as the ILO itself and the ICFTU – the ICFTU, at its conferences held in 1985 and 1986 at Cuernavaca and Buenos Aires, and the ILO, in its High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment last November, which took place in this very city of Geneva. It could not be otherwise. Social organisations have to act with responsibility and nations, even more so, have to honour their commitments. But these obligations cannot be met at any cost, still less if what is at stake is the well-being of the community.

One of the Appendices to the Report of the Director-General is devoted entirely to the situation in the Middle East, that is to the Arab-Israeli conflict. It is not possible to be indifferent to this question, which is so closely bound up with peace in that region.

This Organisation is in a position to contribute a great deal to bringing this conflict to an end. I believe that it is the only organisation with the persuasive ability to clear away the obstacles from its path to a peaceful, just and lasting solution. It must therefore be in the forefront of the efforts that have to be set in motion in order to establish a platform to serve as a basis for serious and urgent negotiations.

The first thing to be done, of course, is to reassure people and to win them away from blind intransigence. It will then be possible to put an end to the anguishing situation in which they are living today, with the tragic loss of brave lives and the enormous economic and social costs and tensions it entails.

May I express the fervent wish that Arabs and Israelis will conclude an agreement enabling them to live in peace and brotherhood, an agreement in which the legitimate rights of both peoples are fully established.

Interpretation from French: Mr. ARETS (Employers' delegate, Belgium) – I wonder really whether it is possible for me, as one of the last speakers on the Report of the Director-General on human rights, not to repeat anything that has been said before.

I should like to think that it is not entirely impossible.

In taking up some extracts from the Report, I should like to stress how far the situation in Belgium is an excellent illustration of what Mr. Blanchard has been saying.

The Director-General stresses the tripartite message of the ILO and suggests that the Organisation serve as an arena for debate and that developing theory and practice should be tested.

This is what I should like to do in taking up four examples that are specific to the socio-economic situation in Belgium.

Firstly, in November 1986 a two-year national inter-occupational agreement was signed which led to an increase in the minimum monthly wage, the improvement of conditions of work and the general introduction of the 38-hour week. This agreement, which revived a tradition that had lapsed for over ten years because of the crisis, demonstrated the determination of the social partners to allow the workers to benefit from the improved competitiveness which is due to the dynamism of industry and also to sounder governmental fiscal and economic policies.

Secondly, the inter-occupational agreement provided that after a year of implementation, an additional collective agreement would be signed under which all workers without exception would be covered by the provisions of the agreement. Following discussions at the National Labour Council, the joint inter-occupational body, which has 12 employers' representatives and 12 workers' representatives, a collective agreement was concluded on 2 May 1988 – very recently – to raise the minimum average monthly wage to approximately 34,000 Belgian francs. This minimum monthly wage varies according to retail price fluctuations. If the employers have been able to agree on these provisions, it is of course with the intention of maintaining good relations between the social partners.

But it is worth mentioning that strikes have been on the decrease in recent years.

Two comparisons that might be made in connection with averages over the five-year period 1970-1974 and the 1985 figures (the most recent statistics available) are particularly significant. They relate to the number of disputes recorded and the number of working days lost as a result of strikes.

In the period 1970-1974, the mean annual figure was 186 disputes and 900,000 working days lost. In 1985 there were 65 disputes, a decrease of 60 per cent, and 127,000 working days lost, a drop of 80 per cent.

These figures proved that the workers have achieved a certain maturity and it was natural for the employers to bear this in mind in working out a new inter-occupational collective agreement.

Thirdly, the Government's co-operation in promoting the collective agreement policy between the social partners is quite satisfactory. This has not always been the case, but in recent years this co-operation has come more to the fore.

There are two examples worth pointing out.

In matters of employment, from 1985-87 the number of jobs in the private sector increased by about 70,000 units, and this is explained by the regained competitiveness of the enterprises; and the number of unemployed has dropped by 50,000, with particular affect on young people under 25 years of age. This is due both to increased employment and to the measures that the Government has taken to improve the situation.

In matters of flexibility in working conditions, not only have inter-occupational collective agreements been concluded, but certain legislative measures have been taken which have been approved by the heads of undertakings. These deal with part-time work and the experimental adjustments for working hours known as "The Hansenne Experiment" after the Minister for Employment and Labour who, over a number of years adopted an imaginative attitude towards these very difficult matters. These experiments required the approval of the head of undertaking and the trade unions and were a success. This is an example of the tripartite approach so dear to the ILO.

Fourthly, preliminary talks have begun in connection with a new national inter-occupational agreement, which will follow the one that ends next November. The Prime Minister, with five Vice Prime Ministers, has received delegations from the workers' and employers' organisations and a new phrase was coined by a Belgian newspaper, which wrote: "The dialogue has started".

So, tripartism is still doing well in Belgium.

Before concluding, I would like to say how much the employers approve the concern expressed by the Director-General.

The High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment held in November 1987, was of the opinion that efficiency and the targeting of programmes could be improved, thereby reducing useless or unproductive expenditure. Well, there's wisdom indeed.

Now, carrying this into the sphere of social security, the employers think that the essential levels of social security attained so far should be maintained, but that some economies can be achieved by cutting down on expenditure which cannot be explicitly justified.

These are some of the reflections elicited by the outstanding Report of the Director-General on human rights. This Report was favourably received by the employers of Belgium.

Interpretation from Portuguese: Mr. FERREIRA DO PRADO (Workers' delegate, Brazil) – Allow me first of all to congratulate the President on his well-merited election to the post of directing the work of this 75th Session of the Conference. The sureness, serenity and impartiality which he has shown in managing our debates gives us every confidence that the ILO will emerge stronger than ever, particularly in its reaffirmation of the principle of tripartism, which is the cornerstone of its existence.

The Director-General's Report dealing with the activities of the ILO in 1987 emphasises what has been done in the fields of human rights, freedom of association, equality of rights between various categories of workers, occupational health and safety, conditions of work, means of assistance, social security and the World Employment Programme.

In the presence of these important themes, which were the subject of special attention by the ILO in 1987 and which are all bound up with problems that are of direct or indirect interest to wage earners throughout the world, in their quest for better living and working conditions, we should emphasise the efforts being made to identify the broad areas in which trade union freedom and autonomy can be put into practice and secured.

We should like to point out that in Brazil we are doing our share in this. Over the past few years, we have been debating the multiple problems which worry the workers and, hence, are of concern to other sectors of society. This effort to seek a dialogue, to make a list of the most controversial questions, to keep an ear open to the most pressing aspirations and claims of the citizens, has its origin in the political amnesty which took place in 1979, when we began a period of transition towards democracy leading to intense activity by the Constituent National Assembly, which is now putting the finishing touches to its work with a view to giving the country a Constitution which will enable it to acquire a pluralistic, democratic government system protecting the broadest freedoms of the various social groups.

This expectation and this prospect of a new era – of a new life – of a new way of tackling economic, political problems is of great interest to the workers, inasmuch as we are the majority and constitute the most disadvantaged of the groups working to make our country richer.

The Brazilian workers, despite several shadows on the horizon, are in the process of winning a number of advantages thanks to the country's new Constitution, especially as regards the trade union representative bodies which, from now on, will at last be free and autonomous and no longer subject to supervision by the State, as they have been for more than 50 years.

It is a matter of some urgency to make known the fact that the Brazilian workers, through their own representative bodies and in the trade union context of their various occupational categories, have never let up for a moment or slackened in their struggle for the freedom and autonomy of the trade unions which is a theme that represents a major principle of the ILO, and for the existence and implementation of which they have been fighting for years in all their various activities.

In emphasising trade union freedoms, we are referring at the same time, because they constitute a whole, to free collective bargaining as regards work and the right to strike, in view of the fact that wage-earners can never claim or win these advantages which are bound up with the practice of their occupations and are theirs as of right if they have no effective and concrete instruments enabling them to cope with the particular conflicts between capital and labour.

That is why, since the new Brazilian Constitution guarantees broad trade union freedom and autonomy, we are able to state that from now on the trade union movement in our country is in a position to implement, through firmness and consistency, all the principles that guide the activities of the ILO.

However, if in the field of democratic and trade union freedoms we are full of hope, in other spheres which are of direct interest to the workers the prospects are far from being so attractive. Quite the reverse. Several grave problems remain to be solved, especially as regards a wages policy such as will ensure the maintenance of the workers' purchasing power, since at present the workers are suffering the consequences of a policy which reduces the value of their earnings to a threshold below which such a situation ceases to be tolerable.

This being the case, the workers have bitterly regretted the directives, in our view the unjust directives, of the Government, which lives in dread of seeing, in our wages and in the overriding need to adjust them from time to time to cope with galloping inflation, a powerful factor influencing the devaluation of our currency. We have never been in agreement with this policy. That is why we wish to reaffirm from this international rostrum that the Brazilian workers have never at any time accepted the orthodox economic theories according to which wages and their adjustment would be a cause of inflation and currency depreciation. The earnings of workers in Third World countries, where there are intolerable rates of inflation, are regularly left behind by the prices of essential consumer products as a result of a number of factors, chiefly capital speculation by industrialists and businessmen. The workers therefore invariably find themselves the victims and never the agents of inflation.

Thus, any policy designed to "tighten the screw" on wages, far from solving economic problems, can only make them more acute by contributing in a decisive way to the impoverishment of our peoples and by bringing about a vicious circle of recession and unemployment.

As if to aggravate even further the crisis set off by the wages gap, there have been frequent renewals of the labour force which must be resisted and curbed if we are to safeguard the security of the workers. To that end one should stress the fundamental nature of the struggle in which the trade union movement is engaged to set up machinery to limit the power of the employers to order dismissals, which at present is done entirely at their own discretion. In Brazil the employers have complete freedom to dismiss their staff, as though work were nothing but a mercenary form of activity. We wish to support the ILO in asserting loudly and clearly that work is not merchandise. At the threshold of the twenty-first century, there is no longer any justification for labour not enjoying more humane and equitable treatment as the principal factor in the production of wealth. It is essential to set up mechanisms for protection whereby the worker can be dismissed only if the employer gives a just reason duly stipulated by law, for otherwise we should be exposed to arbitrary decisions by the employer, in other words a state of affairs in which economic interests always take precedence over the social and human objectives which should be the inspiration of the relations between employers and workers.

We should also like to tell this 75th Session of the International Labour Conference of the concerns of the Brazilian workers. The Brazilian external debt is the cause of major national problems, especially for the workers whose wages have constantly been losing their purchasing power resulting in the reduction of consumption by the population. Overproduction, which creates pressures on exports and affects the balance of payments, requires, in the name of international solidarity, that ILO develops an understanding of fair treatment of the problems of external debt for the developing countries. Brazil can only accept responsibility for payments if they do not represent additional sacrifices for the workers and society as a whole.

Secondly, agrarian reform has become more and more necessary with the distribution of land to the people who live on it. The people also need adequate credit and technical assistance. With a more rapid agrarian reform, we will be in a position to produce more foodstuffs, to reduce the number of people migrating to the cities, to improve the salaries of some 8,700,000 rural workers who now receive less than half the minimum salary and contribute to the consolidation of democracy and the creation of new jobs.

Thirdly, the reform of the banking sector. The Central Bank of Brazil is currently studying a reform of the banking sector. It has already taken over the management of nine provincial banks, and this has led to the closure of various branches, and the dismissal of many employees. The workers and the unions are opposed to this reform because of its negative effects.

Fourthly, the strikes and the dismissal of trade union leaders. Brazilian employers and especially the state-owned enterprises have moved against strikes with excessive force by dismissing striking workers and trade union leaders, as in the case of the strike in February in the area of civil aviation, when the Brazilian airlines VARIG and VASP dismissed a number of workers including trade union leaders.

We hope that the ILO will bring pressure to bear on the Government of Brazil so that these workers can get their jobs back without a wage loss and with the maintenance of their other working conditions and rights.

Finally, in connection with all the problems that have been discussed here, we wish to propose to the 75th Session of the Conference that it adopt the necessary action to create a body with the task of studying, at the world level, all the problems relating to credit establishments and insurance firms and the questions connected therewith which are a matter of concern for their employees. This would be equivalent to a "banking committee", on the same lines as the bodies already set up for various branches of industry.

These are the questions which we would like to put to this eminent Conference in the hope that the solutions will be found for them by establishing, on the basis of the relevant data, an equation that gives greater weight to human beings than to material things and to labour rather than to capital. If this can be done, we shall undoubtedly be preparing the ground for establishing relations between workers and employers free from distinction of any kind.

Mr. SUNDERAM (Workers' delegate, Sri Lanka) – I would like to associate myself fully with the sentiments expressed by the speakers who preceded me in congratulating the President on his unanimous election to this high office and have no doubt that your experience and skill will enable us to reach successful conclusions.

Permit me also to compliment the Director-General on an excellent Report which serves as an admirable basis for a wide-ranging discussion of the role of the ILO in dealing with issues of vital importance to mankind as a whole, and in particular for having chosen Human rights – A common responsibility as the central theme for discussion to mark the 40th anniversary of the proclamation of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the adoption by the ILO of one of its most important human rights Conventions – the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

It is only fitting that the Director-General should have chosen this occasion to review the human rights situations and to consider the factors which militate against the free exercise of a right so fundamental to all human relationships. As the Director-General points out, the expression "human rights", though not referred to as such in the ILO Constitution, is its very essence and constitutes the bedrock on which the ILO is founded. The concept of human rights is expressed admirably in the Declaration of Philadelphia that "all human beings, irrespective of race, creed or sex, have the right to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity". This noble objective has been spelled out in a number of important Conventions and Recommendations adopted by the ILO and is intended to permeate the fabric of the International Labour Organisation and be reflected in its wide and varied activities. Resolutions of the International Labour Conference and ILO Regional Conferences, and particularly the resolutions adopted at the ILO Conferences of 1966 and 1968, highlighted the importance of human rights and called for a new thrust on the part of the ILO in the form of a concerted programme of action to translate this concept into practical reality. The ILO's mandate in the field of human rights embraces practically all facets of its work to promote the realisation of the rights enshrined in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the human rights Conventions.

The ILO's action to promote and safeguard human rights has taken many forms. Human rights have been defined by the adoption of the important ILO Conventions and Recommendations, and, through its supervisory machinery and technical co-operation activities, the ILO has endeavoured to ensure that these rights are realised and applied.

While we are encouraged by the progress that has been made over the past several decades as a result of ILO action, the existing human rights situation is far from satisfactory. We are concerned that many governments have failed to ratify the basic ILO Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 relating to freedom of association and collective bargaining, and the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144). The rights embodied in these three Conventions are fundamental to the ILO's Constitution and principles and are a sine qua non for the functioning of free and democratic workers' organisations. The failure of certain governments to accept and act on the recommendations of the appropriate ILO bodies in regard to the violation of ILO Conventions and to honour their obligations under the Constitution of the ILO also causes us grave concern. We are dismayed by the attempts made by some governments to frustrate the work of the ILO by failing to send complete tripartite delegations, by excluding the representatives of the workers, which strikes at the very root of the ILO's unique tripartite character. It is apparent that ILO action taken so far in regard to these concerns has not had the desired effect and it is imperative that an in-depth review should be made with a view to taking new initiatives to remedy a situation which threatens to seriously undermine the basic principles and Constitution of the ILO. Considering the flagrant and recurring violation of the ILO's basic principles, enshrined in Conventions Nos. 87, 98 and 144, by some governments, a serious effort should be made to relate the ILO's technical co-operation programmes to the ratification and implementation of these Conventions. I am sorry to note that, despite persistent calls by workers' representatives for such action on the part of the ILO, there has been a slow response. The danger which the ILO faces in not "grasping the nettle" is that this great Organisation will be made a mockery of and rendered impotent in time to come.

I am also dismayed to discern a growing trend of governmental action to weaken the ILO's supervisory procedures and the successful efforts by governments and employers to slow down the standard-setting activities of the Organisation, as illustrated by the Director-General's observations in his Report that "in the past four years there has been a marked slowing-down in the rate of new ratifications which is currently equivalent to an average of one ratification per member State every four years."

The ILO has a direct responsibility not merely to promote the observance of human rights per se but to direct its activities towards establishing the relationship between respect for human rights and the maintenance of peace and stability. The tragic situation obtained in the occupied Arab territories which subjects the peoples inhabiting these lands to great privation, hardship, and the denial of the rights embodied in the basic conventions on the ILO, poses a grave challenge to the ILO. While we are not unmindful of the regular missions of the ILO to these territories and the activities under its technical co-operation programmes, the impact has belied our expectations. It is therefore imperative that the ILO should take new and radical initiatives to accelerate the human development of this disadvantaged group and ensure equality of treatment in the spheres which fall within the ILO's competence. The ILO has a further obligation to assist in promoting the self-determination of the Palestinian people as the best means of achieving lasting peace in the Middle East.

The rise in tension and friction and the outbreak of violence in multi-ethnic communities resulting from linguistic, racial or religious differences poses a grave threat to the exercise of human rights and the economic and social development of the countries concerned. The ILO has a positive role to play in harnessing the co-operation and active participation of all groups in its activities at the national, regional and international levels to eliminate discriminatory practices and help promote a spirit of togetherness, national consciousness and equality.

The report of the Director-General reviewing the activities of the ILO in 1987 illustrates the wide-ranging scope of the Organisation's work and its potential for making an even greater impact on its declared objectives and priorities. Unfortunately, despite the ILO's commitment to tripartite consultation, its efforts so far have not had the desired effect. Many governments stubbornly refuse to cast off the age-old prejudice that workers' organisations impede economic development, and continue to ignore the role of social partners in contributing to national development. These governments have succeeded in either excluding the social partners or severely curtailing their participation in ILO's technical co-operation programmes, thereby violating with impunity a principal objective of the ILO. This is, indeed, a far from satisfactory state of affairs which needs immediate rectification. The ILO should not only make greater efforts to ensure tripartite consultation in the member States, but make it a pre-condition that all technical co-operation programmes should have the full participation of the social partners in their formulation and implementation. The ILO should not let itself be side-tracked by the excuse that workers' organisations are not equipped or do not have the expertise to participate meaningfully in these organisations and their representatives with the necessary facilities and expertise to play their due role, and it is its duty to do so if it is not to lose its relevance as a tripartite Organisation.

Greater co-ordination is called for between the ILO and other members of the United Nations family of organisations, particularly in regard to the activities of these organisation which fall within the ILO's jurisdiction. To illustrate this need, I would refer to the World Bank project for the rehabilitation of the tea industry in Sri Lanka, which has earmarked 25 per cent of the project funds for improving the living conditions of the workers in the industry. This social component of the project is within the competence of the ILO, but there is no indication that there has been collaboration with the ILO or with the workers' organisations in the formulation and implementation of this project. The ILO has the necessary expertise under its International Programme for the Improvement of Working Conditions and Environment (PIACT) and World Employment Programme to make a major input in ensuring the success of this project and to ensure the participation of the workers' organisations. It is hoped that the ILO will lose no further time in extending its co-operation and collaborating with a project which is of vital concern to the workers in the tea industry of Sri Lanka.

It also hoped that the ILO will have a greater involvement with workers' activities than has been possible hitherto. Workers' organisations in the Third World are responding to the challenges resulting from poverty, unemployment and underemployment by embarking on socio-economic projects. The organisation which I represent – the Ceylon Workers' Congress of Sri Lanka – has established a Vocational Training Centre with assistance from the ICFTU and NORAD, but with no ILO involvement. Such a pioneering project undertaken by a workers' organisation in the developing world could and should have benefited from the expertise and participation of the ILO. The Ceylon Workers' Congress has initiated an important project for workers' ownership of the housing on tea plantations and their improvement in order to free these workers from their present position as captive labour, which ties their housing to employment and has the effect of evicting them from their homes on termination of their employment. The ILO's expertise and resources can make a significant contribution to the success of this project, and I would like to take this opportunity to call on the Director-General to send a multidisciplinary team in the first instance to Sri Lanka to make a feasibility study of this project with a view to the ILO's participation.

I would like to express my grave concern and that of the workers of Sri Lanka at the curtailment of the freedom of association and trade union rights of COSATU by the South African regime and the attempt made by this regime to emasculate the independent Black trade union movement and take away the hardwon rights of workers and their organisations by the Labour Amendment Bill and the Promotion of Orderly Internal Politics Bill. New and vigorous initiatives are called for by the ILO to bring maximum pressure to bear on the regime to desist from these measures, which must surely create serious industrial unrest and destabilise the country.

In conclusion, I should like to request the Director-General to take serious note of the important suggestions made by delegates at the Conference with a view to incorporating them in the Medium-Term Plan 1990-95.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. FRANCIS de los REYES (Employers' delegate, Cuba) – First of all, I would like to express our congratulations to Mr. Beyreuther, Minister of Labour and Wages of the German Democratic Republic, on his election as President of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. I also congratulate the Vice-Presidents.

The election of Mr. Beyreuther is a living example of the changing process that the world is experiencing. For the first time the representative of a socialist country has been elected as President of a session of the Conference. This state of affairs should be repeated throughout the International Labour Organisation, so that the Organisation can achieve the necessary democratisation and universality, in harmony with the political and social changes that have come about in the world. Speaking of these obvious changes brings me to the Report by Mr. Francis Blanchard to this 75th Session. I should like to dwell on the aspect which we feel to be of the greatest priority and importance: human rights.

In his Report, the Director-General speaks of human rights on this 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which in essence sums up the aspirations of every person in the universe for material and spiritual well-being.

The years have passed, but the essential objectives of the Declaration have not been fully attained. Between that time and the present, mankind has made progress, but not to its fullest possible extent. Wars, economic crises, international exploitation through the domination by strong countries of weak countries, the great difference between highly developed societies and others that live in poverty or, in its extreme form, crushing external debt, all go to show that the good intentions of the Declaration have not become a reality.

Every year, we discuss the phenomenon of apartheid – an abhorrent system imposed by the White immigrant minority in South Africa against the native Blacks, who make up the great majority.

They are denied the right to a political presence or a government in the territory which belongs to them, they are excluded from working in specific areas, they have far lower wages than the Whites, they are segregated and forced to live in homelands under very poor conditions, and when they protest against these vile injustices they are imprisoned or killed. The most significant example is that of the outstanding patriot Nelson Mandela, now just 70 years old, who has been in prison 25 years for defending the cause of his people; he has virtually lost his sight and is in precarious health.

The White racists of South Africa not only put into effect this abhorrent system of apartheid in the territory in which they are a minority, but also exercise their colonial action in Namibia, supporting armed bands in Angola and carrying out plans to destabilise the economies of the countries of southern Africa.

Apartheid is reflected in another region the Middle East. For 20 years now, the Palestine people have been victims of the occupation of their territory. They suffer mass crime, imprisonment, terror, the denial of employment or the possibility of training and development, all carried out by the Israeli authorities, who like the South African racists, take action to thwart the economic development of the bordering Arab countries, were they have extended the occupation, with the inevitable negative effect on the entire region of North Africa.

And is our continent, America, excluded from this process of denial of human rights in all its forms? Not at all. The history of the past 40 years has seen the rise of dictatorships, crimes, exploitation or national riches, unemployment, poor health, illiteracy and poverty; and when our peoples rebel to achieve liberation or defend their national integrity or their sovereignty, the imperial eagle, with its characteristic voracity which maintains a dominant presence in every part of the world, whose representatives have dared to mention in this forum a person from our country who stands for the repressive policy of the Batista dictatorship, puts out its claws and uses any method it has to hand, no matter what the consequences are. It organises mercenary invasions, arms outlaws, assassinates ordinary citizens, carries out assaults and sabotage, takes action to harm economies in order to paralyse development and with this aim systematically sets up an economic blockade. The examples are manifest; they are all in the area of the Caribbean: Cuba, Nicaragua and Panama.

Within this context, which exists with different variations in other regions of the world, the international situation is now becoming more optimistic and hopeful. The conversations held between Mikhail Gorbachev and Mr. Ronald Reagan on to disarmament, strategic arms limitation and the possible limitation of the conventional and nuclear arms race, indicate a promising climate for peace. These measures have been achieved by universal demand, including the demand of the ILO as an international organisation. Along with these positive results, we should include the elimination of areas of conflict which have already been mentioned.

In this perspective we should combine our efforts so that human rights are not just limited to mere words which become palliatives, but become practical solutions throughout the world.

The objectives have been defined. Let us mention some of them: the New International Economic Order covering development plans for the least well off regions – Africa, Asia and Latin America; the elimination of the external debt which so greatly affects the countries of the Third World, and which cannot be paid off. In multilateral action, the gigantic resources used to manufacture arms for mass destruction should be used to eliminate hunger, illiteracy, unemployment, poverty – extreme poverty – in which million of human beings are living. A stop should be put to unfair trade and developed countries should stop paying low prices for the raw materials supplied to them by Third World countries while everyday they raise the price of their own manufactured product. Reciprocity in trade for the products of both the developed and Third World countries should become a reality. The developed countries should cease to subsidise products that affect those traditionally produced by developing countries, such as sugar, because this affects the economies of those countries by limiting their possibilities of exporting. Regional plans extending beyond the confines of frontiers should be implemented to make it possible to exploit natural resources, using for example large rivers for irrigating land which is at present unproductive desert, and for generating electricity; in addition, roads, railways and other means of communication should be constructed.

An extensive training programme must be developed from the most basic level (that is, the eradication of illiteracy) to technical, vocational and higher education. Development projects must be undertaken which establish priorities, taking into account the characteristics of each region and each country whether it be agrarian or industrial development and their impact on the growth of employment. The experience of the functional structure of administrative bodies gained by the advanced countries, which display dynamic creativity and effectiveness, must be transferred to developing countries.

These and other concepts will not only have a positive impact on countries of the Third World, but would also affect the developed countries, thus contributing to achieving the solutions now called for by the world community.

So far as our country, Cuba, is concerned, the new economic order was established with the Revolution, which will be 30 years old on 1 January 1989.

The results are easily seen: industries, banks, means of transportation, and mines, have become the property of all the people; agrarian reform has been put into effect, land being distributed among the peasants, state farms being set up, as well as agricultural production co-operatives set up on a volunteer basis, the latter being the most effective; illiteracy has been eliminated and education has achieved extraordinary advances; with progressive results: the lowest level of education reached is now the ninth grade; tens of thousands of students are attending technical vocational and university courses; priority has been given to medical care. Hospitals, polyclinics, and family medical centres have been built, and large numbers of doctors and nurses have been trained; in summary, positive results have been achieved, which, alongside nutritional improvement for the people, has made it possible to reach a life expectancy of over 73 years, and to reduce infant mortality to 13.6 per thousand. Both indicators place us on a par with developed countries.

Throughout the revolutionary process, hundreds of new industries have been promoted, thousands of tractors and other machines have been incorporated in the agricultural sector; mechanical engineering has been consistently developed; we have constructed dams which accumulate millions of litres of water; animal husbandry has been improved by introducing advanced technology, and our main industry, the sugar industry, has been mechanised to a greater extent, making the arduous work in this sector more humane and entailing a reduction of thousands of workers. The tourist industry is carrying out an extensive development plan in co-operation with other countries, and is thus able to use the natural resources of our beaches; in addition, many scientific centres and factories producing electronic equipment have been set up, forming an accumulation of resources which, once mature, shall bear fruit in the form of extraordinary advancements.

That progress has been achieved is undeniable, but we are not exempt from the inevitable difficulties which societies must overcome in order to become more effective, and achieve better results, which provide a tangible guarantee of human rights.

These difficulties include the following: the level of administrative management be improved, in order to create dynamic and rational functional structures; the growth of productivity is an essential element, being closely linked to sectoral wage systems and standards, including the supervision and improvement thereof; the management of enterprises should have a greater degree of functional autonomy, so that local level initiative can bring about higher production efficiency and improved quality; since higher productivity is necessary in agricultural production co-operatives, priority should be given to this system in the agricultural sector, with a corresponding infrastructure which can enable us to come closer to the goal of food self-sufficiency.

These and other concepts, in our view, from the national perspective, may help to step up development in our country, enabling us to contribute to universal development.

With respect to these ideas, our Commander-in-Chief, Fidel Castro, President of the Council of State and of Ministers, said recently that: "This has nothing to do anymore with structural changes. You are dreaming now about major structural changes, in the form of better distribution of wealth, more social justice, and a modern State. We are already trying to bring this about. We have achieved major structural changes, the greatest that could be made, and reforms of all types, and we are endeavouring to create a modern State. We are striving to create a new society."

(The Conference adjourned at 1 p.m.)

Credentials

Fourth report of the Credentials Committee

Objection concerning the nomination of the Employers' delegate of Nicaragua

1. The Committee had before it an objection to the nomination of the Employers' delegate of Nicaragua submitted by the Chairman and three Vice-Chairmen of the Employers' Group of the Conference and also signed by the Vice-President of the "Consejo Superior de la Empresa Privada de Nicaragua" (COSEP).

2. The authors of the objection maintained that Mr. González Pastora, Employers' delegate of Nicaragua, legal counsel of the "Union Nacional de Agricultores y Ganaderos" (UNAG), had been nominated without the agreement of COSEP which was the most representative employers' organisation in the country and brought together 8,866 employers providing permanent employment to 194,484 workers, while UNAG did not keep a membership register and therefore could not provide reliable figures. UNAG covered only one sector of the economy and even in that sector the "Union de Productores Agropecuarios de Nicaragua" (UPANIC), which was a member of COSEP, was more representative. UNAG was really a producers' organisation and the majority of its members were not employers.

3. On 10 May 1988, the Government had convened a meeting for 11 May to nominate the employers' representatives to the Conference which was attended by four other organisations in addition to COSEP and UNAG, the "Corporación Industrial del Pueblo" (COIP), the "Corporación Comercial del Pueblo" (CORCOP), the "Consejo Nacional de la Mediana y Pequeña Industria" and the Ministry of Transport and Construction. At that meeting, the Government suggested a system of rotation whereby the position of Employers' titular delegate would be held alternately by UNAG and COSEP. COSEP could not accept the suggestion since UNAG could neither by its composition nor by its activities be compared to COSEP as an organisation representative of employers.

4. The authors of the objection appended a number of supporting documents and, in particular, a study made in 1987 by two employers' representatives from Panama and Costa Rica appointed by the Employers' group of the ILO Governing Body, which contained information on the relative representative character of the various organisations obtained from the Government, COSEP and UNAG.

5. They went on to call attention to the conclusions reached by the Credentials Committee at earlier sessions of the Conference concerning the nomination of the Employers' delegation of Nicaragua. Thus, at the 69th Session (1983) and 70th Session (1984), the Government had appointed the nominees of COSEP as delegates and advisers, while at the 68th Session (1982) and again at the 71st (1985), 72nd (1986) and 73rd (1987) Sessions it had appointed the UNAG nominees as the Employers' delegate, a decision which had been criticised by the Credentials Committee. In view of these repeated violations of the ILO Constitution, the authors of the objection requested the Conference to invalidate the credentials of the Employers' delegate of Nicaragua. The objecting organisations added that in view of the suggestion of the Credentials Committee to the 73rd Session of the Conference that an impartial body carry out a detailed study on the representative character of the employers' organisations of Nicaragua, COSEP had written to the Director-General of the ILO offering to prove the facts noted in the study of 1987 and placing at his disposal the necessary information. Unfortunately, the study suggested by the Committee had not been made. COSEP had for years been suffering from discrimination, harassment, imprisonment and other forms of oppression at the hands of the Government, a situation which had been criticised by the Committee on Freedom of Association of the Governing Body.

6. They also wished to call attention to the fact that the Government had failed to respect article 13, paragraph 2(a), of the Constitution, since the Employers' advisers nominated by COSEP had to bear their own travel and subsistence expenses.

7. In a written communication to the Committee, Mr. Meza Soza, Government delegate of Nicaragua, stated that consultations with employers' organisations had taken place on 11 May 1988. While four organisations, including UNAG, had made known the number of their affiliates and the size of the labour force supported by them, COSEP had declined to give figures on the ground that it had already done so on previous occasions. Four of the five organisations, which taken together represented a majority of the employers, agreed that Mr. González Pastora of UNAG should be the Employers' delegate of Nicaragua, but COSEP did not so agree. COSEP also refused to consider suggestions for a rotation system with UNAG and other proposals such as distribution of Committees and even the appointment of a COSEP delegate, if it implied acceptance of an adviser from UNAG. In these circumstances the Government had no alternative but to nominate the candidate supported by the large majority of Nicaraguan employers' organisations, together being far more representative than COSEP. The communication added that, according to the ILO Constitution, no other body, apart from the Credentials Committee, could make a ruling on the question of representativity. It concluded that the Government was willing to respect any agreement reached between the employers' organisations concerned.

8. As was the case last year, the Committee concluded that, even if changes in the representative character of organisations might occur, there is no evidence that COSEP had lost its representative character. Moreover, in the absence of accurate data, the positions of the Government on the one hand and the employers on the other were difficult to reconcile. In this respect, the Committee noted with regret that the suggestion of the Credentials Committee that an impartial body set up in order to carry out a detailed study permitting a realistic assessment of the relative representative strength of the various employers' organisations of Nicaragua had not been taken up.

9. The Committee took note of the willingness expressed by the Government to respect any agreement reached between the employers' organisations concerned. In this respect, the Committee considered that as a prerequisite to such an agreement, it would be essential for there to exist a means agreed by the organisations for evaluating their representative character. Possibly, the International Labour Office, given its experience, might be able to offer assistance to the parties concerned in relation to this question.

10. Finally, the Committee expressed concern at the situation of the Employers' organisations in Nicaragua and again concluded that, in the absence of agreement, the Government should have nominated the Employers' delegate in agreement with COSEP, which apparently remained the most representative organisation. However, the Committee decided not to propose the invalidation of the credentials of the Nicaraguan Employers' delegate and expressed the hope that, in future, the Government would nominate the Employers' delegation to the Conference in full conformity with the provisions of article 3, paragraph 5, of the Constitution.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Poland

11. The Committee had before it an objection to the credentials of the Polish Workers' delegation submitted jointly by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) and the World Confederation of Labour (WCL).

12. The objecting organisations recalled that they had challenged the credentials of the Polish Worker delegations to the 73rd Session and the 74th (Maritime) Session of the International Labour Conference as well as to the Fourth Session of the European Regional Conference of the ILO. As on those occasions, the objection was based on the fact that the nomination of the Workers' delegation had taken place without consultation with their affiliate "Solidarnosc" and without including within it any member of "Solidarnosc". No fundamental change had occurred with respect to the situation described on previous occasions, in particular, that which referred to the continuation of activities of "Solidarnosc" in defence of its members. They added that founding committees of 50 independent trade unions at the enterprise level had unsuccessfully attempted to gain legal registration. They called attention to the strikes in April and May of 1988 in numerous enterprises – all supported by "Solidarnosc" – protesting against the price rises and seeking to obtain the re-legalisation of that organisation. They also referred to the violent suppression of the strikes by the riot police.

13. After recalling the decisions taken by the Committee at the 73rd Session of the Conference (paragraphs 17-20 of the Fourth Report of the Credentials Committee, Provisional Record No. 29), a decision which was reiterated by the Credentials Committees of the 74th (Maritime) Session and the Fourth Session of the European Regional Conference, the objecting organisations stated that they were fully aware of the position taken by the representatives of the Government of Poland at the plenary sitting of the Conference following the conclusions of the Committee (Provisional Record No. 32, page 32/17) and concluded that the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Poland had not been made in conformity with article 3, paragraph 5 of the Constitution.

14. In a written communication to the Committee, Mr. Towpik, Government delegate of Poland stated that there were about 27,000 trade union organisations with a membership of about 7,000,000, forming 63% of the total labour force. There were 134 nation-wide trade union organisations. All, with the exception of one, had formed the All-Poland Trade Union Alliance (OPZZ), which was without doubt the most representative organisation. The Government nominated the delegate and the advisers proposed by the OPZZ. On the other hand, there were about 4,000 independent trade unions with a membership of 500,000 which had not joined any federation. The Government of Poland also consulted this group of organisations and included a representative in the delegation.

15. With respect to the statement of the objecting organisations that the Government should have consulted "Solidarnosc", the communication recalled the declaration made by the Government representative to the 73th Session of the Conference (Provisional Record, No. 32, page 32/17) to the effect that the Government was not able to consult organisations dissolved by Parliament or include in the delegation a representative from these organisations, adding that the overwhelming majority of members of "Solidarnosc" interested in trade union activity had joined new unions. The groups that called themselves "Solidarnosc" did not conduct trade union activities but rather engaged in political activities.

16. The communication indicated that the strikes mentioned by the objecting organisations affected four enterprises and were followed by only 6,000 of the 65,000 workers of these enterprises. There was no reason to identify these strikers with the group calling themselves "Solidarnosc". The 50 independent trade unions mentioned by the objecting organisations which had applied for registration represented only 0.2% of the membership of the 27,000 trade union organisations represented at the Conference. The legal procedure concerning a part of these applications had not yet been completed.

17. The communication concluded, stressing that the Workers' delegation of Poland to the 75th Session of the Conference was fully representative; that it had been nominated in accordance with article 3, paragraph 5, of the Constitution; that the Government had made all possible efforts to give a fully representative character to that delegation and, that in the future, and acting in accordance with the Constitution of the ILO, all efforts would be made to nominate Workers' delegations to the sessions of the Conference which would fully reflect the actual existing structure of the trade union movement in Poland.

18. In an oral declaration before the Committee, the Government delegate of Poland stated that his country was making all efforts to apply not only the letter but also the spirit of the ILO Constitution and had the intention of extending even further the representative character of the Workers' delegation of Poland to the Conference. Towards that end, the creation of a National Committee on Co-operation with the ILO of a tripartite nature was under consideration. On the other hand, it was paradoxical that the objecting organisations, while trying to defend "Solidarnosc", were not taking into account of the fact that the majority of the former members of that organisation had become members of the new trade unions.

19. In reply to a question by the Committee, the Government delegate stated that "Solidarnosc" did not at present represent a significant number of trade unionists and its dissolution had not been discriminatory, as all the then existing trade unions were dissolved and that the refusal to register the independent trade unions mentioned by the objecting organisations was not due to the fact that these trade unions were identified with "Solidarnosc", but rather because a registered trade union already existed in the enterprise. In this respect, the Government delegate indicated that the Polish legislation authorised more than one trade union per enterprise, but that this provision had been temporarily suspended by the Council of State.

20. In an oral statement before the Committee, the Workers' adviser and substitute delegate of Poland, Mr. Uzieblo, stated that within the last year many changes had taken place in Poland, in particular with respect to the extension of activities of the OPZZ, which had organised a number of strikes, some of them illegal, and secured collective bargaining agreements in some enterprises. In his opinion, "Solidarnosc" had at present very few members. The temporary suspension of the provision permitting more than one trade union per enterprise was necessary in view of the economic and social conditions prevailing in the country. About 97% of the labour force was unionised.

21. In reply to questions from the Committee, Mr. Obsadny, Workers' adviser and substitute delegate of Poland, Chairman of the Independent Self-Governing Trade Union of the Workers of the "Ponar Ostrzeszów", stated that he was a former member of "Solidarnosc", for which reason he had been interned on two occasions. His union was one of the 4,000 independent trade unions in Poland which were not affiliated to the OPZZ. At the outset, it had encountered certain difficulties with respect to its operation. A subsequent decision of the Supreme Court authorised the operation of his factory union which had a membership of 1,200 out of the 1,500 workers. It had decided not to affiliate itself to the OPZZ because it was in favour of competitiveness among trade unions. Moreover, it did not belong to a federation and only federations could be affiliated to the OPZZ. In order to broaden the composition of the Workers' delegation to the Conference, the Government had invited about 400 of the biggest independent unions to a meeting. Eighty unions attended the meeting which elected two persons from that group to form part of that delegation. When creating the new trade union in his enterprise, "Solidarnosc" activists had tried to persuade the workers to boycott it. This advice was not followed by him. In his opinion, the groups which were identifying themselves with "Solidarnosc" should join the new trade unions or create others dropping the distinct name of "Solidarnosc" and their leaders could present themselves for election. The only existing restriction was that trade unions would not be able to participate in political activities. Nothing, however, prevented the political opinions of these groups being channelled through a political party. In fact, he had joined the Democratic Party, which had a membership of 120,000, to which many trade union members of his enterprise belonged. Although the law permitted more than one union per enterprise, the provision had been temporarily suspended by a decision of the Council of State because of the prevailing economic conditions. However, this limitation did not apply to federations.

22. The Committee also heard Mr. Robel and Mr. de Vries Reilingh, representatives of the objecting organisations, who stated that in 1980 "Solidarnosc", with about 10,000,000 members, was without doubt the most representative organisation and that since its dissolution it had continued and was continuing to function as a trade union. Although as an illegal organisation it could not provide membership data, at present it could be said to represent 4-5 million workers. The objecting organisations were not suggesting that the OPZZ was not representative, but rather were stating that "Solidarnosc" should have been included in the delegation.

23. The Committee noted that the Workers' delegation of Poland had been nominated after consulting the OPZZ, which represented a substantial number of the workers of the country. It also noted with interest that the group of trade unions which were not members of the OPZZ had been consulted and that an adviser and substitute delegate from that group had been nominated.

24. The Committee, though aware of the sequence of events which had given rise to the present situation, in particular the dissolution of "Solidarnosc", noted with regret the intention expressed by the Government at the end of the Conference in 1987, and now reiterated that it was not able to consult organisations dissolved by a law of the Parliament or to include in the delegation representatives of those organisations. In the opinion of the Committee, the events which had occurred in the past year confirmed its view that "Solidarnosc" had not lost its representative character in the meaning of article 3, paragraph 5 of the Constitution, although its non-legal nature made it impossible to determine its membership.

25. The Committee again expressed its concern at the unsatisfactory trade union situation in Poland and in particular the recent evolution of the situation described in the 1988 Report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations on the application of Convention No. 87 in Poland.

26. The Committee noted that, according to the statements of the Government, a large number of the members of the old "Solidarnosc" had now become members of new trade unions. It also noted that, according to the statements of the Polish Workers' adviser and substitute delegate, who is a member of an independent trade union, nothing prevented trade union activists who identified themselves with "Solidarnosc" from affiliating themselves to the new trade unions or creating others within which they could conduct their trade union activities. The Committee observed that the creation of new unions would at present be extremely difficult, at least until the Council of State had lifted the suspension of the legal provision authorising the creation of more than one trade union per enterprise. According to the information supplied by the Government, this had been the reason for refusing to register the 50 independent trade unions close to "Solidarnosc" which had recently applied for registration. In fact a large number of workers who identified themselves with the principles of "Solidarnosc" continued to be deprived of representation, not only in their capacity as members of "Solidarnosc", but also when some of these groups attempted to register new trade unions.

27. The Committee referred to the report of the Credentials Committee to the 73rd Session of the Conference, and noted with regret that the Government had not made use of the good offices of the Director-General as suggested therein. It concluded by recalling that the resumption of the participation of Poland in the activities of the ILO had been done in a spirit of dialogue. In that same spirit, the Committee expressed the hope that, in the future, the Government would take the necessary measures, possibly by facilitating trade union pluralism along the lines suggested by the Committee of Experts in its report mentioned above in such a way that the Workers' delegation of Poland would be fully representative of all the workers, including those groups identifying themselves with the principles of "Solidarnosc".

Communication concerning the Employers' delegation of Libyan Arab Jamahiriya

28. The Committee received a communication signed by the Chairman and four Vice-Chairmen of the Employers' group, requesting it to inquire about the identity and nature of the employers' organisations which were consulted on, and agreed to, the nomination of the Employers' delegate of Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Mr. Elmukherbi and of his advisers, Mr. Kwairy and Mr. Alghoul, which information was not evident from the functions of these persons given in the provisional List of Delegations. The communication added that the authors reserved the right to object to the credentials concerned if it appeared that the nominations had not been made in accordance with article 3, paragraph 5, of the ILO Constitution.

29. On 6 June 1988, the Chairman of the Committee sent a letter to Mr. Alfaqi Hasan, Government delegate of Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, requesting information concerning the identity and nature of the organisations which were consulted and agreed to the nomination of the three persons listed as Employers' delegate and advisers. No reply was received.

30. In these circumstances, the Committee expressed serious doubt about the existence of employers' organisations in Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, the position held by the delegate and advisers as employers and the procedure followed for their nomination. These doubts had been strengthened by the lack of co-operation from the Government delegation, which failed to supply the information sought by the Committee.

31. The Chairman and Vice-Chairman of the Employers' group, having been informed of the situation, indicated that they would not present an objection at this late stage of the Conference.

Communications from the Chairman of the Employers' Group and three Employers' delegates

32. The Committee received a communication from the Chairman of the Employers' group, indicating that the Employers' delegates of a number of countries and the Employers' group as a whole wished to record their protest at the non-respect by the governments of these countries of their obligations under article 13, paragraph 2(a), of the ILO Constitution. The communication cited eight cases of non-payment of Employers' delegates' travel costs and ten cases of Employers' delegates' subsistence costs. The Committee subsequently received three letters from the Employers' delegates of Bahrain, Brazil and Lebanon protesting the non-payment by their governments of their travel and subsistence expenses.

33. In this respect, the Committee called attention to paragraph 17 of its first report, Provisional Record No. 9, page 40, in which it recalled the obligations of governments under article 13, paragraph 2(a) of the Constitution to pay the travelling and subsistence expenses of their delegations. As regards the three individual communications, the Committee considered that it was not within its mandate to examine complaints of non-compliance with the above-mentioned obligation. It recalled, in this connection, that the question of payment of expenses of delegations to the sessions of the International Labour Conference was presently under consideration by a Working Party on Constitutional Amendments established by the Governing Body of the ILO.

34. The Credentials Committee submits the present report to the Conference in order that the Conference may take note of it.

Structure of the ILO

Internal rules for the Election of the Workers' members of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office

The Workers' group of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference,

Basing itself on article 7 of the Constitution of the ILO and article 52, paragraph 4, of the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference,

Desiring to ensure that due account is taken of the regional interests of the workers and of the existing trade union realities,

Decides to establish the following rules which will apply to future elections of the Worker members of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office:

- (1) For the purpose of these rules, there shall be four regions, defined on a geographical basis as follows: Africa, America, Asia¹ and Europe.²
- (2) The distribution of seats among the four regions is as follows:

	Regular members	Deputy members
Africa	7	3
America	7	2
Asia	7	2

- (3)
 1. During pre-election consultations for the establishment of lists of candidates, care should be taken that candidates from any given region enjoy the confidence of the workers in their region and that a just and appropriate distribution of seats within each region, taking into account the existing trade union realities, is ensured.
 2. International and regional trade union organisations having consultative status with the International Labour Organisation may take part in these consultations if at least one delegate from the region is a member of one of their affiliated organisations.
 3. The Workers' delegates of future sessions of the International Labour Conference are urged to take the results of these consultations into account in their electoral decisions.

² Including Cyprus, Turkey and USSR.

4. In any case, no person can be a candidate unless his name has been proposed by at least 20 per cent of the Workers' delegates from within his own region.
5. In the event that it should prove necessary, the Officers of the Workers' group will assist and encourage the proper conduct of the consultations within the regions.
- (4) The candidates of each region shall be grouped together on the voting paper on the above regional basis. Each member of the electoral college shall select on the list of candidates for each region a number of names which shall in no case exceed the numbers of seats allocated to the region. A voting paper including more names for a given region than the number allocated to it shall be considered invalid.
- (5) If after the first vote one or more seats remain to be filled, one or more further votes shall be taken as may be necessary, each member of the electoral college being entitled to vote for a number of candidates of the region or regions concerned equal to the number of seats which still remain to be filled under the agreed regional distribution.
- (6) If a candidate is not elected after three votes, the region which nominated him shall have the right to propose another candidate.
- (7) If a vacancy occurs among the Worker members of the Governing Body during an interval between sessions of the Conference, the Workers' group of the Governing Body shall, in accordance with Article 54, paragraph 2, of the new Standing Orders of the Conference, proceed to fill the vacancy provisionally with due respect to the regional distribution of seats provided for in paragraph 2 above without, however, being required to appoint the new member from among the deputy Worker members of the Governing Body.
- (8) These internal rules shall be adopted or modified by a three-quarters majority of the Workers' group of the Conference.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – We shall now continue our discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Interpretation from Czech: Mr. BODA (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Czechoslovakia) – I should like to take this opportunity to express my warm congratulations to the President on his election to the presidency of this Session of the Conference. I have had the privilege of knowing him personally for a number of years and have the highest regard for his abilities and tact. His election is recognition of the results of his life's work for the benefit of the working people of the German Democratic Republic. I also congratulate all his colleagues who are Vice-Presidents of the Conference on their election and extend my best wishes for the successful results of the work.

The adoption of the Universal Declaration on Human Rights 40 years ago was an important milestone in international co-operation. We welcome the Report of the Director-General in that it is devoted to human rights, in view of the many disturbing situations in the world today. Unquestionably, the most serious problem is the continued and intensifying mass violation of all human rights, particularly by the occupying and racist regimes in the Middle East and in southern Africa. However, one cannot overlook the continuing differentiation in economic and social situations both at national and international levels, the consequences of which seriously impair the protection of human rights.

The desire for social justice and equality based on the concept of the natural equality of all human beings is many centuries old. Long before it was formulated in Article 1 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the French Revolution – whose 200th anniversary the world will soon celebrate – triumphed in the name of that concept. Under the slogan of the liberation of man from all forms of subjugation, dependence or exploitation, the Great October Socialist Revolution – to whose legacy our people are committed – triumphed over 70 years ago. The freedom and social equality of people is an idea that has proved to be the driving force of all historical events promoting human progress. Yet, historical experience shows us that the realisation of this great humanitarian project, which is also the fundamental purpose of our Organisation, is not easy to attain in spite of the slow but steady growth of the world's overall economic potential. I therefore believe that the purpose of our discussion is to consider the main obstacles preventing the realisation of human rights, the attained level of which does not correspond to proclaimed intentions, and also to assess the real possibilities of making our co-operation and ILO activities more effective.

The Report of the Director-General provides a basis for such debate. I would like to refer to certain points which the analytical approach used in the Director-General's Report does not sufficiently underline. First of all, I would like to emphasise that success in enforcing human rights does not only depend on expressions of good will by legislators. Inequality in legislation denotes inequality in situations. Factual inequality in economic, or to put it in a better way, ownership relationships, not to speak of social status, also leads to unequal opportunities in making use of human rights, regardless of the formal equality established in legislation. This is one of the fundamental reasons for the as yet not very successful efforts to implement the goals of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the international covenants on human rights. One of the main objectives of the ILO – and this stems from the Preamble of its Constitution and also from Articles I and II of the Declaration of Philadelphia – is to endeavour to remedy this situation and to assist peoples in all countries to achieve full enjoyment of human rights.

Therefore it is not enough – and it is not even a matter of priority for the ILO – to endeavour to attain maximum protection and the highest levels of individual human rights for a limited number of citizens, basically only for those who, as a result of a more favourable economic situation or of national, international, sectoral or institutional conditions, are able to enjoy them but to make sure that everyone has the possibility of enjoying basic rights. This idea is assuming more and more importance with the rapidly increasing differences in economic and social situations in the world. It seems to me therefore that an analysis of the situation based on individual human rights, with a strong accent on formal equality, obscures the basic contextual connection with the exercise of human rights. I would like to justify my remarks by citing several examples to illustrate these concepts, taking up a few moments of your time to do so.

First of all, the right to work. This right is not just one of the fundamental human rights, but from the viewpoint of its impact it is the determining factor in respect of a number of other human rights. How can we speak about equal opportunities as concerns the standard of living, housing, participation in social life for those who have been out of work for a long time?

What choice of work do they have, whether productive or otherwise? In other words, what real rights to they have? How can we speak about ensuring trade union rights to these long-term unemployed? And, finally, what certainty do we have that high unemployment is not really one of the sources of mass discrimination in employment, especially when we know that certain age categories and, in certain cases, women are particularly discriminated against, not to mention the fact that the lack of a job permits a subtle selection in dismissing workers and also a similar selection in new hirings based on a number of other distinctions? The right to work therefore is, in its content and actual consequences, the absolutely decisive human right. Consequently, difficult to understand why, until now, it has not found confirmation in an ILO Convention.

This brings us to another example concerning the relation between Conventions Nos. 111 and 122. The Report of the Director-General describes both of them as promotional. Yet it is apparent that the attitude of supervisory bodies to them is very different. Economic policies that obviously lead to high unemployment as a result of an orientation towards the concentration of capital, the speeding up of movements of capital, etc., are not subjected to such detailed formal legal analyses as is the case with Convention No. 111. The conclusions usually adopted concerning the application of Convention No. 122 tend to be general and do not by any means reflect the commitments stemming from Article II(c) of the Declaration of Philadelphia. The Report of the Director-General states: "Yet, in recent years, in many countries – including countries that have ratified the Convention – full employment has ceased to be a major goal."

New situations call for new attitudes. A profound and critical examination of the current social situation in the world, contained in the Medium-Term Plan 1990-95 of the Organisation, has shown that most working people in the world do not enjoy proper social protection, do not have the possibility of organising themselves to defend their interests, and do not have sufficient influence to decide on matters concerning them. In the light of these facts it is necessary to think about trade union rights, also about the participation by working people in the decision-making process, about systems of industrial relations, i.e. about the real tripartite models in the present-day world, if we are analysing problems associated with Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 and others related to the above-mentioned rights – the right to organise and other trade union rights. Current trends in the organisational structures of enterprises and the unsatisfactory weakening of the role of trade unions in certain instances in themselves call for a new way of solving problems. This point was raised by a number of delegations in discussing the ILO Medium-Term Plan.

If I have expressed certain reservations on the concept of the Director-General's Report, I would also like to commend the ILO human rights activities in many areas. I have in mind in particular the efforts to prevent antinational programmes of structural change from reducing the social protection of the working people, and I would like to emphasise that this principle should be respected by international financial institutions as well. We therefore highly commend the conclusions of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment, and hope that the ILO will do everything to implement the conclusions adopted.

We also approve the general orientation of the ILO's technical assistance programme in rural development. The discussions in the Committee on Rural Employment and the proposed conclusions enjoy our full support. Moreover, we consider the proceedings and results of the Fourth European Regional Conference as being an important guarantee for the future development of European co-operation. We approve all the ILO's efforts to promote the conditions of work for the working people. Promoting their basic rights and thus providing an increasing number of working people with access to such rights, is an important contribution of the ILO. It is in these areas that we should see the main focus of its efforts, particularly in view of the present conflict between theory and practical policies concerning the compatibility of criteria of social justice with the criteria of economic dynamism.

In our country, the Czechoslovakian Socialist Republic, we have always recognised the mutual conditionality of economic and social development. Social development is not considered merely as an economic development objective, but simultaneously as a factor in this development. This principle, indeed, has been demonstrated by the adoption of a new law concerning social security by the Federal Assembly of my country. This law has created prerequisites for a further significant improvement in the social protection of the population.

This principle is fully reflected in the achievement of basic rights for the working masses. It is in the interest of development as a whole to create conditions for all citizens without distinction of any kind so that they may all exercise their rights, whether they are men or women. The basic prerequisite remains to safeguard the active participation of all citizens in economic life, and for all of who are in a position to work. The measures, the aim of which is to increase economic dynamism by decentralising the decision-making process and by increasing the participation of the workers in all fields of national life, will mean that certain changes can be made in the structure of employment, and increased social protection of the fundamental rights of the working population can be guaranteed.

In conclusion, I should like to express the hope that there will be an improvement in the overall social situation and progress in implementing human rights in the world. My optimism is based on the ongoing process of change in political thinking in the world, and also on the increasingly broad recognition of the fact that ideological and political differences among States cannot be settled by force and are not an obstacle to mutual confidence and co-operation. On the contrary, it is becoming clearer and clearer that only mutual respect and peaceful co-operation will enable us gradually to unblock the resources which are needed and to exercise human rights in the world more fully and more universally.

Mr. von HOLTEN (Employers' delegate, Sweden) – Many words of well-deserved appreciation have already been addressed to you, Mr. President, and your co-officers for the excellent manner in which you are conducting these proceedings. Allow me to add those of the Employers' delegations of Denmark, Finland, Iceland, Norway and Sweden, on whose joint behalf I shall now make a few observations with reference to the Report of the Director-General.

One of the documents submitted to the session under this heading contains the ILO's Medium-Term Plan. This is an important document as the original Office paper and even more so the Programme, Financial and Administrative (PFA) Committee's report on the paper seem to herald a new departure for our Organisation. What is said there has been inspired by the High-Level Meeting which concluded last November that structural adjustment is needed to achieve more economic growth without inflation and called upon the international institutions concerned to join forces in facilitating such adjustment. For the ILO this means that it will have to identify possible adverse social consequences and advise on how to limit these to the extent possible and that it will have to help by way of education, etc., in overcoming such obstacles as may exist in the form of outdated social patterns and attitudes. In the PFA Committee, employers in particular, but also governments, referred in this context to the positive effects of measures like deregulation and privatisation which are unfortunately often resisted by vested interests.

The main part of the Director-General's Report this year deals with human rights. Issued on the occasion of the 40th anniversary of the Universal Human Rights and of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), it constitutes a follow-up of a similar report to the Conference 20 years ago. From a traditional point of view it is a good document. If the comments I am going to make contain criticisms it is because I and my colleagues have reviewed it also in the light of the Medium-Term Plan.

The concept of human rights as we know it is about 200 years old. Originally the emphasis was on the civil liberties or certain indivisible fundamental freedoms which are to be enjoyed by every individual subject only to such limitations as are necessary to secure due recognition of the same rights of others. These liberties or freedoms require of governments not to act – and in that sense they can be said to be absolute, and they go beyond what is written in the few international texts selected for quotation in the Director-General's Report.

Many Western countries owe their market economies to the recognition of the freedom of property and the freedom of trade by which the privileges formerly held by guilds and other closed groupings were abolished. Freedom of property is not mentioned in any of the United Nations Covenants but is recognised in the Universal Declarations and guaranteed by the European Human Rights Convention of 1950. Although none of the texts referred to expressly mentions freedom of trade, some have a bearing on it. Thus the ILO Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), aims at ensuring that there is productive work not only for those who seek salaried employment but also for those who aspire to self-employment. And the European Human Rights Convention, in protecting the rights of workers (and employers) not only to organise but also, if this is the wish of the individual, not to organise, thereby rules out closed shop and similar organisation security arrangements on which the ILO has opted to stay "neutral".

To civil liberties and fundamental freedoms were soon added another kind of human rights, known as economic, social and cultural rights. These require governments to take positive action to ensure that every individual is in the material position to enjoy fundamental freedoms.

As national economies are not equally developed, and such action cannot extend beyond what is feasible with the resources available to each country, economic, social and cultural rights are not absolute like fundamental freedoms, but relative. Therefore, the international procedures for supervising the observance of these rights are always less developed than those concerned with fundamental freedoms.

In our view, the Director-General's Report fails to distinguish between the basic human rights standards of the ILO, on the one hand, and its other labour standards, on the other. One gets the impression that every ILO Convention embodies a human rights standard which, once adopted, can only be made more, not less, rigid, regardless of whether it gets ratified or not. Reference is made, inter alia, to the introduction of flexible working hours, the abolition of legal minimum wages and the creation of new jobs based on a more individual employer-employee relationship as potential threats to human rights. This is not the way to look at things if one wants the new departure heralded by the Medium-Term Plan, and we, for our part, cannot accept that way of looking at things.

This does not mean that we differ from the Employers' group of the Governing Body which continues to give one of its highest priorities to the ILO's standard-setting activities. Indeed, all three parties of our Organisation appear to us to remain committed to the concerted legislative programme which David Morse, in his human rights report to the 1968 session of the Conference, introduced in stating that the Organisation should "develop a body of international labour standards that is as complete and as widely accepted by member States as possible". That the body of standards has become more and more complete over the years is true. When it comes to acceptance by member States, however, the record is disappointing.

There are 145 substantive Conventions in all which are open to ratification. The average number of ratifications for Conventions is 32. It is 40 for Conventions adopted before 1961, 27 for those adopted in the 1960s, 24 for those adopted in the 1970s and only 5 for those adopted after 1980.

More disturbing is that the Conventions seem to become less and less relevant to the developing countries. Of the present 112 members which are not OECD or European countries, 54 have joined the ILO since 1960. Nevertheless, the 112 developing countries' share of ratifications is decreasing: 63 per cent for Conventions adopted before 1961. That share is 55 per cent for Conventions adopted between 1961 and 1970, 48 per cent for Conventions adopted between 1971 and 1980 and only 28 per cent for Conventions adopted after 1980.

The Nordic Employers' delegation has been advocating, and continues to advocate, that the future emphasis has to be on a revision of standards which, although dealing with vital subjects, are, to judge from their poor acceptance, either too high or too rigid. Admittedly, a revising ILO Convention normally supersedes the revised Convention, but there is nothing in the Constitution which says that it has to be so and we are indeed pleased to note that the revisions completed this year have been the other way round. Certainly, there are also many standards which are universally relevant, like the most important basic human rights standards, and for these standards we propose further promotional action. As employers, we would certainly also be happy to see the basic human rights standards further strengthened in line with the new departure with a view to offering greater protection for productive individual initiative. I hope not to shock anyone by saying this.

A final word about the controversial issue of fair labour clauses in bilateral and multilateral trade agreements. We have obviously nothing against the idea as such of States agreeing to absorb certain common labour standards as a condition for trading with one another. Whether this can work when the State with the largest share of the world's foreign trade applies only four ILO Conventions, all of which are maritime, is another matter. But we are firmly opposed to the ILO getting involved in this issue. The only kind of binding international standard which our Constitution knows is an ILO Convention and the ratification by any State of such a Convention is, as far as the ILO is concerned, an entirely voluntary act. No doubt, the idea of imposing social standards through trade agreements is attractive to the theorists, but we, even those of us who happen to be lawyers, are here to initiate practical action, not to theorise.

Interpretation from Portuguese: Mr. MAXIMIANO (Deputy Secretary of State in the Prime Minister's Office, Cape Verde) – Mr. President, may I begin by offering you my sincere congratulations on my own behalf and on that of the delegation of Cape Verde on your election to the presidency of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference, and also to say how satisfied we are at the competent manner in which you are conducting our work. I am sure that in this way we cannot fail to reach the objectives which we all hope to achieve at this Conference.

We should also like to take this opportunity of congratulating the Director-General on his excellent Report submitted to the plenary for discussion on the human rights issue. In so doing, he has, in fact, taken up a matter which constitutes a source of constant concern to the ILO, and one of the most important issues with which it deals.

Human rights involve the defence and preservation of the principles set out in the Constitution of our Organisation at national and international level.

The tremendous standard-setting work and the promotion of labour developed over the past decades, I think, clearly demonstrate just how deep this commitment is; this commitment which becomes more vital every day in view of the widening gap between rich and poor.

Protecting the dignity of man and ensuring a minimum respect for his rights and his legitimate aspiration to material and moral well-being in a climate of peace and social justice represent prime objectives of the State and the society of Cape Verde and they constitute the direct cause of the victorious struggle waged by the people of Cape Verde to exist as a free and sovereign nation.

The Constitution of the Republic of Cape Verde recognises and guarantees its citizens a broad range of rights ranging from political and civil rights to economic, social and cultural rights and also establishes mechanisms for the defence and implementation of these rights.

Although it is true that many of these rights are implemented automatically, and imposed daily in political and social relations, none the less, it is still true to say that a claim to other rights, and in particular economic and social rights, is still in many cases contingent upon the availability of the necessary resources at each stage of our process of development because the recognition and implementation of these rights will become credible and feasible only to the extent that the social and economic reality of the country is taken into account. And I believe that this is a decisive factor in determining the pace and extent at which benefits can be extended.

It is these circumstances, unfortunately, which impose a limit on our desiderata and which influence the action we have to take towards a policy which is feasible and in harmony with the genuine potential of our national economy, an independent and viable national economy which can only exist if we have defended and preserved our political independence.

This independent and viable national economy is possible only if there is a permanent adjustment of social needs to the deliberate action which we have to develop to encourage more participation and involvement by the citizens in pursuit of these objectives and to do so in a responsible manner.

National reconstruction, which is the main feature of this phase of development in my country, is a task which requires effort and solidarity on the part of members of all social strata. Because under the present circumstances it will not be possible to build a future or to provide the conditions necessary for satisfaction of growing needs unless this effort is supported by deliberate national political will – with the prerequisite that the fulfilment of collective and individual aspirations must first and foremost be the responsibility of the Cape Verde nation.

Cape Verde is a small country without natural resources and the manufactures of its economy are a low level of domestic production, a high level of unemployment and a high degree of dependence upon the outside world. We must look to international co-operation and solidarity for a large part of the means and resources which are required to carry out our economic and social development programme.

Because of these circumstances, we are under certain obligations when it comes to the use of these resources. And we must concentrate investments in projects which will yield a sure economic and social return, with the prospect of generating greater wealth which, in turn, will make it possible to provide more jobs, a constant improvement of living conditions and a gradual reduction of our dependence upon the outside world.

Our development strategy is based on these main guide-lines.

However, it would not be realistic for a small country such as Cape Verde to lay claim to a social policy which is not commensurate with its own strength and potential. We think it is necessary, above all, to produce, to accumulate, because in that way we can defend and consolidate our status as a sovereign people, and gradually eliminate existing social imbalances and the contradictions generated by the development process itself.

It is in this context that my country should be seen, and it is in this context that we are working to defend human rights; human rights which we hold in the highest respect not only as a Member of the ILO whose ideals of course we uphold faithfully, but also and above all because of the essentially humanist and democratic nature of the political regime in Cape Verde.

The Constitution of our country and other laws in force both recognise and guarantee the citizen's freedom of thought, expression, assembly, association, also the right to justice, to be represented and to lodge an appeal in the courts against acts that infringe these rights. Under no circumstances may justice be refused anyone on the basis of inadequate or non-existent financial resources.

Significant efforts have been made in the fields of education, health and social security, and the available health statistics show that we are among the best in our continent. Work is a right and duty for every citizen and the State should provide the conditions within which full employment can be achieved.

New labour legislation was published recently and, in addition to reinforcing the principles of non-discrimination, equality of opportunity and treatment and freedom of association, it introduces considerable improvements in the field of regulations relating, in particular, to working conditions, collective insurance agreements, quality of life of workers, the improvement of the system for preventing and settling labour disputes, the participation of workers and their representative organisations in the life of the enterprise, vocational training, the work of miners and so forth.

The social security system is being expanded and consolidated. Studies are being carried out at present to extend its coverage to categories of workers not yet covered by this general system.

The struggle to combat unemployment, both in urban and in rural areas is our most urgent priority at the moment. Despite difficulties which arise as a result of the difficult world economic situation and because of the inadequacy of our domestic resources, the Government is now promoting and encouraging initiatives aimed at increasing employment, both through programmes which make rational use of existing economic potential and by providing a context which is likely to attract and encourage investment from outside the country in productive projects which will guarantee as many new jobs as possible.

Seeing that the majority of our population lives in rural areas, it is only natural that the Government should pay particular attention to developing this sector. These efforts take the form of systematic projects aimed at halting and reversing the deterioration of the environment and maintaining rural populations in this context while at the same time guaranteeing them minimum incomes which is in line with the achievement of a social policy.

Of these projects, those which relate to labour-intensive work are given high priority in the government policy. These help significantly to reduce the level of unemployment and guarantee incomes to a large number of families. They also help to set up the infrastructure which is necessary for the launching of further development projects.

Apart from the fact that they generate employment, these activities are also major instrument of social and productive enhancement for large sector of our rural population, who have very low vocational skills. These activities should also make it possible to raise the level of productivity of our economy under present circumstances and also to improve the general standard of skills among the workforce.

These projects should fit into an integrated approach to development, and this places new demands on our economic and social organisation and on the ongoing work carried out with the support and technical assistance of the ILO, from which we hope to achieve the following results: increasing involvement by the population involved in direct management to enhance productivity; giving the people more responsibility in solving their problems and in participating in identifying the obstacles standing in the way of development in their communities.

With this brief statement, I wanted to illustrate, on the one hand, the efforts being made in my country to promote progress and well-being amongst the population and also to identify the tremendous difficulties which we encounter in trying to achieve this objective, but we feel sure that the same difficulties are being faced with the other Members of the Organisation as well.

This is a task for one and all. As the Director-General so eloquently says in his Report, our pursuit of this noble objective would be seriously compromised if international solidarity and understanding, are not strengthened, and if egoism and flagrant economic and social inequalities are allowed to persist throughout the world.

We must also do away with the arrogance of the rich towards the poor, oppression and all forms of discrimination, and those people who are still living under domination must be granted their sacred right to live and build their future in peace and total freedom.

I would also like to pay tribute to the efforts made by this Organisation to promote the cause of peoples who are fighting for their freedom and emancipation, and to refer here, in particular, to the undeniable support given by this Organisation to the peoples of South Africa and other neighbouring countries in that troubled region, in support of their just and hard struggle against apartheid. We are convinced that this effort will be rewarded, for victory is certain.

• Mr. ABDULRESHID (Head of the Department of Labour, Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs, Ethiopia) – It is a pleasure and an honour for me to congratulate the President on behalf of the people and the Government of the People's Democratic Republic of Ethiopia and on my own behalf, on his well-deserved election to the presidency of this august assembly. This represents a fitting tribute to his wide experience in the field of labour and social affairs and of the ideals of the society of the German Democratic Republic.

May I also congratulate the Director-General of the ILO for presenting once again a timely issue: Human rights – A common responsibility. I would like to pay tribute to him for the commendable work and for the sustained action that the ILO has always taken for social justice and freedom. I am confident that member States will deliberate upon this, and assess the contribution of the ILO in the international efforts towards the respect of human rights, and reach fruitful conclusions.

"Human rights" has always been an issue of topical importance to all progressive and peace-loving peoples of the world. Human rights questions should be examined globally, taking into account both the overall context of the various societies in which they present themselves as well as the need for the promotion of the full dignity of persons and the development of the well-being of society. The full realisation of civil and political rights, without the enjoyment of economic, social and cultural rights, is not possible. Hence, the attainment of lasting progress in the implementation of human rights is dependent upon sound and effective international and national policies of economic and social development. Human rights cannot be seen in isolation from freedom from disease, hunger, illiteracy, colonialism, neo-colonialism, apartheid and other forms of racism, and racial discrimination.

While discussing human rights, one paramount issue that we cannot bypass is the question of apartheid. Among the reports before us, there is the Special Report of the Director-General on the Application of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa.

From this Report, we note that the situation in South Africa is deteriorating. As has been repeatedly stressed on numerous occasions, the racist regime, in absolute disregard of world public opinion, still continues to trample underfoot the lofty principles enshrined in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and others. The Black majority in South Africa continues to suffer from ruthless oppression and is deprived of fundamental rights.

The illegal occupation of Namibia and the aggression against neighbouring sovereign States are threatening world peace and security.

The conditions of workers in South Africa and Namibia are deteriorating day by day.

Apartheid would have been abolished a long time ago, had it not been for the material and moral support given to it by some governments which prefer to preserve their interests and unjustified gains against the genuine rights and freedom of the oppressed people.

The situation in this part of our continent calls for decisive and urgent action by all States. The firm stand of the People's Democratic Republic of Ethiopia against apartheid will continue until the complete eradication of this abhorrent system. Since only comprehensive and mandatory sanctions can destroy the inhuman system of apartheid, member States of the ILO should take effective measures to apply such sanctions and fully apply the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia.

The question of human rights could be understood only if it is placed within the proper perspective of world economic, social and political reality. Unless it is seen within the objective reality of today's world, its attainment will be futile.

Our world is characterised by underdevelopment, undernourishment, indebtedness, an ever-widening gap between the prosperity of the North and the impoverishment of the South.

Today, more than ever before, the economic situation of the developing countries has assumed disastrous proportions. The debt of developing countries stands at more than $1 trillion; and this has obliged them to spend one-third of their export revenues to repay it. This means stagnation of industrial production, a constantly rising cost of living and mounting unemployment.

Since resources are disbursed in the form of debt-servicing, it has a tremendous impact on the availability of domestic resources for economic development. The problem of Third World indebtedness is further compounded by the steady decline in export earnings, as a result of the collapse in commodity prices on the world market.

Today, the spectre of famine is again affecting many African countries. Moreover, in developing countries, poverty has led to a growing malnutrition and the physical and mental disabilities associated with it, and a lack of preventive medicines has led to diseases which claim a high toll in human life. Illiteracy is another rampant problem in developing countries, and the poor performance of investment in key sectors of the economy has led to a general deterioration of the quality of life in developing countries.

The alleviation of economic and social problems, therefore, is a basic prerequisite for the attainment of genuine human rights. In this connection, the need for the ILO to harmonise its efforts with other United Nations agencies, with a view to mitigating the economic and social problems of developing countries, is imperative.

As is rightly pointed out in the Report of the Director-General, the realisation of the new international economic order is an essential element for the effective promotion of human rights and fundamental freedoms and, hence, should be given priority.

In Ethiopia, human rights are accorded a very high priority in the overall development process. We believe that economic and social rights are preconditions for the attainment of other rights.

The Constitution singles out the attainment of equality, justice, basic freedom and rights through the satisfaction of the material and spiritual needs of the broad masses and improvement of the standard of living of the masses.

The fundamental objective of our revolution is not only to satisfy the basic necessities of the people, but also to build a system through which Ethiopia will develop and the viable life of its people and their basic rights will be ensured.

As a result of the struggle waged for the last 14 years, the working people of Ethiopia have been able to attain numerous victories which have laid down a solid foundation for progress. The working people have not only abolished feudal production relations but also have provided the basis upon which to speed up collective progress.

Accordingly, solid foundations have been laid for guiding economic development through a system of central planning; special efforts are being made to boost productivity in agriculture and the utmost effort is being deployed for the development of industry and other economic sectors.

The organisation of the working people on various levels has also created a suitable platform for popular participation; for example, the Urban Dwellers' Association, Women's Association and the Youth Association.

The other significant stride towards the attainment of basic human rights was the promulgation of the Labour Proclamation of 1975, which established the All-Ethiopian Trade Union and gave unprecedented rights to the workers of Ethiopia.

To date, the Ethiopian Trade Union comprises 1,500 basic unions with a total membership of over 350,000 workers. Among the rights gained by the workers are: freedom of association and the right to organise, job security, improved working conditions, equality of women workers, non-discrimination in employment, pension rights and the right to participate fully in the nation's economic, political and social life.

A new Labour Code, which is being finalised in line with the Constitution, is expected to guarantee further rights to the workers.

The promulgation of the historical Rural Land Proclamation of 1975, which made the peasants owners of their land, restored to them their inherent rights. The peasants are now organised under more than 20,565 peasants' associations, 4,159 service co-operatives, and 2,922 producers' co-operatives with a membership of more than 10.4 million.

These peasants' associations have created new opportunities for smooth and effective dissemination of technologies and have expanded the opportunities for peasants to participate actively in agricultural and rural development ventures.

Within the programme of ensuring equal opportunity and treatment in accordance with the Declaration of Philadelphia, which affirmed the right of all human beings to pursue their material well-being and spiritual development, irrespective of their race, creed or sex, the Constitution of the People's Democratic Republic of Ethiopia guarantees equality between the sexes and nationalities. The People's Democratic Republic of Ethiopia has established the Revolutionary Ethiopia's Women's Association which has enabled women to participate in the economic mainstream of Ethiopian society by ensuring the necessary conditions of women to exercise their rights and discharge their responsibilities as mothers, workers and citizens. Concrete measures are also taken to ensure equality between nationalities through developing their culture and allowing their equal participation in the economic and social development of the country.

On the whole the Constitution provides for equality of all citizens before the law, the right to work, the right to free education, the right to health care, the right to inviolability of the person, freedom of conscience and religion, freedom of speech, press and assembly, peaceful demonstration and association.

I now turn to one of the issues for discussion during this session of the International Labour Conference, "Rural employment promotion". The problem of employment remains one of the extremely serious problems of our time, both in developing and developed countries.

Although numerous measures were taken by Ethiopia to alleviate the problem, we are still faced with an acute unemployment problem. Among the measures taken to promote employment is the nationalisation of rural land which has laid down the basis for the total transformation of the rural economy and has contributed to the alleviation of unemployment problems. As was stated earlier, the organisation of the peasants into various peasants' associations and the formation of producers' and service co-operatives have enhanced employment generation, as labour-intensive technological policy was adopted. In 1987 alone, employment created by service co-operatives reached 11,371 and is growing at the rate of 7 per cent per year in recent years. Many multi-faceted measures which would enable the agricultural sector to absorb and utilise increased human resources were also undertaken. I hope the participants of this Conference will deliberate upon and exchange ideas and experiences on the promotion of rural employment, since the creation of employment in the rural areas, where nearly 90 per cent of the population in developing countries lives, not only reduces rural-urban migration but also results in concrete improvements in the standards of living of the rural population.

The recent drought and famine that has affected the lives of millions of people in the northern part of our country is a great obstacle to our development efforts, and is being handled effectively by national efforts as well as by the efforts of regional and international organisations. In this connection, we wish to express our appreciation and thanks to all governments, regional, international and non-governmental organisations which have rendered assistance and are continuing to supplement our efforts to mitigate the present crisis in our country.

The role of the ILO in promoting the observance of human rights has been remarkable. The standard-setting work of the Organisation is one of its principal instruments for safeguarding human rights. Since its establishment, the main concern of the ILO has been the formulation of international labour standards which mainly deal with human rights such as the prohibition of forced labour, protection of the freedom of association, elimination of discrimination in employment and occupation, application of the principle of equal remuneration between men and women for work of equal value, full employment and others.

The Government of Ethiopia has always attached great importance to the standard-setting activities of the ILO, which is an ideal focus for social progress and a source of inspiration for legislative activities and national regulations in the field of labour.

Although a body of new standards on human rights had come into existence and earlier standards have been reviewed, there are still some Conventions, which are not revised so as to fully reflect the objective reality of today's world. Moreover, the work on the supervision of international labour standards still needs improvement in terms of their relevance to the present situation and future trends. The ILO must be ready to respond to emerging problems and to changing conditions.

The participation of member States of the ILO from developing countries in the formulation and adoption of international labour standards is also indispensable for an effective implementation of standards, as (most of the time) Conventions which have no relevance to developing countries are adopted by the General Conference, making it difficult for these countries to ratify and implement them. In this connection, the need for the ILO to finance some members of the delegations from the least developed countries becomes necessary in the face of the financial difficulties of these countries whose effective participation in the work of the International Labour Conference is hampered by financial problems.

Regarding the ILO's technical co-operation activities, we note that it is becoming an increasingly major means of action for attaining the objectives of the Organisation, notably in the area of application of international labour standards. As is rightly pointed out in the Report of the Director-General, the ILO should consolidate its standard-setting work and technical co-operation activities by linking them together. Joint action of member States and the ILO is needed to ensure the observance of human rights. The ILO should, hence, respond positively to the demands for assistance from developing countries based on their requirements and priorities. Likewise, its action must be harmonised with other United Nations bodies, as the enjoyment of human rights is a "common responsibility" involving the entire international community.

I wish this Conference great success in its deliberations.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. TLIBA (Workers' delegate, Tunisia) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I should like, first of all, to extend my most sincere congratulations to the President for the confidence placed in him and in his country by his election to the presidency of this annual session of the International Labour Conference. I am sure that this Conference will be crowned with success thanks to his competence and wisdom and to the co-operation of all the participants in it. I would also like to convey my cordial greetings to all those at this Conference, and request them to transmit these to the organisations they have the honour to represent and to their fraternal friendly countries.

May I ask the Director-General of the International Labour Office, who is our mutual friend, to accept my heartfelt congratulations on the successes he has achieved at the head of the ILO. We believe that these achievements honour all the member States of the Organisation.

The Tunisian Labour Union maintains excellent relations with the ILO as well as with other workers' organisations throughout the world, particularly those that defend the cause of law and justice. The Tunisian trade union movement came into being more than 70 years ago and ever since it has devoted itself to the struggle to defend the moral and physical rights of workers, thereby helping to reinvigorate the country and ensure its progress. Up to now, positive and fruitful results have been obtained; we continue to work unflaggingly to attain other goals and have every hope in an even better future. You are no doubt aware that in the last few years the trade union movement in Tunisia has experienced a number of difficulties that have led to an unusual situation and a disturbed climate in the union. But since May Day the normalisation of trade union activities and the reunification of the trade union organisation have begun, and some encouraging results have already been achieved. We hope that these efforts will culminate in a special conference before the end of this year with the participation of all categories of Tunisian workers, who are prepared to do everything they can to strengthen and advance the trade union movement so that the objectives of prosperity and social progress may be achieved for all.

The activities connected with the trade union situation in Tunisia are undertaken in an encouraging national climate following the change of power in Tunisia on 7 November 1987. This date is regarded as an important turning-point and a national event of historic dimensions. In the short lapse of time from that day to this, my country has been able to bring about a number of important developments in the economic, social and human spheres that have consolidated the foundations of the country and assured its effective protection against the dangers that threaten it. Among these developments, mention must be made of the measures taken in the field of human rights, notably the release of prisoners, permission for exiles to return, the encouragement of political pluralism, the improvement of the guaranteed minimum wage in order to raise the purchasing power of the lowest income groups, the creation of jobs, particularly for young people, the removal of guardianship over our professional associations and the establishment of organisations concerned with the defence of human rights and freedoms, notably the League of Human Rights and a branch of Amnesty International.

On the occasion of the 40th anniversary of the proclamation of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights we note, in this same year – 1988, the most fundamental flagrant violations of the most fundamental human right, namely the right to live, in the Middle East and more particularly in Palestine and in the other occupied Arab territories where Arab citizens are subjected to the most horrible forms of oppression, torture and mutilation, before the eyes and with the knowledge of world public opinion. The uprising of the inhabitants of the Palestinian occupied territories against Zionist colonisation testifies to the intensification of the repression by this colonising force and of their machinery of destruction.

The Israeli occupation authorities are not content with practising terrorism within Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories; they have exported it outside the area of conflict, violating, for the second time, the territorial integrity of my homeland and committing one of the most atrocious crimes of modern times by assassinating on our soil one of the symbols of the Palestinian revolution, the militant martyr, Abu Jihad, and several other innocent citizens, thereby violating all international practices and charters in defiance of world conscience and public opinion. We see the same practices repeated in South Africa as in the Middle East. There is a close parallel because the people of South Africa are living under the pressure of apartheid and the threat of destruction, and most of their leaders are languishing in prison, in particular the nationalist leader, Nelson Mandela, who has been imprisoned for 25 years. In giving all these examples, our purpose is to remind you that our organisation has a serious and difficult task, that the road before us is still a long one, bristling with obstacles, and that these sensitive areas of action call for greater will-power and determination on the part of the international community.

As regards the defence of human rights, wherever this may be needed and whatever the situation may be, although the Report of the Director-General that we are considering here deals with the problem of migrant workers and their occupational, social and cultural situation in the host countries, and despite all the efforts deployed by the ILO to assist them since its inception, the question of greater protection for this type of worker is still one of the principal concerns of all the forces that support human rights in the world. In this context, I would again like to request the ILO, on behalf of the Tunisian General Labour Union, to organise an international symposium to make an exhaustive study of the situation of migrant workers, particularly with regard to the future labour market in the united Europe of 1992, so that this category of workers can live, work and move around in that economic continent. This is a natural request for the protection of human rights.

Lastly, I would like to say a word about the worldwide arms race, whose consequences will be catastrophic for humankind unless it is halted. A large proportion of the world's resources are squandered for purposes of ruin and destruction, at a time when human beings urgently need these immense sums to combat poverty, famine, unemployment and disease. It is for the ILO to intensify its efforts in this field in order to contribute to halting the arms race.

I wish this Conference every success.

Mr. NEDZYNSKI (representative of the Postal, Telegraph and Telephone International) – I have the honour today to speak on behalf of the common front of free and democratic public service trade unions, comprising my own organisation, Postal, Telegraph and Telephone International, the Public Services International, International Federation of Employees in Public Services and the World Confederation of Teachers. Together, these organisations represent well over 25 million workers employed in the public services throughout the world.

The workers whom we represent provide a vast range of services essential for the well-being of all people and for economic development. It is impossible to imagine ever achieving the high ideals of this Organisation – the eradication of poverty, the dignity of labour, and social justice – without the effective provision of services such as health, water, education, communications and so on, which can only be provided by public services.

But the sector is important not only because of the benefits it provides to the population as a whole. It is important because in many countries the public services also constitute the largest employers and are responsible for the major part of investment in the economy. Studies by the ILO and other bodies show that the public sector in many countries accounts for about a third of total employment, and expenditure on public services often accounts for an even higher percentage of the gross domestic product.

It is, therefore, regrettable that when we examine the Director-General's Report on the Activities of the ILO in the past year, we find very few, if any, references to activities in this key sector.

Since the last session of the Conference, there has not been a single meeting which dealt with the problems facing any group of workers in the public sector. Studies and reports published in the same period have, at best, only been of indirect interest to our members.

We must repeat what we have said on previous occasions at this Conference. If the work of the ILO is to be relevant to workers, then it must reflect the massive changes in the distribution of labour which have taken place in the last few decades and which will continue in the foreseeable future.

If we look at only one group of workers which my organisation represents – telecommunications workers – we can see the scale of change taking place.

The Commission of the European Communities has estimated that by the end of the century, 7 per cent of the gross domestic product of the 12 Community countries will result from telecommunications and adjacent activities. They estimate that, via information technology, more than 60 per cent of employment in the Community will depend to an important degree on telecommunications by the year 2000.

Neither should it be imagined for one moment that workers in the public services have been enjoying a privileged or protected position. In country after country, in both the industrialised and the developing world, public services have been the subject of attacks and far-reaching reforms. Governments, forced by economic pressure, or just as frequently driven by misplaced ideological zeal, have been trying to cut back on public services and, in many cases, to hand them over to private enterprise.

Public service workers have seen their jobs threatened. Their conditions and terms of work and employment have been attacked. Permanent employment has been replaced by temporary or casual labour. Long-established procedures for the determination of conditions have been unilaterally set aside. And while this massive restructuring has been taking place, workers in many key sectors have been faced with the challenge of rapidly changing technology.

We claim no special privileges for the public services. We do believe that the ILO can make an important contribution to helping to find solutions to the multiple problems faced by public service workers. We also believe that solutions found to deal with problems in this crucial sector could be of importance to other groups of workers.

The meetings of the Joint Committee on the Public Service have agreed on numerous proposals about the ways in which the ILO should expand its activities concerning the public service. They have recommended that more standing committees should be created. We, of course, welcomed the creation of the Joint Committee on Post and Telecommunications. We welcomed the meeting on water, gas and electricity services. Although welcome, these developments are still far from sufficient.

We must repeat our demand that the ILO create permanent committees to deal with education, health and electricity, gas and water services.

We repeat our demand that a special branch should be created within the International Labour Office to deal with the public service sector.

The Fourth Session of the Joint Committee on the Public Service will take place later this year. Slightly more than five years will have elapsed since it last met.

No date has yet been fixed for the second meeting of the Joint Committee on Post and Telecommunications. The previous meeting was held in 1984. We strongly suggest that it is now long overdue and must be held as soon as possible.

The Director-General's Report on human rights identifies the crucial importance of a number of issues, such as freedom of association, freedom of expression and the independence of trade unions.

Many of these issues are of major significance for public service workers, though this is merely touched upon in the Report. For instance, the political rights of public service workers are unduly restricted in numerous countries, simply because they are public service workers.

In some countries, such as Indonesia or Turkey, the vast majority of public servants are denied the most basic trade union rights.

The Director-General stresses that "voluntary negotiation among autonomous parties remains of vital importance, precisely when it is viewed from a human rights perspective".

However, the negotiating rights of public servants are frequently severely limited compared to those of workers in other sectors. Public service trade unions cannot and will not accept that there is any justification whatsoever for this kind of discrimination against workers, merely because they are employed by public authorities or bodies. We will continue to insist that they must enjoy full and equal trade union rights.

We are particularly concerned that in recent years attacks on public service workers and their trade unions have increased. In many cases, governments seem to have identified trade unions as a major obstacle to their implementing of policies to cut back public services. Disturbingly, even in economically and socially developed countries with long traditions of the recognition of trade union rights of public servants, we have seen determined and ruthless attempts by governments to curb the activities of our unions.

The Director-General, quite rightly, stresses that the denial of racial equality and other fundamental human rights in South Africa is a challenge to the world's conscience.

In the struggle to overturn the apartheid system, which negates all concepts of human rights and dignities, one of the most significant factors in recent years has been the growth of the independent trade union movement. In the last year, we have seen major advances and bitter disputes in public service sectors, such as the railways and the Post Office.

Post Office workers in South Africa, last year, organised one of the first nation-wide strikes in the public service in that country. As a result, thousands of members of the Post Office workers' union were dismissed. Despite promises and fine words from the Government, more than 2,000 remain without a job.

By one means or another, the Government seems determined to try to crush that union. Thanks to the courage of the workers involved, it has not succeeded. Indeed, today the union organises four times as many members as it did last year.

Our International, the PTTI, together with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, has given (and will continue to give) as much support and assistance as is possible to that union.

While I have stressed the importance of problems facing public sector workers and their unions, we recognise that all workers, regardless of their employment or the country in which they live, must be able to exercise their fundamental human and trade union rights.

This Organisation must continue to stress that, whatever the economic or social system, it cannot accept excuses for non-observance of these rights.

The Director-General suggests in his Report a number of innovative ways in which the ILO might develop its role in enforcing international labour standards. It is, of course, necessary to try to find new ways in which the Organisation might fulfil its task.

However, the ILO must continue to insist that member States live up to their obligations as Members of this Organisation and observe the recommendations which it makes. This must be so in a case such as the United Kingdom, which continues to refuse to allow a significant group of workers in GCHQ the right to belong to a trade union, in violation of recommendations of this Organisation.

This must be so in the case of Poland, where the Government has repeatedly refused to implement the recommendations made in 1983 by the special Commission of Inquiry. Recent events in Poland have shown that whatever claims are made by the Polish Government or by its official unions, workers in Poland want to be allowed to form their own independent trade unions.

They want their union "Solidarność" to be legally recognised once again. We will continue to support that totally justified demand, however much official delegates from that country may protest. We will continue to support the high ideals and principles upon which this Organisation was founded.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. HUSSAIN (Employers' delegate, Iraq) – I should like to begin by conveying to you, Sir, the greetings of the employers of the Republic of Iraq and to offer you, on behalf of the employers' delegation, our sincere congratulations on your election to the presidency of this Conference. I am sure that your skill and experience will ensure its success.

The 75th Session of the International Labour Conference coincides with the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. The Director-General has presented us with a major Report describing the measures taken by the Organisation and the documents it has published over the years on the protection of human rights throughout the world, as befits one of the great international organisations responsible for protecting these rights.

On the occasion of the discussion of this Report we are filled with bitterness at the sufferings endured by the children of our Palestinian people and the violations of human rights and trade union freedoms by the Israeli occupying authorities. The barbaric acts of repression perpetrated by these authorities against the unarmed Palestinian people are by now known to all and have perhaps even become daily fodder for the international press agencies to disseminate throughout the media. Hundreds of Palestinians, employers, trade unionists and students are the victims of repression and organised terrorism by the occupying authorities aimed at expelling them from their factories, their homes and their lands. This campaign has been intensified in recent months and dozens of inhabitants have been expelled, and their houses destroyed, on the pretext that they have participated in the popular uprising claiming the legitimate rights recognised by the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. These inhuman practices, aimed at paralysing the energies of the Palestinian youth, are not only contrary to the spirit of the ILO Constitution and the two resolutions passed by the International Labour Conference in 1974 and 1980 but also a flagrant violation of the Geneva Conventions of 1949.

In the name of the Iraqi Employers' delegation we call upon the Conference to condemn the acts of repression and terrorism perpetrated by the Israeli occupying authorities against the Arab youth and workers in the occupied Arab territories, to invite the Director-General of the ILO to redouble efforts to provide assistance and support to the Arab employers in the occupied territories and to invite the Governing Body to set up a committee to ensure the follow-up of these resolutions by the occupying authorities.

Since the beginning of last year an administrative revolution has been going on in my country aimed at making radical changes in the structuring of economic and administrative activities. The object of these changes is to strengthen the role of the private sector and employers in the development process. From now on private investment can participate in projects which were previously a state preserve, and responsibility for running a number of public enterprises has been transferred to the private sector as part of a policy aimed at strengthening the role of the employers in economic life and opening up new prospects for this sector. The employers have welcomed this revolution and have made essential changes in certain industries with a view to modernising them and making them safe for the workers. In the early months of this year a number of old factories were closed so that new technology could be installed in them to guarantee the workers' safety in conformity with the progressive legislation promulgated by Iraq in the field of occupational safety and health.

I shall not dwell on the considerable development that has been occurring in my country in numerous fields and especially in that of employment. This development could have been even more extensive and more rapid and ensured the well being of all our citizens and the workers in particular. However, the pursuit of the war imposed upon us and the desire of the other party to continue this war and its rejection of all appeals and resolutions by international and regional institutions to settle the conflict by peaceful means and by negotiation have had a negative influence upon our development efforts, which can only prosper and succeed in a climate of peace.

My country has always sought peace and called for a halt to the war and the holding of negotiations. It has taken countless initiatives and launched numerous appeals for peace since the start of the war and up to the present day. It has also accepted all the resolutions passed by international bodies calling for peace, the latest of which was resolution 598 expressing the unanimous desire of the international community. This is why I invite this Conference to join its voice to those of all men of good will throughout the world to demand an end to this war which serves the interests of neither of the two warring countries so that peace can be established in the region, the workers return to their factories and combatants resume their work of construction and development.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – Mr. Hussain, I must remind you, in accordance with article 14, paragraph 4, of the Standing Orders, that you have strayed from the subject of our discussion. I must ask you to revert to the item under discussion.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. HUSSAIN – I call on this Conference to join with all people of good will in the world to appeal for an end to this war, which serves the interests of nobody in the region or in the world at large.

(Mr. Adiko takes the Chair.)

Mr. IEUMBUMROONG (Workers' delegate, Thailand) – It is indeed my great pleasure and honour to be present here today and to participate in this Conference.

I should like to look back over 91 years of history in Thailand, starting in 1897.

The Tramway Employees Association was considered to be the first organisation of workers in our country and its objectives were to protect their privileges and all benefits they deserved.

Sixty-three years later, in 1960, the economic structure was reformed. The effect of the reformation was that we modelled our economy on the industrial development of the Western countries. Millions of workers left their homes in rural areas to the capital hoping that they would gain a better living.

During the so-called "Dictator Government" period, the wage-rate was only eight to ten bahts per day, compared to seventy-three bahts at present. But the workers' way of life is still unchanged. The increased wage-rate has not kept pace with increases in the cost-of-living. While the majority of people are workers or farmers, they are still very poor. They cannot expect or hope for any improvements in the future. They have no security in their lives. Imagine what it must feel like for a family when the breadwinner is paid only 73 bahts per day in exchange for his hard working labour! Moreover, despite the low wage-rate, there are still more than 40 per cent of entrepreneurs who refused to pay their workers the statutory minimum wage.

There are four basic human needs: food, clothing, housing and medical care. In other professions, all these needs are covered, but for workers only two can be guaranteed: food and clothing. With only 73 bahts a day, it is impossible even to think about owning a low-price small house. There are no employers' or government provisions in the event of sickness, accidents or death. This is the reason why we really need the Social Security Law.

It is regretful to have to mention the disgraceful tactics of some entrepreneurs. By using loopholes in the law, they conclude short-term contracts with workers who are forced to accept. When there was a serious problem of unemployment, some entrepreneurs took advantage and forced workers to accept the working conditions they dictated. Of course, the workers, wishing to earn their living, have to accept.

Besides inadequate wages which are below the subsistence level, labour contracts never provide for any security or any social welfare. The lack of occupational safety and health provisions and the low level of public health mean that workers are unprotected at work. The statistics on occupational accidents and sickness are on the increase.

There is a saying to the effect that the worker creates the world. But why is the creator himself leading such an unsettled and miserable life! Is this the justice of our society?

The Government is now aiming to bring industry in line with that of the Western countries. We hope that Thailand will become the fifth tiger in the next five, ten or fifteen years. As far as our fellow workers are concerned we only hope that the Government will step up action to solve our problems. Justice must be attained – and it is the Government's responsibility. If obstacles are put in its way, it means that the Government aims at industrialising our country at the expense of its workers.

Furthermore, the privatisation policy must be reconsidered. The Government should not sell our properties to private sectors, either domestic or international. Why has the Government granted opportunities to foreign entrepreneurs to make them more forceful? What security will the majority of people have? Who will be responsible for the effect caused by this policy? The answer is no one but the majority of people made up of workers, farmers and the under-privileged.

On the past International Labour Day, 1 May, we submitted a declaration to trade unions meeting all over the country, in which it was emphasised that the Government had to solve five labour problems immediately. These were as follows: the Social Security Law has to be adopted urgently, on the lines of all the industrialised countries; all laws with loopholes, especially those authorising short-term contracts, should be reformed; the working conditions and public safety and health provisions for workers in every branch of industry should be improved; the statutory minimum wage rate should be raised to meet the needs of workers and their families; the privatisation policy should be abandoned.

The presence of all of us here is an indication of our earnest intention to overcome labour problems. I hope that this Conference will reach a successful conclusion and achieve all its objectives leading to a new era of our labour world.

Mr. NOWAK (Employers' delegate, Poland) – On behalf of the members of the Polish Employers' Committee for Foreign Relations, I join all those who congratulated the President on his election to this high post. I wish him and his deputies much success in leading this Conference.

The Director-General's Report recalled three anniversaries taking place in 1988 and closely associated with the development of the idea of human rights: the proclamation of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights of the United Nations in 1948; the adoption of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87); and the adoption of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111).

The Declaration of Human Rights and the two international labour Conventions concerning human rights had and continue to have considerable impact on the development of social and political relations in the contemporary world. Although not always stressed in the Director-General's Report, the gap between aspirations and achievements in the human rights field remains very wide. The aspirations of nations correspond to their achievements. The influence of public opinion on the implementation and practical use of the ideas contained in these documents help to reduce these disparities.

The Report states that in the developing countries 70 million people are unemployed. Close to 500 million are underemployed, and about 900 million live in extreme poverty. Unemployment also exists in the rich countries of the OECD. We followed with hope the talks between representatives of the two great Powers and our desire is that they achieved significant limitation of the arms race and that they will use the resources saved as a means to improve mankind's living standards.

I agree with Director-General's remark that "European countries with a centrally planned economy have sought to maintain the full utilisation of labour, but insufficient productivity and rigidities in the functioning of the economy have affected living conditions. Currently, there is a move towards basic reforms in the management of the economy...", and with a similar opinion expressed on page 38. These two points are apt in relation to my country. The second stage of the economic reform which is now being implemented in Poland brings about further independence of enterprises, and the new pay system links the level of earnings with the enterprise's efficiency. Limits on the building of new factories remain, and this encourages the modernisation of existing factories, which is the appropriate policy from the viewpoint of the country's economic needs. Enterprises which increase their production for export enjoy reduced taxation and preferential wages.

All the changes mentioned above, which were introduced in 1987, have contributed to an increase in the efficiency of our national economy and to a higher level of exports of goods and services. In this way, the reforms have already achieved favourable results, though not enough to meet the expectations and aspirations of the people. These expectations and aspirations have recently given rise to strikes in several factories. The strikes have now ended, and the idea of trying to spread them to other enterprises failed to appeal to the workers. It seems that a social awareness is growing in my country that strikes are not the best way to improve the economic situation and that the implementation of the reforms should be accompanied by higher discipline on the part of all those who conceive and implement them.

Many OECD countries have introduced thoroughgoing technological changes in their factories and have rationalised their production, and they are now reaping the rewards of higher labour productivity and higher quality products. These changes are often made without reference to trade unions, and even in indirect conflict with union protest.

The Director-General described such a situation as follows: "Often the position of trade unions has been weakened by declining membership, legislative restrictions and, at times, deliberate anti-union discrimination".

In Poland the union membership rate exceeds 60 per cent, which means that it is three times higher than in the United States and about twice as high as in many developed countries. Polish trade unions have been granted considerable powers, such as workers' self-management.

Comparing the rights enjoyed by employers in, for example, the United States, the United Kingdom, or Japan, and bearing in mind the high discipline in enterprises there (which is frequently associated with the elimination of trade union influence), the power of the Polish director is greatly curtailed, to the benefit of worker self-management.

I was very impressed by the ILO Report The trade union situation and industrial relations in Austria, published in 1986. In this valuable report, ILO experts point to the efficiency of the Austrian social partnership system, where only one trade union, the Österreichischer Gewerkschaftsbund, is operating. The ILO experts found this system to be unusually efficient and good for the entire nation. During my visit to Vienna last April, and while talking with representatives of the Federal Economic Chamber, I verified the smoothness of the system's functioning which was reflected in the small number of strikes, among other things.

I hope that a greater role for the Chamber of Industry and Commerce, which forms part of the second stage of reform, will help to resolve some of the problems facing Polish employers. The proposed legislation on the so-called status of the director will define the role of the director in the enterprise more exactly.

The process of democratisation in Poland has made further progress in expanding the basis for dialogue between the authorities and society. This dialogue is already taking place, particularly in the Socio-Economic Council of the Sejm (Parliament), the Economic Council of the Government, a consultative organ acting for the President of the Council of State and composed of opposition people who wish to continue dialogue with the Government, the Constitutional Tribunal, the Ombudsman who commenced his activities on 1 January 1988.

Both the Ombudsman and the Constitutional Tribunal have returned a number of verdicts in favour of citizens, which have thus modified the Government's actions.

The new and promising idea of increased dialogue between opposition and government representatives is now widely discussed. The name of the proposed organisation is the "Anti-Crisis Pact" and the theme of the dialogue is the current socio-economic situation in my country.

The election law for the people's Councils has eliminated the monopolistic right of Polish political parties to nominate candidates. Now the candidates can be nominated also by various social organisations, among them groups of individuals affiliated to residents' associations.

In recent months the public was presented with interesting proposals under which socialised enterprises will be run by commissions of private persons who have enough money to pay a deposit. These enterprises can employ up to 250 people.

The new regulations made it easier for Polish citizens to open private commercial firms and services of various types and also industrial undertakings with the required formalities being reduced to a minimum. Some of the large enterprises run by the States have started selling shares and obligations. As a result of the changes in the regulations, the number of private enterprises is increasing in Poland.

Further changes were made to ease the regulations which allow Polish state-owned enterprises to form companies, joint ventures with foreign enterprises, etc. In Poland foreign investors are now permitted to run their own enterprises fully based on their foreign capital. A dozen or so big companies and about 900 medium-sized and small enterprises with foreign capital have already been operating in Poland for several months.

By taking up the question of human rights, the Director-General will certainly contribute to enhancing the role of the ILO in the contemporary world. I wish to congratulate him and also to thank the staff for providing well-prepared documents for the use of the delegations to this 75th Session of the International Labour Conference.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. PEREYRA (Workers' delegate, Uruguay) – First of all, I should like to congratulate the President on his election at this session of the Conference of the ILO. We also congratulate the other Officers.

Turning now to the agenda, we feel that the topic was excellently chosen by the Director-General for his Report which is being submitted for the consideration of the 75th Conference.

Few matters can be of greater importance for the workers of the world than human rights which embrace, as the Director-General said, civil, political, economic, social and cultural rights. In discussing ways of guaranteeing such rights, he asks the very important question, "Have we the willpower to overcome the crisis together or are we going merely to continue coping with it as best we can"; and he goes on to ask, "Are we going to resign ourselves to it?"

Mentioning the struggle against need which inspires ILO activities, activities which have to be continued with unflagging energy, he asks, "can trade unions be held responsible for such major aspects of the world economy as turbulence in the monetary system, Third World indebtedness, famine and poverty, or the shifts in methods of production brought about by technological changes?" (English text, pp. 14-15).

In his defence of human rights, the Director-General also mentions freedom of association as being enshrined in various international instruments like the Declaration of Philadelphia, annexed to the Constitution of the ILO, and the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), which has been ratified by Uruguay. However, despite the fact that our country also ratified the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), trade union militants and leaders are not in practice duly protected.

Employers are free to dismiss workers whose behaviour, although within the bounds of the law, goes against their profit motive and naturally they badly abuse this freedom granted by the Government. In this respect, mention should be made of Decree No. 93, dated 3 February 1986, which bans and punishes discrimination against trade unions, but stipulates only very light fines for those who violate its provisions.

All this was the subject of a denunciation we submitted to the Director-General on 14 May 1987, Case No. 1403. We have not, however, been notified of the decision taken. At the same time, we must also state our objection to the illegal limitation on the right to strike by the false declaration that certain services were essential.

In analysing human rights, the Director-General touched upon another issue of great topical interest to workers in our country, namely wages. The document submitted to this Conference for its consideration states: "The general principle of voluntary negotiation among autonomous parties remains of vital importance, precisely when it is viewed from a human rights perspective, implying the ability of individuals to say on what conditions they are prepared to provide their labour" (English text, p. 19). Violation of this very principle by the Government of Uruguay led this delegation, in the course of this Conference, to lodge a new denunciation with the ILO. Uruguay, as we stated, has ratified Convention No. 98 and is therefore duty-bound to promote collective bargaining. This is the method advised by the ILO in setting salaries. The Uruguayan Government, taking advantage of a legal instrument enacted under the dictatorship, Legislative Decree 14.791, which enables it unilaterally to determine salaries in the private sector, is taking an aggressive stance in tripartite negotiations, laying down guide-lines which it seeks to impose unlawfully on the parties. The application of these guide-lines is tantamount to a clear drop in the purchasing power of wages.

To this end, increases beyond the limits laid down in these guide-lines are prevented from being reflected in prices; to put the finishing touch to this well-constructed system, the Government has announced that any collective agreement which does not fall into line with these guide-lines will not be approved. In order fully to understand the scope of the Government's policy we should recall the fact that Uruguayan workers' wages today amount to hardly 64 per cent of their wages at the beginning of the dictatorship.

Similarly, it should be mentioned that the minimum national wage in May of this year was equivalent to US$73. This is equivalent to 90 per cent of the value in July 1985. It should also be known that in 1970 the payroll was equivalent to 42 per cent of national income, whereas today it amounts to a scanty 27.8 per cent. A fact of great relevance to this situation is that during the year there has been a transfer from the private to the business sector of US$120 million.

It is obvious therefore that Uruguayan workers have not accepted and will not accept such government dictates imposed in the name of an anti-inflation policy.

In this respect, we feel that the best response to the situation was formulated by the Director-General himself when he referred to the fact that "the fight against inflation has emerged as a ... preoccupation for many of the world's policy-makers," adding that "less costly means of curbing inflation than recession and unemployment must be found". On the same point the Director-General continues: "of particular concern is that the most vulnerable groups of the population, already affected by the economic impact of the crisis often find their employment opportunities, income and living standards further eroded by painful stabilisation and structural readjustment measures".

As regards wages, another aim of our confederation is that the interested parties themselves – rural workers and people in domestic service – should be involved in setting the wages. This demand has not received support. On the contrary, it is totally ignored by the Government.

In our country there is another important violation of fundamental rights referred to in the document of the Director-General under consideration. In the chapter on the right to equality of treatment, the document states: "There is, for example, the question of the status and conditions of workers in public employment. While in many countries there is a trend to assimilate their position to that of workers in the private sector, significant differences still exist. Often they reflect traditional approaches more than objective differences in the character of the functions performed". In Uruguay, there is an unacceptable system for setting public sector wages. In state commercial and industrial enterprises, collective bargaining is not used, as pointed out by the report of the mission sent by the ILO to our country to study industrial relations in December 1986.

In the rest of the public sector, too, the central administration and other departments, the methods of setting wages do not include collective bargaining; wages are established according to the decision of the respective authorities. It is worth pointing out that, according to official figures, workers in the central administration had a 2 per cent increase in terms of their real salaries, but if we compare inflation with government decrees, we can see that there has been a transfer in income from the salaried sector to the State amounting to 16 per cent.

This flows from the implementation of an anti-people policy which seeks to pursue purely economic and financial goals. Social aims take second place. Thus in Uruguay the system of health protection has deteriorated to unacceptable levels; there has been an increase in unemployment as well as a rural exodus. This goes hand in hand with the concentration of capital and a furthering of private interests which seek to give the country away to foreigners.

A key point in this policy is the recent approval of Law No. 15.921 which sets up tax-free zones. On the one hand, these favour foreign capital; on the other hand, they will have a negative impact on the weak industrial structure of our country. This inevitably affects the conditions of employment of the country's workers.

I now wish to refer specifically to unemployment. ECLAC reported that more than 740,000 Uruguayans, that is 25 per cent of the overall population, are under the poverty line and 12 per cent are indigent. For every ten Uruguayans who wish to work, one is unemployed and 1 1/2 are underemployed. This is the time once again to recall the impact that the foreign debt has on this aspect of people's lives. In our country in the 1985-87 period, this debt increased by 20 per cent despite the fact that $350 million has been paid on the average each year over the past few years. The burden of the debt as at March 1985 amounted to $1,500 per inhabitant; as at 1 March 1988, it amounted to $1,870; as at 1 May 1990, it will have risen to $2,100 per inhabitant.

At present, Uruguayan workers are faced with a situation which is directly linked with human rights. As is well known, we are directly attacked under the still not so distant dictatorship; we had to suffer arrests, exiles, torture and assassinations. When Uruguay began to set up its institutions once again, during a transitional period – which we are still under going – an Act was adopted which granted impunity to those who, from within the state structures themselves, had committed these violations of human rights. The people's reaction was immediate, and in accordance with the Constitution of the Republic, the requisite signatures have been gathered to hold a plebiscite which will enable the people, on the basis of their sovereign right, to repeal this law which should never have been approved. Indeed, 634,702 citizens have signed the request for a referendum. This is far in excess of the 25 per cent that is laid down by the Constitution of the Republic.

To conclude, we wish to say that we have come once again to this Conference with the aim of helping the ILO attain its objective, which is set out in the first paragraph of its Constitution, namely: universal and lasting peace can be established only if it is based upon social justice. Peace and disarmament are absolutely necessary for the development and progress of peoples.

This is the right time to recall, as the Director-General has done, that 1988 marks the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and that of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

These are undoubtedly two of the most important documents for peoples and workers in this century. The first, as pointed out by the Director-General, covers the concepts of human dignity, tolerance and solidarity. The second made workers responsible participants in the human endeavour. Under the protection of this Convention, they have been able to join with their fellow men in building a better world.

We wish to greet all the participants to this Conference. We hope for a dignified peace in Nicaragua. We wish to express our support for the peoples of Panama, Paraguay, Chile, El Salvador, Colombia and Guatemala; also, the Arab workers in Israel and the occupied territories. We strongly condemn violations of human rights in that area.

Once again, we wish to reiterate the historic solidarity of the Uruguayan trade union movement represented by our confederation PIT-CNT.

Mr. HILB (Employers' delegate, Israel) – It gives me pleasure to congratulate the President on his election. I should also like to commend the Director-General on his excellent Report on human rights and international labour standards contained in Part I.

I should like now to comment on the Report contained in Appendix III. Before doing so, however, I have to express my deep sorrow that the Director-General, in his Preamble to that appendix, found it necessary to deviate from the long and proud tradition of impartiality, objectivity and refraining from value judgements which have characterised his own and other ILO leaders' attitudes hitherto. He made a point of qualifying riots and acts of terror perpetrated by extremists among the Arab population, armed and led by the PLO and other terrorist organisations, as an "uprising"; he furthermore states that the status quo cannot last and bases this statement on "universal agreement".

There seems to be a basic contradiction in the Director-General's attitude. He places all the emphasis on the political side of the Palestinian conflict without leaving much doubt as to which side he identifies with. Yet, since the ILO is a social and not a political organisation, his emphasis makes it crystal-clear that the solution of the conflict is outside the scope of the ILO's competence.

As to the report of the official visitors itself, there are several questions beyond one's comprehension. One of them is that while the mission notes that what they call an "uprising" results in organising strikes of commerce in the areas and employment in Israel, either by persuasion or by intimidation, facts that doubtless result in serious obstacles to normal economic activities, the mission concentrates on some, mainly imaginery, restrictions of freedom of opportunity and choice imposed by the Israeli Government which are marginal, if at all.

Another question of this kind is: while Israel offers growingly gainful employment to all the unemployed in the areas, including those that became redundant in the Persian Gulf countries, the mission insists on blaming Israel for "draining off" about 38 per cent of the active population of the territories. Would they blame the United States of America for draining off Ireland's active population if they decided that this is within their competence?

Contrary to the apprehension expressed by the mission's previous reports that unemployment in Israel would be exported to the administered areas, the reality was otherwise, and the employment of residents of Judea, Samaria and Gaza in Israel was not reduced, but even increased and reached more than 100,000 workers in 1987, while the level of unemployment in Judea, Samaria and Gaza dropped to below 3 per cent during this year. Even the ILO delegation reports in paragraph 19 that "a purely arithmetical comparison of the data shows an unemployment rate for 1987 estimated at 2.2 per cent".

While the mission reports in paragraph 65 the negative influence of the settlements in the administered areas regarding the structure of local agriculture, it fails to review and analyse in this connection the substantial increase in agricultural output and productivity which has occurred in local farming. The successful application of modern technology to agriculture in the areas has resulted in a marked expansion of farm output which significantly increased productivity and incomes. This improvement in agricultural performance is a major factor to be taken into account in any consideration of the utilisation of land and water resources in this region.

It is disturbing that the official mission has again failed to present an objective view of the overall situation by not comparing the situation in the areas under discussion with the trends that existed there previous to 1967. Had they done so, they could not deny the provable facts that the pace and pattern of economic activity, the growth in employment, the virtual elimination of unemployment and the improvement in the levels of living, wages and social benefits, education and training since 1967 stand in sharp contrast to earlier periods and compare favourably with those of neighbouring countries, other developing regions and with the United Nations development goals. Before 1967 and the advent of Israeli administration in the areas, the situation there was characterised by a low level of development, slow growth, substantial emigration, a very low educational level, very limited capital stock, low employment and the stagnation of income levels.

It is with regret that I must confess to a great disappointment. Since this is the first yearly session of the Conference which I have attended, I admit that I had expected and looked forward to quite a different experience. I had hoped to listen to and maybe participate in serious deliberations on international standards, technical assistance and the exchange of professional experience. What I actually found are many delegates attacking my country, abusing this rostrum to make unrestrained accusations having no basis in fact – be it even facts mentioned by the mission. This is the price that we pay for permitting this Organisation to deviate from its normal and legitimate causes and to slip into political brawls.

I hope that those delegates who are genuinely concerned with the best interests of this Organisation and the aims for which it has been established will do their utmost to return the ILO to its proper course.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. GOMES (representative of the Latin American Central of Workers) – First of all, we would like to refer to the Report of the Director-General focused, in particular, on human rights, as this is the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention (No. 87).

In Latin America, through the struggle of the peoples and the workers, we are freeing ourselves from the various dictatorships and establishing major processes of democratisation in virtually all countries. In the light of this new situation we would like to refer very briefly to the situation of human rights and, in particular, to freedom of association in our region. In both respects, major progress is being made in comparison with the situations that existed under the now overthrown dictatorships and in those countries where dictatorships still exist. None the less, we want to condemn with special energy and concern the situation obtaining in every country as a result of the neo-liberal and monetarist handling of the current crisis by the political, economic and financial powers. Indeed, the socio-economic and cultural components of human rights are now at stake for they are ignored and flouted, mainly because of the handling of the external debt but, above all, because of the prescriptions and policies laid down by the International Monetary Fund which basically acts as the long arm of the transnational financial centres. The CLAT, together with many other organisations of workers, has been denouncing and repudiating this situation, which violates the most fundamental human right – the right to life – among most of our populations. The Church itself, in December of last year, condemned the current handling of the debt, and its socio-economic consequences, as violating the ethics of survival, that is, the most fundamental rights of human beings and workers.

At the Fifth Latin American Conference on the Human Rights of Workers and Peoples, held in November of last year at Mar del Plata, Argentina, and sponsored by CLAT, all these problems were discussed in depth and the Latin American Charter of Rights and Freedoms of Workers and People was adopted. We officially transmitted this Charter to the President of this session of the Conference and the Director-General of the ILO.

This document clearly defines all the social, economic, political and cultural requirements that flow from human rights and workers' rights. They should be fully shouldered by civilian society and governments if genuine progress is to be made with the democratisation and consolidation of democratic societies based on true genuine freedom, social justice, solidarity and popular participation.

In this same context, we wish to insist on what we have already denounced in preceding ILO Conferences. There is a fatal and unacceptable contradiction between the policies and values which, on a tripartite basis, we are building and promoting through the ILO, and the policies and values defended and upheld by the International Monetary Fund, although both institutions are part and parcel of the United Nations system, and both are duty-bound to uphold and promote the same human rights throughout the world.

In terms of freedom of association, improvements have occurred but once again we must denounce the absolute lack of freedom of association under the dictatorships of different kinds that still exist in Latin America.

We also wish to refer to situations obtaining in countries with civilian governments, elected by the people, which purport to be democratic regimes. First of all, we wish to denounce the behaviour and policies of certain very powerful, influential sectors of private enterprise which use all sorts of ways and means to prevent the workers from organising freely.

I wish to refer, in particular, to the situation in Ecuador, Colombia, Costa Rica, El Salvador and Guatemala. In the latter two countries, there are certain private enterprise sectors which go so far as to destroy trade union organisations in their enterprises. In the case of Guatemala, some sectors of private enterprise – as the Government itself has emphasised – financed and supported the recent attempted military coup against the democratic regime. What is most serious is that these anti-trade union situations are almost always viewed with indifference by the governments themselves, which fail to enforce full respect for freedom of association.

Unfortunately, we must also point out that in Venezuela – a country where, in general, there is respect for freedom of association – for some inexplicable reason, two brothers from our affiliate (the CGT) have been imprisoned for more than one year without any justification. We would request the Committee on Freedom of Association to continue its action until these two brothers are freed.

We wish clearly to state that in other parts of Latin America private enterprise in general has understood in practice that it is fitting and necessary for workers to be able to organise freely; the positive results that this has achieved for all are obvious.

However, there are many complicated, different situations. Consequently there is a need for better documented, more specific study in this regard. Therefore, the CLAT wishes formally to propose to this Conference that it set up, as a matter of urgent necessity, an ILO committee to check in the field the conduct and action of certain private enterprise organisations, in order to verify such violations of freedom of association. We cannot allow this situation to continue any longer; especially if one takes into account the fact that these sectors, though presenting themselves as the most fanatic defenders of totally free markets and free enterprise, are denying the workers all possibility of free and democratic organisation.

Although these neo-liberal arguments are highly debatable, when all is said and done democratic freedoms are indivisible. There can be no freedom for those who represent capital and repression and even the physical liquidation of those of us who are struggling for the rights and freedoms of labour and its workers.

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT (Mr. ADIKO) – I am sorry. Your time is up and we still have a long list of speakers. Kindly conclude your statement.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. GOMES – We consider that in Latin America it is necessary to pursue a special campaign along these lines. With the active participation of the ILO, trade union organisations and other social, political and cultural protagonists, in order to speed up policies, programmes and activities in favour of our populations in general.

Mr. MELIN (Employers' delegate, Finland) – First, I should like to congratulate the President, Mr. Beyreuther, on his election and give him all the well-deserved credit for the able way in which he is chairing our meeting. My congratulations also go to the Vice-Presidents.

One part of the Report of the Director-General is the ILO Medium-Term Plan 1990-95, which contains the main ideas for future action of the Office. From Chapter 1, "The world situation in the 1990s: New challenges and the ILO response", I quote: "Another key component in ILO work on the implementation of long-term employment promotion and structural adjustment strategies must be the development of a climate favouring entrepreneurship and the expansion of the small enterprise sector".

The Finnish employers strongly support the ILO's activities to develop entrepreneurship and small enterprises in developing countries and, in particular, such training activities that are carried out by the employers' organisations in these countries. We should be happy to share our experiences and know-how with our employer colleagues in the developing world. I therefore should like to refer to some ideas and experiences as regards encouragement and training for entrepreneurship in Finland.

Unemployment has been a problem in our country. At the same time, however, there has been a growing shortage of labour. The shortage involves trained, skilled staff.

On the other hand, the employment files are full of untrained and unskilled workers. This situation will only grow worse in the future unless additional emphasis is placed on training. At the same time, new jobs must be created to replace jobs that have been lost. This means supporting enterprise and entrepreneurship.

Finland's economic development and employment have always been based on entrepreneurship and its ideas. Many factories which have grown into large production units began as small village workshops. If we do not have such small shops today, we shall not have large ones tomorrow.

Business enterprises provide work, income and security. In order to ensure employment and welfare, a basic strategy has been to stimulate enterprise and entrepreneurship. New Finnish legislation regarding vocational training in fact calls for teaching enterprise and for improving knowledge of enterprise activities.

What is enterprise? Enterprise includes external enterprise, or the establishment of a business and its operation as an independent entrepreneur. It also includes internal enterprise, or enterprising activity at school, in one's free time or in the service of a business.

Enterprise consists of qualities which are not inborn. They are acquired at home, at work and through training. Since many of these qualities are assimilated in youth or perhaps mainly at home, training in entrepreneurship and how to develop an enterprise must begin early in life.

The goal should be to see that training young persons to be entrepreneurs is viewed as an equal alternative to working in another person's service. School-age students should also be trained in internal enterprise.

This requires that teachers accept the idea that training students in enterprise and entrepreneurship be included in all forms of teacher training; instruction promoting enterprise and entrepreneurship should be included in the curricula for general studies as well as for vocational training and university studies; enterprise should be included in textbooks and other teaching materials and taken into consideration in local curricula; efforts should be made to make students' and teachers' attitudes more favourable to enterprise; co-operation between educational institutions and business should be promoted; students and teachers should be given a chance to learn about business.

The first step in training students to become entrepreneurs is to develop their internal enterprise. This is reflected in diligence, initiative, creativity, goal orientation and the striving to achieve better results.

At the municipal level, enterprise and entrepreneurship can be promoted by encouraging students at vocational training institutes to establish small-scale businesses. These businesses would conduct small-scale production activities in school facilities and sell products or services in the school's immediate environment.

Enterprise and entrepreneurship can also be promoted by starting "mock companies" at school, whose operations would be simulated as if they were real enterprises; allowing students to buy shares of local enterprises such as banks, insurance companies, wholesalers or industrial companies and then have them follow stock market progress; using various business games, either computer-based or otherwise, as part of instruction; increasing business management training in all educational institutions; and inviting entrepreneurs to schools to speak about their businesses.

As of the 1980s, entrepreneurship and enterprises have acquired a new status in the ongoing social and political debate in my country.

It has been commonly understood and accepted that entrepreneurship plays an essential role both as a possible career for individuals and as a generator of economic development and provider of employment. It is especially important because it creates new jobs. Experience has shown that permanent opportunities for work can be created most economically by prospering enterprises.

Public opinion in Finland has traditionally been quite positive towards entrepreneurship. However, the socio-political development by the end of the 1960s and the beginning of the 1970s led some political decision-makers and mass media to adopt a stand which was almost hostile to entrepreneurship.

It is difficult to say which factors accounted for the change in the general atmosphere from the beginning of the 1980s. The hard lesson in economic policy Finns had to learn during the down-swing resulting from the energy crisis certainly plays an essential part in the positive development of this new attitude.

Experience of high inflation and rising unemployment in the 1970s achieved one object which should not be underestimated, and that is the education of the general public, political parties and employers as well as unions in the inexorable laws of economics. Everybody, from individual citizens to the highest political decision-makers, had to admit that without profitable and competitive enterprises the standard of living could not be raised nor the employment situation controlled, let alone improved.

Something similar has happened also in education. A decade ago it was useless to look for the introduction of the concept of entrepreneurship or the role of the entrepreneur in standard curricula or textbooks. The schools now, however, after a considerable delay, started to react to the general change in the cultural climate. As late as 1977, when the reform of the secondary education curriculum was in its final stages, a statement in principle by industry on the role of the concept of entrepreneurship in educational programmes was recorded only in a dissenting opinion of an official report.

In the aftermath of the two oil crises, there has emerged a national consensus, a common denominator of interest between government, industry and unions as to their respective roles and responsibilities with all our partners working towards the same end. Some of the underlying basic assumptions which are generally accepted include the following: one cannot pay for the welfare state and all that goes with it without economic growth; freedom of action for private enterprise, the powerhouse of the welfare state, is the cornerstone of the Finnish economy, but this freedom should be accompanied by social responsibility; a general understanding that the country should not have to subsidise industry which it can ill-afford to do. Enterprises should manage on their own. Government for its part should set the right framework and provide the necessary infrastructure, including, above all, an advanced system of education and vocational training.

In recent years the tide in market economies has turned towards stronger emphasis of the role of the individual and individual values like the pursuit of private interests. Criticism of this new trend and for a tendency to selfishness reflects the predominant social philosophy of past decades. We were in fact in market economies used to restrictions of freedom of choice and responsibility of the individual in favour of collective decision-making and collective responsibility.

The dominant party and organisational structures of the past no longer attract the young. But people who solve problems earn respect among them, not those who use harsh rhetoric and make empty promises. The young generation is sensitive to anything that concerns environmental human rights and they are against any form of discrimination. Now that the current trend has led them away from collective solutions, some are beset with the feeling of insecurity. However, if this change in attitude had not come about, private enterprise would have lost its momentum.

If we want private enterprise to function properly, we must see to it that there is decentralisation of ownership and decision-making. In my opinion there is no justification whatsoever for branding as selfishness such attitudes as self-reliance and individual responsibility whereby some individuals and families prepare to look after their own needs and no longer need to rely on society for support. The less some people depend on society's support the more thus released resources can be channelled to the needy. To rely on government to do everything would mean to deny our own initiative and responsibilities. In saying this I am not advocating the unrestrained exercise of the individual will; individualism without restraint involves risks. It was Kipling, if I remember correctly, who said: "Down to Gehenna or up to the Throne he travels the fastest who travels alone". But this individualism has to be balanced by respect for others and generosity towards them, and this is precisely the sort of atmosphere in which responsible entrepreneurship should thrive.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Workers' delegate, New Zealand) – I congratulate Mr. Beyreuther on his election as President of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. I wish him every success as he chairs this Conference.

It is very appropriate for the Director-General's Report to concentrate on the fundamental issue of human rights as a common responsibility for all, and it is a matter that is having a growing relevance to New Zealand and our region of the South Pacific. On the occasion of the 40th anniversary of the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and 20 years after the International Year for Human Rights, this Session provides us with an opportunity to take stock of the action taken by the ILO to promote and protect the enjoyment of human rights everywhere.

It is most appropriate that the ILO raise concerns about human rights at this point in world history. The ILO is unique amongst the United Nations agencies in having a tripartite structure. It is fitting that the major players in the promotion and protection of human rights have an opportunity to address this key question.

The Director-General in his Report notes that the question of human rights is becoming increasingly important at a time when demographic expansion is speeding up, indebtedness is increasing, unemployment and poverty are stagnating and in danger of spreading, where the gap between rich and poor – individuals as well as nations – is becoming wider, the disarmament process has still to get fully underway and regional conflicts threaten peace.

All nations have a role to play in this process. New Zealand has made and is making its own particular contribution to this process. The abolition of all nuclear weapons by the twenty-first century is an objective that meets the needs of all peoples of all countries. Like so many of the Conventions adopted by this Organisation, it will have to be worked and struggled for. The huge resources at present locked up in arms production are urgently, desperately needed in breathing life into the issues of the work of this session.

The New Zealand trade union movement is also concerned at the increasing threats to the protection and promotion of human rights, and agrees fully with the Director-General that the time for decisions has come.

New Zealand workers have enjoyed many basic human rights that are sadly not found in other parts of the world. However, with the growing power of international capital and large multinationals being unleashed by advocates of a free market, flexibility and individualism, many of those rights – the right to work, to earn an income, to equality of opportunity, to stability – are under threat.

There are extremely serious developments in the South Pacific region that are at the very heart of the issues of the Director-General's Report. The events in New Caledonia, as the Kanak people continue to be denied their legitimate rights of independence, are not only of concern because of the slaughter and bloodshed but also for the impact on all countries of the region. There must be a speedy solution to the outstanding grievances of the Kanak people in conformity with the principles of the United Nations and this Organisation.

Likewise, the position in Fiji where basic democratic and trade union rights have been usurped by the gun. The conditions of Fiji's workers have deteriorated dramatically. The regime at this moment is continuing to violate Conventions, victimise representatives of the workers and has taken into custody prominent leaders of the trade unions. The regime's inability to win popular support for its usurping of power is being forced to use all manner of pretexts to suppress the resistance of the people and to defy the attempts of the international trade union movement to protect fundamental freedoms in that country. These developments are a significant setback for the peaceful development of the region. They each in their own way weaken the region as a zone of peace and stability and threaten the continued improvement in having the Conventions of this Organisation widened and expanded in their ratification by all countries of the region.

The greatest concern within the ranks of the New Zealand workers' movement is that the right to full productive and freely chosen employment, in line with the first article in Part III of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, is declining rapidly in New Zealand. Currently in New Zealand the registered unemployment rate is over 100,000 people, representing over 7.6 per cent of the New Zealand workforce. Outside the main cities, many communities are experiencing registered unemployment rates of well above 10 per cent. This situation is of great concern to the New Zealand Council of Trade Unions. As pointed out by the International Labour Conference in 1979, "in the trilogy of growth, employment and needs-satisfaction, employment provides an essential link. It yields an output, it provides income to the employed and it gives an individual a feeling of self-respect, of dignity and of being a working member of society."

Full employment must be our collective goal. As the Director-General points out, the question is not whether full employment should remain a central goal, but how it can be attained. The New Zealand Council of Trade Unions is addressing this essential question at the present time, and I would like to take a few brief moments to outline the difficulties that we are facing and to share with you some of the proposals that the trade union movement is working on in order to ensure that all workers have the right to work.

The New Zealand economy, like all international economies, has been influenced by the fluctuations of the international economy, particularly those of the late 1960s and early 1970s. As we look back now, we can see that the New Zealand economy did not adjust itself quickly enough to the vast changes that were being thrust upon it against its will. Rising international indebtedness, low growth, rising inflation and rising unemployment were the hallmarks of the New Zealand economy through the 1980s. The Labour Government elected in 1984 began a series of radical economic reforms that were built around broadly-based market liberalisation, a rapid closing of the fiscal deficit and a control of the money supply through an aggressive (high interest rate) market stance by the central bank.

There was nothing particularly novel in this approach, built as it was on conventional IMF and OECD remedies. However, the pace and the form of its application have increased economic insecurity, widened inequalities and resulted in rising unemployment.

There is, in our view, a specific linkage between human rights and all that is covered by this term and the principles of economic policy. Consequently, we are strongly of the view that the process of economic deregulation and free marketism directly threatens many of the traditional rights and values that have underlayed the concepts of an expanding industrial base and social welfare system.

It is one thing to change and restructure. The New Zealand trade union movement recognises the need for change and stands ready to participate in the process of change. However, we are not and can never be indifferent to the form of that change. Change that destroys jobs without creating alternative work will be resisted, change that takes no account of the future of small communities cannot be accommodated. Change that does not recognise the values, the traditions and the vision of society has nothing to offer us. Change that increases uncertainty will generate a resistance to change, and ultimately produce a social and economic outcome far removed from what the architects of that change intended.

As the Director-General points out, faster growth and expanded employment are clearly necessary. It is also clear that lower inflation must be one of our targets. However, the fight against inflation has emerged as a greater preoccupation for many of the world's policy-makers, at the expense of jobs, social equity and stability. New Zealand has not been spared that preoccupation. It is the view of the New Zealand Council of Trade Unions that policies being implemented at the current time which aim at lowering inflation are being pursued at the expense of jobs.

It seems clear to us that tight monetary policies with the associated high interest rate regime is being used as a deliberate attempt to discipline the workforce into accepting wages that do not keep pace with the cost of living, thereby squeezing inflation out of the economy. As the Director-General notes, reduced or low inflation may be viewed as a precondition for the resumption of stable and steady growth. However, low inflation is a necessary but not a sufficient condition for jobs. If we want full employment, we must have policies designed to create full employment.

Any economic reform must have underlying objectives of jobs, social equity and stability. These objectives will not automatically flow from low inflation, expansion of world trade, reduction of indebtedness and so on. For although an essential part of economic reform, such changes merely establish the environment within which such objectives can be achieved. The free market has no heart and soul and consequently no concern for people. Left to operate without restraint the free market will not provide secure employment. The central focus of the policies of the New Zealand Council of Trade Unions is to identify the restraints on the free market which are necessary to achieve these objectives and to ensure they are applied and to identify the positive steps that governments must take to create the balance in society required for the enjoyment of human rights.

In New Zealand, tight monetary, high-interest-rate policies have diverted investment away from productive areas of the economy into speculative areas; the value of the New Zealand dollar has remained high, leading to export difficulties and a loss of import competitiveness. Deregulation has cost many jobs in industries such as manufacturing, as New Zealand workers try to compete with workers from other countries who do not enjoy protection of similar minimum wages and conditions. Pressure to reduce government spending has resulted in massive job losses, as well as threatening the universal nature of our health, education and welfare system – once a model for the rest of the world.

It is widely recognised that governments must intervene to regulate the worst effects of the deregulated marketplace. The major questions for the New Zealand Council of Trade Unions is how will the Government intervene and what will be the consequences of that intervention?

The New Zealand Council of Trade Unions does not believe that the reforms that have been thrust on workers have taken enough account of the need to promote stability and full employment. The time has come therefore to pause to take stock, to check the compass to see if the course is correct. The major worry throughout the country at the moment is jobs. Unemployed people want them, employed people are scared that they are going to lose them, young people wonder whether they'll ever have them. This insecurity in the community must not be allowed to continue.

The New Zealand Council of Trade Unions believes that a range of policies – active labour market policies – must be promoted if we are to move forward to full employment. To get the economy out of stagnation and people into jobs, the New Zealand Council of Trade Unions is promoting a range of policies to steer us through the economic difficulties that will clearly be with us for the next decade.

We have identified seven main policy ingredients in the recipe for a return to a fairer and more balanced economic, social and industrial structure.

The first is to upgrade the importance attached to job creation amongst macro-economic policy objectives. We must get away from the single-objective obsession with controlling inflation at any cost. There is a cost and right now that cost is too high.

Secondly, macro-economic policy interventions have to be deliberately used to lower interest rates and moderate their impact on the exchange rate. The price of foreign currency and the price of money are both too important to be left to the moods and fancies of speculators and money manipulators.

Macro-economic policy has to be related to a national development strategy, led and inspired by the Government and supported by unions and employers. This strategy should identify national goals for the development of resources, for promoting and coordinating research and development and for training and retraining workers to meet the workforce opportunities that the strategy will create.

We are very sensitive to the impact of the economic changes on provincial New Zealand, and we therefore see our fourth ingredient as including a specific regional development policy which will require regional emphasis on research, training, infrastructural and resource development and investment.

The final variation needed to macro-economic policy is a reassessment of tariff policy to ensure that dislocation of New Zealand industry and jobs only takes place as new opportunities are created.

We do not believe that it is enough to get the macro-economy right. Our final two ingredients look at change at the industry level to reinforce a drive towards jobs, stability and equity.

The sixth ingredient, therefore, involves a more planned approach to restructuring through the establishment of tripartite industry councils which would attempt to monitor economic change in various industries in New Zealand and attempt to bring change through stability and planning.

Finally, a more co-ordinated, coherent approach to training and retraining policy, integrating the various programmes being run by our major training institutions, can link labour market change to industry and economy-wide developments.

The fact is, however, that even if these policies were implemented tomorrow, it would take some time for the effects to be felt.

Consequently, we need immediate job-creation programmes to get New Zealand working again, even if they are of a transitional nature. It seems ludicrous that we have people who want to work, things that need to be done, while at the same time paying out massive unemployment benefits which are state-funded in our country, as well as all the other hidden costs of unemployment – violent, crime, distress, family breakdown and alcoholic problems.

In summary, then, the New Zealand Council of Trade Unions is not only reflecting the anger, frustration and despair that is being felt by our members over rising unemployment, but it is also pressuring the Government with the support of the wider community to support local, regional and national employment initiatives.

At the same time, of course, the New Zealand Council of Trade Unions is promoting other aspects of human rights as outlined by the Director-General in his Report. Such things as equality of opportunity for all people, the right to just and favourable remuneration, the right to favourable conditions of work, the right to social security, are all things being promoted by the workers' movement in New Zealand.

The New Zealand Council of Trade Unions is promoting a planned, managed approach to reform that ensures jobs, equity and stability for all workers, with the trade union movement taking its rightful place around the decision-making table.

In conclusion, I wish to comment on the obvious problems facing the ILO in respect of funding. In our view it is important to ensure the ongoing and developing role of the Organisation. This is something that all delegations must give urgent attention to. I would hope that the New Zealand delegation attending this Session makes, from its collective experience, some positive suggestions on this delicate matter. This unique forum, while the innovator of significant change itself, must be able to guarantee an ongoing and expanded role for the ILO.

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT (Mr. ADIKO) – Before I give the floor to the last two speakers, I want to make something clear. Speakers exercising the right of reply will be interrupted if they exceed the time-limit for their speeches, which is of three minutes, or if they go beyond a brief and precise response. If the statement is a contribution to the general discussion, they will also be interrupted. On that understanding, I call upon Mr. Ghali, Government delegate, Iraq, for a right of reply to the statement by Mr. Salimian, Workers' delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. GHALI (Government delegate, Iraq) – Thank you for giving me the right of reply, which I would not have wanted to exercise had it not been for this morning's statement by the representative of the workers of Iran, who mentioned my country in his speech in English – in a passage which was not translated into Arabic.

To say what he said about the party which was responsible for starting the war between Iran and Iraq is wrong – absolutely wrong. And the whole world knows it is wrong. It was the Iranian regime that imposed war on our country, that prepared for it by deploying on our borders, that tried to make trouble in our country, that exported its doctrine to other countries. Our country was left with no choice but to defend itself in accordance with rights and laws, be they divine or worldly.

Iraq merely defended itself, and then requested the United Nations to use its good offices to reach a peaceful settlement of the differences in a spirit of good-neighbourliness. That is our approach. The approach of the other party is quite different. It rejects all peace initiatives, of whatever kind. It defies the international community. It holds up to ridicule United Nations Security Council resolution 598 which enshrined the international proposals that might have meant that an end could be put to this conflict.

In the first few days of this week, the Iranian regime attacked the southern part of our country, trying to establish itself on new areas of territory – a clear indication of its real intentions.

I should like to say that the path towards peace is easy if everyone displays goodwill and a little logic. It is the way my country has chosen, since it enables each country to live in peace according to international law.

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT (Mr. ADIKO) – I now call on Mr. Gaidaienko, Employers' delegate, USSR, who has asked to exercise his right to reply to the statement made by Mr. Smith, Employers' delegate, United States.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. GAIDAIENKO (Employers' delegate, USSR) – I wish to say a few words about today's statement by the Employers' delegate from the United States, Mr. Smith.

It is a matter of regret that this gentleman showed so much disrespect for our Conference. He used the open method of demagoguery. It is a great pity that Mr. Smith himself is obviously unable to understand that he has taken upon himself the scapegoat role of initiating confrontation. The Conference is dealing with some very difficult questions regarding the international community's responsibility for human rights. It is trying to create more and more constructive co-operation in this area, and sooner or later Mr. Smith will have to face this fact.

Our times do not call for demagoguery, but actual activities in favour of human rights and active struggle to create the necessary guarantees to ensure the social, economic and political rights of the workers.

(The Conference adjourned at 6.15 p.m.)

Thirtieth Sitting

Friday, 17 June 1988, 8 p.m.

President: Mr. Beyreuther

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – We resume our discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Mr. BATCHELOR (representative of the Public Services International) – May I add my congratulations to the President and the Vice-Presidents on their election at this session, and express the hope that in this year, which commemorates the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the session will take further steps towards the fulfilment of these fundamental basic rights.

The Director-General has provided the platform for this in Part I of his Report devoted to human rights issues. This excellent Report not only serves as a comprehensive source of reference but also clearly identifies many of the problems and difficulties in the struggle to achieve these standards and conditions which, taken together, comprise essential ingredients for the realisation of basic human rights.

I am speaking on behalf of my organisation, the Public Services International, one of the oldest Internationals, founded in 1907 and now representing more than eleven million blue- and white-collar public service workers in democratic trade unions from 80 countries throughout the world.

We fully support the concept of the Director-General that human rights issues are a common responsibility, and for our part we are fully committed and dedicated to playing our part, and share in that responsibility, particularly in our activities within the ILO and by our constitutional requirement to campaign for the implementation of ILO Conventions and Recommendations.

The Director-General has also very properly drawn attention to the application of double standards by the non-observance of solemn declarations and ratified international instruments, thereby denying the application of agreed standards to those people they were designed to protect. There is plenty of evidence for this in the large number of complaints which are received by the Committee on Freedom of Association against violations of ILO Conventions. And in our experience, it is only the most serious violations of trade union rights which are being directed to the Committee. We believe that workers' organisations are acting responsibly in this respect, but it should be recognised that there are some governments which remove very large and significant groups of workers from the protection of international standards, either by applying their own selective interpretation of ILO Conventions or by implying that membership of a trade union would be a threat to national security or, for example, unilaterally changing the status of groups of workers by defining their work sector as an essential service. There are many cases in public service employment where workers are totally denied trade union rights or have discriminatory restrictions placed upon their trade union rights and activities. We have many bitter experiences where the State has introduced government regulations or even legislation directed specifically at limiting the trade union rights of its own employees. Such actions make up a further example of double standards. In that section of the Report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations submitted to this session, the Committee's observations on the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), show that out of the 25 countries reported upon there are 12 where public service workers are either totally or partly excluded from the provisions of this Convention.

The public service workers in those countries are not celebrating the 40th anniversary of Convention No. 87. For us in the public service sector, it is another anniversary. It is the 10th anniversary of the adoption of the Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151). At the final record vote for adoption there were 331 votes in favour, no votes recorded against and 54 abstentions. Despite this overwhelming support, only 19 countries have so far ratified the Convention.

These are very cogent reasons, therefore, why we welcome and support the Director-General's Report which emphasises in clearly defined terms how trade union rights are an integral part of human rights. The denial of trade union rights is the denial of human rights.

The Report also demonstrates the close link between human rights and economic development, and these two factors are embodied within the high principles of this great Organisation. They include the eradication of poverty and unemployment, the satisfaction of the basic needs of the community and the creation of a new world of work. It is our belief that these principles cannot be achieved without the construction and maintenance of a vigorous and effective public service. This is crucial to long-term stability and the development of the needs of society as a whole.

Not too many years ago, it was possible to look to many parts of the world, where, apart from some notable exceptions, strong and efficient public services were being developed in harmony with the private sector. There was widespread belief that a civilised and just society required a properly equipped and fully staffed public service. The public sector was, in fact, often used by governments to stimulate the national economy, and played a major part in the attempts towards full employment.

Today we see a reverse situation, where public services are being cut back with negative effects on the economy and on social services which were designed to protect the most vulnerable sections of society. We strongly oppose this trend which is a further diminution of human rights and we will do all in our power to seek a return to social solidarity and equality.

Public services and public service workers make up the largest single organisations and the largest groups of workers under one employer in almost every country. The 3rd Session of the Joint Committee on the Public Service stated: "The public service as a whole is the biggest employer in nearly all countries, and should, as a major employer in quantitative and qualitative terms, serve as a model of good personnel management practices for other sectors of employment."

Maybe this could have found a place in the Director-General's Report under the heading "The gap between aspiration and achievement", because we have demonstrated how far removed this is from reality. And that is why we turn to the ILO for more assistance to overcome these problems for those workers who have put their trust in us.

Our close colleague, Stefan Nedzinski, General Secretary of the Postal, Telegraph and Telephone International, defined these needs and the reasons for them when he spoke earlier on behalf of the common front of free and democratic public service trade union. We strongly support the contribution he made and the need for an expansion of ILO activities concerning the public service. The internal structure of any organisation should respond to the needs of its constituents and the vast expansion of public services over the past 40 years, which has been an essential ingredient for economic growth and social improvement, must be recognised by the creation of ILO machinery to match this growth.

A special branch of the International Labour Office for the public sector is long overdue, and the case for this must surely now have been proved.

Their relevant importance to the community, the economy and the broad spectrum of human rights demands permanent ILO Committees for the teaching profession, for health service workers and for electricity, gas and water services. All three are truly international in that these services exist in all countries, and permanent joint committees would bring together a rich source of expertise and practice in these fields.

There are, of course, other identifiable areas of immediate concern. High on the list is the concern for the special problems related to women workers. Despite all the initiatives and good intentions, the need still exists for specific activities to transform these into positive action programmes. Once again, this is a problem which is closely associated with human rights.

Women also occupy the largest number of posts in part-time employment and, as we have said previously, this group is one of the most highly exploited in terms of pay and working conditions of employment. We call once again, therefore, for a special study and a meeting on the subject of part-time workers.

We welcome the decision of the Governing Body to convene a second Joint Meeting on Employment and Conditions of Work in Health and Medical Services. An earlier ILO report showed that these services are now a major employer in all countries, and in the shadow of the possibilities of major health disasters, of which we are all aware, the stability and resources of an efficient and well-organised health service are essential factors of life.

No contribution to this session is complete without reference to the gallant struggle of the Black South African trade union movement against the evils of apartheid in South Africa. We would include also our brothers and sisters in Namibia. All our words of support must be converted into action to help their cause. We welcome, therefore, the Programme of Action against Apartheid and will continue to give our fullest support in the most practical terms possible for its implementation.

There are so many areas of concern to us that it is impossible here to elaborate on each of them, but in view of our long association with our Turkish affiliates in the fight for human and trade union rights in Turkey, I would like to recall that we made the challenge against the violation of trade union rights in Turkey immediately after the events of September 1980. We still continue that challenge and we deplore the abusive procrastination of the Turkish Government over the case against them which has been with the Freedom of Association Committee since February 1981.

Finally, I would like to thank you for the opportunity of placing some of our views before the Conference and to assure you of our continued support and belief in the high ideals and principles of the ILO.

Mr. HERRERA (Workers' delegate, Philippines)

— As the spokesman of Philippine labour, may I convey to the President our warmest congratulations on his auspicious election. The workers of the Philippines, 23 million strong, join the rest of our countrymen in thanking the delegates to this Conference for the warm reception extended within these august halls to our Head of State, President Corazon Aquino of the Republic of the Philippines.

I speak as a Filipino worker who, in spite of his historic burden of poverty and want, today enjoys a climate of freedom — especially freedom of association — unparalleled in our history. Few of the world's leaders living today can speak with as much authority as Mrs. Aquino on how the hopes for democracy and human rights of peoples subjugated by their own rulers or victimised by homegrown repression can, and must, ultimately triumph.

I also wish to join the previous speakers in congratulating and thanking the Director-General, Mr. Francis Blanchard, for his incisive and eloquent report on the theme of human rights. The ILO's contributions to the movement for human rights, especially in the developing world, have been achieved mainly through its international labour standards, especially those that guarantee the right of workers to self-organisation. Thus, it is auspicious for mankind as a whole that in this 75th Session of the International Labour Conference, we commemorate four decades of existence of Convention No. 87 and four decades of the Universal Declaration of Human rights.

The Director-General's Report rightly pointed out that the denial and violations of human rights can hardly be helped under conditions when political absolutism has taken hold in a society. Given the best will in the world, governments that subsist on arbitrary and non-accountable power may render the best lip-service to human rights but in reality will have no choice but to disparage, downgrade and ultimately deny them. Under dictatorships human rights can never take their rightful place in a nation's hierarchy of values; instead they have to be perceived as ranking high in a hierarchy of threats to the existing order, the status quo, because human rights are by their nature subversive to absolute power and hostile to any form of tyranny.

That is the reason the Trade Union Congress of the Philippines, of which I am the Secretary-General, has given the highest priority to the restoration and the strengthening of democratic institutions in our country. It has been my good fortune to win election to the Senate of the Philippines as a candidate of free and democratic labour. Before I left for Geneva, I had the privilege of beginning the sponsorship of a new labour Bill, endorsed by the Aquino administration, which would overhaul the existing labour relations system to make it more democratic, more open, more stable and free.

I was also proud to affix my signature to a historic piece of legislation that will make the ordinary tiller owner of his own land, thus realising the fondest dreams of many generations of small farmers and farm workers. It was for this that our forefathers fought in two hundred revolts during the long occupation of Spain. It was largely over this historic issue of land justice that our country has been riven by a series of armed insurgencies since the end of the Second World War, the latest of which, under Communist inspiration and direction, is perceived today as the main threat to our political and social stability.

But it is not my intention to sound pollyanna-ish about the conditions in the Philippines, or about the future of our country. The attainment of political structures conducive to labour freedom and human rights does not complete the workers' struggle; at best, this is a sound beginning. Even democratic governments can be notoriously indifferent to the observance of human rights, where this conflicts with other priorities such as the security of the State or the political safety and convenience of the ruling elites. On the other hand, irrational and subversive social forces can generate their own pressures to increase the temptation for governments to violate human rights or to cover up their violations.

The enforcement of human rights, including those made concrete through the ILO's international labour standards, requires a degree of resolution and commitment to human dignity which government can only summon with great effort. This is true of normal times. But in societies beset by nascent civil wars, the enforcement of such rights can be even more demanding.

In the Philippines today, for example, the Communist Party has started implementing a strategy of urban terrorism directed not only towards agents of the State, such as policemen peacefully doing their duty, but also to leaders of democratic trade unions. In the TUCP, over the last three years, we have lost over 60 of our best trade unionists to organised assassins of the Communist-led New People's Army. It is of course true that some well-known trade union leaders of the radical left have fallen victim to assassinations believed to have been engineered by secret agents of the Armed Forces. One of them, Rolando Olalia, leader of the Kiluang Mayo Uno, symbolised the best qualities of the radical left in the Philippines.

The faithful observance of human rights becomes extremely difficult in such an atmosphere of politically engendered terror. And yet the CPP and the New People's Army, together with labour unions under their discipline, constantly justify and even boast of their strategy of political murder against their ideological opponents in print and in the mass media. And their numerous foreign supporters, especially in Western Europe, do not hesitate to exalt them to the rank of patriots and fighters for democratic values and human rights.

I submit, Mr. President, that when the Filipino people overwhelmingly ratified their new Constitution on 1 February 1987, signalling the restoration of democratic institutions, the Communist Party's recourse to armed violence lost it its historic raison d'être.

The Government of President Aquino has restored complete freedom of association; it has enacted a historic land reform law. In spite of an overwhelming popular mandate, repeated twice over in national referenda and free elections, it has humbled itself, in the spirit of national reconciliation, by consenting to sit down and negotiate with the National Democratic Front, representing the Communists and the NPA, and the Moro National Liberation Front in complete sincerity and good faith – relying solely on the power of democratic dialogue. And yet the Communists have spurned all these initiatives, preferring civil war and mass terror to the ways of peace and to the peaceful observance of human rights in a peaceful, stable and orderly society.

And they have brought this spirit of fraternal conflict and endless confrontation to our country's industrial relations. Recently, Carlos Fajardo, the president of the TUCP affiliate in a major textile factory just outside Manila was shot and killed by an NPA assassination squad. Just before that, an official of the Department of Labour and Employment mediating a strike dispute just outside Manila was also killed, with the NPA proudly claiming responsibility. Three prominent industrialists have also been killed over the past two months. All these are deliberately and widely advertised by the Communists as genuine political achievements.

It is for that reason that the mandate of the Human Rights Commission of the Philippines has been widened to include jurisdiction over violations committed not only by members of the Armed Forces but also by members of rebel forces. There is no question that the main task of enforcing human rights is still one of protecting ordinary and helpless citizens from the abuses of the minions of the State. A condition of civil war, however, must necessarily put the Armed Forces of the State under a severe disadvantage: as one member of the Constitutional Convention has put it, the Filipino soldier in President Aquino's Armed Forces is now obliged to fight with a gun in one hand and a copy of the Constitution in the other.

And this he must do in face of an insurgent movement already known as the New Khmer Rouge in south east Asia because of its propensity to kill in a wanton manner.

Today, wherever the New People's Army holds sway, and it is believed that no less than one-fourth of our municipalities and villages have fallen under their influence or control, entire communities live under an atmosphere of terror and fear for their lives and their scarce possessions. Some of the labour organisations in the Philippines who endlessly curry favour with the international labour movement support this campaign of terror. The trade union character of these organisations is merely incidental to their principal and overmastering purpose: the forcible overthrow of the Philippine State and the installation of a one-party State that will immediately abolish pluralistic democracy.

Within the framework of the Report of the Director-General, I believe it is also necessary to point out that the promotion of rural employment, one of the technical items on the agenda, cannot prosper except under conditions of peace and tranquillity in the countryside. We believe that, in the Philippines, we are right to insist that the structures of feudalism and repression on the land be first dismantled through comprehensive agrarian reform before we can release the new energies that can generate economic dynamism in the rural areas. The privileged land-owning class, by assuring fair compensation for the land to be redistributed to the tillers, will now be helped to transform themselves into entrepreneurs capable of building small and medium-sized industries, and therefore creating new jobs and incomes, in the countryside.

The other technical items, especially those dealing with equality in employment and safety and health in construction, demonstrate once again the ILO's genius to focus on concrete social problems as the basis of new standards. The International Labour Code in its totality expresses the minimum standards of both a spiritual and a material civilisation that is the common denominator of our humanity in the world of work, regardless of the differences in our stages of development or in our social and economic systems. But I believe the jewel in the crown of the International Labour Code remains Conventions Nos. 87 and 98, which enshrine the primacy of human rights in the social realm through the freedom of association and the right to collective bargaining of the working people.

If I have to leave one final word to this great Conference, this will be a renewed expression of the Filipino workers' faith in the ILO's great vision of peace based on social justice. To a remarkable extent, this vision has been adopted as the directive principle of our collective efforts in the Philippines to reconcile, reunify and revitalise our society after more than a decade of dictatorship. The democratic workers' movement in our country deeply believes that democratic institutions have the inherent power to promote both economic growth and social equity, and therefore to secure lasting peace and brotherhood in our own national society.

We reject the path of violence and civil war. We believe that those who reject peace have to pay the wages of self-destruction.

Whether at the level of a developing nation, or at the level of the world community, the search for peace based on social justice will be generously rewarded. The ILO's vision is universally valid, for all times and places. For the trade union movement of the Philippines, it has become our article of faith.

Interpretation from French: Mr. BURADA (Employers' delegate, Romania) – May I be allowed to extend to the President my sincerest congratulations upon his election to the presidency of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference and to wish him every success in his endeavours.

Our session is taking place at a time which is marked by the existence and the intensification even of the processes which are exerting a negative influence on the overall development of international life.

The armaments race, involving both conventional and nuclear weapons; the proliferation of local conflicts; the practice of a policy of force; the persistence and worsening even of the world crisis in all its aspects are all factors which are a heavy burden, especially on the developing countries.

These are the first to bear the consequences of this negative situation, which is illustrated by a slowdown in rates of economic development, an increase in the external debt, a trade imbalance vis-à-vis industrialised countries, a drop in the standard of living and a pervasive atmosphere of uncertainty.

In spite of these difficulties which are affecting the world economy today, economic and social growth in my country are proceeding in all their various aspects, both quantitative and qualitative.

This is reflected in an increase in the number of employed and in the changes which have taken place in the structure of the labour force. Thus, in the past 40 years, more than 5.6 million new jobs have been created. In 1950, 75 per cent of the population was occupied in agriculture, but now the non-agricultural sector represents about 72 per cent. You can see that this is a complete reversal of the figures.

Commending the activities engaged in by the International Labour Organisation in 1987, I would like, as the representative of the Romanian employers, to dwell on a few aspects of particular interest mentioned by the Director-General in his Report.

First, a few words about technical assistance and the relation between the new technologies and employment, and in particular, present requirements in the field of vocational training.

Taking advantage of its tripartite structure, the ILO could play a more important role in shaping and helping to implement programmes of technical assistance, orienting them towards results which are important to us all by fostering to a greater degree consultation between the three parties concerned.

May I dwell briefly on a few problems which preoccupy the employers of my country.

First of all, a few words about our concerns with relation to the improvement of the economic effectiveness of enterprise. I would like to pay a tribute to the enterprises and to their employers for the efforts they are making in promoting special programmes with a view to modernising techniques and technologies and improving management.

We are in particular concerned with energy-intensive technologies and products because we want to replace them with others that are better from that point of view, so as to improve the technical performance of products and their dependability and reduce production costs.

In parallel, we are going to undertake a broad programme of rationalisation, as regards the size of enterprises, in particular by merging small economic units.

In the same area of the efficiency of enterprises, employers are taking part in a general effort to implement better the specific principles established in my country more than 20 years ago relating to self-management.

A major concern for us at the present time is that of improving safety at work and manpower training.

A large number of issues dealt with by the Director-General in his Report constitute for us Romanian employers areas of daily preoccupation.

As regards vocational training, I would like to inform the session that we have set up a system of education directly linked to production with a mobile programme that responds to the rapid evolution of technologies, and is oriented towards satisfying the economy's real needs in terms of skilled labour.

Thus, vocational schools and industrial high schools are operating in all the large enterprises and offering students the possibility of serving their apprenticeships in the enterprises concerned.

I would also like to point out that a system of advanced training has been established for all workers. I might cite in this connection the periodic training courses set up for employers and other managerial staff, and retraining courses for those who have to change their professional activity.

All of this has contributed to increasing labour productivity in industry and other sectors, and has also contributed to a greater stability of manpower and a better adaptability of workers to the positive changes taking place in our economy, which has enabled us to extend considerably our co-operation with a large number of developing countries.

Without abandoning the classical aspects of technical assistance by experts, the implementation of studies and projects, and the organisation of seminars on individual problems, we have also initiated modular forms of advanced training and vocational training in Romania or in interested countries, generally under the patronage of large industrial complexes and of study bureaux affiliated to the Romanian Institute for Consulting - Romconsult - which can justly be proud of having trained many generations of specialists of various kinds.

To conclude, I would like to say that we consider the objectives which our session has set itself to be quite realistic, and we are convinced that the right to work and to social security can and must be guaranteed to all, even in the difficult economic conditions that prevail at the present time the world over.

Trusting that our experiences and our abilities may be of use in helping to achieve the aims of the ILO, we wish to assure you that we will fully support any co-operation activity intended to achieve success for common activities.

Interpretation from Arabic: M. HOWAYDI (Workers' delegates, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya) - I have pleasure in congratulating you most sincerely upon your election to the presidency of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. We are sure that your competence and your abilities will play a crucial part in ensuring the success of this important Conference.

I should also like to thank the Director-General and draw attention to the efforts he is making. I consider that the Report of the Director-General submitted to this Session is of vital importance, for it deals with the topic Human rights - A common responsibility. The choice of this topic coincides with the celebration by the international agencies and organisations of the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. We greatly appreciate the choice of this topic, which deals with the ILO's role in promoting human rights, and sheds new light on the problems facing mankind. In the present international situation, when the struggle is worsening between peoples hungering for freedom and peace, and imperialism, Zionism, racism, and international monopolies that wish to colonise States, appropriate the wealth of the people and destroy their determination, the Libyan Arab people succeeded on 1 September 1969, thanks to its revolutionary command, in winning a decisive victory over the foreign bases on its territory - American, English, and Italian - and over a royal regime based on repression, arbitrary treatment and exploitation, in which the fundamental rights of the people were disregarded, human rights violated and the freedom of that people in its own land was non-existent.

The violation of the power and of wealth of the peoples means that they are enslaved, degraded and crushed, and their ability to fight and to challenge weakened. This was the act of faith of the glorious revolution of 1 September in its first bulletin. The progress of the people took this path: the power belongs to the people and to no one else, and it is exercised through the people's congresses, the people's committees, the trade unions, the federations and the occupational leagues. Defence of the motherland is the responsibility of every citizen, for if arms are placed in the hands of a class, a party or a community, in the midst of an unarmed people, this puts the whole people at the mercy of whoever has the arms in his possession. Thus an end was put to traditional military institutions, and the people took their place.

When the revolution took place in 1969 it proclaimed in its first bulletin that man and his freedom were sacred. This conviction was strengthened by the people's revolution of 1973, which witnessed the destruction of all laws, regulations and measures that stood in the way of man's freedom and constrained his will. These rights were crowned and confirmed in a historic document which proclaimed the installation of the authority of the people in 1977. For the people is the instrument of power, the guide and the sovereign, and it holds in its hands power, wealth and arms. Thus the first Jamahiriya in history was born in 1977, confirming direct popular democracy: "No democracy without people's congresses", "Committees everywhere".

When the 11th anniversary of the installation of the people's power was celebrated in March 1988, the freedom of Jamahiriyan man was strengthened - a man who believes in freedom and liberation, without distinction of colour, race, language or belief. The liberating guide destroyed prisons, freed prisoners, tore up lists of people who were forbidden to travel, pulled down the international frontiers set up by colonialism at a time when the Arab people did not have the right to exercise its freedom throughout its national territory, and opened up the path of vast and global freedom to the free Jamahiriyan man. For human rights are natural, sacred and inalienable: freedom of expression, freedom of movement, freedom of labour, freedom to set up trade unions, federations and occupational leagues, freedom of belief. Justice is independent, corporal punishment is forbidden, the aim of Jamahiriyan society is to abolish the death penalty. Women are totally free, exceptional measures are prohibited, clandestine work is prohibited, the use of force, violence and terrorism is a betrayal of society's ideals and values, the exploitation of religion is criminal, education, knowledge and the arts are the natural right of all peoples. Peoples who do not have in their hands power, wealth and art are peoples who must fight for their complete freedom. The freedom of the peoples will remain complete freedom. The freedom of the peoples will remain incomplete until the freedom of all peoples becomes a reality.

These principles which have strengthened the progress of freedom and confirmed the right of men and of peoples to live in freedom and peace have been the cause of the savage and barbarous American-Atlantic-Zionist aggressions against my country, the latest of which took place in the month of the bird in 1986. Our great people, under the command of the liberating guide, faced the aggression of a great power against the home of the guide and against the Arab Libyan people. The aggressor was driven back, vanquished and destroyed at sea, and the Arab people deserved the victory and our revolutionary country deserved to become the world supporter of freedom and the foremost enemy of imperialism, Zionism and racism.

These principles and values, which our Libyan Arab people has paid the price of affirming and consolidating with the blood of its martyrs, in order to strengthen freedom throughout the world and confirm the right of all the peoples of the planet, are the principles which our glorious people has set out in a great Green Book for peace and human rights in the era of the masses, for our people deeply believes that the rights of the man that God created on earth are not the gift of anyone, and that these rights have no existence in societies where arbitrary treatment and exploitation prevail, since freedom is the people's power and not the people's expression. Power belongs to the people and it is exercised directly in the people's congresses and committees without representation or mandate.

The Libyan Arab people, which considers freedom as sacred and defends it everywhere, also considers labour as sacred, for labour is the right of everyone within the limits of his abilities, alone or with the participation of others, in accordance with the rule that he who produces is he who consumes. A free society is the society of partners, not the society of wage-earners. Ownership based on effort is sacred and untouchable except in the public interest and for equitable remuneration. The children of Jamahiriyan society are free of the slavery of wages, in confirmation of the right of man to his endeavour and his production. Everyone is free to choose the work that suits him, and the children of Jamahiriyan society are free of feudalism, for the land belongs to no one, and everyone has the right to work it and use it. They are also free of rent, for a house belongs to the person who lives there. The children of Jamahiriyan society are free of any form of slavery, exploitation and arbitrary treatment. It is a society of solidarity which is subject to a sacred law with given provisions, which is religion or custom. It is a society of virtue and noble values which aims to achieve a society without war, without aggression, without exploitation, without terrorism.

This shining, creative society, in solidarity and unity, which refuses discrimination in all its forms, believes that citizenship is a sacred, untouchable and inalienable right. It is a society of equality and justice, for discrimination between men and women is an injustice, servants are the slaves of the modern era, and the most sacred rights of man include the right to grow up within a supportive family with one's mother, one's father, one's brothers and sisters.

This glorious society is one that believes in peace among nations and calls for peace, the right of people to self-determination, the sanctification and defence of peace throughout the world, and the abolition of the trade, industry, and export of arms which are an instrument to oppress and degrade the people and deprive them of freedom.

Our Arab Libyan people has given the world the Green Book as a guide to emancipation, a method of liberation, and an instrument to announce to the masses a new era when evil regimes will fall and when arbitrary treatment and exploitation will disappear.

On this day and in this month of 1988, after 40 years have gone by since the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights by governments, the great Green Book on peace and human rights has arrived. It came from a people which has struggled and risen up to break all its chains and demolish the walls of prisons. This document comes from a free people and is intended for all peoples hungering for freedom and subjected to fascist, dictatorial and reactionary regimes. It is a guide for freedom, a path for peace, and a beacon for freedom. May candidates compete in its service and he who has the honour of putting it into effect will obtain the Khadafi peace prize, which our people has reserved for the noble fighters and apostles of freedom and peace.

The cause of human rights and of fundamental rights and freedoms is the essence of the Constitution of this Organisation, which sets out the role that it must play in facing violations of these rights and freedoms. The Report of the Director-General on the situation of the Arab workers in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories gives an example of these serious violations of human rights and trade union freedoms by the Zionist occupation authorities. The personal visit of the Director-General to occupied Palestine allowed him to become aware, on the spot, of the tragic situation experienced by the Palestine Arab people in Palestine and the occupied Arab territories, and of the destructive consequences of that racist colonialist occupation, of its repressive practices and barbarous crimes.

The ILO mission saw that tragic situation, which reflects the crimes committed by the Zionist occupation forces and its continued violations of human rights and fundamental freedoms, the implementation of a policy of all forms of racial discrimination, not to speak of the various methods of torture and terrorism, the murders, imprisonments, expulsions, mutilations, the miscarriages of pregnant women, the burial of living people, the closing of trade union premises, the forfeiture of the right of association, the confiscation of land and water, and the other violations of the most basic human rights.

The tragic situation that the mission saw has worsened still more during the last six months, in particular since the widespread popular revolution of the Palestinian Arab people in Palestine and the other Arab territories, which has resulted in an escalation of barbarous measures and practices by the Zionist occupation authorities, far exceeding Nazi crimes:

We therefore consider that the true and final solution is to put an end to the Zionist aggression and occupation of Palestine and all the occupied Arab territories, and to allow the Palestinian Arab people to exercise its legitimate right to self-determination and establish its independent Palestinian State on the whole of its Palestinian land, under the command of the Palestine Liberation Organisation, its sole legitimate representative.

We in the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya confirm our unlimited support for the struggle of the Palestinian Arab people until victory under the command of the Palestine Liberation Organisation, the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian Arab people.

In the context of human rights and the defence of freedom everywhere, we confirm our material and moral support for the struggle of the people of Namibia and South Africa against the loathsome racist regime and place ourselves and all our possibilities at the service of the achievement of the complete independence and freedom of the people of Namibia and South Africa. We strongly denounce and condemn the criminal acts perpetrated by the racist regime of Pretoria against the people of Namibia and South Africa and likewise we strongly condemn the cowardly aggression perpetrated by that racist regime against the front-line States which support the people of Namibia and South Africa in their struggle for independence, freedom and equality.

Moreover, we condemn anyone who deals or co-operates in whatsoever fashion with the racist Zionist entity and the racist regime in South Africa, for co-operation and relations with these racist entities or support for them is support for the crimes that these regimes commit against the rights of the peoples of these regions.

Forward! The struggle will go on until victory!

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. LABAT (Government delegate, Uruguay) – Before I start speaking on behalf of the Government delegation of Uruguay, I should like to point out that the speaker today should have been the Minister of Labour and Social Security, Mr. Hugo Fernández Faingold.

Unfortunately, for reasons of force majeure, because of problems which arose in recent days concerning his own portfolio, it was impossible for him to take part at this 75th Session of the International Labour Conference, at which normally he would of course have been representing my Government. However, he has asked me to wish you every success in your work.

My delegation would like to congratulate you, Mr. Beyreuther, on your election to preside over the work of the Conference, which is a very difficult task.

We know from recent experience what this responsibility implies but we are pleased to say that your well-known abilities augur well for the success of our work.

We should like to congratulate also the Vice-Presidents.

The theme chosen by the Director-General for this debate – Human rights – A common responsibility – is closely connected with the very foundations and objectives of the ILO; is it unquestionably a brilliant idea on his part.

The recognition of dignity as a corollary of human rights is only possible through peace and social justice, which are goals of the ILO.

I feel that the theme is particularly appropriate since we are celebrating the 40th anniversary not only of the Declaration of Human Rights, approved by the General Assembly of the United Nations, but also of the adoption of the ILO Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

The Declaration of Human Rights of 1948 is an important milestone in the historic process of the recognition of human rights.

It was the point of departure for a universal concept which has been extended to the extent that it has become the subject of human rights it is today – a subject which concerns and involves humanity as a whole.

While the choice of the subject, and its timeliness, was excellent, I should like add that the Director-General's approach in his Report was also excellent. However, without wishing to undermine the progress realised in this field at the international level, we should like to point out that achievements have indeed lagged behind our aspirations; that the impressive number of declarations and standards drawn up in connection with human rights in the last 40 years, and the introduction of specific measures to observe, assess or implement these instruments, have not lived up to our expectations.

We should like to make quite clear also that while the subject and the problem of the implementation and effectiveness of human rights is, and must be, a universal subject and problem, so is the establishment and development of the necessary economic conditions for strengthening democracy. As the title of the Report aptly puts it: "Human rights – A common responsibility".

This responsibility cannot be satisfied simply with declarations, denunciations or condemnations, nor even with technical and financial co-operation, although this is important in improving the situation of our developing countries; but it is powerless to shorten the distance, to fill in the gap separating us from the developed countries.

The implementation of human rights is indissolubly linked with the endeavour to achieve social justice, and in our modern, complex and interdependent world, this endeavour must be our common task, claiming – imposing – solidarity between all nations.

The solidarity we need is one not limited to declarations, but one which can and must be translated into specific actions connected with the external debt and international trade, leading to the establishment of a more just international social and economic order.

Uruguay, which for many years was a shining example of democratic coexistence, later came under authoritarian dictatorship and the consequent flouting of human rights, and only three years ago recovered its democratic institutionality. Now it is trying to consolidate it and we know from experience the importance of sustained economic and social development for the stability of the democratic system.

We also know through experience that, as long as it is not adopted as an act of faith, permanently renewed and put into daily practice with conscious responsibility, this democratic system cannot have its survival guaranteed.

In this connection, may I, speaking from our own experience, appeal for constant vigilance in the exercise of democratic values, to be ever striven for and never achieved.

The Report of the Director-General calls attention to the importance, in the list of human rights, of freedom of association. Our country has a long and prestigious record of respect to and promotion of trade union rights.

This has its first expression in article 57 of our Constitution, dating from 1934, and reappears in the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), ratified by Act No. 12.030 of 27 November 1953, which were passed with majority support under the monist system, but were unanimously accepted legally, and entered in the internal legal order as being directly applicable.

However, the Government regulated all of these activities and prohibited any anti-trade trade union action. The almost abstentionist system, as far as concerns the application of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98, lasted for about 20 years (November 1953 to 1973) and finds its raison d'être in trade union resistance to any state activity attacking trade union rights. This resistance was founded on ideology, its origins lying in the early development of a modern society capitalising on a time of prosperity and well-being, when the system of labour relations with a respect for human rights was established.

The de facto regime, which in all fields sought to destroy liberal traditions in every direction, laid down numerous regulations on trade union rights, though fewer than at the earlier time just described.

It would be superfluous to repeat the observations that the Committee on Freedom of Association and the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations made at the time regarding these directives, reporting how they were disregarded in terms of their apparent conformity with international rules.

Just before the general election in 1984 which returned the country to democracy, the National Concertation Programme was in force, a group comprising the political parties, social forces, workers and employers, in search of a national consensus to facilitate the transition and lay a basis for its consolidation.

In considering the whole field of trade union freedoms and labour relations in this context, there was agreement on the inapplicability of the regulations set by the dictatorship in a democracy, which were unsuitable as regards both the provisions of the constitution and international obligations, and it was decided that they should be quashed.

But the newly established democratic Government, under Act No. 15.738 of 13 March 1985, brought in the annulment and just not suspension of the so-called laws on occupational association, collective agreement, strikes, trade union law and the so-called "fundamental" law on strikes by public officials.

The retroactive nullification of the rules put into force by the dictatorship meant that the legal system in force prior to 1973 was restored as far as trade union rights are concerned, based exclusively, one might say, on the constitutional text and international labour Conventions Nos. 87 and 98.

Thus, in Uruguay we now have a trade union regime characterised by an absence of rules by collective independence.

There is also full respect of freedom of association as provided by Convention No. 87, particularly as regards positive and negative freedom of association, the freedom to form trade unions, internal autonomy, freedom to affiliate to international organisations and to dissolve themselves, both in the private sector and for public servants.

This was expressly recognised by the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations in 1987, when, in considering Conventions Nos. 87 and 98, it noted with satisfaction the sanction of Law No. 15.738. In particular, it noted with interest the fact that in practice workers and employers may constitute organisations with the guarantees provided by Convention No. 87, and that the right to strike can be exercised and is fully exercised, both in the private industry private sector and in the public service.

While it is true that freedom of association is a sine qua non for a system of labour relations worthy of a democratic country, it is also certain that such freedoms is not sufficient to ensure that the system of labour relations will be solid and functional.

The system of labour relations is a key element in the whole process of economic growth and social development which are indispensable to ensure the right to full, productive and freely chosen employment, equal opportunity, fair and satisfactory remuneration and social security.

The creation of a flexible, mature and dynamic system of labour relations is a fundamental and decisive responsibility of the social partners. It is they who, by co-ordinating the political responsibility of the Government with the collective autonomy of the social organisations, must provide such labour relations with a clear and reliable institutional framework.

This responsibility must be discharged in accordance with the ethical principles laid down in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, as the Director-General reminds us in his Report: the idea of human dignity, that is, that all human beings are entitled to freedom and equality of rights and opportunities, as well as the necessary requirements to live in dignity, and the principle of tolerance implying respect of the ideas and beliefs of others and enabling everyone to have a say in the conditions affecting his society.

One of the basic functions of this system of labour relations is to determine labour conditions in an appropriate manner. During the authoritarian regime, working conditions deteriorated considerably in our country, particularly as concerns the purchasing power of wages.

Once democracy was re-established to restore a normal situation, since Uruguay is a small country with a dependent economy, facing the crisis which is threatening all developing countries, particularly the threat of uncontrollable inflation characteristic of our region, the State of Uruguay, while promoting collective bargaining, assumed an active role in it, as a representative of the public interest. As a result of the system thus established, we have achieved a significant increase in real wages: about 30 per cent in three years. Although it is not yet sufficient, it does confirm the suitability of our machinery to create the necessary conditions for a lasting recovery and the significant increase which has been achieved in the rate of employment.

Moreover, the urgent need to solve wage and employment problems has not made us forget that working conditions and environment form a single whole, of which the various elements – wages and work organisation, safety and health, welfare services and so on – are interdependent and all have a decisive influence on the quality of life of workers.

We have therefore undertaken, under the International Programme for the Improvement of Working Conditions and Environment, tripartite activities with a view to identifying problems in this field and adopting measures to progressively improve these conditions.

We are therefore particularly happy to see the growing importance of the standard-setting activity in the field of working conditions and environment and occupational safety and health, and we welcome the increasingly close connection between this standard-setting activity and the technical co-operation provided by the ILO.

In conclusion, we should like to stress that we fully agree with the point of view put forward by the Director-General, that the best contribution of the ILO to stepping up the defence of human rights should be through co-ordination of its standard-setting activity with technical co-operation.

The continuous action of the ILO along these lines today has made it possible for Uruguay to renew its vote of confidence which led us to join the ILO from the very beginning.

Mr. BOEDJOSASTRO (Employers' delegate, Indonesia) – Allow me on behalf of the employers representing the Employers' Association of Indonesia to convey our congratulations to Mr. Beyreuther on his unanimous election as President of this International Labour Conference.

The employers in Indonesia have always paid great attention to the continuous discussions and efforts to achieve the ultimate aims of universal and everlasting peace, social justice, greater human dignity and the well-being of Indonesian people. In line with these goals, the Report of the Director-General to this Conference has been particularly relevant, stressing as it does the importance of human rights, international labour standards, employment and conditions at work.

In our world of diverse socio-cultural backgrounds, different levels of economic development among nations always exist. At the micro level, a similar diversity can also be observed. In Indonesia, along with its geographical distribution over thousands of islands, we find over 250 ethnic groups with different socio-cultural backgrounds and levels of economic progress. As one nation, we in Indonesia have certainly tried to adopt universal measures throughout the country, but in the implementation of these measures, flexibility should be applied by taking into consideration the social background and economic potentials of the various groups or regions.

Allowing flexibility in the implementation of national or international standards reflects the principle of human rights and democracy by taking account of the different needs and expectations of each social group in the formulation and implementation of social standards. Democracy led by the wisdom of deliberations and representation is a living reality in our community life and is a reflection of the right to organise and freedom to express one's opinion.

Bipartism and tripartism as systems of deliberation on an equal footing among the social partners in industry is the basis of our current industrial relations system for maintaining industrial peace and economic progress. Therefore, the adoption of the principles of social democracy is one of the prime movers of national development and economic progress. During the past five years, a number of recommendations made by the Indonesian Tripartite Body were ratified and adopted by the Government of Indonesia in the form of Government Regulations and/or Ministerial Decrees.

A National Campaign for Occupational Safety and Health was announced by the President of Indonesia in 1985.

Occupational safety and health in the field of construction was discussed at last year's Conference and a symposium on the same subject was organised in Thailand early this year. In those fora it was noted that, by recognising the varying levels of development among countries, we should concentrate our efforts on sharing information about potential hazards, and intensify training programmes through the technical assistance of the ILO.

Preventive and protective measures on occupational safety and health should be progressively developed, whilst awareness of potential dangers should be made part of our educational and training system.

The Employers' Association of Indonesia, together with its social partners in the National Tripartite Body, has made a commitment to pay more attention to the issues of employment, the protection of women workers, family planning, the further development of workers' co-operatives, training and development and the implementation of Pancasila Industrial Relations throughout the industry.

It is also gratifying to note that in 1985 the Government of Indonesia initiated an unemployment assistance programme for dismissed workers. A pension scheme for the private sector was introduced by the Government and has been widely accepted within industry. However, due to the different wage levels and different forms of salary administration, there should be flexibility in the early stages of the implementation of this scheme. In this connection, I support the views of the Employers expressed at this Conference regarding the importance of flexibility in the implementation of ILO instruments.

In conclusion, the ILO should play an important role in promoting the implementation of standards in all countries to guarantee economic progress and the well-being of society. However, given the diversities in population size, stage of economic development and employment situation, it should be understood that policy requirements and priorities applicable to employment problems of individual countries should differ among nations.

What is more important is my hope and my confidence that this Conference will be able to inspire each party to resolve employment problems and related matters in each respective country.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mrs. MARMOL-JOS (Workers' delegate, Dominican Republic) – On behalf of the Dominican workers I wish to extend my greetings and congratulations, both to you, Sir, on your election to the presidency of this 75th Session of the Conference of the ILO and to all the administrative and technical staff of this Organisation who, during the year between the last Conference and this one have devoted themselves wholeheartedly to making labour relations something more than just Conventions and Resolutions, making them concrete realities so that peace and social justice may reign in those countries which have recognised the importance of the role played by an instrument such as this.

We have studied with attention the Report of the Director-General and it is quite clear from this study that we must all reflect not so much upon what has been accomplished in the past year but rather the mission and the role of the ILO in the future: that is to say, its role in the defence and promotion of human rights, the promotion of employment, the constant improvement of conditions of work and the strengthening of social security protection, all of which elements can be listed under the broad heading of human rights.

I wonder to what extent countries such as ours can in fact guarantee these rights in a situation such as we find ourselves in at the present with an accelerating deterioration of our conditions of life and work.

What human rights can a country such as the Dominican Republic guarantee when we have an external debt of more than $4,000 million and an obligation to repay our creditors more than $900 million this year, an amount which is more than $100 million in excess of the total value of the estimated exports for the year 1988?

It is extremely difficult to guarantee human rights in a country whose economy is suffering systematically from a drop in the price of the raw materials we export to the world markets when every day the terms of trade deteriorate to such a degree that in a mere four years – that is to say from 1980 to 1984 – we have lost $550 million solely in export prices.

The subject of human rights, which is a vast one and which cannot solely be limited to the question of prison or unjustified dismissal of a worker, has to be looked at realistically: the guarantee whereby every human being, independently of the continent in which he happens to be born, has the right to food, to a roof over his head, to health and to education, that is to say to live with dignity and decorum, a situation which will not be achieved in the underdeveloped countries such as ours until there has been a thorough revision of the protectionist policies of the major industrialised countries.

We are absolutely in agreement with what the Director-General has said about an improvement of conditions of life being a form of guarantee of human rights. Nevertheless, at this point in time, such conditions can only be created with great difficulty, not only in our country but also in countries whose economy is in jeopardy because of the burden of external debt.

Every day we see a rise in the rate of interest on existing loans which our governments, particularly that of the Dominican Republic, have entered into with the World Bank. We suffer from unfair competition from industrialised countries, which not only reduce their purchases of natural raw materials but also replace them with synthetics, thus contributing to a further deterioration of the economy of our countries and the vast majority of people being unable to see a true national policy which guarantees the full implementation of human rights.

In such times, we the workers in underdeveloped countries are submerged in a state of poverty and desperation, suffering as we do from the inflationary process which has been unjustly transferred by the industrialised countries to ours. This obviously contributes to a situation where peace and tranquillity are unknown in our society. How can we hope, in a situation such as this, for guaranteed human rights.

At this Conference, I quote the example of my country, the Dominican Republic, which at the present moment has a disrupted economy resulting from the progressive deterioration of the value of our money, which is quoted at the present moment at 6 pesos to the dollar whereas the law specifies a parity of the peso with the North American dollar.

National production of goods and services in the Dominican Republic contains more than 70 per cent of imported components. The balance of trade is in deficit and leads to speculation with the dollar, dealing in which in fact has been transferred to a free market in violation of the legislation and contrary to the national interest, favouring in this way a small group of speculators in the financial sector.

We have a population of 6.7 million, of which an estimated 2.7 million belong to the economically active population. Of this 2.7 million, 29 per cent are fully unemployed – that is to say 783,000 – and 45 per cent are underemployed – that is to say some 862,000.

The cost of living has risen by more than 30 per cent per annum, and there has been at the same time a serious deterioration in the basic services such as water, energy, transport, health, education, etc.

In the strictly trade union sphere, although we just signed a tripartite agreement in the month of May which establishes a wage adjustment, the climate of trade union freedom continues to be very precarious since, in the midst of negotiations, various trade unions were annihilated both by the private sector and by the Government.

Hundreds of workers found themselves on the street because they had tried to organise themselves into unions, and this in violation of the provisions of ILO Conventions No. 87 and 98 which were ratified by our country. Other workers such as rural workers and public employees are unable to organise.

Today more than ever our Ministry of Labour is ineffective, and the Government itself does not fulfil its commitments established by law in tripartite institutions such as the Dominican Institute of Social Security, the Institute of Professional Technical Training and the Workers Bank. This disastrous situation creates a very confused picture in the Dominican Republic: in 1984 there was a social explosion leaving hundreds of dead and injured, thousands of prisoners and much property destroyed.

The tripartite dialogue enshrined in the postulates of the ILO has been initiated in the Dominican Republic. However, in view of the fragility of this mechanism, and the rapidity with which existing agreements are losing their validity, we ask the ILO to do its utmost to further the tripartite effort initiated in our country since guaranteeing the implementation of those agreements and progress in other areas despite the general economic deterioration in which we find ourselves would help to preventing an explosion and further chaos and would at least help to ensure the relative democratic stability which we have gained, together with some of the elements of what we generally term human rights, to which the ILO has devoted special attention this year.

Finally, I should like to take advantage of this occasion to express the Dominican trade union movement's solidarity with the Haitian migrant workers in our country in the present unfortunate situation. We consider, as emerges from the investigations carried out by the expert committee of the ILO, that these workers are not guaranteed the essential minimum conditions and are having to work in subhuman conditions and we therefore welcome the Dominican Government's request for an ILO mission to establish standards to assist in solving the serious problems which affect the Haitian workers in our country.

We also wish to take this opportunity to express our solidarity with those workers and peoples who are struggling for independence and self-determination, particularly so that an agreement may be reached in Central America to permit the development of Nicaragua. We further express our solidarity with the people and the workers of Panama and we give our support to the people of Palestine struggling for the liberation of their occupied territories, and we energetically condemn the regime of apartheid which denies all human rights.

Mr. KHADKA (Workers' adviser, Nepal) – It is a great pleasure, singular honour and privilege for me to have an opportunity of addressing this global parliament of labour on the occasion of its 75th Session. On behalf of the workers of Nepal and myself I would like to extend to you our best wishes for fruitful deliberations. Also with much appreciation, I wish to extend on behalf of the workers of Nepal, our warm congratulations to Mr. Beyreuther on his election to the presidency of the Conference. I am convinced that under his able guidance the Conference will achieve its objectives.

I would be failing in my duties if I did not congratulate the Director-General warmly for his excellent and exhaustive Reports, particularly on the social dimensions of human rights, in which he describes human rights as aspects of the ILO's basic social standards. We entirely agree with him that human rights are fundamental and inalienable.

I represent the Nepal Labour Organisation, which was formed in order to preserve and protect the rights of labour, bearing in mind their role in and contribution to the socio-economic development of the country. The idea of a separate organisation for workers in Nepal dates back 50 years, but the distinct form of a recognised entity – the Nepal Labour Organisation – came into existence 27 years ago. Every worker can now exercise his or her rights, and workers can now decide how they are going to play their role in their development and welfare.

We have plans to participate in various measures that would improve the conditions of workers: skills training and upgrading, the provision of legal consultation, organising family welfare programmes, creating opportunities for employment abroad, dissemination of information from the ILO and other related intergovernmental and non-governmental organisations to the workers at the plant level, and the publication of labour journals and periodicals.

I know that these activities are not sufficient, and much work needs to be undertaken. The legal provisions for the labour force are very inadequate, and these stand as a barrier to our efforts. We are making every effort to expedite the ratification of the existing labour laws which would bring Nepal in line with ILO Conventions and Recommendations, including Factory Acts currently in force. I am happy to state that His Majesty's Government of Nepal is moving in the required direction, and is also formulating separate Acts for workers in the tea plantations and the transport sector.

Progress in this direction has not been satisfactory, due mainly to the lack of know-how and trained trainers. We can handle the work ourselves, and for that no assistance from anywhere is required. But what is needed is trained trainers in area of labour affairs to assist the workers of Nepal. Perhaps the ILO and other bilateral as well as multilateral bodies could take note of our needs and come forwards to help us in advancing the cause of labour in Nepal.

As is well known, we are a consistent supporter of the United Nations' policy of action against apartheid.

There has been a tremendous increase in the number of workers in the Third World. I greatly appreciate the work done for construction workers in respect of their health and safety, and we look forward to a Convention and Recommendation in this respect.

The efforts of the ILO with regard to rural workers' employment problems are highly appreciated, and we hope that the ILO will be able to initiate measures to safeguard workers from age-old exploitation.

The United Nations and its specialised agencies have been providing assistance and advice to all the developing countries including LDCs. We now feel that adequate attention has not been paid by the UN system to the needs and requirements of these countries. May I, therefore, suggest that the Conference ask the Director-General of the ILO to set up a separate unit to assess and look after the needs of developing countries.

We have been in the Organisation since 1966. In spite of our heavy involvement in and preoccupation with development activities, we have been actively participating in the work of the Organisation, and we are very keen to increase our involvement therein.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. PEREZ NAVARRO (Workers' delegate, Chile) – I should like to greet the President on behalf of the Chilean workers of our delegation, and congratulate him on his election. Our delegation is attending this session of the Conference with a desire to take part in the deliberations and agreements to be adopted here, in a constructive spirit, feeling that the ILO is a world parliament which must maintain its independence so as to contribute more efficiently to doing away with difficult economic and social conditions of which the workers of the world are victims.

There is nothing more accurate than what the Director-General said in his Report with respect to human rights, a doctrine which, though it has always been talked about, was incorporated in the universal discussion only 40 years ago; when the member States of the United Nations – including my own country – proclaimed their freedom and made the Declaration of Human Rights, and the ILO promulgated the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), universal agreements which guided the workers, employers and governments towards building a world of greater justice and solidarity.

As in previous years, some bodies have challenged our trade union representativeness at the Conference, with the object of favouring certain other de facto and not de jure groups, in contravention of point 5, of article 3 of the Constitution of the ILO itself. We believe that to ignore our legitimate credentials as trade union leaders of a democratic and representative union is not only a real attack on trade union rights which our affiliates exercise every two years to elect and to be elected in a direct, free, well-informed and secret ballot, but it is also trying to ignore, unfortunately under the aegis of the procedures of the ILO itself, the sacred right that all workers have to choose the people whom they feel most suitable to represent them in their trade union organisations and in international bodies. On this subject, we feel that the procedures already established should be regulated more effectively, since this kind of attack simply weakens the moral force of the ILO, which is its great strength.

In his Report, the Director-General stresses particularly the action which the ILO has always carried out in the technical field. Anyone who claims that this Organisation should deal with political problems, first and foremost, is wrong. We believe that the ILO must continue to be a technical body which helps to improve the conditions of workers throughout the world seeking social justice, and giving the workers real possibilities to progress in their own occupations, to eliminate poverty, and give them the means to create decent kinds of work, and find solutions to all their various problems, such as hunger, unemployment and poverty.

There could be nothing worse that could happen to this Organisation than for its activities to be politicised, because then it would cease to have its guiding role and the workers would lose their only world forum. The Chilean workers, which I have the honour to represent, greatly appreciate the work done by the ILO to the extent that it stimulates us to do a better job, to be better workers and better trade union leaders. We cannot ignore that in my country, as in all countries of the world, there are trade union problems which we should refer to on this platform, because they are permanent aspirations of the trade union movement in Chile.

Although in the last year in Chile there were 1,958 collective agreements affecting 178,525 workers of which only 81 negotiations involving 9,913 workers ended with a strike, there are nevertheless certain unions which have not so far used this machinery to determine better economic or social conditions; they receive adjustments only through law or have to accept conditions arising from individual negotiations. This is the case of workers in the public administration and the civil service, those belonging to the retail trade and small agricultural units, teachers and health workers.

Moreover, the maritime and building trades unions, which have had their regulations modified recently, hope to set up tripartite committees by sector, to resolve their collective problems.

We should add that workers on the minimum wage find that it is insufficient in spite of the efforts which have been made, and the problems of debt because of the high cost of loans and so on.

With all these concerns, the organised workers have asked the Government for various measures to ameliorate the situation. Many of these have been corrected or improved, but others are still pending and we are hoping that something will be done soon to relieve the workers in these sectors. But we should not only talk about these present problems. We should also, as the Director-General says, raise our eyes to the future of the Organisation and according to the Medium-Term Plan should undertake important subjects of world-wide importance in the ILO in the last five years of this century.

Looking to the future, without forgetting the present, we could perhaps have a better appreciation of the conflicts of today, that they are circumstantial and that a long-range view may perhaps enable us to overcome them and achieve better conditions. I would like to say something about what the Director-General suggests in the Medium-Term Plan 1990-95 of the need to be united in facing the beginning of the twenty-first century. There will be a population explosion of some 6,200 million inhabitants throughout the world. These will be the mouths that have to be fed and arms that will need to work.

Nations should not only concern themselves with fulfilling these two basic needs, but should also consider housing and training, and that higher production is achieved in workplaces protected against pollution and contamination. On this subject, we view with growing alarm the various inhuman atomic experiments which are being carried out in the South Pacific, which affect our climate and our right to live in an area free of contamination. By the end of the century there will also be greater needs in the field of health and social security, without taking account of the way in which population growth will fuel social conflicts, the orientation of which, of course, will be in the hands of trade union leaders and social leaders who will need to channel these forces to serve the cause of progress in the world of labour. Looking to the future, we must also see everything that the ILO has been able to tell us about youth unemployment. The need is for all of us adults to try to find a solution for young people who are joining the labour force with or without training, in order for them to be able to take up productive work and to provide a home and livelihood for themselves. The concern of active workers to prepare their own future is in most countries subject to the whims of governments. We are committed to fight for adult workers, to provide a better way of life for them; and we are concerned for the situation of our children who are beginning to work at too early an age without any protection.

In the field of social security in our country 72 per cent of our active population is covered by social security, whereas the world average is 41 per cent, and in Latin America it is about 40 per cent.

The group that I represent has made enormous strides to achieve the objectives I have talked about. The creation, three years ago, of our pension fund system is a good example. This example is being followed by workers in telecommunications, telephone and electrical enterprises who are running their own pension schemes, and other workers will be following them this year.

With these steps forward, Chilean trade unionism is increasing its possibilities of progress in the field of social security and we hope by the year 2000 we will be directly administering most of the pensions of the workers of our country to give them a better, more just retirement pension than under the old system.

Full solidarity will be achieved once the employers pay additional contributions to permit earlier retirement for workers working with dangerous substances or in particularly difficult work.

So far as participation and integration are concerned, we say that the channels we have opened so far, such as worker participation on the boards of directors, the direct participation and administration of welfare and health schemes and the administration of pension funds, accident insurance and compensation funds and so on, family allowances; all of this has made it possible for us to have a considerable degree of participation in various bodies which have been created in recent years which will make it possible for us to give greater protection of the interests of workers. I am thinking of the Council of State and the Economic and Social Council, a tripartite national body which has been in existence for four years. There are also regional, communal development councils. We are thus participating at other levels which will transform the Chile of the future.

This is part of the reality of today, which the Chilean workers who in the next few months will decide to enter into a new modern democratic system, so as to continue to promote economic and social development of our country. This reality unquestionably gives the lie to all the things that are falsely alleged about our country, and encourages us to move forward.

Interpretation from Portuguese: Mr. GOMES (Employers' delegate, Guinea-Bissau) – To express appreciation for a gift received is only just – and it is this belief which is prompting our statement today on behalf of the employers of the Republic of Guinea-Bissau; after ten years' attendance at this international forum, during which time we have listened to some very brilliant statements, we are representing the employers' organisations of Guinea-Bissau, our country of origin.

In 1978, we took our seats at the International Labour Conference for the first time, encouraged by the outstanding soldier of peace, Mr. Mário Posla, a Puerto Rican, technical expert of the ILO, who was on mission in Guinea-Bissau for more than two years, between 1976 and 1978. During the two years we lived side by side with him, he sparked a flame in our hearts to serve humanity and to be committed to the spirit of tripartism which we defend and are ready to serve at any time and in any place. We owe everything to Mário Posla, who spoke to us for the first time about the ILO and tripartism in 1976 and never left us until, in 1978, he spoke to us of our participation at the International Labour Conference; we then had our first contacts and advice from

Mr. Omar Bongo and Mr. Elias Mabere, good friends and good technicians, to whom we would like to extend our deepest gratitude.

At this point, it might be a good idea to introduce ourselves so that you might have a better idea of what we are talking about. I am the President of the Commercial, Industrial and Agricultural Association of Guinea-Bissau, which represents private and independent employers. The words that we are going to pronounce are our entire responsibility, in accordance with the statutes of the ILO and paragraph 54 of the report of the Working Party of the Governing Body on the structure of the ILO.

I took office in 1974 at the time of the transfer of colonial power to our present Government in Guinea-Bissau. It was a very painful heritage because of the historic framework of the free and independent organisation of our country in its struggle for social justice. I stand now before this forum inspired by the same principle of struggle for humanity and social justice. I should like to give you a short historical outline of our organisation.

The Commercial, Industry and Agricultural Association of Guinea-Bissau was founded in 1918-19 by a group of Portuguese merchants. It was a different undertaking because of the course followed by the process of decolonisation, which was, of course, not provided for in our statutes, since we were a private organisation. With our economic, fiscal and legislative resources, our Association, which had the approval of the colonial government of the time, may be considered the originator of this type of work, as is shown by our publications from that period.

Always run by experienced men, the Association was in good standing with the colonial Government, acting as a true arbiter, advising on economic and fiscal matters, a link in the chain between the Government and its economic associates.

In 1932, as a result of the difficulties inherent in our struggle as a free and independent organisation, we had our first conflict with the colonial Government which required premises and equipment for its administration at the time of the transfer of the capital from Bolama to Bissau. It therefore occupied our headquarters and revoked our statutes.

In 1934, the situation changed: our statutes were republished, we resumed our normal activities and were granted a contribution of 0.25 per cent of the value of exports from the Port of Bissau.

Thanks to the energetic participation of its associates in profitable activities, in 1953-54 the Commercial Association built and opened its headquarters right in Republic Square in Bissau.

After national independence, the Government first supported the Association's statutes but then adopted an underhand policy of hostility to our independent attitude, and withdrew many of our prerogatives, leaving the board with an organisation virtually deprived of power. This led to the loss of members and associates of the organisation, since it was incapable of making itself felt in the corridors of powers.

You will naturally be wondering how an organisation without funds could survive and how its presence here can be justified. We have made the sacrifice voluntarily, we have paid the necessary expenses, the journey, upkeep, etc.

In September 1977, after many difficulties, the headquarters of our organisation was occupied by the Government, which was overthrown in November 1980, to install the headquarters of the PAIGC Party. This was the final stage of the intention to destroy us. We have been protesting about this situation for a number of years, without any result to date.

However, in July 1986 came the first fruits of our struggle. The Government of Guinea-Bissau, through the Minister of Trade, announced the total liberalisation of economic activities and prices, a measure which has had a dynamic effect on the economic life of the country.

You will appreciate that it took 14 years of struggle with the almost total paralysis of private economic activity. This is how our organisation has evolved. We appeal to all friendly countries and international bodies, particularly the ILO and the International Organisation of Employers to unite in our cause and to help us in our task of reconstruction in a poor country, without foreign exchange, where employers in the private sector have run up against many difficulties due to the years of paralysis.

When the Government announced the liberalisation of economic activities, it asked for our statutes to be revised and updated. The statutes were revised on the basis that our organisation was a private, independent body. In September 1986 we submitted them to the Government for approval. We are still awaiting results.

After the presentation of our statutes to the Government for approval and after a preliminary draft had been submitted to all those concerned, with a time-limit set for replies, many months passed and nothing happened. When we tried to present this documentation to the General Assembly, an opposition group proposed the installation of a joint management and private Chamber of Commerce instead of our private social and independent organisation of almost 70 years' standing. Everything seems calm for the time being and the indications are that our employers' organisation will be able to continue, providing a focus for all those interested in defending the private activity of the Commercial Industrial and Agricultural Association of Guinea Bissau. We would like to appeal to the ILO and all international organisations concerned to do all in their power to give more attention to the struggles of national organisations and more protection to their leaders and members of their families who have suffered in the defence of freedom of expression, which is the basis of democracy, as stated in the Director-General's Report.

In this connection it would seem appropriate to quote the words of Pope John Paul II, that you cannot speak of democracy where all levels of society are not represented. Employers are so far not represented in any of the decision-making bodies of our country. We have made very effort to achieve this, but to no avail. But we are still hopeful; dialogues have taken place. We will just have to wait; after all, Rome was not built in a day.

As is clear from this outline that I have given you, we think that the action of the ILO, of the International Organisation of Employers and of the international trade union organisations, should be strengthened in favour of workers' and employers' organisations because they deserve to have their struggles followed more closely.

We feel that you cannot talk about the reconciliation of interests that we are trying to achieve without interfering in the internal policies of member States.

The ILO should involve itself in the internal policies of member States, participating more fully in organisations of workers and employers, giving more assistance in conflicts of interests, constantly offering assessment assistance and advice to the leaders of these organisations to enable them to deal with the difficulties mentioned and to improve their methods, etc.

Part I of the Report of the Director-General, submitted to this Conference, speaks of basic human rights and the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

This year, in which we commemorate the 40th anniversary of the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, we feel that it is an obligation for all participants to make a more effective contribution to achieving the objectives of peace and welfare for all mankind. International organisations and their governing bodies should channel this contribution to realising more objectively the commitments adopted by the Helsinki Agreement so as to avoid each country making a different interpretation, dragging the whole of humanity down into the calamities which we are already experiencing.

From this point of view, paragraphs 54 and 58 of the fourth report of the Working Party on Structure are relevant here.

Paragraph 54 stipulates that freedom of speech is a vital principle for the ILO. Here one must ask the following question: is there anyone here who can say that he is unaware of the suffering going on in the world, or of the fact that there are people in his country who demand that their governments honour their obligations under the Declaration of Philadelphia? Such suffering affects their families and the most intimate interests of citizens in situations where freedom of expression seems like a backdrop, but very pale in colouring and very flimsy in material. Then how can you ignore the inefficiency of the methods that have been adopted so far?

We feel that a total revision of the methods is essential to achieve concrete objectives which will be possible only with more effective protection of the citizens, enabling them to struggle, even with suffering, in their own countries to oblige their governments to live up to their commitments regarding human rights. Governments too must be helped to respect these rights.

Paragraph 55 speaks of freedom of expression, which should include freedom to reply. Nevertheless, experience shows that denial of freedom to reply is one of the strategies resorted to by certain governments to shirk their responsibilities.

Paragraph 56 speaks of social justice; this is important, of course, for the establishment of democracy, but we must not ignore the fact that social justice in certain countries is applied according to the government's desires or convenience. Citizens are listened to only if they collaborate with certain political interests. Hence speaking of social justice without going out and listening to these citizens is wasting time. In this memorable year of Perestroika, when the Chairman of the Central Committee of the USSR has said that two super powers are trying to put an end to international tension through nuclear disarmament we feel that the ILO and other organisations working for peace, such as the United Nations, the OAU and so on, should be equipped with better tools, allowing for more effective activities vis à vis governments so as not to go back to the state of tension which we have overcome. There is no doubt that the undermining of social justice is responsible for much of the tension prevailing in the world. The adoption of measures to control relations between governments and citizens and between governments would contribute to doing away with these evils that are afflicting us. It would also help if the representatives of certain rich countries became aware of the respect they owe to the laws of the countries where they are posted and to the interests of the free citizens of these countries instead of forcing the governments, through their co-operative relations, into a certain complicity which runs counter to the interests of their citizens which has led to real disturbances in certain areas.

We cannot fail to call the attention of all the countries here and of the ILO, to a concrete example in my country, that of the application of Decree No. 3/84, approved by the Council of State, concerning the increase of rent for the housing of diplomats and diplomatic missions. A lawsuit has been brought by certain countries attacking this and saying that this law is unconstitutional and should be repealed; some countries, such as France, wish to avoid paying a fair and proper rent which the owners of the property should receive. The Government was obliged to intervene in this shameful situation.

We request the ILO to investigate all aspects of this matter in which rich countries, talking of co-operation, give with the right hand but take back double with the left.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – You have exceeded the time limit, Mr. Gomes, and you are straying from the subject. Kindly conclude.

Interpretation from Portuguese: Mr. GOMEZ – Speaking objectively of my country, I cannot but refer to a problem which recently has agitated the whole world, as well as Guinea-Bissau. I refer to the problem of toxic waste. Our Government was very sternly and harshly taken to task by all organisations within the country and outside, as a result of which proposals were made and studies undertaken to see how they could be implemented. We can therefore state that we are indeed doing all we can to ensure the safety, health and well-being of our people.

In conclusion, we should like to pay tribute to the ILO and its soldiers of peace in the activities which they have been carrying out for the past ten years. We should like particularly to thank the International Organisation of Employers for the personal invitation that was sent me in October 1987 to take part in the seminar on training and retraining of management staff which took place in the beautiful city of Cabo Verde under the auspices of that great general of the soldiers of peace, Mr. Daniel Bà, whom I had the pleasure of knowing during that activity.

I would also like to thank the ILO and its secretariat for the support that has been given to our young continental organisation, the Pan-African Confederation of Employers.

I should also like to congratulate the President, on his election to preside over this Conference. All of us I think trust that the Organisation will achieve even greater prestige in future.

We should like to thank, in conclusion, Mr. Francis Blanchard for the great work that he has been carrying out and will continue for the Organisation's benefit and for the benefit of all of us. We hope he will remain at the head of this Organisation for many years to come.

COMMUNICATION TO THE CONFERENCE

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – Before we proceed to our agenda I would like to inform you that the Director-General, Mr. Blanchard, has addressed a telegram to the President to the President of the Republic of South Africa, Mr. Botha.

I call on the Clerk of the Conference to read out the text.

The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE – The telegram reads as follows:

For P.W. Botha, State President, Pretoria, Republic of South Africa

The Seventy-fifth Session of the International Labour Conference at present sitting in Geneva has asked me to convey to you urgently an appeal to you concerning the six persons awaiting execution of the death sentence and known as the Sharpeville Six. The plenary session of the Conference comprising representatives of governments, employers and workers from one hundred and fifty member States of the ILO appealed for clemency and the sparing of the lives of these young persons and expressed the view that clemency at this time could provide a spark of hope at a time when hope is desperately needed. It went on to state that it cannot be in anyone's interest to add to the tragedy and suffering of mankind by these executions; nor is there any possibility that clemency could be misinterpreted. On behalf of the International Labour Conference I send this urgent appeal in the name of mankind to you.

FRANCIS BLANCHARD,
*Director-General,

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON SAFETY AND HEALTH IN CONSTRUCTION: SUBMISSION, DISCUSSION AND ADOPTION

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – We now proceed to the first item on our agenda, the examination of the report of the Committee on Safety and Health in Construction. The outcome of the discussions of the Committee on Safety and Health in Construction appears in the form of a proposed Convention and Recommendation concerning safety and health in construction, which will be submitted to the Conference for approval.

Mr. Mirza, Government delegate, Pakistan, Chairman of the Committee, is unfortunately ill and cannot be with us. We wish him a speedy recovery. Mr. Halliwell, Employers' delegate, Canada, the Employers' Vice-Chairman, has also unfortunately already had to leave for home. I therefore invite Mr. Panzke, Government adviser, German Democratic Republic, Deputy Chairman and Reporter of the Committee, and Mr. Chiluba, Workers' delegate, Zambia, Workers' Vice-Chairman, to come to the rostrum.

I call on Mr. Panzke, Deputy Chairman and Reporter of the Committee, to present the report.

Interpretation from German: Mr. PANZKE (Government adviser, German Democratic Republic; Deputy Chairman and Reporter of the Committee on Safety and Health in Construction) – Unfortunately, the Chairman of our Committee, Mr. Mirza, cannot be present for reasons of health today and therefore I am now speaking both as Deputy Chairman and Reporter and on behalf of Mr. Mirza.

The Committee on Safety and Health in Construction today is putting before you for consideration the proposed Convention and Recommendation on safety and health in construction (Provisional Record No. 25). These documents were the results of expert deliberations by the International Labour Office in 1985 and of the first discussion that took place during the 73rd Session of the International Labour Conference last year. At that Session, the preliminary drafts were submitted to and approved by the International Labour Conference.

The new instruments are to replace the Safety Provisions (Building) Convention, 1937 (No. 62), the Safety Provisions (Building) Recommendation, 1937 (No. 53), and the Co-operation in Accident Prevention (Building) Recommendation, 1937 (No. 55), in order to take into account the enormous scientific, social and economic changes in construction that have been made in all countries. The instruments contain many vastly detailed obligations for governments to control or monitor questions of working and living conditions, particularly in health and safety, and to implement these in legislation in different regulations. The employers are given the responsibility by the instruments for the protection of the health and safety of the workers. Sometimes, great detail is provided about how this responsibility is to be carried out through technical and organisational measures. But the workers also have new duties under these instruments to protect their own life and safety.

There are three essential features of these instruments. First, they contain technical and technological provisions and recommendations; secondly, they are based on the spirit of co-participation by workers in all questions of occupational safety and health that concern them; and, thirdly, they are the basis for occupational safety and health in major international construction.

The first feature may appear strange, but it is vital for construction because of its very specific nature. For non-technicians, these instruments are too specialised, but they are not sufficient for specialists. An important consideration is the non-stationary nature of construction which constantly involves new working and living conditions. Working outside, which means working in bad weather, in cold and heat, damp and wet, is also a specific aspect. As for the work itself, there are particular threats to health, like falling from the roof, from great heights, falling objects or moving masses of earth. Often, a large number of workers is a danger in itself. Sometimes, working conditions are made more difficult because the workers are a long way from their families. I should not like to go into further detail because this has already been done, and the International Labour Office has also provided a great deal of material on the subject, for instance, on page 5 of ILO Information, Vol. 24, No. 2, May 1988.

The second feature of these instruments is no less important, because the right of workers to take part in decision-taking, especially on with regard to establishing work sites and procedures at the workplace, is one of the basic rights and is essential if work is to be done in the best possible conditions.

The third feature of the instruments will certainly become more important in the future because, to an increasing extent, major construction projects are being carried out with the participation of many different countries. There is therefore a need for provisions which can be used as a basis for further, more specific regulations concerning such construction. The instruments therefore contain a number of provisions setting out the rights and duties of, and co-operation between, the different employers on major construction projects, and also regarding co-operation between employers' and workers' representatives.

Last year, I suggested that the International Labour Office should compile a set of definitions of frequently used concepts in order to make the work of the Committee easier. We now have this compilation and I am very pleased, and also express my thanks for the fact that my suggestion has been taken up.

This compilation of concepts is something that will also help to facilitate work in other committees.

I should like to take this opportunity to express my thanks to Mr. Halliwell, the Vice-Chairman of the Employers' group, and to Mr. Chiluba, the Workers' Vice-Chairman, for their support and their demonstration of tripartism. Their technical knowledge and carefully balanced contributions have made the job of Chairman of the Committee much easier, and have contributed to the Committee's being able to finish its work three days earlier than was planned.

On behalf of the Committee, I should like to thank Mr. Kliesch and his colleagues in the secretariat, and all those in the International Labour Office who, by their work before and during the Conference, have laid the foundations for success.

Construction workers throughout the world, very often work in difficult conditions when building houses, cultural or sporting facilities, and in industrial areas. These new instruments should contribute to protecting the life and health of these workers; and in the interests of the construction workers of the world, I would ask you to give your support to them.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – The discussion of the report is now open.

Mr. SKAU-JACOBSEN (Employers' adviser, Norway) – On behalf of the Employers' group of the Committee on Safety and Health in Construction, I wish to associate myself with the distinguished delegates who have preceded me in extending to the President warmest congratulations on his election.

On behalf of Mr. Halliwell, the Employers' Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Safety and Health in Construction, it is an honour and a privilege for me to place before this session the views and concerns of the Employers' group of this important Committee.

The construction industry is a leader in every country in the world. It is one of the world's largest employers of skilled people and the results of our work in this great industry remain for the use and enjoyment of successive generations.

It is appropriate that the ILO instruments pertaining to health and safety of workers in construction be of a high standard, and that they set forth workable and realistic guide-lines for member States to adopt.

Construction is a complex set of related operations which, in the end, produce a finished product. This product may take many forms; it may be a building, a bridge, a power station or a dwelling, but it is always the result of skilled people working in a combination that eventually results in a durable structure.

It is due, in part, to this complicated multitrade system which takes place on a construction site, that safety and health becomes a primary concern.

Our work in this Committee spans two sessions of the International Labour Conference. It has taken us many hours of diligent and co-operative work to arrive at completed documents.

When Mr. Halliwell spoke to this plenary at the conclusions of our work last year, he expressed the concerns the Employers' group had for several articles in the text after the first year's discussion. He referred to many areas where unrealistic provisions would prevent the Employers' group from supporting a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation.

At the outset of the Committee's work this year, Mr. Halliwell noted that some improvement had been made in the proposed text, but stressed that Employers still had difficulty with several issues before us.

It has, from the outset, been the goal of the Employers' group in this Committee to achieve a Convention and a Recommendation which were meaningful and yet which governments could adopt. This same objective guided the work in our Employers' group this year.

As the work of the Committee proceeded under the capable leadership of Mr. Mirza, with assistance from Mr. Panzke, the shape of a new Convention and Recommendation slowly began to take form. With great diligence and patience, the Employers' group was able to provide Government and Worker representatives with a better understanding of some of our most serious problems. As our work proceeded, the text began to take a more practical direction and we realised that in the true spirit of tripartism it might be possible to find common ground.

In the final days of our work, both the Convention and the Recommendation began to reflect an improved understanding of the real world of construction.

It would not be proper for me to say that all of the Employers' concerns were sufficiently dealt with. Nor would it be right to say that the Employes were completely satisfied with the end result of our work.

Unfortunately, we understand there is a minor difference in the translation of one phrase between the English and the French texts and we would ask the Drafting Committee to take the necessary action. I am pleased, however, to advise this assembly that the Committee has produced a Convention and a Recommendation which the Employers' group supports.

At this 75th Session of the Conference, the true spirit of tripartite discussion was very much alive in our Committee. The proof of course lies in the production of the proposed instruments which are before us today, and which were adopted in the final hours of our work in the Committee.

In closing, the Employers' group would like to acknowledge the excellent work carried out by the Occupational Safety and Health Department of the ILO. Their efforts made our work much less demanding and each person concerned is to be congratulated on a job well done.

The Employers would also like to pay tribute to the Government members of our Committee, who made a sincere efforts to understand our concerns and who often offered a helpful suggestion for compromise.

Mr. Halliwell has asked me to express his warm regards to Mr. Chiluba and the entire Workers' group. While Mr. Chiluba advanced the views of the Workers' group with vigour and effectiveness, he never lost sight of the need to find solutions through compromise. Without this understanding, we would never have achieved the goals of the tripartite Committee.

Finally, I want to pay a sincere tribute to Mr. Mirza, our Chairman, and Mr. Panzke, who together guided our very difficult work to a successful conclusion.

Mr. CHILUBA (Workers' delegate, Zambia; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Safety and Health in Construction) - Allow me to join those distinguished speakers who came before me to congratulate you on your election to the office of the President of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. Let me, on behalf of the Workers' members of the Committee on Safety and Health, join you in wishing Mr. Mirza quick recovery.

The two proposed instruments before this Conference on the question of safety and health in construction represent the culmination of many years of research, debate and wide-ranging consultation with governments, employers' and workers' organisations.

As far back as 1964, the Building, Civil Engineering and Public Works Committee of the ILO expressed the view that the Safety Provisions (Building) Convention (No. 62) and Recommendation (No. 53) of 1937 no longer reflected the reality of the construction industry and failed to address the many new and complex health and safety hazards of that industry.

This was 24 years ago. It was valid then. How much more valid is it today as the industry has continued to grow in complexity during those 24 years?

The Workers' group believes that the revision and the updating of the Convention and Recommendation of 1937 fulfil the long overdue commitment by the ILO to prepare a new instrument aimed at improving the health and safety of millions of construction workers throughout the world.

Safety and health in construction is relevant to every country, to the industrialised countries and to the developing countries. Whilst the labour risks and hazards in the construction industry may vary as between these countries, they all have one basic fact in common and that is that the construction industry in all countries continues to have a very high accident rate resulting in needless loss of life and serious injury.

The construction industry is of course a relatively dangerous industry. In the past this perception of the industry has led to a certain complacency about the loss of life and about serious injury to workers in the industry. This complacency was reflected at international and national level. As a result of this the needless loss of life and maiming of workers continued almost unabated. Indeed, in many countries there has been an increase in the accident rate in the industry, reflecting the low priority given to health and safety matters, particularly in times of economic recession. Safety and health measures, where they exist at all, are very often no more than an afterthought, not just by the employers but also by the designers, manufacturers and planners of construction sites, equipment and machinery.

The Workers' group rejects this old approach and we consider that the time is right and ripe for governments, employers' and workers' organisations to pioneer a new approach to health and safety in the construction industry. The impetus for this, we believe, is contained in the text of these new draft instruments. They represent a challenge to the inadequate and outdated approach of the past. With this new approach the Workers' group is confident that the current unacceptable accident rate can be substantially reduced and the construction industry changed so as to provide a safe and healthy work environment for all its workers.

To achieve this, the co-operation of governments, employers' and workers' organisations will be crucial. This tripartite approach is an integral part of the new instruments. The Workers' group believes it is the cornerstone to the new approach to health and safety in the industry and we are therefore fully committed to it.

Since 1937, developments in the construction industry have been radical from the point of view of technological changes and modernisation of plant and equipment, but I am afraid the benefits of these changes did not spill over to the health and safety area. These changes were rarely accompanied by improved training, disclosure of information or adequate consultation with the workers. The workers were thus ill-prepared to deal with these new hazards, and as a result their working conditions deteriorated from a health and safety point of view as they were increasingly confronted with new, complex and dangerous machinery and technology.

The Workers' group believes that the new proposed instruments address these issues in a comprehensive manner. They represent, we believe, a new spirit and approach on the part of employers and governments, to matters of health and safety in the construction industry, as well as setting out a new charter of rights for construction workers. These new rights include the right to information, training, consultation and protection against risks and hazards in construction sites. For the first time – for the first time indeed – the concept of good ergonomic principles is introduced into the construction industry. This concept is fundamental to good health and safety.

These and other concepts contained in the instruments are not in themselves new but they are new to the construction industry, and that is important.

The Workers' group believes, therefore, that these new instruments will bring health and safety in the construction industry into line with health and safety developments in other industries. They will also introduce health and safety practices to deal with technological and other developments which have taken on construction sites over the last 50 years.

As I stated at the outset, these texts represent the culmination of many years' work. Along the way, it has not been easy. Along the way, we were confronted with many difficulties and problems which we believe have not been resolved in a satisfactory manner.

These difficulties included some complex legal questions concerning the interpretation of absolute terms in Conventions. The Committee was assisted in this matter by an opinion from the Office. The Workers' group is satisfied that the opinion of the Office on this matter does not dilute the responsibility of the employer for safety and health because in situations where serious or lethal risks exist the duty to provide adequate protection will continue to be expressed in no other than absolute terms in Conventions.

Finally the successful conclusion of the work of the Committee was due to the careful work of our Chairman, Mr. Mirza, and Mr. Panzke, our Deputy Chairman, who also chaired the meetings of the Committee in the absence of Mr. Mirza.

We also express our very sincere thanks to Mr. Halliwell and all his group as they were very ready to talk, discuss with us and compromise. We are highly indebted to all the distinguished members of the Committee on Safety and Health in Construction. I also wish to express my own sincere thanks to all the members of the Secretariat.

I urge all distinguished Governments, representatives, Employer representatives, and workers alike, to bless the efforts and enthusiasm of the Committee on Safety and Health in Construction by adopting the report unanimously.

Interpretation from German: Mr. OPFERMANN (Government adviser, Federal Republic of Germany, on behalf of the European Community) – On behalf of the representatives of the Governments of the member States of the European Community, I would like to thank sincerely the Chairman, the Vice-Chairmen and all the members of the Committee on Safety and Health in Construction for the outstanding work that they have done during the past weeks. I believe the results achieved represent an important step forward.

I would like to send all wishes for a speedy recovery to the Chairman of the Committee, Mr. Mirza. I would also like to express my thanks to the International Labour Office and to all those who have carried out remarkable work since the Conference last year. My special thanks go to the Drafting Committee. The Legal Adviser's office of the ILO, in drawing up the proposed Convention, has played a useful part by providing clear interpretation of an important point of law, and on behalf of the member States of the European Community I would like to express my thanks to them.

The texts before us and whose adoption we are expecting from the Conference contribute to the extension and updating of the Safety Provision (Building) Convention, 1937 (No. 63), and the Safety Provisions (Building) Recommendation, 1937 (No. 53). We hope that the new Convention will be ratified everywhere very quickly and that thus the safety and health protection of workers on construction sites will be improved world-wide.

The member States of the European Community will naturally study these texts very rapidly with a view to their ratification. This study will take place in a positive spirit. The new impetus which the Single European Act has given, at the Community level, to improving the working environment will no doubt play a part in this.

The Single European Act, which came into effect on 1 July 1987, gives the Community new legal bases for promulgating legal provisions on protecting the health and safety of workers.

The European Community, with a view to the single internal market, attaches great importance to all measures to improve safety and health at work. In this context the work of the Committee on Safety and Health in Construction is, of course, of special interest. The construction industry throughout the world is still experiencing a deplorably high accident rate. For this reason it is the task of all of us to improve significantly safety and health conditions in construction. I would like to assure you that on a longer-term basis too we shall devote great attention to this problem within the European Community.

The work of our Committee has led to texts which form a flexible framework for this particularly important question of safety and health in construction. I am certain that many States will be favourably disposed towards them. In these circumstances we can take it that the results of the work of this Committee will be reflected in improved protection for the workers in the construction industry.

The positive results obtained by the Committee would not have been possible without the spirit of co-operation shown by the representatives, Employers', Workers' and Governments. I would like to thank all three groups for this. I would also like to take this opportunity to emphasise the fact that the promotion of co-operation between the social partners, social dialogue in fact, is one of the main goals of the Single European Act.

I hope therefore that a positive spirit of constructive co-operation in the future as well will also prevail in the future examination of this highly important question.

The texts before us represent good work. They are of vital importance for millions of workers in the world. 10 million of whom are in the European Community alone, and we hope that they will be adopted by the Conference so that the working environment of the millions of workers will be improved.

Mr. AHMED (Workers' delegate, Pakistan) – I feel it my great privilege to associate myself with earlier distinguished speakers who have supported the adoption of this important report. We appreciate the work done by the Committee in the formulation of the Convention and Recommendation, which concern a very important segment of the working class all over the world, in both the developed and the developing countries.

The workers engaged in the construction industry have made great efforts to improve the quality of everyday life and working conditions. Therefore, they deserve full support in the matter of their health and safety and I think the ILO has made a very important contribution to their well-being.

On this occasion, I would also like to express appreciation of the work done by the Chairman of the Committee, Mr. Mirza, who happens to be my countryman. He was unexpectedly by admitted to hospital yesterday evening, but he has conveyed his gratitude for the contribution made by all the members, in particular the Vice-Chairmen, Mr. Halliwell of the Employers and Brother Chiluba representing the Workers' group, as well as Mr. Kliesch and his good team. I too appreciate the work done by the distinguished members of our Committee, including the Secretary and the Deputy Chairman, and therefore strongly urge the adoption of this report.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – If there are no further speakers and if there are no objections, I shall take it that the body of the report, that is paragraphs 1 to 276, is adopted.

(The report is adopted.)

PROPOSED CONVENTION CONCERNING SAFETY AND HEALTH IN CONSTRUCTION, SUBMITTED BY THE COMMITTEE ON SAFETY AND HEALTH IN CONSTRUCTION: ADOPTION

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – We now come to the adoption of the proposed Convention concerning safety and health in construction, beginning with the Preamble.

(The Preamble is adopted.)

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – We shall now adopt the proposed Convention, Article by Article. (Article 1 to 36 are adopted seriatim.)

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – We now go on to the adoption of the proposed Convention as a whole. If there are no objection, I shall take it that the proposed Convention is adopted as a whole.

(The proposed Convention is adopted as a whole.)

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – In accordance with article 40, paragraph 6, of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the proposed Convention concerning safety and health in construction will be referred to the Drafting Committee of the Conference for the preparation of the final text.

PROPOSED RECOMMENDATION CONCERNING SAFETY AND HEALTH IN CONSTRUCTION, SUBMITTED BY THE COMMITTEE ON SAFETY AND HEALTH IN CONSTRUCTION: ADOPTION

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – We now come to the adoption of the proposed Recommendation concerning safety and health in construction, beginning with the Preamble.

(The Preamble is adopted.)

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – We shall now take the proposed Recommendation, Paragraph by Paragraph.

(Paragraphs 1 to 53 are adopted seriatim.)

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – We shall now take the proposed Recommendations as a whole. If there are no objections, I shall take it that the proposed Recommendation is adopted as a whole.

(The proposed Recommendation is adopted as a whole.)

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – In accordance with article 40, paragraph 6, of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the proposed Recommendation concerning safety and health in construction will be referred to the Drafting Committee of the Conference for the preparation of the final text. All that remains for me to do is to thank the Officers of the Committee sincerely for their excellent, substantive and skilful work which has won our profound appreciation. Thanks to their efforts it has been possible to prepare excellent texts, and previous speakers have rightly pointed out that this was the result of constructive tripartite co-operation. On behalf of the Conference I would also like to thank Mr. Kliesch and all the other members of the Office who have served us so well.

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL. DISCUSSION (concl.)

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – We continue with the discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Interpretation from Portuguese: Mr. REAL MAZULA (Government delegate, Mozambique) – My first words will be words of congratulations to the President on his distinguished election to the presidency of this 75th Session of the Conference, as well as words of appreciation for the enlightened manner in which he has conducted our debates which already affords a guarantee of their success.

It is only appropriate that I should make a contribution to this debate, and I could not do so without paying a tribute to the tireless efforts of the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Francis Blanchard, in pursuance of the lofty ideals of this Organisation.

The Report of the Director-General to this session of the Conference raises a number of questions on human rights which deserve thorough consideration in view of their topicality in our country and their obvious implications for the problems of the working world. It is undeniable that human rights cannot be dissociated from freedom of association, equality of opportunity and treatment the right to full employment, the right to fair remuneration, the right to decent and favourable working conditions and the right to social security. That at least is the theory.

How can we reconcile this theory with the fact that workers in my country and in the Third World in general earn only one-hundredth of what their fellow-workers earn in the industrialised countries? How can we change our approach when we see the gap widening day by day between the prices of raw materials and the prices of manufactured products? How can the international community be made to accept the fact that the principle of human rights is a common responsibility when there is inequality of and a great reluctance to transfer know-how? How can one obtain the success of the principles proclaimed in 1919 and backed up by the Declaration of Philadelphia in 1944, and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights in practice when statistical estimates show that in the Third World there are more than 70 million unemployed, 500 million underemployed and about 900 million persons suffering from extreme poverty?

This is the sombre picture presented by the People's Republic of Mozambique. I should add that since the proclamation of national independence, Mozambique has never experienced the joy of peace for reasons which are only too well known to the international community.

Today the situation in my country continues to be characterised by an economic boycott, military aggression against our economic objectives and against our population continuously being carried out by the apartheid regime, using as its main instrument armed bandits, in flagrant violation of the Nkomati Accord. I shall refrain for the moment from giving a tedious list of the serious economic and social consequences this war represents for Mozambique. I shall simply state that at the present time we have around 70,000 unemployed who are officially seeking jobs through our placement services and approximately 4 million displaced citizens living in hostels or simply without roofs over their heads. There has also been the destruction of important economic infrastructures which could have provided new jobs; the direct losses resulting from the South African economic boycott and military aggression against my people amount to more than US$6 billion, which is double our external debt. As well as the economic aspect, the destabilisation activities of the South African regime have already caused the deaths of more than 100,000 people, and millions of families have lost their houses, their farms, their schools, their hospitals and their personal belongings.

Factories, farms, roads, bridges, railway lines, schools, hospitals, lorries and convoys have been destroyed or are unable to function.

To add to all that, our country has not escaped the effects of the international economic crisis which has so profoundly affected all the underdeveloped countries; and the terms of trade between our countries and the industrialised countries have deteriorated.

Because of this situation, the Party and Government of Mozambique have drawn up a programme of economic recovery with a view to halting the decline in economic activity and initiating a progressive recovery of the vital sector of the national economy.

This programme requires of necessity an increase in production and productivity, more economic use of raw materials, fuel and equipment and the rationalisation of human resources.

Furthermore, the main objective of this programme is to rehabilitate the economic and social life of the countryside, notwithstanding the existence of 4 million displaced citizens who are affected by drought and are the victims of armed banditry.

In this connection, I am convinced that the debate on rural employment promotion which will take place at this session of the Conference will help to improve implementation of this programme in our rural areas.

We cannot dissociate human rights problems from the policy of apartheid. This policy is contrary to the principle of equality of opportunity and treatment because it is fundamentally discriminatory. Under the apartheid regime, men are treated according to the colour of their skin, or even their country of origin. For this reason, more than 20,000 Mozambican emigrant workers were forcibly repatriated to Mozambique.

It was simply because it once more repudiated this policy and demonstrated its solidarity with the oppressed peoples of South Africa and Namibia that my country was represented at the tripartite Conference on Action against Apartheid, held in Harare from 3 to 6 May this year.

This session has updated the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa and proposed the Programme of Action which I hope the session will adopt.

Despite an unfavourable economic and political situation, the Government of my country is endeavouring to create working conditions which will improve the lot of Mozambican citizens within the context of the standards of the ILO. Within that context the Government of my country last October set up a department for employment promotion which was designed to create production jobs. In the initial phase, the department intends to absorb surplus manpower resulting from the process of technical and industrial organisation and integrate the miners who have been forced to leave the South African mines. To achieve this gigantic task my country needs international support.

And in that connection legislation has been promulgated providing for a minimum monthly wage for workers – for employees as well as those working in agriculture – so as to give fair remuneration to all workers.

Our labour legislation also provides for a limit on working hours and guarantees occupational safety and health under the conditions imposed by the national economic situation. The report of the Director-General recognises that there are shortcomings in the application of international labour standards, one of the causes being the difficult economic situation of a country like ours.

The solution of the problem, or at least an attenuation of it, must take place through co-operation between the various countries and the ILO. This is a complex question which calls for a revision of this Organisation's standard-setting activity and an adequate mechanism of technical co-operation that takes account of the specific needs of the developing countries.

Meanwhile, I should like to stress, and express my satisfaction with, the high degree of co-operation between my country and the ILO which has led to the sending of two missions to help draw up plans for the absorption of Mozambican miners, repatriated as a result of the decision taken by the South African Government in October 1986; the holding of a sub-regional course for labour inspectors from Portuguese and Spanish-speaking African countries in Maputo from 28 September to 2 October 1987; the sending of a mission to give technical assistance to the Labour Inspection Department in July 1987; and the sending of a mission to collaborate with the Ministry of Labour on drawing up a plan for a social security scheme in my country. I hope that in future this co-operation will be increased still further and will take in other areas of labour matters.

This Conference is taking place in the context of the Universal Declaration on Human Rights proclaimed 40 years ago by the United Nations, and I should therefore like to conclude my statement by saying that the People's Republic of Mozambique is a peace-loving country which defends human rights.

As proof of this, the People's Assembly has approved Amnesty and Pardon Laws. The Amnesty Law applies to all citizens wishing to give up terrorist or criminal activities against the people and the State, and who present themselves voluntarily to the national authorities. Under the Pardon Law, sentences will be reduced or pardons granted for citizens who are guilty of crimes against the security of the people and the State. Millions of citizens have already benefited from these measures and reintegrated into society, rejoined their families and are now working as free citizens on the task of national reconstruction.

We are convinced that the community of nations and the ILO will joined with us in our efforts to promote peace, justice and human well-being; this objective merits our proclaiming that the struggle continues.

(Mr. Tsujino takes the Chair.)

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. ALFAQI HAN (Government delegate, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate!

It is a great pleasure for me to be able to associate myself with all the delegates who have spoken before in congratulating the President, on behalf of the delegation of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, on his election to the Presidency of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. I would not wish to fail either to congratulate the Vice-Presidents, while expressing my good wishes to all for the conduct of our work so as to allow this Conference to adopt Recommendations and resolutions which are commensurate with the importance of the subjects on the agenda.

The Director-General has chosen the subject of Human rights – A common responsibility on the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. This Declaration, which has been recognised by the entire world, mirrors the Declaration of Philadelphia of 1944.

The Director-General was right to emphasise the link that exists between this subject and the realisation of the Organisation's objectives of achieving social justice for all and of promoting and safeguarding human rights. Thus, a large number of international labour standards and Conventions and Recommendations on employment and social security have been elaborated in order to improve working conditions to protect the labour force against occupational accidents and disease, to guarantee equality between men and women and equality of opportunity and to protect old people, children and women.

The achievement of the objective enshrined in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, as the Director-General has said in his Report, can take place only through the implementation of measures nationally and internationally. The Declaration is the concretisation of a moral principle which is none other than respect for human dignity and the guarantee of the physical and moral integrity of all individuals throughout the world by a number of international criteria and principles.

Among the most important measures taken by the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to promote the freedoms of mankind is the elaboration of a human rights documents within the Arab society of our country. It was adopted by the People's Congresses at the municipal level, after being drafted by the General Council of the People and came into force on 11 June last, which was also the 17th anniversary of the withdrawal of British forces from our country.

This document set out the fundamental principles of human rights in the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya of which we shall give some examples. Firstly, the fact that the Libyan Arab Jamahiriyan society considers that Arab freedom is sacred, and is committed to dialogue, as a source of understanding among all peoples and is opposed to the use of force in any form whatsoever except for legitimate self-defence. Secondly, in the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, knowledge is a natural right that is enjoyed by all individuals in our society. There are all free to choose the skills that will allow them to find a job that is compatible with their possibilities and occupational qualifications and satisfies their needs and ambitions. Our society has the duty of disseminating knowledge in all fields in order to eliminate ignorance. It is only fanatical and stupid individuals and groups who try to monopolise knowledge by depriving others of it. Thirdly, society in my country must strive to safeguard and defend liberty in all parts of the world, defend the persecuted and oppose injustice, exploitation, racism and imperialism in accordance with the principles of the struggle of peoples against the enemies of freedom.

The promulgation of this document also represents the practical application of the principles of human rights in the Libyan Arab socialist Jamahiriya. Thus, the leader of the revolution of 1 September, brother Colonel Muammar Khadafi himself freed the prisoners and destroyed the prisons. This is tangible proof that these principles of human rights are applied in the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, and are, in fact, the same principles as those set out in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which the international community is endeavouring to implement.

The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya attaches increasing importance to international labour standards, and has ratified more than 27 Conventions, including the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining, Convention, 1949 (No. 98), the Abolition of Forced Labour and the Convention, 1957 (No. 105). Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) convention, and the 1958 (No. 111).

My country also attaches considerable importance to the conclusions of the Committee of Experts for the Application of Conventions and Recommendations with respect to the way in which the Jamahiriya has applied the Conventions it has ratified. A tripartite technical committee has been set up to examine the Committee's conclusions and review the Conventions not yet ratified by my country, with a view to ratifying some of them in the near future.

Meanwhile, education, free medical care and the right to social security are guaranteed for all residents of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya.

Forty years have passed since the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and there are still millions of people in various parts of the world who are not even allowed their human dignity or the minimum standard of living essential to mankind. Entire peoples are still under the yoke of oppression persecution and racial discrimination, as in South Africa and in occupied Palestine.

For 40 years the Arab people of Palestine have been the victims of barbarous aggression by the Zionists, directed at their very existence. As the Director-General has said in his Report, the situation of workers in these Arab occupied territories will worsen as long as the occupation lasts.

The fanatical practices and actions of Zionism in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories is a flagrant violation of human rights. Since the creation of the Zionist entity in Palestine, Israel has been committing the most terrible crimes, with a heavy record of genocide, massacre, torture and other horrors such as amputating limbs and burying people alive.

These actions, which cause deep revulsion, are perpetuated by Israel, supported and encouraged in these violations of human rights by American imperialism, which provides moral and material support and, in particular, uses its right of veto to protect the Zionist entity from condemnation in the United Nations Security Council.

The Zionists deprive Palestinian employers and workers not only of their legitimate rights but also of their right to live on their own territory. If we really wish to work for respect for human rights... (speaker interrupted by the President).

Interpretation from Japanese: The PRESIDENT (Mr. TSUJINO) – I must ask you, in accordance with the rules, to keep to the subject of the Director-General's Report. The Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General must be the object of your speech. You must not stray beyond this subject. Please do not name or accuse any country.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. ALFAQI HASAN – We have studied the Special Report of the Director-General on the Application of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia. We demand the application of all the sanctions imposed on South Africa by the whole of the world community and we call on the world community to condemn the attitude of the major States, companies and employers who co-operate with the racist South African regime, whatever reasons and justifications they may give.

We also call for rigorous measures to be taken, not excluding the use of force, to eliminate the White minority regime in South Africa and allow the indigenous population to decide their own fate under the guidance of SWAPO.

The agenda of this session of our Conference also includes many other important points, particularly safety and health in construction, the protection of aboriginal and tribal populations and the promotion of employment, social security and rural employment. We hope that the Conference at this session will adopt positive resolutions by the application of which production may be increased and the human and spiritual objectives of all peoples may be achieved.

In conclusion, we hope that the international community will respond to the appeal launched to it by the Director-General, Mr. Francis Blanchard, and that it will redouble the necessary political will and solidarity to guarantee human rights and usher in peace and security, above all for the weakest and the least privileged. We would not wish to fail to address our thanks to the Director-General and the whole staff of the ILO for all the efforts that they have made in different fields.

I would also like to thank all our brothers who interpreted my speech and the technicians who recorded it.

Mr. AHMED (Government delegate, Somalia) – On behalf of the Somali delegation and on my own, I would like to congratulate the President on his well-deserved election to guide the deliberations of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. I would like also to extend my congratulations to the Vice-Presidents and other Officers of the Conference on their election.

My good wishes and congratulations also go to the Director-General, Mr. Blanchard, for his valuable Report which is under discussion at this session. The Report is divided into two parts, Part I devoted primarily to human rights and Part II to a detailed analysis of the Organisation's activities during the year 1987. We fully share the views of the Director-General that human rights are an integral part of the efforts to secure man's material well-being and spiritual development. The Director-General has identified the crucial areas of strain in the world economy. He has pointed out that the workers' rights relating to the freedom of association, equal opportunities, minimum wage protection, working conditions and social security have suffered under the existing economic conditions in member countries.

We welcome this opportunity for examining the most critical and urgent human rights issues and problems affecting the world of labour.

Equality is a fundamental condition of human dignity and social justice, which must at all times be respected in the determination and application of social policy. I would like to assure the Conference that the Government of the Somali Democratic Republic is doing its best to guarantee the political and social rights of all its citizens. Provision is made in our Constitution and Labour Code for equal opportunity, irrespective of race, creed or sex. No doubt, as regards social security systems, Somalia like any other developing country has a long way to go;

however, various laws and regulations have been enacted to safeguard and promote the welfare of labour in the country; for example the Disabled Persons Act, the Trade Testing Promotion Act and the Apprenticeship Trading Act contain several provisions to protect the workers' interests.

Recently my Government adopted economic reform policies and established self-employment schemes in agriculture and fisheries for rural employment promotion. The eradication of unemployment and poverty are the principal challenges facing my Government. My delegation therefore welcomes the inclusion of the item on rural employment promotion in this year's Conference agenda. Unemployment and poverty also remain challenges for international organisations and I commend the ILO, and the employment department in particular, for taking the lead in propagating the message of agriculture-focused equitable growth in the report on Rural Employment Promotion. My delegation has read this report with great satisfaction, especially in view of several references to ILO research on the economy of our country.

I want to assure the Director-General that this kind of research is useful to us in policy formulation at a juncture when we are faced with conflicting advice on the so-called "structural adjustment programmes". This kind of research should be widely publicised.

On a more general point I want to join many of my fellow African delegates in urging that the ILO should continue to have a special role in advisory services in Africa. Our continent is going through a very critical phase in its development, when two decades of industrialisation and progress are threatened because of the economic crisis. We urge the ILO to continue its work on questions of rural-oriented development and on structural adjustment, employment and food security in order to strengthen its advisory capacity. Africa will for a long time have to turn to international organisations for technical assistance and from our experience the ILO is the most sympathetic international Organisation because of its special mandate. We hope it will continue to play this role.

We thus find the general discussion on rural employment very timely. Rural development is vital for our country, as about 70 per cent of our population live in rural areas. In solving the problems of unemployment and poverty, governments have to play the major role, but at the same time the international community must not escape its responsibility. Today most of the developing countries have been experiencing enormous social and economic problems, deficits in the balance of payment and low growth rates, low capital formation and increasing food insecurity. The unfavourable external environment has contributed to some of these problems and by the same token the international community has some responsibility in helping us overcome them.

Turning now to another important issue, the Middle East today is one of the regions of conflict in the world and a serious threat to world peace. The presence of Israeli settlements in Palestine and other Arab States are of utmost concern, as they expose the workers to inhuman conditions of existence and deprive them of their basic rights, owing to the illegal practices perpetrated by the Zionist regime. Recent investigations have clearly shown that the occupying forces persist in their aggressive attitude and continue to ignore the exhortations of the international community to apply minimum employment standards and respect workers' and trade union rights. This Conference should adopt concrete measures to put an end to these inhuman and illegal practices of the Zionist regime. In examining the sad situation of the Palestinian workers and of workers in the other occupied Arab territories, we should apply the basic concept of social justice embodied in the Declaration of Philadelphia: "All human beings, irrespective of race, creed or sex, have the right to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, ... and equal opportunity".

We appreciate the efforts made by the Director-General and the mission which visited the occupied Arab territories and we ask the ILO to continue to monitor the situation of the Palestinian workers. The Director-General has confirmed in his Report the continued deterioration of the situation of Arab workers in the occupied lands due to the Israeli policies and practices to deny them their basic human rights and legitimate national aspirations.

It is painful to witness the war that has been going on for some years now between two neighbouring Moslem countries, Iraq and Iran. Its victims include thousands of men, women and children. As we know, the United Nations, the Islamic Conference, the Non-aligned Movement and all the peace-loving countries have requested the two countries to put an end to this war. We call upon the ILO to join these international efforts to terminate the bloodshed and re-establish peace and order, so that all the energy and resources which are being wasted in destruction may be devoted to the progress and well-being of the people and the socio-economic advancement of these two countries.

The universal conscience continues to be afflicted by another tragedy resulting from the policy of apartheid pursued by the racist regime in South Africa. We have considered very carefully the Special Report of the Director-General and we congratulate the ILO on its contribution to combating and eradicating the nefarious system of apartheid. The International Labour Conference has at its previous sessions tackled this question extensively and considered the detrimental effects inherent in the unjust policies and illegal practices of the racist regime in South Africa that continues to perpetrate crimes against the African workers, who are the victims of the most inhuman methods of exploitation. The ILO has to sustain more resolutely and more vigorously the fight for the abolition of apartheid and racial discrimination in southern Africa. This is a fight that must inevitably be won in the course of time.

In conclusion, we hope that the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference will, through its discussions, arrive at conclusions that will be of benefit to us all. We express the hope that the ILO be endowed with greater resources to continue its noble actions.

Interpretation from French: Mr. FLOREA (Workers' delegate, Romania) – I would like to congratulate the President on his election to this important office and express my greatest wishes for success.

The Report of the Director-General to the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference is devoted to problems concerning human rights and trade union rights to which the General Trade Union of Romania has always given and continues to give special attention.

The conquering of political power by workers and the subsequent construction of the economic, technical and material base for socialism in Romania have represented the fundamental premises and the political and economic framework for the construction of a new socialist society. The democratic potential of socialism has become a reality thanks to the ongoing and perseverant measures taken during the past 20 years upon the initiative of the President of socialist Romania.

The workers' democracy which Romania has created in these past two decades is a complex system marked with qualitative features which express the very essence of the new society. This is evident, on the political level, inasmuch as the people have become the sovereign holders of power, and on the economic level, since the people have become the collective owners, producers and beneficiaries of the fruits of their work. On the social level, democracy is evident in industrial relations, in relations between the individual and the State and between the individual and society, which make it possible to promote the fundamental values of the new society and guarantee conditions for the multi-faceted development and manifestation of the members of society. On the national level, the spirit of democracy finds concrete expression in the full equality of rights of all workers, without any type of discrimination.

Thanks to its comprehensive form and operational mechanisms, democracy in Romania offers an appropriate framework and the necessary political means for promoting swift and harmonious social progress, the refinement of social relations and the affirmation of the human being in its multi-faceted development. This is the reason why we subscribe to the idea expressed by the Director-General in the Preface of his report to the Conference concerning "the indivisible character of human rights which encompass, without distinction, civil and political rights and economic, social and cultural rights".

In our view, participation in deciding the future of society expresses all dimensions of democratic life, ensuring at the same time full exercise of civil rights. This participation opens to all citizens the practical and real possibility of taking part, in accordance with the law, in the conduct of society, a process which is conceived and implemented in the dialectic unity of the constitutive elements: the formulation and adoption of decisions, the implementation of the same, and the monitoring of the manner in which these decisions are put into effect.

The concrete expression of the direct participation of the masses in social administration is workers' self-management. The system of political administration of society has been endowed with a network of truly democratic workers' bodies, from the enterprise level to the national level; these include the administrative bodies and general assemblies of workers in the enterprises, through which the workers participate in management, and the departmental councils of workers, workers' sectoral congresses, national workers' councils, which provide permanent machinery for workers' self-management.

I would like to emphasise that we do not consider our system of workers' democracy as immovable or immutable. Just as in other areas of activity, we feel that improvements may and must be made in the light of the real and constantly changing conditions in society, especially in the context of workers' self-management, primarily by increasing the responsibilities of the general assemblies and councils of workers as collective administrative bodies.

It is in this democratic system that trade unions in our country exercise their activities as organisations of the workers, representing their members in all workers' democratic bodies, from the level of the enterprise to the government level. I would like to mention the fact that in Romania we constantly endeavour to improve legislation to enhance the framework for direct participation of the masses of workers in the formulation and implementation of economic and social policy. The legislation adopted these past years guarantees the legal framework for the exercise of trade union rights, for the participation of trade unions as occupational organisations of workers and as representatives of their economic and social interests for economic and financial management and for the monitoring of all measures concerning working and living conditions of workers of all categories.

Referring to the spirit of Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948, (No. 87), we can state that in Romania trade unions benefit from a wide and well-defined legal framework which guarantees their direct participation in all economic and social activities in the country at every level. Trade unions also participate in the work of the highest legislative body of the country, the National Assembly, through a large number of deputies elected from among trade union leaders from various trade union organisations.

In the context of participation in collective social activities, trade unions, through the workers' collectives, discuss Bills submitted for consultation. On this basis, the trade unions contribute to the formulation of legislation through proposals which result from these discussions. At the same time, trade unions exercise their right of legislative initiative by proposing to the National Assembly Bills dealing with any aspect of the conditions of work and life of workers.

Following the extension of the principle of collective administration and the enactment of legislation concerning the participation of trade unions in all collective administrative bodies, the President of the Central Council of the General Trade Union of Romania is an ex officio member of the Government; the members of the executive committee of the Central Council and other trade union officials participate with voting rights in the collective state bodies such as the Ministry of Labour, the State Planning Committee, the Ministry of Finance, the Council for Culture and Social Education and so on. The presidents and vice-presidents of the executive committees of sectoral federations are also ex-officio members in the collective administrative bodies of the respective ministries. In turn, all territorial trade union bodies are represented in local administration bodies, and participate directly in all matters concerning the workers.

The participation of trade unions in administrative bodies and their active co-operation with state bodies have improved co-operation between trade unions and the State, and thus the representation of the interests of the workers; on the higher level of common interests between trade unions and the State, participation and co-operation, through the intermediary of trade unions, facilitate the direct participation of the workers in the solution of vital problems in our socialist society.

Given the fact that our agenda includes the Special Report of the Director-General on the Application of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa, and since we are discussing problems which concern trade union rights and human rights in general, before concluding I would like to say that the General Trade Union of Romania is deeply concerned by the intensification of repressive measures taken by the racist regime of Pretoria against the Black workers and people of South Africa.

On this occasion, we also wish to state that the General Trade Union of Romania firmly supports the just national liberation struggle of the Namibian people, under the direction of SWAPO, for the independence of Namibia, and condemns vigorously the racist policy of apartheid of the Government of South Africa; it calls for the cessation of all repressive measures against the majority population of this country and the cessation of all aggression against southern African States and independent neighbours.

These are the few remarks I wished to make concerning the problems outlined in the Report of the Director-General to the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. AL-SAMAK (Workers' delegate, Bahrain) – In the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful! May I begin by congratulating the President on his election to the presidency of the 75th Session of the Conference. I am convinced that, thanks to his experience and skill, this Conference will be crowned with success.

I should also like to pay a tribute to Mr. Francis Blanchard, Director-General of the ILO, for wisely choosing the subject of human rights on the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

In his Report, the Director-General has declared that the disregard and contempt for human rights are at the root of war and underdevelopment and have reduced millions of people to misery, poverty and disease. He added that the protection of human rights and human dignity must be based on social justice which is the only means of bringing peace to the world.

In talking of human rights, I must describe the experience of workers in Bahrain in the context of organised labour, and in the context of social solidarity and integration, based on the principles of civilisation, social justice and Arab authenticity.

Since the foundation of our workers' organisation and its legal recognition five years ago, the workers of Bahrain have made great progress which would not have been possible without the co-operation of the social partners. The gains we have realised are the result of improvements in the Labour Code and the Social Security Code, which are now more modern than those of many advanced countries. The closest co-operation prevails between the social partners as concerns the State's efforts to promote employment through programmes which are at developing the skills of workers, and programmes which are designed to upgrade national labour institutions to meet the standards prescribed by Arab and international conventions.

The State's commitment is evident in the number of training centres and further training programmes. The workers' organisation participates with employers in framing the policies for these programmes, through tripartite councils and other national committees.

The democratic rights of workers, including the right to elect their representatives and the senior workers' bodies are unmatched in many countries and have played a very great part in satisfying the needs of all categories of workers. This has helped to achieve stability in working conditions, to stimulate the economy and improve production.

Workers also enjoy freedom of expression, which they exercise through the publication of an independent workers' bulletin.

I should like to thank the ILO for the attention it has given to the workers' organisation of Bahrain, and for the technical and cultural help that it has provided since we requested it in 1984.

The very wide gap between the developing world and the industrialised countries prompts us to re-examine the principles of international co-operation, and to re-examine certain international standards, particularly those concerned with employment promotion and social security in view of persistently slow growth. I am convinced that this world parliament will be the light at the end of the tunnel, as a result of the negotiations and co-operation that are taking place.

At a time when we are celebrating the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the Palestinian people are commemorating their fortieth year of Zionist occupation, which is a blot on the world community. The people of the occupied territories have long been subjected to inhuman terrorism and a genocide unprecedented in history.

Overwhelmed by despair, this people has at last risen up against the occupation which continues its attacks on Palestinian women, children and old people and on Arab workers in the other occupied Arab territories. The occupying authorities use every barbarous and destructive means: attacks on people, the destruction of crops, the burning of land, the destruction of houses. Violence, torture, repression, expulsion, mutilations are the daily lot of workers, trade unionists and employers in this part of the world. In addition, several thousand Palestinian workers have been thrown into prison. In the face of these arbitrary practices we appeal to the international conscience and the ILO bodies to redouble efforts to save the Palestinian people, by providing urgent technical assistance to workers and employers in Palestine and the other Arab occupied territories to strengthen their economic, social and technical capacities and enable them to live in peace and security in their own land.

We urge the Conference and the international community to bring pressure to bear by all means on the Zionist entity, to ensure the implementation of the resolutions of the International Labour Conferences in 1974 and 1980. It is sad to say that similar arbitrary practices and racial discrimination are being perpetrated in South Africa, whose people are scattered and dispersed. In the face of this serious and alarming situation in Palestine and South Africa, we call upon the international community to reinforce its support to the oppressed peoples.

May God guide the Conference to success.

Mr. TABBANI (Employers' delegate, Pakistan) – I have not only the great honour to speak on behalf of all the employers of Pakistan for the first time in my life, but also the very singular honour of addressing this august body in this United Nations setting.

It is a great joy that we are all brought together and made cohesive by the ILO whose watchword and raison d'être are exemplified by the phrase "Meet, discuss, compromise, have consensus, and come to some result or solution".

That is exactly what we have come here to do and have been doing for the past two weeks. We have become acquainted with each other, we have discussed and evaluated, we have compromised and conceded, and we have finally come to conclusions or results or solutions which are all in the process of being presented to the President and before this august body.

Since we have come to the final week and concluding days, we are confident that the President with his great skill and vast experience will be able to bring this Conference to a satisfactory and fruitful conclusion.

Mr. Blanchard's able guidance and inspiration have been the force that has enabled all the Committee to finish their work on time, as required, and in a spirit of accommodation.

The Report of the Director-General of the ILO to the 75th Session of the Conference is appropriate and very far-sighted. He is to be congratulated for adopting the Universal Declaration of Human Rights as his theme – Human rights – A common responsibility – and rightly so. But one may ask, "What are human rights"? Are they fundamental rights; are they rights of existence in the world; are they the self-preservation of rights; or something else? Yes, "human rights" include all these rights and others too. They are the rights of an individual to live in this world as that individual desires. And, as Islam preaches, we are all brothers. Each one of us should treat the other as "a human being", "a live human being".

That is why the ILO has concerned itself with apartheid, the revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention 1957 (No. 107), rural employment, employment promotion and social security, with emphasis on the educated unemployed.

These are part of human rights, and the ILO is to be commended for taking these bold steps and enabling us to sit down together and bring about agreed Conventions and Recommendations for the implementation and furtherance of these and many other concepts of human rights.

I take the liberty of drawing attention to: apartheid, which still exists in this world; discrimination, which still exists, but to a lesser extent; the unending small wars, which are still being fought with no end but destruction; hijackings, which keep innocent people frightened and horrified; refugees, who are forced to live outside their homelands; and employers' rights, which are slowly being usurped.

These are all human rights and need immediate attention by the world, so that, in a spirit of collective responsibility and international solidarity, the correct solutions are to be found to the problems faced in South Africa as a result of apartheid, and to the struggle of the Palestinian people for self-determination. Moreover, now that the accords of Afghanistan have been signed, the Afghan refugees in Pakistan should be allowed to return to their homeland safely and peacefully.

We must further commend the Director-General of the ILO for stressing in his Report the role of the ILO in promoting and protecting these rights. Forty years have passed since the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the first article of which is very significant: "All human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights. They are endowed with reason and conscience, and should act towards one another in a spirit of brotherhood."

The brotherhood of mankind is what Islam has been preaching for 1,400 years, these same rights having been established at that time by divine revelation.

On 16 June 1988, the Islamic Sharia was put into effect through the enforcement of the Sharia Islamic Law Ordinance by the President of Pakistan. This Law empowers the higher courts to strike down any non-Islamic law. An individual can also file suite for a similar action. The courts will be required to pass judgement on whether a law is Islamic or not within 60 days in order to speed up the process. All aspects of domestic economy, including fiscal laws, banking and insurance, will be examined to bring them into conformity with Islamic teachings, while, at the same time, all international financial obligations will remain valid.

We are proud of the fact that this promulgation will make the courts accessible to citizens of all walks of life at reasonable cost, and enable courts to give relatively quick judgements, since "justice delayed is justice denied". Justice that is available to all is another form of human rights.

I have made a brief reference to employers' rights. These are the inalienable rights of employers and entrepreneurs "to create wealth", for which we are usually maligned but, practically speaking, if no wealth is created, how can any be distributed? No, we employers are never selfishly motivated. We fully realise that the progress and increase of production can only be the result of growth and prosperity, which is desired by all. Employers never, I repeat, never, administer poverty; in fact, they eliminate it by distributing profits, and this can only take place in a free economy.

In conclusion, we wish this 75th Session of the International Labour Conference every success in its humanitarian work. I shall end by emphasising the concluding remarks of the Director-General in his Report when he refers to the right of human beings to live in peace, which can only materialise if human rights are truly, universally and collectively recognised.

Mr. RYDER (representative of the International Federation of Commercial, Clerical Professional and Technical Employees (FIET)) – May I begin by joining those who have congratulated the President on his election and on the exemplary manner in which he has guided our discussion on the very important Report that we have before us.

My organisation, representing nearly 9 million salaried employees organised by affiliated unions throughout the world, wishes to record its appreciation of the clear and unequivocal restatement of the most fundamental principles of the ILO that the Director-General has presented in his Report.

His restatement is timely, not just because this year marks the 40th anniversary of the adoption of texts of transcendent importance by this Organisation, and by the international community more generally, but also because working people are today confronted by so many employers and governments who are so evidently in need of a reminder of the content of those texts.

The principle that comes out with particular clarity in the Report, and which is endorsed unreservedly by FIET is the indivisibility of trade union and human rights, and the need for them to be applied universally. There can be no exceptions to that fundamental proposition, and no excuses for its violation.

The exercise of trade union rights does not take place in a vacuum, but rather in the context of economic and social conditions that are generally making their practice more rather than less difficult. We have been reminded most effectively by distinguished guests to our Conference of the fact that failure to construct adequate policies to relieve the monstrous burden of international debt, to act together to promote global development, and to combat mass unemployment and the poverty that results from it has placed basic democratic structures at risk, and that in the absence of effective democracy, basic rights can have no existence.

In proclaiming the universality of human rights we recognise that there is no area of economic and social policy, no Convention or Recommendation adopted by this Organisation which does not beat upon the promotion of such rights, and whose violation does not detract from their observance.

The Director-General has further called to our attention the fact that human rights are our common responsibility, and hence that the solidarity of all parties represented at this Conference is called for in promoting them. Solidarity is, of course, a fundamental precept of the trade union movement. But we do not seek to make it our exclusive preserve. We can only regret therefore, that the efforts of powerful elements in many of our societies seem to be aimed at the dissolution of ties of solidarity rather than their reinforcement, and at encouraging self-interest at the expense of cooperative joint action. We have seen that this applies at the level of individuals, of countries, and even of whole regions. It has been reflected in an erosion of tripartism in many countries, and an increase in the unilateral imposition of concepts of de-regulation and flexibility which have led to the degradation of conditions of work and life. As is pointed out in the Report, when the tripartite message fails, or is consciously rejected, authoritarian relations take its place.

By contrast, our belief is that basic rights must be advanced by a commitment to act together. They can only be damaged by policies or attitudes that seek benefits for some at the expense of others; which set North against South, and creditors against debtors; which divide workers by attacking the bases of their collective representation, and by their fragmentation into core and peripheral groups, or into formal and informal sectors.

This is the road that will take the worker back to the status of a commodity, a road which is explicitly rejected in the Constitution of the ILO, and which can lead only to economic and social regression. FIET is committed to oppose those who would travel that road, and who would justify their itinerary by a separation of the economic and social dimensions of progress. We can admit no such dissection of our basic objectives, since that would inevitably set back the cause of human rights in all of the interdependent areas outlined in the Director-General's Report.

As a international trade union federation, FIET is keenly aware that the continuing internationalisation of the global economy has placed a corresponding emphasis on action at the international level to protect and promote human rights. Our work, and that of our affiliates, in this respect has been complicated and obstructed by the evident willingness of some of the multinational companies with which we deal to act overseas in a manner that they have never done in their home countries.

What are we to conclude about the motivation for example, of the French concern Carrefour, which has for years acted positively in its labour relations dealings in France, but is going to extremes to keep unions out of its new United States operations? Or the parallel case of the Belgian Lion Delhaize Group, which is now taking one step further and using its "non-union" – we would say anti-union experience in the United States – to launch what management has described as "all-out war" against established union structures in Belgium?

A clue is given by the recent statement by the President of Phillips, in the Netherlands, on the day that the company announced the cutting of 20,000 jobs, to the effect that, ideally, the company would load its factories on supertankers steaming around the world to those countries where the lowest operating costs prevail at any given time. That is of concern enough to us—but the situation is greatly accentuated by the type of activities in which some companies are actively engaging to ensure a competitive downward spiral of costs and labour standards. Those activities impinge directly upon the principles that constitute the subject matter of the Director-General's Report.

Forty years on, the ILO remains, we believe, well equipped to close the gap between aspiration and achievement that is still with us in the field of human and trade union rights. Full and universal application of Convention 87 and 98, without regard to the level of development or the economic and social system prevailing in the country concerned or its geographic location, must stay at the fore of that effort. FIET believes that only if those who would seek to extract advantage from the denial of human rights and basic labour standards by making them a factor in economic competition are effectively prevented from doing so will the adverse trends of recent years be reversed.

For this reason we identify strongly with the calls of the international trade union movement for social clauses, protecting basic rights to be written into the arrangements governing international trading relationships. We watched with interest the discussions that took place at the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment last November, and insist upon the need to press ahead with the pursuit of new structures in GATT and in the ILO. While noting the comments made by the Director-General on the need for increasing awareness of the possibilities of existing mechanisms, we nevertheless see clear value in supplementing them with new and binding regulations. In conclusion, FIET reaffirms its commitment to the ideals expounded 40 years ago and our belief that their achievement resides in the field of concrete action rather than utopian fantasy. We welcome the forceful manner in which the Director-General has echoed that belief. We welcome also the fact that speakers from all groups in this tripartite Organisation have, practically without exception, declared their support for the high principles first enunciated 40 years ago. It is our sincere hope that this support will find concrete expression in terms of action in our individual countries.

In a report that is replete with memorable quotations I would finish by citing the Director-General's own response to those who argue the inevitability of mass unemployment and the impossibility of acting against it. He says that "such counsels of despair have no place in the ILO".

Interpretation from Japanese: The PRESIDENT Mr. TSUJINO) – This concludes the discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General.

It would like to take this opportunity to thank all those have participated in the general discussion of the Reports.

Provisional Record

Seventy-fifth Session, Geneva, 1988

Sixth item on the agenda: Partial revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107)

Report of the Committee on Convention No. 107

Introduction

1. The Committee on Convention No. 107 was set up by the International Labour Conference at its third sitting on 2 June 1988. It was originally composed of 73 members (40 Government members, 10 Employers' members and 23 Workers' members). To achieve equality of voting strength, each Government member was allotted 23 votes, each Employers' member 92 votes and each Workers' member 40 votes. The composition of the Committee was subsequently modified six times during the session and the number of votes attributed to each member was adjusted accordingly.¹

2. The Committee elected the following Officers:
Chairman: Mr. España-Smith (Government member, Bolivia);

Vice-Chairmen: Mr. Diaz Garaycoa (Employers' member, Ecuador) and Mr. Svenningsen (Workers' member, Denmark);

Reporter: Mr. Helms (Government member, Denmark-Greenland Home Rule Government).

3. At its fifth sitting, the Committee appointed a Drafting Committee composed of the following members: Mr. Peyra (Government member, the Netherlands); Mr. Watchorn (Employers' member, Australia); Mr. Adam (Workers' member, Canada); and the Reporter of the Committee.

4. The Committee had before it two reports: Report VI(1) and VI(2), prepared by the International Labour Office on the sixth item on the agenda of the Conference, "Partial revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107)", to be discussed by the Conference for the first time. The Proposed Conclusions submitted by the Office were contained in Report VI(2).

5. The Committee held 17 sittings.

6. The representative of the Secretary-General noted that the item before the Committee was the partial revision of Convention No. 107, which had been adopted in 1957. While it remained the only major international instrument dealing with indigenous and tribal peoples, it reflected the 1950s philosophy of integration which had since become antiquated; this philosophy even adversely affected the protective clauses of the Convention, despite their intrinsic value. The current perspective was to ensure that the cultures and traditions of indigenous and tribal people were accorded proper respect, and that they were adequately consulted on matters affecting them. For this reason the ILO had decided to revise the Convention. In summarising the procedure leading to the inclusion of this item on the Conference agenda, the representative of the Secretary-General referred to the Meeting of Experts convened in 1986 to advise the Governing Body and highlighted the significance of the decision to deal with the revision under the double-discussion procedure, which reflected the importance the Governing Body gave to this question. Also, he noted that when Convention No. 107 was formulated, indigenous and tribal people had little or no representation and their voice was not heard during the discussions, whereas today many organisations of indigenous and tribal peoples had been formed, a number of which were present for the Conference's discussions. The representative of the Secretary-General summarised the collaboration which had taken place over many years between the ILO and the United Nations and other specialised agencies. Turning to the analysis of the replies to the questionnaire in Report VI(1), he noted that there were significant areas of agreement on the basic issues of the revision. The integrationist approach and the paternalistic language of Convention No. 107 were now considered to be largely unacceptable and pressure for their replacement by an approach which respected cultural heritage in its broadest sense was widespread. This did not mean that integration was to be rejected as such, but rather that it should not be the exclusive goal of national policy. The protective aspects of Convention No. 107 were considered to be valid, and there was even a feeling expressed in the replies that they should be strengthened. Finally, there was broad consensus that there was a need to ensure that an adequate consultative process existed in matters affecting indigenous and tribal people. The representative of the Secretary-General then drew the Committee's attention to the problems associated with revising Convention No.

¹ The modifications were as follows:

- (a) 3 June: 78 members (43 Government members with 250 votes each; 10 Employers' members with 1,075 votes each; and 25 Workers' members with 430 votes each);
- (b) 7 June: 70 members (43 Government members with 25 votes each; 10 Employers' members with 731 votes each; and 17 Workers' members with 430 votes each);
- (c) 9 June: 68 members (44 Government members with 135 votes each; 9 Employers' members with 660 votes each; and 15 Workers' members with 396 votes each);
- (d) 11 June: 60 members (44 Government members with 63 votes each; 9 Employers' members with 308 votes each; and 7 Workers' members with 396 votes each);
- (e) 15 June: 59 members (44 Government members with 56 votes each; 8 Employers' members with 308 votes each; and 7 Workers' members with 352 votes each);
- (f) 17 June: 60 members (44 Government members with 63 votes each; 9 Employers' members with 308 votes each; and 7 Workers' members with 396 votes each).

107 to make it forward-looking, while at the same time having regard to existing legislation in member States. Referring to the scope of the Committee's work, he pointed out that questions concerning self-determination and the degree of control to be exercised in the decision-making process, were not within the ILO's mandate, and were already being dealt with by the United Nations. Thus, many of the proposals before the Committee were procedural in that they would, if accepted, establish procedures rather than create substantive rights. The representative of the Secretary-General noted that the major issues to be discussed were land rights and recruitment and conditions of employment. He felt it important that, during its discussions, the Committee keep in mind the special significance of land to many indigenous and tribal peoples, and their conception of territorial rights as distinct from mere ownership. Concerning employment, he noted that the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations and the Meeting of Experts on the Revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107) had highlighted the extent of vulnerability of indigenous and tribal people to abuses in this area. In concluding, the representative of the Secretary-General noted that while there was already wide agreement on the basic principles for revising Convention No. 107, the rights of indigenous and tribal people often conflicted with the perceived needs for the development of society as a whole. In successfully completing its deliberations, he felt sure that the Committee would be instrumental in formulating proposals for a Convention whose influence went far beyond its mere text.

General discussion

7. The Employers' members attributed special importance to the partial revision on Convention No. 107 and they reaffirmed their willingness to participate in the revision in order to improve the effectiveness of the Convention. While many things had justified the decision to review this Convention, including the fact that only 27 countries had ratified it, the Employers' members did not necessarily accept that it was totally inapplicable. They felt that the Convention could be selectively amended to make it more effective and to ensure its widespread implementation. In general terms there was a need to strengthen both the concept of participation of indigenous and tribal people in policy decision affecting them, and their legal rights, while retaining their identity. The Employers' members felt, however, that it was important to ensure that the outcome of the Committee's work remained within limits appropriate to the legal and administrative conditions which existed in the rest of the national communities in which these people lived.

8. One Employers' member considered that the revision of Convention No. 107 presupposed that there was a sufficient body of experience with such an instrument. However, given the low level of ratification, he considered that there was no basis in fact for the view that Convention No. 107 was outdated. Moreover, he considered that a number of the changes which were being proposed, including changes to certain terminologies, were beyond the competence of the ILO. He suggested that a working party of legal advisers be set up to study the matter. In questioning the reasons behind the decision to revise Convention No. 107, he felt that the existing text adequately respected the culture and customs of indigenous and tribal populations and that it upheld a policy of spontaneous, rather than compulsory integration. As for paternalism, he observed that it existed in all countries and that its desirability should be carefully examined before being condemned. He further observed that because of the difference between indigenous and tribal populations in developed and developing countries, it would be very difficult to treat them in a single instrument. For these reasons, he was opposed to the revision of Convention No. 107.

9. The Workers' members recalled that when Convention No. 107 was adopted in 1957 it was unique in its scope. They were none the less keen to help to improve it in the light of the changing situation of indigenous and tribal peoples, whose position had recently received attention in such forums as the United Nations and in the report of the World Commission on Environment and Development (the Brundtland Report), as well as the ILO. Among other things, the Workers' members preferred to refer to indigenous and tribal "peoples" rather than "populations" since, as there were about 300 million of them, they were not merely a group. In addition, the Workers' members considered it vital that, in amending Convention No. 107 so that it conformed to modern principles of human rights and self-determination, the Committee take the opportunity to draw on the opinions and experiences of the various organisations representing indigenous and tribal peoples which were present at the Conference.

10. Two Workers' members described their countries' policies concerning tribal minority groups. They considered that the partial revision of Convention No. 107, during the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration on Human Rights, was a necessary element in the process of achieving harmony in national approaches in this important issue.

11. Many Government members expressed their support for the decision to undertake a partial revision of Convention No. 107 along the lines that had been proposed by the Meeting of Experts. There was a large measure of agreement that the conclusions in Report VI (2) generally constituted a reasonable balance between the views expressed by governments and by employers' and workers' organisations in their responses to the questionnaire. Most Government members foresaw the presentation of detailed comments on a number of specific conclusions. A number of them referred to the need to replace the current emphasis of Convention No. 107 with an explicit respect for the unique identity of indigenous and tribal populations and to reach a new understanding with them. Several Government members stressed the need for equal treatment of all groups in the community.

12. The Government member of India expressed reservations on a number of the conclusions of the report of the Meeting of Experts which, in his view, did not represent any degree of consensus. For this reason, his Government considered that the draft amendments to some of the Articles of Convention No. 107 were invalid. The Government member of France supported the view expressed by an Employers' member that the proposed revision of Convention No. 107 should not go beyond the competence of the ILO. He felt that the partial revision should focus on working conditions and social security, leaving standards setting on other issues to the United Nations. The Government member of the Netherlands agreed that the Committee should deal with matters within its competence.

13. Several Government members stressed the need to develop a universally applicable text which could attract a sufficiently wide consensus to permit ratification by a large number of member States. The Government member of Australia noted that several of the rights which were contained in the Proposed Conclusions would be collective rather than applying to individual members of the peoples concerned, and that this approach would cause problems. Several Government members felt that the recognition of matters such as customary law, rights of possession and the use of land, and the assumption by indigenous peoples of responsibility for training and education programmes must be seen in a broader national context. A number of Government members stressed that protection of the rights of indigenous populations must fit rationally within national legal systems. The Government member of Canada emphasised that in this regard her Government was not advocating either the preservation of the status quo or an approach which favoured the lowest common standard. Rather, she felt that during the ensuing discussions it was essential to keep in mind the relationship between indigenous rights and national legal systems. The Government member of Venezuela said his Government would be unable to accept any proposal which would be in conflict with national law. The Government member of Sweden pointed to the growing importance of international law in improving the conditions of indigenous and tribal populations and protecting their rights.

14. Several Government members described the background and current situation, including legislation and administrative arrangements, concerning indigenous and tribal populations in their countries. The Government member of Denmark informed the Committee that he was participating on behalf of both the Danish Government and the Greenland Home Rule Government. He stated that this method of participation was evidence of the constructive relationship which could be developed between nation-states and indigenous peoples. He pointed out that some of the issues which had been successfully resolved in Denmark were similar to those being considered by the Committee. The Government member of India noted that in accordance with his Government's policy of ensuring that tribal populations were able to join the mainstream of national life, their representatives were able to speak at the national and international level, although certain conditions regarding representation had to be met before such views could be taken into account.

15. A number of Government members expressed the view that when considering changing the term "populations" to the term "peoples" it should be borne in mind that, in an international context, the meaning of the term "peoples" was unclear and in some cases had political connotations. The Government members of Canada and France considered that its use could imply rights which went beyond the scope of Convention No. 107, such as the right to self-determination. The Government member of India felt that replacing the term "populations" by the term "peoples" could inhibit the number of ratifications of the revised Convention. The Government member of Argentina considered that while replacing the word "populations" by "peoples" might create difficulties for some States, not including the word "peoples" could disappoint indigenous communities and cast doubt on the nature of the Committee's work. He therefore supported a solution which would specify that the term should not be interpreted as it was in international law.

16. Several Government members expressed reservations on the question of land rights, particularly where sub-oil resources were involved and felt that there was a certain ambiguity in the proposed wording. Some of them felt that the various systems and national laws concerning the exclusive rights of States over the use of subsurface mineral resources, including hydrocarbons, should be taken into account. The Government member of Canada felt that the revised Convention should reflect the different types of land rights which exist; there should not be any revival of claims to traditionally occupied lands which had been the subject of treaties or other arrangements; and the Convention should provide means for dealing with the fact that governments were not always able to recognise all claims for a variety of reasons. The Government member of India drew attention to the responsibilities of the states in land administration in India. He agreed with the statement in Report VI(1) that attempting to achieve international standards for land rights was extremely complex. He felt, however, that Point 4 of the Proposed Conclusions did not accurately reflect the serious reservations and lack of consensus in the report of the Meeting of Experts. He was of the opinion that it would be inappropriate to amend Articles 11 and 14 of Convention No. 107 until a clear consensus emerged. The Government member of France supported this view.

17. The third general issue which was raised by a number of Government members concerned the proposed provisions of the Convention which would require governments to seek the consent of indigenous groups before adopting legislation that affected them. A number of Government members affirmed their commitment to the need for full consultation with indigenous and tribal populations and to the increased participation of these groups in decisions which affected them. The Government member of Canada referred to the need to preserve the independence of legislative bodies in democratic societies. The Government member of India stressed that national governments could not surrender the right to make decisions on economic development. The Government member of the United States expressed the belief that governments should share with their indigenous and tribal populations the responsibility for developing co-ordinated and systematic action for the protection of their members and for the promotion of their rights.

18. The representative of the United Nations stated that the United Nations fully supported the revision of Convention No. 107 and the work being undertaken by the ILO in this regard. He pledged continued co-operation in the revision process. He informed the Committee of the status of the preparation by the United Nations Working Group on Indigenous Populations of the United Nations Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities, of a draft universal declaration on indigenous rights. He added that he would be happy to provide additional information to the Committee, including relevant documentation.

19. The representative of the World Health Organisation encouraged the Committee in its task of revising Convention No. 107 and drew the attention of the Committee to the primary health care programme of the WHO. In referring to Part VI of the Proposed Conclusions, dealing with social security and health, he emphasised the role of the community in health care. He informed the Committee that the WHO was focusing on district level management in order to improve health systems, and stressed the importance of information exchange.

20. The Director of the Inter-American Indian Institute of the Organisation of American States described the role and activities of his organisation, which had co-operated with the ILO since 1950. He underlined the need to amend Convention No. 107 since the orientation towards assimilation had largely been abandoned. It was now most important that the rights of full participation of indigenous peoples, as well as the multi-ethnic character of States which included them, be recognised in order that autonomous development could be achieved. The member States of the Institute agreed that it was essential to achieve equality through diversity, so that every State could be enriched by its indigenous populations. The speaker considered that new models of development were needed so that an increased contribution of indigenous populations to productivity and technology would lead to a better balance between society and its environment.

21. The Committee also heard statements from six international non-governmental organisations which were attending the Conference in accordance with Article 56 Paragraph 9 of the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference. Each of the representatives of the organisations briefly described the scope of their work and the extent of their representation of indigenous and tribal peoples. They all expressed their strong support for the decision to undertake the partial revision of Convention No. 107, which they felt had been a landmark in its time, but which now required amending in order to dispose of its paternalistic approach and remain valid. Several of the representatives of the non-governmental organisations affirmed their strong preference for the use of the term "peoples" rather than "populations" in the revised Convention, stating in particular that it reflected better their view of themselves. They stressed the view that the revised Convention would be limited to social, economic, environmental and cultural considerations, and thus that political issues such as self-governance and other political aspects of self-determination would be beyond its scope. A number of their representatives expressed the hope that the Committee would arrive at conclusions which were agreed upon by indigenous peoples, particularly so far as the important issues of participation in decision-making, and territory and natural resources were concerned.

22. The representative of the World Council of Indigenous Peoples stated that the purely national focus of issues concerning indigenous peoples was giving way to regional and international concerns. As concerned the orientation of the revision of Convention No. 107, he stressed that the desire for a recognition of self-determination for indigenous peoples was a desire for their cultures and values to be recognised. He considered that the concept of self-determination expressed the most desirable relationship between indigenous peoples and nation-states, and acknowledged the need to strengthen the working relationship between the various components of modern society.

23. The representative of the Inuit Circumpolar Conference highlighted the importance of territorial and treaty rights to indigenous peoples in view of their special relationship with the land, and stated that guaranteed access to land was vital if the growth of indigenous societies had been devalued by widespread expropriation of land and territories. Not having proper guarantees of territorial and resource rights would result in an unacceptable gap in the revised Convention, leading to the assimilation and ultimate destruction of indigenous societies. The speaker pointed out that since treaties were distinct elements in the dealings of some indigenous peoples with national governments, treaties and treaty rights should receive specific recognition in the revised Convention so that the rights indigenous peoples had under them would be adequately protected.

24. The representative of the Four Directions Council stated that the fundamental principle which the indigenous organisations felt should be reflected in the revised Convention was the right of these peoples to be represented effectively in all levels of decision-making which might affect them. He referred to the right to organise their own decision-making institutions; the right to respect of their wishes as expressed through conciliation and co-operation with national bodies; and the right to be directly represented on national decision-making bodies. He stated that experience had shown that participation and self-determination were essential in achieving positive economic and social change, and were in fact perfectly consistent with the ILO's own basic principles. He also stressed that self-determination was not destructive of the social fabric of States. In this respect, he noted that change which was imposed from the outside was ineffective and worked against the creative energy of a people. He concluded by proposing that the Committee adopt a general conclusion that governments should take effective measures to consult indigenous peoples during the next stage of the revision process, and that they should incorporate the views of indigenous peoples in their further comments to go before the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference.

25. The representative of the Indigenous World Association observed that an equitable relationship, not a paternalistic one, was required if the rights of indigenous peoples were to be improved. He pointed out that for many indigenous peoples, "modernisation" might be accompanied by the promotion of an alien culture and thus be regressive.

26. The representative of the Nordic Same Council referred to the problems involved in drafting the revision in a legalistic manner which did not correspond to conceptions that were meaningful to indigenous peoples, citing for instance the legalistic distinctions drawn between "populations" and "peoples". He asserted that many of the problems of indigenous peoples stemmed from legislation imposed on them and their territories. As regards land rights, he pointed out that many indigenous peoples were unfamiliar with the concept of private ownership of land, but that its pursuit was often the only way to protect their rights under national law. In discussing environmental issues, he commented on the desirability of drawing on the accumulated wisdom of indigenous peoples in maintaining a self-sustaining environment. He hoped that it would be recognised that there should be a strong indigenous voice in decision-making, and that indigenous peoples' aspirations focused on the right to self-determination which was the way indigenous people expressed their aspirations in this respect.

27. The representative of the Indian Council of South America said that the Council was particularly concerned about aspects of development which implied the destruction of nature, and the undermining of cultural values through assimilation. She felt that the revised Convention should be able to go beyond the constraints imposed by Convention No. 107 so that indigenous peoples could contribute to national development.

28. The Government member of Australia announced that it was his sad duty to inform the Committee of the death of Pastor Sir Douglas Nicholls, a former Governor of South Australia and the first Aborigine to hold such a position. Sir Douglas Nicholls had for many years been a tireless worker for the Aborigine cause and he was a former chairman of the Aborigines Advancement League. The Chairman expressed the Committee's condolences and requested that they be conveyed to the Australian Government.

Examination of the Proposed Conclusions contained in Report VI(2)

29. The representative of the Inuit Circumpolar Conference, referring to Points 1 to 13 of the Proposed Conclusions and speaking on behalf of the other non-governmental organisations present, stressed the fundamental importance of recognising the diverse indigenous societies as peoples. She stated that the continued use of the term "populations" would undermine the credibility of the revision process since indigenous peoples would be depicted in inadequate and inaccurate terms. She noted that some countries had expressed concern that the term "peoples" could imply self-determination, but stressed that Convention No. 107 was limited to social, cultural, environmental and economic considerations, and that any political dimensions were outside the scope of a revised Convention and of the competence of the ILO. She noted that a number of governments had attached considerable importance to the self-determination of indigenous peoples and that it was a prerequisite for the implementation of human rights. Since indigenous peoples still had no right to participate effectively in the revision process, she appealed to the conscience and sense of moral responsibility of the Committee to revise Convention No. 107 so that it recognised indigenous peoples as distinct peoples rather than mere populations. She stressed that unless the wishes of indigenous peoples were adequately included in the revised Convention, it would lack credibility and be unacceptable to them.

CONCLUSIONS PROPOSED WITH A VIEW TO THE ADOPTION OF A REVISED CONVENTION

1. SCOPE OF THE REVISED CONVENTION AND DEFINITIONS

Point 1¹

30. The Committee had before it four amendments on the question of replacing the term "populations" in Convention No. 107, by the term "peoples" in the revised Convention. Amendments submitted by the Employers' members and by the Government member of Canada proposed using the term "populations" in the revised text. The Government member of Bolivia proposed an amendment to use the term "populations" in its generic meaning which included tribal peoples and indigenous populations. The Government member of Canada proposed an additional amendment to the effect that, if the Committee should decide to use the term "peoples", the use of that term in the revised Convention would "not imply the right to self-determination as that term is understood in international law". The Government member of Norway offered a sub-amendment to the Canadian amendment, providing that the term "peoples" as used in the revised Convention would "not address the question of national self-determination as this term is understood in international law".

31. The Employers' members indicated in respect of their amendment that the use of the term "peoples" could create difficulties for ratification of the revised Convention, as it might be taken as a synonym for self-determination, and might have different meanings in different countries. The Workers' members strongly supported the use of "peoples" as proposed in the Office text, in particular as it correctly reflected the view these peoples had of themselves. Moreover, they recalled that the great majority of governments which replied to the questionnaire had favoured using the term "peoples". The Government member of Canada stated that her Government felt that the term might have implications in international law that were different from its use in international legislation.

32. At several moments during the Committee's deliberations, when representatives of accredited non-governmental organisations spoke, they recalled the vital importance of this terminology for them. It reflected their own sense of who they were, and the use of the term "populations" in Convention No. 107 was degrading. They recognised that it was not within the ILO's mandate to pronounce on issues of self-determination. They stressed that if the revised instrument did not use this term they would not be able to support its adoption or its ratification by States, regardless of the other provisions it might include.

¹The numbering of the Points reproduces that of the Proposed Conclusions in Report VI(2). It does not necessarily correspond in every case to the numbering of the Proposed Conclusions reproduced at the end of the Committee's report, which are based on the decision of the Committee and, in some cases, of the Drafting Committee.

33. The Legal Adviser was asked to provide clarification as to whether the use of the term "peoples" would have legal implications affecting the scope of the revised Convention. He indicated that the notion "people" had no legal definition as such, but that it did carry some political implications at the international level. The legal implications resulted first from Article 1, paragraph 2 of the United Nations Charter, and had subsequently been developed further in other instruments. The general view was that the notion of self-determination applied in principle to peoples under foreign colonial domination and not to peoples in independent States which were precisely those referred to in the Proposed Conclusions. The Committee might thus conclude that the use of the term "people" would therefore have no implications in this respect. It had, however, to be recognised at the same time that the notion was not fully established within the United Nations framework, and that its evolution was beyond the ILO's competence and control. The question thus remained as to the advantages of using the term in this revised Convention given its objectives. It would not appear to make more specific the identification if the groups were covered by the Convention. It would merely emphasise the sense of self-identification of these groups, an element which, however, was in any event included in the text. It was therefore ultimately for the Committee to decide, in the light of these considerations and of the concrete objective sought, which of these terms should be preferred.

34. Some Government members expressed continuing reservations over the use of the term "peoples"; some supported the use of the term and others expressed the conviction that a solution could be found which would allow its use. The Committee decided to refer the question to a Working Party which it created for that purpose, including four members of each group in the Committee.

35. When the Working Party had completed its deliberations, the Chairman informed the Committee of the results of its work in this respect. He stated that it had been clear there were firm positions on this matter, and many reservations over the Working Party had, however, been able to agree that the term "peoples" should be used instead of "populations", but that to allow this it would be necessary to make it perfectly clear that its use in the revised Convention would not imply recognition of the right to self-determination as it is understood in international law. The Working Party had considered a number of different formulations and had decided to put before the Committee a text which might serve as a basis for further deliberations. This text was as follows: "The use of the term "peoples" in the present Convention shall not be taken to affect the interpretation given to this term in other international instruments or proceedings, in particular as concerns the question of self-determination. " He emphasised that this was not a final text, and that no member of the Working Party considered it as such, and that it was put before the Committee as a basis for the next discussion as such, it should be included in the proposed revised Convention so that governments, employers and workers could react to it.

36. The Government member of Canada stated that her Government understood and sympathised with the feelings of the indigenous and tribal representatives on this point, and that Canada did use the term "peoples" in its internal legislation. However, she was not now in a position to express a final position on this text. She stated that if her Government's own proposal were not accepted, they would prefer another formulation offered during the working party's deliberations, which she read out: "Nothing in this Convention shall be taken to imply that the peoples concerned are, by the force of this Convention, being accorded the right of self-determination or other rights in international law or as understood in other international organisations."

37. The Government members of Brazil, France, India, Turkey and Venezuela stated that they had serious reservations about the use of "peoples", and felt that the text put before the Committee by the working party should not be used in the Committee's conclusions. The Government member of Japan requested a clarification of the text put before the Committee by the Working Party, and stated that it was not appropriate to use the text as a basis for the next discussion because its meaning was not clear. The Government members of Bolivia, Colombia, Norway and Portugal, as well as the Employers' and Workers' members, felt that the compromise text was a good basis for further deliberations, that it should be included in the Committee's conclusions, and that the term "peoples" should therefore be used in the draft Convention. It was also recalled that 26 of the 32 governments whose replies were reproduced in Report VI(2) had supported the use of the term "peoples".

38. The representative of the Secretary-General recalled that there had been an agreement within the working party to use the term "peoples", subject to the reservation that a statement would have to be included limiting its implications so far as self-determination was concerned. He recalled that in any case, this was a first discussion, that no one could be committed by what was agreed this year, and that every element of the conclusions of the present Committee would be subject to review during the further consultations.

39. As the Committee was unable to achieve consensus on this Point, it was decided that the expression "(peoples/populations)" should be used in its conclusions and in the proposed revised Convention, and that further deliberations would have to be held on it next year.

40. The Committee had three amendments before it. First, the Workers' members proposed an amendment to delete the words "in independent countries" in Point 2(a), in order to enable better coverage of all governmental situations. The Employers' members opposed the amendment since independent countries were already referred to in Article 1 of the Convention. A representative of the Secretary-General recalled that the 1986 Meeting of Experts had recommended that the revised Convention should apply to independent countries, and stated that a change could affect a number of other Conventions which dealt with indigenous populations in dependent territories. In view of the complications referred to, the Workers' members withdrew the amendment, with the proviso that they would review their position in a year's time. (In their second amendment, the Workers' members had proposed a similar deletion in Point 2(b), which was also withdrawn.) Another amendment presented by the Workers' members called for the insertion of the words "or the establishment of state supremacy" after the word "colonisation", in order to make the revised Convention apply to situations in which there had been neither conquest nor colonisation. The Employers' members believed that, because the phrase was a legally indeterminate expression, it could lead to difficulties in implementation. They opposed both remaining proposals. A number of Government members supported the amendment since it closed a potential loophole or mirrored national experience. After further discussion, the question was referred to the Working Party, which reported to the Committee that the amendment had been considered and then withdrawn.

41. The Workers' members had also proposed deletion of the word "traditional", which the Employers' members and some Government members opposed. The Employers' members felt it was against the sense of Convention No. 107. The Workers' members then sub-amended their amendment to substitute the word "own" for "traditional". The Employers' members felt that this formulation would lead to the Convention being interpreted as referring to both traditional and non-traditional institutions, which was not its intention. The proposal to replace the word "traditional" by the word "own" was adopted by 8,840 votes in favour, 7,237 against, with 680 abstentions.

42. Point 2, as amended, was adopted.

43. The Employers' members introduced an amendment intended to permit the governments concerned to have an option, not an obligation, whether to consider self-identification in determining the population groups to which the Convention would apply. The Workers' members opposed the amendment, since it would weaken the text and self-identification was very important. A number of Government members expressed their views, most of which were opposed to the amendment. The amendment was withdrawn by the Employers' members. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to replace the word "important" by the word "fundamental", which they felt better reflected the approach of the Proposed Conclusions, and to delete the word "population" which they felt was superfluous. The Employers' members opposed the amendment, stating that the Office text already went quite far and that the proposed amendment would make implementation more difficult. The Government member of the United States considered that while either term in the first part of the amendment was satisfactory, he wanted to ensure the maximum number of ratifications. The Government members of Brazil and India opposed the first part of the amendment. The Government member of Colombia expressed support for it. The first part of the amendment (to replace "important" by "fundamental") was adopted by 9,505 votes in favour, 1,190 against, with 7,820 abstentions. The second part of the amendment was referred to the Drafting Committee.

44. Point 3, as amended, was adopted.

Point 4

45. The Government member of the USSR introduced an amendment which would avoid ambiguity in the text by removing the word "other" before "tribal", and this was adopted.

46. Point 4, as amended, was adopted.

II. GENERAL POLICY

47. On this Point the Committee had four amendments. The Government member of the United States proposed an amendment to replace "Governments" by "Member countries" in order to avoid confusion. In view of the clear understanding expressed by the Committee that the existing wording referred to governments of member States, and not to other governments (such as tribal governments), the amendment was withdrawn.

48. The Workers' members introduced a two-part amendment which they considered better reflected the new approach to be embodied in the revised Convention. First they proposed that the words "in co-operation with" be replaced by "with the full participation and consent of". The second proposal was to replace the words "for the protection of these peoples and the promotion of their rights" by the words "to guarantee respect for the integrity of these peoples and their rights". They considered that the amendment better reflected the aspirations of indigenous peoples. Concerning the first part of the amendment, the Employers' members and the Government members of Brazil, India and New Zealand considered that the original text was appropriate and opposed the amendment. The Government member of Argentina supported the expression "with the full participation", but opposed "with the full consent". The Government member of Venezuela stated that since the amendment was contrary to the Venezuelan Constitution, he opposed it. The Government member of the USSR supported it. The Workers' members suggested that the word "consent" be deleted from the amendment. This subamendment received broad support and the first part of the amendment as subamended was adopted by consensus. The Workers' members introduced the second part of the amendment and stated that the term "protection" had patronising overtones. They recognised the principle, however, and considered that it should be retained in the amended text. Several Government members supported this part of the amendment. The Employers' members did not consider that the term "protection" was derogatory and opposed the amendment, as did the Government members of Canada and the United States. The Government member of India added that less developed tribal populations were in considerable need of protection and that he also opposed the second part of the amendment. The second part of the amendment was adopted by 9,690 votes in favour, 8,330 votes against, with 1,020 abstentions.

49. In the light of this decision, an amendment to replace the word "co-operation" by the word "partnership" submitted by the Government member of New Zealand, was withdrawn.

50. The Employers' member introduced an amendment which made it clear that the rights invoked would be legally recognised. In reply to a question by the Government member of Venezuela, the Employers' members indicated that their amendment would not refer to laws adopted by indigenous institutions, but to those adopted by national governments. Several Government members and the Workers' members considered that the amendment would make this provision too restrictive. The Employers' members withdrew the amendment.

51. Point 5, as amended, was adopted.

52. The Government member of the United States introduced an amendment to Points 6(a) and 6(b) to add references to individual members of these peoples. The Employers' members supported this view. The Government member of Australia submitted an amendment to Point 6(a) and 6(c) to use the term "members of the peoples". This amendment was supported by the Government members of France and the United States, who accepted it as a subamendment to the United States proposal, and by the Employers' members. The Workers' members recalled that Convention No. 107 did not contain any references to individual persons and suggested that the amendment be subamended to read "the said peoples and their members" instead of "the said peoples". The Government member of Australia explained that support for collective rights was still contained in his amendment, as well as rights which were accorded to members of populations. The Government member of the United States supported this position and withdrew the amendment to Point 6(b). The amendments to Point 6(a) were adopted, as amended, by consensus.

53. Five amendments to Point 6(b) had been submitted. The Workers' members tabled an amendment proposing the replacement of "promoting" by "ensuring", and the insertion of "custom and traditions" after "cultural identity" and "their" before "institutions". The Workers' members explained that the purpose of the amendment was to strengthen the Office text. A number of Government members, supported by the Employers' members, opposed part of the Workers' members' amendment, which called for the use of the word "ensuring" rather than the word "promoting". The Government member of Norway pointed out that the amendment would not be in accordance with other ILO Conventions. In the light of this view, the Workers' members withdrew it.

54. The Government member of Canada also introduced an amendment to include a reference to customs and traditions, explaining that this amendment had been specifically requested by Canadian indigenous groups. The Government member of New Zealand, who had submitted an amendment intended to insert the concept of spiritual well-being, noted that it was covered by both of the previous amendments and withdrew it. An amendment proposed by the Government member of the USSR, which proposed the inclusion of a provision for the protection of indigenous populations' way of life at the end of Point 6(b), was withdrawn in view of its similarity to the one which was being discussed. The Employers' members considered that the amendment was unnecessary in view of the fact that the original wording encompassed traditional considerations. Several Government members supported the amendment, which was adopted by consensus.

55. An amendment to Point 6(c) was introduced by the Government member of the United States, calling for its replacement by the words "assisting the members of the peoples concerned to raise their standard of living to that enjoyed by other members of the national community". The Workers' members agreed with the principle that people should have a higher standard of living but considered that indigenous peoples should decide the issue for themselves. They submitted an amendment to replace the text of Point 6(c) by "ensuring an adequate standard of living of the peoples concerned and a process of development compatible with their aspirations and way of life". The Employers' members said that the amendment submitted by the Government member of United States was more appropriate and supported it. The Workers' members proposed a subamendment to the amendment submitted by the Government member of the United States to include references to those peoples' aspirations and ways of life, and withdrew their amendment. The Government member of the United States and the Employers' members supported the subamendment. Point 6(c) as amended was adopted by consensus, with reservations expressed by the Government member of Venezuela.

56. The Government members of Canada and the United States each proposed amendments calling for a new Point 6(d) which would address the encouragement of self-reliance and self-esteem. The Government of Canada supported the amendment of the Government member of the United States and withdrew her amendment. The Workers' members considered that the proposed new Point was paternalistic and superfluous in view of the agreement already reached on Point 6(a). The Employers' members supported the amendment and stressed the importance of fostering individual dignity. They felt that for clarity, economic self-sufficiency should be included and proposed a subamendment to this effect. The Workers' members proposed subamendments which they considered would better protect individual rights. After further discussion, the Government member of the United States withdrew the amendment. The subamendments were subsequently also withdrawn.

57. Point 6, as amended, was adopted.

Point 7

58. Alternative texts of this point were before the Committee, of which A was a new text and B would have deleted Article 2(3) of Convention No. 107. The Committee had four amendments before it. The Employers' members in an amendment called for the adoption of Alternative A. The Workers' members, who had submitted a similar amendment, withdrew it and supported that of the Employers' members which was adopted by consensus. The Government member of the United States submitted an amendment to add "Members of", but the amendment was not seconded. The Government member of Canada proposed an amendment to provide that the revised Convention would apply equally to males and females of these populations. The Workers' members were of the opinion that the amendment was superfluous and stated that international texts applied to all persons. The Employers' members and several Government members shared this view. The Government member of Norway supported the amendment. He felt that the status of indigenous women was often eroded as a result of economic changes and thus governments needed reminding of their duties towards indigenous women. A number of Government members voiced the same opinion. The Committee did not arrive at a consensus, and the amendment was not adopted.

59. Point 7 was adopted without change.

Point 8

60. An amendment submitted by the Government member of the USSR was not seconded. The Workers' members introduced an amendment to replace the text with one they felt corrected the impression that coercion could be acceptable. The Employers' members opposed this amendment because, in their opinion, it was no less ambiguous, and the original text provided for a greater measure of protection and assistance; in addition, it would not confine the prohibition on the use of force and coercion to the context of the Convention. The Workers' members then introduced a further subamendment. The Government member of Canada shared the opinion of the Employers' members and said that she also understood the need to link Point 8 to the provisions of the Convention. To this end she also proposed a subamendment. The Employers' members supported this subamendment, as did the Government member of the United States, who suggested a re-ordering of the words. The Government member of Portugal stated that she would have preferred to see the prohibition of the use of all force or coercion, but in view of the acceptability of the normal, legal use of force, by the police for example, she supported the thrust of the Workers' members' subamendment. She proposed a further subamendment which made this point. A representative of the Secretary-General informed the Committee that the intent of the Office text of Point 8 included a recognition that the normal use of force by governments against citizens, as for example in connection with law enforcement, would not be prohibited.

61. After further discussion of a compromise subamendment proposed by the Workers' members, Point 8, as amended, was adopted.

Point 9

62. Three amendments to Point 9 were submitted to the Committee. The Workers' members introduced an amendment to add a reference to territories, because of the overall importance of this concept to indigenous peoples. The Employers' members were of the opinion that, since there were already adequate provisions safeguarding land, it was inappropriate for it to be introduced in this Point. Several Government members agreed with these reasons and opposed the amendment. The Workers' members withdrew the amendment, reserving the right to raise the issue at the second discussion in 1989. The Government member of the USSR tabled an amendment to include mention of the environment in the text. The amendment was unanimously adopted. The Government member of New Zealand submitted an amendment calling for a monitoring procedure but withdrew it in view of the provisions in Point 13.

63. Point 9, as amended, was adopted.

64. This point was the object of five amendments. The amendment tabled by the Employers' members was intended to amalgamate the two clauses in the Office text and delete the reference to a state of segregation. The Employers' members said that the wording proposed by the Office was inappropriate today, and that any protective measures that might be considered should not be contrary to the wishes of the population concerned. The Workers' members proposed a subamendment to delete reference to the duration and extent of any protective measures. The amendment, as subamended, was adopted unanimously.

65. Two amendments referring to the original text of Point 10 which were submitted by the Government member of the USSR and the Workers' members were no longer applicable. An amendment tabled by the Government member of the United States calling for the addition of a new clause was not seconded and therefore not considered.

66. Point 10, as amended, was adopted.

Point 11

67. Point 11 was adopted without change.

Point 12

68. The Employers' members proposed an amendment to Point 12(a) to delete the reference to social control which they considered to be inappropriate for an instrument of this kind. This amendment, which was supported by the Workers' members, was adopted by consensus. An amendment submitted by the Workers' members to delete the words "when they undergo social and economic change", which they felt was superfluous, was supported by the Government member of Australia and the Employers' members, and was adopted by consensus.

69. The Workers' members proposed an amendment to replace Point 12(b) with a more positive formulation, and to add the term "practices". The amendment was supported by the Employers' members and the Government member of the United States and was adopted by consensus. The Government member of the United States and the Employers' members had also submitted amendments to add the term "practices", which were therefore not considered further.

70. As concerns Point 12(c), the Workers' members introduced an amendment to add a reference to participation, in a similar vein to an amendment adopted under Point 5. The Chairman pointed out that a discussion of a similar nature had taken place under that Point. The Employers' members supported the amendment which was adopted by consensus. As a result, a similar amendment tabled by the Government member of New Zealand was superseded and not considered.

71. Point 12, as amended, was adopted.

72. The Government member of the United States withdrew an amendment to introduce the term "Member countries", as a similar question had already been dealt with under Point 5.

73. The Workers' members proposed a two-part amendment to substitute "obtain the informed consent" for "seek the consent", and to add that it should be "freely expressed through their own institutions". They considered it essential that indigenous peoples have a real influence on decision-making. The Employers' members opposed the amendment since, in their opinion, it implied a right of veto to indigenous populations over government action. The Government member of Canada supported the Employers' members' views and added that the amendment could threaten the supremacy of legislative bodies. She also felt that it might not always be possible for governments to obtain the views of every group. Several Government members supported this view. The first part of the amendment was rejected by 1,980 votes in favour, 2,880 against, with 180 abstentions. The Workers' members noted this decision with regret, as it was a crucial concern for the indigenous peoples.

74. An amendment calling for full consultation in lieu of seeking the consent was submitted by the Government member of the United States. A similar amendment proposed by the Government member of New Zealand was withdrawn in its favour. The Government member of the United States explained that it was his Government's practice to consult with tribal governments concerning new proposals which would affect them, and that this amendment provided for greater participation on the part of indigenous populations. The Employers' members supported the amendment and withdrew a similar amendment they had tabled. The Government member of Norway proposed a subamendment to change this to "consult fully with a view to obtaining the consent". The Workers' members proposed another subamendment to make the goal of consent stronger still. The Government member of Canada opposed the subamendments, particularly since she believed their adoption would jeopardise ratification of the revised Convention, stating that the amendment submitted by the Government member of the United States already implied what was stated in the Norwegian subamendment. For her delegation, this language required not only formal consultations, but consultations in good faith through appropriate mechanisms. The Government members of Brazil, Ecuador and France further supported the United States amendment. The subamendment proposed by the Government member of Norway was supported by the Government member of Peru and by the Workers' members, who withdrew their subamendment in favour of it. The subamendment submitted by Norway was rejected by 2,034 votes in favour, 2,390 against, and 180 abstentions.

75. At the request of the Workers' members, in accordance with Article 65, paragraph 8, of the Standing Orders, a record vote was taken. The results of the vote were as follows: 2,163 votes in favour, 2,610 votes against, with 180 abstentions. The subamendment was rejected. The amendment which had been submitted by the Government member of the United States was adopted by consensus.

76. The second part of the Workers' members' amendment sought to replace "through appropriate procedures" by "freely expressed through their own representative institutions". The amendment was supported by the Employers' members. The Government member of Canada felt that the text was too restrictive and did not allow for individual consultation and she introduced a subamendment to ease the restriction. The Workers' members appreciated the intention and said they could support it if it was further subamended to emphasise the need for action where legislation was concerned. This text was adopted as subamended. The Employers' members tabled an amendment to add the word "directly", which was adopted.

77. As regards paragraph (b) of this Point, the Workers' members introduced an amendment to replace the proposed text by wording which would increase the emphasis on participation of indigenous and tribal peoples in decision-making. They proposed a subamendment to make the text focus on those directly affected by policies and programmes. A number of Government members supported the amendment, though there was some debate over whether the word "freely" should be included in the text. The Employers' members proposed an amendment designed to permit participation of the people concerned in administrative and other bodies, and the Government member of Japan submitted an amendment which would provide for their participation on an equal footing with other members of the national community. Several Government members were of the opinion that this proposal accorded with the philosophy of the paragraph and supported it. The Workers' members and a number of other Government members opposed the amendment since they felt it would cause problems for governments which had adopted measures of positive discrimination in favour of their indigenous and tribal populations regarding, for instance, representation in legislative bodies. The Government member of Japan pointed out that the concerns which had been voiced were adequately protected in Point 72. The Employers' members proposed that the amendment of the Workers' members be supported as subamended by the word "directly". The Government member of Colombia opposed the addition of the word "directly" because in his opinion it was undemocratic. The Government members of Peru and Venezuela shared this view.

78. The amendment, as subamended, was adopted. The Government members of Colombia, Peru, Venezuela and Japan expressed their reservations and the Government member of Japan said he would reintroduce his amendment at the 76th Session of the Conference. A Workers' members' amendment to reorder the Proposed Conclusions under Point 13 was withdrawn. Amendments by the Government member of New Zealand and the Employers' members were superseded by the adopted text and were therefore not considered.

79. The Workers' members tabled an amendment to Point 13(c) intended to strengthen the proposed text by adding a reference to resources and changing "initiative" to "initiatives" (English text only). The Employers' members were of the opinion that the amendment made the text too vague. They pointed out that the obligation of governments extended only to the provision of an opportunity for development. The Workers' members explained that the term "resources" was used in an economic sense and excluded natural resources; it was intended to refer to the means necessary to develop their own institutions. Several governments supported the amendment which was adopted by consensus.

80. Point 13 as amended, was adopted.

81. Before proceeding with Points 14-26, the Chairman invited the representative of the Indian Council of South America to express the general view of non-governmental organisations on the Points which dealt essentially with the development process, social order and internal laws of indigenous and tribal peoples. The speaker emphasised that an appropriate form of development for indigenous people, including economic and social progress, had to be achieved without force and the sacrifice of their identity and values. She stressed that indigenous people should be allowed to control their own development in line with a concept of participation and consultation, as emphasised by the United Nations and other specialised agencies including the ILO. She noted that the Workers' members had proposed several amendments which clarified and strengthened these arguments and she urged the Government members and the Employers' members to support them. She emphasised the importance of according respect to customary law rather than national laws to resolve internal disputes, and said that internal regulation was to a large extent more conducive to development and the preservation of cultural identity than social control imposed by States.

Point 14

82. The Workers' members submitted an amendment calling for the deletion of this Point. They said it contained old-fashioned language and was paternalistic, and that the concepts expressed were already contained in Point 6. There was considerable discussion on whether the proposed Point was valid and useful. The Government member of Bolivia stated that the Point was valid within the general objectives of promoting the development of indigenous populations. Several Government members expressed similar opinions. The Government member of India advised against overemphasising the paternalistic aspect and the Government member of the United States preferred to see a full range of opportunities for development expressed in the document. In the light of their views, the Workers' members withdrew the amendment.

83. The Government member of New Zealand proposed an amendment to replace "co-operation" by "partnership" and to provide that these measures should be a matter of the highest priority. The Workers' members introduced a subamendment to amend "partnership" to "full participation and co-operation" and supported the amendment. The Committee discussed whether the terms participation, co-operation or consultation should be used, and noted that all three had been agreed to in different contexts. The Employers' members and several Government members were opposed to the use of the term highest in connection with priority, and stated that a high priority was sufficient. A consensus emerged that the term "participation and co-operation" was acceptable.

84. Point 14, as amended, was adopted.

85. The Government member of Bangladesh made a general statement in which he explained the system of development relating to indigenous populations in his country, which included significant representation in parliament, various walks of life and professions. A member of the cabinet belonged to the tribal population. Tribal population had appropriate representation in the sub-district councils, district councils and municipal bodies, which were always consulted before any development project was undertaken. He pointed out that the objective of Convention No. 107 was to integrate tribal populations into the mainstream of national life so that they could benefit from economic progress. In his view, Point 15 was contrary to this objective and he had submitted an amendment calling for its deletion. However, in the light of the discussion on Point 14, he withdrew his amendment. Two amendments intended to emphasise participation and consultation but to retain the right of control of governments, were submitted by the Government member of India and the Employers' members. The amendments were considered jointly. The Government member of India said that while his Government supported the ideas of participation and consultation it had reservations about conferring the right of decision-making on any group. He felt that while the Office text for the revision had been drafted with good intentions, Point 15 was unrealistic in suggesting that these peoples be given the right to exercise control over the development process. This view was shared by the Employers' members so far as their amendment was concerned. The Government member of Brazil emphasised the need to have a Convention which would be widely ratified and supported the attempt of the Government member of India to introduce an element of flexibility. The Workers' members did not support the amendment of the Government member of India which, in their opinion, would severely weaken the influence of indigenous and tribal peoples on decision-making. This view was echoed by the Government member of Colombia.

86. The amendment submitted by the Government member of India was rejected by 315 votes in favour, 2,700 against, with 2,160 abstentions. The amendment submitted by the Employers' members was rejected by 2,430 votes in favour, 2,520 against, with 225 abstentions.

87. The Workers' members introduced an amendment to include the term territories in this Point. They withdrew that part of the amendment calling for its inclusion in Point 14 and the deletion of the word "should". The Employers' members said that the term territories was inappropriate in view of the objective of the text to allow indigenous populations to determine their own priorities. Moreover, they felt that the use of the term could cause legal difficulties and pointed out that it was included in the original Convention. Several governments expressed their opposition to the use of the term since it had implications for national sovereignty. The amendment was adopted by 2,565 votes in favour, 2,530 against, with 180 abstentions.

88. The amendment proposed by the Government member of New Zealand to include reference to spiritual well-being was supported by the Government member of Colombia who proposed a sub-amendment to include the term "belief". The amendment was adopted by consensus.

89. An amendment introduced by the Government member of Canada to add the words "to the extent possible", intended to leave the text flexible enough to ensure a higher level of ratification, was adopted by 3,465 votes in favour, 3,213 against, with 189 abstentions.

90. An amendment calling for the insertion of a reference to national legal standards was submitted by the Government member of Bolivia. The Employers' members felt that the text of Point 15 already covered the matter. The Workers' members held a similar view and the amendment was not adopted.

91. The Committee considered two amendments intended to safeguard participation by indigenous peoples in matters concerning them. The amendment proposed by the Government member of Peru was withdrawn in favour of that submitted by the Workers' members. The Employers' members considered that the original text was more appropriate and opposed the amendment. The Government member of Mexico stated in supporting the amendment that the involvement of these peoples in the process of development should be as broad as possible. The amendment was adopted by 3,402 votes in favour, 819 against, with 2,226 abstentions.

92. Point 15, as amended, was adopted.

93. Five amendments had been submitted on Point 16. The Workers' members withdrew an amendment referring to the preservation of environmental integrity. They now felt this should be considered in Part III of the proposed revised instrument, and stated that they would return to it next year. A second amendment submitted by the Workers' members put greater emphasis on environmental impact studies and was intended to put an obligation on governments to carry them out; it also added the word "spiritual". A more limited amendment to the same effect, which had been proposed by the Government member of Peru, was withdrawn in favour of the former amendment. The Government member of Peru said that governments should carry out social and other studies in developing plans involving indigenous populations. The Employers' members, and the Government member of Botswana, were of the opinion that the original text was more relevant and opposed the amendment. In supporting the amendment, the Government member of India considered that the clause should start with the words "Wherever appropriate". The Government member of Japan supported this view. After several Government members had expressed their support for the Workers' members' amendment, the Employers' members withdrew their opposition and the amendment was adopted by consensus. The Government member of Japan expressed his reservations over the adoption. In view of the adoption of the Workers' members' amendment, the Government member of New Zealand withdrew a related amendment.

94. The Workers' members tabled an amendment intended to require governments to ensure that the peoples concerned had adequate resources to carry out such studies for themselves. The Employers' members and several Government members expressed their opposition since they were of the opinion that its adoption would result in the undertaking of parallel sets of studies. The Workers' members proposed a subamendment to modify the text to require governments to make adequate resources available for indigenous people to carry out studies for themselves. The Employers' members opposed the subamendment since in their opinion it was unnecessary and would dilute the impact of the Convention. The Workers' members withdrew the subamendment, reserving the right to address the issue at the 76th Session of the Conference.

95. Point 16, as amended, was adopted.

96. The Workers' members introduced an amendment calling for the recognition and respect of the customary laws of the peoples concerned in the application of law to the said people. They said that for them such a provision was an important principle. The Employers' members considered that the amendment would lead to preference being given to customary law and thus possible conflict with written legislation. They preferred the text proposed by the Office, which paid due regard to customary law. The Government member of Norway pointed out that the terms "recognise" and "respect", when interpreted in a legal sense, could give preference to customary law and thus make ratification difficult. Several Government members shared these views and opposed the amendment. A subamendment offered by the Workers' members to use the word "rules" was considered by the Government member of Japan to be ambiguous and was subsequently withdrawn, along with the amendment itself.

97. An amendment submitted by the Government member of Canada to replace "customary laws" by the word "customs" was withdrawn in favour of an amendment tabled by the Employers' members to use the words "customs and traditions". The amendment was rejected by 3,376 votes in favour, 3,780 against, with 189 abstentions.

98. Point 17 was adopted without change.

Point 18

99. The Workers' members submitted an amendment calling for the deletion of Point 18. They were of the opinion that its contents were covered in a number of other Points [6(b), 9, 12(b)]. The Employers' members felt that the Point was fully relevant since it used positive wording which could be agreed by all. This view was shared by the Government member of Canada. The Workers' members withdrew the amendment.

100. The Government members of Australia, India and Japan each tabled similar amendments calling for the insertion of a reference to the national legal system. The Workers' members, in opposing the amendments, said that procedures and national laws were covered in the proposed Point 19. The Government member of India drew attention to the importance of national legislation as a part of the democratic process. The Government member of Colombia was of the opinion that the Convention should be forward-looking, in particular as legal systems were continually evolving. He felt it was important not to be restrictive by referring to national legal systems and he opposed the amendments. The Government member of Portugal said that with the text proposed by the Office it might be possible to have legal systems which were not compatible with international human rights. The Workers' members submitted a subamendment calling for the addition of the words "fundamental rights defined by the national legal system". The Government member of Bolivia supported the subamendment. The Government members of India and Australia withdrew their amendments in favour of that of the Government member of Japan. The Employers' members supported the amendment and the subamendment, which were adopted by consensus. An amendment offered by the Government member of New Zealand was not seconded.

101. The Government members of Denmark, Finland, Norway, Portugal and Sweden expressed their concern over the legal implications of the amended wording on the grounds that it could result in restrictions to human rights. They expressed their reservations on the amendment, and stated that they would return to this question at the 76th Session of the Conference. The Workers' members regretted that these reservations had been made after adopting the amended working.

102. Point 18, as amended, was adopted.

103. The Government member of Australia proposed an amendment calling for the deletion of Point 19. He said that since the proposed text did not recognise the primacy of national law, it could cause difficulties in countries which otherwise might ratify the Convention. Moreover, he considered that Points 17 and 18 gave sufficient coverage of the ideas expressed in this point. A majority of the Government members who spoke supported the amendment, as did the Employers' members. The Government member of Portugal said that it was up to the government concerned to decide on procedures. The Government member of the United States stated that his country has procedures to resolve such conflicts. Both opposed the amendment. The amendment was adopted by 3,591 votes in favour, 3,402 against, with 315 abstentions.

104. As a result of the adoption of the amendment, two amendments submitted by the Employers' members and the Workers' members to amend the original text were not considered.

105. Point 19 was deleted from the Proposed Conclusions.

Point 20

106. The Government member of Australia introduced an amendment to delete the words "according to their individual capacity", which in his view were patronising. The Workers' members withdrew an amendment to rephrase Point 20, in favour of the Australian amendment. The Employers' members supported the amendment, which was adopted by consensus. An amendment tabled by the Government member of Australia to delete a reference to Point 19 had been superseded by the deletion of Point 19 from the Proposed Conclusions.

107. Point 20, as amended, was adopted.

108. The Workers' members introduced an amendment intended to rephrase this Point to require that the methods normally used by these peoples for dealing with internal matters be respected, and introducing the concept of the imposition of penalties which were compatible with internationally recognised human rights. The Government member of Argentina proposed a subamendment to ensure that due regard should be had to the methods used, in a way consistent with the phrasing of Point 17. The Employers' members and several Government members considered that the text which had been proposed by the Office was more appropriate. A vote was taken at the request of the Workers' members. The subamendment was rejected by 180 votes in favour, 4,219 against, with 567 abstentions. The amendment was rejected by 2,961 votes in favour, 3,106 against, with 441 abstentions.

109. The Government member of Peru tabled an amendment calling for the insertion of the words "and the standards and institutions recognised" before the words "by the peoples concerned" in the text proposed by the Office, which would enable the intention expressed in the text to be compatible with national legal systems. The Workers' members supported the amendment. The Government member of Bolivia expressed support for the amendment and pointed out that some peoples may have developed traditional legal systems, including penal systems, and the amendment recognised the fact. The Employers' members considered that the amendment would overly broaden the scope of the text, going beyond respect for the customary methods of peoples for dealing with offences, and they opposed the amendment. This view was shared by the Government member of Japan. The Government member of Norway could not support the proposed amendment because it was sufficiently covered by other Points already adopted. The amendment was rejected by 3,339 votes in favour, 3,465 against, with 504 abstentions.

110. Point 21 was adopted without change.

111. The Workers' members tabled an amendment calling for the inclusion of an introductory phrase which was used in Convention No. 107 and for a requirement that the customs of these peoples be respected, which they considered would accord better with the wishes of indigenous peoples. The Employers' members felt that the amendment was too restrictive and that the text proposed by the Office was neutral and thus had a broader application. The Government member of the United States expressed a similar view. In answer to a question, a representative of the Secretary-General said that the proposed text was compatible with other ILO texts in stating that these customs should be "taken into consideration", and that it had been drafted with a view to making it generally applicable. The Workers' members subsequently withdrew the amendment.

112. Two similar amendments, to ensure that national legal systems were taken into account, were submitted by the Government members of Canada and Japan. The Government member of Japan stated that penal law, which was the foundation of public order in a country, should be applied equally. The Government member of Australia opposed the amendments which he felt would not allow account to be taken of customs and traditions in the way the Office text did. The Government member of Norway voiced the same opinion and said that the amendments would limit the possibilities for governments to take into account these peoples' customs. The Workers' members and the Employers' members opposed the amendments, the latter stressing that customs should not be given the same status as national law. The amendments were not adopted. The Government member of Peru withdrew an amendment referring to standards and institutions, but reserved the right to resubmit the matter at the 76th Session of the Conference.

113. Point 22 was adopted without change.

114. The Workers' members table an amendment to delete the introductory phrase because they felt that there was no need to provide for exceptions in such cases. The Government member of Colombia supported the amendment. The Employers' members were of the view that the principle of equality before the law must be maintained. They felt that the deletion proposed would afford preferential treatment to indigenous populations and opposed the amendment. They felt, however, that the proposed text could be improved by reversing the order of the phrases. The Government member of the United States supported this point of view, and the Government member of the USSR said that the text proposed by the Office was flexible enough to cover the different circumstances in various countries. In view of the opinions which had been expressed, the Workers' members withdrew the amendment.

115. Point 23 was adopted without change subject to rearrangement of the text.

116. The Government members of Canada and New Zealand each proposed an amendment to delete the word "specially" since they felt it could create uncertainty, and in their opinion this point needed to underscore the fact that everyone should be safeguarded against abuses of fundamental rights. The Government member of Colombia, in opposing the amendment, said that it was necessary to mention special safeguards of fundamental rights. The Workers' members felt it important to ensure that the possibility of adopting special measures should remain, and it was agreed that this amendment would not preclude this. The amendment was adopted by consensus.

117. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to ensure that these peoples would have the right to use their own languages in legal proceedings. In answer to a question, a representative of the Secretary-General stated that the Committee of Experts had taken the position that this right was implied within the concept of effective protection. Several Government members who expressed support for the amendment shared the opinion that a denial of this right could become a denial of justice. A subamendment introduced by the Employers' members to qualify the amendment by using the term "in so far as possible" was not supported and was withdrawn. The amendment was adopted by consensus.

118. An amendment calling for the addition of a sentence which would ensure the right of these peoples to use their own languages in legal and administrative proceedings was tabled by the Workers' members. Several Government members considered it important that indigenous and tribal populations should have the right to be understood in court, although a number of Government members expressed doubts on the practicality of being able to provide sufficient linguistic services. As a means of improving the applicability of the text, the Workers' members proposed a subamendment to delete the reference to administrative proceedings. The Employers' members supported this proposal and the amendment was adopted.

119. Point 24, as amended, was adopted.

120. The Workers' members, noting that the imposition of penalties specified by national legal systems, particularly imprisonment, could be disruptive of community life, introduced an amendment which would allow giving preference to imposing penalties according to customary law. The Government member of Japan considered that it was not appropriate to adopt a general principle in this respect and opposed the second part of the amendment. He proposed that the amendment he had offered linking penalties to compatibility with the national legal systems should be considered as a subamendment. The Government member of Colombia opposed the amendment because he felt that it would make the scope of the provision too narrow. He agreed with the text proposed by the Office in which economic, social and cultural characteristics should be taken into account. The Employers' members also preferred the Office text. The Government member of Australia was of the opinion that the original text followed logically from Point 22, which was adopted without change, and he therefore supported it.

121. The Workers' members withdrew their amendment in favour of one which had been submitted by the Government member of Peru. They proposed a subamendment to delete the reference to economic, social and cultural characteristics. The Government member of Japan supported the amendment. The Government member of Norway felt that the scope of the amendment was too narrow and supported the text opposed by the Office. This view was shared by several Government members and by the Employers' members and the amendment was not adopted. As a result, the amendment by the Government member of Japan was also not adopted.

122. Point 25 was adopted without change.

123. An amendment to delete the Point on the grounds that it was paternalistic was submitted by the Workers' members, who then proposed a subamendment to give preference to other methods of punishment than confinement in prison. The Employers' members stressed that alternative penalties could only be imposed if contemplated in national law, and if this text recognised this they could support the amendment. The Government member of Japan said that Point 26 concerned the essence of how criminal sentences should be carried out and referred to the amendment he had submitted concerning the essential aim of rehabilitation. The Government member of Australia strongly supported preference being given to other forms of punishment as in the Workers' members' amendment. The Government member of Colombia suggested that any readaptation should be consistent with the cultures of the persons concerned. The Government member of the United States supported the amendment, which in his opinion gave sufficient flexibility as it stood. The amendment was adopted as subamended and, as a result, the amendment proposed by the Government member of Japan was not considered.

124. Point 26, as amended, was adopted.

III. LAND

125. The Committee had 77 amendments before it on the section concerning land, and it decided to refer the entire section to a Working Party. The Working Party held three sessions and reported to the Committee that since there were deeply divided views on several aspects of this issue, it was unable to reach a consensus in the time available. The Committee agreed to the Working Party's suggestion that it postpone the detailed examination of the Proposed Conclusions in Part III of Report VI(2) and of the amendments submitted to it. The Committee also agreed with the recommendation of the Working Party that the Employers' and Workers' members and the Government members of the Committee should, if they wished, make general statements on the whole section, and that these statements together with the Proposed Conclusion in Report VI(2), should be used as the basis for discussion at the 76th Session of the Conference.

126. The Chairman pointed out that in accordance with the Standing Orders of the Conference, the Office must use the text which emanated from the Committee for the next consultation with Governments, Employers and Workers. He advised that when addressing the section on land, the Office would use the text of the Proposed Conclusions in Report VI(2). When comments were received, the Office would thus prepare the final draft of the revised Convention on the basis of the general statements on land made in the Committee, the amendments which had been submitted and the elements of agreement which were attained in the Working Party.

127. A representative of the Inuit Circumpolar Conference, speaking for the accredited non-governmental organisations, made a statement on indigenous lands and resources. The speaker reiterated that guaranteed access and rights to an adequate land and resource base were crucial to the survival and growth of indigenous peoples. She stressed that if the revised Convention was to be a useful instrument, the fundamental territorial and resource rights of indigenous peoples must be respected by it, and that without adequate land and resource provisions the Convention would not provide a meaningful framework for the world's indigenous and tribal peoples. In this context, she referred particularly to the principal government responsibility to guarantee respect for the integrity of indigenous peoples and their rights. The speaker advocated a broad and flexible approach to revising the Proposed Conclusions on land so that land and resource rights would not be unfairly limited. She noted that although the term "territories" was preferred by indigenous peoples, they would support the use of the term "lands" as well in appropriate contexts, in recognition of concerns that had been expressed by a number of governments. She underlined the importance of including the concept of indigenous control and consent in the Convention, and stressed that involuntary removal from land was repugnant and contrary to the objectives of the revised Convention. The speaker expressed special concern over amendments before the Committee which would not establish a general principle of recognition of land rights, including traditional occupation. The speaker also emphasised the importance of treaty rights. Finally she urged all members of the Committee to consider land issues sensitively and to speak in 1989 with a unified and affirmative voice concerning land rights.

128. The Workers' members supported the restructuring of the Proposed Conclusion on land, and felt that it was counterproductive to try to be too precise in order to cover every conceivable situation in addressing the land issue. Different indigenous and national economies and land tenure systems should be taken into account in agreeing broad principles, and it should be left to the supervisory machinery of the ILO to avoid unjust application. In the view of the Workers' members, the fundamental goal was to secure and respect the land base and therefore the way of life of entire communities, and for this reason they strongly favoured the use of the term "territories", which included waters, sea ice, sea areas, etc. It was important for communities to control the development of their territories. The Workers' members suggested that the major concerns of governments and employers in relation to the recognition of land rights should be identified and addressed with a view to developing a better notion of the scope and nature of claims procedures. They felt that indigenous peoples should not have to accept any form of land rights less than the highest form of ownership or tenure accorded to others in the country. Greater attention needed to be paid to the right of these peoples to maintain their relationships between the land and their culture. So far as subsoil resources were concerned, the Workers' members argued that it was essential that there existed provision for far greater control by indigenous peoples, particularly a requirement that their informed consent be obtained. They felt it important that the question of subsoil exploitation be separated from issues relating to removal or relocation.

129. The Employers' members noted that many legal and political concepts concerning land, such as the term "territories", had not been defined in binding terms. They felt exclusive rights to territories or resources could not be attributed to one sector of the population. They recalled that the rights to subsoil resources were held by the State in most countries, while only a few recognised private ownership of these resources. Since it was difficult to make absolute statements on this important issue, they favoured the adoption of a position which would not interfere with the rights of States, but which would call for consultation with indigenous and tribal peoples concerning resource development, and the protection of their living conditions as far as possible. The Employers' members supported the Proposed Conclusions in so far as they contemplated the removal of peoples concerned from their habitual territories only in exceptional circumstances. They considered it important to include specific references to the need to protect property ownership and the use of traditionally-occupied land (a term they preferred to "territories") in national legislation, and agreed that it was necessary to create adequate procedures to deal with land claims. In conclusion the Employers' members said they did not deny any legitimate aspirations of indigenous peoples concerning land and that they were contributing in a constructive and realistic way towards achieving the best solution.

130. The views of 19 Government members of the Committee were presented. A significant number of speakers were of the opinion that the Proposed Conclusions on land submitted by the Office were largely or entirely acceptable since they accorded closely with existing national legislation. Several Government members referred to their earlier statements in the general discussion and described their legislation, or the programmes and policies which had recently been implemented or were being contemplated so far as land rights were concerned. The Government member of Brazil explained the priority being considered in his country to assure to indigenous populations permanent rights to a portion of Brazilian territory. The Government member of Argentina supported the general content of the Part III concerning land since he felt that it coincided closely with the legislation recently approved in his country. This law provided free grants of land to indigenous communities and declared them inalienable and free from taxation. The indigenous communities were therefore guaranteed adequate protection for the ownership and possession of land. He also stated that the references made to the ownership of the subsoil in Point 30 of Part III would contradict Argentina's legal and constitutional requirements. The Government member of Botswana drew the Committee's attention to the activities in his country which were designed to make land available to remote area dwellers who had been displaced from their territories. The Government member of the Philippines referred to the development of legislation in her country to delineate the boundaries of ancestral lands and ensure the rights of ownership. A number of speakers pointed to the important connection between indigenous culture and land, especially the collective aspects. In this regard, the Government member of Australia considered that the rights to land for indigenous people should be viewed as collective rights rather than belonging to any specific individual. The Government member of Venezuela felt that a closer analysis of ownership, possession and national resources was necessary within the context of the revision of Convention No. 107, bearing in mind different legal provisions in each country. He pointed out that his Government would be unable to agree to any provisions under which the right to ownership would not be in accordance with Venezuelan legislation.

131. The Government member of India agreed with the view of the Office, expressed in Report VI(2), that the question of land rights would pose complex problems in trying to achieve international standards with many different national systems. He gave as an example the designation of scheduled areas in India, the means which had been adopted for preventing the transfer of tribal lands to non-tribal people and for the restoration of alienated tribal lands, and the measures taken to protect the tribal populations in relation to the control and exploitation of subsoil resources which are owned by the State. He specified that even the Scheduled Areas had sizeable non-tribal populations in his country, and that there was no provision for community land ownership, except in the northeast of the country, stating that this position should be explicitly taken into account in the proposed revised Convention.

132. The issue of expropriation of lands was raised by several speakers. The Government member of Canada stated that it was one of the principal themes of the section on land, and the Convention should ensure that indigenous populations could only be removed from their lands in exceptional circumstances, and only then in accordance with procedures which allowed for adequate compensation. The Government members of Australia and Norway emphasised the need for a provision which would deal with the expropriation of land of indigenous peoples which did not involve their actual removal.

133. The need to develop and agree on terms which would allow flexibility of implementation was raised by a number of speakers. The Government member of Canada felt that the Proposed Conclusions should reflect sufficient flexibility with respect to the recognition of different rights based on the traditional occupancy of land. The Government member of India said that the Convention should not aim at setting a single international standard, since this would not be in the interests of indigenous populations and the lands they inhabited. The Government member of Denmark pointed to the desirability of reaching agreements which were dynamic and could be expanded to meet changing situations. The Government member of Norway, speaking on behalf of three Scandinavian countries, said that flexible language which met the various situations of indigenous peoples with regard to land, including their national, social and legal systems, was essential if universal acceptance of the Convention was to be achieved. Moreover, he said that the flexibility must be accompanied by strong protection of rights within the various systems. The Government member of Denmark stressed the importance of protecting both the environment and subsistence rights in connection with the land, including the necessity of international co-operation on environmental matters.

134. A number of speakers expressed the view that the terminology used in relation to land needed to be clear and consistent. The Government member of Canada pointed out that important differences existed between the concept of traditionally occupied lands and other lands to which title has been granted within the legal system. The Government member of India felt that the term "land" should be retained wherever possible because the term "territory" had national, international and legal implications.

135. The Government member of Bangladesh expressed strong reservations over the proposal to widen the scope of Convention No. 107. He explained that the Proposed Conclusions did not accord with the Constitution and law of Bangladesh, and considered that the Convention in its current form upheld the legitimate rights and interests of the tribal populations. He felt that amendments would result in difficulties for the policies and programmes of member States. Moreover, he considered that the Proposed Conclusions did not conform to the intent, purpose and spirit of the provisions of Convention No. 107, and that they were likely to cause divisions within developing countries at a time when unity was very important. The speaker concluded by stating he believed that even if the amendments were adopted, they were likely to be challenged in the courts of law and legislative bodies of some member States because of contradictions between the existing provisions of Convention No. 107 and the proposed revised text, and the constitutional provisions and other laws on the subject.

136. The Government member of Denmark expressed the view that the coming year which would be available to discuss further the land rights provisions of the revised Convention would be a crucial one for the indigenous people within the United Nations system. He noted that the outcome of the meeting of the United Nations Working Group on Indigenous Peoples might be of value in this regard. The Government member of Norway, speaking on behalf of several Government members, assured the Committee that they were ready to pursue the aims of the revision in a spirit of constructive co-operation. He said that the Government members were confident that the Committee would adopt a final text on land rights in 1989.

IV. RECRUITMENT AND CONDITIONS OF EMPLOYMENT

137. A representative of the Nordic Same Council, as spokesman for the accredited non-governmental organisations, made a statement concerning the Proposed Conclusions on recruitment and conditions of employment. He stated that most indigenous peoples existed in subsistence economies and stressed that the revised Convention should aim to uphold economic and development strategies in these areas. The non-governmental organisations fully respected the ILO's capacity to promote the improvement of recruitment and employment conditions. He emphasised, however, that particular attention should be paid to vocational training, handicrafts and rural industries, and in particular to traditional ways of resource utilisation, having due regard to the indigenous philosophy of environmentally sustainable development. He pointed out that the subsistence economies practised by many indigenous peoples were often seen as an obstacle to development, particularly where the exploitation of natural resources was concerned. Development had often been accompanied by dispossession of the lands these peoples occupied and their isolation from the development process and the acquisition of new skills, resulting in their marginalisation in society. He stressed the vital cultural component of traditional activities as well as the significant economic impact these activities had on the communities concerned.

138. He pointed out, however, that the possibilities of development of these peoples should not be confined to traditional activities because of the limiting effect on options for development. Rather, he emphasised that indigenous peoples should be given the opportunity to prepare for alternative occupations and activities as well as enhancing their technical skills, a course of action which would require financial support as well as the enhancement of training.

139. The Workers' members introduced a three-part amendment which proposed that the words "Each member" be replaced by "Governments"; that the element of collaboration be introduced; and that protection should be provided for to the extent that these peoples were not effectively protected by law. They explained that the thrust of the amendment was to enable these peoples to assume a larger degree of responsibility for their own affairs. Sub-amendments, to include the term "full co-operation", and to delete the final clause of the amendment which referred to laws adopted by the peoples concerned, were proposed by the Employers' members and accepted by the Workers' members. The amendment was adopted by consensus. As a consequence the Government member of Colombia withdrew an amendment, the intention of which had been incorporated in the Point.

140. Point 41, as amended, was adopted.

141. The Committee had six amendments before it. The first, submitted by the Government member of Colombia, called for Governments to prohibit and penalise discrimination. In response to a question, the representative of the Secretary-General explained that the terms of the amendment were not used in other ILO instruments on discrimination. The amendment was not adopted. The first of five amendments tabled by the Workers' members called for the replacement of words "Each Member" by "Governments", and was adopted. The second amendment to qualify "discrimination" with the adjective "adverse" was opposed by the Employers as being unnecessary and was withdrawn.

142. A third amendment submitted by the Workers' members to add a reference to measures for promotion and advancement in Point 42(a) was adopted.

143. The Workers' members proposed an amendment to introduce a new Point 42(c) to extend the coverage of Point 42 to equality of opportunity and treatment in employment between men and women and protection from sexual harassment. The Employers' members considered that equality was already adequately covered in Point 42 and that there was no need to specifically mention sexual harassment, in view of the widespread legislation against it, and opposed the amendment. Following the support of the amendment expressed by several Government members, the Employers' members withdrew their opposition. The amendment was adopted by consensus, subject to the Drafting Committee's suggestion on where it should be placed. It was later incorporated in Point 43.

144. The Workers' members introduced their fifth amendment to Point 42, calling for the expansion of the coverage of benefits in the original Point 42(c) to all social security benefits and other occupationally-related benefits. The Employers' members considered that, since Part VI of the proposed Conclusions referred to social security, this section should be restricted to conditions of employment and they opposed the amendment. The Chairman expressed the opinion that the Workers' members' proposal was pertinent in that it dealt with social security in a general rather than a specific way. In view of this explanation, the Employers' members withdrew their objection to the amendment, which was adopted by consensus.

145. Point 42, as amended, was adopted.

Point 43

146. On this point, the Committee had eight amendments before it. An amendment to place this Point before Point 42 submitted by the Workers' members, was withdrawn. The Employers' members proposed an amendment to reorder the terms of Point 43 while retaining its substance. The amendment was withdrawn after discussion.

147. The Government member of the United States tabled an amendment to Point 43(a) calling for the same measures of protection for indigenous populations as for other workers in the same sectors. A subamendment to delete a reference to recruitment and conditions of employment was proposed by the Workers' members and accepted by the Government member of the United States. The amendment, as subamended, was adopted by consensus.

148. An amendment which called for the inclusion of contractual and casual workers in Point 43(a) was submitted by the Workers' members. Following a discussion on the use of the term "contractual", the Employers' members accepted a proposal to use the term "those employed by labour contractors" and the amendment was adopted.

149. Amendments submitted by the Government member of Japan to delete Point 43(b), and by the Government member of New Zealand to add the term "compulsorily" after "subjected", were not seconded and were not considered. The Government member of Colombia introduced a two-part amendment to delete references to specific kinds of coercive recruitment systems. The amendment was not supported either by the Employers' members or the Workers' members and was withdrawn.

150. The Government member of Peru submitted an amendment calling for the addition of a clause designed to ensure that governments made sure that the peoples concerned were aware of their rights under labour legislation. The Government member of Portugal felt that the text should provide instead that these people were informed of their rights. The Employers' and Workers' members supported the amendment which was adopted. The Drafting Committee was requested to take into account the subamendment proposed by the Government member of Portugal when finalising the text.

151. Point 43, as amended, was adopted.

Point 44

152. An amendment to place an explicit obligation on governments to provide labour inspection services was submitted by the Workers' members. The Employers' members were of the opinion that the text proposed by the Office was more precise and did not support the amendment. The Chairman noted that an amendment which had been tabled by the Government member of Japan was consistent with the amendment submitted by the Workers' members. The Workers' members proposed to subamend the text supplied by the Office by adding to it the final part of their amendment, to the effect that the inspection services should ensure compliance with this part of the Convention. The Employers' members accepted the subamendment, which was adopted. The Government member of Japan announced that he reserved his position on this point.

153. Point 44, as amended, was adopted.

Point 45

154. The Workers' members introduced an amendment to add the words "at least equal", since indigenous peoples were the weakest part of society and special efforts were required on their behalf. The Employers' members supported the amendment, which was adopted by consensus.

155. Point 45, as amended, was adopted.

156. An amendment introduced by the Workers' members calling for the strengthening of the text by the insertion of the words "special" and "effectively" before "measures" and "promote" respectively, and to add the word "all" before "vocational training programmes", found no support and was withdrawn.

157. The Government member of Colombia introduced an amendment designed to ensure the participation of the peoples concerned in the design and execution of vocational training programmes, since in his view they were rarely consulted at these stages. The amendment was supported by the Government member of Peru. The Employers' members pointed out that governments could not always allow for intervention in the design of programmes and opposed the amendment. The Government member of Canada said that the key words in the Point were "general application" and she felt that the amendment would give a greater degree of privilege to one sector of the community. She therefore opposed the amendment. The Workers' members said that they preferred the original text and the amendment was not adopted.

158. Point 46 was adopted without change.

159. The Workers' members introduced an amendment to strengthen the obligation on governments and to provide for participation by the peoples concerned. The amendment was adopted by consensus. As a result, amendments which had been submitted by the Government members of Japan, New Zealand and the United States were not considered. The Government member of New Zealand reserved his position on the Point, and advised that he might raise it at the 76th Session of the Conference.

160. Point 47, as amended, was adopted.

Point 48

161. The Workers' members submitted an amendment designed to reflect these peoples' aspirations. The Government member of Denmark expressed his support for the amendment. The Employers' members felt that the text proposed by the Office was more precise and opposed the amendment. This view was shared by the Government members of Bolivia and the United States. The amendment was not adopted. An amendment calling for the amalgamation of Points 48 and 49 was tabled by the Employers' members. A subamendment was proposed by the Workers' members which would delete in Point 48 the word "progressively" in referring to the assumption of responsibility, and add the concept of choice concerning the acceptance of training programmes. Several Government members preferred the retention of "progressively" in order not to place sudden new burdens on indigenous and tribal institutions. The Employers' members' amendment was adopted.

162. Point 48, as amended, was adopted.

Point 49

163. As a result of the decision to amalgamate Points 48 and 49, amendments submitted by the Government member of Canada and the Workers' members were not considered.

164. Point 49 was deleted.

Point 50

165. The Committee had five amendments before it on this Point. The Workers' members tabled an amendment which would reword the clause with a view to recognising the right of these peoples to carry out traditional activities as they wished. The Workers' members accepted a suggestion of the Employers' members that a reference to rural industries should be retained from the original text. The Government member of the United States felt that the amendment read as though subsistence economies would have to be retained at all costs. He tabled an amendment which he considered took the possibility of alternative means of economic development into account. The Government members of Japan and New Zealand proposed amendments which they considered would avoid confusion between economic and cultural development, and which they felt would clarify some of the terms. There was general support for the sentiments contained in the Workers' members' amendment. In order to reach an agreed formulation, the Government member of the United States proposed to subamend his amendment to add a reference to subsistence economies; to the recognition, strengthening and promotion of traditional activities; and to the protection of their integrity. The Employers' members accepted the revision and the amendment was adopted and referred to the Drafting Committee for editing. It was agreed that the thrust of the other amendments had been incorporated in the text.

166. Point 50, as amended, was adopted.

Point 51

167. The Workers' members introduced an amendment to combine the texts of Points 51 and 52. The Government member of the United States referred to the necessity of avoiding the intrusive provision of technical co-operation against the will of the peoples concerned, and suggested that their wishes should be taken into account in the amendment. With this proviso, he withdrew an amendment that he had submitted to this effect. The Employers' members, in supporting the text proposed by the Office, said that it was important that governments had the option of providing assistance. The Workers' members were of the opinion that the obligation to provide financial as well as technical assistance, was most important. They noted that nothing was said about financial assistance, and stated that their formulation would cover both direct financing and the provision of credit facilities. Following discussion of ways in which a conditional statement could be incorporated, the Committee agreed to a formulation in which the Workers' members' amendment would commence with the words "Upon the request of the peoples concerned, technical and financial assistance should be provided".

168. Point 51, as amended, was adopted.

Point 52

169. In view of the amendment to Point 51, Point 52 was deleted.

VI. SOCIAL SECURITY AND HEALTH

170. The Government member of New Zealand proposed an amendment to ensure that social security schemes were provided equally to all sections of the community. The Employers' members, while sympathising with the intent of the amendment, pointed out that, for economic reasons, not all countries had universal social security schemes. This opinion was shared by the Government member of India. The Government member of Colombia stressed that it was not possible to define the extent to which all sectors of the community should receive social security benefits. In his opinion, the text should make it clear that governments should not be required to provide social security to all the population in the short term.

171. The Workers' members, in supporting the amendment, said that where social security schemes existed, they demanded universal application and proposed the elimination of the word "progressively". In their view, the issue was not the existence of social security schemes but the extension of their coverage. A number of possible subamendments were proposed, which might meet the objectives of those wishing to stress universal application of social security schemes. The Government member of New Zealand proposed to amend the Office text by the addition of the words "without discrimination against them". This subamendment received broad support and was adopted by consensus. The Government delegate of India stated that he had wished to see emphasis given to schemes which were specifically directed towards these groups, as in his own country, and he reserved his position on this Point. Two other amendments submitted by the Workers' and Employers' members were covered in the agreed text and were not considered.

172. Point 53, as amended, was adopted.

173. The Government member of United States introduced an amendment to add a requirement that resources be provided to allow indigenous peoples to assume control of health services, where they wished to do so. The Workers' members supported the amendment and consequently withdrew one they had submitted on the same Point. In response to a question by the representative of the World Health Organisation, the representative of the Secretary-General stated that the reference to the highest attainable standard of physical and mental health had been based on the wording of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural rights. The Employers' members supported the amendment, which was adopted by consensus.

174. Point 54, as amended, was adopted.

175. The Committee considered two similar amendments which had been submitted by the Government member of Canada and the Workers' members. The former stated that her amendment referred to the important issues of community-based health services, their provision, and the training of health workers. The Workers' members supported the amendment, withdrawing their own proposal, and proposed that "and medicines" be added to "health practices". The Government member of Colombia raised the issues of the holistic approach to traditional medicine and the important role of practitioners of traditional medicine, and hoped that they would be taken into account at the 76th Session of the Conference. He suggested that a reference also be made to preventive health care. The Employers' members supported the amendment which was adopted as subamended. An amendment tabled by the Government member of New Zealand was withdrawn in the light of previous discussion.

176. Point 55, as amended, was adopted.

Point 56

177. The Workers' members introduced an amendment to include in the text a requirement for the participation of the peoples concerned. The Employers' members supported the amendment and proposed the incorporation of their own amendment to add "of the country". The amendment was adopted by consensus.

178. Point 56, as amended, was adopted.

VII. EDUCATION AND MEANS OF COMMUNICATION

179. A representative of the World Council of Indigenous Peoples, as a spokesman for the accredited non-governmental organisations present, made a statement on the Proposed Conclusions on education, means of communication and administration. In referring to education, he said that a definite responsibility must be placed on governments to co-operate with indigenous peoples so that appropriate education programmes might be accomplished. These programmes included ensuring that indigenous children were taught in an appropriate indigenous environment, with consideration being given to the use of their language, subject matter, physical surroundings and, most importantly, the needs and aspirations of the peoples concerned. He stressed that if there was to be any substance and meaning to the idea of self-determination, it would have to begin by respecting the rights of indigenous peoples to educate their own children. The continuity of the consciousness of the peoples was vital to them.

180. The spokesman said that national borders had become a major obstacle to the continuity of culture, customs and traditions. He said that an amendment which proposed the free transit across national borders which separated indigenous peoples, was one means of addressing this important problem. The speaker explained the caution with which indigenous peoples had approached the terminology in the Convention, which he said was a natural product of the historical relationship between indigenous peoples and others, and reflected the general caution with which a new instrument was drafted. He stressed that Point 72 of the Proposed Conclusions should contain the strongest possible language to ensure that the rights and benefits which had already been agreed to were not adversely affected by the application of the proposed revised Convention. The speaker closed his remarks by extending an invitation to all participants to discuss the Proposed Conclusions with the indigenous and tribal peoples in preparation for their consideration at the 76th Session of the Conference.

Point 57

181. An amendment which would draw attention to the need for and possibility of affirmative action in education, was submitted by the Government member of New Zealand and was adopted by consensus. The Workers' members introduced an amendment to add to the existing text a recognition of the right of indigenous peoples to establish their own educational institutions with funds provided by governments. A subamendment proposed by the Employers' members to link the point with the existing text was agreed. A number of Government members expressed concern over the potential costs associated with what they considered to be an open-ended clause. It was felt that that factor could inhibit ratification. The Employers' members recalled that a similar concern had been addressed in Point 51 and suggested that it provide that appropriate resources should be provided for this purpose. The amendment, as subamended, was adopted by consensus.

182. Point 57, as amended, was adopted.

Point 58

183. The Workers' members proposed an amendment to require greater involvement by indigenous peoples in education programmes. They agreed to incorporate an amendment proposed by the Government member of Peru to specify various traditional values as a subamendment. A similar amendment proposed by the Government member of Canada, and subamended by the Government member of Japan, was supported by the Employers' members but considered by other Government members not to go far enough. A majority of the Government members who expressed opinions favoured the Workers' members' amendment, which was adopted as subamended.

184. Point 58, as amended, was adopted.

Point 59

185. An amendment to delete this Point was tabled by the Workers' members since part of it had been incorporated into Point 57. The amendment was adopted by consensus.

186. Point 59 was deleted.

Point 60

187. The Government member of Canada introduced an amendment to require measures to facilitate training of members of these peoples and increase involvement in the design and implementation of educational measures. The Employers' members supported the amendment in so far as it referred to special educational programmes. The Workers' members and a number of Government members felt the amendment would weaken the proposed text. The amendment was rejected by 490 votes in favour, 770 against, with 98 abstentions.

188. The Government member of Colombia submitted an amendment to increase the say of indigenous peoples in the formulation of education programmes. The amendment was supported by the Workers' and Employers' members and was adopted by consensus. An amendment to delete the word "progressive" tabled by the Workers' members received little support and was not adopted. An amendment was proposed by the Government member of Japan to provide more flexibility by the addition of the words "where appropriate", was not adopted.

189. Point 60, as amended, was adopted.

190. An amendment submitted by the Government member of Canada to replace Points 61 to 63 with a combined text was generally regarded as being regressive and was not adopted. She tabled a consequential amendment to change "mother tongue" to "own indigenous language". The Government member of Colombia proposed a subamendment to allow the group concerned to determine the languages to be taught, and calling for the deletion of the qualification regarding practicability. The amendment as subamended was adopted by consensus. The Government member of Venezuela expressed reservations over the deletion of the words "where this is not practicable". Three other amendments which had been submitted by the Workers' members and the Government members of Japan and the USSR had been covered by the amendment and were not discussed.

191. Point 61, as amended, was adopted.

192. The Workers' members tabled an amendment to ensure that these peoples had the opportunity to attain fluency in the national language. The Government member of Canada withdrew a similar amendment. The Employers' members supported the amendment, which was adopted. As the intention of the two amendments proposed by the Government members of New Zealand and the USSR had already been covered, they were not considered.

193. Point 62, as amended, was adopted.

Point 63

194. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to change "appropriate" to "effective". The addition of the word "indigenous" before "languages" was also proposed, and both were adopted by consensus. The Government member of Canada expressed reservations on the use of the word "effective" and expressed the opinion that governments could not guarantee effectiveness, but they could introduce appropriate measures for these purposes. An amendment to this effect was not considered. Two amendments which had been tabled by the Government member of Colombia and Japan had been covered and were not discussed.

195. Point 63, as amended, was adopted.

Point 64

196. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to delete this Point on the grounds that its content was already covered in Point 57. The Employers' members did not agree and said that children from these peoples should be able to participate fully in the life of the national community. Several Government members voiced similar opinions and the amendment was not adopted. An amendment to describe the goal of primary education, submitted by the Government member of the United States, was not seconded. The Government member of Canada introduced an amendment designed to ensure that an aim of primary education of indigenous peoples should be to enable them to participate fully in the national community. The Workers' members proposed to subamend this amendment to stress equal participation in the communities of the peoples concerned as well as in the national community, without restricting the coverage of the amendment to primary education. Several Government members supported both the amendment and subamendment. The Government member of Norway referred to the problems of structural discrimination which could result from a lack of education. The Employers' members stated that it was important for these population groups to be able to participate in national life. The amendment and subamendment were adopted.

197. Point 64, as amended, was adopted.

198. The Workers' members proposed an amendment to refer to all sections of the community and to add a sentence with the objective of ensuring that educational materials fairly portrayed the societies of the peoples concerned. The amendment was adopted.

199. Point 65, as amended, was adopted.

Point 66

200. An amendment to promote the understanding and exercise of indigenous peoples' rights under the proposed revised Convention was tabled by the Workers' members. Several Government members felt that the reference to duties in the original text should have been retained. The amendment was withdrawn in favour of a similar amendment submitted by the Government member of Canada, and the Workers' members proposed to subamend it to include "labour" and "rights under the revised Convention". The amendment was adopted by consensus as subamended. The intentions of amendments tabled by the Government members of Colombia and of the United States were regarded as having been included in the adopted text.

201. Point 66, as amended, was adopted.

202. The Government member of Colombia proposed an amendment calling for the deletion of the words "if necessary" in order to stress the importance of these peoples' right to know their rights and duties. The Workers' and Employers' members supported the amendment. The Government member of the Netherlands felt that, because of its link with Point 66, the amendment would result in governments being obligated to translate the Convention and other materials into all indigenous languages. In order to avoid such an open-ended commitment he proposed to use "as far as practicable". The Government member of Colombia stated that since the item referred to a basic right, the term "if necessary" was a limitation. This view was supported by the Government member of Nicaragua. Several Government members preferred the text prepared by the Office. The Government member of Norway felt that the amendment would result in reluctance on the part of governments to provide material to indigenous and tribal peoples. After the representative of the Secretary-General had confirmed that the obligation under Point 66, as well as under the rest of the proposed revised Convention, would rest with governments, the Employers' and Workers' members withdrew their support and the amendment was withdrawn.

203. Point 67 was adopted without change.

204. An amendment tabled by the Government member of the United States to give the point more flexibility was not adopted. The Government member of Peru proposed an amendment to strengthen the requirement to establish mechanisms to implement the revised Convention. The Government member of Colombia, in support of the amendment, pointed out that a co-ordinating body was needed for this purpose in each country. Neither the Workers' nor the Employers' members supported the amendment and it was not adopted. The Government member of Colombia proposed an amendment calling for the provision of sufficient means for agencies to fulfil their functions. The amendment was supported by the Workers' members and several Government members. The amendment was adopted by 742 votes in favour, 693 against, with 92 abstentions.

205. At the request of the Employers' members, in accordance with Article 65, paragraph 8, of the Standing Orders, a record vote was taken. The results of the vote were as follows: 742 votes in favour, 707 votes against, with 56 abstentions. The amendment was adopted. An amendment submitted by the Government member of Japan was not seconded. An amendment submitted by the Workers' members to include a reference to the implementation of other obligations under the revised Convention, was withdrawn when it was pointed out that it was covered in Point 70.

206. Point 68, as amended, was adopted.

Point 69

207. The Employers' members tabled an amendment calling for the adoption of Alternative A in the text proposed by the Office. Several governments supported the amendment. The Workers' members proposed, and then withdrew, a subamendment referring to the implementation of the proposed revised Convention. The amendment was adopted. An amendment proposed by the Government member of Colombia to include "and evaluation" in the Office text was adopted. The final formulation of the text was referred to the Drafting Committee.

208. Point 69, as amended, was adopted.

Point 70

209. The Workers' members introduced an amendment which they subsequently aligned with the text proposed by the Office, with the addition of the phrase "in co-operation of the people concerned". The Employers' members preferred "full co-operation" and the amendment was adopted.

210. Point 70, as amended, was adopted.

Point 71

211. The Workers' members proposed an amendment designed to have the clause take into account the intent of the proposed revised Convention and the wishes of the peoples concerned. Several Government members considered that the intention was already covered in the text and the amendment was withdrawn.

212. Point 71 was adopted without change.

Point 72

213. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to bring the text of the Point into line with Article 19, paragraph 8 of the ILO Constitution. The amendment was adopted.

Proposed new Points

214. The Government member of Colombia introduced an amendment calling for the insertion of a new Point which would require the recognition by governments of the collective rights of peoples to enjoy legal personality. He said that in many countries it was impossible, other than as an individual, to carry out many transactions. The speaker suggested that rather than being debated this time, the proposed Point might be considered by the Office for inclusion in the proposed revised Convention, with a view to discussion next year.

215. The Government member of Colombia introduced another amendment calling for the insertion of a new Point which would require governments to recognise and respect the rights of these peoples to maintain their own institutions, especially in cases in which governments adopted new mechanisms for community-level government. As it appeared that much of the sense of the proposed Point was covered elsewhere, he withdrew the amendment.

216. The Government member of Colombia introduced a third amendment to insert a point dealing with indigenous and tribal peoples who lived in frontier areas, a subject he said was not covered in Convention No. 107 or in the Proposed Conclusions. He said that no regulations adequately dealt with the social, economic and cultural problems of peoples separated by borders. The representative of the Secretary-General drew the Committee's attention to the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Recommendation, 1957 (No. 104) which contained provisions (Part. X) concerning frontier zones, and to the precedents in ILO practice for the consideration of migrant workers.

217. The representative of the Inter-American Indian Institute said that the proposal offered an opportunity to strengthen the text of the Convention and cited examples of relevant work in this area. He referred in particular to Recommendation No. 19 adopted by the VIIIth Inter-American Indian Congress in 1980, which contained detailed recommendations in this respect. The Workers' members fully supported the intentions behind the amendment, which was very comprehensive and far reaching, but preferred to be able to reflect on the matter and return to it during the second discussion. The Employers' members agreed that the amendment dealt with serious problems, and stated that the scope of some of them were beyond the competence of the ILO. They too preferred to consider the amendment at a later date, and suggested that it be drafted to be more in line with issues of direct relevance to the ILO. Several Government members shared the concern expressed in the amendment but supported the suggestion to return to it at the 76th Session of the Conference. The amendment was deferred.

Adoption of the report, the Proposed Conclusions and a resolution

218. During the examination of the draft report, several members of the Committee requested that changes be introduced for the purpose of clarifying, correcting or supplementing of the text of several paragraphs.

219. The Committee adopted the report unanimously, subject to the agreed changes.

220. The Committee unanimously adopted the Proposed Conclusions and the draft resolution.

221. The Workers' and Employers' members, as well as several Government members, expressed their appreciation of the co-operation demonstrated and the invaluable contribution made by the international non-governmental organisations representing indigenous and tribal peoples. The Chairman referred in particular to the significant impact of the carefully formulated presentations by these groups during the Committee's deliberations. The Workers' members urged all governments to consult with organisations representing indigenous and tribal peoples during their preparations for the next Session of the Conference in 1989. The Committee unanimously endorsed these views.

222. The report of the Committee, together with the texts of the Proposed Conclusions and the resolution, are submitted to the Conference for consideration.

Proposed Conclusions

1. The term “(peoples/populations)” should be used in the proposed Convention, pending a final decision by the Conference at its 76th Session.

I. SCOPE OF THE REVISED CONVENTION AND DEFINITIONS

2. The revised Convention should apply to:

- (a) tribal (peoples/populations) in independent countries whose social, cultural and economic conditions distinguish them from other sections of the national community, and whose status is regulated wholly or partially by their own customs or traditions or by special laws or regulations;
- (b) (peoples/populations) in independent countries who are regarded as indigenous on account of their descent from the populations which inhabited the country, or a geographical region to which the country belongs, at the time of conquest or colonisation and who, irrespective of their legal status, retain some or all of their own social, economic, cultural and political institutions.

3. Self-identification as indigenous or tribal should be regarded as a fundamental criterion for determining the groups which the provisions of the revised Convention should apply.

4. The indigenous and tribal (peoples/populations) mentioned above should be referred to in the revised Convention as “the (peoples/populations) concerned”.

II. GENERAL POLICY

5. Governments should have the responsibility for developing, with the full participation of the (peoples/populations) concerned, co-ordinated and systematic action to guarantee respect for the integrity of these (peoples/populations) and their rights.

6. Such action should include measures for:

- (a) enabling members of the said (peoples/populations) to benefit on an equal footing from the rights and opportunities which national laws and regulations grant to other members of the population;
- (b) promoting the full realisation of the social, economic and cultural rights of these (peoples/populations), with respect for their social and cultural identity, their customs and traditions, and their institutions;
- (c) assisting the members of the (peoples/populations) concerned to raise their standard of living to that enjoyed by other members of the national community, in a manner compatible with the aspirations and ways of life of these (peoples/populations).

7. Indigenous and tribal (peoples/populations) should enjoy the full measure of human rights and fundamental freedoms without hindrance or discrimination.

8. No form of force or coercion should be used in violation of the human rights and fundamental freedoms of the (peoples/populations) concerned, including the rights contained in the revised Convention.

9. Special measures should be adopted as appropriate for safeguarding the institutions, persons, property, labour and environment of the (peoples/populations) concerned.

10. Such special measures of protection should not be contrary to the wishes of the (peoples/populations) concerned.

11. Enjoyment of the general rights of citizenship, without discrimination, should not be prejudiced in any way by such special measures of protection.

12. In applying the provisions of the revised Convention:

- (a) due account be taken of the cultural and religious values and practices of these (peoples/populations), and of the nature of the problems which face them both as groups and as individuals;
- (b) the integrity of the values, practices and institutions of these (peoples/populations) should be respected;
- (c) policies aimed at mitigating any difficulties experienced by these (peoples/populations) in adjusting to new conditions of life and work should be adopted, with the full participation and co-operation of the (peoples/populations) affected.

13. In applying the provisions of the revised Convention, governments should:

- (a) consult fully the (peoples/populations) concerned, through appropriate procedures and in particular through their representative institutions, whenever consideration is being given to legislative or administrative measures which may affect them directly;
- (b) establish means by which the said (peoples/populations) may freely participate at all levels of decision-making in elective institutions and administrative and other bodies responsible for policies and programmes which may affect them directly;
- (c) make available to these (peoples/populations) opportunities and resources for the full development of their own institutions and initiatives.

14. The improvement of the conditions of life and work and level of education of the (peoples/populations) concerned should with their participation and co-operation, be a matter of priority in plans for the overall economic development of areas inhabited by them. Special projects for development of the areas in question should also be so designed as to promote such improvement.

15. The (peoples/populations) concerned should have the right to decide their own priorities for the process of development as it affects their lives, beliefs, territories, institutions and spiritual well-being and to exercise control, to the extent possible, over their own economic, social and cultural development. In addition, they should be involved in the formulation and implementation of plans and programmes for national and regional development which may affect them directly.

16. Governments should ensure that studies are carried out, in collaboration with the (peoples/populations) concerned, to assess the social, spiritual, cultural and environmental impact of planned development activities on them.

17. In the application of national legislation to the (peoples/populations) concerned, due regard should be had to their customary laws.

18. These (peoples/populations) should have the right to retain their own customs and institutions, where these are not incompatible with fundamental rights defined by the national legal system or with internationally recognised human rights.

19. The application of Points 17 and 18 should not prevent members of these (peoples/populations) from exercising the rights granted to all citizens and from assuming the corresponding duties.

20. To the extent compatible with the national legal system and internationally recognised human rights, the use of methods customarily practised by the (peoples/populations) concerned for dealing with crimes or offences committed by members of these (peoples/populations) should be respected.

21. The customs of these (peoples/populations) in regard to penal matters should be taken into consideration by the authorities and courts dealing with such cases.

22. The exaction from the members of the (peoples/populations) concerned of compulsory personal services in any form, whether paid or unpaid, should be prohibited and punishable by law, except in cases prescribed by law for all citizens.

23. The (peoples/populations) concerned should be safeguarded against the abuse of their fundamental rights and should be able to take legal proceedings for the effective protection of these rights. Members of these (peoples/populations) should have the right to use their own languages in any legal proceedings.

24. In imposing penalties laid down by general law on members of these (peoples/populations) account should be taken of their economic, social and cultural characteristics.

25. Preference should be given to methods of punishment other than confinement in prison.

III. LAND

26. The rights of ownership and possession of the (peoples/populations) concerned over the lands which they traditionally occupy should be recognised.

27. Governments should take steps as necessary to identify the lands which the (peoples/populations) concerned traditionally use and occupy, and to guarantee effective protection of their rights of ownership and possession.

28. Special measures should be taken to safeguard the control of the (peoples/populations) concerned over natural resources pertaining to their traditional territories, including flora and fauna, waters and sea ice, and other surface resources.

29. Governments should seek the consent of the (peoples/populations) concerned, through appropriate mechanisms, before undertaking or permitting any programmes for the exploration of mineral and other subsoil resources pertaining to their traditional territories. Fair compensation should be provided for any such activities undertaken within the territories of the said (peoples/populations).

30. Subject to Points 31, 32 and 33 below, the (peoples/populations) concerned should not be removed from their habitual territories.

31. Where the removal of the said (peoples/populations) is considered necessary as an exceptional measure, such removals should take place only with their free and informed consent. Where their consent cannot be obtained, such removals should take place only following appropriate procedures established by national laws and regulations, including public inquiries, which provide the opportunity for effective representation of the (peoples/populations) concerned.

32. In such exceptional cases of removal, these (peoples/populations) should be provided with lands of quality and legal status at least equal to that of the lands previously occupied by them, suitable to provide for their present needs and future development. In cases where chances of alternative employment exist, and where the (peoples/populations) concerned prefer to have compensation in money or in kind, they should be so compensated under appropriate guarantees.

33. Persons thus removed should be fully compensated for any resulting loss or injury.

34. Procedures for the transmission of rights of ownership, possession and use of land which are established by the customs of the (peoples/populations) concerned should be respected, within the framework of national laws and regulations.

35. The consent of the (peoples/populations) concerned should be sought when considering the adoption of national laws or regulations concerning the capacity of the said (peoples/populations) to alienate their land or otherwise transmit rights of ownership, possession and use of their land.

36. Persons who are not members of these (peoples/populations) should be prevented from taking advantage of the customs referred to in Point 34 or of lack of understanding of the laws on the part of the members of these (peoples/populations) to secure the ownership, possession or use of land belonging to them.

37. Unauthorised intrusion upon, or use of, the lands of the (peoples/populations) concerned should be considered as an offence, and appropriate penalties for such offences and other appropriate recourse procedures should be established by law.

38. National agrarian programmes should secure for the (peoples/populations) concerned treatment equivalent to that accorded to other sections of the national community with regard to:

(a) the provision of more land for these (peoples/populations) when they have not the area necessary for providing the essentials of a normal existence, or for any possible increase in their numbers;

- (b) the provision of the means required to promote the development of the lands which these (peoples/populations) already possess.

39. Adequate procedures should be established within the national legal system to resolve land claims by the (peoples/populations) concerned, including claims arising under treaties.

IV. RECRUITMENT AND CONDITIONS OF EMPLOYMENT

40. Governments should, within the framework of national laws and regulations, and in full co-operation with the (peoples/populations) concerned, adopt special measures to ensure the effective protection with regard to recruitment and conditions of employment of workers belonging to these (peoples/populations), to the extent they are not effectively protected by laws applicable to workers in general.

41. Governments should do everything possible to prevent any discrimination between workers belonging to the (peoples/populations) concerned and other workers, in particular as regards:

- (a) admission to employment, including skilled employment, as well as measures for promotion and advancement;
- (b) equal remuneration for work of equal value;
- (c) medical and social assistance, occupational safety and health, all social security benefits and any other occupationally related benefits, and housing;
- (d) the right of association and freedom for all lawful trade union activities, and the right to conclude collective agreements with employers or employers' organisations.

42. The measures taken should include measures to ensure-

- (a) that workers belonging to the (peoples/populations) concerned, including seasonal, casual and migrant workers in agricultural and other employment, as well as those employed by labour contractors, enjoy the protection afforded by national law and practice to other such workers in the same sectors;
- (b) that workers belonging to these (peoples/populations) are not subjected to working conditions hazardous to their health, in particular through exposure to pesticides or other toxic substances;
- (c) that workers belonging to these (peoples/populations) are not subjected to coercive recruitment systems, including bonded labour and other forms of debt servitude;
- (d) that workers belonging to these (peoples/populations) enjoy equal opportunities and equal treatment in employment for men and women, and protection from sexual harassment;
- (e) that workers belonging to these (peoples/populations), including seasonal and migrant workers employed in agriculture or in other activities, should be fully informed of their rights under labour legislation and of the means of redress available to them.

43. Particular attention should be paid to the establishment of adequate labour inspection services in areas where workers belonging to the (peoples/populations) concern undertake wage employment, in order to ensure compliance with the provisions of this Part of the revised Convention.

V. VOCATIONAL TRAINING, HANDICRAFTS AND RURAL INDUSTRIES

44. Members of the (peoples/populations) concerned should enjoy opportunities at least equal to those of other citizens in respect of vocational training measures.

45. Measures should be taken to promote the voluntary participation of members of the (peoples/populations) concerned in vocational training programmes of general application.

46. Whenever existing programmes of vocational training of general application do not meet the special needs of the (peoples/populations) concerned, governments should, with the full participation of these (peoples/populations), ensure the provision of special training programmes and facilities.

47. Any special training facilities should be based on the economic environment, social and cultural conditions and practical needs of the (peoples/populations) concerned. Any studies made in this connection should be carried out in co-operation with these (peoples/populations), who should progressively assume responsibility for the organisation and operation of such special training programmes, if they so decide.

48. Handicrafts, rural and community-based industries, and subsistence economy and traditional activities of the (peoples/populations) concerned, such as hunting, fishing, trapping and gathering, should be recognised, strengthened and promoted as important factors in their economic development. The integrity of these traditional activities should be protected.

49. Upon the request of the (peoples/populations) concerned, appropriate technical and financial assistance should be provided, taking into account traditional technologies and the cultural characteristics of these (peoples/populations), as well as the importance of sustainable and equitable development.

VI. SOCIAL SECURITY AND HEALTH

50. Social security schemes should be extended progressively to cover the (peoples/populations) concerned and applied without discrimination against them.

51. Governments should ensure that adequate health services are made available to the (peoples/populations) concerned, or shall provide them with resources to allow them to design and deliver services under their own responsibility and control, so that they may enjoy the highest attainable standard of physical and mental health.

52. Health services should, to the extent possible, be community-based. These services should be planned and administered in co-operation with the (peoples/populations) concerned and take into account their economic, geographic, social and cultural conditions as well as their traditional preventive care, healing practices and medicines.

53. The health care system should, to the extent possible, allow for the training and employment of local community health workers, and focus on primary health care while maintaining strong links to other levels of health care services.

54. The provision of such health services should be co-ordinated with other social, economic and cultural measures in the country, with the full participation of the (peoples/populations) concerned.

VII. EDUCATION AND MEANS OF COMMUNICATION

55. Measures should be taken to ensure that members of the (peoples/populations) concerned have the opportunity to acquire education at all levels on at least an equal footing with the rest of the national community.

56. In addition, governments should recognise the rights of these (peoples/population) to establish their own educational institutions and facilities. Appropriate resources should be provided for this purpose.

57. Education programmes and services for the (peoples/populations) concerned should be developed and implemented in collaboration with them to address their special needs, and should incorporate their histories, their knowledge and technologies, their value systems and their further social, economic and cultural aspirations.

58. The competent authority should ensure the training of members of these (peoples/populations) and their involvement in the formulation and implementation of education programmes, with a view to the progressive transfer of responsibility for the conduct of these programmes to these (peoples/populations).

59. Children belonging to the (peoples/populations) concerned should be taught to read and write in their own indigenous language or in the language most commonly used by the group to which they belong, as decided by these (peoples/populations).

60. Adequate measures should be taken to ensure that these (peoples/populations) have the opportunity to attain fluency in the national language or in one of the official languages of the country.

61. Effective measures should be taken to preserve and promote the development and practice of the indigenous languages of the (peoples/populations) concerned.

62. The imparting of general knowledge and skills that will help children belonging to the (peoples/populations) concerned to participate fully and on an equal footing in their own community and in the national community should be an aim of education for these (peoples/populations).

63. Educational measures should be taken among all sections of the national community, and particularly among those that are in most direct contact with the (peoples/populations) concerned, with the object of eliminating prejudices that they may harbour in respect of these (peoples/populations). To this end, efforts should be made to ensure that history text books and other educational materials provide a fair, accurate and informative portrayal of the societies and cultures of these (peoples/populations).

64. Governments should adopt measures appropriate to the traditions and cultures of the (peoples/populations) concerned, to make known to them their rights and duties, especially in regard to labour, economic opportunities, education and health matters, social welfare and their rights deriving from the revised Convention.

65. If necessary this should be done by means of written translations and through the use of mass communications in the languages of these (peoples/populations).

VIII. ADMINISTRATION

66. The governmental authority responsible for the matters covered in the revised Convention should create or develop agencies of other appropriate mechanisms to administer the programmes involved, and provide them with the means necessary for the proper fulfilment of the functions assigned to them.

67. The programmes referred to above should include planning, co-ordination, execution and evaluation, in co-operation with the (peoples/populations) concerned, of the measures provided for in the revised Convention.

68. These programmes referred to above should also include proposals to the competent authorities for legislative and other measures and supervision of the application of these measures, in full co-operation with the (peoples/populations) concerned.

IX. GENERAL PROVISIONS

69. The nature and scope of the measures to be taken to give effect to the revised Convention should be determined in a flexible manner, having regard to the conditions characteristic of each country.

70. The application of the provisions of the revised Convention should not adversely affect rights and benefits of the (peoples/populations) concerned pursuant to other Conventions and Recommendations, or under treaties, international instruments, or national laws, awards, custom or agreements.

Resolution to place on the agenda of the next ordinary session of the Conference an item entitled "Partial revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107)"

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Having adopted the report of the Committee appointed to consider the sixth item on the agenda,

Having in particular approved as general conclusions, with a view to the consultation of governments, proposals for the partial revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107);

Decides that the question of the partial revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107), shall be included in the agenda of its next ordinary session for a second discussion with a view to the adoption of a Convention.

Resolutions

Report of the Resolutions Committee

1. The Resolutions Committee, set up by the Conference at its third sitting on 2 June 1988, was originally composed of a total of 218 voting members (85 Government members, 60 Employers' members and 73 Workers' members). An appropriate weighting system ensured equality of voting strength.

2. The first business of the Committee was to elect its Officers. On the proposal of Mr. Ladsous (Government member, France), which was seconded by Mr. Rowe (Employers' member, New Zealand) and Mr. Karlsson (Workers' member, Sweden), Mr. Alexander (Government member, United Kingdom) was unanimously elected Chairman. In accordance with the Committee's usual practice, the Chairman acted as Reporter. The Committee elected as Vice-Chairmen Mr. Rowe (Employers' member, New Zealand) and Mr. Karlsson (Workers' member, Sweden).

3. The Committee had before it 12 resolutions submitted in accordance with article 17 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the Conference having decided, on the recommendation of the Selection Committee, to refer the resolution concerning the promotion of employment and social security (submitted by the Government delegation of Italy) to the Committee on Employment and Social Security. In accordance with article 17, paragraph 4, of the Standing Orders, these resolutions were all declared receivable. They were then presented by their authors in accordance with article 17, paragraph 5(a), of the Standing Orders.

4. After these presentations, and before the vote held in accordance with the procedure laid down in article 17, paragraph 5(a), of the Standing Orders, the following resolutions on related subjects were combined by their authors:

(a) a resolution concerning the role of enterprises in employment growth, submitted by Mr. Georget, Employers' delegate, Niger, Mr. Lindner, Employers' delegate, Federal Republic of Germany, Mr. Lounis Khodja, Employers' delegate, Algeria, Miss Mackie, Employers' delegate, United Kingdom, Mr. Nasr, Employers' delegate, Lebanon, Mr. Oechslin, Employers' delegate, France, Mr. Pierides, Employers' delegate, Cyprus, Mr. Rossi, Employers' delegate, Brazil, Mr. Rowe, Employers' delegate, New Zealand and Mr. Smith, Employers' delegate, United States; and a resolution concerning the promotion of self-employment, submitted by the Government delegation of the Islamic Republic of Iran. The authors of these resolutions agreed to combine the two texts as the following resolution: resolution concerning the role of self-employment and small and medium-sized enterprises in employment growth;

(b) a resolution concerning the report of the World Commission on Environment and Development, submitted by Mr. Andersen, Government delegate, Denmark, Mr. Ettarp, Government delegate, Sweden, Mrs. Holmboe Ruge, Government delegate, Norway, Mr. Kristinsson, Government delegate, Iceland; and Mr. Riikonen, Government delegate, Finland; and a resolution concerning environmental protection and employment, submitted by Mr. Baker, Workers' delegate, United States, Mrs. Buvverud Pedersen, Workers' delegate, Norway, Mrs. Dreifuss, Workers' delegate, Switzerland, Mr. Jaaskelainen, Workers' delegate, Finland, Mr. Karlsson, Workers' delegate, Sweden, Mr. Mercier, Workers' delegate, Canada, Mr. Morton, Workers' delegate, United Kingdom, Mr. Muhr, Workers' delegate, Federal Republic of Germany, Mr. Sánchez Madariaga, Workers' delegate, Mexico, Mr. Sunderam, Workers' delegate, Sri Lanka, Mr. Svenningsen, Workers' delegate, Denmark, Mr. Tanaka, Workers' delegate, Japan, Mr. Vanni, Workers' delegate, Italy and Mr. Verzetnitsch, Workers' delegate, Austria. The authors of these resolutions agreed to combine the two texts as the following resolution: resolution concerning environment and employment;

(c) a resolution concerning the role of the ILO in the protection and promotion of human rights, submitted by Mr. Baker, Workers' delegate, United States, Mrs. Buvverud Pedersen, Workers' delegate, Norway, Mrs. Dreifuss, Workers' delegate, Switzerland, Mr. Jaaskelainen, Workers' delegate, Finland, Mr. Karlsson, Workers' delegate, Sweden, Mr. Mercier, Workers' delegate, Canada, Mr. Morton, Workers' delegate, United Kingdom, Mr. Muhr, Workers' delegate, Federal Republic of Germany, Mr. Sánchez Madariaga, Workers' delegate, Mexico, Mr. Sunderam, Workers' delegate, Sri Lanka, Mr. Svenningsen, Workers' delegate, Denmark, Mr. Tanaka, Workers' delegate, Japan, Mr. Vanni, Workers' delegate, Italy and Mr. Verzetnitsch, Workers' delegate, Austria and a resolution concerning the contribution of the ILO to the strengthening of respect for human and trade union rights, submitted by Mr. Al-Hujailan, Workers' delegate, Kuwait, Mr. Andreev, Workers' delegate, Bulgaria, Mr. Bochow, Workers' delegate, German Democratic Republic, Mr. Bulgak, Workers' delegate, Byelorussian SSR, Mr. Escandell Romero, Workers' delegate, Cuba, Mr. Kovalevski, Workers' delegate, Ukrainian SSR, Mr. Kozik, Workers' delegate, Czechoslovakia, Mr. Timmer, Workers' delegate, Hungary and Mr. Yanaef, Workers' delegate, USSR; and a resolution concerning the promotion of human rights and development, submitted by Mr. Hordijk, Workers' delegate, Netherlands and Mr. Peirens, Workers' delegate, Belgium. The authors of these resolutions agreed to combine the three texts as the following resolution: resolution concerning the role of the ILO in the strengthening of respect for human and trade union rights; which was submitted by the Workers' group.

5. In accordance with the procedure laid down in article 17, paragraph 5(a), of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the Committee determined the first five resolutions to be considered among the eight remaining before the Committee and their order of priority. Owing to a change in the composition of the Committee, there were at this time 238 voting members (92 Government members with 645 votes each; 60 Employers' members with 989 votes each; and 86 Workers' members with 690 votes each).¹

6. The first resolutions and the votes cast for them were as follows:

- (1) resolution concerning the protection of workers' and employers' rights and freedoms in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories (479,020 weighted votes);
- (2) resolution concerning the role of the ILO in the strengthening of respect for human and trade union rights (441,060 weighted votes);
- (3) resolution concerning the role of self-employment and small and medium-sized enterprises in employment growth (362,422 weighted votes);
- (4) resolution concerning environment and employment (331,577 weighted votes);
- (5) resolution concerning occupational safety and health (294,211 weighted votes)

7. In accordance with article 17, paragraph 5(b), of the Standing Orders, at its fourth sitting the Committee set up a Working Party to make recommendations as to the order in which the remaining resolutions before the Committee should be examined.

8. The Working Party was composed as follows:

Government members: Mr. Melas (Austria), Mr. Siktanc (Czechoslovakia), Mr. Al-Akel (Jordan);

Employers' members: Mr. El-Herrawi (Egypt), Mr. Myrdal (Sweden), Mr. Glade (United States);

Workers' members: Mr. Lamprecht (German Democratic Republic), Mr. Niasse (Senegal), Mr. Dreifuss (Switzerland).

9. At the Committee's seventh sitting, the Governing member of Austria, Chairman of the Working Party, announced that the Working Party had met and that a majority of six of the Working Party favoured the following order of priority:

- (6) resolution concerning solidarity and co-operation between the affluent countries and countries of the Third World and the role of the ILO in social and economic development;
- (7) resolution concerning child labour;
- (8) resolution concerning development, employment and environment.

However, a minority of three members favoured the following order:

- (6) resolution concerning development, employment and environment;
- (7) resolution concerning solidarity and co-operation between the affluent countries and countries of the Third World and the role of the ILO in social and economic development;
- (8) resolution concerning child labour.

10. The Committee decided to adopt the order submitted by the majority of the members of the Working Party and noted the order preferred by the minority.

RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE PROTECTION OF WORKERS' AND EMPLOYERS' RIGHTS AND FREEDOMS IN PALESTINE AND OTHER OCCUPIED ARAB TERRITORIES

Presentation of the resolution

11. The resolution was presented by the Syrian Minister of Social Affairs and Labour, on behalf of the Arab group. He noted that the resolution, which concerned basic rights and freedoms that the ILO had been established to protect and promote, was especially topical in view of the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the Palestinian uprising in which scores of people had been detained, injured and killed. The uprising was a decisive rejection of an occupation that had lasted more than 20 years and that illustrated Israeli aggression and negligence of freedoms. The International Labour Conference had already taken history stances in favour of Palestinian rights: the resolutions of 1974 and 1980 respectively condemned the policy of racial discrimination and violation of trade union rights and called on Israel to refrain from creating new settlements in the occupied territories. Israel had none the less ignored international opinion and pursued its policies, as recorded by ILO missions to the occupied territories since 1978. The 1988 report of the ILO mission again confirmed Israeli provocative violations of basic human rights, while the social and economic conditions of the Palestinian people had reached an intolerable level.

12. Drawing attention to specific paragraphs in the resolution, he noted that the preamble was based both on the findings of the ILO missions to the occupied territories and on basic human rights recognised by international instruments, resolutions and covenants. The human rights of the young, the elderly and women, the right to work with dignity, the right to material and physical safety and the right to an identity were not enjoyed by the people of Pales-

¹ Subsequently, further changes were made in the composition:

- 4th sitting on 9.6.1988: 240 voting members (94 G, 60 E and 86 W);
 - 6th sitting on 10.6.1988: 234 voting members (94 G, 54 E and 86 W);
 - 7th sitting on 13.6.1988: 235 voting members (94 G, 54 E and 87 W);
 - 8th sitting on 14.6.1988: 234 voting members (94 G, 53 E and 87 W);
 - 9th sitting on 15.6.1988: 233 voting members (94 G, 52 E and 87 W).

tine and other occupied Arab territories. The operative parts of the resolution called on the ILO as the social conscience of the world vis-à-vis coercive and oppressive practices to condemn Israel, first for incapacitating young Palestinians by breaking their fingers and toes, thus depriving them of a dignified life, and second for refusing to respect the previous resolutions of 1974 and 1980. The present resolution further called on the international community – in particular the international organisations – to intensify their aid to the Arab workers and employers in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories. The final operative paragraphs called for an end to the barbaric oppression by Israel in the territories and for the establishment of a special committee at every session of the Conference to review reports and technical programmes on the conditions of Arab workers and employers in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories.

13. In submitting this resolution, the tripartite Arab group looked to the ILO, with its lofty social ideals, to play its part in reducing the psychological pain suffered by the Palestinian people. The occupation in itself was a violation of human rights. The oppressive practices by Israel were unacceptable on human and moral grounds. Finally, the speaker informed the Committee that to date 373 persons had been martyred, 11,200 injured, 1,150 handicapped and 19,000 taken prisoner, and that 308 houses had been destroyed as a result of Israeli oppressive policies in the territories.

14. Following the presentation and prior to the general discussion, the Government member of Israel requested the right of reply. The Chairman noted that a right of reply was a general principle and could be exercised provided that it was strictly confined to the precise remarks prompting it, and that no attempt was made to open up a substantive debate. The Government member of Algeria, on a point of clarification, requested the Chairman to enlighten the Committee as to the reasons which could justify granting the right of reply to the Israeli delegation. After several points of order had been made stipulating that article 17, paragraph 5(a), of the Standing Orders clearly excluded the possibility of any reply, the opinion of the Legal Adviser was sought. He pointed out that while the right of reply was not expressly provided for in the Standing Orders, it was inherent in the freedom of expression prevailing in the Organisation and lay within the discretion of the Chairman under article 61 and 62 of the Standing Orders. The Chairman's decision was not subject to appeal and it was his duty to ensure that the right of reply was not used to begin a wider debate.

15. The Government member of Israel, exercising the right to reply as granted by the Chairman, said that the statement made in introducing the resolution submitted by the Arab group amounted to an unbridled political attack against his country, using abusive language which his delegation rejected out of hand and with which it would not compete.

General discussion

16. The Workers' Vice-Chairman informed the Committee that the Workers' group had expressed unanimous concern over the serious situation in the areas dealt with in the resolution. However, the group differed in terms of what action should be taken by whom: a few members of the group felt that the resolution did not belong with the ILO but with the United Nations General Assembly; a large number of group members felt that the resolution should be adopted in its present form and content; and many members of the Workers' group accepted the idea of the resolution but felt that a number of amendments would be necessary to keep it in line with the ILO's sphere of competence. In particular, there was concern among the latter group that operative paragraph 5 would harm the work of the International Labour Conference and would eliminate the uniqueness of the special Committee on Apartheid, and further would not contribute to the search for a just solution. The Workers' Vice-Chairman also noted that the sponsors of the resolution, supported by others, considered that they had been moderate in drafting the resolution, and that the resolution in its present form was the minimum that should be expected of the ILO. He also noted that other members of the Workers' group would want to express themselves individually during the course of the general discussion.

17. The Employers' Vice-Chairman opened his remarks by noting how pleased the Employer' group was that the resolution concerning the role of self-employment and small and medium-sized enterprises in employment growth had been placed third on the priority list. He hoped that the Committee would adopt the resolution in due course. Turning to the resolution currently before the Committee, he noted that all were agreed that the situation in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories was grave and distressing. Human rights and trade union rights of both employers and workers were at issue. The real question before the Committee was how best to improve the situation – how within the mandate and competence of the ILO to give expression to its role as the social conscience of the world and to find a practical solution, a feasible resolution, couched in language that would command broad support and focus on labour law and freedom of association, as well as human rights in the broader sense. While noting that there was considerable support for the thrust of the resolution, the Employers' Vice-Chairman also informed the Committee that there were reservations within the Employers' group as to how to give effect to the spirit of the resolution. He also noted that his colleagues would take the floor during the course of the debate.

18. Speaking on behalf of the 12 member States of the European Community, the Government member of the Federal Republic of Germany stated that the Foreign Ministers of the European Community had discussed the situation in the occupied territories on a number of occasions and had expressed their profound concern at the deteriorating conditions in these territories. However, they had also consistently stressed that certain issues belonged to other United Nations forums and not within the specialised agencies. While the 12 member States of the Community did share some of the concerns expressed in the resolution, they had difficulties with some parts of it, in particular operative paragraph 5. The proliferation of special Committees at the Conference would run counter to the mandate of the ILO and would also have considerable financial consequences at a time when constraint was called for. Stressing the deep concern of the European Community about the conditions in the occupied Arab territories, the member States felt that the only solution would be through a comprehensive and lasting political settlement of the Arab-Israeli conflict, as proposed in the 1980 Venice Declaration and subsequent declarations. The European Community reaffirmed its strong support for an international peace conference under the auspices of the United Nations. Concerned also over the poor employment prospects and restrictions on trade union activities in the occupied territories and without prejudging future political solutions, the Community had pursued its own development and humanitarian programmes for the occupied territories to help improve living conditions. One such programme was the promotion of direct exports of agricultural and industrial products from the occupied territories to the European Community, which had decided in October 1986 to give Palestinian producers in the occupied territories preferential tariff treatment for exports to their market. Nineteen months after the Community's decision, the member States regretted that the programme had still not been implemented and urged the Israeli authorities to allow it to proceed in the near future. The 12 member States of the European Community emphasised their concern about the actions taken by the Israeli authorities in the occupied territories which aggravated the lack of confidence between Israelis and Palestinians and rendered more difficult the search for a peaceful settlement in the region. The level of violence together with the loss of human lives, was of concern and the continuation of repressive measures by Israel was to be deplored.

19. The Workers' member of Senegal, in supporting the resolution, addressed himself to two main issues. First, the criticism levelled against operative paragraph 5 of the resolution that it would reduce the importance of the Committee on Apartheid was unfounded. For Africans, apartheid did of course predominate over and above any other problem. However, African countries which were also developing countries knew about injustice and had taken a position in favour of the resolution in its present form. Constructive amendments would be welcome if they led towards a consensus of the Committees at the Conference, if warranted by problems commanding world-wide interest, would be a positive step in the ILO today. Second, addressing the argument that the resolution was not within the competence of the ILO, he noted that the role of the ILO was to defend social justice and the freedom of workers. If the Palestinian people had a right to justice, to civil liberties and to basic rights, then it was essential that the Committee should accept the resolution. Agreement and consensus should be sought, and the Committee on Apartheid should not be used as an excuse to criticise this resolution. There were a number of technical committees at the Conference which did not diminish the importance of the Committee on Apartheid.

20. The Government member of Israel called for the total rejection of the resolution, claiming that the text was another act in the ongoing political warfare against his country. It reintroduced formal political confrontation into the proceedings of the Conference and into the work of the ILO at a time when the world community was intensifying its search for peace and coexistence. It was significant that this resolution was the only text submitted to the Conference regarding specific territories, although genuine problems of freedom of association and violation of workers' rights existed in other territories, including those of all the States sponsoring the resolution. The resolution claimed ten times that "Palestine" was an occupied Arab territory, thus brazenly denying the legitimacy of Israel's very existence and demonstrating that the ultimate purpose of the struggle against Israel was to establish the so-called secular state of Palestine "between the sea and the river". The text was replete with invidious allegations and condemnations concerning terror, oppression and expansionism, which were completely baseless, whereas countries among the sponsors engaged in or abetted international terrorism themselves. The claims made in the resolution about discrimination against, and the disabling of, workers were contrary to the truth. Indeed, it was those who fanned the recent unrest in the territories using incitement, intimidation and physical violence, including road blocks, setting buses on fire, and beating up and stoning workers, who attempted to deny workers their right to work. Despite this, almost all Arab workers from the West Bank and Gaza continued to arrive at their places of employment in Israel, thereby demonstrating the wish of the silent majority in these territories for a peaceful existence. The Government of Israel was right therefore to reject suggestions to increase the import and employment of foreign workers.

21. Concerning the freedom of action of the Arab trade unions, he recalled that the 251st Report of the Committee on Freedom of Association, cited in the preamble of the resolution, also drew attention to the fundamental mission of the trade union movement and to its political relations or actions. He regretted that the trade unions in the territories had become hotbeds of public unrest and terrorism, aligning themselves along the same factional lines as the terrorist organisations and using their offices for political and terrorist activities. Their leaders had been caught in acts of violence. The reference in the resolution to Israeli settlements not only had no connection with labour and employment issues but also falsely asserted that Arab inhabitants had been harmed in areas of concern to the ILO. The settlements had benefited them materially and supplied them with sources of employment. He noted that Jewish settlers numbered only 5 per cent of the Arab population, which had increased by over 50 per cent since 1967. On the issue of the "non-permissibility of the acquisition of land by force", also cited in the resolution, he questioned what peaceful means had been used in the acquisition of domination of other territories in Africa, the Arab peninsula and Iraq.

22. In relation to operative paragraph 5, he stated that the work of such a committee would condemn the ILO an annual exercise of political acrimony, involve unwarranted additional expenditure and deflect attention from the issues on the ILO's agenda. Any additional committee on specific territorial issues should deal with the real issues of freedom of association of workers and employers, including agricultural workers, artisans and Arab and non-Arab workers, in all the countries that had sponsored the resolution. He stressed the importance of constructive solutions instead of sterile confrontation.

23. The Workers' member of Israel noted that as Chairman of the Workers' delegation from Israel, he was an example of how the Israeli and Arab workers collaborated in the Histadrut. It was unfortunate that international barriers prevented similar co-operation among nations. The recent events in the Middle East were the result of extremist politics on both sides and should be rejected; similarly the resolution in both its spirit and letter could not be accepted. Focusing on the actions of the Histadrut, he noted that equal pay and equal working conditions for workers in the occupied territories were granted on the same basis as to workers in Israel; that Arab workers from the territories had the right to be members of boards within enterprises and to be elected union officials; and that the same employment guarantees were given to all workers. The Histadrut had prevented the dismissal of workers who had not been able to work during the public disturbances and had banned the replacement of workers involved in demonstrations. It had also launched a series of actions to assist workers and make them aware of their rights. He appealed to his Arab brothers not to be led by the extremists and to work for peace and progress.

24. In supporting the resolution, the Government member of Qatar stressed the gravity of the violence and repression in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories. This had been clearly shown on various television programmes. The resolution was fully consistent with the ILO's objectives since it dealt with human rights. The first priority accorded to the resolution illustrated the support of peace-loving countries, and he expressed the hope that it would be adopted and thus contribute to improving the position of the Palestinian people.

25. The representative of the Palestine Liberation Organisation felt compelled to reply to some of the earlier speakers. First, those who considered the resolution as a destructive initiative were in fact accusing the overwhelming majority of the Committee of supporting destructive principles. Second, the resolution was a moderate statement compared to the magnitude of the problems imposed by Israel on Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories. The Government member of Israel had displayed a lack of respect for the truth by denying the existence of violence, detentions and deportations and other violations of human rights against the Palestinian people, which in other international forums had been described as genocide. He failed to understand how Israel could portray resistance to occupation as terrorism. The right of the Palestinian people to resist occupation by all means, including armed struggle, had been recognised in meetings of the United Nations. History also clearly demonstrated that terrorism had been practised in the early days of Israel by leading Israeli figures. Finally, the names used by the Government member of Israel to describe the occupied territories illustrated that it intended to remain as an occupying force and was not searching for peace.

26. In opposing the resolution, the Workers' member of the United States noted that he was one of those in the Workers' group who felt that the resolution did not belong with the ILO but with the United Nations. If the intent of the resolution was to address urgently the problems of the Palestinian employers and workers and to effect immediate action, operative paragraph 5 would not do that. This paragraph implied a de facto acceptance of the continued occupation of certain territories by Israel and ignored other efforts to find a peaceful solution to the problems. He queried why badly needed funds should be used for yet another special committee, when mechanisms clearly existed within the ILO to deal with these problems. He concluded that the purpose of the resolution was political and thus unacceptable.

27. A second Workers' member of Israel pointed out what he considered to be astonishing language in the resolution. He queried the term "Palestine and other occupied Arab territories". He noted that contrary to the statements in the resolution "on deprivation of work opportunities", unemployment was not a serious problem in the West Bank and in Gaza and was lower than that in Israel. Statements about the exploitation of, and discrimination against, workers were unfounded, as explained by his colleague, although it was regrettable that 40 per cent of the commuting workers were classified as irregular workers. Terrorism and acts to prevent workers from earning a living were not perpetrated by Israelis. The resolution made no call for peace or for a political solution; it was solely a condemnation of Israel and should be rejected totally.

28. In response to a query about the permissibility of two persons from the same delegation speaking on the same issue, the Legal Adviser stated that, whereas in the Government group the members of the Committee were governments, in the Workers' group individuals were members of the Committee in their own right and therefore it was in order for more than one such membre from the same to speak on any issue.

29. The Government member of the German Democratic Republic maintained that the resolution, which dealt with rights and freedoms, had its proper place in the ILO. The ILO had a particular duty to protect human rights and should exhaust all possibilities of doing so. While other organisations might deal with similar problems according to their own terms of reference, this should not preclude the ILO from dealing with issues under its mandate. Agreeing with the Director-General's conclusion in the report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories that a political solution must be sought, he declared that the example of Afghanistan provided hope that such solutions could be found. In the meantime the ILO could undertake useful measures to facilitate a settlement and the resolution should be supported in this vein.

30. A co-sponsor of the resolution, the Government member of Egypt, thanked the Committee for ranking the resolution in first place. The objectives of the ILO were to ensure that the best possible conditions of work existed and that labour standards were respected. It was particularly opportune in the 40th anniversary year of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights to denounce barbaric acts of violence, repression and discrimination perpetrated against the Arab workers. The report of the Director-General on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories gave examples of inequality of treatment as regards employment, social security and working conditions. International public awareness and condemnation of the events in the occupied Arab territories demonstrated to the peoples of those territories that their feelings and their anxieties were shared. Adoption of the resolution would help ensure that the fundamental rights of Arabs in the occupied territories were respected.

31. The Workers' member of India clearly stated that the resolution lay within the purview of the ILO, a fact supported by the adoption of the resolutions in 1974 and 1980. The resolution was based on a balanced and pragmatic approach to the problem. The ILO needed to show firmness in giving effect to the resolution, which should be practically oriented and adopted unanimously by the Committee.

32. The Government member of Iraq agreed with the previous speaker that the resolution was fully within the competence of the ILO. Claims that the resolution was political in nature were merely an attempt to conceal the truth about the situation and to distort the facts. Moreover, the Government member of Israel had not observed the use of parliamentary language, particularly in those statements concerning certain member States and attacking all those who had voted for the resolution. No reply would be given to these remarks since they were political in nature and only an attempt to draw the Committee into an unfruitful political debate. Referring to operative paragraph 5 of the resolution, it was emphasised that this Committee would not deny the importance accorded to the Committee on Apartheid. Even if there were financial implications, it was incumbent upon the ILO to take action to protect the rights of the people of Palestine and of other occupied Arab territories, particularly since it appeared that the Israeli authorities were determined to continue their occupation. It was untruthful to affirm that trade unions in the occupied territories were centres of violence and terrorism, and such a statement violated the ILO's principles of freedom of association. The violence, including intentional fractures of fingers and feet inflicted on young persons, and other barbarous acts, was continuing and increasing in the occupied territories. Such acts revealed the Israeli spirit of aggression and wounded the feelings of those members of the Committee who supported the resolution. The text of the resolution was balanced and moderate and fully in line with the spirit and principles of the ILO.

33. The Workers' member of Norway expressed disquiet at the harsh statements made by a number of Government members of the Committee, which contrasted with the factual and calm debate held by the Workers' group. In the situation under discussion it was the workers and ordinary members of the population who suffered and who were in greatest need of a peaceful solution. The content of the resolution was forceful; clearly the situation was difficult and some people were living in unacceptable conditions. The priority given to the resolution reflected international awareness of, and concern for, these problems. While many of the points contained in the resolution could be supported, the provisions of operative paragraph 5 made it difficult, if not impossible, to support the text in its present form. Another special committee would make the Committee on Apartheid less exclusive and would place great demands on the work and economic resources of the Organisation. If operative paragraph 5 were to include references to the wish to negotiate with a view to finding solutions and to increase technical assistance, it would strengthen the resolution. In this case it would be possible to look at the resolution again. The decision taken by the member States of the European Community on the promotion of exports from the occupied territories was a welcome step.

34. The Employers' member of the Federal Republic of Germany deplored the events and violence in the occupied territories. However, it was doubtful whether the resolution would contribute to resolving the current situation; it would only serve to foster tension in the region, particularly since it lacked any reference to the possibility of contributing to a solution. The text was too selective in condemning only one party when there were many other areas in the world where violence was used. It was exclusively negative in approach, whereas it should call for solutions which were acceptable to both parties in the dispute, and which safeguarded the rights of the Palestinian people and the security of Israel. If the text contained such elements, it might be possible to overlook the fact that it went beyond the terms of reference of the ILO and to support it. A special committee on this subject would not be a useful forum and would not result in detente.

35. The Government member of Jordan thanked the members of the Committee for the priority that they had given to the resolution, which proved their concern for workers' and employers' rights and freedoms in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories. Following the 1974 and 1980 resolutions, it was necessary for the ILO to provide assistance to the workers and employers and to take action to end violations of their rights, particularly today when the heroic uprising in the territories, which was entering its seventh month and was being opposed by the barbarous acts of the Israeli authorities, was witnessed every day on television by the world audience. The annual reports of the Director-General referred to the collective responsibility to protect the rights and freedoms of workers and employers. Yet no real progress had been made during the past 11 years. Expropriations in particular had reached a very high level and gave a special significance to the resolution, particularly in view of the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. This Committee, and the International Labour Organisation in general, should assume its duties in this field and provide greater assistance towards ending the illegal activities of the Israeli authorities. Those who feared the financial implications of operative paragraph 5 should ask themselves what other activity or programme could take priority over the protection of the rights and freedoms of workers. The Report of the Director-General should not be ignored in this context. Those advocating peace should start by spreading justice.

36. The Employers' member of Israel contended that the resolution was merely a political statement, which was untruthful and unjustified. It invited the ILO to engage in political activities that were contrary to its mandate and which should be dealt with by the United Nations. If adopted, the resolution would condemn the Conference at each session to concentrate on political matters to the detriment of its other business. The major political problems that existed in the Middle East could not be solved through the adoption of condemnatory resolutions of this nature. About 100,000 workers from the territories were employed in Israel and enjoyed exactly the same conditions and benefits as Israeli workers in accordance with labour laws and collective agreements. In Judea, Samaria and Gaza there was full employment and the conditions of work had greatly improved in recent years, with workers entitled to such social benefits as paid vacations, medical care, health insurance and sickness pay. Moreover, the authorities had invested hundreds of millions of United States dollars in developing the territories. The Committee should reject the resolution.

37. The Employers' member of Jordan criticised the attempt by several speakers to intensify acrimony in the debate instead of concentrating on finding solutions to the atrocities being perpetrated in the occupied territories. Referring to who was spreading terrorism, he recalled personal tragedies involved in the explosion at the King David Hotel in 1946; terrorist acts by Israeli agents in Norway in 1973; and the massacres in Sabra and Chatila. Injustice should be condemned wherever it occurred, and he would wholeheartedly support any similar resolution referring to other areas of the world. The resolution was particularly suited to the role of the ILO, which, through its wide-ranging international labour standards, dealt extensively with the rights of workers. The Director-General's report on the occupied territories provided basic truths. For many years Arabs in these territories had been the victims of discrimination, as recognised in the previous resolutions adopted by the Conference and by the United Nations. The mathematical majority vote in the Committee could not be disregarded, as democracy was based on the counting of votes. The General Assembly resolution on the basis of which the State of Israel had been established had itself been adopted by a very small majority. Affirmations by the Histadrut that the workers in the occupied territories were well treated should be questioned, since it was a political organisation whose Secretary-General was a member of the Knesset and of a political party that denied Palestinians their rights. When operative paragraph 5 was assessed, it should not be considered in material terms, since it was impossible to talk of the protection of human rights in such terms; if the oppression ended soon, the Committee would not be needed. Those who rejected the resolution were doing the Organisation a disservice since continuing injustice created further injustice.

38. The representative of the Palestinian Trade Union Federation (Palestine Liberation Organisation) welcomed the widespread support for the resolution and praised the initiative by the European Community to encourage exports from the occupied territories. Claims that Palestinian workers had benefited from the occupation were untrue. The indigenous population in Palestine had owned 90 per cent of the land in the territories occupied in 1948, which had been reduced to only 1 per cent as a result of a gradual, step-by-step, compulsory confiscation of land and the establishment of Israeli settlements. In the territories occupied in 1967 the Palestinian land had been reduced to 40 per cent. Statistics from the Bank of Israel showed that Palestinian Arabs were in fact paid between 37 and 46 per cent of the average wage of Israeli workers. Furthermore, seven members of the executive committee of a West Bank trade union were under arrest, proving that trade union rights were not respected. The martial decrees: numbering over a thousand, in force in the West Bank, and 900 in the Gaza Strip, which regulated every aspect of life from the planting of trees to water consumption, denied the indigenous population any freedom. Deductions were made from Arab workers' wages for social security payments, but benefits were few. The Histadrut, which managed industrial, commercial and banking operations in the occupied territories, exported commodities to South Africa and sent security officers to combat freedom fighters in South Africa. It was not often realised that Israel was the third largest exporter of arms and military technology in the world.

39. The Workers' member of Venezuela emphasised that there was little use in arguing that the ILO should be an apolitical organisation since the struggle for freedom of expression and individual and collective rights, as well as freedom of association, was genuinely political in nature. Intransigence, used as a means of advancing arguments, was an obstacle to the conclusion of just and lasting agreements. There were no signs that an agreement could not be reached between Israelis and Palestinians at this stage. There was proof that the Israeli people were disposed to search for a respectful conciliation formula to resolve the problems under discussion, and one way of obtaining solutions was through flexibility and the modification of positions. It was hoped that the escalation of violence by extremists on both sides would diminish and disappear.

40. The Workers' member of Switzerland noted that the resolution expressed concerns that were shared by all; the Committee should be prepared, within the terms of reference of the ILO, to take action to prevent a worsening of the situation in the occupied territories. A dual objective should be pursued in the resolution. First, the rights of workers in the occupied territories should be protected, and that involved implementing the conclusion put forward in paragraphs 7 and 8 in the Director-General's report on the occupied territories, which should be included in the operative part of the resolution. Second, as implementation of the necessary measures might encounter difficulties because of the state of occupation, a lasting political solution was indispensable. This solution should aim not only to end the occupation, but also to create conditions for the peaceful coexistence of the peoples of the region through self-determination and mutual respect for their rights. The text of the resolution would be strengthened if references condemning real violations of workers' rights were not weakened by unfounded accusations of racism and if expressions that cast doubt on the right of the State of Israel to exist were eliminated. She opposed setting up a special Conference Committee since she had confidence in the ordinary procedures of the Organisation, and the Committee might jeopardise the quality of work of future sessions of the International Labour Conference.

41. The Workers' member of the USSR appealed for support of the resolution which was a proper response to the worrying situation in the Middle East. Because it dealt with the loss of trade union and other rights, the resolution clearly came within the competence of the ILO. The adoption of resolutions in 1974 and 1980 was further proof of the ILO's role in this matter; no other international organisation was more competent to defend the legitimate rights of workers that were being violated in the occupied Arab territories. It was necessary to restore freedom of action to trade unions and to reintroduce respect for workers' rights.

42. The Government member of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya stated that the resolution was serious and objective and that no one could support the flagrant violations of international law by Zionist Israel. The ILO was the proper forum to consider the violations of workers' and employers' rights in the occupied territories. The Preamble to the Constitution, which he cited, clearly gave the Organisation competence in this area. Any argument to the contrary was merely a pretext to defend Zionist interests and the Israeli policy of aggression. Certain parties constantly protected Israel against resolutions in the United Nations through the use of their veto. Certain parties also threatened to withhold contributions to international organisations, and to use all available means to avoid the adoption of the resolution. The attack made by the Government member of Israel on the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya should be seen in the context of constant attempts by Israel, particularly within the United Nations system, to present itself as a victim. In fact, the only party carrying out terrorism was the Zionist entity, which had hijacked planes, carried out raids, blown up a Libyan civilian plane and destroyed much of the merchant fleet in Lebanon. The latest act of terrorism had been the murder in Tunisia of a leader of the Palestine Liberation Organisation. The international community could not ignore such injustice and members would need to resist the tactics being used within the Committee.

43. The Workers' member of Mexico warned the Committee that the debate should not be allowed to turn into an interminable series of counter-arguments. Mexico was a friend of all free countries and all peoples of the world. It was necessary to avoid insults and to search for solutions through consultation and mutual concessions. The business of the Committee was to formulate a resolution that contained the fundamental principles of justice, particularly with regard to workers' rights and their rights to economic well-being, as illustrated in the motto, "Bread, peace and freedom", of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions. The prestige of the ILO, and in particular its tripartite nature, equipped it to produce such an instrument, which should be effective, well-balanced and harmonious.

44. The Government member of the USSR noted that the question of the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories was not a new subject for the ILO, as it had been dealt with the 1974 and 1980 resolutions adopted by the International Labour Conference and in the Director-General's annual reports. Recently the situation had deteriorated, resulting in an Arab uprising against the violation of human rights and freedoms, discrimination, the confiscation of land, and mass repression by the Israeli authorities. As noted in the Report of the Director-

General, the situation would become still worse if the occupation did not end. Appendix III of the Report of the Director-General also gave numerous facts concerning overt and covert discrimination against Arab workers in areas such as social security, working conditions, vocational training and trade union freedom – trade unions had been dissolved and many of their leaders expelled or imprisoned. The world community was deeply preoccupied by this situation and condemned the actions of the Israeli authorities in these territories, as they violated international law. What was needed was a just and comprehensive settlement in the Middle East on the basis of the United Nations Charter and relevant United Nations resolutions, according to the balance of interests of all parties. The governing principles should be self-determination for the Palestinian people, the withdrawal of Israeli troops from all occupied territories and the peaceful coexistence of all States in the region. It was generally recognised that a suitable mechanism for bringing this about was an international conference, under the aegis of the United Nations, of all interested parties and permanent members of the Security Council and including the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people, the Palestine Liberation Organisation. The ILO must express its support for the right of the Arabs in the occupied territories to economic security and to equal opportunity and to live and work in freedom and dignity, as proclaimed in the Declaration of Philadelphia, and must do everything possible to guarantee this right in practice to the Palestinian people. The USSR delegation supported the resolution submitted by the Arab States.

45. The Workers' member of the Netherlands believed that while all members were concerned at what was happening in the occupied territories, there was no unanimity on the substance of the resolution. He hoped that a consensus could be reached, based on the yardstick that human lives were at stake. The Director-General's report had rightly pointed out that resolutions should be pursued in two directions, one aimed at a political solution and the other at overall development policy in the occupied territories. Whereas the former was outside the ILO's competence, it was the Organisation's duty to be responsible to the latter. Regrettably, the resolution took no account of these different kinds of solution, and it therefore lacked balance. Some previous speakers, referring to the Declaration of Philadelphia, had interpreted it too strictly in suggesting that social justice was a prerequisite for the solution of political conflicts. Practical contributions to an overall development, as defended in the report of the Director-General, might lead to a process of peace. Such contributions should be fully explored. The statement made by the spokesman of the European Community countries outlined measures taken to promote trade relations with the occupied territories and could lead to a positive policy in that direction. The speaker could not fully support the resolution, in its substance or terminology, and did not see the necessity of establishing a special committee as called for in the resolution. He reserved the right to introduce amendments to improve it.

46. The Government member of Czechoslovakia, expressing his support for the resolution, considered it to be a logical step responding to a procedural gap in the ILO monitoring system. That system at present had no satisfactory means for dealing with cases of mass violations of human and trade union rights. It was therefore appropriate to have recourse to a special solution analogous to the practice established to deal with the issue of apartheid. To date, no case that had been brought before the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations had given enough room to deal with the complex problem of the situation regarding human rights and freedoms in Palestine and the occupied Arab territories. His delegation therefore supported the provision calling for the establishment of a special committee unless another suitable solution emerged from the debate of the amendments.

47. The Government member of Canada indicated that his Government had followed with grave concern the situation in the occupied territories, including the human suffering, that gave rise to the resolution. It had expressed the view that human rights violations arising from control measures in the territories were unacceptable and inconsistent with the IVth Geneva Convention. His delegation was also mindful that the resolution addressed political issues which it was prepared to consider in appropriate forums but which were outside the scope of the Organisation and could divert attention from other substantive issues within the ILO's mandate. He had serious doubts about the proposal to establish an annual Conference Committee to deal with this topic, as there were questions about the availability of resources as well as about what such a mechanism might achieve. Despite concern about the tone of the language used in the text, his delegation was open to proposals for resolving the difficulties in a concrete way. In the final analysis, the question facing the Committee was whether the Organisation had any useful role to play in this issue.

48. Speaking in support of the resolution, the Workers' member of the German Democratic Republic pointed to the link between the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the Preamble to the ILO Constitution in respect of the need for peace to be based on social justice. The resolution concerning the occupied territories was imbued with that spirit. Peace could only come to that area if all concerned, in the spirit of the ILO Constitution, demanded that the Israeli Government should assure the fundamental rights of the Palestinians and cease violating their human rights. The ILO could, in keeping with its Constitution and in the spirit of this resolution, make a contribution to the restoration of democratic and trade union rights and freedoms in the area. The Committee had heard accounts of the various forms of human rights violations committed by Israel in the occupied territories, and the Committee could not let them pass in silence. For over six months the Palestinian population had struggled with peaceful means against the terror that had gone on for decades, against the repressive measures visited on trade unions and against the brutal methods used by the occupying forces. Through the resolution the ILO could contribute to the convening of an international conference under the auspices of the United Nations, which would be attended by representatives of the parties concerned and which would assist in achieving peace on the basis of social justice.

49. The Workers' member of the Syrian Arab Republic stressed that the resolution was fully in accordance with the objectives and principles of the ILO. This was illustrated by its focus on human and trade union rights and by the previous resolutions adopted by the Conference on this subject in 1974 and 1980. The 1974 resolution condemned the policy of racial discrimination and violation of trade union freedoms, impairing basic human freedoms, pursued by the Israeli authorities against the Arab peoples. In the 1980 resolution the Conference also strongly deplored the establishment of Israeli settlements in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories since June 1967. It called upon the Israeli authorities to put an immediate end to the establishment of settlements in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories, including Jerusalem, and to dismantle the existing settlements. It also expressed its concern at the establishment of Israeli settlements in Palestine and in the occupied Arab territories and at their economic and social consequences which seriously affected the economic and social rights of the Arab labour force. The high priority that had been accorded to the resolution was another proof of the democratic nature of the ILO and confirmed the rejection by the international community of the representative measures exercised by the Israeli authorities. Despite claims to the contrary, trade union rights in the occupied territories had been severely restricted; since 1979 no petition for registration had been accepted from any Arab trade union in the area, military activities had been undertaken to repress trade unions, trade union centres had been closed down, their assets confiscated and trade union leaders arbitrarily detained. The Israeli authorities also prevented the construction of housing and confiscated Arab-owned land on the pretext of security considerations. The situation of Syrian workers living in the occupied territories had constantly deteriorated – up to 87 per cent of their agricultural land had been confiscated. Mothers were being maltreated in their attempts to prevent the arrest of their children. Reliable sources indicated that 224 martyrs had fallen, while the present unrest had resulted in 6,000 detentions. The report of the Director-General on this subject illustrated the magnitude of the violations and the fact that their frequency had increased. The ILO should rise to the occasion and should react against the situation of children in the area who were demonstrating on behalf of the rights, freedoms and dignity of their parents and who were suffering more than they could bear.

50. The Workers' member of Afghanistan emphasised that the first and foremost task of the ILO was to defend the interests of workers wherever they might be. This task had special priority in view of the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the increasing violation of such rights in the occupied territories. The ILO should take a more exclusive step to this effect; hence the resolution was appropriate and within ILO competence. A proper mechanism for implementation was also essential.

51. The Government member of China was of the view that the resolution conformed to the terms of reference of the ILO. The Palestinian people, including workers, women and children, were subject to various forms of discrimination. Their social security was not guaranteed, let alone their right to basic freedoms. Especially in the last half year, the Israeli authorities had used oppressive means, and a large number of people had been maimed and killed. This was causing universal concern. Although the problem was of a political nature, it was also appropriate for the ILO to consider those aspects within its competence, as its purpose was to protect social justice. The content of the resolution was on the whole positive, and he supported the reasonable proposals contained in it. He hoped that after broad consultation the Committee would adopt a resolution acceptable to all and that it would benefit the Palestinian people.

52. A motion to close the debate under article 64 of the Standing Orders was moved by the Government member of Jordan and supported in a show of hands by more than one-fifth of the members. The Government member of Australia opposed the motion since many speakers still wished to address the subject and added that if the debate were allowed to continue, a more constructive resolution would probably emerge. The Workers' Vice-Chairman noted that several members of his group wished to speak and he therefore favoured continuation of the discussion. The motion was then put to the vote by a show of hands which produced the following results: 180,061 votes in favour, 1,161 against, with 56,125 abstentions. The quorum of 130,961 having been attained, the motion was declared adopted. In response to a request, the Chairman indicated that the following members had expressed the wish to speak: the Workers' members of the United Kingdom, Iraq, New Zealand and Jordan; the Employers' member of Kuwait; the Government member of Australia; the Workers' members of Cuba and Israel; the Government member of Democratic Yemen; the Workers' member of Mauritania; the Government members of the Syrian Arab Republic, Algeria, Senegal, Cuba, Hungary and Bulgaria; the Workers' member of China; the Government members of Japan and the Sudan; the Workers' members of Portugal, the United States, Philippines and Israel; and the Government member of the United States.

53. The Government member of Canada challenged the result of the vote under article 65, paragraph 7 of the Standing Orders, on the grounds that there may have been irregularities in the vote by show of hands. His motion was subsequently withdrawn, whereupon the Government member of the United States challenged the result on the same grounds. A record vote was then taken which produced the following results: 188,578 votes in favour, 2,322 against, with 78,380 abstentions. The motion to close the debate was adopted.

54. The Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic exercised his right under article 64, paragraph 4 of the Standing Orders, as one of the sponsors of the resolution, to speak on the question under discussion after the closure had been voted. Recalling some of the main points in the resolutions adopted on this subject by the Conference in 1974 and 1980, he indicated that this resolution, which had come out first in the secret ballot, was directed against discriminatory practices and the denial of human and trade union rights by the Israeli authorities. Given that the resolution simply denounced Israel's evil practices in the occupied Arab territories, such as the victimisation of thousands of young people, in addition to referring to those earlier resolutions, how could anyone claim that it was politically motivated and outside the competence of the ILO? Rather, it fell squarely within the mandate of the Organisation, its purpose being to improve trade union rights. He was not surprised that the Government member of Israel had gone beyond the issues raised in the resolution and in so doing had insulted other delegations, including his. Despite this, the Committee should not be diverted into a sterile political debate that could only delay the adoption of this resolution.

Consideration of amendments

55. Forty-one amendments, numbered from D.6 to D.46, were submitted for examination.

56. Amendment D.46, submitted by the Government members of Belgium and Italy, sought to replace the words "Palestine and other occupied Arab territories" by the words "the occupied Arab territories", in the title, in the sixth, eighth, ninth and tenth preambular paragraphs and in operative paragraphs 2, 3, 4 and 5.

57. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of Italy stressed that the Committee must remain strictly within the mandate of the ILO and avoid introducing political issues. What was needed was clearness and precision in the language of the resolution which would not be subject to interpretation of a geographical or historical nature. This concept also guided the Security Council of the United Nations in its resolution No. 605, also referred to in the sixth preambular paragraph of the present resolution.

58. The Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic rejected the amendment on behalf of the co-sponsors of the resolution since it called into question the objectives and content of the resolution as a whole, which was contrary to the wish of the Committee that had given the resolution top priority. While the co-sponsors were ready to consider amendments that improved the text, they considered that the overriding objective of most of the amendments was to demolish the whole concept of the resolution.

59. The Workers' and Employers' Vice-Chairmen announced that no group positions had been adopted on the amendment and that members would intervene in their individual capacities.

60. A number of Committee members supported the amendment. The Government member of the United States stated that the existing text prejudged the issue of sovereignty in the Middle East and was contrary to United Nations resolutions, which were the only foundation for a peaceful solution to the conflict in that region. The Workers' members of the United Kingdom and Spain, as well as the Government members of France and Belgium, supported the amendment on the grounds put forward by the Government member of Italy. The terminology used in the Director-General's report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories should be followed. The large number of amendments to the text were evidence that many members of the Committee had difficulties with the resolution; but these amendments also indicated a willingness to discuss the resolution in a democratic manner, and were not an attempt to undermine it. The terminology used in the resolution had veiled connotations which called into question the existence of the State of Israel and thus detracted attention from the real issues of workers' and employers' rights.

61. The Employers' members of Kuwait and Jordan and the Workers' members of Mauritania, the Syrian Arab Republic and the USSR spoke against the amendment. This amendment would undermine the whole basis of the resolution and delay discussions on important issues within the Committee. The reference to Palestine could not be deleted; Palestine was a historical fact, had a specific legal meaning and had been referred to in many United Nations documents and resolutions, as well as in the ILO resolution adopted in 1980. The Workers' member of the USSR recalled in particular the recent meeting of the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations which had before it an agenda item on the violation of rights in the occupied Arab territories, including Palestine.

62. With a view to seeking consensus within the Committee, the Employers' member of the United Kingdom proposed to subamend D.46 by replacing the words "Palestine and other occupied Arab territories", in the title and subsequently in the text, with the words "occupied Palestine and other occupied Arab territories."

63. The subamendment was supported by the Government member of Malaysia and the Employers' member of Pakistan, who both referred to the use of the term "Palestine" in the resolutions adopted by the Conference in 1974 and 1980. The subamendment was also supported by the Government member of Jordan.

64. The representative of the Palestine Liberation Organisation stated that while the resolution had been criticised as having political objectives, it was in fact the amendments that were political in intent and therefore alien to the spirit and nature of the resolution. Amendment D.46 had a political objective of deleting the references to Palestine from the resolution. Palestine had been recognised by the former League of Nations and was now recognised within the United Nations and the ILO as being a term that referred to a territory and to a people having specific rights. United Nations organisations had frequently placed Palestine on their agendas as a separate and independent item. The resolution dealt with a well-known fact, that is, occupied Palestine. The supporters of the amendment were motivated by political objectives that were contrary to the interests of Palestinian workers and Palestine which were recognised by the international community. He could, however, support the subamendment proposed by the Employers' member of the United Kingdom.

65. The Government member of Denmark and the Employers' member of the United States opposed the subamendment since it did not clarify the text and presented grammatical problems which in fact accentuated the difficulties with the present text.

66. The Employers' Vice-Chairman, in his personal capacity, proposed a further subamendment which sought to delete the word "other" from the reference to Palestine and other occupied Arab territories. This was subsequently withdrawn in favour of a subamendment proposed by the Employers' member of Sweden.

67. The Government members of Belgium, the Federal Republic of Germany and the United States strongly supported the original amendment D.46 and noted that the proposed subamendments did not improve its original text. The Government member of the Federal Republic of Germany stressed that common ground should be found to solve the problems of employers and workers in a specific area of the world, and therefore a text that drew the widest support possible, which amendment D.46 was intended to do, should be adopted.

68. The Employers' member of Sweden proposed to subamend the amendment by replacing it with "the occupied Arab territories including those in Palestine", which had been mentioned earlier in the discussion by the Workers' member of the USSR.

69. The Government members of the Syrian Arab Republic and Qatar noted that the sponsors of the resolution were receptive to constructive amendments and supported the subamendment proposed by the Employers' member of the United Kingdom. As the representatives of the Palestine Liberation Organisation had accepted the subamendment, there seemed to be some agreement in the Committee; attempts to find yet another new wording were wasting the time of the Committee and undermining its work. The Employers' member of Jordan also supported this amendment and requested the Committee not to allow its work to get bogged down in amendments and subamendments.

70. The Workers' members of the USSR and of Senegal supported the subamendment proposed by the Employers' member of the United Kingdom, noting in turn that the concept of Palestine had been clearly referred to in the records of the recent Commission on Human Rights of the United Nations Economic and Social Council, and that the priority given to the resolution by the present Committee indicated that it was unnecessary to change any reference to Palestine.

71. The Government members of the United Kingdom, Italy and Canada reaffirmed their support for amendment D.46 in its original form. This particular wording, which occurred frequently throughout the text, should be clear and precise and avoid possible interpretations of a geographical or political nature. The subamendments did not contribute to the clarity of the text. The Government member of Canada added that the underlying consideration of the discussion of this point was the need to demonstrate that the ILO could make a specific contribution to the settlement of problems in this area. The concept of Palestine as an entity in international law and politics was not universally accepted, and this issue was not going to be resolved by the ILO. The fact that this form of language had been used in the past in the ILO did not mean that its use had helped to resolve the problems of the area.

72. The Workers' member of Spain noted a certain confusion in the terminology used in the present title of the resolution, which should be avoided. It was unclear what was meant by "Palestine" – whether it referred to Gaza, the West Bank and Jerusalem, the State and territory of Israel, or the territories now occupied or those before partition in 1947.

73. The Employers' member of the USSR emphasised that it was necessary to retain the wording that was the most acceptable to the majority of members of the Committee, and that the subamendment proposed by the Employers' member of the United Kingdom was a possible basis for compromise and agreement.

74. The Government member of Algeria stated in response to queries about definitions that the existing language in the resolution was clear in its reference to Palestine. Palestine was a political issue and the Committee should not be embarrassed by that. The representative of the Palestine Liberation Organisation had made concessions and it did not serve the interests of the workers and employers in Palestine to protract the debate.

75. The Government member of Senegal, emphasising the importance of finding a consensus within the Committee concerning the title of the resolution so that the substance of the issue could be considered, proposed, as a subamendment to amendment D.46, that the following wording, which had been included in the United Nations Security Council resolution No. 605, should be employed in the resolution: "The Palestinian and other Arab territories occupied by Israel since 1967."

76. After a number of members of the Committee had expressed their agreement with the above formulation, amendment D.46, as subamended by the Government member of Senegal, was adopted. In response to questions, the Chairman specified that this formulation would be cited in all provisions referred to in amendment D.46, namely the title, the sixth, eighth, ninth and tenth preambular paragraphs and operative paragraphs 2, 3, 4 and 5.

77. In this connection, the Government member of Israel noted that his delegation objected to any formulation connected with the resolution.

78. The Government member of the United States stated that although his delegation would not stand in the way of consensus in the Committee, it reserved its position on this point.

79. Amendment D.13, submitted by the Government members of Belgium and Italy, sought to replace, in the first preambular paragraph, which stated that–

Taking into consideration the Constitution of the ILO which states that "universal and lasting peace can be established only if it is based upon social justice", and that "conditions of labour exist involving such injustice, hardship and privation ... as to produce unrest so great that the peace and harmony of the world are imperilled, the words after "and that" by the following quotation from Preamble to the Constitution of the ILO:

conditions of labour exist involving such injustice, hardship and privation to large numbers of people as to produce unrest so great that the peace and harmony of the world are imperilled; and an improvement of these conditions is urgently required.

Introducing the amendment, the Government member of Belgium stressed that the precise text of the Constitution of the ILO should be used, since each word and concept had a specific meaning.

80. Both the Workers' and Employers' Vice-Chairman indicated that their groups could support the amendment.

81. The Government member of Israel stated that while the quoted text as such was supported by his Government, it could not be accepted in this context.

82. Amendment D.13 was adopted.

83. The first preambular paragraph was adopted. The Government member of Israel stated that he would like to have his Government's objections to the text of the resolution, as noted above, placed on record.

84. The second preambular paragraph, which read as follows:

Taking also into consideration the Declaration of Philadelphia which states that "freedom of expression and of association are essential to sustained progress", and that "all human beings irrespective of race, creed or sex, have the right to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity, was adopted. The Government member of Israel requested that his Government's reservations be placed on record.

85. The third preambular paragraph, which read as follows:

Recalling the resolution concerning trade union rights and their relation to civil liberties, adopted by the International Labour Conference in 1970, which affirms that without independence and political freedom workers cannot fully exercise their trade union rights, was adopted. The Government member of Israel requested that his Government's reservations be placed on record.

86. Amendment D.19, submitted by the Government members of Canada and the Netherlands, sought to delete the fourth preambular paragraph, which read as follows:

Recalling also the resolution concerning the policy of discrimination, racism and violation of trade union freedoms and rights practised by the Israeli authorities in Palestine and in the other occupied Arab territories, adopted by the Conference in 1974,

Introducing the amendment, the Government member of the Netherlands said that since many delegations had difficulties with the fourth preambular paragraph, the amendment was intended to make the resolution more widely acceptable to all sections of the Committee. He recalled that many members of the ILO had voted against the 1974 resolution and that the United Nations General Assembly resolution 3379 of 1975, which had sought to equate Zionism with racism, had also been rejected by many governments. The fourth preambular of the resolution currently under discussion concerned matters outside the ILO's mandate. The deletion of this paragraph would allow a broader cross-section of the Committee to deal with the important issues which the resolution attempted to address.

87. The Employers' Vice-Chairman indicated that his group could not support the amendment. The Workers' member of the German Democratic Republic, acting in place of the Workers' Vice-Chairman, explained that there was no consensus within his group on this matter, but that a part of the Workers' group could not understand why this paragraph should be deleted when it merely referred to a resolution which the Conference had adopted in 1974 and which had never been annulled. The Workers' members of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Sudan and Senegal and the Employers' member of Kuwait and the Algerian Government member shared the view that the amendment should be rejected.

88. The Workers' member of the United Kingdom supported the amendment. To maintain the progress already made in the debate he called upon the Committee to remove any language from the resolution that was insulting or aggressive. The Government member of France also supported the amendment and stated that the resolution adopted in 1974 did not have the support of his Government then, and it still maintained these objections. The Workers' member of the United States also supported the amendment because preambular paragraph 4 contained inaccuracies, offensive language and was polemical. Attempts to link the actions of the Israeli Government with racism was the most objectionable aspect of this resolution.

89. The Workers' member of Switzerland then proposed a subamendment to rephrase the original preambular paragraph 4 so that the reference to racism would be deleted.

90. A number of Committee members strongly objected to this subamendment since the reference to racism was an accurate reflection of the situation, was widely accepted and had been used in previous ILO resolutions. The intent of the subamendment was to rewrite history. The Employers' Vice-Chairman stated that the subamendment would not be acceptable. Some Government members, while welcoming the intent of the proposal, stated that it would not meet the objections of the authors of amendment D.19. The Government member of Yugoslavia and the Employers' member of Kuwait raised points of order concerning whether this proposal was a subamendment or constituted a new amendment and whether anyone had the right to modify a resolution that had already been adopted by the ILO. Following this discussion the proposal was withdrawn.

91. The Government member of France offered a subamendment which proposed alternative language for preambular paragraphs 4 and 5. This was seconded by the Government member of Australia, who indicated that his Government was deeply concerned about the continued unrest in the occupied territory, in particular the deportation of Palestinians to Lebanon and the harassment of trade unionists. If the occupation continued, the position of Arab workers was to deteriorate still further, and the effects on living and working conditions could be extremely grave. To resolve the conflict it was essential that the rights of the Palestinians to self-determination and independence be accepted, within the framework of a negotiated settlement based on the right of all countries of the region to secure and recognised boundaries in accordance with resolution 242 of the Security Council. The proposal was challenged on a point of order by the Government member of Jordan, on the grounds that it constituted a new amendment, which was not admissible at that time, rather than a subamendment.

92. The Assistant Legal Adviser explained that the question of what was and what was not a legitimate subamendment under the terms of article 63, paragraph 6, of the Standing Orders was in the last resort a matter for the discretion of the Chairman. However, she noted by way of illustration, that where an amendment proposed to delete an entire paragraph, as was the case here, a proposal modifying that amendment in such way that the overall effect would be to remove only part of the paragraph while retaining some of the original wording would be a legitimate subamendment, whereas a proposal to substitute entirely new language for the original paragraph would probably be a new amendment, subject to article 63, paragraph 4, of the Standing Orders.

93. Following this advice, the Chairman ruled that the subamendment introduced by the Government member of France could not be accepted.

94. The United States Employers' member proposed a subamendment which sought to delete only the word "racism" from preambular paragraph 4. The motion was seconded. However, the Chairman disallowed the proposal on the grounds that it would alter the official title of a resolution adopted by the Conference.

95. The Government member of Mexico suggested that paragraph 4 should only mention the number and the date of the resolution referred to without citing the title. The Chairman, after consulting the secretariat, replied that the usual practice was for the Committee to include in its reports to the Conference the titles of its resolutions only without numbers.

96. The United States Employers' member then proposed a subamendment which sought to delete the passage "concerning ... Arab territories," from the paragraph, so that it would read:

recalling also the resolution adopted by the Conference in 1974,

The motion was seconded.

97. After several points of order contesting the admissibility of the subamendment, and a statement by the Government member of India opposing it since it would render the preambular paragraph meaningless, the Employers' member of Kuwait moved to close the debate on amendment D.19 and related subamendments. The Government members of Algeria and Argentina raised a point of order stating that the Legal Adviser has earlier advised that an ILO resolution could not be cited without its complete title, and the Chairman had so ruled (proposal by the Government member of Mexico). Hence, the proposed subamendment was unacceptable and could not be put to a vote.

98. The closure motion was put to a vote by a show of hands. It received 353,122 voted in favour, 0 against, with 108,561 abstentions, the quorum being 255,154. The closure motion was adopted.

99. Exercising his right to speak for the sponsors of the amendment after closure of the discussion, the Government member of Canada regretted that the Committee had got stuck on technicalities, which had blocked any substantive discussion on the question raised by the amendment.

100. The Government member of Tunisia raised a point of order on the basis of article 64, paragraph 4, of the Standing Orders. In reply the Chairman stated that the authors of an amendment had the right to speak after a vote on closure.

101. The subamendment of the United States Employers' member was then put to a vote by a show of hands. The result was 12,267 votes in favour, 8,178 against, with 489,666 abstentions, the quorum being 255,154. The subamendment was rejected for lack of a quorum.

102. Amendment D. 19 was put to a vote by show of hands. It received 137,636 votes in favour, 0 against, with 373,527 abstentions. The amendment failed for lack of a quorum.

103. The result of the vote was challenged under article 65, paragraph 7, of the Standing Orders by the Government member of the Netherlands, on the grounds that the working conditions in the chamber had not been conducive to an orderly vote by show of hands, which might have led to an incorrect count. After a discussion of the advisability, necessity and timing of a record vote, the Legal Adviser explained that in the case of a challenge, for which reasons were given, to the result of a vote by show of hands, a record vote was obligatory and could not be postponed to a later sitting since in the case of such a challenge, the exactness of the result which had been questioned could not be verified if in the meantime the composition of the Committee had changed.

104. A record vote on amendment D.19 was taken. The result was 144,375 votes in favour, 0 against, with 383,256 abstentions, the quorum being 255,154. The amendment was rejected for lack of a quorum.

105. Before and after the vote a number of Committee members expressed regret that the work of the Committee had been delayed through technicalities (Government member of Canada) and procedural matters (Government members of Algeria and the Syrian Arab Republic; Workers' members of Senegal and the USSR; Employers' member of Jordan). Others requested the Chairman to use his good offices to accelerate the pace of work (Government members of Tunisia and Qatar; Employers' member of Kuwait). Still others called for additional sittings to enable the Committee to make up for lost time and complete its work (Government members of Algeria, China, Iraq, Senegal and the USSR; Workers' members of the German Democratic Republic, Mauritania and the Syrian Arab Republic; Employers' member of Jordan).

106. Amendment D.32, which sought to correct a typographical error in the English text only, changing "unions" to "union", in paragraph 4 of the Preamble, was then considered. After noting the reservation of the Government member of Israel that it could not accept any of the amendments or the resolution itself, the Committee adopted the amendment.

107. Preambular paragraph 4, as amended, was then put to a vote at the request of the Government member of the United States. The vote by show of hands produced the following result: 412,748 votes in favour, 0 against, with 107,075 abstentions. The paragraph was adopted.

108. Amendment D.6, submitted by the Government member of Denmark and duly seconded, sought to replace preambular paragraph 5, which read:

Recalling also the resolution concerning the implications of Israeli settlements in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories in connection with the situation of Arab workers and the resolution concerning the International Year of Shelter for the Homeless and the role of the ILO, adopted by the Conference in 1980 and 1987 respectively, with the following text:

Recalling also the resolution concerning the International Year of Shelter for the Homeless and the role of the ILO, adopted by the Conference in 1987,

Introducing the amendment, the Government member of Denmark noted that the views of his Government had been reflected in the statement made on behalf of the European Communities during the general discussion. Any reference to the resolution adopted in 1980 concerning Israeli settlements should be deleted in the present resolution since his Government had not been in favour of it then and its position had not changed. If this reference remained in the present resolution, his Government would not be able to support it.

109. The Employers' Vice-Chairman stated that his group did not support the amendment. The Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic, speaking on behalf of the Arab group, also opposed the amendment. He stressed that he knew what had motivated the amendment and he was opposed to that as well as to the substance of the amendment.

110. The Workers' member of the United States and the Government member of France supported the amendment for reasons put forward by the author.

111. After the Government member of Denmark explained that adoption of the amendment would allow his delegation to take a more positive attitude to the resolution and that he had no reason for withdrawing it, the Government member of Egypt asked for a vote on the amendment.

112. The amendment was put to the vote by a show of hands. There were 112,145 votes in favour, 0 against, with 416,726 abstentions. The quorum of 255,154 not having been reached, the amendment was not adopted.

113. At the request of the Government member of Israel, preambular paragraph 5 was put to a vote. The result was as follows: 416,655 votes in favour, 0 against, with 107,075 abstentions. The paragraph was adopted.

114. Amendment D.8, submitted by the Government member of Sweden and co-sponsored by the Government member of Norway, sought to delete preambular paragraph 6, which read:

Affirming that the Fourth Geneva Convention, 1949, concerning the protection of civilian persons in time of war, is applicable to Palestine and other occupied Arab territories, as was reaffirmed by the Security Council in its resolution No. 605 and by the Commission on Human Rights in various sessions,

The Government member of Sweden stated that while his Government did not challenge the substance of the preambular paragraph, the reason for submitting this amendment was a formal one: it was not within the competence of the ILO to interpret the Fourth Geneva Convention. The Committee should respect the division of labour among international organisations and leave matters outside the competence of the ILO to the competent authorities.

115. The Employers' Vice-Chairman stated that the Employers' group opposed the amendment. He was supported by the Employers' member of Jordan. The Workers' Vice-Chairman announced that there was no consensus within the Workers' group and its members would speak and vote in their individual capacities. Other Committee members also had divergent views. The Government member of Yugoslavia urged the authors of the amendment to withdraw it. The Government member of Japan requested clarification as to what was being affirmed, and if there were specific decisions and paragraphs on this they should be cited. The Workers' member and the Government member of the United States supported the amendment.

116. The Employers' member of the United States sought to rephrase the original preambular paragraph as a subamendment to D.8 as follows:

Recalling past United Nations resolutions as they apply to the Palestinian and other Arab territories occupied by Israel since 1967,

The Employers' member of Kuwait raised a point of order stating that this subamendment, like the one proposed for D.19 by the Government member of France, constituted a new amendment and was no longer admissible. Following advice from the Legal Adviser, the Chairman ruled that the subamendment was not receivable.

117. The Government member of Israel stated that his Government's position was to conform with the provisions of the Fourth Geneva Convention and to implement them in its administration of the territories. The Israeli attitude on the whole question had been distorted by placing undue emphasis on the Israeli position concerning the political status of the area, with regard to the applicability of the Convention. Israel had signed and ratified all four Geneva Conventions. Conformity with the Fourth Geneva Convention was illustrated by the extensive operations carried out by the delegates of the International Committee of the Red Cross. Moreover the Israeli administration followed rules that were stricter than envisaged in the Fourth Geneva Convention, in particular in the field of legal protection.

118. A number of members of the Committee opposed the subamendment, including the Government members of Algeria, Iraq and the Syrian Arab Republic; the Employers' members of Jordan and Kuwait; and the Workers' members of Sudan and the Syrian Arab Republic. The last speaker, referring to the Zionist entity, stated that it was important to call attention to the applicability of the Fourth Geneva Convention to Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories. On a point of order raised by the Government member of Israel, the Chairman drew the attention of members of the Committee to the fact that member States should be referred to in their official designation as recognised by the United Nations.

119. The Employers' member of Jordan, replying to the last statement of the Israeli representative, said that the untruth in his statement about the Israeli authorities being committed to abide by the Fourth Geneva Convention was revealed by the fact that the Israeli High Court had found illegal the expulsion of Awad Mubarak, a Palestinian now possessing American citizenship, and a number of Arabs from their country.

120. The Syrian Minister of Social Affairs and Labour spoke against the amendment, stressing that the time of the Committee was being wasted. The purpose of the amendment was clear; it should be rejected.

121. The Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic moved to close debate on the amendment. In accordance with article 64, paragraph 2, of the Standing Orders, it was determined that a least one-fifth of the members of the Committee supported the motion for closure. Speaking against the motion, the Government member of the United States stated that he had a statement to make on the amendment, and that it included points concerning the competence of the ILO to deal with the applicability of the Fourth Geneva Convention; he was therefore against closing the debate. The Employers' member and the Workers' member of the United States also spoke against the motion, noting respectively that democracy and the right to speak were being flouted by the motion and that the language in preambular paragraph 6 was gratuitous and insulting and hence more discussion was required on the amendment.

122. A vote by show of hands was taken. The result was as follows: 305,477 votes in favour, 0 against, with 187,345 abstentions. The motion for closure was adopted.

123. The Government member of the United States challenged the result of the vote by show of hands. When asked by the Chairman to state his reasons for doing so, he requested the advice of the Legal Adviser since he could find no reference in the Standing Orders which required him to give a reason. The Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic, supported by the Government member of Algeria, requested a record vote on this amendment and on every subsequent amendment. He stated that it was clear the every vote by show of hands would be followed by a record vote; it was better to preserve the dignity of the Committee and of the Office of the Chairman by proceeding directly to a record vote and dispensing with a vote by show of hands. Following a discussion of a procedural nature on the method of voting, the Chairman called for a record vote on the mention of closure of debate on amendment D.8, in accordance with article 65, paragraph 5, of the Standing Orders. The result of the vote was as follows: 329,347 votes in favour, 0 against, with 221,015 abstentions. The motion for closure was adopted.

124. Availing himself of his right under article 64, paragraph 4, of the Standing Orders, the Government member of Sweden, as co-sponsor of the amendment, reiterated that the only reason for the amendment was formal, since it was not within the competence of the ILO to interpret the Fourth Geneva Convention. No arguments had been put forward to convince him otherwise and he hoped the amendment would be supported.

125. The Chairman called for a record vote on amendment D.8 in accordance with article 65, paragraph 5, of the Standing Orders. The result was as follows: 210,915 votes in favour, 0 against, with 297,710 abstentions. As the quorum of 255,154 was not reached, the amendment was not adopted.

126. The Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic, supported by the Government member of Algeria, moved to close discussion of all remaining amendments, in accordance with article 64, paragraph 1, of the Standing Orders. Speaking on behalf of the Arab group, he stressed that the manner in which the work of the Committee had proceeded was not acceptable. He questioned whether it would be possible for the Committee to finish its work on the first and second resolutions and adopt a report in the one day remaining. He regretted that the situation of workers and employers in Palestine had been relegated to the sidelines during the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Some members of the Committee had sought to narrow the gap between the divergent views, but the road had been full of pitfalls and other members had turned the Committee into a stage for chaos, disrespect and indiscipline. The morning session had been cancelled unilaterally without consulting the Committee. It was essential to speed up the work of the Committee, which was the reason for this motion.

127. A number of Committee members raised points of order on the above motion and requested the advice of the Legal Adviser.

128. The Government member of the USSR supported the motion proposed by the Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic. Unfortunately, some members of the Committee were deliberately and openly endeavouring to prevent the adoption of the resolution under discussion and such tactics were unworthy of the Committee. The ILO had an obvious duty to express solidarity with and provide assistance to the Arab workers in Palestine and the occupied territories, and it was regrettable that the Committee should have proceeded as it had. He stated that the motion had priority under article 64, paragraph 2, of the Standing Orders and should be put to a vote.

129. The Government member of Senegal, explaining his vote, stated that one field in which the international community must achieve consensus and take account of past consensus was human rights. Those who argued that this Committee was not the Commission on Human Rights or the International Committee of the Red Cross should not forget that all rights – social, human, economic and political – were inseparable. In other forums of the international community consensus had been reached on the applicability of the Fourth Geneva Convention to the occupied territories. The governments of the authors of the subamendment had been in the vanguard of the struggle for human rights; and Israel itself stated that it applied the Convention in the occupied territories. He hoped that a way would be found to save the credibility of the Committee and of the Organisation.

130. The Government member of Saudi Arabia regretted that the Committee had been prevented from moving forward by feeble spirits and stated that the Committee and the secretariat had failed to prevent chaos and inaction. There was a clear majority in the Committee for the resolution but the majority had not been respected. There had been delays and a sitting cancelled without consultation. He supported the motion presented by the Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic.

131. The Legal Adviser responded to questions that had been raised about the interpretation to be given to article 64, paragraph 1, of the Standing Orders in respect of the motion by the Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic to close the discussion on all proposed amendments to the resolution which were still outstanding. He indicated that article 64, paragraph 1, and article 63, paragraph 7, were complementary and had to be interpreted together. According to precedent in the ILO, a successful motion to close debate on the "general question" which in this case was the resolution – would close the debate on all outstanding amendments. However, that would not eliminate the obligation under article 63, paragraph 7, to put every amendment to the vote. Summarising, a successful closure motion on the general question (the resolution) would end the discussion on all amendments, but those amendments would still have to be put to the vote.

132. The Government member of Israel challenged this interpretation of the Legal Adviser. In the view of his delegation, a motion for closure as provided for in article 63, paragraph 2(g), could only be applied to a question that was under discussion at the time the motion was moved. In the case in point, preambular paragraph 6 of the resolution was the general question under discussion; therefore, the closure applied only to the discussion of the amendment affecting that paragraph and not to discussion of the remaining amendments. Support for this view could be found in article 64, paragraph 4, which applied specifically to the Resolutions Committee and referred to the "question under discussion".

133. Some Committee members called for the sitting to be adjourned. Others favoured continuing it. The Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic, supported by several other Government members, agreed to resume the discussion at the next sitting provided it was on the basis of the opinion of the Legal Adviser. The Government member of the United States reserved his right to comment at a later sitting on the opinion given by the Legal Adviser.

134. In response to a question from the Employers' member of Kuwait concerning who had the power to terminate a sitting of the Committee, the Legal Adviser stated that unless the closing time had been fixed by the Selection Committee and subject to the special provision concerning the termination of the work of the Resolutions Committee contained in article 17, paragraph 6, of the Standing Orders, the Chairman was empowered under article 61, paragraph 1, to close a sitting.

135. In adjourning the sitting, the Chairman noted that the issues were complex and should be examined carefully at the next sitting, which would commence on the basis of the opinion given by the Legal Adviser.

136. At the next sitting, the Chairman, responding to a point of order raised by the Government member of Israel which challenged the opinion of the Legal Adviser, confirmed that he had accepted the advice given by the Legal Adviser and that the work proceed on that basis. Having ascertained that at least one-fifth of the members present supported the motion for closure of the discussion on the general question, the Chairman gave the floor to one speaker from each group to speak against the closure.

137. The Government member of the United States stated that while he did not intend to challenge the ruling of the Chairman he considered the motion out of order, inconsistent with the letter, spirit and intent of the Standing Orders and contrary to the principles of the Organisation. Whatever approach was taken by the Committee at this session should not be regarded as a precedent. As the approach taken by the Committee raised serious questions for the work of the Resolutions Committee and the ILO generally, the question raised by the Government member of Israel and his own question should be answered before the next Conference. The Office should prepare a written legal opinion which should be submitted for comment. His Government felt the Standing Orders were clear. When they referred to resolutions or amendments, they called them as such. The term "general question" used in article 64, paragraph 1, could therefore not be interpreted to cover all amendments or an entire resolution. In addition to the provision in article 63, paragraph 7(2), that a vote was required on each amendment, there was a clear thrust and strong presumption in article 63 that amendments would be discussed. Article 64, paragraph 4, by referring to amendment in the singular, clearly implied that this term could not cover more than 30 amendments. He also requested an explanation of the different approaches taken in article 16 and article 64 as regards the distinctions between amendments, resolutions and questions. He endorsed the view taken earlier by the Employers' Vice-Chairman that the "general question" referred to in article 64, paragraph 1, meant the paragraph of the resolution under discussion and not all amendments to the whole resolution. His Government had two understandings regarding the procedural implications following the vote on closure as proposed by the Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic. First, sponsors of each amendment would be able to introduce them. Second, in accordance with article 64, paragraph 4, the sponsor of each amendment would have the right to speak after adoption of the motion for closure of the discussion on all remaining amendments, not for closure on the resolution itself as had been previously voted by the Committee.

138. The Chairman stated that the secretariat would take note of the request made that action should be taken on this question before the next Conference.

139. The Employers' Vice-Chairman expressed support for the request by the United States Government member that this question be looked at by the time of the next Conference. His personal view differed from that of the Legal Adviser, but this session was not the time to air those differences. It should be understood that the procedure being followed should be regarded as a way to facilitate the work of the Committee in this particular instance and should not set a precedent.

140. The Workers' member of the United Kingdom also supported the request for clarification of the Legal Adviser's opinion. The Committee should not be guided primarily by precedent but by the Standing Orders. He opposed the motion for closure because his and other Workers members' amendments had been designed to improve the resolution, which was after all only a draft, and to make it more pertinent to the concerns of the ILO. The resolution should refer to established facts, not assertions, should use parliamentary language and should have a positive flavour, oriented to future actions. It was not the usual practice in this Organisation to cut off discussion on an important issue.

141. The Chairman, acting in accordance with article 65, paragraph 6, put the question to a record vote. The result of the record vote on the closure of discussion on the general question was as follows: 279,385 in favour, 2,262 against, with 222,636 abstentions, the quorum being 255,154. The motion was adopted.

142. The Workers' member of Israel, on an explanation of his vote, stressed that the matter was of the utmost importance and should not be connected to the controversial issue of the territories occupied by Israel. It was a grave matter to limit members' right of discussion; this was a matter of freedom of speech. As a former member of the Governing Body, he felt strongly about the importance of ensuring freedom of expression within ILO bodies. He therefore hoped that the call for this question to be examined before the next session of the Conference would be heeded.

143. In response to points of order raised by the Government member of the United States, the Chairman ruled that only a sponsor of the resolution, and not sponsors of individual amendments, was authorised to speak after closure as provided for in article 64, paragraph 4, of the Standing Orders. The Government member of Canada indicated that he respected the decision of the Chairman in the immediate circumstances. However, he had doubts about the logic or justice of a procedure permitting the originators of a closure motion to have the last word, to the exclusion of the originators of amendments subjected to the closure. This seemed at odds with the letter and intent of the Standing Orders, and the Government member of Canada consequently welcomed the decision to give this question and its implications a thorough study before the next Conference. On behalf of the sponsors of the resolution, the Government member of Syrian Arab Republic stated that he had nothing to add at this time to his earlier statements concerning the substance of the resolution.

144. Under article 63, paragraph 2(2)(f), the Employers' member of the United States requested a clarification from the Legal Adviser as to whether the question under discussion was the resolution or the amendments to the resolution. The Legal Adviser confirmed the interpretation given by the Chairman, that is that the closure motion had been on the general question, in other words on the resolution. It was therefore one of the sponsors of the resolution who, under article 64, paragraph 4, of the Standing Orders, had been entitled to speak following closure, as had been ruled by the Chairman.

145. A record vote was taken on preambular paragraph 6 of the resolution. The result of the vote was as follows: 309,748 votes in favour, 0 votes against, with 199,723 abstentions. Preambular paragraph 6 was adopted as follows (taking into account the consequential changes resulting from the Committee's decision on the rephrasing of the title and subsequent references in the text):

Affirming that the Fourth Geneva Convention, 1949, concerning the protection of civilian persons in time of war, is applicable to the Palestinian and other Arab territories occupied by Israel since 1967, as was reaffirmed by the Security Council in its resolution No. 605 and by the Commission on Human Rights in various sessions,

146. The Government member of Australia explained his vote in favour of preambular paragraph 6. Although his Government shared the misgivings of those who had questioned whether it was appropriate for the ILO to comment on the application of the Fourth Geneva Convention to the occupied territories, it nevertheless did consider that the Convention applied to those territories. Moreover, as the Australian Minister for Industrial Relations stated in the plenary sitting of the Conference, the Australian Government was particularly concerned at the contravention of the Fourth Geneva Convention involved in the deportation of Palestinians, including trade unionists, from the occupied territories.

147. The Employers' Vice-Chairman, in the Chair at the time, proposed two matters of procedure to the Committee. First, in view of the unavailability of the Chairman, who had been appointed Reporter, he proposed that the Workers' Vice-Chairman act as Reporter. Second, in view of article 17, paragraph 10, of the Standing Orders, which stated that the Resolutions Committee shall submit a report to the Conference, and in view of article 17, paragraph 6, which stipulated that the Committee must terminate its work by 6 p.m. on the third working day preceding the date fixed for the closing of the session, he proposed that the next and final sitting be devoted to the adoption of the report. The Committee so agreed. The Workers' member of Mauritania expressed reservations on the appointment of the Workers' Vice-Chairman as Reporter because of his partiality.

148. Preambular paragraph 7, which read:

Expressing its concern at the continued breach of United Nations principles, international rules, conventions on the non-permissibility of the acquisition of land by force, was then considered by the Committee. The Chairman ruled that as the three amendments concerning this paragraph – D.12, submitted by the Employers' member of the United States, D.20, submitted by the Government members of France and Norway, and D.33, submitted by the Workers' members of Barbados and Norway – were identical in seeking the deletion of the paragraph, they would be considered as one amendment.

149. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of Norway indicated that he could not speak on behalf of all of the sponsors since their reasons for submitting the amendment may have differed. While his Government was not opposed to the substance of the paragraph and did oppose the acquisition of land by force, the International Labour Conference was not the proper place to make the statement presented in preambular paragraph 7. If the ILO was to have any impact on world opinion, it must limit its work to its area of competence. As the three amendments came from all three groups on the Committee, it was clear that the desire to delete preambular paragraph 7 had considerable support.

150. The Chairman put the amendment to a record vote. The result was as follows: 184,830 votes in favour, 0 votes against, with 294,831 abstentions. The quorum of 255,154 not having been reached, the amendment was not adopted.

151. Preambular paragraph 7 was adopted. The Government member of Israel stated his opposition to the paragraph.

152. At the time fixed by article 17, paragraph 6, of the Standing Orders for the termination of its work, the Committee had not completed its consideration of the first resolution. It had adopted the first seven preambular paragraphs of the first resolution.

RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE ROLE OF THE ILO IN THE STRENGTHENING OF RESPECT FOR HUMAN AND TRADE UNION RIGHTS

Presentation of the three original texts

153. This resolution resulted from the combination of three resolutions, as explained in paragraph 4 of this report.

154. The Workers' member of Mexico, introducing the original resolution concerning the role of the ILO in the protection and promotion of human rights, noted that its purpose was to emphasise the fundamental importance of all human rights and particularly freedom of association. Further recognition of these rights was necessary for workers to be able to carry out their activity in full dignity. Changes in social and working conditions, and the internationalisation of the economy, were leading to new challenges. Many governments and employers were contesting rights that had previously been acquired by trade unions and workers. There had been a shift from full-time employment to part-time and other precarious forms of work, and the threat to working conditions from multinational enterprises had grown. The adjustment programmes recommended by the international financial institutions did not take adequate account of the social changes they involved. Organisations representing workers should respond to these challenges, and in particular should assist unorganised workers and other vulnerable groups, such as rural workers, those in the informal sector, and working women. It was important that young persons entering the workforce should be able to join trade unions and thus have a voice in planning the future. These concepts were also reflected in the Director-General's Report to the Conference entitled Human rights – A common responsibility. In 1948 the United Nations had proclaimed the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the ILO had adopted the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention (No. 87). Forty years later, this resolution aimed to highlight the importance of these concepts.

155. Introducing the resolution concerning the contribution of the ILO to the strengthening of respect for human and trade union rights, the Workers' member of the German Democratic Republic stressed the vital importance of this subject in light of the increasing and massive violations of human and trade union rights occurring in various parts of the world. Fundamental human and trade union rights could not be separated from the global problems of our time, such as the maintenance of peace, development, environmental protection, mass unemployment, indebtedness, and inadequate shelter. Because of the seriousness of these challenges, basic human and trade union rights – including the fundamental rights of trade unions to exist and to bargain collectively – were sometimes jeopardised for the sake of profit. Respect for the principle of freedom of association was an essential condition for ensuring that workers could play a constructive part in the economic and social development of their country, and this was a role that was especially important in times of economic difficulty. The speaker called upon all governments that had not already ratified Convention No. 87 to do so.

156. The Workers' member of the Netherlands, introducing the resolution concerning the promotion of human rights and development, noted that human rights had to do first and foremost with how human beings could have a decent life and prospects. He observed a trend towards a society in which two-thirds of the population had remunerative work while one-third were unemployed or trapped in low-income or low-quality jobs. Poverty and indebtedness of developing countries had increased. The Trade Union Advisory Committee of the OECD had recently drawn attention to this grave situation in a statement submitted to the OECD Ministerial Council and the Toronto summit. The statistics could be translated into inhuman suffering: 700 million people suffered hunger pangs daily; 15,000 people starved each day; every minute a child died. The main reason for these negative developments was an unjustified distribution of wealth. Social justice was desirable for its own sake but was also a conditio sine qua non for economic progress. The resolution sought to make the point that development policy had to be related to an adequate human rights policy in which people should have the right to participate in local, regional and national decision-making. It was important that member States should respect and implement the fundamental human rights Conventions such as those in the field of freedom of association, collective bargaining, discrimination, forced labour and equal opportunity. The international instruments should be applied and monitored through effective procedures. Economic, social, cultural and political structures favourable to democracy and justice should be developed.

General discussion

157. The Workers' Vice-Chairman, recalling that 1988 was the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and of the ILO Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, noted that while that anniversary alone would be good reason for considering the resolution, more important and regrettable reasons also existed. The rights contained in those documents were mere words, not daily reality, for thousands and thousands of workers around the world. The most basic of those rights were being denied. Unions were not allowed to form, were declared illegal or their activities hampered. Collective bargaining was severely restricted. Workers were discriminated against for reasons including race, creed, sex and ethnic background. Workers fighting for trade unions disappeared, were arrested, sentenced to severe punishment or even killed. Existing trade unions were dissolved and their premises and property confiscated. These rights violations were not only a grave injustice; they also deprived workers of the possibility of participating in national development, which represented a great waste of good will and experience. The injustice also created a danger to stability within and between countries, as lasting peace could only be secured on the basis of justice and freedom. It was very important that international bodies pay great attention to this matter. The machinery and rules for doing so existed, even though some rules needed to be improved, but the political will to respect and implement the rules was missing. In this regard the workers looked to the ILO, which had been formed to protect the interests of workers and in which they had a constitutional right to participate. The vital principle of the ILO, tripartism, had to be defended. Not only within the Organisation but in member countries free and independent organisations of workers and employers had to be allowed to make rules and to safeguard their implementation. Acquired rights were under threat in many countries because of current economic difficulties. These included the right to free collective bargaining, to social security, and even the right to organise. Such vulnerable groups as women and migrant and low-income workers were even more at risk. Only through protecting and strengthening the ILO's supervisory machinery could respect be enhanced for these human and trade union rights. The link between the ILO's technical assistance and receiving countries' respect for basic rights should be noted. Strengthening the ILO in these tasks was the purpose of the resolution, which the speaker hoped and believed the Committee as a whole would rapidly accept.

158. The Employers' Vice-Chairman indicated that his group had no difficulty in generally supporting the resolution. Their only major concern was that it should refer, where appropriate, to employers as well as workers, and to employers' organisations as well as trade unions, since workers and their organisations were not the only victims of government repression in the world today. Amendments would be proposed to secure parity of treatment in the text. For the same reason, they had a problem with the first part of operative paragraph 2(h). The second part of that paragraph, if it were to remain, also presented a problem, as it would need to be aligned more closely with the ILO Tripartite Declaration on Multinational Enterprises. As it stood, the proposal was not feasible and indeed was illegal in many countries. Depending on how the Committee dealt with the two parts of that paragraph, it might not be possible to combine them.

159. The Government member of Spain considered it natural that this resolution should have a high priority in the Committee's work, not only because, as already noted by other speakers, it was the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and of ILO Convention No. 87, but also because human rights constituted the essence of human dignity, which itself was the basis of social justice. He noted that the Prime Minister of Spain, in the plenary sitting of the Conference, had argued that the protection of human rights was a central aspect of the ILO's mandate. His delegation therefore supported the resolution, but had a number of suggestions to help strengthen the text. First, operative paragraph 2(a) as presently worded might lead one to think that economic development was something that could be taken for granted, but it should be recalled that there were legal norms on the right to development contained in the United Nations Charter, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and other binding international instruments. In operative paragraph 2(c) the relevant ILO Conventions were listed but no mention was made of the basic principles of freedom of association, such as the right to strike. In paragraph 2(g), mention should also be made of young people and older workers as being among the vulnerable sections of the working population. Paragraph 2(h) should make explicit reference to the responsibility of multinational enterprises in respect of human rights under the draft United Nations Code of Conduct on Transnational Corporations and the ILO Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy. Paragraph 4 omitted any reference to the need for managerial training courses to deal also with the protection of employees' human rights. While these suggestions were intended to strengthen the resolution, his delegation could accept it even in its present form.

160. The United States Government member indicated that his delegation was pleased to find this resolution on the Committee's agenda, since it believed the effort to strengthen respect for human rights, in particular the right to freedom of association, was one of the ILO's most fundamental roles and in many ways its raison d'être. Although not perfect, the text was of the type that the Committee and the Conference should adopt. Its emphasis on human and trade union rights and human dignity was consistent with the Organisation's principles and could have a potentially unifying effect in the Committee and Conference. It provided a stark contrast with draft resolutions introduced for narrow political reasons and intended to have a divisive effect. In this 40th anniversary year, the references to the Universal Declaration were particularly welcome. Operative paragraphs 1 and 2 of the resolution reaffirmed the commitment of the ILO and of the governments of member States to the Universal Declaration, including its Article 20, which declared that "everyone has the right to freedom of peaceful assembly and association" and that "no one may be compelled to belong to an association". If all member States of the ILO present in this chamber would adhere to these fundamental obligations, then this resolution would be largely unnecessary. As preambular paragraph 11 made clear, the reality, unfortunately, was different. It pointed out that individuals attempting to exercise their right to freedom of association were subjected in many countries to mass arrest, disappearances, forced exile, ill treatment, torture, detention without trial, severe sentences and even death. Their organisations faced confiscation of property, dissolution, and occupation of their premises. Such government conduct had to end, for the sake of human rights and in the interest of economic development. On particular points, his delegation believed that the reference to "right to work" in operative paragraph 2(b) should be amplified to refer to a "right to fully productive and freely chosen work". Operative paragraph 2(e) was crucial and its drafting commendable; operative paragraph 2(f) had also been commendably drafted, as the co-operation referred to was vital, yet was too often lacking.

161. The Government member of France pointed out that while 1988 was the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration, his country was preparing to celebrate in one year's time the 200th anniversary of the Declaration of the Rights of Man. It was appropriate that the Organisation should reaffirm now its commitment to these principles, especially as it had done much to inspire them. His delegation attached much importance to economic and social rights, but these had no meaning in the absence of individual rights. It was a sad tour of the world members were being taken on, where even the most elementary rights such as the rights to life, to free movement, to assistance, and to freedom of association were being violated. It was not appropriate to list all such violations here but, while eschewing politicisation and selective indignation, it was necessary to express concern at these situations and show solicitude for the persons affected. His Government had no difficulty in accepting the resolution, which was completely within the purview of the ILO. The importance of preambular paragraph 6 should be emphasised, since the right to development was the basis for the enjoyment of the other rights, as noted by the 41st Session of the United Nations General Assembly, which had adopted a declaration on this theme establishing a clear link between development and human rights and placing the individual at the centre of this process.

162. The Government member of the United Kingdom welcomed the choice of human rights as a theme for this year's Conference. The defence and promotion of human rights underlay all ILO activities including those related to respect for freedom of association, the struggle against forced labour and all forms of discrimination, and equality of opportunity and treatment. The resolution appropriately sought to define the course of ILO action in this field in coming years. The resolution was admirably comprehensive in scope, and her delegation was prepared to support it, subject to a reservation concerning operative paragraph 2(a), where the implication that the existing structure of the world economy was not conducive to development was not acceptable. Her Government had ratified the two major International Covenants on Human Rights as well as many other international human rights instruments. This bore witness to a respect for individual liberties that could be traced back as far as the signing of the Magna Carta some 750 years ago. While other countries had other traditions and each government was responsible for the well-being of its own citizens, her delegation held to the fundamental principle of the rule of law. It was now well established that human rights were a matter of legitimate international concern, and in the ILO judgements were made and the actions of individual governments scrutinised. It was disappointing that such a wide gap existed between principles laid down in ILO and wider United Nations conventions and the situation actually prevailing. Television and newspapers provided a seemingly endless series of horrors and atrocities. The few countries often censured did not have a monopoly of these violations. Resolutions already adopted by the Conference on South Africa and the occupied Arab territories reflected the just indignation of the international community, and her Government had spoken out against the abhorrent practice of apartheid and had voiced great concern about Israeli practices in the occupied territories. But selectivity of criticism or censure was a threat to the principle of international human rights scrutiny and should be guarded against. It was important to engage in honest dialogue on individual situations while resisting the incursion of extraneous political elements into ILO resolutions, as they could undermine the foundations of the Organisation's work.

163. The Government member of Austria welcomed the resolution, which marked in a suitable manner the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration. However, it should not be forgotten that even before the adoption of that instrument the ILO was working to protect human rights and dignity. The Director-General's Report had pointed to three types of ILO human rights efforts: the definition of rights, especially through their codification; measures to secure their realisation, especially through international supervision of the various Conventions; and the provision of appropriate assistance to help countries implement them. Whereas in the past two decades international human rights work had centred on codification, in the future implementation and the corresponding technical assistance would be the focus. There was a need for a common interpretation of international norms by the various international organisations, which was an issue that certain members of the Governing Body and of delegations had addressed in recent years. In many parts of the world there was a gulf between international human rights standards and reality, suggesting that efforts to bring about implementation were still insufficient. His country like most others recognised the principle that the application and adaptation of human rights could not be left exclusively to individual States. The ILO had a very important role to play in this respect. The Director-General's Report had made a very fundamental statement, with which his delegation agreed, concerning the indivisibility of human rights be they civil and political, economic, social or cultural. The speaker also endorsed the link noted in the Director-General's Report between a policy of dignity and respect for the person, on the one hand, and peace, on the other: there could be no genuine peace if human rights were constantly violated or denied. His delegation supported the resolution and believed that it could further strengthen the ILO's already important role in international human rights protection.

164. The Government member of the German Democratic Republic, expressing support for the resolution, noted that his Government had indicated its support for the two human rights agreements cited in the resolution, had on many occasions adopted a positive stand on the Universal Declaration, and was a party to Conventions Nos. 87 and 111. His delegation shared the view that the implementation of human rights instruments should be assured by appropriate action at both national and international levels. He stressed the importance of preambular paragraph 7 and operative paragraph 2(a) and noted with satisfaction that operative paragraph 4(a) called for studies to prepare standards in new areas not yet codified; last year his delegation had made proposals on these lines. The draft text could be improved in certain respects, through endorsement of the principle of indivisibility of the various human rights, which Prime Minister Gonzalez had noted in his address to the Conference, and through putting political and economic rights on the same footing. These ideas were covered in part in operative paragraph 2(b) but needed to be dealt with elsewhere, for example in the tenth preambular paragraph, in order to bring the resolution into line with the Director-General's Report. For this purpose his delegation would be offering amendments to the text.

165. The Workers' member of Mauritania noted that the Committee had been discussing the need to protect human rights wherever they were violated, and now had before it a document that went into detail on the need to preserve civil and trade union rights everywhere. This resolution supplemented and strengthened the resolution considered previously by the Committee. The speaker invited all members to do everything possible to ensure the adoption of the resolution. Without individual and collective freedoms there could be no progress. Theory should be linked to practice and thus, if the Committee accepted this resolution, there should be no differences of opinion within the Committee over human rights violations in particular regions. Several points in the text were important, especially the call on States to set up structures to protect human rights; the view that fundamental rights and freedoms should be proclaimed everywhere; the call to refrain from any action calling human rights into question; and the idea that without economic and social development there could be no freedom. Development should be more balanced and promote equitable distribution between North and South, between rich and poor.

166. The Government member of Iraq observed that millions of people were suffering throughout the world because of violations of their human and trade union rights. Some regimes perpetrated these actions deliberately, and the terrorist regimes which did so were never short of pretexts to justify their practices. The ILO, as the conscience of the world of labour, had a responsibility to take a stand against such action. His delegation supported the resolution without reservation, since all persons should be able to live in dignity, their basic rights protected through appropriate ILO and other international instruments. It would be unreasonable to celebrate the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights without adopting this resolution. He asked members to support this and other resolutions before the Committee despite the attitude of some delegations which were seeking to prolong the discussion and were posing procedural obstacles in an attempt to prevent the resolution from being adopted. This resolution supplemented the first one considered by the Committee.

167. The Government member of Norway commended the various authors of the merged text for their initiative on a topic which fell fully within the ILO's mandate and he hoped a resolution based on that text could be adopted. Much effort, mainly within the United Nations system, had gone into developing international human rights instruments, and the ILO had played a very important role in this work. The resolution was timely on account of the double 40th anniversary but also an account of the violations of human and trade union rights that took place every day in many countries, most systematically in South Africa. Human and trade union rights would not be enjoyed by the people of South Africa and Namibia until the system of apartheid had been abolished. However, the focus on South Africa should not be allowed to obscure the violations that took place in other countries. While the main responsibility for ensuring human rights lay with the individual governments, all participants in the ILO tripartite system had the right and obligation to speak out against abuses and work actively for improved respect for human and trade union rights. Legal instruments were of course important in this effort, but what mattered most was how human and trade union rights were implemented and exercised in daily life.

168. The Government member of Hungary said that it was not a coincidence that the ILO had adopted Convention No. 87 in the same year as the Universal Declaration of Human Rights had been adopted. In the past decade there had been more talk about human rights than ever before, but unfortunately this did not mean that human rights were being respected more than in the past. Serious human rights violations were occurring daily over the globe. The list of countries that did not respect human rights had changed over time, and was in fact constantly lengthening. Therefore, the appeals formulated in this resolution should be fully supported. The ratification of human rights Conventions, such as Convention No. 87 and Convention No. 98 and others, was only the first step. The most important thing was to make sure their provisions were fully implemented. The adoption of this resolution would represent another step in this process. There were many international organisations besides the ILO that dealt with human rights and a better co-ordination of these activities, through the United Nations and with the active participation of the ILO, would increase the effectiveness of this work. Finally, the speaker expressed the hope that this resolution would be further improved in the Committee and would eventually receive unanimous support.

169. The Government member of Czechoslovakia affirmed his country's sincere support for the promotion of human rights, as attested by its having promptly endorsed the Universal Declaration, ratified without delay the two human rights Covenants, and subscribed from the beginning to the ILO Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia. The purpose of social development in his country was unrestricted enjoyment of all civic, economic and social rights. While fully supporting the idea contained in the resolution, his delegation would offer amendments to bring the text into line with the two Covenants, whose logic they supported. It was not appropriate to divide human rights which concerned the ILO into two categories – those relating to freedom of association, forced labour and equality of opportunity, on the one hand, and all the rest, on the other hand – and to make these two categories subject to different actions as provided for in the resolution. As had been noted in the relevant instruments and by many speakers in plenary sitting, the right to work was of capital importance. For those unemployed for long periods, what remained of their trade union rights, right to free choice of work and other human rights? These rights depended on certain pre-conditions and the resolution needed to give them the same weight. Account should also be taken of the fact that the Conference last year had passed a resolution on the 40th anniversary of the adoption of Convention No. 87, some provisions of which covered more or less the same ground as this resolution. It would perhaps be preferable simply to refer to that resolution instead of largely repeating its provisions. The focus of this resolution should be a renewed commitment by the Organisation to its human rights mission and to measures that were needed to deal with cases of massive and brutal human rights violations.

170. The Workers' member of the Syrian Arab Republic reported that the Workers' group had studied this resolution carefully and noted that the Committee had ranked it second in the secret ballot. In many parts of the world, trade unions had suffered violations, many of which remained unpublished, some of which were referred to the ILO. These violations had taken three main forms: some employers and multinational companies had deprived workers of their rights in order to boost profits; workers had been dismissed for attempting to establish trade unions for the defence of their rights; and workers had been oppressed by imperialist governments to prevent them from defending these rights. In all three cases workers had suffered many kinds of discrimination and pressure. On each occasion that people had expressed condemnation of trade union and human rights infringements, in an attempt to restore the balance, there had been others who attempted to cover up these violations. This was particularly the case in respect of Arab workers living under the domination of the Israeli occupation authorities. These people had suffered daily violations in connection with their work, which had repercussions for their entire family. He therefore expressed full support for this resolution.

171. In supporting the resolution, the Government Member of Qatar stated that human rights were the responsibility of all member States, which should co-operate with one another to strengthen the ILO's significant role in this field. Noting that economic and social rights relating for example to job opportunities and social and health services were held in great regard in Qatar, he called for peace and respect for human rights world-wide so that all would be able to live under excellent conditions. Countries from the four corners of the world had come together to strive for respect for human rights. The ILO should support this resolution and the resolution on the protection of the rights of Palestinians in the occupied Arab territories, which was closely related to it.

172. Also expressing strong support for the resolution, the Government member of Australia stated that the promotion of human rights was a fundamental task of the United Nations machinery in general and an activity central to the ILO's mandate. His delegation was pleased to reaffirm its unshakeable commitment to the fundamental principles of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and of the international Covenants which formed the basis for a number of other instruments on human rights. The ILO had already contributed substantially to the cause of international human rights. First, its human rights Conventions had established principles of international law which were regarded as norms. Second, its mechanisms to enforce the application of standards were simple, straightforward and effective, and were working well while enforcement procedures elsewhere in the United Nations system were sagging under the weight of paper. Third, the ILO's comprehensive technical co-operation programme was designed to help countries implement standards. These achievements justified a collective recognition of the ILO's role in human rights, which should be encouraged, and the resolution was commended for unanimous adoption.

173. The Workers' member of China, noting the special significance of the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and ILO Convention No. 87, supported the resolution. Human and trade union rights at the present time were far from satisfactory. At a time of great technological progress when human beings were able to travel to outer space, it was sad to note that certain governments still stubbornly clung to policies such as apartheid and other forms of oppression. In South Africa the authorities wilfully violated the human rights of the African population, while the Israeli authorities deprived the Palestinian people of their basic rights of national identity, self-determination, trade union rights and even the right to exist. Throughout the world, mass unemployment was also contrary to human dignity, was a waste of human resources and harmful to social stability and to social progress. Recalling the principle that poverty anywhere constituted a danger to prosperity everywhere, he noted that the gap between the affluent and poor countries, which was widening, was also a cause of great concern. A new and just international economic order was necessary to allow developing countries to exercise fully their right to economic development. Double standards could not apply to human and trade union rights. The universality of those rights applied generally as in the present resolution and to Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories as presented in the resolution that had been given first priority by the Committee; some members had attempted to deny this. That would amount to invalidating the principle of the universality of those rights.

174. The Workers' member of the United Kingdom, on behalf of the British trade union movement, strongly supported the resolution; its contents were vital for the workers in his country and for all Members of the ILO. Echoing the principles outlined by the United Kingdom Government member, he stressed two points. First, not only were trade union rights not fully recognised in many countries, but in other countries, and particularly industrialised ones, rights that had been acquired were now being removed. It should be fully recognised that there were ideological, and not only economic, reasons for this, which made the adoption of this resolution all the more opportune. Second, the ILO possessed excellent supervisory machinery that monitored the application of its international labour standards – the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, widely recognised as being authoritative and independent, and the Conference Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations. It was regrettable that in too many cases governments failed to comply with their recommendations; it was sad that governments freely took upon themselves obligations but then chose not to comply with them. He agreed that the issue of selectivity was important and stressed that all governments should abide by international law and ILO Conventions and co-operate in applying them.

175. The Government member of the Netherlands particularly welcomed the resolution in view of the celebration of the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. A particularly positive feature of the resolution was that its authors came from all quarters of the Organisation and included countries which had earlier been criticised for their performance in this area. It was hoped that this resolution marked the beginning of an enlightened era of increased respect for human and trade union rights as envisaged in ILO Conventions and Recommendations. Paragraph 11 of the Preamble referred in particular – and with good reason – to the killing and disappearance of trade union activists. In some countries even the fact of being a trade union member carried with it a risk of death. Paragraph 11 of the Preamble should therefore be elevated to an operative paragraph. Another aspect of the resolution that merited greater attention was the need for increased collaboration between the ILO and the United Nations in the area of trade union rights. Some co-operation existed between the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations and the Commission on Human Rights of the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations. An amendment to the resolution to strengthen this co-operation would serve to ensure that the ILO maintained its key role.

176. The Workers' member of the United States supported the resolution on behalf of workers in his country. The positive discussion in the Committee was especially important since the Resolutions Committee provided guidance for the priorities of the future work of the Organisation; it was important to place human and trade union rights high on the list of such future activities. Some of the discussion in the Committee's previous sittings had been pious and pompous and had disguised the fact that many countries represented within the Committee exercised discrimination and denied workers the right to organise, the right to strike, the right to collective bargaining, freedom of speech, freedom of assembly and freedom of the press. An excellent resolution had been adopted by the Committee in 1970 on trade union rights but it had not been implemented in many countries. It was therefore essential to adopt the present text and to implement its operative paragraphs speedily.

177. The Workers' member of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya considered that the introduction of this resolution regarding human rights had been made at a suitable time, while the 40th anniversary of the Declaration of Human Rights and the adoption of Convention No. 87 was being celebrated. It had been put forward at a time when there were serious violations of human dignity and human rights that went beyond what had been known before. These included torture, the killing of children and women and the use of toxic gases against the Palestinian people in Palestine and the occupied Arab territories by the Zionist occupying forces and the most atrocious crimes by the racist South African regime. It was most unfortunate that in spite of these violations of human rights many countries still maintained relations of sympathy and support with these criminal entities. Fully supporting the resolution, he noted that his country had recently issued a document on human rights which provided for the right to exercise authority, the right to organise federations and trade unions and professional congresses, the abolition and destruction of prisons, the liberation of prisoners, and the lifting of restrictions on travel.

178. The Government member of Byelorussian SSR stated that most nations wished to develop international co-operation in the area of human rights; the ILO's role in this area was one of its most important tasks. Democratisation of international relations would be advantageous to all sides and would eliminate current misunderstandings. The resolution had drawn on the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, ILO Convention No. 87 and other international instruments. The Byelorussian SSR had ratified the relevant instruments and implemented them in full. The resolution was particularly relevant to those areas where human rights were hindered because of social and economic problems, unemployment, poverty and external debt. The resolution pointed to a number of means to increase international co-operation so that all States could implement the international instruments on human rights. Human rights could not be examined in isolation and were linked to the issues of peace, self-determination and national sovereignty. With reference to co-operation in this field, the humanitarian links between nations should be fostered with a view to improving human, social and cultural rights, and in this connection he noted the importance of the proposal for the convening in Moscow of an international conference on human rights problems. In conclusion, he supported the resolution.

179. The Government member of the Ukrainian SSR emphasised the importance of the subject under discussion and the fact that human rights had been selected as one of the principle themes of the International Labour Conference this year. Within its area of competence, the ILO could not ignore the many factors that led to mass violations of human rights in specific contexts, including unemployment and social injustice, and should do all it could to combat them. In his own country there had been a number of recent achievements that made use of the experience acquired by other countries and by international organisations. Perestroika and glasnost were two important ideas that had been introduced. There were still several problems that needed to be solved to ensure fuller protection of workers' rights. New measures had been introduced: laws on democratisation and on individual and collective rights; and laws on democratisation and on individual and collective rights; and laws on enterprises and co-operatives. The need to improve social protection measures for citizens and to combat unemployment should be clearly mentioned in the resolution. He agreed with the previous speakers on the links between peace and human rights; without the right to live in peace, other human rights had no meaning. The resolution should also emphasise the indivisibility of human, social, political, cultural and economic rights.

180. The Government member of Sudan stressed the importance of the resolution in the context of the Report of the Director-General to this session of the Conference. There was also a clear and indivisible correlation between the rights discussed, this resolution and the protection of workers' and employers' rights and freedoms in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories. Trade union and civil rights were inseparable from human rights, particularly in the Third World where factors such as poverty and ignorance, low prices for their commodities and high debts let to the poor becoming still poorer, which further jeopardised respect of fundamental rights. In his country a unique way of overcoming dictatorship had been found and all freedoms were guaranteed by the Constitution, which protected inter alia the rights of trade unions, the press and political parties. In reply to a member of the Committee, who had referred disparagingly to the human rights situation in connection with the southern part of his country, he pointed out that the issue was one not of human rights but of war imposed on the Sudan by external sources to weaken and retard the development of the country. His delegation supported this resolution, which should be read in conjunction with resolution No. 1.

CONSIDERATION AND ADOPTION OF THE REPORT

Consideration of the report

181. The Committee considered its draft report at its 14th sitting. A number of general remarks were made on the report as a whole. The Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic, on behalf of the Arab group, noted that it had not been possible to examine the draft report in depth. Nevertheless the group had a number of general remarks. Amendments to the first resolution should have been presented in such a way as not to distort the issues under discussion, for example by citing the original text of the resolution with the amendments. The record votes should have been reproduced in full in the report, and the texts of the seven preambular paragraphs of the first resolution adopted by the Committee should be given in the report. The Government member of the Libyan Arab Jamhiriya supported this remark and in particular requested that the detailed results of all votes concerning preambular paragraphs 3, 4, 5 and 6 should be included. The final version of the report of the Committee should contain these changes. The Employers' member of Jordan stated that the report lacked balance in that some speakers' interventions were summarised in far greater detail than others.

182. Corrections to specific paragraphs were submitted by various members for incorporation in the report.

183. The Government member of Senegal, noting the failure of the Committee to adopt a resolution, recalled that it was not the first such occasion and that some other instances had seen even more heated debate. Part of the problem had been the procedure for closing the debate, which led to the frustration of some members who were not able to express themselves. Good will on the part of all was needed, and when debate was leading nowhere alternative solutions should be sought. That was what his delegation had tried to do. Despite the impasse, efforts should continue in the various bodies of the ILO to bring about a positive outcome. Work should go forward relative to problems of the Arab workers in the occupied territories in areas such as employment, social security, vocational training and freedom of association. The Director-General should prepare a report for the next session of the Conference on these activities. A durable solution should be sought, and the ILO should play a prominent role in that context.

184. The Workers' member of Mauritania took the view that responsibility for the regrettable delay that had prevented the Committee from getting on with its work, for example by passing a resolution marking in an appropriate way the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, was not equally shared but attributable to the authors of the many amendments to the first resolution.

185. The Government member of Zaire intervened for the first time in the discussion on the Committee's work. He stated how disappointed many were to see that the ILO had failed to adopt a resolution on human rights during the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. He noted that this was due to the intransigence found on both sides. This was particularly regrettable for the employers and workers covered by the resolution. He felt that it should have been possible to reach a consensus, but unfortunately no working party had been set up, instead a "contact" group met where bitterness prevailed.

186. The Government member of the Islamic Republic of Iran stated that his delegation was opposed to anything which could be construed as recognising Zionist control of Palestine.

Adoption of the report

187. At its 14th sitting the Committee unanimously adopted its report subject to a number of changes.

Geneva, 18 June 1988

Provisional Record

Seventy-fifth Session, Geneva, 1988

Seventh Item on the Agenda: Rural Employment Promotion

Report of the Committee on Rural Employment

Introduction

1. The Committee on Rural Employment was set up by the Conference at its second sitting on 2 June 1988. It was originally composed of 128 members (63 Government members, 25 Employers' members and 40 Workers' members). In order to ensure equality of voting strength, 200 votes were allocated to each Government member, 504 to each Employer member and 315 to each Worker member. The composition of the Committee was subsequently modified seven times and the number of votes allotted accordingly.¹

2. The Committee elected the following officers:

Chairman: Mr. Ruphin (Government member, Madagascar);

Vice-Chairmen: Mr. Velazco Arzac (Employers' member, Mexico) and Mr. Ahmed (Workers' member, Pakistan); Reporter: Mr. van Raalte (Government member, Netherlands).

3. The Committee appointed a Working Party composed of the Government members of Argentina, Bulgaria, Indonesia, Malawi and the United Kingdom; the Employers' members Messrs. Velazco Arzac, Khurana, Limburg, Mambwe, Smith and substitute Mr. Cheshire; and the Workers' members Messrs. Ahmed, Boddy, Maiyaki, Veretennikov and Zaffora.

4. The Committee held 13 sittings.

5. The Committee had before it Report VII, prepared by the Office, on the seventh item on the agenda of the Conference, "Rural employment promotion".

6. The Chairman, in his opening address, underlined the importance of the rural sector in all countries, and the very serious problems it was facing. He argued that priority should be given to food self-sufficiency and rural employment in the battle against injustice, inequality and poverty. This required material and financial resources, the application of appropriate technologies, labour-intensive techniques and vocational training. One could envisage the creation of rural development poles to encourage rural employment creation and to combat the rural exodus. Recalling the ILO's Right of Association (Agriculture) Convention, 1921 (No. 11), Rural Workers' Organisations Convention, 1975 (No. 141), Co-operatives (Developing Countries) Recommendation, 1966 (No. 127), Rural Workers' Organisations Recommendation, 1975 (No. 149) and Plantations Recommendation, 1958 (No. 110), the efforts of the World Employment Programme since its inception and the value of multilateral and bilateral co-operation, he pointed out that, nevertheless, a great deal remained to be done. There were tasks for all – the ILO, developing countries, and industrialised countries.

7. In welcoming the members of the Committee, the representative of the Secretary-General stressed the need for added efforts to promote growth, stimulate employment and reduce poverty in the hostile environment of the 1980s. The crucial question was how to accelerate the pace of the incipient recovery while pursuing both growth and equity. Rural employment had suffered as a result of lopsided development in the past; unemployment, underemployment, unremunerative jobs and poor working conditions were endemic features of many rural societies. In presenting the report he explained that the ILO had attempted to document the evolution of rural employment in both developed and developing countries. While emphasis was on the latter, where the problems were more urgent, it had been important to include developed countries in view of the problem they faced as well as the impact they had on the situation in developing countries. The report laid particular emphasis on the need to develop an employment-oriented strategy for increasing labour absorption in the rural areas of developing countries, through both more vigorous agricultural growth and the reinforcement of linkages with a growing non-farm economy. He invited the Committee to consider in particular whether the tasks of rural employment promotion and poverty alleviation should receive greater attention in strategies for recovery, growth and employment creation; what might be the possibilities for increased labour absorption in agriculture and in rural non-farm activities; and what guidance and advice it would offer for the future direction of ILO activities in the areas of rural employment and development.

General discussion

8. The Employers' Vice-Chairman welcomed the report, especially in view of the fact that it was an important issue of concern to all; he was looking forward to hearing the views of the Workers' members on this crucial subject. He stressed the need for a set of practical conclusions which should be directly applicable and realistic in economic terms. The use of new technologies should be emphasised and special attention should be paid to the problem of migration. In addition, full use should be made of the resources available in rural areas. He stated that rural employment promotion basically meant integrated rural development or agricultural modernisation. Employment promotion should not be an end in itself; it was part of a larger strategy towards rural modernisation. For the Employers' group, key elements of this strategy were the development of the non-farm economy and the improvement of rural living conditions. Furthermore, rural modernisation implied productive employment using new technologies and modern production methods. These should serve to achieve self-sufficiency in food and higher agricultural production, thus contributing to rural wealth. The Employers' Vice-Chairman further pointed out that resources were limited. In particular, there was insufficient land to distribute without resulting in holdings that would be too small to be economic. Resources should not be allocated solely on the basis of social criteria. Economic and social criteria needed to be combined so that investment resources could be mobilised in order to raise productivity. As regards the small farm sector, capital investments should be carefully considered to ensure that they were justified in economic terms. The legal environment was also important, and adequate price incentives were needed. He also stated that private ownership contributed effectively to increasing productive investment and to keeping the population in rural areas; the guarantee of the right to private ownership should therefore be the basis for employment creation. The Employers' Vice-Chairman concluded that public works construction such as roads and wells was essential for rural development. He suggested that such investment decisions should be taken in consultation with employers' as well as workers' organisations. He noted that in some countries employers had made a economic contribution to infrastructure improvements.

9. The Employers' group also was of the view that small and medium-sized enterprises, as discussed in the 72nd Session (1986) of the International Labour Conference, could make an important contribution to rural development. Such enterprises should be promoted by providing permanent and basic education as well as vocational training. Employers' and workers' organisations could play a useful role in helping to identify training needs. The Employers' group also considered that it was necessary to recognise the contribution of the informal sector to employment, to examine the causes of its expansion, to improve the climate for it and to provide specific support measures. It also felt that a programme of action was needed to increase food production. Self-sufficiency in food would help to combat migration to the cities and reduce food imports, thus making foreign exchange available for industrial development.

10. The Workers' Vice-Chairman associated himself with the previous speaker and was looking forward to close collaboration with him. He felt that the report suggested some useful measures for promoting rural employment, although information could have been provided on such aspects as the magnitude of youth unemployment in rural areas, the costs and benefits of biotechnology and the impact of trade policies. He pointed out that the subject under discussion was of concern to other United Nations agencies, particularly the FAO, and that the policies of bodies such as the GATT, the World Bank and the IMF had important effects on rural employment. The Workers' members attached great importance to the right to work, as recognised in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Employment gave dignity, but it must be freely chosen.

11. Measures were required in many areas. The Workers' Vice-Chairman gave first priority to human resources development, as there was an urgent need for people in rural areas to gain access to meaningful education, skills and income-generating capability. The development of abilities and talents created assets for the nation and mankind. Equal opportunities would at least lead to more equality even if, as Aristotle said long ago, "there is as much injustice in the equal treatment of unequal cases as there is in unequal treatment of equal cases". Rural development was essential for eliminating poverty and increasing employment, enabling people to stay in rural areas, and it was the responsibility of governments to ensure that all at least satisfied their basic needs for education, health, housing and safe water. The second priority was structural change in societies, so that those denied access to basic resources, especially land, could contribute to development. The scale of landlessness and near-landlessness was enormous. The Declaration of Principles and Programme of Action of the world Employment Conference had referred to the need for agrarian reform, which would facilitate development and employment creation. The third priority was access to technology, which should be shared, for the common good. This called for both national and international action. The example of Europe showed that with the application of agricultural technologies, output could rise with fewer workers, while augmenting incomes and national wealth. Non-farm technologies were also very important. There were other areas where the State could make a greater contribution, such as in protecting rural workers from toxic chemicals, strengthening the infrastructure, promoting food conservation, and providing credit and other inputs for small farmers. It required greater political will to eliminate poverty, provide for basic needs, protect safety and health, and ensure a minimum wage. But, it also required stronger workers' organisations, to improve the lot of workers and to contribute to overall national prosperity. ILO Conventions, as referred to by the Chairman, were important in improving the institutional framework to enhance the role of the rural poor in national development. In particular, too few countries had ratified Convention No. 141, which was an urgent priority.

12. At the international level, action by many agencies was needed since high debt burdens and interest rates, monetary policies, fluctuating exchange rates, falling commodity prices and adverse trade policies kept the rural poor from obtaining a fair return on their labour. He looked forward to a greater role by the ILO in these areas, especially in view of its tripartite structure. The ILO also had an important function in promoting workers' organisations, workers' education and co-operatives, as well as in research and the dissemination of information, and in encouraging equal treatment of women in employment. The Advisory Committee on Rural Development, which had not met since 1983, should meet more regularly. Finally, he expressed the hope that the outcome of the deliberations of the Committee would benefit the rural poor.

13. The representative of the Organisation of African Trade Union Unity praised the report for providing a comprehensive discussion of the employment problem in the three developing continents. In Latin America the main problem was one of absorbing labour in the urban sector. In the Asian region the labour force was largely rural so that there was a need to increase rural labour absorption, while the high incidence of landlessness called for land reform. In Africa, where around 70 per cent of the labour force remained in the rural areas, a solution to unemployment must also be found in the rural sector. He observed that the African crisis was often blamed on government mismanagement which could be corrected by introducing structural adjustment programmes. That was based on an adequate analysis. The ILO had provided an alternative view and, in this context, he commended the Office for developing competent research and technical advisory services regarding employment, food security and income distribution in Africa. Many still talked about "getting the prices right", but experience in a number of African countries had not produced the expected results. Distorted prices could have a negative effect on agricultural production, but structural adjustment programmes had typically obscured the fundamental problem of African agriculture – the fragile resource base. The absence of a green revolution and the use of primitive technology suggested that prices would only have a marginal impact on production. ILO research had made a useful contribution on the impact of adjustment programmes and he trusted that this work would continue. As regards the ILO's role in rural employment promotion, assistance in public works, while useful, could only make a marginal contribution to reducing unemployment. Rather, the ILO's major role should be to do research that was country-specific and provided guidance for policy.

14. He stressed that the developing countries were experiencing difficult times, with external markets shrinking and export prices falling. In this context, he supported the report's emphasis on food security. The use of local resources should also be promoted to resume growth, and the agricultural sector should be entrusted the role of pulling the economies out of the depression. While the eventual aim of development was industrialisation, agriculture should not be excessively squeezed to achieve this. He concluded that future ILO research should stress country-specific issues and give priority to the impact of structural adjustment on employment. The international aspects of the African crisis, including access to external markets and financing, should also be emphasised, and work on food security and migration should continue. Non-farm activities should be encouraged, but their limited potential should be recognised.

15. The members of the Committee expressed their appreciation for the report on rural employment promotion prepared by the Office. A number of speakers observed that it was well written and well documented and provided a solid basis for the work of the Committee. The report was considered to have provided a valuable overview of a complicated problem and of a wide range of experience in rural promotion. Nevertheless, the Government member of Czechoslovakia felt that the report tended to generalise too much about the situation in industrialised countries with centrally planned economies and that certain data pertaining to his country were distorted. The Government member of the United States was of the view that the report's discussion of price policy was misleading.

16. The difficult world situation was mentioned by many members. Structural adjustment programmes in a context of heavy debt burdens and protectionism constrained the possibilities for rural employment promotion and rural development. Limits on government expenditures hindered governments from undertaking the necessary investments and programmes in the rural sector. Moreover, the concentration of the international financial institutions on economic factors and criteria, without adequate attention to the social aspects and social costs, helped to explain the failure of some of the policies they imposed. The particular crisis in Africa was underlined by several Government members, who commented on the combined effects of inadequate rainfall, backward technologies, low and precarious incomes and harsh structural adjustment programmes, all of which made it difficult to build up the necessary political will. It was also argued that agricultural protection and subsidies in industrialised countries were a major barrier to the improvement of the agricultural sector in developing countries. They restricted developing country exports and thus their capacity to import inputs for domestic industry and for agricultural modernisation. In some developing countries, when there had been an improvement in agricultural productivity, the benefits had been eroded by declining world prices and the loss of market access due to protectionism. Some developed countries also saw the need for trade reform. The Government member of the United States referred to the consensus reached among the OECD ministers at their recent meeting, on the need for reform in agricultural trade, and to his Government's view, as expressed in the GATT, that all agricultural subsidies, quotas and import barriers should be phased out over a ten-year period.

17. Many members of the Committee pointed out that the rural economies of developing countries had a major role to play in absorbing the labour force. The urban areas had only a limited potential to employ additional labour from rural areas. In this regard, the Government member of Brazil observed that those leaving the rural areas lacked the skills needed in urban areas, and thus either became unemployed or found only insecure, poorly remunerated jobs. In designing effective policies to promote rural employment, efforts should be made to ensure that such policies were an integral part of national development strategies. Moreover, as several members pointed out, macro-economic conditions and the linkages between agriculture and industry should be taken into account. The Government member of Turkey stressed that rural employment problems could not be solved in the short run since the issues were difficult and complex. Several speakers expressed the view that policy measures should focus on economic as well as social development. An effective rural development strategy needed to focus on both access to social services and employment promotion. A number of Committee members also emphasised that policy-making should not focus on agriculture alone. The non-farm sector should play an active role in absorbing labour. Attention was drawn to the criteria that should be used in defining a rural employment strategy. The need to give priority to agricultural productivity and the creation of productive employment was stressed by some members. Sustained employment growth could not be achieved without economic growth. Others felt that social criteria should play an equally important role. Agricultural productivity was an important criterion in identifying policies to promote sustained development, but not necessarily the single most important one.

18. Some members referred to population growth and other demographic aspects in discussing the rural employment situation. High rates of population growth increased the labour supply and often contributed to surplus labour in rural areas. This in turn was linked to migration from rural areas and the search for jobs in the urban centres. Several members expressed particular concern over high levels of youth unemployment.

19. Several members considered that economic development should be properly balanced between rural and urban areas. The rural sector should be given adequate priority in the allocation of public expenditures and investment. Policies should provide sufficient incentives to both urban and rural producers. A number of members drew attention to the fact that unbalanced growth was one of the main causes for the migration to urban areas and suggested the need for policies to reduce excessive migration flows. Regional planning was also considered an important element in employment promotion strategies. Rural poverty was often concentrated in certain areas, and region-specific measures were called for to deal with the special conditions there. The Government member of China stressed the need for action to promote labour mobility between regions and to create new towns.

20. Several Government members offered observations that reflected the diversity of conditions and experience within national economies and in the rural sector. There were differences between developed countries as well as between developing countries and, as the Government member of the Netherlands pointed out, rural development and rural employment promotion depended upon the specific socio-economic, cultural, physical and political circumstances in a country or a region. Some Government members from industrialised market economy countries stressed the importance of competitive markets, private enterprise and getting prices right for the purpose of resource allocation. It was observed that governments' role in this regard was to create a policy environment conducive to a competitive, stable economy in which private enterprise could flourish. Yet, in the view of many members the State had to play a larger role in the development of productive agriculture and related activities and the fostering of inter-sectoral linkages. The Government member and the Employers' member of Czechoslovakia laid particular stress on the importance of co-operatives. It also was argued that prices reflected the balance of market forces to a greater extent than the real value of products.

21. A number of speakers drew attention to the importance of the agrarian structures in determining levels of rural employment and incomes. The Government member of Brazil in particular stressed the uneven distribution of land and the consequent need for land reform. The availability of land and its distribution had a major impact on labour absorption in agriculture. The existence of fully recognised land titles also was important. Landless workers were at a special disadvantage in securing an adequate livelihood. Several members felt that agrarian reform, including the redistribution of land, was essential in order to achieve higher incomes and to reduce unemployment. Agrarian reform was also important in stemming the exodus to urban areas and in raising food production. However, as the Government member of India pointed out, successful implementation required both administrative abilities of a high order and political will. It was also imperative that agrarian reform include such other measures as the provision of an adequate infrastructure and technical assistance to small-scale farmers. The Government member of Chile expressed the view that land reform would lower agricultural productivity and adversely affect the national economy. Referring to centrally planned economies, several speakers pointed to the successful experience of developing agricultural and non-agricultural co-operatives in rural areas and the linkages between them. The Government member of China described his Government's policy of promoting rural township enterprises and observed their positive impact on rural non-farm employment.

22. There was widespread agreement that greater attention to improving women's employment and social status was required. Overall development strategies needed to incorporate women's activities, and appropriate policies and special schemes to support women workers should be designed. It was also stated that rural women's enhanced access to technical advice and credit would strengthen their contribution to rural development.

23. A large number of speakers stressed the crucial role of technology in raising agricultural and non-farm output and labour productivity, and consequently, incomes and standards of living in rural areas. For agriculture, biotechnologies should be given more prominence, and reference was also made to the importance of high-yield seed varieties, farm equipment and the transfer of technology from the developed to developing countries. In general, a need was seen for better dissemination of more appropriate technologies, adapted to the diverse local realities.

24. In referring to the non-farm sector, many members of the Committee asserted that this sector should be assigned a key role in rural employment policy. The declining share of agriculture in total production, together with the diminishing prospects of sufficient employment creation in urban areas, underscored the role of non-farm activities, including rural industries, in absorbing the rapidly growing labour force in rural areas. Committee members suggested various approaches to increasing employment in this sector. The need to diversify the rural economy, by developing the services and commerce sectors among others, was stressed. The view was also presented that non-farm employment should be expanded through small and medium-sized enterprises. Forestry, construction and agro-industry were identified by several Committee members as activities with good potential for further development. The Government member of Senegal said that, as a general policy, non-farm activities should be geared to available rural markets and be designed so as to support agriculture. The use of local resources also was regarded as important by many members. One Committee member felt, however, that the non-farm sector's potential to absorb surplus labour should not be overestimated.

25. In view of the need to increase food production in developing countries, a number of Committee members urged the adoption of measures to achieve self-sufficiency in food. Food security should be a key objective in policy-making. The availability of credit, in particular, was considered an important constraint and several speakers emphasised the need to improve access to credit for small-scale producers. This could be achieved by extending banking facilities in rural areas and by introducing simplified procedures for obtaining credit. Other members made the point that credit policies should be accompanied by measures to provide agricultural inputs, such as improved seeds, and extension services. Efforts to achieve self-sufficiency in food were sometimes made more complicated, as the Government member of the Congo pointed out, because people had developed distorted food consumption habits favouring imported foodstuffs, such as bread, in place of local food products.

26. Many members referred to the multiple functions of infrastructure investment in facilitating the integrated development of rural areas. Irrigation was in many cases a priority for raising agricultural output and reducing its variability. Rural roads and telecommunications improved the environment for industrial investment and the provision of services. Moreover, rural public works projects made a direct contribution to labour absorption and poverty alleviation, even if only temporarily. Where they succeeded in reaching target groups while creating durable assets of value to those groups, the income gains could be more long-lasting.

27. Issues surrounding population policy were raised by several members. Along with education and improving the availability of family planning information, priority had to be given to maternal and child health. Also, in the view of one member, it was important to integrate demographic policies into national economic planning.

28. A number of members drew attention to the need to raise the level of human resources and, in particular, to the importance of improved training for workers in rural areas. A trained labour force was linked to creating jobs and reducing rural unemployment. Several speakers urged that training and training curricula be adapted to meet the skill requirements of the rural sector and the training needs of those working or seeking work in various fields of farm and non-farm activity. The Government member of Egypt stressed the importance of establishing vocational training centres throughout the country, with courses adapted to the labour market requirements of each region. The Government member of Swaziland called for more emphasis to be given to blue-collar over white-collar training.

29. The key role of workers' organisations was stressed by a number of speakers. There was an underlying human focus to the discussion of rural employment promotion and rural development, and people's participation was fundamental. Co-operative forms of organisation were beneficial because they could strengthen bargaining power and incomes through economies of scale. In the rural context, Convention No. 141 and Recommendation No. 149 were particularly pertinent in the view of several members.

30. It should be mentioned that, while not reproduced in this summary of the general discussion, the country-specific information offered by many members provided an invaluable exchange of experiences among developed and developing countries.

31. Many members expressed views on the role that the ILO should play in the promotion of rural employment and on the emphasis to be given to particular means of action. Several speakers maintained that no new standards were needed in this area. Rather, the emphasis should be placed on the ratification and implementation of existing standards. The Workers' Vice-Chairman urged ratification of Convention No. 141 and requested up-to-date information on how ratification was proceeding. Some members pointed to areas where the ILO should conduct further research or strengthen data collection and the dissemination of information.

32. Several members attached considerable importance to technical co-operation. They urged the ILO to give more emphasis to technical co-operation and technical advisory services aimed at tackling basic rural problems and assisting in the design of policies. The Government member of India felt that the ILO should develop and encourage packages of inter-related projects rather than concentrate on isolated micro-projects, while the Government member of the United States maintained that the ILO should not undertake massive projects but instead supply critical missing ingredients which constrained development and could be efficiently and effectively provided. Evaluation of the effectiveness of ILO technical co-operation activities in the rural field was also discussed. Evaluation could help determine future directions of technical co-operation. The Government member to the Congo called, in particular, for the ILO to conduct evaluation studies with a view to measuring a project's degree of success or failure, thereby helping other countries to avoid the traps or overcome the difficulties encountered elsewhere.

33. In view of the complex and difficult nature of the rural development process, a number of members stressed the need for the ILO to co-operate closely with other international organisations. Many United Nations specialised agencies and other international and regional bodies were identified, with several members drawing attention in particular to the important role played by the UNDP and the FAO.

Developed countries

34. The Employers' Vice-Chairman stated that his group felt that the report submitted by the Office offered many important and enlightening concepts, but that the aim of the Committee should be to come up with suggestions that went beyond the report and the conclusions of earlier conference discussions on rural employment. The Employers' members wanted viable recommendations and enriched criteria that would promote rural modernisation and employment and achieve progress over the next ten years. Conclusions should be drawn solely from what came out of this tripartite meeting.

35. The Employers' Vice-Chairman then went on to outline the proposals of the Employers' group. Governments, employers' and workers' organisations should jointly assess development potential in rural areas of all countries in the spheres of agriculture, livestock, fisheries and forestry and the ILO should collect up-to-date statistics at least initially for developed countries. Small- and medium-sized enterprises, on which a resolution and set of conclusions had been adopted at the 72nd Session (1986) of the International Labour Conference, were the best instrument for generating jobs in rural areas and reducing migration. This called for fiscal and credit policies as well as technological information to enable and encourage some of the rural population to become employers. The establishment of agro-industries in the most needy rural areas should be stimulated through incentives, including social incentives, which could create jobs and increase the tax base. The Employers' Vice-Chairman also urged the strengthening of employers' and producers' organisations and stressed that special efforts should be undertaken to incorporate small-scale entrepreneurs. There was a need for stepped-up research, especially with respect to the biotechnological revolution, and for intensified vocational training for people in rural areas through the setting up of training institutes by government or employers' or workers' organisations. Market opportunities should be more readily available in rural areas; markets should be more transparent and prices more appropriate. He then went on to state that the developed countries should liberalise their international trade – but gradually, not abruptly – in order to facilitate trade in agricultural and agro-industrial products. Moreover, with the support of workers' and employers' organisations, governments should develop infrastructure projects that made efficient use of resources in order to promote rural development, perhaps including projects for tourist centres. He also urged that the developed countries, in their relations with developing countries, show more fairness, in particular with respect to the purchase of raw materials from developing countries, the sale of food surpluses, technical co-operation as well as external investment to promote industries and rural employment in developing countries. The Employers' members also wished to recommend that the mechanisms in all countries for promoting and protecting agriculture, agro-industry, livestock and animal husbandry be applied flexibly so as to strengthen international trade and competitiveness. Furthermore, industrialised countries should undertake social and structural measures supportive of rural production and employment, such as early retirement and projects for ecology and reforestation. Finally, technical co-operation, on which there had been an extensive discussion at the 73rd (1987) Session of the International Labour Conference, should be harnessed by developed countries to help generate rural employment in developing countries.

36. The Workers' Vice-Chairman began by underscoring some of the proposals made by the Employers' group that the Workers' group welcomed and could support. He cited the development of infrastructure and the placing of amenities in rural areas, vocational training, the promotion of biotechnologies, and the involvement of employers' and workers' organisations in future activities, including agro-based industries. The research capacity of the developing countries, especially in biotechnology, should be developed. But there were many other issues of concern to the Workers' group. He cited the rural-urban gap, which did not encourage young people to remain in the rural sector, the mass under-employment of female and part-time workers and the need to ensure that contract labourers were not exploited. He urged the fuller utilisation of seasonal and part-time workers while providing them with decent wages and social conditions. Importance was also attached to paying increased attention to working conditions associated with the use of new technologies by multinationals. The health, safety and trade union rights of workers should be protected. Turning to price policies and tariff protection, the Workers' members recognised that it was necessary to remove restrictions in order to ensure greater rural employment: an interdependent world required free trade and access by developing countries to the markets of developed countries. Where workers faced displacement, they should be assured of adequate alternative employment and social security benefits. Retraining and manpower reconversion measures were especially important. The Workers' Vice-Chairman then raised the need to train women and young people for future employment, and to reduce working hours through collective bargaining efforts. Finally, he welcomed the recent agrarian policies that had been introduced in some developed countries, such as Spain, as well as efforts within centrally-planned economy countries to improve the life of workers and give them more autonomy in decision-making.

37. The Employers' Vice-Chairman, referring to the Workers' Vice-Chairman's comment on multinational enterprises, pointed out that when the ILO had studied the situation of multinational enterprises and the employment conditions they offered, it had found that wages and working conditions and safety and health were equal to or better than those offered by national enterprises.

38. It was pointed out that rural employment problems differed between countries and regions. Several Government members referred to the changing nature of rural employment in industrialised centrally planned economy countries; although these did not share the unemployment problems referred to by several members of industrialised market-economy countries, they nevertheless faced problems concerning rural employment and the rational and effective use of human resources. There were imbalances, for example, in location and in the age structure. While total rural employment had fallen over the past 20 years in most countries of the region, there had been an increase in the share of non-farm activities in rural employment, with the expansion of complementary industrial and service sector activity. This trend had generally been accompanied by higher education and skill levels in the rural population and a reduction in the income gap between rural and urban areas. Furthermore, insurance or social security protection, such as health care, maternity protection and pensions, had been extended to rural workers, so that they had coverage similar to that of urban workers. A striking and alarming characteristic of the rural labour force was its older age structure compared to that of the overall population. Several speakers stressed that there was a need to make rural employment more attractive to youth and to adopt other measures that would help to redress the age imbalance.

39. There was a diversity of institutional forms in agriculture both within and between industrialised centrally planned economy countries. The Government member of the USSR commented on the problems of state and collective farms and on his Government's policy for the promotion of co-operatives under recent legislation. Although not yet of major significance, these co-operatives were expected to play an important role in the modernisation of rural areas, in agro-industries, technical services, and service industries as well as in agriculture. The new legislation also facilitated closer relations between co-operatives and state enterprises. The co-operative movement was also expected to help solve some social problems, by providing additional employment in areas where there was surplus labour overall of seasonally, by raising family incomes, and by incorporating activities for pensioners, handicapped persons, housewives and youth. The Government member of the German Democratic Republic pointed out that agricultural co-operatives already included most of the rural population in his country, and that the agricultural sector played a decisive role in the economy by providing foodstuffs and raw materials for industry. As explained by the Deputy Government member of Poland, on the other hand, three-quarters of the agricultural land in her country was held by individuals, although there also were state and co-operative farms. However, a decline in employment in individual agriculture was expected as a result of increasing land concentration.

40. A number of measures had been taken by governments of industrialised centrally planned economy countries in order to strengthen the rural economy and to make more effective use of labour. Vocational training was emphasised by several speakers. The rural population, already much better educated than in the past, also had higher expectations and sought to apply new technologies, for which specialised training was needed. This would also help to make rural employment more appealing to young people and discourage their migration to the towns and cities. Improvements in infrastructure, often through co-operation between state enterprises and co-operatives, also contributed to greater efficiency in the use of resources and higher incomes in rural areas as non-farm employment opportunities expanded. Closer relations between agricultural and non-agricultural co-operatives or enterprises could contribute to reducing seasonal variations in the need for labour and thus reduce the necessity for seasonal displacement of workers. An innovative means to accomplish this was described by the Government member of the German Democratic Republic. There were agreements between agricultural and industrial co-operatives and enterprises where some coal miners and transport workers provided additional labour to the agricultural sector in the summer, and some agricultural workers worked in the coal and transport sectors in the winter. These agreements, which were promoted by the Government, led to a better allocation of labour over the year and thus to higher family incomes. Price reforms had also been instituted in order to intensify agricultural production and increase the supply of various inputs, such as farm equipment and other industrial products, while maintaining stable food prices for consumers.

41. Several members commended the Office for the report's analysis of rural employment problems in industrialised market economies, although one Government member felt that the report should have paid attention to the psychological impact of unemployment and policies to deal with this problem. The level of rural unemployment had risen in many countries. Members generally felt that increased efforts were needed to provide a solution. It was stressed, however, that uniform models for policy design did not exist and that research and action should be country-specific.

42. Regional imbalances and the regional concentration of rural unemployment, obscured by national averages, were of great concern to a number of industrialised market-economy countries. A long-term trend of declining rural employment had accompanied higher agricultural productivity and the industrialisation of agriculture. A number of examples were given of government assistance to deprived rural areas. The Government member of Spain also referred to the European Employment Fund as a source of support. In addition, there were targeted credit and rural vocational training programmes in several countries, and enlarged social security schemes and strengthened infrastructure were also important. The decentralisation of universities and colleges, as had been carried out in Finland, could make a significant contribution to the creation of enterprises and employment in rural areas.

43. The Government member of Australia cited how a programme of traineeships in non-trade occupations, including agriculture and horticulture, served as a useful complement to apprenticeships in providing structured training to young people. In addition, he stressed the importance of local initiatives through which communities could generate their own employment based on their own priorities, with government playing only a supportive role. The Government member of Finland expanded on this subject, pointing out that local employers, trade unions or others could create small enterprises and engage in self-employment or other income-generating activities, which were especially needed in more remote rural areas. He also referred to the studies of local initiatives in the OECD which illuminated the reinforcing effects of various policies including local banks, government training centres and larger enterprises. The OECD had just decided to take up the question of how its experience could be of help to developing countries.

44. The Government member of the United States stressed the fundamental importance to the developed countries of maintaining a dynamic free market environment conducive to broad-based, non-inflationary and sustained economic growth in order to promote full employment. He also urged developed countries to seek to provide more open markets for the exports of developing countries. He felt that increased financial flows, industrial co-operation, technology transfer and training were at the heart of developed country assistance to rural employment promotion. Moreover, there was a need for adjustment in developed countries to improve efficiency, and he referred to the recognition given by the Governing Body Committee on Employment to the question of structural adjustment. Reform should include agricultural trade policies and there should be a concerted and progressive reduction of agricultural support. The Government member of the United Kingdom supported the view that international trade should be liberalised and that agricultural support should be reduced. The Government member of Switzerland recognised the concern of developing countries over agricultural surpluses but he pointed to the right of each country to determine its appropriate volume of production. He also argued that farm subsidies could be justified in terms of the objective of food self-sufficiency. The Government member of Austria pointed to the contribution that subsidies could make in promoting the development of backward regions, new agro-industries and the production of specific crops.

45. It was also pointed out that the reduction of rural unemployment required the creation of new employment in rural and in urban areas. Finally, Committee members pointed to a number of measures essential for dealing with rural employment problems in developed countries, including the promotion of small-scale enterprises, the strengthening of linkages between agriculture and other sectors, the adoption of macro-economic policies that could be favourable to the establishment of agro-industries, and the provision of social amenities, especially for rural women. Special mention was made of the Council of Europe's campaign for rural Europe, introduced in 1987.

Developing countries

46. The Workers' Vice-Chairman stressed that his group could not be satisfied with merely restating the facts of grim poverty, mass unemployment and unmet basic needs, or the lack of social and economic and women's development. The Workers' group wished to see proposals for concrete action. At the international level, market access for the exports of developing countries was called for, in line with the international division of labour and interdependence. But even all the needed changes at the international level, in commodity prices, exchange rates, interest rates and debt, would not automatically benefit the rural areas of developing countries. There were essential steps to be taken at the national level. Governments should make a political commitment to improving the lot of the rural poor and making their policies more favourable to rural areas, rather than focusing their attention exclusively on urban centres, which attracted the young away from rural areas. Investment in sound and effective rural infrastructure could contribute to a better rural-urban balance. He also stressed a number of points which had come up in the general discussion, including the access of the rural population to education, training, health care, and the need to focus special attention on women, youth and the handicapped. Concerning the institutional framework, the role of workers' organisations and their participation were fundamental to avoid confining rural development to the elites. The ratification of Convention No. 141 was urgent. Workers' members could also in principle support rural producers' and marketing co-operatives with state assistance, so long as they were voluntary and so long as co-operative legislation provided for equal rights and participation by all. Agrarian reform, with land to the tiller, should continue where landlessness was significant, and tenants' rights should be adequately protected by the State. Technology could play a very important role; resources for its transfer from developed to developing countries could come from reduced expenditure on armaments. One should consider, however, the possibly negative safety and health effects of introducing new technologies. In applying biotechnologies there was a need to avoid displacing labour. A special focus on women was needed, in terms of education, training, access to land and to decision-making. In particular, legislation should protect the wages and working conditions of home-based workers. Family planning could be promoted through improved health care, including extension services and traditional birth attendants, so that infant mortality would decline. Rural industrialisation was also a priority, including food processing and agro-industries, with related skills development. The State should improve marketing facilities and promote the introduction of high-yield varieties of seed. Efforts were needed to develop handicrafts, using local materials. And there was some scope for tourism development in rural areas. More government resources should be devoted to research on conditions at the grassroots level, about which there was too much conjecture. No one could deny the importance of productivity, but the benefits should be widely shared, including among workers and consumers. There should be a balance between policies for economic growth and income distribution.

47. The President of the Pan-African Federation of Agricultural Trade Unions suggested that there had been insufficient efforts to follow up on ILO work over the past 40 years. In his view, trade unions not only had a role in preserving workers' rights, but they should also initiate projects that promoted employment, including education and training. For example, the Egyptian Trade Union Federation had initiated, in co-operation with the Government, an integrated agricultural project under which land was allocated, and loans and training provided to workers. A pilot model village had been able to achieve self-sufficiency in food and in some manufactures. He also referred to a recent conference on agriculture and rural development which called for the setting up of an agricultural development fund. He then proposed a flexible strategy that, taking account of inter-country differences, would promote agrarian reform, agro-industries, skill advancement and opportunities for women.

48. On behalf of the Employers' group, the Employers' Vice-Chairman, noting that there seemed to be considerable convergence of views in the Committee, outlined a strategy for the modernisation of rural areas. In the first place, governments, in co-operation with employers' and workers' organisations, should formulate national strategies where rural employment promotion was incorporated into an overall, integrated strategy of economic, social and political objectives and the respect of human rights. Concerning agrarian reform, the land was a limited resource, and its redistribution could delay progress and even lead to a breakdown in agricultural production and to poverty, and thus to the exodus of rural youth. In the case of Mexico, in spite of the best of intentions, the reform had been a major failure, placing a heavy burden on the agricultural economy. Land had been divided up into tiny, unproductive holdings, such that peasants could not even meet their basic needs. In all cases, it was essential to combine rural employment promotion with other factors in order to improve the land's productivity. Creating jobs always required investment. Given debt burdens and trade deficits, it was not possible for developing countries to depend on external finance for job creation. A dynamic process of wealth creation had to be initiated, making investment in rural areas attractive – in industry and services, as well as in agriculture and livestock. Investment required the provision of legal protection of private property rights in both land holdings and tenancies. The most appropriate instruments for creating productive and stable jobs were small- and medium-sized enterprises. Everyone should have equal rights and opportunities to take up agricultural and non-farm activities, with no economic activity being the exclusive reserve of government or any privileged group. All workers in rural areas should have access to technologies and to social security, with particular attention to the participation of women, youth and the disabled. Co-operatives could be a viable instrument for promoting rural employment among producers and in services, so long as they were autonomous, independent and voluntary. They must not become a political instrument, imposing any one ideology. Rural employment, both in agriculture and in non-farm activities, depended on the dynamism and autonomy of workers', producers' and employers' organisations in rural areas. They should receive the necessary technical support and training to be able to overcome backward rural technologies. Improved export possibilities for the agricultural and agro-industrial products of developing countries could make an important contribution to generating the income needed for investment in job creation in rural areas. For countries suffering from high interest rates and debt burdens, the objective of promoting rural employment could not be separated from that of food self-sufficiency. Governments should prevent monopolies and the excessive centralisation of production, inputs, credit and marketing, and instead pursue decentralisation and flexibility. Rural employment promotion also required substantial investment in infrastructure, including electrification, health and educational facilities and leisure, in order to improve the living conditions in rural areas and to reduce rural-urban disparities. Workers' and employers' organisations should be consulted on these investments.

49. Finally, the Employers' members wished to make some additional points with respect to land reform. It should never be used as a weapon for economic or political purposes, but only to promote general economic development, based on sound economic and technical factors. Any country considering land or agrarian reform should justify it in terms of optimising the use and productivity of land, generating employment and improving rural living standards. Otherwise, a redistribution of productive assets to the poor could reduce productivity and constrain the application of technologies. They adhered to the principle of free enterprise and open markets, where all people had the right to lawful work and to the protection of their property rights. Where land reform was carried out, it required the provision of credit, marketing facilities, technical assistance and training in the use of technologies and in management skills, in order to be successful. If the State resorted to taking private land, it should be justified in terms of rendering idle land productive. Prompt and adequate compensation was essential, as well as the right of recourse to independent judicial authorities in case of disputes. And when agrarian policies involved the opening up of new areas, due attention had to be given to ecological factors. It had to be recognised that most agrarian reforms, even though carried out with the best of intentions, with time became failures in terms of both production and employment creation. In sum, the majority of countries would require overall rural modernisation rather than agrarian reform, except in exceptional cases in certain countries. The Workers' Vice-Chairman, however, argued that land reform had proved successful and had strengthened agricultural production when it was accompanied by the necessary facilities and inputs, including credit and infrastructure.

50. Proceeding from the earlier general discussion of the serious economic and social problems found in the rural sector of developing countries, many Government members reiterated the great importance they attached to improving employment opportunities and living conditions in rural areas. Rural employment promotion was vital and some speakers supported the adoption of rural-based, employment-oriented development strategies. Other members, while agreeing that it was correct to encourage greater emphasis on the rural sector, pointed to the growing urban population and urged that development strategies be comprehensive. Agriculture, industry and commerce all had to be developed.

51. Several Government members returned to the subject of agrarian reform, and a range of views was expressed. The Government member of Chile argued against agrarian reform in situations where there was a lack of skilled labour and infrastructure. The result would be the inefficient use of productive resources, thereby requiring the government to subsidise or take over small landholdings which otherwise would fail. The Government member of Belgium, referring to certain densely populated countries in East Africa (for example, Rwanda and Burundi) where land was scarce and very small holdings proliferated, wondered whether government policies should encourage or discourage land concentration. The problems of excessively small landholdings were referred to by the Government members of Indonesia and Tunisia. Nevertheless, the importance of access to land and other productive assets for achieving equity objectives was stressed by several members (in this context, see paragraph 21).

52. Some members mentioned policies to provide agriculture, and in particular smallholders, with selected seeds, fertilisers, pesticides and irrigation systems as well as credit, new technologies, information and extension services. Another policy concern discussed within the Committee was that of prices. The adjustment of prices of agricultural products, including more favourable prices for producers, drew support from some members. But it was also observed that increased prices, particularly of food items, could reduce the purchasing power of the poor and, in particular, the landless.

53. The crucial role of rural non-farm activities in generating employment and raising incomes of the rural poor was highlighted by many members. A number of members noted the contribution that cottage industries and small- and medium-sized enterprises, including agro-based industries, could make in terms of jobs and output. Moreover, the Government member of Nepal observed that informal rural industries, when organised so as to realise their growth potential, could lay the foundation for the emergence of an industrial tradition as well as the upgrading of skills and the development of managerial capabilities. Many speakers also underscored small rural industries' requirements for credit, technology, markets, training and infrastructure. Some speakers referred to the important role fishing played as a provider of food and jobs and a contributor to the national economy, but also drew attention to fishing's needs for special credits and other forms of assistance.

54. A number of efforts to extend credit to the rural areas, sometimes through the establishment of new types of credit facilities, were brought to the attention of the Committee. An example of the role of a rural savings bank in promoting integrated activities in a participatory manner was given by the Government member of Cape Verde. Easier access to credit was also among the principal measures urged to promote employment in the informal sector. This was an area where inter-sectoral linkages also could be strengthened.

55. As regards the absorption of labour in rural areas, a number of members stressed the importance of labour-intensive activities. Special public works programmes, which could generate employment, create physical assets and improve access to social services, were highlighted. The Government member of Uganda argued that by improving road communication and opening up the rural areas, the level of employment would rise as more and more people were attracted to start rural employment-generating projects. But it was also observed by other speakers that public works programmes alone did not solve poverty or necessarily contribute to economic advancement.

56. While certain of the public work activities mentioned were of an environmental character, such as soil conservation and re-afforestation, a number of speakers from industrialised market-economy countries introduced the larger concern of ensuring that environmental considerations formed part of strategies for rural development and the promotion of rural employment. The distressing consequences of the growing disharmony between human beings and the land were depicted by one member, while another maintained that increased production at the expense of the environment would backfire. In referring to the Brundtland report, the Government member of Norway stated the firm belief that sustainable development and growth depended on improved natural resource management. She urged that the needs of the present generation be addressed without compromising the ability of future generations to meet their own needs.

57. The significant contribution that women made to the rural economy, the adverse conditions in which they worked and lived, and the need to bring them to the forefront of policy formulation for the rural sector were given considerable emphasis by a number of members. Notwithstanding the central role played by women, especially in food production, their work was largely unremunerated and unreported in official statistics. As the Government member of Nepal forcefully stated, women were doubly disadvantaged, first as members of rural poor families and again as women. In spite of their significant contribution to the household and national economies, they continued to languish without assets, in ill health and illiteracy, occupying a subordinate position within both family and society. Women also were overworked. As the Government member of Norway pointed out, policies for rural development must address the problems related to women's total life situation, thereby providing access to land, credit, training, extension services and labour-saving technologies, but also to primary health care, family planning and primary education. Development policies should also address the interrelationship between women's productive and reproductive roles. It was observed that rural industries and non-farm activities in general should be given greater attention as a source of employment for rural women, without restricting them to more traditional activities such as sewing, knitting and handicrafts. The ultimate objective was to integrate women, their needs and interests, in the overall development process and in decision-making.

58. The problems of other target groups, particularly young people, were discussed by a number of members. Youth unemployment was regarded as a particularly serious contemporary challenge and some speakers referred to measures to assist young people; at the same time, many members expressed concern over high rates of rural-urban migration. It was remarked that the outflow of young people deprived the rural areas of an active productive workforce, but it also was observed that with mechanisation and productivity gains, employment opportunities for young people were rapidly declining in rural areas. Moreover, with smallholdings losing their family structure, the presence of young people in the rural areas became less and less viable. A member voiced concern about the ageing of the rural population. With respect to target groups, however, the Government member of Belgium noted the omission in the report prepared by the Office of any mention of the situation of the disabled in rural areas.

59. In view of the connection between rural employment promotion and skill development and upgrading, several Government members from developing countries cited initiatives in the area of rural vocational training and practical technical training. These included a training institute aimed at producing skilled manpower which would gradually replace expatriate workers, and vocational training centres whose graduates also received business management training so that they could become small employers. Other speakers signalled educational needs such as adjusting the rural educational structure and conducting literacy campaigns. Some members remarked on the links between improving the qualifications of the labour force and achieving productivity gains, and one member emphasised the relationship between increases in labour productivity, on the one hand, and improved education and better access to health services and clean water, on the other. Several speakers stressed the importance of family planning and attention to health and safety, including primary health care. It was observed, however, that while a demographic policy was clearly necessary, this would only have an effect in the long term.

60. Several members referred to tripartite arrangements that had been established nationally or in the rural areas of their countries. The importance of involving employers' and workers' organisations as well as the rural population at the grass-roots level in decision-making was emphasised by a number of speakers. The Government member of the Philippines outlined five interlocking pillars of a rural workers' development programme. These included the participation of rural workers in political and economic decision-making, their organisation into self-reliant groups as well as their provision with an economic base and access to productive resources and services. The Government member of China called attention to policies aimed at mobilising to a maximum degree the initiatives of peasants and rural institutions at all levels. Several other members also noted the importance of seeking to maximise the use of local resources as part of an overall rural development strategy. This in turn was related to the undertaking of local initiatives and enhanced participation by the beneficiaries at the local level. Several members also mentioned the role that NGOs were playing or could play in the field of rural development, including assistance and support for rural women. The Government member of the United Republic of Tanzania mentioned that there might also be a need for a different role of departments of labour in employment creation as against their traditional role in labour administration and dispute settlement.

61. A number of members stressed the harm that global recession was causing to developing countries. Their capacity for rural development and the creation of rural employment depended to a considerable extent on more rapid growth in the world economy. The burden of debt was also a major hindrance to the progress of developing countries. The structural adjustment programmes they were carrying out had a particularly severe impact on the poor, as was underlined by the Government member of the Philippines. She called for a greater effort to evaluate the effects of structural adjustment on employment and poverty. Given the negative impact on employment and incomes in the short term, the Government member of Tunisia argued for the setting up of accompanying measures to ease these effects. The Government member of the United Kingdom stated that his Government understood the problem of the impact of structural adjustment on the rural population, and thus was making some additional financial resources available to those developing countries carrying out effective structural adjustment programmes.

62. There was, however, a need for structural adjustment in the developed countries, according to the Government member of Argentina. Developing countries suffered from the distortion in international trade caused by the developed country agricultural surpluses, trade imbalances, protectionism and the instability in international markets, which prevented them from pursuing investment and growth in line with their comparative advantage. He also wondered how developing countries could service their debt if they were deprived of market access. Import barriers and export subsidies in developed countries should be eliminated. More fairness in trade relations was essential. In this context, the Government member of the United Kingdom stated his Government's support for reducing agricultural surpluses and liberalising agricultural trade.

Role of the ILO

63. With respect to the issues pertaining to rural employment promotion, the Committee members made numerous suggestions for ILO action. Both the Employers' and Workers' Vice Chairmen agreed with the rural-focused, employment-oriented development strategy proposed in the report. The Employers' Vice-Chairman, however, wished to ensure that such a strategy gave the necessary emphasis to growth, while the Workers' Vice-Chairman stressed that equity and social development should be part of the proposed strategy.

64. The Government member of Sweden felt that the ILO strategy was clearly growth-oriented and that equity aspects should have been emphasised more. He argued that there was no contradiction between equity-oriented policy and the raising of productivity since, for example, improved education and better access to health services for the poor would lead to higher labour productivity. Also, increased purchasing power of the rural poor was often a pre-condition for growth. He urged that the ILO should not forget its commitment to the cause of equity. On this point, the Government member of Brazil urged the ILO to support member countries in carrying out land reform programmes.

65. Several members felt that the ILO should pay adequate attention to the international dimension of rural poverty. Debt problems, trade restrictions, exchange rate fluctuations, low prices for the exports of developing countries and structural adjustment programmes had all contributed to the worsening of the rural employment situation in developing countries in the 1980s. The Workers' Vice-Chairman suggested that the Office should take account of these problems in its follow-up to the conclusions of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment. Another member suggested that the ILO should provide an alternative view on adjustment policies. The Government member of Congo and the Deputy Government member of Algeria considered that the ILO should promote a more just pattern of North-South trade. Another member questioned, however, whether the ILO was the appropriate forum to discuss such issues as trade liberalisation and agricultural surpluses.

66. Other speakers observed that environmental aspects should also be emphasised in the proposed strategy. One member favoured environmental policies that were labour-intensive, including those involving public works, and suggested that the ILO should encourage these policies. The Government member of Norway, in her reference to the conclusions of the Brundtland report, mentioned that these presented a major challenge to international organisations to ensure the integration of environmental aspects in their development activities. The members of the Committee also commented on the rural emphasis of the ILO's proposed strategy. Several stressed that rural job creation was essential for dealing with the unemployment problem, but that the problem of growing urban unemployment also had to be addressed by any development strategy. With a view to implementing the ILO's proposed strategy in an effective manner, a number of members pointed to the importance of attaching high priority to the non-farm sector which was particularly suited for creating employment for rural women, who should be a key target group of the ILO's work. While agreeing with the ILO's approach for dealing with rural employment problems, some members observed that its action programmes should be country-specific. The Government member of the United States supported the ILO's proposed strategy and called upon the ILO to collaborate closely with the recipient countries in identifying their employment problems. He further stressed the need for implementing the ILO approach within the framework of the Medium-Term Plan 1990-95, stressing that existing budget constraints were severe and that it would be desirable for the Office to concentrate on doing fewer things better.

67. The important role of ILO standard-setting activities in achieving social development in rural areas was fully recognised by the members of the Committee. The Workers' Vice-Chairman proposed that the ILO continue its efforts to promote the ratification of standards and, in particular, of Convention No. 141. He drew attention to the fact that this Convention had been ratified by only a few countries. He also stressed the need for promoting human rights in rural areas through standards. The Employers' Vice-Chairman shared these views and presented specific suggestions for future ILO work on standards. He proposed that the Office prepare a study examining why Convention No. 141 had received only 25 ratifications since its adoption in 1975. He wondered whether the terms of the Convention were realistic or whether member countries had not paid sufficient attention to it. He also proposed that Tenants and Share-croppers Recommendation, 1968 (No. 132) be upgraded to a Convention. He felt that this would be justified given the importance of providing secure land tenure rights. Several Government members questioned the need for new standards. The Government member of the United States thought that new legal instruments were not needed and that ILO action should focus on updating existing Conventions and promoting their ratification and implementation. Other Government members supported this view, although the Government member of Switzerland noted that the possibility of new Conventions should not be dismissed at the outset and that the Committee, in discussing the report, might want to submit specific suggestions.

68. Many members commented on the role of the ILO in carrying out and disseminating research, technical advisory services and data gathering. The Employers' Vice-Chairman began by saying that the ILO should increase the dissemination of technical information on the subjects covered by its mandate. He also stated that the ILO should distribute more statistical information. Annual statistics should be updated and published each year. Several Government members supported this call for improved data collection and dissemination. Recognising the ILO's role of providing data on social development, the Government member of Norway stressed the need for data that were country and gender-specific. The Government member of Iraq also underlined the importance of influencing public opinion on employment matters and felt that the ILO could make an important contribution in this area. A number of research topics were suggested by members. As regards the ILO's proposed rural-focused, employment-oriented strategy, the Government member of India called for studies to examine how rural demand for non-farm products could be stimulated. The Workers' Vice-Chairman called for concrete research to identify appropriate measures for reducing the rural-urban income gap. A Workers' member said that ILO research on the African crisis should continue and that it should stress the development of appropriate development strategies and the role of prices. A number of speakers called upon the ILO to examine the social impact of structural adjustment policies, and how rural poverty was affected by conditions on international markets, debt problems and exchange rate fluctuations. The Government member of the Philippines suggested that the ILO should monitor the impact of policies and programmes designed to reduce rural unemployment.

69. Several Committee members stressed the importance of ILO research in the design of technical co-operation. Research should feed back into the formulation of technical co-operation activities, according to the Government member of the United Kingdom; the Government member of Ethiopia drew attention to research to assist countries in developing proper strategies for employment growth. The Government member of Belgium said that if the ILO wanted to act, it should not only evaluate past actions but also anticipate future developments. Moreover, as an international organisation, the ILO had the advantage of being particularly well placed to do comparative research in different parts of the world. He also added that his Government attached much importance to ILO research because it concerned employment issues which were highly relevant to its development co-operation programme.

70. The Workers' Vice-Chairman called for increased technical advisory services to assist governments and tripartite organisations in promoting employment creation, productivity, technology, basic needs satisfaction and infrastructure. The need for effective technical advisory services was also stressed by several members. The Government member of the Netherlands considered that the ILO's policy advisory role complemented the work of other international organisations. The Government member of the United Republic of Tanzania expressed great appreciation for ILO advisory missions which had made an important contribution to government planning.

71. Many members of the Committee felt that the ILO could make an important contribution to reducing rural unemployment and underemployment in developing countries, and they considered technical co-operation to be a very important means of ILO action. The Workers' Vice-Chairman identified a number of priority areas for ILO programmes. He particularly mentioned projects for workers' education, co-operative development and other means of strengthening rural workers' organisations. Projects concerned with basic needs, skills development, technology, safety and health, were also a priority. He further referred to employment creation schemes, anti-poverty programmes and projects for raising women's welfare. To the extent possible, projects should be multi-purpose. The Employers' Vice-Chairman was also of the view that technical co-operation projects could upgrade the social condition of the rural population and improve the rural infrastructure. Like several subsequent speakers, he stressed, in particular, the importance of economic growth and training projects for employment creation. Technical co-operation to assist member countries in dealing with the socio-economic impact of structural adjustment policies was proposed by the Government member of Tunisia. Technical co-operation, the Government member of Czechoslovakia felt, played a vital role in reaching those who had not benefited from mainstream growth.

72. The Government member of India suggested that technical co-operation should take the form of a package of interrelated rather than isolated projects. Several other Government members endorsed this view and agreed with the Workers' Vice-Chairman that projects should be multi-purpose and reflect an integrated rural development approach incorporating basic needs, skills development, technology and other elements. One member suggested that the ILO should develop models for technical co-operation in developing countries. The Government member of Australia, however, suggested that development packages would only be appropriate when countries had similar problems and were at a comparable stage of development; otherwise, projects would have to be country-specific. Others also considered that country-specific conditions should be emphasised in project design which, according to one member, should focus on critical missing ingredients in rural employment growth. The need for data banks for planning and designing technical co-operation was also referred to. A number of the Committee members indicated that it was essential for the ILO to review the impact of its technical co-operation projects. Valuable lessons could be learned by examining both successes and failures. A member felt that the extent to which projects were replicable could thus be determined. Project impact evaluation, as the Government member of the United Kingdom pointed out, was an indispensable guide for future technical co-operation, provided that clearly defined criteria were used in the exercise. These, he added, should include the promotion of enterprises, economic viability, productive employment and effective training, among others. Finally, the Government member of China stated that his Government wished to increase co-operation and exchanges with the ILO.

73. In the discussion many speakers referred to the valuable contribution the ILO could make in improving the social and economic condition of rural women. Members were unanimous in regarding women-oriented activities as essential for promoting social justice and economic development in the rural areas of developing countries. The Workers' Vice-Chairman urged the ILO to give high priority to activities for improving the condition of rural women as well as that of young persons, and recommended that they should be key target groups for technical co-operation programmes. Home-based workers should be given special attention. The Employers' Vice-Chairman encouraged the ILO to step up its promotion of human rights-related Conventions. The Government member of Norway considered that the ILO had an important task in promoting women's access to and control of productive resources and over the returns on their own labour. Expressing her agreement with the Government member of Nepal, she argued against welfare-oriented projects for rural women and in favour of projects that created economically viable employment opportunities for them. In addition, she stressed the very important role the ILO had to play in promoting the organisation of rural women so as to increase their participation in political life. She generally supported an integrated approach to rural development rather than micro projects, but in certain socio-economic or cultural situations there was a need for women-specific projects, without losing sight of their role in the overall development strategy. She also argued that ILO resources should be earmarked for women's projects. The Government member of Sweden also emphasised that agricultural growth often took place at the expense of female employment, and he suggested that the ILO should place the promotion of female employment high on its agenda of future research and technical co-operation.

74. The Committee discussed the role of the ILO in promoting strong and viable rural workers' organisations, which were crucial in fostering social and economic development that was fully shared by workers. The Workers' Vice-Chairman called upon the ILO to continue its workers' education programme which, he stressed, had provided essential and vital support to workers' organisations in many countries. He further mentioned that technical co-operation projects should, to the extent possible, include activities to strengthen rural workers' organisations and emphasise the potential contribution these could make to rural development. The Employers' Vice-Chairman also expressed the view that rural workers' and employers' organisations had a vital role to play in promoting social justice and he stressed the importance of ILO action in this area.

75. A number of Committee members commented on the ILO's role in promoting small-scale and medium-scale enterprises for rural development. This role, according to both the Employers' and Workers' Vice-Chairman, should concentrate on providing training for technical and managerial skills. In addition, the Employers were of the view that ILO action in this area should take account of the resolution and conclusion on the promotion of small- and medium-sized enterprises adopted by the Conference at its Seventy-Second Session (1986).

76. Many members of the Committee commented on the need for ILO efforts to promote rural employment and development by providing appropriate training programmes. The Employers' Vice-Chairman favoured general and specialised training schemes in rural areas. The Workers' Vice-Chairman stressed the importance of human resources development and he stated that ILO training programmes should be, to the extent possible, multi-purpose. The Government member of the United States noted that enhanced rural training programmes were an essential requirement for successful rural employment promotion and that the ILO had an important role to play in this connection. In this context, he referred to general education, literacy and technical skills training programmes. Training programmes must be continuously adapted, he added, to the rapidly changing structure in developing countries.

77. With a view to promoting the use of viable and appropriate technologies in rural areas, the Committee suggested that the ILO continue its on-going efforts in this area. The Workers' Vice-Chairman made the point that technical co-operation projects should include the promotion of appropriate new technology. He also maintained that the ILO should carry out research on the socio-economic impact of biotechnologies and that the FAO and UNDP should be involved in this work. The Government member of Ethiopia noted that the ILO had a role to play in designing proper and balanced technology that suited the needs of developing countries. The Government member of India pointed to the useful contribution the ILO could make in publishing information on relevant technologies in the farm and non-farm sector, while the Government member of Senegal stressed the need for the ILO to publish more information on technical improvements in agriculture.

78. As regards public works, the Committee stressed the important contribution of ILO public works projects in promoting equitable development in the developing countries through improved infrastructure and better access to social services. The Workers' and the Employers' Vice-Chairmen both felt that these projects should receive continuing emphasis in the ILO's technical programme and that workers' and employers' organisations alike should be consulted in the selection and design of these projects.

79. Recognising the importance of tripartism in fostering economic and employment growth at the national level, both Vice-Chairmen stressed that workers' and employers' organisations should be regularly consulted in the design and implementation of ILO technical co-operation projects. This view was supported by a Government member. The Workers' Vice-Chairman added that the last full meeting of the Advisory Committee on Rural Development was held in 1983 and that this Committee should hold its meetings more frequently.

80. Finally, Committee members emphasised the need for continued inter-agency collaboration in the field of rural development. The promotion of rural employment was a task that required close collaboration with other specialised agencies, and the Workers' Vice-Chairman called upon the ILO to strengthen these linkages. The Employers' Vice-Chairman added that inter-agency consultations concerned with rural development should have a tripartite representation, and he noted that employers' and workers' organisations were not associated with FAO projects. The Deputy Government member of Algeria also favoured close inter-agency collaboration, while the Government member of India stressed that such collaboration, particularly with the FAO and UNIDO, was also necessary in order to avoid duplication. Inter-agency co-operation involving lending agencies as well as organisations active in the social field, such as UNICEF and WHO, was stressed by the Government member of the Central African Republic. The Government member of the Netherlands stressed the importance that his Government attached to the streamlining and better coherence of operational activities within the United Nations system. He referred to Resolution A/RES/42/196 adopted by the General Assembly in December 1987, recommending that the various organisations belonging to the United Nations system should co-operate more closely, and urging that the central role of the resident co-ordinator at the country level be recognised. He also stressed that there was an urgent need for interconnected, flexible and simplified procedures for the operational activities of the United Nations system in order to respond better to the priorities of the developing countries. The Government member of the United Kingdom stated that it was necessary to respect the distinct mandates of agencies within the United Nations system, as was stated in the Conclusions of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment.

81. At the seventh sitting of the Committee, the Chairman introduced a working document in the form of a resolution and conclusions that were the results of the discussion of the Working Party. There were certain paragraphs or phrases on which the Working Party had been unable to reach agreement, but the document provided what was generally regarded as a sound basis for discussion. The Chairman recommended that the Committee begin by taking up the portion of the working document on which the Working Party had been unable to reach agreement. These had been placed in square brackets.

82. The Workers' Vice-Chairman began by observing that the document fully reflected the discussions of the Committee. The Workers' group, he added, had prepared several amendments that dealt with some of their specific concerns. These included the need to provide adequate infrastructure, to promote rural employment, to strengthen rural workers' and employers' organisations, to promote the ratification of Convention No. 141, among others. The Workers' Vice-Chairman also stressed the need for improving the international environment and drew attention to paragraph 12 (now paragraph 11) of the conclusions dealing with international action. In this context he provided some data on the international situation which pointed to the need for urgent action by the international community, in view of the very acute situation in developing countries which was manifested in massive unemployment, underemployment, poverty, malnutrition and high infant mortality rates. In 1980, some 730 million people, or 34 per cent of the population of developing countries, were estimated to be living in poverty; of those, 340 million, or 16 per cent of the total population, were severely malnourished. As recently as 1983, around 9.3 million children died at birth and the infant mortality rate was 88 per thousand. At present, 500 million people living in rural areas were entirely landless, and 440 million were marginal small farmers, or near landless. Furthermore, the rates of unemployment and underemployment were rising. These conditions had been further compounded owing to the economic difficulties caused by the unfavourable international environment which had prevailed since the early 1980s. The total external debt of developing countries amounted to $992.6 billion in 1985. This represented 194 per cent of their exports, and 45 per cent of their GNP. The debt service amounted to 18.9 per cent of export earnings. He said that given the decline in resources available to these countries due to the debt servicing burden, the fall in commodity prices, rising interest rates and trade barriers, the governments of developing countries should mobilise the political will to deal with these problems.

83. The Employers' Vice-Chairman felt that the document was balanced and serious, although in several places the text was unnecessarily repetitive. It constituted a worthwhile tool that could be used in an effective way by governments. It was not necessary to discuss points which, while difficult, had been agreed on in the Working Party. Rather the Employers' group wanted to focus only on points which it considered indispensable for improving the document. He stressed again that in order to promote employment in rural areas private enterprise was essential for investment, which created jobs and contributed to integrated rural development. The Employers' Vice-Chairman further pointed to the fact that developed countries were producing agricultural surpluses, while many developing countries had failed because they had followed utopian paths which did not take account of the fact that employment creation required making investments.

84. The first instance of a disputed text, in paragraph 6 (now paragraph 5), concerned references to workers' exposure to new hazards arising from the adoption of technological innovations in agriculture. The Employers' Vice-Chairman preferred to delete the clause "but at the same time exposing workers to new hazards", and to include the complete sentence, "it is necessary to ensure that workers are adequately protected against potential chemical and biological hazards"; but he proposed to rephrase it to read, "it is necessary that workers should be adequately protected against potential occupational hazards, chemical and biological hazards deriving from those innovations", in order to avoid implying that new technologies necessarily involved new hazards. The Government member of the United Kingdom suggested inserting "in some cases" in the clause referring to new hazards, and "for example" after the words "potential occupational hazards", which rendered the clause acceptable to the Employers' Vice-Chairman. The Workers' Vice-Chairman agreed to these amendments, but also wished to add, after the reference to new hazards, the words "and risks to employment". The Employers' Vice-Chairman wished to study the proposition of the Workers' Vice-Chairman, who agreed to propose it later as a written amendment. The text was then adopted as amended.

85. The Committee next considered a square bracketed phrase that introduced "and the promotion of enterprises" to paragraph 14(a) (now paragraph 13(a)) containing strategies for labour absorption. Both the Employers' and Workers' Vice-Chairmen agreed to retain this phrase on the condition that the word "new", as suggested by the Employers' Vice-Chairman, was inserted before the word "enterprises". This was accepted.

86. Paragraph 14(k) (now paragraph 13(k)) on the promotion of full participation by employers' and workers' organisations contained the square bracketed phrases "including trade union organisations" and "as well as co-operatives and grass-roots movements". Following agreement by the Employers' and Workers' Vice-Chairmen to delete the second square bracketed phrase, the Government member of Sweden suggested that both square bracketed phrases be dropped and replaced by a reference to the provision in Convention No. 141. Both groups agreed, with the Employers' group then suggesting that the text should read "promoting the full participation of employers' organisations and workers' organisation as defined in Convention No. 141". This wording was accepted by the Committee.

87. Another proposal which was in square brackets, in paragraph 15 (now paragraph 14), concerned giving priority in technical co-operation programmes to those countries which had ratified Convention No.

141. The Workers' Vice-Chairman proposed to reword this passage by replacing the reference to Convention No. 141 by a reference to the respect of trade union rights. The Government member of the USSR argued that it was inappropriate to link in technical co-operation to the ratification of Convention No. 141 since the reasons for its limited ratification had not yet been examined; therefore the whole phrase should be deleted. The Government members of India and Denmark agreed. The Government member of the United Kingdom suggested that linkage to trade union rights was a different issue and should be presented separately as an amendment. The Employers' Vice-Chairman, while agreeing with the reference to respect for trade union rights, considered it perhaps preferable to enlarge the phrase to encompass the respect of human rights, questioning how assistance could be given which did not respect them. The Workers' Vice-Chairman agreed. However, a number of Government members from developing countries objected to linking technical co-operation with respect for human rights, and raised the question of criteria to be applied. The Workers' Vice-Chairman offered an amendment on this point, which read: "In allocating resources to such programmes, every encouragement should be given to promoting human rights, including freedom of association and the right to organise." The Committee agreed.

88. The Committee then turned to paragraph 16 (now paragraph 15), on the ratification and application of relevant ILO standards, which contained three square bracketed phrases. The first of these would have added the words "with a view to its possible upgrading to a Convention" to a sentence pertaining to a possible revision of Recommendation No. 132. The Employers' Vice-Chairman indicated a willingness to withdraw this phrase, and after some discussion this was agreed. There followed a square bracketed sentence that requested "the Governing Body to consider placing on the agenda of an early session of the Conference the question of the control and application of modern agricultural technologies with a view to the adoption of an instrument". The Employers' Vice-Chairman felt that it was not for the Committee to take decisions for the Governing Body nor to anticipate the results of the Conference. He agreed, however, to retain the sentence if the words "control and" before "application" were deleted and the words "with a view to the adoption of an instrument", at the end of the sentence, were dropped. This too, after discussion, was agreed to by the Workers' Vice-Chairman and accepted by the Committee. Another square bracketed sentence in the same paragraph invited the Governing Body also "to place on the agenda of an early session of the Conference an item relating to rural employment promotion with a view to the adoption of an instrument". The Employers' Vice-Chairman believed that this was premature, but the Workers' Vice-Chairman argued that this should be seen as giving guidance to the Governing Body for the future and need not imply its immediate placement on the Conference agenda. Following a further exchange of views among members of the Committee, the Workers' Vice-Chairman agreed to delete the sentence in square brackets.

89. The Committee then proceeded to consider a square bracketed phrase added at the end of paragraph 17 which aimed at allocating more resources to work by the ILO on rural labour and employment. This was supported by the Workers' Vice-Chairman and also accepted by the Employers' Vice-Chairman who suggested, however, that the word "more" be changed to "sufficient". The Workers' Vice-Chairman agreed. The Government member of Côte d'Ivoire asked that the word "work" in the French text be changed to "activities". Some Government members then returned to the text on which the Workers' and Employers' members had agreed, arguing that the Committee, by expressing the view that more resources should be allocated to work on rural labour and employment, was appropriately voicing its conviction that this was a high priority. The Workers' Vice-Chairman pointed out that the Committee was asking the Office to take up various additional activities in the area of rural employment promotion which would require the allocation of adequate resources. The Government members of the United States and the USSR, while not disagreeing, underscored the ILO's difficult financial situation and the heavy responsibility that this placed on the Governing Body. The Government member of the Philippines observed that if the square bracketed phrase were to assign "priority" in the allocation of resources to rural employment, this would reflect the importance of the area, while recognising the financial situation. In this context, some other Government members pointed out that the reference to priority concerned a shift in focus or emphasis in favour of work on rural employment and need not imply an increase in the overall budget. The representative of the Secretary-General then suggested that the phrase "consider giving greater priority in the allocation of resources to activities concerning rural labour and employment" might meet the concerns of the various speakers. The Committee agreed to this wording.

90. The whole of paragraph 18, concerning dialogue between industrialised and developing countries, especially with respect to agricultural trade policies, was in square brackets. There was some disagreement as to the competence of the ILO in this field, and several amendments were suggested. The representative of the Secretary-General proposed a compromise text, which was agreed and which read as follows: "The ILO should, within its sphere of competence, contribute to the promotion of dialogue between industrialised and developing countries. The Conference urges that the contribution of the ILO in this area should be based on the Conclusions of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment".

91. Paragraph 19 on inter-agency collaboration contained a square bracketed sentence stating that the ILO should include tripartite representatives in its delegations and in joint activities with other agencies. Both the Employers' and Workers' groups agreed to this sentence but the Government member of the United Kingdom felt that such representation had substantial budgetary implications and that the ILO could not suggest to other international organisations how to organise their work. He proposed an alternative which was not adopted. The Employers' Vice-Chairman suggested the following text: "In the joint committees of the United Nations system in which the ILO participates, tripartite representatives should, wherever possible, be included in ILO delegations". The Committee agreed.

92. At its eighth sitting, the Committee began to consider the 133 amendments that had been submitted. All amendments were adopted by consensus or withdrawn following a brief discussion or, in a few cases, referred back to the Office for purely drafting changes. However, those cases where there were marked differences of view are reported in the paragraph which follow.

93. The Employers' Vice-Chairman was concerned that the fourth sentence of paragraph 1 implied that only unbalanced development strategies were responsible for insufficient employment growth in developing countries, and thus proposed to delete the second part of the sentence. In line with this concern, the Government member of the United Kingdom proposed that instead the sentence be changed to read as follows: "The problem is particularly acute in developing countries where decades of unbalanced development have contributed to limiting the capacity of the urban and modern sectors of the economy to generate sufficient employment". This change was accepted by the Committee.

94. Paragraph 2 was slightly amended and then adopted. Paragraph 3 was adopted without discussion.

95. There was considerable discussion on paragraph 4, which concerned the extension of social security, retraining and other measures to assist workers in developed countries affected by changes in their countries' agricultural policies to find alternative employment. The Employers' members had submitted an amendment to delete the paragraph; they did not object to the concept but felt that it was adequately reflected elsewhere and was inappropriate in the introductory section. The Workers' Vice-Chairman stressed the importance his group attached to such measures. The Employers' Vice-Chairman then suggested modifications to indicate that the introduction of protection would be progressive and that it would apply to the "rural population" rather than "rural workers". These changes were accepted by the Workers' Vice-Chairman, who also agreed that the text could be moved and inserted as a new clause in paragraph 8 (now paragraph 7(i)). The Committee agreed.

96. The Government members of Bulgaria, the German Democratic Republic and the USSR proposed an amendment which sought to ensure that the formulation of "new development strategies" in paragraph 5 (now paragraph 4) formed part of the general concept of establishing "a new international economic order". The amendment was supported by the Workers' Vice-Chairman. The Government member of the Philippines favoured emphasizing the creation of more favourable conditions at the international as well as at the national level. But the amendment was opposed by the Government members of the United States and the United Kingdom, who respectively felt that the concept was ambiguous and adequately covered earlier in the document. The Employers' Vice-Chairman initially observed that there were other competent international bodies responsible for making proposals on a new international economic order, a term which was ambiguous in the context in which it was being used and had political implications. He subsequently proposed a sub-amendment aimed at reflecting the concerns expressed about factors at the international level. The Government member of the USSR accepted the proposed change which read as follows: "to devise new development strategies at the national and international levels". This paragraph was then adopted by the Committee.

97. The Workers' group introduced an amendment to paragraph 6 (now paragraph 5) to add the words "and risks to employment" to the following sentence "Major technological innovations are now being adopted in agriculture, offering encouraging prospects for raising productivity and increasing incomes but at the same time exposing workers to occupational hazards". The Employers' Vice-Chairman did not support this because he felt that technology could also increase employment. He agreed, however, to support the Workers' members amendment when combined with a proposal by the Government member of the Netherlands to add "and employment" after "raising productivity and increasing incomes". The Workers' Vice-Chairman agreed and the Committee adopted this formulation for the paragraph.

98. Paragraph 7 (now paragraph 6) was adopted without change. Paragraph 8 (now paragraph 7), after a number of amendments were made, including the addition of a new clause (formerly paragraph 4), was adopted.

99. Paragraph 9 (now paragraph 8), concerning the agricultural support and trade policies of industrialised market-economy countries, gave rise to an extended discussion. The Government member of Switzerland was particularly concerned about recognising the need of developed countries for national food security and for policies to discourage a rural exodus, and he proposed amendments to that effect. He felt that more liberal agricultural trade, as proposed in the paragraph, might lead to a greater imbalance and concentration of agricultural production rather than to a more appropriate decentralisation. The Workers' and Employers' Vice-Chairmen were persuaded by the argument and accepted these amendments with slight modifications. However, an amendment to include a reference to allowing market signals to influence the orientation of agricultural production which was proposed by the Government member of the United States, utilising language recently agreed in the OECD, was not sustained. An amendment submitted by the Employers' group introduced the concept of protecting the environment, and was accepted. Following some further discussion and rephrasing, the paragraph was adopted by the Committee.

100. Paragraph 10 (now paragraph 9) was adopted without amendment.

101. The Committee considered an amendment proposed by the Employers' group to delete from the last sentence of paragraph 11(e) (now paragraph 10(e)), the words "consolidation of holdings should be encouraged so as to optimise production" and insert "groupings of holdings or production units should be encouraged so as to optimise production and marketing". The Government member of Brazil proposed several amendments, of which those concerned with the importance of crop diversification and improving smallholders' access to irrigation were adopted, while another emphasising the social function of land, was not supported. Another amendment to delete the entire sentence was proposed by the Government member of the United States, arguing that smallholdings could operate efficiently and make a substantial contribution to total agricultural output. The Employers' Vice-Chairman expressed his preference for the amendment introduced by his group. He further proposed to insert in his amendment after the word "encouraged" the words "without changing the legal title". The Workers' group supported the amendment on the condition that this last addition be deleted and the word "voluntary" be inserted to indicate that smallholders should not be obliged to group their holdings. This was acceptable to the Employers' group and the Committee agreed. After a long discussion and extended debate, with some amendment to its other clauses, paragraph 11 (now paragraph 10) was adopted.

102. Paragraph 12 (now paragraph 11) was adopted without change.

103. Paragraph 13 (now paragraph 12) was adopted after only slight amendment. However, there was considerable discussion on an amendment proposed by the Government member of the United States which concerned the role of the Governing Body Committee on Employment in overseeing ILO work in this area. The Workers' Vice-Chairman stated that the amendment was superfluous, since the Governing Body in any case guided the work of the ILO. He also considered that it was for this Committee to put forth its own views on what the ILO should undertake in this field. Several Government members were also concerned that it would be unbalanced to refer to a particular ILO body in this context and not elsewhere in the conclusions. While not endorsing the amendment, the Employers' Vice-Chairman felt that it was important that the Committee on Employment followed the subject of rural employment promotion on a permanent basis, to ensure a follow-up to the conclusions of the Committee. The Committee agreed to include this point in paragraph 17, referring to the need for the Governing Body Committee on Employment to keep under review the ILO's work on rural employment.

104. The Government members of Somalia and Uganda proposed to add new provisions to paragraph 14(a) (now paragraph 13(a)) in order to include in ILO assistance to member States, studies of the impact of structural adjustment programmes on employment and food security and advice on the feasibility of alternative adjustment programmes, and requesting the ILO to give particular emphasis to Africa. The Workers' Vice-Chairman supported these amendments. The Employers' Vice-Chairman, however, while agreeing with the first two points, felt that it was not correct to single out Africa, and it was agreed to refer only to the least developed countries. The Government member of the Netherlands objected to the ILO offering advice on alternative structural adjustment programmes, as being beyond the competence of the ILO. The representative of the Secretary-General explained that the ILO was being asked to give its views on the employment aspects of alternative programmes, and a rephrasing to that effect was approved.

105. An amendment, which was proposed by the Workers' group to paragraph 14(f) (now paragraph 13(f)) to include a reference to plantation workers, was withdrawn on the understanding that the ILO's attention would be drawn to the importance of including attention to the specific problems of plantation workers in the International Programme for the Improvement of Working Conditions and Environment (PIACT).

106. The Government member of Indonesia proposed to amend paragraph 14(k) (now paragraph 13(k)) to include a reference to women's organisations as well as employers' and workers' organisations. The Employers' and Workers' Vice-Chairman preferred to maintain the traditional reference to employers' and workers' organisations, which covered both men and women. They confirmed their commitment to equality, which was why there was a special clause concerning women. The Government member of the Philippines nevertheless felt that it was regrettable that the two Vice-Chairmen could not agree to expand the tripartite concept which otherwise could be used to limit the participation through organisation of those, especially women, in rural areas who were not members of employers' or workers' organisations. Paragraph 14 (now paragraph 13), after slight amendment to some of its clause, was then adopted.

107. Paragraphs 15 and 16 (now paragraphs 14 and 15) were adopted after slight amendment. Paragraph 17, as amended, was adopted. Paragraph 18 was adopted without change.

108. The Government member of the Netherlands proposed to amend paragraph 19 to include a reference to recognising the central role of the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council in providing overall co-ordination and guidance, and a request to the Conference to urge the Governing Body to report to ECOSOC as stated in resolution A/RES/42/196 of December 1987. The Workers' Vice-Chairman pointed out that there were many other relevant resolutions adopted by the United Nations that would then also have to be mentioned. He also argued that the ILO was not subservient to another body, and reference to co-operation with other organisations of the United Nations system was already included in the conclusions. The Employers' Vice-Chairman also opposed the amendment. The representative of the Secretary-General explained that the ILO did recognise the role of the United Nations General Assembly and the UNDP Governing Council and that the ILO already reported regularly to the relevant United Nations committees and to ECOSOC. He suggested that, given the concern of the Government member of the Netherlands with co-ordination of the ILO's operational activities, reference could appropriately be made to the need to implement the conclusions adopted by the Conference at its 73rd Session (1987) concerning technical co-operation, in which extensive references were made to co-ordination. This was accepted in place of the proposed amendment, and the Committee then adopted paragraph 19.

109. The Workers' members proposed to add a new paragraph, calling on the ILO to initiate consultations between rural workers' organisations with a view to determining steps to be taken to improve the health and safety and employment of rural workers. The Employers' Vice-Chairman suggested a broader formulation, to include contact between the ILO and both employers' and workers' organisations on the issue of employment. The proposed paragraph was amended to include employers' organisations and to delete "rural" before "workers' organisations". It was adopted and placed in the text as paragraph 16.

110. The Resolution was adopted unanimously.

111. At its 13th sitting the Committee adopted its report with some minor amendments to the report and to the conclusions. However, the Government member of Senegal objected to the language in paragraph 10 of the conclusions which, in his view, appeared to compel governments to take certain actions.

112. The Committee submits its report, the resolution and the conclusions to the Conference for consideration.

Resolution concerning rural employment promotion

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,
Having taken note of Report VII on rural employment promotion;

1. Adopts the following conclusions;
2. Invites the Governing Body to request the Director-General:
 - (a) to bring these conclusions to the attention of member States;
 - (b) to take these conclusions into account in preparing the Programme and Budget Proposals for 1990-91 and future biennia, and in preparing or revising future medium-term plans for the Organisation.

Conclusions concerning rural employment promotion

INTRODUCTION

1. Global unemployment and underemployment are the challenge of our time in the present context of growing population and increased urbanisation. Under-utilisation of labour, and the associated problem of poverty, affect many countries at all levels of development. These difficulties have been compounded by an increasingly difficult international environment. The problem is particularly acute in developing countries where decades of unbalanced development have contributed to limiting the capacity of the urban and modern sectors of the economy to generate sufficient employment and economic growth. The debt problem, declining commodity prices, fluctuating exchange rates and protectionism have led to a drastic reduction in export earnings and in the import capacity of developing countries. Faced with this situation, many countries have had to adopt structural adjustment programmes which have affected employment prospects, at least in the short term. In the search for a solution to the employment problem, rural economies of both developed and developing countries will have a major role to play. Economic growth provides the most desirable environment for employment creation and should be accompanied by income growth in particular for the poorest sections of society.

2. Looking ahead, there are challenging tasks to be undertaken. The relationship between agricultural policies of developed countries and the export earnings of, and employment in, developing countries require a more liberal approach to trade in the developed countries. In industrialised market economies an important issue which needs to be confronted relates to the costs and benefits of alternative policy options to deal with agricultural surpluses, protection and food prices. An awareness of problems connected with international trade should be encouraged at all levels within these countries. The results of significant changes in international trade would be complex and would vary between countries and within countries. It can be expected that change would have implications for employment and employment promotion policies in both developed and developing countries.

3. In centrally planned economies the current initiatives towards reform may have far-reaching implications for agricultural productivity and employment. A major issue in this respect relates to the optimum organisational structure and the institutionalisation of the recent reforms. These reforms aim at the expansion of technological innovations with a view to increasing efficiency and labour productivity in agriculture. Such changes would release labour for industry and services and would increase the supply of food for the urban areas.

4. In developing countries the rapid increase of population and the labour force will continue in the foreseeable future. There is sufficient evidence that agriculture alone will not be able to absorb the increase in the labour force, even under the most optimistic scenarios. Major reorientations in social and economic policies will be required to create the appropriate framework for the increase in employment opportunities and incomes of the rural population, who are generally poor, in the agricultural as well as the non-farm economies of developing countries. The lessons of past experience, together with the present difficult international environment, emphasise the need to devise new development strategies at the national and international levels in which the crucial role of the rural sector is fully recognised, and to create more favourable macro-economic conditions for the rural sector. Under the present conditions, in many countries, revival of growth itself requires acceleration of agricultural growth and development of trade linkages between agriculture and industry. There is also an urgent need to increase income growth, to combat mass poverty, unemployment and underemployment in rural areas and to bring about an equitable distribution of the benefits of growth. In pursuing such a strategy, particular attention should be given to closing the rural-urban gap through the creation of appropriate infrastructures, and to the full participation of women.

5. While the challenges of employment are great, taking a forward look points to increased opportunities. There are signs of gradual recovery from the global recession of the early 1980s. Major technological innovations are now being adopted in agriculture, offering encouraging prospects for raising productivity and increasing incomes and employment, but at the same time in some cases exposing workers to new hazards and risks to employment. It is necessary that workers should be adequately protected against potential occupational hazards, for example, chemical and biological hazards deriving from those innovations. There is a growing awareness that efforts at the international level should be directed at protecting the poor, especially the rural poor, against the shocks of negative international developments. All these trends point out the opportunities that exist in facing up to the challenge of global unemployment and underemployment.

NATIONAL ACTION

6. All countries, whatever their level of development, and whatever their economic and social systems, need to give greater attention to the contribution that the development and modernisation of rural areas can make to overall growth, to balanced economic and social development, and to the solution of their employment problems.

7. Countries should ensure that:

- (a) strategies and policies for growth and development lead to a better balance between rural and urban areas, and to a strengthening of the linkages between agriculture and industry. The rural sector, including agriculture, plantations, forestry, animal husbandry, fisheries and non-agricultural enterprises, can make an important contribution to industrial development as a supplier of food and raw materials, as a market for local industrial products and as a provider of investible surplus in rural areas. Small- and medium-sized enterprises should be promoted in accordance with the conclusion adopted by the Conference at its 72nd Session (1986) concerning the promotion of small- and medium-sized enterprises. Appropriate policies regarding prices, credit, taxation, technology, investment and institutional development should be considered, taking into account their social implications. Rural workers' organisations should be promoted in accordance with the Rural Workers' Organisations Convention, 1975 (No. 141);
- (b) adequate opportunities for gainful and productive employment in farm and non-farm activities, particularly for youth, are provided to the inhabitants of rural areas so as to improve the standard of living in these areas, and to stem the exodus of the rural population to the large cities. The special needs of vulnerable and disadvantaged groups such as the handicapped should be accorded appropriate attention. Special consideration should also be given to indigenous and tribal populations;

- (c) policies for overall rural development make adequate provision for hydraulic, electrical, communication and other infrastructural development as well as health, housing, education and cultural services, thus reducing the gap in living conditions between rural and urban areas;
- (d) every effort is made to provide seasonal, part-time, casual and migrant workers and contract labour with adequate social protection and working conditions. Every effort should also be made to create alternative employment opportunities during the rest of the year. In this connection, attention should be given to the ratification and full implementation of the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 96);
- (e) women's central role in rural development is fully recognised and women are given equal access to basic resources, productive assets and property rights. In recognition of women's double work burden related to employment and family responsibilities, measures to provide them with adequate social services and appropriate technologies should be given priority. In parallel, non-traditional productive activities for women should be supported and women's access to decision-making institutions should be facilitated;
- (f) agricultural policies, including pricing policies, are so designed as to increase productivity, ensure sufficient supply of food to all people, and provide adequate incentives and incomes to food producers, particularly in developing countries;
- (g) every encouragement is given to the development of rural non-farm activities (including rural industries and services) which can on the one hand provide locally many of the goods, services, infrastructural facilities and equipment needed for agricultural growth and employment, using local resources and locally produced inputs to the maximum extent possible, and on the other hand provide employment and incomes to a significant section of the rural labour force. In this context, encouragement and assistance needs to be given to the growth of enterprises in rural areas, especially small- and medium-sized ones and co-operatives, ensuring them adequate access to capital, credit, equipment, markets and skills;
- (h) policies for education, vocational training and technical advisory services, available on a continuing basis, and human resource development are so designed as to provide rural populations, including youth, women and children, with the skills and aptitudes required for productive employment, both in the farm and non-farm sectors, in rural areas;
- (i) provision is made for the progressive extension of social security, retraining and other measures to assist the rural population in finding alternative employment opportunities whenever they are affected by changes in the economic environment;
- (j) representative organisations of employers and workers are consulted in the design and implementation of policies, programmes and projects for overall rural development. Encouragement should also be given to local initiatives for employment. In conformity with the Rural Workers' Organisations Convention, 1975 (No. 141) and Recommendation (No. 149), member States should encourage the growth of strong rural workers' organisations, and should take appropriate measures for the ratification and application of those instruments;
- (k) due attention is given to the protection and rehabilitation of the rural environment and particularly to addressing the problems of soil deterioration and erosion, so as to provide the basis for sustainable development and employment growth in rural areas; and
- (l) where rural employment promotion requires the introduction of technological change and innovation, due attention is paid to rural workers' health and safety, including their protection against chemical and biological hazards.

Developed countries

8. In industrialised market economies, important issues include the costs and benefits of alternative policy options aimed at a more liberal trade in agricultural products, a reduction in agricultural surpluses and a diminished production-stimulating support with a view to reducing the budgetary burdens of such support and to further opening up markets for developing countries. In this context consideration should be given to policies designed to: (a) minimise the potentially negative effects, particularly on the poorest regions and the poorest segments of the populations; (b) encourage the development of small and medium-sized enterprises to provide jobs for the farmers and agricultural workers affected; (c) promote the protection and preservation of the rural environment; (d) discourage rural exodus leading to more unemployment in urban areas; and (e) take measures to ensure appropriate food security. Member States should extend social security, training, retraining and other measures to facilitate labour mobility particularly during the transitional phase. Innovative policies in this respect should aim at increasing employment opportunities in the rural areas so as to contribute to a reduction in overall unemployment.

9. The recent developments in centrally planned economies pose a challenge for planners and policy-makers. Attempts at reform and restructuring must give agriculture an important place in future development. These countries in introducing new policy measures for increasing efficiency and labour productivity in agriculture, should focus on: (a) reforms concerning prices, methods of labour remuneration, and organisation of work; (b) the introduction of institutional changes that guarantee greater farm autonomy and decentralisation in decision-making and access to ownership of land in accordance with national legislation; (c) policies to assist workers who may be displaced as a consequence of the reforms; and (d) appropriate support to the creation of small and medium-sized enterprises in rural areas. These countries should also focus on further increasing their imports of agricultural products from developing countries.

Developing countries

10. The acute situation in developing countries, reflected in massive unemployment, underemployment, poverty, malnutrition and high child mortality rates, requires the assignment of a central role to rural employment promotion. This is particularly important in view of the difficult international environment which has prevailed since the early 1980s. Given the decline in resources available to these countries due to the debt servicing burden, the fall in commodity prices, rising interest rates and trade barriers, member States should mobilise the political will to adopt policies and programmes in support of a rural employment-oriented strategy of development, aiming at the alleviation of rural poverty, the creation of income generating activities and the improvement of the socio-economic well-being of rural people. This should include the following elements:

- (a) in defining their national development strategies, particularly in the context of structural adjustment and the need for recovery, member States should give priority to employment promotion, economic growth and modernisation of the rural sector. Structural adjustment programmes should be so designed as to improve the productive potential of undertakings of all types and increase the productive and income-earning capacity of the weakest groups. The rural sector's share in investment and public expenditure, especially in the development of infrastructure and social services, should be commensurate with its relative importance in population and poverty. Furthermore, pricing, subsidy and other macro-policies should be so designed as to provide adequate incentives to rural producers and to develop market linkages between the rural and urban sectors;
- (b) in designing population policy, priority should be accorded to the promotion of family planning based on education complemented by family and child health care measures and basic literacy in rural areas;
- (c) in order to bring about a more balanced spatial distribution of population, and mitigate the impact of excessive urbanisation, member States should give consideration to the development of small and medium-sized towns and the encouragement of small and medium-sized agro-industrial enterprises, including those processing plantation crops;
- (d) member States should design an employment-oriented strategy of rural development that aims at promoting labour absorption in both the farm and non-farm sectors. The non-farm sector must play a key role in this strategy;
- (e) the promotion of labour absorption in agriculture requires designing an integrated set of programmes in support of smallholders aiming at increasing productivity and employment of this important sector. Such programmes should include the adoption of policies which stimulate crop diversification and the diffusion of high-yielding varieties, appropriate farm equipment, biotechnological innovations and the results of agricultural research, paying due attention to the environment as well as to the health and safety of rural workers, including their protection against occupational hazards; the provision

- of adequate credit, extension, training and marketing services; the allocation of public investment to irrigation development, and the adoption of programmes of subsidies and credit to enable smallholders to make fuller use of their land through irrigation. In cases where very small holdings are unproductive or inefficient because of their size, voluntary consolidation of holdings or production units should be encouraged so as to optimise production and marketing;
- (f) the right to a freely chosen employment and to own property should be recognised. In certain situations, agrarian reform involving redistribution of property rights in land in favour of the landless or small producers, would assist the modernisation of agriculture, employment opportunities and equitable rural development. Wherever appropriate, such reforms should be undertaken within the context of an overall rural development strategy, with the objectives of promoting optimum use of land and facilitating the application of appropriate new technologies, and should be carried out through just legal procedures, providing effective and equitable compensation and access to independent judicial process for those adversely affected. Such reforms would need to be accompanied by measures to improve facilities for credit, input supply, marketing, training and extension services. Since in many countries different types of property title coexist, there should be legal security of property and/or tenure;
 - (g) the development of a dynamic non-farm sector (rural and agro-based industries and services) requires: (i) designing innovative policies to provide incentives for the channelling of agricultural resources into value-adding non-farm enterprises; (ii) creating infrastructure and other facilities including credit, training, marketing and technology; (iii) stimulating and respecting various organisational forms of production in conformity with basic human rights; and (iv) implementing complementary policies to support and legitimise the role of the informal sector with access to financing, appropriate technologies and enterprise skills;
 - (h) any direct employment creation programmes that may exist should lead to an increase in the bargaining power of rural workers, and ensure adequate remuneration and, where applicable, social protection through legislation for both men and women. In this context, priority should be given to the ratification and full implementation of the Minimum Wage-Fixing Machinery (Agriculture) Convention, 1951 (No. 99);
 - (i) in designing and implementing rural employment policies, special attention should be paid to enabling women's full participation in the development process. In particular, emphasis should be given to: (i) ensuring their equitable access to training, employment extension services and productive assets including land; (ii) enforcing equality of pay and guaranteeing social protection; (iii) encouraging women's full integration into rural workers' organisations on the basis of a recognition of their particular needs and concerns and ensuring their full participation and influence in rural development processes, including through women's organisations in the service of the community; and (iv) encouraging and promoting women's participation in small and medium-sized enterprises in rural areas;
 - (j) national strategies should take full account of the basic needs of the rural population with a view to closing the gap between urban and rural living standards;
 - (k) the success of rural employment strategies requires full participation by rural workers and employers through their freely chosen organisations in all phases of planning, implementation and evaluation. Within this context, member countries are called upon to increase efforts to step up the ratification and application of ILO instruments concerning the rural sector, especially the Rural Workers' Organisations Convention, 1975 (No. 141), and Recommendation (No. 149), the Plantations Convention, 1958 (No. 110), and the Tenants and Share-croppers Recommendation, 1968 (No. 132);
 - (l) encouragement of rural workers' and employers' organisations to participate more fully in the organisation of services for people's health care; literacy; training; the provision of safe drinking water, electricity, communications and other facilities to the villages; group-based credit programmes for the poor; and the promotion of workers' education for strengthening their active participation in rural workers' organisations;
 - (m) production, marketing, credit and other types of rural co-operatives have a major role to play in promoting employment, development and self-sufficiency. The rural population should have free access, democratic control and independence from any external interference in the creation and functioning of co-operatives. Their development should be encouraged, in conformity with the Co-operatives (Developing Countries) Recommendation, 1966 (No. 127). Efforts should be made to develop training, credit, marketing and other facilities to enable co-operatives to mobilise local resources and increase the access of the rural population to productive resources and services;

- (n) policy-making is often constrained by the lack of relevant data, particularly on rural employment and incomes. Member countries should undertake determined efforts to improve the data base for policy-making particularly by providing information disaggregated by sex and by rural and urban sector separately;
- (o) care should be taken to ensure that all appropriate research data are communicated to the local level so that they can be utilised and their benefits realised; and
- (p) existing programmes should be evaluated and the lessons learned taken into account for application in future programmes.

INTERNATIONAL ACTION

11. Recognising the need to improve the international environment for developing countries, and taking account of the Conclusions adopted by the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment and the special responsibility of the ILO in the United Nations system for labour and social matters including the promotion of full, productive and freely chosen employment and its responsibility to examine and consider economic and financial policies in the light of their impact on employment and social conditions, the Conference calls upon the international community:

- (a) to take the necessary steps for a more liberal international trade, avoiding distortions, together with appropriate protective social policy measures;
- (b) to find a solution to reduce the debt burden of developing countries;
- (c) to facilitate increased flows of capital and aid; and
- (d) to develop mechanisms for the transfer to developing countries of appropriate technological innovation, including biotechnology, and the use of raw materials for industrial processing.

THE ROLE OF THE ILO

12. In view of the impact of macro-economic policies, especially those aiming at economic reform and structural adjustment, on employment and livelihood of the rural population, the Conference urges the ILO to reassess present research on the interlinkages between macro-economic policies and employment and poverty in the rural areas with a view to undertaking innovative, original applied research on these topics. The main objective of this research should be to provide sound advisory services and data to ILO constituents in order to assist them in promoting growth strategies for recovery.

13. The ILO should, within its field of competence, combine research, advisory services and technical co-operation to strengthen its assistance to member States in the following areas:

- (a) the design of strategies aiming at increasing labour absorption in rural areas through the promotion of growth linkages between agriculture and the non-farm rural economy. Such strategies should aim at increasing productivity in both sectors through the adoption of innovative and appropriate technology and the promotion of new enterprises. The ILO's work should include: (i) documenting and disseminating knowledge on the appropriate macro and micro policies for promoting economic growth, labour absorption and productivity in agriculture and the non-farm economy; (ii) studying the methods of strengthening the agriculture/non-agriculture linkages in the rural areas; (iii) the formulation of alternative options for employment promotion policies, particularly for the least developed countries; (iv) studying the impact on rural employment and production of different systems of ownership; (v) documenting and studying the ways of developing rural-urban linkages as well as linkages with the non-traditional export markets; and (vi) studying the impact of structural adjustment programmes on employment and food security. The ILO should advise governments on the employment aspects of alternative adjustment programmes, particularly in the least developed countries;

- (b) the promotion of employment in the rural non-farm economy, this being a crucial element in the promotion of employment in the rural areas in the medium term. Technical co-operation projects in this area should shift away from isolated micro projects into more interrelated projects of a coherent programme. In line with the conclusions adopted by the Conference at its 72nd Session (1986) concerning the promotion of small- and medium-sized enterprises, the ILO should pay special attention to the role that such enterprises can play in rural development. The Conference calls upon the ILO to organise, where appropriate, non-farm employment strategy missions, in co-operation with other agencies, in order to assist governments and employers' and workers' organisations in the promotion of rural non-farm activities;
- (c) the promotion of labour absorption in agriculture in developing countries. Particular emphasis should be given to: (i) designing the appropriate institutional framework for promoting increased agricultural production and employment; (ii) providing assistance to maximise the employment potential of the introduction of improved technologies such as high-yielding varieties, improved farm equipment and bio-technology; (iii) assisting in the establishment of occupational safety and health programmes for agricultural workers; (iv) acting as a "clearing house" for information on successful experiences of increased labour absorption in agriculture and the real living conditions obtained by the workers; and (v) assisting rural workers' and employers' organisations in the formulation of socio-economic programmes;
- (d) the design of an integrated programme in support of smallholders in the rural areas of developing countries with a view to increasing the production of food and the promotion of employment. Such an approach might include: (i) the design of an innovative institutional framework for improving access to credit, particularly for the poor; (ii) the provision of appropriate training, complemented by access to appropriate technical assistance, by introducing innovative and participatory training approaches and methodologies; and (iii) the provision of technology suited to the needs of small farmers, keeping in view their safe working conditions;
- (e) the development of appropriate approaches to, and programmes for, enhancing technical, managerial, organisational, enterprise and other skills for men and women to enable them to participate in and benefit from the process of growth and development in rural areas;
- (f) the development of strategies, within the International Programme for the Improvement of Working Conditions and Environment (PIACT), for improving the living and working conditions of rural workers;
- (g) the documentation and dissemination of information on the causes and dimensions of rural poverty with particular emphasis on the linkages between rural and urban poverty caused by migratory movements. In this respect emphasis should be given to special anti-poverty and direct employment creation programmes targeted at the most disadvantaged groups. These should include special public works programmes, food-for-work programmes and other direct interventions.
- (h) giving priority to activities in support of rural women. Particular emphasis should be given to: (i) continuing research and documentation on the constraints on employment, conditions of work and differential impact of policies on rural women; (ii) direct measures to increase returns to women's labour in agricultural, productive and economically viable employment opportunities; (iii) encouraging the development of social amenities including provision of safe water supply, easy access to fuel and child care facilities; (iv) steps to encourage women's full participation and influence in economic and social development; (v) women's access to decision-making bodies; and (vi) developing productive non-traditional activities for women;
- (i) the design of programmes aimed at documenting and improving the legal, economic and social conditions of home-based workers;
- (j) the design of programmes aimed at documenting and improving the legal, economic and social condition of the informal sector, which is now recognised as an important element of the rural sector both in terms of employment creation and in terms of generation of productive activities;
- (k) the promotion of the full participation of employers' organisations and workers' organisations as defined in the Rural Workers' Organisations Convention, 1975 (No. 141) in designing and implementing rural employment policies. In this respect emphasis should be given to assisting the rural population in the creation and development of their own organisations, to the promotion of legislation protecting rural workers and their organisations, and to workers' education programmes for such organisations; and

- (l) the collection and dissemination of data by sex, region and sector, on rural employment, wages, incomes, and other aspects of development, and the assistance to member States in creating systems to monitor the conditions in rural areas, especially of the poor groups. It should also make greater efforts to disseminate such data and the results of its research on the experience of different countries to a wider audience on a regular basis.

14. The ILO's technical co-operation programmes should aim at the promotion of national self-reliance, respond to the priorities and needs as defined by member States, and be carried out in close consultation with the social partners, including those in the recipient countries. In allocating resources to such programmes, every encouragement should be given to the promotion of human rights, including freedom of association and the right to organise. The ILO should continue and expand its work related to the evaluation and monitoring of the socio-economic impact of technical co-operation projects and ensure the dissemination of the results of its inquiries and the lessons of its experience, both successes and failures. Special attention should be given to the effectiveness of technical co-operation projects.

15. The ILO should vigorously promote and monitor the ratification and application of relevant ILO standards, particularly those related to such basic human rights as freedom of association and the right of organisation of rural workers, non-discrimination and abolition of forced labour as well as of child labour. The ILO should also investigate the reasons for the limited ratification of the Rural Workers' Organisation Convention, 1975 (No. 141) and the Plantations Convention, 1958 (No. 110), and promote a tripartite dialogue on the subject. The Governing Body is requested to place on the agenda of an early session of the Conference the revision of the Tenants and Share-croppers Recommendation, 1968 (No. 132). The Conference also calls upon the Governing Body to consider placing on the agenda of an early session of the Conference the question of the application of modern agricultural technologies.

16. The ILO should initiate consultations between workers' organisations and between employers' organisations as to steps which might be taken to improve health and safety as well as employment of rural workers.

17. In the context of the Medium-Term Plan and the Sectorial Activities Programme, the Conference calls upon the Governing Body to convene the Advisory Committee on Rural Development at more frequent intervals. The Governing Body Committee on Employment should keep under review the ILO's work on rural employment. The Governing Body should also consider giving greater priority in the allocation of resources to activities concerning rural labour and employment.

18. The ILO should, within its sphere of competence, contribute to the promotion of dialogue between industrialised and developing countries. The Conference urges that the contribution of the ILO in this area should be based on the Conclusions of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment.

19. In carrying out its activities, particularly technical co-operation programmes, the ILO should continue and strengthen its co-operation with other organisations of the United Nations system to promote employment-oriented patterns of development in the rural sector, and should implement the conclusion concerning technical co-operation adopted by the Conference at its 73rd Session (1987). In the joint committees of the United Nations system in which the ILO participates, tripartite representatives should, whenever possible, be included in ILO delegations.

Provisional Record

Seventy-fifth Session, Geneva, 1988

Thirty-second sitting

Monday, 20 June 1988, 10.15 a.m.

President: Mr. Beyreuther

RATIFICATION OF THE INSTRUMENT FOR THE AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANISATION, 1986

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – I have the pleasure of announcing that the Director-General of the International Labour Office has registered the ratification by Ghana of the Instrument for the Amendment of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation, 1986. This brings the total number of ratifications and acceptances of the Instrument to 43.

THIRD REPORT OF THE CREDENTIALS COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND NOTING

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – The next item on our agenda is the third report of the Credentials Committee.

I call on Mr. Nakamura, Government delegate, Japan, Chairman of the Credentials Committee, to submit the report.

Mr. Nakamura (Government delegate, Japan; Chairman of the Credentials Committee) – I have the honour to submit to the Conference the third report of the Credentials Committee, which is contained in Provisional Record No. 26.

This report contains the Committee's decisions on the objections to the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Chile, the Workers' delegation of Greece, the Workers' delegation of Nicaragua and the Workers' delegate of the Philippines.

I am pleased to say that the decisions of the Committee recorded in this report were unanimous.

Since it was adopted unanimously, the Conference is required under article 26, paragraph 5(b) of the Standing Orders only to take note of it.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – I invite the Conference to take note of the third report of the Credentials Committee.

(The report is noted.)

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE APPLICATION OF STANDARDS: SUBMISSION AND DISCUSSION

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – The third item on our agenda is the report of the Committee on the Application of Standards.

I would like to ask the officers of the Committee to come up to the rostrum: Mr. El-Assar, Government adviser, Egypt, Chairman; Mr. Wisskirchen, Employers' adviser, Federal Republic of Germany, Employers' Vice-Chairman; Mr. Houthuys, Workers' adviser, Belgium, Workers' Vice-Chairman; and Mr. Elmiger, Government delegate, Switzerland, Reporter.

I now call on Mr. Elmiger, the Reporter, to present the report.

Interpretation from French: Mr. ELMIGER (Government delegate, Switzerland; Reporter of the Committee on the Application of Standards) – I have the honour of presenting to the Conference the report of the Committee on the Application of Standards, which will be found in Provisional Record No. 28. The Committee was established in accordance with article 7 of the Standing Orders of the Conference with a view to examining the third item on its agenda: "Information and reports on the application of Conventions and Recommendations".

As usual, the Committee divided its work into three parts. It began with a general discussion of the questions relating to the application of Conventions and Recommendations and the manner in which the member States are complying with their obligations under the Constitution of the Organisation in regard to its instruments. The Committee then discussed the general survey made by the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, which dealt this year with the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention and Recommendation, 1958 (No. 111). Lastly, it examined a number of individual cases in respect of which the Committee of Experts had made observations in its report, as regards the application of ratified Conventions and compliance with the obligation to supply reports and to submit Conventions and Recommendations to the competent national authorities.

The main questions which were examined during the general discussion in the Committee are indicated in the first part, section B, of the General Report of the Committee, in paragraphs 4 to 63. The report of the Committee of Experts served as a basis for this discussion as well as for the examination of individual cases.

This year the Conference commemorated three anniversaries of particular importance for the ILO: the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the 40th anniversary of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the 30th anniversary sary of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111).

Like the Committee of Experts, the Conference Committee welcomed the fact that the Director-General had devoted his Report to the Conference to human rights, and considered it particularly appropriate that this year the general survey of the Committee of Experts dealt with Convention and Recommendation No. 111.

The Committee recognised the vital contribution which the ILO had made towards the implementation of human rights through its action to define these rights and ensure that they are applied. It declared itself to be convinced that in order to promote human rights the ILO must continue to establish standards adapted to developments in the world and to endeavour to improve the application of the procedures by which it ensures respect for these standards.

The Committee was of the opinion that the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the ILO Conventions dealing with fundamental rights were as relevant as ever today. They should not merely exist as instruments, but must be respected in practice. In this connection, many speakers, echoing the Director-General's Report to the Conference, deplored the gaps which exist between the acceptance of the principles and actual practice, as well as the numerous and at times massive violations of human rights which continued in all parts of the world.

The interdependence and the universality of human rights were emphasised. In this connection, certain members stressed the importance of civil and political freedoms for the respect of economic and social rights, for which the ILO is more particularly responsible. Others emphasised the importance of the right to work without which other human rights are without any foundation. Reference was also made to the effective enjoyment of human rights.

On the occasion of the 40th anniversary of the adoption of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Committee reiterated the particular importance which, just as the Committee of Experts, it attaches to this Convention. An appeal was addressed to the member States to ratify the Convention if they had not yet done so, and to ensure its full application. The considerable impact of Convention No. 87 on national legislation and practice was emphasised and examples of this impact were mentioned.

The Employers' and Workers' members associated themselves with the comments made by the Committee of Experts in paragraph 17 of its general report, to the effect that the restrictions to freedom of association are often the consequence of general limitations of civil liberties and that the fundamental guarantees of civil liberties condition the effective exercise of the principles of freedom of association. They emphasised the importance for social dialogue of the respect of the fundamental principle of Convention No. 87, according to which workers and employers should have the right to establish and join organisations of their own choosing without previous authorisation. The Workers' members regretted that the application of Convention No. 87 continued to come up against serious difficulties in many countries and that the economic crisis which raged throughout the world was at times used as a pretext for anti-trade union repression.

The Committee discussed ratifications and denunciations of Conventions. The slower pace of ratifications aroused concern, and various members were of the opinion that the Office should give the utmost attention to the reasons for this slowdown, on which various views were expressed, and to ways of remedying this situation.

The high number of denunciations of the Conventions of night work for women and the Underground Work (Women) Convention, 1935 (No. 45) (which five countries recently denounced) was the starting point for a discussion on special standards for the protection for women and the future revision of the Night Work (Women) Convention (Revised), 1948 (No. 89). In this year's report, as it had done in 1986 for the Conventions on night work, the Committee of Experts had requested the Governing Body to seek a solution to the growing difficulties encountered in the application of Article 3, paragraph 1, of the White Lead (Painting) Convention, 1921 (No. 13), which prohibits the employment of women in any kind of industrial painting work involving the use of white lead. A summary of these discussions is to be found in paragraphs 24 to 27 and paragraph 82 of the report of the Conference Committee.

As it does every year, the Committee discussed the supervisory system. This discussion is reflected in paragraphs 28 to 40 of its report.

A certain consensus emerged as regards the quality of the report of the Committee of Experts as well as on the considerable, useful and meticulous work it involves. Numerous speakers reiterated their support of the principles of independence, objectivity and impartiality of the Committee of Experts. Members from the socialist countries felt that it was necessary to improve the supervisory system so as to increase the number of ratifications and the participation of governments in supervisory procedures.

They made a number of proposals aimed at giving a more important role to the Conference Committee and facilitating dialogue within this Committee. These proposals, which concern the respective roles of the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee as well as the latter's working methods, are reflected in paragraphs 33 to 35 of the report. The Employers' members, the Workers' members and a certain number of Government members felt that the division of roles between the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee was sufficiently clear and satisfactory and that the present working methods of the Conference Committee should be maintained.

Many speakers expressed concern regarding the statistics on the manner in which governments comply with their obligation to supply reports. These statistics show that a growing number of governments fail to supply the reports due, or supply them only with considerable delay with respect to the dead-line, or fail to provide the information requested. Various practical suggestions were made so as to remedy this situation. They are reflected in paragraphs 40 and 41 of the report.

The discussion also covered the role of employers' and workers' organisations. These organisations are taking an increasingly active part in the supervisory machinery and procedures, as can be seen from the number of cases where recourse was had to the complaint and representation procedures provided for in articles 24 and following of the Constitution of the ILO and to the procedure of the Committee on Freedom of Association, as well as the number of observations received from these organisations by the Committee of Experts regarding the manner which governments comply with their standard-setting obligations.

Again, consensus was reached in favour of strengthening the activities of the Office aimed at helping governments to better comply with their obligations with respect to ILO standards and to promote a better knowledge of ILO standards and supervisory procedures, in view of their positive results. Many speakers emphasised the considerable and growing amount of work which the Office has to carry out.

Several Government members expressed the hope that, in spite of the present budgetary difficulties, sufficient resources, reflecting the fundamental importance of standards and of the supervisory system, would be made available to the department which is responsible.

The Committee expressed its support for the recent initiatives undertaken by the Office to strengthen the links between international labour standards and technical co-operation activities of the ILO, in view of the fact that these two types of action should go hand in hand.

This year again, the Committee gave particular attention to the application of the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), on which the Committee of Experts once again made general comments in a special section of its report. I refer to paragraphs 50 to 58 of the report of the Conference Committee. Many speakers congratulated the Committee of Experts on its observation and on the manner in which it carries out its evaluation of the application of the Convention. The dialogue achieved between the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee concerning these issues was considered to be exemplary.

Emphasis was again laid on the magnitude and seriousness of employment problems, as well as the fact that in the future they will affect not only the developing countries and the developed market economy countries, but also those with a centralised economy, which face economic restructuring and the reform of their system of economic management. The Committee therefore felt that employment should be a major concern of the ILO and that the resources of the Organisation should be mobilised so as to assist all member States in this field. It expressed the conviction that in today's world, full, productive and freely chosen employment is not an outdated concept, but should remain, as provided for in Convention No. 122, a vital objective of the national policy of every country.

The Workers' members and several Government members referred to the conclusions of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment convened by the ILO at the end of 1987, and particularly expressed their support of the conclusions regarding the need for a better co-ordination at international level between economic, financial and monetary policies, and social policies, as well as those concerning the role that the ILO should play in this connection so as to ensure that structural adjustment policies should not run counter to the objectives of our Organisation, in particular to that of full employment. They hoped that these conclusions would be applied. Several speakers invited the Committee of Experts to continue to deal with problems of indebtedness and international trade.

The Committee also gave attention to the irregular forms of employment which are becoming increasingly important in industrialised countries, such as part-time work, temporary work or fixed-term contracts. The discussion on this subject is summarised in paragraphs 56 and 57 of the report.

During the general discussion, the Committee also dealt with the application of the Labour Inspection, Convention, 1947 (No. 81), and on the Labour Inspection (Agriculture), Convention 1969 (No. 129), the application of Conventions dealing with industrial installations at sea, seafarers problems and the submission of certain instruments to the competent authorities in the European Community.

The Committee devoted the second part of the general discussion to the overall study by the Committee of Experts. You will find in paragraphs 64 to 86 of the report a summary of the discussion on this subject. The overall study this year dealt with the question of equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation by examining the application by all member States of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention and Recommendation, 1958 (No. 111). The Committee unanimously recognised the fundamental nature of these instruments which, by enshrining the principle of equality in employment and occupation without discrimination based on race, colour, sex, religion, public opinion, nationality, social origin or any other criteria determined by member States after consultation with their social partners, establish a link between human rights, or rather between the rights of individuals (right to equality) and overall industrial relations. It was therefore particularly welcome that the study on equality in employment and occupation should be presented to the Conference on the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

During the discussion, attention was drawn to the gap between the approval or recognition of the principle and its application or implementation. Without mentioning here all the breaches in application, which must be eliminated without delay, it appeared quite clearly that the achievement of the principle of equality should be part of a permanent and continuous action covering a large number of sectors, starting with training. Training is undoubtedly the key to equality but, to continue this metaphor, once the first door is opened there are other doors and other locks. Legislative measures or regulations prohibiting discrimination are important, but they must be accompanied by positive measures and a programme of education and information on these questions.

Convention No. 111 has been ratified by 109 member States, which makes it one of the most ratified instruments of the ILO. The satisfaction that can be justly felt has to be qualified, however: just under one-third of member States have not yet ratified it. In paragraph 86 of the report which is before you, the Committee proposes that the Conference, when adopting the present report, should make a solemn appeal to all member States to examine the possibility of ratifying this Convention if they have not yet done so and ensure the full implementation of all its provisions.

The largest part of the work of the Committee consisted in examining individual cases of respect for ILO standards on the basis of observations in the report of the Committee of Experts. This task took up 11 meetings of the Committee. The discussion of these cases is summarised in the second part of the report before you. For the discussion of individual cases the Committee continued to apply the methods of work which it has followed up to now.

In selection D of the part entitled "General report", the Committee draws the attention of the Conference to a certain number of findings and conclusions drawn from its examination of individual cases. In paragraph 100 of the report, the Committee welcomes the fact that this year the Committee of Experts was, in paragraph 105 of its report, in a position to refer to a significant increase in the number of cases in which governments had made changes in their legislation and practice following comments made by the supervisory bodies. These results are tangible proof of the effectiveness of the supervisory system and the will of member States to take part in these supervisory procedures. The Committee wished to draw attention very particularly to a number of cases in which difficulties are encountered in complying with the obligation of providing reports and information in accordance with the Constitution. I refer you to paragraphs 90, 94, 95, 97 and 112 of the report. The Committee also draws attention to the special problems related to the application of ratified Conventions and I refer you in this connection to paragraphs 104 and 109 of the report. In paragraph 115 of its report, the Committee notes that certain countries that were not represented at the Conference, or the representatives of which had to leave before the end of the Conference, were unable to take part in the work.

This year, all the governments present at the Conference responded to the invitation extended by the Committee to participate in its work. The Committee welcomed this and thanked the 46 governments which did so. However, the Committee had to delay the discussion of individual cases by one meeting because the government representatives were not ready. On the initiative of the Employers' and Workers' members, it therefore held an informal discussion on the means that could be taken to improve the organisation of its work. It intends to take this matter up again next year.

As it does each year, the Committee discussed important questions related to international labour standards, the supervisory system and the way in which the different States are complying with their obligations in accordance with the Constitution and the Conventions they have ratified. I am happy to inform the Conference that, in spite of the importance of certain questions of principle and the complexity of certain cases that the Committee had to discuss this year, the discussion took place smoothly, in a spirit of mutual understanding and good will.

I would like to thank the Chairman of the Committee, Mr. El Assar, Government adviser of Egypt, who guided our work in a conscientious and objective manner. I would also like to pay tribute to the great experience and spirit of co-operation shown by the Employers' and Workers' Vice-Chairmen, Mr. Wisskirchen and Mr. Houthuys. May I also express my sincere thanks to Mr. Sidibé, as well as to all the members of his team for their efficiency and their devotion.

I recommend to the Conference the adoption of the report that is before us.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – The discussion of the report of the Committee on the Application of Standards is now open.

Interpretation from German: Mr. WISSKIRCHEN (Employers' adviser, Federal Republic of Germany; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on the Application of Standards) – Our Committee is submitting the report before you, as required under article 7 of the Standing Orders. The basic contents of the report have just been presented to you in detail by Mr. Elmiger. I would only like to add a few points from the point of view of the employer.

The starting point and the necessary basis for the work of the Committee of Experts and of our own are the reports from member States, since the duty to report is laid down in the ILO Constitution. There are still many shortcomings in complying with this constitutional duty. I would only like to point to the fact, which concerns us very much, that less than half of the government reports on Conventions for which specific information was requested on practical application have been submitted. In these circumstances the Committee of Experts cannot make a realistic evaluation of the situation. This is why we consider it absolutely necessary that the member States should always report on the law and practice situation, otherwise it is impossible to evaluate the situation.

We know what heavy duties the governments have to deal with. Perhaps the frequency of the report for certain Conventions could be reduced, in which case the International Labour Office, and for the Committee of Experts, would have their task of revision reduced also. As it is, we have only had a selection of 50 to 60 member States to call on for the questions which concern them in the comments made by the Experts.

In the list of governments invited, Nicaragua is missing this year; we consider this regrettable because our Committee decided last year that this case, due to very serious discrepancies in the application of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), would be examined once again this year, and that the Government would be asked to make a full and detailed report to the Committee of Experts.

This report was not submitted by the Nicaraguan Government. The Committee of Experts therefore asked the Government of Nicaragua, in a footnote of its report, to supply all necessary information to the Conference. All member States who are mentioned in such a footnote are invited by the Committee to discuss their case. We consider it unfair that this constant practice of our Committee was not applied to Nicaragua, in view of the fact that over the last year Nicaragua has failed to submit itself to such a dialogue.

This is a serious situation and the acceptance of a mission of inquiry by Nicaragua was not sufficient reason to fail to discuss these questions here at the Conference.

The application of the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), is always considered with great attention by the Committee of Experts and by our Committee. The essential factors for creating additional employment in our opinion are the battle against inflation, reduction in external debt and state action on enterprises. This helps more than job promotion programmes.

In addition, it is important for the competitiveness of enterprises to adjust quickly to structural changes. This vital question for many enterprises and jobs requires a great deal of flexibility and the ILO cannot be excluded from these factors. In this connection, we do not consider it justified that part-time work and short-term contracts should be condemned as being "irregular" work. The fact is that many people, for all sorts of reasons, are looking for this type of work; even for those who are looking for full-time, traditional employment, but cannot find it, part-time employment is better than unemployment.

Generally speaking, we do not think that it is a very daring prognosis to claim that in the future fewer and fewer people will be needed to do the same amount of work in the same time; differentiations will increase and therefore these new working methods should not remain without social protection. The necessary degree and type of protection must be found, which of course can be done best through collective agreements.

A very important item of our general discussion this year was the report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations on the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111). These documents dealt with human rights, as do other instruments referred to here, both of which are now celebrating their 40th anniversary.

The excellent report on Convention No. 111 deserves a lengthier appreciation than I can give here. We would merely wish to repeat that it is a natural tenet of human dignity, in conformity with humanitarian beliefs, that no one should suffer prejudice due to race, creed, sex, political opinion, or national or social origin.

But the report shows that in practice, there is still a great deal to be done everywhere in the world. One problem which our Committee has dealt with concerns protection for women which by definition is not considered discriminatory. For example, together with the Experts we have concluded that the prohibition of night work for women may actually be a disadvantage to women. The growing discrepancy between reality and the fiction of the Convention that these protective measures are not actually discrimination has led to many denunciations of the Convention by member States and to the decision of the Governing Body to place the revision of this Convention on the agenda of the next session of the Conference.

This is only one example, but it shows that protective measures should to be studied in good time, before they prove to be disadvantageous to those who are meant to be protected. The requirement to prohibit night work for all is a flight from reality to illusion.

The prohibition of discriminatory treatment in jobs does not aim to equalise all human beings, but to extend an equal chance to everyone and thus give everybody the possibility of developing. The aim of Convention No. 111 is therefore the freedom and dignity of man.

Our Committee, as usual, has devoted its time to the examination of individual cases. I can only make general reference to the results; they are given in the second part of the report. A few important problems, such as the duty to report and the application of Conventions, are also covered in the first part of the report of the Committee.

We Employers believe that for all the significance of ratification and the supervisory system, practical application of standards is also important. We are therefore pleased with the most recent ratifications, by the United States and Malta, which are a sign of new efforts in the field of ratification.

Generally speaking, this year we have the feeling that there may be wider consensus concerning the fact that we need true dialogue in our Committee, with the duty to submit serious information and reports. Dialogue also requires tolerance, but this does not mean that everything should be accepted without any differentiation. Before the difficult, substantial work of our Conference is solved, the organisation of the work of our Committee must be improved. We consider it unacceptable that one afternoon the Committee could not meet at all because none of the member States were prepared for discussion.

The contents of the report and the reflection of the work of the Committee in the report is based on the excellent work that has been done and all that is due to the goodwill of our Chairman, the solid work of our Reporter and the excellent help provided by Mr. Sidibé and his remarkable staff. Good co-operation in the Committee is based upon a good understanding between the Employers' group and the Workers' group under the excellent leadership of Mr. Houthuys. I would like to express my special gratitude to all the members of my Employers' group and their constant support.

The Employers of the Committee on the Application of Standards recommend the adoption of this report, which they commend to the Conference.

Interpretation from French: Mr. HOUTHUYS (Workers' delegate, Belgium; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations) - The report of the Committee on the Application of Standards was adopted last Friday by the Committee itself, without difficulty and without protest; one could even say, without any fuss. Is that a good or a bad thing? Without wishing to sound complacent or trying to avoid confrontation where it is inevitable, I venture to say that we are able to submit to you a draft report which is positive and constructive.

Our aim cannot be impress or cause a sensation but rather to attain social progress in the member States. In the general discussion, we were aware that the great principles, the fundamental and essential values must underlie any action. How could it be otherwise in the International Labour Organisation, whose banner is the Philadelphia Declaration? How could it be otherwise in the year when we are commemorating the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which inspired the Report of the Director-General and the discussions we had for two weeks in the Plenary? And how could we doubt the sacred foundations of social relations in a year in which we are celebrating the 40th anniversary of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise, Convention (No. 87). We only have to say Convention No. 87 and everyone knows what we are talking about: freedom of association, the true and full freedom which workers have to establish, build up and to direct their movement to defend and promote their interests.

Furthermore, in 1988, we are also celebrating the 30th anniversary of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation), Convention (No. 111) which, from a positive standpoint, calls for equal opportunity in employment and occupation; however, more often than not, it is unfortunately viewed as an instrument to protect against discrimination based on sex, race, religion, colour, social origin, national origin or political opinion. For indeed, workers have had to recognise a painful fact. Speeches and general statements may be fine, agreeable, encouraging and full of hope; but actual situations – and this applies more or less everywhere in the world – are often quite the opposite and extremely discouraging. What a discrepancy between theory and practice, between wishful thinking and real-life situations, and often also between laws and their application.

We must respond to all this in a number of ways. First, through ratification, and in particular through the ratification of key Conventions. Admittedly, two-thirds of the countries have ratified these Conventions; but still one-third of the member States, i.e. some 50 countries, have yet to ratify Convention No. 111, Conventions Nos. 87 and 98, Conventions Nos. 29 and 105, Convention No. 151 and so on. We therefore solemnly appeal to these countries to make a greater effort this year and in the forthcoming years to ratify these Conventions. The past year produced few results. Fortunately, in 1988, we have already had 62 ratifications. We particularly welcome the fact that Malta has now ratified 25 Conventions and that the Iron Curtain, which lasted for 35 years, has now been pulled down by the United States. We congratulate and thank that country. We hope that this country and others continue along the road of ratification; this is the great step that has to be taken towards ratification. However, ratification without a gradual and true application is a lie.

In the case of almost all the Conventions, particularly Convention No. 111 – as is clearly demonstrated in the impressive general survey – there is a need for continuing attention, interest and action and a need for regular adaptation to development and change; and as part of this ongoing and tireless activity, there must, above all else, be the recognition and respect for tripartism. This tripartism presupposes the autonomy of those involved, dialogue and negotiation between employers and workers and between social partners and governments. And in this context, much ground still needs to be covered as regards the ratification and application of the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144). It is really remarkable, and we welcome this fact, that employers' and workers' organisations in many countries appeal to – indeed, dare to appeal to – the ILO could take cognisance of their difficulties, to submit their problems to the Organisation and to make claims and complaints. Each year, a growing number of countries act in this way, thereby testifying to their confidence in the Organisation and, I am sure, helping to make the supervisory system work effectively and ensuring that effective solutions are brought to bear on the shortcomings in law and practice.

We are deeply attached to the supervisory system and the workers must never allow it to be dismantled or truncated. The ILO would be deprived of its substance without the independence, objectivity and impartiality of the Committee of Experts. We should pay tribute to and encourage the Committee. What would we do without the administration of the ILO and, for our part, without the service of standards and freedom of association? We are rightly thankful to Mr. Sidibé and all his skilled and dedicated team. They are not only officials who have to earn their living; they are men and women inspired by the ideal of social progress in the world. It is most regrettable that for budgetary reasons they must be deprived of the necessary equipment and personnel to do their job, which is not solely administrative but also includes direct contacts, missions, assistance in training courses, seminars and other training and assistance activities.

Furthermore, we also pointed out in our discussions this year that the work in co-operation with the Committee of Experts and the Secretariat but that, as a Committee, we are in no way subject to or dependent upon them. It is only in shouldering our own responsibilities that we can carry on with our activities as we should.

Our working methods have been successful because all the countries invited to do so came forward, and we thank them for doing so. We believe that more of an effort needs to be made to improve our methods so that we do not lose half days because certain governments come forward belatedly. We must also avoid the kind of situation where year after year, certain governments do nothing but repeat the same promises without ever carrying them out. We cannot accept either that the discussion on various individual members of the Committee merely becomes a tribunal where accused governments are put in the dock, accused and condemned. But that does not mean that we must not express criticism and note discrepancies between Conventions and actual practice; we shall continue inciting, inviting helping and encouraging countries to make progress. We are very happy to note many cases in which progress has been made this year and many instances of good will and co-operation. Results have been positive rather than negative. Solidarity with the small and the weak has prevailed over egotism and corporatism. But we still note with regret a number of serious and worrying cases. They are reflected in the second part of the report and they may be read in the Conclusions. Observations are sometimes made in special paragraphs because there is an urgent need for action and application of key Conventions. This is particularly true as regards freedom of association in the Central African Republic, where the direct-contacts mission must take place as soon as possible, for the Dominican Republic, as concerns workers on sugar plantations, for Ecuador, where inadmissible restrictions are placed on freedom of association and for Pakistan, where we have long been urging the complete abolition of forced labour. Although it was not possible to draw up a special paragraph on Turkey concerning freedom of association and collective bargaining, we are still concerned about the latest legislation which needs urgently to be reviewed and if necessary amended. It is regrettable that in the case of the Islamic Republic of Iran, we were for a third time obliged to place it under the heading of

"continued failure to implement" because minorities are not respected on account of their religious persuasion.

Despite all that, we live in hope of change and the will to co-operate. We are optimistic, despite difficulties and even unacceptable situations.

When we think of the millions of unemployed in the industrialised countries, but particularly in the Third World, one is saddened and repelled at the same time. The High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment (1987) and the examination of the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), have demonstrated the effects of financial, monetary and commercial disarray throughout the world which the family of United Nations organisations has a duty to help put right. The most urgent problem is that of the foreign debt which is inflicting even greater austerity and poverty on the poorest. The ILO cannot stand aloof from this debate and from the quest for solutions. Otherwise, all employment-promotion programmes in agriculture as well as in industry and in commerce will remain ineffective.

Our Committee attaches great importance to the obligation under Article 19 of the ILO Constitution that all countries have to co-operate in general surveys. We expect a great deal from next year's general survey on the Merchant Shipping (Minimum Standards) Convention 1976 (No. 147). There are serious and worrying problems in merchant shipping and we trust that next year's study will help to overcome them.

I must end on this note. Everything of importance is, in any case, to be found in the Committee's report, as is also the question of denunciations and that of night work. It is particularly recommended that you should read the report, that you should re-read it and disseminate it among all the member States of the ILO. We believe that the ILO must do more to come down from its ivory tower. The worldwide extents for social progress are still to a great extent unknown among the grass-roots. We must therefore increase our efforts to publish articles in newspapers, the ILO must become familiar to militants and workers. In this way its influence can be greatly strengthened and extended.

I should like to thank our Chairman, Mr. El Assar for his hard work, Mr. Elmiger, our Reporter, for the excellent Report and Mr. Wisskirchen, my social partner, for his co-operation. I should also like to thank Mr. Sidibé and his Secretariat team for their work, as well as the whole Workers' group for their Participation. And if my friend George Kanaiev could say in the Committee that the road to hell is paved with good intentions, I, too, can say that there is greater rejoicing in heaven over one sinner who is converted than over 99 others who do not need to be converted.

Consequently, long live every small or great improvement thanks to the work undertaken by our Committee on the Application of Standards.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. CALLORDA SALVO (Government adviser, Uruguay) – We would like to express, on behalf of the Uruguayan Government, our satisfaction at the work done by the Committee on the Application of Standards (Provisional Record No. 28). We consider that the tasks assigned to it were fully accomplished under the skilful leadership of Mr. El Assar, Chairman of the Committee, and of the Vice-Chairmen, Mr. Wisskirchen and Mr. Houthuys.

The statement made by Mr. Sidibé, Director of the Department of International Labour Standards, prior to the start of the work was, we considered, of special importance. In his statement he linked the question of human rights to international labour instruments, and explained the approach of the International Labour Organisation to its standard-setting and technical co-operation activities. He also summarised the status of the ratifications and fulfilment of constitutional obligations by member States so far as the Conventions and Recommendations are concerned.

Finally, he reviewed the procedures and work schedule of the Committee. All this gave us a useful frame of reference and was welcomed by the members of the Committee who subsequently made constructive contributions to the general debate and to the examination of specific cases.

I do not think it superfluous to reiterate that the high level attained by the exchange of views among the members of the Committee was undoubtedly the outcome of the excellent report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations.

In this respect, we would like to refer to the approach adopted under the present system of supervision which has not come about by chance or improvisation. On occasion, of course, we would like to see certain discrepancies between ratified standards and national legislation corrected more expeditiously, since it is on this that the progress of social justice and the consolidation of universal peace depend. This is, in any case, the responsibility of the member States to the international community, and any delays in achieving compatibility cannot be blamed on the present supervisory system.

Finally, I should say that the report of the Committee on the Application of Standards is an excellent document which reproduces the statements made by the members of the Committee in a concise, clear and systematic manner. It merely remains to express the hope that, in due course, the Committee of Experts and the Office will follow up all the proposals made, which are aimed at more effective compliance by States of their constitutional obligations under the Conventions and Recommendations. In this way we shall undoubtedly be helping to bring about, among other things, the more effective development of human rights which has been the central theme of this 75th Session of the Conference.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. GUIDOBONO (Government adviser, Argentina) – It is a great honour for me to address this distinguished assembly on behalf of the Government delegation of the Republic of Argentina. Since the Reporter of the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations has clearly described the work done by that Committee and we have heard statements by the Workers' and Employers' Vice-Chairmen, I will confine myself to making comments only.

During the discussions held in our Committee, concern has been expressed, as on previous occasions, at the increase in the cases of violation of the fundamental freedoms of human beings as well as of other provisions of the Conventions ratified, and a decline has been noted in the rate of ratification of international instruments by the States.

Although this may be so, what is important when a detailed assessment has to be made of the operation of the supervisory machinery is, as in any human activity, to see whether the positive achievements add up to more than the mistakes made.

And here we can safely say that no one who has taken part in or followed the work of our Committee over the years can deny that the balance is positive. There is a clear trend towards an improvement in national social and political legislation and a closer alignment of this with international labour standards.

This is valid even though there are still certain cases which cause concern. The general trend, however, examined on a long-term basis, is positive, and this is what counts. And in this trend the supervisory machinery of the ILO has undoubtedly played an important part.

It is well to remember that these methods have evolved over the years, that major modifications have been introduced to improve them, and that this process of revision is certain to continue. We must not forget that any human act and or organisation can be improved. I believe, however, that in its essence the regular supervisory system should remain unchanged.

The existence of a technical, objective and impartial examination carried out every year by the Committee of Experts and the multisectoral and tripartite discussion held in the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations (without prejudice to the existence of constitutional machinery to deal with demands and complaints and the special procedure for examining cases of alleged violations of freedom of association, to mention only a few of them), are the true pillars on which the patient and persevering efforts of our Organisation to achieve greater dignity for humankind to protect human rights and to further peace through social justice are supported.

Our Organisation attaches prime importance to a system of mutual dialogue and understanding, and also extends aid and co-operation to countries in overcoming the difficulties they encounter from time to time.

I would like to say that I am pleasantly surprised, having participated for several years already in this Committee, by the notable spirit of co-operation displayed by the various social partners throughout the discussions.

Those who have come from countries that have suffered from the evils of political instability, who have been governed by regimes that were outside the legal and constitutional framework, can bear eloquent witness to the significance of the moral weight of the debates held in connection with our countries at each meeting of the Committee.

This is the reason why the delegation of the Republic of Argentina wishes to proclaim its formal and substantial support for the supervisory machinery now in force in our Organisation.

At the same time, I would like to express my gratitude to the representatives of the workers and employers of the world, who have added factors of cohesion and balance to the search for concerted solutions. Not only should we thank them for their participation but we should encourage it. It is a sound system. It is the characteristic which makes our Organisation unique in the United Nations system.

In this context, I would like to support the appeal made by Mr. Francis Blanchard at the 70th Session of the International Labour Conference for all member States to ratify the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1946 (No. 144). This is a very important instrument, and I am glad to say that Argentina ratified it a few months ago and its ratification was recorded in the Office in March 1988.

I cannot conclude without stressing the special importance that the Government of Argentina attributes to the convergence between standard-setting activities and technical co-operation. On this question, I would like to state that at the same as the recent ratification by my country of the Collective Bargaining Convention, 1981 (No. 154), we asked the Office for technical co-operation to plan the measures necessary for the fullest possible application of this Convention both in law and in practice. This will certainly contribute to the more effective application of international labour standards which is, after all, the ultimate objective of co-operation activities.

FINAL RECORD VOTE ON THE CONVENTION CONCERNING SAFETY AND HEALTH IN CONSTRUCTION

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – We shall now interrupt the discussion of the report of the Committee on the Application of Standards in order to proceed to the final record vote on the Convention concerning safety and health in construction.

(A record vote is taken.)

(The detailed results of the vote will be found at the end of the record of this sitting.)

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – The result of the record vote on the Convention concerning safety and health in construction is as follows: 421 in favour, none against, with 1 abstention. Since the quorum is 259 and since the required two-thirds majority has been attained, the Convention is adopted.

(The Convention is adopted.)

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – I would like to announce that Mr. Knack, Employers' adviser, United States, has asked for the floor in order to explain his vote.

Mr. KNACK (Employers' adviser, United States) – You may well have noted the results of the vote. There was one abstention, and you are looking at that abstention. I will be very brief and try to clarify the position I have taken.

I believe that everyone who supports a Convention has a duty to work towards its adoption in his home country. As I considered support of this Convention, I asked myself five questions: Will it serve the needs of my country? Will my country ratify it? Will my country implement it? Does it help those I am here to represent? And does it have global value?

If I had answered "no" to all five questions, I would have opposed this Convention. If I had been able to answer "yes" to all five questions, I would have supported the Convention. But since I found that the answer was "yes" to some of the questions and "no" to others, I abstained. My conscience rests peacefully with this formula.

FINAL RECORD VOTE ON THE RECOMMENDATION CONCERNING SAFETY AND HEALTH IN CONSTRUCTION

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – We shall now proceed to the final record vote on the Recommendation concerning safety and health in construction.

(A record vote is taken.)

(The detailed results of the vote will be found at the end of the record of this sitting.)

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – The result of the record vote on the Recommendation concerning safety and health in construction is as follows: 394 in favour, none against, with no abstentions. Since the quorum is 259 and since the required two-thirds majority has been attained, the Recommendation is adopted.

(The Recommendation is adopted.)

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – I would like to take this opportunity to express my gratitude to the members of the Committee and its Officers for having prepared these documents in such a constructive way, thus having led to the unanimous adoption of the instrument.

My pleasure at this result is unfortunately somewhat lessened, tempered by a piece of information that I have to give you. The Chairman of the Committee on Safety and Health in Construction, Mr. Mirza, Government member, Pakistan, had to be taken to a hospital in Geneva to undergo a serious operation. Mr. Mirza's health is as satisfactory as may be expected after such a major operation. I am sure that we all agree to send Mr. Mirza from our Conference our warmest wishes for a speedy recovery. And I am sure that the results of the votes on the work of his Committee will contribute to speed his recovery and improve his state of health.

(The sitting adjourned at 1.15 p.m.)

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE APPLICATION OF STANDARDS: DISCUSSION (cont.) AND ADOPTION

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – We resume the discussion of the report of the Committee on the Application of Standards.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. CHEREMET (Government adviser, USSR) – We have before us the report of the Committee on the Application of Standards. This report has been adopted by consensus, which was a manifestation of the good will of members of the Committee, of dialogue and co-operation, the strengthening of mutual understanding and of the endeavour to comply with obligations incumbent on the Committee under the Constitution of the ILO.

In discussing the questions on the agenda of the Committee, many of us who are members of the Committee quite naturally felt the special atmosphere that prevails at the present time in the ILO. This is, of course, the same atmosphere that is being felt by all the organisations in the United Nations family, and by all those organisations that are striving towards peace, social justice and co-operation. I am thinking of the 40th anniversary of the adoption by the United Nations of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the anniversary of the ILO's adoption of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention (No. 87) and also the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation), Convention (No. 111). This is not just a matter for celebration but also a basis for taking stock of what has been achieved and for considering the future.

The instruments I have already mentioned provide a basis on which co-operation among States that have completely different political and social systems at different levels of development is founded, and we have managed to develop a dialogue among States on this basis. This fact and its significance for our Organisation must be fully recognised. It is in this very connection that I would like to emphasise the fact that the unanimous realisation of the significance of the international instruments I have already mentioned, is, unfortunately, not always accompanied by the equally unanimous ratification of those instruments, since, as far as the ILO is concerned, the Conventions most directly linked with human rights, particularly those of working people, that is Conventions Nos. 87, 98, 29, 105, 100, 111 and 112 have only been ratified on average by two-thirds of the ILO member States. This question arose in the course of the discussions in our Committee when we discussed the general part of the report of the Committee of Experts.

Mutual understanding, dialogue and co-operation in the framework of this Organisation will develop successfully if all States have equal obligations both with regard to their own relationships with the ILO and with regard to their application of international standards in the area of labour in their respective national contexts. Ratification would be made easier if we had a more equal situation as regards the system of supervisory machinery and the observance of labour standards and human rights. This would also promote trust among States in the implementation of the supervisory machinery and would hold good for the Conference Committee as well.

I would like to draw attention to the following points: in the course of the meetings of the Conference Committee, we touched on a number of questions that concern the working methods of the Committee in its relationships with the Committee of Experts. In particular, the question was raised that it would be desirable for the report of the Committee of Experts to be received significantly earlier in time so that governments could familiarise themselves with it and prepare their own reports. At the present time, the situation is such that very often the governments receive the report of the Committee of Experts literally on the eve of the Labour Conference. Questions were also raised regarding the possibility of having a member of the Committee of Experts present at the session of the Conference Committee; the possibility for the Conference Committee to give instructions to the Committee of Experts, including instructions to take up particular cases again on more than one occasion and to give additional attention to particular material, in particular new legislation which may have been passed by individual countries, and to give their conclusions on this.

In the course of their discussions, questions arose as to whether the Conference Committee itself could come to an opinion on new material presented by governments in their reports to the Conference Committee, as, for example, giving an appraisal of new forms of legislation and whether they are in accordance with the Convention, or whether the Conference Committee is obliged to ask for the Committee of Experts' conclusions in all cases. If so, this means that the Conference Committee will have to wait for a whole year, since the next session of the Committee of Experts only takes place in a year's time, after the Conference Committee.

Some criticism was expressed of the presentation of reports on certain Conventions and of the frequency of these reports.

Finally, a proposal was put forward on the elimination of the "special paragraph", or the introduction of a moratorium before such a special paragraph is introduced for a certain period of time. This is connected with the need to strengthen dialogue and mutual understanding and trust, and also to do away with this process of condemning States. During the further work of the Conference Committee, arguments were put forward in favour of this proposal. It would appear that the situation of the report of the Committee referred to in paragraph 114 should draw the attention of the ILO secretariat and we hope that in the near future there will be an opportunity to discuss the specific proposals that have been made concerning the whole range of questions which arose in connection with improving the work of the Conference Committee, as reflected in paragraph 114.

The report put before you by the Conference Committee emphasises in its last paragraph the fact that this year the Committee was the scene of discussions where a spirit of mutual understanding and good will prevailed in an effort to reach solutions that were acceptable to everyone. This is quite right, and I think we have to take note of the important contribution that was made in this respect by Mr. El Assar, the Chairman of the Committee; the Vice-Chairmen, Mr. Houthuys and Mr. Wisskirchen; and the Reporter, Mr. Elmiger, and also the representative of the Director-General in our Committee, Mr. Sidibé, the Director of the International Labour Standards Department.

The report of the Conference Committee thus deserves to be adopted. On behalf of the socialist countries, I propose that you adopt it unanimously.

It is very important to recall that this report expresses the tripartite endeavours of the Committee. The report is the result of an agreement reached by more than 90 Government representatives and also by the representatives of the Workers and Employers in this same Committee. The report is thus an authoritative one, and in general, we must take note of the fact that the authority of the report of the Conference Committee as, to a certain extent, a final stage in the supervisory machinery, deserves special attention and study. We will hope that, each time we are able to adopt this report annually, understanding for its authority will grow, and also understanding for its special role in the supervisory machinery. This is the reflection of our feeling that we are all aiming at good will, mutual understanding and co-operation.

Mr. NABIAN (Government adviser, Islamic Republic of Iran) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! While express our sincere appreciation for all the efforts taken through your good offices, Mr. President, for the proper conduct of this 75th Session of the International Labour Conference, and thanks to the good offices of the Chairman of the Conference Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, as well as to all his colleagues from the Office, whose great expertise and experience is invaluable for the promotion of the very fundamental aspirations of our Organisation, the delegation of the Islamic Republic of Iran wishes to express its deep regret that it has been obliged, once again, not to be able to vote for the conclusions of the Conference Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, with respect to the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation)

Convention, 1958 (No. 111); furthermore, it wishes to express its serious objections to those conclusions, as well as the manner in which they were drawn up. I am making the following comments and proposals here in plenary, both for the record and in the hope that they will be given further consideration through appropriate means.

Unfortunately, the work of the Committee of Experts seems to have been strongly influenced by political pressures, which added unnecessary complications to the proper functioning of the Committee. The Committee has seemingly exceeded its main functions with regards to the conformity or non-conformity of national laws and regulations and the provisions contained in a ratified Conventions.

The Committee should not rely solely on the information submitted by complainants without taking note of the comments made by member States in that relation.

In this manner, it would be able to avoid further complexities which might eventually lead to the slowing down of the work of the Committee, thereby further lowering the effectiveness and level of ratifications of international labour standards.

The Committee will also be able, in this way, to submit more pragmatic reports to the Conference Committee.

The opinions and observations expressed by the Committee of Experts should remain objective, impartial and properly substantiated, both at the time complaints are submitted and in formulating its reports to the Conference Committee; which form the basis for the discussions and conclusions of the Committee and are later adopted by the General Conference.

This should not overshadow the sovereignty and independence of member States.

The Committee of Experts is under the Governing Body and, as such, its powers can naturally not exceed those of the constitutional organs of the International Labour Organisation.

It would seem that the mandate of the Committee should be reconsidered, with a view to precisely defining its scope which should necessarily be confined to purely technical functions within the framework of the provisions of the Constitution and the decisions of the Conference.

The strengthening of the work of the Committee of Experts to enable the philosophical, cultural and social views of all the member States to be taken into consideration, as reiterated also by the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, is a prerequisite for real progress.

The delegation of the Islamic Republic of Iran, in pursuance of its repeated calls at previous sessions of the Conference, strongly proposes that with a view to the proper consideration of the views and opinion of more than 1,000 million Moslems throughout the world, the membership of the Committee of Experts should be strengthened through the appointment of an appropriate number of qualified Islamic legal experts.

The distinguished Vice-Chairman of the Committee on the Application of Standards made a reference this morning to the Islamic Republic of Iran, to the effect that discrimination was practised against minorities on religious grounds.

I should like to draw the attention of the Conference to the fact that the Committee's report refers only to discrepancies with regard to some instances, about which the Islamic Republic of Iran has already extended several fundamental questions to the Conference Committee, in the hope that proper replies would be provided to them, however, they are still outstanding.

Nevertheless, there is no reference, either in the report itself or in the discussions of the Committee, to a religious minority.

Without intending to reopen a dialogue here, it would have been preferable if what was said could have been more properly justified.

Mrs. GUTEMA (Government delegate, Ethiopia) – My delegation has always attached special importance to the work of the Committee on the Application of Standards. We have been encouraged by the successful completion of the Committee's deliberations and by the spirit of dialogue and understanding which characterised the Committee's work during the present session of the Conference.

My delegation is therefore pleased to join the consensus in support of the report under consideration.

The debate on the general questions relating to international labour standards concentrated on the present functioning of the supervision of standards and on the ways and means of improving them by taking into account objective realities.

The discussion on the general survey of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), was fruitful in that it reminded member States that the Convention was one of the five most important human rights Conventions of the ILO and member States were able to exchange information on existing laws and practices in different countries.

I would like to pay tribute to the efforts being exerted by the secretariat of the ILO, in particular Mr. Sidibé, for their excellent work on standards. The spirit of dialogue which prevailed in examining individual cases was widely welcomed by the members of the Committee and is encouraging. We hope that this same spirit of goodwill and realism will prevail in the future.

To conclude these brief remarks, my delegation congratulates the officers of the Committee – the Chairman, the two Vice-Chairmen and the Reporter – and support the adoption of the report by the Conference.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mrs. BATISTA LORENZO (Government adviser, Venezuela) – Once again, we are here to consider the report of the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations of an ILO Conference. We congratulate the members of the Committee on the spirit of consensus achieved throughout their deliberations.

Once again, I should like to recall the importance that the Government of Venezuela has always attached to the subject of human rights and, in particular, to the treatment of this subject by this Committee in connection with the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122). We believe that our organisation faces a permanent challenge in evaluating the impact of the international economic situation on the regrettable and progressive deterioration of social and political conditions in most member States.

Many of the cases which were considered in the Committee involved the violation of Conventions on the fundamental rights, which cannot be blamed entirely on their responsibility or negligence of the governments involved. This was brilliantly and clearly stated by the Director-General in his Report and confirmed several times by the Committee of Experts and the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations.

We should not forget the international economic context of the developing countries. International trade has its own standards which are not exactly set by us. The value of raw materials which generate foreign currency are declining and, in general, the economic resources of the developing countries and the burden of foreign debt does not help either. All of this places the developing countries in a stranglehold which limits their ability to improve the working conditions of their workers.

We are by no means attempting to justify the violation of human rights. Everyone well knows Venezuela's commitment to, and constant defence of, these human rights, but we are aware that we must bear in mind the international context in which we operate in terms of the economy and its decisive impact on the full exercise of human rights.

The High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment explicitly referred to in the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, which was held in Geneva last November, for the idea of which we are indebted to the reports of the Committee of Experts, should be seen as a fundamental milestone in the ILO's history. This Committee should be proud of having thus opened the door to a discussion that guarantees the political relevance of the ILO, in view of the importance of this issue, to which we, as member States, are committed. We should not forget that the Committee on the Application of Standards is the backbone of the supervisory system of the ILO.

To conclude our comments on this session, we should like to express our deepest congratulations to the Committee of Experts for their excellent general survey on the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), which gave us an excellent opportunity to deal extensively with a topic of such vital interest to us, opposed as we are to discrimination in any form.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. AL-KHALIDI (Government delegate, Saudi Arabia) – In the name of God, the Merciful the Compassionate! Before giving the impressions of the delegation of Saudi Arabia on the conclusions reached by the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, may I express an idea suggested to me by the two sides of a shaving mirror; sometimes I use the magnifying side and sometimes I use the ordinary side of the mirror. In my view, the supervisory machinery of the ILO, a very important system, of which we whole-heartedly approve and which we depend on, might be called the two-sided mirror of the labour world. It is two-sided because there are in fact two aspects. The first aspect is reflected in the report of the Committee of Experts, which mentions the extent to which the constitutional obligations of member States have been carried out in the form of reports on ratified or non-ratified Conventions. But the other side of this mirror consists in enlarging the situation. Here we have documents produced by the Conference Committee dealing with Conventions and respect for standards; these reports go into detail on the whole situation, so that the position is perfectly clear for countries as regards applying certain of these Conventions.

I would like to congratulate the Chairman of the Committee, Mr. El Assar, and express the pride of the Arab group at the way in which he directed its work. I would also like to congratulate Mr. Wisskirchen, the Employers' Vice-Chairman and Mr. Houthuys, the Workers' Vice-Chairman who, thanks to their co-operation and spirit of understanding, constructive and objective dialogue, especially between the Employers' and Workers' groups, have engendered a happy atmosphere in the Committee, especially among the members of the Government group. The Committee reviewed the economic, social and political conditions in the world, especially in the developing countries. This has a positive influence on the report which I recommend that you adopt.

In conclusion, on behalf of the Arab group I should like to express my appreciation to the standards division of the ILO, especially to Mr. Sidibé and to all the members of the secretariat who work day and night to contribute to helping the Arab group; because all these conclusions have been translated into Arabic, enabling the Arab group to respect their constitutional obligations. We hope that translation will also be made of, for example, the annual report of the Committee of Experts. We hope that report too will be translated into Arabic so that we can honour our obligations.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. MEZA SOZA (Government delegate, Nicaragua) – The Government of Nicaragua wishes first of all to associate itself with the views expressed regarding the very fruitful results of the work of the Committee on the Application of Standards. We therefore support fully the consensus which approved this report. However – and we would ask that this be put on record – we are obliged, much to our regret, to clarify the remarks made by a distinguished Vice-Chairman of the Committee, who referred to my country in his statement.

This is not the time for a full discussion, but I should like to point out that Nicaragua's deletion from the number of cases to be examined this year was not unfair, as the speaker maintained. He knows very well that there was no consensus in the Committee in respect of the inclusion of my country, both because of the obvious progress which has been made in the law and practice of my country and because of the fact that my Government has invited a study mission of the ILO in order to check the appropriate application of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and others on the spot.

The more than 1,600 organised trade unions and more than 1,400 collective agreements concluded during the eight years of the revolution alone testify to the freedom of association in Nicaragua. We therefore deeply regret that we have to note once again the prejudice that exists against Nicaragua amongst those who make repeated appeals for constructive dialogue, but themselves approach it weighed down with subjective and unfounded opinions.

In conclusion, therefore, we express the sincere hope that at the next Conference there will be more open minds amongst those who have been generally intransigent when discussing the realities in Nicaragua.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – Since there are no further requests for the floor, and if there are no objections, I shall take it that the report of the Committee on the Application of Standards is adopted by the Conference.

(The report is adopted.)

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – May I thank most warmly the officers of the Committee for the excellent work they have done: the Chairman of the Committee, Mr. El Assar, Government adviser, Egypt; the Employers' Vice-Chairman, Mr. Wisskirchen, Employers' adviser, Federal Republic of Germany; the Workers' Vice-Chairman, Mr. Houthuys, Workers' adviser, Belgium; and of course the Reporter of the Committee, Mr. Elmiger, Government delegate, Switzerland.

The report has shown that a constructive and thorough discussion took place in the Committee on many difficult questions, which led to the submission of a report which was adopted unanimously. We thank the whole Committee for its work.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON EMPLOYMENT AND SOCIAL SECURITY: SUBMISSION, DISCUSSION AND ADOPTION

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – This brings us to the second item on our agenda this afternoon, the report of the Committee on Employment and Social Security.

I should like to invite the officers of the Committee – the Chairman, Mr. van den Berg, Government adviser, Netherlands, the Employers' Vice-Chairman, Mr. Rey, Employers' delegate, Mauritius, the Workers' Vice-Chairman, Mr. Seidman, Workers' adviser, United States, and the Reporter, Mr. Schneuwly, Government adviser, Switzerland – to come to the rostrum.

However, before proceeding to the report I should like to call on the Clerk of the Conference to draw attention to a number of errors in the text of the report.

Interpretation from French: The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE – I should like to point out a number of errors in the English text of the report of the Committee on Employment and Social Security in Provisional Record No. 27.

(The speaker continues in English)

On page 27/1, paragraph (g) of the footnote should read "154 members" instead of "174 members". On page 27/18, second column, the third and fourth lines should read "was transmitted to the Committee by the Selection Committee. During its last sitting the Committee". The seventh line of paragraph 210, on the same page, should refer to "Paragraphs 10 and 30" instead of "Paragraph 10 and 13". On page

27/19, the first version of paragraph 219, which is repeated, should be deleted. Finally, on page 27/25, the whole paragraph 2 of Article 23 is missing. It should read as follows: "Where a declaration made in virtue of Article 5 is in force, the implementation of paragraph 1 above may be deferred."

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – I call on Mr. van den Berg, Government adviser, Netherlands. Chairman of the Committee, to submit the report.

Mr. VAN DEN BERG (Government adviser, Netherlands; Chairman of the Committee on Employment and Social Security) – Our Reporter should normally have been introducing the report, but I am very glad to do so myself on behalf of my Committee. The report is contained in Provisional Record No. 27.

In the fourth preambular paragraph of the proposal Convention concerning employment promotion and protection against unemployment, one of the most threatening problems of today's world is considered: the widespread unemployment and underemployment affecting various countries throughout the world at all stages of development and in particular the problems of young people.

I am proud, as the Chairman of the Committee on Employment and Social Security, to present to this Conference a Convention and a Recommendation which contain standards in this field unanimously accepted by this Committee.

It is a real landmark in dealing with such a complicated subject. It was not only the very co-operative atmosphere in which the Committee worked or the willingness of all parties to compromise and to present standards which meet the needs of jobseekers and the disadvantaged who are either not employed or underemployed, it is far more a result of input from so many highly skilled members of the Committee in the discussions.

I have to express my thanks to all of them, in particular to the Vice-Chairman of the Committee, Mr. Seidman, the leader of the Workers' group, and Mr. Rey, the first-in-command of the Employers' group. The support of these two old hands, experienced for many years in the work of the ILO, was an extraordinary help to me. Also my thanks to Mr. Schneuwly, the Swiss Government adviser, who is responsible for the outstanding report which expresses clearly the intentions of the Committee concerning the contents of the two instruments and which will be of great help for implementing the instruments. And not least, of course, I have to extend my thanks to the Office for its excellent work in preparing the discussions in the Committee as well as in assisting the Committee in this year's debates.

I have the feeling that our Committee has expressed in these two instruments the topics of this year's Conference, human rights which the Director-General in his Report labelled as being a common responsibility. The Director-General stated in his Report: "The gravity of the world economic situation makes it necessary to examine its implications for the enjoyment of human rights and to see how human rights standards and principles may contribute to decisions aimed at overcoming existing instability and tensions."

In the framework of this Committee, that means a way of visualising human rights which could be prescribed as the right to a decent living. We try to set standards for incentives for the maintenance of employment and the creation of new employment, taking into account that these objectives are the most important to tackle the problem we are confronted with. In the meantime, we cannot forget that adequate safeguards are necessary for the daily needs of the unfortunate and disadvantaged who are out of work and seek for new employment. The proposed instruments are completely within the scope of the statement of the Director-General. The instruments contain contributions and guide-lines for an approach to dealing with the problems of the eighties and the nineties. They are a tripartite vision for the current situation in the labour market throughout the world. At the very last moment at last year's first reading, the Government delegate of India made a plea to the Committee that it should take into account, when concluding instruments setting standards for employment promotion and compensation against unemployment, the economical realities, the social realities and different levels of development. It is my conviction that the Committee meets this plea as well as reflecting in the standards the social progress that has been made in the 54 years since the adoption of the Convention ensuring benefits or allowances to the involuntarily unemployed, the Unemployment Provision Convention, 1934 (No. 44). This new Convention contains more details, a more shaded approach, reflecting the development of unemployment schemes all over the world, achievements but also aims for those who are developing or starting to develop. These are aims to pursue. Conventions and Recommendations are adequate and realistic challenges in the best tradition of the ILO.

Of course, there are compromises between the three parties, compromises that are compatible with all other standards laid down in different standard-setting instruments, compatible in their wording as well as in their spirit.

These instruments are a tripartite answer and guidance for employment promotion and unemployment protection both separately and independently; instruments deserving a great number of ratifications to underline the social progress in this world since 1934, despite economic difficulties, but stressing the importance of work and productive employment so as to secure the realisation of human rights, in particular the right to a decent level of existence for workers and their dependants in line with the spirit of the ILO Constitution.

Interpretation from German: the PRESIDENT – The discussion of the report of the Committee on Employment and Social Security is now open.

Mr. REY (Employers' delegate, Mauritius; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Employment and Social Security) – Allow me to congratulate the President on his election to the Chair of this Conference.

Last year, after the first discussion, we had arrived at a proposed text for a Convention, supplemented by a Recommendation which was unacceptable to employers in many aspects. In particular, we had pointed out that if we had a Convention with a rigid text we would only support a Recommendation. We were also concerned about the use of double standards for developed and developing countries respectively. As regards the persons to be protected, we specifically criticised Article 11 of the proposed text as it introduced the concept of including in the labour force persons who had never been employed and did not wish to be employed. There was also great difficulty for employers in accepting the special provisions for new applicants for employment. However, on the Committee's suggestion, the Director-General agreed to convene a small tripartite meeting of experts to try to reduce the differences remaining after the first discussion between the points of view expressed and, without actually giving an opinion on the details of the proposed text, to give some general office guidelines for drafting the instruments that are now in front of us for discussion.

We are convinced that the work done by that Working Party has permitted a much better text to be submitted to our Committee this year. After having spent so many days on the text of the Convention and that of the Recommendation, let us now consider the results we have now achieved. In a general way, the text of the Convention has been made much more flexible by including only questions of principle, leaving all the details to be included in the Recommendation. Instead of having double standards as we had last year, one for developed countries and the other for developing countries, against which we strongly protested, we have now a single standard applying to all countries, with exemptions provided in Article 5 to cater for countries where such exemptions are justified by the extent of protection of its social security system.

As it is also provided that members availing themselves of the temporary exemptions provided for would endeavour to improve their system of social security so as to be able to ratify the whole Convention, we think that the necessary flexibility has been provided for in Article 5 and that we have reached a satisfactory solution.

As regards the persons protected under Article 11, we are of the opinion that the coverage is adequate, since it is based on all employees, including public employees and apprentices. It further provides that public employees whose employment up to normal retirement age is guaranteed by national laws or regulations may be excluded from protection.

We have also come to a satisfactory conclusion concerning the withdrawal, suspension or reduction of the benefit to be paid to the protected persons as specified in Article 20 of the Convention. This has been achieved after a long discussion and it is gratifying to note that the Committee has approved a reasonable text in that respect.

Right from the start of our discussions, employers had placed great stress on the importance that employment promotion should be given in the instruments envisaged. We are gratified to note that in Part II of the Convention, on the promotion of productive employment, it is stated that each member shall declare, as a priority objective, a policy designed to promote full, productive and freely chosen employment by all appropriate means, including social security. The priority has therefore been correctly placed on the promotion of protective employment.

As regards the Recommendation, we are of the opinion that its provisions may serve as a guideline to all countries. It sometimes goes into more details than are required, but as a recommendation is not a binding instrument, member States may choose the most suitable parts for application. We therefore commend the provisions for gradual implementation, specially governing Part IV on the development and improvement of systems of protection, which gives useful guidelines to countries which want to develop the social security system.

In the Employers' group, one reservation has been made concerning Paragraph 10 of the Recommendation, and a reservation has also been made on Paragraph 30 by the Latin American Employers. But as a whole, the group approves the text of the Recommendation.

It follows from my declaration that I am recommending the Employers' group to vote in favour of the text of the Convention, as supplemented by the Recommendation, as I now propose to the Conference.

Before concluding, I wish to place on record the Employers' deep appreciation of the excellent report produced by our Reporter, Mr. Schneuwly, Government adviser, Switzerland. I strongly recommend all Employers to adopt the report.

I am also pleased to thank the members of the Drafting Committee, who did a very good job and in record time.

Lastly, I wish to express my deep appreciation to the Chairman of the Committee, Mr. van den Berg of the Netherlands, who led us with great determination and fairness, sometimes in some troubled waters.

I wish also to pay tribute to the Workers' Vice-Chairman, Mr. Bert Seidman of the United States, who showed so much goodwill and co-operation and a determination to arrive at a satisfactory ending throughout the Committee's work.

Finally I would congratulate Mr. Tamburi and his staff for their excellent work during the Committee's work.

Mr. SEIDMAN (Workers' adviser, United States; Workers' Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Employment and Social Security) – At the outset, I wish to express my appreciation to our Chairman, Mr. van den Berg, who both last year and this year presided over our Committee with dignity combined with good humour and no small measure of patience. Without his efforts, the Committee could not have achieved its purposes. I also wish to thank Mr. Schneuwly for the excellent report for which he was responsible. It has been a pleasure to work again with Mr. Rey, the Employers' Vice-Chairman, though, of course, there were some issues on which we could not agree. The Workers' members are also grateful for the valuable assistance the Committee received from the members of the ILO Social Security Branch, especially Mr. Tamburi and his colleagues, Mr. Perrin and Mr. Voirin. We also pay tribute to the excellent service provided to us as Workers' members by Mr. Damen of the ILO Workers' Relations Branch and Ms. Stewart of the ICFTU. Finally, I wish to thank all the members of the Committee but, especially, want to express my deep appreciation to my colleagues in the Workers' group for their dedication, steadfastness, co-operation and solidarity.

I want to mention briefly what I believe is an innovation which proved to be useful for our Committee. It has already been referred to. As the result of a suggestion made at the final session of the Committee last year, the Office set up a small tripartite working party which met in November 1987 to advise it on the preparation of the draft instruments which were submitted for consideration this year for final action. This small group, in which I was privileged to participate, was able to suggest a number of basic principles for major features of the instruments which, in modified form, are now included in the proposed Convention and Recommendation you have before you. I would suggest to the Director-General that from time to time he consider setting up at the half-way mark a similar tripartite group when draft Conventions are being considered under the double discussion procedure.

Both last year and this year, there was a recognition on the part of members of all three groups that our aim should be to develop instruments which, in as many countries as possible, would provide protection for unemployed workers and employment promotion measures while having relevance to the great diversity of nations which exists in this world. We in the Workers' group believe that this double objective has been achieved through Article 5 of the Convention which provides for limited exceptions for countries that do not have full-fledged social security systems. There are also other provisions in the Convention which afford flexibility to Members to make it easier for them to ratify it.

In fact, the Workers felt that, if anything, the Convention provides too much flexibility for countries that already have extensive social security systems not to implement some of the protections which are set forth in the Convention.

Despite this weakness, the Convention contains many positive features, although we in the Workers' group believed and advocated that some of them should be strengthened. Let me briefly mention some of these important protections. Throughout both instruments there is a welcome emphasis on measures to promote employment. We said over and over in the Committee that first and foremost, unemployed workers want jobs. Yes, benefits are needed – and they are absolutely essential – until workers can obtain suitable employment. That term, by the way, is defined in the Convention and further elaborated on in the Recommendation, so that workers are not forced to take unsuitable jobs on pain of losing benefits.

There are other positive elements in the instrument, but I will not try to list all of them. Among the most important are standards in the Convention ratifying countries must assure with respect to benefit levels, duration of benefits, qualifying requirements and groups for disqualification, as well as extent of coverage. There are also provisions for health services for the unemployed and a guarantee that the unemployed will be protected by other benefits when they are unable to work.

We are also glad that in Article 24 member countries are expected to recognise the special problems faced by youth, the disabled, migrants and other groups who are faced with particularly difficult problems when they seek jobs, many of them for the first time or after being out of the labour force for a long time. However, we regret that the protection to be offered to these persons is set forth in only vague terms and, even then, Article 4 permits ratifying countries to derogate this obligation altogether.

The Workers' group is also pleased with the inclusion in the Convention of requirements for consultation with employers' and workers' organisations. Article 6 assures equality of treatment without discrimination but also without hampering special measures for the disadvantaged. However, as I shall mention, one completely unjustified form of discrimination is permitted.

In fact, that subject took up an inordinate proportion of the Committee's time although, in the view of the Worker members, it never should have been considered at all. I refer to Article 20(d) which permits ratifying countries to deny benefits to unemployed workers in situations involving labour disputes. We in the Workers group are pleased that the paragraph as finally adopted is in the least harmful form that was acceptable to employers and governments. Nevertheless, we think this is an unjust, discriminatory provision which is contrary to time-honored principles of the ILO and especially to the basic precepts of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

As we know, this year's Report of the Director-General is entitled Human rights – A common responsibility. In it there is a section on freedom of association in which the Director-General calls attention to the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights. The Director-General reminds us that that Covenant "today accepted by 91 States – provides that the right to strike shall be ensured, provided that it is exercised in conformity with the laws of the particular country". The Director-General goes on to state: "ILO supervisory bodies have recognised that strike action is one of the essential means available to workers and their organisations for promoting and protecting their economic and social interests; it constitutes an exercise of the right of organisations freely to organise their activities and to formulate their programmes, provided for in Convention No. 87."

The right to strike is virtually nullified when workers do not have the wherewithal to provide the basic necessities of life for themselves and their families. When that happens, the collective bargaining balance – and most strikes in countries where there are free trade unions are settled in collective bargaining negotiations – that balance is tilted far over on the employer's side. So let us see what Article 20(d) does and what its impact will be.

In addition to its weakening of the right to strike, it is highly discriminatory. First, it discriminates against strikers as well as workers who are locked out by their employers and even certain categories of workers who are not on strike and who may not even belong to the same union. Bear in mind that, without this provision, these workers could obtain unemployment benefits only if they met all the legal requirements, including seeking work as well as the qualifying period for entitlement to benefits.

Second, the denial of benefits in labour dispute situations discriminates against the lowest-paid workers and their unions. Large powerful unions of well-paid workers often have strike funds to tide over their members who are on strike or locked out, many of whom may have built up a small financial reserve. But low-paid workers in small, weak or fledgling unions – farm-workers, service workers, garbage collectors and the like, especially in developing countries – these workers have no savings and their unions have no strike funds, and their employers can easily starve them into submission to even the most unjust demands. Should such workers and their children be discriminatorily denied all benefits when they are involved in a labour dispute?

Third, Article 21 of the Convention states: “In assessing the suitability of employment, account shall be taken [among other factors] of whether the employment is vacant as a direct result of a stoppage of work due to an on-going labour dispute.” If work is unsuitable for other workers, why does it suddenly become suitable for the workers who are most concerned?

Fourth, as I have said, it is not just workers on strike or locked out who are hurt by this provision but their children, spouses and other dependants. The hardships they are unjustly forced to bear may bring them to put pressure on the bread-winner to return to work – a pressure he or she may not be able to resist. It is not easy for workers to stand up for their rights when day after day they see the suffering their families must bear.

Fifth, since the discrimination extends to workers not on strike or locked out, they are likely to put pressure on the workers who are involved in the labour dispute to return to work.

I have said all this because we in the Workers' group feel very strongly that this form of discrimination against workers who exercise one of the most fundamental rights is morally wrong and is contrary to the fundamental ILO principle of freedom of association.

Having said that, and without detracting from our strong opposition to this particular provision in the proposed Convention, the Worker members of the Committee are unanimous in the conviction that the two instruments before you, if they are widely ratified and followed, will significantly contribute toward improving the lives of workers and their families all over the world. We therefore strongly urge all delegates to vote for the Convention and the Recommendation as well as the Committee's Report.

Interpretation from French: Mr. SCHNEUWLY (Government adviser, Switzerland; Reporter of the Committee on Employment and Social Security) – As this is the first time that I have spoken in plenary, I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate the President on his election to the presidency of this Session of the Conference.

The need to find solutions to the serious problem of unemployment has always been one of the major concerns of our Organisation. The Preamble of the Constitution of the ILO in 1919 expressly mentions the prevention of unemployment. That year, the Conference adopted two international instruments that dealt with the promotion of employment and compensation for unemployment: Unemployment Convention (No. 2) and Unemployment Recommendation No. 1.

However, since that time, unemployment compensation and employment policy have systematically been the subject of different standards. Thus, in 1934, the Conference adopted the Unemployment Provision Convention (No. 44) ensuring benefit or allowances to the involuntarily unemployed. As a result of the reform of national systems of unemployment compensation in numerous countries in recent years, Convention No. 44 has now become out of date. Long-term unemployment, the unemployment of young people, unemployment connected with the reintegration of women, changes in the structure of the labour market, new ways of organising working time, are all factors that have encouraged the member States of the ILO to tackle, in their national legislation, the problem of protection against unemployment by not only reacting to it but also by preventing it. And so, as part of its standard-setting activity, the Organisation decided to lay the foundations for new international instruments to revise the Convention of 1934, placing the problem of protection against unemployment in a context that highlights the economic element and the promotional role of the insurance scheme.

The Committee on Employment and Social Security, which was in charge of revising Convention No. 44, was concerned both last year during the initial discussion and this year, to draft international standards that, while directed towards the promotion and development of employment, would ensure unemployed people a decent standard of living. The report before you today for adoption therefore contains a Convention entitled “Convention concerning Employment Promotion and Protection against Unemployment”, supplemented by a Recommendation. The proposed resolution on the promotion of employment and social security, submitted by the Government delegation of Italy, which was examined by our Committee, was withdrawn by that delegation, because the Committee realised that it did not have the necessary time for a proper and detailed examination of that resolution.

What can I say after Mr. van den Berg, the Chairman of the Committee, Mr. Rey and Mr. Seidman have spoken? They have said nearly all there is to say on this Convention. Nevertheless, may I comment briefly on the high points of the debates contained in the Committee's report submitted to you today.

The Committee constantly tried to strike a balance between improving the level of protection of and the flexibility of the instruments to be adopted. How to draw up flexible provisions that would attract the greatest number of ratifications possible without, however, emasculating the international instruments, was the challenge that the Committee tried to meet.

The delegates on the Committee unanimously agreed to introduce into the Convention a chapter on the promotion of productive employment. The real solution to unemployment does not consist only in financial compensation for unemployment, but also in the promotion of both additional job opportunities and employment assistance.

The Convention and the Recommendation under discussion are without doubt international instruments adapted to the situations on the labour market of our times. These instruments should protect not less than 85 per cent of all employees against the risks of full or partial unemployment and unemployment for technical reasons. The rate and duration of compensation, the waiting time, the definition of suitable employment, the list of situations in which employment benefit may be suspended or reduced are all aspects which make the Convention and the Recommendation modern instruments assuring unemployed people of reasonable protection. At this stage, I cannot keep silent about the lively discussions on the possibility – which was finally included in the Convention – of refusing or suspending payment of unemployment benefit during a labour dispute. Mr. Seidman has just spoken of this at length.

Drawing up modern instruments is one thing; drawing up modern instruments that will be ratified by the greatest possible number of States is quite another matter. Thus, during their discussion, the members of the Committee never lost sight of the need to establish flexible provisions. The opportunities for member States of the ILO to apply temporary waivers and to exclude from the commitment resulting from ratification the provisions on new applicants for employment were the result of the efforts made by the Committee to achieve this flexibility.

I would finally draw your attention to Part IV of the Recommendation dealing with development and improvement of systems of protection. When revising the Convention of 1934, the Committee wanted to examine the problem of unemployment protection from a modern and dynamic point of view. However, it always bore in mind the fact that States that did not provide any protection against unemployment or which only had incipient social security systems, would feel that the level had been placed very high. This prompted the Committee to provide in the Recommendation for temporary waivers and in the Convention for provisions which States could use in order to develop or improve their systems of protection for unemployed people.

In conclusion, I should like to pay tribute to the high calibre of the work done by the Chairman of our Committee, Mr. van den Berg, and by the Vice-Chairmen, Mr. Rey and Mr. Seidman. Their knowledge of the subject and their experience contributed greatly to the smooth running of the Committee. We must not forget that Mr. Rey and Mr. Seidman were already at the helm last year. My warm thanks are also addressed to the Secretariat of the ILO – and in particular to Mr. Tamburi, Mr. Perrin and Mr. Voirin – who, by their availability and their advice, enabled the Committee to carry out the task entrusted to it.

The report of the Committee was adopted by its members on 17 June; before submitting it to you I wanted to make a few corrections to draft Convention but the Clerk of the Conference has done this for me. It merely remains therefore for me to commend the adoption of the report to the Conference.

Interpretation from German: Mr. ADAMY (Workers' adviser, Federal Republic of Germany) – The question of unemployment and the provision of a guaranteed minimum income for the unemployed is certainly not a new problem for the International Labour Organisation. At its very first session, the International Labour Conference adopted a Recommendation to the effect that: “each Member of the International Labour Organisation establish an effective system of unemployment insurance for the provision of social security for the unemployed.”

If we ask ourselves today whether we have achieved this objective, then we have to observe the fact that, quite on the contrary, we are still very far from this objective. In large areas of the world mass unemployment and underemployment are increasing and they are accompanied by poverty and misery.

According to the Report of the Director-General, there are roughly 900 million people in the developing countries today who are living in extreme poverty, in the Western industrialised countries, more than 30 million people are unemployed.

Certainly it is not possible to compare the grinding poverty of people living in developing countries with that of those living in industrialised countries; we must nevertheless greatly stress the fact that unemployment and employment below the level of the workers' qualifications are an unacceptable social burden for every affected worker, wherever he lives in the world.

Unfortunately, we are obliged to point out that, while we were revising this Convention, in rich industrialised countries such as the Federal Republic of Germany it is being considered how state benefits can be further reduced and how programmes concerning the labour market can be cut.

At the same time, we are seeing an increase in precarious employment conditions which cannot easily be covered by the social security system.

However, we must make sure that we do not allow a situation whereby the benefits for unemployment are reduced to a fair-weather institution, and benefits in cases of need are once more refused.

As in the past, the main question is how we can provide everyone with decent employment which enables them to live in dignity and in just and truly humane conditions. The struggle for jobs and guaranteed minimum income must be given an absolute priority because this fundamental human right has still not yet been implemented.

I would like to urge all the delegates to adopt this proposed Convention which is important to the unemployed throughout the world. We have had to wait for more than 50 years before we could revise the Unemployment Provision Convention 1934 (No. 44), which was drafted originally in the world economic crisis; since then important economic and social changes have taken place. The level of social development achieved at that time is far from being adequate for us today.

We worked very hard in the Conference Committee to try and prepare a Convention which would considerably improve the guaranteed minimum income of the unemployed. Despite all the progress made it is not possible, however, to overlook the serious weaknesses of this Convention.

We very much regret that essential standards – at least as regards the industrialised countries – do not even surpass those levels which had already become standard practice at the end of the 1920s, that is directly before the outbreak of the world economic crisis, in Germany, the Netherlands and other comparable countries. This applies not only to the duration of the benefits but also the level of the benefits and the length of the qualifying period.

We also consider it to be a problem that rich industrialised countries are allowed to offer even less than these minimum standards, sometimes by having recourse to exemptions. Although all member countries of the ILO committed themselves “to the extension of social security” measures to provide for social security under the Declaration of Philadelphia, two of the standards which arise from the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention 1952 (No. 102), can be temporarily suspended, even by the industrialised countries. The waiting period in the Convention which we have to adopt today can be extended beyond the waiting period laid down in Convention No. 102, and so the Convention in this respect is even retrograde if you compare it with the ruling of 1952.

We feel it is completely wrong that industrialised countries can lay claim to the degree of flexibility intended for the developing countries. But the purpose of this exemption rule is being stood completely on its head and the universal nature of the Convention is called into question, if the industrialised countries are also allowed to have recourse to these exemptions.

Such exemption clauses for economically comparable industrialised countries conjure up the danger that individual countries are trying to disengage themselves from other countries as regards their social policies. If this became widespread, we would find in the very heart of Europe countries with background social policies, who would then try to obtain competitive advantages at the expense of their neighbouring countries.

We would like to urge all the industrialised countries not to allow such a distorted situation to arise. The minimum standards of the ILO must be equally binding for all industrialised countries belonging to the ILO.

The world economic crisis at the end of the 1920s already showed us once before how catastrophic the consequences of a crisis strategy can be, which believes it can overcome employment problems by reducing wages and social security benefits.

In the past few years as well, workers and the unemployed in many areas of the world have had to make enormous sacrifices. However, unemployment has not been reduced, it has even increased. Very often the labour market and employment policies are still only seen as a mere by-product of general economic policy. However, the workers' impatience at the lack of government action to create jobs is increasing.

Although we are obliged by the Declaration of Philadelphia to implement a policy of full employment and to provide for social security based on solidarity, we have to note with regret the lack of political will to achieve these aims.

Although this revised Convention is essential, 40 years after the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, it still does not guarantee every individual the right to work or protection against basic poverty.

As in the past, we must make sure that the struggle against unemployment is the fulcrum of our economic and social policy. We must, at the same time, constantly be aware that without a comprehensive strategy to combat unemployment, the minimum guaranteed income will be under constant threat.

We must therefore make every effort to ensure that there is no repetition of the tragic and frightening events which were connected with the world economic depression and the subsequent destruction of Europe.

We must join forces to make sure that life can be breathed into this new Convention, in contrast to the preceding standard so that we can have a solution based on solidarity for employment problems.

The Workers feel that the subject of unemployment cannot in any way be regarded as having been solved by this new Convention.

We hope rather that our work in the Committee is the beginning of an effective employment policy which is committed to meeting the needs of millions of people throughout the world and which gives the highest priority to combating unemployment.

Therefore, I would like to ask you to adopt this Convention.

Interpretation from German: Mrs. ENGELN-KEFER (representative of the International Social Security Association) – In the name of the International Social Security Association, in which the Federal Employment Institution co-operates actively, I welcome the proposed Convention and Recommendation concerning Employment Promotion and Protection against Unemployment.

In view of high and increasing unemployment, not only in developing but also in industrialised countries, it is essential to review and, if necessary, to develop further, international standards aimed at protecting the unemployed and combating and preventing unemployment.

As is noted in the Preamble to the proposed instruments, in past years, we have seen the adoption of important Conventions and Recommendations for the improvement of employment opportunities, training, education and retraining, as well as the role of labour administration.

Ever since the inception of this Organisation, there have been standards on financial protection in the event of unemployment. However, for many years now the need for revision of these standards has been recognised. In addition, the Unemployment Provision Convention, 1934 (No. 44), which was adopted in 1934 at the height of the world depression, has since been ratified by only 14 countries.

The standards laid down in the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102), have already been overtaken in most industrialised countries.

Thus, there is an undisputed need, particularly from the point of view of existing unemployment insurance systems and labour administrations, for the elaboration of new instruments to adapt standards on protection of the unemployed to the current situation.

In our studies and technical meetings in ISSA we continue to realise how different the development of unemployment insurance systems has been not only between industrialised and developing countries, but also among industrialised countries themselves. Here, new international standards, which would contribute to world-wide harmonisation and improvement of unemployment protection, could be particularly helpful.

We welcome in particular the link drawn in the proposed instruments between regulations for financial protection in the event of unemployment and measures to combat and prevent unemployment through training, further training, assistance towards job integration, job creation schemes and vocational rehabilitation.

ISSA itself has extended the purview of its permanent committee on unemployment insurance to cover employment promotion. The recent ISSA meeting focused mainly on links between financial unemployment benefits and measures for further occupational training and job creation to combat unemployment.

Particularly from the viewpoint of the unemployment insurance systems and labour administrations concerned, the link between financial protection and labour market policy becomes increasingly clear.

An effective labour market policy can reduce unemployment and thus the costs of its financing. In my country, the Federal Republic of Germany, unemployment entails a total cost of approximately DM60 thousand million each year. There is a direct relationship between unemployment benefit and employment policy: the more effective the labour market policy, the less the cost required to finance unemployment.

In addition, the systems for the financing of unemployment insurance should be set up in such a way as to ensure that both workers and employers are provided with an incentive to go on actively seeking employment.

This, however, should not mean that unemployed persons would be forced to accept any job, even those for which they may be overqualified, simply in order to ensure their livelihood.

We therefore greatly welcome the fact that Article 21 of the proposed Convention contains provisions concerning the suitability of the job which is offered.

We must also stress the fact that financial protection should apply not only in the event of full unemployment but also in the case of partial unemployment. In view of the increasing number of lower-paid and more precarious part-time jobs, this is particularly important.

We in ISSA take a positive view of the agreement reached on concrete standards regarding the persons to be covered by financial protection, the minimum amount and duration of benefits, the calculation and amount of benefits and the conditions for entitlement, as well as the grounds for exclusion from benefits.

According to our investigations, these standards represent realistic levels which should make it possible for more of the ILO's member States to ratify the instruments and to give them effect.

In view of the continuing difficult situation in developing countries, it is entirely appropriate to provide for gradual application of these standards by exemptions laid down in the standards. In many developing countries, ratification will be made easier, thus helping each country to gradually improve unemployment protection according to its own level of development.

Ratification of the proposed Convention will also in some industrialised countries be made easier by the fact that exceptions could initially be made for two of the proposed standards in the event of ratification. Convention No. 102 provides for the possibility of social security systems gradually assuming obligations, as well as exemptions within individual social security systems, such exemptions being restricted to economic and medical developments.

Such exemptions for industrialised countries as proposed in the present text are a particularly critical balancing act for the ILO. The decisive significance of the Convention lies in the fact that it lays down minimum standards which should be binding on the largest possible number of member States. The relevant deliberations and results of the International Labour Conference lose their significance if increasing provision is made in international standards for exemptions, especially when these are not restricted to developing countries, but are also extended to industrialised countries. It may well be that it is just such difficult standards concerning financial protection in the event of unemployment, which call for more flexible application. This, however, should not become a general precedent for future ILO standards. Even in the future, we must insist on the fact that exemptions from international standards in Conventions must be kept to a minimum.

The magic word "flexibility" which one increasingly hears at both national and international levels should not be evoked or applied in a biased way to the detriment or advantage of certain social groups. Otherwise the central function of the ILO – international standards – would become meaningless. This would be highly regrettable from the viewpoint of international social insurance institutions, both at the national and the international level.

That being said, on behalf of ISSA, I propose that the report and the instruments contained in it be adopted.

Mr. MAH (Employers' delegate, Singapore) – I thank you for the opportunity to say a few words, not sure whether, from a small country like Singapore, it is worth while for all the delegates and members of the Conference to listen to me. However, I shall try to do my best.

Having listened to all the statements from the Chairman of the Committee on Employment and Social Security, from the Employers' Vice-Chairman Mr. Rey, and from the Workers' Vice-Chairman, Mr. Seidman, I thought I should make a few observations. After all, Singapore is a newly developed, or should I say, new developing country and I feel that one or two observations might be useful.

To begin with, let me say Singapore employers support the Convention and the Recommendation proposed by the Committee on Employment and Social Security. The Convention sets up standards for developing countries to aspire to and to achieve. It also provides a great deal of flexibility under the Recommendation for us to be able to commence practical action in achieving a better society, a better world, for all of us in the developing countries.

Perhaps one thing is missing in the whole debate. There is insufficient reference to the necessity to create wealth before there can be any creation of productive employment.

I said in the deliberations of the Committee during the past two weeks that I feel that the objectives are very desirable but there have been insufficient reference to the need to create wealth before there can be any creation of employment and of social security.

In Singapore, we support the creation of employment and a higher standard of living. This we have achieved through the emphasis on the necessity for the creation of wealth in the first place.

May I inform my fellow delegates and participants to this Conference that in 1985 and 1986 Singapore went through a period of severe recession. We lost 120,000 jobs and unemployment reached 6.5 per cent. But through the united efforts of the workers, the Government and employers in looking after the common interest of Singapore, we were able to create sufficient recovery, and the economy has now recovered to the extent that in the first quarter of 1988, the GDP (gross domestic product) has grown by 10.9 per cent, and overall recovery in 1988 was 8.8 per cent as against 1.8 per cent negative growth in 1986. This we have done because of the necessity to create wealth, and I may tell you that unemployment today in Singapore is only 2.5 per cent, which is very marginal unemployment. We are now in a situation of gross shortage of labour and the problem is how to find sufficient people to do the job, to meet the requirements of the new demand for labour in our economy.

So, the only point I want to make is this: while we must protect the unfortunate, the disadvantaged members of our community, there must be first a determined effort to create wealth. If we do not do that, then we cannot create productive employment.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – We shall now move on to the adoption of the report of the Committee on Employment and Social Security, paragraphs 1 to 219. If there are no objections, I shall take it that the report is adopted.

(The report, paragraphs 1 to 219, is adopted.)

PROPOSED CONVENTION CONCERNING EMPLOYMENT PROMOTION AND PROTECTION AGAINST UNEMPLOYMENT, SUBMITTED BY THE COMMITTEE ON EMPLOYMENT AND SOCIAL SECURITY: ADOPTION

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – We shall now proceed to the adoption of the proposed Convention concerning employment promotion and protection against unemployment, beginning with the Preamble.

(The Preamble is adopted.)

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – We now move on to the operative part of the proposed Convention, which we shall adopt Article by Article.

(Articles 1 to 31 are adopted seriatim.)

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – May I take it that the proposed Convention is adopted as a whole?

(The proposed Convention is adopted as a whole.)

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – I have a request for the floor from Mr. Leoro Franco, Government delegate, Ecuador, who wishes to explain the vote of his delegation.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. LEORO FRANCO (Government delegate, Ecuador) – In the laudable process of providing social protection for all members of society, measures which attempt to improve or promote such protection, particularly for workers, are bound to meet with general acceptance. Nevertheless, not all member States of the ILO, and particularly Ecuador, are in a position to enter into such commitments, which it could not fulfil in its present financial and economic situation, as well as in view of its countless social needs.

Unfortunately, the compensation envisaged for protected persons in the proposed Convention on employment promotion and protection against unemployment, which has been submitted by the Committee on Employment Promotion and Social Security to the Conference, cannot be accepted at the present time by the Government of Ecuador or by the Ecuadorian Social Security Institute which, despite tremendous financial difficulties, has been extending its coverage to rural workers.

I should like to state therefore that Ecuador will have to abstain in respect of the proposed Convention, and that this is due solely to the compelling reasons given.

It is hoped that in the future once the present crisis has been overcome and the concept of true international economic co-operation has been restored, the proposed commitments can be not only accepted, but also implemented which is what matters.

The Government of Ecuador is aware of the need to assure social protection little by little, even for unemployment. No country could desire full employment more than mine, but the proposed Convention is not within its possibilities as a developing country at the present time.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – In accordance with article 40, paragraph 6, of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the provisions of the proposed Convention concerning employment promotion and protection against unemployment, as adopted by the Conference, will be referred to the Drafting Committee of the Conference for the preparation of the final text.

PROPOSED RECOMMENDATION CONCERNING EMPLOYMENT PROMOTION AND PROTECTION AGAINST UNEMPLOYMENT, SUBMITTED BY THE COMMITTEE ON EMPLOYMENT AND SOCIAL SECURITY: ADOPTION

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – We now move on to the adoption of the proposed Recommendation concerning employment promotion and protection against unemployment, beginning with the Preamble.

(The Preamble is adopted.)

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – We shall now proceed to the adoption of the operative part of the Recommendation, Paragraph by Paragraph.

(Paragraphs 1 to 30 are adopted seriatim.)

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – May I take it that the proposed Recommendation is adopted as a whole?

(The proposed Recommendation is adopted as a whole.)

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – In accordance with article 40, paragraph 6, of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the provisions of the proposed Recommendation concerning employment promotion and protection against unemployment ment as adopted by the Conference, will be referred to the Drafting Committee of the Conference for the preparation of the final text.

Now that we have adopted the instruments, I would like to thank the members of the Committee for the work they have done. I would particularly like to thank the Chairman of the Committee, Mr. van den Berg, the Employers' and Workers' Vice-Chairmen, Mr. Rey and Mr. Seidman, and the Reporter, Mr. Schneuwly. Their excellent work has enabled our Conference to adopt a fine document.

(The Conference adjourned at 5 p.m.)

President: Mr. Beyreuther

RATIFICATION OF A CONVENTION BY FINLAND

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – I have pleasure in announcing to the Conference that the Director-General of the ILO has registered the ratification by Finland of the Asbestos Convention, 1986 (No. 162).

This brings the total number of ratifications of international labour Conventions to 5,380.

FOURTH REPORT OF THE CREDENTIALS COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND NOTING

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – The first item on our agenda is the fourth report of the Credentials Committee.

I call on Mr. Nakamura, Government delegate, Japan, Chairman of the Committee, to present the report.

Mr. NAKAMURA (Government delegate, Japan; Chairman of the Credentials Committee) – I have the honour to submit to the Conference the fourth report of the Credentials Committee contained in Provisional Record No. 29. In this report you will find the Committee's decisions on the objections concerning the Employers' delegate of Nicaragua and the Workers' delegation of Poland; it also contains two communications, one concerning the Employers' delegation of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and the other from the Chairman of the Employers' group and three Employers' delegates.

As regards the objection concerning the Employers' delegate of Nicaragua, the Committee took note of the fact that the suggestion to set up an impartial body to examine the conflicting data on the representative character of the employers' organisation in Nicaragua, which had been made by the Credentials Committee last year, was not carried out. At the same time, the Committee took note of the willingness expressed by the Government to respect any agreement reached between the employers' organisations concerned. In this respect, the Committee considered that as a prerequisite to such an agreement, it would be essential for there to exist a means agreed by the organisations for evaluating their representative character. I therefore suggested that the International Labour Office, given its experience, might be able to offer assistance to the parties concerned in relation to the question.

With respect to the objections concerning the Workers' delegation of Poland, the Committee noted with interest this year that the Government has consulted trade union groups outside of the All-Poland Trade Union Alliance (OPZZ), which itself represented a substantial portion of Polish workers. In this regard, it asks the Government to continue to take measures in the spirit of dialogue with which its participation in the activities of the ILO had been marked so that the Workers' delegation of Poland would be fully representative of all the workers of Poland.

The Committee also noted that one country had failed to respond to its request for information so that it was not possible for it to carry out in this case the mandate entrusted to it under article 26 of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

Since the decisions contained in this report were reached unanimously by the Credentials Committee, the Conference is requested only to take note of it.

Following the signing of this report by the Committee, which marked the conclusion of its work, it received a communication from the Government of the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan stating that, with reference to paragraph 8 of the second report of the Credentials Committee containing the reservations made by Pakistan, the delegation of the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan reaffirmed its Government's position in the matter which it had already expressed at the last session of the United Nations General Assembly.

This brings us to the end of the work of the Credentials Committee which this year had before it nine objections and five communications. I would like to take this opportunity to express my warm thanks to my two colleagues, the Employers' member, Mr. Hoff, and the Workers' member, Mr. Svenningsen, and the Secretariat for their efficient and friendly co-operation. Because of this excellent spirit which prevailed throughout our discussions, the Committee was able to reach unanimous decisions on all the cases before it.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – I have received a letter concerning this report from Mr. Meza Soza, Government member, Nicaragua. With his agreement I would like to ask the Clerk of the Conference to read the letter to the Conference.

Interpretation from Spanish: The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE – This letter is written in Spanish and I will therefore read it in that language. It is dated Geneva, 21 June 1988.

The Government delegation of Nicaragua has taken note of the decision of the Credentials Committee on the challenge to the credentials of the UNAG delegate and other Employers' delegates attending this Conference.

who were appointed by the Government of Nicaragua following the failure of the employers' organisations in the country to reach agreement among themselves.

We regret that once again this Committee has chosen not to believe the figures relating to representativeness advanced by the Government and has failed to recognise that the delegates concerned were appointed in accordance with the wishes of the great majority of the employers attending the Conference, who represent all sectors of the economy.

The Government of Nicaragua has made numerous efforts to resolve the disputes over the representativeness of UNAG fomented by COSEP and the International Organisation of Employers. To solve the problem, we have proposed a system of alternation but even this has been rejected by COSEP – which incidentally has lost much of its representativity over the past few years, contrary to the asseveration of the Committee. This claim to absolute representativeness excludes the possibility of other employers' organisations attending the Conference as advisers if the COSEP representative is the titular delegate. In these circumstances, we nevertheless wish to reiterate the Nicaraguan Government's readiness to accept willingly any solution that the Nicaraguan employers' organisation may agree upon in this connection.

Yours faithfully,

(Signed) Adrian MEZA SOZA,
Government delegation, Nicaragua,
75th Session of the International Labour Conference

Interpretation from French: Mr. OECHSLIN (Employers' delegate, France) – My group has asked me to make a brief statement on paragraphs 32 and 33 of the report and it was not my intention to comment on the various cases relating to challenges to credentials submitted by the Committee.

Having heard the letter from the Nicaraguan Minister I would simply note in passing that, as far as I know, COSEP has never refused the idea that representatives of other organisations form part, as technical advisers, of the Employers' delegation of their country. But that is not why I am speaking.

I would like to draw your attention to the fact that the list of accredited delegates and advisers that you find in Provisional Record No. 6 and that of the registered delegates in Provisional Record No. 9 give only a partial and distorted picture as regards the composition of the Conference, and therefore makes the calculation of the quorum wrong. I will give you a few figures. On 13 June, that is to say, two weeks after the beginning of the Conference, in our group we had at least ten Employers' delegates who were accredited but who had not come to Geneva. These included our colleagues from Burkina Faso, Cape Verde, Dominican Republic, El Salvador, Guatemala, the Solomon Islands, Papua New Guinea, Zaire, Sierra Leone and Lesotho. Some of these colleagues had been registered in their absence, which of course is most irregular and produced an incorrect quorum calculation. For 11 countries there was no accredited delegation: Belize, Costa Rica, Djibouti, Dominica, Fiji, Democratic Kampuchea, the People's Democratic Republic of Laos, Paraguay, St. Lucia, Sao Tome and Principe and the Seychelles. In the great majority of cases we are assured that the reason for the absence of these delegates was that the governments had not been able to finance the travel, either of the delegation as a whole, or of the Employers' delegate, even when he had been nominated.

We carried out an inquiry in our group and we found that at least 13 governments – Bahrain, Brazil, Colombia, Gabon, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Lebanon, Yemen and six other countries – have not respected their constitutional obligation of paying the travel and living expenses of their non-governmental delegates and the figure would be 25 were you to count cases in which the travel costs or living expenses of the Employers' technical advisers have not been paid by the governments.

For years now we have been drawing the attention of the Credentials Committee to a situation which is tending to worsen in this Conference and also in regional conferences. We hope that in Harare, for the African Regional Conference, we will be faced with a better situation.

We are very happy that the Credentials Committee this year should have agreed to name three countries concerned. This is progress and we hope that this will lead the governments better to respect their constitutional obligations and we hope that this will encourage the Office to draw more precisely the attention of governments to their constitutional obligations.

Is the fact of not paying delegations within the terms of reference of the Credentials Committee? Views differ on this subject, but it appears to me that not paying, or not giving a delegate the means to be able to come to Geneva, amounts to the same as not appointing him, and this can have extremely detrimental consequences on the problems of the quorum and we know how important problems of quorum are at this Conference. We therefore think that this is an important problem, a constitutional problem, and if we continue down this road there will be many Employers' organisations that will not designate representatives and the result of this, according to our Constitution, will be that they will also deprive the Workers' delegates of their right to vote. Therefore I urge the Director-General whose good offices have been asked for in order to help the Working Party of the Governing Body that is examining these questions to think about this situation in which about 20 per cent of our group are totally or partially absent from our work.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – Since the fourth report of the Credentials Committee was adopted unanimously by the Credentials Committee, I invite the Conference to take note of it.

(The report is noted.)

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON CONVENTION No. 107: SUBMISSION

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – We now proceed to the report of the Committee on Convention No. 107 which is in Provisional Record No. 32.

I should like to ask the officers of the Committee to come to the rostrum. Mr. España-Smith, Government delegate, Bolivia, Chairman of the Committee; Mr. Díaz Garaycoa, Employers' adviser, Ecuador, the Employers' Vice-Chairman; Mr. Svenningsen, Workers' delegate, Denmark, the Workers' Vice-Chairman; and Mr. Helms, Government member, Denmark, the Reporter.

I call on Mr. España-Smith, Chairman of the Committee, to present the report.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. ESPAÑA-SMITH (Government delegate, Bolivia; Chairman of the Committee on Convention No. 107) – I have had the great honour of chairing the Committee entrusted with the partial revision of Convention No. 107 which, as you all know, was adopted in 1957 and deals with indigenous and tribal populations. The revision, which has been carried out in the course of this year, was the first reading, that is the first discussion of this issue.

I was able to enjoy in the Committee the valuable co-operation of Mr. Díaz Garaycoa, Employers' Vice-Chairman of the Committee, and that of Mr. Svenningsen, Vice-Chairman of the Committee representing the Workers' members. The support of both, the support of their groups and the support of the governments that participated in the proceedings of this Committee was decisive in ensuring that our work came to a successful conclusion.

For my country, Bolivia, to chair this Committee was of particular significance, since we are a country with a large number of indigenous populations, and one whose characteristics are essentially pluricultural. I think it is worth mentioning in this context that Convention No. 107 and the accompanying Recommendation were adopted at the time when the ILO was administering the Andean Programme and Bolivia was then one of the principal countries where this well-known indigenous programme of technical co-operation was being implemented.

Convention No. 107 is the only international instrument specifically conceived to protect these important groups of human beings.

The indigenous and tribal populations represent a total of nearly 300 million people in the world. As the report of the ILO indicates, these peoples are among the least protected, they are in fact the poorest of the rural poor.

Perhaps the main reason why it was felt necessary to revise this Convention was the fact that, after 30 years of existence, it was becoming clear that the indigenous populations were anxious for its integrationist approach – with all this term's connotations of assimilation – to be reconsidered.

Indeed, if there is something we should remember in the light of the new concepts, the new sociological and anthropological insights, and on the basis of experience, it is that the indigenous and tribal populations have never ceased to affirm their own cultural identity.

We can now see that this same process of integration into a national society is only possible if there is recognition of equality and of the specific cultural, social and economic characteristics of these populations.

I would like to highlight the positive and constructive results of the Committee's deliberations. In addition to the important presence of the various Government delegations and representatives of the Employers and Workers, the Committee also had the dynamic support of the Office through Mr. Ali, as representative of the Director-General, and Mr. Swebston.

I would like to draw special attention to the fact, which I consider to have been highly important, that the Committee, in revising the Convention, had the opportunity of personally hearing the subject of the Convention, namely the indigenous populations themselves, who were represented in various ways.

First of all, there were various indigenous representatives on the government delegations and also on the Employers' and Workers' delegations. The indigenous populations were also represented by various non-governmental organisations accredited as the direct representatives of the indigenous and tribal populations.

These organisations were given an opportunity of expressing their views through a general presentation and also in relation to each of the main chapters of the Convention.

A number of other governmental organisations were also present, and gave support and assistance to the indigenous populations. In view of all this, I would like to say that the presence of representatives of the indigenous populations, as well as of the organisations acting for them, greatly facilitated the work of the Committee, in particular by enabling us to hear their aspirations, their concerns and their points of view at first hand.

It is important to stress the fact that the Committee drafted a number of conclusions with a view to a revised Convention that would have a new philosophical approach based on recognition of the specific identity of the indigenous populations and their right to participate in the decision-making process in all questions and programmes that directly affect them, that is to say, to participate in the taking of decisions and the determination of their own destiny.

The conclusions reached by the Committee propose that the measures to protect the integrity of the indigenous populations should be considerably strengthened, and also clearly set out both the rights and the obligations of the indigenous populations.

For the purposes of this Convention, measures should be taken, firstly to enable members of the indigenous populations to benefit on an equal footing from the rights and opportunities which national laws and regulations grant to other members of the population; secondly, to promote the full realisation of the social, economic and cultural rights of these sectors of the populations; and, thirdly, to assist the members of the indigenous populations to raise their standard of living at least to that enjoyed by other members of the national community in a manner compatible with the aspirations and ways of life of these populations.

As can be expected, in view of the fact that this was a first round of discussions and that there were very diverse and heterogeneous opinions on various issues, some subjects undoubtedly caused particular difficulties. There was, for instance, the question of the use of the word "peoples" or "populations". Various points of view were expressed in the Committee. It was felt that the term "populations" is, according to a deeply felt opinion of the indigenous populations, merely a cold statistical expression, whereas the word "peoples" represents an identity, with a social and cultural content.

On this delicate subject, the Committee, in seeking to reach agreement, explored ways and means of maintaining the use of the word "peoples" without giving it in any way the connotation it bears in international law or in certain international instruments.

Another subject on which there were differing views was that of land. This is a thorny question because it relates to the use of natural resources and implies that a wise and equitable balance has to be found between the interests of the State and the national society as a whole and the interests and survival of the tribal and indigenous populations.

In any event, it is a subject which, in my view, should be guided by the respective national laws of the different countries which reflect the many different situations in the various regions of the world.

Despite the differences of opinion and variety of views expressed in the Committee, I have the feeling that, on those two subjects – which remain pending for decision next year – the Committee succeeded in indicating certain paths, which could well converge in a harmonious solution, which would, at the same time, embody the interests of the indigenous populations and the aspirations of their social counterpart groups and safeguard the interests of the ILO member States.

To this end, we should take advantage of what remains of this year, and also of the coming year, until there is a second discussion of the Convention, to mature ideas and to hold the appropriate consultations.

Bearing in mind, too, that the indigenous and tribal populations are obviously the most interested parties and will actively participate in such consultations, we hope that governments will strengthen their procedures for consultation of and the exchange of information with the organisations representing these populations.

I also have the hope that the ILO will make its technical services available in order to further strengthen the possibilities of consultation with a view to a successful partial revision of the Convention at the next session of the International Labour Conference.

In conclusion, I would like to make one comment: I merely wish to recall that the adoption of this Convention – because I hope it will be adopted in 1989 – will coincide symbolically with the 70th anniversary of the creation of the International Labour Organisation.

FINAL RECORD VOTE ON THE CONVENTION CONCERNING EMPLOYMENT PROMOTION AND PROTECTION AGAINST UNEMPLOYMENT

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – We are obliged to interrupt the discussion of the report of the Committee on Convention No. 107 to take a final record vote on the Convention concerning employment promotion and protection against unemployment.

(A record vote is taken.)

(The detailed results of the vote will be found at the end of the record of this sitting.)

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – The results of the final record vote on the Convention concerning employment promotion and protection against unemployment is as follows: 366 votes in favour, none against, with 26 abstentions. As the quorum is 259, I have the pleasure of informing you that the Convention is adopted.

(The Convention is adopted.)

FINAL RECORD VOTE ON THE RECOMMENDATION CONCERNING EMPLOYMENT PROMOTION AND PROTECTION AGAINST UNEMPLOYMENT

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – We now move on to the final record vote on the Recommendation concerning employment promotion and protection against unemployment.

(A record vote is taken.)

(The detailed results of the vote will be found at the end of the record of this sitting.)

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – The result of the final record vote on the Recommendation concerning employment promotion and protection against unemployment is as follows: 375 in favour, none against, with 17 abstentions. As the quorum is 259, the Recommendation is adopted.

(The Recommendation is adopted.)

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – I give the floor to Mrs. Rocca, Government adviser, Italy, to explain the vote of her delegation.

Interpretation from French: Mrs. ROCCA (Government adviser, Italy) – The Italian Government wishes to express its satisfaction at the conclusion of the work on the Convention concerning employment promotion and protection against unemployment and its accompanying Recommendation.

The fact that we were able, after having worked so hard and in depth, to attain valid and innovative legal solutions in such a delicate and complex field, represents a real success on the part of our Organisation. We are familiar with the considerable difficulties existing at present between the various national legislations. The system of standards which has been defined concentrates on the interaction between the social security systems and employment promotion; it is characterised by a qualitative difference because of its scope which goes beyond the general assistance granted by States.

Nevertheless my Government could not refrain from underlining the fact that by introducing greater flexibility in this instrument as we proposed – flexibility based on a principle of equivalence of legal protection – it would have made it easier for the member States to ratify the Convention.

Let us not forget the concern expressed by the Director-General of the ILO, as well as by our Minister of Labour, on the very low level of ratification of the most recent ILO Conventions. It would have undoubtedly helped if the resolution on the same subject, submitted by the Italian Government, had been adopted. Unfortunately, this resolution was not adequately discussed, because of the lack of time allotted to it. The resolution in question, which sets out to rationalise public funds for assistance in the framework of an active employment promotion policy, would no doubt have made a significant contribution through the appropriate planning of studies and research, and would doubtless also have encouraged a more positive attitude on the part of the member States to this Convention. We would like to express our thanks to the Government of Sweden and to the other many member States who gave their support to our resolution. We hope that the objectives proposed may be achieved at the next Conference.

In the light of these considerations, the Italian Government, whilst reaffirming its attitude – which on the whole is positive – towards the legal instruments that the Conference has just adopted, cannot but express its concern as regards the present possibility for ratification of the Convention; and this is despite the well-known willingness of Italy to ratify Conventions. Indeed, Italy has ratified a large number of international labour Conventions which have been incorporated into its national legislation.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. ARBELOA (Employers' adviser, Venezuela) – We abstained in the vote on both of these instruments because unfortunately paragraph 211 of the report distorts the statement made in the Committee by the Employers' members of the Latin American countries. I should like to read the full text of this statement with a view to its being included in the record of this session: "Although we agree in principle with the objectives of the proposed Convention and Recommendation, we can accept them only with certain reservations inasmuch as our developing countries, heavily burdened by external debts are committed to the establishment of national priorities aimed at ensuring the best investment of our very scarce resources; these must be used to promote and create productive employment, avoiding unemployment, underemployment and the further expansion of the informal economy. Consequently, it is extremely difficult for our countries to accept new burdens or obligations which, even though well-intentioned, would endanger the priorities I have mentioned and the efforts being made to stimulate badly needed investments. We are convinced that only in this way will we fully abide by one of the fundamental aspects of human rights, namely ensuring more and better productive and decent jobs for the people of our region. For these reasons we agree with the resolution in its revised version, presented by the Government of Italy, and we hope that its objectives will be taken into consideration by the ILO in the near future, in the light of the situation in the developing countries. Furthermore, it should be borne in mind that the Latin American position is consistent with the contents of the conclusions concerning the promotion of small and medium-sized enterprises adopted by the Conference in 1986 and the conclusions of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment held last November in Geneva. We also endorse the conclusions reached unanimously by the meeting of Latin American Employers (Quito, March 1988), which rejected the creation of compulsory funds of the type provided for in Paragraph 30 of the proposed Recommendation."

This much said, we repeat that our vote would otherwise have been cast in favour of the instruments adopted by the Committee, albeit with certain reservations.

REPLY OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL TO THE DISCUSSION OF HIS REPORT

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – I now have the honour to invite Mr. Francis Blanchard, Director-General of the ILO, to give his reply to the discussion of his Report.

Interpretation from French: The SECRETARY-GENERAL – Once again I have the honour of responding to the general debate in which 285 speakers, including 117 Ministers, took part. Allow me to thank them for their speeches in which all, without exception, welcomed the fact that the theme of human rights, the subject of my Report to this 75th Session, served as the basis for your discussion.

It goes without saying that I was particularly interested in the views expressed by Mr. Felipe Gonzáles, the President of the Government of Spain, and by Mrs. Corazón C. Aquino, the President of the Republic of the Philippines. Their visits were two great moments during this 75th Session. Before leaving Geneva, they assured me that they had been touched by the warmth of your welcome. In their remarkably broad-minded and thought-provoking speeches, both expressed their unconditional support for our Organisation's activities. In welcoming these eminent persons, the Conference illustrated the esteem in which it holds these two nations which have fought to restore democracy.

Am I right in thinking that after so many years during which the theme of human rights has given rise to acrimonious exchanges, this Conference perhaps has shown that it is possible, as I had hoped, for countries too long divided by excessive zeal in the defence of this or that ideology, to use the same language? This Conference has shown that the problem of human rights can now be discussed and studied in depth, certainly without naivety, but also without scepticism. Without being naive because each of us is conscious of the limitations of an international organisation in this field. Without scepticism because, as this debate has shown, considerable work has been done, particularly by the International Labour Organisation. Let us note with satisfaction that some countries, often inclined in the past to overlook their problems or to hide them, this year have chosen to speak of them. This is significant, for is it not true that in order to make headway in this difficult field we have to give dialogue a chance, to exchange views and experiences? We should remember that it is not wise to make value judgements before we are familiar with the facts and the situations, and that we should not apply to the others a moral standard that we are not ready to apply to ourselves. The dialogue we have undertaken at this Conference is essential, particularly between countries that for too long have been divided on this issue. We must keep this dialogue alive.

The Conference did not confine itself to discussing the subject of human rights in the plenary. It undertook again this year to strengthen the ILO's action by approving the conclusions reached by the Committee entrusted with so-called technical questions, but which, as you well know, entailed political judgements and choices, in the best sense of the term.

This was the case for the Committee on the Application of Standards, whose work, once again highly appreciated, reflects the zeal and care of its members. Might I publicly express our admiration to Mr. Houthuys, Workers' Vice-Chairman; although his retirement is announced every year, I know everyone here hopes it will take place only when he is truly ready. The Committee on the Application of Standards, like any other supervisory body of our Organisation, however elaborate, does not have the sort of instruments that States can establish by virtue of their sovereignty. In the present state of the international community, it is through the persuasion, conciliation, direct contacts and hearings of the Committee that we make progress, as again was the case this year. Its report demonstrates this. But at the same time, the Committee observed that a great deal still remains to be done, in particular to guarantee the application of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111). The Committee on the Application of Standards expressed satisfaction with the remarkable general survey carried out by the Committee of Experts last March on problems of discrimination in employment and occupation. I hope that governments, employers and workers, that all of you – once you return to your respective countries – will publicise this study and the discussion that took place in the Committee. Unfortunately there still remains a considerable gap between the realities in the different member countries and the principles of dignity, liberty and equality proclaimed by these two fundamental Conventions – Nos. 87 and 111 – and other related standards.

In this respect I am pleased that you, Mr. President, have set the tone by affirming in your opening speech that by ratifying international Conventions, “States (...) assume the responsibility for implementing the appropriate standards.” The delegations were clearly sensitive to your comments, because no delegation invited to provide information to the Committee on the Application of Standards failed this year to fulfil that obligation.

The partial revision of Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107), was a challenge for the Conference, and no one who spoke on this subject or participated in the corresponding Committee failed to recognise this. Mr. Tytler, Minister of State for Labour of India, declared that this issue was the most crucial for his country. It is true that it is a problem that affects 300 million people from every continent. For a long time the ILO had hoped to improve their lot. Convention No. 107, adopted in 1957, tried to do this. But more than 30 years have passed and the situation has changed. The objective now to be sought is to help these populations through appropriate standards and action, to retain their identities and to live according to their traditions and their culture. This is the direction in which the Committee has moved; its work will be concluded next year, culminating, I hope, in the unanimous adoption of a text which will meet their needs. Many non-governmental organisations concerned with the fate of indigenous and tribal populations attended this session of the Conference. They were legitimately interested in expressing their views. I am pleased that governments were sensitive to that interest and that some of them invited eminent persons from these populations to form part of their delegations. During the coming year the Office will fulfil its obligation to pursue the necessary consultations and will put before the Conference proposals to serve as the basis for the instrument which will be considered by the 76th Session of the Conference next year. Along the way, the Office will maintain the close contacts it has established with the United Nations and the specialised agencies, in particular the WHO, FAO and UNESCO, and also with the High Commissioner for Refugees. I would like to take this opportunity to thank their representatives for their active participation in the work of this Committee.

The Governing Body had decided to propose to the Conference that it consider the problem of rural development within the context of a general discussion by a Committee of the Conference. The outcome of a general discussion is always uncertain. However, the Committee on Rural Employment has removed any doubts we might have had by proposing a set of conclusions which is particularly rich in substance, based on a policy of “ruralisation”, as one delegate put it, by analogy with the policy of industrialisation which is so often evoked or invoked, in support of development policies. The Committee warned against the excesses of unbridled price and market forces. It proposed concrete ways of stimulating rural employment including growth, modernisation of the rural sector, agrarian reform accompanied by adequate support measures, and the opening up of the markets of developed countries to exports from developing countries. The Office will draw inspiration from these conclusions when it is asked to provide additional assistance. I had the opportunity during this session to speak with many Ministers and government employers’ and workers’ delegates; they shared with me their objectives and their hopes, but also their fears in the face of a too low rate of growth, persistent unemployment and poverty and the often dramatic drop in the prices of commodities. And here I would particularly like to highlight something which struck me perhaps more than in previous years: the serious preoccupations expressed by the representatives of African countries which have been struck not only by natural disasters, but also by stagnation or negative growth. They have been unable to find sufficient economic stimulus either internally or in their trading and other relations with developed countries. The appeals for greater assistance which my staff and I have heard and carefully noted are a great challenge to our institution. I will come back to this question in a few minutes.

But first, might I briefly recall the results of the other Conference Committees which have also enriched the discussions in plenary on the theme of the common responsibility of all the member States to guarantee the respect of human rights. The Committee on Employment and Social Security deserves special mention. I think that its work will constitute a milestone. It has proposed new standards on unemployment, contained in a Convention and a Recommendation, that ought to be broadly accepted because they propose sound objectives and are drawn up in terms that are sufficiently flexible to make them acceptable by the largest possible number of member States. With these instruments, the Conference has concluded its programme which it started 25 years ago, to revise all the social security Conventions adopted between the two world wars. I would like to add that this is the first time that international standards have given so much importance to the necessary relationship between prevention and redress. The instruments drawn up this year to revise the Safety Provisions (Building) Convention, 1937 (No. 62) is also of considerable significance. This is a very wide field of activities and I think that we should be pleased by the wish demonstrated by employers and workers to draw up texts that will contribute to guaranteeing more effectively the safety and health of workers in construction. By adopting them unanimously they have to some degree morally committed themselves with governments to apply them in daily practice.

Thus, this session will have marked an important stage in adapting the Labour Code to the problems of society today. That is a good thing, because I believe that the task of our Organisation in the years to come should be to develop international standards which serve the interests of the largest possible number of countries.

It is with good reason that the Committee that examined the Report it was my honour to submit once again to the Conference on Apartheid, should now be entitled the Committee on Action against Apartheid, and not simply the Committee on Apartheid. This change is not fortuitous. It is in response to a good intention and the updating of the 1981 Declaration demonstrates this. This year, 1988, through which we are passing, is marked for the International Labour Organisation by some very important stages in this battle against apartheid. I will recall them briefly. A tripartite conference was held in Harare from 3 to 6 May and everybody agrees that it did a remarkable job. In many respects we owe to it the elements that we have used for updating the Declaration. It emphasised the usefulness of the assistance provided by the Office to the front-line States. It allowed the trade union organisations in South Africa, COSATU and NACTU, to strengthen their links with our Organisation at a time when the new legislation that South Africa is preparing is threatening trade union rights. I would like to thank the Government of Zimbabwe and, first and foremost, Mr. Nkomo, Minister of Labour, not only for the hospitality shown to that conference, but for the masterly way in which he directed its work. I would remind you that Mr. Nkomo chaired with equal skill the Committee on Action against Apartheid at this 75th Session. I would add that in accordance with tradition he will be the President of the African Regional Conference that will be held in Harare next November, again thanks to the great generosity of the Zimbabwe Government. That Conference will have on its agenda the problem of the fight against apartheid, amongst many other important problems. Our Organisation will not relax its efforts to help the workers of South Africa to obtain equality of rights and opportunity and to roll back the policies and practices of apartheid. In the same way, it will continue to help Namibia so that country will finally be able to know independence not solely in texts or decisions by international bodies, including the International Labour Conference, but reality; that is, in the daily lives of the men and women of that country who will have had their freedom restored. Here I am echoing the eloquent appeal from this rostrum to the international community by Mr. Nujoma, the President of SWAPO.

A remarkable feature of this debate has been that it has supported in the most categorical terms the proposals made last November by the High-Level Meeting, which was held at the headquarters of our Organisation and under its auspices, on the problems of structural adjustment and employment. What, briefly, was the message of this meeting? First of all, it proposed that adjustment policies should be formulated and applied in such a way that the most underprivileged or poorest groups, who have suffered greatly from the harshness of these policies, should cease to bear the brunt of their effects. Secondly the meeting defined objectives and measures covering both the economic and the social dimension of development. The presence at the High-Level Meeting of the heads or representatives of the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank, the OECD, GATT and other organisations alongside the ILO, is perhaps – in fact I believe it is – the first step down a path which in the years to come is likely to lead these organisations to adopt the same premises, which, indeed, no longer differ as they did, and to use the same language and advocate the same policies, which are intended in the final analysis to bring about an improvement in the lot of the greatest number. The proposals of the High-Level Meeting, endorsed by the Governing Body, answer the concern of many Government, Employer and Worker delegates, who have expressed from this rostrum their anxiety at the persistence of unemployment and poverty, the permanence of indebtedness and the dangers of protectionism. But it is to be noted that at the very time this debate has been taking place, a few signs have emerged which give grounds for hope that the world economy may be able once again to find the path towards growth. Figures have been published showing that in the industrialised countries this growth is higher than all the experts had predicted. In some of these countries, I am thinking of Spain in particular, it exceeds 5 per cent. In most of them it is around 3 per cent or slightly higher. In the developing countries, although still too low, it is unquestionably growing. Note should also be taken of the initiatives taken, I am thinking of the appeal launched by the French Government, the measures taken by the Governments of the Federal Republic of Germany and Japan, to attempt to lighten the burden of debt through far-reaching measures, going beyond the technical arrangements for rescheduling of the kind put into effect over the past few years, with some success I might say.

Has not the time come to create a dynamic confidence so as to accelerate growth, the indispensable prerequisite of progress? But, is growth possible without the full involvement of the industrialised countries of East and West – and I mean East and West together, not separately – because these are the countries which enjoy economic power, which enjoy a high standard of living and which can show their readiness to co-operate with the rest of the world. In the industrialised countries there exist reserves allowing for considerable growth. What about the reserves that should be created, deployed and developed in the developing countries? The resumption of active growth is an imperative necessity. Legitimate though it may be, the fear of inflation cannot be allowed to overshadow the obligation, more pressing than ever, to reduce unemployment and underemployment. I put the question to you: what chances would democracy and human rights have in a world where the poverty of the vast majority went hand in hand with abundance for a tiny few? Let us bear in mind in this connection the fact that a percentage increase of one point in the gross domestic product in the Americas and Asia and two points in Africa would raise more than 250 million poor people above the poverty threshold. We have to acknowledge that this is a target not only to be reached but to be exceeded substantially in the course of the years to come.

In the wake of stimulated growth leading to progress in a spirit of solidarity, greater possibilities of meeting the need to protect the environment will be opened up. I shall take careful note of all remarks made from this rostrum in this connection before going to Oslo next month to take part in a discussion on this topic at the invitation of the Prime Minister of Norway, Mrs. Brundtland, who, as you know, is not only the co-author of a monumental report on the question of the environment but also chaired the committee which produced it.

Since no resolution on the subject could be adopted by the Conference, for reasons of which you are aware, the remarks made from this rostrum are all the more encouraging for our Organisation in pursuing its activities, both in a field which is familiar to us, that of the working environment, and in another field which I feel holds out a wealth of possibilities, that of employment. As action to protect the environment is developed, new sectors of activity will open up, which, in my opinion, are likely to generate employment.

Employment. This is one of the keynotes of the International Labour Conference. Year after year it is mentioned by every speaker without exception. Employment is one of the conditions of success in the battle of our Organisation for the full exercise of human rights. Many of you have insisted that there must be no lowering of international labour standards under the pretext of adapting the labour market to the demands of competitiveness. Referring, for instance, to the problem of flexibility, the Prime Minister of Spain observed that innovation, or rather innovations, in the field of employment, achieved through the use of new arrangements in respect of employment contracts, remuneration and the organisation of working time, should not lead to laxity or deregulation in industrial relations or the loss of legal guarantees of job security. According to Mr. Muhr, Chairman of the Workers' group of this Conference, it is more than ever the duty of the ILO to propose a system of values binding on all States. Mr. Marin, Vice-Chairman of the Commission of the European Communities, referring to the great unified market due to come into existence in 1992, stated that the European Community should address itself to the social dimension of this tremendous endeavour. The objective for the European Communities is the same as the ILO is pursuing on a world-wide scale, to achieve social justice through economic progress. While the objective is clear, it is not so easy to achieve. All relevant comments made here must be taken into account and in this connection both Mr. Lindner, Employers' delegate of the Federal Republic of Germany, and Mr. Puhakka, Minister of Labour of Finland, quite rightly uttered words of warning about the risks, which I referred to in my Report to the Conference, of a fragmentation of the working population, leading to the gradual emergence of a dual society. In short, it is necessary to combat all forms of social exclusion, as recalled from this rostrum by, among many other speakers, Mr. Delebarre, Minister of Employment and Social Affairs of France.

Several speakers during this debate expressed satisfaction that I referred in my Report to the problem of the links between labour matters and international trade. In this connection, it has been suggested in various quarters that respect for certain minimum labour standards should be made a factor in international trade relations. For instance, Mr. Vanderveken, on behalf of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, stated that a social clause making trade relationships dependent on respect for certain fundamental ILO standards, would help to discourage unfair competition in trade. Far from constituting a protectionist measure, such a clause, in his opinion, would favour a more open system of world trade. The Minister of Labour and the Workers' delegates of India challenged this viewpoint, as did other representatives of the Third World. I think that in the light of this situation, it is necessary, first and foremost, to take note of the fact that this problem is constantly being brought up both here and elsewhere; I am thinking in particular of GATT. This, in my opinion, cannot do other than encourage these two organisations – the ILO and GATT – to concert their efforts as soon as possible, in order to attempt to analyse exactly what is involved in the concepts of comparative advantage, unfair competition, minimum standards – and to do this on the basis of as accurate an assessment as possible of the situation. The ILO, for its part, possesses facilities in the field, together with those it can derive from its supervisory machinery. So it should assess the additional facilities which could be provided either by the ILO or in co-ordination with GATT, in order to pursue two objectives: first, the expansion of international trade, and second, the improvement of the working conditions of populations whose means of subsistence or sometimes even survival depend very largely on international trade. But, having said this, I cannot deny that the solution must, above all, be sought in a much more balanced and much fairer relationship between the industrialised countries which believe in high levels of social protection and the developing countries which are grappling with inextricable problems of indebtedness and markets. In short, the more progress Third World countries can make the better international labour standards will be applied and obviously they need help in this connection. The ILO, as the custodian of international labour standards, must give itself the means of increasing its technical co-operation resources. This brings us back to the link so strongly affirmed by this Conference last year between international labour standards and technical co-operation. Action in this connection will have to take place at several levels: in Geneva, where the Parliament that this Conference represents should endeavour to frame standards responding to the needs of a world which is changing and which may be growing and progressing; and also in the member countries where the ILO must proffer advice and aid in a variety of forms according to needs in so far as it possesses the technical and financial means of responding to the requests which, as I said a few moments ago, are ever increasing and ever more diversified.

Faced with these prospects and the tasks incumbent upon us, how can I fail to express the serious concern I feel about our financial situation? Of course, I have noted with satisfaction the vote by the Conference in favour of additional appropriations to offset, in part only, the deficit caused during this biennium by the fall in the value of the dollar. I have also noted with satisfaction the decisions taken to pay back into the Working Capital Fund part, and part only, of the sums that had to be withdrawn at the end of 1987. But, at the same time, I am not unaware that these decisions, however essential they may have been were taken at the end of a long debate in the Financial Committee of the Governing Body, then in the Governing Body itself, and finally in the Finance Committee of the Conference. I am not unaware either that this debate was marked by reservations, often expressed in very strong terms by a certain number of countries which pointed to their own financial difficulties and stressed the need for this Organisation – or I should rather say for the Office – to yield to collective discipline. Do I need to reassure the Conference that I share its concern? At the risk of repeating myself, I affirm that we have not ceased over the years, thanks to stringent financial management, to strive for both efficiency and savings. These efforts will be continued, if necessary entailing internal structural reforms which I have already been considering. But the risks remain, which force the Governing Body certainly from next November and myself to make difficult choices if the resources available to the Office during the biennium turn out to be substantially below those which would be available to it if all member States without exception paid their contributions punctually and in full. In fact, as you know, this has not been the case in the past few years. This is perhaps the most critical risk facing us during this biennium, because we have lost the safeguards which protected the budget during previous financial periods, and bearing in mind the fact that we shall have no new safeguards until 1990-91 with the establishment, next November I hope, by the Governing Body of a system which I have proposed to it of guarantees against fluctuations in exchange rates. That is why I am launching an urgent appeal to all member States and in particular the major contributors – I would say contributors in the singular and the plural, and I am sure everyone will understand me – urging them immediately after this Conference to reconsider in their capitals the problem of their contributions to our Organisation. It is my duty to state that the problems challenging our Organisation are problems which, due to their increasing complexity, necessitate an increase in the technical capacity of the Office. There is a limit it would be unwise to overstep without jeopardising the vitality of the Organisation and its usefulness to member States, and we have almost reached this limit. Having said this, I wish to add that the time has perhaps come for systematic reflection on a series of questions and in particular on the system of meetings. I know that in many respects meetings are the lifeblood of the Organisation, I am not necessarily proposing that they should be reduced in number, but but they do need to be streamlined with the aim of saving time and resources. The improvements sought should not be simply improvements of detail or ad hoc improvements. If reforms have to take place they will have to be structural. They should take into account all factors, starting with the highly desired, in my opinion, entry into force of the instrument for the amendment of the Constitution adopted in 1986. If these constitutional amendments are ratified, the enlarged Governing Body will be more representative and consequently be able to play a bigger role in certain fields.

As concerns the Conference, there is nothing in the Constitution or in the Standing Orders, requiring a first discussion of international instruments to take place within the context of the International Labour Conference. The preparation of some, if not all of these instruments, could take place at preparatory technical conferences. I hope you will understand me: I am not proposing at this stage to change the frequency of the Conference itself, I am simply proposing that we hasten our consideration of all the ways of making it possible to streamline the way meetings work, as well as ensuring a fairer balance of participation by member States through the assumption, at least in part, of the expenses of delegations. I would remind you in this connection that I have been asked to carry out a mission of “good offices” precisely for this purpose.

The balance sheet of the Conference, which I have not attempted through these remarks to draw up, appears to be positive, for all those members of governments, entrepreneurs, trade union leaders, but also Members of Parliament, whose task it is at the national level to promote employment, to ensure social protection, to reduce the risks of accidents and illnesses, and protect the weakest categories, or those who are the victims of discrimination. I will leave it to you to imagine what the balance sheet might have been, it would have been a very substantial if not an excellent balance sheet, if the Conference had been able to adopt the proposed resolutions, wise in their principles, happily worded, presented on the eve of this Conference by a number of delegates on human rights, the environment, the role of enterprises in the creation of employment, the combating of child labour and others. However, this was not the case. The Resolutions Committee was not able to complete its work. The means at its disposal, perhaps its rules of procedure, the atmosphere surrounding it, all prevented it from achieving its ambitions. It is to be regretted. Personally, I would have hoped that this Committee would have been able to express itself on the Report I submitted to the Conference on the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories. I would have hoped for a resolution, the principles of which had been proposed, that could have been formulated on the basis of my Report to the Conference, which has been said to have provided substantial information. That was not the case. Since, in contrast to the case of South Africa, the Office has had access to the occupied Arab territories every year for more than ten years, I shall nevertheless, with or without a mandate, continue the efforts I have been making for several years and have intensified this year to collect information on the situation of these workers and ensure the implementation of the recommendations made in this Report and addressed to the Government of Israel. I have no doubt that the Government will respond to my approaches as it has done up until now and in particular last April when I was on the spot.

The Conference is drawing to a close. The failure of the Resolutions Committee should not detract from the success of the work accomplished in the technical and other Committees of the Conference. These Committees have lived up to tradition. There have been a thousand details at this Conference – in the plenary, in the Committees, at the solemn sittings reserved for Heads of State, at the informal meetings which have enabled such a rich exchange of views and at the hospitable receptions which brought us together every day – which have shown, at least this is my impression, that an international community of labour does exist. I have always thought that if the Organisation is to function properly, there must be a synergy between States and the Office. I have had the great privilege for many long years to observe this synergy, this readiness to work together. As long as this readiness exists, in a fruitful relationship between the ILO's constituents and the Office, our institution, endowed with its unique components in the United Nations system, will be able to cope with the tasks to come, however arduous they may be. This is the key. I would even go so far as to say the most important key, along with the three others – and I am referring here, as I am sure many of you know, to the three golden keys of which the Directors-General are the custodian. This is the key, with the three others, which symbolises tripartism, to which we must remain unswervingly attached because it is the sign of freedom.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – Mr. Director-General, thank you very much. The applause makes it clear that all those attending the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference have listened to your comments with great interest and with approval. Your reply to the 285 speakers who participated in the general discussion on your Report – as well as the speeches themselves – has been an important contribution to the International Labour Conference and has laid the foundations for our future work to promote the welfare and well-being of mankind. I congratulate you on your speech and once again extend to you, on behalf of the Conference and myself, our warmest thanks.

(The Conference adjourned at 1 p.m.)

Thirty-fifth Sitting

Tuesday, 21 June 1988, 3.15 p.m.

Presidents: Mr. Beyreuther, Mr. Aitken

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON CONVENTION No. 107: DISCUSSION AND ADOPTION

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – We will now proceed with the discussion of the report of the Committee on Convention No. 107.

Mr. HELMS (Government adviser, Denmark; Reporter of the Committee on Convention No. 107) – I have the honour to submit to you the report of the Committee on the Revision of Convention No. 107, as contained in the Provisional Record, No. 32.

It is a very special honour for me because I believe that the Committee has chosen me as the Reporter because I, besides representing the Government of Denmark, am here in my capacity as a representative of the Greenland Home Rule Government.

So it has been one of the first decisions of the Committee to appoint a representative of an indigenous people as the Reporter – a sign of the will of the Committee to fulfil the very ideas of the revision of this ILO Convention, namely, to create international recognition of respect for the cultures, ways of life and institutions of the indigenous people and tribal populations of the world.

The Committee had an extremely difficult task before it. Convention No. 107 is a wide-ranging instrument, covering indigenous and tribal rights in scores of countries and hundreds of widely different communities. It tackles sensitive issues of human rights, land, ownership and use, and the relationship between these communities and the national states.

The very terms we use have implicit and explicit meanings which need careful consideration.

As has been stated in the report, the Committee found it gratifying that a number of indigenous and tribal organisations sent representatives to attend the Committee. We were able to hear a number of statements by them and, of course, to consult them informally during this period.

The Committee particularly appreciated, in the light of how deeply felt and sensitive these issues are to them, the way in which these representatives understood and respected the framework in which we work.

There were two major issues on which the Committee chose to defer specific decisions to next year.

The first was the use of the term “peoples”, as against “populations”.

To many indigenous people the term “populations” is felt to be degrading and perhaps even contemptuous.

To many governments the term “peoples” seems to open a door to political disintegration.

The Committee, through a Working Party, tried to find an acceptable formula which would use the word “peoples”, but qualify it to avoid any misunderstanding.

Even though a possible formula was put before the Committee by the Working Party, it was not possible to reach full agreement in the Committee on this issue.

It was therefore decided to include in the conclusions from this year the term “peoples/populations”, and thereby make it explicit that no decision was taken this year.

In connection with this point, I should inform you that there is a slight printing error: in Part III, the Conclusions used the word “peoples” alone; this was unintentional and it will be corrected.

The second issue on which a decision was deferred to next year was the issue of land rights. As will be well known, this issue goes to the very heart of these people.

Here, too, the Working Party began a detailed examination, but it became apparent that it would not be possible to reach agreement this year.

In these circumstances, the Committee decided not to consider the provisions in detail but to listen to statements of position by members.

This was done, and the original Office text for the revision will be used as the basis for the next round of consultations.

These two major issues will have to be dealt with next year, and I know that consultations at regional level have already been prepared. This will improve the possibilities for reaching agreement next year, hopefully with solutions that will be satisfactory to all the parties concerned.

If I have dwelt first on the questions which have caused us problems, it has been more to give greater emphasis to those on which we were able to agree.

This Committee had, as I have said, a very difficult task before it. Some of its members approached its discussion with what I would think could fairly be called suspicion; other, maybe, with hopes beyond reality. Neither the subject nor the format was familiar at the ILO, and there had been some concern expressed before the Conference about the explosiveness of the issue.

It was potentially explosive. But, to its credit, the Committee dealt with the questions before it in a rational and constructive way.

On the participation of the representatives of indigenous and tribal organisations in its work, the Committee took a series of decisions to create a framework for consultations which should facilitate its work next year.

On the substantive issues, the Committee accepted virtually unanimously the thrust of the recommendations put before it by the Meeting of Experts, held on this subject in 1986, as they were reflected in the Office's report.

That is, that the integrationist and assimilationist approach of Convention No. 107 should be revised to reflect respect for these cultures and to seek co-operation with the indigenous and tribal institutions in the creation of a common future.

We all agreed that they should be given the right to participate in the decision-making process in so far as it affects them, and in respect of their way of life.

We also agreed that the programmes and policies intended for their benefit should be framed in consultation with them and carried out in co-operation with them, whenever possible.

We further agreed with their own position that they should receive the training and the means necessary to carry out such programmes themselves whenever this was appropriate. On all the other issues, too, the Committee worked with the same sense of co-operation and dedication; and I think the results we have achieved are substantial and will provide an excellent basis for next year's discussions.

Finally, I should point to the participation of representatives of the United Nations, the World Health Organisation and the Inter-American Indian Institute. All of them, as well as other specialised agencies which have been consulted during the time leading up to this year's discussions, have expressed support and encouragement. The Office will, of course, remain in close touch with them on this question.

The Convention we are trying to frame is a very special one. It covers a whole field of human life and work and will constitute the main international instrument in this area.

This is a heavy responsibility for the ILO, but I am sure that I speak on behalf of all members of the Committee when I say that it will be carried out with the intention of creating full satisfaction not only for the indigenous peoples but the employers, the workers and the governments as well.

With these introductory remarks, I hereby submit the report of the Committee on the revision of Convention No. 107 to the plenary. It is my hope that it will be received in the same positive spirit in which it was created.

I would again like to extend my sincere gratitude to the Committee for electing a representative of the Greenland Home Rule Government as their Reporter, and thereby on this day, which happens to be the national day of Greenland, placing, I believe for the first time, a representative of Greenland on this podium to which we all look with so much respect and so many hopes of peace and co-operation amongst the people of the world.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – I thank Mr. Helms, the Reporter of this Committee. At the end of his statement he drew attention to the fact that today is Greenland's national holiday. I am sure that the whole Conference would like me to express to Mr. Helms and to all other Greenlanders their very warm wishes on the occasion of this national holiday.

Mr. WATCHORN (Employers' adviser, Australia) – As our Reporter has already indicated, our Committee's report deals with a complex, delicate but fundamentally important subject. It touches on issues vital to most indigenous peoples, issues reflecting their culture, their past, their present and their aspirations for the future.

This item has come to the Conference after years of consideration within the United Nations Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities and following detailed further examination within the Office and by a Meeting of Experts convened by the ILO. At the heart of the matter lies Convention No. 107 on indigenous and tribal populations. This was adopted in 1957 and remained the only international instrument dealing with indigenous peoples. Its revision has been proposed because of its basically integrationist orientation. This was perhaps correct for 1957 but is generally agreed to be inappropriate at the end of the 1980s. After efforts to bring about appropriate changes to reflect current reality, we have adopted conclusions which envisage a number of changes, most of them representing responsible improvements to Convention No. 107. These particularly focused on matters of general policy, recruitment and conditions of employment, vocational training and rural industries, education and communication and administration.

Our work has had the benefit of both formal and informal participation by indigenous groups. Most notable has been the participation of non-governmental organisations in the deliberations of the Workers' group. It is fair to say that this has not been without its problems from time to time, but overall this participation has helped the Committee to understand better the hopes and fears of indigenous peoples. I hope that next year these lines of communication can be maintained if not widened.

I have concentrated so far on the positive achievements of the Committee's work this year. However, as the report indicates, there are two vital issues upon which the Committee was not able to make significant progress, despite the attempts made in a Working Party of which I had the honour of being a member. These issues were whether indigenous groups to which the proposed revised Convention will apply should be described as "peoples" or as in Convention No. 107, "populations". And, second, the politically, economically and socially sensitive issue of land, as outlined in Part II of Convention No. 107.

The Committee effectively postponed a decision on both these questions. As for the first issue, they have the terminology to be used – "populations" or "peoples". It is abundantly clear that this is not a matter of mere semantics. For Governments particularly, there is concern that the use of the term "peoples" may, under international law, have connotations of broad rights of self-determination being granted with all that this may imply for the fabric of society within the nation State. For indigenous peoples this is no mere terminological matter. They believe to the depths of their being that they are peoples and not populations and that the revised Convention should recognise them as such.

The Working Party was faced with the task of trying to find a way through the seemingly intractable problem. We looked at a number of options. In the end, we decided to recommend to the Committee an approach which would have sought to pave the way for the use of the term "peoples" in the revised Convention by proposing that the use of the term should not of itself, and I now quote: "be taken to affect the interpretation given to this term in other international instruments or proceedings, in particular as concerns the question of self-determination". Unfortunately, this formulation was not sufficient to persuade the Committee to accept the use of the term "peoples" as the basis for next year's discussion. This was so particularly because a number of Governments felt that this did not adequately address their concerns. In the light of this, the Committee was able to decide only that the use of the term "peoples" should be left open for decision during next year's discussion and accordingly that its conclusions this year should refer to "peoples/populations".

It would be idle to pretend that there is not an interconnection between these two questions. Both the use of the term "peoples" and that of the word "territories", as raised in the Office text and in the wording and apparent intent of a number of the proposed amendments of the Workers' group to Part III of the Office text concerning land, gave rise to real concerns about the overall impact of these terms under international law.

These are questions which call for mature deliberation over the next 12 months. From my own very personal perspective, I believe it is not impossible for the ILO to find a way to deal with these issues, in so far as they are truly matters of the house. Thus it should be possible to find a formula which makes it clear that the revised Convention No. 107 will not be interpreted to mean or imply that rights to self-determination or other rights under international law, or as understood in other international organisations, are, by the adoption of the proposed revised Convention, being granted to the peoples concerned. Equally, this should not imply that the existing rights under international law are being inhibited. If this understanding can be reached early in next year's discussion, then I believe the way can be paved for the use of the term peoples" in the revised Convention and for a rational debate on the issue of land, which, in the light of the problems to which I have already referred, was left for resolution next year with the Office text to serve as the basis of discussions.

Having said this, it would be superficial of me to suggest that the broad approach to which I have referred previously will necessarily resolve questions dealing with ownership, control and use of land or territories. Fundamental differences remain and will have to be addressed next year over these issues. In particular the Employers' group is likely to have continuing concerns over the questions of rights to subsoil resources, control or veto over exploration and/or exploitation of those resources and over the land rights or usage issues which can affect economic development to the overall benefit of the national community. This is hardly to be wondered at. However, I feel sure that the Employers' group will not be found wanting in its preparedness to deal next year with the issues of the heart and the mind so crucial to indigenous peoples.

In so far as the issues are of the heart and the mind we can, I believe, find a solution. To the extent that the issues transcend the heart and mind and may adversely effect the interests of the national community, then the Employers' group will, I believe, continue to take account of the overall national interest while not remaining insensitive to that of indigenous groups. I will do so not because of any overwhelming and narrow self-interest, but because of its concern that in the long term the national interest will also be in the interests of indigenous peoples themselves. It thus behoves us all, Workers, Governments, Employers and indigenous groups alike, to use the next 12 months fruitfully to consider the issues with which we have experienced such difficulty this year.

We should each ponder our own position and take account of the genuine concerns which have emerged this year. We should recognise that Nirvana was unlikely to be reached but that next year's discussions offer us a realistic opportunity to consider and hopefully adopt an international instrument that will be a signpost to a better future for indigenous peoples.

That, of course, is crucially dependent upon continuing dialogue both formally and informally. We have made a start this year; let us continue in 1989 so that we can achieve a responsible and widely ratifiable revision of Convention No. 107.

Finally, may I take this opportunity to thank our Chairman, Mr. España Smith of Bolivia, for his effective and untiring work as the Chairman of our Committee, Mr. Helms our Reporter, Mr. Svenning-sen the Workers' Vice-Chairman, with whom the Employers' group found our informal consultations most valuable, and particularly Mr. Días Garaycoa, our Employers' Vice-Chairman, who is unfortunately absent from Geneva, and on whose behalf I am speaking today. He has made an invaluable contribution to our work.

I commend the report to the Conference and recommend its adoption and that of the conclusions which were reached by the Committee.

Mr. SVENNINGSEN (Workers' delegate, Denmark; Vice-Chairman of the Committee) – As I stated at the outset of our discussions in the Committee, the Workers attach great importance to the revision of Convention No. 107 so that the revised Convention might be based on the new approach, namely to give the indigenous and tribal peoples as much control as possible to decide their own way of life and to strengthen their rights of landownership and of the use of their territories.

We knew that this task of revising Convention No. 107 would not be an easy one. However, with the exception of two crucial issues, to which I will come back in a moment, we were able to reach satisfactory formulations for most of the conclusions proposed by the Office.

This will provide us with a good basis for further consultations, which have to take place at the national level, and for the second discussion of the revised Convention next year. In one or two instances we were not entirely satisfied with the outcome concerning the sections which were dealt with in the Committee. Such a case relates, in particular, to the requirement that the governments concerned should obtain the informed consent of the indigenous and tribal peoples, freely expressed through their own institutions, whenever consideration is being given to legislative or administrative measures which may affect them. The Workers would like to express the hope that this principle will be considered again next year with a view to including it in the final text of the revised Convention.

Regrettably, two of the most crucial issues in the revision process had to be postponed until next year. The first issue relates to the term "peoples" to be used in the new Convention. The Workers strongly supported the use of this term "peoples" as it reflected the views which these peoples have of themselves. However, we had to note that a significant number of governments expressed misgivings about the use of this term, as, in their view, it could imply the right of political self-determination as understood in international law. The Workers' group was willing to accept a clause in the Convention explaining that the use of the term "peoples" did not address the question of political self-determination. We also accepted the compromise formulation on this issue which came out of the Working Party, set up to deal with this question, which is reflected in paragraph 35 of the report. We hope that this formulation might be used as the basis for the further consultations leading to the second discussion next year.

The second issue, which has been postponed until the next Conference, concerns the land rights of the indigenous and tribal peoples. In the view of the Workers' group the fundamental aim to be embodied in the revised Convention is to secure and respect the right of these peoples to own their lands and to exercise full control over the use of their territories, including subsoil resources. We urge the governments and the employers to reconsider this whole matter in a positive manner and to listen carefully to what the indigenous and tribal peoples themselves have to say on this question.

More in general, we would like to appeal to the governments to consult fully the workers' and employers' organisations, and in particular the organisations of indigenous and tribal peoples, in future deliberations on the revision process. We also want to lodge an appeal that representatives of these peoples be included in the tripartite delegations to the next Session of the International Labour Conference for the second discussion of this item. Moreover, we would like to suggest that the Office offer its technical advisory services to those involved, in particular to the indigenous peoples' organisations, so as to strengthen their participation in the further process of revision. In any case, the same opportunities which were offered to them in our Committee should be maintained or even further improved at the next Session. Finally, it might be interesting to provide, on that occasion, United Nations organisations, governments and the indigenous peoples' organisations with the possibility of giving further documentary information on their activities as regards the peoples concerned.

In concluding this statement, let me thank the Chairman of our Committee, the Employers' Vice-Chairman and the Reporter for their solid co-operation and constructive spirit. I also want to express my special thanks to Mr. Amir Ali, Mr. Swepston and all the members of the Secretariat who serviced our Committee in such a competent and friendly manner. Last but not least, I want to thank wholeheartedly the representatives of the indigenous peoples' organisations for their invaluable contribution to our work and to my Worker colleagues on the Committee who worked so hard to achieve a satisfactory outcome.

(Mr. Aitken takes the Chair.)

Mr. KAR (Government delegate, India) – First of all, I would like to congratulate the Chairman, the two Vice-Chairmen and other members of the Committee on the high quality of the report before us. We are indeed happy that the Committee on Convention No. 107 could successfully complete its deliberations within the time schedule of formulated draft proposals for a revised Convention concerning tribal and indigenous populations for further discussion and finalisation next year.

The pragmatic approach by the Committee members to the delicate issues contained in the text was reflected in the decision of the Committee to defer consideration of the points concerning land to 1989. I would like to mention that a number of delegations, including our Government, had highlighted the complexity of the issues of land and land rights. In this connection I may state that my country is pursuing one of the most positive policies towards tribal land. In fact, our Government has been deeply concerned about the rights of tribals over their land and this was expressed in the early fifties by our first Prime Minister, Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, who was the inspiration behind a positive tribal policy in independent India. In 1961, the Dhebar Commission called for further tightening of laws to prevent alienation of tribal land.

Legislation on land not only varies from country to country but also within a country. In India land administration is a subject within the jurisdiction of the state governments. The problem being very complex, an attempt at setting international standards is likely to pose problems in the way of efforts being carried out by various countries according to their requirements. This is because there are wide differences in national systems of land ownership and control of natural resources connected with land. Also, there is a fundamental difference between the relationship which many tribal people have with the land and the attitude of other sections of national populations who view land as an alienable and productive commodity. In our country all the states having scheduled tribal areas have land alienation laws which prevent the transfer of tribal land to non-tribals and provide for detection and restoration of alienated tribal land. We have done this firmly though there has been mounting pressure on land with our population touching 800 million. However, we have a very large tribal population also which is about 60 million and it is imperative that, in order to help their development, full protection against exploitation acquires primacy in our tribal and land policy. To ensure this our Government's efforts have been directed towards the following measures: 1. the state governments have launched a special drive for the completion and updating of land records to enable them to confer ownership rights on tribals wherever this has not been done till now; 2. consolidation of tribal land holdings is being carried out in a sustained manner; 3. the existing land laws are being reviewed continuously so that all shortcomings in the policy are overcome and the laws can be really effective; 4. the Government is creating adequate machinery to ensure restoration of alienated land; 5. the Government is also identifying land-alienation-prone areas in order to take pre-emptive remedial measures.

Even where it becomes unavoidable to cause displacement of tribals due to major projects, our Government has undertaken comprehensive rehabilitation which is based on a "land for land" approach.

Tribal communities in various parts of the world present a broad spectrum of diversity. Even within India the number of scheduled tribes is about 250, who are at various stages of development. In such a situation the strategy for tackling the tribal situation will vary from country to country.

Other issues like replacing the word "populations" by "peoples", the degree of control over decision-making in matters concerning tribals, etc., will have to be carefully considered since these are sensitive issues having national and international ramifications. I am sure the governments will be in a position to adopt a final text on such key issues next year after considering in depth the aspirations of the indigenous and tribal populations on the one hand and the needs of national integration on the other.

Mrs. ADAMSON (Employers' adviser, United States) – This year marks the 40th anniversary of the United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Human rights was accordingly chosen as the theme for this session of the Conference, but it should be remembered that the ILO began its work on human rights, or social justice, as set forth in the Declaration of Philadelphia, a generation before the United Nations came into existence.

In the ILO tradition, moreover, human rights (or social justice) are tangible, living, dynamic and evolutionary. Here, it is not simply left to governments to define rights and enshrine them in declarations and conventions. Instead, the ILO embodies a tripartite structure by which rights and responsibilities are continually negotiated among the social partners.

In many countries today the most vulnerable part of society is indigenous and tribal peoples. Generally, they are so marginalised that the concept of social partnership is impossible. Unable to avoid direct and indirect discrimination on matters of their social, cultural and economic interests, they face a process of disintegration and possible extinction. Essential to overcoming such disenfranchisement is the right of indigenous peoples to organise, to have their organisations recognised and to participate in the decisions affecting their lives – familiar rights to the ILO and its tripartite structure. Therefore, it is extremely important to note amongst ourselves and in the world at large that when the informal means were found within the Standing Orders for NGOs to participate directly in the partial revision of Convention No. 107, the very purpose and ideals of ILO were achieved.

We should build on these gains in the coming year. Greater indigenous participation should be sought for the second and final round of discussions, to be held next year. At the same time, we must all reaffirm the complete compatibility of indigenous participation with the fundamental aims and principles of ILO: that is, the achievement of social justice through collaboration, representation and co-operation.

Governments do not move themselves – people move governments.

As most of us here today can attest, it is the organised, negotiated participation of interested parties that achieves the best results. This type of collective co-operation happened as the Employers' group came to join the Workers' group in unanimously agreeing on the term "peoples". I strongly urge that next year we begin using the term "peoples". No other term reflects the cultural collective and indigenous society as a whole. I am an Employers' delegate from the United States, and I am a Cherokee American Indian of the United States. I can personally tell you that I felt as if I had been slapped in the face when the recognition of my peoplehood was denied. Regardless of the fears of governments regarding our status as a people, I believe most of us made great strides this year. I urge that we continue to move our respective nations forward. I urge each Workers' and Employers' delegation from those States which perceived the term "peoples" as dangerous to national politics and sovereignty, to understand your nation's best intentions, yet also understand that the contention of threats to national security, ill-used, is often a pretext for discrimination and a threat to freedom and liberty.

What indigenous peoples have been seeking is not the creation of new States, but the recognition of their right to be different and to maintain their identity, and a degree of autonomy within existing States. As peoples they are advocating social, economic and cultural pluralism, not independence.

Most all of us agree that indigenous peoples should have the right to be different, but how can this right be actualised without the structures and procedures for guaranteeing indigenous peoples economic freedom?

This question brings me to the last and most crucial matters contained within Convention No. 107 – indigenous land rights. The Committee as whole did not reach any conclusions, nor did it formulate any recommendations for next year's consideration, on the section regarding land. However I would like to spend the last few minutes of my time trying to highlight a framework for clarifying the issues within indigenous land rights and preparing us for the work the Committee next year.

The existing Convention, adopted in 1957, made certain assumptions: first, it defined and ensured the individual indigenous person's right to own land; and second, it recognised that the practice of displacing indigenous peoples or dispersing them from the lands and territories they occupied should not go unchecked.

In the 30 years since the Convention's adoption, it became apparent that the limited focus on individual ownership failed to provide for the intrinsic and fundamental collectiveness of indigenous societies. It also became an incontestable fact that indigenous land rights were violated and threatened, owing to the absences of procedures for protecting and guaranteeing those rights.

At a minimum, next year's work must ensure and safeguard indigenous peoples' use of the territories they traditionally occupy, and recognise that the right of possession should equal that of ownership. Provisions regarding land in this revised Convention must give greater recognition to means other than ownership for the effective control. The rights of indigenous peoples should be broadened to a territorial concept which would encompass flora, fauna as well as natural resources, such as coastal fishing and sub-surface mineral resources.

The flourishing of indigenous peoples, the strengthening and development – let alone the very survival – of their societies, economies, cultures and lifestyles depends upon adequate land and resource bases. Human rights is the counterpart of economic freedom, and only when the two are united, like two sides of a coin, do they acquire meaning and currency.

So I ask, has the ILO been stretched beyond its mandate in focusing attention on indigenous peoples? Surely not, if its aim is to protect a people's fundamental right to organise. Surely not, if its aim is to prevent discrimination and safeguard precarious human rights. Surely not, if its efforts will result in economic justice and a fair and dignified livelihood for those peoples. The focus on indigenous peoples falls well within the purview of the ILO, and indeed lies at the very core of the ILO's economic and social principles and mission.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. NIÑO (Government adviser, Venezuela) – First of all, I would like to congratulate most warmly Ambassador España Smith of Bolivia, Chairman of the Committee for the excellent human qualities which he demonstrated throughout the work of our Committee over the two weeks we have been present here. I would also like to congratulate Mr. Díaz Garaycoa, Employers' member, Ecuador and Mr. Svenningsen, Workers' Vice-Chairman from Denmark.

My delegation really did not intend to take the floor in the last stage of the long, difficult, but constructive exercise which has been under way for two weeks in connection with the partial revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107). But a number of passages adopted on 18 June do not correspond to the interventions and the statements made by the Government delegation of Venezuela during the meetings to which I refer.

We are extremely surprised because certain corrections were made on Saturday – that was when we received the report – and we expect it, knowing the efficiency of the Secretariat, that the corrections we had indicated would have indeed been made. At the same time we feel that the sovereign position of the States must be duly reflected in the report. If I might therefore be permitted, I would like to read out these corrections which, generally speaking, are matters of translation in the Spanish text; otherwise there are no substantive changes. First of all, in paragraph 13, line 32, it says: "entrara en conflicto". It should say: "fuera contrario". In paragraph 37, fifth line, the word "compromiso" should be deleted from the Spanish text; and paragraph 130, in the penultimate line, has inexplicably been changed, and it should in fact say what the text originally said. Instead of saying "en virtud de la cual" it should say "sobre" and when it says "no se conforman", it should say: "que fuese contrario".

And finally, in paragraph 50, we would like to ensure that the appropriate change, requested on 18 June, be made.

Mrs. AHIABA (representative of the Indian Council of South America) – Thank you for the opportunity of addressing this distinguished forum. My name is Noemí Beatriz Ahiaba, I am from Argentina and the representative of the Indian Council of South America. The Indigenous Rights Group, which includes representatives of indigenous organisations from different parts of the world, has requested that I make this presentation on behalf of the group.

This year we celebrate the 40th Anniversary of the United Nations Declaration of Human Rights. The world's indigenous peoples comprise more than 5 per cent of all humanity; none the less they continue to be the most disadvantaged, the most vulnerable and the least recognised or respected. It is essential for the ILO to commit itself fully this year to correcting this serious gap in international human rights protection.

The purpose of our presentation today is to convey to all Conference delegates the crucial nature of the revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107). We also wish to highlight some of our major concerns.

It is a most serious and ongoing injustice that, in 1988, there is still no appropriate legal framework at the international level to explicitly recognise indigenous peoples as distinct "peoples" and fully protect our rights. As a consequence, the territories and resources of many indigenous peoples continue to be violated. Furthermore, the values and priorities of indigenous societies are repeatedly disregarded.

We are convinced that adequate revision of Convention No. 107 could serve to improve significantly the severe situation facing indigenous people on a daily basis. Those of you who are delegates at this International Labour Conference control the revision process and have a collective responsibility to ensure that this process does not fail.

We are encouraged by the sensitivity and understanding demonstrated in favour of indigenous peoples by the Workers' group and by a number of governments. We hope that a greater number of governments, as well as the Employers' group, will more actively and consistently support the position of indigenous peoples in the coming year.

In developing international standards, we believe that the International Labour Organisation is currently in a position to take an affirmative leadership role. Together, we can bridge the cultural gaps that arise from differing values and perspectives. Equally important, new and constructive paths could be forged towards greater respect for and understanding of indigenous rights and aspirations.

As a first step, it must be unequivocally recognised in the terminology of the Convention that indigenous peoples are in fact peoples. We are not and have never been mere populations, which is a term more typically used by the biologists who refer to bears or animals. What is at stake is the credibility and overall purpose of the ILO revision process, which would be severely undermined should the terminology of the Convention continue to depict us, the world's indigenous people, in inaccurate and demeaning terms.

We are disappointed that the Committee has referred to us in its latest Report to this Conference as "peoples/populations". We see this as a step backwards. We also regret the attempts by some governments and some employers to place conditions on any possible use of the word "peoples", which is contrary to the objectives of the revision process.

It has been suggested that the use of the term "people" could imply a right of secession. However, it should be remembered that, consistently with the specialised mandate of the ILO, Convention No. 107 is limited to social, economic, environmental and cultural considerations. Political issues have been clearly identified as falling outside the scope of the revised Convention and indeed of the ILO as an organisation.

We none the less believe that specific reference to peoples and to self-determination in Convention No. 107 would help to achieve a necessary and positive advancement for indigenous peoples. It is the continuing lack of self-determination that keeps many indigenous societies in a state of poverty and dependency and with inadequate enjoyment of basic human rights.

In regard to land and resource rights, the Committee Report indicates that these key issues have been deferred to next year. This is in large part due to the lack of consensus or agreement.

If Convention No. 107 is to be transformed into a useful and enduring instrument, our fundamental territorial and resource rights must be fully respected by its terms. Effective recognition and protection of these basic rights are without question the very soul of the revised Convention. Without adequate recognition of land and resource rights, the revised Convention No. 107 would not provide a meaningful framework for the world's indigenous peoples.

It is worth noting that the World Commission on Environment and Development (the Brundtland Report) has clearly underlined the very central importance of lands and resources to indigenous peoples. The Commission concluded: "The starting point for a just and humane policy for such groups is the recognition and protection of their traditional rights to land and resources that sustain their way of life, rights they may define in terms that do not fit into standard legal systems."

Guaranteed access and rights to an adequate land and resource base for all indigenous peoples are crucial to the survival and growth of indigenous societies. We view ourselves as an integral part of nature's ecosystem. In a dynamic and profound manner, we continue to be inseparable from our territories and environment. We feel that by ensuring protection for our way of life, which includes a harmonious relationship with the natural world, the ILO will also be helping to safeguard the integrity of the global environment.

In view of its reformulated objectives of moving towards greater recognition of indigenous rights, the revised Convention No. 107 must not in any way unfairly limit the nature and scope of indigenous land and resource rights in different parts of the globe. For example, leaf collection in India, forest resource uses in Brazil, Inuit rights to Arctic sea ice and the use of ocean areas by Hawaiian indigenous peoples must all be sufficiently accommodated in a revised Convention.

In general, the subsistence economies and other traditional activities of indigenous peoples must be fully recognised and strengthened through the revised Convention. Moreover, national programmes of economic development must respect the integrity of indigenous territories, environments and social and economic institutions.

With regard to natural resources, we believe that it is essential to include explicit reference in the revised Convention to both surface and subsurface resources. The claims of States to exclusive ownership of these resources have often been based on premises that ignored the pre-existing rights of indigenous peoples. This continuing inequity should be re-dressed under a revised Convention No. 107. It is illusory to separate subsurface and surface rights entirely, moreover, since any exploitation of the subsoil is likely to threaten the integrity and enjoyment of surface resources.

In view of the great diversity of situations pertaining to territorial and resource matters, we advocate a broad and flexible approach. We believe that the revised Convention should above all include a general clause obliging governments to recognise and respect indigenous land and resource rights. At the same time, we appreciate that governments and employers have a number of major concerns. Where necessary, these concerns can and should be identified and addressed through specific provisions during the coming year. In addition, a comprehensive mechanism for resolving disputes concerning indigenous land and resource rights and treaty rights should be devised for early consideration by all parties interested in the revision process.

In 1989, we hope to further refine other vital aspects of the Proposed Conclusions, such as the provisions dealing with the administrative and interpretative aspects, education and language rights, and respect for our customary laws and practices. Confining recognition of our customary laws to those compatible with the national legal system will inevitably result in serious and unjust cases of assimilation.

As we have previously stated, indigenous peoples do not yet have a way of directly participating in this revision process. We still have no means of safeguarding our most fundamental and inalienable rights. We urge this Conference to introduce new and meaningful ways of substantially increasing our involvement during the second year's discussion of the revision process.

In this critical upcoming year, we seek to co-operate with all of you to ensure the adoption of adequate and meaningful standards in the revised Convention. In particular, we seek international standards that are fully consistent with and supportive of the basic aspirations, rights and perspectives of the world's indigenous peoples.

Mrs. RUGE (Government delegate, Norway) – My delegation would like to pay tribute to the work that has been accomplished up until now in revising Convention No. 107. The report of the Committee shows that there has been wide agreement among the members all to the importance of this work. However, as we all know, and have been reminded this afternoon, a great deal of difficult work remains to be done next year, particularly, as we know, on the key issues. In order that a good result may be reached next year, it will obviously be necessary for member States to do preparatory work in the meantime, particularly, it would seem to me, on a regional basis. In our own region – the Nordic European – we have plans for this and we trust other regions will take similar initiatives. It is to be hoped that in this work it will be possible to have participation also from the Bureau, in order to continue the good and close working relationship which has been prevailing in the Committee. In this connection we were very encouraged to hear the Director-General comment directly on this in his reply this morning. Our delegation, along with a number of others, is very concerned that the second and last reading of the revised Convention should be able to conclude with success. Good and thorough preparatory work from all the parties concerned will contribute to this.

(Mr. Beyreuther takes the Chair.)

Mr. ALI (Government adviser, Bangladesh) – I would like to join the previous speakers in congratulating the President and the Vice-Presidents of the Conference. I also extend my compliments to the Chairman, Vice-Chairmen and officials of the Conference Committee on the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107) for the arduous work they have done in the Committee.

Bangladesh attached high priority to the work of this Committee. As a member of the Committee we have pointed out some of the difficulties that may occur in the process of adoption the proposed revised Convention on indigenous and tribal populations. We have also indicated that implementation will be all the more difficult unless issues connected with land and the definition of terms like “people” and “population” are not resolved to the satisfaction of all concerned.

This view is based on experience in matters of implementation of the existing Convention, which was adopted in 1957. In the current session, we have some 155 countries and other agencies participating in the debates. Theoretically therefore there is the widest possible coverage of the views held by different member States and by other agencies. In practice, the situation is, to my knowledge, far from being satisfactory. Many of the countries often fail to do their homework and effectively participate in the deliberations of the committees and the plenary. This is so because of the inadequacy of the number of delegations and also the time constraint. As a result, as we have found, substantive ideas and correct formulations do not emerge effectively. The text of the Conventions reflect the viewpoints of the audible few rather than that of the majority.

This is why Bangladesh underscored the need for incorporating correct connotations of terms used in the Convention, in addition to ensuring flexibility of the provisions of the revised Convention; and, for the adoption of such a Convention, adequate representation has to be ensured.

That being so, I think it would be desirable to have consultations among member States and I hope that the Office will come forward to help organise such consultations before the next session.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – If there are no further speakers and if there are no objections, I shall take it that the report, paragraphs 1 to 222, is adopted.

(The report, paragraphs 1 to 222, is adopted.)

CONCLUSIONS PROPOSED WITH A VIEW TO THE ADOPTION OF A REVISED CONVENTION. SUBMITTED BY THE COMMITTEE ON CONVENTION No. 107: ADOPTION

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – Next we shall proceed to the adoption of the Conclusions proposed with a view to the adoption of a revised Convention concerning indigenous and tribal populations. We shall take the Conclusions Point by Point.

(The Conclusions, Points 1 to 70, are adopted seriatim.)

RESOLUTION TO PLACE ON THE AGENDA OF THE NEXT ORDINARY SESSION OF THE CONFERENCE AN ITEM ENTITLED “PARTIAL REVISION OF THE INDIGENOUS AND TRIBAL POPULATIONS CONVENTION, 1957 (No. 107)”, SUBMITTED BY THE COMMITTEE ON CONVENTION No. 107: ADOPTION

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – Lastly, we proceed to the adoption of the resolution to place on the agenda of the next ordinary session of the Conference an item entitled “Partial revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107)”. If there are no objections, I take it that the Conference adopts the resolution?

(The resolution is adopted.)

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – Now that we have adopted the report of the Committee on Convention No. 107 I would like to express my thanks to the Officers and members of the Committee for the excellent work which has been done. I would like to thank in particular Mr. España-Smith, the Chairman, Mr. Diaz Garaycoa and Mr. Svenningsen, the Vice-Chairmen, Mr. Helms, the Reporter, and Mr. Watchorn who today replaced the Employers' Vice-Chairman, Mr. Diaz Garaycoa.

REPORT OF THE RESOLUTIONS COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION. DISCUSSION AND ADOPTION

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – The next item on the agenda is the report of the Resolutions Committee, which will be found in Provisional Record No. 33. The Chairman and Reporter of the Committee, Mr. Alexander, Government delegate, United Kingdom, has unfortunately fallen ill and is therefore unable to be with us today. I therefore invite the remaining Officers of the Committee, the Employers' Vice-Chairman, Mr. Rowe, Employers' adviser, New Zealand, and the Workers' Vice-Chairman, Mr. Karlsson, Workers' delegate, Sweden to come to the rostrum. I call on Mr. Karlsson, Workers' Vice-Chairman, to submit the report.

Mr. KARLSSON (Workers' delegate, Sweden; Vice-Chairman of the Resolutions Committee) – As Reporter of the Resolutions Committee it is my duty to present the Committee's report to the Conference. While it is a great pleasure to address the Conference, it is with considerable regret that I undertake this task in the absence of the Committee's Chairman.

The Resolutions Committee met on a total of 14 occasions over the course of the last two-and-a-half weeks. Initially, 12 resolutions were presented to the Committee but this number was later reduced to eight, following the merging of several texts. The Committee determined the priority order for examining the resolutions in accordance with the procedure laid down in the Standing Orders.

Much of the working time available to the Committee was devoted to consideration of the resolution that was placed first on the list of priority. The resolution concerned the protection of workers' and employers' rights and freedoms in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories.

Forty-one amendments were submitted for consideration in regard to this resolution. The Committee engaged in a detailed and frank debate on the resolution and the proposed amendments. However, it was unable to consider all these amendments, and consequently the Committee has no resolution to submit to the Conference this year.

The Committee also completed the general discussion on the resolution concerning the role of the ILO in the strengthening of respect for human and trade union rights. This discussion was constructive and concise, but unfortunately there was insufficient time to consider the amendments submitted in relation to this text. In this case, too, the Committee was unable to conclude its business and reach a consensus. An exchange of views took place on these two proposed resolutions. Those views are accurately reflected in the report before you which was adopted by the Committee.

I commend this report to the Conference.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – The discussion of the report of the Resolutions Committee is now open.

Interpretation from French: Mr. CATTANEO (Employers' adviser, Italy) – It has to be admitted that the work of our Committee this year has led to considerable disappointment, especially for those who last year had participated in work leading to the adoption of three resolutions. However, despite the results, we worked very hard and considerable efforts were made. That is why, on behalf of the Employer members of the Committee, I would like to thank the Chairmen, rather than the Chairman. This rather unusual form of words is an indication of the difficulties encountered. I would like to thank the Chairmen for the goodwill with which they led us through often very difficult meetings. I would also like to thank the Government and Worker members of the Committee with whom we spent some bitter days. Of course, I also wish to thank the members of the secretariat who carried out their work in what were extremely difficult circumstances. The report submitted to you is a very precise reflection of our work and of the way in which it took place. If the Employers' group recommends the adoption of the report, it is not only in order to accomplish a formal responsibility. We are convinced that if we look at the content of this report and reflect upon the events described there, men of goodwill will be able to indicate to us the best way to overcome the difficulties which we faced this year.

Mr. KARLSSON (Workers' delegate, Sweden; Vice-Chairman of the Resolutions Committee) – The Workers' group sees the resolutions submitted to the International Labour Conference as one way to give indications to the Director-General and the Governing Body about what the priorities are and should be for future ILO action to be undertaken to the benefit of all workers around the world. Therefore, it is of great interest to workers that the work of the Resolutions Committee should be as productive as possible.

We all regret, therefore, that the Committee's work could not be brought to a successful conclusion this year. The result, with no resolutions finalised, is even more negative for us, as resolution No. 2 was a proposal unanimously presented by the Workers' group of the Committee.

The Committee did substantive work on one resolution only. As regards that proposal it is important to note that the Workers' group was unanimous in its concern for the situation of the workers in the area in question. The differences of opinion related to what action should be and by whom. It is my sincere hope that these differences too can be carefully considered and consequently avoided in the future.

It has been a very instructive experience to act as Workers' Vice-Chairman of the Committee. I have learned more than ever to appreciate the sincerity of my fellow workers in the group. Admittedly, the members were not always of the same opinion, but we always tried to show respect for one another. I want to express my heartfelt thanks to all Workers in the Committee. I also want to thank the other officers of the group, the three Vice-Chairman, Brother Knox, Brother Lamprecht and Brother Niasse, as well as the Secretary of the group, Brother Hordijk. My thanks also go to Brother Amal Mukherjee from the Workers' Relations Branch for his invaluable advice to me and to the whole group.

The tripartite nature of the ILO is for me of the utmost importance. In that spirit, I appreciated the opportunity to work together with Mr. Rowe, Employers' Vice-Chairman, and I want to thank him for his co-operation.

I had the possibility a little earlier to find out personally how difficult it is to be Chairman of the Resolutions Committee as a whole. Consequently, I am wholeheartedly grateful to our Chairman, Mr. Alexander, and very much regret that we have to thank him in his absence. I wish him a quick and full recovery from his indisposition.

Finally, I would like to express my admiration for the ILO staff working for our Committee. The dedicated work by Mr. Ali Taqi and all the members of his team was marvellous and I want to address my last words of thanks to them.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – As I have a long list of speakers on the report, I would like to draw their attention to the fact that, when the Resolutions Committee fails to complete its examination of a resolution, as has happened this year, the Conference, according to article 17(6) of the Standing Orders, does not discuss the resolution or act upon it. I therefore urge the speakers on my list to bear this provision of the Standing Orders in mind and to confine their remarks to the general report proper, without entering into any discussion of the text of the resolution itself.

Mr. IBRAHIM (representative of the Organisation of African Trade Union Unity) – On behalf of the Organisation of African Trade Union Unity, I would like to place on record my organisation's dissatisfaction with the outcome and conclusions of the Resolutions Committee of the Conference. We vehemently deplore the Committee's utter failure to recommend any of the draft resolutions to the Conference for adoption. We particularly deplore the Committee's inability to reach a consensus on the resolutions that they have discussed. I think that the delaying tactics used by some members of the Committee also deprived the second resolution of its chance to be debated. This is indeed quite deplorable.

The African Workers' group endorsed the two resolutions that have been discussed and they were convinced that they would, when adopted by the Conference, immensely contribute to the 40th anniversary year of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

It is our belief that trade union rights and civil liberties are inseparable from human rights. We are also convinced that the provisions of the ILO Constitution guarantee protection of human and trade union rights and that the pursuit for social protection and for social justice falls within the ILO's mandate, as enshrined in the Declaration of Philadelphia.

Therefore, we commend the Director-General's concern for violations of trade union rights the world over and particularly for the deteriorating human and trade union rights situation in the occupied Arab territories.

The Director-General's Report confirmed once again that the situation of Arab workers, which is already seriously affected by the State occupation, is being aggravated by the repressive measures introduced by the occupying forces against the Palestinian workers and people following the uprising in those territories. It therefore called for energetic actions by all ILO member States to ensure, among other things, equality of opportunity and treatment as well as a guarantee for effective exercise of trade union rights in those territories.

Moreover, it is no secret that owing to reported complaints of serious violations of trade union rights in the occupied Arab territories, considered by the Committee on Freedom of Association of the Governing Body, the occupying authority was reminded more than once of its obligations – as a Member of the ILO – to respect trade union freedom in the occupied Arab territories.

They were further called on to ensure that trade unions should be allowed to organise their meetings on their premises without interference by the military authorities. They were also reminded that the right to hold trade union meetings is a fundamental aspect of trade union rights. The Committee on Freedom of Association further stressed that forced exile of trade unionists is a violation of human rights as well as an infringement of freedom of association, in that it weakens the trade union movement by depriving it of its leaders.

I have cited the above reports to indicate the concern and indignation already expressed by the ILO organs on the gravely deteriorating situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories.

Now, here we are, at the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference, being told that a moderate resolution which had expressed the same concern as those indicated earlier and was calling for more energetic actions, as suggested in the Report of the Director-General, could not be agreed upon by the Committee owing to its opposition by certain members of the Committee, who applied double standards.

It is unethical on the part of those opposed to the resolution to apply different standards for different peoples and regions of the world on the same issue of human and trade union rights. These are against the principles on which the International Labour Organisation stands for and for which we are bound to respect it.

Finally, we also strongly regret that the resolution on the role of the ILO in the strengthening of respect for human and trade union rights has not also been concluded by the Committee.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. BOZO (Minister of Social Affairs and Labour, Syrian Arab Republic) – On the occasion of our discussion on the report of the Resolutions Committee, I would like, on behalf of the Arab group and its three components – of which some have taken the floor during this meeting – to express our observations and evaluation of the results of this Committee.

It might be useful, at the outset, to remind you that we almost all agreed here in this Conference that it was both necessary and urgent under the present circumstances that the Arab group should, at this session, submit a draft resolution on the situation of Arab workers and employers in Palestine, for two reasons. The first is the dramatic escalation of barbaric and oppressive practices committed by the Israeli authorities against the Palestinian people and the violation of the basic rights and freedoms accepted by our Organisation. The second reason is that the international community, and the ILO itself, is commemorating the 40th anniversary of the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. It was therefore incumbent upon our Organisation, with its lofty, humanitarian ideals, to address the message to the Palestinian people through a unanimous resolution, who have been struggling under the yoke of Israeli colonisation for more than 40 years, before this Declaration was adopted. This resolution would have stated that peace and justice-loving nations have not forgotten the struggle of the Palestinian people and its steadfastness against the cruel practices of the Israeli authorities.

When we arrived in Geneva, we were surprised to see the extent of the ruthless campaign being waged against the Arab resolution which sets out to protect the rights and freedoms of Palestinians. We were surprised by the enormous pressure exerted by some Western Powers, especially the Government of the United States, which was even directed at friendly governments to try and make them change their position on the Palestinian question. There was even an attempt to sow seeds of discord between Arabs and Africans, trying to make them believe that if a committee on Palestine was set up – as provided for in the Resolution – the ILO would concentrate less on apartheid. I must here, for reasons of honesty, say that our friends in Africa, with whom we are joined in a common struggle, did not yield to these incorrect and imprecise arguments. They know that a special committee to study the situation of workers and employers in Palestine can only consolidate the work of the Committee on Apartheid, given the similarity between the two racist regimes of South Africa and Israel.

These pressures and other unorthodox practices were to no avail. This was in fact highlighted by the result of the vote on the order of priority to be given to the resolutions, when our resolution was elected to be discussed first. Peace and justice-loving nations, and their three components, refused to bow to these pressures because they are not only counter to their sovereignty and their freedom to adopt decisions but are a blatant violation of international law, the principles of non-interference in internal affairs and the aims of the International Labour Organisation. Indeed, this Organisation was established to defend the rights and freedoms of oppressed peoples – peoples struggling for their independence and freedom – as well as to unveil violations of human rights anywhere in the world. In fact, the result of the vote was a refusal of any policy of hegemony or authoritarianism, which is practised by a minority of countries, irrespective of how much they contribute to the budget of the Organisation.

The absolute priority accorded to our resolution highlights two fundamental truths: first, that the rights of the Palestinian people are and will continue to be the major concern of peoples throughout the world and that attempts by several States to divert attention away from this people will fail; the second truth, confirmed by the votes within the Committee, is that the number of those backing the Palestinian cause is increasing, because they have been shocked by the criminal actions of the Israeli occupation authorities.

In the light of the failure of these policies, pressures and manoeuvring, a minority of the members of the Resolutions Committee adopted, from the very beginning of its deliberations, an attitude which is anti-democratic, anti-parliamentarian, and contrary to the views of the majority. This behaviour took many forms and we regretted this all the more because it was demonstrated by countries which claim that they are raising high the banner in defence of human rights – as if human rights vary according to nationality, colour or religion.

First, the Committee noted that there were more than 40 amendments, not counting the subamendments, which all aimed at aborting the resolution and undermining its content.

Second, in order to obstruct the will of the majority in our Committee, the minority of Western governments, led by the delegation of the United States Government, tried to impose their own views through filibuster and obstructionism. In so doing, they abused the right guaranteed by the rules governing our work in the Committee, in order to divert it from its objectives and attain the contrary.

In fact, we wasted two weeks of precious time in our Committee in voting, the results of which we knew beforehand and which was designed to lose time. If you read carefully the minutes of our work, you will find that more than 20 votes took place by a show of hands, then a record vote, and the results were identical. The result of the vote by show of hands was often more representative of the position of the majority, which rejected the provocative measures of those opposing the Arab resolution. In other voting procedures, upon which the American delegation insisted, the main aim was to waste time and money and prevent at all costs that the resolution should be adopted by the Conference. These practices did not stop here. They even effected the role of the Chairman of the Committee who is supposed to demonstrate qualities of fairness, firmness, objectivity and integrity; but unfortunately, we were shocked by the attitude of the Chairman of the Committee and his lack of objectivity in the deliberations, because we lost all respect in his position. In fact, his behaviour clearly contributed towards the failure of our work and stirred up the majority of members who wanted to adopt several resolutions and not only the resolution on the workers and employers in Palestine.

Before I conclude my speech, I would like to make the following observations on lessons learnt from the deliberations of the Resolutions Committee this year.

First, a minority of States created a very dangerous precedent in this Organisation. Through unorthodox, illegal and unacceptable practices, it prevented the Conference from adopting a resolution reflecting its will to condemn Israeli practices against the rights and freedoms of the Palestinians, as well as expressing its support with its struggle and its uprising – especially during our session when we are celebrating the 40th anniversary of the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. We are convinced that the majority of those participating in the Conference feel that this 75th Session will remain in our memories as a sad and painful episode in the history of the International Labour Organisation, for the International Labour Conference, which is supposed to be the social conscience of the world, was unable, because of the practices I have just mentioned, to participate fully in the celebration of this occasion through the adoption of appropriate resolutions related to the struggle of people striving in their freedom and human rights.

Second, the responsibility of failure lies entirely with those in this Committee who wasted our time in procedural points and matters – a particularly serious accusation in view of its objectives to attain human rights. The report you have before you shows very clearly that the Arab delegations tried, from the very beginning, to avoid any pitfalls in our deliberations that were likely to hold up our work, so that we could adopt all the resolutions submitted to us – which we believe were all very important. But those who were against the Arab resolution, in their stubbornness, preferred to wreck the work of the Committee and to sacrifice the results of its deliberations; in other words, they did everything in their power to ensure that the resolution was not adopted, in accordance with the Machiavelian maxim that the end justifies the means.

Third, the Arab group as a whole was flexible, ready to talk and discuss, in order to ensure the success of the Committee. But, in fact, this good will was exploited to create yet further obstacles in the procedure. And in our discussions with those proposing amendments and subamendments, it became clear that those opposing the Arab resolution had not changed their position at all. They simply do not want this Organisation to shoulder its responsibilities towards the Palestinian workers and employers, from the humanitarian and social standpoint, a task which is within the competence of this Organisation. We are all aware that attempts to alleviate the situation are truncated and, in fact, do no more than give some assistance to Palestinian workers and employers, although the legitimate demands of both parties reside in the complete and full exercise of the rights and liberties enshrined in the Constitution and the Conventions of this Organisation.

If we are to say who is the winner and who is the loser in the work of the Committee, I would like to say very sincerely that the biggest loser is the cause of human rights and freedoms because, in fact, the failure to adopt our resolution, based on legitimate demands, is a victory to injustice, imperialism, occupation and oppression. It may even be seen by some as an encouragement to the Israeli authorities to continue its arbitrary practices against Palestinians. But this is untrue, because even those who opposed our resolution were unable to justify the barbaric nature of the Zionist occupation authorities.

Finally, I would like, on behalf of the Arab group, to express to our friends at this Conference our fullest gratitude for their firm stands during our work. We shall not fail to mention their attitude at international, regional or national forums. I would like to mention here, in particular, all the members of the socialist group, the Islamic countries, the African countries and non-aligned States; their attitude was honourable and dignified. The positions of all those who were against our resolution will be analysed at all official levels and by the people, so that we can differentiate between those who are our true friends and those who pretend to be and apply double standards.

Although the Arab resolution did not succeed in being adopted by the Conference, the issue will have to be decided upon sooner or later, as long as Israeli settlement continues in Palestine and the other occupied territories. The Arab delegations and the delegations of peace and justice-loving countries will not cease in their defence of this cause, until the voice of the Palestinian people reaches this august assembly and there is a dignified discussion on their social, humanitarian and economic sufferings and on the denial of their basic rights, in accordance with the mandate of the International Labour Organisation.

Mr. DAJANI (Employers' adviser, Jordan) – The report of the Resolutions Committee is in your hands now, and it is certain that a thorough reading of this report will not leave a pleasant impression with you. This is because of the obstacles and impediments deliberately placed in the way of the resolutions by a minority of members of the Committee who often, perhaps wrongly, claimed that they were speaking on behalf of their governments. At the same time, their government ministers were saying quite different things, in their parliaments in their own country or at the United Nations. However, the report is clear.

The Acting President of the Resolutions Committee and also the Acting President of the Employers' group have done their best to present a fair picture of what happened in the Resolutions Committee. But, of course, they were compelled to couch their accounts in diplomatic language. Had they been more explicit in what they said, they would have put on record that the minority undemocratically blocked the way of the majority. Artificial impediments were set up and nothing new has been achieved.

After 11 reports submitted by the Director-General since 1978 on the situation of the Arab workers in the occupied Arab territories suffering from harsh Israeli military occupation, as the year 1988 is marked by a series of human rights anniversaries and also, in view of proposed resolution submitted by the Workers' group concerning the role of the ILO in the protection of human rights and promotion of respect for trade union rights, we in the Arab group felt very deeply that our balanced resolution would not be affected by such obstacles and that, inasmuch as there were a number of proposed resolutions of some importance to be put before the ILO, our resolution would not be impeded.

In fact, a review of the situation from the beginning of the first report in 1978 will show that the situation has been escalating as regards the atrocities taking place in those areas.

This minority in the Resolutions Committee has prevented us from allowing anyone to give even a small tap to the hands of the Israeli authorities, or to wipe the tears from the eyes of a little child. They have simply left the situation as it is, claiming that if we tried to press our resolution, a material obstacle would be set up that could not be eliminated. They put human considerations behind material interests. I wonder how they will look at this matter in their own conscience.

Meanwhile, the majority of speakers in this distinguished Conference have condemned most of the Israeli measures of oppression and their denial of elementary rights. There is a pogrom taking place in the occupied areas, so much so that yesterday the papers reported that the Israelis are now attacking each other. They mistook an Oriental Jew for an Arab and killed him by beating him on the spot. You can imagine therefore what happens to the Arabs.

I remember attending a lecture by the famous American, Helen Keller, who was asked two questions. One concerned whom she liked, and she said "I like those who have humanitarian hearts". And then she was asked the second question: "Who do you hate, Miss Keller?" and she said "Those who are blind in their perceptions".

I will not take up your time for long. I am a person twice displaced from my own country. My family lived for hundreds of years in Jerusalem and Palestine, and now we have received news that in my own house, in my father's house, immigrants from Russia and elsewhere are coming to take our homes and deprive us of our property; we are denied the right that we exist. We do not exist in the eyes of those who write such dark pages in the annals of history. History will not be merciful with those people any more than it has been merciful with dictators.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. KAMIL (Government adviser, Egypt) – In adopting the report of the Resolutions Committee, I would ask you, on behalf of the Egyptian Government, to convey my gratitude to all Governments and representatives of Workers and Employers who gave their support to the draft resolution concerning the protection of the rights and freedoms of Arab workers and employers in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories.

Egypt is one of the countries which sponsored this resolution and placed it before the Conference in the confidence that the members of the Conference would support the just cause of a people struggling to recover its freedom and its right to a decent life on the land of its ancestors, especially because the Palestinian people is undergoing an ordeal and facing Israeli oppression, the practices of which are a total violation of all international laws and customs.

The report which has been submitted to us contains no resolution, after weeks of exhausting work and shameful manoeuvres in the Committee. I consider, however, that the resolution would have been possible if good faith had prevailed over the actions of a small number of members of the Committee who abused the procedures and the Standing Orders of the Conference in order to waste time and to prevent the draft resolution from coming to a vote. Our disappointment is all the more keen because that small minority has continued in its practices and policies of frustrating any negotiation on the resolution in the small Working Party, in the course of which the representatives of the countries sponsoring this resolution made every effort to assure passage of the resolution which is so much needed by the Arab workers and employers in the occupied Arab territories including Palestine, as is evidenced by the reports in all the American and Western mass media.

We consider that the real success which reflects the feelings of the overwhelming majority of the international community consists in the unlimited support granted by that majority to the resolution which at the outset of the proceedings was given the highest priority among the various resolutions that have been placed before the Conference. We also saw this in the various votes that were held on the resolution and which demonstrated clearly the major difference between those who support the resolution and those who opposed it.

Finally, we witnessed the fact that the Committee was able to adopt seven paragraphs, paragraphs which reaffirmed international principles and resolutions. As a matter of fact, the resolution could have been adopted if the time allocated to the Committee had been longer.

The overwhelming majority of the international community supported the resolution and this demonstrated to the Palestinian people that in their legitimate struggle they are not alone. That majority wanted the International Labour Organisation to associate itself with other international organisations which since the start of the Palestinian uprising have been adopting resolutions that support and uphold the Palestinian struggle and condemn the oppression and repression of the Palestinian population. The failure of the International Labour Organisation to adopt a similar resolution makes it the only international organisation in that situation.

I would like to say that this exception is still an exception. The overwhelming majority of the international community have been able to have its say within the Organisation as well as outside.

The time factor played into the hands of the small minority in the Resolutions Committee in their efforts to create procedural obstacles to the work of the Committee. However, that small minority should remember that time is always on the side of people whose rights are flouted. That minority should recall that human rights in Palestine, the right to life, freedom and human dignity, are sacred rights which are upheld by God and will ultimately prevail.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. AL-JASSEM (Employers' delegate, Kuwait) – In the name of God, the Compassionate and Merciful. As one of the co-sponsors of the resolution concerning the protection of workers' and employers' rights and freedoms in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories, and as one of those who helped to ensure that top priority was given to this resolution, I would have preferred to come before you with good news and hope for the struggle of the Palestinian people, who have refused to live under the hateful Israeli occupation. Their uprising has echoed world-wide, and I had hoped that that echo would have been heard here at this Conference, which is justly regarded as the Parliament of nations. I had hoped a resolution would be adopted by this the conscience of the United Nations, a resolution that could be regarded as recognising the right of a people resolved to defend its homeland from racist occupation and every kind of repression. Whatever the form of this occupation, it remains a foreign occupation. Alas, some resorted to various rules to hamper the work of the Committee. They went so far as to deny law and logic, and even rejected the advice of the Legal Adviser of our Organisation, who could not agree with their illogical judgements.

As you know, there is nothing easier than to tear down a great monument. What is difficult is its construction. Thus we see that a minority among the members of the Resolutions Committee adopted an unjust attitude and supported the forces of evil, and used every possible means to frustrate the majority, which was fighting for justice and right. That majority wanted to act in accordance with the dictates of its conscience. We had felt that the Arab resolution concerning the protection of workers' and employers' rights and freedoms in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories enjoyed priority; it was followed by the resolution concerning the strengthening of respect for human and trade union rights. This free and courageous attitude of the overwhelming majority of the members of the Resolutions Committee is worthy of being supported and upheld by all members of this Conference.

From the humanitarian standpoint, I associate myself with those who have wished the Committee's Chairman a speedy recovery. But from this rostrum I state that he was responsible for obstructing the work of the Committee, having sided with a minority in order to keep the Committee from adopting any resolution during this session. I know that during previous sessions he has been the target of complaints. In future sessions we must establish very clear-cut rules for the election of the Chairmen of all Conference Committees, and for the Resolutions Committee, in particular. As concerns the fate of the Arab resolution and the fate of the resolution concerning human rights, I trust that the ILO, and the Governing Body and its committees, will one way or another accord them all due attention.

I should like to recall the proposal made by the Government representative of Kuwait in the Governing Body at its February-March Session this year, concerning an examination of the uprising of the Palestinian people and the need to give all possible support and assistance to that people. I trust that this proposal will be considered in the course of the next session; that is a proposal I should like to make to you formally, Mr. President, in the presence of the Director-General, Mr. Blanchard. I trust that freedom and human rights will not be regarded as abstract concepts. The life of a man is far more precious than any sum of money. It would be deplorable for this heroic struggle not to be recognised in the ILO, which was originally created to defend, strengthen and promote trade union rights and freedoms, when so many other organisations have attached such great importance to this problem in their own areas of competence.

Meanwhile the uprising continues and will continue until the forces of evil are rolled back and the way of freedom and peace is opened for the Palestinian people. Yet there will always be people who live in ignorance and are moved by hatred. This uprising, which some people at the beginning felt concerned only a few children, is a beacon that will light the way of the Palestinian people, and of peoples under occupation in the other territories. This beacon will never be extinguished so long as the occupation continues and the forces of injustice and evil continue to repress that people.

In conclusion, I should like to thank you for your attention. I would also like to thank the secretariat, which worked very hard in the course of the Resolutions Committee's work.

Interpretation from French: Mr. SENE (Government delegate, Senegal) – My delegation has already made its comments on the deadlock outlined in the report of the Resolutions Committee at the close of its work. The reasons for this helplessness are of course numerous, apart from the procedural difficulties already mentioned by a number of speakers. There were also examples of rigidity, of cumbersome, of lack of understanding, a lack of a spirit of compromise; there were obstacles of every sort, notwithstanding the approach taken by the sponsors of resolution No. 1 and consultations among the sponsors of amendments.

The final result was an impasse, which brought to naught all the constructive steps taken in various quarters by men of good will. There is no doubt that it is essential without delay to reflect on this negative and pernicious tendency which paralyses the capacity for dialogue and the dynamics of negotiation in the Resolutions Committee, which, as you know, is a crucial organ of our Organisation. And even in terms of the rationalisation of work mentioned this morning by the Director-General, it must be noted that the tripartite structure, whose originality is part of the ILO's prestige, is undoubtedly time-consuming. There have to be consultations, reciprocal concessions, mutual trust: all essential prerequisites to creative and fruitful international co-operation in the service of social justice and peace.

However, we must not despair. Because of the grave and tragic events taking place in the occupied Arab territories, my delegation welcomed the declaration of the Director-General who undertook this morning to continue his efforts to give to Arab and Palestinian workers and employers who are victims of violence and repression the assistance of the International Labour Organisation with a view to protecting their freedoms and their interests, out of respect for human rights and the principles of international humanitarian law. Henceforth we must understand that human rights are indivisible.

It is therefore regrettable that on this 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the adoption of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), we have been unable to adopt one single resolution marking the ILO's dedication to the values and ideals expressed in those instruments in answer to the challenges of our time, the demands of development and the needs of human dignity.

I should also like briefly to take this opportunity of paying tribute to the Committee on Action against Apartheid because it is part of the same struggle against oppression, to be waged in solidarity among all men. That is why we particularly welcome the work of a category of voluntary organisations, of free workers, of creative people, artists, musicians, composers and audio-visual experts, from London, Paris, Dakar, New York and all the world's cities who wish to carry the echo of the human rights cause and the irresistible tide of the dismantling of apartheid in South Africa.

In this regard, we thank the Director-General for being so good as to make available to us the resources for carrying out a calm and constructive programme in this area, enabling us to adopt the programme for updating the instrument by consensus.

In conclusion, let me say, no matter what the devices employed by the Pretoria regime, the late President Samora Machel, who was a martyr in the struggle for freedom in Africa, said from the rostrum of the United Nations on its 40th anniversary that South Africans of all races and all colours, of all origins and all religious convictions are in the process of building a new nation, in whose honour our artists and our musicians sing today. President Mitterrand said in the message he sent us the other day that these concerts are worth all the speeches in the world, because they lead directly and courageously to mobilisation for brotherhood.

The presence at our Conference this year of leaders of COSATU, OATUU and the President of SWAPO is a promising sign and a comforting one, which without a doubt will strengthen the immense potential for brotherhood which is being sought out in South Africa and in Namibia to keep alive the dreams of individuals, peoples, nations, the whole of the international community here represented, committed, shoulder to shoulder, to the unwavering struggle against the system of apartheid and racism throughout the world and for the triumph of human rights, freedoms and human dignity.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. YASEEN (Government delegate, Kuwait) – In the name of God, the compassionate, the merciful! The report of the Resolutions Committee has been submitted to us for discussion. We would have liked to see this report contain concrete, effective, real results and we would also have liked to see it contain resolutions which the Conference would have been called upon to adopt at this 75th Session. However, I am disappointed, and this disappointment is one which is shared by a very large number of delegates present here in this year the 40th anniversary of the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

It is sad, it is shameful, to see the objectives and the principles of our Organisation disregarded in this way. Proof of this can be seen in the fact that the Arab resolution on the protection of workers' and employers' rights and freedoms in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories has not been able to reach this plenary sitting.

This resolution is one which first and foremost concerns human rights and it is absolutely in conformity with international labour Conventions, with the Declaration of Philadelphia and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Nevertheless a number of States and the representatives of certain parties launched a battle against this resolution and sought to inhibit the discussion, presenting amendments and other proposals in order to empty the resolution of its content, of its substance; others exerted pressure in order to interpret the Standing Orders in a way that suited them, the ultimate objective being to prevent the Conference from adopting the resolution.

Those who pretend to be partisans of human rights and justice are in fact rising up against the will of the Conference represented in the Resolutions Committee.

When the Resolutions Committee gave first priority to the Arab resolution by 479,020 weighted votes, the Committee was thus expressing the conscience of the Conference. However, a small majority resorted to procedural methods, the Standing Orders, and manoeuvred, using various proposed amendments to their own ends, together with other forms of pressure, in order finally to totally stifle the spirit of democracy which should guide the Conference. The overt hostility in relation to this Arab resolution not only had repercussions on that resolution, but also meant that the second resolution was similarly impeded. I wonder what is the conception of human rights of this minority? It seems to me that it is one which sees only its own economic and political interests. This minority would like to deprive this Organisation of its objectives, of its raison d'être.

We would like to express our thanks to all those who gave their support to the resolution, both in the Committee and outside it. I would like to mention the member countries of the Group of 77, the non-aligned countries, the Islamic countries, the African countries, the socialist countries, and others among the Government benches, the Employers' and the Workers' benches.

It is sad, it is regrettable, that this Arab resolution could not be put before the Conference when the Israeli occupying forces are practising repressive action and infringing the trade union rights of the Arab population. The annual mission of the ILO has been drawing attention to these practices since 1978. Since November 1987, the Palestinian people have expressed the refusal of the entire Arab population to tolerate Israeli practices and the imprisonment of Arab militants and workers. Unfortunately, however, we have not, at this 75th Session of the International Labour Conference been able to adopt the resolution in question – the Arab resolution. We have thus failed in attaining our goal, which was to try to highlight and draw attention to the issue of human rights at this session.

Interpretation from French: Mr. OECHSLIN (Employers' delegate, France) – I share the concerns which have been expressed here as regards the absence of results in the Resolutions Committee. Two weeks of impassioned discussion and debate made it impossible to deal not only with the first resolution under consideration, but also with other important texts such as those concerning human rights, the role of enterprises in employment growth and the environment.

The proposed texts were, doubtless, not perfect, but they could have been improved in a constructive spirit. The Employers' group was prepared to do this. And at one point we even believed that the Committee would be able to agree on wording which seemed to be very broadly acceptable.

The task of the Resolutions Committee is to try to define the ILO's future course and to make it possible for the Conference to express itself on important and topical issues. It should not be thought of as a release valve, and on this I agree with Mr. Karlsson who spoke on behalf of the Workers' members. Our work must strictly respect the framework of legality. Our procedures, therefore, must follow the letter and the spirit of the Standing Orders. The Standing Orders were in fact designed to facilitate a consensus among parties on controversial issues. They are a means, and not an end in themselves; if the Standing Orders do not fulfil their role, they should be modified. The Governing Body should consider possible amendments to the Standing Orders, to make it easier to reach a compromise.

However, it should be recognised that compromise presupposes the genuine desire of those concerned to achieve a compromise as Ambassador Sene has said most eloquently. We should all reflect on this issue individually. There is no reason why the spirit of dialogue which has prevailed in the work of other Committees of the Conference this year should be left outside by those entering Room XIX.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. OMAR (Government delegate, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya) – The failure of the Resolutions Committee to achieve tangible results is not so regrettable as the methods used by a small minority which intentionally worked to prevent the adoption of the resolutions concerning the protection of workers' and employers' rights and freedoms in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories, the resolution which was considered by all peoples and nations interested in peace as that meriting priority consideration among the five resolutions submitted to the Committee.

Amongst the methods adopted was abusive use of the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference. The opponents of the resolution frequently requested both a vote by show of hands and a record vote although paragraph 6 of article 65 of the Standing Orders of the Conference stipulates very clearly that "Committees shall vote by a show of hands or by a record vote". Another method was to keep asking for the advice of the Legal Adviser, even on very simple issues. It was obvious that the Legal Adviser also found this excessive and asked the Committee to try to apply the provisions of the Standing Orders.

Furthermore, the Chair was used in a way which shed some doubt on the impartiality and integrity of the Chairman. We do not wish to make any accusations here, we merely speak about realities, what everyone was able to see. The Committee, throughout this entire period, seemed like a ship without a captain at its helm. It is with great regret that we say this because we would have liked to see a neutral attitude so that this position maintains its prestige, its dignity.

The minority in the Committee tried to place responsibility for what happened on the authors of the resolution by claiming that we were delaying freedom of expression when we asked for the closure of the discussion. That is not true. We asked for the closure of the discussion only after all normal methods of negotiation had been exhausted and once it was clear that the other side was not acting in good faith and that there was a clear intent to waste time so as to prevent the adoption of this resolution.

The opponents of the resolution were able to express their views and the authors showed great flexibility and openness. That is why a number of small scale meetings were held. The intention to oppose the resolution was absolutely clear from the outset when an argument was put forward, a fallacious and erroneous argument, that the ILO was not the appropriate forum in which to discuss this matter and that it should be submitted to the General Assembly. At a later stage, when we studied the content of the resolution it was said that paragraph 5 represented the essential problem, for the opponents of the resolution did not wish the Conference to continue to study violations perpetrated against workers and employers in Palestine. This is very strange, particularly in the context of the savage repression and the violence of Zionism. It was also said that operative paragraph 5 would have negative repercussions on the work of the Conference and on the work of the Committee on Apartheid and that this paragraph would not contribute to a just solution of the question as a whole. What kind of logic is that? All this was done with the pretext of improving the draft resolution but it is clear that all these pretexts were primarily aimed at getting rid of this resolution.

The minority under the leadership of the United States was thus able to block the resolution concerning the protection of workers' and employers' rights and freedoms in Palestine and likewise to paralyse the adoption of other important resolutions, despite the fact that this is the 40th anniversary of the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. There is no logical reason to explain this behaviour apart from the declared hostility vis-à-vis the heroic people of Palestine and total and absolute submission to Zionist pressures.

This minority was able arbitrarily to block the adoption of this resolution which is indeed most regrettable particularly since there were some who declared themselves to be partisans of democracy. We are happy, however, to see the noble attitude adopted by peace-loving countries in the Third World and in the socialist group. This attitude is based on their sense of responsibility vis-à-vis the law, justice and peace.

Mr. MORTON (Workers' delegate, United Kingdom) – I wish to speak briefly on behalf of a substantial number of Workers' delegates. We believe that it is neither beneficial to this Organisation nor helpful to any cause to attempt to repeat the work of the Resolution Committee in this Plenary Session. A Committee was elected, it conducted its business to the best of its collective ability and within the Constitution and Standing Orders.

My own experience with such committees, over many years, is that all participants use and are entitled to use the procedures correctly. As Mr. Oechslein has just said, if the procedures need modification, then they should be looked at.

Meanwhile, we have the Report of the Committee before us and it does not include any resolution. Now a resolution is a precise form of words and it was not possible to reach agreement on those words. This is a familiar problem in this and in many other organisations. No amount of recrimination or repetition can alter that simple fact of history. "The moving finger writes", as the poet said "and having writ, moves on".

Now for the future we hope, as Mr. Karlsson said, that something may be learned from these events and learned by all participants. For these reasons, my colleagues and I do not intend to enter into a renewed debate on any of the issues that were before the Committee, or indeed on the Committee's procedures, although we would wish to emphasise that our interest and concern about these issues is as great as that of any others in this hall. We hope that next year we shall all be able to approach the difficult task of the Resolutions Committee with a flexible and constructive approach and achieve greater results.

Mr. ELIAV (Government delegate, Israel) – My delegation wishes first to congratulate the Officers and secretariat of the Resolutions Committee on the exemplary way they have carried out their task in the face of a very difficult situation. They did an admirable job and we are only sorry that the Chairman, Mr. Alexander, fell ill; and we were very happy to learn today that he is getting well again and would like to request the United Kingdom delegation here to wish him our best wishes for a full and speedy recovery.

The basic purpose of our Organisation is to try to achieve harmony and co-operation in solving one of the essential problems in the social domain of our society. The work of the ILO is predicated on the assumption that the inherent diversity of interests in the field of labour in which all the social partners – namely workers, employers and governments – are engaged calls for a concerted, I repeat concerted, effort to establish a constructive, I repeat constructive, dialogue between them and to promote economic growth which would guarantee full and satisfactory employment.

Thus, the Organisation was structured on a tripartite basis, which is unique among the specialised agencies of the United Nations system (which it pre-dates) in that its organs are not composed only of governmental representatives. Furthermore, it was established on the basis of a Constitution and functions on the basis of Standing Orders which, taken together, provide for a system of checks and balances between its three components and ensures that as a rule it would deal only with issues relevant to its goals.

However, from time to time, they witness pernicious efforts to introduce into the Organisation political issues which have nothing to do with these goals and in fact run counter to them. They had no relation whatsoever with the establishment of labour standards, the deliberation of Conventions, the supervision of labour laws, the promotion of employment and several other important issues which are within the competence of the Organisation. They cause only superfluous confrontations and sterile polemics and thus harm the image of the ILO as an organisation striving to achieve social consensus in all fields.

The most recent attempt in this negative field was the exercise in futility imposed on this Conference by the Arab delegates from all the three groups which vitiated completely the work of the Resolutions Committee. There was no need to force an Arab draft from this Committee. There was no need to exert political pressure in order to set aside the draft on the role of the Organisation in the promotion of human rights in the year which commemorates the 40th anniversary of the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which was to be the main theme of the Conference. Nor was there any need to set aside other deserving resolutions like the one of self-employment and small- and medium-sized enterprises and the one concerning the report of the World Commission on Environment and Development. There was no need to muzzle delegates in the Resolutions Committee right from the start when a tumultuous attempt was made to prevent me from exercising my right to reply, even briefly, to an unbridled and vicious attack on my country made during the presentation of the Arab draft. Finally, there was no need to turn the Resolutions Committee into a debating forum on the Middle East conflict and to use abusive and offensive language against my country while doing so.

May I, in this context, inform the delegation referred to in paragraph 186 of the Report of the Resolutions Committee that one of the first Zionists in history was Cyrus the Great, as he is rightly called in the history of Iran, the founder of the first Persian Empire. It was he who facilitated about 2,500 years ago the first return of the Jewish people to their homeland in Zion and his name lives forever with us and has been adopted by us as a Jewish first name or, as Arab delegates would say, it has been Judaised.

To return to the report itself, there is also certainly no justification whatsoever for denigrating in an uncivil and unprecedented manner the Officers of the Committee including the Chairman, even after he was taken ill, repeated here from this rostrum a few minutes ago, and to criticise the draft report for giving space to statements that the Arab delegates did not like. We all know by now that as a result of this Arab exercise in futility, the Resolutions Committee has regrettably been unable to reach any concrete results, in contrast with the work of the other committees to which we were happy to contribute. However, the lucid and comprehensive report before us, the author of which should be congratulated, reflects truly and fully why and how this situation was reached.

Before concluding, I would like to refer to the issue which was falsely exploited for the venomous campaign against Israel, including a few minutes ago in this debate. I would like to reiterate, on behalf of my Government, that the West Bank and Gaza Strip, unlike other territories in the Middle East and North Africa where there exist political and ethnic problems, have been and are open to any independent people of good will who would like to observe the situation there. Furthermore, we have been submitting annual reports to the Conference on this issue, which are appended to the Director-General's Report and are there to read for everybody who is interested in facts and statistics and not in distorted fiction. It is our policy to intensify this policy of openness and co-operation with the Organisation, through government promotion of further development and training projects for the benefit of Arab workers and employers in the territories, as we were very glad to tell the Director-General during his recent visit to Israel. We were also glad to note his reference to such a policy during his impressive statement this morning. We firmly believe that the real interests of these workers and employers would be best served by a positive response of this Organisation to the challenge, including the allocation of adequate financial resources. We call on all those concerned to help us in achieving this goal, which would constitute an important contribution to the arduous process of achieving peace and coexistence in the Middle East.

Mr. SHARMA (Government delegate, India) – One can only admire the courage and perseverance with which the Palestinian people have been struggling for the liberation of their own land and the recognition of their inalienable national rights under the leadership of the Palestine Liberation Organisation.

A just and durable solution to the Palestinian issue cannot be found without Israel's total and unconditional withdrawal from all Palestinian and Arab territories occupied by it since 1967, including Jerusalem, and without the exercise of the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people, including the right to return, self-determination without external interference, the right to national independence and sovereignty and the right to establish an independent Palestinian State in their homeland, Palestine. Today, in any just and permanent settlement in the occupied territories, including Palestine, it is Palestinian interests which must prevail. It is only when the Palestinians become their own masters that all States of the region will be able to live within secure international frontiers.

The climate of tension and violence, already prevailing in the occupied Arab territories, including Palestine, has considerably intensified over the past several months. The recent events in the occupied Arab territories, including Palestine, have been a cause of particularly deep concern to us. The situation there has deteriorated, leading to a Palestinian uprising against the violation of human rights; the mass repression conducted by the Israeli authorities has led to hundreds of people being detained, injured and killed. It is indeed unfortunate that Israel continues, by force, to pursue a self-defeating policy of stifling the legitimate aspirations of the Palestinian people.

The world cannot ignore the many specific instances of atrocities heaped upon the hapless Palestinian inhabitants in the occupied lands. As noted in the Report of the Director-General, the situation will become much worse if the occupation is not ended, and ended quickly. The Report draws attention to numerous instances of overt and covert discrimination against Arab workers in areas such as trade union freedom, social security, working conditions, vocational training, etc.

The situation of the Arab workers in the occupied Arab territories, including Palestine, is not a new subject for the ILO; it has been previously dealt with in resolutions adopted by the International Labour Conference in 1974 and 1980 and in the Director-General's annual reports.

My delegation fully supported the resolution concerning the protection of workers and employers' rights and freedoms in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories, which was given top priority for consideration by the Resolutions Committee of this session of the Conference. Unfortunately, owing to various reasons including the delaying tactics adopted by some, the Resolutions Committee was unable to complete its work on even the first resolution which it took up in order of priority. In the view of my delegation this is a most regrettable development. It would have been entirely appropriate for such a resolution to be adopted this year against the background of the recent Palestinian uprising, and it would have been particularly topical since 1988 marks the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. All the same, I would like to express my delegation's position that work in ILO should continue and expand with regard to the problems faced by the Arab workers in the occupied territories, including Palestine, in areas such as employment, social security, vocational training, freedom of association, etc. We would like to express our full support for every effort which the ILO makes in the future to help the Palestinian people. We are convinced that the ILO must support the rights of the Arabs in the occupied Arab territories, including Palestine, to live and work in freedom and dignity with equal opportunity and economic security, and that the ILO must do all within its competence to guarantee these rights in practice to the Palestinian people.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. ISSA (Workers' delegate, Syrian Arab republic) – Allow me to make a brief statement and provide my impressions of the debate in the Resolutions Committee, on my own behalf and on behalf of the Arab trade unions.

We followed with great attention all the positions taken up, all the attitudes concerning procedures and issues in the Resolutions Committee to prevent the selection of the proposed resolution and its submission to the Conference. This resolution obtained the highest priority and the largest number of votes in front of the Conference. In fact, it obtained the top priority over 13 resolutions. It is the resolution concerning the protection of workers' and employers' rights and freedoms in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories. The very title of the resolution and its various paragraphs clearly indicate that it aimed at impeding the continuing invasion of the Israeli authorities in the Arab territories and its attempt to instal a foreign nation, which arrived in that land from various parts of the world, and then to attempt to expel the original inhabitants of that territory. In order to achieve their aims, the Israeli authorities are using force and repression as well as resorting to pressure to force the landowners and the employers to leave their land and to be exiled from these territories.

In our resolution, we urged the various countries and nations of the world to put an end to this policy of repression and terror used daily by the occupying authorities against the Arab inhabitants and all those who stand by them.

We also called for the release of imprisoned Palestinian trade unionists and the need to observe and protect the basic human rights and trade union rights referred to in the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation, the Philadelphia Declaration and the resolutions adopted by this Organisation.

The resolution also requested that due account be taken of the Report submitted by the Director-General to the Conference. The resolution obtained the top priority by the members of the Resolutions Committee because of its humanitarian content and the refusal of any attempts to undermine the adoption of this resolution. This was also due to the fact that we firmly believed that this resolution would seek to put an end to the criminal attempts undertaken by the Israeli authorities against the Arab inhabitants and workers in Palestine. Unfortunately, the procedures resorted to in the Resolutions Committee resided in an attempt to submit a large number of amendments to the resolution as well as delaying tactics which would impede the adoption of the resolution and its forwarding to the Conference.

This measure led to a failure in discussing the four other resolutions that had obtained priority in the Committee. The procedural manoeuvres adopted by those who wished to deprive this resolution of its content and to prevent discussion of the other resolutions in fact succeeded by simply resorting to procedural tactics. In so doing they have undermined the procedures and the principles of this Organisation upheld in its Constitution.

In fact, I wonder in whose interest is it that the resolution was not adopted? I also wonder what would have happened if the resolution had been adopted, and what would have happened if another territory had been under discussion.

The resolution refers to mass murder and terror.

All countries should be concerned about such events as are taking place in Palestine – terrorism, murders, assassination, expulsions and the murder of children, is something that has happened for a long time now. If it had happened in the Middle Ages we would have said that humanity was unable to grasp the danger and the seriousness of the matter and that humanity then was not as civilised and developed as it is today.

However, what is happening now in Palestine and in the other occupied Arab territories, and the suffering of our nation and people, their social drama, is in fact taking place within sight and sound of the world and in the twentieth century. It is being perpetrated by the authorities of the Zionist occupation who have nothing to do with humanity, under the protection of those who claim to protect human rights and trade union rights. How can you explain this? It seems to me that humanity is somehow classified into different categories, and it seems as if these Zionists have set themselves apart from the international community, and do not understand the basic principles of humanity.

This, in fact, is what happened in the Resolutions Committee.

The continuation of this practice will transform this international organisation into an instrument seeking to uphold principles and practices which are in total contradiction with the policies and principles of the United Nations and its agencies. We are quite aware that the United States played a major role in failing that resolution. They have, in fact, provided the means and facilities to the occupying authorities. Here we must reaffirm once again that the measures resorted to by the representative of the United States and their other supporters in this present session of the International Labour Conference have now become a scandal in the eyes of international opinion, because the nation and the people of Palestine, after 40 years of occupation, have imposed their presence as their actions and resistance have now reached the forefront of the international news and media. They have once again reaffirmed that however long terrorism prevails, it cannot last for long, as the nation struggles to uphold and restore its legitimate rights.

This is the lesson of history since the beginning of creation.

Finally, I wonder why was such a resolution subjected to such treatment? Many attempts were made to undermine the resolution and make it fail, though it dealt with a cause that has in fact inflicted suffering on millions of people and has exposed the Middle East region to three wars. The position of this minority in the Resolutions Committee, its opposition to the resolution, clearly indicates how much it belittles world opinion in the Committee and the world at large and how much it, in fact, belittles the position of other countries and member States of the Committee which would have liked to provide their support to the people of Palestine and their workers. The very fact that this resolution had obtained such a high priority, the various votes that were undertaken and which, in fact, indicated total rejection of the amendments, clearly reflects the international solidarity and sympathy for the people and workers of Palestine and the rejection of racism and of restrictions on trade union rights and other rights in Palestine and the other territories.

However, what really increases our suffering is that this attempt was made at a time when we were celebrating the 40th anniversary of the International Declaration of Human Rights and the anniversary of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (1987). We had sincerely hoped that we would reach a compromise solution between the various parties and members of the Committee. However, our opponents adopted the policy of delaying tactics which led the Committee to conclude its work without adopting any final resolution.

Finally, I wish to put on record that my total rejection of the debate that took place in the Resolutions Committee because it was simply a manoeuvre at wasting our time. I would also like to condemn the attempt to abort the work of the Resolutions Committee and the attempts made to oppose all the work of this international organisation. The measures adopted and the procedures ran counter to its rights. It is a two-edged sword which can be used in other cases and which could threaten and undermine this Organisation which was established to uphold and protect humanity and to prevent those who wish to inflict harm upon it. I am saying this not to discriminate or distinguish between peoples or between developed and developing countries but only to indicate that the procedure and the behaviour which we witness today in the Resolutions Committee, which paralysed the work of that Committee for an entire year, was simply an attempt to undermine a just and fair resolution.

Finally, I wish to express my deep thanks and gratitude to all those members who supported the resolution without any hesitation, for their firm belief in the validity of the resolution's contents. I simply wish to tell them that the events that will take place on the Palestinian scene in the future will prove that they were right in supporting this resolution.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. KOSTINE (Government delegate, USSR) – On behalf of the group of socialist countries. I should like to make the following statement.

The bulk of the work of the Resolutions Committee was to consider the situation of workers and employers in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories. The Arab countries introduced a resolution which was allocated first priority after a vote. As regards the discussion of this resolution, I must say that our countries are seriously concerned by the dangerous developments in the Middle East. If this situation continues, it may have very serious consequences for all peoples and States in this region and threaten international peace and security.

The settlement of the conflict in the Middle East can only be based on a balancing of interests of all countries. The Arabs must recover their confiscated territories, the Palestinians must be given the right to self-determination, and all States of the region must be guaranteed the right to peace and security.

The only sure and realistic way of achieving a comprehensive solution in the Middle East is through an international conference with the participation of all interested parties, including the Palestinian Liberation Organisation and the States which are permanent members of the Security Council of the United Nations.

The ILO must raise its voice to defend the Arab workers in the occupied territories, and give them all the necessary assistance so that they may live and work in conditions of dignity and peace, economic security and equal opportunities, as called for in the Declaration of Philadelphia. Therefore, it is to be regretted that as a result of the manoeuvres carried out by representatives of some countries, our Conference is unable to adopt a resolution which would express its solidarity with the Arab workers in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories, at a time when they need this more than ever.

These delegates have used all kinds of procedural manoeuvres in the Committee in order to prevent the adoption of the resolution concerning the Arab territories despite the fact that the sponsors of the resolution showed their readiness to compromise, and that the vast majority of the members of the Committee were ready to express their solidarity with the workers in the occupied territories and to condemn Israel for its inhuman actions against an unarmed civilian population in these territories.

The results of the work of the Committee also show the imperfections of the procedure for examining resolutions, which prevents the effective work of the Conference. The impasse created by the opponents of this resolution, has led to a situation whereby the Committee was not in a position to discuss other important resolutions such as the protection of human and trade union rights, employment growth and the environment.

We regret the fact that the Committee was thus not able to put before the Conference for its examination even one resolution. And all of the resolutions it might have considered touch on issues which are of great significance for all the workers of the world.

Interpretation from Chinese: Mr. YAO (Government adviser, China) – The report and its examination now is the record of the work of nearly three weeks of an important Committee of the Conference. The Chinese delegation will not make any comment on the report itself, but we are disappointed about the Resolutions Committee's failure to achieve any result. This is the first time that China, since its association with ILO activities, has confronted ed such a situation. We feel concerned and uneasy about it.

This has happened because of the lack of co-operation and the procrastination of the Resolutions Committee. As a result, the resolution on the protection of workers' and employers' rights and freedoms in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories was not adopted. Furthermore, the examination of other resolutions was also hindered. It is very regrettable.

An important item at this year's session of the Conference is the protection and promotion of human rights. It is most unfair that such a situation, which disregards the basic human rights of workers and employers in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories, should have occurred. I reiterate here and now that the Chinese Government and its people will, as always, resolutely support the Palestinian and Arab people in their just struggle.

Dialogue and co-operation constitute the trend of the world today. The ILO too has maintained a tradition of reaching consensus through tripartite consultations. We hope this will not be undermined by irresponsible behaviour. It is also our hope that the ILO will continue to make a positive contribution to safeguarding the interests of the workers and people of the world.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. AL-ZAIDI (Government delegate, Iraq) – In the Name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful! It is really sad that this year we have this unfortunate situation as regards the work of the Resolutions Committee.

In spite of the paramount importance of this session of the Conference, which coincides with the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the Resolutions Committee and, therefore, the International Labour Conference could not adopt a new document to strengthen these rights and expand their application. We are even more upset by this situation because of its causes, and the way in which the Standing Orders were used to introduce obstacles contrary to the spirit of the Constitution of the Organisation and to the spirit of the Standing Orders. The question is for whom was this done, and why. In whose interest was the work of the Resolutions Committee blocked? In whose interest were these obstacles put up to prevent the adoption of a resolution that received top priority? Why was this attitude taken vis-à-vis this resolution?

The resolution, in its reference and in its content, conformed to all the principles of international organisations. Moreover, its sponsors accepted some amendments in spite of the magnitude of the crimes perpetrated by the occupation – the Zionist authorities – since 1948; these crimes are more racist than those perpetrated by the authorities in South Africa.

This sad situation arises from the practices followed in the Resolutions Committee. At the outset, the Resolutions Committee did not wisely choose its Chairman. He was often absent and he was not always aware of the procedures that should be followed or of the basic aspects of the Standing Orders and other procedures. We faced in this Committee cases in which we were sure that some were endeavouring to waste our time and stall matters. Every time the Legal Adviser was called upon our work was delayed. It was really surprising to see the unique case in this Committee when the Legal Adviser was challenged, undermining the credibility of an international civil servant simply because his interpretation did not please this minority. The representative of the Zionist entity challenged the opinion of the Legal Adviser. This did not come as a surprise, at least to those who know the score. It does not come as a surprise because he who challenged this opinion does not have any place in a forum of freedom and liberty, because he is part and parcel of an entity that is based on settlement and usurpation. Now, we are finishing this session without reaching any resolutions to add to the documents and instruments of this Organisation, without giving the ILO a role in the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Those who worked to undermine the Resolutions Committee did not realise that the uprising will continue. I know this because the "children of the stones" who have tasted freedom will continue their uprising, supported by all the honest people of the world. In spite of all that has taken place, we are duty-bound to continue this discussion. In spite of the forces that stand in the way of human rights and freedoms in the Committee, the Director-General and the Conference will take the appropriate measures to protect Arab workers in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories, because the role of the ILO within the international community should be very clear-cut and should be prominent in all social issues that are of interest to the world.

Our confidence in the future and our trust in the Organisation and in all other international forums are great. Our trust in the children of the uprising is also great; one day they will put an end to the repression and racism of the usurper and the enemies of right and freedom will not have a place in this world. Victory will belong to the people.

Mr. BARKAN (Workers' adviser, Israel) – I do not wish to compete with some of the previous speakers, neither in substance nor in their abusive language. I want only to evaluate the work of the Committee and to draw some conclusions.

The situation created last week in this Conference reflects the nature of this Organisation. On the one hand, very important results were achieved in the four technical committees: two new Conventions were adopted and another one was amended. On the other hand, the Resolutions Committee went into a cul-de-sac and could not finish its work, even on one resolution. Were there no important issues on this agenda?

On the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the Committee had on its agenda "human and trade union rights". Equally, it could have given its attention to the shameful situation where 200 million young children around the world are working instead of learning and are exploited.

It might have referred also to a new field of the ILO by examining the mutual influence of employment and environmental protection, and some other very important issues.

Why was this important Committee prevented from carrying out its task? The sole reason was that the majority in the Committee decided to deal first with a resolution which has a political nature; a subject which is within the jurisdiction of a political international organisation like the UN, but not within the competence of a social organisation like the ILO.

Allow me to remind the distinguished delegates of this Conference of the unique composition of the ILO. Its unique Constitution and procedures – they are all aimed at one objective – not to raise differences but to achieve consensus. Without such consensus, the ILO would deviate from the basis on which its founders had constituted it. Without consensus, this Organisation will embark on a road which leads nowhere.

Histadrut, the general federation of labour in Israel, which I represent in this Conference, does its utmost to create such an atmosphere. Its members, Jews and Arabs alike, enjoy the same rights and benefits. On the initiative of Histadrut, the law will provide that every worker in the country (Jews and Arabs, citizens of Israel, as well as Arab workers commuting every day to work in Israel from the West Bank and Gaza) will work under the same collective agreement and have the same wages and enjoy the same conditions of work and fringe benefits and have the same right to elect and to be elected to the local labour committee.

Histadrut stands also for the easing of national tensions and calls on both sides to the conflict to convene an international conference and to discuss peace. Extreme measures and positions, like the draft resolution submitted to the Resolutions Committee, will serve only the extremists from both sides who shake hands with each other.

A peace settlement will show a way out of the impasse in which our tormented region is stuck.

In spite of the words pronounced here, I call on the delegates from the Arab countries, because new winds are now blowing in the bipolarised world: let us combine efforts in our region, let us talk, and we will find a political and peaceful solution which will be based on mutual recognition, on respect for each other's rights, to the benefit and prosperity of our peoples, of our children. This aim is not unattainable. It is in our hands. Let us join hands.

Mr. KERKINOS (Government delegate, Greece) – We voted in the Resolutions Committee in the belief that the report would now be coming to the plenary. It is a factual report, and this is why I wish to state now that the Government delegation of Greece will be voting for the report on the understanding that a correction will be made on page 33/26 regarding the way the Government representative of my country appears to have voted in that particular instance. We did not abstain. We were absent as we were absent on the occasion of all votes in, and all the procedural matters raised at, the Resolutions Committee. We realise it is a technical error, and hope that it will be rectified.

Having clarified this, may I add that the position we took in the Committee did not mean that we were distancing ourselves. We were not distant; we were not remote. We were very much there.

Mr. AHMED (Worker's delegate, Pakistan) – At this late hour we are near the closure of this session of our Conference, at which we have spent almost three weeks, a very precious time in our life, and we find that in one of the important Committees, in the Resolutions Committee, despite the fact that there were 85 Government members, 73 Workers' members and 60 Employers' members, after their detailed deliberations of three weeks, out of all the resolutions which were tabled by the delegates, nothing could be brought about in this important plenary.

On this occasion we share the feeling that the members of the Workers' group, led by Mr. Karlsson, made the utmost efforts to do positive work and we appreciate his services. Moreover, the Office, ably assisted by Mr. Ali Taqi, provided all possible facilities. But, despite all these efforts, we find that the discussion could not be concluded on even one resolution.

Many of the speakers have highlighted the various aspects which delayed these activities, but we would certainly on this occasion urge that attention be paid to the findings outlined in paragraph 6 of the report which gives priority to five resolutions. We would have wanted these resolutions, including the resolution concerning the role of the ILO, the strengthening of respect for human and trade union rights, the resolution concerning environment and employment, the resolution concerning occupational safety and health, the resolution concerning self-employment and also the resolution tabled by the Workers to combat child labour, could have been considered in this plenary, along with resolution No. 1 concerning the protection of workers' and employers' rights and freedoms in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories, which was given priority by the Committee.

I am not about to go into details of the various reasons why we support the cause of the Palestinian people and the cause of the working class in other occupied Arab territories. Some distinguished members have stated that things have gone far enough, and that we must now see to the improvement of the conditions of work and life, although there are other issues such as the freedom of the people in the occupied territories.

We believe that this Organisation, and many other international organisations that bring us together stand for one thing – that the liberty of each individual is a basic right and that each nation has the basic right to pursue its material and spiritual well-being in full freedom, economic security and equality – and if that right is denied, the whole process is negated. This very principle was proclaimed in article II of the Declaration of Philadelphia. It is also the basis of this principle that the Constitution of the ILO states that universal and lasting peace can be established only if it is based on social justice. But can there be social justice if people are under occupation and foreign rule? If such practices had continued most of the Third World countries would still be subjugated. In this respect the ILO has a great tradition – to support all those people who are subjugated. That is why we support the anti-apartheid movement, and the struggling people of South Africa. This is why we support the right to justice and freedom there.

We consequently feel that the resolutions passed by the sessions of the Conference in 1973 and 1980 reflect the fact that this is an aspiration of this house, and we appreciate the work done by the Director-General in presenting an annual Report on the situation in that part of the world to the Conference. We hope that, although these resolutions have not come to the plenary, the aspects which have been spotlighted – the suffering of the Palestinians and the workers in the occupied Arab territories – will be duly taken into account as regards their basic rights, as this is why we support the contents of the resolution in question.

Interpretation from German: Mr. LAMPRECHT (Workers' adviser, German Democratic Republic) – On behalf of a number of Workers' delegates and members of the World Federation of Trade Unions, I should like to make the following statement.

The Resolutions Committee had before it a very timely and urgent resolution concerning the protection of workers' and employers' rights and freedoms in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories which have been held by Israel since 1967. In view of the denial of the democratic and trade union rights and freedoms of the Arab population by the occupying forces and in view of the exceedingly tense situation in these territories, we expected the adoption of a document, all the more since the overwhelming majority in the plenary and in the Committee declared its solidarity with the Arab population.

We therefore regret the fact that the work of this Resolutions Committee could not be brought to a successful conclusion even though the majority of the members of the Committee were in favour. We also regret this because as a result the second resolution, concerning the role of the ILO in the strengthening of respect for human and trade union rights, which had been submitted by the whole of the Workers' group was blocked. Particularly since this is the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the 40th anniversary of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention (No. 87) we were most anxious to see this resolution adopted.

Interpretation from French: Mr. NIASSE (Worker adviser, Senegal) – His Excellency Mr. Sène, the Ambassador of Senegal, has already stated very eloquently the position of my country. If I am taking the floor now it is as spokesman of the African group in the Committee.

Since this is also the first time that I have spoken at a plenary meeting may I congratulate you on your election as President of the 75th Labour Conference, but above all for your pragmatism and your savoir-faire that have enabled you to ensure the smooth running of this Conference.

I feel great regret because the Resolutions Committee is one of the most important of the Conference's committees and should, in my view, be a place where understanding and co-operation are achieved and where ways are found for the ILO to contribute towards alleviating the world crisis. However, this year, intolerance and a partisan spirit have prevailed over the cardinal virtues which should be upheld by us in the various structures and committees of our Organisation. It would have been possible if we had wanted to understand each other, to adopt, in spite of the short time available, two or three resolutions at least. Unfortunately this was not the case due to delaying tactics and political confrontations which led to no resolution being adopted – not even the one that was recognised as being the priority one by four-fifths of the members of the Committee. At a time when the whole world is celebrating the 40th anniversary of the Declaration of Human Rights, it is really unfortunate that an institution such as the ILO, whose main vocation is the defence of human rights, should not adopt a resolution on that subject because a minority, by drawing upon certain Articles of the ILO Constitution, blocked the democratic procedure which is the very essence of the Organisation and used all its efforts to stop injustice being perpetrated against the Palestinian people.

Turning once again to the Report of the Director-General and its contents, which no person of good will could contest, since the events in Palestine and their repercussions are well known. I dare to hope that the prominent persons who are gathered here and the people of good will in this Conference will do their utmost to ensure that the priority resolutions of this year, concerning the rights and freedoms for workers and employers in Palestine and the occupied Arab territories, human rights, employment promotion, co-operation between the affluent and developing countries, environment and employment and child labour, will not remain a deadletter and that through dialogue, understanding and consensus, we shall achieve acceptable solutions to all in the future.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. AGUERO PEREZ (Workers' adviser, Cuba) – My delegation, as well as various trade union organisations from Latin America which participated as titular members at this Conference have requested me to place on record their rejection of the inappropriate methods which were used by the most powerful capitalist member State of this Organisation and the alliance of a small group of countries and other allied forces of the Israeli occupying forces, which prevented the Resolutions Committee at the present Conference from carrying out its work. Through an unreasonable number of amendments they managed to exhaust the time allotted to the Committee. This was a most undemocratic method against a resolution which received top priority and the support of the overwhelming majority of the members of the Committee.

The arguments of those who blocked the resolution concerning the protection of workers and employers' rights and freedoms in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories are not valid because, in our opinion, this resolution is within the competence of the ILO. This is borne out by a statement in the Report of the Director-General, where he states "within the occupied territories economic development – and consequently employment – as well as the trade union situation continue to be subject to serious restrictions resulting from the state of occupation, and there is little prospect of any significant improvement while that situation persists. Recent events have underlined how critically that situation dominates the entire life of the territories. There is an urgent need for a process which will bring peace to this region, since a continuance of the 20-year-old occupation could only lead to a progressive deterioration of the situation, including that of Arab workers. So long as it exists the ILO will, within the framework of its means and competence have to pursue its action for the benefit of Arab workers of the territories."

The anti-democratic blockage of the work of the Committee did not merely prevent us from expressing our fitting solidarity with the heroic struggle of the Palestinian people and other Arab workers, but also stood in the way of the adoption of an important resolution on the strengthening of the respect of human and trade union rights which was submitted by the Workers' group. For all these reasons we regret the manoeuvres which took place in the Resolutions Committee and which did serious damage to the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference.

I should like to take this opportunity to reiterate our unconditional solidarity with our brothers in Palestine and other Arab nations, and express our unconditional support for the heroic sacrifices and fight waged by the Palestinian people, our hope that they will achieve their just rights and aspirations in the near future under the aegis of the glorious PLO.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. ABDOON (Workers' adviser, Sudan) – May I, on behalf of the general trade union of workers in the Sudan, make some remarks on the work of the Resolutions Committee.

The Director-General has chosen for his Report to this session of the Conference the topic of human rights as a collective responsibility. In line with this topic, the Resolutions Committee gave top priority to the resolution on the protection of the rights and freedoms of workers and employers in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories. This issue is very closely linked with human rights and with the responsibilities of the ILO in consolidating and strengthening freedoms and trade union rights all over the world. Moreover, it coincides with the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and the adoption of Convention No. 87. In the Sudan we celebrated the 40th anniversary of this Convention, which is applied in practice, and which corresponds to principles enshrined in the Constitution of the Sudan. In order to preserve these victories and achievements, which are threatened by restrictions on civil and political rights, we must reinforce our efforts, and that is what we have done in the Sudan. This is demonstrated by two revolutions, in October 1964 and April 1980, led by the workers.

These principles are the cornerstone of our union in the defence of trade union rights. My delegation co-sponsored the resolution that received top priority. It is not surprising that top priority was given to the protection of the freedoms and rights of Arab workers and employers in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories. In its preamble we find mention of several principles dear to the ILO and practical, reasonable, applicable measures in the operative part. I shall not go into details because all of you know the contents of this resolution. And you know that it should have been adopted by the Conference. However, it is regrettable that the Resolutions Committee got bogged down in procedural questions. In 13 years on this Committee, I had never seen what I saw this year: tactics and procedures that are uncivilised and undemocratic, to say the least.

These procedures undermined the noble objectives we all hoped the Committee would reach in order to preserve and protect the rights of workers and employers in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories, especially now when we see the people rise up against the repression and discrimination of the Israeli occupation authorities.

This is what I wanted to put on record on behalf of the workers of the Sudan. Our union regrets that we have received a negative report this year from the Resolutions Committee, a report that does not give any encouragement regarding the promotion and protection of the trade union rights we hold so dear.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. AL-YAHYA (Government delegate, Saudi Arabia) – In the name of Allah, the Merciful, the Compassionate. It is an insult to the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights that we could not this year adopt a resolution in our Committee. We feel great sorrow at the fact that workers' rights are being denied especially when the workers concerned are the workers of Palestine and the other occupied territories and when the perpetrator of the injustices is the Zionist entity. This is a truth we have started to learn here in this Organisation. My great fear is that this Organisation will be charged with bias, and I wonder then what attitude we shall adopt towards racial discrimination.

During discussions over the past ten years on racism and apartheid most of the speakers have agreed that the discrimination suffered by the Black workers in South Africa and the Arab inhabitants of Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories are similar. Why then was the resolution not adopted? A previous speaker stated at this rostrum that the resolution in question was not adopted because it was political. Yet it represents eight years of efforts undertaken by the Organisation – eight years of continuous reporting by the Director-General. Yet, despite all these efforts, nothing has been achieved and none of the Organisation's decisions or resolutions have been implemented. So what other course was there to take but to submit a resolution aimed at urging the Organisation to lead a different path that would somehow affect that regime? Can you call such a resolution a political one? This resolution is entirely within the purview of the International Labour Organisation, because it deals with the freedoms and rights of workers and employers in Palestine and the occupied territories. Therefore I cannot accept the argument that this was a political resolution.

Am I to congratulate or commiserate with that handful of nations which decided to reject this resolution? It was a premeditated decision that the resolution would be rejected. Can we say that this handful of nations have succeeded? I do not believe that all those who have a heart that beats and a conscience that lives in their hearts would say so. Such practices cannot succeed.

Since the beginning of this Conference, we have heard cries of protest from this handful of nations; protests and warnings stating that this resolution and other similar resolutions would not pass. Then we heard threats; rumours started circulating to the effect that one of the member States would stop paying its contributions to the Organisation if the resolution was adopted.

I only hope that there was no basis to this rumour; otherwise we cannot consider this to be a democratic Organisation.

Intimidation was used against those who were in favour of the resolution. You, yourself, at this rostrum heard one of the members of the Bureau of the Committee speak about the resolution without mentioning the workers in Palestine and the occupied Arab territories. He merely referred to workers covered by this resolution. Why did he not refer to them? Was he ashamed to say their names?

I am not going to repeat everything that has already been said; but since the Director-General has not succeeded in his mission – and as my colleague who preceded me on the rostrum, the representative of Cuba, already said when he read out a large part of his report – this Organisation may continue to issue resolutions; despite all this, nothing will silence the cries and the protests of a nation being intimidated, starved and expelled from its territory.

In the Director-General's statement this morning, when he gave his reply to the general discussion, he made a commitment that this Organisation would exert even more efforts to implement decisions and resolutions on the subject. I simply wish to express here my gratitude and thanks to the Director-General and all those who work with him; yet at the same time, I doubt very much that the Zionist entity will allow him or anyone who succeeds him to set foot on its territory. This is a source of great regret to me; yet you, distinguished delegates and members, are the ones who can provide a solution. You can provide a solution by adopting any decisions to be submitted to you later on the same subject.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. AL-SABBAH (representative of the Palestine Liberation Organisation) – At the outset allow me to express to the President our admiration and appreciation for the wisdom and efficiency he has demonstrated in steering the work of this Conference and for the success achieved so far with the exception of the Resolutions Committee, whose Chairman, Mr. Alexander, Government delegate of the United Kingdom (to whom I wish good health and a prompt recovery) was unsuccessful in chairing the proceedings of the Committee, due to his lack of knowledge of the due procedures and rules and because he did not enjoy the necessary integrity and unbiased attitude of the Chairman, but adopted delaying tactics. In so doing, he was a tool in the hands of the United States and a handful of other like-minded States and prevented the adoption of the Arab resolution concerning the protection of workers' and employers' rights and freedoms in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories. To this end they established in the Committee new and strange rules and procedures which are in total contradiction with the rules of democratic discussion and dialogue. They completely disregarded the wishes of the States which had voted this resolution top priority.

That vote was a clear and frank reflection of world social conscience. It reflected the international desire of every nation in the world that respects peace and justice in the world to defend the Palestinian cause. It also represented a clear condemnation of the racist practices, the policy of settlements and the violation of human rights and basic freedoms by the Zionist occupation authorities in Palestine and in the other occupied Arab territories.

Here I wish to express the gratitude and appreciation of Palestine, its people and its leaders for the total unbiased support we found in our friends in the socialist countries and among the non-aligned countries as well as amongst the nations of Asia and Africa and some of the nations of Latin America. This support was forthcoming in the government ranks, within the employers' organisations and from the workers' benches, from the beginning of the discussions on the order of priority, they confirmed that the Arab resolution should be given absolute priority.

I do not wish to reiterate what was said by the Chairman of the Arab group regarding the indignation aroused by the flagrant manoeuvres and presures which prevented the adoption of the resolution and its submission to the plenary sitting of the Conference. It is truly regrettable that these manoeuvres, totally alien to customary parliamentary practice in international organisations, should have been perpetrated by a major power which in this Organisation assumes a great deal of responsibility in the field of the protection of human rights. While that nation claims to uphold and protect human rights in the media, its actions contradict what it proclaims for it allies itself policies of repression and continually violate human rights. This is evident in the obvious support of the United States for the two racist regimes in Pretoria and Tel Aviv and in the fact that it provides them with weapons of destruction and most modern instruments of torture so as to repress the noble nations of Palestine and in southern Africa.

The Director-General in his Report which was discussed by the Conference indicated that the respect for and protection of human rights are a common responsibility. We had expected that this appeal would be echoed by other nations, especially those that suffered military occupation during the Second World War, or during their national liberation struggles in the case of countries in Asia, Africa or Latin America, those nations whose sons and daughters understand the suffering of a people under military occupation, who have witnessed the violation of basic human rights and freedoms; for them resistance to military occupation was the most noble form of struggle. Yet these same nations were as consenting spectators before the struggle of our nation which has been going on for 40 years. The real opposition to this resolution, however, came from a great power, one which raises high the banner of the protection of human rights but for this nation it seems that the Palestinians enjoy no rights. Real opposition also came from the Western nations, nations that suffered military occupation that violated the rights and freedoms of its peoples but it seems that the children of the occupied peoples have forgotten the suffering of their fathers and grandparents during the Second World War.

We were greatly surprised to hear words of support and solidarity for the rights of the Palestinians from those countries in the plenary but at the same time they hindered and opposed the adoption of the Arab resolution which called on the International Labour Organisation to assume its responsibility vis-à-vis the question of the freedoms and rights of the Palestinian people, those rights which were so ably and bravely referred to by the Head of the Spanish Government, Mr. González, in his address to the Conference.

I wish once again to reiterate my appreciation and thanks for the unwavering and principled support of the peace-loving nations in the world for the Palestinian people's rights. At the same time, I wish to express my sorrow vis-à-vis the attitude of countries opposed to this right, not only because this stand is contradictory to the most elementary rules and customs of international relations but also because this can be construed as an encouragement for occupation and Israeli settlements and a continuation of Israel's policy of barbaric repression, the continuing violation of human rights and freedoms, and a further encouragement for the Zionist entity to continue in its policy against our Palestinian people in its struggle for its rights and freedom.

The Palestinian people is a nation which has an ancient civilisation, a rich history and heritage, whose land was the cradle of the three world religions. Its tragedy and history of displacement started with the United Nations resolution of 1947 which divided Arab Palestine into two States. Nevertheless, the Palestinian people still believes that the international community led by the United Nations and its specialised agencies, including the International Labour Organisation, still possess the abilities and the moral and material potential to condemn aggression, occupation and the Israeli settlements policy and to uphold justice and restore the rights of the Palestinian nation. We firmly believe that this Organisation can play an influential role in helping the Palestinian people to enjoy its rights and basic freedoms and that it can condemn all those who oppose and hinder the enjoyment of these rights, for this is the mission of the ILO, and the best justification of its existence. And though the Palestinian people recall with sorrow the position taken by certain Western nations in defiance of justice in this Organisation, we nevertheless hope that these nations will change their attitude and that, in the future, they will give the Palestinian people their full moral support so that this Conference may unanimously adopt a resolution that is wholly in accordance with the role incumbent upon it and consonant with the action taken by all the assemblies and general conferences of the organisations of the United Nations system. It will thereby enable the Palestinian people to enjoy its inalienable rights, and, in particular, the right of self-determination and the right to establish an independent Palestinian State in its homeland and under the leadership of its sole legitimate representative, the Palestine Liberation Organisation, so that our people, the workers, farmers, employers, and all its social classes, may be able to exercise all their rights and fundamental freedoms, in particular the freedom of association, that are guaranteed by international labour standards.

Your collective will, and the serious work accomplished in this Organisation, will be of great assistance to the Palestinian people in its valiant uprising which it has resolutely continued for seven months despite the numerous victims claimed by the occupation authorities and Zionist colonisers who resort to ignoble means of repression against the rights of our struggling people. Be assured that these terrorist acts and the policy of repression and discrimination enforced by the Israeli military occupation authorities will not prevent our people from pursuing the struggle by all the legitimate means guaranteed to it by the United Nations texts so that our people may regain their legitimate rights and that peace may be restored in Palestine and Jerusalem.

Mr. FREEMAN (Government delegate, United States) – My delegation wishes to reassure this plenary that the United States Government has no intention of allowing the resolution which was submitted to the Resolutions Committee of the International Labour Conference this year, or its quite appropriate outcome, to interfere with its commitment to continue seeking a just peaceful negotiated settlement of the actual issues in the Arab/Israeli conflict. The resolution which was submitted by the Arab group would not have contributed in any way to the peace process, nor indeed was it designed to. It would have undermined the objectives and the very future of this Organisation by requesting the ILO to take action outside its mandate and in violation of basic norms of due process. It was for these reasons that my delegation, along with other governments, Workers' and Employers' delegates, introduced or supported a number of absolutely legitimate amendments. To the extent that they were considered, they were rejected out of hand with the resulting impasse that is duly recorded in the Committee's report. While we may regret the impasse, we do not regret the fact that we exercised our right to introduce and vigorously pursue important amendments that were needed to try to set a badly defective resolution right.

Mr. GLADE (Employers' adviser, United States) – The report of the Resolutions Committee this year is noteworthy for several reasons. First, the report contains no approved resolutions; second, it reflects deliberations that in no way can be termed a debate; third, it causes us to reflect on the nature of the Resolutions Committee of the Conference and why it did not succeed this year. In the course of these deliberations there was no meeting of minds. For this, the Committee came to its deadline with only seven preambular paragraphs of the first resolution approved. Indeed, procedure prevailed over substance in an ugly battle, which to me is ironic. The International Labour Conference is legitimately concerned with freedoms around the world, but I stress, not uniquely with the rights of employers and workers in the Middle East. The question of these freedoms continues in many of the nations represented in this hall, but at the same time, efforts to produce a resolution supposedly concerned with worker and employer rights were to no avail. The report is clear on why this occurred; I commend it to your attention. Indeed, what I saw in the Committee was division and acrimony, and as one who attempted reconciliation through the process of amending the text, I was disappointed that my right to present amendments was forcefully cut off. I was angered by this tactic against freedom of expression. The process of amending is part of the workings of the Committee and I reject allegations that the objective in my case was to obstruct the proceedings. I respectfully suggest that when we proceed in this way, when we deal with resolutions that provoke confrontation, then we inflict harm, sometimes irreparable damage, on this Organisation, which must serve the interests of the employers and workers of the world on social questions. The lesson is clear and should have been learned by now. The constructive spirit of tripartism will succeed only when the Resolutions Committee deals with questions that are social in nature. Otherwise the system breaks down, as reflected in Provisional Record No. 33. It may be noted that the issue here may have been more appropriately dealt with by the existing competent ILO supervisory machinery. We must preserve the Resolutions Committee as a forum for tripartite debate on social questions, framed objectively within the ILO mandate without hysteria. As an Employer deputy delegate, I am frankly disappointed that we in the Committee did not discuss the important questions of employment creation which may have contributed important results to the ILO. Indeed, we failed on all accounts; we failed because we did not focus on work, on true labour relations issues, a subject on which we are gathered here as experts.

In conclusion, allow me to quote one of your predecessors in the chair who reminded the Conference of the principles upon which our actions at the Conference should be based: "In periods of acute political tension, the ILO has a two-fold responsibility: to uphold the values of human freedom and dignity enshrined in its Constitution and to circumscribe rather than extend the area of international tension by ensuring the fullest possible degree of continued co-operation in pursuit of the objectives of the ILO."

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – I give the floor to Mr. Hewitt, Government adviser, United Kingdom, for a right to reply.

Mr. HEWITT (Government adviser, United Kingdom) – In exercising this right of reply I would like to address in particular the comments made by the representative of the PLO and, I have to say, others earlier in the debate.

The PLO representative cast certain aspersions on the performance of the Chairman of the Resolutions Committee which, I should say immediately, the United Kingdom delegation as a whole totally rejects and cannot accept. I should like to put the record straight on behalf of someone who we all know unfortunately cannot be here to exercise the right of reply on his own behalf. I am therefore happy to take on this task and to do it for him. I don't want to be controversial but I reject the allegations of the PLO representative regarding partiality, lack of knowledge of proceedings, bending of procedures and being a tool of the United States. There is one thing that the United Kingdom is proud of and that is the democratic spirit and independence of mind and no one from the United Kingdom would be willing even to enter into that sort of game. The Chairman scrupulously protected his independence and he did as good a job in the difficult circumstances of the Resolutions Committee as anyone might have expected of any Chairman from whatever group or region he came. The difficulties of the Resolutions Committee stem directly from the lack of the spirit of negotiation and compromise on issues which are of major concern to us all. The resolution also concentrated on issues which went beyond the legitimate concerns of the ILO, and went far into areas which belonged to other organs or agencies of the United Nations system. The ILO should rightly concentrate on the matters which are of concern to itself.

I would like this statement to be included in the record.

Interpretation from German. The PRESIDENT – We have had a long debate, and everyone has had an opportunity to speak on the report. From the statements we have heard, it is obvious that the Committee had a very difficult task. Since there are no further speakers and if there are no objections, I shall take it that the report is adopted.

(The report is adopted.)

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – I would like to thank all the Officers and members of the Committee, the Officers in particular because they made great efforts and have had to spend a great deal of time in preparing this report. I would like to thank you all also for your stamina during this afternoon's meeting. I would also like to thank the interpreters in the booths and everybody who has spoken.

(The Conference adjourned at 7.45 p.m.)

Provisional Record

Seventy-fifth Session, Geneva, 1988

Thirty-sixth sitting

Wednesday, 22 June 1988, 10.15 a.m.

President: Mr. Beyreuther

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON RURAL EMPLOYMENT: SUBMISSION, DISCUSSION AND ADOPTION

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – The first item on our agenda today is the report of the Committee on Rural Employment, which appears in Provisional Record No. 34. I invite the officers of the Committee to come to the rostrum: the Chairman of Committee, Mr. Ruphin, Minister for the Civil Service, Labour and Social Legislation, Madagascar; the Vice-Chairmen, Mr. Velazco Arzac, Employers' adviser, Mexico, and Mr. Ahmed, Workers' delegate, Pakistan; and the Reporter, Mr. van Raalte, Government adviser, Netherlands.

I call on Mr. van Raalte the Reporter of the Committee, to submit the report.

Mr. van RAALTE (Government adviser, Netherlands) – I feel very honoured to present today the results of the discussions of the Committee on Rural Employment. I am particularly pleased to have been the Reporter of a Committee which showed competence and a critical but very co-operative spirit. Both in its Plenary sittings and in the sessions of its Working Party, the exchange of opinions continued until a compromise could be reached. The result is a report which has been adopted by the Committee without a single vote being taken.

It is not possible to present in five or ten minutes a summary of two weeks of deliberations which will do justice to all the opinions that have been expressed or even to the conclusions that have been reached. May I therefore highlight a few points which I think are of particular interest to the Conference.

Firstly, I should like to mention the widespread appreciation in the Committee for the report on Rural Employment Promotion prepared by the Office. The report was considered to have provided a valuable overview of a very complicated problem and of a wide range of experience in promoting rural employment. Perhaps, in addition to the ILO experience, the experiences of other agencies, such as the FAO and the World Bank, in the field of rural development might have been considered as well.

Secondly, I should like to mention the international aspect of rural development and rural employment promotion. Both in the ILO document and in the discussions of the Committee, ample consideration has been given to the international environment. The Committee observed that the debt problem, declining commodity prices, fluctuating exchange rates and protectionism have led to a drastic decline in the export earnings of developing countries.

This problem is setting the scene for international negotiations in many forums. With the ILO's mandate in these matters always kept in mind, it led to long discussions in our Committee, and a common awareness of the problem prevailed as well as a variety of views on ways and means of reaching solutions.

Thirdly, I would like to draw attention to the national level. In spite of the interdependency of nations, which accounts for the interest in the international aspect, nations are after all entities in themselves. The Committee stressed therefore that rural development should be tailored to the specific cultural, socio-economic, political and physical environment of each country.

The suggested social and economic policies that are required to create the appropriate framework for the increase of rural employment and rural income should be refined and adapted in order to suit specific and often unique national and even local circumstances.

That leads me to my fourth point: the local level. This is where the beneficiaries of our efforts for rural employment promotion are located.

The Committee stressed, among other things, the need for adequate opportunities for gainful and productive employment, for women's full participation in development processes, and for a major role to be played by representative organisations of both employers and workers as well as by various types of rural-based co-operatives.

The subtle balance between inter-dependency and autonomy, a point of discussion at the international level, is apparently a matter of concern at the local level as well. I am referring to the so far unanswered question of to what degree local initiatives for informal organisations should be encouraged, in view of the social or economic well-being and development of their members, and to what extent these organisations can serve as agents for rural development and as a starting-point for more formal organisations.

My fifth point relates to the role of the ILO. It is obvious that, in the mandate of the ILO, there are many starting-points for taking up the challenge of rural development at various levels: international, national and local.

The Committee has been very much aware of this, and has suggested activities on each of these levels, such as studying the impact of structural adjustment programmes on employment and food security; advising member States on strategies and methods to strengthen agricultural/non-agricultural linkages; promoting labour absorption in agriculture; and assisting the rural population in the creation and development of their own organisations.

The Committee stressed that, to make full use of the ILO's experience, close co-operation with other specialised agencies of the United Nations family would be required.

This brings me to the end of my presentation of some of the major points that have been discussed in the Committee on Rural Employment.

Last but not least, I should like to thank our Chairman, Mr. Ruphin, and the two Vice-Chairmen, Mr. Ahmed of the Workers and Mr. Velasco Arzac of the Employers, for their stimulating contribution to the discussions. I should like to extend my gratitude to Mr. Martin and his staff for their excellent co-operation and competence in producing a report which reflects the variety of options, opinions and points of view expressed in the Committee.

I propose therefore that the report be adopted by the Conference.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – The discussion of the report of the Committee on Rural Employment is now open.

Interpretation from French: Mr. RUPHIN (Minister for the Civil Service, Labour and Social Legislation, Madagascar; Chairman of the Committee on Rural Employment) – At the conclusion of our work, it is a pleasure for me today, in my capacity as Chairman of the Committee on Rural Employment, to invite the Conference to adopt the resolution and the conclusions drawn up by our Committee after the general discussion that we had on the subject of rural employment promotion. The discussions in our Committee were particularly rich and fully confirm – if there was a need for this – the value of such an international tripartite consultation on a subject that relates to a sensitive sector in all our countries and is of concern to a large number of workers. The broad exchange of views and experiences we had will have allowed us to draw a certain number of conclusions which will reflect both the diversity of national experience and the consensus on a number of essential issues.

I would briefly like to recall here some of the priorities agreed upon by our Committee. In any type of economy, the agricultural and non-agricultural rural sector is a particularly sensitive sector because it constitutes an essential productive basis for growth; it also affects, to a great extent, national sovereignty and the capability of a society to feed itself. Above all, in the developing countries, it includes a very large number of workers. In view of world economic interdependence, many hoped for a broader liberalisation of trade in agricultural products whilst respecting national priorities and with a concern for greater equity in commercial relations between industrialised and developing countries. A better balance was considered to be desirable between the spontaneous trends of the market and policies aimed at preserving food security and national production capacity. Major reforms are taking place at the moment in the industrialised countries in the agricultural sector and it is important that both employers and workers from strong and weak nations alike be in a position to make their voices heard.

The second priority our Committee agrees upon concerns the promotion of the rural sector as an answer to the global job deficit. The rural agricultural and non-agricultural sector, provided it is given the resources, constitutes a considerable employment potential, particularly for developing countries and their populations, which are in the majority young and leaving the countryside for precarious urban jobs.

A rural development strategy geared to employment should be a priority in developing countries. The agricultural sector has to allow the largest possible number of small-scale farmers, agricultural workers and landless workers, men and women, to increase their productivity and the stability of their employment in order to be able to improve their working conditions and their income.

Structural reforms may be necessary, but what is needed above all is a better distribution of vital factors needed to increase production, introduce the appropriate technology and provide for credit and vocational training. We should particularly welcome the conclusions that our Committee has reached on the subject of agrarian reform, after laborious negotiations between the different parties.

I would wish here to pay tribute to the spirit of dialogue and co-operation shown by the two Vice-Chairmen, Mr. Velasco Arzac of Mexico and Mr. Ahmed of Pakistan, who were able to reconcile sometimes widely differing points of view. Our Committee also thought it was necessary for many countries to give further consideration to the non-agricultural rural sector including small rural enterprises and agro-industrial units, highly labour-intensive work and services.

More appropriate macro-economic policies in the fields of prices and taxation, investment assistance, marketing structures, infrastructures and social services are considered indispensable for providing the agricultural and non-agricultural rural sector with an economic environment that is more conducive to its expansion. A tightening of the links and exchanges between agriculture and industry is necessary if the two sectors are to grow so that they can assist each other to develop. The fields of vocational training and appropriate technologies, credits and infrastructure have been identified as essential concomitants for there to be growth that will lead to the creation of jobs for the masses.

The ILO is called on to intensify its contribution in this respect. This growth and employment strategy in the rural sector should allow for a better balance between the town and the country and thus provide a more serene future for the rural populations which would be in a better position in the long term to manage their natural and economic environment.

The third priority of our Committee concerns the protection of workers. The standard-setting activities of the ILO are called upon to play their part fully in this by inviting member countries to take the necessary steps to ensure respect for freedom of association and the protection of trade union rights in the rural sector.

The member States are invited to ratify the Rural Workers' Organisations Convention, 1975 (No. 141) more broadly and to apply its principles fully. Furthermore, the ILO is invited to consider the reasons for the still limited ratification of this fundamental instrument. In a large number of countries, conditions of work for rural workers are precarious and better protection is vital both as regards the use of toxic substances and the conditions of employment of seasonal or casual workers. The rights of women workers deserve particular attention in the light of their contribution to the rural sector. In addition, the Committee has put forward a large number of suggestions aimed at strengthening the role of the ILO with respect to rural development. The strategy of balanced growth between the agricultural and non-agricultural rural sectors as proposed by our Committee will entail a three-fold efforts. A strengthening of employers' and workers' organisations is an essential precondition for the success of the strategy so as to guarantee the broadest possible participation by the social partners in all stages of the formulation and implementation of the strategy and to enable them to contribute to it through their development initiatives.

A balanced programme of research, consultative services and technical co-operation will allow our Organisation in its fields of competence and in association with its natural partners to give concrete support to this strategy. Finally, a special effort is needed to help the least developed countries to benefit fully from the structural adjustments that are necessary to give the rural sector the role and place that it should have in promoting growth and employment.

On behalf of the Officers of the Committee on Rural Employment, I have the honour to submit the resolution and conclusions adopted by this Committee to you for the approval of the Conference.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. VELAZCO ARZAC (Employers' adviser, Mexico; Employers' Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Rural Employment) – It is an honour to address the Conference as spokesman for the Employers' members from various countries who participated in the work of the Committee on Rural Employment. My first words will be words of thanks and appreciation on behalf of the Employers' group to the International Labour Organisation and its Director-General for having convened this meeting of the Committee on Rural Employment as part of the proceedings of this session of the International Labour Conference, which focuses the attention of the whole world on the importance of this subject.

The problem of rural development is of great concern to many countries. First of all there is the increase in the urban population, with all the economic and social problems this implies. Secondly, the growing demand for jobs, particularly on the part of the younger generation which, in many countries, has an uncertain future. Thirdly, the insufficient agricultural production which, in many countries is reflected in poverty and serious social problems.

Our analysis of these problems pointed to the need to discuss a general strategy for the promotion of employment in rural areas, not only in farming and animal husbandry, but also in non-farm activities, that is to say agro-industries, industries or enterprises of any kind, including service enterprises, with a view to increasing indirect employment in rural areas. This, in a constant attempt to achieve three objectives: firstly, a better distribution of the world's population, by decongesting the large urban centres; secondly, productive employment, accompanied by social security; and thirdly, optimum use of the potential of rural areas, not only with a view to producing food, but also for the supply of various raw materials.

With these aims in mind, we were fully conscious of the challenge inherent in the topic of rural employment. All three sides carefully analysed the Office report after having engaged in consultations in our respective countries; on this basis we made our statements and took part in discussions which were by no means easy. In order to give you a better idea of the value of this report, and especially of the Committee's conclusions, I should like to refer, within the international context, to the various points on which concern was expressed. Some of these points have already been mentioned by the speakers who have preceded me, and I do not need to repeat them. Some countries are faced with agricultural surpluses while other countries are not self-sufficient as concerns food supplies; some countries wish to export more, while others have to promote policies in order to secure a more liberal approach to international trade for the benefit of the developing countries. But the most important point of all in this international context, in the opinion of the Employers' group, is the idea that the old system of agrarian reform as a political, social, economic and legal measure, consisting in the sub-division and distribution of vast areas of land among peasants or farmers, might automatically serve to promote rural employment.

To emphasise the importance of the subject of agrarian reform, while the Committee was sitting, the Senate of the Republic of the Philippines approved a new agrarian reform scheme for that country. In the majority of the countries carrying out agrarian reform under the old system, and the Philippines is not one of these, much of the private property in question was converted to public or collectively owned property, in order to benefit the new owners or new exploiters of the land. However, in the majority of cases, these reforms ultimately failed, both in terms of agricultural production and in terms of the creation of jobs in rural areas.

Despite the good intentions, the distribution of land did not prove to be the right solution because in many cases the size of the plots was so small that they were unproductive and barely provided subsistence for the people living on and working these plots. Furthermore, certain agrarian reforms were accompanied by illegal procedures and abuses which created a climate of uncertainty concerning ownership rights and land tenure, which discouraged productive investment in these rural areas.

We were concerned that certain persons wanted to press for agrarian reform as a solution for certain countries. We, the employers, therefore put forward a proposal based on the modernisation of rural areas, which in the majority of countries would not require agrarian reform; only in exceptional cases might such reform be necessary in certain countries.

Our rural modernisation plan consists of the following points, all of which are framed within the concept of human rights, beginning with the right to progress for all those living in rural areas. This modernisation would guarantee and encourage genuine progress for peasants and farmers. It would harmonise the creation of jobs with production targets, bearing in mind that every new job requires investment.

Many developing countries had resources from foreign loans, but they were not sufficient to create enough jobs in rural areas.

For these reasons we need to channel productive investment into rural areas, while formulating policies which will stimulate and protect these investments.

We want to narrow the gap which exists between urban areas and rural areas; for this purpose it is necessary to lend dignity to and promote, not only employment, but the way of life, education, culture and the participation of employers' and workers' organisations, in order to make life in rural areas more attractive.

All this presupposes investment on a large scale by governments; but since resources are limited and a number of countries are faced with the problem of their foreign debt, this investment will have to be based on rational criteria so that it really can generate economic growth.

In this connection I would say that social consciousness as concerns rural areas must be bound up with economic consciousness. If there is no economic growth, there will not be sufficient growth in rural employment.

We consider that this modernisation calls for great flexibility.

Fortunately, governments are tending to rely more and more on freedom of enterprises and on enterprises to generate jobs.

We have therefore associated ourselves in this Committee on Rural Employment with the recommendations concerning small and medium-sized enterprises which were adopted by the International Labour Conference in 1986.

A very important point in the proposals made referred to access to ownership of land, even in centrally planned economy countries, because ownership plays an important role in attracting the population to rural areas and in attracting productive investment.

In addition, consideration was given to a new approach to production, marketing and credit co-operatives, designed to achieve economic and social objectives which would ensure their proper operation.

Finally, there was strong insistence on the need for education, vocational training and technical advisory services, available on a continuous basis, to provide support for the modernisation of rural areas.

We have to recognise that the Office set about its task in a very professional way throughout our meetings, and in this connection, I would like publicly to recognise Mr. Martin and Mr. Radwan.

As far as the ILO is concerned, we have here a report and conclusions which open up possibilities for a new orientation for its work over the next ten years, an orientation which will be more realistic and based on viable strategies, whose success will not be confined to isolated cases. It should rather be based on technical co-operation programmes which merge the views of employers' and workers' organisations in order to indicate the paths to be followed, and in defining practical, pragmatic and viable strategies for action to ensure progress.

I should like also to express my thanks publicly to the Chairman of the Committee, Mr. Ruphin, to Mr. van Raalte, our Reporter, and to the Vice-Chairman of the Workers' group, Mr. Ahmed. Throughout our meetings they always looked for consensus; as a result our report was adopted without a single vote.

I should like to thank the Employers' members who elected me as their spokesman for their confidence and support.

Now, the employers' organisations can say publicly at this Conference that we are entirely ready and willing to collaborate with the ILO in the promotion of rural employment.

I congratulate the International Organisation of Employers for having laid emphasis on this subject, and I would like to thank Mr. Antonio Peñalosa who, as Secretary of the Employers' group, played an active part in the negotiations and discussions with the other sides.

In conclusion, I should like to tell this plenary that we are fortunate to have here conclusions which can constitute a landmark in rural development programmes, provided they are accompanied by the active participation of all three sides, and by enthusiasm and a deep conviction that it is imperative over the next ten years to promote rural modernisation in most countries.

Mr. AHMED (Workers' delegate, Pakistan; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Rural Employment) – On this last day of the Conference a lot has been said about rural employment promotion. I will be brief, but I have my duty and I am grateful to the members of the Workers' group who have bestowed on me the honour of representing them and I sincerely thank them for their co-operation. In particular, I also have my duty to thank the Officers of our group, brother Ross Person, Secretary, brother Jeff Boddy, from the United Kingdom, brother Veretennikov from the USSR and brother Maiyaki from the Niger, the Vice-Chairman. There has been also a very sincere help from brother Narayan, brother Ramamurthy, brother Hozazsiski, brother Ali Ibrahim, brother Zimba, brother Lynch, brother Tayashi and many other members of our group. As a whole we worked like a team and we tried our best to bring something positive to those people who constitute the bulk of mankind living in the rural sector. I also have my duty to thank the distinguished Chairman, Mr. Ruphin, who has conducted these deliberations very open-mindedly and with great help where difficulties arose and also Mr. Velazco Arzac, the Vice-Chairman of the Employers' group, who I understand had a difficult task but was always open to dialogue. And Mr. van Raalte, the Reporter of our group from the Netherlands, who has worked long hours along with Mr. Martin and Mr. Ridman, even during weekends. I also thank all the members of the Committee who have contributed to bringing something positive to this forum.

There are 3.8 billion people living in the rural sector, which constitutes almost 70 per cent of the population of the world. If we look at the figures, out of 73 million in 1980, 34 per cent were in a state of abject poverty in the rural sector, while 340 million – almost 16 per cent of the world population – were malnourished and 9.3 million children died at birth, which constitutes an infant mortality rate of 88 per thousand. This reflects the state of affairs in the rural sector and I think that this important Conference has contributed a lot, while we are celebrating the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, to focusing attention on the important right of workers in the rural sector – the right to work. That concerns this very Committee, which has discussed in detail what international and national actions are to be taken in order to promote rural employment. At the same time we have also reflected on what we expect from the ILO to carry out future activities in this field and we hope this concrete documentation will be given due attention in the future activities. Particularly in this Committee, as Mr. Vealzco Arzac has said, we have spent long hours and even weekends discussing a very crucial issue – the fate of those people who are landless in the rural sector. If we look at the figures, there are almost 550 million landless rural labourers and another 440 million are almost landless, having very little land which does not provide them with an adequate living. As has been pointed out in our Committee also, 70 per cent of the land in one continent of the world is owned by only 2.5 per cent of the people. So we believe that in order to bring a better life to the rural labour force they must have access to land because this is a basic tool which helps them not only to improve their lives but also to achieve higher productivity and better output. This was a very important point in the eyes of the Workers during our discussions and I must say that we believe that there is need for agrarian reform in such cases in order to bring a better life to these people. In the case of feudalism, which is the dominant pattern in certain countries, and exploitation of rural labour, the situation needs to be reviewed as was pointed out by many distinguished members of the Committee during the course of our deliberations when they described what they had done in respect of agrarian reform. Their experiments have also proved their worth where this agrarian reform has been coupled with the extension of facilities to the farmers such as export advice on marketing and technology, and other facilities. The result has been better productivity and better output than among those with large landholdings where the landholders are not keen to utilise all those resources. So, in this respect, paragraph 28 contains the recommendation where we have not only stressed the need for agrarian reform but at the same time recognised the right to own property and stressed that, in accordance with the rights guaranteed in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, those people affected by agrarian reform should be compensated.

Another aspect which needs to be stressed is the need to develop the institutional framework in order to mobilise the creative ability of the mass poor in the rural sector. It is essential that their organisations should be strengthened and in particular we urge that the Rural Workers' Organisations Convention, 1975 (No. 141), should be ratified by all member States in order to demonstrate their solidarity with the suffering people in the rural sector. In addition to that there are many recommendations which are reflected in this important report, particularly the issue of strengthening tripartism, both at the national and at the ILO level.

At the same time, human resources development and the role of women in the rural sector are subjects calling for attention, as well as the need for enforcing minimum wage regulations and improving other facilities such as social security. At the international level there is need for a better adjustment of price tariffs and fairer commodity prices, together with an opening of markets to the developing countries so that their agricultural products may have access to the market economy. At the same time the developed countries' workers should be guaranteed the right to employment as well as to retraining facilities during this transitional period.

We have also discussed the efforts of bio-technology and the need of the ILO and national governments to take care of the health and safety of the workers.

At the same time, we also expect the ILO and member States to do more to strengthen the role of workers' and employers' organisations.

I shall not prolong the proceedings at this late hour, when we are entering the last day, but I have my duty. We have come to a positive conclusion of this Conference in many Committees, for which I think all the delegations deserve to be commended; at the same time I must express my appreciation of the President's work in guiding this Conference, along with the Vice-Presidents, and the Clerk of the Conference. I also appreciate the efforts of the Director-General and his team and thank them for helping to bring about a positive result. I also thank the distinguished members of our group for their co-operation, and also brother Muhr and brother Oscar who helped us to project the Workers' point of view so successfully in the various forums.

Finally, I have the duty also to wish you a happy return home, success in your future deliberations and "bon voyage".

Mr. PETERSON (Government adviser, United States) – Rural employment promotion has taken its place as one of the serious issues of our time. During the course of this Conference, the ILO has again placed on the agenda of mankind a matter of great concern to developed and developing countries, regardless of their stage of development or particular requirements for structural adjustment. Our search for solutions to the problems of development is one of the universal challenges that brings us all together at this hour, for indeed chronic poverty and hunger are the enemy of all.

The United States firmly believes that our own development experience is a useful guide to productive economic policies. What is the most fundamental lesson of that experience? That the talent of individual human beings is the greatest resource a society can bring to the tasks of national development; that the individual with his or her inherent creative genius and enormous potential stands at the centre.

We believe that, in the final analysis, freedom is the key to economic growth. Today, many countries are reawakening to the fundamental connection between individual initiative and economic progress. We have learned a great deal together about what does and does not work. We have seen now how discredited orthodoxies about state-directed development gave rise to misguided policies that stifle individual initiative. Policies that, in practice, have given inadequate incentives to farmers and have created a long-term decline in food production. Across the continents significant changes are taking place, where leaders have recognised, as the OAU declared almost two years ago, that the primacy accorded the State has hindered rather than furthered economic development.

Agricultural pricing has been reformed to give farmers a fair and profitable return on their output. Private market channels are being revived to bring food to the cities and consumer goods to the countryside. Exchange systems are being altered to reflect market value and to permit allocation of scarce resources to the most productive sectors.

These are historic changes. We applaud them. And we stand ready to support efforts aimed at the expansion of individual human opportunity.

The challenge of employment creation confronts all of us and the promotion of rural employment presents issues unique to national circumstances. In general terms, and perhaps most fundamentally, the developed countries need to ensure a dynamic economic environment conducive to broadly based and sustained global economic growth, and more open markets for the exports of developing countries. Rapid growth of developing countries' exports to the United States is one of the strongest forces for development in the world today. Yet all countries face the challenge of structural adjustment to a global economic environment that is changing with great rapidity.

The promotion of structural changes that encourage sustainable long-term growth is important to developed and developing countries alike. That was made abundantly clear in the Committee's deliberation during the past two weeks.

A continuing situation of structural over-supply of agricultural products, primarily as a result of domestic support policies linked to production and augmented by technological change, has created the present crisis in agriculture. Negotiations on agricultural trade in GATT provide a particularly critical set of issues and have high priority.

There is increasingly wide recognition that the orientation of production by market signals should remain a long-term objective of reform and that a progressive and concerted reduction of agricultural support is a must.

It has become clear that, ultimately, no one benefits from the current agricultural policies employed around the world. Not farmers, not consumers and not taxpayers. Least of all the rural poor in need of employment and an adequate standard of living.

The United States has proposed an ambitious programme of global reform. At the heart of our proposal is the elimination over a ten-year period of all export subsidies, market barriers including tariffs, quotas and all domestic subsidies that affect trade. Also, the institution of uniform food health regulations around the world to prevent non-tariff barriers to agricultural trade.

We believe that nothing less will correct the problems that now face us all and urgently need to be resolved. Such reform will greatly assist the development of a dynamic rural sector and the creation of needed employment. At the same time, we believe that the interdependency between agricultural development and non-agricultural development needs to receive greater consideration. The highly professional preparations by the ILO for this particular discussion and the Committee debate itself have indicated that these linkages and the creation of small- and medium-sized businesses should be given high priority in rural areas. In combination with financial flows, industrial co-operation, technology transfer and appropriate education and training, we will see the progress we all seek.

The times demand our best efforts. We can do no less. To paraphrase a former statesman, the world needs and demands full, persistent experimentation. It is common sense to take a method and try it. If it fails, admit it frankly and try another, but above all try something. As leaders, we examine the foundations of economic growth and rural employment, and we must gauge our success by the future we are creating for the coming generation. That is our challenge.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT - I give the floor to the Clerk of the Conference to announce a modification to the resolution annexed to the report.

The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE - There is a modification to be made to the resolution concerning rural employment promotion on page 34/19 of the report. Operative paragraph 2(a) should read as follows: "to bring these conclusions to the attention of member States and of employers' and workers' organisations".

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT - We now proceed to the adoption of the report of the Committee on Rural Employment. If there are no objections, I shall take it that the report, paragraphs 1 to 112, is adopted.

(The report, paragraphs 1 to 112, is adopted.)

RESOLUTION CONCERNING RURAL EMPLOYMENT
PROMOTION, SUBMITTED BY THE COMMITTEE ON RURAL EMPLOYMENT: ADOPTION

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT - We now proceed to the adoption of the resolution concerning rural employment promotion. If there are no objections, I shall take it that the resolution is adopted.

(The resolution is adopted.)

CONCLUSIONS CONCERNING RURAL EMPLOYMENT
PROMOTION, SUBMITTED BY THE COMMITTEE ON RURAL
EMPLOYMENT: ADOPTION

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT - We thus proceed to the adoption of the conclusions concerning the promotion of rural employment. If there are no objections, I shall take it that the conclusions are adopted.

(The conclusions are adopted.)

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT - I would like to thank the officers of the Committee - the Chairman, Mr. Ruphin, the Employers' Vice-Chairman, Mr. Velazco Arzac; the Workers' Vice-Chairman, Mr. Ahmed, and the Reporter of the Committee, Mr. van Raalte - very warmly for the excellent report and conclusions that they have provided us with. The excellent spirit of co-operation that prevailed in the Committee is reflected in the atmosphere in which the discussions took place. I wish all the members of the Committee the very best of success.

CLOSING SPEECHES

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – We now proceed to the closing speeches of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. I would like to ask the Vice-Presidents to come to the rostrum.

Mr. AITKEN (Government adviser, Jamaica; Vice-President of the Conference) – In bringing to an end the deliberations of the 75th Session of our Conference, it is well that we look back to see whether we have lived up to the challenge of the theme that the Director-General set for us – Human rights – A common responsibility, or at least to see how far we are prepared to provide resources to carry out the common responsibility of extending the frontiers of human rights. If we were slow to recognise that the time has come to play our part, we were fortunate to have with us this session three personalities whose careers are well anchored in the fight for human rights. I think of His Excellency Mr. Felipe Gonzalez, President of the Government of Spain; Her Excellency Mrs. Corazon C. Aquino, President of the Philippines, and Mr. Sam Nujoma, who may well be the president of a free and independent Namibia. All three by their speeches have also challenged us to keep in step as the universal quest for human rights still has a far way to go.

When their challenge is added to those of the more than 280 speakers who have joined in the discussion on the reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General, then the Conference should have something to show: that it has accepted the challenge and will keep in step.

Through the patient and untiring work of its Committees, I think that the Conference has taken up the challenge. We have affirmed our abhorrence of the system of apartheid, though we have been unable to agree on any practical method to get rid of it – that is probably beyond us. However, the challenge was taken further when the Finance Committee of Government Representatives gave a rather hard-headed look at the finances of the Organisation, and eventually adopted a budget that will allow for the delivery of services commensurate with the income that may reasonably be expected within the budget year. The Conference adopted the budget because, I believe, all governments are agreed that some sacrifices are inevitable; some sacrifices will have to be made if people on the lower rungs of the economic ladder are to be helped so that they can better help themselves.

The various standard-setting committees worked hard and have achieved positive results both in revising old Conventions and in establishing new ones. The Convention concerning employment promotion and protection against unemployment and the Convention concerning safety and health in construction have been adopted by the Conference. This is a very positive achievement in areas of great importance that long for this revision of the Conventions. Much work has been done in revising the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107), and in setting forth the outlines of a Convention concerning rural employment. The Committee on the Application of Standards has, as usual, performed its task in an assiduous and purposeful manner. The spirit of give and take that prevailed in that Committee is the essence of the ILO.

The achievements of the Conference, let me say, were made possible by the selflessness of our Committee Chairmen and Vice-Chairmen, and all the officers of their respective bureaux.

Let me take the opportunity to thank them all and in doing so wish a speedy and full recovery to those Chairmen who fell ill. A reminder, perhaps, that the task of Chairman is a daunting one.

I think the Conference will agree with me that we all had good fortune to work under the guidance of a competent and skilful President, and I should also add – though it may not seem so to you – a cheerful one. I am sure governments will want their Vice-President to wish him well when he leaves Geneva and, if fate so plans it, to hope that we may see him again here in the Conference. That goes too far for my colleagues, the Vice-Presidents representing Employers and Workers. I must also thank Conference staff for their invaluable assistance to all of us and, in so doing, extend my heartiest appreciation to the interpreters who have maintained their usual high standards – though I believe at this very moment they may be having some difficulty in translating my words because I did not provide them with a script. I must apologise to them for that. But I am sure the message I am leaving is getting through to you.

Let those who work through the wee hours of the morning to ensure that the Provisional Record of the Conference is at Land when we arrive here at 9 in the morning and thereafter know that the Conference thanks them wholeheartedly. And let me take this opportunity to thank the Conference for having elected me as a Government Vice-President. I did not have the opportunity to do so before, and to tell you that I appreciate the confidence you have placed in me in giving me a rewarding experience. I hope that when the gavel indicates that the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference is adjourned you will not have regretted that election. I certainly enjoyed it.

Mr. TSUJINO (Employers' delegate, Japan; Vice-President of the Conference) – It is a great honour for me to make a closing speech as Employer Vice-President of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference.

Under the able guidance of the President, Mr. Beyreuther, the presidium, has been filled with a spirit of team-work and co-ordination. No distinction has been felt among us, whether we come from the North, South, East or West. I am confident that this cohesion among the President and the three Vice-Presidents has contributed greatly to the smooth proceedings of this year's Conference.

I also wish to take this opportunity to express my compliments to the Director-General, Mr. Blanchard, and to his competent staff for their painstaking work in their everyday activities. Moreover, I thank them for the advice and support extended to me in fulfilling my responsibilities as Vice-President.

Humand rights – A common responsibility was chosen as the main theme for this session of the International Labour Conference. Naturally, almost all the delegates in their speeches have urged successively that the apartheid system in South Africa be abolished as soon as possible.

On 16 June, the updated Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia was adopted. No distinction, no discrimination should be allowed among human beings on grounds of race or colour in our world of today. This expresses world opinion and this is heaven's will. I strongly call on the Government of South Africa to abandon its apartheid policy immediately and – this is extremely important – peacefully.

We should not forget the suffering and tragic life led by many people, victims of conflicts in various parts of the world. Urgent action is needed to help them.

We have a saying, "Let bygones be bygones", that is not easy to apply. However, this saying teaches us that past grudges should not lead to everlasting unhappiness. What is done cannot be undone. Instead, we should strive for peace now and in the future. We have to learn to live in peace. Human beings are not all powerful, but at least they are gifted with wisdom. Let us seek a better and peaceful world without being fettered by legacies of the past.

For the past three weeks, I have carefully listened to the speeches given by the delegates, sometimes at the seat of the Japanese Employers, sometimes on the rostrum in the place of the President. I have been deeply impressed by them. All of them expressed their aspiration for world peace and pledged their support for the important mission of the ILO.

The world today has a total population of some 5 billion men and women. Changes are incessant and rapid, especially in political and economic life, and they bring in turn an increasing number of new problems. We have to find adequate solutions for them. A positive step towards world peace can be assured only by our common efforts for social justice, which is enshrined in the ILO Constitution. We must exert maximum effort for this noble objective, through ILO standards and technical co-operation. Our aspiration to what is true, good and beautiful should support us.

Distinguished delegates of Governments, Employers and Workers of the ILO member countries, and all the staff of the ILO, let us reaffirm our determination and dedication to fulfil the mandate given to the ILO. We should also aim for efficiency in the organisation of sessions of the International Labour Conference, the Governing Body and the various committees. Reflection and reconsideration is necessary in this respect.

In concluding, I wish to express once again my gratitude and compliments to every one of you who has contributed to the success of this 75th Session of the International Labour Conference.

Interpretation from French: Mr. ADIKO NIAMKEY (Workers' delegate, Côte d'Ivoire; Vice-President of the Conference) – Now that we have come to the end of the work of this 75th Session, first of all I would like to congratulate Mr. Beyreuther very warmly on his brilliant election to the presidency of the International Labour Conference.

I am pleased to have been able to help him in his work and, above all, I am pleased to have been able to appreciate and benefit from his experience, competence and hard work and his great human qualities.

Under his wise and courteous guidance, the plenary sittings of this 75th Session of the International Labour Conference have taken place to the satisfaction of all, in an atmosphere of excellent mutual understanding, courtesy and freely accepted discipline.

I must also very warmly congratulate Mr. Francis Blanchard, the Director-General of the ILO, and all his colleagues on their advice and suggestions which proved extremely useful for us on the one hand, and on the other, on the material organisation of the Conference – the clarity, the quality and wealth of the documents that they submitted to us for consideration and which served as a basis for all our discussions.

I am thinking too of the men and women whom we don't see but whose voices, full of conviction, oblige you to listen to and follow the speaker. It is a duty and even a pleasure for me to express to the interpreters my full admiration for the active and efficient part they have taken in the harmonious progress of our work.

As for the Chairmen, the Vice-Chairmen, the secretaries, the group reporters, the Committee reporters, whose jobs were extremely hard, complex and constraining, I owe them not only thanks and congratulations but I think I should recognise publicly and solemnly that their great merit was to have contributed once again to finding ways and means that could lead to respect of freedom of association and the right to organise, to real enjoyment of human rights, to safety and health in construction. The whole of humanity has a debt to them because of their work on the promotion of employment and social security and in finalising the necessary legal texts for improving the conditions of life of indigenous and tribal populations and for the promotion of rural employment at a time when unemployment is gaining ground in our cities.

Furthermore, they can be satisfied with their contribution to the quest for peace in the world and to the updating of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa.

I should like to thank the officers of all the Committees and all those who participated in the work of the Committees; they can be satisfied with having done a useful job.

Finally, I cannot conclude my brief speech without admitting how sensitive I am to the honour shown to me in allowing me for the first time in my trade union career to preside over a plenary session of the International Labour Conference.

I am extremely grateful to the Organisation of African Trade Union Unity which nominated me, to the Workers' group who supported the nomination, all the delegates who gave me their confidence in electing me as Vice-President of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference.

I am convinced that the ILO, thanks to tripartism, will for a long time remain the ideal setting for democracy, international understanding, solidarity and the respect of human rights.

Interpretation from French: The SECRETARY-GENERAL – There are two very special moments during the International Labour Conference. These moments are the opening sitting and the closing sitting. The opening sitting because the delegates are coming together, old friends are meeting again as they do year after year. The Chairman of the Governing Body, who has the honour of opening the session, sometimes has difficulty in stilling the many friendly and often joyous conversations that are going on. It is also a time for hope and confidence, and this confidence finds its expression in the session's first decision, namely the choice of a President for the International Labour Conference.

Mr. President, from the remarks that have been made over the past three weeks and from what has been said just now by the three Vice-Presidents, you know how well placed was the confidence shown when on the first of June the Conference unanimously elected you to the presidency of the Conference.

The second privileged moment of the International Labour Conference is the closing sitting, when the Conference comes together and once again finds what it may have lost during the Conference – a relaxed and comfortable atmosphere, in contrast to certain sessions of certain Committees, such as those we heard of yesterday, where the atmosphere was not always so calm. But, all of a sudden, the wind dies down, passions are forgotten, and we find once again the same kind of atmosphere that prevailed at the opening sitting. And I think that this is due to the fact that everybody who is here in the hall this morning, as the Conference draws to a close, has the impression that the Conference has done good work. This has already been said. I am happy to say it again after so many others – as I said yesterday morning, when I added a few more details – I think the Conference has done a good job. And the reason for this is that a very large number of you took part in the work of this session with zeal and diligence, which is characteristic of delegates attending the International Labour Conference.

So I should like very briefly, in order not to prolong these remarks, to thank all those who contributed to the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. I am thinking of course of the members, the experts and the officers the Conference Committees. Indeed, the Conference is the sum total of everything that happens day after day in its Committees.

And I should also like to take this opportunity to thank publicly all my colleagues, because while you have all been very kind in your comments about me, as Director-General, I would like to share these compliments with all my colleagues. I am lucky to have around me a team which is not only very competent and sometimes very scholarly, but also extraordinarily motivated, a team which places itself at the Conference's disposal during these three weeks, day and night. I want you to know this, and I want them to know this. While this may go without saying, it is better to say these things so that they are known to everybody. And this applies to everyone, including all those members of the staff who work behind the scenes and whom we do not see, but who give us the daily bread we need to get through our day's work.

And, Mr. President, to carry out an operation of this size, it is of course necessary to have team at the top. You have had alongside you three Vice-Presidents who have done credit to this Conference – Mr. Aitken, Mr. Tsujino, Mr. Adiko. I have been fortunate enough to work alongside you and alongside them as well, and I greatly appreciated the atmosphere of courtesy and harmony that prevailed among the four Officers of this Conference.

Having said this, Mr. President, it is necessary to have a captain or a pilot – you can choose whichever name you like. You have been both probably – and those who knew that you would conduct the business of this Conference to a successful conclusion can bear witness today to what you have achieved over the past three weeks, with great courtesy, great patience and deep concern and readiness to listen, and to make your own contribution to the success of the Conference. I could bear witness in many other ways to your extreme kindness. It has been a very great pleasure for me to work alongside you.

For 11 or 12 years I think, you have had the opportunity to see what happens at these opening and closing sittings, so you are familiar with the procedure and I don't need to conceal from you the fact that I have a gavel in my pocket which I am going to give you. You have observed this ritual over more than ten years. Perhaps once as you sat somewhere in this hall, you had hoped that one day you would be in the President's chair, and that the Secretary-General would have the pleasure of giving you a gavel. I shall do so now. The one you have already hasn't been used very much, but this is the one I will give you, and I am sure you will be happy to keep it in your office or home. So it gives me great pleasure, Mr. President, and I am speaking on behalf of the whole Conference, to express our deep gratitude to you for the exemplary work you have done.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – Allow me to thank the Director-General for his closing remarks which he addressed to the Conference. I also appreciate his comments about our business here and his words of thanks to those who have been instrumental in securing a successful Conference and of course I am extremely grateful for this symbolic gift, this gavel, which was the main instrument over the past three weeks when I was your President.

We are about to close the proceedings of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. We can look back on more than three weeks of arduous work. The symbolic sign that our Conference is drawing to a close is this gavel which I have just been given by the Director-General, Mr. Francis Blanchard. It will always remind me that I was given the challenging task of presiding over this Conference.

Let me associate two ideas with this gavel. First of all, it was primarily used during the Conference to confirm positive results of joint endeavours. This is certainly typical of the good atmosphere which was borne by the will to prepare the ground for good results by engaging in a constructive dialogue, co-operation and accepting different views.

It was undoubtedly conducive to our proceedings that our Conference took place at a time when international relationships are on the move. We are pleased to note that this Organisation is also about to embark on a new and better phase of international co-operation and this very thought has been stressed by quite a few speakers. I am personally very gratified to say that the interview I gave prior to the Conference, as well as the statement I made at the beginning of the Conference, were interpreted along these lines. Even a few dissenting voices could not detract from this impression. It is a fact that cooperation can be brought about only by a factual dialogue.

The second thought which is linked with this gavel, is of a somewhat symbolic nature. In my country the hammer is the symbol of work; it stands for the strength of working people, who after all are the creators of all values. The great German poet, Wolfgang von Goethe offered the following alternative to mankind: "Either you rise or you sink, either you suffer or you triumph, you have to be a hammer or an anvil". Human beings do not wish to be an anvil; they prefer to play the role of the hammer and, as stated by the Philadelphia Declaration, they wish to implement their rights, irrespective of race, creed or sex "and to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity."

Human beings do not wish to be dominated by external factors or be suppressed by them; they wish to have an active say in their own lives. This search, this quest of human beings, also left its imprint on our extensive discussion of the Report of the Governing Body and the Report of the Director-General: Human rights – A common responsibility. The debate developed into a large forum, at which there was a wide exchange of experience and opinions. It reflected the multiplicity of today's world. It helped to provide information and it promoted mutual understanding. The highlights of this Conference were the visits from our guests, the President of the Philippines, Mrs. Corazon Aquino and the President of the Government of Spain, Mr. Felipe González.

They enriched our deliberations and they also guided us in our discussions.

The discussion in the plenary showed clearly what challenges face our Organisation in its quest to expand the implementation of human rights. These challenges confront governments, trade unions and employers. To identify our common responsibility and to act jointly to the extent possible is truly the test of tripartism of this Organisation. I was pleased to hear the opinion expressed by the Director-General, Mr. Francis Blanchard, who yesterday stated that we should not judge without looking at facts; that we should not expect others to do what we are not prepared to do yourself. Indeed, the whole concept of human rights would be distorted if we tried to impose our own ideology and our values on others, making them the yardstick of everything. As the Director-General stated, we ought to give a chance to dialogue, to the exchange of opinions and experience. Human rights and basic freedoms as a whole, must be used in such a way to intensify the confidence and understanding between nations.

The most important human rights is undoubtedly the right to life. Life requires peace and since human life is based on work is also one of the basic human rights. Work alone makes it possible to deploy and unfold human talents to ensure equal access to education and culture, irrespective of one's social background, wealth, ideology and religion.

Human rights also includes the abolition of apartheid. Having adopted a new Declaration on Apartheid, as well as an updated Programme of Action, and conclusions calling for immediate action, our Organisation has set new objectives to step up its activities – which until now have already been considerable – against apartheid.

The President of SWAPO, Sam Nujoma, who we had the pleasure of meeting in our midst, appealed urgently to the Conference to adopt the instruments submitted to us by the Committee on Apartheid and to implement them. The Conference took up this appeal by unanimously adopting these instruments. Now it will require the political will of all, plus corresponding action, to implement these documents.

On the basis of a report by the Director-General, our Conference also discussed the support to be extended to the just struggle of the Arab people of Palestine, their right to self-determination and to working and living conditions which are in line with the International Labour Organisation. The fact that the draft resolution introduced by representatives of the Arab countries was accorded top priority bears witness to the significance of this question. Although we failed to achieve agreement about this document, its discussion nevertheless helped us to realise once again how urgently we need a solution to the problems that still exist in this region.

Our Conference adopted two new Conventions and their two accompanying Recommendations. They relate to safety and health in construction, and employment promotion and social security. This helped to increase the number of international labour standards, updating some of these standards.

The fields covered by these Conventions are of considerable importance for human beings. A safe working place is a basic requirement to protect the life and health of working people. As for the employment promotion and social security you will certainly concur with me in believing that we should centre our efforts and activities on ensuring and maintaining full employment. We should view also from this standpoint the documents prepared by the Committee on Rural Employment. In revising the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107), important preparatory work has been performed at this year's Conference.

The adopted Conventions now will have to be ratified, for it is necessary that standards adopted under great difficulties by the Organisation also become effective in practice. Standards alone would remain a deadletter unless they were instilled with life. To establish Conventions, to ratify them by member States, to transform these standards into legislation and practice, and to supervise them to ensure their respect; all these form a whole and cannot be separated.

As in previous years, the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations analysed results achieved to date. In line with the general climate of this Conference, the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations worked in a climate of co-operation, dialogue and the exchange of experience. Co-operation does not preclude different viewpoints and divergencies. However, if discussions take place in an atmosphere of dialogue and impartiality it certainly has a positive effect on the ratification and application of our Conventions.

Before we take leave of one another, allow me to express my heartfelt thanks, as the previous speakers did before me, to all those who have been instrumental in ensuring the success of this Conference. First of all, I should like to extend my thanks to my Vice-Presidents: Mr. Smith, who during the first few days, was here in his capacity as Minister of Labour of Jamaica; then to Mr. Aitken, Government delegate of Jamaica; then to Mr. Tsujino, representative of the Japanese Employers' Confederation and member of the Governing Body of the ILO; and Mr. Adiko, Secretary-General of the Workers' trade union of the Côte d'Ivoire, also a member of the Governing Body of the ILO. I greatly appreciated the advice and the support extended to me by my colleagues in conducting the business of the Conference. We have always worked together as true colleagues.

Allow me to address a particular word of thanks to the Secretary-General of our Conference, Mr. Francis Blanchard. He worked unstintingly in order to create conditions under which the Conference could work and perform successfully. I would also like to conclude in my words of thanks all the members of the staff of the International Labour Office whose reliable performance was evident every day. I should also like to express my gratitude to our interpreters and translators who helped us understand one another in an excellent way.

Now that we are about to return to our home countries, each of us will be faced with a task of building upon the Conference results and ensuring that they are used for the benefit of mankind. To work constantly to achieve the noble goals of the International Labour Organisation calls for commitment, passion and unceasing work. This is a never-ending struggle, in which human beings shape their own lives.

Allow me to refer once again to the great German poet Johann Wolfgang Goethe, who, in his literary masterpiece, made Faust say at the end of a long life rich in experience: "Only those deserve freedom or life who are ready to conquer them day after day." Let us continue to work along these lines also in the future.

With these words I declare the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference closed.

(The Conference adjourned sine die at 12.15 p.m.)
