The intention of the Government is to accelerate the process of freeing all forms of entrepreneurship, widening responsibilities to undertake economic activities in various structures and sectors, and making these activities legal in a more simple and efficient way. In order to activate the desired results of the special prerogatives of the Government as soon as possible, we have to unite the action of society, Government, trade unions, workers' self-management and managing staff of the enterprises.

In summing up the standard-setting action of the ILO in the area of human rights, the Director-General has rightly stated in his Report that the standards established in the Conventions and Recommendations of the ILO are not eternal. He also informed us of an active programme of revision of standards adopted in older Conventions. I also fully agree with the opinion of the Working Group of the Governing Body for international labour standards that there are still a number of issues which deserve standard-setting activities.

Each anniversary brings recollections of what has been done and what, in the light of experiences gained, could be improved. The world has been changing very fast, both because of dynamic technological progress and economic development, and because of transitions in social relations at the national and international level. Similarly, the role of trade unions is also changing in the world of today. Quite obviously, they have to adapt to contemporary challenges, to new requirements and socio-economic objectives. Has not the time come to consider, on the occasion of these anniversaries, the need for a more adequate formulation of the principles, place and role of trade unions in changing social relations? This would be beneficial for the trade union movement and for the working people whose interests they represent. These are only initial thoughts which encourage us to reconsider this problem, which interests trade unions, as much as governments and employers.

The Director-General concludes his Report with emphasis on the right of a human being to live in peace. It is a lofty idea. If we really want to achieve the desired goals of social progress and justice, peace is a fundamental condition for their attainment. Therefore we want to look towards the future with hope and trust. The shape of this future, in its national and international dimensions, depends on ourselves and on our action.

Interpretation from French: Mr. MAYILA (Minister of Labour, Employment and Human Resources, Gabon) – On behalf of the Government of the Republic of Gabon and on behalf of this delegation which it is my honour to lead at this 75th Session of the International Labour Conference, I would firstly like to address my sincere congratulations to Mr. Beyreuther on his election to the Presidency of our Conference. I am convinced that under his guidance the Conference will achieve success in its work, so important for achieving peace and social justice in the world. In this respect, I can assure him that my delegation is ready and willing to co-operate in helping him carry out his exalted and noble task.

My congratulations are also due to the Vice-Presidents and, of course, to Mr. Francis Blanchard, the Director-General of the International Labour Office, for his excellent Report, Human rights – A common responsibility, a very relevant subject of capital importance in the eyes of the whole world.

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights is 40 years old. The time has therefore come for the international community to take stock of its position on the route followed by the nations of the world and to look at the future.

Some, in the North, do so with confidence and serenity; others, in the South, in anxiety and uncertainty over a worrying future; yet all are spurred on by the will to achieve progress for humanity by accepting the challenges which do honour to man and his genius.

It is to this that the eloquent Report of the Director-General of the International Labour Office, which deals with human rights in the context of the International Labour Organisation is addressed.

Gabon takes the ideas of peace, justice and social progress as the basis of its economic and social policy, I would say even of all its policy. The Government of Gabon has faith in the virtues of constructive dialogue and in concertation for achieving its objectives. In this context, a certain number of measures of an institutional nature particularly govern industrial relations.

The Constitution of the Republic of Gabon has taken on the essential aspects of the rights and liberties declared by the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the rights of the citizen. Our national legislation intends to protect all fundamental values and has therefore included many standards and rules drawn up by the international organisations in the United Nations system, particularly the ILO, in both our Labour Code and our social security system.

We place considerable hopes in this substantial contribution and we are particularly happy to be able to emphasise how much we appreciate this active co-operation.

As regards freedom of association, our legislation is in accordance with the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention 1948 (No. 87). Freedom of association in general, and trade union freedom in particular, are formally guaranteed, and the Government does everything it can to promote the development of the trade union movement.

As regards equality of opportunity and treatment, the Constitution of Gabon, like our social legislation, guarantees the right to work and the rights to obtain employment without any form of discrimination based on race, sex, creed or political opinion. Vocational training is an obligation for the State and for the enterprises; workers of both sexes have the same rights of access to all training institutions and advanced vocational training institutions; migrant workers, who are subject to our legislation, enjoy all the benefits provided for by that legislation and enjoy the same conditions as do our nationals.

Furthermore, the Government that it is my signal honour to represent here has taken as its essential objective the promotion of productive, freely chosen employment in order to stimulate growth and economic development, raise the standard of living and combat unemployment and underemployment in a country where work is considered to be an honour and a source of value. The Gabon legislation prohibits all forms of exploitation of workers, prescribes respect for the liberties and dignity of the worker and guarantees him and his family decent conditions of health and life.

As regards protection in the field of social security, the system in Gabon covers all wage-earning workers and independent workers. These measures have recently been extended to all classes of the population.

Over and above the indivisible character of political, economic, social and cultural rights, this is the time to ask ourselves a number of questions, because this topic gives us the opportunity of talking about the rights of those who have no rights.

In my country, we say that a man who is hungry has no rights; that a man who is ignorant of his rights has no rights; that a man who has only the right to die has no rights. That is President Bongo's deep-rooted conviction.

Unfortunately, this is the case in many underdeveloped country and in many parts of the world where torture, humiliation and human degradation are rife. It is unfortunately and above all the case in South Africa where apartheid holds sway and this state of affairs in itself constitutes a threat to peace, liable to disrupt our precarious balance and the very principles of the liberties set out in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

Doesn't the Declaration of Philadelphia, the ILO's own Declaration, say that "poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere..."?

Gabon is convinced that world peace depends on respect for human rights; and the large number of ratifications of ILO Conventions and those of other institutions in the United Nations system relating to human rights demonstrate my country's will to work in this direction. What is more, certain questions arise regarding the actual implications of human rights in developing countries which are faced with serious problems of illiteracy, poverty, demographic explosion, unemployment, famine, malnutrition, drought and other natural disasters.

Can we, in fact, talk of human rights in these poor countries where destitution, ignorance and unemployment constitute negative factors against the development of dignity and fundamental freedoms? We say no.

This is why, last year, from this rostrum we pleaded for a "Marshall Plan" for Africa and the Third World, crushed in economic stagnation by the weight of debt and debt servicing.

This is why we reiterate our appeal to the rich countries to overcome their egoism, give up the arms race in order to relaunch the world economy and thus contribute to ensuring peace in the world, because the fullness of human rights depends on this.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. RIOS MUÑOZ (Government delegate, Colombia) – Mr. President, allow me to congratulate you on your election and, through you, allow me to congratulate the Director-General on his Report.

The Government of Colombia wishes to greet the ILO, as well as the delegates, advisers and observers of the various countries present here.

The central topic of this meeting – human rights – provides us with an excellent opportunity to analyse the situation in Colombia, to review freedom of association in our country and to describe briefly the social and economic agenda of my Government.

Conflicts and violence in Colombia have a long history. They are linked to our process of modernisation and development, and are particularly grave from time to time.

In the past decade, new forms of delinquency such as terrorism and drug trafficking have exacerbated the violations of fundamental human rights.

The problem of disappeared persons, which has been recurring since the end of the seventies, is also a cause of grave concern.

Common delinquency, which is prevalent on the outskirts of large urban areas, contributes to this atmosphere of violence.

The victims of these acts of lawlessness are usually political leaders, trade union leaders and activists, journalists, the clergy, intellectuals, members of human rights committees, teachers, businessmen, rural leaders, members of the armed forces, civil servants, and particularly judges, lawyers and public administration officials.

It is a complex problem because these displays of violence, whose seriousness and occasional atrocity give Colombia the image of a conflict-ridden country, are provoked by a minority, whereas the great majority of Colombians live and work in the context of a democratic society, under a government elected by national majorities, which guarantees and protects the exercise of fundamental freedoms.

Moreover, Colombia's economic growth is higher than that of many other Latin American countries. Colombia is investing in programmes for social development designed to eradicate extreme poverty, improve the operational and management capacity of the State and secure stable employment for the great majority of its citizens.

Freedom of opinion, of the press and of organisation as well as freedom to mobilise and protest, are protected by the State.

Colombia is one of the States that has shown the will to find a political solution to the problem of guerrilla insurgencies through negotiation.

Specialists agree that human rights violations can be traced to extremist groups and terrorist organisations linked to drug-trafficking bands.

Some act through hired assassins, particularly in developing agricultural areas. In these areas the polarisation of extremist groups takes the form of violent action to block the application of essential reforms, such as agrarian reform, and to counter democratisation, participation, freedom of association and trade union action.

Other elements engage in actions which violate the human rights of business people, the middle class and the leaders of traditional parties.

Drug-traffickers also carry out specific types of violence in the cities, especially against the authorities and citizens, to weaken the system of justice and to protect their investments in unlawful activities, and in the purchase and exploitation of farm land.

The eradication of conflict, the struggle against impunity and the restoration of order are now priorities of our Government.

The Government's strategy operates through four types of mechanisms.

First, a call to citizens to reactivate their solidarity and infuse society with the respect for human rights.

Second, the implementation of an operative unit for the defence and protection of human rights, co-ordinated by the Presidential Advisory Body which was recently set up and is comprised of officials from state agencies competent in this field. It receives complaints concerning violations of human rights, recommends policies to protect and promote human rights, co-ordinates strategy and responds to the suggestions of citizens.

Third, a social development plan with public investments designed to eliminate the socio-economic causes of violence.

And fourth, the improved financing and administration of the judiciary system.

Further, the Government of Colombia has invited the Working Group on Enforced or Involuntary Disappearances of the United Nations to visit Colombia. The Working Group has accepted the invitation and will investigate the problem in specific areas, present recommendations and offer advice.

In October the Government will sponsor the Assembly of the Association of Relatives of Disappeared Persons in South America, which will endeavour to define common strategies of action.

The Ministry of Labour seeks to promote policies to improve trade union rights and guarantees.

The presence of a strong trade union movement and its involvement in policy-making decision-making in social, economic and public matters, is vital to Colombia's democracy.

The Colombian Government welcomes all measures which can shed light on the truth. An ILO mission will visit Colombia in September. It will be welcome. It will provide an opportunity for a close examination of my country's effort to consolidate its democratic system within a context of social justice.

Colombia, faithful to the postulates of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the various international covenants, makes constant efforts to implement freedom of association, equality of opportunity and the right to work; to promote health and social security, better conditions of work and participation.

Under this administration, the coverage of social security has been extended to workers' families, domestic employees, self-employed workers, the clergy and to geographical areas which were not covered before. The social orientation of the various family compensation funds has been strengthened. By 1990 we hope to have 6 million beneficiaries, which is a 100 per cent increase over the present situation.

Standards have been drawn up to strengthen protection of child workers and minors. The educational system now offers programmes in administration, and we are developing training programmes to support the transfer of technology.

Turning to the right of association in Colombia, the State guarantees to employers, workers and self-employed workers the right to associate freely in the defence of their interests, and to set up occupational associations or trade unions which, in turn, have the right to unite and form confederations.

This right of association is protected by the State.

The Penal Code sanctions offences against the freedom to work and the right to form trade unions. The Labour Code forbids employers and workers to limit or distort the exercise of these rights and freedoms in any way.

Collective bargaining is fully in force and there is a ministry entrusted with the task of defining the relevant policies and mediating and monitoring trade union development.

At present there are 2,468 legally recognised trade union associations; there are four workers' confederations with different ideological tendencies.

Since August 1986, 1,693 negotiations have been concluded, of which 1,244 were collective agreements. Twenty-four arbitration courts were set up; 24 strikes were recorded, involving 5,629 workers. These figures reflect that in spite of the breadth of freedom of association, there has been much industrial peace.

Colombia is strongly committed to its development and the strengthening of democracy. The structure of government is based on social justice and is designed to create a new and more equitable society in which genuine opportunity is accompanied by general well-being and the equitable distribution of resources.

We have therefore decided to redirect resources towards the full coverage of services to the benefit of the poorest; to increase our financial, national and local subsidies; to modernise the management of the entities responsible for social services; and to mobilise the community and promote its participation, in the diagnosis, planning and monitoring of public programmes.

This has enabled us to define sectoral programmes such as basic education for all, the provision of basic commodities and food security, the generation of employment and the improvement of wages, full coverage of the judiciary system, popular participation, basic health care and the strengthening of the various systems of association.

Colombia finds itself at a crossroads in its history. The State, the private sector and the social partners are confronting this situation; as we said earlier, considerable advances have definitely been achieved in the social and economic field. But the Government aims higher still and is engaged in a constitutional reform through which it hopes to extend benefits to all Colombians.

In the field of human rights, we want to recognise new rights, extend the coverage of existing rights and establish machinery which will guarantee the protection of these rights. We would like, for instance, to review traditional freedoms and establish a more modern social right – the right to health; to reform the machinery for the protection of woman by strengthening the judiciary system; to implement these rights and create a special institution to promote the protection of human rights.

Finally, machinery will be developed to strengthen the relationship between employers and workers and make it more co-operative, enabling trade unions and enterprises to improve the quality of life of all citizens, in a fair and rational business environment.

All these elements imply radical change and great responsibilities, which the Government is prepared to shoulder with conviction and optimism, and the knowledge that it is working for a better Colombia.

Mrs. AYKUT (Minister of Labour and Social Security, Turkey) – I should like at the outset to associate myself with previous speakers in extending warm congratulations to the President on his election, as well as to the other officers. I am confident that under his able guidance and with the assistance of his officers, the session will be in a position to fulfil its task in the most positive manner.

I should also like to take this opportunity to thank the Director-General for his comprehensive and excellent Report. The study of the Director-General on the realisation of human rights within the framework and mandate of the ILO contains a brilliant overall analysis of the actual situation and many inspiring suggestions which, I am sure, will receive the attention they deserve.

The ILO has always been an organisation making essential contributions to the promotion of human rights in the areas which fall within its competence. It is, therefore, most fitting that the theme of the Report of the Director-General has been selected this year as Human rights – A common responsibility. In fact, as is said in this Report, the whole range of ILO activities is related to the promotion of human rights.

The ILO has been successful not only in bringing into existence a body of standards, but also efficient arrangements to monitor the effect which has been given to them and to assist the countries in improving their labour legislation.

In the context of human rights, the Organisation's standard-setting activities, together with the need for an efficient mechanism of monitoring, have been and continue to be of the utmost importance. In order not to put this exercise under strain, the whole mechanism needs to be credible. This requires that a line be drawn between what is theoretically desirable and what is realistically feasible. Not only in setting standards, but also in monitoring, the harsh realities of daily lives and the diversities of countries have to be taken into account. The monitoring mechanism of the ILO should never be allowed to be used for purposes other than that for which it is devised. When setting standards, care must be taken so as to make them realistically applicable to as many countries as possible. In monitoring the application, the utmost care should be taken to keep this exercise within the limits for which it is devised and to resist all attempts to exploit it for other purposes. It is only this way that the credibility of the ILO system can be upheld and, consequently, any strain on it avoided. Within the same context, the need for continuing review and updating of standards and continuous sensibility over the manner in which the monitoring mission is carried out acquires a growing importance.

It is within the framework of these views that we subscribe to the principles enumerated in the fourth report of the Governing Body Working Party, particularly to the need to strike a balance between the duty of upholding the values of human freedom and dignity enshrined in the Constitution of the Organisation and the necessity of circumscribing, rather than extending, the area of international tension, and one might perhaps say, as well, national tension.

The wide range of successful activities in different technical fields and in several regions contained in the second part of the Report of the Director-General attests to the continued role of the Office in responding to the challenges faced in the field of labour.

Within this framework, the advisory services and technical co-operation offered by the ILO have always been useful in promoting training, working and employment conditions, especially in developing countries. Turkey is among the countries which has benefited from its technical co-operation with the ILO. We intend to pursue this fruitful co-operation.

In its present session, the Conference is being asked to consider the question of "employment promotion and social security". In our view, the standards to be established in this field should be flexible enough to be adapted to the various national systems without being based on any particular model. In considering the proposed texts, we should also take into account the necessity of resolving the difficulties faced by disadvantaged persons in finding employment or obtaining assistance. Migrant workers constitute a major category of these persons because their number is estimated to be 30 million all over the world. Any Convention relating to employment promotion and social security would not be satisfactory unless it contained the necessary provisions for protecting the right of migrant workers.

Unemployment continues to be one of the most serious problems facing the member countries, particularly those which are developing. There is no doubt that this problem is closely linked with world economic problems. During the first half of the 1980s the number of people living in absolute poverty has considerably increased. The real wages in developing countries have fallen dramatically. The main causes of this negative development are, no doubt, growing protectionism. The worsening of foreign debt, the increasing difficulty of servicing it and shortcomings in implementing structural adjustment. It is, therefore, essential to establish a closer dialogue between organisations engaged in combating world poverty and implementing structural adjustment. The developing countries which confront the biggest part of the present world economic difficulties need three types of action: a better international environment, an adequate flow of capital and appropriate domestic policies. Only the combination of these three can prepare conditions in which these countries would be able to solve these economic problems, which in turn, would prepare the ground for the solution of their social problems. The present difficulties are a challenge both to the developed and to the developing countries. Efforts must therefore be made through concerted measures, both national and international, to accelerate employment-generating growth and to combat long-term unemployment.

As a developing country, Turkey is unfortunately not immune to this problem. Although in recent years our Government has been able to contain the upward trend in unemployment, the diminution in the rate of unemployment has not as yet reached a sizeable proportion. As I said earlier in my statement, to fight economic difficulties, and hence unemployment, we need a better international environment, an adequate flow of capital and appropriate domestic policies.

We believe that we have successfully fulfilled the last condition and contribute to the first two. The dynamic economic policy followed by my Government in the recent years is firmly based on liberalism, close international co-operation and the concept of interdependence for economic growth.

Within the framework of the economic policy I referred to above, the national employment service has been fundamentally reorganised. As a body affiliated to the Ministry of Labour and Social Security, the service was established in 1946 in line with the principles laid down by the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention, 1933 (No. 34), and the Employment Service Convention, 1948 (No. 88). Within the framework of the legal arrangements under way, a tripartite administrative structure will shortly be introduced for furthering the existing dialogue with employers and workers.

To meet the needs of the labour market, several projects were put into operation, namely the promotion of vocational training through co-operation with employers, on-the-job training in the industrial sector, the promotion of women's employment in the domestic services, special services for displaced workers, employment of the handicapped, etc.

I should also like to deal briefly with developments in the fields of social policy and industrial relations in Turkey. My Government is of the view that the efficiency of the free collective bargaining system depends mainly on the integration of this system with social policy measures. That is why the fundamental policy objectives of our Government have been the elimination of poverty and unemployment, the realisation of social justice, the strengthening of the middle class and the achievement of price stability. With a view to attaining these objectives, we have put into practice measures to reinforce the social infrastructure.

One of the concrete consequences of our century-old struggle for democracy and industrialisation is the progress achieved in the field of industrial relations. Labour law has gained a collective dimension throughout the process of democratisation, and Turkey witnessed a rapid development from the stage of basic legal rights to the next stage, that is to say the right to organise and collective bargaining.

There is no doubt that Turkey's membership of the ILO since 1932 has been most influential in all stage of this development. Leaving aside the history of 150 years of the Turkish labour movement, Turkey has had labour legislation for 50 years, trade union legislation for 40 years, and free collective bargaining system for 25 years. In all these, Turkey benefited from the ILO's contribution and guidance. Despite all these developments, we are fully aware that we still have to achieve further progress in this field.

The ILO can be rightly proud of its long services and contribution to the dignity and happiness of mankind. I want you all to know how deeply touched I am as one of the few women labour ministers, to be addressing the session of the Conference of our Organisation, which upholds and serves human values.

Taking as a point of departure the fact that the basic goal of development is human welfare, we believe that economic progress has the basic aim of achieving social progress.

Industrialisation within a democratic system aimed at progress, respect for human rights and social justice has always been the main aspiration and policy target of Turkey.

About a week ago, 55 workers – Turks and Germans – lost their lives in a coal mine accident in the Federal Republic of Germany. I was in the Federal Republic yesterday to attend their funeral. I am confident that all participants in this session of the Conference will share the deep sorrow we felt on this tragic loss and join us in expressing our condolences to the bereaved families of the victims.

Finally, I wish to express our sincere hope and belief that our Organisation will approach the problems faced by various categories of countries with a sense of collective responsibility and international solidarity, assessing them objectively in a depoliticised atmosphere, so as to find the right solutions according to the real merits of each case and problem. We believe this to be in the interest of the credibility of this body and, consequently, in the interest of all member countries.

I wish the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference the best of success in its humanitarian work.

Interpretation from German: Mr. BOCHOW (Workers' delegate, German Democratic Republic) – The 75th Session of the International Labour Conference of 1988 is taking place in a period that is full of hope and promise. After years of critical international tension, the successful summit between the highest representatives of the USSR and the United States has moved the prospect of a world of peaceful co-operation closer to us.

For the first time, the Intermediate-range Nuclear Forces treaty will not only limit weapons of destruction but eliminate them altogether. The door has been opened to a nuclear-free world. Now we must ensure that no one will close it again.

It is also with this aim in mind that the Head of State of my country has convened an international meeting on nuclear-free zones, from 20 to 22 June in Berlin, which will be attended by representatives of different political and social circles from over 100 countries.

At the beginning of July, the first holidaymakers will take their vacation in an area in the north of my country that was, until very recently, a missile site. Even before the instruments of ratification were exchanged, the Soviet-missiles had been withdrawn and the area concerned handed over to the trade unions for their use.

How often have we not heard the claim that resources released through disarmament, should be made available for social purposes? Here we have a concrete example, where a missile base became a trade union holiday centre for hundreds of workers and families.

The Report of the Director-General deals extensively with the activities of the ILO to implement human rights; as pointed out in the Report: "the ILO was the first to proclaim the indivisible character of human rights".

The Report contains shocking figures on the working and living conditions in a large part of the world.

Seventy million unemployed, 500 million underemployed, 900 million persons living in dire poverty in countries of Asia, Africa and Latin America, as well as 30 million unemployed in capitalist industrialised countries are deprived of basic human rights. The reason for this situation can be ascribed to "the unfavourable economic environment... and the structural adjustment policies imposed as a consequence of external debt".

What exactly is an unfavourable economic environment and what are its causes? Is it not partly due to the selfish exploitation of developing countries through the international monopoly of capital and transnational companies? Is it not also because vast capital is concentrated in the hands of the few, whose efforts to maximise profits are increasing wealth on the one hand and making poverty worse on the other hand? Is it not true that the arms race is still using up vast funds?

As UNCTAD and IMF statistics show, from 1970-85, the developing countries paid more than $1,100 billion to capitalist industrialised countries and their banks to service their debts.

The payment of interest, as well as the servicing of the debt and the flow of profits from direct foreign investments, led to a situation in which, in 1986, the developing countries alone had to provide some $130 billion to the capitalist industrialised countries. This is more than four times the amount they received by way of development aid in the year 1985.

If we look at the conditions in which millions of people are still forced to work in a number of countries, it is clear how much remains to be done to implement the basic rights of the worker everywhere.

No one can overlook this fact. My colleagues from the capitalist countries can provide sufficient examples of their own to show to what extent new poverty is spreading even in the so-called rich countries.

All this is accompanied by a number of efforts to restrict the field of action of the trade unions and, if possible, to exclude trade unions altogether.

Behind all these efforts, there is often an uncoined intention to use scientific and technological progress and the ensuing technological change exclusively in the interests of making a profit. Flexible strategies, pursued by entrepreneurs, as well as numerous legal provisions severely curtail trade union activities.

The scientific and technological revolution obviously confronts the trade unions of my country with new challenges. We feel that technological progress and economic growth should always be accompanied by a marked improvement in working and living conditions. In my country as well, this is only possible through the untiring efforts of our trade unions. We therefore feel that an international exchange of views between trade unions in this area is very useful.

It is with this in mind that we are preparing a European symposium on this subject: "New technologies - Employment and trade unions", which will be held in November this year.

At the same time, we would welcome it if, in 1990, the ILO would duly commemorate the 100th anniversary of the celebration of 1 May. We support all initiatives and proposals of trade unions which have already been submitted in this connection.

Allow me to refer to two particularly serious cases of violation of basic human rights which are quite rightly mentioned in the Report.

First of all, I shall turn to the policy of Israel in the illegally occupied Arab territories. The mass protests of the Arab population on the West Bank and in the Gaza Strip show the need to avoid further delay in finding a fair and lasting solution to the problem of the Middle East. The International Labour Organisation should make even greater efforts to ensure that an end is put to the persecution and discrimination of Arab workers.

A subject under constant discussion at the International Labour Conference is the situation in South Africa. Despite public protests, the apartheid regime is continuing the repression of the majority Black population and increasing its terrorism both inside and outside the country. The recent measures taken against progressive trade unions, especially those belonging to of the umbrella organisation, COSATU, are a flagrant violation of relevant ILO standards. It is vital that we step up the campaign for an effective boycott against South Africa and obtain the strict implementation of the corresponding United Nations resolutions.

The ICFTU, here in Geneva, pointed out in a remarkable report that considerable capital investments of western industrialised countries are still being made in South Africa, which prolong the existence of this anti-human rights regime.

At this point, we cannot but support the reference in the Report of the Director-General which mentions the close links between the application of basic human rights to education and work, to life in peace and social security and the maintenance and development of trade union rights.

Obviously, trade unions in the German Democratic Republic also had to strive over a period of time to obtain recognition and influence, and it was due to the hard work and competence of their officials.

I can assert the fact that in the indivisible area of human rights and freedom of association we do not apply double standards: our solemn adherence to the relevant international Conventions bears witness to this - and can be verified at any time. It is the result of a long and continuing process of innovation and reform in which the rights of the trade union in the enterprise have been constantly developed.

The Report of the Director-General quotes a speech given by the President of the United States, Franklin Roosevelt, to a conference in Washington in 1941: "In international, as in national affairs, economic policy can no longer be an end in itself. It is only a means of achieving social goals." This principle is the cornerstone of the social programme of the German Democratic Republic which unites economic and social policy. This policy ensures that each citizen shall enjoy social security, comprehensive education, full employment and a promising future. In a comprehensive national programme, for example, we introduced a social housing project which made it possible for over half of the population to have access to new or renovated housing over a period of 15 years. Stable prices for staple food stuffs, services, rates and rents guarantee workers an adequate standard of living through their work.

It is easy to understand that the unions of the German Democratic Republic participate actively in a policy – which, after all, is based on the basic claims of the trade union movement – in a number of ways, as independent sovereign organisations, with far-reaching rights.

Shortly after joining the ILO in the year 1974, my country ratified Convention No. 87.

Article 44, paragraph 2, of the Constitution clearly states that trade unions shall be independent and no one may restrict or hamper their activities.

In the Labour Code of the German Democratic Republic, which was developed by the trade unions some ten years ago and submitted to public opinion and Parliament for discussion, the legal standards for trade union activities are spelt out. It states, among other things that trade union activities are protected by the socialist State. All state bodies, economic bodies and enterprises are obliged to promote trade union activities and work together with them closely. It adds that anyone who curtails trade union activities will have to answer for his actions.

Obviously, we are not naive and realise that despite the fact that there is no conflict of interests between the heads of enterprises and trade unions based on ownership, there can nevertheless be differences of opinion. In such cases we have a number of trade union committees, assemblies of shop stewards and opportunities to air our views. We also have proven democratic instruments by means of which, together with the central trade union executives, we can always solve problems by consensus.

I am sure you will not object if I end by expressing my congratulations to the President of our Conference, the Secretary of State for Labour and Wages in the German Democratic Republic, on his election to his high office. It is extremely pleasing for a trade unionist to note that not only has this responsible task been entrusted to an eminent representative from my country but also to an active trade unionist, a member of the National Council of the Confederation of Free German Trade Unions (FDGB) and for many years a deputy chairman of this organisation. I am sure that you, Mr. President, on the basis of your long-standing experience, will devote a great deal of attention to the concerns of trade unions from all countries at this Conference.

Interpretation from French: Mr. HUG (Government delegate, Switzerland) – It is a pleasure for me to associate myself and the whole of my delegation with earlier speakers in congratulating the President on his election to the presidency of our Conference. I should also like to address my congratulations to the three Vice-Presidents.

I should not wish to start my statement without first addressing my thanks to the Director-General and, through him, to all the officials of the International Labour Office for the enormous amount of work they do during the course of the year. The calibre of their performance, their competence and their commitment to the work are an honour to our Organisation. In my capacity as a representative of the host country of the Organisation, and like all Swiss representatives, we obviously have the privilege, throughout the year, of maintaining close links with the International Labour Office and thereby sharing the interest we have in its activities.

Might I, therefore, reiterate here in this plenary session our commitment to the International Labour Organisation and to the objectives it pursues with consistency, seriousness and conviction. I should also like determinedly to emphasise the vital importance we accord to the activities of our Organisation on behalf of the defence and protection of the fundamental human freedoms and rights. In this respect, I give my Government's full support to the system and the procedures established in our Organisation to ensure respect of the obligations undertaken in exercising their sovereignty by the member States.

The Director-General has this year presented us with a Report devoted to a double anniversary – the 40th anniversary of the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights on the one hand and one of the key Conventions of the ILO, Convention No. 87, on freedom of association on the other. This Report furthermore refers to many other fundamental instruments of the Organisation dealing with equality of opportunity, employment, remuneration, working conditions and social security.

In this context, might I take up two aspects of the Report of the Director-General which I think merit consideration. Firstly, freedom of association and its implications in Swiss society and then in a more general sense the role of employment promotion in the exercise of human rights. Switzerland, a country in which consensus puts its stamp on everyday social and political life, has understood for a long time now that freedom of association is one of the essential foundations of economic and social success. Nevertheless, we are conscious of the fact that freedom of association is not an asset we can question when, in our country as elsewhere, economic conditions require painful adjustments or restructuring. Social dialogue and the responsibility of the social partners are essential conditions for strengthening our economy, and in Switzerland they find their expression in a dense network of collective labour conventions. But for us freedom of association is also an opportunity to take part in the political life of the country and to allow the workers freely to express their ideas. For that purpose, we in Switzerland have consultation mechanisms which are fully in keeping with the basic principles of our Organisation, particularly tripartism. By ratifying this essential instrument of the Organisation – by which I mean the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention 1948 (No. 87) – our country has endorsed the idea expressed by the Director-General that “freely established and freely functioning representative organisations are an essential part of the continuing dialogue ... on which the search for solutions to economic and social problems must be based”.

But dialogue and social consensus also mean a concern for social justice. That is why we must always bear in mind, as representatives of public authorities, that it is not possible to find just solutions to economic problems to the detriment of employment and a reasonable and effective social policy. True, we in Switzerland are in favour of liberalism which allows free play to market forces and encourages the spirit of innovation in company managers. But, on the other hand, the counterpart to this free market economy must be a solid system of social security.

Now, in the second part of my speech, I should like to revert to the role of employment promotion in the exercise of human rights. The low unemployment rate in Switzerland doesn't relieve us of the need to exercise vigilance. We therefore consider it essential that every individual should have the possibility of gainful employment, which is synonymous with freedom, dignity, economic security and equal opportunities, all of which principles are contained in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. This year the Organisation has once again given us the opportunity, within the framework of its standard-setting activities, to find constructive solutions to the serious problem of unemployment in the world by placing on the agenda of the session the subject of employment promotion and social security. There is no miracle recipe for solving the problem of unemployment, but we welcome the creation of international standards permitting unemployed persons to be guaranteed a decent standard of living. In the view of the Swiss Government the revision of the Unemployment Provision Convention, 1934 (No. 44), was necessary and judicious. By taking up the problems of protection against unemployment not only from a "reactive" but also from a "preventive" point of view, the session has set itself the dual objective of guaranteeing the unemployed equitable compensation for the loss of earnings resulting from unemployment and highlighting the promotional role of unemployment benefits. This wind of change which has blown through many systems of protection against unemployment and which stresses the promotion of additional employment opportunities and employment assistance has also blown across our frontiers. Since 1984 Swiss legislation on unemployment insurance has been encouraging, through benefits, the reconversion, advanced training and occupational integration of the unemployed; it grants contributions to unemployed people who accept jobs in regions distant from their homes; and the law supports, through subsidies, workers' and employers' organisations and public authorities which set up courses or occupation programmes for the unemployed.

This modern and dynamic perspective which the session has adopted to analyse the problem of unemployment and which highlights the economic element, must not, however, allow us to forget that some States provide no protection against unemployment or have only rudimentary social security systems. In the concern for international solidarity the international instruments drawn up with a view to revising the Unemployment Provision Convention, 1934 (No. 44), should provide for flexible provisions which the largest possible number of States should be able to ratify; they should also contain recommendations from which States will be able to derive inspiration in developing or improving their systems of protection for the unemployed.

In the world of work today the ideal would be to find a good balance between the free play of market forces, social justice and – and this is topical – the protection of the environment.

Guaranteeing respect for human rights and social welfare depends on universal solidarity. However, for that solidarity to be able to produce the best possible results, there is one principle which every State should bear constantly in mind: man is and will always remain the driving force behind the economic machine. The economy serves man, and man must be at the centre of all economic activity. Thus economic performance should not constitute the sole aim of a balanced policy nor should a frantic concern to ensure the protection of nature. It is by counting on our human capital, by guaranteeing the full dignity of man and by giving him adequate and equitable working conditions that we shall be able to give effect in full to the new demands relating to human rights and freedom of association.

Mr. OBOCKI (Member of the Federal Executive Council, President of the Federal Committee on Labour, Health and Social Welfare, Yugoslavia) – I would like to congratulate the President upon his election and to express my best wishes for success in carrying out his important and responsible duties as President of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. I am confident that his experience and expertise will be of inestimable help in ensuring a positive overall outcome of our Conference.

We have studied the Director-General's Report with due attention. I should like to observe that this year's exhaustive and comprehensive Report shows a high degree of objectivity in analysing the activities of the International Labour Organisation as well as the main problems it had to confront in the period between the two Conferences. It is quite obvious that the serious problems of a political, and particularly of an economic and social, nature confronting the world today have a decisive impact on the main directions of the activities of the International Labour Organisation as well as on their results. It is my opinion that the International Labour Organisation is managing more or less successfully to adjust to the current situation and that the principal orientation and structure of its activities correspond in great measure to present-day needs. This essentially favourable assessment of the activities of the International Labour Organisation in the period under review also applies in the main to the Medium-Term Plan in its basic strategic options, which provides a positive orientation corresponding in principle to the course development is expected take.

In this connection I should like to underline in particular our support for the general trend towards greater economy in the Organisation as a whole which implicitly means greater financial participation by member countries. The question is certainly not a new one nor is it being raised for the first time, but I feel that this is the right moment to underline once again the need to intensify the efforts to achieve a definite turn around in this respect. This brings me, for example, to the question of the possibility of holding the general Conference once every two years, when any new normative instruments could be adopted and issues coming directly under the terms of reference of the Conference dealt with. In the meantime, we could step up our professional activities and undertake all the necessary professional preparations, which seem to me to be more important than any others.

In mentioning the serious economic and social problems in the world I had in mind, in particular, the fact that the world economy and international economic relations are again experiencing a period of profound crisis. The stagnation in development is the most protracted and the most serious we have known since the second World war. However, it is at this very moment that the economies of the developed countries are undergoing structural change and making all-round technological progress, while the gap in economic development between the North and the South is widening and the position of the developing countries is constantly deteriorating. I refer, in the first place, to the aggravation of the debt problem, certainly the most topical problem on a world scale today, which is having an increasingly adverse effect on the developing countries. This also applies to my country which is passing through a period of grave economic difficulties.

The principal tasks facing the Government of my country and society as a whole in the period ahead are to overcome the crisis and stagnation and to check the inflationary trends.

In this connection, our activities will focus on the preparation of proposals for a reform of the economic system as the key prerequisite for surmounting the current difficulties and ensuring stable and dynamic economic and social development. With this aim in mind, changes are being examined and prepared in the following segments of the economic system: the system of expanded production including property relations, the market and prices; the system of formation, distribution and allocation of income; the financial system, which will embrace monetary-credit relations and banking; the system of accounting, taxation and contributions; the system of foreign economic relations; the system of planning and the system and policy of encouraging the accelerated development of the underdeveloped. In addition, the Government of my country will propose a social policy concept geared to the conditions of implementation of a thorough reform of the economic system.

The principal aim of these changes is to give effect in the economy to all the criteria of a realistic economy and to provide scope for the full play of economic and market laws coupled with the complementary and corrective role of state interference in economic life, and the establishment of conditions to enable economic enterprises to take their business and development decisions independently and to bear all the risks of managing socially owned resources. These changes should make for greater exposure of the Yugoslav economy to the favourable effects of the world market, its greater participation in the world economy and an increase in its exports. The rate and direction of the country's further technological and overall development will depend on the results of these efforts.

May I now refer briefly to the extremely important subject of the general debate in our Conference, namely human rights. Though the event that prompted this debate may have been the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights as well as of the ILO Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention (No. 87), I believe that the general situation with respect to the protection of human and trade union rights is such as to warrant an appraisal and indication of the main directions of future action in this field by the ILO as the oldest specialised international agency and the only tripartite organisation in the United Nations family.

I should, first of all, like to underline that the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia is active and consistent in its unceasing efforts, within the United Nations and all its bodies and specialised agencies, to promote and protect human rights. True to its choice, Yugoslavia has ratified and built into its legislation all the international instruments existing in the area of human rights protection, specifically the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights.

In keeping with its policy, Yugoslavia denounces human rights violations and is actively involved in the struggle against them, particularly with respect to the rights of the people of South Africa and Palestine and against apartheid as an anachronism in these times. Yugoslavia also advocates the affirmation of a comprehensive concept of human rights, which essentially means full equality and unity of economic, cultural and social rights as well as of political and civil rights. Moreover, Yugoslavia resolutely supports recognition of the contribution to human rights development made by all, not only by certain cultures and nations, and of the right to development as a human right of both individuals and nations. I consider the latter to be of special significance for the developing countries, as it implies their right to exercise control over their own natural resources and to establish international and economic and other conditions conducive to more rapid socio-economic development. Generally speaking, we in Yugoslavia believe that the level of development attained in the world, the process of decolonisation, the emergence of new nations and the advent of the non-aligned movement necessitates the elaboration and affirmation of certain new rights of nations and individuals. Among these new rights, in addition to the right to development mentioned above, the most prominent place certainly belongs to the right to participation which is gaining in significance in the world today and is becoming a part of all sectors of contemporary society. There is not a single country in the world today which has not developed some form of participation. Some developing countries have opted for participation as the dominant characteristic of their overall social relations, whereas in Yugoslavia this phenomenon has been raised to a higher level of social significance by taking the form of self-management which constitutes the basis of our socio-economic system. In this context, I think the International Labour Organisation has a very significant role to play and that it has already done a great deal. At the same time, I would like to point out that certain novel aspects of human rights are emerging which require more active and direct involvement on the part of the Organisation.

Regarding the extensive agenda for this year's session, I note that all the items we shall be discussing deserve our close attention and that the Yugoslav delegation will urge the adoption of solutions corresponding to a maximum degree to the complex interests of all of us.

Finally, may I express my conviction that this 75th Session of the International Labour Conference will produce positive results, particularly given the political readiness of the entire structure of the Organisation to address key problems.

Interpretation from Chinese: Mr. SHA (Employers' delegate, China) – May I, first of all, extend my warmest congratulations to the President on his election to the presidency of the Conference. I am confident that the current session of the Conference will be crowned with success under his guidance.

Forty years have elapsed since the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the ILO's Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention (No. 87). These four decades after the Second World War, though short in human history, have witnessed more changes on this planet than the previous hundreds of years. In the perspective of different regions and aspects, these changes have been complicated. However, in a global perspective, there has always been an irreversible trend towards peace and justice, independence and sovereignty, science and democracy, prosperity and development.

On speaking of seeking material well-being and spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, we should not fail to observe that, when a country is under foreign military interference, invasion, or even occupation, the restoration of its independence and sovereignty is the precondition for discussions of freedom and dignity; that when a country is pursuing policies of racial discrimination and apartheid, to mobilise the world community to support people of all races in their struggle for equal rights and interests is a practical action for safeguarding human rights in that country; and that when the people of a country or region live in abject poverty, to provide aid and promote economic development for them are the basic guarantee for the material well-being and spiritual development of the people there.

In addition, it is clear that democracy and freedom for the individual are inseparable from a series of social and economic questions such as promotion of employment, fair income distribution, improvement of working conditions and social security, equal pay for equal work of men and women, protection of the aged, young and handicapped workers, and freedom of expression and association. In the efforts to safeguard human rights, we should start by tackling practical problems, and steadily accumulate results so as to promote peace and prosperity for all mankind.

On behalf of Chinese employers, I am pleased to report that marked progress has been achieved in China in developing democracy and strengthening the legal system. For enterprises in China, it was an event of far-reaching significance when, at the 7th National People's Congress held last spring, the Law of the People's Republic of China on Industrial Enterprises Owned by the Whole People and the Law on Chinese-Foreign Contractual Joint Ventures were adopted. The Conference also adopted amendments to China's Constitution concerning the private sector of the economy.

The Industrial Enterprises Act is one of China's basic laws and took ten years to prepare, draft, revise and adopt. It can be said that the Law is the crystallisation of democracy and the legal system in China.

The essence of the Act is the principle of separating ownership of enterprises from their management. The Act explicitly stipulates that, while still owned by the whole people, these enterprises are vested with extensive managerial rights in a broader sense, including the right to possess, utilise and dispose of property. Under the Act, enterprises will decide independently on their management and development, and on the utilisation and transfer of their property, including the holding of shares in other enterprises, investment, mergers and acquisition. The Act provides a legal basis and guarantee for transforming enterprises into socialist producers of goods with independent managerial power. It also provides a legal basis and guarantee for turning directors and managers of enterprises into legal representatives of the enterprises, who will take up the central position in these and assume full responsibility for them. However, in exercising their authority, the directors and managers of enterprises should respect the right of workers and staff to participate in the democratic management of the enterprises, accept the role of the staff and workers' congresses in supervising and checking upon the work of the enterprises and adopt a democratic decision-making process for major issues. The staff and workers' congresses have the right to assess and supervise the work of the leading members at various levels of the enterprise and to propose the reward, reprimand or punishment of the directors and managers for their work, as well as their appointment and dismissal.

The Law on Chinese-Foreign Contractual Joint Ventures is a major achievement in the implementation of the open policy in China. On the basis of the experiences of various types of Chinese-foreign contractual joint ventures, the Law stipulates in explicit terms the process that enterprises should follow for registration and application for approval, enterprises' rights and obligations, their structure of leadership, the recruitment of staff and workers, the activities of their trade unions, regulation on the control of foreign exchange and imports and exports, the distribution of profits, and the termination of co-operation. The implementation of the Law on Chinese-Foreign Contractual Joint Ventures provides a legal basis and guarantee for business operations by foreign entrepreneurs in China and will undoubtedly promote further co-operation and exchanges between Chinese and foreign businessmen.

The amendment to China's Constitution which is important for enterprises is the addition of the following passage, which reads as follows: "...the State permits the private sector in the economy to exist and develop within the limits prescribed by law. The private sector of the economy is a complement to the socialist public economy. The State protects the lawful rights and interests of the private sector and exercises guidance, supervision and control over the private sector". This gives the managers of private enterprises equal legal status with the managers of the state-owned and collectively-owned enterprises, thus providing a legal guarantee for private entrepreneurs in developing their business.

While developing democracy and improving the legal system in an effort to meet the requirements of the development of the socialist modernisation programme, a contingent of Chinese entrepreneurs has emerged, which includes managers of state-owned enterprises, collectively-owned enterprises and private enterprises. They are playing a more active role than ever before. In recent years, in order to protect their lawful rights and interests, and to exchange experiences on improving their business performance, Chinese entrepreneurs, with the assistance of the China Enterprise Management Association, have gradually organised themselves into various entrepreneurs' associations and clubs. Among them are the China Enterprise Directors' Association, Township Enterprise Directors' Association, Female Enterprise Directors' Association, Young Enterprise Directors' Association and many other local enterprise directors' associations and clubs.

The organisations of Chinese entrepreneurs are emerging vigorously and developing fast. They are playing an increasingly important role in China's economic development. We wish to develop further our friendly co-operation with the ILO and the employers' organisations of all countries. I believe that the friendly exchanges and co-operation among China's enterprises, the ILO, other countries' enterprises and personages in various circles are not only conducive to China's development, but also helpful to the promotion of the material well-being and spiritual development of all mankind.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. CARRILLO ROJAS (Workers' delegate, Colombia) – One year ago, representing the workers of Colombia, I had the opportunity to inform the 74th Session of the International Labour Conference of the creation of the Unitary Centre of Workers of Colombia (CUT). Today, speaking again on behalf of the workers in my country, I can say that the process of unity in the Colombian working class has been strengthened despite the terrible violence that afflicts my country. Element of the extreme left and the extreme right have resorted to terrorism, kidnapping and assassination as a means of imposing themselves upon the vast majority of the public who reject them. Liberals, conservatives, communists and members of the Patriotic Union party have been assassinated. More than 100 trade unionists, all of them members of CUT, have fallen victim to the assassins. Soldiers, policemen and guerrillas are dying violently almost every day and in the midst of this drama, the CUT is struggling for respect for the right to life, for pluralism and for peace with social justice.

One of the regions which has suffered most from the violence and where the greatest number of workers have been assassinated, Uraba, is an area in which great social injustice exists, non-compliance with labour standards and indeed subhuman living conditions. Workers have managed to set up trade unions which are trying to change the situation through collective bargaining. These workers' organisations, subsidiaries of CUT, have been the victims.

On behalf of Colombian workers, I would like to thank the ICFTU, the WFTU and in general the entire international trade union movement for all the solidarity they have shown us.

In the light of the concern expressed by the Governing Body of the ILO at the situation of violence in Colombia, it is of great importance that a special mission be sent to my country. This would provide enormous support to the decision of the President of our Republic, Virgilio Barco, to see that the crimes which have been committed do not go unpunished.

We consider the central theme chosen by the Director-General for this meeting, human rights, to be very appropriate. We are convinced that the ILO can play an important part in the economic transformation which the world requires to guarantee the exercise of human rights.

In the last few years in Colombia employment agents have become more powerful, thus replacing the direct relationship between the employer and the employee. With the excuse of reducing costs and increasing profits, Colombian enterprises are hiring new staff through these intermediaries, middlemen who belong to employment agencies set up under Decree 1433 of 1983. With this method, the employer simply hires and the worker is hired out, completely eliminating the human relationship and imposing upon the worker a twofold subjection, on the one hand, to the person who gives the orders in the factory and, on the other, to the person who pays the wages.

The worker works constantly, but without any right to job security, to membership of a trade union, to the protection of collective bargaining or to exercise the right to strike. More than 40 per cent of employees in Colombia are now being employed by temporary employment agencies.

This policy is a violation of the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) and the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation), Convention, 1958 (No. 111). Convention No. 100 stipulates equal pay for equal work, whereas the temporary worker earns less than the rest of the staff. Convention No. 111 forbids discrimination in employment. Temporary workers are discriminated against in comparison with the rest of the workers.

We want prompt intervention in order for all the Conventions of the ILO ratified by Colombia to be respected, both by the Government and by employers in my country.

In my statement to the ILO last year, I drew attention to the seriousness of the world economic crisis and the need for governments to take the necessary decisions to correct the drift off course. I mentioned at that time that not only countries in the Third World were seriously affected by the crisis, but that workers in the developed world were also being affected by the contraction of the international market.

I denounced the structure of international credit, which is based on speculation and usury. I said it was the root of the ongoing pillage of the actual economy. In October 1987 the world received a warning of what the future could hold. International markets have still not recovered from the blow and measures taken by the bodies that regulate the world economy, instead of stimulating a recovery, have made the situation worse.

Unemployment and poverty will appear in every corner of the world and no country will be spared if the whole system crashes to the ground. That is why, today, world solidarity is essential as a basic principle to create a new international economic order where the principles of inequality and injustice do not prevail.

All nations should have the right to scientific and economic development without limitations. Differences of race should not be an argument to decide who can be more or less powerful. Economic power in the rich should become the basis of the development of the poorest without limiting progress through financial conditions based on usury.

Latin America is suffering from the consequences of the crisis. From our horizon, all hope of progress and economic development is vanishing little by little. In the past few years the policy of indebtedness implemented by the International Monetary Fund has led us to change from countries requiring capital into net exporters of capital abroad. Year after year, the continent as a whole pays the international bank 100 billion dollars in debt servicing and the situation has reached the point where the capacity of our countries to pay has become exhausted.

But the World Bank, instead of reacting by creating new credit lines to favour development has resorted to the process of renegotiation, country by country, thus subjecting us to a process of unprecedented inflation. What is negotiated is a reduction in health and education. Our currencies are devalued so that our products can be bought at rock bottom prices. Governments only promise economic plans that cannot be implemented because there are no real budgets. Year after year, the salaries of the workers lose their purchasing power and unemployment grows, casting millions of families into absolute poverty. Diseases such as malaria, scarlet fever and polio are recurring in the form of epidemics.

The Director-General of the ILO has said "Third World countries are estimated to have over 70 million unemployed and close to 500 million underemployed, with some 900 million living in extreme poverty" (English text, p. 10). He states that the economic inequality induced by foreign debt has caused this situation.

The International Labour Organisation could propose a world employment plan to serve as a basis for a new economic order. Only through using productively the idle hands existing throughout the world can we reactivate the economy. Industrial and technological development in the developed countries should be placed at the service of the Third World. Entire continents such as Latin America and Africa should be the centre of vast projects to endow them with rail and road infrastructures as well as the irrigation capacity they need to restore the productivity of areas as fertile as the Sahel desert used to be.

Developed countries basing themselves on a credit system with low interest rates and long-term repayments could provide employment, particularly in the productive sectors of the economy to produce the machinery and technology that the Third World needs to overcome its poverty. We in the poor countries will have to strive to abandon our scientific and technological dependence through systems of education enabling us to train researchers and inventors who will contribute to the development of science and human progress.

Quite recently, a Colombian compatriot of ours, Dr. Manuel Elkin Patarroyo, showed the world that there is creative potential in our nations, by discovering the vaccine against malaria. Thanks to this discovery, millions of human beings in the world will benefit. This Colombian scientist deserves particular recognition and he needs economic support so that he may pursue other researches of great importance in the field of health.

As was said by his Holiness John-Paul II on his recent visit to Latin America, we are trying to create a world that is of benefit to all, where governments, workers and employers work in a harmony of interests. The ILO, the forum where we all come to analyse the problems of the labour world, should shoulder the responsibility of co-ordinating a world development plan that is genuinely in the interest of all humanity.

Mr. ABOR (Minister of Labour and Social Security, Sudan) – I bring you greetings, best wishes and congratulations from the people of the Sudan, from their workers' and employers' organisations and from their Government. On their behalf, I say to you: "salam alekum wa kulu seina intum bakheir".

Mr. President, your election to the high office of the presidency of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference is of special significance to us in the Sudan and, I believe, to the rest of mankind, who have thought it wise to entrust this momentous responsibility to such an experienced and wise man.

We extend our congratulations to you because we are convinced that our affairs and problems, as well as the affairs and problems of the rest of mankind, are in safe hands where they will receive full attention and adequate care.

May I also extend my congratulations to the international community on the 40th anniversary of the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. May I further register my appreciation to the Director-General for his particularly apt choice of human rights as the subject of his Report; indeed, for many of us this is a rare commodity. The fact that he has dealt with this in his first Report is indicative of his order of priorities and personal attachment to the matter, and of his concern that human rights are not more widespread.

Please allow me to refer to the Sudan so that you may have a view of the Sudan and be able to appreciate the problems and advantages of the Sudanese people from the Sudanese standpoint.

First, the Sudanese people were able, in a mass popular uprising, to throw off the shackles of totalitarian military dictatorship and to introduce a relaxed, multi-party democracy as a system for the management of their affairs. We have a Parliament, the supreme legislature in the country, wherein members are elected by a one-man-one-vote style of selection of leaders. We have 18 political parties and 11 of them are represented in Parliament through a popular vote. There is a Government made up of a coalition of parties and parliamentary opposition to the coalition.

We have over 20 newspapers, all of them enjoying total freedom of the press. Workers' organisations and trade unions are as free as they can be anywhere in the free world. All these liberties and freedoms are embodied in the transitional Constitution of the Sudan, as we have yet to draw up a permanent law.

Regarding labour conditions in our country, the following positive steps have been taken: first, a new Trade Union Act, confirming and reinforcing freedom of association, has been enacted; second, an amendment to the current Minimum Wages Act has been adopted; third, an amendment of the Pensions Act has been adopted to provide for more favourable pension terms for the public service employees; fourth, other labour laws are undergoing favourable review, including the Social Security Act, the Individual Labour Relations Act and the Industrial Safety Act.

Concerning human resources development, continuous efforts have been made to increase the number of institutions for human resources development, especially in the areas of vocational training, technical education and management development. We place special emphasis on the education, training and skill upgrading of specific human categories such as women, youths, the disabled, the displaced and the refugees. We have, however, been confronted with serious problems of employment, underemployment and unemployment. Nonetheless, various studies have been carried out on these subjects, some in close collaboration with the International Labour Organisation. These problem areas have been given full consideration in the formulation of the Four-Year Programme for economic salvation, economic rehabilitation and development of the land.

Sudan's social and economic development strategy is currently based on the Four-Year Programme, which concentrates on human resources, planning, development and utilisation of resources. This Programme sets out to formulate and adopt a population policy which is in conformity with the social, cultural and economic conditions in the Sudan; and to adopt a labour-intensive approach to the development and rehabilitation of infrastructures and community facilities, particularly in the rural areas of the Sudan.

The preceding points are a summary of our projections for the improvement of the living conditions of all members of the Sudanese national family. We are aware that it is not as comprehensive as it might be, but it is the best we can do at the moment, given the hurdles we have so far encountered at home.

As I have mentioned "the hurdles we encounter at home", I should perhaps describe a few of them to you because you need to know, and the international community represented here also needs to know.

First, out of the recorded number of refugees in the whole world, i.e. 13 million, two-and-a-half million are in the Sudan alone. Slightly over 2 million of them are from Ethiopia. Second, there is a second category of uninvited guests now in the Sudan. They have flocked in over the years from the West African countries of Chad, Mali, Nigeria, Senegal and Mauritania. Their total number is estimated at three-and-a-half million people in the Sudan. Third, there is another category, of Sudanese nationals, whose living conditions may be even worse than those of the refugees. This may be attributed to two reasons. First of all, over the past few years, there has been a speedy advancement of the desert southwards and a constant drought. As a result, there has been no water for men and animals, no crops and no grass for the cattle. It has also led to an exodus of large populations, totalling about 2 million. They have moved into strange areas that were not prepared to receive them and brought a crisis upon our country. The second reason is that a most inhuman war is being fought in southern Sudan; a war organised, financed, equipped and directed by foreign forces for foreign interests against the Sudan, in spite of the fully relaxed Sudanese brand of democracy, unparalleled anywhere in Africa or even in the rest of the Third World.

The number of Southern Sudanese looted of all their belongings, uprooted from their homes and forced to flee en masse is about 4 million. Two million of them have fled to Northern Sudan and this number is increasing daily. An other million have left the rural areas for the district and provincial headquarters in the south.

The total number of people in wretched, sub-human conditions in the Sudan, both nationals and aliens, is easily 12 million. That is about half the total population of the Sudan. Does that not show the disastrous impact on our economic and environmental balance? On our social, cultural and moral stability? On our political and security infrastructures? The strain on our administrative and security infrastructures is massive and severe, to say the least.

We are not complaining, but we want the human community to know. Our motto in the Sudan is: my brother's problems are also mine.

I said earlier that what is most human in man is freedom per se, and to deny freedom to any man or any group of men is to dehumanise that person or those people. It is our opinion in the Sudan that apartheid in South Africa is a scheme of dehumanisation because it blatantly denies democratic freedom to the overwhelming majority of the population of South Africa. There must be something diabolically wrong in a man who thinks it right to dehumanise his fellow humans. It is therefore our opinion in the Sudan that the human family has an obligation to move to liberate the victims of apartheid and to destroy apartheid, and to have pity on the architects and the perpetrators of apartheid, to regard them as perverts and clinical cases that need to be liberated from themselves and from their domain of grievous misconceptions about themselves and about their fellow men.

The physical fact of the military occupation of a people and their territory also constitutes, in our opinion, a tragic violation of human freedom. the continued occupation of Arab lands and the violent suppression of the resisting Arab people by the people of Israel is a lamentable violation of human rights and freedom, a regrettable contradiction to the central theme of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference.

It is only 40 years ago that the people of the Jewish family suffered horrible persecutions and acts of genocide from the Nazis. The people of the world rose in sympathy and support for the Jewish people. The Nazis were crushed, along with their heinous state apparatus for the liquidation of the Jews and other victims. It was then possible to gather the remnants of the much persecuted Jewish people, and the State of Israel was set up in Palestine for them. To this day the perpetrators of those terrible crimes against the Jewish people are still being hunted for their crimes, and are still being brought to trial and adequate punishment. Is it possible then that people could have such short memories, to the extent that the Jewish people themselves could be seen to be committing similar terrible acts of violence and injustice against their unarmed Arab cousins and neighbours?

Is it not actually possible that, in another 50 years, the present Jewish perpetrators of crimes of violence against the Arabs could also be the hunted and the persecuted in Arab law courts, in the same manner that the Nazi criminals are being hunted and persecuted today in Israeli courts? I do not have any definite answer to this question, but I know for a fact that vengeance is a basic human sentiment, and in some instances it is synonymous with justice.

(Mr. Adiko takes the Chair.)

Mr. MARTOS (Employers' delegate, Hungary) - Since this is the first time I have taken the floor in this plenary session, I would like to avail myself of the opportunity to congratulate the President and all the Vice-Presidents of the Conference on their election.

I am very happy that, for the first time of the history of the Organisation, a member of a socialist government has been elected unanimously as President of a session of our Conference. I hope that in the future, this will not seem so unusual. I would like to wish the President every success in fulfilling his task. I consider it very appropriate and reasonable that the Director-General has chosen the question of human rights as the main subject of this session of the Conference. Human rights can be viewed in a wider sense, as social, political and economic rights. For the International Labour Organisation the right to work has a very special importance and so does the gradual improvement of conditions of work emphasised in the title of the Director-General's Report, the interpretation and protection of human rights is our common responsibility. Every State, regardless of its political system together with representative organs of employers and workers, is responsible for the same. To be able to work under proper conditions and with high efficiency is in everyone's interest.

The contents of human rights are changing continuously. They are closely connected with the level of political and economic development of the individual countries. Whatever the political intentions and wills are, certain rights can only be granted in the measure allowed by the performance of the economy. In our world the gap between poor and rich countries keeps on widening. No country or group of countries has the right to expropriate the contents of human rights and the related level of provisions and security, or to impose them on any other country where the level of development makes it impossible to grant the same conditions.

As a function of the social system and the level of development, human rights gain different meanings. Naturally, the importance of certain questions also differs, in the light of the social conditions in a given country.

In the course of examining the issue of human rights we should abstain from simplifications. When studying the effectiveness of human rights the state of development, in terms of achievement and backwardness, should be considered.

The Hungarian People's Republic continues to strive to guarantee human rights while promoting the democratisation of its institutional system and the openness of its politics. Our economy, however, faces difficulties. Our foreign debt is especially high; the efficiency of the economy is low; so is the rate of growth of the national income; inflation is increasing. These conditions require the consistent elaboration and implementation of political and economic reforms of high efficiency. With this aim, the Parliament has approved the Government's new programme which has introduced a value-added tax and a personal income tax. These modern systems of taxation help economic organisations and the Government to see the economic situation more clearly. Furthermore, a unified corporation tax and the modernisation of the Company Act, which dates back over 100 years, are also on the agenda of the Parliament.

These regulations will encourage "competition neutrality" on the markets, the growth of competitiveness and of economic efficiency. The intensification of economic competition and the diminution of uneconomical activities have caused much social uneasiness, which should be handled differently. Thus, the modernisation of the social security and pension system, as well as that of the means of employment policy, is essential.

A significant feature of our reform will be the major restructuring of wage policy and the wage system, to enable economic organs to regulate wages, and abandon central wage regulation.

The discrepancies between macro- and micro-level interests have to be surmounted by developing a system to reconcile interests. The State intends to achieve higher incomes, while companies operating in a competitive market will seek to minimise costs - including wages. Directives and regulations should, in our opinion, be replaced by the mechanism of reconciliation of interests, where decisions will be made by the interested parties by way of compromise. Such a mechanism would correspond to the ILO mode of operation. Therefore, we hope to rely on its experience and advice.

Let me speak briefly, as I do every year, of the Hungarian Chamber's activity. Today, there is no doubt in Hungary that after the developments of the past years the Chamber truly represents the interests of companies. The Government, takes due consideration of this fact in carrying on the reform.

The Prime Minister, his deputies and the ministers more and more frequently consult the Chamber on general and specific economic issues.

In the proposed mechanism of reconciliation of interests, bodies of different levels of the Chamber represent the interests of employers; thus, in the course of collective bargaining on wages a clear-cut and fair relation will be established with the other negotiating parties, in other words, the Government and the trade unions.

Undoubtedly, in Hungarian economic life the Hungarian Chamber of Commerce is distinctly an employers' organisation and it would be expedient if the Employers' group of the ILO - bringing an end to a dispute of several years - would make a final decision on whether or not to acknowledge the Hungarian employer representatives.

The Hungarian Chamber of Commerce - in the interest of its member companies - intervenes in all questions concerning companies and employers. Thus, we have prepared studies on the basis of our special points of view on the expected Company Act, and on the revision of the pension system, complementing the efforts of competent government organs. We are working for greater company independence and wish to strengthen the representation of interests of the company directors as employers.

Since last year's session of the Conference, our contacts with the ILO have been intensifying. In the fall of 1986 Mr. Francis Blanchard, Director-General of the ILO, while in Hungary, met with the President and leading officials of the Chamber, and exchanged views on the development of relations between the two organisations.

At the invitation of the Chairman of the State Office for Labour and Wages, an ILO expert group studied the employers' activity in the framework of an investigation regarding the employment situation.

When launching a training course, an ILO associate on mission in Hungary studied the Chamber's activity of representing and safeguarding the interests of the employers.

An integral part of our activity for renewing the Hungarian economy is the dissemination of the methods which may help to build an up-to-date economy. In this context, jointly with the State Office for Labour and Wages, we have issued an ILO publication: Payment by results.

Before concluding, I wish to emphasise that the activity of the Hungarian Chamber of Commerce is evidence of the great importance we assign to our role in representing company interests, fostering relations, and benefiting from ILO experiences.

These endeavours show that the organisation of the Hungarian employers is striving to build constructive co-operation with the ILO and with those organs which seek to achieve its aims on the basis of mutual advantage.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – We shall continue with the discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. BEN SEDDIK (Workers' delegate, Morocco) – Forty years ago, at the time of the proclamation of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and at a time when the ILO had adopted the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Moroccan workers were faced with a legal and political system which was discriminatory in the extreme. This meant that Morocco was the only country under French domination where the indigenous population was deprived of the freedom to exist or to act will regard to trade union rights, and could legally neither join trade unions nor even set up their own trade union organisations.

This fact points to the particular historical identity of our trade union movement; a movement towards organisation under a regime which, by its very nature and prohibitions, imbued us with the spirit to organise our action towards a nationalist struggle because in order to combat that nationalising the regime denied us the right to action.

In point of fact, our struggle for trade union rights became assimilated with nationalism, and this placed us among the very foremost ranks of the struggle of Moroccans for freedom; freedom we consider to be indivisible and sacred. We believe it to be the source of our feeling for organisation and for trade union activities, as of our ideals of solidarity.

Moroccan workers remember the support given to their movement, in particular by the ILO, whose Governing Body twice – on 26 June 1953 and on 11 March 1954 – had adopted unanimously the Report of the Freedom of Association Committee, calling for our right to form trade unions and our right to freedom. This support, based on the constant efforts of the ILO towards defining, promoting and defending human rights, freedom, dignity, security and well-being, had contributed in no small measure to curbing the repressive aspect of colonialism.

The Moroccan Union of Labour thus bears witness to the great value and highly important role of the concept, as well as the very action of solidarity.

The principles of freedom and solidarity were, and still remain, the very basis of our action towards achieving trade unions free of any interference by the State, by sectarian interests or by employers – a movement which should be sure of its strength and its continuity, and which organises and truly represents the workers, builds upon and supports their interests and at the same time defends and promotes those interests. The ILO has been informed of the enormous number of obstacles and persecutions which the Moroccan Union of Labour has had to endure since its inception.

As our organisation undertook to remain free, independent and authentic, our trade unionism often saw its very right to exist and to act trampled underfoot by repression aimed at dismantling and gagging it – in other words, at harnessing it.

But our will and our right to exist and to act in independence and unity were also threatened by the divisions which were manoeuvred by political groups which had no true meaning. With the interested concern of the administration, this gave rise to a number of spurious organisations which are not in any way related to trade unionism. However, there are some 14 such bodies which claim to have the status of trade unions.

This example shows us how perniciously trade union freedom can be threatened.

The Report of the Director-General to the 75th Session of the Conference far-sightedly places the question of freedom of association foremost among those themes which he explores from the lofty and noble standpoint of human rights.

The Moroccan Union of Workers is happy to note the development of the theme in the Report and fully supports the principles pertaining to the basis of trade union rights and to their fundamental objective, role and framework, as well as the means which are indispensable for their existence and for the activity of the trade union movement.

We also express our pleasure at the fact that the ILO has explicitly rejected the erroneous idea which has appeared and which, although fashionable, is both self-interested and backward, according to which the trade union movement, in the light of economic changes, seems to be losing its raison d'être. We are convinced of the contrary; we are convinced that no strategy enabling us to emerge from a crisis, be it national or transnational, can be truly effective without the active participation of the organised and representative body of labour in its formulation and implementation.

This having been said, freedom of association calls for further clarification of its principle.

The Director-General recalls rightly that "Governments...should not attempt to transform the trade union movement into an instrument for the pursuance of political aims".

We fully support this principle.

However, we consider that freedom of association is just as seriously violated when political factions make undue use of that same freedom in order to set up and multiply a number of bodies or unions. Political and economic interests, acting against the workers, hasten to endow these bodies artificially with the prerogative of representation or even negotiation which should normally belong to true and authentic trade union organisations and to them alone.

Now this is a serious infringement of any healthy social dialogue and, hence, of development. It shows a will to destroy trade union unity.

Pluralism can, in the political sphere, on the one hand, imply diversity and set standards of tolerance on the basis of democratic constitutional rules. In the trade union field, on the other hand, particularly in a country seeking true development, trade union plurality does not imply the concept of pluralism. Very often it aims only at breaking up the true trade union movement. Indeed, it is not warranted by any truly objective need. Instead it provides a crude cover for sectarian ambitions which have no plans, no future and are a source of confusion and an additional handicap to workers.

It is true that trade union unity cannot be truly imposed by any other law than that of the common will of the workers, and legislative interference in trade union activities must be rejected. However, we must similarly reject the idea that trade union independence, which is the prime condition for the unity of workers, should be attacked through political factions and interest groups.

When their objective interests so require, and as long as there is no religious or ideological ferment to divide them and they choose trade union freedom, then the workers must be protected against any artificial distinctions imposed upon their trade union movement and superimposed in the name of pluralism on the occupational fragmentation which already distorts to such a great extent the societies of the Third World countries.

Freedom and solidarity also make it our duty to mention here the questions of migrant workers, of the Palestinian workers and people, and of the workers and people of southern Africa.

Since these questions are examined from the point of view of equal opportunity and treatment in the Report of the Director-General, it appears that the ILO has not remained unaware of the fate of these workers and peoples. We thank the Director-General for having demonstrated the tragic scope of these questions and the efforts of the international organisation in this regard.

The situation in the occupied Arab territories makes a daily demand upon conscience and universal principles in order that it may be forcefully denounced and that the Israeli aggression against youth, workers and the whole Palestinian people struggling for their existence and self-determination under the leadership of the PLO may cease. The heroic and exemplary uprising of the Palestinians demands active solidarity on the part of all human beings who love freedom and progress. It is not a formal and verbal solidarity which can satisfy the conscience of those who express it that is required, but a real and active solidarity which necessarily must lead to a direct confrontation with the racist and usurping oppressor.

It goes without saying that any support and assistance which the ILO can afford to the workers and people of Palestine will lighten the yoke of the occupation and its everyday misfortunes. Nevertheless, the true solution to the tragedy resides in an end to the Zionist occupation and the recognition of the right of the Palestinian people to freedom and independence.

The same applies in Africa, where apartheid continues to prevail, and we must condemn such a system and ban it from international society.

We are also concerned about the situation of migrant workers in host countries where they – who are already the prime victims of the economic crisis – become easy and artificial preys to political competition or where discrimination infringes the dignity of these workers and tries to destabilise them.

These questions go beyond the mere aspect of equal opportunity and treatment, as stated in the Report. They warrant the greatest seriousness and render urgent the implementation of action strengthening the authority of the United Nations by substantiating within its system, as within the international trade union movement, a more active and more efficient policy of solidarity.

Interpretation from French: Mr. MILLOGO (Minister of Labour, Social Security and the Civil Service, Burkina Faso) – I would like, first of all, on behalf of the delegation of Burkina Faso, to convey my heartfelt congratulations to the President and to all the members of the Bureau of the Conference. I am firmly convinced that under their wise guidance the work of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference will proceed in excellent conditions and attain positive results.

I would also like to congratulate heartily Mr. Francis Blanchard, the Director-General of the International Labour Office, for the brilliant report he has submitted to us. The rigour, the quality and the richness of this document make it an excellent and very precious instrument of work for this 75th Session.

The agenda of the Conference calls on us to give thought to a number of themes. In behalf of my country, I would like to describe briefly our point of view on the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

The Report of the Director-General accords particular attention to the theme of human rights, as well as to the capital role of the International Labour Organisation in the pursuit of the objectives of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights through the establishment, adoption and implementation of standards on the basic freedoms of man such as freedom of association, non-discrimination in employment, the abolition of forced labour. Having noted the contradictions between the enthusiastic and unanimous adherence of member States to international standards which guarantee and protect human rights, on the one hand, and the violation of these very standards in numerous regions of the world on the other, the Report of the Director-General puts before each member State the question of ILO standards which aim at the protection of human rights; this is a very important question, one of vital importance for every man, and a problem to the extent that human rights are marked by a clash of the most diverse opinions and political positions.

It is incumbent upon us all to recognise the value and the validity of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the ILO's efforts to achieve the realisation of these rights through its standard-setting activity. However, much has still to be done. May I quote Article 1 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights: "All human beings are born free and equal in dignity and in rights. They are endowed with reason and conscience and should act towards one another in a spirit of brotherhood".

Today, what sense or meaning can a South African Black find in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, 40 years after its proclamation, if racial discrimination is raised to the level of a system of government? Does this mean that the South African Black has no dignity? That he has no reason, no conscience?

An overwhelming majority of the people of the developing countries live daily in an atmosphere of insecurity and fear for the morrow. For them human rights is still an illusion.

These are some of the questions that have yet to be answered and to which the delegation of Burkina Faso would like to draw your attention.

Despite these difficult questions which are all the more complex within the framework of different socio-economic regimes, we would like to assure you that Burkina Faso attaches considerable importance to the standard-setting activities of the ILO in the field of human rights. Indeed, international labour standards constitute a useful guide in the orientation of social action, in the formulation of labour legislation and in the constant improvement of living conditions. For these reasons my country has ratified a large number of Conventions and has committed itself to abide by them and broaden their scope of application in the future.

In this connection I would merely like to stress that since the accession to power of the Popular Front on 15 October 1987, the basic concern of the Government of Burkina Faso has been to establish a healthy social climate based on trust and loyalty, with a view to satisfying the fundamental and legitimate aspirations of our people who are anxious to live in peace and happiness.

We must not fail in our efforts. We must not remain simple spectators while thousands of people are starved and subjected to torture throughout the world. We are happy to note that the ILO has reinforced its action by intensifying its struggle against discriminatory practices in the interests of peace and progress.

I therefore wish for full success in our work.

Interpretation from Czech: Mr. KOZIK (Workers' delegate, Czechoslovakia) – I am very glad to be able, on behalf of the Czechoslovak trade union delegation, warmly to congratulate Mr. Beyreuther, from the German Democratic Republic, on his election to the post of President of this session of the Conference. I have known Mr. Beyreuther for many years, not only for his trade union experience but also for his knowledge of high-level matters, and I am sure that under his chairmanship our work will proceed in a spirit of co-operation and constructive dialogue.

The 75th Session of the International Labour Conference is taking place in a period which can leave none of us indifferent. Barely six months have passed since the signing of the Soviet-American agreements involving, for the first time in history, the elimination of an entire class of nuclear weapons. In its turn, the recent Moscow summit meeting has shown that the process of détente and disarmament is taking further, important steps. We are firmly convinced that this development will not only be such as to prevent the threat of nuclear conflict but will also make a significant contribution to solving the urgent problems facing mankind in the economic, social and labour spheres. After all, the preservation of peace is not simply a question of a ceasefire but particularly a matter of promoting social programmes and developing man's material and spiritual life. This goal can be achieved only through multilateral and everdeepening co-operation in the search for solutions to problems many of which are of concern to all of us irrespective of the region and social system in which we live. The world is characterised by a multiplicity of interrelationships and makes our common responsibility and hence the responsibility of the universal international organisations more important. If the International Labour Organisation wishes to continue to make its presence felt in these new conditions, then it will have to shed many of the attributes which tie it too closely to the past.

As we noted when considering the draft Medium-Term Plan of the ILO for the period 1990-95, the leadership of this Organisation is seriously concerned for its future. But I must say frankly that we read this draft with mixed feelings. We entirely support the four main priorities put forward in the Plan: the defence of human rights, employment promotion, and the improvement of working conditions and social security. We shall continue to regard as the principal instrument of the ILO the setting of standards which is of decisive importance for all the priority areas I have mentioned. In our opinion the prerequisite for the adoption of effective international standards and their implementation is the democratisation of all the Organisation's activities, particularly through promoting the role of the most representative and most democratic organ of the ILO, the International Labour Conference. However, so far as this goes, the draft Medium-Term Plan causes us a certain measure of doubt and concern. For many years the International Labour Conference has been, and it is still, considered, to be a genuine parliament of labour. It gives the participating delegations and their various components the opportunity to exploit their proposals and points of view to the full. In our opinion it would be unacceptable – and it might even jeopardise the future activity of the Organisation – if any attempt were made to reduce its sphere of activity or possibly replace it with other organs which would not be capable of representing the ILO in its full universality.

We have also studied with great interest the other document – the Report of the Director-General on problems of human rights. I should like to make just three very brief comments on this subject.

First of all, I should like to note with appreciation the fact that the Director-General has emphasised the interdependence and indivisibility of political and civil rights on the one hand and economic and social rights on the other. One could cite many instances from the quite recent past to show the extent to which the long-term economic crisis is depriving man not only of the right to work and adequate remuneration and other social guarantees, but how in its consequences it can deprive him of the opportunity to fully enjoy his political and civil rights, if not even the possibility of exploiting them in society.

I also welcome the fact that the Report sees the ILO's key role as supporting full employment, rejecting the view that full employment and the right to work are merely unrealistic and outmoded notions. I should like to emphasise that our delegation is one of those which considers that the adoption of an international Convention recognising and guaranteeing to the letter the right to work as one of the fundamental objectives of the ILO.

Finally, I should like to touch upon the chapter which caused us a certain disappointment, that is to say the chapter on freedom of association. We feel that there is need for a more thorough analysis of a phenomenon which is referred to elsewhere in the Report, an analysis of the reasons and consequences of the weakening of trade union organisations; this is due not only to structural changes in the economy but also to varying legislative measures and frequently even open anti-trade union discrimination. In our opinion, this is a phenomenon that should have been given far greater attention, all the more so as it is to be observed in new and promising branches of industry, even in countries with a long-standing trade union tradition. We therefore support the Resolution concerning the contribution of the ILO to the strengthening of respect for human and trade union rights, submitted by a number of trade union organisation members of the WFTU.

I am perfectly well aware that current developments in many socialist countries, including Czechoslovakia, are being followed with great interest by the world community. I should like for this reason, to touch briefly upon a number of issues connected with the changes which the restructuring of our economy is bringing to workers and the activity of their trade union organisations.

At last year's session of the Conference, I already outlined some of the changes planned which, from an economic standpoint, are considered to be the most significant taken over the past 40 years. These changes are now in full swing, with the complete participation of the trade unions. In particular, plans are afoot to strengthen the principal element of the economy, that is to say the state enterprise, which is the cornerstone of the socialist economy and entrepreneurship. However, a higher degree of independence of the enterprise involves more responsibility for the results achieved and this of course entails a certain amount of risk. In these circumstances, it is essential that the workers should have a real say in the running the affairs of the enterprise. The self-management of workers will thus become increasingly crucial for they will be entrusted with important duties, such as the power to elect the director of the enterprise. These new aspects are being tried out in a whole series of enterprises. However, it is already clear that the trade unions will retain their position, even within this new economic system and that, through the participation of their members in the autonomous administrative bodies, they will have even greater influence on the key issues of concern to their enterprise. The essential mission of the trade unions, even in these new conditions, will, however, continue to be to promote favourable living and working conditions and to defend the justified interests and needs of the enterprises.

The period which is now beginning will confront the Czechoslovak trade unions with new challenges and tasks in the field of living standards, social justice and social policy at large. These will centre on the effective exercise of the social and economic rights of citizens, particularly in the field of wages policy, employment, personal and public consumption, as well as conditions away from the workplaces. In connection with the self-financing of enterprises, there might be problems and tasks that could even generate a certain measure of local tension. The proposal to place limits on inefficient production to reduce the administrative apparatus and to carry through other structural changes will involve a major redeployment of the workforce. We have to prepare ourselves. We must not only predict the social consequences of these phenomena but also take measures likely to alleviate their impact on workers and their families. The Central Trades Union Council considers it perfectly natural that measures of this nature in the field of remuneration, work and the social sphere should be undertaken by agreement with the trade unions.

The new conditions in the economy also require new labour legislation. Last week there was an open discussion on the draft Labour Code. Of course, I cannot go into details at this point but I should like to point out that the updating of this law will give the trade union organisations a greater measure of responsibility and also open up new possibilities for them. For example, there is to be a considerable increase in the number of subjects which may be covered by collective bargaining, especially in the fields of remuneration, and these matters will also be made more legally binding. There will also be considerable changes for trade unions, in so far as trade union officials will have increased legal protection. No trade unionist or member of an industrial tribunal may be dismissed or transferred to another job without prior authorisation from the higher trade union body. This will contribute greatly towards consolidating the role of trade union officials at enterprise level, in accordance with the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98).

At the start of my statement, I emphasised the great responsibility incumbent on the ILO to tackle urgent social problems. Any progress in this direction, however, will depend to a considerable extent on conditions in the Organisation for constructive dialogue, based on the principles of equality and mutual respect. This applies not only to relations between the member organisations but also to relations between individual groups. I am firmly convinced that the positive trends which were noted in this past year will pave the way for the future activity of the ILO, and this will not only be in its own interests but will benefit the workers of the whole world.

Interpretation from Portuguese: Mr. DE JESUS (Government delegate, Angola) – I should like to share with you my feeling of satisfaction in addressing this great session of our Conference under the presidency of my friend Mr. Beyreuther, Secretary of State for Labour and Wages of the German Democratic Republic, for his election, and the Vice-Presidents, Mr. Smith, Mr. Tsujino and Mr. Adiko, whom I warmly congratulate on behalf of my Government and my delegation.

I hope that their vast experience will be decisive in the success of the work of this 75th Session of the International Labour Conference which is being held on the theme Human rights – A common responsibility.

This year the Director-General has given us for our consideration in his Report not only some ideas about the fundamental, complex and exciting theme of human rights but also details of the practical achievements within the limits of the ILO's competence as they progressively take shape.

This theme is dear to us in the People's Republic of Angola, a country in southern Africa and a redoubtable bulwark of the revolution in Africa, which has been making sacrifices in a war that has lasted for some 27 years, in order to consolidate its national independence. It is a theme that is present in all the programmes that we have carried out within the process of national reconstruction.

Our people, our party and our Government form a single whole in the sacred struggle to enable every citizen and every worker of Angola to exercise once again his political, economic, social and civil rights. The entire legal order in force in Angola is directed towards this ideal.

In implementing its human rights objectives, my country through its progressive stance has adopted an internationalist position placing at the disposal of other peoples its material, moral and political support and committing itself to the struggle against obstacles to human rights.

I am speaking of the peoples of southern Africa, Namibia, Palestine and others.

Labour is the heart of all this. Labour, we feel, is a fundamental value for man, giving its true dimension to other scales of values. Thanks to labour, man has transformed nature for his happiness. But the labour that dignifies and civilises man takes different, sometimes monstrous, forms that undermine human dignity. In other words, institutionalised or hidden slavery, forced labour, discrimination in employment, apartheid – all these are challenges for all progressive countries and the organisations of the United Nations family, and not only for us who want workers to enjoy and exercise their rights simply because they are human beings.

Now although it is true that the sacred cause of human rights must be the responsibility of all, in the political, economic, financial, social and cultural conditions of the world, it seems to me that what we must do is to commit ourselves to concrete and viable action so that under the auspices of ILO we can gradually achieve these noble ideals.

At this juncture, I should like to pay tribute to the ILO and its Director-General for the efforts made to promote and consolidate conditions for the exercise of human rights throughout the world.

We therefore note with pleasure in Part II of the Report the activities carried out by the Office to comply with the Organisation's terms of reference and the challenges of the present-day international situation, for the benefit of the well-being and progress of mankind.

As an African, I cannot fail to congratulate the ILO in particular for its co-operation programmes in the African region at a time when Africa is facing a very serious economic crisis with tragic repercussion on the social conditions of the peoples in most of its countries.

I am convinced that everyone in the ILO understands and accepts the specific attention which the ILO must pay to measures in favour of the Third World and particularly Africa. Indeed, there are shortcomings in the national technical capacity in the field of professional training, market employment, social statistics, labour administration, social security, strategy for small and medium-sized enterprises, management and planning of labour, all problems which undermine the status and effectiveness of the ministries of labour and social security. It is to be hoped that the ILO will give due attention to the training of national counterparts by international experts and advisers, which would allow not only a better development, but also a better follow-up of projects.

We also need scientific, diversified and comparative technical studies on the social and labour realities of Africa.

This is where the International Labour Review, the Social and Labour Bulletin and the Legislative Series of the ILO and other publications are so useful. However, it is also necessary to call upon African professionals and experts, trade unionists and employers, who should not hesitate to give us their thoughts and their experience in various publications, since the political decision-making bodies need these thoughts and experiences in order to take concerted action on effective global means of carrying out social policies.

I would like now to speak about labour administration in the Portuguese-speaking African countries. The administration of labour is still in its infancy since there is a distinct shortage of the necessary human and material conditions. Our priority, therefore, is the specialised training of our cadres. Co-operation between the ILO and the PALOP countries is satisfactory, but development is sometimes hindered or slowed down by various administrative obstacles. We need a constant liaison body between our country and the technical services of the ILO in order to better solve our problems and reduce the drawbacks due to geographical distances and bureaucracy.

In order to face the difficult national and international situation, my country had dedicated itself to a programme of economic and financial recovery known as SEF, to promote and stabilise economic development. But in implementing this programme, we face specific problems with social implications, requiring prior and careful work which our present organisation of labour cannot deal with unless we receive speedy, and in certain cases exceptional, international technical assistance.

In addition, I believe that the permanent monitoring of the administrative labour bodies concerning the social dimension of economic development can only take place through social institutions which are well organised and well equipped.

I give my full support to the policy of decentralisation put forward by the Director-General in order to introduce greater dynamism, efficiency and effective presence in the regions and subregions; undoubtedly, the development of a decentralised system of organisation of ILO activities will meet the concern expressed at the meeting of Ministers of Labour in Maputo last November.

As front-line countries we are satisfied with the assistance given to the liberation movements of southern Africa. This is an important ILO contribution to the defence of human dignity and human rights.

We are following keenly the PIACT programme and would like to inform you that since 1986 we have established in Angola a "National week of protection and health in labour", to which we have invited observers from other countries and from the ILO.

ILO missions have worked with us this year on questions of inspection, employment markets, social security and standards.

We should also like to ask the ILO to help us in a new training programme in Angola since we will probably need an assessment mission.

As for the activities of the International Social Studies Institute, we would like to congratulate and encourage its Director for his determination in giving practical advice in the field of social and labour policy alongside science and research. We seize this opportunity to recall the wish expressed by the delegates of the first Social and Labour Policy Course organised for the Portuguese-speaking countries in Brasilia in 1985 that the course should be held regularly in order to stimulate reflection on social questions in our countries.

In conclusion, I should like to express my agreement with the Director-General that if we cannot guarantee conditions for the exercise of human rights, it would be a lie to maintain that we wish for peace in our countries.

That is why, together with progressive nations and individuals of the world, on behalf of my Government and my delegation, I express my satisfaction and my support to the Soviet Union and the United States of America for the courageous and dynamic work being accomplished for disarmament and peace in the world.

Interpretation from French: Mr. BAILLY (representative of the Trade Unions International of Workers in the Metal Industry) – On behalf of the Trades Unions International of Workers in the Metal Industry, I would like to thank the President for giving us the possibility of participating in the work of this session. We hope that this 75th Session of the International Labour Conference will be very successful and that it will have thoughts and decisions to share with the world of labour aimed at improving the conditions of work and life of wage earners.

Our Organisation is an international professional organisation of metalworkers which represents 71 trade union organisations in 46 countries. Our organisation can be found on all continents and in the countries with a different social regime. Furthermore, we maintain friendly contacts and working relations with other organisations on the basis of an open dialogue for the defence of the interests of the metal workers.

That is why the questions that are being discussed here are of considerable interest to our Organisation. Indeed, the application of trade union rights and human rights is essential for advancing workers' rights, culminating in the ratification and implementation by all those member States that have not yet done so, of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention (No. 87) and of the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention (No. 98).

The Tenth International Conference of the unions of metalworkers which took place in 1987 in Berlin, capital of the German Democratic Republic, made a broad analysis of the situation of metalworkers in the various countries and regions of the world.

On that occasion, the participants in the Conference stressed the problems encountered by metalworkers in the practical exercise of their human rights and trade union rights.

One of the main concerns of the participants in the Conference, a concern which is strongly emphasised in the Report of the Director-General of the ILO, within the framework of human rights, is the right to work. We note that about 35 per cent of all the unemployed in the world today are workers employed in the various branches of the metal industries.

We also note that the unemployment is continually increasing. At the same time, two-thirds of the world population live below the poverty line. Unequal relations and the external debt hit the people of the developing countries the hardest.

In the developed and developing capitalist countries, unemployment, the erosion of purchasing power and social guarantees, co-ordinated deregulation, the choice of investment, and financial speculation in all its forms have but one purpose – to ensure maximum profits for possessors of capital only. These policies are pursued to the detriment of the interests of the people and the workers, among whom those in the metal industries are particularly affected. In this connection, it is essential to ensure that the millions of metalworkers who have lost their employment following restructuration in the various branches of their industry should be able to find another job.

According to the forecasts of the ILO, between now and the year 2000, it will be necessary to create a billion productive jobs, mostly in the developing countries, if we want to achieve universal full employment. We solemnly assert that the situation of the workers is not predestined.

Article 23 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, adopted 40 years ago, which stipulates that everyone has the right to work, to free choice of employment, to just and favourable conditions of work and to protection against unemployment, is still in practically the entire capitalist world, a right yet to be attained.

These preoccupations are those of many national, regional and international trade union organisations.

A whole series of contemporary economic and social problems could be solved if the resources now being wasted on the arms race were transferred to finance economic and social development programmes. The last summit meeting between the Soviet Union and the United States has confirmed that this could be done.

Priority should be given to the satisfaction of needs, the creation of jobs for the unemployed, the solution of the terrible problem of underemployment and the adoption of measures to full human resources in the struggle against poverty and hunger, to reabsorb the external debt of the developing countries and to protect the environment.

Unfortunately, the offensive of the monopolies in the arms race, and their attempts to dominate in the social, economic and political spheres run counter to the interests of the workers.

This offensive is a destabilising factor in international economic and political relations.

Transnational corporations exercise a strong influence over countries' political, economic and social options by creating relations of dependency. They attempt to interfere in the internal affairs of numerous States.

In this context, we fully support the principle enshrined in the Constitution of the ILO that universal and lasting peace can be established only if it is based on social justice, which is inconceivable without the effective exercise of freedom of association.

Metalworkers' trade unions have found, in many countries, that they have to face a joint and co-ordinated policy on the part of the employers, supported by the capitalist governments, the purpose of which is to jeopardise the very existence and activity of the unions. Everywhere the employers attack the rights of the metalworkers which have been attained after years of struggle. They do not hesitate to use all the repressive measures available to them against the workers and their unions.

In countries where there is a military regime, and those where militarism plays a dominant role, employers have recourse to the brutal intervention of the police and the army. Physical repression is organised; many workers and militants are imprisoned without trial and tortured, and some are even murdered.

In capitalist countries, workers and militants are penalised, dismissed, dragged before the courts, imprisoned and fined. The repression of workers and their unions is intensifying, resulting in numerous victims.

In many countries, trade union activity is increasingly considered to be illegal; while militants and wage earners are likened to criminals.

In these circumstances, we call upon the ILO to actively defend the basic individual and collective rights of workers, and of metalworkers in particular.

We would like to draw your attention to the fact that, in the present-day world, the socialist countries are the most advanced in safeguarding and enforcing the rights of workers in the economic, social, political and cultural fields. A useful discussion and practical work are underway with a view to enlarging the role of the trade unions in the advancement of society. The implementation of socialist democracy makes it possible to develop the active and constructive participation of workers and trade unions in all spheres of national life.

As is pointed out in the Report of the Director-General of the ILO, "efforts to secure the enjoyment of human rights involve the entire international community" but the realisation of these efforts depends in large measure on national activities.

Our international union reaffirms that the trade union movement is a tool in the struggle to emancipate the development of the individual and the community. It is the basis on which wage earners can be together and one of the basic components of democracy in the organisation of society. That is why our international union, in accordance with the standards and Recommendations of the ILO, supports the recognition of the right to organise in trade unions and the right of collective bargaining, particularly at the level of transnational corporations; the independence of trade unions and the non-interference of employers in their internal affairs; the elimination of all intervention or control of trade unions by public authorities or state bodies; the full enjoyment and free exercise of the right to collective bargaining against compulsory arbitration; legislative guarantees relating to the right to strike, including general, solidarity or protest strikes and the elimination of all restrictions on that right; a total ban on lock-outs; the right of trade unions to participate in the elaboration of labour legislation, in political, economic and social decision-making and in the implementation of development strategies; the abolition of all legislative provisions or measures preventing or restricting the development of international trade union relations, international trade union solidarity and affiliation to international organisations; the elimination of all forms of anti-trade union repression and of all discrimination as regards affiliation to trade unions and union activities; observance of international labour Recommendations and Conventions of the ILO relating to trade union rights by employers and governments; a ban on any professional interdictions; and the eradication of the regime of apartheid and of racism in all its forms.

Our International Union hopes that all the means that are available to the ILO will be placed at the disposal of the workers and people. The standards and Recommendations established by the ILO are a positive support in many fields. We hope the ILO as a tripartite organisation will find the ways and strength to ensure respect for these norms.

Our International Union associates itself with all trade union organisations which fight for the realisation of trade union rights and human rights. We associate ourselves with all those who strive for a life of peace and freedom.

COMMUNICATION BY THE PRESIDENT TO THE CONFERENCE

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – Before I give the floor to the next speaker, I would like to make the following communication. This morning I received a letter from the Ambassador of the Permanent Mission of Jamaica in Geneva. I call on the Clerk of the Conference to read this communication.

The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE – The letter is in English, dated 9 June 1988, and reads as follows:

Excellency,

It is with much regret that I have to inform you that the Honourable J.A.G. Smith, Minister of Labour, Jamaica, and Government Vice-President of the Conference, has had to return to Jamaica on urgent official business.

The nature of the business is such that the Minister could not foresee its early resolution which would allow him to return to the Conference to carry out the important duties for which he was elected. He has therefore requested me to advise you that regrettably he has no option but to resign from the office of Vice-President.

The Honourable Minister has asked me also to convey to you his sincerest apologies for not having had the opportunity to inform you personally of this unforeseen development.

Please accept, your Excellency, the assurances of my highest consideration.

(Signed) Antony HILL
Ambassador, Permanent Representative of Jamaica

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – You have heard the contents of this letter. The Government group will therefore have to meet as soon as possible to nominate a new Vice-President. Further information will be provided in due course.

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND OF THE

Interpretation from Chinese: Mr. FANG (Workers' delegate, China) – May I congratulate the President on his election to the presidency of this session of the International Labour Conference. I am sure that under his guidance and that of the Vice-Presidents, this session will fulfill its task successfully.

The Director-General, in his report, focuses his attention on the problems of human rights and trade union rights. These are the issues of common concern to the international community. Looking back, we are glad to note that for several decades the International Labour Organisation has done much to safeguard workers' rights and interests through its standard-setting activities and by providing technical co-operation.

Great changes have taken place in the international community in the past 40 years since the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the ILO's Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87). The overwhelming majority of countries subject to enslavement in the past have already attained their independence and sovereignty. The international community increasingly condemns and discards the practice of encroaching upon the sovereignty and territories of independent countries, interfering in the international affairs of other countries, denying other people's dignity and attempting to decide the destiny of others. It has become an urgent desire for the people of the world to free themselves from poverty and unemployment, and to promote economic development and prosperity. In the new era, the concept of human rights has expanded to encompass democracy, freedom for individuals, the rights of everyone to work, rest and social security, the independence and sovereignty of the State, as well as national self-determination and economic development.

Obviously, safeguarding human rights requires a peaceful environment. The realisation of human rights cannot but encounter serious obstacles in a society where there is turmoil and injustice.

Here I would like to mention the apartheid policies of the South African authorities. This barbarous system of racial discrimination and encroachment upon trade union rights, not only denies the basic human rights of the South African Black people, but also constitutes a threat to peace and stability. At the same time I would also like to draw attention to the human rights of the Palestinian people. In the past 20 years, the economic, social and trade union rights of the Palestinian people in the occupied territories have been wantonly encroached upon. The arrest, imprisonment, beating and shooting of young people, women and children occur time and again. Human rights are not in the least ensured. We firmly support the South African people in their just struggle against apartheid and for racial equality; we support the Namibian people in their just struggle for national independence. We strongly demand that sanctions be imposed on South Africa. We firmly support the Palestinian and other Arab peoples in their just struggle against Israeli aggression and expansion, and their struggle for the restoration of the national rights of the Palestinian people.

We also note with anxiety that the economic gap between the rich and poor countries has been widening, and that unemployment and poverty are pervasive in most parts of the world. At present, the world's unemployed population has surpassed one-tenth of the world's total, dashing the hopes of so many for the right to work and a higher living standard. The only way to change this situation is to promote economic development. This not only requires all countries to work out policies suitable to their own conditions, but imposes on the international community the need to make joint efforts to alter the existing unfair international economic order.

Since the ILO has promoted multilateral co-operation in the economic and social fields and done a lot of work in carrying out technical and vocational training, we hope that it will continue to make contributions to counter poverty and unemployment.

Since the founding of the new China the rights of the Chinese people have been enshrined in the Constitution. The socialist system guarantees the rights of the people as masters of the State. At present China is accelerating its policy of reform and opening up to the outside world. The aims of the reform are to boost social productivity, incessantly to improve the people's material and cultural life, to strengthen socialist democracy and the legal system, and to promote the building of socialist culture and ideology. Reforms provide effective guarantees for the vast majority of the people to enjoy all kinds of material and legal rights.

Trade unions are the most important mass organisations in our country. They are playing an increasingly important role in the reform. They participate in formulating plans for social and economic development, and drafting laws, decrees, regulations and policies concerning the vital interests of workers. For example, trade unions take an active part in drafting reform plans such as the reform of the labour system, the wage system, social security, the price system, the distribution of houses and housing rents, as well as the system of enterprise leadership. They organise workers to exercise supervision in the course of the implementation of these reforms. The workers' rights are safeguarded through participation. During the reform, the Workers' Congress Regulation and the Enterprise Act were promulgated in 1986 and in April of this year, respectively. The trade unions participated in the drafting work and solicited the opinions of vast numbers of workers and trade unionists. The Enterprise Act explicitly stipulates that, with enterprise directors assuming full responsibilities for enterprises, workers and staff members should support their directors or managers in their lawful functions. Furthermore, the Enterprise Act establishes the right of workers, as masters of the enterprises, to participate in the democratic management of enterprises. The Act stipulates that the main form of workers' participation in the democratic management of enterprises shall be the Workers' Congress. It has the following functions: to discuss and examine any important decisions of the enterprises; to discuss and decide on the welfare of the workers and staff; to criticise and supervise directors or managers and other leaders at lower levels of the enterprise. A series of regulations on the rights of workers and staff members, embodied in the Enterprise Act, provides legal guarantees for them.

To play a better role in the socialist modernisation drive in China, the Chinese trade unions are carrying out a process of self-reform. Trade union reforms focus on economic development as the central task, and stress the defence of the specific interests of workers, while safeguarding the overall interests of all citizens. Trade unions will carry out their work independently and advance towards a real democratic organisation of the masses.

Meanwhile, trade unions adopt various forms of workers' education such as occupational training and further training, to upgrade the workers' skills and promote their ideological, cultural and technical qualities so as to ensure that the workers of our country can play a greater role in the reforms and the modernisation drive, while fully enjoying all kinds of rights and benefits.

Human rights are closely linked to peace and development. The people of the world hope that peace will be defended, and that all who are able to work will have greater opportunities to contribute to economic development and social progress. We hope that the joint efforts of the workers and peace-loving people of the world will put an end to atrocities, to the deprivation of basic human rights and the violation of the legitimate rights of nations.

China stands for equality among all countries, big or small, rich or poor, weak or strong and for the non-bullying of others and the non-interference in the internal affairs of other countries.

We hope that the objectives embodied in the ILO Constitution and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights will be truly realised through the joint efforts of the people of the world.

(Mr. Tsujino takes the Chair.)

Interpretation from Portuguese: Mr. ROSSI (Employers' delegate, Brazil) – May I congratulate the President on behalf of the employers of Brazil. We are sure that under his wise guidance the work of this session of the International Labour Conference will meet, once again, with full success.

The Director-General of the ILO has very appropriately chosen human rights as the theme of his yearly report, in honour of the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Human rights is a delicate and controversial, but topical, problem. From time immemorial man has sought to secure and defend his rights, forging his customs and the laws governing social coexistence. His original aim was to define and refine social structures through laws which would submit all individuals to the specific mechanisms of the society of the era.

As a direct consequence of this tendency, social institutions came into being: government, religion, marriage and many others. Then appeared trade laws, property rules, and the repression of acts which could disrupt the social fabric. New precepts served to strengthen social solidarity. But it would be illusory to believe that principles of special order were intended to protect human rights. Their objective was not man as such, but society, and the need to achieve its stability, security and progress.

The ancient civilisations developed on the basis of these principles. The individual had no choice but to abide by prevailing customs, habits and laws or face expulsion from the community. His work and his efforts were tributes paid to a society which agreed to accept him, but which required in exchange a heavy burden of obligations and duties.

The fragmentary legislation of ancient times clearly shows that the protection of human rights was weak, timid and inefficient because legal statutes aimed only at peace and the security of society. The total submission of man to the constituted authority, as reflected even in the smallest details of life, enables us to state that man in ancient times did not truly enjoy individual freedom.

This situation did not evolve much in the Middle Ages, when men began to feel the injustice of the feudal system.

The institution of the constitutional State then took place in a political framework marked by two extraordinary historical events of the eighteenth century – the American Declaration of Independence and the French Revolution.

In those days, the idea of the rights of a human being was closely linked to the struggle for greater political participation by the people, and to the struggle against social inequality. Thus, a model of the State was conceived, based on law, and forged in such a manner as to afford the individual the possibility of participating in the sovereign will of his country, thus ending the relation of perpetual subservience binding man to the State. The State was no longer the alpha and omega of individuals. It was brought down from its throne to serve man.

Certain documents of the time, such as the American Declaration of Independence of 1776 and the Bill of Rights for the first time proclaimed certain inalienable and fundamental rights of the human being, such as the right to enjoy life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness, and the right to own property.

Since then these new humanistic values have gradually been incorporated in the internal legislation of our modern countries. Today, the protection of human rights is widely recognised by the various declarations of principles, by constitutional texts, by law and by jurisprudence.

Today, it is perfectly clear that the aim of legislation is not a threat to the individuality of any person. On the contrary, laws to protect society and laws to protect the individual are but two sides of the same coin, provided the citizen respects the limitations imposed by legislation to which he is subjected.

Where efforts to safeguard human rights were once limited to purely political aspects, they subsequently assumed a much wider scope to include social rights, economic rights and cultural rights, as well as the right to security, work, education, scientific progress and so on.

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights, engendered by the horror of the barbaric acts of the Second World War, represents one of the most beautiful and complete enunciations of the principles of human rights. Within this framework we have the principles of free enterprise, which is the fundamental basis for the economic, social and political development of peoples, as a primordial condition for the existence of a democratic, fair and pluralist society.

As stated by the Director-General, the activities of the ILO, in one way or another, are linked with human rights. Nevertheless, these activities have always been geared primarily towards the protection of workers, while the defence of free enterprise, the source of productive employment, has come second.

The Preamble to the ILO Constitution states that universal and lasting peace can be established only if it based on social justice. This reflects the ongoing commitment of the ILO to fight untiringly against injustice and to enhance the human dignity of all individuals, as well as their equal and inalienable rights which constitute the basis of freedom, justice and peace in the world. Indeed, it is only in a system of free enterprise and market economy that there can be a guarantee of full freedom. That is why the principles of free enterprise must be defended, stimulated and strengthened.

The International Labour Conference, as well as the regional conferences of the ILO, have already produced innumerable documents concerning the protection of human rights. For example, I could mention Conventions Nos. 29, 105, 100, 122, 144.

The question of freedom of association, to which the Report of the Director-General devotes an entire chapter, is of great importance within the activities of the ILO.

The existence of representative and freely constituted trade unions contributes to the cause of civil and political rights because it allows freedom of expression and association. The existence of trade union organisations further perfects the democratic nature of the member States by enabling workers and employers to engage in dialogue among themselves and with government. Moreover, they collaborate in seeking solutions for economic and social problems affecting every country. From this point of view, as was mentioned in the Director-General's Report, the independence of the trade union movement is fundamental in order to foster social progress; and precisely for this reason, the trade unions should not serve as instruments of government in the pursuit of political objectives.

Labour is not a commodity, as recognised by the Declaration of Philadelphia. In the final analysis, employment policy is necessarily dependent on the general orientation which each country gives to its economic policy, and its efficiency is determined by the extent to which government accelerates the process of privatisation by reducing the State's role as employer and by extending the economic scope of the private sector; by the extent to which government stimulates the creation of new enterprises, especially small and medium-sized enterprises, and reduces public expenditure.

The right to suitable remuneration and prosperity emanates from powerful economic activity. This is the only way of addressing the structural problems of each State Member and enabling it to create new employment.

When we speak of the enjoyment of social and economic rights as guaranteed by the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and other international instruments, we fully agree with the Director-General.

We cannot see the issue as a whole if we overlook the negative context of the world economy which for many years has been strangled by a persistent crisis, which is the cause of many evils, such as underdevelopment, poverty and unemployment.

The absence of an economic order based on international solidarity is responsible, in large measure, for the low rates of growth of many African, Asian and Latin American countries which are suffering from the staggering expansion of their populations and from notorious imbalances in their labour markets.

We believe there could be a political will at the international level in order to reverse this unfortunate trend. Solidarity will be exercised through frank dialogue among nations and through closer collaboration in their political, commercial and scientific relations. Covering this road on a tripartite level, the ILO has enhanced the values of harmony and co-operation with a completely modern vision which aims not only at preserving social structures or the objectives of legal statutes from mankind's past. Today, the ultimate goal is Man, and the realisation of his aspirations, his longings, his dignity and his individual freedom.

Interpretation from German: Mr. MEINEL (representative of the Trade Unions International of Public and Allied Employees) – May I begin by congratulating the President on his election to his high office and to wish him success in his work.

I have the honour to speak on behalf of the Trade Unions International of Public and Allied Employees, an organisation which brings together more than 38 million trade unionists from all areas of public service, from all regions of the world and from all economic and social systems.

Ove 65 per cent of our member organisations are at work in developing countries.

We have taken note with keen interest and close attention of the Report of the Director-General. Allow me to confine my remarks on the Director-General's Report and on the ILO Medium-Term Plan to the aspects that concern the civil service and public services sector which undoubtedly deserve the close attention of the participants in the 75th International Labour Conference, particularly since one employee in four works in that sector.

We welcome the fact that the Director-General's Report addresses in detail the common responsibility for all human rights, that is to say both basic human rights and trade union rights and freedoms, dealing with them in a comprehensive manner and not in isolation from political, economic and social problems.

A similar approach also marked the 8th International Congress of Public Service Employees which recently took place in Sofia, and whose delegates and guests took their decisions on behalf of over 51 million organised employees from 85 countries, and with the participation of 21 international and regional organisations including the ILO.

In accordance with the decisions of that Congress, we should like particularly to emphasise the direct connection between human rights to education and work and the most fundamental human right to life and peace. As trade unionists, we consider that our aspirations to social security, trade union rights to organise and engage in collective bargaining in all areas of the public service, would lose all meaning in the atomic age if war and weapons should lead mankind to the brink of a nuclear disaster. There can be no doubt that disarmament would release resources for education, job creation and the introduction of a system of social security that would make it possible to guarantee the most basic human rights, from which two-thirds of mankind are still excluded. Accordingly, as trade unionists, we call for the conversion of the arms industry to civilian production. We call for practical measures of nuclear, chemical and conventional disarmament. And for this reason, we emphatically welcome the historic agreement whose implementation will, for the first time in history, lead to the destruction of a whole class of nuclear weapons. We welcome the proposals contained in the Six-Power initiative and the initiative by the German Democratic Republic for an international conference to be held on nuclear-free zones. This conference is to be held shortly in East Berlin, in the German Democratic Republic.

We believe it would have been desirable if the Report of the Director-General had attached more importance to these important aspects since the relations between human rights, peace, disarmament and the new international economic order are a reality, to deny which would have dire consequences such as hunger, poverty, inadequate health care, an anti-social policy, to the benefit of the arms budget, and other global problems with which mankind is today confronted.

We find it incomprehensible that the ILO Medium-Term Plan, despite the responsibility it has in the socio-economic aspects of disarmament, provides for not one pertinent activity. More ILO commitment in this area would be a genuine contribution to social security, justice, peace and progress and would be in keeping with the preservation of basic human rights.

Speaking of human rights, the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), which was adopted 40 years ago in San Francisco, must be regarded as having the utmost significance. Convention No. 87 and the struggle for its implementation have undoubtedly led to positive changes in the world of labour, and have increased the opportunities for collective representation of the workers' interests by trade unions.

We believe that this 40th anniversary of the adoption of Convention No. 87 provides an opportunity to honour the ILO's contribution to its implementation. In many cases, our Trade Union International and other trade union organisations have been able to help trade union activists effectively on the basis of this Convention in the struggle to advance their legitimate interests.

However, we are also well aware that Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 and the Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention (No. 151), continue to be infringed in many countries and have still not been ratified by many governments. Governments are still making use of legal, military and racist measures in order to undermine the rights of workers and their trade unions and to prevent the implementation of the Conventions.

Trade unionists are liquidated, imprisoned, tortured, their organisation prohibited and their resources confiscated or destroyed.

We are all familiar with the situation in South Africa, in Chile or in the Israeli occupied Arab territories. But in other countries, too, it may be seen that laws and measures are being applied whose purpose is to reduce or even to eliminate the influence of trade unions in the civil and public service and in other areas. This often happens in connection with the introduction of greater flexibility into labour relations or the privatisation of parts of the civil and public service in order to create trade union-free institutions to destroy the right to collective bargaining and thereby make more difficult or even impossible the activity of trade unions as collective representatives of the workers' interests.

Unfortunately, these phenomena are not only to be observed in countries where dictatorship and violence are used to secure those in power against the will of the majority of the population. Even in countries that have enjoyed democracy for years, repressive measures are increasingly being used against trade unionists and their organisations. In Great Britain, the assets of trade unions have been confiscated; in Spain, on 17 May this year, the Secretary of State for Public Administration suspended the trade union rights of the workers' committees in connection with the granting of time off to do trade union work. The justification offered for this decision was that the trade unions were not prepared to sign an agreement which would have led to a reduction in the purchasing power of public servants. Trade union officials were even threatened with dismissal. Meanwhile, this particular infringement of Convention Nos. 87 and 135 has been settled. It is gratifying in this instance that those responsible have recognised trade unionists as valid representatives, even though differences of view persist on certain issues.

However, we are resolutely opposed to any measure of repression against the trade unionists on workers' committees in this regard. We hope the problems will be completely solved on the lines indicated by the President of the Government of Spain in his speech to the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference.

It should be emphasised that there is an obligation and a responsibility for all democratic forces to resist even more energetically the increasing infringements of human and trade union rights, especially in the civil and public service, and to restore trade union rights in all areas and at all levels.

In this connection, our Trade Union International attaches central importance to the standard-setting activities of the ILO, including the question of employment promotion and social security, since mass unemployment and social insecurity demonstrably create fertile soil for continuing infringement of human and trade union rights.

And beyond this, we take the view that the supervision of the implementation of Conventions Nos. 87, 98, 135 and 151 must continue to be given special attention by the competent organs of the ILO.

In this connection, we welcome the holding of the Fourth Session of the Joint Committee on the Public Service of the ILO in November this year. We understand that the ILO has to make savings, but we believe that the already meagre activities of the ILO in the area of the public service should not be reduced still further. This is particularly true for the Fifth Session of the Joint Committee and the discussion of the problems of employees in health services, fire departments and women employees in our sector.

In conclusion, may I draw your attention to the fact that in most countries of Africa, Asia and Latin America the situation of public service employees and civil servants and the population at large has undergone dramatic deterioration; elementary services cannot be guaranteed; poverty, hunger, homelessness and attacks on trade union rights are on the increase. This situation is often the consequence of the established priorities of national, economic and social policy. It is, however, above all a consequence of the existing international economic relations, of the anti-social and anti-democratic conditions imposed by the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank and other international financial institutions. This situation gives most developing countries no opportunity to carry out their national development programmes and this includes the development programme for the civil and public service. On the contrary, their foreign debts and debt servicing have reached proportions that severely hamper any national development or even make it impossible and actually put development into reverse. We emphasise this because we believe that the question of human and trade union rights at the end of the twentieth century cannot be addressed in isolation from the global problems now confronting mankind. I am referring to issues such as the maintenance of peace, the achievement of disarmament, development, the solution of the debt crisis, the protection of our environment, which need to be considered in direct connection with the exercise of human and trade union rights. The complexity of these problems underscores the fact that today no country and no international organisation, whether it be our Trade Union International or the International Labour Office, is in a position to carry out effective measures on its own in the interests of human and trade union rights. What is required is international co-operation in the framework of the ILO and beyond its walls. What is required is the joint effort of all democratic forces and organisations in the interests of the preservation of human rights in all regions and in all countries of the world.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. MONTT BALMACEDA (Employers' delegate, Chile) – I should like to extend my most cordial congratulations to Mr. Beyreuther on his well-deserved election as President of the 75th International Labour Conference.

Once again, the Director-General, Mr. Francis Blanchard, has submitted for discussion to this Assembly an excellent study of the greatest interest, on this occasion the first part of his Report Human rights – A common responsibility, a subject matter which is rich in both content and suggestions. As he points out quite rightly in the introduction to this text, “although the term ‘human rights’ is not specifically mentioned as such in the ILO Constitution, the concept underlies all the activities of the Organisation; indeed, the ILO was the first to proclaim the indivisible character of human rights which encompass, without distinction, civil and political rights and economic, social and cultural rights”. We shall refer to these words again at the end of our statement.

Now, as concerns the ILO proper, we are rightly reminded in the Report of the Director-General of the text of the Declaration of Philadelphia, according to which freedom of expression and association is essential for constant progress. Freedom of association, I think we should add, is nevertheless acquiring different ways and means of application as time goes on, according to the requirements of each international community to which it is applicable.

On more than one occasion we have indeed emphasised from this rostrum the most significant duty which the Employers' Association in Latin America has today, to participate in the social and economic development of the continent.

It is with satisfaction that we have also on more than one occasion noted that, as in the case of Chile, the response of our employers to this legitimate requirement is becoming ever more favourable. Thus, for example, in addition to the dedicated and constant work of social development, undertaken already many decades ago by the Chile National Society of Agriculture, the oldest of our employers' organisations, whose 150th anniversary we are celebrating just now, we must also mention the ongoing efforts of the Society for the Promotion of Manufacturing, the largest representative body of the industrial sector in the field of technical professional education, vocational training, housing for workers, health, etc., and the ongoing action of the National Mining Company, the National Chamber of Commerce, the Chilean Chamber of Construction, the Association of Banks and Financial Institutions along similar lines, and a wide spectrum of employers' organisations in Chile, represented through the Confederation of Production and Trade, our main organisation, whose work in employment programmes has been widely disseminated in the various media of the ILO.

Thus, we enthusiastically support the ILO programmes for Latin America aiming at giving assessment, guidance and help to our employers' organisations on the continent and their action along these lines.

Then there is the right of association, not only to defend the specific interests of those they represent, but in this case also constitute an important factor in the collaboration of the corresponding bodies in national development.

I would go further. Such contributions would be even slighter, or completely non-existent if at the same time the enterprises affiliated to these organisations were idle. But on the contrary, in Chile today we are witnessing flourishing economic activity, especially vigorous during the past five years, where the private enterprises are playing an ever greater role. It would take too long to refer in detail to the main features of this positive phenomenon, which a distinguished Chilean economist has rightly called our “silent revolution”.

But a brief outline of this would nevertheless lead us to emphasising, inter alia, together with progressive debureaucratisation and the positive attitude of the employers which we see growing today among new generations of Chileans, the notable modernisation of agriculture and the literally explosive increase in exports. Take, for example, the field of agricultural production, where we had 25-fold increase between 1973 and 1986, whereas copper, which in 1973 represented 80 per cent of our exports, today represents only 40 per cent of the same; and whereas in 1971 Chile only exported 412 different commodities to 58 countries, today it exports 1,343 products to 112 countries. Meanwhile, 798 exporting companies have joined the Chilean economic process in the past two years, whereas between 1973 and 1986, the number of these enterprises tripled.

"Economic policy can no longer be an end in itself. It is only a means to achieving social objectives", said President F. D. Roosevelt when he spoke in 1941 to the International Labour Conference. These were wise words from that notable statesman and specially significant in this Organisation. Today we recall these words in order to say that this process aims quite rightly, at general progressive well-being; so when faced with the undeniable improvement in the quality of life that we are experiencing in Chile today, we must also add to this the significant increase in the purchasing power of salaries. Never before in our country have we had such new and interesting formulas as "ownership of capital" or direct contributions by enterprises to the improvement of training, special coupons for the family support, sporting and cultural events and so on.

Thus certain companies, some private, some being privatised, have a significant number of their workers who are shareholders: 12 per cent in SOQUIMICH, 31 per cent in the Steel Company of the Pacific, 27 per cent in Chilectra Metropolitana, and so on. The process is going on. A recent study of the Confederation of Production and Trade concludes that in 1986, for each peso paid in wages, private enterprise contributed 1.11 additional pesos to improve the general quality of life of its workers.

For many years now Chile has been the subject of severe criticisms in the international community. I would like to make my own modest contribution to rebutting this. Chile has an area of 2,006,626 square kilometres and over 11 million inhabitants. Chile speaks the beautiful language of Castilla and has received two Nobel Prizes for literature. It has been independent for 180 years. Its per capita income is increasing day by day. In other words, the real Chile is far better than it is seen by many in the remainder of the world today.

Of course, it is not an earthly paradise. But what country is? It has not been the custom, because it is not our duty for Chilean Employers' delegates at session of the Conference to refer from this rostrum to current political, international or internal situations in our country. Chile is in the forthcoming months approaching a very relevant moment of its institutional evolution according to its Constitution. Therefore, I could not fail on this opportunity to refer, very briefly, to some concerns which affect the sector that I represent.

Our Director-General has rightly reminded us in various chapters of his Report, explicitly or implicitly, of the principle of indivisibility, unity and mutual inter-relationship which should govern the various specific fundamental rights of the human being. In addition to these rights, we also call today for the inclusion of legitimate "freedom of enterprise" as an inherent part of human nature. We should never again wish to see this brutally eliminated in Chile, as we have in the past. For its better realisation, we envisage freedom of enterprise as being fully integrated with other political and civil rights, but neither can we envisage the one without the other, neither can exist in isolation. Together, they supplement each other within an institutionality based on justice.

Freedom of enterprise, in a world which demands ever more in the way of welfare and, therefore, creativity, is today being readopted by many great powers, some worthily represented in this assembly, tired, perhaps, of ideologies and bureaucracies as the main key to progress. Freedom of enterprise, indeed, makes us more human because it involves risks and challenges, which are so inherent to the best parts of our life.

In the extreme south-west of Latin America, between the Andes and the immensity of the Pacific, the Chilean entrepreneurs tempered by many decades of vicissitudes but today being reborn in their impetus to create, are looking to you, to collaborate with all of you without exception, in a world ever more united for the greater well-being of your countries and of Chile.

Mr. van LEEUWEN (representative of the International Federation of Free Teachers' Unions) – First of all, I should like wholeheartedly to congratulate the President on his election by this assembly. I also wish to congratulate the Director-General on the Report he has presented to the session. You will not be astonished that our organisation, the International Federation of Free Teachers' Unions, which represents 6 million teachers all over the world, is particularly satisfied that the Director-General has devoted this year's Report to the issue of human rights. It is our organisation's main objective to promote and protect these rights through both trade union action and education. We consider it of great importance that again attention is drawn to the fact that all ILO work is related to the common standard of achievement set for all peoples and nations in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. It is unfortunate, however, that in 1988 governments still need to be reminded of this Universal Declaration and their moral obligation to respect basic human rights. In many countries economic, political and religious doctrines still remain obstacles to the full application of international human rights standards.

In the introduction to his Report, the Director-General quite rightly notes that "the achievement of human rights is an integral part of efforts to secure man's material well-being and spiritual development" and that in this sense "economic development cannot be separated from social development". In other words, it does not pay to restrict basic freedoms, to deny human rights: there are no economic or political benefits. On the contrary, the suppression of people, whatever form it takes, is bound to backfire both economically and politically. Many examples from the past and the present support this view and show also that nations which comply with international human rights standards perform much better – in almost every field – than those which impose restrictions. You might say that the Universal Declaration is not only a moral standard but also some sort of "self-help guide" to social progress and accompanying economic growth.

This Conference is held at a time of spectacular changes, some of which bring hope for the future. In my address to this assembly in 1984 I felt compelled to express my organisation's deep concern over efforts of certain nations to reform the composition, jurisdiction, authority and procedures of the ILO control mechanisms. At that time we had reasons to believe that these efforts were motivated by the unwillingness or alleged inability of these nations to comply with international labour standards. Today we note a quite different tendency: suspicions are fading, attitudes are changing and the Director-General has returned from Moscow with hopeful news. As far as we are concerned, no better moment could have been chosen to address this report to international labour standards and human rights.

The recognition or denial of trade union freedoms and human rights is not only an issue of friendly or hostile governments. It is also, and perhaps first of all, a matter of awareness among people, among the individual members of our societies, of the absolute and immutable values that these rights and standards represent. I do not have to explain that teachers, and the field in which they work, education, represent a tremendous potential for imparting these values, imparting them to future generations and for teaching the techniques to promote and protect them.

Our Organisation considers the promotion of human rights education one of its major tasks. It is satisfying to notice that millions of classroom teachers are indeed actively involved in this kind of education activity, despite the many difficulties which they encounter, including repressive measures taken by those authorities that fear the powerful effects of such education. A good – or bad, if you want – example of course, is that of South Africa where teachers, students and parents a few years ago started developing the so-called “people’s education” concept. The South African Government, realising that if schools would start to educate against apartheid, the resistance and opposition to their racist policies would spread, responded hard and ruthlessly. Meetings to discuss “people’s education” were forbidden and its initiators, among whom were many teachers, were arrested and detained. Yet, the people’s education movement in South Africa flourishes, schools have become tools to combat apartheid and, as a result, opposition and resistance against the White minority regime have grown.

In Chile, we also see that teachers are making every possible effort to make education a vehicle for democracy. There too the authorities respond harshly. Some time ago the Chilean Government simply fired thousands of teachers many of whom played an active role in the struggle for democracy. Our Organisation has filed a complaint against this measure, one which is currently under ILO consideration. Only a few weeks ago members of a local branch of the Chilean teachers’ union in the provincial town of Iquique were, while in a meeting, arrested after police forces had harassed them and damaged their building.

Nobody doubts the importance of human rights education; nobody doubts the significant role our schools play in the combat against oppression, inequality and poverty; nobody doubts the significant contribution of education to social progress and economic growth. On the contrary, we all have high expectations of our school systems and their ability to lay the basis for a better society in the future. Yet the people who have to do the work, who must meet all these demands, who have to live up to these expectations – the teachers, the educators – our members – are seriously neglected. Their trade union rights, their professional freedoms, their terms and working conditions – these are all neglected.

Even if we leave aside South Africa and Chile and pretend that these countries are different from all others, the general picture of the situation of teachers, of the application of their rights, of their employment situation, is a very gloomy one. Both in the developing countries and in the industrial economies teachers’ pay and conditions continue to deteriorate while their workload concurrently becomes heavier. People who manage to remain teachers until retirement age are exceptions. Most of them leave beforehand, sick or disillusioned, because they are unable to work under the miserable conditions that their employers allow to endure. Moreover, the remuneration of teachers – in most developing nations not even reaching minimal pay levels and in most industrial nations remaining far below the average earnings of industrial workers – does not at all attract young people to enter the profession. For this reason in certain countries a serious shortage of teachers should be anticipated. At the same time we see that efforts on the part of the teachers’ union movement to stop this trend, to bring about changes, are being barricaded. Sometimes this is done by decree, by taking away teachers’ trade union rights. A recent example is the measure of the Government of the United Kingdom to suspend the collective bargaining rights of teachers in England and Wales. Although I wish to express our sincere satisfaction at the recognition by the ILO of the validity of the complaint filed about this serious infringement, I do hope that the ILO will also exert the necessary and additional pressure on the Government of the United Kingdom to have these basic rights restored. I stress this point – that since the decision of the ILO that the practice of “Berufsverboten” was a violation by the Federal Republic of Germany of Convention No. 111, it has not led to any change whatsoever in that practice. In the Federal Republic of Germany today a teacher’s political convictions can still keep him from practising his chosen profession.

I have said that the position of teachers, their interests as workers and professionals, are grossly neglected; I would add, not only by national governments, but also by international bodies. The IFFTU finds it incomprehensible that the ILO’s programme hardly entails anything in support of our sector. Yet we are talking about millions of dedicated workers in the midst of a crisis, workers who are shouting for help from the only intergovernmental organisation that is able to provide it.

In the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) we hear that teachers should perform better; within UNESCO we hear that teachers should work harder; within the International Monetary Fund we hear that teachers should be paid less. But the ILO remains silent. Let me again try to break that silence. Let me again urge for action regarding the ILO/UNESCO Recommendation on the Status of Teachers which, year after year, has proven to be ineffective. Governments do not even bother to reply to the questionnaires concerning the application of this Recommendation. We have repeatedly pleaded for the transformation of this one instrument into two instruments – one on educational standards and policies, to be enforced by UNESCO, and one on teachers’ conditions, to be enforced by the ILO.

As far as ILO sectoral activities are concerned, I wish to recall the recommendations made by the Joint Meeting on Conditions of Work of Teachers held here in Geneva in November 1981. It was suggested to the Governing Body that a standing committee on the education sector be established and that various studies on the employment situation and conditions of teachers be initiated. Seven years have now gone by and practically none of these recommendations has been implemented. As for the near future, not even another Joint Meeting is planned.

We understand the budgetary constraints that are the main cause of this neglect. Yet it demonstrates that the priorities have been placed elsewhere, and this brings me to my final comment, namely that the ILO in setting those priorities should take better account of changes in the composition of the working force, of the decline of certain industrial sectors, and of the growing importance of other sectors – not only to guarantee that reality is better reflected in its work but also to prevent that the ILO alienate itself from large groups of workers.

Our organisation, the IFFTU, is a part of the trade union movement of public service workers that operates under the name “Common Front”. Next week my colleague from the PTTI will address this assembly on behalf of the Common Front which in its entirety represents more than 20 million public service workers. I wish to associate myself with the statements he will make.

Mr. KHURANA (Employers' delegate, India) – I should like to extend to the President, with deep sincerity, on behalf of the Employers of India and on my own behalf, congratulations and good wishes on his election to preside over the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. I also extend warm felicitations to the Vice-Presidents who have been elected to assist him. We are certain that under his inspiring leadership the proceedings of this Conference will be steered to a successful conclusion.

I would also like to place on record our appreciation of the commendable work done by the Director-General in bringing out a very thought-provoking Report, Human rights – A common responsibility. The issues posed in this Report need to be critically examined so as to evolve and spell out coherent operational strategies and modalities of action to meet the merging aspirations and challenges in the realisation of human rights.

Admittedly, as pointed out by the Director-General in his Report, the efforts to secure enjoyment of human rights involve the entire international community. It is also widely recognised that a just and equitable social order will be achieved only when human rights can become functioning and living realities. Our efforts in this direction are, however, greatly influenced by the global economic environment which at present is characterised by structural imbalances. These imbalances reveal themselves in the burgeoning surpluses in foreign accounts of a few market-oriented industrialised countries, the ballooning of the developing world's debt, excessive volatility of exchange rates and erosion of faith in the rationality of capital markets as a result of the stock market crash of last October.

While the developed industrialised countries may get along well in this situation for some time, the developing countries are bound to face even more serious problems. With falling commodity prices and a decline in the value of exports, an increase in import prices of manufactured goods and a rise in interest rates, the developing countries cannot escape deceleration in growth rates and mounting unemployment. The indications are that imbalances in the world economy, combined with the protectionist policies of the developed world, are likely to accentuate the unemployment position in the developing world.

Should the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights not be the occasion to ask if anything can be done to lessen the burden of developing countries, to accelerate their development, to alleviate their poverty? The answer obviously is that a lot can be done.

In fact, what is required to be done is already known and even accepted in principle. There is, however, a general lack of international will to do what is necessary and feasible, and on a scale that can make a significant difference. Capital and technical assistance, support to primary product prices, preferential access to manufactured and semi-manufactured products and relief in times of crisis are some of the accepted policies that are practised only half-heartedly.

The rationale of these policies should not be charity or the provision of temporary relief. The endeavour should be to improve, on a long-term basis, the productive capacity of those who today produce little. Judged in terms of commercial rates of return or in terms of contributions to the balance of payments, there may not be many projects in such countries that may attract technical and capital assistance. Nonetheless, the projects which make a distinct contribution to improving the domestic economic environment cannot be ignored. To meet such situations, the need for concessional assistance has been accepted. The International Development Agency (IDA) was created to provide such concessional assistance. But unfortunately it has continuously been starved of funds.

Surely the world is rich enough to set aside not just 1 per cent but about 3 per cent of its GNP for the alleviation of poverty around the world. Yet even the target of 1 per cent of GNP has not been achieved. From our experience in relation to developing countries, it is becoming increasingly clear that help from outside will have to be provided to them largely by way of concessional assistance. If it is not possible to assist on this basis and on a scale which can make a significant contribution to its economies, much of the developing world would have to face the spectre of continued poverty for millions for many decades to come, with the attendant social and political upheavals. In an interdependent world, as we all know, “poverty anywhere constitutes a threat to prosperity everywhere”.

At times like this, it is relevant to ask whether the existing framework of international co-operation needs any change. Strictly, the actions involved in regard to promoting reasonable international economic policies fall within the purview of other international organisations. But considering the serious impact that international economic policies have on labour and employment and the unique position which the ILO enjoys on account of its tripartite character, it seems to me that the ILO is best placed to provide a lead in such matters. In this connection, the initiative taken by the ILO in organising last November a High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment involving other specialised agencies of the United Nations system deserves commendation. I suggest that this arrangement should be institutionalised so that such meetings are held regularly. It is also essential to forge an understanding among nations as to what constitutes reasonable economic policies and what rules of the game should apply internationally to help the developing world.

The other important theme of this Conference, and which is very closely related to the eradication of global unemployment and poverty, is rural employment promotion. Most developing countries are predominantly rural – with over two-thirds to three-fourths of the population living in rural areas and depending on agriculture. There is a general consensus, backed by empirical studies, that in these countries investments in the urban industrial sector, though essential, have not helped generate sufficient employment opportunities to absorb the growing labour force. With an increasing population and a multiplying labour force, and with the majority of the people living in rural areas, an effective rural employment policy is the most appropriate instrument for achieving the goal of growth with social justice in these countries. It is gratifying to note that the ILO attaches considerable importance to this subject and that a detailed report lucidly conceptualising the issues which need to be tackled and resolved has been submitted to this Conference for consideration.

I believe that the solution to the growing menace of unemployment and underemployment in rural areas lies in building a strong, efficient, productive and functioning rural economy, which may perhaps be termed “ruralisation”, the intention is not to minimise the importance of industrialisation. Accelerating industrialisation in these countries is necessary for bridging the gulf between the developed and developing world, between traditional and modern technology. A sound and strong industrial base is also necessary to provide adequate linkages with agriculture, irrigation, health care, family welfare, education and so forth. Industrialisation and “ruralisation” are therefore not mutually exclusive. Each has its own importance and its own part in taking the society as a whole towards achieving the accepted objectives of the ILO.

To increase employment opportunities in rural areas, it is essential for developing countries to accelerate the pace of rural development. This calls for programmes and measures which can increase agricultural production, develop rural skills to meet the requirements of farm and non-farm activities, promote rural industries and provide rural people with access to education, health care, modern transport and means of communication, and other facilities necessary to improve the quality of life. The endeavour obviously must be to create the infrastructure and the conditions for promoting self-sustaining growth in the rural economy. Considering the nature of the problem confronting the developing countries, the magnitude of the task to be performed is stupendous. While this Conference would enable the ILO to determine the manner in which it can assist these countries, under its existing technical co-operation programme, I feel that it should provide assistance on a scale which can make a significant contribution to their rural economies.

This, I feel, is the background for deliberations on certain important issues before this Conference. Forty years ago the international community adopted the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. The world can hope to achieve the objectives enshrined in this Declaration only if nations of varying sizes and levels of development strive together to create a more just and equitable social and economic order. This calls for all-pervasive transformation. This is the occasion for the distinguished representatives of governments, employers and workers of all persuasions to evolve modalities and strategies for achieving the desired transformation.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. FAVELEVIC (Employers' delegate, Argentina) – Once again it is my honour to address this Assembly on behalf of the Employers of Argentina, and in my capacity as Vice-Chairman of the Argentine Industrial Union.

Allow me first of all to congratulate the President on his election to the presidency of the Assembly, the duties of which he is fulfilling most efficiently and to say how grateful our sector is for the excellent work carried out by Mr. Blanchard and his colleagues, as well as for the contents of the Report which he has submitted to the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference.

Indeed, the subject of Human rights – A common responsibility is vital to our society.

There can be no doubt that apart from being specifically mentioned in international or national documents, as pointed out in the Report, the very idea underlies the principles and the constitutional objectives of the International Labour Organisation and, I might add, all those documents which seek to reflect the very foundations of contemporary society: namely the preservation of human freedom and dignity and their exercise within a framework of justice.

This premise, which was proclaimed long ago but which has lost none of its vital importance and relevance, embodies man's aspirations to attain his ideals and states in simple terms objectives that are as profound as they are difficult to achieve.

Freedom, dignity and justice are expressed in our century and on the threshold of the next, in association with the idea of justice and progress.

These are not empty words; this progress is a necessity; there can be no real justice unless there is sustained growth ensuring man's integral development allowing him to meet adequately his needs.

The Director-General has reminded us that the problem of human rights has to be contrasted with the harsh realities of daily life which for many are the realities of underdevelopment and malnutrition. On this point we should like to add that private initiative has as its fundamental objective, through the enterprise, to produce goods to meet the needs of the people, thereby generating jobs and opening up new opportunities for social progress.

In this way there is a convergence of aims for the achievement of the general welfare which, in turn, opens up new development possibilities for the enterprise, enables it to consolidate its markets, expand its output, update its technologies and train its workers efficiently. Economic progress and social progress are thus inextricably linked.

The Report before us deals in depth with workers' rights which in labour terms are a true expression of human rights. We cannot but share this view and express the hope that any obstacles preventing their realisation may be overcome, particularly in the developing countries.

However, allow me to make several comments from the standpoint of the Argentine employers.

If the workers' aims are to be achieved, there must be vigorous economic development; there has to be full productive capacity and this is only possible with an economic model which promotes freedom and private initiative. These prerequisites are not possible under authoritarian political systems or under economic rules which restrict freedom, fetter the initiative of citizens or infringe in any way, no matter how subtle, the right of ownership of the means of production.

Indeed the world's most advanced economies are found today in those countries which have adopted models of economic freedom and adhere to democratic political systems; systems in which justice and the equality of opportunity are guaranteed to all.

However, for countries like ours which are trying to overcome their difficulties under the burden of heavy external debt and are also affected by an undue policy of agricultural subsidies practised above all by the most highly developed countries, these rules of the game are absolutely essential.

As employers and citizens, we must recognise with deep satisfaction the consolidation of our republican and democratic political system. Under this form of government, there can be no doubt that political freedoms can be exercised broadly.

This success, which has been achieved with great difficulty by the community as a whole, also requires imaginative and up-to-date approaches in the labour field, in order to achieve effective results.

It might be said that the Director-General's Report summarises the aspirations of the Argentine people in the labour field. However, we believe that these objectives will be a mere illusion if there is not a sustained development of the economy, based on clear-cut definitions which provide guarantees of workers' rights, and employers' freedom to organise and run their affairs, which are compatible with the principles of industrial and commercial freedom and the freedom of property, guaranteed by our Constitution to all the inhabitants of our country.

If, simplistically, we were to fail to advocate this basic premise, we would only be representing the wishes of one sector of the community. We would simply be presenting a list of requirements but not of practical possibilities. We would merely be wasting our words.

We believe unreservedly in human rights, but the rights of all men, and whilst giving our full support to the Report submitted to this Conference, we claim inalienable rights for employers and entrepreneurs because they are not purely motivated by selfish reasons but realise that progress can only be the result of the growth of the productive system and that this can only take place in a free economy, last but not least, there can be no distribution of wealth if there is no wealth to distribute. Therefore, to create wealth and not to administer poverty is our catchword and our concern.

Confounding these goals would mean practicing reverse discrimination; not discrimination against the worker but equivocally against the enterprise, which can only result in stagnation, disinvestment, poverty and frustration on every side.

Accordingly, in the name of the political freedom which we have recovered in Argentina, we question the new trade union law which is at variance not only with the terms of our Constitution but also with the categorical terms of Convention No. 87 inasmuch as it does not comply with the principle of the freedom of trade union freedom, and uses language imposed by the law which is incompatible with the establishment and free functioning of genuinely representative trade union organisations.

This explains and justifies our condemnation of this law before the supervisory bodies of this International Labour Organisation.

We also object to this trade union law because it infringes legitimate employers' rights in the following ways: it undermines the powers to organise and manage, it works against the efficiency and productivity of enterprises, particularly small- and medium-sized enterprises, and against the growth of productivity, without at the same time benefiting the workers; it confers privileges on trade union representatives that are turned into a veritable preserve affecting the right of equality before the law, and not only vis-a-vis the enterprise but also vis-a-vis other workers; it fails to envisage the essential need to modernise the regulatory instruments of labour relations, nor does it contribute to an ongoing dialogue between the factors of production, maintaining models that are out of date and creating grave obstacles to the free development of working life, ignoring the fact that modern legislation must contribute to social peace, to growth and to distributive justice.

To sum up, excessive trade union interference in the life of the enterprise and trade union arrogance demonstrate an excess of rules and regulations which we fought while the legislation was in preparation and which now justifies our efforts and militates in favour of an amendment of the text which is already in force.

We are also concerned that the proposals to revise the legislation with regard to individual workers' contracts can have dire consequences because we need clear and consistent labour legislation which will protect the rights of the workers but which will not result in clandestine work or evasive behaviour which can be of no benefit to those who want to see a transparent economy where informality would not be the rule, since such undesirable mechanisms, would end by destroying competition, for there can be no competition against marginal employment.

We shall always raise our voice, especially here, a natural place for tripartite dialogue, in favour of the harmonisation of sectoral interests in order to facilitate the adoption of fair and equitable standards. This did not happen in our case because adequate account was not taken of our claims, nor were solutions found which we would regard as reasonable.

Argentinian employers are not against laws which improve the situation of workers and their conditions of work. Rather we would favour such laws, provided they are in keeping with realistic criteria and do not prevent the attainment of the general goals mentioned above.

Neither are we against a just and balanced protection of trade unions and their representatives; but the law in question works against the general interest and its implementation will upset the necessary balance among the various intermediate entities and the harmony which should reign in labour relations.

It must be emphasised that productivity and efficiency must be the goals not only of the employer, but also of the workers, because it is possible to share the fruits of growth only if growth is generated and there is no possibility of a permanent increase in real wages without improvement in productivity.

Because we believe in a state of law and we are fully aware of its importance, we have to struggle for it to remain in force, recognising the rights of others, but also insisting on respect for our own rights. Only in this framework, can the ideals of justice and equality be fully realised.

This is the only way that sustained social and economic progress can be achieved in accordance with the aspirations of the national community as a whole.

(The Conference adjourned at 5.45 p.m.)

Credentials

Second report of the Credentials Committee

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegate of the Bahamas

1. The Credentials Committee had before it an objection to the nomination of the credentials of the Workers' delegate of the Bahamas submitted by the Commonwealth of Bahamas Trade Union Congress (CBTUC) and supported by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU).

2. The authors of the objection declared that since 1983, the Government of the Bahamas had refused to recognise the CBTUC as the sole registered trade union centre of the Bahamas and had arbitrarily selected representatives from trade unions which had publicly expressed support for the governing political party. This year a new organisation, the National Workers' Council of Trade Unions and Associations (NWCTUA), was created comprising mainly those unions which support the Government. According to the objecting organisations, the Government had organised the consultations in such a way that a number of very small trade unions which did not function according to the labour laws or their own constitutions were able to participate in the balloting thereby biasing the results against the CBTUC. For this reason, the CBTUC suggested to its affiliates that they take no part in the selection process.

3. In a written communication to the Committee, Mr. C. Turnquest, Director of Labour and Government delegate of the Bahamas to the Conference, indicated that the CBTUC had 11 registered unions and that combined membership was about 10,000, whilst the NWCTUA represented 16 registered trade unions with a total membership of 15,400. The CBTUC represented neither a majority of the registered trade unions nor a majority of the total union membership. The Government had made efforts to appoint the Workers' delegation in agreement with all the most representative workers' organisations in the country without exception in conformity with the wishes of the Committee and had appointed a Workers' delegate from the most representative workers' organisation.

4. In an oral statement before the Committee, the Government delegate of the Bahamas added that, concerning the balloting, each trade union had one vote. Among the unions composing the NWCTUA, only two had fewer than 100 members. All registered unions, of which there were 38, including those belonging to the CBTUC, had been invited to participate in the ballot. Among the 17 unions which replied, 16 voted for the NWCTUA. In reply to a question of the Committee, the Government representative indicated that, according to the law of the Bahamas, registration was open to all trade unions but not to confederations.

5. Some doubts were expressed in the Committee as to whether the balloting introduced by the Government was the best method of ensuring that the most representative workers' organisation was selected. The Committee noted that, according to the information provided by the Government, the NWCTUA was the most representative workers' organisation. It noted that the ICFTU, while stating that the CBTUC was the most representative workers' organisation, had not provided any data in support thereof. The Committee noted the efforts of the Government to give effect to its previous recommendations and decided not to accept the objection. In so doing, the Committee expressed the hope that the Government will pursue further its efforts in order to obtain the agreement of all the most representative organisations in the nomination of the Workers' delegate to the International Labour Conference.

Objection concerning the nomination of a Workers' adviser of Peru

6. The Committee had before it a telegram from Mr. Ramírez Salas and Mr. Flavio Rojas Sarmiento, presenting themselves as President and Secretary General respectively, of the Confederación de Trabajadores of Peru (CTP), stating that the workers' adviser, Deputy B. Céspedes Pérez did not represent the authentic CTP of Peru.

7. The Committee noted that this objection which was of a succinct nature did not contain any element permitting it to take any position in that regard.

Communication concerning the delegation of Afghanistan

8. The Committee had before it a communication from the delegation of Pakistan stating that it wished to place on record its reservation regarding the credentials of the delegation of Afghanistan for reasons already stated by the Pakistan delegation at the last session of the United Nations General Assembly. The Committee noted that, apart from recording this reservation, the communication did not call for any action on its part.

Communication concerning the delegation of Lesotho

9. The Committee noted the communication sent by Mr. M.L. Mophethe, Government delegate of Lesotho to the Conference, stating that, contrary to the principles of the International Labour Organisation which his country held dear to its heart, the delegation of Lesotho did not include a Workers' representative. The Government found it impossible to nominate the most representative organisation in view of the failure of the workers' organisations to agree on their representative to the Conference and to fulfil their obligation to send returns by the deadline provided for under the applicable legislation.

10. In this connection, the Committee referred to the terms of paragraph 16 of its first report (Provisional Record, No. 9, page 9/39), in which it recalled governments' obligations in this matter.

Communication concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Portugal

11. The Committee had before it a communication from the Confederação Geral dos Trabalhadores Portugueses – Intersindical Nacional (CGTP-In) concerning the Workers' delegate of Portugal.

12. The communication stated that although the CGTP-In continued to be the most representative organisation of workers, having been so recognised by the Committee in previous years, the Government had nominated a titular delegate which was not of that organisation. It added that the CGTP-In could have presented an objection under article 26, paragraph 3, of the Standing Orders of the Conference. If it had not done so, it was in order to give the possibility to the Government and other interested parties to correct the discriminatory attitude towards the CGTP-In. This decision did not prejudice the possibility in the future of presenting a formal objection if the goodwill of the CGTP-In did not receive a response from the other interested parties.

13. The Committee noted that the communication did not call for any action on its part and limited itself to taking note of it.

14. The Credentials Committee submits the present report to the Conference in order that the Conference may take note of it.

COMMUNICATION TO THE CONFERENCE

Report of the Appeals Board set up by the
decision of 8 June 1959

1. By a letter of 3 June 1988 communicated to the President of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference, the Employers' delegate of Nicaragua objected to the fact that, as a result of a decision of the Conference of 2 June concerning the composition of its committees, none of the positions of titular member which he had requested had been assigned to him.

2. The President of the Conference referred this objection to the Appeals Board set up by the Conference on 8 June 1959 for the appointment of Conference Committees. The Appeals Board, appointed by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office at its 240th Session (May 1988), and selected from among the persons designated for that purpose by the Conference, was composed of Mr. G. Abi-Saab, Mr. L. Cottafavi and Mr. P. Laroque. It met at the International Labour Office on 8 and 9 June 1988, under the chairmanship of Mr. Laroque, to examine the above-mentioned objection in accordance with the terms of reference assigned to it by the Conference decision of 8 June 1959.

3. In discharging its responsibility, the Board considered, as all of its predecessors had done, that it was essential, firstly, to guarantee the right of all parties concerned to appear before the Board and, secondly, to follow an expeditious procedure so as to enable its decisions to become effective at as early a stage of the Conference as possible. In order to safeguard the right to a hearing, the President invited the appellant to submit in writing to the Office of the Clerk of the Conference, for the attention of the Board, his observations on the facts and arguments submitted in support of his appeal. On communicating these written observations to the Chairman of the Employers' group, the Board invited him similarly to submit a brief comment on the appeal, which was in fact made against his group. After taking note of the comments made by each side, the Board then heard the appellant and the Chairman of the Employers' group on 8 June 1988. The Board wishes to thank both the appellant and the Chairman of the Employers' group for their punctual and full replies to these invitations. Thanks to their co-operation, the Board is of the opinion that the right of the parties to be heard on an equal footing has been fully guaranteed and that its task has been carried out in the shortest possible time.

Statement of the appellant

4. The Employers' delegate of Nicaragua, Mr. M. González Pastora, duly accredited to the 75th Session of the Conference by his Government, had requested that he be assigned a position as titular member on the Committee on the Application of Standards and that his technical adviser, Mr. J.R. Aragón Marín, should be assigned a position as titular member of the Committee on Rural Employment. However, the appellant had been assigned only a position as deputy member of the Committee on the Application of Standards, while Mr. Aragón Marín had been appointed neither as titular nor as deputy member of the Committee on Rural Employment.

5. In his written statement the appellant deplored the discrimination to which he was subjected by the Employers' group, and stated that this attitude violated the spirit of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation and defied his authority as Employers' delegate of Nicaragua (since it is the delegate who in principle has to decide which of his technical advisers shall take part in the work of the various committees). He repeated his request that he be included in the voting section of the Committee on the Application of Standards and that Mr. Aragón Marín be allotted a seat as titular member of the Committee on Rural Employment. He also requested to be heard by the Board.

6. Addressing the Board, the appellant regretted the need to repeat the arguments he had put forward at previous sessions of the Conference, and expressed the hope that agreement on the subject of participation by the various employers' organisations of Nicaragua would make a repetition of his appeal unnecessary. He had made a modest request for two titular members' seats, for himself and his technical adviser, and his request had not been granted. Although he took part in discussions in the Committee on the Application of Standards as a deputy member, he requested, for reasons of principle, the right to vote, which the Employers' group was refusing him, taking its stand on the arguments put forward in previous years. This situation was unacceptable, and the appellant asked the Board to rectify it.

Statements by the Chairman of the Employers' group

7. In his written statement the Chairman of the Employers' group recalled, firstly, that the great majority of the members of the Employers' group were of the opinion that the system adopted, which empowered a board composed of persons from outside the Conference to take decisions without appeal concerning the functioning of the Conference, was in contradiction with the right of all delegates to vote individually on all matters before the Conference (article 4 of the Constitution).

8. As regards the substance of Mr. González Pastora's appeal, and subject to what had gone before, the reasons why the Employers' group had not proposed Mr. González Pastora as a titular member of the Committee on the Application of Standards, and his adviser, Mr. Aragón Marín, as a titular member of the Committee on Rural Employment, arose from the fact that these two persons did not truly represent the employers of Nicaragua. For the same reason, as in 1986 and 1987, protests had been made against the nomination of Mr. González Pastora as Employers' delegate of Nicaragua. In the previous year, the Credentials Committee had concluded that the Government should have nominated the Employers' delegate in agreement with the Higher Council of Private Enterprise (COSEP), which is in fact the most representative employers' organisation in Nicaragua and which opposed the appointment of Mr. González Pastora as delegate.

9. Contrary to Mr. González Pastora's claim, the grant of voting rights to a certain number of employers' representatives on Conference Committees represents a delegation of power by the Employers' group, not by an individual delegate. Persons who have thus been appointed as titular members of committees have the responsibility of representing the group in the event of a vote. The number of such representatives must necessarily be limited in such a way that the group is always in a position to vote at full strength, with the support of its other representatives appointed as deputies. The fact that the Conference, on the recommendation of the group, can decide which of the members of a Committee are entitled to vote implies, on the contrary, that a certain number of members are not so entitled.

10. The group considers that it has fully applied the principle of equality of treatment which the Conference had in mind when it adopted the "Procedure for the constitution of Conference committees". This procedure certainly does not give any delegate the right to be appointed as a voting member simply because he has expressed the desire to be granted this right. Such a right would render completely meaningless both the elections for membership of committees and the decisions of the groups as to the number of voting members to represent them in each committee.

11. Addressing the Board, the Chairman of the Employers' group said that the situation which had prompted the present appeal was the same as that of 1987, and that therefore he would not repeat in detail the arguments deployed previously. The Employers' group, while it was aware of the precedents which the Board had set, nevertheless took the view that, since the situation had not shown any further development, it would be inappropriate to depart from its standpoint, for reasons of principle, in view of the fact that the Employers' delegate of Nicaragua represented arable farming and cattle-raising interests which made little use of wage-earning workers and thus failed to correspond to his group's concept of "employer".

Ruling of the Appeals Board

12. From the information available to the Appeals Board it appears that the candidature of Mr. González Pastora for the voting section of the Committee on the Application of Standards and that of Mr. Aragón Marín to the Committee on Rural Employment were dismissed simply because the employers' organisation with whose agreement Mr. González Pastora was nominated delegate was alleged not to be the most representative employers' organisation in Nicaragua. Although at the 73rd Session of the Conference the Credentials Committee had taken the view that "in the absence of agreement [on the nomination of the Employers' delegate of Nicaragua], the Committee continued to be of the opinion that the Government should have appointed the Employers' delegate in agreement with COSEP, which apparently continued to be the most representative employers' organisation", the Credentials Committee had decided not to propose that Mr. González Pastora's credentials be invalidated.

13. It is not for the Appeals Board to pronounce upon the representative character of delegates to the Conference. Such a pronouncement would call in question the validity of their credentials under article 3, paragraph 5, of the Constitution; this is subject to another procedure, provided for in article 3, paragraph 9, of the Constitution and article 26 of the Standing Orders. By virtue of article 26, paragraph 8, of the Standing Orders, "the delegate to whose nomination objection has been taken shall have the same rights as other delegates, pending final decision of the question of his admission". Accordingly, in the absence of such a final decision, the Appeals Board can only conclude that the position of the Employers' group is based on grounds which cannot justify it. Mr. González Pastora's objection to his exclusion, and that of his substitute Mr. Aragón Marín from the voting section of the Committee on the Application of Standards and that of the Committee on Rural Employment respectively, is thus substantiated.

14. The Appeals Board therefore decides to add Mr. González Pastora and his technical adviser Mr. Aragón Marín to the voting sections of the Committee on the Application of Standards and that of the Committee on Rural Employment respectively.

15. By the terms of Part III, paragraph 3, of the Conference decision of 8 June 1959, it is incumbent upon the Conference to make the necessary arrangements to preserve the equality of voting strength of the three groups where the composition of the voting sections is altered by the Appeals Board's decisions. The vote-weighting system in operation will enable this requirement to be met.

Sixteenth sitting

Friday, 10 June 1988, 10.15 a.m.

Presidents: Mr. Beyreuther, Mr. Tsujino

SEVENTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – The first item of the agenda is the submission of the report of the Selection Committee. I call on Mr. Vargas Escobar, Government delegate, Nicaragua, Chairman of the Selection Committee, to present the report.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. VARGAS ESCOBAR (Government delegate, Nicaragua; Chairman of the Selection Committee) – It is my honour to submit to the Conference the seventh report of the Selection Committee which is to be found in Provisional Record No. 5F. The report deals exclusively with changes in the membership of the Committees of the Conference.

I recommend to the Conference the adoption of this report.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – The seventh report of the Selection Committee is now before the Conference. If there are no objections, I take it that the report is adopted.

COMMUNICATION BY THE PRESIDENT TO THE CONFERENCE

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – I should like to communicate to the Conference a proposal that it send a preliminary reply to the telex from Mr. Oliver Tambo, President of the ANC, of which I informed it yesterday.

I would therefore like to read out to you the text of a preliminary reply and ask for your consent:

Mr. Oliver Tambo, President of the ANC.

I have received your telex of 6 June 1988 concerning imminent legislation restricting trade union action in South Africa. This is causing great concern in the Conference and is receiving the immediate attention of the Committee on Apartheid of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference which will be proposing concrete measures to be taken in this regard for adoption by the Conference within the next week. Please be assured of my highest consideration.

President of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference

If you agree and have no objections to this provisional answer, then we shall send the telex as I have read it out.

(It is so decided.)

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – We will now resume our discussion of the reports of Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. ABDULGABBAR (Minister of Labour and the Civil Service, Democratic Yemen) – I should like first of all to congratulate the President on his election, testimony of his experience and wisdom.

I would also like to express our satisfaction with the positive development in relations between Democratic Yemen and the ILO, and express the hope that it will continue.

The Director-General's choice of human rights as the topic of our discussion was a wise one. I don't think that his intention was merely to commemorate the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights or to recall the importance of these rights. Rather, I think he sought to stress the ways and means of bringing about local and international conditions which better ensure the implementation and exercise of these rights.

There is no question that the International Labour Organisation has contributed much to furthering human rights through its many activities, and be enshrining these rights and principles in international labour instruments concerning social security, equal remuneration, the promotion of rural employment and other vital areas.

Nevertheless, current economic and social conditions require the Organisation, within the framework of its Constitution, to redouble its efforts to promote human rights. The ILO stands before a historical challenge which calls on it to summon courage and determination to address problems and their real causes. The Director-General is right in saying that the ILO should re-evaluate its role.

Human rights should not be considered as an abstract ideal, but rather as a practical and intellectual aspect of daily life.

Human rights cannot be realised only by legislation; without an economic basis they are merely empty concepts. That is why human rights are deeply influenced by the general economic and political situation throughout the world.

Owing to its modest resources and the underdevelopment left by 130 years of colonialism, Democratic Yemen has since its independence on 30 November 1967, been faced with so many difficult choices that it is virtually impossible to assign them an order or priority. We have had to plan our economic development to ensure gradual social progress. The development of human resources was given a proper place in our plan, with priority given to eliminating illiteracy, which is the greatest barrier to participation in public life and the exercise of democracy. Our reconstruction also focused on free education, which has been extended to the university level and to the most remote rural areas. The State has built schools and vocational training centres and established agencies responsible for their organisation and operation. In the field of labour and the genuine participation of enterprises, workers and other popular organisations, we have managed to promulgate appropriate legislation, such as the Labour Code of 1978 and the Social Security Code of 1980, establishing bodies for their implementation. This legislation guarantees a number of principles such as equal remuneration between men and women, the abolition of forced labour and child labour, etc. We have also passed an Act on the rights and obligations of trade unions. However, a great deal remains to be done, but we are doing our best, within the constraints common to most developing countries. •

The over-populated and over-indebted developing countries are characterised by low levels of development and national product. This situation was not of our own choosing; no country chooses poverty and misery. This situation results from the over-exploitation of natural and human resources by colonialism and the periods which followed it. The present economic situation has imposed on developing countries an international division of labour which condemns them to exporting raw materials and importing finished products in a market controlled by the capitalist countries, whose economic, scientific, technological and military supremacy enable them to impose an unfair monetary system which exposes developing countries to enormous losses while frustrating their development efforts.

The question we must ask ourselves is whether developing countries can guarantee respect for human rights and for the international labour Conventions concerned with them – which establish, for example, the possibility of productive remunerative work for every citizen – when the world economic and monetary system is a perpetual threat to human rights in those countries; that is, the right of their peoples to stability and peace and to economic and trade transactions based on equality and justice.

We believe that it is difficult for these countries, faced with so many obstacles, to put all these rights and Conventions into effect, however keenly they may wish to do so.

This being so, what we need for the last decade of the twentieth century is a renewed international commitment upholding the rights of peoples – without exception – to a new world system guaranteeing economic security, peace and equality for all peoples.

If human rights are truly the responsibility of all of us, how can we stand by while a people in its own territory is coerced, subjugated and subjected to racial discrimination?

The report of the International Labour Office mission to Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories, which has been presented to us here as part of the Report of the Director-General, describes only a fraction of the sufferings of the workers, trade unions and employers in those territories. The proposals and recommendations of the mission echo those already made in the 1987 report. Meanwhile, ten years have gone by during which the situation in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories has continually worsened in economic, employment and humanitarian terms owing to the Zionists' racist practices of confiscating land and water sources, of expelling and uprooting citizens, of breaking the limbs and bones of our young people, of murdering children and adolescents and the many other acts of terrorism perpetrated in flagrant violation of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the international labour Conventions and the Geneva Convention of 12 August 1949 relative to the Protection of Civilians Persons in the Time of War.

The stones, of which we can no longer say that they are cold and silent, address an eloquent appeal to the conscience of all of us in all parts of the world. And all those who have watched the Zionist crimes on their television screens, have expressed their horror and reprobation, in common with all the Parliaments and all the international, regional and professional organisations in the world.

The grief and bitterness aroused in us by the suffering of the Arab people of Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories are equalled by the pain we feel at the suffering of the African people in their land under the racist regime of apartheid in South Africa and Namibia. Apartheid is an affront to man and to his dignity; it is a challenge to morality, to standards and to the divine commandments. The Organisation must take up a firm position with regard to the racist regimes consonant with its role as protector of human rights and dignity.

Human rights and dignity are indissociable; the struggle for the realisation of these rights is indissociable and is unquestionably our common responsibility.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. ABBADI (Minister of Employment, Morocco) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! It is a pleasure for me, Mr. President, to extend to you, on my own behalf and on behalf of the delegation of the Kingdom of Morocco, my very warm congratulations upon your election to the presidency of this session. We wish you full success in your task and hope that our work will achieve positive and constructive results.

The Director-General of the ILO has made a wise choice of theme for the first part of his yearly report, Human rights – A common responsibility.

The discussion of this theme at this session is an excellent way for the ILO to commemorate the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and to review our Organisation's efforts to give concrete expression to these rights in its fields of competence.

The action of our Organisation in this area is essentially reflected by the adoption of a very great number of Conventions concerning equality of opportunity, treatment and remuneration; social secuity; trade union rights and freedoms; improvement of working conditions and the working environment; and employment promotion.

The defence of human rights is a shared responsibility. The Kingdom of Morocco is aware of this responsibility; consistent with its dedication to the principles continued in the Constitution of the ILO and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, it has always striven to protect these rights and guarantee their exercise.

Thus, Morocco has ratified almost all the Conventions pertaining to these subjects and has incorporated their general and fundamental principles in its national legislation.

In the field of wages, several measures have been adopted with a view to establishing the principle of equal remuneration. These measures include the suppression of wage areas and the unification of the minimum wage for men and women in the various local and provincial governments of the Kingdom.

In this connection, I should mention that the legal minimum wage is adjusted periodically, as needed.

As for social security, which guarantees workers and their families the right to various payments and benefits, it has been extended to wage earners in the agricultural sector after having been originally restricted to workers in the industrial and trade sectors and to wage earners in the liberal professions.

Furthermore, the economic and social development plan for 1988 to 1992, which was formulated pursuant to the guide-lines laid down by His Majesty King Hassan II – may God glorify him – provides for several measures aiming at improving the social security system and extending its scope.

As for the improvement of working conditions and the workplace, Moroccan legislation comprises several texts guaranteeing the rights of the workers as regards hours of work, weekly rest and annual leave, and provides adequate protection in the field of occupational safety and health.

Our national legislation merely guarantees certain minimum standards, but it allows employers' and workers' organisations to establish supplementary benefits, particularly through collective agreements.

The Moroccan Constitution provides for a plurality of political, trade union and occupational organisations and guarantees freedom of association. The laws passed since independence pertaining to employers' and workers' organisations embody all the principles contained in the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), to wit: the right to set up organisations, trade unions or trade union confederations, freely and without prior authorisation, as well as of the right to adhere to international occupational and trade union organisations.

Moreover, employers' and workers' organisations are represented in Parliament and participate in the formulation of national economic and social development plans. They express their viewpoints in all fields, either through Bills or amendments to Bills submitted by the Government, or by monitoring government action and commenting on the same orally or in writing. The democratic system adopted by our country is truly viable and in force.

As concerns employment, Morocco has ratified the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) and attaches great importance to this question, which is among the priorities of our plan of orientation, in conformity with the guide-lines issued by His Majesty, King Hassan II.

Efforts are now being deployed to implement programmes aimed at improving the labour market by strengthening training in various sectors and at different levels, by encouraging investments in the various sectors, and by adopting legislation concerning assistance for young people in the creating of small and medium-sized enterprises or co-operatives.

In this connection I would point out that the private sector is expected to play a very important role in helping the Government to promote employment at the regional and local level.

The agenda of our session includes two important items which will be submitted to a second discussion. I am referring to safety and health in construction, and employment promotion and social security.

Last year I had already expressed the viewpoint of my country with respect to these two topics; I hope that the instruments which will be adopted will be sufficiently flexible to ensure the maximum number of ratifications.

As regards the promotion of rural employment and the general discussion of this question, we hope that the conclusions of the Conference will include practical measures to help the member States, and particularly developing countries, to promote employment in the rural environment and thereby to curb the exodus towards the urban areas.

The promotion of rural employment must be part of a development strategy aiming at absorbing surplus manpower by enhancing human resources through proper training and the use of new and appropriate technology.

The ILO must participate in the formulation and implementation of projects aiming particularly at collecting reliable information on that sector, and introducing technologies which can increase production while creating as many jobs as possible.

Morocco is primarily an agricultural country. Since its independence it has improved this vital sector by strengthening and diversifying agriculture, by modernising agricultural production and by building dams; through these measures, it has sought to be self-sufficient in foodstuffs and to promote rural employment.

Our country is quite ready to place its experience at the disposal of the other States Members of the ILO if they so request.

At a time when the entire world is celebrating the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the Arab workers and employers in the occupied Arab territories are still deprived of the rights provided for by the international charters and texts. The situation of these workers and employers has been seriously affected by the occupation and continues to deteriorate owing to new settlements, the confiscation of land, the demolition of houses and the expulsion of workers and employers.

The visit of the Director-General of the International Labour Organisation to the occupied Arab territories enabled him to see for himself the inhuman conditions experienced by these workers and employers, and the violations of which they are victims.

The Kingdom of Morocco energetically condemns the policies exercised by the occupation authorities in the occupied Arab territories and considers that the fundamental rights of the Arab workers and employers in these territories can be guaranteed only by the liberation of these territories.

While reaffirming its solidarity with the front-line countries, Morocco forcefully denounces the policy of discrimination and apartheid practised by the Pretoria regime against our African brothers in South Africa and Namibia. Morocco expresses the wish that our Organisation should pursue its efforts and increase its aid to the people of South Africa and Namibia, to ensure that they may enjoy their human rights and exercise their legitimate rights without any obstacle.

Before I conclude I should like to reiterate to you my congratulations and wish full success to our Conference.

(Mr. Tsujino takes the Chair.)

Interpretation from Japanese: Mr. NAKAMURA (Minister of Labour, Japan) – On behalf of the Government of Japan and on my own behalf, I should like, first of all, to join with the previous speakers in offering the President my warmest congratulations on his election to the Presidency of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. I am confident that under his leadership, and with this knowledge and experience, this Conference will produce fruitful results.

This year marks the 40th anniversary of the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights by the United Nations, an occasion that in every way deserves to be commemorated throughout the world.

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights is the fruit of the accumulated wisdom of mankind and a long process of endeavour to establish human rights as the fully enjoyed birthright of every man and woman, and is an important milestone on the road to the attainment of peace through the international guarantee of human rights.

It is for this reason that the Universal Declaration is justly called the “international Magna Carta of all mankind”.

During these 40 years, the International Covenants on Human Rights and the other international human rights conventions have been adopted by international organisations, with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights as the fundamental guideline and resolute efforts have been made by the people concerned to ensure that human rights are universally recognised and enjoyed as a “value common to all mankind”.

The ILO, as the specialised agency of the United Nations responsible for labour matters, has an important role to play in safeguarding the rights of workers all over the world. I believe that it is very timely for this session, where the representatives of the governments, employers and workers of the member States meet together in this year of the 40th anniversary of the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights to discuss how we may best ensure that human rights shall be a reality for each man and woman.

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights states in the first sentence of its preamble that “recognition of the inherent dignity and of the equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human family is the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world”. Although the countries of the world live under differing political and social systems, human rights are inherent to all human beings, and we must use all our human wisdom in striving unceasingly to make those rights a reality, transcending the limits of all such institutional differences.

Regrettably, however, there still exist factors which pose the gravest possible threat to human rights, among them racial discrimination and regional conflicts.

Apartheid, in the Republic of South Africa, must not be tolerated. It must cease to exist. In that country, however, no substantial improvement can be seen, and the oppression of Black South Africans and the suppression of their liberation movements have been increasing, all of which cannot fail to sadden and cause grave concern to all people of goodwill.

Then, too, in countries where there is conflict, hunger, disease and poverty have resulted from the hostilities, and vast numbers of refugees have been forced to flee from the afflicted areas, creating very substantial problems for the neighbouring areas and countries.

All of these are important factors which undermine world peace. The withdrawal of the Soviet Union's armed forces from Afghanistan, recently begun thanks to the mediation of the United Nations, is greatly to be welcomed as marking the first step toward the solution of a long-festering problem and threat to peace. My country pays the highest tribute to the United Nations for the role it has played in the quest for a solution and ardently hopes that the momentum created will lead to a comprehensive settlement bringing peace and security to Afghanistan and its neighbours.

We hope that the international organisations concerned will continue to strive in their respective fields of competence for the earliest possible settlement of all such conflicts.

The ILO has an important responsibility for ensuring that human rights are protected and enjoyed by establishing and supervising the application of international labour standards and extending technical co-operation to developing countries.

In developing countries, which constitute the majority of the ILO member States, there is widespread unemployment and poverty, as a result of the stagnation in their economies and industries and the rapid growth of their populations that swallows up the gains from their development efforts.

What is absolutely essential in order to safeguard the human rights of the people of those countries is action to facilitate the gradual implementation of international labour standards and to create the economic and social infrastructures that will make such assimilation possible.

It is important therefore for the ILO, when setting new standards, to take full account of the actual situation prevailing in developing countries.

It is also essential for the ILO to continue to attach great importance to technical co-operation, one of the aims of which is to create a climate in the developing countries favourable to the implementation of the ILO standards, to strengthen those countries' administrative systems and develop their human resources with a view to making the application of the ILO standards really feasible and effective in such countries.

I would emphasise especially that the active promotion of technical co-operation geared to the stage of economic and social development and the needs of each country will bring about steady, albeit not spectacular, progress in the application of international labour standards and in the stabilisation and improvement of the living standards of workers all over the world.

In this belief, my country has been actively co-operating with the ILO's multi-bilateral programme, its Asia and Pacific Skill Development Programme and other ILO programmes. My Government is determined to make yet greater efforts to expand such programmes.

Ensuring that the peoples of the world enjoy to the full their human rights cannot, as is pointed out in the Report of the Director-General, Mr. Blanchard, be achieved by the activities of the ILO alone. If that end is to be attained, the activities of the other United Nations agencies, and the autonomous efforts of the member States, are also necessary.

With the common understanding regarding human rights and awareness of a common responsibility for their protection and promotion, all of us must strive to enable all countries and all international organisations to carry out the missions entrusted to them.

Where international labour standards based on ILO Conventions are concerned, member States that have ratified Conventions must implement them adequately, and the supervisory machinery of the ILO must, through appropriate and stable application of the standards, gain the member States' yet greater confidence, which will enable the Organisation to carry out its supervisory activities still more effectively.

In concluding my statement, I would like to emphasise the very great importance of the role of the ILO is called upon to play in establishing social justice, and making lasting world peace a reality.

I hope most earnestly that there will be fruitful discussions in this Conference on the basis of the Report of the Director-General, Mr. Blanchard. I would also like to reiterate the position of my Government, which is that it will make renewed efforts to co-operate with the ILO as it carries out its important duties and will continue to support the ILO in the future as the Organisation working, as in the past, for sure and steady progress.

Mr. DRILON (Secretary of Labour and Employment, Philippines) – On behalf of the Philippine delegation, may I extend our congratulations to the President on his election to the presidency of this Conference. We are confident that, with his background and experience, he will lead this Conference to a very successful conclusion. I also wish to offer my compliments to the Director-General, a recent visitor to my country, for his comprehensive and in-depth Report on the human rights situation as it relates to the world of work.

As he pointed out, 1988 marks a series of human rights anniversaries and the moment of review presents itself to us today. We have to re-examine the state of human rights in our own backyards. Beyond the assessment of how we have fared, we now must determine how we should continue our efforts individually and collectively, in promoting and safeguarding the basic rights and freedoms of our people and our nations.

In my country, the issue of human rights has occupied the centre of the stage for quite a while. It is fitting that two days from now my country will commemorate its independence. In the light of our recent history, 12 June will mark not only our independence from a foreign coloniser, but will bring into sharper focus our recent deliverance from the tyranny of a home-grown dictatorship.

The Filipino people's struggle for genuine independence and social justice has not ended. No one can deny that the 28-month old democratic Government of President Corazon Aquino has made considerable strides in improving the quality of life for Filipinos in many respects. Much remains to be done, however. Recognising that human rights really do no more than ensure the full realisation of a person's potential, we seize the occasion today to reaffirm the Philippine Government's commitment and adherence to the principles set forth in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and to the objectives of the International Labour Organisation to promote social justice based on lasting peace.

Such declarations of national will and purpose must, however, be translated into concrete realities. Allow me therefore to mention briefly what my Government has done and is doing with respect to these commitments.

When President Aquino assumed office in February of 1986, she immediately took steps to dismantle the repressive features of the previous Administration. The right to habeas corpus was restored and an independent committee to investigate human rights abuses was set up. Over 1,000 political prisoners, including union leaders, were released.

Today, the primacy of human rights as a policy of the State is enshrined in our new Constitution which was overwhelmingly ratified by the citizenry in February 1987. A permanent and independent Commission on Human Rights has been created under this new charter and is now fully functioning. It has the following powers: the investigation of all forms of human rights violations involving civil and political rights; the provision of legal-aid services to underprivileged victims; the exercise of visiting rights with respect to detention facilities; the recommendation to our Legislature of effective measures for the further promotion of human rights; and the monitoring of government compliance with international treaty obligations in this respect.

As so aptly stated by the Director-General, the issue of industrial relations is inevitably intertwined with the larger issue of civil liberties. Whenever and wherever repression of basic human rights occurs, the working man is always affected, and always in an adverse manner. Philippine experience in the dark days of the dictatorship bears this out.

Our new Constitution has laid the framework for a system that recognises the right of workers to self-organisation, collective bargaining and peaceful concerted action, including the right to strike. But over and above the constitutional provisions, there is actually a palpable change in the labour relations picture in the Philippines today. In a manner of speaking, labour-management relations in my country are now taking the less-travelled path of maximum liberalisation rather than suppression of trade union rights, of voluntary and amicable resolution of industrial relations issues rather than compulsory arbitration by the State.

There is a resurgence of unionism in our country. Since 1986, there has been a 20 per cent increase in the number of registered labour organisations. Likewise, the number of collective bargaining agreements has gone up by 33 per cent for the same period. More significantly, the right to unionise has been extended to the public sector, the very first time such a right has been extended to government workers outside the corporate sector.

There is a marked shift in our dispute settlement approaches. Instead of the compulsory arbitration methods of the past, voluntary modes of dispute settlement, such as conciliation and voluntary arbitration, are now being employed. A National Conciliation and Mediation Board has been established to stress preventive, rather than remedial, actions in labour-management relations.

We are actively encouraging the establishment of labour-management councils at the plant as well as at the provincial and regional levels. They will serve as a mechanism not only for settling industrial relations issues but, more importantly, for ensuring co-operative action on such common concerns as productivity and the sharing of productive gains. We have initiated a movement towards area- and enterprise-based social compacts, which are voluntary agreements between labour and management to help to bring about industrial peace and economic stability. The forging of such compacts is based on the principle of shared responsibility between labour and management in fostering industrial peace.

Representation of workers and employers in policy-making bodies of the Government continues to be encouraged. National, regional and industrial tripartite conferences and meetings are regularly called for consideration and adoption of voluntary codes of conduct designed to promote industrial peace or to align labour-management relations with established priorities in economic and social development. In November 1987, the President formed a Tripartite Review Committee, many of whose members are part of the Philippine delegation to this Conference. The Committee has the task of reviewing all existing labour laws and recommending the necessary amendments. I am pleased to report that it has presented an initial set of amendments relative to labour relations laws which now form part of a draft Bill certified by the President to the Legislature as urgent. A high-level council on labour and employment will shortly be constituted to provide advisory and consultancy services to the Government on matters concerning labour. This council will be composed of representatives from relevant government agencies, the management sector and the trade unions. With the establishment of this council, tripartism as a policy of the Government will have been institutionalised.

Thus, we can proudly say that we have gone beyond the realm of rhetoric in ensuring the basic rights of the workers in our country. I would like to think that the developments in the industrial relations picture in the Philippines reflect our desire to be transparent, accountable and consultative in our task of governing. In the final analysis, the positive developments on the Philippine labour front are one of the best manifestations of the primacy of human rights in my country today.

But the developments are not confined to a more liberal and egalitarian labour relations system. In fact, the lot of the working man can never be gauged solely on the basis of the state of relations between labour and management.

The overriding labour policy of our present Government was clearly enunciated by President Aquino during the last Labour Day celebration. That policy seeks to achieve for the Filipino working man the greatest possible freedom and equality of opportunity. It views the working man not just as a means of development. The improvement of his well-being is the end of development itself. The means to this end is the generation of well-paid and sustainable employment.

Consistent with this policy framework, our national development plan for 1987-92 embodies a development strategy over the medium term that is both employment-oriented and rural-based. This strategy has been translated into a number of policy measures and programmes intended to foster greater labour utilisation and improve the general welfare of the labour sector.

Among these policy reform measures are: the commitment to the use of labour-based, equipment-supported technology in government infrastructure projects; the encouragement of micro-cottage and small and medium-scale industries which by their very nature are labour-intensive; and the encouragement of more investments for sustained growth.

Alongside these policy initiatives, the Government has launched programmes to remedy poverty such as the emergency employment schemes intended for those sectors requiring the greatest assistance – the out-of-school youth, the landless rural workers, women and minors, and others similarly situated.

Livelihood programmes are likewise being strengthened and expended to create self-employment opportunities and supplement the income of workers. To this end, non-governmental organisations and the private sector are actively participating not only in the development of such projects but also in the channelling of credit for them.

At this point I would like to refer to the Director-General's Report on the measures that must be taken to give women their rightful place in social and economic life. In the Philippines the principle of equal opportunity and fair treatment of working women has gained headway under our new Constitution as well as our national development plan. Both documents explicitly recognise men and women as equal partners in nation-building and development and uphold the protection of women's welfare. Measures are also being taken to raise our women's consciousness of their rights, improve their self-perception and increase their self-respect in order to develop their full potentialities.

A Senate Bill has been introduced to strengthen the prohibition on discrimination against women in the workplace. It penalises acts of discrimination such as payment of a lower wage to a female employee than a male employee for work of equal value, and favouring a male over a female employee with respect to promotion, on account of their sexes.

Another group that is of major concern to my Government at present are our migrant workers. Last year alone over 400,000 of our workers left the country to take jobs abroad. The increasing outflow of our workers has, however, been matched by a rise in welfare problems. The alarming thing about this is that the problems are, to a large extent, concentrated in specific service occupations. In response to this situation, my Government has imposed a temporary ban on the deployment of certain skills, specifically domestic helpers, until protective mechanisms to ensure their safety and welfare have been set up. This requires co-operative action by both the sending and receiving countries.

I would like to express our appreciation to host countries who give adequate attention to the economic as well as social needs of Filipino workers. It is much to the ILO's credit that we now find a forum for discussing improvements in standards for migrant workers, for easing the tensions between the sending and the receiving countries, and for facilitating the search for solutions aimed at securing the recognition of the rights of our migrant workers.

During the 74th (Maritime) Session of the Conference held last year, it was agreed that seafarers shall have the right to social security protection. I am happy to report that Filipino seafarers now enjoy full social security coverage. On the local front, the President has issued an Executive Order increasing the sickness and funeral benefits allowable under our country's employees' compensation programme.

We recently put into operation an occupational safety and health centre for our workers – the first of its kind in south-east Asia. It will serve as the nerve centre for all research and training requirements in the field of health and safety in the workplace. It will provide expert advice to the Government relative to the formulation of policies and standards, as well as assist employers and workers in implementing improvements at their workplaces.

In closing, I would like to express my Government's satisfaction and appreciation of the work that the ILO has undertaken over the years. Allow me also to reaffirm once more my Government's support of the Organisation's mission and programme that seek to better the quality of life for the working man.

Mr. GALEA (Minister for Social Policy, Malta) – May I congratulate the President on his appointment to preside over this session of our Conference.

The Director-General, Mr. Blanchard, this year chose as the theme of his balanced and exhaustive Report, the ILO's contribution and its commitment towards the attainment of internationally accepted common standards of human rights – implied as an objective of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

In my response, I will seek to focus on five aspects of the policy which the Maltese Government, in the one year that it has been in office, has sought to develop and which are related to the implementation of work-related human rights; these may be of some general interest.

These five aspects are: first, the implications of the right to work in terms of re-education and training of the unemployed; second, the rights of the non-paid workers – a subject to which I devoted the main part of my statement to the Conference last year, which I believe deserves mentioning again because of the non-monetarised sector of the world economy – given that the huge army of non-wage-earning and unsalaried workers is undoubtedly the most neglected segment of the human workforce. This is perhaps the field most open to innovative ILO action and the most flagrant gap in the spectrum of human rights provisions of the world of work. I shall mention a small step by my Government in the right direction, but I shall not develop upon the theme; however, I recommend that it be given pride of place in future deliberations of our Organisation. Third, the institutionalisation in appropriately structured forms of the right of workers to a healthy industrial environment which respects the integrity and development of the worker. Fourth, the rights of the handicapped in the world of work. Fifth, the rights of the elderly in relation to work.

Permit me to say something about the new approach we have adopted with regard to the first point. In Malta we have a serious structural unemployment problem. A substantial number of unemployed persons register at the Employment Service and most of them receive unemployment benefit and assistance. Moreover, in the public and parastatal sectors, a sizeable portion of certain grades of the working population is underemployed. In many cases, workers had been engaged, in certain levels, over and above the operational requirements of public undertakings or companies over which the Government exercised effective control. No consideration at all was paid either to the real development of the workers themselves or to the negative implications for the country's economic development, which is in dire need of skilled and productive workers. But if this was a disguise rather than a solution of the problem of unemployment, we did not believe that making these workers redundant would be the right solution either.

We are committed to a programme of full employment. To try to come to grips with the problem of unemployment, we devised an "Auxiliary Workers and Training Scheme". This is a labour institution intended to benefit both unemployed workers and those underemployed in the public sector. On admission to the Scheme, auxiliary workers are first assessed in order to ascertain their skills. They are then assigned to projects with opportunities for work suitable to their skills and given opportunities for training under programmes devised to upgrade these skills. Thus, they are prepared for permanent jobs in the public or private sectors of the economy. The workers are in no case paid less than the national standard minimum wage.

The Scheme is designed to provide immediately for short-term manpower requirements, but is geared towards long-term growth. It is supplemented by a packet of incentives for investment and the creation of productive jobs. Structural unemployment is not solved by providing social security benefits. Nor is it solved by giving pseudo-jobs in the public sector. It can only be solved by training workers for productive employment. Short-term measures which do not envisage the long-term prospects of employment tend to be counter-productive. They tend to discourage initiative and fail to stimulate growth. The stimulation of personal initiative is a primary target aimed for by the management of the new Scheme introduced by the Government of Malta.

Its Board of Management is, in fact, tripartite. It includes representatives of the trade unions and of employers' associations, as well as of the public authorities. The composition of the Board helps to ensure the fullest co-operation between the Government, trade unions and employers in the running of the Scheme. Such co-operation is necessary to take account of three factors: the market forces of supply and demand; the need for smooth industrial relations; and the attraction of investment in economic projects with a potential for growth.

The primary emphasis of the Scheme will be on training. The training sets out, first, to raise the general education level of the worker; second, to increase his technical know-how; third, to enhance participative skills in the social life of the workplace. These three factors interact. I would like to stress that we intend to plan the training programmes in our "Auxiliary Workers and Training Scheme" in such a way as to provide not only the precise technical know-how corresponding to the changing demands of the labour market in this age of technological innovation, but also, first and foremost, to foster the development of the personality of the worker and his human potential. The right to work carries with it a moral responsibility on the part of the worker to respond in a reasonable manner to training and job opportunities offered to him.

In the second place, after the primary problem of unemployment, my Government has sought also to grant public recognition of the human rights of unpaid working people, which are far too often ignored. The world of work is not limited to the wage-earner. In my country, as in the rest of the world, many people work for no monetary reward. This year's budget took an important social policy measure to help unpaid family workers by introducing an allowance paid by the Department of Social Security to mothers who have a dependent child. This measure is at present restricted to mothers forming part of a household whose aggregate income falls within definite limits. It is hoped to expand this service so as to benefit more mothers with family responsibilities.

But even this is only scratching at the surface of a vast, deeply buried reality. Current statistics do not truly reveal the real features of the world of work. This is most patently obvious in their near total lack of information about unpaid workers and the non-monetarised sector of the economy.

This is also true in other fields. For instance, in Malta, at the end of March 1988, the unemployment rate, calculated on the basis of those registering for work at the Employment Service, was given as 4.6 per cent of the working population. It would seem that there is a growth of job opportunities as there was almost a 1 per cent increase in the number of gainfully occupied persons last year. However, these figures, which are used at the present as the basis for economic planning, are far from representing a complete or accurate picture of the employment situation. For one thing, the numerical calculation takes no account of the social and human implications of work. Second, the definition of "unemployed" and "gainfully occupied" is linked to the labour market concept and does not reflect situations of underemployment; still less does it recognise the massive reality of unpaid workers. The planning of labour policy on a truly realistic basis calls for an assessment of data regarding manpower skills and their deployment. My Ministry for Social Policy has been discussing with other ministries what measures might be taken to obtain the required information at the national level. I suggest that a vast programme on a world or regional scale could be fittingly undertaken by the ILO in this connection.

I now turn rapidly to my third topic. The respect of human rights and the quality of working life depends to a large extent not only on such conditions of employment as wages, but also on the working environment. In Malta the Factories Ordinance, and regulations issued thereunder, had already established minimum standards of health, safety and welfare at the place of work. But soon after taking office, my Government felt it necessary to set up a National Commission (on which trade unions and employers' associations were represented) to survey the existing services relating to occupational health and safety and to make proposals for their improvement. The Commission, which drew up a report within a short time, recommended the setting up of a Health and Safety Authority which could co-ordinate the functions at present carried out separately by the Department of Labour regarding occupational safety, and by the Department of Health in respect of occupational health. The new Authority, due to be set up shortly, will be provided with the necessary organisation to carry out its responsibilities, including qualified trained personnel and adequate equipment. The Ministry for Social Policy is giving a high priority to the matter, especially as safety legislation cannot be allowed, as during the past year, to fail to keep pace with the expansion of industry and technological change because of understaffing and lack of appropriate testing equipment. It is hoped that these shortcomings will be remedied within the shortest time possible.

A fourth major area in which my Government felt that human work-related rights called for more effective implementation was that of the disabled. My Government therefore decided to set up another national commission to draw up a plan dealing with the problems of disabled persons in Malta, improving all the services relating to such persons. The Disabled Persons (Employment) Act, 1969, made provisions for the vocational rehabilitation of disabled persons who register at the Department of Labour. It also obliged employers to take a quota of registered disabled persons offering them suitable employment in accordance with the advice of the disablement resettlement officer and of the placement medical officers. During the past years, institutional welfare services were somewhat stepped up there included the setting up of sheltered workshops for certain types of disabled persons. However, the field services, including labour inspection services and vocational guidance, failed to expand, mainly owing to the lack of personnel. These shortcomings are now being remedied. Most important of all, however, is the generation of a collective consciousness and its juridical expression which recognises the full, special, place of the disabled in the world of work.

Fifth and finally, on account of obvious demographic reasons erroneous popular ideas about the potential for valuable work of people who have attained a certain age, my Ministry is devoting much attention to the participation of older workers in economic activities. Malta has taken the initiative of hosting the United Nations Institute on Aging, inaugurated in Malta this year. The Parliamentary Secretariat for the Aged, which forms part of my Ministry, has worked very hard during the past year to improve the health service for the aged, including a community service which has started to operate. These services for the aged are expected to help prolong working life and delay retirement. It is heartening to observe in Malta that there is a demand from retired workers to carry out part-time jobs, voluntary activities, or consultancy services. These activities do not – as thought by some people – deny jobs to younger workers; on the contrary, they supplement the activities of the working-age people by sharing with them the experience they have gained over a number of working years. My Ministry is seeing what can be done to encourage older workers to remain active for as long as their health permits, without suffering undue economic disincentives for prolonged services.

Having now highlighted the five areas to which my Ministry gave particular importance, I will conclude by recalling that in the most general way my Government is committed towards the protection of human rights everywhere, and especially in the sphere of work. In this respect, it has already taken steps towards the ratification of international instruments which guarantee such rights. My Ministry is looking towards the Application of Standards Branch of the ILO responsible for the application of ILO Conventions and Recommendations for guidance in this matter. As a step in this direction, I have already informed the Director-General that my Government has ratified a good number of Conventions following a period of almost 20 years in which not one single Convention was ratified by Malta. This gesture, together with the signature on 26 May this year of the European Social Charter to which we are now going to fully adhere, will no doubt be appreciated not only by this Organisation but also by the trade unions, employers' associations and persons in Malta intimately connected with the field of work. This gesture is also seen as a contribution by my Government to commemorate the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights of the United Nations, and of the approval of the ILO Freedom of Association and the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), to which the Director-General refers in his Report, as well as a modest expression of solidarity with the tripartite world-wide interests represented by this Organisation.

It is my Government's belief that only through open dialogue can the reconciliation of conflicting interests be resolved, not only in domestic matters but also in the international field. Unfortunately, there are many instances brought to our attention where there are allegations of breaches of human rights, as envisaged in the principles of the ILO. We should all be vigilant and never allow situations to reach such proportions as to merit international action or sanction.

The situation of the Palestinians in the occupied lands, as well as the victims of apartheid in South Africa, are two such instances. We urge all concerned to spare no effort to rectify matters. Through our diplomatic representatives at the United Nations and elsewhere during the past year, Malta has taken various initiatives for world peace and we strongly believe in the principle which animated the founding Members of the ILO that there cannot be genuine world peace without social justice.

Interpretation from Greek: Mr. GENNIMATAS (Minister of Labour, Greece) – On behalf of the Greek delegation and on my own behalf, may I begin by warmly congratulating the President on his election to his lofty post. I am convinced that with his vast experience, he will guide the work of this session to important conclusions. May I also congratulate the Vice-Presidents of the Workers' and Employers' groups on their election.

The Report of the Director-General of the International Labour Office is a hard-hitting document which raises a number of questions and which alludes to other important ones.

This Report, which is written in a simple and classical style, without lyricism or dramatisation of situations, is a democratic challenge to all of us.

We, politicians and social partners, have a duty to stop the rot. We cannot guarantee human rights, democracy – political democracy, economic and social democracy – by merely expressing wishes but only by rigorously acting, which we should all do together.

Democracy is not only a system of power but also a way of life and a means of organising work.

The International Labour Organisation has always constituted, and still constitutes, an oasis in our tormented world where human rights are more frequently violated than respected.

Military conflicts are more widespread than peaceful coexistence. Democratic regimes are much more rare than non-democratic regimes.

Greece, the birthplace of democracy, has suffered greatly from these evils.

I want to mention some symbolic dates that the Director-General recalled in his Report. International Labour Convention No. 87 was voted in 1948 when my country was torn apart by a civil war which was destroying what remained from the efforts of Nazism and Fascism.

The year 1968 was proclaimed the International Year for Human Rights, and we had a dictatorship in my country which had already lasted for several years, abolishing democracy and human rights. Our wounds have healed since then, thanks to the efforts of our people, the sacrifices of our workers and the assistance of certain international organisations.

We feel that the International Labour Organisation is one of the most appropriate organisations to contribute to the struggle for human rights.

Human rights and democracy are constantly violated in South Africa, in the occupied area of Cyprus, the occupied territories of Palestine and elsewhere in the world.

Condemnation is not sufficient. The International Labour Organisation must declare a crusade as of now.

We have lived through a time in which universal values have lost significance. Trade predominates over moral values.

Recently, however, a ray of hope has emerged. The Reagan-Gorbachov agreement opens up the path to peace. The time has come for both sides to stop confrontation in the political and military area, thus creating conflicts, and the parties should enter into socio-political competition to give a new impetus to development. Instead of trying to develop machines to exterminate mankind and the planet itself, the parties should try to find machinery to save mankind.

Thus, the trends should be reversed. We should not be pessimistic as regards the rate of world development.

Obviously we must define criteria and the scope of economic development. But above all, we should be aware of our responsibilities for all the values which promote development.

There is one question which is very important and we must answer it. Development is for whom and hand-in-hand with whom?

The first part of the question is certainly a matter of productive forces. The second part affects workers in industrial and post-industrial societies and it plagues the people of the Third World who, at the moment, are in a situation of poverty in which all the disadvantaged groups in the world pay most for the heavy burden of the continuing world economic crisis.

This is a dual question. It is easy to answer the question but it is much more difficult to translate these words into action.

Development must simultaneously have economic, social and cultural objectives.

The economic objectives respond to the question: For whom is development? The social and cultural objectives respond to the other part of the question.

Work is both a social right and the principal factor of production. Consequently, it is involved in the process of achieving the three objectives of development.

The fundamental principles which have created the need for the welfare state should not fade during periods of economic crisis and come to the fore only during periods of economic recovery.

On the contrary, the welfare state should be stressed during periods of crisis, when the society of solidarity appears, because it is then that the least advantaged sections of society pay dearly for the consequences of the crisis.

We must stress fundamental principles: remuneration according to the contribution to the process of production; social services according to need; adaptation of development to the natural and cultural environment of labour and adaptation of the environment to man.

It is not that man cannot adapt but what must exist are adaptable societies.

Work, as a factor of production, should meet the challenge of the year 2000.

A new era is being born. We have dramatic scenarios, as regards production, productivity, competitiveness. There are striking technical developments and there is a constant reduction in the value and volume of raw materials; there is a vast increase in the cost of knowledge, as compared with the cost of work; we have a boom in exchange rates and access to credit which dominates trade and production. And all this requires a new approach and a new strategy.

In a few years, the employers' dilemma, faced with the problems of flexibility and greater ease of action, or the problems of trade unions who wish to return to the well-known compromise of the social contract, will in fact become a false dilemma because of the developments I have mentioned.

The cost of knowledge which is continually increasing, and the need to master revolutionary new technology reverse the idea of mankind which we have formed as merely a link in the chain of production.

A century of social struggle has not helped to close the gap between manual and intellectual work, but new technology is closing it decisively. In the year 2000, workers will do their work with a spirit of discernment, perspicacity and imagination in any area of production where they find themselves.

Our epoch offers two requirements therefore: first, participation; secondly, education – in the sense of systematic transmission of knowledge at various levels and also in the area of vocational training and continuing education.

The so-called labour relations, or rather human relations, governing conflicts and contradictions between the factors of production, are based on a strategy which has two aspects: democratisation and modernisation.

A democratic dialogue must be established between the social partners, in which the State will play the role of catalyst rather than the determining element of the chemistry involved.

With democratisation, we are going to search out a synthesis of common points between diverging or converging interests, while in each case the desired social trajectory will emerge.

With modernisation which is based on contemporary thought and on continually changing reality, stress is laid upon the positive elements designed in such a way as to ensure a development-oriented strategy.

In Greece, in this context, we have recently ratified the Workers' Representatives Convention, 1971 (No. 135), emphasising the protection of staff representatives, but also setting up workers' committees in enterprises.

In accordance with the law, stress is placed on active participation of workers in the development of the enterprise, labour relations and co-operation with trade union organisations. We want to stress the fact that these measures were supported by all political forces, and trade union and employers' organisations.

The responsibility for respecting the law is incumbent upon all parties concerned without any intervention from the public authorities.

In the context I have just mentioned, we entirely agree with the arguments put forward in the Report and therefore we participate in the efforts of the Organisation and promote them with all our strength.

The activities decided upon at previous sessions of the International Labour Conference promoting equality between men and women, labour relationships, vocational training, employment, health and safety, the protection of the environment, as well as the aims and programmes of the Medium-Term Plan 1990-95, are in accordance with the needs of workers and the desired progress of development.

For the right to life, health, safety at work, in the factory, on the building site, is a subject of primary importance. It is primordial because human life is not a coin which can be exchanged against something else. It is not a renewable resource. There are some moral values we must always maintain but nothing is higher than man himself.

We try to defend the right to employment: first, by means of intervention during periods of acute unemployment; secondly, by restricting unemployment at the source; thirdly, through training and vocational guidance; fourthly, with occupational retraining and social integration of people with special needs; fifthly, by unemployment insurance to eliminate the inequalities created by unemployment.

As regards the right to remuneration, beyond the guaranteed basic wage we promote the defence against inflationist pressures by self-financing systems partly linking remuneration with productivity; productivity which improves all the factors of production, on the basis of an improvement of labour relations.

The choice, the way and the application of these remuneration schemes are the subject of sole concern to the two parties involved, and will be based on free collective bargaining between the partners.

In my country, we are already revising the institutional framework of collective relationships and negotiations.

We have already begun constructive dialogue with all trade union organisations of workers and employers.

Our guide-line in this endeavour is the adoption of a flexible framework which makes it possible for both parties freely to discuss all the subjects of concern to them.

As we emphasised in the Report, there is a gap between intentions and results, and to bridge this gap a permanent dialogue is being proposed by the Director-General. Dialogue, ideas and new methods require the invention of new values which would take account of economic pressures which the developing countries have to face and also the economic competition among developed countries.

The uniform application of international labour regulation in the area of labour relations is distorted by the secondary effects of unprincipled competition which is a characteristic feature of economic transactions.

The problem of poverty in a large part of the developing countries' population, particularly in the Third World, cannot be mechanically solved by applying general rules protecting workers.

Noting this reality should lead us to find new methods of enlarging the technical assistance provided by the International Labour Organisation capable of promoting economic development.

At the same time the ILO is the most competent institution to make the international community more aware of the problems, encouraging it to put forward new global proposals which will lead to a much better proportioned and fairer economic development for all the countries of the world.

We should send out from this Conference a message of hope. A message to all the young people of the world telling them that our struggle, our efforts, are aimed at a better world, less competition, more sensitivity to the everyday problems, difficulties and dead-ends which are often encountered by the younger generation in finding their first creative job in the world of work.

We must say to the disadvantaged groups that we are considering their problems and we consider them full members of society.

We should like to say to women that the struggle for equality is a common struggle of both sexes and that this equality will be achieved in a democratic society.

We should like to say to all workers that we shall stop the exploitation of men by men.

We should like to say to peoples struggling for independence that we are energetically on their side.

We should like to say to political leaders that they must safeguard peace.

Interpretation from French: Mr. BLEUX (representative of the World Confederation of Labour) – On behalf of the World Confederation of Labour, first of all allow me to express our satisfaction with the Report of the Director-General. We would like to congratulate him on the contents of the document and the central theme he has chosen for discussion Human rights – A common responsibility.

The discussion of the Report is particularly important and gives us an opportunity to consider the state of human rights, as well as to seek ways and means to promote them at a time which is critical for social, economic and political development throughout the world.

As the Director-General states, in the introduction to Part I of his Report "The promotion and protection of human rights is a continuing process...The achievement of human rights is an integral part of efforts to secure man's material well-being and spiritual development, and in this sense economic development cannot be separated from social development." Despite the fact that most member States have acceded to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and have adopted ILO Conventions dealing with fundamental human rights such as the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105), Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100), and others, many do not actually apply them.

The ideas in all these instruments, which correspond to the aspirations of workers and their organisations, have been a source of encouragement to the trade union movement in its incessant struggle against injustices, inequalities and violations of freedom and human rights.

The number of abuses and infringements of human rights are still legion today in various regions of the world, regardless of the economic and political system. In many countries, they take the form of violent repression of any popular, especially trade union, actions resulting in dismissals, imprisonment, torture, disappearances and assassinations – not to mention the confiscation of trade union property and the dissolution of organisations.

One of the most flagrant forms of violation of human rights and racism has found its most odious expression in the racism apartheid regime in South Africa. The Black populations are deprived of the very right to legal existence in their own country. They are subjected to the arbitrary whims of the public authorities and white economies. The complicity of certain powers in pursuit of their material interests hampers the application of sanctions and the embargo decided upon by the United Nations to eliminate apartheid, while millions of Blacks are suffering from daily discrimination, exploitation, absence of freedom, restriction of trade union rights, violent repressive measures, internment and killings.

Furthermore, the policy of homogeny, absurd wars, arms expenditure, and genocide bring serious consequences for the workers and the people concerned in their wake. The atrocious example of the bombing of Kurdish towns, killing of millions of people, is as deplorable as the increasing violation of human rights in Iran. Finally, an end must be put to the inadmissible oppression of the Palestinian population in the occupied Arab territories and a valid solution found which respects the rights of the Palestinian people.

In many countries, political, economic, social and cultural models and structures are imposed; austerity programmes are introduced and liberties and basic human rights are flouted, in the name of national security.

In general and throughout the world, massive abuses of human rights take the form of disregard for basic needs. It is superfluous to mention that underdevelopment in the social and economic spheres constitutes a major obstacle to the enjoyment of economic, social and cultural rights and affects large layers of populations who live in the poverty-stricken and destitute conditions.

In a great many Third World countries, basic human rights are not respected. Indeed, there are many populations who have no access to a minimum of food, medical care, education or income. Workers cannot organise themselves freely in order to defend their rights. The rural world, which after all is the immense majority in the Third World, lives under the burden of unbearable economic, social and cultural privation. In this respect, we can only commend the Conference for having included the discussion of rural employment in its agenda.

In accordance with its principles and objectives, the World Confederation of Labour (WCL) has made it a priority to defend human freedoms and rights against all forms of discrimination and exploitation, particularly racism and apartheid, and has come out against all forms of domination and political, economic, social and cultural exploitation. Seminars and various meetings held by the WCL on human rights and basic freedoms have demonstrated that its main concern is to safeguard human rights and the integrity and dignity of people and to uphold their organisations. Its actions have taken many forms: representations to international organisations; complaints to the ILO; co-operation with non-governmental organisations and other trade union organisations; information and protest campaigns; various aid to victims and their families; missions in the field to collect information and protect the people and organisations concerned, irrespective of the political system. The WCL has intervened in Poland, Turkey, Chile and many other countries.

Structures of economic and political domination, which set out to make a profit, give rise to situations of injustice and dictatorship. The policy and action of international finance organisations, such as the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank, are dangerous, in so far that they force the Government into debt and apply adjustment and austerity measures which are hard on the workers and favour national oligarchies. Trade union organisations, who represent those who are the main victims, should be consulted and participate in the framing of economic policies to ensure the respect of workers' rights.

We were pleased that a High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment was held last November; we hope that the conclusions will help towards reducing the serious imbalances in the world economy, promoting employment and alleviating poverty through the combined efforts of all international organisations. The ILO should be commended for having initiated this meeting because, in so doing, it has demonstrated its will to promote economic and international policies which favour equality and social justice.

Freedom of association, the right to organise and the right to collective bargaining are essential for the representation and defence of workers' rights and interests, which are closely linked to development, requiring co-operation and solidarity on the part of all. This is the reason why the workers' representatives of organisations affiliated to our Confederation have submitted two resolutions to this Conference: one concerning the promotion of human rights and development, and the other concerning solidarity and co-operation between the affluent countries and countries of the Third World and the role of the ILO in social and economic development.

We are pleased to note that the resolutions concerning the promotion of human rights has been given high priority and ask that positive action be taken to defend better liberties and human rights throughout the world.

Whilst appreciating the activities of the ILO in the areas of studies, technical co-operation for development and attempts to reduce poverty and the examination of complaints and the application of ILO standards, we also feel that constant efforts should be made to improve the procedures and adopt new measures to ensure that abuses and injustices cease and human rights and freedoms are respected everywhere.

We should also like to say that, in its future activity programmes, the ILO should give even greater support to workers' own efforts and provide them with the necessary means to strengthen their trade union organisations, so that they might more effectively overcome economic and social problems.

As the Director-General has said "the creation of productive employment and the alleviation of poverty remains the most daunting challenge facing the ILO today". We hope that substantial resources will be increasingly granted in the area of employment promotion both in the poor as well as in the more advanced countries. Each and every one of us is responsible for promoting employment, fighting poverty and respecting human rights. These problems will become even more acute on the eve of the year 2000 if we fail to take concerted and equitable measures, which call for international solidarity.

The WCL is highly appreciative of any effort to stem the tide of human rights abuses and poverty. It remains a staunch partner of the ILO, true to its principles and objectives, and will continue to take an active part in any action aimed at establishing social justice and peace throughout the world.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. DAGVADORJ (Government delegate, Mongolia) – May I begin by wholeheartedly congratulating the President on his unanimous election to this lofty post and express my conviction that his many years of rich experience, both in trade union organisations and in the State Secretariat for Labour and Wages of the German Democratic Republic, will assist him in successfully in coping with the responsible task of guiding the work of this session.

The present session of the Conference is taking place in conditions where we are seeing an opening up of new positive trends in the development of international relations.

Despite the complexity and contradictions of the modern world, the development of events in the international arena bear witness to the fact that a new kind of political thinking is making headway step-by-step.

The Government of the Mongolian People's Republic considers the results of the recently concluded Soviet-American summit meeting in Moscow to be an important contribution to the continuance of the political dialogue, and also as a strong impulse to the development of relationships between East and West.

Summit meetings between the USSR and the United States give an example of a successful joint creation and of mutual understanding in the name of recognising common human values and strengthening the spirit of new political thinking in international relations, and even more strengthening faith in the possibility of achieving the aims of creating a nuclear-free and non-violent world.

In this context the Mongolian People's Republic attaches great importance to the Third Special Session of the United Nations General Assembly devoted to disarmament which is currently being held in New York, and considers it to be a real opportunity for all States, both large and small, nuclear and non-nuclear, to determine together new tasks and new guide-lines in the process of disarmament and in the creation of a comprehensive system of international peace and security.

Today, when the question of the survival of mankind has acquired global and priority importance the role and responsibility of the United Nations and its specialised agencies, including the ILO, are continually on the increase.

One can only express satisfaction at the fact that discussion of human rights problems at this session is taking place in the year when we are observing the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the significance of which is becoming ever greater, and also, I might point out, in the year when we are observing the 40th anniversary of the ILO Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87). This enables one to sum up what has been done by the ILO in the sphere of protecting workers' rights in the past and to determine what the Organisation should be doing in the future.

The significant contribution of the ILO in defending human rights and in promoting the observances of them is noted in the Director-General's Report. The Mongolian People's Republic supports the efforts of ILO against gross and large-scale violations of workers' rights and trade union freedoms wherever they occur. In the first place I have in mind the policy of discrimination and violation of human rights and fundamental freedoms in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories, and also the policy being pursued by the racist regime of South Africa.

The continuing aggression and occupation by Israel of foreign territory in itself constitutes not only the grossest violation of the bases of international law but is also incompatible with the very concept of human rights and freedoms. The events now taking place in the Arab territories occupied by Israel are yet another demonstration of the fact that without a just political solution to the Palestinian problem one cannot reckon with the establishment of lasting peace in the Middle East. The only way of settling this matter would be to convene an international conference on the Middle East under the aegis of the United Nations with the participation of all countries concerned, including the PLO. The Mongolian People's Republic firmly condemns the inhuman policy and practice of apartheid being perpetrated by the racist regime of South Africa and therefore declares itself in favour of the speedy and complete elimination of this policy.

The Director-General, in his Report, quite rightly points out the indivisibility of human rights, which were first proclaimed by the ILO and have on more than one occasion been confirmed by the United Nations General Assembly.

Indeed, one cannot talk about genuine freedom if people do not have guaranteed rights to life, work education, medical care, housing and social security.

We consider that the ILO has the overriding responsibility to take a lead in the general efforts within the United Nations system to protect and promote human rights, by increasing its contribution, within its terms of reference, to the struggle against unemployment, poverty, exploitation and discrimination and for the establishment of a new international economic order.

We entirely agree with the assessment of the Director-General in his Report to the effect that international co-operation and solidarity are vital factors in all efforts aimed at implementing human rights.

The Mongolian People's Republic has an integrated approach to the question of human rights. Thus, for example, in accordance with our Constitution, the citizens of our country have equal rights irrespective of sex, race, nationality, religion or social origin. The right to work and equal remuneration, the right to education and leisure, freedom of association, freedom of speech and freedom of the press are guaranteed by the whole legal, social and economic system. In our country, we have an integrated system of state control ensuring strict observance and implementation of all these rights. I would also like to point out that the Mongolian People's Republic has ratified the fundamental ILO standards covering human rights and provides for their strict observance. Furthermore, at the present time, we are preparing proposals for the ratification of two further ILO Conventions, the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138), and the Paid Educational Leave Convention, 1974 (No. 140).

Our country, like the majority of ILO member countries, is in favour of further improving the standard-setting activities of the ILO and the revision of some outdated international labour standards.

On the basis of contemporary reality in the nations' socio-economic development, our delegation on the whole supports the proposals on key areas of ILO activity as outlined in the Medium-Term Plan for 1990-95. In view of the significance of the Organisation's technical co-operation activities we consider that the ILO, with its social vocation, should further increase resources for effective technical assistance to the developing countries. At the same time, it is essential that ILO activities in the area of technical co-operation should be closely co-ordinated with the activities of other United Nations organisations which afford technical assistance to developing countries.

At the present time, in our country we are actively developing a process of renewal and wide-ranging democratisation in all spheres of public life, first and foremost in the area of economic management and the social development of the country. Our Government is exerting great efforts to move as quickly as possible from an administrative and bureaucratic method of management towards a genuinely democratic system. We are changing not only the methods but also the forms and structures of management. During this process, we are significantly extending the rights, as well as the responsibilities, of primary labour collectives. All productive, agricultural and many other questions of the social development of collectives are now going to be decided not in ministerial offices but on the spot, with the active participation of the workers themselves.

The Government of my country is carrying out a policy of open support and comprehensive promotion of the individual and co-operative labour activities of our citizens as an important and flexible way of satisfying the ever-increasing and ever-changing desires of the population for various goods and services. Collective and subcontractual forms of organisation and remuneration for work are being widely introduced.

All these measures by our Government, aimed at eliminating the major shortcomings of our economic machinery, which in the past fettered creative initiative in individual citizens and the workers' collectives.

The broad democratisation of public life and expanding independence and self-management for labour collectives naturally leads to the need to improve and revise much previously accepted economic legislation, including labour relations laws. This process we are indeed carrying out. I should point out that as we improve and revise our internal legislation we will fully take into account the requirements of international labour standards.

In conclusion, I would like to express my thanks to the President for giving me the opportunity to speak at this session of the International Labour Conference and to wish him the greatest success in his work as President.

Mr. PERIQUET (Employers' delegate, Philippines) – Mr. President, congratulations on your election to the presidency of this session of the Conference, and to you, Mr. Tsujino, friendliest felicitations.

The Philippines Employers' delegation attaches special significance to our participation in this session because our country's President, Mrs. Corazón Aquino, is going to address it.

Our delegation admittedly comes to this session in a posture that is rather defensive. Around two years ago, our country was the toast of the world when we reclaimed political democracy through a peaceful revolution. The international media vividly narrated our triumph to the world. But since then our ratings from the international media have slipped. We are afraid that many of you are not just confused about what has been happening in the Philippines. Many of you may have formed conclusions about our country based on negatively slanted reports that have incomplete, if not outright shaky, premises.

We find our participation here to be a valuable opportunity to inform the world at first hand about the meaningful accomplishments the Philippines has made in the past two years in her economy and in social justice. It is fitting to note that these accomplishments were made partly as a result of the restored respect for human rights in our country.

The Philippines' strong affinity with the ideals of the ILO concerning the labour of man, his rights, dignity and well-being, as well as the efficient use and equitable distribution of scarce resources, has no doubt been instrumental in her economic recovery.

But for kindling progress in the Philippines, much credit should go to the emergence of a genuine leader of the Filipino people. This leader's mission has been to champion human rights, democracy and the welfare of the Filipino people, and to resurrect the spirit of entrepreneurship and free enterprise, where before these ideals were manacled by political incursions. Our delegation is very honoured that this leader – President Aquino – will share with this session her views, experiences, and concerns on the Philippines' struggle for democracy and well-being, a struggle that is common to most developing countries.

So what has transpired in the Philippines since the revolution of February 1986?

First of all, the post-revolution Philippines we inherited was one that had shattered democratic institutions, a prostrate economy, and a divided, poor people. It was only a shining hope for a better future that held our country together, and this hope was evoked by the new leadership of our land.

Our immediate priorities in that initial stage of rebuilding our nation were political: these were to restore respect for human rights, including the freedom of belief, expression and association; and to revive our democratic institutions, such as our very popularly ratified Constitution, and the independence of our legislature and judiciary.

In less than two years, our democratic political restructuring was substantially achieved, and this record of sorts had its undesired, albeit amusing, effects. Our countrymen tended to have a greater propensity to exercise their newly regained freedoms. Multifarious views were openly expressed in the free market of ideas. Moreover, there was a sudden increase in the number of labour strikes. Soon enough, radical groups took to the streets with new causes to protest while the leftist insurgency intensified. Even within the Government, there was dissension. Once again, the Philippines was in ferment.

But there was no clamping down on freedoms. In fact, the Aquino Government has restored the political and civil rights of those who are now trying to undermine it. What the Government did was to pursue its compelling growth and development strategy. And all along, the private business sector was engrossed in servicing the burgeoning domestic consumer demand and repositioning itself for brisker activity. Pent-up consumer demand was so great that many firms quickly experienced shortfalls in capacity and thus had to expand.

What was noteworthy about the relationship of government and the private sector in our new democracy was the strong sense of partnership between the two. Whereas previously there was distrust, business and government became mutually supportive of each other. Government dismantled its inefficient business monopolies, committed itself to get out of business, and to stay within its policy direction and provision of social goods. Private business flourished as government interference was reduced.

Economic indicators attest to the rapid strides of the Philippines ever since her democratic restructuring. In 1986, the contraction of the gross national product was stopped; in 1987 the GNP grew by 5.6 per cent. In the first quarter of 1988, it grew further by 7.6 per cent, surpassing even the rosier estimates of some of our prophets of boom.

As the pace of economic recovery improved, Filipinos became more absorbed with productive activities. The surge of consumer demand triggered expansion of our industrial sector and this produced higher employment. Those who could not get employment in the organised sectors of the economy started cottage and medium-scale entrepreneurial ventures which were commonly successful. Unemployment eased and the incidence of labour strikes fell dramatically. Wealth creation became more widely diffused.

The centrepiece achievement in all these was the emancipation from poverty of 1.5 million Filipino families – or one-fourth of our poor population – in the space of just two years. In the past, the ranks of our country's poor only kept growing. The exercise of human rights in our democracy is becoming more meaningful as economic progress adds to the dignity and well-being of the Filipino people.

Tripartism has been increasingly practised in national policy formulation, especially where labour relations are concerned. Both management and labour sectors have represented themselves ably in various tripartite forums. The clearest benefit derived from the practice of tripartism in the Philippines is the onset of industrial harmony: tripartism whittled down the confrontational relations of labour and management and then forged a stronger sense of partnership between them. Witness alone the dramatic 50 per cent decline in the number of workers involved in labour strikes from 1986 to 1987.

In an indirect but material way, tripartism enhanced national unity, because it built up consensus. Tripartism thereby helped our democracy increase its resilience against the many serious challenges, including armed challenges, that are posed against it.

But we cannot gloss over the stark reality that the Philippines is still a low-income developing country, with one-half of its population living below the poverty line. At the outset, the national strategy adopted to erase poverty was balanced agro-industrial development, with an emphasis on employment generation. We just could not optimise the gains from this strategy due to various constraints.

One of these constraints is our foreign debt servicing: this year, around 40 per cent of our Government's budget will go into debt repayment, when this amount could have bought the basic services for health and education, and built rural roads of which we are in such dire need. For so many years to come, debt servicing will limit our growth. Since the debt problem is common to developing countries and has a direct impact on employment opportunities and the welfare of workers, the ILO should strive to have a more effective interface with international financial institutions for the relationalisation of debt policy. Troubled debtor nationals should not be deprived of their very means of survival and repayment.

Another constraint is the lack of capital. Earlier, this problem was aggravated by the widespread perception that the Philippines was an unsafe investment outlet due to labour unrest and the insurgency. By this time, industrial harmony is more evident in our country. And the insurgency is being gradually uprooted by the diffused benefits of economic growth as well as by a more forthright counter-insurgency strategy.

An upturn in the net inflow of foreign investments has been noted in the Philippines. It is quite significant that major multinational companies are responsible for a large extent of these inflows, as they are currently expanding or starting their Philippine operations.

At this juncture, allow me to cite an important development contribution of the ILO to the Philippines. This is the upgrading of our human resources via the "Improve your business" programme for small-and medium-scale Filipino entrepreneurs. We hope that this programme could be more fully integrated with the needs of the members of our informal and rural sectors in the upgrading of entrepreneurial and managerial skills. These people comprise no less than 60 per cent of our population and if they are provided with useful and adequate training, the personal and social profits that they stand to generate would be tremendous.

In conclusion, the Philippines in the past two years has embarked on the restoration of political democracy and the efficient market allocation of economic resources but without losing sight of distributive justice. The gains from this approach are very gratifying: whereas two years ago, there was stagnation, now there is fast economic growth; whereas before there was labour unrest, now there is more industrial harmony. The benefits of progress have been widely distributed such that poverty incidence has declined significantly, and the insurgency is thereby losing its reason for being. Many more serious obstacles to development confront the Philippines, but we learned to sail against the wind and prospects are bright that we shall win our war against poverty and underdevelopment sooner rather than later.

In closing the Philippine Employers' delegation expresses its deepest appreciation and gratitude to the ILO for its unremitting assistance. We were highly honoured when the Director-General, Mr. Francis Blanchard, personally went to the Philippines to convey the ILO's invitation for President Aquino to address this session. We look forward to greater and lasting co-operation between the ILO and our country, the Philippines.

Interpretation from Japanese: Mr. TANAKA (Workers' delegate, Japan) – On behalf of the Japanese workers, please allow me to congratulate the President, on his election to chair the Conference, and I appreciate his eminent way of presiding over the proceedings of the Conference. I also wish to extend my heartiest congratulation to the Vice-Presidents and to Mr. Tsujino on his election as Vice-President of the Conference representing the Employers' group. I am confident that he will perform his important tasks as Vice-President in an excellent manner.

It is timely and appropriate that the Report of the Director-General to this Conference has taken Human rights – A common responsibility as its main theme. It is timely not only for the reason that this year marks the 40th anniversary of the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights by the United Nations General Assembly and also the 40th anniversary of the adoption of the ILO Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

Today, in the midst of worldwide economic instability and strain, many countries, particularly the developing countries, are confronted with various economic and social difficulties caused by ever-increasing unemployment, accelerating inflation, the accumulated foreign debt, and so forth. In order to overcome these economic and social difficulties, many governments and employers are applying arbitrary policies which often victimise workers by reducing their overall working conditions, including wages, and restricting of their rights. Therefore, the time is now appropriate to recognise once again the principles of the ILO. It is a challenge to the ILO today, for the ILO stands for the realisation of social justice through the improvement of working conditions and the guarantee of workers' rights.

The Declaration of Philadelphia adopted by the International Labour Conference in 1944 proclaims that the guarantee of basic human rights such as freedom of expression and of association are the foundation of the ILO's activities and the guiding principle for international standard-setting activities. As pointed out in the Report of the Director-General, "the ILO was the first to proclaim the indivisible character of human rights which encompass, without distinction, civil and political rights and economic, social and cultural rights." I think this is a principle of the greatest importance nowadays and that democracy based upon the guarantee of basic human rights is what is required in the world today.

We know that the ILO protects human rights through its standard-setting activities in the form of Conventions and Recommendations and through its supervision of their application. As the ILO Constitution clearly states in its Preamble, "the failure of any nation to adopt humane conditions of labour is an obstacle in the way of other nations which desire to improve the conditions in their own countries". These standards should be universally implemented as minimum standards and no country should be permitted to deviate from their application. In this context, we strongly oppose the arguments to set up so-called double standards or regional standards according to differences in political and economic systems or degrees of economic development in any country.

It is well known that the ILO has consistently warned against infringements of human rights and made recommendations for the redress of infringements of such fundamental human rights as freedom of association and other basic workers' rights in any country through its supervisory machinery. This supervisory machinery has also enabled the trade union organisations of Japan to make very substantial improvements in the security of the rights of the Japanese workers and their trade unions. In this sense, we have agreed upon and support the protection and strengthening of ILO supervisory procedures for the international instruments through the Committee on Freedom of Association as well as the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, and we strongly oppose any attempt to weaken such procedures.

We share the Director-General's concern expressed in his Report over the slow process of ratification of ILO Conventions by many countries in recent years. Japan is no exception to this, since our Government has ratified only two Conventions during the past decade, and it has ratified only half of the major priority Conventions designated by the ILO. If our country is to make a commitment to co-operate with the ILO, Japan should first of all ratify as many essential Conventions as possible to make its domestic situation commensurate with its position as a developed country and set an example for other nations. In this respect, we are determined to spare no effort, and urge our Government to promote further ratification of the Conventions.

In coming years, it is essential to strengthen further and put into effect co-ordinated action among the countries of the world. In order to give full and concrete meaning to co-ordinated action, a tripartite consensus between the government, workers and employers is an essential prerequisite. In the process of formulating and implementing any policy, the opinions of the parties concerned who are most exposed to its influence must be expressed. Any policy would be hard to enforce without consensus among all the parties. In this sense, trade union participation is a prerequisite in the policy deliberation and formulation of any country. Tripartism is a pivotal principle for the existence of the ILO itself, and it should be protected and enhanced in every country. From this standpoint, ratification of the ILO Tripartite Consultation Convention, 1976 (No. 144) (International Labour Standards) by every country, naturally including Japan, is a pressing need, and we are determined to urge our Government to work for its ratification.

A prerequisite for tripartism is free and democratic trade unions, and freedom of association and trade union rights should be secured for trade unions. ILO Conventions Nos. 87 and 98, which guarantee trade union rights and freedoms, are of a crucial importance not only for trade unions but also for ILO tripartism. We should bear in mind that economic growth and social justice can be realised only on the basis of well-established tripartism with the help of free and democratic trade unions.

We cannot avoid the issue of peace and disarmament when we touch upon the theme of human rights. The Universal Declaration of Human Rights states that "disregard and contempt for human rights have resulted in barbarous acts which have outraged the conscience of mankind" and advocates the guarantee of human rights for everyone in the world as the foundation of the establishment of peace.

After the Second World War, Japan was able to create its national Constitution, which provides for basic human rights, freedom and democracy, and renunciation of war. It is not an exaggeration to say that the post-war economic of Japan has been successful only because it has upheld these principles. There is no doubt about one basic factor that has enabled the national economy to grow: that is, to let the nation minimise its military expenses and allocate the reserves of resources to investments in the private sector, to stabilise civil life, as well as improve the social infrastructure.

We welcome the world climate leading to global disarmament and peace through the ongoing dialogue between the heads of States of the United States and the USSR. We would urge all nations to reduce their military budgets and utilise the resources thus saved for effective international co-operation and collaboration, with a view to halting the crises confronting the developing countries and promoting their development.

The Japanese workers are working for the establishment of freedom, peace, human rights, democracy and trade unions rights. In particular, we express our strong support to the people of South Africa who are struggling for the elimination of inhumane apartheid. Apartheid is a real crime against humanity and it must be abolished rather than mitigated or compromised with. I understand that at this Conference a discussion on updating the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa is taking place and I sincerely hope that a declaration with more concrete meaning and force will be adopted at this Conference and positively supported on a tripartite basis by the governments, workers and employers of all countries.

In this connection, the Japanese workers are gravely concerned over the increase of Japanese trade with South Africa. We unanimously recognise that global mandatory and comprehensive economic sanctions constitute the most effective weapon against the apartheid regime of South Africa, and we have been urging our Government to adopt and implement effective measures of sanctions against South Africa in compliance with the resolutions of the United Nations and the ILO. We have also called upon Japanese enterprises to exercise self-restraint in any economic dealing with that country. The Japanese workers are determined to promote strong and extensive campaigns at home and abroad, until we put an end to the regime of apartheid.

Now allow me to touch upon a domestic subject. The Japanese trade union movement has achieved unity among the overwhelming majority of trade unions in the private sector after a long history of division, and a new national centre called RENGO or Japanese Private Sector Trade Union Confederation was born in November last year. I am happy to report that it has been collectively affiliated with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions. At present, we are moving rapidly towards creating one unified national trade union centre which would also include democratic trade unions in the public sector. We believe this unification movement in Japan will enable us to further our co-operation with the ILO in the future.

I shall conclude my address by expressing our commitment that our trade union movement will be directed fully towards achieving the noble principles of the ILO, and lastly by expressing my special gratitude to Mr. Francis Blanchard, the Director-General, for whom I have great respect, and to his excellent and friendly staff for their great efforts to ensure the smooth proceedings of this Conference.

Interpretation from French: Mr. DECOSTERD (Employers' delegate, Switzerland) – Again, this year, the Report of the Director-General has proved to be very useful for all of us. On the one hand, it enables us to realise the immense amount of work which is done in the various sectors of our Organisation and to learn certain lessons from it. On the other hand, the Report introduces some very well-developed thoughts on a topical theme.

In this connection I want to pay particular tribute to those activities of the ILO which seem to me to be the most important and at the same time the least recognised and most difficult. I want to talk about the practical activities of all the expert officials working in the field and trying to solve the most difficult problems on the spot and in direct contact with the interested parties. As in transnational companies, most of the work is not what is done at headquarters – and I apologise here to Geneva – but rather the work carried out in the various countries.

I am not one of those who feel that every year they have to come up to the rostrum and say something. However, after about 12 years' experience in this Conference, in the Governing Body and in certain areas of practical activity, I should like to share with you some ideas about human rights and then about the structural adaptation of our Organisation.

It is quite right that the Director-General has drawn our attention to the gap – I might even call it the abyss – which separates the formal statements from the reality. This gap is to some extent a legitimate one. It shows us the progress that has to be made in order to achieve the objective which is sought. However, when the objective itself is too ambitious, and when all the efforts to achieve it are in vain, then a feeling of frustration and discouragement, even a lack of interest, can develop that can produce an effect which is the opposite to that which is being sought. It would be worth while to think about this situation and look at the basic tenet of the Declaration of Philadelphia, which I quote: "All human beings, irrespective of race, creed or sex, have the right to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity."

If I attempt to transpose this statement, which is an extremely ambitious one, magnificent in spirit and extensive in scope, into more specific and modest terms relating to the right of man at work, these then would be the main aspects of these rights as regards our Organisation.

Being able to choose a job and not having a job imposed upon one is a fundamental right. To be properly trained to do one's work and one's job is another right. To be directed with the respect due to one's own human personality is another right. Over a working lifetime to be able to improve one's qualifications and develop according to one's professional and general aptitudes and thereby to aspire to other jobs are also important aspects of this right. To know the ins and outs of the work one is doing, to be able to express one's views about one's work and to be consulted before any decision having a direct bearing on the job is taken, and also to know the activities, the financial situation and basic principles of one's firm are also specific rights which should be highlighted. Finally to benefit in one way or another from the fruits of one's work and to enjoy a retirement which is free from monetary anxiety as far as the basic essentials of family life are concerned are other equally important aspects of man's rights in work.

There is no need necessarily to have international standards and laws for these rights be respected. It is part of the duties of the State, the enterprise, the management and the workers themselves. But oddly enough, in our world rights are continually being claimed but no one ever talks about the duties.

Rights and duties are complementary; the one cannot exist without the other. It is what John Fitzgerald Kennedy said when he became President of the United States: "Ask not what your country can do for you; ask what you can do for your country."

One has acquired the habit of classifying countries on the basis of per capita Gross National Product. But why not try to classify them in a way that might be more enlightening as regards the reality of human rights. Every year OECD awards good and bad marks according to the economic performance of its member countries. Could we not do the same thing with human rights at work, following a similar procedure? That would certainly encourage countries which are making progress and would put more tangible pressure on those which still have a lot to do in that area, but which nevertheless are inclined to want to give lessons to others.

I now come to the structural adaptation of our Organisation.

Crises always have an invigorating effect on people and on enterprises when they try to adapt to new circumstances as rapidly as possible in order to survive. States and public administration take longer to react. However, we may observe that in many countries there is a will and there are achievements showing that the necessary lessons have been drawn. As regards international organisations, they suffer from what we call the "oil tanker syndrome"; that is, they doggedly maintain their course without recognising or wanting to recognise that the world has moved in a different direction.

Our Organisation, to judge by the recent discussions about the Medium-Term Plan by the Governing Body, wants to continue to do everything. But the fact is, if you want to do everything you end up doing nothing. Since our resources are getting scarcer, I consider it indispensable to concentrate our efforts on some of the essential, high-priority aspects of our work aimed at promoting in real, practical ways the dignity of men and women at work.

Such an adaptation cannot come about unless we adopt an innovative spirit in the Governing Body to begin with, and then in the top management of the ILO. Thus it would be appropriate to prepare and assist the staff who are to be in charge of carrying out this adaptation, through an adequate policy of personnel training and development. Only subsequently could we embark on adapting the structure of the Organisation, and the International Labour Office too, with a view to concentrating the available resources along the line defined by the strategy worked out.

Let me take one example: our annual International Labour Conference or the regional conferences or even other similar meetings organised during the year. Over a period of 22 days, here we all are in situations dominated either by ritual or by some operational or emotional situation. If we look closely at the comparative weight of these three factors, we note with regret that ritual to a large extent dominates over the operational and the emotional. When I say ritual, I am not only thinking about the rules of procedure or how the Conference progresses, but, above all, about the substance of hundreds of statements in plenary or in the committees. Wherever ritual predominates, effectiveness suffers. We should think about this and go all out for a structural adoption.

All this will be a long and difficult job. Let us be honest; I know that as well as you do. But let us not forget: the only time a man does something great in his life is when he feels nothing is impossible:

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. KHOURY (Government delegate, Lebanon) – I should like to congratulate the President most sincerely on my behalf and on behalf of my Government on the unanimous confidence with which he has been elected to the presidency of this Conference. We are sure that he merits this trust as, in his country and internationally, he is one of the persons principally responsible for labour relations. We are sure that, under his guidance, this Conference will reach resolutions, recommendations and guide-lines capable of assuring a better future of peace and security.

The Director-General has given us a historic opportunity to ensure that the Conference this year will differ from previous Conference by presenting to us his Report, Human rights – A common responsibility, so that we can establish a special role for the International Labour Organisation representing the culmination of the roles it has played from 1919 to our day.

This is why I would like to say quite frankly that, as a human being and a Lebanese national, I felt disquieted and ashamed when I read the Report of the Director-General, and even a little fearful. The Director-General, no doubt, felt the same when he wrote that human rights, far from being more widely respected, are being flouted.

I would like to make this point even more clearly by reminding the 151 States participating in this Conference to affirm human rights that the war of man against man, which started with Cain and Abel, is unhappily not yet over. Every epoch has its apostles of good will, in every epoch the need to respect human rights is proclaimed, but in every epoch, too, there are unfortunately more Cains and Abels.

The concerns and anxieties of the Director-General are entirely justified, for we have lived through bitter times and we have seen that the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights by the United Nations in 1948 was immediately followed by the establishment of a racist Zionist State in Palestine. The religious fanaticism of this State is such that it believes that its people are God's chosen people, although God created all human beings and has no wish to be the God of one people to the exclusion of all other human beings, of whatever race and country.

In this same context, 20 years later, more specifically on the occasion of the proclamation of 1968 as the Year of Human Rights designed to promote international recognition and protection of human rights, we saw another racist power in South Africa deny the rightful inhabitants of that country their basic rights and subject them to the most abject forms of discrimination and oppression, dashing all their hopes and dreams.

Today, we live in a world where human rights are violated. But even more serious crimes are being committed. Ours is an age of genocide. Land is being stolen, geography is being falsified and efforts are being made to make us believe that what is false is true and what is true is false. History is being twisted and reason cast aside. The world's conscience is being buried by those who wish to be the rulers of the twenty-first century, to rule alone and have others merely be slaves or, better yet, robots who do nothing but obey, even though they are living beings.

You know what happened in 1948 at the United Nations. You know that a Charter was unanimously proclaimed confirming the importance of human rights, without distinction based on colour, ethnic group or creed.

You know this: However, I should like to add that the person who was the rapporteur of the Human Rights Commission, who played a major role in its work and who helped to draft the Universal Declaration of Human Rights was a Lebanese national. He did not merely represent Lebanon at the United Nations; he represented all human aspirations everywhere for equality among people, and for their right to life dignity and security, without discrimination. His contribution was Lebanon's contribution to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the United Nations' gift to all those who suffer and who are oppressed in the world.

What happened after that? Lebanon, a member of the United Nations, conscientiously implemented all international instruments, especially those adopted by the ILO.

Lebanon, which was a haven of peaceful co-existence for three religions and 17 sects.

Lebanon, which was the refuge of peace-loving and freedom-loving persons who fled dictatorships.

Lebanon, which was the cradle of civilisation.

Lebanon, which was the enshrinement of freedom of thought and of expression, through its books, its newspapers, literacy circles and media.

This Lebanon, whose representative had proclaimed the Declaration of Human Rights on behalf of all nations, became the victim of its own ideas and principles, and the prey of the Israeli State which seeks by all means not only to deprive us of our land and destroy our homes, but to rob us of the hope of living in dignity and freedom, and to sacrifice our rights in the name of a divine right they claim as exclusively their own, flouting human laws and the laws of God himself.

Please excuse me for baring my suffering and that of my countrymen. I am an injured citizen of an injured country, a neighbour of those who have violated Palestine and dispersed its legitimate population, and who today seek to murder the survivors of these populations – old men, women, and children – for the simple reason that they have picked up stones to defend themselves from the most savage armed campaign on earth. The same is true in South Lebanon, where the national resistance brings to all peace-loving people the message of freedom, written with the sweat of workers, the blood of martyrs, and the tears of widows and orphans.

They are also engaged in a defamatory campaign against Syria, which is acquiring the means to counteract force and intimidation in the battle between the rights of Arabs and the vanity of Israel. Today they threaten the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia. They seek to prevent people from defending themselves from living a safe life, and even from dreaming of peace.

Lebanon is one of the first States to have joined the ILO, shortly after its independence. Evidencing its faith in the Organisation, it set up its Ministry of Labour, in accordance with its laws, practices and customs. It granted to trade union organisations the right to exercise their activities without restriction; it established equality of remuneration between men and women; it promoted equality of opportunity as regards employment; it espoused the concept of full and productive employment in fair and meaningful conditions; it created conditions tending to promote national solidarity with a view to instituting social security; and in order to enable the country to develop its own special legislation, it endowed its economy with free enterprise in commerce, industry and services, to such an extent that Lebanon was known as the "Switzerland of the East".

But, as I have already said, this all proved in vain because Lebanon fell victim to Israel aggression and its armed invasion, deceit and trickery. The Israel aggressors were not satisfied merely to burn our farms, destroy our homes and ruin our industry; with the aid of their accomplices they fostered a situation which has made Lebanon the target of accusations of international terrorism. Everyone knows that Lebanon, a humble, welcoming and peaceful country, is itself the victim of international conspiracy and terrorism.

But in spite of this, Lebanon is not dead; it is not finished. Like the phoenix, it will rise from its ashes, seeking once again to become the land of peace; a model of human rights, a fortress of freedom and a sanctuary for free men.

With my last words from this rostrum before the 3,000 delegates attending this Conference, I wish to pay homage to our friends throughout the world, to our Arab brothers who have helped us and especially to Lebanon's twin sister, the Syrian Arab Republic, the Syrian people, the Syrian army, and President Hafez El-Assad who, in view of the conspiracy against neighbours struggling for a decent life, undertook with typical Arab courage to save Lebanon and, in particular, three of the most important Lebanese positions, for Syria returned to Lebanese loyal to Lebanon Tripoli, before allowing it to disappear, Beirut, before allowing it to burn, and South Beirut, before it could be added to the long list of massacres.

The Syrian experience in Lebanon shows the way for those who would apply the International Bill of Human Rights, not through slogans, speeches and publications, but through the practical and sincere protection of human rights, whether those of a brother or of a stranger.

I am very grateful to have this opportunity to express our gratitude to have the opportunity to express our gratitude to our Syrian brothers; we know that their security is the key to our own, and their national economic wealth the door through which will flow fresh air to restore our health and vigour. Last but not least, the Israeli conspiracy will falter and fade as our relations with Syria develop and strengthen.

May the forces of good meet with victory. Death to the forces of evil. May peace be with you.

(The Conference adjourned at 1 p.m.)

Seventeenth sitting

Friday, 10 June 1988, 3 p.m.

Presidents: Mr. Beyreuther, Mr. Adiko

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – We shall continue this afternoon with our discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. GUTIERREZ VEGARA (Workers' delegate, Spain) – First of all, I should like, on behalf of the Spanish workers, to congratulate the President on his election and to wish him every success in his work.

The ILO's activities, in its dual role of setting standards through Conventions and Recommendations and providing co-operation and assistance to ensure the application and observance of its rules and principles, is increasingly appreciated and valued.

As rightfully pointed out in the Director-General's Report, the defence and promotion of human rights is inextricably linked with employment promotion, the constant improvement of working conditions and the maintenance and strengthening of welfare and social security.

However, this approach does not seem to be reflected either in the imbalances in the world economic situation or in the social and economic policies of employers and governments of countries which, such as ours, are not moving in this direction.

The foreign debt is a prime example of the contradictions in international relations between the industrialised and the developing countries; the foreign debt, which rose from $376 billion in 1985 to $409 billion in 1987 in the main debtor countries in Latin America, and the failure of the Baker Plan, hang like the Sword of Damocles over the heads of the international financial system and prove that the debt is impossible to service.

To overcome these serious problems, which are causing untold misery for millions of workers and people in the world, we have to go further than moratoriums, renegotiations or mere "pay-offs" of the debt. We have to look into its causes rather than merely cope with its effects. In the final analysis, it is vital to change relations between south and north. The longer we put off this task, the greater will be the imbalances in international relations and the uncertainty in the world economic situation.

As the fundamental texts of the ILO point out, peace and social justice constitute an essential basis for the exercise of human rights. Also in this context, it is very sad to see that in the world today there are many areas in which war and social injustice are basically self-perpetuating.

We should like to make special mention of the brutal, systematic and unjustified aggression of the State of Israel against the workers and civilian population of the occupied Arab territories, and of the misery and injustice to which the Palestinians in refugee camps are condemned. Equally, we wish to denounce the apartheid imposed by the Pretoria regime and the criminal repression with which it hopes to stifle the just aspirations of the South African workers. However, the Spanish Government, beyond occasional statements, does not implement in practice the measures that might be required from any democratic State against the Pretoria regime.

Our country maintains a considerable volume of trade with the government of that country. Thousands of Spanish enterprises in almost all sectors of production, from firearms to manufactured goods, have been exporting to the Republic of South Africa from 1976 up to the present with the agreement of the Ministry of Economy and Finance for their requests for export licences. Spain imported to a value of 38,850 million pesetas from South Africa, with an unfavourable balance for our country of 26,756 million pesetas. The Republic of South Africa has singled out Spain with as the main country to which coal and uranium is supplied. But this also meant that the United Nations included Spain on the list of the main trading partners of the racist regime of South Africa.

In this situation, with the desire for peace of the peoples of Central America and the inalienable rights of peoples such as the people of Nicaragua to follow the road that they have freely chosen, or Palestine to its self-determination as a free State, it is not sufficient to have good will and hopes. It is essential to have the active and decisive solidarity of workers throughout the world who really are in favour of freedom, social justice and progress. It is therefore essential to help put a rapid end to the dictatorships from which the workers in Chile, Paraguay and other countries are suffering.

Important steps have been taken in the field of disarmament, but as yet there is no end to the arms race, with the quantity of resources it absorbs, which should be devoted to productive free employment. The arms race is not only the greatest danger to peace but it is also the most anti-economic and anti-social phase in the development of international relationships. To put an end to this state of militarisation would be to advance towards the elimination of blocs, not only in the political and military fields but also in the economic field. In this process, the EEC and the non-aligned countries have an important and decisive role to play.

In our country we are not yet moving towards promoting employment, improving labour conditions or consolidating the public system of social welfare.

Economic authorities present the development of the Spanish economy as if this were "a new economic miracle". No doubt in Spain there has been a considerable increase of business profits and an increase in GDP, higher than in most of the OECD countries. However, it is economic growth that has not been properly used as far as job creation is concerned. Unfortunately, Spain not only stands out because of its increased GDP but also because it is the OECD country that still has the highest rate of unemployment (20.6 per cent of the working population, according to the Ministry of Labour itself) and one of the lowest levels of unemployment benefits: only 26 out of each 100 people unemployed receive any type of benefit. Within the EEC, it is also the country that in the past two years has distributed its national income in the most unfair manner, since the share of net profits exceeds earnings and income from work considered as a whole. It can therefore be said that our country's economic growth contains within it the seeds of even greater social inequality.

In addition, there has been significant foreign investment which is basically directed at financial speculation and the purchase of enterprises previously brought back to health at a high cost in lay-offs.

In addition to speculation, there has been a process of renewing capital equipment, but more than half such equipment is imported. Our administration presents this as industrial modernisation, but it is a growth so greatly dependent that it will be difficult to sustain in the medium term. Once again, Spanish capital is up to its century-old tricks: it is dependent on the capital and technology of the great powers. If this policy continues, the so-called process of modernisation will involve an even greater social and territorial imbalance, a typical feature of under development.

The erosion of investments, which have gone into less productive activities, together with the industrial dismantling caused by the so-called process of reconversion and increasing technological and economic dependency, have had very adverse effects on employment.

Unemployment has increased from 1,872,500 at the end of 1982 to some 3 million today. This represents an average of 630 unemployed per day in the past five years. But besides the progressive increase of unemployment in absolute terms, the two most outstanding recent features of the Spanish labour market have been the excessive and widespread use of short-term temporary labour contracts and the extension of the black economy. According to official information, temporary employment went up from 15.6 per cent at the beginning of 1987 to 21.1 per cent at the end of that year, and it represents 98 per cent of total contracts signed in that period. According to the annual report of the Association of Human Rights in Spain, the number of people who have been dismissed or had their contracts terminated by decision of the undertaking was 1,670,000 in the past five years.

As to working conditions, suffice it to say that in the past five years mortal industrial accidents have increased by 23 per cent. It is very revealing that at the same time the budget of the National Institute of Health and Safety at Work has gone down from 7,200 million pesetas in 1983 to 4,100 million in 1987.

All this shows that the labour rights granted to workers in Spanish legislation under collective agreements or ILO Conventions are either not applied at all or only partially. The very precarious nature of employment brutally reflects the flexibility of the labour market in Spain and is the cause of a whole range of arbitrary actions and breaches of regulations.

Unemployment affects the whole of the working population in Spain. It affects people over 25, young people and women. This makes it hard to put forward proposals to improve the position of individual sectors: we need a social and economic policy that really gives priority to the struggle against unemployment as a whole.

Long-term unemployment is very damaging to many older workers, because once their redundancy benefit is used up, they remain unemployed with no possibility of finding a new job.

The rate of unemployment among women is 25.5 per cent. According to data from the Ministry of Economic Affairs itself, 42 per cent of the women who work do so in the black economy, and about 60 per cent of them earn less than 50,000 pesetas.

The rate of unemployment among young people is 49 per cent, three times the figure in OECD countries. The solution being juggled with in official circles is a so-called "youth employment plan" which has already been totally rejected by all the trade unions, and has only obtained the blessing of the employers. The proposal would deny young workers the right to collective bargaining and the right to contribute in order to receive social security benefits such as disability and old-age pensions, and it would also introduce wage discrimination not on the basis of work done but of age. It would therefore be incompatible with ILO Convention No. 111 and other international texts which prohibit such discrimination.

The policy of the Spanish Government and employers since 1983 places us in a state of economic dependency and uncertainty, and is socially very unfair. The line adopted has led to the impoverishment of the public social security service, in a country like ours which was never a social welfare State. Neo-liberal theories have resulted in much greater social disequilibrium than in more developed countries.

Social security expenditure is practically at a standstill, at 12 per cent of GDP. Social security pension increases have declined from 4.5 per cent in 1982 to only 0.36 per cent in 1987. The greatest drop has been since the introduction of the 1985 Act reducing pensions, which led to a great deal of social conflict. Almost 77 per cent of pensions are below the minimum inter-occupational wage, which in Spain is not much more than 40,000 pesetas.

To sum up, the situation in Spain leads us in the trade union movement to call for far-reaching changes in economic policy, which should be more socially oriented. In the light of the texts of the ILO and Convention No. 122, it is inadmissible to formulate and implement a policy in which business profits are made at the expense of mass unemployment, a disintegrating labour market and lack of social welfare.

Our trade unions have always been open to negotiation and social dialogue to find the right solutions to every one of the serious economic and social problems of our country. But previous agreements have been systematically ignored, and now the social and economic authorities are adopting ambiguous attitudes towards social dialogue. Despite the fact that the Spanish Prime Minister in the past few days has made statements about dialogue, great obstacles are put in its way in practice. Budget policy has been tailored to the employers' demands even before the annual period of collective bargaining has started. Day by day, there is a policy of putting job creation and social equity last, and trying to make the trade unions responsible for it.

Our employers and the Government are actually thinking more in terms of an apparent negotiation, which can be manipulated for short-term political ends, than genuine bargaining involving specific commitments, efforts and resources to improve conditions of work and life.

In the past few months we, the representative trade unions, have again been the ones to offer a broad agenda for negotiation to both employers and the Government. The response so far has either been an evident lack of interest in the questions proposed or, as in the case of the employers, continued demands for greater deregulation of the labour market.

The commitments undertaken by the Government, through the Prime Minister, at numerous meetings with trade union leaders, to hold talks on some specific issues, are mainly due to the perseverance of and pressure exerted by the representative unions. It is now up to the Government to show that it is really willing to negotiate, and to consider the claims and alternatives shared and defended by the unions for many years.

Our country is one of the member States that has ratified the greatest number of Conventions. It is also one of the States that has most frequently failed to respect them. The rules and prescriptions in international instruments have not yet been accepted as normal pattern of conduct, either in economic and employment policies or in other fields. In spite of the resolutions repeatedly adopted in the Committee on Freedom of Association, it is often the practice of the Administration to compel minimum services to be provided when there is a strike in the public services – which more often than not are maximum services – and nearly always without giving the unions calling the strike a previous hearing or agreeing with them on the scope and form of the strike.

In Spain, despite the ratification of Convention No. 151, the Government has shown unwillingness to negotiate labour conditions and to respect the right to strike as an indispensable part of trade union freedom. Recently, the Government has penalised the exercise of these rights by educational workers, cancelling negotiations to settle the conflict and increasing the number of working days in the academic year, thus imposing a de facto economic sanction for a legal strike. During the same period, the Government has abolished privileges in a discriminatory manner and has started proceedings against various union leaders in the public service, including the Secretary-General of the Workers' Committee in that area.

What progress has been made has been in non-official areas. As regards the unions, through full respect for the freedom and independence of each body, we are moving forward to the essential and long-awaited goal of unity. We owe to this the fact that we have been able, for the second year in succession, to improve slightly the purchasing power of wages – exceeding, by a great effort on the part of the unions, the limits established by the General State Budget and the guide-lines set by the employers association – to improve working conditions and social protection of the unions, as well as to broaden and extend trade union rights to the most deprived communities, and to groups, such as public employees, who are still denied the right of collective bargaining.

Trade union unity, within the internal diversity of the working class, is essential to meet the new challenges of unemployment, the technological revolution, the new production processes and regional imbalances, etc. To achieve this, we are in favour of developing trade unionism throughout Europe, and strengthening the role and functions of the European Trade Union Confederation, whose resolutions adopted at the Fourth Congress recently held in Stockholm, are a contribution of the first importance for building a socially and economically united Europe.

We shall be dedicating our efforts and focusing our work in the immediate future on the attainment of these objectives and the realisation of a more equitable and fraternal world.

Mr. MWILA (Minister of Labour and Social Services, Zambia) – I wish to join other distinguished delegates who have spoken before me on congratulating Mr. Beyreuther, with the Vice-Presidents, on his deserving election to the chairmanship of this august Conference. I wish also to take this opportunity to thank the Director-General and his supporting staff for producing a comprehensive and thought-provoking report to this Conference, covering real issues which confront mankind today. The ILO stands for social justice and fair play and, as such, every effort must be made to enable its work programmes to continue smoothly as planned. It is unfortunate that for this biennium, the Organisation is facing financial problems arising out of wide fluctuations in exchange rates and the late payment by member States of their assessed contributions. These problems could be solved in a number of ways, but one that immediately comes to mind is that of administrative adjustment, within the available resources and without prejudice to the important areas of ILO regular activities. I will, on my part, urge my Government to pay whatever is due to the ILO in form of contributions on time.

We are this year celebrating the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. This Declaration must be upheld by us all, as it is a panacea to peace and security in the world. Human rights can only be safeguarded through the implementation of the international standards in our respective legislations and national practices. Human rights and international labour standards are respected and enforced in my country. Our labour policies and legislation are based on principles of social justice for workers. The Constitution of the Republic of Zambia clearly spells out those principles and safeguards which guarantee freedom of association and the right to organise. Zambians are free to exercise those rights as guided by policy and legislation.

Full and productive employment is indeed the challenge of our time. Governments throughout the world are preoccupied with finding ways and means to redress this sad situation, particularly as it affects young people. In Zambia efforts are being made to solve this vexing problem through institutional arrangements such as youth camps where young people are taught basic skills, especially in agriculture. The idea is to make these young people self-reliant. Other institutions such as the Village Industry Service (VIS), Small Industries Development Organisation (SIDO) and the Small Enterprise Programmes (SEP) are all intended to create employment for unemployed persons. Additionally, it is the policy of my Government that, whenever possible, enterprises should endeavour to use local raw materials in their production processes; and also utilise labour-intensive technology in order to generate employment opportunities.

The informal sector, which hitherto was neglected in our policy implementation, is now receiving urgent attention through the enabling legislation and institutions which I referred to earlier. There is great potential of employment generation and opportunities in the informal sector. Peasant farming and producer co-operatives are unique institutions in the rural areas of my country while, in the urban areas, small industries producing basic household requirements are also encouraged and supported through the Small Industries Development Organisation (SIDO). All these institutions work within policy guide-lines of government ministries and departments.

In the field of industrial relations, my country encourages and promotes tripartite consultations. It is my Government's declared policy that representatives of Government, employers and workers should hold regular consultations on labour issues including the introduction of new labour legislation. We cherish these tripartite consultations on matters of mutual interest because in this way, areas of possible conflict of interest are thus pre-empted.

Rural employment is an area of concern to us and, for a start, the development of the agricultural sector is our first priority. Each year, my Government offers attractive incentives to farmers through producer prices of agricultural produce. It is my Government's intention to continue to offer incentives to farmers in order to create linkages between agriculture and industries that rely on agricultural produce for their primary inputs in their production processes.

The Factories Inspectorate within my Ministry of Labour and Social Services carries out regular inspections at all working places in Zambia and advises employers and workers on legal requirements as regards health and safety at the workplace; in that way, safety and health regulations are observed.

On the question of social security and employment, I wish to say that my Government is still considering the establishment of a comprehensive social security scheme which will cover, not only workers in the formal employment sector, but also those in the informal sector in both rural and urban areas. In 1981, a commission of inquiry was appointed by His Excellency the President of the Republic of Zambia, Dr. Kenneth David Kaunda. One of the terms of reference of that commission of inquiry was to examine the establishment of one social security scheme which would incorporate all existing social security schemes in Zambia. That commission of inquiry has since submitted its report to the Government for consideration. When the Government has finally approved the report on the social security scheme, it is hoped that Zambians will be properly catered for in this regard. I do hope that the Conference Committee on Employment and Social Security will come up with concrete ideas in which some of the ILO member States which are still grappling with the problems associated with employment and social security will find useful guide-lines in formulating national policies on such issues.

I wish to congratulate the ILO for paying great attention to human rights. This is evidenced by the holding, under the auspices of the ILO, of a conference in Harare, Zimbabwe, early last month to deal specifically with the abominable system of apartheid and formulate a draft proposal for updating the 1981 International Labour Organisation Declaration on Action Against Apartheid. Apartheid is an insult to humanity. The system should be denounced as the greatest disgrace to civilisation. Apartheid is a clear example of flagrant violation of human rights which the International Labour Organisation and the entire international community are unanimous in condemning.

It has been observed lately that, in desperation, the apartheid regime in South Africa has become more oppressive than ever before. There is a state of emergency in that country and there are restrictions on trade union rights and suppression of all anti-apartheid groups. This is how the apartheid regime of South Africa unashamedly suppresses human rights. Trade union rights, freedom of the press, and freedom of the people's movements are violated through state legislative powers.

The apartheid regime in South Africa has also continued with impunity to destabilise the neighbouring independent States even to the extent of raiding and bombing and killing innocent citizens under the guise of pursuing freedom fighters. The regime is simply sick and it is our considered view that apartheid cannot be reformed. Apartheid must be eliminated altogether in order to bring about peace in our southern region of Africa. The elimination of apartheid is a common responsibility of the international community and we can individually and severally do so effectively by supporting the liberation movements in South Africa and Namibia. Yes, we can express our solidarity with the struggling masses of South Africa, but expression of solidarity and giving moral support to them is not enough; only concerted action by all of us, workers, employers and governments, can bring that evil system of apartheid to its knees. We have the opportunity at this Conference of making a comprehensive review of all aspects of action against apartheid. Let us, therefore, support the draft proposal on updating the 1981 International Labour Organisation Declaration on Action Against Apartheid.

The problems affecting the world today cannot be solved single-handedly by one country or a grouping of countries with a common interest or ideology. We live in a world of interdependence where small and big nations need each other more than ever before. Let us therefore work together in harmony and brotherhood for progress, social justice and fair play in the world through the instruments available to us, such as the International Labour Organisation.

Mr. RAMAMURTHY (Workers' delegate, India) – On behalf of the Workers' group from the Indian Republic and on my own behalf, I congratulate the President on being vested with the onerous responsibility of presiding over the deliberations of this 75th Session of the International Labour Conference.

I also take this opportunity to compliment the Director-General of the ILO for the exhaustive and lucid presentation of his Report, covering a wide range of issues of very crucial importance, with the major thrust on human rights and the ILO. It was four decades ago that the United Nations General Assembly adopted the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the preamble of which had underscored the imperative need for "recognition of the inherent dignity and of the equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human family" as "the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world". It was again in 1948 that the tripartite International Labour Organisation, whose Constitution, written nearly three decades before the UN Declaration, began with the recognition that "universal and lasting peace can be established only if it is based upon social justice", adopted the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention (No. 87). Twenty years later, this august Conference had gone into a reappraisal of the ILO's activities from the human rights angle on the occasion of the International Year for Human Rights. I therefore laud the Director-General's choice of human rights and international labour standards for occupying the prime position in his Report by very aptly pointing out that all ILO activities are related in one way or the other to human rights "because the achievement of human rights is an integral part of efforts to secure man's material well-being and spiritual development, and in this sense economic development cannot be separated from social development". There can, therefore, be no compromise on the issue of protecting and promoting human rights.

Our all-pervasive leader Mahatma Gandhi had said: "There are eternal principles which admit no compromise and one must be prepared to lay down one's own life in the practice of them". The objectives of the United Nations Declaration of Human Rights and ILO Convention No. 87 are eternal principles which give no room for any compromise. The trade union organisations in India, and particularly the one to which I owe my allegiance, the Indian National Trade Union Congress founded on the Gandhian tenets of trade unionism, will defend to the last the workers' freedom of association and their right to organise themselves.

I am making such an assertion as one representing the working class of a member State which does not deem it necessary to ratify the two ILO Conventions Nos 87 and 98 concerning the eternal principles referred to above. Ratifications of these two conventions would be of no significance when their prime objectives are enshrined in the very Constitution of the country. Freedom of association is a fundamental right guaranteed to Indian citizens under the country's Constitution and hence there has arisen no compunction in the failure to ratify the convention. Likewise, the objectives of Convention No. 98 of 1949 are in full play as amply reflected in the multiplicity system in the functioning of our democracy – the world's biggest – and in the multiple national and regional trade union centres operating as the frontal organisations of the political parties in the trade union fields.

As regards this, there are countries that have been with audacity trampling over human rights and dignity with utter disregard to its condemnation on a global scale. It is indeed an indelible blot on the entire civilised world that the racist White minority regime in South Africa is being allowed to pursue with its most despicable apartheid policy to deny to the majority of the population the basic human rights and freedom. It is all the more appalling that affluent member States of this tripartite Organisation, who are the votaries to these two covenants and who are unduly loud in their claims to be the crusaders for freedom and human rights, continue to maintain economic, trade and even military links with the racist regime in defiance of world opinion. These affluent nations have been consistent in their resistance to any move for the imposition of mandatory sanctions against the pernicious White minority regime, which has let loose a reign of unabashed violence on the indigenous South Africans, who constitute the vast majority. Leaders of freedom-loving South African people, like Mr. Nelson Mandela and others, have been mercilessly incarcerated by the barbaric racist regime, disregarding all moral and ethical norms. And yet, the affluent nations have no qualms to continue to thwart any attempt to get mandatory sanctions against the brutal South African regime adopted by the United Nations Security Council.

It is a historical fact that it was the twentieth-century apostle of truth and non-violence, Mahatma Gandhi, who was the first to raise his voice of protest against racial discrimination in South Africa. India has all along been consistent in playing a leading role in the fight against the most uncivilised apartheid policy. The barbaric South African regime is now trying to retaliate against the front-line nations in Africa. The non-aligned countries have instituted an AFRICA Fund to insulate the front-line countries from any retaliatory and aggressive actions by South Africa. India has contributed substantially to this fund and is one of the leading States in mobilising more funds also.

Regardless of their ratification or non-ratification, the principles and objectives of all the Conventions on basic rights and tripartism, referred to in the Director-General's Report, are in operation in the country that I am representing here today. There are national laws like the Trade Unions Act, the Industrial Disputes Act to govern industrial relations; the Industrial Employment (Standing Orders) Act, the Equal Remuneration Act, the Bonded Labour (Abolition) Act, the Child Labour (Prohibition and Regulation) Act, and so on. In fact, there is no dearth of legislation protecting the interests of the workers. Tripartism is being fully practised. Tripartite consultations precede the formulation of policies, planning and enactments. The problem, however, is in the effective implementation of the well-intentioned policies and enforcement of the laws due to an outmoded enforcement system and machinery. There is yet another problem to be coped with and that is the collusion between the vested interests and a powerful section of the bureaucracy, which is, perhaps, a phenomenon to be reckoned with in any rapidly developing country after centuries of colonial subjugation and exploitation. I am also to concede that the trade union movement is too weak to combat these negative factors because of its fragmentation on party lines.

As the Director-General has rightly pointed out, interdependence of human rights is evident not only in measures and policies within nations but also in their effects beyond international boundaries.

The lofty dream of universal enjoyment of human rights can materialise only through a drastic reduction in the disparities between nations and within nations. There has to be a growing realisation of the mutuality of interests and interdependence between nations. It is the need to give concrete shape to this realisation that particular thrust is being given on ushering in a new international economic order so as to ensure a balanced development of the world as such.

Unfortunately, the world economy is passing through a crisis. Stagnation in economic growth has taken hold of many countries so as to cause a serious setback to economic and social progress. The negative impact of this crisis on the developing world is having its effect on the developed countries, who are facing uneven and slow growth with a marked increase in the unemployment level. Increasing adherence to protectionist and distortive measures and policies followed by the industrialised market economy countries is resulting in the collapse of commodity prices and the deterioration of terms of trade so as to deprive the developing countries of badly needed export earnings. Barriers are being set up in the path of developing countries' exports which impede the structural adjustment necessary for expansion of exports from the developing countries. The debt burden has forced many developing countries to sacrifice their development efforts. The result has been a disproportionate transfer of resources from the developing to the developed countries and no less a person than the President of the World Bank has voiced concern over this trend. Added to these are the attempts on the part of the trade union centres of some developed countries to get international trade and financial agreements linked to the strict observance of international labour standards on the plea of safeguarding against violation of freedom of association and other trade union rights. It is most disconcerting that all these are taking place at a time when global economic co-operation on the basis of equity, interdependence and shared responsibility are of prime importance.

I had earlier referred to the Director-General's observation that the achievement of human rights is an integral part of efforts to secure man's material well-being and spiritual development and in this sense economic development cannot be separated from social development. True to its Declaration of Philadelphia, the International Labour Organisation has started attaching greater importance to the world of work. During recent years, greater importance is being attached to technical co-operation programmes designed for the socio-economic advancement of the developing countries. It is heartening to note that the World Employment Programme accounts for nearly 36 per cent of the ILO's technical co-operation activities mainly in the fields of special public work programmes, manpower and employment planning, labour market information systems, appropriate technology, rural development, women workers, refugees and population. The World Labour Reports, brought out by the ILO in 1984, 1985 and 1987, have spotlighted the trends relating to real incomes, the employment situation, wages, industrial relations, social security, productivity and participative management. A large number of member nations feel that the ILO should lay added emphasis on poverty alleviation and promotion of rural workers' organisation in developing countries.

This aspect was very forcefully projected by our Prime Minister, Mr. Rajiv Gandhi, in his address to a special session of this Conference in 1985 by drawing attention to the vast millions spread over the countryside who worked as landless labour at very low income levels, as also to those who found no work or were grossly underemployed. What more could the ILO do to make these segments of labour a major force of its activities, he asked, and he hoped that the ILO would further enlarge the work it had initiated for the weak, the unemployed and the unorganised.

The subsequent session of the International Labour Conference saw the Director-General responding to our Prime Minister's appeal, while presenting his Report highlighting three basic issues – concern over the phenomenal twin problems of unemployment and poverty, new dimensions in labour relations including the organisation of unprotected workers and certain issues in the formal sector and trends and issues related to the future of social protection in both developed and developing countries.

It is gratifying that rural employment has been included in the agenda of this session, though for a general discussion. India has implemented six five-year plans for socio-economic development and is in the midst of implementing the seventh plan; as a consequence of which it has earned a fairly high position amongst the most industrialised nations in the world.

According to the seventh five-year plan document, 206.79 million of the total labour force of 269.81 million are rural. By 1990 the total labour population is expected to go up to 306 million with 228.61 million concentrated in the rural sector. Removal of poverty and unemployment are the crucial components of the strategy for growth with equity. These are the objectives of India's planned development. According to the quinquennial surveys of poverty by the National Sample Survey Organisation, 40.4 per cent of the rural population are still below the poverty line.

With the objective of alleviating rural poverty, the union government and the state governments had initiated a number of rural development programmes like the small farmers development programme, and so on. But according to a study of ARTEP, these well-meaning programmes have not been found fruitful since the benefits had not reached the targeted groups.

It is need to be conceded that there is presently a growing consciousness, and the Government has taken some significant steps, the latest being the appointment of a National Commission on Rural Labour, primarily to study in depth the causes and consequences of the present conditions of rural unor-ganised labour and recommend a policy framework and an action plan for the future.

Yet another radical measure that the Government of India has very recently initiated is the promulgation of an ordinance against Benami Holdings in urban and rural areas. This measure, besides bringing absentee landlordism to an end and thus providing land to the actual tillers, will strengthen the implementation of the progressive land ceiling measures.

Kindly permit me to conclude my speech by quoting the resounding words of the nineteenth-century Indian monk, Swami Vivekananda, who gave an altogether revolutionary and socialist content to spiritual pursuit. He said as far back as 1900: "Let New India arise. Let her arise out of the peasant's cottage, grasping the plough; out of the huts of the fisherman, the cobbler, and the sweeper. Let her spring from the grocer's shop, from beside the oven of the fritter-seller. Let her emanate from the factory, from marts, and from markets. Let her emerge from groves and forests, from hills and mountains. These common people have suffered oppression for thousands of years – suffered it without murmur, and as a result have got wonderful fortitude. They have suffered eternal misery, which has given them unflinching vitality. Living on a handful of grain, they convulse the world; give them only half a piece of bread, and the whole world will not be big enough to contain their energy; they are endowed with the inexhaustible vitality of Raktabija. And, besides, they have got the wonderful strength that comes of a pure and moral life, which is not to be found anywhere else in the world. Such peacefulness, such contentment, such love, such power of silent and incessant work, and such manifestation of lion's strength in times of action – where else will you find these? You will hear the inaugural shout of Renaissance India, ringing with the voice of a million thunders and reverberating throughout the universe, "wah guru ki fateh" – victory to the Guru."

FIRST REPORT OF THE CREDENTIALS COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND NOTING

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – Before we continue our discussion, I now like to call on Mr. Nakamura, Government delegate, Japan, Chairman of the Credentials Committee, to present the Committee's first report.

Mr. NAKAMURA (Government delegate, Japan; Chairman of the Credentials Committee) – I have the honour to present the first report of the Credentials Committee.

The report sets out the position with regard to the composition of the Conference as it was on 3 June 1988 when the Committee adopted this report. In the meantime, of course, a number of additional delegates and advisers have been accredited and registered, and these changes are being taken into consideration.

You may have noticed that in the annexed table of the English text of the first report in Provisional Record No. 9 there is a printing error. The heading of the table should read: "List of Registered Delegates and Advisers".

In the brief report of the Chairman of the Governing Body, the quorum was calculated on the basis of the number of delegates accredited on the eve of the Conference in keeping with established practice based on previous Conference decisions. The Credentials Committee fixes the quorum on the basis of the number of delegates who have actually registered at the Conference.

Since the signing of the first report, the number of member States present at the Conference has increased, bringing the total number of States present to 141 with the addition of the delegations of Sao Tome and Principe, Sierra Leone and Solomon Islands.

The report also sets out the position with regard to incomplete delegations and the results as regards the right to vote. The delegations of two countries were exclusively governmental. I am happy to say that one of the countries, namely Dominican Republic, has now nominated a tripartite delegation.

One country, Zaire, had not accredited an Employer's delegate, but it has since done so. At present one country, Sao Tome, has not appointed an Employers' delegate and another, Lesotho, has not appointed a Workers' delegate.

The position with respect to incomplete delegations is slightly better this year than it has been in the recent past. Nevertheless, the Committee cannot regard the accreditation of incomplete delegations, however few, as being satisfactory. The Committee reaffirms the necessity of governments complying with the requirements of article 3 of the Constitution that a complete tripartite delegation be sent to the Conference.

The Committee also noted that there is some imbalance between the numbers of advisers to the delegates of each group, and in particular between the number of Employers' and Workers' advisers. Once again, it urges governments, when nominating delegations, to have due regard for the proportion in the composition of the Conference as envisaged in paragraphs 1 and 2 of article 3 of the Constitution.

The Committee further repeats the request contained in the resolution concerning the strengthening of tripartism in the overall activities of the ILO, adopted by the Conference at its 56th Session in 1971, and expresses the hope that governments will accord equal treatment to each of the three groups when appointing advisers to their country's delegations to the International Labour Conference.

In this connection, the Committee attaches great importance to the obligation of member States under article 13, paragraph 2(a), of the Constitution to pay the travelling and subsistence expenses of their delegates and advisers, and it trusts that this obligation will be respected for the whole duration of the session of the Conference.

I should like to draw your attention to the information contained in paragraph 7 of the report concerning the number of women delegates and advisers accredited to the Conference, which has been included in the Committee's report again this year in order to take into account the resolution concerning the participation of women in ILO meetings, adopted by the Conference at its 67th Session in 1981.

The Committee wishes to stress that its work and that of the Conference would be greatly facilitated if the credentials reached the Office within the time-limit stipulated in article 26, paragraph 1, of the Standing Orders and if all governments used the suggested form of credentials of delegates appended to the Memorandum communicated to the governments every year prior to the session of the Conference. It would be particularly helpful if governments would provide exact information on the employers' and workers' organisations consulted in nominating Employers' and Workers' delegates and advisers, as well as on the organisations which have agreed to such nominations.

Since this report was adopted unanimously by the Credentials Committee, the Conference is required only to take note of it.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – I invite the Conference to take note of the first report of the Credentials Committee.

(The report is noted.)

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL (cont.)

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – We now resume the discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Interpretation from Portuguese: Mr. PINTO CARDOSO (Employers' delegate, Portugal) – First of all, I should like to congratulate the President on his election to such a high position, and to wish him the greatest success in the conduct and exercise of his functions.

The Reports submitted by the Director-General to previous sessions of the International Labour Conference have always been devoted to subjects of the highest importance; this year, once again, I am very satisfied to see the topical nature and the remarkable interest of the subject chosen by the Report of the Director-General.

The Director-General is quite right when he declares that the application of human rights depends greatly on international co-operation and that the International Labour Organisation has a privileged position to promote and enforce these rights.

The importance of the implementation of such an objective by the ILO is all the more urgent, as no one can deny, and the Report itself points out, that although in certain countries, human dignity is given the highest value, in many other States, however, there are constant violations of the most basic human rights and in some cases these violations reach alarming proportions.

It is therefore imperative to relaunch, on the international level, a movement aimed at improving more and more each time everything which concerns the recognition and protection of human rights in all its aspects, that is civil, political, economic, social and cultural rights.

Moreover, international co-operation in this field has already demonstrated its effectiveness; as Mr. Blanchard pointed out there has been a significant increase in the number of ratifications of ILO Conventions, implemented after the International Year of Human Rights: it amounted to 3,338 ratifications at the beginning of 1968 compared to 5,311 on 1 January 1988. These figures are conclusive and do not require any explanation.

Portugal is without any doubt one of the member States of the ILO in which human rights have been applied with the greatest rigour and the greatest firmness. For example, the majority of ILO Conventions most directly concerning human rights have already been ratified by Portugal.

In fact, freedom of trade unions, the right to collective bargaining, the right to satisfactory working conditions, the right to equitable pay, the right to social security, the right to equal opportunity in employment, these are all questions which have been resolved in a very satisfactory and sometimes even an exemplary manner.

However, it is obvious that, in all countries, the different aspects of the rights to satisfactory working conditions, to social security, or to equitable pay for workers, depend to a large degree, inevitable, on the economic and financial growth of the country concerned.

In this regard, Portuguese employers have been very critical of successive governments in Portugal, including the current Government. Although the restructuring of the Portuguese economy must take into account tax and financial factors, it should also be the object of a thorough and rational revision of provisions regarding labour legislation.

The latest economic analyses of the OECD concerning Portugal during the years 1987-88 clearly shows the unfavourable impact of the rigidity of labour legislation on the productivity of enterprises.

In fact, the main principles of the Portuguese labour legislation have remained the same for the past 12 years or more, and were imposed at a time when revolutionary ideas of a Marxist type ignored all economic requirements and realities. Thus, the laws currently enforced are imposing extreme rigidity on realities which are in the midst of change or which have sometimes disappeared already.

For example, let us point out that in contrast to other countries in the European Community, in which labour legislation has become progressively more flexible over the past few years in order to face up to the obvious imperatives of competitiveness, and to reduce unemployment, Portugal has until now made little progress in this domain. Labour legislation is much too restrictive and there is a widening gap between Portugal and the other European community members in this regard.

However, following the electoral promises to adapt the Portuguese labour legislation to what is already applied in other member countries of the EEC, we should note that the current Government has recently submitted a draft to revise the legislation concerning the termination of labour contracts, fixed-term labour contracts and lay-offs.

This project, although it is insufficient, does, however, represent an evolution towards the hoped-for harmonisation of labour legislation in Portugal with that of its Community partners.

This draft legislation has, however, had a turbulent existence. Three versions have been drawn up, one after the other, in order to satisfy certain trade union claims, with the net result that the initial trend towards uniformity in the European Community has partly disappeared.

Finally, the Constitutional Tribunal has felt that the current version was unconstitutional. There is now some cause for concern as to what will actually happen, because the Portuguese Constitution still contains a number of revolutionary anachronisms, outmoded politically and historically, but which are still officially in force in spite of everything and remain effective in a discriminatory and paralysing way.

On the other hand, the law concerning strikes still does not deal with the legal concept of a strike and this is why strikes are still used to defend interests which have nothing to do with the socio-professional interests of workers.

The abusive use of the right to strike, which has had serious repercussions on the economic situation in Portugal, and in particular for certain enterprises, can only lead to prosecutions under legislation covering unjustifiable absences.

But although the right to strike is accepted completely, the right to lock-out under any form continues to be forbidden, and can be punished by a prison sentence of up to two years, even in cases of defensive lock-outs or of types of temporary factory closure resulting from technical problems or in order to protect plant or equipment against possible damage.

We should also proceed to a revision of the legislation and a reduction of working hours.

Indeed, in today's world of constantly fluctuating economic realities, in which enterprises have to adjust and adapt to market requirements all the time, Portugal's legislation on the reduction of working hours dates back to 1971 and its obsolescence prevents enterprises from taking full advantage of their productive capacity.

Moreover, we should point out that in 1983 the only modification introduced regarding the law on overtime has in no way improved the law. On the contrary, it has increased rigidity and made it more difficult to use overtime, and this goes against market requirement and the needs of enterprises.

In summary, it is becoming increasingly urgent to revise Portuguese labour legislation, as this will open up the possibility of reducing the unemployment rate and encouraging investment, and to move more quickly towards the full application of human rights in our country.

Among these rights, the rights of equality of opportunity and of free enterprises cannot be denied to Portuguese employers, who at present work in unjust and unfavourable conditions compared with their competitors in the European Community and elsewhere.

We hope that the ILO will be able to contribute, as Mr. Blanchard said in his Report, to the extension of human rights as a common ideal for ILO member States.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. BULGAK (Workers' delegate, Byelorussian SSR) – First of all, may I be associated with the congratulations in connection with the election of comrade Beyreuther to the lofty post of President of the present session of the International Labour Conference and wish him and his Vice-Presidents success in their work.

The Report of the Director-General, presented for our consideration, is an acceptable basis for discussion, above all because it makes an attempt analyse the state of affairs in this field. We note with satisfaction that the problem of human rights is being considered in the light of the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the provisions of the International Covenants on Human Rights and other Conventions and Recommendations of the ILO.

The resolution adopted last year on the 40th anniversary of the adoption of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), is relevant in the sense that the International Labour Organisation now urgently needs measures which would contribute to increasing the number of union members. The difficulties for trade unions of giving workers practical help in the face of the crises in the economy and legislative actions limiting the rights of trade unions are the basic reasons for the decrease in union membership in many countries.

It is also important to support the provisions of the Report of the Director-General where he represents the sphere of human rights as being interdependent with such social and economic problems as unemployment, poverty, foreign debt in the developing countries and other problems.

The Report of the Director-General concerning the activities of the ILO in 1987 emphasises the importance of the conclusions of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment. In considering employment problems, the resolutions on development, international debt and social problems adopted at the 72nd Session of the International Labour Conference in June 1986 are all, of course, important.

But it is clear from the Report, and also from the statements of a number of delegates, that contemporary realities in many countries of the world make it impossible to count on the elimination of massive unemployment, inflation, social and national differentiation in living standards and economic crisis before the end of the twentieth century.

Moreover, as the Report points out with some disappointment, "massive unemployment represents a tragic waste of [human] resources and a wasted opportunity for development and social progress" (English text p. 38).

In this connection, an important contribution by the ILO to the protection of workers' rights and needs could in our view, be such actions as the revision of the World Employment Programme, the formulation and adoption by the ILO of appropriate standards to work out and implement a national and international policy on limiting unemployment, increasing employment opportunities and guaranteeing the right to work.

The World Employment Programme must definitely be adopted primarily to the needs of the present time, when the conditions dictated by new technologies have become particularly relevant, when the problems of unemployment are so acute and when trade unions need a lot of assistance.

In speaking of what the ILO could do in order to achieve positive changes in the sphere of labour and union activity, we take the Constitution and functions of the ILO as our starting-point. That is why the main trends of ILO activities should include measures to increase employment levels and eliminate poverty and destitution, using for this purpose the resources released by disarmament and the reconversion of military production; the improvement of working conditions; the participation of workers and their unions in social and economic decision-making at all levels; assistance in increasing the role of the unions and international co-operation of unions of every kind; and assistance in increasing the role of the unions and international co-operation of unions of every kind; and assistance in developing social security systems. Taken together, all these activities of the ILO should determine and complement its standard-setting activities, which are a most important aspect of its terms of reference.

It is worth pointing out that the ILO tripartite principle is expressed in a fully balanced way only if the trade unions are given a major role in the development of social and economic policy. ILO activity should also be tied more closely to the national plans of member States.

The Report rightly points out the link between human rights and the problems of the maintenance of peace and stability; but at the same time, we cannot disregard the fact that the problem of peace and the social and economic aspects of disarmament have not been given due attention in the Report, in spite of the fact that an appropriate resolution has been adopted within the framework of the ILO.

At the very beginning of next year, it will be 70 years since the establishment of the Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic. For us, this is an important landmark, from which we can clearly see the results and the lessons of the distance we have travelled, as well as the tasks facing us at the present highly important stage in the development of our society.

The policy of the restructuring and further democratisation of our life has opened up new prospects and presented new tasks to the workers of the Republic and our trade unions.

In taking an active part in the attainment of a strategic policy for the acceleration of the socioeconomic development of the country and the qualitative transformation of all aspects of life in Byelorussian society, the unions, which are the largest organisations in the country with a membership of over 5 million view the protection of the human rights and legitimate interests of the workers as the most important elements of their work.

Combining the modern achievements of scientific and technical progress with the planned economy, we are making full use of the possibilities of socialism. Our unions are participating extensively in the solution of questions dealing with the further development of the material and technical base, the profound reconstruction of the national economy on the basis of scientific and technical progress, and changes in structural and investment policy.

It goes without saying that the measures being carried out in our country will not bring sizeable returns straightaway. However, there are already genuine, practical results. In 1987, the national economy of the Republic, according to the basic indicators, greatly accelerated the pace of its development. The growth of industrial production was the highest for ten years. Qualitative changes are taking shape in the agrarian sector.

Intensive management methods require new approaches to the management of labour resources as well.

Formerly, the needs of the national economy in terms of labour requirements were met through the greatest possible enlistment of the able-bodied population in social production, whereas now the prime concern is to free and redistribute the workforce.

The entry into force of the law on enterprises, the adoption of total self-accounting and self-financing, the intensification in the tempo of technical re-equipment and the growth in the productivity of labour are all increasing the scale of such liberation.

Clearly, many new questions arise connected with the solution of this problem, but the principal feature is that we are totally convinced that we have the necessary resources for resolving these questions. First of all, there will be an increase in the need for skilled workers in the service sector and other sectors of the social infrastructure.

Under these conditions, the trade unions of Byelorussia, together with the managerial and state organs, are implementing a whole range of organisational, social, economic and legal measures to improve the utilisation of labour resources, the establishment of a comprehensive placement service and the training and occupational training of the population. Our trade unions' central concern is for the people. The managers of enterprises, organisations and other establishments are, together with trade union committees, looking into all cases of staff reductions and the possibilities of their re-employment and retraining in new professions and occupations. Existing benefits and compensations in such cases are fully applied.

Much is also being done by our unions to implement comprehensive plans to improve working conditions, job protection and health care. We consider that the principal purpose of our efforts is to increase significantly the role of the trade unions as guarantors of maintaining workers' rights and talking full account of their personal and social interests.

Next year, the International Labour Organisation will be marking the 70th anniversary of its inception. In this connection we wish to express the hope that, together with the useful work which the Organisation carries out in working out international standards on social and labour questions, the ILO might provide decisive support to the just and difficult struggle of the workers against unemployment and for a reduction in working hours and safeguarding the interests of the workers and the rights of their organisations.

We trust that the ILO will play a greater role in the implementation of the adopted decisions to eliminate flagrant and massive violations of human rights in the Arab territories occupied by Israel, in southern Africa, in Chile and in other countries with dictatorial regimes.

On the whole, in our view, the International Labour Organisation could play a more active role in the process of implementing all the economic and social human rights and union freedoms and thereby add its substantial contribution to the solution of existing problems in the sphere of labour.

Interpretation from German: Mr. LINDNER (Employers' delegate, Federal Republic of Germany) – The first part of this year's Report from the Director-General centres on human rights and the ways and means by which the ILO might contribute to the protection and promotion of these rights.

I should like to comment on several aspects of the Report. However, first of all, I would like to thank the Director-General for the excellency of his work and congratulate him; it is balanced, objective and realistic. As I have already frequently criticised the Reports at this forum, I particularly wish to stress now my positive impression of this document.

My first comment is addressed to the remarks in the Report on the relationship between human rights and the economic background. They imply that economic difficulties have a direct impact on the capacity of individual countries to guarantee and promote human rights. I see some contradiction in this. On the one hand, we keep speaking of the indivisibility of civil, political, economic, social and cultural human rights and, on the other hand, we are told that unfavourable economic factors make it difficult for some countries to grant human rights. I cannot accept that, in particular, the guaranteeing of civil and political human rights could depend on the state of economic development, or indeed be an excuse for their violation. In my opinion, there are sufficient examples of countries with high per capita incomes, in which political, human rights, such as freedom of movement and freedom of expression, are flouted; and there are others, with poor economic backgrounds, which are exemplary in this respect. I agree with the statement of the Secretary-General of the United Nations quoted in the Report, to the effect that human rights violations do not occur in a vacuum but are the natural consequence of systems and consciously pursued policies. I greatly regret the discrepancy mentioned in the Report between the commitment of all States to respect human rights and the situation actually prevailing: on the one hand, the right of the inviolability of the individual and of freedom of movement are enshrined in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the Final Act of Helsinki; on the other hand, we have to face reality: barbed wire fences and a wall with watch-towers run through Germany and shots are still fired at those who seek freedom. These are realities, in spite of the fair words we hear or read.

Among the international organisations, it is the main task of the International Labour Organisation to contribute towards creating conditions to ensure full implementation of economic and social human rights. In so doing, the ILO and its member States must always remain aware of the fact that justice and better conditions of life and work must be founded on a healthy and sure economic basis. One can only distribute what has been produced; that, too, is a reality in our world. If we want to make a big cake and cut it into slices, we must have the corresponding ingredients. It is therefore necessary to create favourable conditions for the economy and for the enterprise or to improve them; in other words for those who can create well-being and lay the foundations for distribution. This requires a policy to promote growth without inflation, which is the best means to increase employment and cut unemployment.

In his Report, the Director-General mentions on two occasions the danger of a split in the active population. I share his concern; in my country, as well, we can witness two categories emerging in the active population. There are those who have a job, an annual increment and often reduced working hours; then there are the others who have no job and, on account of high and ever-rising labour costs, have fewer and fewer chances on the labour market, especially when they have little or no professional skills. We must find ways and means to stop this trend; and I appeal to the trade unions to recognise at last the close link between labour costs and employment.

In his chapter on the right to full, productive and freely chosen employment, the Director-General also refers to the aspirations of reform in the socialist countries. We are following with great attention and sympathy present developments in the political and economic fields in the Communist countries. Many of these countries are apparently coming to the conclusion that centrally planned economies are not effective economically and finding it increasingly difficult to face the problems of a modern, increasingly technological economy. Anyone who is not ideologically prejudiced is fully aware that an economy steered by a large number of civil servants and administrators produces at far greater expense than one that is steered by market prices. Furthermore, the socialist economies are, to a great extent, unflexible, slow and unwieldy in reacting to changes in economic trends, such as the advent of technology. Policy adjustments in such countries are always directly linked to the prestige of the State and its civil servants, because the respective Communist Party is responsible for policy and cannot, supposedly, make any mistakes. We must, of course, welcome any attempts to introduce market economy elements in the social economy, but I feel that they may only be of limited help; the cornerstones of a market economy – private property and the regulation of all markets through free prices and free investment decisions – are lacking. I am therefore doubtful about success, but it will be interesting to follow future developments.

A further sign that realities are being forced is that the socialist countries are speaking about inadequate productivity, unprofitable enterprises and unemployment in official statements. In the old days, only the Capitalists had unemployment. This new trend confirms our earlier suspicions that alongside official unemployment, there was at least as much invisible unemployment.

The Director-General, in his chapter on equal opportunity and treatment, speaks of the apartheid policy of South Africa. The German employers have always condemned this policy as a grave violation of human rights and demanded that it be dismantled. There can be no denying that this inhuman racist policy must be brought to an end as quickly as possible. However, the question remains: what measures can be taken to attain this goal and how will these measures affect the people who suffer under apartheid? I need not stress the fact that these must be peaceful measures. But peaceful measures must not have an adverse effect on those they are supposed to help. We are worried that the economic sanctions demanded on all sides, such as disinvestment, will not affect so much the White but the Black population of South Africa, because many jobs disappear; and these are precisely the modern, well-paid jobs in enterprises where apartheid was dismantled long ago and where the training and further training of Black workers represent an investment for the future. We therefore consider these measures inappropriate. Furthermore, the programme of action against apartheid that was recently supplemented at Harare requires employers' organisations to make sure that their members should have no trade, economic or financial relations with South Africa. We cannot subscribe to this because we are not competent to do so. We are similarly unable to influence investment decisions in enterprises who are among our members.

For this reason, we have reservations regarding this part of the action programme.

Mr. SUNMONU (representative of the Organisation of African Trade Union Unity) – Please permit me, on behalf of all African workers united under the umbrella of the Organisation of African Trade Union Unity, to congratulate the President and his colleagues on their election. We are confident that under his wise guidance, this historic 75th Session of the International Labour Conference will come to a successful end.

I also congratulate the Director-General, Mr. Francis Blanchard, for the high quality of his Report and the excellent work done by the International Labour Office, under his able leadership, since the last session of the Conference.

This session is taking place during the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and that of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87). We congratulate the ILO for its efforts in the protection of human rights, especially in the areas of freedom of association, the fight against forced labour and all forms of discrimination, and in equality of opportunity. In spite of these efforts, however, human rights are violated with impunity in many areas of the world.

It is astonishing to note that both human and trade union rights are more frequently violated in times of economic depression than in times of economic boom. When the economy goes bad, the workers become the whipping boys of governments and employers. It is then that we hear them say that workers are lazy and overpaid, that workers are the ones who should make all the sacrifices and accept wage and benefit cuts, retrenchment, leave without pay, wage freezes, etc. Benefits that are won through the front door of collective bargaining are lost through the back door of structural adjustment. The welfare of human beings has given way to greed and profits.

May I refer to the debt problem in the Third World, particularly in Africa, and the economic, social, political and environmental consequences of debt on the whole world? The magnitude of the problem is such that if it is not well handled, it may plunge the world into catastrophe. It is in consideration of the seriousness of the debt problem in Africa that the OATUU organised jointly with the World Federation of Trade Unions an "African Trade Union Conference on Africa's Debt and Debt-Servicing" in Addis Ababa from 8 to 10 December 1987.

Africa's debt as at the end of 1987 was US$228 billion; US$27 billion were spent in servicing this debt (according to International Monetary Fund estimates). Africa, like the rest of the indebted Third World countries, is now the exporter of capital to the industrialised countries. The structural adjustment programmes imposed by the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank on African countries on account of facilities they granted these countries to service their debts have led to massive retrenchment of workers, unemployment, massive capital flight, excessive and uneconomic devaluation of national currencies, deterioration of social services like education, health, housing, water supply, and to high crime rates, political instability, etc., leading a former African Head of State to refer to these IMF-inspired structural adjustment programmes as "adjustment without human face".

The world-wide economic recession that we are witnessing today is a direct consequence of the Third World's debt. We consider as unjust, selfish and insensitive most of the solutions being suggested by governments and agencies of the creditor countries. We totally reject debt-equity swaps, on the ground that they will lead to economic slavery of the debtor countries.

We also reject the IMF and World Bank solutions on the grounds that they will perpetuate the submission of African economies and stifle their genuine development.

I would like to remind this august assembly of the African proverb that says, "If your neighbour has a cough and you don't help him to cure it, then his incessant coughing at night will disturb your sleep." It is, therefore, my considered opinion that some sort of Marshall Plan of the type devised for post-war Europe, that will not only lead to the cancellation of the Third World's debt, but also stimulate productive investments in them, remains the only solution to the problem.

I dwell at length on the debt problem because in its solution lies the key to most of the concerns of the ILO, such as development, employment, basic needs, etc.

One of the major topics of this Conference – rural employment promotion – is also an area that can guarantee employment, food self-sufficiency, industrialisation and faster development of most developing countries. In our view, the following suggestions should be considered to ensure its success: agrarian reform; mass literacy programmes that will include vocational, health and agricultural education; provision of infrastructure, like small- and medium-sized dams and irrigation systems, roads, water supplies, electricity, schools, health facilities; food preservation and processing; assisting the rural communities in the formation of different types of co-operatives.

Environmental protection is a potential area of massive job creation. Desertification and erosion can be controlled through the planting of trees, shrubs and grass. Pollution-control measures are another area of employment creation. I should be failing in my duty if I do not condemn the attempts of certain companies in the industrialised countries to dump toxic and atomic waste in developing countries by taking advantage of the poverty of these countries. These acts are criminal and inhuman and should be punished.

On behalf of the African workers, I congratulate the Governing Body, the Director-General, the Assistant Director-General for Africa and all the ILO officials and staff for the successful conclusions of the Harare Conference on Action against Apartheid. The proposed Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia, which the Harare Conference adopted, is the minimum that the three constituents of the ILO can do to bring apartheid to a speedy end.

Recent developments in South Africa, where the apartheid regime has been repressing democratic organisations and passing fascist trade union laws, should be condemned by all decent and freedom-loving people of the world. The arrogant aggression of the Pretoria regime against the front-line States and its illegal occupation of Namibia should also be sanctioned. I therefore call for mandatory economic sanctions against the racist regime and the unconditional independence of Namibia this year. We also call for massive financial and economic assistance to the front-line States, the unconditional release of all political and trade union detainees and the financial and material support of the trade unions and liberation movements of South Africa and Namibia, for the early achievement of peace, freedom, majority rule and independence of South Africa and Namibia.

I fully agree with the Director-General who, speaking in his Report of the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories, said that "it is universally agreed that the status quo cannot last". The Director-General is correct because any policy that is based on robbery, injustice, inhumanity and brutality cannot last. The killing, maiming and jailing of the Palestinian people by the Israeli authorities during the current uprising in the occupied Arab territories should be condemned by all decent people. I would like to assure out Palestinian brothers and sisters of the unflinching support of the African workers in their just struggle. The Organisation of African Trade Union Unity supports the convening of an international conference on the Middle East where all parties to the dispute, including the Palestinian Liberation Organisation, as the sole representative of the Palestinian people, will fully participate. There can be no peace in the Middle East until the Palestinians' rights to freedom, independence and homeland are granted. There can be no peace without social justice.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. CHILO (Employers' delegate, Ukrainian SSR) – First of all I should like to associate myself with the congratulations on the election of the President to his responsible and lofty post and to wish success to the officers of the Conference.

The present session of the Conference is taking place in conditions of a definite warming in the international climate, favourable prerequisites for which were created by the first genuine achievements in the sphere of nuclear disarmament. They turned out to be a fruitful result of the constructive Soviet-American dialogue at the summit meeting as well as of persistent efforts on the part of the world community.

The further intensification and deepening of this process, the universal affirmation of the new political thinking in international affairs will assist in the strengthening of peace and security of peoples and the development of broad international co-operation, and this will also include the sphere of social and labour relations.

In our view, an important role in the achievement of these noble aims can and must be played within the framework of its own competence by the International Labour Organisation inasmuch as it is only in conditions of peace, disarmament and political stability that it is possible to have economic and social progress in countries, increase employment and improve working conditions and workers' welfare.

In this connection, we support the work started in the ILO to study the socio-economic consequences of disarmament. It is important that this activity by the Organisation should continue to expand as much as possible and be supported by all member States.

At present the entire national economy of the Ukrainian SSR is in the grip of a deep and large-scale restructuring. The special aims of the reform boil down to, first of all, to subordinating the whole of production to the achievement of socially significant results; second, to overcoming the situation of scarcity and directing management towards raising efficiency and quality, and turning the scientific and technical process into the principal factor of economic growth; and third, increasing the interest of workers in the results of their labour and providing scope for the development of initiative.

The most powerful driving force in accelerating the socio-economic and scientific and technical process is guaranteeing a person work and the position of being the real master of his own workplace, both in the collective and in society as a whole.

The most important feature of 1988 has been the entry into force on 1 January of the law on state enterprises (associations). The law radically alters the place of the enterprise (association) in the national economy, giving it an entirely new status in planning, material and technical provision, financing of credit relations and relations with ministries and local bodies, other enterprises and scientific organisations. The main feature is that enterprises are being given extensive rights, and their actual independence and responsibility is guaranteed on the basis of full economic accounting. The enterprise now works out and approves its own production and marketing plan. The guide-lines for it are the scheduled figures which are not of a mandatory nature – they rather serve as a particular form of "information" about social requirements and the criteria for their fulfilment.

The interests of society will be guaranteed through the allocation, under favourable conditions and on a competitive basis, of State orders which involve only a certain proportion of the production of the enterprise, the remainder being produced to orders placed directly by the consumer.

The law also provides for the extension of the limits of independence of workers' collectives. With the introduction of this law, in fact, a new ideology of economic management has been established, based on the principles of socialist democracy and self-management. The new conditions of management give workers' collectives the right to make their own decisions in the most important areas of economic activity and to monitor their implementation, to elect the managers on a competitive basis, starting with the brigade leaders and going right up to the director himself, in strict observance of unified management in administration.

Of great importance among the measures being taken to restructure the economic mechanism is intensification of the social aspects of management. In this area organising and providing a stimulus for work, employment and employment and providing a social and cultural service for workers are the questions that come to the fore.

As the director of a major production association, I should like to tell you how in the new conditions, some of these matters are being dealt with at one of the plants in the association – the Tochelektropribor plant in Kiev.

One of the important social problems calling for the speediest solution is that of housing. That is why the appropriate party and government directives require us to provide each Soviet family with its own individual apartment by the year 2000.

Guided by these directives, as well as by the housing needs of the workers in our plant, and using the new rights guaranteed by the law, we have, jointly with the trade union organisation and the Soviet of the labour collective, and in an appropriate manner, corrected the plan for the formation of expenditure for the social development of the plant for the five-year period 1986-90. That plan in its present form provides for a sharp increase from 1988 in resources earmarked for housing construction. Using those resources means that we will be able to solve the housing problem at our plant by the year 1990.

Our plan for spending resources of the plant social development fund also takes account of the need for developing the construction and upkeep of establishments of a social and cultural kind – kindergartens, schools, clubs, dispensaries and other establishments. It should be pointed out that today we have no shortage of places in kindergartens, dispensaries and rest homes.

With the accelerated tempo of scientific and technical progress, the introduction of new progressive technologies, the operation of the new economic mechanism, the scale on which workers are being freed and made available for other work has increased. Such people are offered work by being transferred to staff new enterprises and establishments, including the socio-cultural service for workers of our plant and of the association as a whole, and to organise multishift work and work on reconstructing production. Workers who have been transferred to other work and their families are guaranteed the necessary housing and social conditions.

Faced with the need to master a new profession, the workers, having concluded their appropriate labour agreement, can undergo further training by taking time off from work or while continuing with their work.

Those workers for whom we are not in a position to provide appropriate work are placed in jobs by local labour organs. Special attention is given to ensuring that the interests of this category of persons are not adversely affected.

In conclusion, I should like to say that like other directors of enterprises in the socialist countries, I am interested in the development of a constructive dialogue within the framework of the Employers' group as this would contribute to the strengthening in the ILO of mutually profitable co-operation in seeking solutions to social and labour problems.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. REYES (Workers' delegate, Bolivia) – First of all I should like to congratulate the President, Mr. Beyreuther, on his election, wishing him much success in the conduct of this important meeting. I should also like to address to the Vice-Presidents who work with him, my warmest congratulations on their election.

On behalf of the Bolivian Workers' Trade Union I would like to highlight the importance of this meeting's agenda. Each of the items before us deserves the greatest attention; but there are two main aspects that we particularly look forward to discussing in the respective committees. I am referring to the question of employment promotion and social security as well as the revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107). Furthermore, we would like to express our total support for the need to put an end to the policy of apartheid in South Africa.

The main theme of the Director-General's Report deserves to be highlighted. Human rights are everyone's responsibility. Let us not forget that we, the workers, are the main victims of the absence of these rights, including the lack of work and its serious social consequences.

For many years now our meetings in this forum take place in the context of a profound international economic crisis whose most serious repercussions affect the living and working conditions of people in the Third World.

It is not necessary to give extensive details regarding these implications. Various works of the ILO have highlighted the severe nature of these problems and the misleading way in which solutions to the crisis are portrayed, particularly regarding the questions of employment and wages. Unemployment is increasing in developed capitalist economies, but to a much lesser extent than in Latin American countries, where there are no social mechanisms to protect the unemployed. On the other hand, real wages have decreased significantly during this decade.

The ILO will soon celebrate its 70th anniversary. We can say that much progress has been made in the definition of standards concerning worker-employer relations. However, much remains to be done to achieve the aims of this institution. Need I remind you that many governments ignore existing standards or brush them aside in order to defend the interests of employers?

In this framework of non-compliance and omissions, many governments apply a set of policies designed to maintain the supremacy of the private financial sector over and above the need to solve the problems of full employment to protect the national interests of the Third World countries.

The ILO and its regional representation in Latin America (PREALC) have provided us with a host of studies whose conclusions we can only agree with. However, in many countries there are forces which oppose the implementation of the corresponding recommendations.

We also note with great concern that in many instances the ILO advocates approaches and policies which later are not taken into account by ILO advisers and consultants, who instead act according to the governments' requirements. A case in point is advice furnished to the Bolivian Government regarding social security and labour legislation, where ILO experts have acted without taking into account the interests of the workers.

Having discussed these questions, I would like to refer to some general topics, to deal later on with the main problems of the Bolivian worker movement.

I would particularly wish to mention the foreign debt problem, whose utmost importance is recognised by all who know anything about the international situation.

In this regard, I would like to make it quite clear that we, the Bolivian workers, do not have a simplistic appreciation of the problems. However, aware of all the problems which are linked to this question, we do not think that the solutions and approaches proposed by private banks, financial organisations and the governments of the creditor countries contribute to solving the dilemma which exists between the interests of the international financial system and the requirements of the Third World countries.

In his recent visit to Bolivia, Pope John-Paul II pointed out that one of the sources of instability in the world today is the extreme weight of the foreign debt. The lack of equilibrium between the debt and the ability to repay it, and the difference between the amounts granted to the borrowers and the profits expected by the creditors are causing great harm to poor countries.

Faced with these obvious facts, it is necessary to recognise that this is a political problem which cannot be settled solely by financial negotiations between debtor governments and creditor banks with guarantees from the IMF. On the contrary, what is needed is a joint position of debtor countries faced with an unpayable debt.

I must remind you that over a decade ago the United Nations approved a Programme of Action for the Establishment of a New International Economic Order to remedy injustice in international trade, to put a halt to the protectionism of the developed capitalist countries, and to guarantee the sovereignty of poor countries over their natural resources. All these aspects were linked also to the struggle for peace and disarmament.

Except for the recent progress made in disarmament negotiations between the USSR and the United States, not much progress has been made in creating conditions of international security, and almost nothing has been achieved regarding the freeing of resources for the development and reorganisation of the world economy in favour of the Third World countries.

This is all the more alarming when we observe the situation which prevails in Latin America. Indeed, after a long cycle of dictatorship imposed by the North American imperialism and the local oligarchies, since the end of the last decade we have witnessed a re-emergence of democratic and constitutional guarantees in many countries that were previously oppressed by terrible military dictatorships.

Except in the case of Chile and Paraguay, with whose people's struggles to restore democracy the Bolivian worker movement has not ceased to express its militant solidarity, minimal democratic conditions have been restored in the other South American countries.

However, servicing the foreign debt and meeting the requirements of the IMF and the World Bank, which are now working together in the establishment of conditions which are unfavourable to our interests, imperil the continuing existence of democratic rights and conquests because the governments which inflexibly apply these formulas resort more and more to authoritarian and repressive means to impose them.

Indeed, can democracy prevail if unemployment is acute and if there is a systematic deterioration of real wages?

I cannot help mentioning in this context the two-fold effects which the financial manipulation and the policies of industrialised capitalist countries have on the Bolivian people. The major international financial speculation has, among other things, caused the fall of international tin prices, tin being the main export of our country.

The same thing occurred with the price of oil and petroleum products, which also are of interest to Bolivia.

All this brings us to the observation that the productive forces which are developing in the current framework of international economic relations and the policies applied by the governments subject to international constraints are not essentially aimed at solving the problems of the peoples, whose employment, health, nutrition and social security have seriously deteriorated throughout this decade.

I must say, on the other hand, that the re-emergence of democracy in Bolivia after more than a decade of repression of workers' rights, was attained thanks to the struggle of the people and their representative organisations. However, this brief flowering of democracy has not greatly improved the situation of the workers.

In the final part of my presentation I would like to refer to the serious conditions in which the Bolivian economy is developing, under a model called the New Economic Policy, whose essence is a most rigid social cruelty affecting particularly the workers, the farmers and the middle class.

Our problems are many and of great intensity, but the worst is unemployment. More than 20 per cent of the labour force is out of work, and therefore has no means of supporting their families. It is therefore not surprising that under these conditions there is a state of anguish, particularly among the young people, whose future is full of uncertainty; they have no prospects. The Government has made the situation worse by the laying off of over 20,000 state miners and oil workers. All under the name of "relocalisation". In turn, the private mining and manufacturing undertakings, basing themselves on Decree No 21060 which established "free contracting", have proceeded to lay off thousands of workers and continue to do so. I must say that in the past days the industrialists have announced the closing down of more factories.

As a consequence of the tremendous extension of poverty, there also has been a re-emergence of endemic diseases and an alarming expansion of malnutrition in children. All this seriously compromises the future of the next generation.

Malnutrition and poverty are twin brothers; even in this age of tremendous technological progress, they still afflict the peoples whose governments put the interests of financial speculators before the interests of the population.

In accordance with official studies, in 1975 four-fifths of the Bolivian population had an income which allowed it to acquire only 70 per cent of essential food and services, which means that thousands of Bolivian workers were already living in poverty.

If the situation was serious in 1975, it has now become even more acute due to the economic policy which has lowered the national minimum wage to a level of $30, whereas the cost of living is similar to international prices. While in any case it is unacceptable that the crisis be solved at the cost of the wage earners, it is even more inhuman to reduce wages, as requested by the IMF, and as the present Government is doing, when wages are already under subsistence levels.

The recent national hunger strike in which 10,000 participated to demand a fair wage, and make other claims such as the defence of public education and health, is proof of the social anxiety caused by the New Economic Policy. However, the Government has not shown any inclination to honour the requests of the workers.

The IMF and the World Bank are experimenting with this new policy in my country, in spite of the fact that it has failed in other countries. There is much talk of an "economic miracle" in Bolivia aimed at swaying public opinion. There isn't such a miracle. We are witnessing the worst social and economic crisis, and if the system has not crumbled yet, it is thanks to the millions of dollars which are earned from the illegal activities of drug-traffickers.

I am not going to go into specifics, but since 1985 my country is virtually occupied by advisory organisations which have usurped national sovereignty in the definition of economic and social policies and obstructed self-determination in all fields.

Whether under the pretext of combating the drug traffic or that of redeeming the private foreign debt in Bolivia, policies are imposed which are consistent only with dictatorial regimes.

It is obvious that in our country we have restored constitutional freedoms and guarantees. However, the Government has used different means to limit trade union activities and the legitimate mass movements in the country, as occurred in March in a strike of oil workers when the military intervened in the workplaces and oil worker leaders were illegally imprisoned. The COB brought a complaint before the ILO, but the Government's reply was completely unacceptable for the workers.

We must also mention that tens of thousands of civil servants are forbidden to organise, in flagrant violation of the Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151).

Finally, I am sure that our Government delegate will try to justify the situation before this Conference, or deny our claims. However, we are ready to give the necessary proof regarding each and every one of our claims.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. BEL HADJ AMMAR (Employers' delegate, Tunisia) – On my own behalf, and on behalf of Tunisian employers, I am pleased to congratulate the President on his election, and to express the hope that his efforts will be crowned with success.

I am also pleased to thank the Director-General for his judicious choice of the themes of the reports he has submitted to the Conference, especially that concerning the activities of the ILO, which highlights the scope and importance of the work carried out by our Organisation, and the difficulties it has encountered in working towards its objectives.

I would also take this opportunity to pay homage to the Bureau for Employer's Activities, and to thank it for the assistance it unfailingly provides to employers' organisations with a view to promoting the participation of small and medium-sized enterprises, which represent the most effective means for creating jobs, promoting development and improving the conditions of life.

I am especially proud to speak before the Conference inasmuch as Tunisia entered a new era on 7 November last, under the Presidency of Mr. Zein El-Abébine Ben Ali, who oversaw the transition at the Head of State, fully respecting constitutional provisions. This transition has reinforced the rule of law and strengthened our democratic institutions, which are based on the people's sovereignty, and on the recognition of political pluralism and the right of national organisations to manage their own affairs and reinforce their structures.

A new Act was promulgated in the first few weeks of the new regime, concerning preventive detention and the strengthening of individual freedoms. That was the first of a number of decisions bolstering the political and civil rights of citizens; moreover, amnesty was granted to several thousands of persons, and measures were adopted to suppress special courts and other institutions which posed a threat to the rights and freedoms of Tunisian citizens.

The new regime immediately turned its attention to social and economic problems; within the first few days it approved across-the-board tax reductions with a view to alleviating the economic crisis in which enterprises found themselves and the negative consequences of the crisis on employment. Several measures were taken to facilitate the activities of employers, and to reassure investors from friendly countries, in order that we might give concrete expression to our major national objectives, especially in the areas of employment, export and international co-operation.

The new regime has approved assistance to lower income groups and increased the guaranteed minimum wage in industry and agriculture with a view to maintaining the purchasing power of citizens. For these reasons we are optimistic that the new regime will enhance our country's stability, progress and development.

Industrial progress and the use of modern technology in all Tunisian sectors have contributed to an increase in occupational accidents and diseases; this situation called for the formulation of new legislation aimed at improving conditions of work and hygiene at the workplace. Measures taken in this connection have helped to improve relations between workers and employers.

We have assigned a high priority to safety in construction; this sector accounts for a large proportion of the trade union movement, and its workers are exposed to a variety of risks, owing to the conditions and nature of their work. The construction sector, moreover, is considered as one of the most important sectors; it employs a labour force which is generally ill-informed as to the risks arising from the failure to use suitable protective equipment.

The Tunisian Employers' Organisation has always complied with national regulations and laws, as well as international recommendations, concerning safety in construction. The principle activities undertaken by our organisation in this area include its participation in the implementation of instruments and legislation concerning occupational safety and health, the publicity given to new safety and health legislation, and efforts to ensure the compliance of employers with these regulations. Moreover, the Federation of Industry and Commerce participates actively in the revision and amendment of this legislation, since it considers that occupational safety is the responsibility of all parties concerned, and that an integrated approach must be taken in the face of these risks.

The Government of Tunisia has paid particular attention also to agriculture and employment in rural areas. The policy we are now pursuing seeks to create adequate conditions to encourage ongoing economic growth in the rural sector with a view to economic and social transformations.

The priority accorded to agriculture in the Seven-Year Plan has begun to take shape in a series of measures seeking to improve the general environment and also to give more flexibility to regulations governing production and to strengthen and increase productivity so that all expectations may be met in this sphere.

Special concessions have been made to encourage investment aimed at self-sufficiency in food production, at improved agricultural techniques, at the employment of more of the poorest people, and at the employment of young technicians in agriculture. The Government has therefore given particular attention to agriculture and to permit our agriculture to become self-sufficient.

I would like to conclude by expressing the hope that the ILO should make further efforts in all areas of its competence in order to promote human rights, to help share the fruits of economic growth and to reduce disparities among the member States. No global strategy, be it international or regional, could succeed if there are still oppressed peoples, such as the Palestinian people and some peoples of Africa, living under the oppression of Zionism or racial discrimination.

The present session is taking place at the same time as the heroic rising in the occupied Palestine territories, which has met with Israeli repression, which defies moral values and international law and Conventions.

This terrible repression can only increase tension in the Palestinian occupied territories. We appeal to all freedom-loving forces in the world to denounce and condemn these criminal acts.

(Mr. Adiko takes the Chair.)

Interpretation from French: Mr. FREY (representative of the International Confederation of Executive Staff) – On behalf of the member Organisations of the International Confederation of Executive Staff (CIC) and on my own behalf, I have great pleasure in congratulating the President and the Officers of the Conference upon their brilliant election. Their exceptional competence and great experience auger well for the success of this 75th Session of the International Labour Conference.

May I be allowed to recall for the benefit of the new participants at this present session of the Conference that the CIC groups together the national confederations of executive staffs of the principal countries of Europe as well as the international federations of executive staffs of the major economic sectors of these countries: metallurgy, mines, chemistry, transport.

After having read the Reports of Mr. Francis Blanchard, the members of the Office of the CIC and myself, would like to congratulate the Director-General of the ILO and his colleagues on the quality of their analysis and profound thoughts concerning Human rights – A common responsibility and the activities of the ILO during 1987.

The problem of employment and especially its negative image, unemployment, cannot fail to be of serious concern to any responsible person.

Urgent action must indeed be taken for the men, women and whole families who are without work and therefore without resources, without social coverage and frequently without anywhere to live. They are hundreds of millions in Africa, Asia and Latin America making up the “Fourth World”, to whom we must add, unfortunately, the “new poor” of the industrialised countries. In the space of a few years, unemployment has turned them into the forgotten ones of the system; they are no longer able to fulfil their basic human destiny because they are deprived of the most elementary of necessities. Only remunerated activity will restore their dignity as human beings to them.

There is a way that might lead to success. It is based upon the search for a balance, admittedly fragile, between supply and demand in goods and services.

Demand can be stimulated by just remuneration of the workers, accompanied by tax relief. The profits achieved through such a policy can be invested totally in consumption, which must be avoided, or constitute, at least in part, savings if suitable taxation laws encourage this.

Savings thus generated would be poured into the production process, thereby facilitating its modernisation and international competitiveness. Enterprises could then meet their domestic demand and open themselves up to export. If a balance is struck between income tax and investment incentives, it should be possible to find high growth without which there is unfortunately no remedy to the sorry problem of unemployment.

The implementation of an “agreed economy” between the social partners might contribute to the success of such a policy. By establishing through dialogue the bases for the just sharing of the fruits of production, a way would be found to ensure a solvent demand and motivate all wage earners, who constitute the prime movers of the enterprise. This is one of the aspects of participation which is in conformity with the socio-economic doctrine of the International Confederation of Executive Staffs.

Employment promotion and unemployment compensation can, of course, be realised to a certain extent through social security; but in many countries, this entity appears to have reached the limit of its possibilities. The seriousness of the situation leads us to hope that at the end of the work of the 75th Session of the Conference, it might be possible to adopt the proposed Conventions and Recommendations concerning employment promotion and social security.

Now is not the moment, given the great needs of the world, to decide whether full employment should be an essential goal; we should rather determine the ways of achieving this. Indeed, we must do everything in our power to put an end to this enormous wastage of resources and of unfulfilled social progress, as has been so clearly pointed out by the Director-General, Mr. Francis Blanchard.

It is this situation which has led the ILO to convene the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment held in November 1987 in Geneva.

This action is greatly welcomed by our Confederation which sees in it a possibility of dialogue between high-level economic and political decision-makers.

At the meeting, it was pointed out that adjustment policies cannot be dissociated from their social repercussions. Employment promotion, as we have already stressed, depends upon sufficient, stable and non-inflationary growth. Certain measures should also not be tackled indiscriminately: for instance, the reduction of working time and the lowering of the retirement age have not reduced unemployment but have turned out to be costly and have incurred wastages in regard to competence and experience.

Training appears to be an excellent means of ensuring protection of employment, recycling and mobility. It must be regarded as a genuine service which maintains the knowledge and competence of each worker. As such it should be incorporated in working time.

We must train today to ensure work for tomorrow; this is the point. But here again, we must train "in a useful way", in other words to meet the demands of enterprises through clearly defined specialisations.

It should not be forgotten that in a period of unemployment, certain jobs remain unfilled because of a lack of qualified and trained candidates; this is the case of plastics technicians, robot experts, biotechnicians, construction work specialists and those working in public works.

Emphasis should also be placed upon the need to train trainers; this is a field where preretirement or retirement personnel could make a useful contribution.

Before concluding my statement on the difficult problem of world-wide unemployment, we wish to pay tribute to the ILO technical co-operation in Africa during 1986-87: $55 million, representing an increase of 23 per cent compared with the previous year, have been devoted to the rural population, to women and to the refugees. This assistance was essentially directed at training, employment and development.

Finally, when two-thirds of the world's population are suffering from famine, under-nourishment, or malnutrition, it is not possible to accept the concept of food surpluses. There are urgent needs to be met. The new project for a Marshall Plan in favour of the Third World launched by François Guillaume, ex-Minister of Agriculture of France, should be taken up in its entirety to establish a just economic order.

There is another fortunate development we should point out: the ratification by the USSR of an agreement involving the establishment of a common stabilisation fund for commodities, to which some 90 countries have already given their support. This will make it possible to afford a better management of approximately 18 easily stored commodities. For many developing countries, this will represent a means of sustaining their economies.

Still in connection with the activities of the ILO in 1987, we wish to emphasise the co-operation of the ILO in the programme of the International Year of Shelter for the Homeless. By promoting programmes for the improvement of the housing of the poorest and the most destitute, the ILO is at the same time developing employment in the building sector.

Turning to conditions at the workplace, the CIC considers it a praiseworthy decision to place on the agenda of the 76th Session of 1989 of the Conference, the item entitled "Safety in the use of chemical substances at work" as well as the question of night work, including that of women.

Within the context of the International Programme for the Improvement of Working Conditions and Environment (PIACT), we have noted the existence of a new bulletin entitled Safety and health at work which supplies extensive information on safety at work in relation to chemical substances, carcinogenic products, smoking, stress and AIDS.

We consider it appropriate to reaffirm our fundamental attachment to the right to social security for all and the universality of its protection based upon the principle of solidarity.

Solidarity must of course be exercised between people from different professional sectors, wage earners and liberal professions, young and old alike. However, if in regard to old-age pensions you wish to avoid conflict between one generation and another, it is desirable nevertheless to rethink measures which would lead to shortening people's working life unduly.

Also, the CIC supports the concept of a guaranteed minimum wage for all by the year 2000. Such a practice would also provide for unemployed people who had reached the end of their qualifying period for benefits and other people who are excluded from full medical protection, which should not be refused to any human being. Poverty as such is already a heavy burden, let us not add to this the weight of physical suffering.

As regards the developing countries the concept of national solidarity may seem illusory in the context of their extreme poverty. International solidarity should be brought into action, to give financial help to social security schemes by reducing such things as certain armaments budgets.

The CIC is concerned about labour mobility and supports the principle of an international system for the preservation of rights in regard to social security as provided for in the Equality of Treatment (Social Security) Convention, 1962 (No. 118), and the Maintenance of Social Security Rights Convention, 1982 (No. 157), and Recommendation No. 167.

Forty years after their adoption by the General Assembly of the United Nations the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), are as ever a tribute to their authors. The gaps which remain in their application are proof of the paramount obligation for the ILO to intensify its effort of persuasion and to continue its mission of supervision in order to promote equality of opportunity between human beings and ensure their material and spiritual welfare. It is on this basis that it will be possible to achieve peace with authentic human development.

Interpretation from Portuguese: Mr. SEQUEIRA (Workers' delegate, Portugal) – As a delegate of the Portuguese workers, I would like to congratulate the President on his election to preside over our work, and to express the hope that this Conference, at the end of its labours, will approve results that will make a positive contribution to the improvement of the conditions of work and life of the workers in all the member States of the ILO in the context of economic and social development.

I would also like to congratulate the Director-General of the ILO for the important contribution he has made through his Report, which enables us to examine in depth the remarkably interesting topics we are considering in this Conference.

As a representative of the Portuguese workers, I welcome the fact that this Conference is concerned with the problem of human rights in its myriad facets. Just as the participation of workers without freedom of association or the existence of trade unions in a context of political intervention and the absence of freedom of expression have no meaning because they are powerless, political freedoms are fictional when they are not accompanied by guarantees of social protection and access to the economic means necessary for a dignified existence and life.

Forty years have passed since the Universal Declaration of Human Rights was proclaimed, and the time has come to make an assessment that will enable us to determine the direction that should be taken by the activities of the ILO, of the governments and the trade unions in order to achieve the effective and generalised application of the lofty principles embodied in the Declaration.

The problem of human rights in the area of intervention of the ILO is assuming increasing importance because the most basic rights of the workers and freedom of association are violated daily in many areas of the globe.

As a result of these violations, millions of men and women are cruelly exploited and are subject to deplorable working and living conditions. In this way artificial competitive advantages are created which the violators of human rights and the transnationals take advantage of. This type of competition is invoked to justify attacks on the rights of workers in other countries. It has also given rise to the neo-liberal and dehumanising ideas that are being put forward today, in contravention of the most basic values of solidarity and social justice.

In this context the expression of the ILO's belief that "universal and lasting peace can be established only if it is based upon social justice" is increasingly valid today.

This statement is expanded upon in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which proclaims that "recognition of the inherent dignity and of the equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human family is the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world".

We are living at a time of radical economic, technological and structural changes accompanied by a crisis that has painful social consequences for workers and particularly for the weakest and most defenceless members of the human family. As if men and women were things, as if human society could exist in stability and freedom without social cohesion, what is now being advocated is uncontrolled deregulation and the abolition of the welfare state, even where this is still in its infancy. It is not surprising that, as the Report of the Director-General points out, the rate of ratification of Conventions has slowed down in the past few years.

This overall picture shows how necessary it is to increase the effectiveness of the activities of the ILO so that social regression is no longer possible, so that the general public and governments can be brought to understand that social progress must be regarded as a condition for and not merely as a possible consequence of economic progress.

Portuguese workers, too, are faced with plans based on these concepts, which sanctify the market and threaten the right to work and the dignity of the workers. On 28 March 1988, the Portuguese workers held a general strike against a plan to liberalise dismissals which would represent a serious social reversal if it were to come into force because, in addition, it violates the Constitution of the Portuguese Republic.

The strike of 28 March was the greatest ever held in our country. It was a signal that should be clearly interpreted because it will be propitious for the renewal of tripartite dialogue and the discovery of consensus solutions which, while serving the interests of the enterprises, will not violate the legitimate rights of workers.

The unsuitability of this plan to Portuguese conditions is all the more obvious in that the workings of labour justice are extremely slow and access to justice is impeded by the increase in legal costs and the inefficiency of labour inspection, that a high rate of unemployment still exists which is underestimated by official statistics, and that there is a high proportion of long-term unemployment has been accentuated by fixed-term contracts which apply to 19 per cent of the wage earners, and by the increase in temporary work. The Government is preparing to facilitate the establishment of private employment agencies on a profit basis. The unemployment benefits are inadequate, and only one out of every five unemployed persons receives them. The social security and health systems are also inadequate and the State has reduced its contributions to the health budget, strangling it financially. Despite the fact that wages have increased in the last three years, income distribution is extremely unbalanced to the detriment of the workers, and the tax system penalises the workers immorally. There are serious shortages as regards housing, transport and other parts of the social infrastructure.

The crisis is not fatal; it is not unavoidable; it can be overcome without causing social regression. An effort must unquestionably be made to bring about sustained growth so as to enable us to create better jobs and to ensure that everyone has access to a real improvement in the quality of life and level of living. The enforcement of the principle of equality of opportunity must be assured, and gradual but steady progress must be made towards the goal of full employment.

The fight against inflation must not be pursued blindly as the top priority, but endeavours must be made to reach the objectives of full employment, shorter working hours and an improved quality of life and level of living through the realisation of rights, adequate wages and equitable income distribution.

It is incumbent on us to affirm that solidarity must not be an empty word, whether within a country, among different countries, between North and South, or between the richest and the poorest and most deprived.

In our country, in the last few years, it has become obvious that, as long as dialogue and consultation are respected and complied with, a consensus can be generated that promotes transformation and social and economic progress.

This is an observation which encourages us to view the future with a measure of optimism. It is also apparent from this that conflict must be met by dialogue and negotiation. Self-interest must be countered by solidarity; intolerance and the violation of human rights denounced, and the primacy of the human person and his dignity affirmed. This presupposes respect for the defence of freedom and the promotion of economic and social democracy.

In the turbulent world in which free men are forced to coexist with the negation of freedoms and democracy, where warlike confrontations continue to break out, the situation of the apartheid regime in force in southern Africa is particularly serious.

My trade union organisation has been visited by representatives both from the trade union movement and from movements representative of the South African people to whom it has unequivocally demonstrated its solidarity in the struggle which they are waging to put an end to apartheid.

It is increasingly clear to us therefore that we can legitimately call upon the international community to bring effective pressure to bear on the apartheid regime in order to liberate the people it is oppressing, to demand the immediate and unconditional release of all political prisoners in South Africa and to put an end to South African military incursions in Mozambique and Angola.

I am sure that important contributions will be made by this 75th Session of the Conference of the International Labour Organisation to peace, economic development, social progress and the achievement of justice.

Mr. LOFBLAD (representative of the International Federation of Building and Woodworkers) – First of all let me associate myself with all previous speakers who have congratulated the President upon his unanimous election to his lofty post at this Conference. He certainly has all the qualifications for leading this Conference. I would also like to thank him for giving me the opportunity to speak to the Conference. I shall try to be brief.

First of all, I wish to congratulate the Director-General for his excellent Report. We are used to having excellent Reports from the Director-General, and this year's Report is no exception. It is produced in the good traditions of the Director-General, the International Labour Office and the International Labour Organisation. The Director-General's Report is always a very important document for the workers of the world and it gives us both advice and information about the past and experiences from the difficult work of the ILO.

Part I of the Director-General's Report is devoted to the question of human rights. I want to stress the importance of this part of the Report. Unfortunately, human rights, as they have been spelled out in the Declarations from the United Nations and in the Conventions of the ILO, are not respected as they should be in the world. In reality, a lot of people, workers, politicians, even employers are deprived of their right to speak freely and give their opinion about their situation. They are also deprived of the right freely to create organisations in order to represent them. A lot has been said over the years about this problem. I think, however, it has to be said over and over again. We must be grateful that we have an organisation in the world like the ILO, in which it is possible for us all to speak our mind, to declare the opinion of the people we represent and ask for the right for all people to do so on every occasion. We also have reason to be grateful that this Organisation tirelessly works to safeguard this right and to get the relevant Conventions more and more respected in the world. Unfortunately, there may be a long way to go before all people are free to live in peace and freedom enjoying full human rights. But the goal has been set and the struggle must continue, and we have to look to the future with the hope that with our determination and struggle we shall be able to change the world, to improve it, to make it a better and freer place to live for all people.

On behalf of my organisation, the International Federation of Building and Woodworkers, I want to thank the ILO for what it is doing, not only in the field of human rights, but also in the field of industrial problems like safety and health, vocational training and other problems or questions related to the situation of the working people. If we look back over the years, there have been setbacks, but there has also been progress, and we shall not forget this. We ought not to be too discouraged because from the base that we now have, it is quite possible to continue with vigour and hope for the future.

I would also like to take this opportunity to thank the ILO for the attention it is paying to the problems relating to construction workers. For four years now, questions relating to the construction workers have been placed on the agenda of the International Labour Conference. In 1985 and 1986, we had on the agenda the question of safety in the handling of asbestos and at the 1986 Conference we were able to reach agreement about a Convention concerning that serious health problem. During 1987, the subject of safety and health in construction was included in the agenda of the International Labour Conference, for the first time, and we are now following it up for the second time. Let me say, on behalf of the organisation that I represent, and on behalf of all building workers and their unions in the world, that we hope that it will be possible to reach an agreement about a revised Convention on this particular problem. As we know, the previous Convention has been in effect for no less than 50 years and there is certainly a need for it to be revised. And we are working very hard on it. I also express the hope that the new Convention will not be too general or diluted. We really need some specific regulations regarding safety and health in construction, because construction workers are exposed to a great many health and safety problems which I need not list here. But to be a construction worker means that you have to agree to be exposed to hard physical work and quite numerous medical problems, such as handling dangerous materials and also difficult working conditions; and there are many health hazards involved. None of these problems can be avoided because of the nature of the work of erecting a building, or maybe even more when taking down a building. Building work will continue to be a hazardous occupation and we all have to keep this in mind; therefore, it is even more important that from the outset we are aware of this and that we do all we can in order to prevent accidents and restrict health hazards to the minimum.

It ought to be stressed that health and safety in any occupation is a tripartite responsibility, and health and safety should always be dealt with in good faith by all the parties involved. Not only are accidents and bad health conditions as such costly to the workers who are unhappy enough to be the victims of such circumstances, but it is also costly for an employer to have accidents at a building site. It is costly to have workers who get sick or die because they have been exposed to dangerous substances, materials and conditions. It must be in the interest of all three parties – governments, employers and workers – to follow the directives of an ILO Convention and the regulations that are in force in any given country. Sloppy health and hazard control, if analysed, proves to be a very costly affair for everybody. It is a challenge to all of us to work for a safer workplace and to respect stricter regulations about health and safety in construction and on all workplaces.

As a representative of these workers, I wish to take this opportunity to say that we accept and stress that it is also the responsibility of the worker to co-operate in this field, and to find ways and means of avoiding accidents and minimising health hazards. The worker himself is a very important element in this task, because he is closest to the place of hazard and, therefore, he can do a lot himself, especially if he or she is a skilled worker, and I think it is very important in order to avoid accidents if he is aware of the risks, tries to avoid them and to respect regulations. A careless worker is a risk not only to himself but also to his colleagues at the workplace. By setting a good example, the worker himself can be very helpful in convincing the employers about the necessity of a good health and safety programme. I am quite sure that it is not only the Convention that we hope will come out of this session about health and safety in construction that will be useful. I think that the exchange of views that has taken place in the Committee between governments, employers and workers has also been very useful, because the participants will go home remembering what has been said by friends from other countries, by opponents, and so on. The workers will remember what the employers said and the employers will remember what the workers said. And I think this activity of the ILO is more useful in the long run than we often appreciate. If we did not have this machinery, it might be very difficult for us to make any progress at the world level. Where new technology is applied under very different social and economic conditions, it is particularly important that we get directive, advice and co-operation to solve the problems.

Since I have the floor, I also take this opportunity to condemn the shameful apartheid regime in the Republic of South Africa, and I want to stress the importance of the ILO's having a special session on South Africa every year, because, in the name of humanity, I feel it is necessary that we keep on pushing this question even if it does not seem to lead to success as readily as we wish, until the system of apartheid is finally gone.

I thank the ILO for the efforts being made in this particular area. At the same time, I should like to thank the ILO for what it is doing in the field of technical and other assistance to the people in the poor countries in the world. I should like to remind the countries of the industrialised part of the world about their responsibility in the field of assistance to the countries that are on the road to development, to continue and increase this assistance. It has certainly become overdue for us to make a more determined effort in order to solve the problem of poverty in the world. Last year was declared by the United Nations as the International Year of Shelter for the Homeless. I should like to take this opportunity to stress that this was not a one-year programme. We then only made a manifestation that we will continue with this programme. We shall continue over the decades to come to work for the improvement of the situation of the poor. If we only spent a part of what we spend on armaments, we would be able to solve the problem of poverty in the world. It is a disgrace that we do not really try to change the world situation and produce fewer weapons, and instead produce more housing, more schools, better food, better health care for all people. A real democracy, a real freedom, will never come to people if they are deprived of a decent life. It is impossible for people to understand the value of the word "democracy" if they are starving, if they have no schooling, if they are dying of hunger.

I thank the ILO and the Director-General, Mr. Blanchard, personally, for the extremely good co-operation that is given to international trade secretariats like ours. We congratulate the ILO on this year's session and we wish you every success in your future work for a better, peaceful, world.

Mr. BHAGIRUTTY (Workers' delegate, Mauritius) – I wish to extend my warmest congratulations and those of the Mauritius Labour Congress to Mr. Beyreuther on his election as President of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. I am sure that his long experience in labour matters will enable him to discharge his responsibilities smoothly, and to the satisfaction of all delegates present.

I would like to congratulate the Director-General of the ILO for the presentation of his comprehensive Report: Part I of which deals with human rights and the ILO, a subject of special significance in 1988 – 40 years after the adoption of the Freedom of Association and the Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) and the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights by the United Nations General Assembly; Part II contains an account of the activities of the Organisation during last year.

The 40th anniversary of the adoption of the Universal Declaration and of one of the ILO's key human rights Conventions – is a golden opportunity for the Conference to take stock of the action taken by the ILO and its member States to promote and protect the enforcement of human rights.

It is very sad to note that in many countries, basic human rights are denied to workers. Many trade unionists have been assassinated and others put in jail because of their trade union activities. Many countries have not ratified Convention No. 87 which, together with the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), constitute the basic instruments concerning freedom of association adopted by the International Labour Conference. My country, Mauritius, has only ratified Convention No. 87. We consider that the Government has a moral obligation towards the ILO and that it should therefore ratify this important basic Convention.

We, in Mauritius, are celebrating this year the 50th anniversary of the trade union movement and the establishment of the Labour Department. We were fortunate to receive in Mauritius in this anniversary year the visit of two eminent personalities from the ILO: Mr. Cesar Poloni, chief of the ILO Workers' Education Branch in January; and Mr. Bertil Bolin, Deputy Director-General of the ILO last month. During his stay in Mauritius, Mr. Poloni visited the MLC Workers' Education Centre. On that occasion, he expressed the wish of seeing the emergence of a strong and united trade union movement. His wish served as a source of inspiration to the leaders of the Mauritius Labour Congress to succeed in consolidating the movement. I am glad to inform you that two important trade unions in the public service, namely the Government Servants' Association and the Government Teachers' Union, representing 60 per cent of organised labour force in the civil service, affiliated to the Mauritius Labour Congress recently. Hence my organisation is the largest trade union federation in Mauritius, representing nearly 50 per cent of the organised labour force covering all sectors of the economy.

Since the establishment of the Labour Department 50 years ago, important changes have taken place in our society. We have also witnessed significant improvements in the wages and conditions of employment of Mauritian workers. With the introduction of new technology in several industries, the attitudes and aspirations of workers have also evolved.

Unfortunately, there has not been adequate change in the structure and personnel of the Labour Department to respond to the needs of the increasing number of enterprises and workers. The number of labour officers has not increased accordingly. Proper facilities in terms of transport, offices and equipment are not being provided to them as it should be. A village that has 25,000 inhabitants cannot be deprived of a labour office. We note with concern the absence of a pragmatic vision of what the Labour Department should be in the year 2000. The annual report of the Ministry of Labour and Industrial Relations has not been published for the past six years. We believe that, whatever improvements in legislation, awards and remuneration orders to protect the workers, it would be impossible to enforce them without well-equipped and trained personnel in the labour inspectorate branch. Otherwise, this legislation will remain a dead letter.

As regards Part II of the Report on the activities of the ILO in 1987, we have noted with satisfaction the considerable work being carried out in the fields of human rights, international labour standards, labour relations, labour administration, workers' activities, social security, training, etc.

We welcome the inclusion in the agenda of this Conference of the important items of safety and health in construction (second discussion), and employment promotion and social security (second discussion).

In this period of rapid industrialisation, in my country, the issue of health and safety of workers is of paramount importance. In our country, Health, Safety and Welfare Regulations have been in existence since 1980, but they do not have adequate provisions to cover the workers in all sectors of the economy.

We are aware that the ILO has sent an expert to advise the Government on the elaboration of comprehensive new legislation to deal with all aspects of health and safety, which will be introduced to Parliament very soon.

We hope that this new Act will cover all the workers in Mauritius, including the public sector, with particular emphasis on the construction industry where risks of accidents are greater.

In 1982 alone, 11,014 occupational injuries, of which 11 were fatal, were registered. Owing to the unavailability of genuine information, I cannot provide other figures.

As regards employment promotion and social security, we note that on 31 December 1987 there were 531 firms operating in the export processing zone, employing some 87,900 workers. However, we consider that economic development should go along with social development. We are not satisfied with the way the national wealth is being distributed at the moment. For example, the daily wage of a factory workers in the export processing zone is slightly above £1, whereas the same category of worker in Hong Kong earns approximately £4.

It should be recalled that the Export Processing Zones Act dates back to 1970. After 18 years, this Law has, we understand, become irrelevant. We have made representations to the Government to make important amendments to this Act, but up to now the Government has not revised the law. It is appropriate at this stage to point out that the conditions of work in the EPZ are still not fair enough; for example the compulsory nature of overtime, night work for female employees, no severance pay until three years of continuous service have been completed and the double-cut system, whereby a worker who absents himself on the day following a Sunday or a public holiday forfeits two days' wages.

Legislation is never static; it should respond to changes in the society. The trade unions cannot function under a coercive and outdated legislative framework.

The Industrial Relations Act of 1973 imposes a number of constraints on the normal activities of trade unions.

In a statement made in a newspaper, Mauritius Today, of 29 April 1988, the Minister of Labour and Industrial Relations said: "The Industrial Relations Act will be neither abrogated nor amended". Major amendments would be required to restore the right to strike and the promotion of free collective bargaining, especially when the Government is launching a three-year national workers' education project, with the assistance of the ILO and the UNDP.

We hope that the intention of the Minister of Labour and Industrial Relations to reactivate the National Workers' Education Advisory Committee and the Labour Advisory Committee will materialise soon. We hope that Government will involve the trade unions fully in the implementation of this project.

The report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Convention and Recommendations has again mentioned the case of Mauritius with much concern in paragraph 123, page 40, and in Report III (Part 4), page 408.

I hope that the Government of Mauritius will submit all the instruments to Parliament very soon.

Before I finish, I reiterate my organisation's unflinching support for our sisters and brothers in South Africa, who are still struggling for their basic human rights under the inhuman system of apartheid. We condemn the racist regime of South Africa and ask for the release of Comrade Nelson Mandela and all other trade unionists arrested and imprisoned for performing their trade union duties in the service of progress and the advancement of the interests of the working class.

Interpretation from French: Mr. BENEDEN (representative of the World Confederation of Teachers) – May I, first of all, congratulate Mr. Beyreuther on his election to the Presidency of the International Labour Conference, and also congratulate all the members of the Office.

On behalf of the World Confederation of Teachers, affiliated to the World Confederation of Labour, which I have honour to represent in this forum, I wish the Conference every success. The brave courageous Report by the Director-General of the ILO and human rights is most welcome to the WCT particularly its stress on the special responsibility of the ILO as regards its terms of reference, its tripartite structure and its many activities and programmes dealing with human rights. As shown by the title of the Director-General's Report, human rights are our common responsibility. From the birth of this Organisation, all ILO activities have been concerned with every kind of human rights, which revealingly reflect the content of this responsibility and the ideals to be pursued in future years.

The WCT associates itself still more with the Director-General's assertion of the indivisible character of human rights, which encompass without distinction, civil and political rights and economic, social and cultural rights. The great debate on human rights, East-West, North-South, reminds us that this indivisible character is not without tensions and indeed can give rise to conflicts. The coexistence of two separate international covenants (on civil and political rights, on the one hand, and economic, social and cultural rights on the other) and the divergent interests they create strengthens us in our conviction that this indivisible character is always far from being fully realised and integrated. Above all, international law on economic, social and cultural rights, so important for the ILO and us all, is still weak, still unfinished, by contrast with international law on civil and political rights. There is no point in reminding you that human rights can divide us, as they divide the American President Reagan and General Secretary Gorbachev; but only the indivisible character of all human rights can unite us.

The WCT associates itself fully with the ethical concepts that the Director-General puts before us as the only values that can guarantee this indivisible character of human rights: human dignity, tolerance and solidarity. These values, referring back to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights do more than merely link civil and political rights with economic, social and cultural rights. They link the cause of human rights with the challenge of peace, and international law with the fundamental aspirations of men and nations to live together and survive so many conflicts and tensions.

Indeed, it is not enough to define human rights; this has already been almost done since the end of the world wars. What matters now is to make sure that they are put into practice, to take the necessary steps to ensure their implementation by providing the co-operation and services without which the finest definitions are useless.

The major task is still before us, particularly as concerns Third World countries. This task is for the ILO, but also for other international organisations, for governments, but also for non-governmental organisations.

The WCT associates itself fully with the importance the Director-General attaches to the economic context and its social impact. This importance derives directly from the indivisible character and the interdependence of human rights. At the same time, this implies that the economic context is the basis of all human rights and that there are few human rights in the realities of underdevelopment and undernourishment. The interest felt by the WCT for our colleagues in the Third World underlines the urgent and primordial nature of these realities. Great respect for human rights is not compatible with the misery which still dominates half our globe. The indivisibility of human rights is not compatible with the ever-growing gap between the rich and the poor, the industrialised countries and the developing ones. For the WCT the problem of development is itself a problem of human rights, as the African Charter of Human and People's Rights of 1981 stresses.

There is no point in stressing the importance the WCT attaches to freedom of association. As we are reminded by the Director-General, quoting the Declaration of Philadelphia, freedom of expression and of association are essential to sustained progress, while free discussion is essential for political, social and economic democracy. To achieve respect for freedom of association and the guarantee of that right for all the teachers of the world is one of the driving forces of the WCT. It is the social and trade union version of human dignity, tolerance and solidarity.

The same is true of equality of opportunity and treatment, the right to full and freely chosen employment, the right to just and favourable remuneration, the right to just and favourable conditions of work and the right to social security. This so close to ILO activities and so dear to human rights that the WCT associates itself with it with full trade union commitment and all the passion of teaching and education generally.

While human rights are a common responsibility, they are the particular responsibility of teachers and educators. In the spirit of the Preamble to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the WCT, through teaching and education, seeks to develop respect for these rights and freedoms among the young who may be able to translate these into their behaviour as adults. But at the same time – it is the same struggle – the WCT aims to defend the rights and freedoms of teachers and their confederations and unions. For the WCT there can be no hiatus between respect for human rights as such and the rights and freedoms of teachers, the more so since teachers are in the front line of awakening respect for human rights among the young and developing a way of teaching of human rights encompassing the whole of society.

This point of view leads the WCT to stress particularly freedom of association on both the national and the regional and international level. For us this freedom implies autonomy of action and association, vis-à-vis both the public authorities and private organisations, free discussion and open dialogue for the whole of teaching and education. Guided by freely agreed tolerance and solidarity, this freedom of association is at the heart of the teaching world, the driving force to guarantee its full prosperity and the happiness of nations. It is very revealing to note that the teachers are the first to see their interests slighted whenever a government is attacking workers' rights. The example of South Africa is typical. The latest reports from the Committee on Freedom of Association of our Organisation describe others.

A second point of special importance for the WCT concerning human rights, directly linked with freedom of association, is the freedom to teach. This freedom does not affect the primary responsibility of States and the public authorities as regards teaching, but to this it adds the co-responsibility of everybody and at the same time links teaching to education. Concrete forms of the freedom to teach reflect the various national and regional conditions, without in any way affecting their central idea of respect for the rights and freedoms of all, including freedom of association and free discussion in teaching and education. This freedom, so dear to teaching and to spiritual development does not exclude equality. In human rights, liberty and equality find their place in fraternity and solidarity and join one another in tolerance and human dignity. The WCT wishes to be the spokesman of this fundamental bipolarity of human rights. In stressing freedom, it does so only to ensure equality in the constraints of the whole community, and to link it with the solidarity which is the only foundation of teaching and education.

In view of this, the WCT cannot separate the hiring of teachers from the hiring of all workers and employees, particularly in the public services.

Geared to rights and freedoms for all and guided by brotherhood and solidarity at all levels, our Confederation subscribes to the tenets of the World Confederation of Labour and seeks dialogue with other international teaching institutions and with the whole international trade union movement.

This dialogue will not smother the identity and objectives specific to our Confederation. On the contrary, it strengthens them. At the same time it prevents them from severance and segregation, which are incompatible with human rights and cannot be reconciled with the open nature of a changing world.

Last but not least, we seek to promote the rights of children, particularly in teaching and education. They remain the weakest among human rights. All efforts to draw up a Convention on children's rights have fallen on strong ground after the adoption of the Declaration of the Rights of the Child in 1959.

As a trade union movement of teachers, the Confederation wishes to re-open the debate, convinced that the rights of children cannot be opposed to the rights of teachers but rather complete them.

It is not without importance that our Confederation is organising a pan-African workshop in Lomé next July in which the prime role of teachers in the development of the continent and its children will be studied.

We cannot help but note that the activities of the ILO concerning the situation of education personnel are still too restrictive to be able to meet our expectations and legitimate aspirations.

In view of the importance of our sector for the future in achieving human rights, we consider that the ILO should take more initiatives in the field of the rights and conditions of service of workers in education.

We are pleased that the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment last November insisted, in its conclusions, on the fact that the ILO could intensify its action for the development of training and retraining programmes so as to give qualifications, particularly to the young people who are entering or re-entering the employment market. In doing that the Committee stressed the important part played by teachers and educators in general in the struggle which is to be carried out to deal with the great challenges of our time in terms, among other things, of employment and economic and technological development.

The ILO and UNESCO have been carrying out and will continue to carry out their work relating to the Recommendation concerning the Status of Teachers (1966).

We are pleased that the fifth session of the joint ILO/UNESCO committee on the implementation of this Recommendation will be taking place next October.

Our Confederation will communicate to that joint committee our positions and will send information on the subject. We have every trust in the competence of the independent experts in that committee, but we deeply regret that neither the teachers themselves, who were at the centre of the discussions, nor their representative international organisations were invited to participate in the work of the committee. That is all the more important in view of the fact that implementation of the Recommendation is being jeopardised by restrictive budgetary policies in an increasing number of countries both developed and developing. Working conditions are deteriorating because of the increase in benefit times and standards, restrictions on teachers' incomes, and the extension of their tasks and responsibilities.

We have contributed to a preliminary study to work out a possible ILO Convention concerning the trade union rights of teachers and their working conditions. We are prepared to pursue this co-operation in order to arrive at a valid international instrument which might be such as to improve, through its very existence, the situation of teachers and hence the situation of education systems and therefore the future of our children.

The demand regularly made from this rostrum by the common front of public services (PTTI, PSI, IFFTU, INFEDOP and the WCT) to set up a permanent joint committee for teaching personnel; similar to the Joint Committee on the Public Service and the Joint Committee for Postal and Telecommunications Services, has not yet been met. Some think that this committee would be superfluous and redundant since there is a joint UNESCO/ILO committee. We completely disagree with this interpretation. No professional category would accept that the ILO should confer supervision of their rights and interests merely to independent experts. That would be profoundly contradictory to the procedures and rules which are the basis of ILO's activities.

Teachers wish to co-operate in order to arrive at a situation in which all may enjoy full rights as guaranteed by the declarations, conventions and recommendations of United Nations agencies.

They are counting on the ILO to provide them with the best opportunities for achieving that end.

Mr. FORD (Representative of the International Textile, Garment and Leather Workers' Federation) – The Director-General's Report on human rights cites several authoritative sources in support of fair labour standards in international trade: the Charter of the International Trade Organisation; the ILO World Employment Conference; and the Brandt Commission. But the Governing Body's Report to Conference, in its chapter on relations with international organisations; does not mention relations with the GATT, despite the common concern of both organisations for fair labour standards in international trade. The tripartite technical meeting in December 1987 for the clothing industry called for a dialogue between the ILO and the GATT on fair labour standards in international trade.

The Director-General's Report shows ways in which exploitative employment practices or government action to restrict trade unions so as to gain competitive advantage in exports may be subject to ILO scrutiny by the Committee on Freedom of Association. But there are many countries that fail to follow ILO standards as is shown in the Director-General's Report.

Previously, when countries with low wages and weak unions refused to remedy the situation, only the countries concerned suffered, but rapid industrialisation and export expansion, especially in the newly industrialising countries (NICs), has transformed the international economy. The NICs in South-East Asia and Latin America will soon be joined by others capable of producing a very wide range of industrial products. Thus the situation will be quite different from that faced by the ILO in its early days. The question is whether new methods and new machineries are now necessary?

The policy of the ICFTU and its international trade secretariats is for the inclusion in the GATT of a social clause to be drawn up by an advisory committee established by the ILO and the GATT. Such a social clause should include the right to form and join unions; the right to collective bargaining; a minimum age for children to work; and acceptable working conditions and health and safety standards.

A social clause in the GATT will ensure that social progress in developing countries will accelerate in tandem with growth and exports. It will also help to prevent social regression in the importing countries brought about by competitive devaluation, not only of currencies but also of human values and of social standards acquired through historical struggles of the trade union movement and its political allies.

The social clause will facilitate the further expansion of international trade since it will tend to equalise the conditions of international trade so as to promote real comparative advantage based upon natural resources, geographical location, the innovative talents and productive energies of peoples rather than production cost-reducing measures such as subsidies, wage controls and putting trade union leaders in jail. Unless we raise more rapidly the living and working conditions in developing countries then through international trade such conditions in advanced industrialised countries will be undermined. This was recently confirmed in an article published by the ILO which said that "if the Europeans did not succeed in renewing their products technologically, then the level of their wages and salaries would fall to those of the NICs". Yet the United States, the most advanced country in technology, also has the biggest balance of payments deficit, despite the fall in the value of the dollar. Such balance of payments deficits in a number of countries are often an alibi to put downward pressure on wages and salaries in order to maintain international competitiveness. The Director-General's Report shows that in many developing countries real wages were reduced by one-third to one-half in a few years so that purchasing power was reduced by as much as a half.

It is often said by employers that foreign competitors pay lower wages and therefore have lower unit costs. This argument is often used to keep wages down even in developing countries where wages are typically only about 8 or 10 per cent of total production costs. The argument that domestic competitors have an advantage because of lower wages can be combated by raising wages in the companies concerned through trade union action. It is more difficult to raise wages in competing firms abroad, where in many developing countries unions are very weak because governments impose wage stops. For instance, many industries in Africa have not had wage increases since the early 1980s because some governments see low wages as means of attracting and/or retaining foreign investment.

Frequently, a ruthless holding down of wages is imposed by the IMF as part of a poisonous package of economic redressment that also includes an open-door policy for imports. Such an open-door trade policy often results in shut doors in the countries' factories as a result of sudden increases in domestic and foreign competition. I was recently in Senegal where they told me about the closing of the Bata shoe factory as a result of savage imports and a sudden flow of competition from abroad and even domestically.

Is this inevitable? Is there no alternative? The ILO should be consulted by the IMF and governments concerned to seek to avoid mass lay-offs as a result of IMF prescriptions on the lines of the ILO teams that wrote reports on Kenya and the Philippines about a decade ago.

The effort to keep in business to meet foreign competition based on unfair conditions of employment increasingly results in the adoption of similar conditions in importing countries – for instance, clandestine labour to avoid social security payments and minimum wage laws, home-working and a return to pre-industrial production systems, such as for instance, in Latin America where the Bata company is encouraging shoe workers to stay at home and do the production there. This takes us back to the eighteenth century not just to the nineteenth century.

Some researchers find that job losses in the official sector, because of transfers to clandestine home work, even exceed those from imports. For instance, I would quote Common fate, common bond by Swasti Mitter, published in 1986. The author quotes the Greenwich homeworkers project in the United Kingdom: "The invisible workforce provides the lampshades we buy from the stores in the high street – dresses, blouses, electrical goods, toys, zips and many other goods".

In the United Kingdom, the fire service inspects factories only where over 20 people are employed, and the accidents in these sweat-shops and home-working therefore mainly affect poor immigrant women. I quote from The Times: "The five women who died in a clothing factory fire in east London on Wednesday worked in premises that had not been visited by fire-prevention officers or factory inspectors".

Similar conditions prevail in New York. I quote from a university study: "There is growing awareness in the industry – that is the clothing industry – that wages in New York are increasingly competitive with those in the garment industry in South-East Asia because of the unlicensed and clandestine workshops". Europe has a similar experience. The ILO should give the problem of home work urgent attention. It is now clear not only that workers' standards in the last developed countries fail to improve to reflect greater productivity and exports but standards in importing countries are being undermined by efforts to undercut imports through return to sweatshop and home-work production and the dispersal of production in, for instance, South Africa to the so-called "homelands" where lower wages are paid. This is currently mainly in the clothing industry but threatens to spread to many other industries as international trade expands. There are some governments that vigorously advocate a free market economy while carefully ensuring that the domestic labour market is rigged by keeping wages and social benefits down. The only way in which some governments can be persuaded is through measures that oblige them to adopt human rights such as are embodied in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which unambiguously lays down the right to organise in trade unions and to a decent wage, as well as the principal ILO instruments.

When the GATT was established, trade in manufactured products was principally between developed countries with relatively high standards of living. Now the developing countries have secured about 12 per cent of world trade in manufactured products and in some industries it is as much as 50 per cent in the clothing industry.

The Multi-Fibre Arrangement (MFA) has in some measure modified the speed with which textiles and clothing exports expand. We cannot foresee whether a new MFA will be necessary when the present one expires. One thing is clear: a return to the GATT rules without a social clause will simultaneously condemn workers in many exporting developing countries to see a vast new expansion in the amount of textiles and clothing they produce while failing to secure a better life, which they have yearned for decades, because they are not permitted to share adequately in productivity increases and the consequent high profits – and I speak, of course, of a relatively few countries. Moreover, the number of jobs in the developed countries will decline even more rapidly.

The Government of the United States has proposed the establishment of a working party on the relation between workers' rights and international trade. Apparently, this has been opposed by certain leading exporters. The free trade union movement, on the other hand, fully supports the establishment of such a committee. It is to be hoped that countries opposing this will change their minds since it could lead to co-ordinated international measures to help developing countries achieve more rapid economic expansion linked with measures to secure more rapid social progress. International, financial, economic and social measures must be increasingly co-ordinated by organisations such as the World Bank, the IMF, the GATT and the ILO, so as to make it less likely that international financial measures will lead to increased social, and hence political, problems. It appears that there is an increasing awareness in the IMF, under its new Director, Mr. Camdessus, of the social impact of its economic prescriptions.

We should try to build on this and increase appreciation of the fact that the rigid separation between the financial, economic and social aspects of society often prevent solutions being found.

I should like to conclude at this rather late hour by reiterating our admiration and support for ILO and its work.

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT (Mr. ADIKO) – Before calling on Mr. Danieli, Government of Israel, to exercise his right of reply, I would like to recall that, in conformity with the Standing Orders, a speaker shall be interrupted if he exceeds the limit of three minutes, if he raises new questions which go beyond a brief and precise answer, if the intervention does not take the form of a contribution in itself to the general debate. I call on Mr. Danieli to exercise his right of reply to answer Mr. Bel Hadj Ammar, Employers' delegate, Tunisia.

Mr. DANIELI (Government adviser, Israel) – Time and again my delegation is astonished at the degree of ignorance and disregard of major problems which afflict the country and the region of certain delegates who always find it more appropriate and convenient to attack instead the State of Israel. Regrettably, such a disregard also marked the speech by the Employers' delegate of Tunisia, who shamelessly went as far as mentioning Zionism and apartheid in one breath.

Suffice it to mention at this juncture that Israel provides major assistance to Black workers and their trade unions in South Africa. The Employers' delegate's own country, Tunisia, has recorded in recent years most tense and fragile labour relations. Tens of thousands of workers went on strike and protested against harsh measures and restrictions imposed by the Government of Tunisia. These manifestations by the workers were brutally crushed by the security services, trade unions were dissolved and their leaders arrested. Simultaneously, Tunisia and the delegate's own employers' organisation had to cope with the implications of mass and arbitrary expulsion of tens of thousands of Tunisian workers from one of its neighbouring countries – a grave matter which is still under serious examination by the ILO and which put in jeopardy the livelihood of those workers in Tunisia. We have not heard of all these regrettable events which should be the prime concern and topic of every Tunisian delegate addressing the Conference, especially at a time when these delegates seek the approval of the world community for a Tunisian to take up a leading position in this Organisation.

(The Conference adjourned at 7 p.m.)

Provisional Record

Seventy-fifth Session, Geneva, 1988

Eighteenth sitting

Saturday, 11 June 1988, 10 a.m.

President: Mr. Beyreuther, Mr. Adiko

COMMUNICATION TO THE CONFERENCE OF THE REPORT OF THE APPEALS BOARD

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – The Conference has before it a report by the Appeals Board with respect to the objection made on 3 June 1988. The report will be found in Provisional Record No. 15. By decision of the Conference taken on 8 June 1988, the decisions of the Appeals Board in such cases are final and have to be brought to the attention of the Conference immediately to be noted without debate.

Consequently, the Conference takes note of these decisions, which are not open to debate.

(The decisions are noted.)

EIGHTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – We will now consider the eighth report of the Selection Committee. I call on Mr. Vargas Escobar, Government delegate, Nicaragua, Chairman of the Selection Committee, to present the report.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. VARGAS ESCOBAR (Government delegate, Nicaragua; Chairman of the Selection Committee) – I have the honour to submit to the Conference the eighth report of the Selection Committee, which is in Provisional Record No. 5G. The Committee proposes that non-governmental international organisations be invited to be represented in the Conference and in one of its committees. The Selection Committee also recommends that the Conference approve some changes in the composition of certain committees of the Conference.

I recommend to the Conference the adoption of this report.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – The eighth report of the Selection Committee is now before the Conference. If there are no objections, I take it that the report is adopted.

RATIFICATION OF THE INSTRUMENT FOR THE AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANISATION, 1986

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – I would also like to inform you that the Director-

General of the International Labour Office has registered the ratification by Lesotho of the Instrument for the Amendment of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation, 1986.

This brings the total number of ratifications and acceptances of the Instrument to 41.

RATIFICATION OF TWENTY-FIVE CONVENTIONS BY MALTA

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – I have pleasure in announcing to the Conference that the Director-General of the International Labour Office has registered the ratification by Malta of the following 25 Conventions:

- Hours of Work (industry) Convention, 1919 (No. 1)
- Night Work (Women) Convention, 1919 (No. 4)
- White Lead (Painting) Convention, 1921 (No. 13)
- Weekly Rest (Industry) Convention, 1921 (No. 14)
- Inspection of Emigrants Convention, 1926 (No. 21)
- Sheet-Glass Works Convention, 1934 (No. 43)
- Underground Work (Women) Convention, 1935 (No. 45)
- Reduction of Hours of Work (Glass-Bottle Works) Convention, 1935 (No. 49)
- Safety Provisions (Building) Convention, 1937 (No. 62)
- Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 96)
- Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100)
- Holidays with Pay (Agriculture) Convention, 1952 (No. 101)
- Weekly Rest (Commerce and Offices) Convention, 1957 (No. 106)
- Social Policy (Basic Aims and Standards) Convention, 1962 (No. 117)
- Guarding of Machinery Convention, 1963 (No. 119)
- Medical Examination of Young Persons (Underground Work) Convention, 1965 (No. 124)
- Maximum Weight Convention, 1967 (No. 127)
- Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129)
- Minimum Wage Fixing Convention, 1970 (No. 131)
- Holidays with Pay Convention (Revised), 1970 (No. 132)
- Workers' Representatives Convention, 1971 (No. 135)
- Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138)

Rural Workers' Organisations Convention, 1975 (No. 141)

Working Environment (Air Pollution, Noise and Vibration) Convention, 1977 (No. 148)

Vocational Rehabilitation and Employment (Disabled Persons) Convention, 1983 (No. 159)

This brings the total number of ratifications of international labour Conventions to 5,370.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – We shall now resume the discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. OULD HMEITY (Workers' delegate, Mauritania) – Allow me first of all, Mr. President, to congratulate you on your election to the presidency of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. I should like to wish you every success in steering the work of the Conference and hope that we will achieve the goals and ambitions of our Organisation.

The annual session of the International Labour Conference this year is being held under very special international circumstances. Unemployment and violations of human rights are increasing from day to day. The recession in the Third World is a direct cause of the lowering of the purchasing power of thousands of workers and the loss of employment of many others. All this has led to a serious drop in the living standards of many regions of the Third World, more specifically those that have been stricken by the drought. This collapse in the economies of Third World countries would not have occurred had it not been for the injustice on which the world economic system is founded. This requires the world community to establish a new system which would be fairer and more equitable.

The agenda of this session of the Conference contains many subjects which are worthy of our attention, more specifically those related to human rights and trade union rights. Other subjects, such as the environment, employment, development, and the ILO's role and co-operation in economic and social development, are of particular importance, especially in view of the fact that there is an ever-increasing gap between the North and the South and the economic and social situation in many Third World countries seriously jeopardises not only the living and purchasing power of the workers in these countries but is liable to hinder the development process in these countries.

The programmes of economic and financial reform drawn up by the financial institutions of the United Nations, such as the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank – financial reforms which in fact dictate certain reforms on the countries concerned to obtain easy terms – only serve towards starving the citizens of these countries and have no positive impact on their economies. The debt to the Third World – and more specifically, that of Africa – has reached such proportions that there can be no further economic growth and social development on the continent. It is these circumstances that have led to an increase in unemployment and other social ills. Thus the international community is called upon to increase its joint efforts to find a fair and urgent solution to the problem of indebtedness, to enable the countries of the African continent to pursue their development projects. The method of rescheduling of international debts has failed. A more realistic system must therefore be sought, perhaps through the convening of an international conference to solve the problem. However, such a conference would have to take into account that the African countries, especially those countries stricken by drought, are absolutely incapable of reimbursing their debts.

The present session of the International Labour Conference is taking place at a time when the international community is celebrating the 40th Anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Indeed, this Conference is examining the situation of human rights, especially in areas where these rights are denied and where man is losing his basic rights and sometimes even his right to life.

Human rights are sacred and interdependent at all times and in all places. All nations are equal; and no international organisation should remain silent vis-à-vis repeated violations of these rights in certain areas of the world, as is the case at present in Palestine and in the other occupied territories – even more so since these violations are taking place in a manner unprecedented in history. The same also applies to the situation in the southern tip of Africa; in fact, there is nothing surprising about the two situations, given the strong links between the racism in South Africa and Zionism in Palestine.

The racist regime in South Africa has flouted all the resolutions and decisions adopted by the international community and refuses to abide by the simplest humanitarian standards. This Organisation must therefore take practical measures to combat apartheid in South Africa. As regards Palestine and the other occupied territories, the situation has become very dangerous. The suffering inflicted on the Palestinian people by the Israeli authorities has led humanity to lose all hope of seeing human rights being restored in this part of the world. The suffering of the Palestinian people today exceeds by far the sufferings of the Jewish people during the Second World War at the hands of the Nazis. What is most serious is that all this is happening with the full knowledge of everyone, as if it were normal that the Palestinians are suffering today exactly the same fate as the Jews suffered during the Second World War. The Palestinians are being arrested in their tens of thousands and being killed every day. They are being buried alive and even women and children are not being spared; their bones are broken and they are paralysed; their houses are being destroyed for no other reason than the fact that they are Palestinians and wanted to stay in their homes on their land. They are being illegally expelled from their country, deprived of the right to work and freedom of expression and the right to organise, whether this is for political or trade union reasons. They are also suffering the worst forms of racial discrimination. Policies of starvation and attempts to limit education have become the favourite arms of the Israeli authorities, confronted with the just struggle of the Palestinian people to attain self-determination and freedom. The most deplorable aspect is that all this is happening without a single voice being raised to tell the Israeli authorities to cease attacking the Palestinian people and to put an end to their barbaric practices against a country subjected to the worst form of aggression; and this is after repeated attacks on the Palestinian camps and villages in Lebanon, against the headquarters of the Palestinian Liberation Organisation in Tunis and the assassination of Abou Jihad only 50 days ago only in Tunisia, a country which is thousands of kilometres away from Palestine and is not in a state of war with Israel.

Our Organisation must take decisive and practical resolutions to put an end to the bloodshed, to support this Arab Palestinian people and to help it, under the leadership of the Palestinian Liberation Organisation, its sole legitimate representative, to build the independent State of Palestine in full freedom. The International Labour Organisation should provide all forms of practical and moral support to the Palestinian workers to help put an end to the barbaric acts perpetrated by the Israeli authorities against these workers, so that they might establish their trade unions, release and no longer have their houses destroyed or be expelled from their land.

We must of course also review membership of Israel in this Organisation, as long as its authorities refuse to abide by its resolutions or principles of human rights, freedom of expression, freedom of association and the right to live in peace. What is most serious is that state terrorism has become an alternative policy.

Long live the International labour Organisation!
Long live international co-operation and solidarity!
Long live peace and justice!

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. BECHARA (Workers' delegate, Lebanon) – I should first of all like to congratulate the President on his election to his important position and to underline his qualifications and competence. I should also like to thank the Director-General for his excellent Report which is full of clear and useful information.

I come from a country, Lebanon, which has been living through terrible times for many years. Our country deserves much consideration after the frightful torments through which it has lived. There is a permanent threat to its existence, its sovereignty, the future of its children and the civilisation which it has personified for thousands of years.

Lebanon the martyr continues to resist because of its tenacious determination to survive. It therefore deserves the support and assistance of the international community. For our country is a refuge for freedom and a crossroads of civilisations; and any threat to its existence will have adverse effects on stability, peace and progress in a great many regions of the world.

The Lebanese are well aware of the seriousness of the problem, namely the occupation of part of the national territory, the seizure of the national right to decision-taking, the increasing political divergencies, the weakness of the State, the need for basic reform, the weakness of the economic infrastructure and the loss of confidence in the future of the country, as a result of the permanent war which has been waged since 1975 on Lebanese soil and the conspiracy against its unity and independence.

This situation has contributed to an increase in economic and social problems, the worst features of which are hyperinflation, which rose to more than 730 per cent in 1987, unemployment, which affects 30 per cent of the active labour force, emigration, which has drained away one-quarter of the country's population including many representatives of the professions, educated people, professional people, and a free fall in the standard of living as a result of which 80 per cent of the people of Lebanon live in need. In addition the public debt is increasing daily because the State has lost all its revenues. As a result of this, social and medical benefits of every kind are dwindling day by day.

The Lebanese trade union movement, which is one of the strongest national institutions, is proud of having worked to cope with the national problem and of having launched, in collaboration with the trade union, occupational, social, women's and youth organisations, and within the framework of the National Trade Union Congress a comprehensive national project of salvation which for many years has had the remarkably unanimous support of the entire Lebanese people in all the regions of Lebanon.

All the citizens of the country have affirmed their determination to achieve unity, peace and reform.

In the context of this project, we are convinced that the solution must be based on the following: the liberation of Lebanon from Israeli occupation and the withdrawal of all foreign troops as well as support to the worthy national resistance in southern Lebanon and the extension of the sovereignty of the State over all Lebanese territory; a declaration that the war is at an end and the use of dialogue as a means to political understanding on the basis of democratic reform; recognition of Lebanese unity, independence and Arab personality, refusal of partition with an opening up of routes between all regions; the formulation and implementation of a large-scale plan of national economic and social reform, which has been described in our draft and our programmes, aimed at economic revitalisation, social justice and redistribution of income.

Lebanon today is on the eve of an important constitutional event, namely the election of a new president of the Republic this summer. We shall be at this rendez-vous and we are anxious to elect a president who will be the saviour of our country with a programme of national salvation, a programme to end the war, a programme for reform and the re-establishment of confidence in Lebanon.

We also wish to affirm that the people's trade union movement will not sit idly by in the face of the threat to disrupt these elections, which is a real danger for the country's very existence and future.

The trade union movement has been harassed and surrounded and trade union freedoms have constantly been threatened because our movement is openly the problem of Lebanese man in revolt.

From this point of view, we make an urgent appeal to the international community for more understanding of the situation in Lebanon and support for its independence, unity and sovereignty; to come and help us in the struggle for peace, freedom and bread. We are convinced that your honourable Organisation can play an essential role in this regard, particularly in encouraging governments to assist Lebanon in achieving liberation, sovereignty and independence; in implementing a comprehensive plan of assistance and aid to Lebanon in order to put it on its feet again; in confirming the need for presidential elections reflecting the national determination for liberation, unity, salvation and reform; in helping the trade union movement and the Lebanese humanitarian organisations in their struggle for survival, salvation and reform.

We also hope that your honourable Organisation will decide on the aid programmes that we so ardently desire in order to rehabilitate and revitalise our different social organisms. We feel that the reopening of the ILO Office in Beirut is a constructive and necessary step in order to provide the aid that we need.

Lebanon is attached to its centuries-old image, despite hostility abroad; the image of a peace-loving and civilised Lebanon, an anti-terrorist Lebanon, a Lebanon that has itself become a victim of this terrorism; a Lebanon struggling to defend freedom and justice.

Lebanon considers that the resistance of the Lebanese population to ensure the liberation of the occupied territories and the general uprising of the Palestinian people in the occupied territories are an expression of the absolute and inalienable right to build a free and independent State on their territory. The Israeli methods of murder, repression and expulsion of the Palestinian population stand condemned by us and are dealt with in a draft decision that we call upon the International Labour Conference to approve.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. PACHO QUISPE (Workers' delegate, Peru) – First of all, I would like to welcome and express my sincere congratulations to the President for having been elected to preside over this 75th Session of the Conference, all the more so as he is a representative of a socialist country and we are sure that under his skilful direction, the results will be favourable for the workers.

Although it is difficult to summarise in so few minutes the dramatic and terrible situation of the workers and people of Peru, I can nevertheless stress once again that we are a country with an economy which is dependent upon and pillaged by imperialism but that we are very rich in natural resources which are regrettably usurped by transnationals in complicity with our Government. The Peruvian workers eat less and have shorter lives although they work more, and when they protest, and they stand up to fight for their natural resources, for national sovereignty and for respect for the rights of the workers against pillaging by imperialists and others these workers are repressed immediately and violently, and the Government and economic power groups consider the workers, because of this, to be subversive, anti-democratic, communist and any other adjectives they may want to add.

This situation is the same in the other Latin American countries and in the Third World. It is compounded by the adverse effects of the international economic crisis, made even worse by the adjustment policies imposed by the International Monetary Fund, and accepted and implemented by our governments, the results of which have been to worsen the living, wage and employment conditions of the workers. In other words, the repercussions of the international economic crisis have a direct impact on our workers and our people are thus becoming poorer every year while the economic power groups are becoming richer.

In 1973, for instance, remuneration in Peru was 48.9 per cent of national income, whereas today it is only 31.4 per cent of the national income, that is from one-half it has declined to one-third. However, the profits of employers have risen from 22.3 per cent in 1973 to 40.9 per cent of the national income today. This means that the workers continue to be victimised while the economic power groups continue to benefit from the situation.

If the rich are richer and the poor are poorer in Peru today, this is due to the fact that for almost 13 years a policy especially directed towards these ends has been in force without interruption. The general income of the Latin American region has declined in recent years and, as a result of the interminable roundabout of the external debt, our countries have ended by becoming exporters of capital, financing the deficits and the arms race of the more developed economies and principally the imperialist economies.

We finance the generation of these surpluses, doing so at the cost of a systematic policy of social exclusion, and of the violation of fundamental human rights, which indissolubly associate economic, civil, political, social and cultural rights.

This is why we, the workers of Peru, consider it so important and encouraging that the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Francis Blanchard, should have reserved a substantial part of his Report for a review of the present situation, forty years after the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights in 1948. This was also the year in which, as we all know, the ILO adopted one of its fundamental Conventions: the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention.

As the Director-General's Report states, the experience of the ILO has corroborated the remarks of our fellow countryman and Secretary-General of the United Nations, Mr. Javier Pérez de Cuellar, that "the violations of human rights do not occur in a vacuum... such violations are not mere aberrations in the context of systems and structures which are otherwise equitable. Rather, they are... the natural consequence of systems rooted in injustice and inequality", accompanied, moreover, by consciously pursued political, economic and social policies.

This is exactly what is occurring now in Peru. If work is considered as a commodity, in contradiction of the ILO's view, and if the aim is to emerge from the crisis while seeking not the interest of the masses but rather to recover the rate of return, to increase the exchange value of the currency, and to adjust it to the requirements of international capitalist competition, then the trade unions, whose permanent and fundamental aim is the social and economic progress of workers, are an obstacle to these pretensions. That is the reason why the Peruvian Government has declared that all strikes by the workers are illegal, although the ILO recognises the right to strike and so does the Peruvian Constitution. This means then that trade unions freedoms, as the substantial corollary to the exercise of other civil and political rights, are under permanent threat.

In 1981, the previous Government of Peru introduced a Bill on strikes which was to have done away with the legitimate exercise of this right – one of the basic means available to the workers and our organisations. This Bill was strongly criticised by the Committee on Freedom of Association of the Governing Body of the ILO (because we made a complaint here) owing to its content which was contrary to the principles of freedom of association in Convention No. 87, whose 40th anniversary we are commemorating, and Convention No. 98 which was approved a year later.

I should call the attention of international public opinion and this Conference to the fact that the present Government of Peru has just sent the Congress a Bill for the approval of the parliamentary majority of its Party regulating the rights of collective bargaining and strikes, even more draconian and restrictive than the one which came under severe criticism from the Committee on Freedom of Association in 1982. So we have to see to it that this Bill does not get through.

I must recall as well that 13 years ago the policy of wage restraint came into being and is still in force in Peru. This radically limits the growth of workers' income through the interventionist collective bargaining policy of the State, run by a body called the National Development Corporation, affecting both the public and the private sector. Under this policy, between 1973 and 1987 Peruvian workers lost 40 per cent of our income on average; the situation of workers in the public sector is worse, in that their purchasing power has decreased to the tune of about 60 per cent. This is why 200,000 educators, members of the trade union SUTEP, are on indefinite strike, calling for improvements in wages and living conditions. Two Supreme Decrees were issued for public sector workers in 1983 setting standards for the exercise of their rights to trade union organisation and collective bargaining. Both the Supreme Decrees should be roundly condemned by the Committee on Freedom of Association, because they are contrary to the standards and principles of freedom of association adopted by the ILO and, paradoxically, ratified by our country.

I must draw your attention to the fact that the present Government, at its mid-term, has kept these restrictive arrangements unchanged and, still worse, they have extended these restrictions, and others even more irksome, to other categories of workers.

I am referring, for example, to around 10,000 workers, civilian workers who work for military companies and industries, transport companies, (these are industries, not transport, as the word INDATER indicates), who are all deprived of their fundamental labour rights. These workers are not permitted to organise unions, they are not permitted to present specific claims and they are denied all other rights, on the grounds of national security and defence, in a manner totally contrary to the principles recognised in the Conventions adopted by the international community on the protection of the right to organise and collective bargaining.

There are various provisions in force depriving these workers of all these fundamental human rights, but there are also other problems which concern our workers.

Up to the present time, approximately 10,000 Peruvians have died and around 2,000 have been detained or have disappeared during the past eight years. This is, according to the official figures, due to a fratricidal war fought by armed groups. The Government always responds with its dirty war, thus increasing violence in Peru, so the worst consequences have been suffered by the civilian population and the trade union and popular movement.

It is not the workers who promote violence. We are seeking a democracy with social content and participation; we want peace, but with social justice, not a merely formal so-called democracy in which injustice reigns.

The workers of Peru wish the ILO contribution to the promotion and defence of the workers' human rights to be intensified, for the joint construction of a new social and international economic order.

I will conclude this statement by expressing, on behalf of the workers of Peru, our solidarity with our brother workers of Panama, who are fighting for their national sovereignty against foreign blackmail and interference in their internal affairs.

We also greet and express solidarity with the workers of the country of Sandino, and we are sure that Nicaragua will be victorious in the face of imperialist criminal aggression, since the cause of this brother nation is the cause of all our workers, who have so emphatically, even the Peruvian Government, expressed solidarity with Nicaragua.

We also greet and express our solidarity with the workers of the heroic country of Cuba whose workers' organisation, the CTC, is close to completing its first half century. This is a country which a few months ago was a victim of another campaign of defamation with gross lies and slander on the part of the imperialists.

Our earnest, constant wish is that the just demands of the workers of Palestine should become reality, that they should have a free country in which peace and justice reign. We also express our solidarity with the workers of Chile and Paraguay.

The workers of the world have no frontiers. That is why we cannot be enemies because of our nationalities. The enemies of the workers are rather injustice, hunger, poverty, war and the exploitation of man by man.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. DAJANI (Employers' adviser, Jordan) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! On behalf of the employers of the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan, and on my own behalf, I would like to express my most sincere congratulations to Mr. Beyreuther on his election to the presidency of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. I am convinced that his experience and wisdom, as well as his capacity for work, will enable this session to attain its objectives. The delegations who are participating in the work of this Conference, which is of course an annual event, are filled with hope that solutions will finally be found for labour problems, in conformity with the objectives of the Organisation and in the service of the cause of mankind and international peace. Each delegation should be able to contribute to supporting the Organisation with its own talents and knowledge.

I have the privilege of addressing delegations of member States on behalf of the Chamber of Industry of Amman, of which I am a member, and I hope that I can put across my message in this statement. At the same time I would like to congratulate the Director-General on his Report, pay tribute to him, and his wide experience and great skill in leading this Organisation in an exemplary way with his methods, his organisation and his devotion to serving the interests and carrying out the resolutions of this Organisation. It is not easy to run an organisation of this size. It is not easy to look at the world as a whole when it is made up of countries which vary widely, in order to improve work through production, to promote human resources – man is both the instrument and the objective of development and, with true humanity, to help developing countries to meet their needs.

This Report of the Director-General is completely in line with our concept of employment: jobs must be carried out with care, devotion and with skill. We are all responsible for human rights, without any distinction between countries large and small, strong and weak, rich and poor. Fraternity among mankind is the great pillar of prosperity for man on this earth and this is the road to peace. His Majesty King Hussein took this principle as the basis for an inspiring speech, in which he said: "Man is the centre of gravity for development in Jordan. He is the artisan of development; he is the instrument of development; and also its beneficiary. He works in his own interests of development and contributes to serving the interests of others who deserve to be helped to develop their concerns".

In Jordan the employers play an important role in economic and social development. By way of example, we faithfully implement the principle of tripartism which brings together the Government, the workers and the employers.

We appreciate the assistance given us by the Organisation in expanding vocational training, in setting up the Vocational Training Institute, the Social Security Institute and the Occupational Safety and Health Institute. We also appreciate the assistance given in the formulation of labour legislation, and of legislation in other areas, which seeks to raise the level of labour and of man, so that he may better meet his own needs and the challenges of life.

We are grateful for the ILO's interest in holding various local, regional and international symposiums in Jordan concerning labour relations. As employers, we attach a great deal of importance to the ILO's Bureau of Employers' Activities. There is no doubt that all Employers' delegates here would agree with me. The symposium concerning the development of productivity was extremely useful to us; the seminar on migrant workers and their problems was also extremely useful to us and others. We hope to help employers' organisations in Jordan, through chambers of commerce and industry, to help them improve the training given to workers, and enhance the services offered to their members and to the Jordanian economy, especially through the promotion of small and medium-sized enterprises. As the same time we would like there to be contact between these chambers and the employers' organisations in developed countries so that we can benefit from their experience. These contacts are useful, for we can learn from one another. The ILO is our intermediary in all these activities; I am certain that employers' organisations in the developed countries will be generous with their support, since economic promotion in developing countries can increase trade with the industrialised countries.

We, as employers in Jordan and in our capacity as the regional centre for services and maintenance, are trying to increase job opportunities and raise levels of training so that people can become qualified in the new technologies – qualifications which are in greater and greater demand by virtue of the innovations which have taken place in industry, construction and civil engineering, and in medicine in particular. We are pleased that an ILO Employers' group has submitted a resolution inviting governments to consult employers' and workers' organisations in order to encourage private initiative with a view to setting up small and medium-sized enterprises, and inviting the Governing Body of the ILO to instruct the Director-General with setting aside a bigger place in the Organisation's budget for activities which encourage the spirit of enterprise and occupational reintegration of those who have lost their jobs. All these points, and others too, in the resolution are at the very focus of the Organisation's obligations and of the subprogrammes aimed at promoting full employment, struggling against unemployment and raising everyone's standard of living. We hope that when it is submitted this resolution will receive your full support.

We consider this Organisation – the International Labour Organisation – to be the social conscience of mankind as a whole. There has not been a speaker from this restrum who has not emphasised that fact. In his Report the Director-General deals with a human, noble and important question; on behalf of man, wherever he may be, he launches an appeal for respect for human rights as laid down in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. This Declaration guarantees man his dignity and his freedoms, his freedom of expression, his right to earn his living honourably, in security and peace.

Before the proclamation of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights the International Labour Organisation was already working to solve the problems facing peoples, societies and individuals, particularly as far as the rights and freedoms related to work were concerned. The Organisation sought to find solutions to those problems by relying on people who were lovers of peace, justice and fairness and on itself in order to achieve the objectives laid down in its Constitution. This Organisation sought to liberate from injustice those who were subjected to it and to defend the victims of oppression by putting an end to it. Any project, any resolution, any programme and any instrument which has been adopted by this Organisation is in fact a defence of the rights and freedoms of man at work – an appeal for respect for his dignity and for humanity and an encouragement to lead an honourable life. The Director-General's report discusses this extremely important issue with great frankness, above all as regards the question of the occupied Arab territories where human rights are being trampled in a way unprecedented in the history of mankind, even in the times of fascism. The same is true in South Africa, whose regime is co-operating with the Israeli authorities in perfecting all forms of torture, repression and genocide. These are crimes which should be dealt with by an international court. Your Conference is faced with a resolution condemning the Israeli authorities; we hope, in the name of peace and justice, that you will wholeheartedly support this resolution and that you will not abstain during the vote. There is no place in the world for double standards of duplicity. Nothing is worse than remaining silent in the face of evil, for what is at stake is man, his life, liberty and security, not simply material considerations which one can take or leave. We must restore the rights of the oppressed and condemn the aggression. Men's laws have their source in God's laws, and human rights apply to all men without exception. He who suffers a wrong does not have the right to seek vengeance by victimising a third party, or to take pride in seeing him suffer the consequences of his own injustice.

There are two aspects to history; there is the history of events and the history of men and crises affecting them. Crises affecting men correspond to periods when people make attempts to shake off humiliation and injustice and to put an end to the occupation to which they are subjected. I believe that all people on the face of the earth have experienced this history. The uprising of the Palestinian people in the territories that Israel has occupied with force is the history of the Palestinian people who are rising up to free themselves from injustice. They are being murdered, wounded, maimed or imprisoned, because they are trying to free themselves from this oppression. As you know, when a people start to revolt, they manage to shake off the yoke of their sufferings. This struggle is the very symbol of the principles of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

There are not many of you present here today because, of course, it is the weekend; but I am very grateful to you for having come here today and I would like to wish the Conference every success in its work. I hope that God will guide you in your work to do everything you can in order to promote the cause of humanity and that you will also act in accordance with the dictates of your conscience to come to the aid of all peoples throughout the world.

Mr. TITIMUR (Workers' delegate, Papua New Guinea) – First of all, I would like to associate myself with the previous speakers in warmly felicitating the President on his election to the high office of presiding over the deliberations of this 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. I have no doubt that his experience and mature understanding of the problems confronting the world of labour will help this Conference to reach pragmatic answers to the complex questions that it will address. I must also congratulate the Director-General for the excellent report that he prepared, even though we in Papua New Guinea, as usual, do not seem to be receiving our copy sufficiently in advance. This problem has been reported by delegations from developing nations of the Pacific on previous occasions, and I hope that the necessary remedial action will be taken.

Before proceeding to touch upon the agenda items, I wish to keep this Conference apprised of the fact that the trade union movement in Papua New Guinea is now vigorous and dynamic, thanks to a developmental project to strengthen the Papua New Guinea Trade Union Congress, initiated and implemented by the ICFTU and the APRO, and the stationing of an ICFTU representative in my country.

I must also state that a direct consequence of that developmental project has been the great progress made by the Trade Union National Centre in Papua New Guinea in attracting to its fold almost all major trade unions in every sector of the national economy. We continue to receive material and other resources from friendly organisations which have greatly assisted us in becoming the largest Trade Union National Centre among the developing countries in the region.

I must also place on record the support and encouragement extended to us by the Government of Papua New Guinea, in general, and the Labour Department, in particular, in our development process.

Though some positive developments have taken place in the world, particularly as regards nuclear disarmament and the continued dialogue between the two super Powers, there does not seem to be a de-escalation of armed conflicts between nations or groups. The net result is a colossal expenditure incurred in the build-up of conventional arms and the diversion of scarce resources in this direction, while major human issues such as higher living standards and full employment go wanting.

Unfortunately, the Pacific has also been transformed from a peaceful region to an area of conflict, with the overthrow of a democratically elected Government in Fiji, the issue of independence for New Caledonia and other social convulsions taking place in some of the small nations which have acquired a notoriety that is both undesirable and unwelcome.

Despite the vigorous opposition expressed by the governments and peoples of the Pacific, France continues with its regrettable nuclear device testing programme in the Mururoa Atoll, putting at risk the source of the livelihood of the people of the South Pacific.

An important residual effect of the events in Fiji has been that the Free Trade Union Movement closed its ranks and compelled the regime in Fiji to restore trade union freedoms in that country, diluted though they are.

We in Papua New Guinea are being hamstrung in the full expression of our trade union freedoms in so far as they relate to the process of collective bargaining. A centralised, statutory wage-fixation system hangs like a millstone around the neck of the workers. When the wages tribunal sits at intervals of three years, the Government always opposes an upward revision of the wages of the workers.

To demonstrate this point, I quote from paragraph 2.43 of a document written at the request of the Government of Papua New Guinea and submitted to the tribunal by the Government: "There is no real basis for a dynamic shift towards collective bargaining in Papua New Guinea. Any rapid effort to promote a wide range of separate industry awards would be likely to raise the incidence of disputes and bring about considerable disruption. It would also compound the problem of the cost of skills, since in current market conditions the more skilled and experienced group of workers would be better placed to secure higher awards. Workers in the strategic industries and in major new projects in the process of construction would be likely to do exceptionally well, at least in the short run, with uncertain and possibly damaging effects on industrial costs or government revenue or unemployment. On the other hand, a slow development of a wider range of industry or company awards within the framework of the Minimum Wages Board determination, but with features appropriate to the circumstances, could be helpful in easing some of the rigidities of the Minimum Wages Board system."

The impact of the Government's position is demonstrated in the next paragraph which says: "The experience after 1975 shows that the Minimum Wages Board system is quite compatible with the implementation of a government wage policy that stresses wages stability and the medium-term capacity of the economy to pay."

As a member State of the ILO that has ratified the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), we believe that the Papua New Guinea Government is acting in breach of this Convention and has effectively curtailed the process of collective bargaining. Presumably, a reason for this approach may be the fact that the trade union movement was not unified and not streamlined, particularly in the private sector.

But this argument is no longer valid owing to the developments I outlined earlier.

It is particularly encouraging that the Government has accepted the reality of the current situation and has invited the trade union movement, among others, to open a dialogue with the Government at the instance of the Prime Minister. In the course of such talks, we intend to impress on the Government the need to ratify ILO Conventions on such basic issues as maternity protection, paid education leave, freedom of association, tripartite consultation and so on. We are hopeful that at the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference we will be in position to pay a handsome tribute to the Government for acting in consonance with international labour standards.

The agenda item on safety and health in construction is particularly relevant to Papua New Guinea, as my country is in the process of exploiting its vast reserves of natural resources.

International labour guide-lines on this topic have become vital. In Papua New Guinea, 80 per cent of the population live and work in rural areas, on tea, coffee, coconut, rubber and oil-palm plantations. At the moment, our labour laws do not provide for the establishment of trade unions among self-employed people. We believe that the Government's efforts alone are not sufficient to raise the living standards of the rural people, who should be given the right to create and manage organisations of their own. It is our view that organisations of rural workers hold the key to employment promotion in this sector, and we will urge the Government to adopt the Rural Workers' Organisations Convention, 1975 (No. 141).

We are particularly interested in employment promotion and social security because, in this regard, Papua New Guinea has a series of problems. The only social security bodies in the country are the National Provident Fund in the private sector and the Public Officers' Superannuation Fund in the public sector.

The National Provident Fund does not cover the rural workforce or workers in urban centres who work in establishments employing fewer than 25 workers; the Public Officers' Superannuation Fund does not cover married women and a certain category of public servants.

Papua New Guinea suffers from an acute shortage of skilled manpower; this has resulted in an influx of expatriates who enjoy terms and conditions of employment far superior to those of nationals performing identical work. Therefore, it is crucial that training facilities be established, firstly, to provide our people with the necessary skills and, secondly, to eliminate the wage differentials that exist today.

The promotion of employment depends also on the attractiveness of employment. If social security is not extended to all areas, I frankly do not see how efforts to promote employment will be successful.

Talking of employment promotion, I also would like to highlight the trend towards privatisation in Papua New Guinea; privatisation, I believe, is a bug that has bitten all developing nations.

Privatisation invariably results in the displacement of workers, and this is a common denominator in both Third World and industrialised countries. Short-term profits through privatisation are preferred to governments assuming their social responsibilities to the people. The unhindered recourse to privatisation and the attendant unemployment are diametrically opposed to the concept of employment promotion and lead to social tension. It is therefore my proposal that the International Labour Office prepare a set of guide-lines, perhaps in the form of a Recommendation, concerning privatisation and its effects on the workers, with special emphasis on developing countries.

Interpretation from French: Mr. DOLGU (Government delegate, Romania) – I should like to associate myself with those who have spoken before me, to convey to Mr. Beyreuther our most heartfelt congratulations on his election to the presidency of the session. His competence and his great experience augur well for the success of our work. We also congratulate the other Officers of the Conference.

The deliberations of our Conference are taking place under complex international economic conditions.

As was recently stressed by the President of Romania, Nicolae Ceausescu, these conditions reflect the effects of the world economic crisis, the increased deterioration of the economic situation of the developing countries, the persistence of certain acute social and political problems and the continuing tension in international life.

These phenomena and these processes have had, and continue to have, a negative impact on world economic development, and have had an effect on all countries, including my own; for our world is undoubtedly one in which increasing interdependence is bringing countries and continents closer together in both time and space. This means that more and more they find that they have to survive or prosper together, or they will simply find themselves in a multiple crisis with no foreseeable way out. Even if this increasing interdependence is broadly recognised, it remains none the less neglected, and even forgotten. Even if new challenges arise, the approach to problems remains that of yesteryear without any real possibilities of finding viable solutions.

That is why, in its social and economic dimension, the situation with which we are concerned continues to deteriorate. Proof of this is that in the developed countries some 30 million people are affected by unemployment. Some of them are deprived of all rights to assistance and some even have no roof over their heads. Further proof is the extremely serious situation in the majority of developing countries, where on top of former inequalities and injustices there are now others which are ever more intolerable. The economic and social effects of external debt are by far the most catastrophic, for while development has practically come to a halt and the gap between rich and poor countries is getting deeper and deeper, underdevelopment is gaining ground. Hundreds of millions of men and women are without auspices of the United Nations and with the participation of all the parties involved, including the PLO.

As is pointed out in the Report of the Director-General of the ILO, one serious and persistent challenge to the principles of equality defended by the ILO comes from the apartheid policy pursued by South Africa. We should like to take this opportunity to denounce this odious regime and associate ourselves with those who are calling for an end to this regime and to affirm the solidarity of the people of Romania with the just struggle for liberation of the people of Namibia.

To conclude, I should like to express my conviction that the ILO will be able to mobilise all its resources and opportunities to make an increased contribution in its own field of competence to a better understanding of the problems confronting the world of work and to their lasting solution.

I assure you that in pursuit of that objective you can count on the active co-operation of my country.

(Mr. Adiko takes the Chair.)

Mr. BEN-ISRAEL (Workers' delegate, Israel) – I am glad to join the list of speakers who have congratulated Mr. Beyreuther on his election as President of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference.

Four technical items on this session's agenda underscore the changes that have taken place in the ILO's activities since its establishment; these range from rural employment to social security. The Director-General's Report is to be commended for its faithful portrayal of these four topics.

My country, Israel, having been engaged for many years in wide-scale building projects, has acquired considerable experience in the field of safety and health in construction. Lately, however, we have been obliged to take measures to contain our high inflation, and the resulting economic slowdown has, needless to say, had an immediate effect on our building trade. The Histadrut, which represents the interests of the working people of Israel, is struggling for a renewal of economic growth, which will in turn revive the building sector, so that redundant building workers may soon resume their jobs.

A lesson we have learned, however, both in times of prosperity and of economic recession, is that the main enemy of safety and health at work is cheap, unskilled labour. So far, the question of safety and health has been taken care of through our collective agreements in the building trade; but I believe that comprehensive legislation will cover more workers in the building industry as it will be binding also on the small contractors employing unorganised labour.

We will not accept any claims on the part of the employers that the building trade cannot afford to comply with high standards. Such a claim is not justified and is merely an attempt to evade responsibility for the workers' health and well-being.

For its earliest days, the Histadrut (the General Federation of Labour in Israel) as a social movement, paid special attention to employment promotion and social security. The establishment of our labour economy – Hevrat Ha'ovdim – is in itself an expression of our drive to create job opportunities. Histadrut's pension funds network, which covers almost all the wage earners – with the exception of the national and local government employees – provide social security to the majority of our working population.

Histadrut's main concern is to secure employment for the working man. Thus, despite the new, conservative policies advocated by some of the ministers in our present Government, unemployment in Israel is below 7 per cent. Unemployment compensation is paid by the National Insurance Institute; but this is only a temporary remedy. Therefore in our labour economy in enterprises which have had to reduce manpower because of the economic recession, we have offered the workers professional re-training programmes and mobility opportunities whenever possible, to avoid unemployment. We have also proposed that part of unemployment pay be channelled to vocational training schemes to create a new basis for employment. In order to help our development towns which have been the hardest hit by unemployment, because of the rather small number of enterprises available, the Histadrut has established a special "Growth Fund" which operates in accordance with our principle of mutual aid. Workers in enterprises throughout the country have contributed the equivalent of three days' work to this Fund and the money collected has been used to set up new enterprises or to enlarge existing ones in order to supply more jobs in the developing towns.

The problem of lack of sufficient industrial jobs is particularly acute in Israel's Arab villages. The Jewish villages – mostly kibbutzim (collective settlements) and moshavim (smallholder settlements) – have coped locally with the problem by initiating the establishment of industrial plants, thus combining industry with agriculture to secure employment for all their members. However, in the Arab villages, industrialisation has still not taken place, and people travel to neighbouring towns to find work in industrial plants. The Histadrut is trying to help industrialise the Arab villages by encouraging the establishment of co-operatives and today there are already 190 such co-operatives.

We are also encouraging the establishment of manufacturing plants in Arab villages on the basis of partnerships between our labour economy and local contractors. We believe that Histadrut's rural employment promotion drive in the Arab villages will not only help to solve employment problems, but will also serve as a bridge for Jewish-Arab co-existence and the full integration of the Arab population in the Israeli economy, just as the Arab workers themselves are integrated in Histadrut as full-fledged members enjoying equal rights and obligations, and elected to our highest executive bodies.

I should now like to comment on the Director-General's Report.

The report on the situation of the workers in the administered territories, prepared by the Director-General and the ILO annual mission, includes – despite certain inaccuracies – several interesting elements. The mission is given full freedom of action and movement, and meets with whomever it wishes. I will not discuss the sections of the report pertaining to the Israeli Government and employers, but there are some other issues that I feel must be dwelt upon.

First, let me comment on the section relating to equality of opportunity and treatment. As far back as 1967, the Histadrut succeeded in ensuring, as the Director-General's report itself testifies, that every worker from the territories who sought employment work, underemployed, undernourished, or even starving.

Not so long ago, one spoke fairly frequently of the need to set up a new international economic order. Nowadays, those voices are heard less and less often. Priority is given to the ways and means of managing the crisis, and sometimes that is really no more than a euphemism which barely conceals efforts to shift on to others, particularly the weak, the burden of the necessary structural adjustments. It seems that an attempt is being made to ensure that people forget the onus of responsibility which in the present situation is on the developed countries, and the spirit of solidarity which should imbue all macro-economic decisions in these countries.

We should like to congratulate the Director-General, Mr. Francis Blanchard, for having stressed in his Report the social dimension of human rights, and for having most opportunely recalled how it is a common responsibility.

The deliberations in this forum, whose vocation it is to concern itself with the basic needs of the world of work, are called upon to contribute to creating a better awareness of the gravity of the situation and to succeed in determining lines of action which are adequate to meet the present challenges.

Forty years ago my people chose the socialist path of development. Socialist property in its two forms, state property and co-operative property, constitutes the foundation of our economic system, from which exploitation of man by man has been eliminated once and for all and in which full employment has been ensured and is guaranteed by the Constitution. At the Romanian Communist Party Congress in 1965 a process of profound change was initiated, and is still under way.

Distortions of socialism, violations committed against human rights, erroneous interpretations of our history and of our cultural heritage have been eliminated and arbitrary practices have been replaced by a society based on law. On the basis of the principle that the development of socialism implies the development of democracy, an entire system of institutions has been set up enabling workers and citizens in general to express themselves and to participate fully in decision-making. In enterprises, the supreme decision-making body is the general assembly of workers whose executive body, the council of workers, is itself made up of elected representatives.

As for economic management, we have carried out a redistribution of responsibilities between central state bodies and production units so as better to harmonise the tasks stemming from the single economic and social development plan and the freedom of choice deriving from the autonomy of enterprises based on self-financing and self-management. At the same time, successive price reforms have been carried out with the aim of better reflecting the real costs of production.

On the basis of this new economic and financial mechanism, we have devised and implemented an economic policy aimed at sustained growth and a harmonious distribution of new economic activities throughout the land and at moving from extensive to intensive development and to increasing participation in international economic co-operation.

As for promoting the principle of equality of opportunities, I should like to make a few comments.

First of all, the policy of economic development nation-wide and an appropriate housing policy have resulted in the creation of more than 5.6 million new jobs since 1950, most of them in the last 20 years. These jobs which have been created throughout the country have been conducive to a considerable reduction in the disparities between districts in terms of per capita income. Numerous industrial sites and agro-industrial centres have been built in all districts and there has been an almost total reconstruction of towns.

Secondly, a coherent policy has been pursued on equality of wages between men and women and the promotion of women. Today women are well represented at all levels, in the State, the party, in trade unions, and in various other professional organisations, as well as in enterprises and groups of enterprises.

Thirdly, an income policy has been introduced which excludes privileges and the appearance of new privileged strata, and at the same time ensures that workers are interested in the results of their labour.

Finally, there has been a considerable development of education, research and culture, which enables everyone to have access to an education which guarantees equality of opportunity and also provides the necessary conditions for the full development of the individual.

My country is at present midway through implementing the 1986-90 five-year plan. In that period the market value of production in industry has increased by some 20 per cent, and we have secured record production in agriculture for the second year running. Productivity has increased by 20 per cent and exports by 30 per cent, which have made it possible for us to increase the wages of all workers by 10 per cent. This action will start this year and the first beneficiaries will be the workers with the lowest incomes.

The fact that we have on our agenda an item on employment promotion and social security with a view to the adoption by the Conference of a Convention reflects the concern of the ILO at the situation existing in certain member countries in this respect and also the determination to contribute to finding solutions which are both realistic and effective.

It is the same for the item concerning rural employment promotion which shows once again the attention devoted by the Organisation to the critical situation obtaining in many member States in this important economic sector.

In Romania about 28 per cent of the active population is employed in agriculture.

Modernisation and the reorganisation of agriculture are accompanied by the creation of the necessary prerequisites for approximating the conditions of life and work as between villages and towns. The extension, in the rural areas, of the network of non-agricultural activities, such as small industry, handicraft co-operatives and services also contributes to ensuring full employment and better utilisation of the work of the population.

The conclusions that can be drawn from the special report of the Director-General on the situation of the Arab workers in Palestine and the other Arab territories occupied by Israel demand more than ever a redoubling of efforts to achieve a political solution, to convene an international conference under the in Israel through our Labour Exchanges would enjoy the same conditions as his Israeli counterpart, in terms of wages, social benefits and work opportunities. To our regret, however a considerable number of workers from the territories prefer irregular employment over which the Histadrut has no control.

We are certainly far from happy with this situation, as the availability of cheap labour is harmful for the Israeli worker. But, speaking generally, I can say with a measure of confidence and pride that by and large there is no cheap labour in Israel in the real sense of the term.

Contrary to other migrant workers, the workers from the territories are regarded as commuting workers, the large majority of whom leave their homes in the morning to come to work in Israel and travel back to their homes at the end of the working day. Because of the small size of the country the maximum travelling distance amounts to one hour only. Permanent workers in organised plants also participate in union activities. They are entitled to vote and to be elected either as representatives of workers from the territories or as representatives of the entire working body. Some have been elected as workers' committee chairmen by the whole body of workers, Jewish and Arab alike.

In return for the trade union protection which Histadrut extends to the workers from the territories, it deducts a 1 per cent organisation fee from their wages as compared with the 4 to 5 per cent membership fee it deducts from its full-fledged members.

Histadrut ensures that workers from the territories are aware of their rights by distributing pamphlets and leaflets in Arabic at their places of work and in the labour councils. There is also a "Questions and answers" radio programme in Arabic on these topics, as the Director-General's report has rightly mentioned.

Throughout the most difficult periods during the last few turbulent months in the territories, the solidarity between Israeli workers and their colleagues from the territories has not wavered, indeed, due to Histadrut's strong objections the proposal to import foreign workers to replace the workers from the territories was rejected.

I now turn to the resolution submitted by the Arab States, and this takes us back to the days which we had hoped would never again return. Purely political issues have once again been placed on the ILO's agenda to the detriment of the Organisation's most important social mission and in contradiction to due process machinery. In this respect, I should like to recall the words of a great ex-spokesman of the ILO, my friend Irving Brown, the Workers' delegate from the United States, when these matters were discussed in 1983. He firmly stated that "to condemn a member State's behaviour without due process was to politicise the Organisation. The ILO's due process machinery included the complaints procedure set out in article 26 of the Constitution and the review procedures of the Governing Body Committee on Freedom of Association, the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations and the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards. It did not permit a one-sided investigation. Certain of the sponsors of the resolution were advocating a weakening of the supervisory machinery. Many of them had been cited by the Committee of Experts. Israel had never been cited.

The resolution was an attempt to turn the Committee into a combination of prosecutor and jury. Since the resolution mentioned freedom of association and discrimination, which were subjects of ILO Conventions, why did the sponsors not complain to the Committee of Experts, the Committee on the Application of Standards or the Committee on Freedom of Association? It is appropriate to decide such a matter by simple vote in a committee of changing membership and political composition. The adoption of a series of resolutions did not constitute a legitimate and objective record."

Past experience has shown that preoccupation with a political issue of this kind will inevitably prevent us from dealing with any of the other constructive topics which are the ILO's very raison d'être. This being the case, the Histadrut delegation cannot remain indifferent to the very grave unfounded accusations contained in the draft resolution and will certainly not refrain from pointing out the record of the countries which have subscribed to this draft resolution in the field of human and civil rights, freedom of organisation and care for the living and working conditions of their peoples. Neither will we abstain from noting those countries which shamelessly practise double standards in their relations towards other countries. On the one hand, they abstain from criticising countries which deny human rights and basic freedoms on the absurd claim that these countries cannot be influenced anyway but, on the other hand, they very readily condemn Israel – the sole democracy in the Middle East whose free trade union movement, the Histadrut, organises three-quarters of its entire population.

As far as the workers from the territories are concerned, I wish to state that the Histadrut has ensured that everyone who works in Israel is covered by the same collective agreements prevalent at his workplace. Furthermore, despite the fact that the Histadrut is a general federation of labour in which all parties of our political spectrum are represented, the Histadrut decided by virtue of a formal executive bureau resolution to extend trade union protection to those Israeli Arab workers who took part in solidarity actions.

Let me add a few remarks concerning paragraph 5 of the resolution which calls for the establishment of a special committee to deal with the situation in the territories at every ILO session.

First, the resolution, by referring to "Palestine and other occupied Arab territories", in effect denies Israel's very existence, and may I remind you, fellow delegates, that the Conference rejected such language in the Conference of 1983 which rejected a similar resolution.

Second, every year an official ILO mission visits the West Bank and Gaza to study conditions there and receives full co-operation from all three parties which represent Israel at the ILO. The Director-General's Report includes a special appendix on this topic. This ought to be entirely sufficient.

Third, the resolution contains not a single constructive proposal regarding peace.

This disruptive initiative is taken at a time when the world community is intensifying its search for peace and coexistence, as has just been demonstrated by the summit meeting in Moscow. The truth is that the Israel labour movement, which has a large majority in the Histadrut, is making efforts for peace.

I am sorry that I have had to introduce a political element in my address but I was left no choice in the face of the political resolution you have been asked to support. I am, however, confident that sound logic and sincere desire for peace will lead you to reject this draft resolution and seek positive avenues for advancing the cause of peace in our troubled region.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. TORREZ GAMEZ (Workers' delegate, Nicaragua) – In taking the floor at this august assembly, I would like to join the speakers who have congratulated Mr. Beyreuther on his election to preside over the work of this Conference. We are certain that under his skilful leadership, our work will conclude with extremely positive results.

The Report of the Director-General this year has addressed a very sensitive issue; the serious violations of human rights in many areas of the world trouble the conscience of mankind.

Every day men and women everywhere are being persecuted, murdered, imprisoned and subjected to the most degrading, cruel and unjust conditions.

At this very moment, while I speak in this forum, it is certain that someone, somewhere, is awaiting his final hour, a victim of cruel mistreatment, deprived of these human rights we are discussing, and about which so much has been written.

The traumatic reality exceeds the resonance of any speech or the eloquence of any report.

In the area of economic and social rights, the spectre of unemployment, the lack of social security and the absence of minimum labour guarantees persist, despite efforts brought to bear by the international community and its bodies, and there are still no prospects for an immediate solution.

As was pointed out in the Report of the Director-General, Conventions and international labour standards undoubtedly represent effective instruments for the protection of millions of workers. However, beyond the legal framework, there are structural conditions in the world economy which have a crushing weight on the prospects for full productive employment, social security and other basic claims.

We are firmly convinced that in order to guarantee to the working class of the Third World the essential conditions of work and life, our economic dependence on the large industrial Powers must be ended, and the creation of a more just and rational economic order is essential.

This is why we reject the economic structural adjustment measures sought by the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund because these measures merely shift the weight of the crisis on to the shoulders of the impoverished majorities, without tackling the basic causes of this crisis.

The Nicaraguan workers support all workers of the world fighting for social conditions which can guarantee a decent future for their children.

The workers in Nicaragua, during these eight years following the revolution, have been the main protagonists of fundamental achievements in the areas of freedom of association, collective bargaining and in other concessions exacted from the employers who were once protected by the dictatorship; many of them have not understood that tripartism is not just a ceremonial sentence, but a necessary reality of today's world.

Embarking upon the complex path of national reconstruction, we have taken special care to safeguard fundamental human rights. In eight years of revolution we have been able to create more than 2,600 trade unions and have negotiated more than 1,400 collective agreements in all economic sectors.

We have gained access to education, health and housing projects in the cities and in the countryside; and although it entails great sacrifices, we are building for future generations.

This is the project of an entire people which has been the victim of aggression by a foreign Power for some years now. The sentence of the International Court of Justice clearly defined which party was in the right in this conflict.

What has been the reaction of the Nicaraguan workers to the foreign aggression?

What has been and continues to be the position of the great majority of the trade union movement?

It has been the same as the position of the European trade union movement during the fascist invasion. We have put aside personal interests to come to the defence of our country; no one can reproach us for such an attitude. Was it not the thousands of French, Belgian, Dutch and English workers who joined their national armies and resistance movements, and who finally defeated the aggressor?

It should therefore not come as a surprise that the unions in Nicaragua have urged their members to join the ranks of those fighting to defend the sovereignty of our country.

Just like the workers of Europe and of all countries threatened by fascism, Nicaraguan workers have strengthened the resistance against the aggressor. In 1987 and 1988, we contributed 1,109,618 man-hours on a voluntary basis, involving more than 30,000 workers and a vanguard detachment of 12,000 responsible for providing supplies and spare parts that are in short supply owing to the economic embargo decreed against our country. What other attitude could we have expected from people who love their nation?

Could we imagine French or Belgian workers declaring a strike or boycotting the production of their country during the bitter struggle to expel the fascist enemy?

Without a doubt, we admire the example of that generation of workers who were responsible for the victory in the bloody battle to preserve the fundamental values of mankind.

The principles of self-determination and resistance before the aggressor are not foreign to the history of the European, Asian, African, Arab or other labour movements. And that is why we know that you understand our support for the Popular Sandinista Revolution, which safeguards the nation and the principles of social justice and solidarity.

We are in favour of measures and practices which offer prosperity to our future generations.

That is why we are fighting for peace, because we are aware that the war of aggression financed by the North American Government has cost the country more than 3,600 million dollars in material losses and more than 50,382 lives.

What claims could workers make while the conflict has paralysed investments and closed enterprises?

In these circumstances, however, we do not hesitate to take action to protect the interests of workers. But we are not irresponsible; we will not sacrifice the in which workers and trade union organisations must struggle day after day in South Africa, in Namibia and the territories occupied by Israel. This is of considerable concern to us. In Chile, the trade union movement is fighting for trade union rights in order to topple the regime of the dictator Pinochet.

It is quite clear that democratic freedoms are threatened and that the military dictators are flagrantly violating Convention No. 87 and the principles of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. It should, however, be pointed out that in the Western so-called democracies, conservative circles have declared war on the trade union movement and its achievements. At present, the employers and government circles in several developing countries are pursuing a policy aimed at weakening the influence of the trade unions. These circles have adopted as an objective the abolition of the rights and advantages of the trade unions which they have attained through the century-old struggle of the trade union movement. These trends are clearly visible in Europe. I should like to point out many countries have social legislation the objective of which is to create a situation making it possible for the government to break strikes with the assistance of the security forces, as has happened in a number of countries. In the course of recent years, the defence of trade union rights has played an important role in social struggles at the international level. This shows that the trade union movement and the workers are determined not to withdraw in the face of the onslaught of reaction.

Interpretation from French: Mr. LEBRUN (Workers' delegate, Haiti) – Please allow me first of all to congratulate Mr. Beyreuther on his election to the presidency of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference.

The creation of the first Haiti trade union, which was the cobblers' trade union, set up on 24 March 1903, proved that class consciousness already existed amongst the workers, but nevertheless after this first attempt to organise, the reactionary class and the occupiers of 1915, sullyng our native soil, quickly moved to stifle the union. It was only in 1946 that the movement was officially launched. Forty-two years of insignificant trade unionism marked by high and low points, and the most severe blow struck against it was in December 1963 by the regime of Duvalier the elder. The Third World faction of the movement, led by Fortuné, in exile in Venezuela, tried to re-establish the movement in 1980, but the Duvalier dictatorship, now represented by the son, once again extinguished the flame of the working-class movement. If there was any trade unionism at all, until 7 February 1986 it was a drawing-room trade unionism in lounge suit – sham trade unionism under supervision.

I have briefly recalled my country's trade union history in order to make you understand the complex problems of the Haitian labour world. From the slave system to the feudal system, which still prevails in the rural areas, our country underwent its industrial apprenticeship with the installations set up by the American occupier and since that time, at the beck and call of the political authorities, the wealthy class, completely unperturbed, has continued its outrageous exploitation of the working class. In the last 31 years of the Macoute regime, up to the CNG transition, exploitation with all its implications and consequences has been institutionalised. There is no question of life or dignity in the tragic situation of urban and rural Haitian workers.

In the closing years of the twentieth century, when man is ahead of his time, while still incapable of feeding millions of starving people throughout the world, the Haitian worker in provincial towns and in the capital has no housing, not enough to eat, no access to health care. He has suffered over the last ten years from a wage freeze, he is seeing the cost of living shooting up and his purchasing power diminishing; he is cramped into shanty towns without any facilities, exposed to epidemics, infectious diseases, and ill-treatment. He has the choice only between death or mass migration abroad, like the boat people, in totally inhumane conditions in a hopeless search for a better life.

As for the rural worker, he has the worst of all worlds, with the impoverishment of the peasant worker, the drain of capital from the agricultural sector, underemployment and lowered productivity. Peasant workers, who make up more than 80 per cent of the overall population, remain the source of all the evils of Haiti: they are illiterate and have no technical training. The Haitian peasant worker is in a serious situation. You must understand that he carries on his shoulders 43 per cent of the GDP of an economy in distress and that he lives on the margin of society without any facilities, without any infrastructure: no schools, hospitals or electricity, no roads or means of communication. Our country, Haiti, is one of the countries most interested at this 75th Session in the promotion of employment in the rural environment. It is calculated that 10,000 to 15,000 hectares of land remain uncultivated every year as a result of erosion caused by the systematic felling of our forests which has led to a serious decline in the real income of the rural population. The mass of workers and small farmers make up 66.8 per cent of the overall active population. Another constraint upon the development of agriculture is the fact that the land is badly distributed and the most fertile land is concentrated in the hands of the big landowners.

This serious deterioration of economic and physical conditions has led to massive rural migration to the towns and the other Caribbean islands, particularly to the sugar plantations of the Dominican Republic, creating a new slave class of the twentieth century in the Caribbean. Of course I do not have the time to go into detail on these circumstances, but I can say one question arises: What are the working conditions of the labourer, the artisan, the skilled worker, the peasant, the Haitian worker in general?

Working in Haiti is not a right but a favour and to deserve it you have to obey without answering back and take everything so as not to lose your job. Work, which is usually understood as a factor of freedom and equity, is reduced to punishment. Working conditions, the working environment, health and safety, poverty wages, the total lack of social security, all these factors I think give you, delegates to the 75th Session, an idea of the social position of the Haitian workers, which gives rise to the need for us in Haiti to struggle for a new Labour Code and ratification of the Convention on the promotion of employment and social security.

The army of the unemployed is growing from day to day, increasing the number of petty criminals, pickpockets and gangsters. Solutions to this problem future in order to ensure the present at all costs. The first battle that the Nicaraguan workers have to win is the safeguarding of the integrity of the country and the sovereignty of the nation. Without a free country there are no worker demands; if we lost the country, we would lose everything. We will never allow this to happen.

Throughout our struggle, Nicaraguan workers have acted in solidarity with other workers in other areas who are fighting against the same enemy.

That is why we reaffirm our unwavering solidarity with the workers and people of Panama, victims of economic aggression and military threats which have been repudiated by the international community.

We reaffirm our solidarity with the Palestinian workers in the territories occupied by Zionist aggressors. Their cause is also our own.

We continue fighting alongside the people of Namibia and South Africa, to put an end to the abhorrent regime of apartheid.

Finally, we reaffirm our willingness to work alongside all the workers of the world who are fighting for the just cause of freedom, and we affirm our commitment to defeat the enemies of peace, social justice and freedom in the land of Sandino.

Translation from Finnish: Mr. PERÄ (representative of the Trade Unions International of Workers in the Building, Wood and Building Materials Industries) – Allow me, on behalf of the 17 million members of the Trade Unions International of Workers in the Building, Wood and Building Materials Industries to greet the participants of the 75th Conference of the ILO. The workers of our international organisation and their professional organisations are well aware of the importance of the questions on the agenda of this 75th Session of the Conference. We have studied with considerable attention the Report of the Director-General and we are convinced of the importance of the points to which he has drawn attention and that the agenda of the Conference and the sub-topics satisfy the requirements of our time.

We, as a trade unions international, are particularly impressed by item IV of the agenda. Safety and health in construction is of vital concern for the occupational organisations of our industrial branch. Within the Trade Union International, this question, for some years now, has been discussed in detail. Four years ago, we embarked in our Organisation upon a discussion concerning the establishment of a programme of demand in the field of labour security in the building industry and the wood industry. These efforts resulted in a first draft which will be discussed at the tenth international conference of our industrial branch, from 13-17 September in Berlin, the capital of the German Democratic Republic. With regard to the building industry, the main points of this draft are on the same lines as the draft Convention and Recommendation drawn up by the International Labour Office in the field of labour protection in the building industry. In our view, all the conditions are assembled for the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference to prepare a document on labour protection in the building industry which could be an instrument for improving labour conditions in our industrial branches.

In our preparations for the discussion at this session of the Conference on safety and health in construction, we have taken advantage of the experience of a year ago. We pointed out, indeed, that a year ago, certain employers with the help of certain government representatives, had made a serious attempt to prevent the adoption of a new Convention and Recommendation capable of effectively promoting safety and health in the building industry.

That is why, in our Trade Union International, we feel that the Employers' efforts to have certain Articles of the proposed Convention changed or to dilute the text agreed upon a year ago reflect a highly irresponsible attitude towards the very serious problems arising in our branch of the industry. Furthermore, we are convinced that it is essential to solve a whole series of questions within the framework of this new discussion. The necessary material in this connection was submitted a year ago by the Workers' group.

On behalf of our international organisation, we should like to stress forcibly that Convention No. 62 at present in force no longer adequately satisfies the needs of the building industry as regards the regulation of occupational hazards. It is necessary to state clearly that Convention No. 62 does not cover the conditions which have evolved in the building industry over the last 51 years. We all know that Convention No. 62 was approved in 1937. Since then, technical progress in building has moved ahead at a tremendous pace. Building processes, materials, methods of work have been modified. The concept of construction has been totally changed. It is therefore quite normal that regulations concerning the elimination of hazards, that is to say, the necessary measures ensuring safety at work, should be different from those established 51 years ago.

Taking into account the interests of the woodworkers and the workers of the building industry, new international standards are necessary. This need has been expressed by the whole trade union movement and is demanded by trade union organisations regardless of their political orientations or international affiliations.

Our Trade Union International stresses that the international standards of safety, health and well-being must today, as in the future, correspond to the demands of the technico-scientific development of our industrial branch. Therefore, the adoption of a new Convention and Recommendation is essential to ensure better labour conditions for several millions employed in the building industry.

Allow me to draw attention more particularly to Part I of the Report of the Director-General relating to human rights. I am very satisfied that this Report stresses the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise, Convention, 1948 (No. 87), which is particularly important for the international trade union movement. From the point of view of trade union action, this document, the 40th anniversary of which we celebrate this year, is of vital importance. Indeed, the international trade union movement considers that trade union rights and freedom of association are an integral part of human rights.

We have noted in our Trade Union International that over the last years there has been a considerable development in the struggle of the peoples for their democratic freedoms and their trade union rights. The trade union organisations of our industrial branch have played and will continue to play a central role in this process. Furthermore, the situation created by discrimination imposed a radical situation are not round the corner because the gulf between the haves and the have nots is so enormous that it will take us a great deal of time as well as political and democratic will and trade union struggle in order to reduce it. But if we see a better tomorrow retreating from us further and further, this human tide of suffering, hungering and thirsting for justice and freedom will not be confined by any plan to halt the struggle of the workers and people of Haiti for a better life.

The employers in Haiti have been tolerated and protected by the political authorities, who have always been their puppets, particularly during the last 30 bloody and cruel years of the Duvalier regime. The employers, Haitian or foreign in a conquered land, have made their pile from the Haitian working class. Without defence and without the right to organise, the Haitian worker, from the dissolution of the trade union movement in December 1963 until 7 February 1986, was delivered bound and gagged into the hands of the reactionary, retrograde and paternalistic employers. On 7 February, a date which we shall constantly refer to, a clandestine movement, which had existed for nearly 23 years, was able to surface once again, with three main branches: the CATH, the FOS – which had been on the scene for two years – and the CATH/CLAT. And since then, the struggle for the right to exist and the right to organise has been our main demand.

In 1986 alone, more than 12,000 jobs were lost with the closing of subcontracting enterprises, which thus reacted to the breaking up of the package of claims put forward by the working class, and also of the joint enterprises administered by the State of Haiti under the order of the famous Minister of Finance at the time, Lesly Delatour, commonly known as “Chicago boy” or “Mister Clean”. No jobs were lost in 1987, but over 10,000 workers in the subcontracting industries were dismissed for their trade union activities and nearly all of them were okayed by the Social Affairs Department. Other foreign employers, who were more arrogant, did not hide their anti-trade unionist attitudes and said, “If you want your trade union, keep it, but we will take our enterprises to Costa Rica, the Dominican Republic or elsewhere”. Others who are more intelligent, so very intelligent, prefer to counter-attack with their inspectors, supervisors and senior employees, using the corruption of trade union leaders or business representatives, blocking negotiations with their skilful lawyers specialising in dirty tricks and demagoguery, playing on the corruption of judges at the special labour court and police and military intimidation against the legal actions of workers for their just claims. And because of their manoeuvres, some of these employers have become notorious.

More recently the anxiety of the workers and the trade union movement has been aroused by the tendency of the employers to revert to their old repressive practices, with the use of intimidation, arrests and so on, to block any claims put forward by the workers. It was observed in March, April and May, that whenever action was taken by the workers' unions, however just and legal, it was promptly put down by the intervention of armed civilians or the military. In addition to the protests and accusations made to the bodies concerned on the 40th anniversary of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention (No. 87), we publicly condemn these arbitrary acts which remind us of the 30 years under the Duvaliers, and call upon the ILO bodies concerned to take the necessary action without delay. At the same time, we condemn the opportunistic groups of politicians who, to satisfy their ambitions and realise their political plans, infiltrate the workers' strikes to manipulate them for other purposes.

As a delegate of the Haitian workers and my own Confederation (CATH/CLAT), I have to point out to all the participants at the 75th Session that, without complicity, there would have been no misuse of funds. Having said that, I would add that the succession of Haitian Governments up to the present date have always been mercenaries with no sense of patriotism in the service of the major powers, protecting the interests of the employers and the bourgeoisie. Similarly all the laws, structures and institutions in our country have been established in such a way as to protect and defend the interests of the affluent class.

How are we to interpret the fact that, throughout the dictatorship of the Duvaliers, the transition of the CMG and up to the present, our Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs, with all its bodies, should have been impotent before the dramatic situation of the Haitian workers. The Haitian worker, at the mercy of the whims of reactionary employers and the complicity of the bodies and certain services of the Ministry of Labour, the passivity of the employers' organisations and the internal struggle of the trade union confederations, does not know which way to turn. Accustomed to corruption, the Haitian and foreign employers, since the days of the dictatorship, which they supported, have infiltrated all the services of the regional offices of Social Affairs and especially the labour tribunal, where cardboard copies of judges always await instructions before knowing what to do and what verdict to pronounce. Incompetence and corruption – these have been the distinguishing features of all the services of the Ministry of Labour, with a few minor exceptions, in the last 30 years.

I do not wish to conclude without referring to the 40th anniversary of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), to respect for human rights and to the freedoms of workers and peoples. You are no doubt aware that, up until now, establishing a trade union was necessarily a clandestine matter in Haiti as long as it had not been legalised by the labour directorate. Otherwise, the founders would simply be dismissed by the enterprise.

When we refer to human rights and freedoms, we do this for various reasons. As workers and an affiliated confederation we adhere to the overall concept of human rights as defined by the CLAT and the WCL. The CATH/CLAT demand, for the workers and the people of Haiti, the right to life, to existence, to the right to learn to read and write, the right to work, to hope, and the right to develop ourselves, as workers and as people, because we are not second-class workers. We have spilled our blood in order to gain our freedom and to build democracy, and we are always ready to continue the struggle in order to achieve our complete and full liberation.

Nobody will make us a present of freedom and democracy; we have always worked to be worthy of our independence and to make 7 February 1986 the date of the eradication of the Duvalier dictatorship.

For our workers and our people the struggle continues. We are not asking for anything but we do demand, by means of international co-operation, to have returned to us what for so many years of repression was stolen from us by all those who supported or tolerated the bloodthirsty dictatorship that oppressed our people for 30 years.

We are taking this opportunity to denounce from the ILO rostrum the Haitian employers, accustomed to paying tribute to the dictators all the better to exploit the workers, and the foreign and transnational corporations that have made such enormous profits through the corruption of the totalitarian Duvalier regime. In common with workers and peoples throughout the world, we demand the right to freedom of association and the full exercise of human rights which must not only prevail within each country but also, and more particularly, in the international context, because there are countries that violate the rights and freedoms of other countries and, in order to enjoy a higher level of development, condemn us to underdevelopment. We repeat in a loud voice and to the whole world that we, the workers and the people of Haiti, are capable of constructing our own model of democracy in keeping with our own culture and people. Haiti is undoubtedly in difficulties but it is not a dustbin for ideological rejects or outdated political systems which are now being called into question in other countries by their own ideologists. Like any other great country, we claim our right to self determination. We welcome international co-operation but we say no to assistance given with strings attached or to foreign interference.

We naturally want peace, but not the peace of the grave, not the peace of our children dead because of endemic disease or hunger, while our money rots quietly in foreign banks and our oppressors continue to enjoy their pleasant stay in your country in conditions of luxury. It was sad to hear the President of the Conference saying, in his inaugural statement, that we are all looking to Moscow at the present time and are impatiently waiting for the results of the Reagan/Gorbachev summit, and that the peace of countless countries and of billions of human beings depends on Washington and Moscow. Is peace condemned to depend permanently on the decisions taken by these two super-Powers?

Peace for Haitian workers does not just mean not being in a state of war or living under the nuclear threat, which is merely the polemics of super-Powers and the show business of the arms-producing countries. It is much more than this, it means not to be dependent on or dominated by the so-called developed countries that continue to hold our own development hostage to their own. We want true peace, which is the fruit of social justice, dialogue and consultation, international solidarity and the full exercise of the rights and freedoms of workers and peoples.

Interpretation from Farsi: Mr. YAZDAN PANAH (Employers' delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran) – In the Name of Allah, the Compassionate, the Merciful! "The Satan promiseth you destitution and enjoineeth on you lewdness. But Allah promiseth you forgiveness from himself with bounty. Allah is all-embracing. All-knowing." (The Glorious Koran.)

The International Labour Conference at its present session, addressing the important issue of human rights, has undertaken a new international task, a movement inspired by the increased awareness of the people, particularly in the Third World. The need to pay more attention to the demands of the people in those countries has warranted the international organisations concentrating more on the issues and problems facing the Third World.

The Director-General in his Report to the present session has focused on human rights and the role of common international responsibility in the promotion of respect for human rights, and has stressed the need for better observance of the freedoms contained in the international labour Conventions as the mainstays for the realisation of human rights and has made particular reference to the inter-relationships between respect for human rights and world peace and stability.

There is no doubt that all countries, according to their own ideology and political methods of administration, have adopted economic, political and social patterns of their own, which are essentially manifested in their national constitutions, on the basis of which their economic and political targets and policies are pursued. International labour standards are necessarily given due consideration in economic and social policies and legislations.

The question still remains as to what factors have contributed to the obstructions that hinder the observance of human rights in today's world.

A glance at the socio-economic conditions prevailing in the Third World, considering their acute social situation, particularly in the fulfilment of their basic needs and the provision of minimum living standards, will better demonstrate the extent to which human rights are being respected in the world.

The expansion of the political influence of some major industrialised countries and the usurpation of the natural resources and the God-given wealth of the Third World by the Eastern and Western international exploiters, carried out under the guise of political, economic and military assistance besides the imposition of their own political wishes upon them, has resulted in the ever-increasing deprivation and oppression of the Third World nations.

According to the Report of the Director-General, approximately 900 million people are unemployed or live in absolute poverty in the Third World countries. The pricing of most of the commodities and raw materials of these countries is controlled by the industrialised countries which, in turn, export their manufactured products to the same countries at extremely high prices and their political agents stationed in the satellite countries free-handedly plunder their wealth and natural resources and create regional conflicts under various excuses by dumping their outdated armaments in those countries, serving the goal of making the exploited Third World countries both militarily and economically more dependent. Under such circumstances, can the international labour standards be realised and applied in practical terms?

I should also refer to the obvious violation of human rights through the continuation of the policy of apartheid by the racist regime ruling over South Africa and by the usurping Zionist regime. The Zionist entity, usurping the homeland of the Moslem Palestinians, has deprived them of their most fundamental God-given human rights, and still with military and financial support of the arrogant Powers, continues to plunder their natural wealth. Nevertheless, the liberation movements of the oppressed in South Africa and the uprising of the Palestinian Moslem are being bathed in blood, while they struggle for the achievement of their very basic human rights and to restore to the beautiful phrase of "human rights", the standing theme in the Report of the Director-General, the true meaning it deserves.

The imposition of various restrictions and creation of barriers by the major industrialised countries, preventing the establishment of an acceptable balance in international economic relations, are the most important factors in the expansion of poverty and inequality in nearly all of the Third World countries.

The total amount of debts of the developing countries has increased from US$1,120 billion in 1986 to US$1,190 billion in 1987, indicating an annual increase of 6.3 per cent. Those debts are estimated to further increase to US$1,250 billion in 1988. This implies that the economic situation of the debtor countries has been more seriously deteriorated, while they have not been able even to free themselves of the repercussions of the assembly industries due to the obstructionism imposed upon them by the industrialised countries.

Furthermore, transnational enterprises, as the arms of the international exploiters continue to dump their hazardous industries in the Third World, thus confronting the deprived nations of the world with serious occupational and environmental health and safety hazards.

Those companies, relying on the usurped wealth of the Third World and adopting unjust exploitative policies and practices in the international markets have disrupted the economic, financial and trade status of those countries to their own benefit and have caused detrimental effects to the economy of the Third World. Agents of those companies, by artificially lowering the prices of primary goods and raw materials and then through massive purchase of the same materials from the exporting countries, by exerting control over the international markets and increasing the prices according to their own illegitimate interests, drain the material wealth of the Third World countries. Owners of capital in the industrialised countries through monopolising the technology have practically blocked the route of progress and prosperity to the Third World countries.

As the effective observance of human rights is becoming more urgent, some countries who pretend to be supporting human rights in effect block the realisation of human rights by perpetuating their anti-human acts in all corners of the world.

The Great Satan and its allied rulers, with their insane acts in different regions of the world, including the Persian Gulf, in order to secure the unlawful interests of transnational enterprises, have entered their military fleet to their satanic show of power aimed at continuing their exploitation of the oppressed countries by obstructing the socio-economic progress of the held-back nations. To continue their economic plunder, they impose various sanctions, contrary to all human values, and prevent the healthy commercial and economic activities of the human societies whose most basic right, that is, their right to self-determination, is thus obviously breached.

On the other hand, the continuation of the role of the dollar in international transactions has created other serious hazards for the prosperity of the peoples and the economies of the Third World. The publishing country, through creating artificial fluctuations in the supply of dollars, imposes her arbitrary control over the world economy, and inflicts irreparable harm on the already weakened financial body of the Third World countries, thus expanding the dimensions of poverty all over the world. Under such conditions, discussing the observance of or respect for human rights in the international community will bear no fruits unless the destructive factors, i.e. the international exploitative policies of both East and West, are discontinued. So long as those policies be carried out, one cannot expect human rights to be truly respected in the international community.

Hardly two years had elapsed since the victory of the Islamic revolution in our country when the war was imposed against our Moslem people. Nevertheless, despite sanctions and other pressures imposed by the international exploiters, our country has been able to pass new laws, with particular reference to the observance of the rights and the provision of various social protections for the Moslem and revolutionary people. Managers have wholeheartedly supported the Islamic revolution, and have endeavoured towards the reconstruction of the economy aiming at the independence of the country to be gained.

It has been one of the main objectives of the employers to help raise the living standards, as well the income and employment levels of the workforce and promote their well-being. The employers of the Islamic Republic of Iran have had no conflict of interests with the workers while fully participating in the tripartite activities that are according to, and in some cases, higher than the international labour standards. This also has been possible with the help of the Almighty, and because of the common understanding which prevails in the light of our Islamic culture.

Our Moslem people are continuing their holy defence ever more resolutely after eight years since the beginning of the imposed war, while the aggressor, with the bombardment of our cities, villages, schools, hospitals and factories, is continuing its aggressions, among the most recent of which the chemical bombardment of the defenceless women, men and children in the Kurdish city of Halabcheh can be cited as an unprecedented crime committed by the aggressor. This is while the responsible international organisations, claiming to defend human rights, have kept silent instead of identifying and condemning the aggressor without even trying to prevent the continuation of such aggressions. Neither have the well-known international exploiters denied the aggressor any of their wholehearted support.

In order that fundamental human rights be truly realised, there is no way for different social groups but unitedly to rise up against the international exploiters.

Managers and employers in the Islamic Republic of Iran have, shoulder to shoulder with other social groups, embarked on a national movement against the international exploiters. Numerous innovations in our country bear witness to our success in practical terms. We believe that basic human rights can prevail only when – inside national borders – the illegitimate interests of international monopolisers be discontinued through appropriate management so that the natural freedoms and rights of all the people of the world shall be restored.

Peace be upon us and the true followers of Allah!

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT (Mr. ADIKO) – I now call on Mrs. Kekedo, Government delegate of Papua New Guinea, who wishes to exercise her right of reply to Mr. Titimur, Workers' delegate, Papua New Guinea. First, however, I must remind you that persons exercising the right of reply may be interrupted if they speak for more three minutes, if they raise new issues that go beyond a brief and precise reply, or if the reply constitutes in itself a contribution to the general debate. I trust that you will keep to these rules.

Mrs. KEKEDO (Government delegate, Papua New Guinea) – I consider it my responsibility to reply to certain accusations and allegations made by the Workers' delegate from Papua New Guinea. There are aspects of his speech which require some qualification. Firstly, the central statutory wage-fixation system referred to is the Minimum Wages Board. This is only one aspect of the industrial relations machinery operating in Papua New Guinea. It has been in existence since 1974. The Minimum Wages Board is appointed ad hoc and is comprised of one government representatives, one community representative, two employers' representatives, two workers' representatives and a permanent chairman. It sits at intervals of three years and invites submissions from all parties concerned. Its main aim is to give full consideration to what has been presented before it and determine a sustainable minimum wage which is then pegged to cost-of-living increases.

It is interesting to note that the 1983 and 1986 determinations were both warmly accepted by workers' movements throughout Papua New Guinea. It is again important to note that the rate of inflation in my country has been well below the limit up to which wages are adjusted.

Furthermore, during the three-year intervals, workers are given the right to bargain for and negotiate wage increases outside the determination, based on work value changes and productivity.

Three pieces of legislation also provide workers with the right to organise and to negotiate for improved terms and conditions.

It is therefore outrageous and narrow-minded to claim that the Government is curtailing the process of collective bargaining in Papua New Guinea. A whole page is also devoted to the Government's submission to the 1986 Minimum Wages Board hearings. They have used details of the Government's submission to mislead this important Conference. On the contrary, it clearly demonstrates that the Government is concerned about the interest of the majority – that is, the 80 to 90 per cent of the 3.2 million people who live in the rural areas – and is prepared to put its limited resources into development projects for the good of the majority and to accept willingly to be a part of the wage bargaining process described earlier. I should also state that the Government has taken the initiative to review our social security legislation. However, it would prejudice my Government's position if I were to dwell on the issue.

I should like to take this opportunity to state that the Government of Papua New Guinea will be looking forward to the report to be made by the Committee on Rural Employment on which we have had the privilege to serve.

Provisional Record

Seventy-fifth Session, Geneva, 1988

Second item on the agenda: Programme and budget proposals and other financial questions

Second Report of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives

1. The Finance Committee of Government Representatives met on 3, 6, 7, 8 and 9 June 1988 with Mr. D.M.P.B. Dasanayake (Sri Lanka) as Chairman and Reporter, and Mr. J.P. Labat (Uruguay) as Vice-Chairman.

1. COMPOSITION OF THE ADMINISTRATIVE TRIBUNAL OF THE ILO

2. The Committee had before it Provisional Record No. 2, containing a recommendation from the Governing Body concerning the extension of terms of office of two deputy judges of the Administrative Tribunal of the ILO.

3. The Committee recommends that the Conference extend the terms of office of each deputy judge for a further period of three years, and accordingly that it adopt the resolution, the text of which appears at the end of this report.

II. PROPOSED INCENTIVE SCHEME FOR EARLY PAYMENT OF MEMBER STATES' ASSESSED CONTRIBUTIONS

4. The Committee had before it Report II: Information concerning the Programme and Budget for 1988-89 and Other Financial and Administrative Questions, and also Provisional Record No. 2, containing a recommendation from the Governing Body concerning a proposed incentive scheme for the early payment of member States' assessed contributions.

5. The representative of France noted that the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee had made a recommendation to the 239th (February-March 1988) Session of the Governing Body, proposing an incentive scheme to encourage the early payment of member States' assessed contributions. The scheme proposed a redistribution of 60 per cent of interest earned on temporarily surplus regular budget funds to those member States which had paid in full their assessed contributions by the end of the year in which they were due. The distribution was based on the equitable principle that those member States which paid in full and on time should receive the benefit of those interest earnings. However, the situation had now changed. At the 240th (May-June 1988) Session of the Governing Body, the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee had considered a paper dealing with a proposed long-term strategy of exchange rates, which proposed the assessment of member States' contributions in Swiss francs. Historically, interest rates paid on Swiss franc deposits were much lower than those paid on US dollar deposits: to have a worthwhile sum available for distribution the resolution should be amended to provide for 100 per cent of interest earnings on temporarily surplus regular budget funds to be set aside for distribution under the incentive scheme.

6. The representative of Venezuela recalled his objection to the scheme at the 239th (February-March 1988) Session of the Governing Body. The obligation upon member States was to pay their contributions in full in order to participate in the work of the Organisation. Member States who paid late did so mainly because they were unable rather than unwilling to pay on time. The proposed incentive scheme discriminated against them and he could not support such a proposal.

7. The representative of Canada strongly supported the proposal to establish an incentive scheme which provided an inducement for member States able to do so to pay their contributions promptly. The scheme would be financed by interest earned on temporarily surplus regular budget funds, and to be successful it was important to attach to it as much leverage as possible. The amount available for distribution under the incentive scheme would not be adequate if the Office were to switch to a system of Swiss franc assessment for member States' contributions; for this reason he supported the suggestion put forward by the representative of France that 100 per cent of interest earnings should be applied to the incentive scheme.

8. The representative of the Director-General (the Treasurer and Financial Comptroller), explained why it was proposed that only 60 per cent of interest earnings on temporarily surplus regular budget funds should be set aside for the incentive scheme, which was very similar to that adopted by the International Civil Aviation Organisation (ICAO). There were two main differences in the schemes, however: firstly, the ILO incentive scheme was designed to operate annually, compared to a three-year period for the ICAO scheme; and secondly, the ILO scheme offered a virtual guarantee that there would be funds available for distribution. There was no such guarantee for the ICAO scheme, where in years when budgetary expenditure exceeded income, interest earnings were applied firstly against that deficit.

9. The main objectives of the scheme were to improve cash flow and to provide some benefit and recognition to those member States which paid their contributions promptly. There would undoubtedly be an even greater benefit to those member States if 100 per cent of interest earnings were to be set aside for incentive payments, but only at some cost to the finances of the Organisation because it was the accumulation of interest earnings which had accounted for the steady growth in the level of the Working Capital Fund since 1972. There was a proposal before the Finance Committee at its present session for a reduced reimbursement to the Working Capital Fund in respect of withdrawals to finance the regular budget deficit during 1986-87, and the diversion of all interest earnings to an incentive scheme would further compromise the Fund.

10. If the Organisation was to adopt a system of assessment of member States' contributions in Swiss francs, it was estimated that the Organisation might earn a premium on the forward purchase of US dollars of about SF7 million a year, some of which could be available to finance the proposed incentive scheme. If it were now decided to use all interest earned to finance the incentive scheme, he expressed the hope that the Governing Body and the Conference would show some flexibility in the use of the premium so that a part of it might be used to protect the value of the Working Capital Fund.

11. The representative of Argentina recalled that he had not opposed the decision of the Governing Body but at the same time knew very well that this decision alone would produce little if any improvement in the financial situation of the ILO. Member States did not pay their contributions either for political reasons or because they were unable to do so, and it was unlikely that this would change with the introduction of an incentive scheme. The proposal should be submitted for approval as it stood. He could not agree with the views expressed by the representatives of France and Canada.

12. The representative of the Netherlands strongly supported the proposed incentive scheme but noted that the need for it had only been brought about by failure of all member States to meet their obligations under the Constitution and pay their contributions in full and on time. He cautioned that discussion on the Working Capital Fund reimbursement and the incentive scheme should proceed separately so that an incentive scheme would stand on its own. He associated himself with the remarks of the representatives of France and Canada.

13. The representative of the United States noted that some remarks of earlier speakers seemed to be based on the belief that if a little incentive was good, a lot was better. This was contrary to the stream of discussion in the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee where many member States, large and small, rich and poor, had expressed considerable reservations about the success of the proposed incentive scheme. It would make no difference for countries in which payments were governed by legal considerations, and in any case it had only been intended as a temporary arrangement in order to see if the distribution of interest earnings by way of an incentive scheme had any impact, particularly as all interest earnings at present were accumulated in the Working Capital Fund. The experiences of other organisations within the United Nations family were of limited value as they had not been operating long enough. It was surprising to see the discussion moving beyond a consideration of the incentive scheme and he objected strongly to any line of debate which pre-judged future decisions of the Governing Body. He had supported the proposal in the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee on the clear understanding that it was to be implemented for a trial period of two years.

14. The representative of Cuba expressed opposition to the proposal. It took no account of the extremely difficult predicament of many poor countries, nor of the vigorous efforts that they were making to pay their contributions in time.

15. The representative of Spain noted that the proposal was for an incentive scheme as an experiment over a trial period, and it would only be possible to decide to continue or abandon the scheme after it had been operating. He supported the suggestion put forward by the representatives of France and Canada that 100 per cent of interest earnings on temporarily surplus regular budget funds should be set aside in the Fund for the incentive scheme.

16. The representative of the Federal Republic of Germany observed that the scheme would probably neutralise the effect of the late payment of contributions by encouraging late-paying member States to pay earlier. He supported the suggestion put forward by the representatives of France and Canada to set aside 100 per cent of interest earnings to finance the incentive scheme.

17. The representative of Brazil associated himself with the previous speakers who had expressed opposition to the proposed incentive scheme. If member States did not pay their contributions on time it was because they were in financial difficulties and these could not be cured simply by an incentive scheme to pay earlier.

18. The representative of Australia expressed his continuing support for the proposed incentive scheme, stating that it would encourage member States to pay their contributions promptly and restore a measure of equity to the current situation. At present some member States were effectively subsidising others and the proposed incentive scheme redressed the balance in some small measure. He appreciated the explanatory comments from the Treasurer and Financial Comptroller but nevertheless expressed support for earlier speakers who proposed that 100 per cent of interest earnings be set aside to finance the incentive scheme. He believed also that any incentive scheme should stand on its own and that the reimbursement of the Working Capital Fund should be debated as a separate issue.

19. The representative of Botswana believed that all member States were aware of their obligations to pay their contributions in full and on time. It was apparent nevertheless that some countries were unable to honour their obligations. It was necessary for member States to bear in mind that the incentive scheme being discussed was clearly a demonstration of an effort by the Office to ensure that funds were available when required to carry out the functions authorised by the Conference. She therefore supported the proposal that the scheme be introduced for a trial period of two years but recommended that an analysis be carried out at the same time to establish which countries could not pay, the reasons for their inability to do so, and suggestions for possible remedies.

20. The representative of the United Kingdom observed that the Committee was only debating this proposal because of the failure of many member States to meet their constitutional obligations and to pay their contributions in full and on time. Although there was perhaps some relationship between the present debate and that on the reimbursement of the Working Capital Fund, the two issues had to be considered separately, it would probably have been better to debate a precise sum to be set aside for financing the incentive scheme even though persuasive arguments could be advanced for setting aside 100 per cent of interest income. nevertheless there was a firm proposal before the Committee which was difficult to amend in the course of debate even if there was room for discussion on procedural details. He supported the proposal as it stood.

21. The representative of Sweden noted that one of the most preoccupying aspects of the difficult financial situation in which the ILO found itself was the late payment of contributions by member States. He was of the opinion that all possible efforts should be made to improve the pattern of payment of contributions; the introduction of an incentive scheme, based on the "S-curve" formula, was an important element in the efforts to improve the cash-flow situation of the ILO, and this was the principal reason for his support for the introduction of such a scheme. The fact that the scheme would introduce a greater measure of equity between those who paid early and those who paid late was, of course, a welcome side effect, but the main concern was to improve the cash flow.

22. Some participants in this and earlier debates on the subject had questioned the effectiveness of such a scheme. It was a fact that many countries considered themselves unable to pay before a certain date for financial reasons or for administrative reasons such as the timing of their fiscal year. An incentive scheme could help to overcome these hurdles provided that the incentive offered was sufficient. Like other speakers, he had come to the conclusion that the proposal from the Governing Body under which only 60 per cent of the interest earned on temporarily surplus regular budget funds was to be set aside for the scheme was not enough. If the system was to have any real impact all interest earned had to be set aside for this purpose. He associated himself with the statements of earlier speakers who had advocated such an amendment to the proposal of the Governing Body.

23. He acknowledged the point made by the Treasurer and Financial Comptroller concerning the effects such an amendment would have on the financing of the Working Capital Fund, and said that he would be prepared to be flexible on the use of the premium described in the proposal on long-term strategy for exchange rate fluctuations when this would be discussed in the November session of the Governing Body. He noted also that the incentive scheme, if approved, was scheduled for introduction in 1989, whereas the proposal put forward in the paper on long-term strategy on exchange rates would be introduced in 1990 at the earliest.

24. The representative of India felt that delays in payment of contributions were not always genuinely due to economic difficulties. The incentive scheme was only a trial which sought to establish equity in respect of all member States. For this reason, he was able to give his support to the scheme before the Committee.

25. The representative of Japan recalled that his Government had already expressed its views in the Governing Body. His views were very much in line with those expressed by the representative of the United States. In the light of the doubts concerning the effective working of the scheme, he supported it on a trial basis only.

26. The representative of Iraq spoke in favour of the principle of offering incentives for timely payment of contributions and stated that the full interest earned on temporary surpluses should be returned to contributors. In his view, however, the scheme would be more effective if it provided for making returns to all member States who met their obligations – even to those States whose financial dispositions or temporary economic difficulties prevented them from meeting the exact due date.

27. The representative of Saudi Arabia recalled that in the 13 years of his country's membership in the Organisation his Government had paid its contributions on time and even in advance. It did this because it believed in the principle that the Organisation should be given the means to carry out its work. The incentive scheme before the Committee was a bold experiment, and he was not opposed to 100 per cent of interest being made available to reward those who met their obligations. However, he supported the representative of Iraq in his suggestion that the reference date for obtaining rebates should be fixed in a manner which would also benefit those member States whose contributions were delayed through no fault of their own. He pointed out that the problem of exchange rate fluctuations was a totally independent question. The ILO was seeking a solution to its current cash flow difficulties, and the introduction of the incentive scheme constituted a valid new approach to those difficulties.

28. The representative of Nigeria stressed the burden which contributions placed upon developing countries, illustrating this by the fact that his Government's contribution for 1987 represented approximately one twenty-fifth of his Ministry's total budget for that year. He felt that developing countries, owing to their lack of funds and to timing difficulties arising from the dates of their fiscal years, were condemned to paying late and would thus be excluded from benefiting from the incentive scheme unless their allocations were reassessed. Since some 70 to 80 per cent of member States fell within this category, he felt that the necessary adjustments should be made before the proposed scheme went into operation.

29. The representative of Italy stressed the experimental nature of the scheme. He therefore supported the proposal made by the Governing Body, bearing in mind the Director-General's statements emphas-ing the fact that timely payment of contributions by member States was the best guarantee for the execution of the approved programme of the Organisation.

30. The representative of China associated himself with the views of the representative of the United Kingdom. In supporting the Governing Body's proposal, he was aware that the scheme was experimental and could thus be improved over time. He asked for information on the difference in yield that might be expected between US dollar and Swiss franc temporary investments.

31. The representative of Ecuador was opposed to the scheme; in his view it did not furnish an equitable solution to the problem. To be equitable, the scheme should have to take account of each individual country's economic situation, and for his reason he wished his reservations to be recorded.

32. The representative of Bangladesh considered that the scheme should accommodate differences between the ILO's and certain governments' financial years: otherwise, it met with his support. He asked that a fuller picture of the function of other United Nations agency incentive schemes be furnished.

33. The representative of the German Democratic Republic stated that he favoured a two-year trial period for the incentive scheme, having noted that positions expressed in the debate ranged from those of representatives who frankly opposed the scheme to those of representatives who wished to strengthen it by feeding 100 per cent of the accumulating interest into the fund from which rebates would be made. The middle course retained by the Governing Body had taken account of the Director-General's opinion on this subject, and in any event could be reviewed in the light of the actual results.

34. The representative of Peru concurred with other speakers who had drawn attention to the inequitable aspects of the scheme, which derived from a basic division between two groups of countries – those with the potential to meet their financial obligations on time and those who were simply unable to do so.

35. The representative of the Philippines was basically in support of the incentive scheme. She nevertheless recognised that countries of differing levels of development would possess correspondingly different capacities for meeting their financial obligations in good time. She therefore hoped that, in an appropriate spirit of co-operation, the scheme might be adapted in a manner to permit a certain portion of the rebate funds to go to the benefit of countries experiencing such difficulties.

36. The representative of Switzerland commented that devising an equitable scheme would be simpler if it were indeed true that the developed countries regularly met their obligations and that only the less well-off countries retarded their contributions. In fact, a number of indebted developing countries made a great effort to pay on time. Her Government gave first priority to the functioning of the Organisation, and was thus in favour of the proposed scheme – including the suggestion to render the full 100 per cent accumulating interest to the fund, for redistribution in the form of rebates. Were all contributors to pay on time, there would be virtually no need for a Working Capital Fund. The aim should therefore be to establish a scheme which would give the Organisation the liquidity it needed.

37. The representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya spoke in favour of the incentive scheme, associating himself with the representative of Botswana, who had expressed the hope that some account could be taken within the scheme of the special situation of the developing countries. His basic preference was for the scheme proposed by the Governing Body which envisaged earmarking 60 per cent of interest earned on temporarily surplus funds for the corresponding rebates to member States.

38. The representative of Greece also agreed with the Governing Body proposal, considering that the 60 per cent appropriation constituted a suitable compromise between the views he had heard in the debate. He foresaw difficulties in endeavouring to define categories of contributors who could be deemed to be facing particular difficulties in meeting their financial obligations.

39. The representative of the Ukrainian SSR observed that the problem before the Committee was simple to define: the Organisation was in financial difficulty. What was more complex was finding a suitable way to stabilise and then strengthen the financial base of the Organisation. The proposed incentive scheme constituted part of the solution and therefore met with his support. However, it would be preferable to introduce it on an experimental basis for a period of two years. Future analysis of the scheme proposed by the Governing Body might lead to more far-reaching measures.

40. The representative of Tunisia associated himself with the remarks of the representative of Italy. The scheme should be introduced for a trial period of two years after which it could be seen whether it had fulfilled the desired aims.

41. The representative of Belgium spoke in favour of the amendment proposed by the representative of France. He wondered whether a simulation exercise had been conducted for previous years, which would help the Committee to foresee the full effect of the operation of the scheme over future bienniums.

42. The representative of Nigeria noted that the majority of delegates appeared to support the proposal before the Committee. He therefore felt it would be wise to decide the yardstick against which the results of the scheme would in due course be judged.

43. The Treasurer and Financial Comptroller, replying to the various questions raised in the Committee, said that the Office had not yet conducted a simulation exercise to determine the benefit which each member State would have derived over the last few years. However, interest earned on temporarily surplus regular budget funds for the previous two biennia was as follows: 1984-85 $1,747,000; 1986-87 $950,000; a preliminary forecast for the current biennium was on the order of $400,000. This amount was significantly lower than those of previous years owing to the critical cash flow situation; however, the estimate for the current biennium may prove to be low in view of the contributions received from some countries which usually pay their contributions later in the year. He also indicated that the present interest rate for US dollar deposits was 7 per cent, as compared with 2 per cent for Swiss francs. The Treasurer emphasises that there was absolutely no element of penalty in the proposed incentive scheme. Member States who failed to pay on time would not have their contributions increased by way of interest charges or penalty, but would merely forfeit their right to participate in the rebates that would be made at the end of the year. Other international organisations which had implemented similar incentive schemes had indicated that it was too early yet to determine how effective they were, but in any event the International Labour Office intended to measure the success of its scheme in two ways: firstly, by monitoring the actual number of countries who paid their contributions earlier than in previous years and, secondly, by comparing the actual cumulative total value of contributions received at given points during the year with those of previous biennia. Some of the larger contributors, who traditionally paid late in the year, had already paid their 1988 contributions, either in full or a substantial portion thereof; had an incentive scheme been in force, the Office would have been led to believe that the scheme was performing successfully. However, the fact that no such scheme was actually in force at present, illustrated the relative difficulty that the Office would face in the future in determining with precision the effectiveness of such strategies.

44. The representative of Brazil reiterated his view that the matter was a very serious one. However, the proposed scheme did not take full account of the various reasons for which some governments were late in paying their contributions. He remained sceptical about the effectiveness of such a scheme and continued to believe that it would not solve the financial problems of the Organisation since it did not address these problems in an adequate and definitive manner.

45. The representative of Ghana expressed opposition to the proposal because the obligation of member States to the Organisation was so important that it would not be the subject of an incentive scheme. The majority of countries, especially the developing ones, were in arrears because of the acute foreign exchange problems they were facing and not because they did not want to honour their obligations. The introduction of the scheme would not help to remove the fundamental reasons for the late payment of contributions.

46. The representative of Nigeria reaffirmed his support of the scheme since in the long run not only would all member States benefit if the scheme were successful but the proposed plan would not adversely affect those member States that found it impossible to pay their contributions for reasons beyond their control. The proposal was simply designed to encourage those member States with the means and ability to pay to do so punctually.

47. The Committee then proceeded to vote by show of hands on the amendment put forward by the representative of France. The result of the vote was as follows: in favour of the amendment – 16; against the amendment – 20; abstentions – 25; the quorum was 52; the proposed amendment was therefore not adopted.

48. Following a decision of the Chairman, the Committee proceeded to a record vote on the resolution concerning the adoption of the proposed incentive scheme of early payment of member States' contributions. The result of the vote was as follows: 50 in favour of the resolution, 6 against the resolution, with 8 abstentions. Details of the voting on this resolution are set out in Appendix IV to this report.

49. The necessary two-thirds majority having been achieved, the Committee recommends that the Conference adopt the proposed incentive scheme for early payment of member States' assessed contributions, and accordingly that it adopt the resolution, the text of which appear at the end of this report.

III. FINANCIAL REPORT AND AUDITED FINANCIAL STATEMENTS FOR 1986-87

50. The Committee had before it the Financial Report and Audited Financial Statements for the 60th Financial Period (1986-87); Report II: Information concerning the Programme and Budget for 1988-89 and Other Financial and Administrative Questions; and Provisional Record No. 2, containing a recommendation submitted by the Governing Body that the Conference adopt the Financial Report and Audited Financial Statements for 1986-87.

51. The representative of Italy noted with interest the conclusion in the report of the External Auditor. It was extremely important that there was a regular and careful process of evaluation of the projects carried out by the ILO.

52. The representative of Switzerland said that, as usual, the authorities of her country had examined carefully the recommendations contained in the report of the External Auditor. The fact that there was no extended debate in the Committee did not signify at all a lack of interest, but rather the Committee's confidence in the work of the External Auditor.

53. The representative of the Netherlands agreed with the comments of the previous speaker but asked if it was possible to have further information on the qualification of the accounts. He recalled that a qualification to the accounts of UNICEF last year had given rise to considerable controversy and damage to the credibility of that organisation.

54. The representative of the Director-General (the Treasurer and Financial Comptroller) explained that the qualification in the External Auditor's report was one of a strictly technical nature and in no way cast doubts on the propriety of the accounts. The Governing Body, in full knowledge of all the facts, had authorised an exception to Financial Rule 3.20(a) so that the arrears of income received in January 1988 could be credited as income for 1986-87. The External Auditor had to bring to the attention of the Governing Body the effects of this decision, because the 1986-87 accounts were not prepared on the basis of normal accounting practice. The Treasurer pointed out that, as in all likelihood the 1988-89 accounts would be based on normal practice, without recourse to exceptions to the Financial Rules and the Financial Regulations, there might well be yet another qualification by the Auditors for 1988-89, as the basis for these accounts would not be the same as for 1986-87, because of the exceptional nature of the latter.

55. The Committee recommends that the Conference adopt the final accounts for 1986-87 in accordance with article 29 of the Financial Regulations, and accordingly that it adopt the resolution, the text of which appears at the end of this report.

IV. PROGRAMME AND BUDGET FOR 1988-89

56. The Committee had before it Report II: Information concerning the Programme and Budget for 1988-89 and Other Financial and Administrative Questions, and Provisional Record No. 2, containing proposals concerning programme reductions for 1988-89, an adjustment related to Part III of the budget (Working Capital Fund), and the budget exchange rate and consequential adjustments for 1988-89

57. The Director-General explained that the proposals before the Committee were the culmination of a long debate in the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee and reflected a joint effort by both the Governing Body and the Office to deal with the increasing financial difficulties facing the Organisation, which in turn were making the everyday management of the Programme and Budget extremely difficult to carry out.

58. These difficulties stemmed from firstly, fluctuations in the rate of exchange between the US dollar and the Swiss franc, and secondly, delays in the payment of contributions by certain member States; both were quite beyond the control of the Office and had a serious effect on the programmes of the Organisation and on its capacity to respond to the needs of its member States. The Governing Body, after a long debate, was submitting the proposals now before the Committee in an attempt to balance the need for rigorous management policies with the need to maintain the momentum of the Organisation. The first proposal was for a reduction in the Programme and Budget for 1988-89 of $1.9 million; the second, for a reimbursement to the Working Capital Fund in 1989 of $15 million rather than the $25 million required according to the Financial Regulations; and finally, the addition of a sum of $26 million to the Programme and Budget for 1988-89 to cover partially the consequences of the depreciation of the dollar against the Swiss franc. These three proposals together would have the effect of increasing the contributions due by member States in 1989 by $39 million. It was a substantial sum, and would impose an increased burden on the member States of the Organisation at a time when many among them, if not all, were facing difficult problems and were themselves forced to apply policies of austerity.

59. The proposals before the Committee should, however, be examined after taking account of the Organisation's recent budgetary problems; examining them in their totality would show the continued willingness of both the Office and the Governing Body to reduce this additional burden on member States. The Organisation was already below the zero threshold; the Programme and Budget approved for the 1988-89 biennium showed negative growth. A year ago, in response to the views expressed by members of the Finance Committee, the Programme and Budget proposals for 1988-89, were reduced by $5 million and he had given an undertaking that further programme reductions amounting to $6.9 million would be found before the present session of the Conference. In brief, proposals had been put forward covering programme cuts of $1.9 million and a reduction of $5 million in the sum required to be reimbursed to the Working Capital Fund in 1989 according to article 21 of the Financial Regulations, to compensate for withdrawals from this Fund to finance the deficit for the 1986-87 biennium.

60. During the course of the debate which had taken place several days ago in the Governing Body, the Office had put forward a proposal to reduce by a further $5 million the reimbursement due in 1989 to the Working Capital Fund. The Governing Body has accepted this proposal but this did not signal an end to the efforts being made by the Office to reduce the burden falling on member States in 1989. Earlier this year the Governing Body had decided, as an exceptional measure, to include arrears of contributions amounting to $9.7 million and received in January 1988 as income for the 1986-87 biennium. The effect of this decision, together with the two reductions of $5 million each in reimbursements to the Working Capital Fund effectively reduced by $19.7 million the amount which would have had to be assessed on member States in 1989 in accordance with article 21 of the Financial Regulations. In fact, the spirit of foresight and co-operation which in recent times had characterised discussions between the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee, the Governing Body and the Office went a good deal further than might be realised. The savings of $17.3 million approved in November 1986 by the Governing Body were finally increased to a total of $21.8 million for the 1986-87 biennium, and this was after taking account of the substantially reduced payments of contributions. If these measures had not been taken, this amount would have had to be financed by withdrawals from the Working Capital Fund. The combined savings from all these measures was an impressive $56.5 million, yet the amount requested for reimbursement to the Working Capital Fund in the proposals at present before the Committee was only $15 million.

61. These figures were put before the Committee not in a spirit of false pride but to demonstrate the great care that the Office had taken in presenting only well-researched proposals to the Governing Body which in turn had carefully examined them before finally submitting them to the Finance Committee. The proposal which had led to the most discussion in the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee, and in the Governing Body itself, concerned the deficit resulting from the persistent depreciation of the dollar against the Swiss franc. It was this factor, and probably this alone, which had forced the Office to resort to the Working Capital Fund at the end of 1987. Indeed, the problem continued: the exchange rate used for the preparation of the 1988-89 Programme and Budget was 1.60 Swiss francs to the dollar but the amended exchange rate, proposed to and approved by the Governing Body for consideration by the Finance Committee, was 1.43 Swiss francs to the dollar. It was on this basis that the Governing Body was submitting to the Finance Committee a proposal to add the sum of $26 million to the Programme and Budget for the 1988-89 biennium. It was a substantial sum, yet it rested on an assumption many thought daring, if not optimistic. The average rate of exchange from January to May 1988 was less than 1.36 Swiss francs to the dollar. To reach a new average of 1.43 Swiss francs to the dollar for the whole of the 1988-89 biennium, it would be necessary for the dollar to average at least 1.45 Swiss francs for the remaining 18 months, otherwise a new deficit would arise. The Office had given an undertaking, as reflected in the text of the resolution before the Committee, that any additional costs which resulted from exchange rate fluctuations producing a biennium average of less than 1.43 Swiss francs to the dollar would be met by way of adjustments to the Programme and Budget. The Committee should appreciate that this exposed the Office to serious risk because a continuing decline in the value of the dollar would clearly signify the need for reductions to the Programme and Budget approved almost unanimously last year by the Conference.

62. Unfortunately this was aggravated by the uncertainty surrounding the payment of member States' contributions. If, during the course of the present biennium, the Office again had to face delays and reductions in the payment of contributions, the financial situation would become very difficult. That was why it was necessary to renew the appeal, which had been made many times in the past and which had been supported by spokesmen for the Employer and Worker groups as well as certain governments, that all outstanding contributions should be paid promptly and in full. If deficits occurred, the Office would have no choice but to carry out whatever programmes it could within the limit of the resources at its disposal. Members should understand clearly that this would mean draconian cuts in programmes, in services provided to governments, to employers and workers, and unfortunately, in technical co-operation activities carried out in developing countries.

63. The Office was not being complacent in asserting that it had always followed prudent financial management practices, with a continuing determination to reduce costs. The last ten years had been marked by continued reductions which had affected in particular the administrative and financial services of the Office. It would be dangerous to believe that the Organisation could continue to reduce its Programme and Budget to any significant extent and at the same time affirm, as the Conference and the Governing Body had done constantly and with justification, that the Organisation had a major role to play in the fight against unemployment and underemployment, in improving conditions of work, safety and health, in improving the economic and social environment, in responding to the needs of those with minimal social protection, and last but not least, in defending basic human rights. It was a matter of finding a fair compromise, and indeed this had been the clear objective of the Office, the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee, and the Governing Body, in formulating these proposals and putting them in the form of resolutions for the consideration and decision of the Committee. Was it possible to go further? If the Committee were to attempt to do so it would have to recognise certain essential conditions. Firstly, that the deficits resulting from the depreciation of the dollar against the Swiss franc would be covered by a supplementary credit of $26 million in the Programme and Budget for the present biennium, which would be assessed on member States in 1989. Secondly, that the long-term strategy for the elimination of the problems caused by exchange rate fluctuations which had been proposed to and accepted in principle by the Governing Body last month would be definitively approved by the Governing Body at its next session and by the Finance Committee and the Conference next year. This would enable the Office to protect the Programme and Budget for the 1990-91 biennium and those following. Thirdly, that the Working Capital Fund would be maintained at a level sufficient for the Office to deal with the treasury problems resulting from the late payment of contributions. The level of the Working Capital Fund could be reduced if the Office had the assurance that the Governing Body would agree in November to introduce the scheme for the elimination of exchange rate risks. Fourthly, that member States would recognise their obligations to the Organisation and make a sincere effort to pay their contributions promptly and in full.

64. It was true that many governments faced difficult financial problems, but their contributions to international organisations, especially the ILO, should not be considered as external payments when those organisations responded so willingly to the needs of the citizens in those countries. Contributions to international organisations, and again particularly the ILO, should be considered as one of the means for attaining the objectives of economic and social progress, an objective supported by all member States of the ILO. People of all countries had the same perceptions of problems, whether in the factory, in the office, in business or elsewhere. They felt with the same keenness, and with the same anguish, the problems of crisis, of technological change, of necessary but disruptive structural adjustments. They felt the need to work together within the ILO for a fair and just world. It was precisely because the world faced all manner of serious problems in the economic, social and labour fields that it was necessary to see that the ILO had the means to reach for these goals, modest though they were.

65. The Director-General concluded by saying that he looked forward to hearing the views of the members of the Committee, and that he, together with his colleagues, would be happy to provide any further information needed by the Committee in order to reach a fair and just decision.

66. Mr. Von Holten, speaking in his capacity of Employer Vice-Chairman of the Governing Body, said that the views of the Employer members of the Governing Body were shared by most if not all Employer delegates to the Conference. The recommendation from the Governing Body which was before the Committee, which had the Employers' full support, contained three parts:

- (a) a reduction of $1.9 million in the regular budget adopted by the Conference last year;
- (b) the addition under Part III of the budget of an amount of $15 million; under the Financial Regulations that amount should have been $25 million, which meant that the nominal level of the Working Capital Fund was being reduced from $37 million to $27 million;

- (c) the addition under Part IV of an amount of $26 million to finance an adjustment of the budget exchange rate from 1.60 to 1.43 Swiss francs to the dollar.

67. These recommendations were the result of consensus in the Governing Body, with many governments expressing strong reservations about the nominal dollar increase in the budget. The problems facing some or indeed most of these Governments were real enough; but several arguments could be advanced in pleading with the Committee to follow the recommendations outlined by the Governing Body and the Director-General.

68. The ILO was first and foremost a special case, but that did not mean that it was more important than other international organisations to which the member States belonged, even though it was of particular relevance to Employers and Workers. The ILO budget was relatively small and its record of financial restraint had, in terms of budget totals, been better than that of any other United Nations organisation. Figures in support of this statement were to be found in his address last year to this same Committee and were reproduced in paragraph 27 of the report of the Finance Committee to the 1987 Conference.

69. Up to now the ILO had budgeted in dollars despite the fact that between 60 to 70 per cent of its expenditure was in Swiss francs. In a situation where currencies fluctuated against each other the Organisation would inevitably face either a cash surplus or deficit at the end of a biennium unless it purchased forward its Swiss franc requirement. The Director-General had already mentioned the decision taken in principle by the Governing Body at its 240th (May-June 1988) Session which would almost fully protect budgets in this respect, because when a budget was adopted member States would know exactly what they were required to pay during the course of a biennium and would not, as now, be asked at a later date for more funds to finance negative exchange rate adjustments. Today, however, the Organisation was unfortunately still in the position of having to find $12 million and in any case its statutory purpose was not to finance exchange rate adjustments but to finance budgetary expenditure pending the receipt of contributions and other income. The shortfall of $26 million therefore had to be financed by means of an additional assessment upon member States, as proposed by the Governing Body. During discussions in the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee, and in the Governing Body, many governments in expressing their reservations had held that any additional assessment, whether related to either Part III or Part IV of the budget, should be offset in part by reducing the ordinary programme by a much larger amount than the $1.9 million proposed in the recommendation from the Governing Body.

70. One of the proposals before the Committee concerned the reimbursement of $15 million to the Working Capital Fund. Absorbing exchange rate fluctuations was not one of the purposes for which the Funds had been established; although it had in effect been used for that purpose in the 1986-87 biennium, it was hoped that a combination of Swiss franc assessments and forward currency purchases would obviate that need in future. This would give cause for satisfaction if it were not for the growing difficulties being experienced by the Organisation because of the failure of some member States to pay their contributions in full and on time. It was gratifying to see that there had been some improvement; indeed most member States, although unable to pay on time, were fully conscious of their obligations towards the ILO and tried to pay as soon as their national economies permitted. The main problem lay with the biggest contributor who, until 1986 at least, had paid its dues before the end of the biennium but had since embarked on a course of unilaterally reducing the amounts due by it to the ILO. Table II of Appendix III to Provisional Record No. 2 showed that the United States still owed the organisation $13 million in respect of the 1986-87 biennium. Not only had the United States administration not asked Congress to finance these arrears, but it had asked for financing for only 75 per cent of the contributions that the United States was due to pay to the United Nations and its specialised agencies this year. And that was not all: the United States administration had also recommended a set of priorities, based on the particular usefulness to the United States of each of the organisations in the United Nations system, under which some of them would be paid in full and others even less than 75 per cent, including the ILO, which might receive as little as $25 million of the $40 million due from the United States this year. This high-handed behaviour had made a bad impression on the Employers' group who after all represented the international business community in the ILO. Last week the Finance Committee had accepted an incentive scheme of the type already adopted by some other United Nations organisations, a scheme which would partly compensate those member States who were now making up for the defaults of others. He was not sure whether it would be of use in the case of the United States which certainly could but did not want to pay, but the incentive scheme was to be introduced on a trial basis and could therefore, if necessary, be supplemented later on with some sort of penalty. In the present situation, however, the Organisation ran the risk of having to register, in addition to the amounts due in respect of the 1986-87 biennium, further United States arrears of $15 million, an amount which might be doubled by the end of next year. This was something for the Committee to bear in mind during the course of debate on the reimbursement to the Working Capital Fund.

71. Another of the proposals before the Committee concerned the possibility of further savings in the ordinary Programme and Budget. The ILO's record in this respect was better than that of most other organisations in the United Nations system but this did not necessarily mean that there was no room for future savings: the Employers believed there was. On the other hand, about 75 per cent of the Organisation's expenditure was related to staff costs which, except for the cost of experts in technical co-operation, could not be reduced from one day to the next. Nevertheless, a reduction in staff costs was necessary if the Organisation really wanted to cut and not merely delay expenditure. For a long time now the Employers had been saying that the activities of the ILO were too diversified; that the structure of the Office did not allow for the redeployment of resources required by changing needs from one financial period to the next; that personnel policies, particularly those concerning recruitment, permanent appointment and promotion, did not ensure the necessary mobility; that the structure in the Office was too top-heavy; and that there were too many old offices in industrialised countries, etc., etc. The Employers had also made concrete suggestions in the budget debates and had invariably cautioned against increasing the number of staff, but regrettably there had been very little response from the governments who at most had indicated that they were to let the Director-General once more use the cheese slicer in an across-the-board manner. The Employers could live with any reasonable budget total but they were very much concerned with how available funds were used and could therefore not accept such an approach. The Director-General had already indicated that he was prepared, if necessary, to pursue the question of further economies in the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee of the Governing Body at its next session in November 1988. The Employers believed that it would indeed be necessary to do so and furthermore that the operation would have to extend beyond the current biennium to the Programme and Budget for 1990-91. The proper forum for such an exercise was not this Committee or the Conference, however, but the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee of the Governing Body and the Governing Body.

72. Mr. Muhr, the Worker Vice-Chairman of the Governing Body, agreed with much of what had been said by the previous speaker. The Workers had already signalled their reluctant agreement with the proposals of the Director-General, many of which had been discussed at great length in the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee and in the Governing Body. Seen against the background of what the Organisation was expected to do, not only for the Workers but also in the context of its wider role for the whole of mankind, it was unlikely that there was room for further significant economies. The Director-General had already mentioned that the burden on member States in recent years had been reduced by $56.5 million; ten years ago, when the United States had withdrawn from the ILO, the activities of the Organisation had been reduced by 22 per cent; yet when the United States rejoined at the beginning of this decade the Organisation had continued at the same reduced level of activities: the United States contribution merely reduced those due by the other member States. At the time the Workers had been reassured with a promise that the Organisation would indeed return to the original programme level, but so far this had not happened. Yet the Organisation still had problems and there was talk of further programme cuts. If the Committee wanted further savings, however, it was necessary to identify very clearly the programmes that should be cut. The Workers, for their part, had never refused to participate in such a debate.

73. One of the proposals before the Committee concerned adjustments to the budget exchange rate for the 1988-89 biennium. The Workers believed that it was the duty of the governments to compensate for adverse exchange rate fluctuations for both moral and legal reasons. In past years when there had been a profit from exchange rate movements, there had never once been a proposal from any member State that such profits be used to finance additional programmes, and it was not appropriate now for member States to call for programme cuts because of unfavourable exchange rate movements. Furthermore, there was still considerable risk attached to the rate of 1.43 Swiss francs to the dollar contained in the proposals before the Committee, because the Office would be obliged to reduce expenditure, which meant cuts in programmes, if the average exchange rate for the 1988-89 biennium fell below 1.43 Swiss francs to the dollar. The Workers had serious misgivings about this proposal, inasmuch as higher percentage cuts to the programme would be required to compensate for any further depreciation of the dollar. There were also problems with the proposed adjustments to the Working Capital Fund, although these would be less serious if the Office were to switch to a system of assessment in Swiss francs. Moreover, the main purpose of the Working Capital Fund was not to absorb the effects of exchange rate movements, but to finance expenditure in anticipation of the receipt of contributions from member States. The Workers, like the Employers, were very disappointed that the Working Capital Fund had been almost exhausted on several occasions in the past because of the delay in the payment of contributions by certain member States. If the Committee adopted the proposal put forward by the Director-General, the Organisation would be vulnerable in the years that it took to rebuild the Working Capital Fund to its former level. In supporting Mr. von Holtzen's appeal to all member States to pay their contributions promptly and in full, he observed that it was gratifying to see that a number of member States, some of which faced enormous economic difficulties, were now paying their contributions earlier than they had in the past, and this in itself was a reassuring sign of their commitment to the aims and ideals of the ILO. Other member States should do likewise.

74. The representative of Colombia, speaking also as co-ordinator for the Latin American and Caribbean group, expressed approval of the initiative which had been taken in giving the floor first to the two guest speakers, the representatives of the Employers' and Workers' groups, and for their comments on the Director-General's Report. This reflected the spirit of tripartism in the deliberations of the Committee.

75. He wished first to commend the Director-General for his explanation, which has summed up authoritatively the main aspects of the problems facing the Organisation. The Latin American members recognised the efforts of the Director-General to find answers to the serious financial problems of the ILO which were due to two major causes: the unfavourable exchange rate fluctuations and the serious delays in the payment of contributions by some member States. The situation was now very serious, but there was no point in stressing the gloomy side, and in fact, it had already been acknowledged on different occasions over the past year by various Latin American government representatives, workers, and employers. Once again, at this difficult time, the Latin American members reaffirmed their adherence to the principles of the ILO and to its programmes for social progress which made the ILO's presence important throughout the world.

76. However, the economic situation in Latin America was still very serious, for various reasons which included trade problems and balance of payments difficulties. In this situation, the Latin American countries now considered that their duty was not only to contribute regularly and in full (as they had indeed done, often at great sacrifice), but also to help the Organisation, as governments had been doing since the 1970s, to find ways of making the necessary structural adjustment without harming programmes.

77. The Latin American members approved the proposal to reduce the programme and budget by US$1.9 million, and that to reduce by a further US$5 million the reimbursement to the Working Capital Fund. However, these expenditure reductions were not enough. The Office had requested an additional US$26 million because of exchange rate losses, and US$15 million to reimburse the Working Capital Fund. Even these measures might prove inadequate if one considered the possibility that a budget exchange rate of 1.43 might not be sufficiently low, and in fact the Governing Body has admitted in May that a rate of 1.43 might be too optimistic. The situation could become still more serious if there continued to be delays in the payment of contributions; the size of the problem was virtually unforeseeable, and more efforts were required to reach a consensus on additional substantive reductions. Some speakers had made illogical statements to the Governing Body to the effect that more administrative cuts would be necessary after countries paid their contributions, but in fact cuts were all the more justified if countries did not pay.

78. Whatever replenishments to the Working Capital Fund were necessary, the burden fell on member States; but the consequence of exchange rate losses should be borne not only by member States but also by the Office, which should consider further cuts. In view of the seriousness and complexity of the situation, it was important to avoid conflict and promote co-operation. The Latin American members believed that an appropriate tripartite working party was needed to help the Chairman and the Committee to provide complementary solutions, and they supported the proposal of the Director-General for programme reductions of US$1.9 million and for a reduction of US$5 million in the reimbursement to the Working Capital Fund. But the short time available to the Committee for discussion warranted the setting up of a special tripartite working party in which all member States and the Office would be represented, to consider measures which would counter the need for a further disbursement of US$41 million. Such an approach would be useful in the present biennium and would be helpful as a mechanism for dealing with wider-reaching problems, including the study of the 1990-91 Programme and Budget. The Latin American members had been proposing this procedural solution since November 1987 and were pleased to note that the Employers also favoured this approach.

79. The representative of Sweden, speaking on behalf of the five Nordic countries, advised that the budget should be kept neutral with regard to exchange rate fluctuations. This meant that in the same way as countries expected to receive rebates on exchange rate gains, they should now be prepared to make up for exchange rate losses. His own Government regarded its contribution to the ILO as a good investment, but at the same time cautioned that the Organisation must act with financial prudence. The Nordic Governments hoped that the Governing Body would reach a consensus on long-term measures that would protect the Organisation from similar losses in future.

80. During the 240th Session (May-June 1988) of the Governing Body, many governments had urged the Director-General to try to absorb part or all the budgetary losses of US$26 million. This was likely to be necessary in any case, as at least one major contributor had indicated that it would not pay its share. It needed to be stressed again that every member State had to pay its contribution promptly and in full. The overall pattern of payments was still extremely disturbing, and the fact that some governments had announced that they would continue to be unable to pay their contributions in full tended to suggest that the Organisation would find itself in a continual situation of crisis management.

81. The Nordic countries were concerned that the financial crisis of the ILO might worsen. If no major improvement occurred, the Governing Body would have to consider programme implementation reductions once again in November; and if such reductions were to become necessary it was important that they be worked out through close consultation among the three partners in the Organisation. The existing mechanisms were quite sufficient for this task, so it was not necessary to discuss reductions other than those already proposed in the document under discussion, which the Nordic countries supported. They also deeply appreciated the efforts of the Director-General to improve the effectiveness and efficiency of the Organisation, and trusted that these efforts would continue in order to limit, as far as possible, any negative effects on programme activities.

82. The present pattern of payment of contributions gave good reason for doubts about the proposal not to replenish the Working Capital Fund in full. Looking at the problem in the short term, it was tempting to reduce the burden of member States in this way, but if member States continued not to live up to their obligations by not paying contributions in time it would probably become necessary, in the long term, to restore the Fund to its original size so that the Organisation could deal with its cash flow problems. Assuming that the Working Capital Fund would be relieved of its role as a buffer fund for exchange rate fluctuations in the future, the Nordic countries would not oppose the proposal now under consideration, but wished only to record this note of caution.

83. The representative of Australia shared the concern expressed by the Director-General and by the Workers' and Employers' spokesman about the financial situation of the ILO. The dual impact of an overvalued budget and considerable uncertainty about likely receipts this biennium imposed the obligation to take clear decisions which would help set the Organisation on to a more secure course. In the current international economic climate Australia and many other countries had had to take tough decisions to impose strict financial discipline on their public expenditure, decisions which were not without social and political cost. In the same way, international organisations, when faced with the consequences of that international economic climate, needed to exercise strict financial and budgetary discipline and live within their means.

84. With regard to the replenishment of the Working Capital Fund, the Australian Government felt that no replenishment was needed at present. The current level of the Fund, about $12 million, was, as a proportion of the budget, as large as those of a number of other international organisations including the WHO and IAEA, and was adequate for its primary purpose of cash flow management. In the past the Fund had also served as an exchange rate buffer fund; however, in November the Governing Body would be considering a proposal for a long-term strategy on exchange rates which would not utilise the Working Capital Fund. It would thus be premature to replenish the Fund to the extent proposed under the expectation that it might be needed to cover future exchange rate losses.

85. Moreover, any replenishment of the Working Capital Fund at present would very likely be used to cover indirectly the shortfall in receipts caused by the failure of some member States to live up to their international obligations. As a matter of principle, loyal payers should not be asked to subsidise the delinquency of other member States. This failure to comply with financial obligations was the prime reason for the fact that the Organisation had been obliged over the past few years to adopt a crisis management approach to its operations. Increasingly, the Governing Body had been obliged to spend its time reviewing these operations, and the Director-General and his staff were to be complimented for having coped so well in these difficult circumstances.

86. As for the need to revalue the budget, all the members who had voted in favour of the budget last year shared some responsibility for the cost of revaluing that budget to a more realistic rate of exchange. At the same time, in a spirit of burden-sharing, the ILO should absorb as much of that cost as possible through savings and cutbacks in expenditures. The effect of the two proposals made by the Director-General would be to add $41 million to member States' assessments in 1989: this was a sum which his Government regrettably could not accept. However, he was willing to work with other members of the Committee and with the Office to identify a package of proposals which would attract consensus support. His Government however, could not support a package which called for more than $26 million in supplementary assessments for 1989.

87. The representative of Botswana, speaking on behalf of countries of the African region, expressed her understanding of the position of governments which found the proposed net budgetary increase of $39 million too large to be acceptable, and pointed out that the African countries would also be called upon to bear their share of these costs. There was much more at stake for the ILO in 1988-89 and future years, however, than these budgetary additions. Any reduction in the required provisions would compromise programmes of vital importance to the countries in her region, and indeed in developing countries elsewhere. She had been particularly struck by the Director-General's remark to the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee at the Governing Body's 240th Session (May-June 1988) that it was a sad fact that there should be a threat of programme reductions at a time when the ILO could do much to alleviate the massive social problems being faced in all parts of the world.

88. Member States of the African region saw the Director-General's undertaking to absorb any exchange rate losses resulting from a fall of the Swiss franc value of the dollar below the rate of 1.43 as a source of potential underbudgeting and consequential further programme cuts. Moreover, replenishing the Working Capital Fund by less than the already-reduced sum of $15 million would strike at the financial foundations of the Organisation. Further reduction would be particularly inopportune at a time when there were known shortfalls in contributions and a continued devaluation of the dollar. She therefore urged all countries to resist the temptation for short-term expediences and to support the proposals of the Governing Body, without reservation, to add the necessary sums to the budget.

89. The representative of Canada recalled that his country's views had been expressed in some detail at the relevant Governing Body sessions. The real problem lay in the size of the current and potential deficits, and the only solution was to resort to planning on a contingency basis and make programme cuts commensurate with the shortfall in revenues that could be expected. As such, the $1.9 million budget reductions already proposed were welcomed, but it would be appropriate for the Governing Body to consider in November 1988 what programme implementation cuts for the biennium might be necessary. The Office should not contemplate spending more than it received.

90. That much said, his Government accepted that member States must protect the Organisation from the effects of exchange rate fluctuations, and therefore agreed to the addition of $26 million recommended by the Governing Body. It welcomed the Director-General's undertaking to absorb any deterioration below the 1.43 Swiss franc level – which he hoped would be only small and residual, although this was not sure. By contrast, replenishment of the Working Capital Fund by $15 million was not acceptable. Although article 19.2 of the Financial Regulations had not been invoked by the Conference for many years, it nevertheless empowered the Conference to fix the level of the Working Capital Fund. The opportunity might be taken to redefine the purpose of the Fund, which in his view was there to assist cash-flow management. In the past, it had been used for the somewhat extraordinary purpose of providing exchange rate cover. He was most concerned, however, at its use to cover shortfalls in the receipt of assessed contributions, and was sure that the authors of article 21.2 of the Financial Regulations had never intended that the replenishment mechanism would be used to transfer the burden of unpaid assessments to those countries which had paid theirs on time: such action was not a legitimate use of the Fund. Thus, in order to formulate an opinion on the level of replenishment necessary to maintain cash flow over an appropriate number of months of operation, he requested the Secretariat to furnish relevant information in the context of the Fund's present level of $12 million.

91. The representative of France recognised that the ILO currently faced acute financial difficulties along with other United Nations agencies. The situation regarding late payment of contributions was deplorable, yet it was hard to see a way to improve it. One hope might lie in the solution to the problem of exchange rate fluctuations now being proposed; he could already state that his Government would be prepared to support the Director-General's basic proposals, endorsed in principle by the Governing Body, when they came up again for discussion in November 1988. That solution would however only apply from the year 1990 onward, and his Government therefore accepted the addition of $26 million to meet the 1988-89 estimated needs.

92. Turning to the question of replenishment of the Working Capital Fund, he agreed with the representative of Canada in being unconvinced that the Fund had necessarily to be brought back to the level at which it stood two years ago. The Office would have to live with $12 million, which on the face of it was adequate for covering cash-flow needs. The further reduction of $15 million would ease the 1989 assessments, and the Office could later indicate any problems which seemed insurmountable as the situation evolved. Finally, he expressed his concern regarding the suggestion which had been made to form a special tripartite budgetary group, considering that the proper channels for such matters remained the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee and the Governing Body.

93. The representative of the United Kingdom observed that the Director-General, together with the representatives of the Employers' and Workers' groups, had spelt out clearly the size of the financial problems facing the ILO. Such difficulties were not confined to organisations of the United Nations system: member States were all having to observe strict financial and budgetary discipline in order to live within their means. For the ILO this meant following the basic principle that money could not and should not be spent in excess of reasonable expectations of contribution income. Against this background, his Government believed there to be a clear need for burden-sharing between the member States and the Organisation.

94. Taking the exchange rate compensation and the Working Capital Fund replenishment as a whole, he would not only expect that some of the $26 million proposed for the former would be absorbed through cuts in operational expenses, but that the payment to the Working Capital Fund be limited to what was necessary to restore it to the level appropriate to its proper purpose which, as had been said by others, was to meet cash-flow difficulties within the budgetary year. Its use for covering exchange rate losses or shortfalls in contributions could not be condoned. Together, the total increase which member States should be called upon to found by way of increased contributions should be no more than $26 million. In order to ensure that the ILO did not overspend its income in either year of the biennium the Governing Body would need to review, in the usual tripartite manner in November next, possible cuts in programme and operational expenses with a view to taking firm decisions. For this reason, the creation of an extra body to fulfil this function did not appear to be necessary.

95. The representative of Pakistan expressed his appreciation for the Director-General's clear analysis of the issues before the Committee. Despite certain difficulties, his Government could accept the proposed net budgetary addition of $39 million, the need for which arose for reasons quite beyond the Director-General's control, and indeed reflected the success of measures already taken to keep the sum to the minimum. The Committee had a duty to be realistic: the ILO could not carry out its programmes if it were denied the financial means in the form of compensation for exchange rate losses and an adequate cash-flow guarantee. His Government therefore supported the Governing Body proposals without reservation.

96. The representative of Austria had carefully studied the financial difficulties which had arisen and the solutions related to programme cuts, exchange rate compensation and Working Capital Fund replenishment, which together amounted to an extra burden that many member States would find onerous. Savings were necessary, but finding a consensus on the precise form they should take was not easy. The Governing Body was to be commended for the efforts it had made, and he thanked the Office for being willing to bear some part of the exchange risk for the remainder of the 1988-89 biennium. In the light of this, he counselled caution and understanding with regard to any further programme cuts. The ILO was the organisation responsible for working conditions and as such had a role to play in guaranteeing human rights. Employers' and Workers' views had therefore to be taken into consideration throughout in order to reach a balanced solution for the Working Capital Fund and with regard to the additional assessment of $26 million in respect of exchange losses.

97. The representative of Venezuela also thanked the Director-General and the Employers' and Workers' representatives for their statements. She wished to reiterate the point of view expressed by the spokesman of the Latin American and Caribbean group. The world economic crisis exercised its greatest impact upon the developing countries, whose difficulties were compounded by the burden of their foreign debt. Countries which had to exercise such strict austerity themselves naturally looked to the Office to do the same with its activities. Programme adjustments were therefore necessary in non-priority sectors of the budget, without reducing the main technical programmes and technical co-operation activities. In this connection she noted that there were many administrative expenses in which cuts could be made without adversely affecting the technical programmes of the Organisation. The $41 million addition proposed for 1989 for exchange rate compensation and replenishment of the Working Capital Fund could not be accepted: the most constructive proposal was for the establishment of a tripartite group with which the Secretariat should be associated and which would, during the current Conference, adopt conclusions of substance with respect to 1988-89 and future bienniums.

98. The representative of India supported the proposed resolutions as recommended by the Governing Body and described them as an optimal solution in the short run, as both the member States and the Office contributed towards the costs involved. In the long run a strategy on exchange rates would be needed to solve this problem.

99. The representative of Rwanda opposed the proposed programme reductions which he felt would not have been necessary had all member States paid their contributions when due. These cuts had a greater effect on the poor and developing nations who were making great efforts to pay their contributions. However, if such cuts were absolutely necessary, they ought to be kept to a minimum.

100. The representative of Italy supported the proposed resolutions, as his country had done in the Governing Body, and commended the Director-General for his efforts in securing a further $1.9 million of savings. He supported the allocation of $26 million to Part IV of the budget on the understanding that, however painful the process, the Office should continue to look for further savings, as previously suggested by the Employer and Worker representatives, and ensure that cuts were applied as far as possible to administrative programmes rather than technical programmes. With respect to the Working Capital Fund, the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee would be able to consider in November what its nominal level should be; he stressed however that it should be used solely for its intended purpose of financing budgetary expenditure in anticipation of income, and not for financing deficits. To this end, he appealed to all member States to bring their contributions up to date so as to avoid the inequitable situation where member States paying their contributions in good time indirectly supported others who paid late, through additional assessments required for the reimbursement of the Working Capital Fund.

101. The representative of Saudi Arabia said that the Organisation's financial problems were due mainly to the fact that many member States were late in paying their contributions. The other major factor was exchange rate fluctuations which were beyond the capacity of any international organisation established in Switzerland to control. This was dramatically illustrated by the fact that the 33 per cent increase of the present biennial budget over the previous one was due entirely to exchange rate fluctuations. It was essential that the Organisation's programme implementation be shielded from the effects of exchange rate movements, and it was up to the Office to find appropriate solutions; these could well include the contribution incentive scheme to accelerate member States' payments, because the late payment of contributions remained one of the major obstacles to balanced treasury management. However, programme cuts could not be ruled out in view of the total amount of contributions outstanding.

102. The representative of Senegal said he understood some member States' objections to the cost increases, but these were due to factors beyond the Office's control; it was only right that member States should be called upon to meet them. Despite the fact that these increased costs came at a time when Senegal was itself experiencing economic difficulties, he supported the proposal and noted that the Office was willing to assume the responsibility for covering any increase in costs that would occur if the exchange rate averaged less than 1.43 Swiss francs to the dollar over the remainder of the biennium. He noted further that the appropriate level of the Working Capital Fund would be decided by the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee in November in connection with the decision to be taken on the long-term strategy for exchange rates. He was very conscious of the Organisation's need for adequate resources so that it could fulfil its proper role in the world; it was the collective responsibility of all member States to ensure that the Organisation had the means to do so.

103. The representative of China appreciated the Office's proposals for $1.9 million in programme cuts and the $10 million reduction in reimbursements to the Working Capital fund. With respect to the allocation of $26 million to Part IV of the budget he recalled his country's comments at the 240th (May-June 1988) Session of the Governing Body in which the Office was requested to examine ways of introducing further economy measures, and the major contributors called upon to fulfil their obligations promptly and in full. Nevertheless, he supported the proposal on the understanding that the cost should be shared by the Office through a reduction in administrative costs while keeping technical co-operation programmes intact.

104. The representative of the USSR recalled that he had repeatedly expressed concern regarding the financial position of the Organisation and the continual rise in contributions. Concern had also been expressed in discussions in the Governing Body, where the majority of speakers had voiced the opinion that the financial burden should be shared between the Office and the member States. He shared this view. The financial position of the Organisation depended to a significant degree on member States fulfilling their obligations. The Soviet Union, recognising this, had paid its contributions for 1988 earlier than usual. It was gratifying also to see that measures were being taken by the Office and the Director-General to stabilise the financial position of the Organisation and to curtail budgetary growth.

105. He supported the decision concerning the change to payment of contributions in Swiss francs, as well as the proposal to cut the Programme and Budget for 1988-89 by $1.9 million. He welcomed also the undertaking by the Director-General to absorb any deficit arising from an average exchange rate for 1988-89 of less than 1.43 Swiss francs to the dollar. The reduction in reimbursement to the Working Capital Fund by $10 million was also a step in the right direction. Nevertheless it should be possible to stabilise the Fund at the lowest possible level compatible with the aims for which it was set up. This however should depend critically on the self-discipline of member States. At the Governing Body's discussions in February-March and May-June of this year, a number of useful suggestions had been made for stabilising the Organisation's budget, and although not all of them could be acted upon immediately, it was to be hoped that the Director-General would put forward proposals for a reduction in the budgetary exchange rate adjustment of $26 million.

106. The representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran noted that exchange rate fluctuations often worked to the benefit of the more advanced countries, and there was no reason why other countries should shoulder any of the burden facing the Organisation at present. Many poor countries in Africa, Asia and Latin America faced almost insuperable foreign debt problems and could simply not afford increased contributions to the ILO. If the proposals at present before the Committee were accepted, then it should be the affluent States alone which should pay.

107. The representative of Switzerland observed that earlier discussion of the proposals before the Committee showed that on the one hand member States wanted to support the ILO, but that on the other the additional aggregate assessments of some $39 million proposed for 1989 constituted an excessive rate of growth. It was necessary to restrict them to an absolute minimum. She was prepared to support fully the increase of $26 million necessary to compensate for the depreciation of the dollar. The proposal for the replenishment of the Working Capital Fund was, however, very much a different matter. At present the Fund stood at about $12 million, compared to $29 million one year ago, but even the present level still represented about one month's expenditure requirements, which was about the same as in the other specialised agencies in the United Nations system. The question of whether the full reimbursement of $15 million should be made to the Working Capital Fund as required by article 21(2) of the Financial Regulations depended very much on the precise purposes for which the Fund would be used. If it were to be used only for its original purpose, that is, the financing of expenditure in anticipation of income, it was probably sufficient; but if in addition it were to be used to compensate for the non-payment of assessed contributions by member States it would probably be exhausted very quickly. Perhaps a satisfactory compromise would be a modest increase in the present level of the Fund to $15-20 million; the $15 million reimbursement requested by the Office did seem difficult to justify. She hoped that the Committee would be able to reach an agreement by consensus so that the finances of the Organisation could be placed on a sound footing.

108. The representative of Colombia said that the representatives of the Latin American countries had been most impressed by many of the suggestions put forward since the beginning of the Committee's discussion on this item. There was still much work to be done, however, before a decision could be taken by the plenary of the Conference. To achieve a consensus in the Finance Committee it would be helpful if the Chairman were able to consult representatives from different regions as well as the representatives of the Employers and the Workers. The last two had been heard only as guests in the Finance Committee, but would undoubtedly have much to contribute to an in-depth discussion so as to give the Chairman guide-lines and suggestions on how agreement might be reached in the Committee. Some previous speakers had suggested that the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee, as well as the Governing Body itself, already served as tripartite forums for discussion and that another tripartite body was not necessary. Admittedly those organs were tripartite, but they were not sufficient. This Committee was made up solely of Government representatives and on this occasion should itself have an adequate and informed mechanism for consulting representatives of the Employers' and Workers' groups in order to discuss matters of common interest. Such an advisory ad hoc group could be of considerable value in setting guide-lines for reaching a consensus in the Committee, identifying the essential needs of the Organisation, and in putting much clearer information before the plenary of the Conference. Such an arrangement might well reduce the length of Committee sittings.

109. The representative of the Federal Republic of Germany expressed his appreciation for the remarks made earlier by the Director-General and the representatives of the Employers' and Workers' groups. The Office had worked with a great sense of responsibility to find solutions to its problems in recent years; the member States now had to find some way of reinforcing the aims of the Organisation and mobilising the collective strength of all its constituent member States. Furthermore, those that honoured their obligation to pay their contributions in full and on time should not suffer because others paid late. There was a heavy responsibility to be borne by non-paying member States because the Organisation could only commit itself to expenditure when funds were received. His own country has tried to help the Organisation by paying its contribution more promptly and it hoped that other member States would follow this example.

110. One of the proposals before the Committee concerned an additional assessment in 1989 of some US$26 million as an adjustment to the budget exchange rate. This was a legitimate charge and it was fair that it should be borne by member States because it was a matter over which the Office had no control. The member States would, however, welcome any proposal from the Office whereby some of this burden might be absorbed through programme and budget adjustments. As far as the proposal for the replenishment of the Working Capital Fund was concerned, it was important that the role of the Fund should be defined precisely before fixing the amount of the reimbursement. Admittedly, some of the decisions taken in the past were due to exceptional circumstances, but in future the Working Capital Fund should not be used to absorb either exchange rate fluctuations or contributions in arrears, but only for its original purpose of financing budgetary expenditure pending the receipt of income. He associated himself with the remarks of previous speakers who believed that the present level of the Working capital Fund would probably be adequate if it was used for that purpose alone. The proposal put forward by the representative of Colombia to modify the process of consultation had to be treated with some caution. The tripartite decision-making procedures of the ILO had worked extremely well so far and the Committee should be wary of creating new institutions without good reason for doing so.

111. The representative of Jamaica was impressed by the efforts of the Office, as reflected in the document under discussion, to create workable devices to meet the problems at hand. Several ingenious ideas had been proposed during the discussion, but there was no need to create new institutions. There had been times in the past when he had called attention to the risk that the list of countries which did not meet their financial obligations on time might lengthen if assessment were increased. He dreaded that prospect: fortunately, Jamaica had been able to meet its own obligations, although no without sacrifice, because of the paramount importance which his country attached to the work of the ILO.

112. Last year, like many others present, he had expected that the downward slide of the dollar would be short-lived; this had unfortunately not been the case and the Organisation was faced again with the same problem. It was imperative that the resulting burden be shared and not imposed entirely upon the member States' national budgets. The Office had recognised this and made commendable, but insufficient, efforts in that direction. He recalled that the Director-General had said that drastic cuts would be necessary if the situation did not improve; this showed that the Office recognised the difficulties which might lie ahead if there were an escalation in the late payment of contributions. To prevent such an escalation, it was important that assessed contributions not be increased to a level where countries would be obliged to defer their payments. The Organisation should try to formulate a budget which would fairly reflect the income expected to be received by the Organisation. He sympathised with the views of other member States who believed that in some areas the activities of the ILO were too diffused and could be regrouped. To maintain an effective programme the Organisation needed to review carefully the size of its budget: it was not the volume but the quality of services delivered which counted. He therefore believed that the Organisation should not fear the prospect of budgetary cuts; it should heed the Director-General's warning. Furthermore, the function of the Working Capital Fund needed to be clearly defined, and its total should not exceed one or two months' expenditure requirements. If excessive amounts were put into the fund, the Organisation might be tempted to put it to a number of uses for which it was not intended; this was not acceptable.

113. The representative of the United States reminded the Committee that the position of his Government in regard to the questions before the Committee was reflected in the records of the sessions of the Governing Body and of the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee at which these matters had been considered. The overriding factor in its position was that clear constraints on the United States' federal budget limited its ability to pay current assessments in full, and would preclude payment of increased assessments. He appreciated the efforts of the Director-General and his staff in dealing with a very difficult situation. He shared also the concerns of the Director-General, the Workers' and Employers' spokesmen, and the member States on the financial situation of the Organisation; like many of these speakers, he recognised the necessity for it to respond, as it had in the past, in a practical manner, recognising the real world situation. Like the Employers, he believed that priority activities must be funded and other less important activities eliminated. If this work could best be done by the means outlined by the Latin American and Caribbean group, then he would support that effort.

114. He had been disappointed with the arguments put forward by some of the speakers so far. One had suggested that reductions in the budget assessments would not lead to improved payments; this argument ran counter to experience and logic, unless it referred exclusively to the narrower situation of member States which were unable to pay their current contributions and would also be unable to pay even a reduced increase. While this may be true, the desirability of a policy that would deliberately increase the arrears of member States was dubious. Similarly, he questioned whether it was wise for member States in good financial health to increase the burden on themselves and then argue that all member States, regardless of their financial condition, had a similar obligation.

115. Furthermore, it was regrettable that the $6.9 million reduction proposed by the Office had not been entirely in the form of programme cuts, as he had anticipated; it was also disappointing that speakers continued to define the proposed $26 million assessment related to exchange rates as a compensation for exchange rate fluctuations, after a conscious decision had been taken last year not to use a realistic exchange rate as an expedient to avoid a realistic programme level. At present there was a real need for burden sharing and for recalculating the budget for one year of the biennium. He had been disappointed also with the insistence to go forward with the replenishment of the Working Capital Fund at a time when the burden on member States was so large, when the Governing Body had before it a proposal to solve the problem of exchange rate fluctuations (a major drain on the Working Capital Fund), when the Organisation would in any case have to live for well over half the biennium with a reduced Working Capital Fund because of the timing of receipt of payments, and when there was apparently no empirical evidence to suggest an appropriate level for the Fund. He proposed that a decision on the appropriate level of the Working Capital Fund should be based on a paper from the Office, and that the decision on the Working Capital Fund should be taken by the Governing Body in November together with the decision on the long-term solution to the exchange rate problem. In this way the costs of any needed replenishment would be met one year later, thus reducing the current assessment increase with little increased risk to the Organisation. He hoped that the kernels of ideas which the Director-General had set before the Governing Body would germinate and produce a financial proposal to minimise assessment increases on member States, a proposal around which all member States, Workers and Employers could rally.

116. The representative of Bangladesh suggested that the Committee follow existing procedures for doing the groundwork with regard to programme and budget cuts. He recalled that the Director-General had underscored the need for financial measures to tide the Organisations over difficulties arising out of increased demands for technical co-operation, uncertainty about the payment of contributions by member States and exchange rate fluctuations. He had also sought support for the specific proposals for the reduction of programmes to the extent of $1.9 million, payment to the Working Capital Fund to the extent of $15 million and the revision of the exchange rate to 1.43 Swiss francs to the dollar. Some delegates, however, had raised doubts about the efficacy of these measures and had suggested that the programme be limited to available resources so that the burden of additional contributions would not be imposed on member States. Some had even suggested that members who had paid regularly should not be penalised for the delinquency of others. His own country, while fairly well up to date with its contributions, needed more and more technical assistance both for upgrading the skills of its burgeoning workforce and for the development of employment opportunities. From that point of view, he hoped that the proposals put forward by the Director-General would be approved, and that proposed cuts in programme would be kept to a minimum and would not, in any case, affect any projects in the least developed countries.

117. The representative of the Netherlands associated himself with previous speakers who had expressed appreciation for the observations made by the Director-General at the beginning of the session. In seeking both to protect programme delivery from exchange rate fluctuations and at the same time to lighten the impact of additional assessment on member States, the Director-General and the Office had proposed the various measures now before the Committee, including readjustment of the current budget exchange rate and a less than full replenishment of the Working Capital Fund. Notwithstanding this reduction of the level of the Fund, the proposals implied an extra assessment on member States in 1989 of US$41 million: US$26 million for the adjustment and US$15 million for the Working Capital Fund. He believed that this was asking a lot since many member States seemed to have considerable difficulties in meeting their present financial obligations. Indeed, as the Swedish spokesman had pointed out, it seemed evident that around 25 per cent of the proposed additional assessment would never be paid. A more acceptable proposal would be the absorption, to the maximum extent possible within the current budget, of the costs of the exchange rate adjustment. In order to dispel the uncertainties concerning the capacity of the ILO to absorb such costs he looked to the Office to give some indication of where savings might be made without affecting programme delivery. For example, it appeared that the current programme and budget presupposed an almost negligible vacancy rate and assumed full manning of established posts, whereas in practice this was not the case; this might well provide scope for some savings.

118. With regard to the Working Capital Fund he firmly believed that it should revert to its original function: to facilitate cash flow, and not to meet contingencies and emergencies such as contribution shortfalls or exchange rate losses. As such it would serve, in any one year, to meet the requirement of approved expenditure pending receipt of contributions. A predictable shortfall in contributions should not be classed as "pending" and therefore would not justify maintenance of the Working Capital Fund at the level proposed; neither would the prospect of further exchange rate losses. A long-term strategy against such losses would, it was hoped, be adopted in November; this would dispense with the need to use the Working Capital Fund for that purpose. In summary, he had considerable difficulty in accepting that the Working Capital Fund be replenished to the extent proposed. The present level of the Fund, which was similar to that maintained by a number of other United Nations organisation, was sufficient to meet the ILO's requirement. In coming to this conclusion he was heartened by the improvement in the recent payment of contributions by some member States, and believed that the adoption of the proposed incentive scheme would reinforce this welcome development.

119. The representative of Zambia noted with appreciation the efforts of the Director-General in trying to ensure that the programme of the ILO would proceed unimpeded. However, he believed that further reductions in the budget could be effected, especially in administrative areas, without prejudice to the efficiency and effectiveness of the ILO and its programme. Faced with adverse financial circumstances, the Organisation had to adapt its activities to its resources; the especially vexing problem of exchange rate losses, which amounted to US$26 million, needed to be resolved by sharing the burden between the member States and the ILO. A more lasting solution was also needed to avert future deficits and the consequential reductions of programme, which would erode the impact of the ILO as a promoter of social progress and justice. He concurred with the proposal of the Federation Republic of Germany that the purpose of the Working Capital Fund should be defined in precise terms and that it should be used only for that purpose. He urged the Director-General to scrutinise the budget further in an effort to find more savings, but at the same time to make sure that this exercise did not compromise the already approved programmes.

120. The representative of the German Democratic Republic declared his Government's support for the ILO, which it considered as a forum for co-operation. His Government was therefore ready to bear its financial obligations towards the Organisation. The problem now being debated by the Committee related to a complex pattern of additional external costs, compounded by the arrears due from the Organisation's largest contributor. There was no doubt that the net request for an additional US$39 million constituted a considerable burden for member States. He therefore supported the proposed programme cuts of US$1.9 million. Further cuts, particularly in administrative areas, seemed nevertheless to be possible. The discussion of a long-term solution on the financial problems should also consider the more effective use of such funds, the concentration on priority objectives, and the avoidance of duplication, both within the ILO and between the United Nations agencies. He advocated further centralisation in management of programmes.

121. He declared that his Government was willing to bear its share of the US$26 million additional assessment necessary for adapting the budget exchange rate, and expressed the hope that a long-term solution to this problem would be found in November next. He had noted from the debate that finding an appropriate level for the Working Capital Fund had been one of the Committee's major preoccupations, and agreed that this Fund should be restricted to the uses authorised in the Financial Regulations.

stances, not least his own. Despite these difficulties, however, it was determined to meet its obligations and pay its contributions; but with the additional budget assessments that were being called for owing to the revaluation of the budget exchange rate from 1.60 Swiss francs to 1.43 Swiss francs to the dollar, it was concerned that programme levels would have to be reviewed and inevitably, in some case, reduced. The replenishment of the Working Capital Fund had not been fully justified: it was evident that the Office needed to review its budget levels and propose further cuts in spending, however painful these might be.

130. The Treasurer and Financial Comptroller advised the Committee that the Director-General proposed to address the Committee again the following day, in response to the very important issues that had been raised during the debate.

131. The Director-General apologised for his unavoidable absence from some of the Committee's sittings. He had, however, been fully briefed on the discussions which had taken place and appreciated the opportunity to be able to respond once more on behalf of the Office. He proposed to reply to the three main issues which had been discussed by the Committee, and would ask the Treasurer and Financial Comptroller to provide the Committee with some supplementary information concerning the Working Capital Fund.

132. The proposed programme reductions of $1.9 million seemed to have been accepted by the Committee and he did not propose to dwell on this issue except to reply to the representative of the United States, who had expressed disappointment that the reduction in the budget of $6.9 million promised a year ago by the Office had not been entirely made up of programme reductions. He recalled that there had been no undertaking on the part of the Office on how this reduction would be realised, nor had the Committee expressed any particular preference. The Office had honoured its obligation by proposing programme cuts of $1.9 million and a reduction of $5 million in the reimbursement required to the Working Capital Fund. Both of these proposals had been accepted by the Governing Body at its 239th (February-March 1988) Session on the recommendation of its Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee.

133. The second proposal concerned additional assessments on member States in 1989 to take account of the continuing depreciation of the dollar. The problem facing the Office was the fixing of an exchange rate which in all probability would cover only a part of the additional costs caused by exchanged rate movements. It was proposed to add $26 million to the budget to allow for a revaluation of the exchange rate from 1.60 to 1.43 Swiss francs to the dollar. The choice of 1.43 as the new budget rate had already provoked comment; even though it was extremely close to the present market rate, some speakers thought it too low, others thought it not low enough. Many member States, understandably enough, had voiced the opinion that the Office should bear part of the burden resulting from the depreciation of the dollar. But in fact the Office had already done so: it had taken many corrective measures since 1986, and details of these measures had been given in his opening address to the Committee. Of course, the Office could readily ease the burden on member States by selecting a higher exchange rate: that would be easy, but misleading. It was interesting to note that the Office was now being reproached for fixing a budget exchange rate of 1.60 a year ago, but this was the rate that had been agreed upon after long discussion in the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee, the Governing Body, the Finance Committee of Government Representatives, and finally the Conference itself.

134. The Director-General wished to give a clear undertaking on behalf of the Office that it was willing to absorb, by way of savings, any budgetary deficit resulting from an average exchange rate for the 1988-1989 biennium of less than 1.43 Swiss francs to the dollar; it would have to average at least 1.45 Swiss francs for the remainder of the biennium to produce an average of 1.43 for the whole of 1988-89.

135. In the deliberation of the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee during the last session of the Governing Body, and also in the present sitting of this Finance Committee, many speakers had expressed the view that member States paying their contributions on time and in full should not be required to carry those member States which did not. In response to these statements the Office would be obliged to inform the Governing Body at its next session in November of the deficit resulting from the non-payment of contributions by member States. He joined those many member States which had expressed regret at the decision of the largest contributor, the United States, to pay only a part of its assessed contribution. To respond to the sentiments expressed by those member States which deplored the late payment of contributions, cuts would have to be proposed: they would be severe, they would be unpopular, and they would upset some member States.

136. Referring to the legitimate concerns expressed by the member States of the Latin American region which wished to set up a committee to review the system used at present for the formulation of the programme and budget proposals, the Director-General regretted that proposal could not be taken further in this Committee because of time constraints, but he reassured them that the Governing Body functioned with full tripartite representation and that it was perhaps the most appropriate forum in which their proposals could be developed. The Office would be ready to give all assistance in this matter to enable governments and employers' and workers' representative to study specific proposals.

137. The Director-General also wished to draw to the Committee's attention the considerable efforts already made by the Office to cut back on administrative costs. Even so, in some areas such as technical co-operation activities, administration costs had been maintained and even increased because the Office saw them as an effective instrument in maintaining dialogue between developing countries and the ILO itself. In technical co-operations programmes, for instance, the agency costs received from the UNDP had remained static at 13 per cent for some time, and although there was a proposal by the Administrative Council of the UNDP to increase this figure to 14 per cent for 1987, the increased figure would still fall far

Compared with other agencies, such as the WHO, US$27 million seemed to be too high, and he therefore felt that the renewed debate on the long-term strategy with regard to exchange rate fluctuations should include a discussion on the Working Capital Fund.

122. The representative of the Ukrainian SSR commented that the ILO's financial difficulties were not new although on this occasion they were attributable to a combination of different factors. He expressed satisfaction with the Director-General's efforts for rationalisation, which had resulted in the recommended US$1.9 million programme cuts, and in a reduction in the replenishment of the Working Capital Fund. Even so, he doubted whether this reduced sum was really necessary and felt that the amount proposed for the replenishment of the Fund could be set at a lower level. In addition, he supported those delegations which had proposed that the Office should bear a share of the US$26 million exchange rate burden. The financial health of the Organisation depended upon the timely receipt of contributions as well as on the relevant effort made by the Office. He looked forward to seeing the implementation of the proposals on the long-term strategy in respect of exchange rate fluctuation, and hoped that they would be more decisive and operationally oriented.

123. The representative of Malaysia was particularly concerned with the failure of major and other contributors to honour their payment obligations. The situation was worsening. He observed that the Employers' and the Workers' representatives had called for the imposition of penalties for late payments. However, he stated that this was not a simple matter, as governments differed in the ordering of their priorities concerning national and international obligations. A special committee might need to be appointed to oversee the question of contributions.

124. Although the bulk of the ILO's programme was oriented towards the needs of developing countries, he observed that many of them had called for reductions in their contributions without wishing for programme cuts. As a developing country itself, Malaysia felt that the ILO should search for economy, and the one area which stood out from his perspective was the frequency and duration of meetings, including the potential reduction of the length of the annual Conference from three weeks to a fortnight, which could be achieved if only one technical item per year were included in its agenda. The whole budgetary mechanism should be simplified in order to get around what he saw as the problem of tripartism at a number of levels in the present process, which tended to hinder any reform which would ensure that governments' views be better heeded and place final decisions on budgetary matters in the hands of the Conference Finance Committee. Despite these remarks, and taking all views into account, he was able to support the recommendations now before the Committee.

125. The representative of Hungary stated that he was greatly concerned by the acute financial difficulties brought upon the ILO by currency fluctuations and the late payment of contributions. His own country had done what it could to avoid creating additional problems and had paid its contribution for 1988 in full and on time. It was moreover ready to continue its help and bear its share of the additional burden on the horizon for 1989. He endorsed the $1.9 million of programme reductions and, although the difficulties arising from exchange rate fluctuations were recognised as being beyond the Office's control, he felt that it should nevertheless seek to absorb this burden to the greatest extent possible. On the other hand, his Government accepted the need to replenish the Working Capital Fund with the sum of $15 million, in the hope that, once the long-term solution to exchange rate problems were found, and arrears of contributions paid, further replenishment would not be necessary.

126. The representative of the Philippines supported the proposals put forward by the Governing Body. However, the proposed budget cuts should allow for the continued implementation of existing as well as new projects. She strongly supported the comments made by previous speakers regarding the necessity of placing proposed programmes and projects in a proper order of priority and urging the Office to ensure, as it had in the past, that they gave value for money. The replenishment of the Working Capital Fund would of course be a burden for developing countries such as the Philippines which were experiencing severe economic difficulties, but if the Fund were not replenished now there would only be more problems in the future. The new nominal level of the Fund, after its reduction by $10 million, should be sufficient to preserve the financial stability of the Organisation, even though the root cause of its budgetary problems – the fluctuation of exchange rates – was beyond its control. She appreciated the efforts by the Office in developing a long-term strategy to deal with currency problems and in trying to find economies within the budget.

127. The representative of Botswana said that countries of the African region as well as other developing countries were opposed to reduction of cuts in programmes already committed in their countries. In view of the fact that ongoing programmes were paramount to the welfare of all developing regions, and given that it was now apparent that the ILO could not meet its commitments owing to the over-optimistic budget exchange rate adopted earlier, there was clearly a need to supplement the ILO budget for the next two years, primarily to ensure that the programmes already under way in developing countries were completed.

128. The representative of Nepal fully supported the proposals put forward by the Governing Body. The programme reductions of $1.9 million were regrettable, but in the circumstances had to be accepted. The proposed budget increase of $26 million to revalue the budget rate from 1.60 Swiss francs to 1.43 Swiss francs to the dollar was probably somewhat conservative and would more than likely compel the Director-General to effect further budget cuts during the biennium. As far as the proposed reimbursement to the Working Capital Fund of a reduced amount of $15 million was concerned, it was clear that the Organisation must be allowed to operate on a sound financial footing, which included an adequate level for its Working Capital Fund.

short of covering full administrative costs. The question then was should the ILO develop technical co-operation activities or not? The answer was quite clear and could be found in the resolution on technical co-operation taken at the 1987 session of the Conference. There was also an important link between technical co-operation and the application of international labour standards. The member States themselves attached much importance to this activity and with so many insisting on ILO support in this field, it was clearly important that the ILO subsidise these costs. The depreciating dollar had also eroded the real value of the income received from the UNDP, yet the administrative costs linked to technical co-operation activities could not be reduced without jeopardising these programmes. The total cost to the Organisation of the depreciation of the dollar over the 1988-89 biennium was conservatively estimated at $26 million, as detailed in the proposals before the Committee. It was a cost completely beyond the control of the Office, and he asked the Committee to agree to a full reimbursement of this amount.

138. The nominal level of the Working Capital Fund at present stood at $12 million. At its February-March and May-June sessions, the Governing Body had proposed reductions totalling $10 million in reimbursements to the Working Capital Fund. After listening attentively to the discussion in the Committee, he now proposed that the reimbursement to the Working Capital Fund be reduced by a further $7 million, which would set the nominal level of the fund at about $20 million, instead of $27 million. The Fund would then be effectively reduced from its original nominal level of $37 million to $20 million. This proposal would, however, have to be directly and fully linked to an acceptance by the Governing Body in November this year of the proposal that the Programme and Budget for 1990-91, and those of future biennia, be fully protected against exchange rate movements. In proposing this further reduction Committee would strongly recommend to the Governing Body the adoption of that proposal at its session in November.

139. The Treasurer and Financial Comptroller said that many Committee members felt that the level of the Working Capital Fund could be further reduced, while others felt that it was premature and imprudent to diminish the financial reserves of the Organisation in anticipation of decisions that had yet to be taken. The real question before the Committee concerned the adequate level of the Working Capital Fund. On 31 December 1987 the nominal level of the fund was $37 million. Although this appeared to be a big sum, it had to be remembered that the Fund was virtually exhausted at that date. In 1987, the nominal level of $37 million of the Working Capital Fund was realistic and justified.

140. It was important to stress, so that there was no misunderstanding on the subject, that the virtual exhaustion of the Working Capital Fund last year had not been due to the non-payment of contributions by member States. It had been entirely due to the need to meet the cost of the fall in the value of the dollar, below the revised budget exchange rate of 2.05 Swiss francs to the dollar. Many speakers had expressed the view that member States should not be called upon to make up for the shortfall in contributions of those countries that had not met their financial obligations to the Organisation. Some had said that this was not the purpose of the Working Capital Fund, and he could only confirm that the Fund had not been used for that purpose.

141. In the last biennium the Organisation had faced severe difficulties due to the non-payment of some very large contributions. The Director-General had not used the authority he possessed under article 21 of the Financial Regulations to finance this shortfall from the Working Capital Fund. On the contrary, he had adopted a realistic and pragmatic approach to the problem and had himself taken the initiative to propose reductions in expenditure, totalling $17.3 million, to the Governing Body in November 1986. The introduction of various economy measures, some of which were of an emergency nature and which would not be maintained indefinitely, had produced savings under Part I of the budget of $21.8 million. This again evidenced the fact that resort to the Working Capital Fund had always been made in a responsible manner.

142. Although the nominal level of $37 million of the Working Capital Fund might have been reasonable in 1987, it did not mean that it was reasonable for 1988 and beyond. One significant development had taken place since 1987, resulting from the determination of both the Director-General and the Governing Body to find a long-term solution to the perennial problem of exchange rate fluctuations. Encouraging progress had been made on this matter at the last session of the Governing Body in May and it was absolutely imperative that a suitable solution be endorsed by the Governing Body next November, and by this Committee, as well as the Conference, next June.

143. In considering what the desirable level of the fund should be, it would be useful to recapitulate very briefly its history. The Working Capital Fund had been established by the Governing Body in 1952 by merging the Reserve Fund of the ILO, which had been established by the Governing Body in 1936 and which stood at $982,000, with the former Working Capital Fund of the ILO that had been transferred from the League of Nations. The opening balance of the Working Capital Fund in 1952 was $2,252,000, which represented 36 per cent of the annual budget, at a time when exchange rates were stable and contributions generally paid on time. The Fund had grown over the years by payments from the budget as well as through the accumulation of miscellaneous income and interest received. In 1972 the Fund stood at a level of $10 million, which represented 27 per cent of the annual budget.

144. Since 1972, no payments had been made to the Fund from the budget to increase its nominal value. The level of the Fund had grown entirely by the judicious investment of available balances by the Office and through the receipt of miscellaneous income. It had thus been possible for it to keep pace with the growth of the budget without requiring a direct charge on member States, although this growth proved essential in order to meet the various demands on the Fund over the years. Only last year, though, the Fund had been virtually exhausted.

145. Although the growth of the Fund through interest and miscellaneous income had been very satisfactory, the Committee was reminded that the factors which permitted this Fund to grow independently were about to be significant diminished, for two reasons: firstly, if the Organisation decided to adopt a system whereby assessments were made in Swiss francs, it was most likely that the Working Capital Fund also would be converted into Swiss francs, and the interest rate on Swiss francs assets was about one-third of that on dollar assets. Secondly, in view of the decision that was likely to be taken by the Conference the following week, the incentive scheme to encourage prompt payment of contributions would be financed through income that would otherwise have been transferred to the Working Capital Fund. In view of those would otherwise have been transferred to the Working Capital Fund. In view of those two considerations, the Committee should have no illusions: the independent growth in the Working Capital Fund would be severely curtailed, if not terminated.

146. During the Committee's discussion some allusion had been made to the working capital funds of other organisations. One had to be very cautious in making such comparisons, because the financial structure of each organisation was quite different. The modest level of the Working Capital Fund of the WHO had been mentioned; but the WHO had the benefit of casual income, which had helped it meet the cost of exchange rate fluctuations. The ILO had no such facility.

147. The FAO also had a smaller fund than the ILO, but it was being steadily increased by its legislative organs, whereas in the ILO the trend was clearly in the opposite direction. Moreover, in the FAO there was a Reserve Fund. There was no such fund in the ILO. The Treasurer gave these two examples to show that a direct comparison of the levels of the working capital funds of various organisations could result in misleading conclusions.

148. In considering the level of the Working Capital Fund, it was also necessary to remember that approximately $6 to 8 million of the Organisation's cash resources were tied up in bank balances that were maintained for the regional offices, some 40 external offices and regional centres. The Working Capital Fund was constantly being used during the course of the year to finance temporary shortfalls in income; this was one of the most vital uses of the Fund, a purpose for which it was clearly intended.

149. In this connection it was fair to mention that, at the present time, approximately 30 member States had not paid a single dollar towards their 1987 contribution. Some 90 member States had made no payment towards their 1988 contributions. The total contributions due to the Organisation in respect of previous years, stood at $32.4 million. For the current year there were $75.4 million of unpaid contributions. At the present time, there were almost $108 million worth of contributions owing to the Organisation. Even at the best of times some very large contributions were received only in the last three months of the year. Pending the receipt of such contributions, the Office had no choice but to turn to the Working Capital Fund.

150. The representative of Canada, among others, had suggested that the level of the Working Capital Fund might be restricted to one or two months' expenditure. The Director-General, in making his proposal for a further reduction, had taken the risk of further reducing the Working Capital Fund to a level sufficient to meet one months' expenditure, plus a part of what was required to finance the cash floats. This would represent a total of $20 million: about $15 million worth of monthly expenditure, plus $5 million to help finance the cash floats. The Office believed that it would be financially imprudent to go beyond that level at the moment, but it would continue to monitor the level of the Fund in the light of experience over the next two years. If the Working Capital Fund was reduced too far, in the present financial climate there would appear to be very little chance of re-establishing it at a more appropriate level in the future, because of the reluctance of member States to make payments to the Fund and also because its future growth would be severely limited for the reasons already mentioned.

151. The Treasurer and Financial Comptroller, replying to various questions raised by members of the Committee, explained that the proposal of the Director-General to reduce the $15 million reimbursement to the Working Capital Fund by $7 million, to $8 million, which would give the Fund a nominal value of $20 million, meant that the net additional assessment on member States would now stand at $32 million. In response to another query, the Treasurer replied that the proposed system for assessment of contributions in Swiss francs would, if accepted, go into effect in the 1990-91 biennium at the earliest.

152. The representative of Colombia expressed the interest of the Latin American and Caribbean group in the new proposal of the Director-General concerning the Working Capital Fund. Like other delegates, his group would study these important proposals closely; they appreciated the efforts being made. In clarification of the proposal made earlier by his group, he assured the Committee that the Latin American group did not wish to change either the organisational structure or the structure of decision-making on financial matters. Its intention had simply been to replace the totally informal type of consultation, which normally occurred at any meeting, by consultations organised in the form of a group of "friends of the Chairman", so as to lighten the task of the Committee and ensure that all views were represented.

153. The Committee had before it document FC/D.5 containing a resolution concerning proposed programme reductions for the 1988-89 biennium recommended by the Governing Body.

154. The Committee adopted this resolution, the text of which appears at the end of this report, for submission to the Conference.

155. The Committee then considered document FC/D.6, containing a resolution concerning a proposal for reimbursement of the Working Capital Fund, proposed by the Governing Body at its 240th (May-June 1988) Session, but amended to take into account the further reduction in the Working Capital Fund, as proposed by the Director-General to the Committee.

156. The representative of the United Kingdom had listened carefully to the revised proposals, now reflected in the resolution put before the Committee the previous day by the Director-General, and also the explanation by the Treasurer and Financial Comptroller concerning the Working Capital Fund. No one in the Committee could be under any illusion about the serious financial predicament in which the ILO found itself, nor could anyone avoid the responsibility of taking the difficult decisions which were necessary to meet the needs of the Organisation and of the member States. He had previously expressed the view that there was a need for burden-sharing on any financial adjustments which might be necessary to the budget. It was encouraging that the Director-General had offered to reduce the supplement to the Working Capital Fund to a total of $8 million, which would bring the level of the fund in 1989 up to $20 million. This increase, however, was a charge against member States and would have to be funded by them in increased assessments for 1989.

157. The Director-General had also insisted that $26 million was the minimum amount required to compensate for exchange rate losses. He had emphasised the risks that the Organisation was taking in limiting the increase in the budget to $26 million. Nevertheless, the full impact of the proposals now before the Committee was a demand for an increase in the 1988-89 programme and budget of $34 million and correspondingly increased assessments on member States for 1989.

158. The revised proposals of the Director-General were disappointing. The ILO might be in a serious financial predicament, but so were many of the member States. He continued to believe that confronting a financial crisis mainly by a demand for more resources was not an adequate or acceptable response. If money was not available to finance everything member States had voted for the previous year when the budget for 1988-89 was adopted, a decision had to be taken to economise and to ensure that total expenditure was maintained within the funds available. It might be very difficult to secure agreement on where programme adjustments should be made, but all the member States made the same choices in their own programmes even though there were conflicting interests between the various ministries during discussions on government budget levels. There was no reason why the same difficult decisions could not be made here in Geneva. It did not appear that the Office had taken fully into account the clear thrust of the comments made by member States in this Committee; the burden-sharing so far offered was not, in his view, adequate. The request by the Director-General to the Finance Committee to approve an increase of $34 million could and should be reduced by further cuts in budgetary expenditure. Notwithstanding the explanations of the Treasurer concerning the demands on the Working Capital Fund, it was not clear why the Organisation needed an increase for 1989 when, during the whole of 1988, it would be living with the current level of $12 million in the fund; what prevailed in 1988 should equally continue to prevail in 1989. Admittedly this would make life very difficult for the Treasurer and his colleagues dealing with treasury management in the Organisation, but the Director-General and the Treasurer should reconsider this proposal. A better solution would be to delay further consideration of the proposal concerning the Working Capital Fund until the November session of the Governing Body when the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee could make a recommendation concerning the appropriate level for the Working Capital Fund. The Office should also do more to reduce the $26 million additional assessment for exchange rate adjustments by budgetary cuts, especially in administrative costs. At the November 1988 session of the Governing Body the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee would have to make very difficult decisions concerning budgetary expenditure and there was no reason why this should not be anticipated by the Office by way of immediate administrative measures.

159. To reflect the concerns just expressed, he wished to propose an amendment to the resolution contained in document FC/D.6 as follows:

- paragraph 1, second line, after "... Financial Regulations," replace the remainder of that paragraph with "the issue of the Working Capital Fund be postponed for consideration at the Governing Body in November 1988.";
- delete paragraph 2.

160. The representative of Colombia, speaking on behalf of the countries of the Latin American region, said that his group had listened with great interest and relief to the statement of the previous speaker, and he shared the concerns that had been expressed about the future of the ILO and also the need for caution over the decision concerning the reimbursement to the Working Capital Fund. He supported the amendment, but also wished to draw attention to the first paragraph of the preamble. This issue had been debated at great length in the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee and in the Governing Body itself and he suggested that the precise wording of the Governing Body decision be used in the draft resolution.

161. The representative of Belgium drew attention to article 13(2) of the Constitution which provided quite clearly for the adoption of the Programme and Budget by the Conference, upon the recommendation of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives. If the proposal put forward by the representative of the United Kingdom were adopted, the Working Capital Fund would be left in a vacuum for several months. As a compromise, he suggested that the proposed reimbursement to the Working Capital Fund be reduced by a further $2 million.

162. In response to inquiries from the floor, the Assistant Legal Adviser said that if the Conference did not adopt the resolution concerning the Working Capital Fund proposed by the Committee, article 21(2) of the Financial Regulations would apply, and member States would be required to reimburse the Working Capital Fund according to those provisions. If the Conference wished to consider some other proposal it could refer the matter back to the Finance Committee.

163. The representative of the United States supported the amendment proposed by the representative of the United Kingdom. He had listened to the concerns expressed by the representative of Belgium but believed the proposal to be consistent with the concerns he had raised. If the matter were referred forward by the Conference to the November session of the Governing Body any recommendations would ultimately come before the 1989 Conference in accordance with article 13 of the Constitution. For many years the programme, Financial and Administrative Committee and the Governing Body, in both of which the social partners were represented, had emphasised the difficult financial situation facing the Organisation. A decision by the Finance Committee to postpone the need for a substantial financial contribution from member States for one year would, he hoped, meet with the understanding and support of the social partners once again.

164. The representative of Sweden felt that a Working Capital Fund of $12 million for 1988-89 was not sufficient and would probably mean that the Office would have to resort to external borrowing, an undesirable practice. He supported the original resolution and indicated that he would abstain in any vote on the amendment put forward by the representative of the United Kingdom.

165. The representative of Colombia suggested that, in the absence of any specific provision to the contrary, when the Conference took a decision on a programme and budget it implied that the level of the Working Capital Fund should remain at the same level, which indirectly fixed the level of the Fund on a provisional basis. The proposal put forward by the representative of the United Kingdom was consistent with this view and pointed the way toward a sensible and supportable solution, which would very probably be accepted by the plenary of the Conference. However, in the highly improbable event that the proposal was rejected by the plenary, it would be necessary for the Committee to reconvene to make a recommendation concerning the level of replenishment.

166. In reply to questions from the representatives of Burundi and Malaysia, the Financial Comptroller recalled the very detailed explanation of the functioning of the Working Capital Fund he had given at the previous sitting of the Committee. It was the Director-General's considered view that the Organisation needed a minimum of $20 million to meet the effects of factors in 1988-89 which were beyond its control – in particular the rate of receipt of contributions. The Office had to face the likelihood that the proportion of uncollected contributions would go up as the biennium progressed. Moreover, for a number of reasons, expenditure was habitually greater in the second year of a biennium than in the first. It was therefore quite clear that extremely difficult cash-flow problems would arise over the course of the current biennium if the proposal to replenish the Working Capital Fund were not adopted.

167. In reply to a question from the representative of the United Kingdom concerning the procedure to be adopted should the plenary of the Conference not accept the Finance Committee's resolution leading to a reduction in the replenishment of the Working Capital Fund, the Assistant Legal Adviser explained that it was open to any delegate in the plenary, by way of a motion as to procedure under paragraph 2.2 of article 15 of the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference, to propose that the Conference refer the matter back to the Finance Committee.

168. The Committee then turned to the adoption of the resolution for the reimbursement of the Working Capital Fund.

169. The representative of Colombia proposed that the first paragraph of the preamble to the resolution should be amended to reflect the wording of the Governing Body decision referred to, so that it would read as follows:

“The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation, Noting that the Governing Body, at its 240th (May-June 1988) Session, endorsed in principle the introduction in 1990-91 of a system of Swiss franc assessments combined with forward purchasing of the biennium's dollar requirements and agreed that the final decision should be taken at the 241st Session of the Governing Body in November 1988 based on a more detailed proposal presented by the Director-General with consequential changes in the Financial Regulations and Financial Rules,”.

This amendment was adopted.

170. The Committee then proceeded to a record vote on the amendment proposed by the representative of the United Kingdom. The result of the vote was as follows: in favour of the amendment – 25; against the amendment – 26; abstentions – 29; the quorum was 54; the proposed amendment was therefore not adopted. Details of the voting on this resolution are set out in Appendix V.

171. The representative of Switzerland seconded an amendment proposed by the representative of Belgium, designed to lower the amount of replenishment of the Working Capital Fund to $6 million, by replacing “$17 million” by “$19 million” in paragraphs 1 and 2 and replacing the last words of paragraph 2 by “will amount to $6,059,627”.

172. The representative of Colombia stated that the Latin American and Caribbean group maintained its position that it would have been preferable not to replenish the Working Capital Fund at all, since the elements on which the proposed replenishment of the Fund was based had not been made perfectly clear. However, the group respected the wish of the majority concerning the partial replenishment of the Fund. As the figure proposed by Switzerland was lower, his group would support it.

173. The representative of Denmark felt that the Committee should have confidence in the Director-General's evaluation of $20 million as the necessary level for the Working Capital Fund. He was prepared to accept the reimbursement of $8 million and would not accept lowering it. The representatives of Zimbabwe, France and Burundi concurred with this view.

174. The Committee then proceeded to a vote by show of hands on the amendment proposed by the representative of Belgium. The result of the vote was as follows: in favour of the amendment – 32; against the amendment – 39; abstentions – 9; the quorum was 54; the amendment failed for lack of a two-thirds majority.

175. The Committee then proceeded to a record vote on the resolution for the proposed reimburse-

Resolution concerning the composition of the Administrative Tribunal of the International Labour Organisation

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

In accordance with Article III of the Statute of the Administrative Tribunal of the International Labour Organisation, Extends the terms of office of the Rt. Hon. Sir William Douglas (Barbados) and Mr. Edilbert Razafindralambo (Madagascar) as deputy judges of the Tribunal for a further period of three years.

Resolution concerning the proposed incentive scheme for early payment of member States' assessed contributions

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Recalling that in accordance with article 10, paragraph 1, of the Financial Regulations, member States' assessed contributions for each calendar year are due and payable on 1 January of that year,

Noting that delays in the payment of assessed contributions by some member States have prejudiced the implementation of the Organisation's programme in a timely and orderly manner and placed those member States which pay their contributions in a timely manner at a disadvantage,

Recalling the concerns expressed by the Conference, the Governing Body and the Director-General with regard to the late payment of assessed contributions,

Agreeing that some form of incentive should be provided to member States that pay their assessed contributions in a timely manner;

1. Decides that an incentive scheme based on the setting aside of interest earned on temporarily surplus regular budget funds in any year shall be introduced as from 1 January 1989 for a two-year trial period;

2. Decides further that during this trial period 40 per cent of interest earned on temporarily surplus regular budget funds in each year shall be paid into the Working Capital Fund and that the remainder shall be set aside to provide a total incentive amount available for distribution to those member States which have paid in full their assessed contributions for the current year by 31 December of that year. The total incentive amount so established in each year will be distributed to eligible member States under an incentive points system based on an "S" curve formula which will take into account the dates and amounts of payments of current year's contributions by member States.

Resolution concerning the Financial Report and Audited Financial Statements for 1986-87

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Decides to adopt the Financial Report and Audited Financial Statements for 1986-87 in accordance with article 29 of the Financial Regulations.

Resolution concerning reduction in the Programme and Budget for 1988-89

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Recalling that the 73rd Session of the Conference adopted the Programme and Budget for 1988-89 on the understanding that programme reductions to reduce the overall level of the budget would be worked out for approval by the Conference at its present session, Decides to make programme reductions of $1.9 million as detailed by major programme in Appendix II to this report.

ment of the Working Capital Fund. The result of the vote was as follows: in favour of the resolution – 60; against the resolution – 5; abstentions – 18. The necessary two-thirds majority having been achieved, the Committee accordingly recommends that the Conference adopt this resolution, the text of which appears at the end of this report. Details of the voting on this resolution are set out in Appendix VI.

176. The representative of Australia explained that his vote against the resolution, and against the amendment, had been motivated by the belief that there was no need for reimbursement of the Fund at this time. In the light of its acceptance, and anticipating that a mechanism for dealing with the currency fluctuation problem would be accepted by the Governing Body in November, he felt it should be stressed that neither in 1990 nor in the years after that, would the Organisation (notwithstanding article 21 of the Financial Regulations) again need to ask for such a replenishment of the Fund. If it were to do so, this would be tantamount to a confirmation of his fear that the Working Capital Fund was working not just as a cash flow mechanism, but as a way of passing on to other member States the deficits caused by the failure of some member States to pay their dues. Such a practice would be contrary to equity and would not, in any circumstances, be acceptable to the Australian Government.

177. The representative of Colombia pointed out that the members of his group had abstained in the vote because they disagreed with the amount, but respected the decision of the Committee concerning the replenishment. They felt that for one year no reimbursement was needed, and that more clarification was required of the elements on which the reimbursement was based. They would therefore have preferred postponement of the decision. This view was shared, in his estimation, by members of a group representing 62.7 per cent of the contributions to the budget.

178. The Committee then proceeded to a record vote on the resolution concerning additional assessments for 1988-89 in respect of budget exchange rate adjustments. The result of the vote was as follows: in favour of the resolution – 54; against the resolution – 18; abstentions – 11. The quorum of 54 being reached and the necessary two-thirds majority having been achieved, the Committee accordingly proposes to the Conference for adoption the resolution, the text of which appears at the end of this report. Details of the voting on this resolution are set out in Appendix VII.

179. The representative of the Netherlands still believed that the Organisation could absorb more of the losses. He hoped that it was clear that the Working Capital Fund should only be used for cash flow, not for covering shortfalls due to exchange rate losses or to non-payment of contributions by member States; if necessary, the Financial Regulations should be amended accordingly.

180. He further noted that the Organisation would be protected against exchange rate losses in the future, and hoped that the proposed system for protection against such losses would go into effect in 1989. The Office should prepare a contingency plan in case, in November, it should appear that member States would not be making payment in full and on time. In such a case, severe cuts in programme delivery might appear inevitable.

181. A table showing the summarised budget of expenditure and income for 1988-89 is appended to this report (Appendix I), and a summary of the proposed expenditure budget for 1988-89 by major programme is also appended (Appendix II). A statement showing the contributions due from each member State in 1989 is also appended (Appendix III).

Geneva, 13 June 1988.

Chairman and Reporter.*

Resolution concerning reimbursement to the Working Capital Fund in 1989

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Noting that the Governing Body, at its 240th (May-June 1988) Session, endorsed in principle the introduction in 1990-91 of a system of Swiss franc assessments combined with forward purchasing of the biennium's dollar requirements and agreed that the final decision should be taken at the 241st Session of the Governing Body in November 1988, based on a more detailed proposal presented by the Director-General with consequential changes in the Financial Regulations and Financial Rules,

Expressing the hope that firm proposals in respect of this problem will be made by the Governing Body within the framework of the programme and budget proposals for the 1990-91 biennium;

1. Decides that, as an exceptional measure and in derogation of article 21, paragraph 2 of the Financial Regulations, the amount due to be added to Part III of the budget (Working Capital Fund) in 1989 in order to reimburse the Fund for withdrawals made to finance the excess of budgetary expenditure over budgetary income in 1986-87 be reduced by $17 million, thereby reducing by a corresponding amount the additional assessments which would otherwise be made on member States in 1989 for that purpose;

2. Notes that, taking account of the $17 million, the resulting additional assessment for 1989 required under article 21, paragraph 2 of the Financial Regulations will amount to $8,059,627.

Resolution concerning the Programme and Budget for 1988-89

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Recalling that the rate of exchange between the United States dollar and the Swiss franc (the "budget rate") for the 1988-89 Programme and Budget was fixed at 1.60 Swiss francs for 1 US dollar,

Noting the depreciation of the US dollar in relation to the Swiss franc since that rate was fixed and in particular the adverse trend over the first five months of the 1988-89 biennium,

Considering the consequential need to cover the additional costs that have arisen and are likely to continue to arise during the execution of the programme adopted for 1988-89;

1. Decides to modify the budget rate for the 1988-89 biennium from 1.60 to 1.43 Swiss francs to the dollar and accordingly to add an amount of $26 million under Part IV (Effects of exchange rate adjustments) to the budgets of expenditure and of income for 1988-89, it being understood that any additional costs arising from the value of the dollar being lower than the revised budget rate of 1.43 Swiss francs to the dollar will be met through adjustments within the level of the revised Programme and Budget for 1988-89;

2. Approves the revised budget of expenditure and income for the 61st financial period ending 31 December 1989, in the amount of US$357,023,033, resulting from the present resolution and the resolutions adopted at the present session of the Conference concerning programme reductions and reimbursements to the Working Capital Fund, as set out in Appendix I to this report.

APPENDIX I

Provisional Record

Seventy-fifth Session, Geneva, 1988

Action Taken on the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa

Report of the Committee on Apartheid

1. The Committee was established in accordance with paragraph 4 of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa, which was adopted by the Conference at its 67th Session (1981). It was established, inter alia, for the purpose of monitoring action against apartheid.

2. The Committee was composed of 54 members with the right to vote (20 Government members, 14 Employers' members and 20 Workers' members). It also included 18 Employers' deputy members and 20 Workers' deputy members. In accordance with the usual procedure, equal voting for the three groups were assured by the appropriate system of weighted voting. The United Nations, the OAU, a number of Government members and some non-governmental organisations with consultative status as well as the African National Congress of South Africa (ANC) and the Pan-Africanist Congress of Azania (PAC) were represented by observers.

3. At its opening sitting the Committee elected its Officers as follows:

Chairman: The Hon. Nkomo (Zimbabwe)

Vice-Chairmen: Mr. Hernandez, Employers' member (Philippines)

Mr. Mercier, Workers' member (Canada)

The Committee also elected as Reporter: Mr. Vollebaek, Government member (Norway).

4. The Committee held six sittings. Its mandate was to examine the Special Report of the Director-General on the Application of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa which dealt, inter alia, with developments regarding the situation in South Africa in respect of labour and social matters, and contained an analysis of the information provided by governments, employers' and workers' organisations on measures taken against apartheid as foreseen in paragraph 5(b) of the Declaration as well as on international action against apartheid. A further document complemented the Special Report by providing a brief summary of (i) the principal events which had occurred in South Africa concerning labour matters; and (ii) information supplied by governments, employers' and workers' organisations since the completion of the Special Report. The Committee also had before it the report of the Tripartite Conference on Action against Apartheid which had taken place in Harare, Zimbabwe, from 3 to 6 May 1988 which contained a draft for the updating of the Declaration on Apartheid to be considered in relation to the item which had been included in the agenda of the Conference by the Governing Body of the ILO at its 238th Session in November 1987, following the recommendations of the Committee to the 73rd Session of the Conference. In addition, the Committee had before it the report of the Governing Body Committee on Discrimination at its 240th Session in May 1988 and a document submitted to the Committee following a decision of the ILO Governing Body at its 240th Session in May 1988 containing a report entitled Banking Facilities in the ILO, approved by the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee of the Governing Body at that session. This related to the question referred to in paragraph 10, under Part V "ILO action" in the Conclusions of the Committee on Apartheid of the 73rd Session of the Conference in 1987.

5. The representative of the Secretary-General drew attention to the crucial task of updating the ILO Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa that would be undertaken by the Committee on Apartheid during the current 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. He referred to some of the proposed new elements in the Declaration, contained in Provisional Record No. 3 of the Conference. It had been recommended, for example, that the Committee should be known as the "Conference Committee on Action against Apartheid", the Declaration as "the Declaration concerning Action Against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia", and the appendix as "the Programme of Action against Apartheid". He pointed to the preparatory work done at the Tripartite Conference on Action against Apartheid, convened in Harare, 3-6 May 1988, on the decision of the Governing Body at its 238th Session (November 1987) and on the recommendation of the Committee on Apartheid at the 73rd Session (June 1987) of the International Labour Conference. He observed that the decision to place the updating of the Declaration on the agenda of the Conference could not have come at a more appropriate time owing to the current gravity of the situation in South Africa and Namibia. The situation now required urgent action not only by the ILO but also by governments and employers' and workers' organisations. The Special Report of the Director-General on the Application of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa, to be discussed by the Committee, demonstrated clearly the deterioration of the plight of the Black workers and the repressive measures adopted against their organisations. Furthermore, it analysed the information supplied by the ILO tripartite membership and by the international organisations on action taken by them against apartheid. By examining this information, the Committee could indicate what needed to be done to speed up the process of bringing an end to apartheid.

6. The Chairman expressed the hope that the Committee would adopt an unequivocal programme of action against apartheid which would clearly indicate to the Government of South Africa that the governments, employers and workers of the world reject the obnoxious system of apartheid. The fact that human rights constituted the theme of the Director-General's Report to the Conference made the work of the Committee more pertinent since the apartheid system in South Africa denied basic human rights to the majority of the country's population. He referred to the numerous security and emergency regulations which constrained and oppressed Blacks and the trampling of trade union rights in South Africa. The "so-called" reform programme of the South African Government should not deceive the Committee, since the essence of the apartheid system remained intact. Internally, the ruthless application of the emergency and security regulations ensured that the privileged few enjoyed the system's benefits, while externally the racist regime carried out acts of destabilisation against the front-line States. He drew attention to the significant role being played by the ILO in the struggle against apartheid, such as its adoption of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa in 1964, which was updated in 1981. This Declaration testified to the international community's abhorrence of the apartheid system. He expressed the hope that the Committee would tighten and update the Declaration to enable it to reflect the developments that had occurred since the last updating in 1981. He paid tribute to the delegates who participated in the Tripartite Conference on Action against Apartheid, in Harare, for coming up with a proposed Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia which would guide the work of the Committee. The tightening and updating of the Declaration would further advance the ILO's rightful place in the fight against apartheid, and the implementation of the proposed Programme of Action against Apartheid would help to dismantle the abhorrent system.

7. On behalf of the Workers' members, the Workers' Vice-Chairman observed that the work of the Committee demonstrated its credibility with the Black workers in South Africa. He emphasised that the Black workers were embarking on solidarity action to protest against the South African Government's Labour Relations Amendment Bill which would introduce restrictions on the activities of the trade unions and would limit their right to strike, and define unfair labour practices in an anti-trade union manner. Furthermore, the Bill gave the responsible minister the right to introduce any changes he wanted at any time in the definition. The Bill could also encourage employers to recognise the minority racial trade unions based on the principle of "divide and rule". He gave several examples of the arrest of trade unionists for reasons which could only be pretexts. He reminded the Committee that the ILO existed to defend trade union rights, an integral part of which were the rights to freedom of association and expression which were completely suppressed in South Africa. Owing to the fact that Black workers did not have the right to vote in South Africa, they could only express their views through the trade unions. He also pointed to the threats by employers against the workers who embarked on peaceful protests and cited several examples to illustrate this point. Since a number of employers, including those who presented a liberal image to the outside world, severely repressed their Black workers, the Workers' group requested the Employers' group in the Committee to provide precise information on the attitude of their members in this regard. He reiterated that the employers should use their influence over the South African Government to persuade it to renounce the proposed Labour Relations Amendment Bill which provided for serious infringements of freedom of association. He drew attention to another draft Bill which was deeply worrying the Workers, namely the Promotion of Orderly Internal Politics Bill aimed at preventing external solidarity funds from being brought into the country to assist the anti-apartheid organisations. The Workers were afraid that this Bill could be used against the Black trade unions. The Special Report of the Director-General indicated that many governments made funds available to support organisations which were geared to improving the conditions of the Black majority in South Africa and the victims of apartheid. In their response, the European Community appeared to give more importance to such "positive" measures than to "negative" measures such as economic sanctions. It was disquieting to note the Government of South Africa's statement that the Promotion of Orderly Internal Politics Bill was geared to controlling the funds coming from external sources as well as to keeping under surveillance the use of such funds for politically subversive ends or for illegal activities. What concerned the Workers was the fact that virtually all trade union-connected activities, including humanitarian aid for victims of apartheid, would be included in this definition if the Government so decided. The Workers' group would like to know the steps envisaged by the Governments of the European Community or other governments to implement measures geared to putting pressure on the South African Government to abandon the introduction of restrictions which were aimed at strangling every democratic movement in the country. He observed that it was necessary for the Committee to specify effective action to be taken by each of the tripartite constituents against this challenge of legislative measures in South Africa. Regarding the main task of the Committee for this year which was to update the Declaration and the Programme of Action, he noted that this task would be facilitated by the work already undertaken by the Tripartite Conference on Action against Apartheid in Harare. He regretted to have to point out that if half of the recommendations in the Declaration and in the Programme of Action had been followed by the ILO constituents, there would not have been any need to convene another session of the Committee. In this context, he indicated the Workers' disappointment in the replies supplied by the States which could play a key role in the dismantling of apartheid. In spite of the quality of the Special Report's analysis of the situation in South Africa and Namibia, the Report did not contain any real evaluation of the implementation of the Declaration and the Programme of Action. He observed that a certain routine was followed in the replies which were stereotyped and did not contain substance regarding the actual measures implemented or not implemented. Consequently, the Workers' group would like to put greater emphasis on the setting up of a central mechanism to monitor the application of the recommendations adopted by the Committee. He regretted the fact that the countries of the European Community had again provided a collective response, with the exception of Denmark, Ireland and Italy, which supplied individual replies in addition. It was almost unbelievable that only 20 governments, including five of the industrialised countries – Australia, Austria, Ireland, Japan and Sweden – could mention positive action in relation to Part II paragraph 6 on Government action in the Programme of Action, dealing with the withholding of recognition of the Bantustans, denial of the establishment of representative offices and the entry of representatives of Bantustans into their territories, the prohibition of new investments in and the demand for the withdrawal of existing investment from these areas. Furthermore, paragraph 9 was only referred to in four replies even though it only concerned the lifting of all impediments preventing trade unions from participating in solidarity action with the workers engaged in the anti-apartheid struggle. It was clearly indicated in the Special Report that no progress had been achieved towards the dismantling of apartheid. The state of emergency reintroduced during the preceding year would certainly continue this year and all types of restrictive measures would only grow. The Workers' group supported the view expressed by the Director-General in the Special Report that only concerted and targeted international pressures on the South African Government's areas of greatest vulnerability could bring about a reversal of the apartheid policy by peaceful means. He emphasised that the gold market played a significant role in the maintenance of the South African regime. The Workers' group called on the ILO to undertake an expert study on this subject. He also referred to the solidarity demonstrated by the banks when the ILO had made inquiries to identify another bank to be used by the ILO in place of the Union Bank of Switzerland (UBS). A more global approach needed to be adopted to put pressure on all the banks involved in trade with South Africa. The possibility of putting pressure on the consortium of banks which, within the next two months, would be negotiating with South Africa on the loans granted to it should be examined carefully. He identified the field of energy as another vulnerable area. He noted that Italy, which was the greatest importer of South African coal, had declared itself favourably disposed towards an embargo on coal imports from South Africa if the 12 European countries could agree on this point. Italy should be informed that it could set an example by promoting this action vigorously among the 12 countries or else adopt a coal embargo unilaterally as had France and Denmark. He emphasised that the goal of action to be undertaken was to adopt comprehensive and mandatory sanctions. The Workers favourably acknowledged the efforts made by the United States Congress towards the promotion of sanctions which, to a large extent, reflect the recommendations in the ILO Declaration and in the Programme of Action. It was, however, difficult to understand the reasons for the United States' veto of the adoption of such sanctions in the Security Council. In a special appeal to the Workers, he expressed the hope that in the future no employer in South Africa, nor any commercial agency which violated the known international standards or which collaborated with the Government of South Africa, would be confident that "very little real pressure would be exercised to its disadvantage".

8. On behalf of the Employers' members, the Employers' Vice-Chairman emphasised the function of the Committee which, in consonance with paragraph 5(a) of the Declaration, related to the monitoring of action taken against apartheid. He expressed the Employers' appreciation of the efforts made by the Government, workers and employers of Zimbabwe in hosting the Tripartite Conference on Action against Apartheid, and noted that Zimbabwe was shining example of how people of different races could work together in harmony and co-operate for their mutual welfare and benefit. He congratulated the Director-General on his Special Report for providing comprehensive information on recent developments in labour and social matters not only in South Africa but also in Namibia in accordance with the request of the 73rd Session (June 1987) of the International Labour Conference. The Special Report also contained an analysis of the information supplied by governments, employers and workers on action taken against apartheid. In addition, it examined international action against apartheid including activities carried out by the ILO in accordance with the conclusions of the Committee on Apartheid at the 73rd Session (June 1987) of the Conference. He observed that although the Report mentioned that replies had been received from 105 governments and 63 employers' and 103 workers' organisations, which indicated an increase in replies, this increase was not substantial and should not satisfy the tripartite members. The replies received were from less than two-thirds of the Members. Furthermore, they did not entirely cover the key and pertinent issues. He requested that specific ways should be identified to improve upon the replies submitted by the tripartite membership. He drew the Committee's attention to the specific activities undertaken against apartheid and in aid of its victims by employers' organisations which were mentioned in the Special Report. He mentioned, as an example, the co-operation between the Norwegian Employers' Confederation, the ILO and the Zambia Federation of Employers in a project on small enterprise development for refugees in Zambia. Several employers' federations had also transmitted, to their affiliates and associated organisations and enterprises, the recommendations for specific forms of action against apartheid contained in the conclusions adopted in the preceding year by the Committee on Apartheid. He made particular mention of the Japan Federation of Employers' Associations, NIKKEIREN, which had been engaged in developing awareness among Japanese employers of the problems brought about by apartheid and the anti-apartheid measures undertaken by the ILO and its constituent members. He reaffirmed the Employers' commitment to the fundamental principles relating to basic human rights enshrined in the Preamble to the ILO Constitution and in the Declaration of Philadelphia. In addition, the Employers were committed to supporting measures that would bring pressure on the South African Government which had refused to promote basic human rights. He expressed the disappointment of the Employers' group that the South African Government had not heeded the voice of the international community, and reaffirmed the Employers' commitment to 'support programmes and policies urgently required for the total elimination of apartheid. He referred to some of the views he had expressed before the Committee, in June 1987, to the effect that despite colour differences, all men were equal and there were no superior races. Unfortunately, this fact was not recognised by the apartheid system. He was hopeful that apartheid would be eradicated since it sowed its own seed of destruction. He drew attention to the support given by the many different races and creeds to the Blacks in South Africa. He urged the ILO and its tripartite members to publicise more widely and constantly the evils of apartheid and the action undertaken by them against this inhuman system. He expressed earnest hope that the draft updated Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and its annexed Programme of Action against Apartheid would be favourably acted upon by the Committee.

9. The Government member of India expressed appreciation of the conclusions of the recent Tripartite Conference on Action against Apartheid and also support for the amendments proposed for the updating of the Declaration. He recalled that the Director-General of the ILO had been presenting the Special Report since 1964, and observed that the Special Report submitted to the Committee at the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference caused deep concern since it clearly revealed the magnitude of human rights' violations under the apartheid system and also demonstrated that the condition of the majority of South Africa's people had deteriorated considerably during the past year. Referring to the Pretoria regime's ongoing acts of repression including persistent trampling of trade union rights, harassment and torture of trade unionists, detention and killing of many people, he attributed the current turbulence in the labour field in South Africa to the perverse and inhuman system of apartheid. He informed the Committee about his country's long-standing total commitment to the struggle against apartheid. India had always been at the forefront of the international campaign against apartheid and it had also played a special role in support of the struggle of the Black majority in South Africa for freedom and human dignity. As early as in 1946, even before India had attained its independence, the Indian delegation had included a new item concerning South Africa's policy of racial discrimination on the agenda of the General Assembly. India was the first country to impose sanctions against South Africa. It did not maintain any relations with that country and strongly condemned the apartheid system as well as the banning in February 1988 of 17 anti-apartheid organisations in South Africa and the restrictions on COSATU. India regarded all modifications of the system, cosmetic or otherwise, as unacceptable. Apartheid had to go in its entirety. He called upon all governments and employers' and workers' organisations to join in imposing immediate, comprehensive and mandatory sanctions against South Africa, and urged the international community to act cohesively to ensure that such sanctions became a reality since they constituted the only peaceful means that could compel the South African regime to dismantle apartheid. He appealed to the governments which supported the apartheid regime to recognise that any delay in action would only lead to an increase in bloodshed. Drawing attention to the fact that India chaired the AFRICA Fund which currently had contributions/pledges of over US$250 million, he appealed to all governments, employers' and workers' organisations, non-governmental bodies and individuals to contribute to the Fund and thus help the front-line States in their struggle against the racist Pretoria regime. His Government was convinced that the apartheid system was doomed to collapse. With respect to Namibia, he reiterated India's outright condemnation of South Africa's illegal occupation of that country and reaffirmed his Government's support for the oppressed people of Namibia and for their sole, legitimate representative, SWAPO, in their just struggle for independence. He quoted the statement made by the Prime Minister of India at the Non-Alignment Summit in Harare that freedom in South Africa would brook no further delay. The choice was between liberty now with innocent lives saved or liberty later in a welter of blood.

10. The Workers' member of Bulgaria stated that a State which discriminated against the majority of its population because of their skin colour represented an extreme situation which touched on fundamental human rights in a year which marked the 40th anniversary of the Declaration of Human Rights. Despite the calls made, the racist regime continued its policy. The world, therefore, had to intensify its efforts in the fight against apartheid and the ILO had an important role to play in this endeavour. Apartheid remained in spite of the interventions made by all the world's States and, more importantly, by the political and trade union organisations. He demanded an explanation for apartheid's continued existence. He recalled the saying that "there was no smoke without fire". In this instance, the fire which fanned the evil apartheid system was produced by the transnational enterprises and the banks, which were referred to in a substantial part of the report that also specified many North American, British, Federal German and Swiss enterprises operating in South Africa. Everyone agreed with the general principle that apartheid was evil but to date the efforts achieved were not enough to eradicate it. In his opinion, it was essential to put pressure on the countries which derived profit from the Black manpower in the labour market and supported the apartheid system. Regarding the issue of banking services for the ILO, he expressed surprise that no progress had been achieved. He underlined the importance of the Programme of Action drafted by the recent tripartite conference in Harare and urged member States to supply annually information on measures taken against the apartheid system.

11. Speaking on behalf of the Nordic trade union movements which were affiliated to the ICFTU, the Workers' member of Norway expressed the belief that the persistent and co-ordinated efforts of the international trade union movement in support of the trade union movement in South Africa had had some impact. He observed that members of the Black trade union movement in South Africa were themselves primarily responsible for the phenomenal growth that had occurred in their movement. It was also through their own effort and organisation that their movement was making its mark on history as the most important and strongest force fighting the apartheid system and struggling for a democratic society in South Africa. He however underlined the importance of the support provided by the unions outside South Africa and the need for outside pressure on the racist Government. He indicated that the Nordic unions and the ICFTU provided support to both COSATU and NACTU as well as to the other independent trade unions. He was happy to note that COSATU and NACTU had met on 1 June 1988 and had agreed on undertaking common solidarity actions on 6, 7 and 8 June against the new labour Bill and the collusion between the employers and the Government of South Africa. He was of the opinion that the efforts being made to destroy the trade union movement in South Africa would lead directly to violence, strife and even civil war and would make the prospects for peace very bleak. He indicated that those who had supported the formation and the growth of the Black union movement inside South Africa were committed not only to continuing their support but also to extracting and enhancing, from companies, employers and governments, especially in industrialised countries, support for the Black workers and their unions and resistance of the apartheid system. He attributed his unions' support of the unions in South Africa not only to moral and idealistic reasons but also to the fact that the future of the union movement in South Africa would reflect the future of the union movement in Africa, and the possible evolution of the trade union movement in the developing world in general as well as in the world at large. Furthermore, he perceived that in general the relationship between Whites and Blacks and indeed Africa and Europe was at stake. He was of the view that the current unsatisfactory situation of the unions in South Africa could explode at any time. The unions could not accept the Government's new labour Bill nor the views of the employers. They were bound to fight back. He stressed that in such a situation, the unions should not fight alone. In this context, what the Committee on Apartheid recommended to the International Labour Conference and what the latter also recommended to the world should be of considerable importance. He reaffirmed the unions' support to the union movement in South Africa and urged the Employers' group in the ILO to put pressure on their counterparts in South Africa to support democracy in that country which would guarantee them business in future. He called on governments to examine the situation closely and to adopt sanctions and other measures against the Pretoria regime. With respect to future developments in South Africa, he was of the view that the division between Whites and Blacks would deepen. He therefore urged governments, especially of the United Kingdom, the Federal Republic of Germany, Japan, the South-East Asian countries and to some extent Italy and France, to act immediately to avoid further deterioration in the situation. He recognised that some governments had made an effort in this direction and gave, as examples, the American legislators and the governments of the Nordic countries. With respect of the EEC's action against South Africa, he appealed to the Governments of the United Kingdom and the Federal Republic of Germany to adopt a more progressive attitude. In this context, he reiterated the urgent need not only to emphasise sanctions, but also to set up priorities including the boycott of coal imports from South Africa, the closing of all credit facilities for South Africa and the ban on exports of oil and all materials for energy production in South Africa. He proposed that the Committee should recommend the Plenary of the Conference to take a vote on the ILO's adoption of this approach. He disclosed that some governments claimed that they did not export oil or arms to South Africa while they actually did so. He also drew attention to the fact that while the Governments of the Nordic countries had introduced bans on trading with South Africa, certain countries had been re-exporting Scandinavian goods to South Africa. He urged those countries to refrain from such acts. He also proposed that the Committee should recommend to the Plenary of the Conference to vote on the setting up of a monitoring mechanism by the ILO to monitor and report on the implementation of ILO Recommendations. If the United Nations also set up a monitoring system to oversee member countries' observance of the arms embargo, the ILO and the United Nations would be working hand in hand to exert real pressure on the South African racist Government. He urged the ILO to take a strong stand against the labour Bill in South Africa.

12. The Workers' member of the Islamic Republic of Iran observed that although apartheid was one of the easiest problems of the present era, it was also one of the most difficult. It was one of the easiest problems because it was generally accepted by all as the worst form of tyranny and aggression and it was also condemned by the majority of the world's people; it should therefore be easy to deal with. However, it was a difficult problem since it had become an incurable disease that had created suffering especially for the oppressed people of South Africa. He observed that apartheid and its oppression of workers in South Africa had continued in spite of the numerous speeches that had been made and declarations that had been adopted against the racist apartheid regime. He attributed this to the attitudes adopted by some governments, including the superpowers. The superpowers, with their great military resources, undertook expensive military operations to support their puppet governments, but were unwilling to adopt simple measures geared to solving the protracted problem of apartheid. He informed the Committee that during the Committee's meeting six years ago, one of the Committee's members had disclosed that some of the countries that had been buying oil from the Islamic Republic of Iran had been selling it to South Africa. This issue had been examined by the Iranian authorities who now insisted that all buyers of Iranian oil should submit a guarantee that they will not ship or sell the oil to South Africa. He appealed to other governments to adopt similar steps to contribute towards solving the problem within the shortest possible time. He also urged the Committee to specify concrete measures to be implemented by governments, workers' and employers' organisations which would ensure fruitful completion of the work that had begun at the Tripartite Conference on Action against Apartheid in Harare. He suggested that all ILO member States that continued to co-operate with the racist South African regime should be temporarily suspended from membership.

13. The Workers' member of Mozambique said that his Government and the workers of Mozambique had at every opportunity manifested their opposition to apartheid and their concern about the explosive situation in the States affected by the regime, particularly in Angola and Mozambique. They also supported the decision of the Tripartite Conference on Action against Apartheid held in Harare in May 1988 to update the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa to reflect reality. The inhumane acts committed against Mozambique and Angola by the armed bandits of the apartheid regime were well known and the workers and Government of his country were dismayed by those countries and international organisations that continued to support it. This support constituted a continuous attack on the independence and democracy of the front-line States. Apartheid could not be reformed; it should be dismantled once and for all and disinvestment should be followed by a policy of investment in the front-line States. The workers of Mozambique endorsed what they had stated at the Harare Conference as shown in paragraph 54 of Provisional Record No. 3 of this International Labour Conference. The workers of Mozambique called upon the Director-General and Members of the ILO to make every effort to support Mozambique financially and materially in line with the Conclusions of the United Nations international conference on emergency assistance to Mozambique. The Committee should adopt the updated Declaration and Programme of Action against Apartheid as drafted in Harare and with the positive, practical action and goodwill of all, acting in the name of humanity, the apartheid regime would be erased from the history of mankind.

14. The Workers' member of France sadly remembered Dulcie September, representative of the ANC in France, who was murdered in Paris last spring. All workers and democratic people in his country, and in particular his organisation, the CGT, had been deeply distressed by this terrible event and had demonstrated their wish to join with organisations and anti-apartheid movements throughout the world in a last tribute. He agreed with the proposals put forward at the conference in Harare and presented in Provisional Record No. 3 concerning the proposed updating and renaming of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid, and trusted that these documents would be unanimously adopted at the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. He deplored the fact that the Government of his country had not seen fit, once again, to send a separate report in reply to the ILO's questionnaire on measures taken against apartheid. He noted that the French Government had not only persisted in maintaining links with South Africa, but also had received Mr. R. F. Botha, the South African Foreign Minister. Moreover, in 1987, 70 French firms continued to trade with South Africa to the extent of several billion francs worth of goods including fuel, steel, textiles, food products, etc., and French banks continued to be among the heaviest investors in South Africa. He also deplored the fact that a delegation of French right-wing and extreme right-wing members of Parliament had felt it necessary several months ago to sit in Pretoria and that on their return the members of this delegation had not hesitated to praise President Botha's courage and clear-sightedness. He hoped that the new French Government would have a different attitude and would declare itself decidedly in favour of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia and that it would apply the Programme of Action without delay.

15. The Government member of the Federal Republic of Germany said that the situation in South Africa became more critical by the hour: anti-apartheid organisations were still banned; the emergency legislation continued in force; there was no real freedom of the press and in February the authorities had silenced a further 17 organisations which opposed apartheid by peaceful means and had deprived COSATU of essential political rights. The situation had its origins in the apartheid regime which used force against all Black people, and segregated them into the so-called "homelands" flouting the basic principles of democracy. Apartheid could not be reformed and the aim of his Government was to seek its peaceful abolition based on the consent of all South Africans. To this end his Government sought to promote dialogue between the groups concerned, but the South African authorities refused to talk with the genuine representatives of the Black majority. His Government had continuing contact with these representatives, particularly those from trade unions and churches, the ANC and the Inkatha Movement. His Government was also prepared to dialogue with representatives of the White Government. But meaningful discussions inside South Africa could only take place when all political prisoners had been freed and when the prohibition of Black organisations – such as the ANC and PAC – had been lifted. As a member of the European Community, his Government attached importance to all positive measures that helped Black workers, such as social improvements carried out by companies from the Federal Republic of Germany operating in South Africa. The proposed South African law to prohibit financial donations from abroad to anti-apartheid organisations would affect the assistance provided by the Federal Republic of Germany to trade unions, churches and other organisations. The South African Government should abandon that policy. The Federal Republic of Germany and the other member States of the European Community did not accept the continued violation of human rights in South Africa. Apartheid extended beyond the frontiers of South Africa and undermined the economic and social development of the front-line States which, in turn, interfered with the prosperity of the whole of southern Africa. The Federal Republic of Germany was committed to the cause of Namibia and, in conjunction with the United States, Canada, France and the United Kingdom, advocated making effective the right of the people of Namibia to self-determination through internationally recognised elections. His Government deeply believed in the protection of human dignity as the sole guarantee of social peace and wished to see a state of affairs where South Africa, freed of apartheid and racial discrimination, could take its place as a respected member of the family of nations.

16. The Workers' member of China described the interest of the 130 million workers of China in developments in southern Africa and their indignation at the worsening situation there. He cited many examples of the apartheid regime's racist and authoritarian policy, including the continued imprisonment and torture of Nelson Mandela and other political prisoners and trade unionists. The South African regime's attempt to extinguish the resistance of the peoples of southern Africa and ignore the condemnation of the international community was in vain. The development of the Black workers' movement in South Africa promoted by COSATU and NACTU and the widespread extensive strike action taken in recent months had provoked the admiration of the workers of China. The workers of China condemned South Africa's colonial rule in Namibia, its use of this country as a military base for the invasion of neighbouring States and the attacks it had carried out against SWAPO and trade union and student organisations, including the arrest of their leaders. They also condemned Pretoria's policy of aggression in other southern African countries, particularly Angola. These activities demonstrated that the authorities in South Africa were at the root of the instability in the region. The SADCC had called for comprehensive and mandatory sanctions against South Africa and had appealed to the international community for aid to help the countries in southern Africa revitalise their economies and to support them in their struggle. The workers and trade unions of China condemned South Africa's racist and aggressive policies both at home and abroad and firmly supported the peoples of Namibia in their struggle for independence. South Africa should accept United Nations Security Council resolution 435. The ILO had made major contributions against apartheid and all its Members should be called upon to implement the declarations and resolutions adopted by the International Labour Conference. The Tripartite Conference on Action against Apartheid held in Harare had been timely and successful and showed the solidarity of Government, Workers' and Employers' members with the peoples of the front-line States. The updating of the Declaration and the Programme of Action against Apartheid would contribute greatly to the struggle against apartheid.

17. The Government member of Norway said that the proposed Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia was of particular significance for the Committee and an important guide for other organisations, but the fact that so few changes had been made indicated that the goals and objectives of the 1964 Declaration and its 1981 updating had not yet been attained. With the help of the military, the police and vigilante groups, the Government of South Africa had increased its repressive measures against the Black majority in that country. This was a sign of weakness and not of strength. The international community should join the Nordic countries in their efforts to bring apartheid to an end by peaceful means. In fact, the Programme of Action stressed the need for economic measures to be taken against South Africa. His delegation agreed with this and also with the need to give economic support to the front-line and neighbouring States to relieve their economic dependence on South Africa. Programmes of economic co-operation were a means of helping these countries. Norway had provided approximately US$180 million in 1987 in addition to US$24 million for humanitarian assistance to the victims of apartheid. Although Norway in no way accepted the policy of apartheid, it was not in a position to sever diplomatic relations with South Africa and, in spite of its law on the economic boycott of South Africa, there was no legal foundation on which the Government could comply with the recommendation requiring contracts to be denied to firms and enterprises having commercial relations with South Africa. He welcomed the emphasis given in the Special Report to Namibia and the importance the ILO attached to providing vocational and management training, and labour administration and workers' education through technical assistance programmes in the region. The ILO's activities complemented Norway's bilateral assistance efforts. There was a need for co-operation between the ILO and other organisations in the United Nations system to make more efficient use of available resources. He felt that more emphasis could have been given in the Special Report to analysing the effect of ILO activities. With regard to the Special Working Group on Banking Facilities in the ILO, the Director-General should continue to seek to diversify the deposit of ILO funds, and effect transactions with banks that did not have links with South Africa.

18. The Employers' member of the Islamic Republic of Iran asked what was meant by "action" in the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia. Did it merely mean refraining from some measures, or did it mean "active participation" in an all-out campaign against the "Devil of the twentieth century": against a threat to all human values and dignity? This "devil" called for "active" rather than "passive" action. Part III of the Programme of Action against the Policy of Apartheid gave passive advice: to refrain from some measures which, though positive, lacked the necessary impetus for "active combat" that South Africa's apartheid regime demanded. He suggested – as a minimal "real action" – that a special international fund be created to help those struggling within South Africa and in the neighbouring States. The Islamic Managers' Association and the Industrial Managers' Association of the Islamic Republic of Iran were prepared to participate in this action. If the ILO had taken similar action against other forms of racial discrimination in the world, or at least verbally condemned them, the history of brutality against humanity might have been different.

19. The Government member of China commented on the ruthlessness of the action taken by the South African Government against the Black peoples in South Africa, Namibia and in the neighbouring countries. The Chinese Government supported the struggle of the peoples of South Africa and the front-line States for racial equality and basic rights and for independence and sovereignty and their right to regional peace and stability. It had always been the policy of the Chinese Government to strengthen solidarity and co-operation with African countries and to support the just struggle of the African people. The actions undertaken by the South African regime for many years proved that there was no room for illusions. Practical actions against apartheid were needed and economic sanctions were a powerful weapon; imports of oil should be stopped because without oil there would be no communications within South Africa and the armoured vehicles used for suppression could not run. Since 1973, the OPEC countries had declared an embargo against South Africa, but still South Africa got all the oil it needed. The products of mining, one of the biggest economic activities in South Africa, were mostly exported. If certain countries did not buy these products a fatal blow would be struck against the economy of South Africa. However, the fact that all military, political, trade and other contacts were not cut off was an indication of the measure of support for the crimes of South Africa and provided the regime with the means to continue oppressing its people and aggressing the neighbouring States. The Director-General pointed out in his Special Report that opponents of sanctions maintained that economic progress for Blacks was the key to ending apartheid. Nevertheless, facts showed that in spite of the growth of the economy, Blacks had known relatively little economic advancement over the past 30 years and no significant political change. The economic development programme in the homelands appeared to compound the problem. The policy remained one of controlled Black progress within the confines of the system and not at the expense of that system. The Committee should approve the text of the updated Declaration and its appendix and submit it to the Plenary for approval. The ILO should mobilise the international community and member States to help the front-line States in their struggle against South Africa and honestly implement the various United Nations and ILO resolutions.

20. The Workers' member of Angola congratulated the Director-General on his Special Report which described the situation in South Africa and Namibia. He also congratulated the participants at the Harare Conference on the proposed Declaration which was before the Committee for discussion. Apartheid was destabilising the whole of southern Africa: the front-line States and particularly Angola and Mozambique were its number one target. Since independence 13 years previously, Angola had not known a single day of peace; it had been fighting to defend its freedom and territorial integrity against South African aggression. Angola had paid a very heavy material and human price that amounted to some US$25 billion, over 60,000 dead, and incalculable numbers of disabled, orphaned and homeless. The previous year the South African Government had sent eight battalions, made up of 24,000 men armed with sophisticated weapons, into Angola. However, the aggressor had been defeated in that undeclared war which explained why the South African authorities had been in such a hurry to negotiate with the Angolans in London. The withdrawal of Cuban troops from Angola was the condition set by South Africa for granting independence to Namibia. His Government's position was clear. There must be: withdrawal of South African forces from Angola; implementation of Security Council resolution 435 of 1978; an end to all aggression against Angola; an end to aid to armed bandits trained and equipped by South Africa to attack Angola. Only when these conditions had been filled by South Africa would Cuban troops leave Angola; that was Angola's contribution to the cause of the peoples of southern Africa. Angola would continue to support its brothers in Namibia and South Africa in their struggle for independence and for their basic democratic rights. He called upon delegates to join in the struggle against apartheid and to vote for the application of all sanctions aimed at eliminating it.

21. The Workers' member of the United Kingdom said that the unique evil of apartheid was well known in all its aspects. He therefore wished to concentrate on clarifying and emphasising necessary measures. There was a need to obtain fuller responses from those to whom the ILO addressed requests for information. For example, there was much in the statement from the European Community in the Director-General's report that was positive, but it was not specific enough. The mechanism of the European Community had been used in the past not as an instrument of economic advance but of political concealment. National responses should be obtained with the Community response for those measures taken both at the national and supra-national level. The question referred to on page 99 of the Director-General's Special Report on impediments to trade union action had been included in the Conclusions of the Committee in previous years; yet a response had never been received that faced the problem squarely. The question was to what extent workers were free to support the workers of South Africa. On the answer depended much of the support that could be given. Trade unions were anxious to act, but the legal system in the country concerned and the attitudes of employers in the industrial relations context were relevant in one British union. He had been fighting for years against legal obstacles to maintain an embargo against South Africa without success. This part of the Declaration needed detailed study. The law could prevent trade unions from taking action. This should be considered in the Declaration.

22. The Government member of Senegal noted that paradoxically the 40th Anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights coincided with the 40th anniversary of apartheid. Apartheid represented the total negation of the principles and objectives of the Declaration of Philadelphia since it was based on a belief in the superiority of the White minority over the Black majority. The racist philosophy of apartheid was a crime against humanity, but especially against the Blacks of South Africa and their organisations. Their union leaders were harassed and imprisoned and their trade union organisations – such as COSATU and NACTU – were banned. In defiance of international law and the rules of morality, the apartheid regime had arrogantly and aggressively attacked front-line States and interfered with their economic and social development. Apartheid persisted because it had the support and encouragement of other countries – a fact that his Government deplored. The OAU Declaration on southern Africa, adopted at its 23rd General Conference, and the Tripartite Conference in Harare had declared that the only peaceful means of overcoming this odious regime was through mandatory economic sanctions, a sentiment that Senegal firmly upheld. The suffering of millions of human beings whose dignity was being flouted was the responsibility of the Committee and of the international community.

23. The Observer of the Organisation of African Trade Union Unity (OATUU) said that apartheid was becoming more dangerous and the chance of a peaceful solution was slipping away. The Director-General's Special Report showed the seriousness of the situation and those opposed to economic sanctions could see how hypocritical and untenable was their position. They contributed to the survival of apartheid through the enormous profits derived at the expense of the Black workers of South Africa. The Governments of the United States, the United Kingdom, France, the Federal Republic of Germany, Italy and Japan should support and enforce economic sanctions against apartheid so as to destroy it peacefully. The role of international banking corporations in syndicating loans to the regime was a major reason for its survival. Disinvestment and prohibition of new investments should be enforced by all Government and Employers' members of the ILO. Trade union funds, including pension funds, should be withdrawn from banks which had links with South Africa and the ILO should find an alternative banking arrangement. The aggression by South Africa against the front-line States and the colonisation of Namibia should be condemned by the international community. The OATUU supported the position of the Workers' spokesman on the adoption of the updated Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia. Black trade unions inside South Africa should receive ILO and trade union support. The OATUU was working hard for the unification of COSATU and NACTU and other non-affiliated trade unions inside South Africa to ensure unity of action and the protection of Black workers' rights. Material and economic assistance was needed by the front-line States to rebuild their economies and stop their reliance on South Africa. He fully supported the updated Declaration and appealed to all ILO Members to implement it.

24. The Government member of the German Democratic Republic noted that the Tripartite Conference on Action against Apartheid had prepared the proposed Declaration and the Programme of Action which were now before the Committee. The debate at the Harare Conference had brought forward new evidence of the continuing deterioration of the situation for the Black majority in South Africa and of that in Namibia and the front-line States. His Government strongly approved the new version of the Declaration, particularly the consideration it gave to the occupation of Namibia and South Africa's policy of destabilisation of the front-line States. He hoped that the text would be accepted by the International Labour Conference and that it would unanimously be put into practice. He thanked the Director-General for his Special Report which, for the first time, analysed the situation in Namibia. Chapter I emphasised the complex situation caused by apartheid in southern Africa. However, in the light of recent international agreements, he hoped that even the problems of southern Africa could be solved by political means. He expressed the solidarity of the people of the German Democratic Republic with the trade union movement in South Africa which was working for the improved political, economic and social conditions of Black workers, and with the people of Namibia and the front-line States in their struggle for a solution to the problem. His Government supported the ILO in its commitment against apartheid, contributed actively to implementing decisions taken, and agreed with the view expressed in the Special Report that only concerted and targeted international pressure on the Government of South Africa would bring about a reversal of the policy of apartheid. Compliance with Security Council resolution 435 was the only realistic basis for attaining the independence of Namibia.

25. The Workers' Vice-Chairman drew the Committee's attention to a news agency report which had just been handed to him concerning the success of the stay-away organised by COSATU and NACTU in protest against the South African Government's Labour Relations Amendment Bill and the ban on 17 anti-apartheid organisations. According to COSATU's estimates, up to 3 million workers had stayed away altogether and in Johannesburg alone; the independent Labour Monitoring Group had indicated that over 1 million workers had stayed away.

26. The Government member of Algeria drew attention to the fact that the ILO Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid was being updated at a very significant and symbolic time, since this year marked the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. He recognised that the Tripartite Conference in Harare had facilitated the work of the Committee. There was consensus among all the delegates at the Conference to undertake decisive action to enable the victims of apartheid, the Black independent trade unions and the liberation movement to benefit from justice and freedom. The Committee was receiving respect today which was largely merited because it was strengthening the cause of the Black workers in South Africa and boosting their hope for justice and liberty and also contributing to the success of their legitimate fight against apartheid. He referred to the items on the agenda of the Committee's work, stressing that they related to the full range of the violation of the Black workers' rights. For example, there was reference to the illegal occupation of Namibia and several violations of human rights in South Africa. Numerous efforts were being undertaken so that freedom, justice and peace would triumph in South Africa. He recalled the decision of the non-aligned countries to establish the AFRICA Fund with the twofold objective of applying comprehensive and mandatory sanctions against the South African regime and assisting the front-line States to cope with the possible impact of such sanctions on their economies. He indicated that South Africa had not heeded the calls of the international community and the Black workers were still hoping for the achievement of their fundamental human rights. He recalled that despite the fact that South Africa's mandate over Namibia was revoked in 1966, it continued to occupy the country even though this occupation had been declared illegal by the International Court of Justice. In maintaining support for the fundamental principles of the Declaration of Philadelphia concerning the equality of human beings, it should be stressed that the ILO had always expressed its disapproval of the lack of attainment of human rights by the Black workers in South Africa. However, none of these numerous calls had influenced the tenets of apartheid. Nor had a new attempt been made to redesign a new system. The pillage of Namibia's natural resources, repeated military aggression and destabilisation of the front-line States continued. Support for the victims of apartheid should be closely linked to support for the just struggle of the people of Namibia for their independence. The attack on the apartheid racist regime which had institutionalised the disgraceful system of separate development for the different races should be intensified. There was no doubt that apartheid sowed its own seeds of destruction and that the changing of the system was inevitable. While waiting for this to occur, it was essential for the tripartite members individually and collectively to increase pressure on the regime, including the imposition of comprehensive and mandatory sanctions to force the South African Government to accept the international community's appeals. He drew attention to the fact that Nelson Mandela represented a symbol in the just struggle towards which the Committee should direct itself more forcefully to show more clearly its determination and conviction in the fight against the racist Pretoria regime.

27. The Workers' Vice-Chairman requested the ILO Secretariat to indicate the source of its statement (on page 85 of English and page 94 of the French versions) of the Special Report that "subsequent attempts have been made to form trade unions, one reputed to have been with the assistance of certain Western trade union movements...". In response, the representative of the Secretary-General informed the Committee that the source was The Namibian which was a weekly newspaper published in Windhoek. He also referred to the slight difference between the English and French texts of the Special Report on this issue and apologised for it. Both the Workers' Vice-Chairman and the Workers' representative of the United Kingdom expressed dissatisfaction with the specific word "reputed" which was used in the statement referred to in the Special Report and expressed doubts about the justification for including this matter on the basis of such inadequate evidence. It was agreed that the Secretariat would change the word "reputed" to "reported".

28. The Employers' member of Namibia recalled that it was only a few years ago that the Namibians and comrades in Zimbabwe had shared the same platforms as members of national liberation movements of their respective countries. While the Zimbabweans had achieved independence, the Namibians continued to be slaves of the apartheid South African regime. Zimbabwe had proved beyond doubt that, given the opportunity, they could manage their own affairs better than the colonial rulers. He informed the Committee about developments in Namibia during the past year. The atrocities he had mentioned at the Committee's meeting last year had not only continued but had worsened. Various forms of torture and harassment of innocent civilians had intensified; people's teeth were forcefully extracted; they were suffocated; there were arrests and disappearances of individuals; schools were destroyed, churches were vandalised and clergymen subjected to brutal treatment; villages and businesses suspected of being sympathetic to freedom fighters were destroyed; and women, including the young, were raped. The imposition of martial law and a curfew over a greater part of Namibia had compounded the situation. For example, people were shot dead under the pretext that they had broken the curfew. He reiterated the belief of the people of Namibia in sanctions and called for comprehensive and mandatory sanctions against the racist South African regime. They were clearly aware of the implications of their demand – that it would hurt them as well as the racist regime – but were prepared to make such a sacrifice. There would, for example, be loss of jobs and various forms of hardship. They were also aware that there was no easy way to freedom and independence. They were prepared to suffer a little more in order to achieve lasting peace, justice, freedom, independence and prosperity. Sanctions were about the only remaining peaceful means to bring about change. Those against them were willingly or unwillingly opting for violence. He drew the Committee's attention to the fact that 60 per cent of the profits of the multinational companies operating in Namibia was repatriated out of the country before tax and the remaining 40 per cent served as company expenses. Thus, there was little reinvestment of the profits of the multinationals in Namibia to benefit the local population. The multinationals also exploited the Namibian workers' cheap labour and, therefore, were able to reap huge profits. They harassed and dismissed their Black workers, especially trade union members. These companies had thus adopted an anti-trade union approach. The royalties paid by the multinationals to the South African colonial regime helped to finance the administration and its military activities and thus contributed to the maintenance of the status quo. The foreign companies were therefore viewed by the Namibian people as sabotaging their independence and as accomplices of the racist regime. Discriminatory laws were rampant in Namibia. An example was the Group Areas Act which had to be recognised by the multinational companies. He stressed that Namibia would need foreign investments, and foreign companies to operate there after its independence. This would, however, be done through arrangements between the legitimate independent sovereign State of Namibia and the companies concerned. Regarding the Director-General's Special Report, he expressed his satisfaction with its coverage of Namibia and hoped that there would be a full separate chapter on Namibia in the near future. He expressed support for the draft Declaration and the Programme of Action.

29. The Observer of the Palestine Liberation Organisation (PLO) expressed satisfaction with the Special Report and the draft Declaration that emerged from the Tripartite Conference in Harare. He deplored the fact that every year the Committee met but no concrete results had been achieved. The draft Declaration and the Programme of Action prepared in Harare constituted moral weapons that could be used to force the apartheid regime to heed the voice of the international community. He pointed to the delaying tactics adopted by some groups. He indicated that if the Declaration and the Programme of Action were considered as valuable, every effort should be made to implement their recommendations, especially those relating to sanctions. He appealed to the ILO to allocate sufficient funds to the anti-apartheid programme, and stressed that the PLO, which itself was a liberation movement, was prepared to share its resources to support the liberation movements in South Africa. He observed similarity between the struggle the PLO had launched since 1965 and that of the Black majority in South Africa and Namibia. He praised the Special Report for its survey of recent developments in labour and social matters in South Africa and Namibia and its analysis of the replies provided by tripartite members. However, he observed that some of the measures adopted by the tripartite members were not up to the level expected, and noted that only the Government of the United Kingdom was mentioned in the Special Report as being opposed to sanctions. Another area of concern related to the collaboration between some States and South Africa in the nuclear field. He disclosed that several of the countries which made speeches against the apartheid regime also supported it. The Declaration clearly showed that apartheid was the source of the industrial disputes in South Africa and Namibia and it also emphasised that support should be extended to the front-line States.

30. The Employers' member of the United Kingdom provided some information concerning the attitude of British business to the policy of apartheid. They were totally opposed to apartheid which was referred to as a system that institutionalised and enshrined discrimination on the grounds of race. They believed that hopes for a prosperous South African economy in the future depended on the increasing prosperity of its Black people who were currently denied education, skills training and advancement, which were essential for this prosperity to be achieved and maintained. British enterprises were convinced that by staying in South Africa they could maintain the process of improving the working conditions, education and skills of Black workers, and felt that they would be abandoning this responsibility to their employees by leaving South Africa. He referred to the statement made recently by the President of the British Industry Committee on South Africa to the effect that by staying in South Africa, which required determination, patience and understanding, British industry would be making the only effective contribution foreigners could make towards the peaceful solution of the South African problem. He also emphasised that British business remained opposed to the imposition of mandatory economic sanctions since it believed that this would endanger the economy upon which the future of all South Africa's people depended. He explained that those who advocated sanctions intended their target to be not the country of South Africa as a whole but its White ruling hierarchy. However, experience had shown that the actual impact of sanctions on White South Africans was minimal as the Whites had the political power to deflect the cost of sanctions to others. Furthermore, sanctions had a counterproductive effect on the thinking of the Government of South Africa. The imposition of mandatory economic sanctions would also slow down the growth of the economy. The job losses, which would follow, would be concentrated amongst the Blacks who constituted the majority of the workforce. The burden would fall most heavily upon the unskilled. The decline in the South African economy would further have harmful effects on a number of its neighbouring States through reduction of markets and the need for migrant workers. Sanctions would therefore be an impediment. They would more likely intensify violence than facilitate negotiation. The South African Government's heavy-handed actions within and beyond its frontiers would increase and their determination to resist change would be strengthened. He reiterated the point that labour power was the greatest non-violent weapon at the disposal of Black South Africans and its strength depended on an increasingly better educated and better skilled participation. The South African economy alone could produce the wealth that was needed to ensure improved employment and social opportunities for all its peoples. He referred to the statement made by the President of the South Africa Black Taxi Association (SABTA) to the United States Congress regarding sanctions, which expressed belief in progress being achieved through the creation of jobs and wealth. This would bring about a political influence that could not be resisted by any government. He ended by stating that with the reservations he had expressed on sanctions, British industry could support the draft updated Declaration and the Programme of Action that had emerged from the Conference in Harare.

31. The Observer of the African National Congress of South Africa (ANC) stressed that the South African regime was an illegal structure which had been imposed upon the people of the land and kept in power by force. He emphasised that the regime enjoyed the protection of Western powers who were not ashamed to veto peaceful action that could be imposed on this Government by the Security Council. They included governments who proclaimed their adherence to the principle of human rights. He drew attention to the regime's aggression against the independent front-line African States and its killing and kidnapping of ANC members. The prisons in South Africa overflowed with people, including children, who had been arrested by the sadistic regime. Ten thousand people were reported to have been imprisoned without trial. He referred to the death and destruction caused by the security forces in the Black townships. South Africa was a leading practitioner and advocate of capital punishment. Those who controlled finance were also allies of the Pretoria regime. He indicated that it was the money which this Government was able to mobilise from outside which financed its various forms of aggression and evil deeds. He was of the view that no decent statesman and international organisation should associate himself/itself with a bank which maintained strong support for a regime which carried out such oppression against the majority of its people. He also spelt out the significant role which employers had been playing. The employers always called in the army when the workers went on strike, and threatened to sue the unions. He therefore appealed to the employers in the Committee to do their utmost to assist the oppressed workers of South Africa to avoid being targeted by the Blacks as part and parcel of the oppressive machinery to be destroyed later. He drew the Committee's attention to several of the implications of the Labour Relations Amendment Bill, which he perceived as one further attempt by the racist regime to eliminate the trade unions. The regime had an anti-working class mentality. In this context, he reminded the Committee about the many atrocities the regime had committed against Black workers in that country. He observed that this Bill would entrench that situation. It would completely weaken the trade union movement and prevent it from exercising its role as a legal instrument which championed the rights of workers and constituted a component of the struggle against exploitation. The Bill wanted workers to accept low wages and poor working conditions without the rights of bargaining properly. It would thus enable employers to continue with the exploitation of workers. Politically, the Bill sought to confine the trade unions to only shopfloor matters and to end their involvement in the mass democratic movements. He spelt out the various demands on the Black workers' very limited wages and the diverse constraints suffered by them. He was of the view that it would be naive to expect the Black worker in South Africa not to be politicised so that he could express his dissatisfaction with the oppression suffered by him at the workplace and at home. The Bill would also ban sympathy and secondary strikes which would prevent the workers from acting collectively to force the employers to concede to their demands. It would also limit primary strikes as the Bill only recognised strikes by workers who were "directly involved" in the issue concerned. Male workers would therefore be prohibited from striking over the issue of maternity benefits since not being females they would not be directly affected by it. The Bill would thus undermine the basic principle of trade unionism relating to collective action. The Bill's stipulation that workers could not strike on the same issue over a period of 15 months would not only prohibit intermittent strikes but would also render workers open to unfair dismissals and retrenchments in addition to the lower wages, so that they would be at the mercy of their bosses and the Government.

The Bill would also undermine grievance, dispute and retrenchment procedures which were operational in many factories. Workers would be dismissed and retrenched with impunity. It would thus encroach on industrial relations in the country. The complicated and unworkable procedures that workers would be required to go through before undertaking a legal strike would make such a strike almost impossible. For example, the manpower department would have to be notified within 21 days of the start of a dispute and this requirement conflicted with the stipulations of the agreements already entered into by the unions with employers. The new law would empower the inspector to extend the required period at the request of the employers for any length of time to prevent a strike. Even if the workers eventually embarked on strike action, the employers would be at liberty to go court to interdict the unions and to stop the action. After strike action, the employers would have the right to re-employ only selectively instead of unconditionally reinstating all affected workers in terms of the concession fought for and won by the workers in the past. The Bill would also empower the employers to sue and confiscate the property of a union, whose members went on strike, to compensate for production loss. He indicated that under the tutelage of SACTU, South African workers had learnt to use their militancy to compel employers to make certain concessions. The unions had also used the Industrial Courts and had scored many victories there. The new Bill would emasculate the Industrial Courts and establish new courts called the Special Labour Courts to review decisions of the Industrial Courts. The process of appeals would be laden with considerable bureaucracy and would be long drawn out as workers would be expected to wait for three years for the outcome of an appeal. He explained that one of the principles on which COSATU was founded was the formation of broad-based industrial unions which brought together all the unions organised in one industry for purposes of effectiveness and collective action. The Bill would, however, deny a trade union, which had a strongly organised presence, the right to negotiate on behalf of the workers at the workplace. It would therefore encourage splinter unions to mushroom since the Bill provided recognition of minority unions. Unions which consistently demanded rights for their members would be perceived to be engaging in unfair labour practices. The Bill sought to do away with the requirement in the past that a union had to prove its support in the form of having sufficient representativeness in the industry where it sought admission. He observed that since the Bill was being introduced in the wake of the disintegration of TUCSA, it could be seen as an open protection for Whites-only racial trade unions which had previously enjoyed the absolute monopoly of negotiating with employers. It would also stop the current increasing realisation by some White workers that their lot lay with their Black working class colleagues and that they should support non-racial unions. He therefore foresaw the emergence of racial unions representing not only the Whites but also the Coloured and Indian workers. He stressed that this attempt to frustrate the unification of the working class should be stopped at all costs. He disclosed that COSATU had tried to organise a meeting with the employers to discuss the implications of the Bill and the employers had failed to recognise its unfavourable effects and had therefore refused to reject it. He informed the Committee about other measures adopted by some of COSATU's affiliates. For example, PPWAWU had produced anti-Bill stickers which members wore on their overalls and pasted on factory walls. COSATU had resolved that all these affiliates should adopt the PPWAWU campaign. More militant action awaited the employers. He appealed for solidarity in stopping the passage of the new Bill into law and indicated that the ANC had also called upon South Africans and their workers to oppose the Bill.

32. The Workers' member of the USSR also confirmed that the situation in South Africa was worsening and becoming more complicated and that it was a serious threat to international security. Urgent action was, therefore, required to eradicate the apartheid system as clearly indicated in the Special Report. He was of the view that information was needed on the effects of the various recommendations on South Africa. He drew attention to South Africa's destabilisation attempts against the front-line States, and stated his support for the recent mass strike by the Black workers. Stressing that the ILO had a great role to play within the international community's overall action to end apartheid, he expressed satisfaction with the outcome of the Conference in Harare and indicated that it could serve as a solid basis for the creation of a healthy situation in South Africa. The few Employers' and Government delegates who were against the adoption of the draft Declaration and Programme of Action represented some of the chief supporters of the apartheid regime. He urged the Committee to recognise the grave situation in South Africa and to adopt the Declaration and to put it into effect. He reiterated that the victims of apartheid and the front-line States were all willing to make sacrifices and therefore there was no reason for not adopting sanctions. He called upon the ILO to ensure the strict implementation of the Declaration and stressed that the Special Report should in future provide an objective account of the progress made by the ILO towards this implementation. Finally, he urged member States of the European Community to provide individual replies in this same way as the other ILO member States.

33. The Government member of Ghana congratulated the Director-General for his Special Report which highlighted the evil of apartheid. The Government of South Africa concentrated on silencing all Black opposition and failed to seek realistic solutions to socio-political problems, namely by allowing majority rule: one man one vote. Repressive powers remained entrenched as evidenced by the treatment of Mr. Govan Mbeki after his release from Robben Island after 23 years. The stability of neighbouring countries had been undermined and the grave economic and social problems of the region had been aggravated. Only international pressure on the South African Government's areas of vulnerability could reverse apartheid by peaceful means. However, opponents of mandatory and comprehensive sanctions maintained that the economic progress of Blacks through growth in the economy was the key to ending apartheid, in spite of the fact that economic progress had brought them very little economic or political advancement in 30 years. The economic development of the homelands had only increased opportunities for the exploitation of cheap labour and had enhanced the profits of the Government. Gains in employment had been to the advantage of White society and had not enhanced the well-being of the majority of Blacks. The Government's policy was to control Black progress within the system and not at its expense. Organisations like the UDF and COSATU had been restricted in their activities; the Government had maintained a policy that destabilised the front-line States; and the occupation and plunder of Namibia continued in violation of United Nations resolutions and the United Nations Decree on the Protection of the Natural Resources of Namibia. The proposed amendments to the Labour Relations Act in South Africa would make the situation even more serious. The international community should intensify its efforts; the role of the United Nations should be strengthened; and comprehensive and mandatory sanctions should be immediately implemented. Decisions and resolutions of the ILO, the OAU and other organisations should be fully implemented and embargos upheld on arms dealing and co-operation in the production and development of nuclear and other weapons. There was increasing international willingness to isolate South Africa, and Ghana paid tribute to those countries that had sought a united solution to end apartheid. It was disheartening, however, that 31 countries still maintained trade links with South Africa and that all leading industrialised nations had economic relations with that country. His Government was concerned about the ambivalence of those that offered relief to migrant apartheid victims while maintaining a policy of support to that regime. Apartheid was the Nazism of today; any advantages obtained were soiled with the blood of South African workers. The ILO should urge the international community to act.

34. The Government member of the United States endorsed the request the Chairman had made earlier to the effect that the Conference should send an effective message to the South African Government that the governments, workers and employers of the world condemned apartheid. The injustice of apartheid was the root cause of the economic misery and instability in southern Africa. The United States rejected the theory and practice of racial domination and repression by which it was enforced. Helping to find an end to apartheid and assisting South Africans of all races who were working to create a non-racial democratic society in South Africa were fundamental objectives of United States foreign policy, which were briefly: a constitutional order establishing equal political, economic and social rights for all South Africans; a democratic electoral system with multi-party participation and universal adult franchise; effective constitutional guarantees of basic human rights for all South Africans as provided for in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights; the rule of law safeguarded by an independent judiciary with the power to enforce rights guaranteed by the Constitution to all South Africans; a constitutional allocation of powers between a national government and its constituent regional and local jurisdictions; an economic system that guaranteed economic freedom, allocated government social and economic services fairly and enabled all South Africans to realise the fruits of their labour, acquire and own property and attain a decent standard of living. All Americans sought a South Africa based on these universal principles of freedom, justice and equality. In the United States and in the Committee, debate had never been over ends but over the means by which apartheid would be eliminated. Although apartheid repelled and angered his Government, they did not believe it could be defeated by punitive economic sanctions or by isolating South Africa from the outside world. There was no evidence that economic hardship, which would be primarily borne by Blacks, would induce the rulers of South Africa to see the error of their ways and relinquish power; rather it would strengthen the forces of reaction and unleash whatever violence those forces deemed necessary to maintain control. That was where his Government dissented – and chose respectfully to exercise the right to dissent – from what was apparently the consensus in the Committee in favour of mandatory sanctions. First, it was not within the mandate of the ILO to call for such mandatory sanctions. In addition to its training and assistance programmes, there were other measures within the competence of the ILO which it could effectively take against apartheid and which it had so far refrained from doing; he had referred to them last year. There were some healthy signs that this might be changing. Secondly, there were grave doubts that sanctions would have a salutary effect on South Africa's policies even if they could be effectively implemented on a worldwide basis, which was doubtful. There had been a debate in the United States which had led to the Comprehensive Anti-Apartheid Act of 1986 which, although opposed by the executive branch, was now the law of the land which the Executive was duty bound to implement. The Act had been characterised by the General Accounting Office of the United States Congress as containing the most comprehensive sanctions among major industrialised countries. The proponents of the Act had hoped to achieve the rapid dismantling of apartheid. Unfortunately, their expectations had not been realised and, as a direct consequence of the Act, the South African Government had retreated further, isolating itself from world opinion. One result had been, in the intervening months, such things as a lessening of responsiveness to queries on human rights, disinvestment by United States firms and a cut of 50 per cent of United States firms in South Africa, which had slowed the progress of positive change in areas such as workplace conditions, career opportunities and health, housing and education projects. In many cases the social responsibility programmes initiated by United States firms based on principles required by law had been cut back or eliminated by the Afrikaner owners that took over these firms. The political situation in South Africa had continued to deteriorate since the last International Labour Conference in a reaction to international pressures and in response to the forces to the right in the White political spectrum. In the last few months the South African Government had carried out a series of actions and passed legislation that had already been referred to, including the banning of the 17 black opposition groups, amongst which were the UDF and COSATU, the introduction of new labour legislation, and so forth. But the backward, deteriorating movement in South Africa had led to a new call for even tougher sanctions in the United States Congress. The House of Representatives was expected to pass a Bill by the end of this month. However, apartheid would be defeated only when its victims gained the economic and political power to liberate themselves. The few positive changes that had occurred in South Africa in recent years, such as the abolition of the pass laws and job reservation, had come about largely when Blacks had attained enough economic power to make such discriminatory laws unenforceable. More Black economic power meant more power to break down the structure of apartheid. Indiscriminate sanctions meant less Black economic power. Carefully charted sanctions had played a role in bringing home to supporters of the South African status quo the cost to be borne by them from being isolated from the civilised world. But just as important were positive measures designed to advance black economic power, to strengthen apartheid's victims to wage a legal and moral struggle for a solution and to encourage and facilitate dialogue between South Africans of all races who were courageous enough to throw off the shackles of fear and mistrust that were the chief underpinnings of apartheid. Such measures were at the heart of his Government's policy for combating apartheid and, even as they continued to press the South African regime to abandon the path of racial dominance and repression, they would pursue every opportunity to assist Black South Africans to acquire the means for their own peaceful liberation. An opportunity now presented itself to the ILO to use its supervisory machinery in response to a complaint lodged against the Government of South Africa by Black trade unions. He endorsed any action by the ILO in this matter. He noted that hopeful progress was being made towards the solution of southern Africa's most severe and long-standing regional conflict. Thanks to serious negotiations now under way between South Africa, Angola and Cuba, which the United States was mediating, there was now a realistic opportunity to rid the region of foreign military forces, to secure Namibian independence and to achieve peace and stability in Angola. He believed that both Angola and South Africa had an objective interest in seeking a diplomatic alternative to the military confrontation that had persisted in the region for more than 13 years. A limited window of opportunity existed and the United States was seeking to capitalise on it. The recent London Conference was an important step in the right direction. All delegations had repeatedly underscored their desire to contribute to an early settlement and the South African Government unequivocally restated its commitment to United Nations Security Council resolution 435. It was vital that this momentum should not be lost, and he urged that a follow-up round should take place as soon as possible. It was equally important that all parties exercised military restraint as the negotiations unfolded. Attempts by any side to gain a temporary military advantage could undermine the promising diplomatic initiatives that were now under way. He called on African States to lend moral and diplomatic support to this effort to bring Namibia to independence and to remove foreign troops from the south-western African region.

35. The Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic, after sending greetings from the people of his country to those of Zimbabwe and other frontline States, stated that the least that could be said about apartheid in South Africa and Namibia was that it was inhuman and contrary to reason and logic. It was the product of imperialism and settler colonialism which had also been experienced in Asia and the new world. If good and evil were forces in the human experience, those who believed in apartheid constituted the evil part of mankind. His country had no diplomatic, economic, political or cultural relations with South Africa and did not even allow nationals of South Africa to come into the country since the South African regime was looked upon in the same light as the Zionist regime. When discussing ways of dealing with apartheid, those suffering also from racial discrimination in the new world and in the occupied Arab territories should not be forgotten. The Conference should not only listen to speeches and excuses, but should elaborate practical solutions to put an end to apartheid and other such regimes. The peoples of South Africa and Namibia had borne great suffering at the hands of the Pretoria regime and those supporting it economically, militarily and in the nuclear field, and at the hands of those transnational companies which were reaping profits from the blood and sweat of South African workers. Syrians found it hard to accept that people existed who believed and practised apartheid in this age of science and the exploration of space. The Conference had condemned the policy of apartheid many years ago. But it was still alive. Governments, employers and trade unionists should fight it with all the means at their disposal. They should impose mandatory sanctions. The United Nations Charter and the Covenants on Human Rights had been signed by all their countries and were binding both at home and abroad. Some of those States which were looking for excuses had already imposed sanctions in an aggressive manner against other countries in the world. He proposed imposing economic, cultural, banking, military, communications and transport boycotts against South Africa and asked representatives of governments, workers and employers to make commitments in this direction.

36. The Government member of Indonesia stated that the situation in southern Africa was becoming increasingly critical and that the root cause was the racism and racial discrimination embodied in the system of apartheid. His Government condemned the South African regime for its policy of apartheid and was convinced that it could only be ended through mandatory sanctions and intensified international efforts to assist the non-White workers of South Africa. He appealed to members to increase pressure on South Africa. Working with various international bodies, his Government had played an active and positive role to achieve this end and endorsed and supported the results of the Tripartite Conference on Action against Apartheid and the Programme of Action should be translated into deeds. Indonesia would never establish diplomatic relations with South Africa as long as apartheid was maintained; it had issued legislation banning all relations with South Africa; visas were not issued to nationals wishing to visit that country nor to people who held travel documents issued by South Africa. Indonesia did not take part in any activity or event in which South Africa was participating.

37. The Workers' member of Namibia said that the ILO had shown its commitment to assisting the victims of apartheid by its concrete help in training South Africans and Namibians to prepare for a democratic future in their countries. Apartheid was incompatible with the principles of the ILO and each year the Special Reports provided detailed information about the violation of the basic rights of workers. In Namibia, wages for Whites were 18 times higher than those for Blacks. Most Blacks lived below the minimum subsistence level and the people in the Bantustans and rural areas faced grinding poverty. South African and transnational companies, white farmers, businessmen and professionals depended on the exploitation and control of Black labour through segregation, discrimination and particularly the sometimes violent suppression of workers' political and trade union rights. Last year the authorities had launched a series of attacks against the property, officials and members of unions affiliated to NUNW. Many were arrested, others were injured, one person died and much damage was done. SWAPO leaders and NUNW officials (John Pandeni, General Secretary of NAFU, Anton Lubowski, Treasurer of NUNW, Ben Ulenga, General Secretary of MUN, and Henrik Witbooi, Dan Tjongarero and Nico Bessinger of SWAPO and others) were detained. Jason Angula, SWAPO Secretary for Labour, was still in detention. The workers of Namibia strongly supported the updated Declaration and urged the ILO to reaffirm its condemnation of apartheid, recommend the adoption of mandatory sanctions against South Africa, encompass the principle of armed struggle in South Africa and Namibia and establish the periodical holding of a tripartite conference in a front-line State to be closer to the reality and provide moral and political support to the South African and Namibian peoples.

38. The observer of the Pan Africanist Congress of Azania (PAC) congratulated the Chairman and recalled that Zimbabwe had experienced racism, injustice and colonialism which had been defeated, although South Africa's proximity made Zimbabwe a target of racist aggression. The Director-General's Report demonstrated the ILO's commitment to the application of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa. It was important to continue exposing the injustices in South Africa and to urge its total isolation. His movement had confidence in the resolve and commitment of the ILO and peace-loving people everywhere to work for the eradication of apartheid. The Report showed that there had been no amelioration of political and social conditions and that Black unions were prosecuted and suppressed through legislation such as the proposed Labour Relations Amendment Act. The Pretoria regime was pandering to right wing demands when it took action against 17 community organisations and restricted COSATU's activities. White workers were increasingly averse to the relaxation of discriminatory labour laws. Investors in South Africa had noted the disparities in education and experience between Blacks and Whites. The peace-loving people of the world had come to the assistance of the victims of apartheid, but this assistance was now also threatened by a newly introduced Bill. The situation in South Africa had been well covered in the Special Report and highlighted by numerous speakers; everyone agreed on the illegality of apartheid. But how did the protagonists of dialogue with the regime reconcile their profits with the suffering and killings inflicted on the African population, without this implying that they had a common purpose with apartheid? The PAC urged the Committee to translate the updated version of the Declaration into heightened and sharpened action against the regime.

prehensive system of international peace and security. The ILO had a role to play in finding a solution. The Organisation had acquired considerable experience and the Declaration and Programme of Action, which she wholly supported, were an important basis for future action, but a monitoring system should be set up. She expressed the conviction that concrete results would not be obtained without renewed concerted efforts by the whole international community and without an end to economic, political and military links with the racist regime of South Africa. Such links had frustrated the efforts of the Security Council to try to apply comprehensive and mandatory sanctions in accordance with Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter. If the arms embargo was strictly observed, if there was systematic implementation of the United Nations and OAU Resolutions for the independence of Namibia and strong condemnation of the South African Government's aggression against the front-line States, if the patriotic forces in South Africa and Namibia led by the ANC and SWAPO were supported, apartheid would soon disappear and our efforts would not have been in vain. These noble objectives gave us optimism. The situation, however, continued to aggravate and there were no prospects for optimism. The recent ban on the political activities of some popular democratic organisations, including the UDF and COSATU, was only one of the numerous examples.

40. The Workers' member of the United Republic of Tanzania stated that although the Director-General's Special Report might have some shortcomings it provided a good basis for deliberation. The recommendations of the Tripartite Conference on Action against Apartheid held in Harare would also facilitate the work of the Committee. The sons and daughters of South Africa and Namibia continued to suffer and die for the crime of demanding their legitimate right to be free in their own land. Apartheid was spilling over into Mozambique, Angola, Botswana, Zimbabwe and other front-line States. Their economies were being strangled. Would the peoples of Africa be able to maintain a spirit of "suffering without bitterness"? Was there not a danger of a culture of hatred evolving? The peoples of Africa had participated in the fight against Nazism. Today, 43 years after that war had ended, Hitler's henchmen were still hunted as the world found it difficult to forget the evil that had occurred. Twenty-four years ago the International Labour Conference had adopted the Declaration condemning apartheid that was now being considered for a second updating. The statements made today were essentially the same as those made 24 years ago and yet apartheid was still very much alive and even more serious than it was then, when it had not yet extended to the neighbouring States. And the talk continued. There was a need to take stock of what had been achieved so far by the Declaration and what was constraining it, so that the constraint could be cleared. The major constraint, he felt, was dishonesty: the paying of lip service to the Declaration. If all who had voted for the Declaration had stood by their obligation to implement it, the situation would be different. ILO's monitoring system should require States to provide individual replies. The European Community, for example, was not a member of the ILO; however, its members were and they should answer. The questionnaire should show what actions employers, workers and governments failed to do anything about. The report should reveal not only what was done against apartheid, but also what was done to support apartheid. He commended COSATU and all South African workers for their determination; the international community was supporting people who were prepared to support themselves.

41. The Government member of Zimbabwe thanked the Director-General for his Special Report. He pointed out that his country was on the front line of South African regional destabilisation: a result of Pretoria's policy to undermine the development of the States in the region and frustrate their efforts in support of the liberation movements. Zimbabwe was in the unenviable position of having South Africa for a neighbour. It was also landlocked, its only outlet to the sea being through Mozambique where marauding South African-sponsored RENAMO bandits made access difficult. His country, therefore, was at the mercy of Pretoria for the export and import of goods and needed the support of friendly nations to improve its position. However, Zimbabwe did not shrink from promoting the cause of the South African people as witnessed by the holding in Harare of the Tripartite Conference on Action against Apartheid where proposals were made for the updating of the Declaration concerning Apartheid in South Africa. It was also host to the Africa Rehabilitation Institute and the African Regional Labour Centre which, as part of the ILO's programme, provided training to South African and Namibian trade union cadres, among others. He stressed that those countries that resisted implementing the Declaration and the Programme of Action and the other peaceful measures urged by the international community through the United Nations system were giving economic and political support to the Pretoria regime. Those countries – most likely champions of human rights – urged them, in the name of justice, to cease from further support to the South African Government, knowing from experience what the support of the international community had meant when the Zimbabwean people had been dismantling the Smith regime. There were indications that the situation in South Africa was ready to explode. Black workers had heeded a call from their trade unions to boycott work, indicating that emergency regulations and security laws in South Africa no longer deterred those denied their rights. His Government hoped that the International Labour Conference would adopt the updated Declaration and send a clear message to Pretoria to completely dismantle the obnoxious system of apartheid.

42. The Workers' Vice-Chairman referred to the fact that the protest in which more than 3 million South African workers had been involved against the Labour Relations Amendment Bill geared to destroying the independent Black trade union movement had reached its third day. He stressed that already several of the Employers were adopting a policy of no work, no pay, and there had been threats of dismissals, workers had been killed or wounded. He requested the Employers' group to specify their position on the issue. He informed the Committee that the Workers' group had sent a telegram to South African employers to urge them to protect the system of industrial relations already existing in their country and to persuade the Government to abandon the Bill. COSATU had filed a complaint with the ILO, which would be referred to ECOSOC, as was quite right since South Africa was not a member of the ILO, and it showed that the proposed amendments constituted a violation of trade union rights and left no doubt about the true intentions of the South African authorities and the employers. South Africa was not a member of the ILO. The Employers' member of the United Kingdom had claimed that British companies had invested in South Africa to provide benefits for the Black workers and that some organisations were striving to do something about the South African situation. This was contradicted by facts. The Workers' Vice-Chairman referred to a study relating to the EEC Code of Conduct which showed that the wages paid by the majority of the United Kingdom companies to their

Black workers in South Africa were below the stipulated minimum levels. It was, therefore, surprising that the EEC continued to attach great importance to the Code of Conduct. It was significant that the trade unions in the South African metal industry had adopted, in collaboration with the unions in West Germany, a code of conduct for the German companies which was very different from that of the EEC. He referred to an intervention that had been made by the United States Government which had expressed hope in change occurring in the economic power of the Black workers. The Workers' group were of the view that this did not reflect the poverty, malnutrition and unemployment which prevailed in South Africa well before any sanction had been applied. All studies indicated that apartheid was responsible for the plight of Black workers and that it was only through the complete removal of this system that the workers could achieve economic power. The absence of global sanctions had been responsible for the deterioration of the situation in South Africa. The half-measures so far adopted could not convince the South Africa regime about the seriousness of the apartheid action. He informed the Committee that the Workers' group would be suggesting some amendments during the meeting of the Working Party to the Declaration and Programme of Action. He expressed full support for the two documents and hoped that the Governments and the Employers would do the same, in order not to delay the eradication of the apartheid system. He requested serious and concrete response from the Employers' group to the recent events in South Africa and also the identification of specific areas which could constitute targets for specific action. He read out the texts of the conclusions the Workers' group had prepared for discussion in the Working Party and insisted on the need to set up a monitoring mechanism.

43. The Workers' member of Yugoslavia expressed full agreement with the Special Reports, the Programme of Action and the proposals for inclusion in the conclusion of the Committee's report. The racist Pretoria regime was waging an increasingly bitter war against the Black people of South Africa and Namibia and also the front-line States. The acts committed by this regime constituted an affront to the international community and violated the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. It was, therefore, essential to intensify individual and collective efforts against the apartheid system. International action needed to be reinforced and an attempt should be made to increase the application of sanctions and assistance to the Black people of South Africa and Namibia in their struggle, as well as to the front-line States. It was essential to examine with more attention the issue of setting up a mechanism for the more efficient monitoring of the application of the Declaration and the Programme of Action in order to be able to assess the action taken. There was too much indulgence and toleration for those who supported the apartheid regime. It was necessary to examine the channels for public information; the media needed to make more efforts to portray better the situation in South Africa and Namibia and the political and economic boycott of the regime and should also denounce those who were doing nothing against the apartheid system. Some countries had adopted important measures but they had not been sufficiently publicised. The Committee's conclusions should specify the setting-up of a very effective monitoring mechanism and the channels for public information. He reaffirmed the readiness of the unions in Yugoslavia to fully support all the measures relating to the struggle of the South African and Namibian people.

44. The Workers' member of the German Democratic Republic referred to the news about the killing of seven Black workers in South Africa during the current stay-away. He expressed the commitment of the trade unions in the German Democratic Republic to the anti-apartheid struggle, and noted the benefits of the Harare Conference for the current work of the Committee. He endorsed the proposals made by the Workers' Vice-Chairman for inclusion in the conclusions of the Committee, and requested that in future the Special Report should explore further the action of foreign banks in South Africa and Namibia. He observed that the Code of Conduct had not led to any attempt to dismantle apartheid, and regretted that those who were in a position to support the anti-apartheid programme had not done so and continued to avoid sanctions. He stressed that all human beings wanted peace and freedom, and urged the Committee to pay special attention to the human rights issue. He reiterated the fact that the apartheid regime had to be dismantled for human rights to be achieved in South Africa.

45. The Workers' member of Zimbabwe, speaking on behalf of the workers of Zimbabwe and other front-line States, expressed appreciation for the solidarity shown to them in their efforts to replace apartheid with democracy according to the principles of the ILO and the United Nations. He reaffirmed their support for implementing the recommendations of previous meetings on this matter in Geneva, Livingstone, Lusaka and Harare, and recalled addressing a meeting in June 1977 as a result of which he had been permanently banned from South Africa. This had not deterred him, but had reinforced his determination to bring about the liberation of that country as speedily as possible. In supporting the updated Declaration, the people of the front-line States counted on the solidarity and support of countries which had passed legislation in response to the call for comprehensive mandatory sanctions. There had been enough spoken condemnation of the Pretoria regime and its policy of apartheid and the occupation of Namibia. Any further talk should concentrate on the immediate practical implementation of appropriate action by individuals, organisations and governments. Forty years of word-mongering was more than enough. Action should start, even if in a small way; it would grow. So-called peaceful solutions could only lead to a blood-bath. These were the two options. He categorically disagreed with those who were against mandatory economic sanctions and who said that they would hurt the Blacks more than the Whites. The experience of Zimbabwe had shown that, if it had not been for the United Nations mandatory sanctions, the war of liberation would have gone on much longer. He wished it placed on record that the front-line States of Zambia and Zimbabwe among others had, in 1986, decided to apply mandatory economic sanctions against South Africa knowing that they would probably be the victims of counter-sanctions because of their landlocked situation, but the rest of the world had not been on their side and it would have been meaningless. However, the front-line States were still determined to take the appropriate measures, if other nations would support them, and to this end sought to ensure the viability of the Beira Corridor and the participation of Zimbabwean and Tanzanian troops in Mozambique to protect the sea routes. He urged the Committee to adopt unanimously the updated Declaration and its Programme of Action.

46. The Government member of Cuba condemned the shameful crime of apartheid and the racist regime of South Africa which continued to commit the worst violations against human rights. He expressed his solidarity with the front-line States which were the focus of military aggression by the South African Government and its mercenaries, which aimed at destabilising those countries politically, economically and militarily. He supported the proposed Declaration and the Programme of Action prepared at the Harare Conference and expressed his thanks to the Director-General for his Special Report on the Application of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa. To the knowledge of his Government there had been no improvement in the condition of the Black population, especially of the workers, and, as a result of their resistance to the fascist oppression, murder, torture and other cruel and degrading forms of treatment had increased. Tens of thousands of men, women and children continued to protest and the regime was not able to put a stop to the combat, which, with the help of SWAPO and ANC, the African population was waging for its freedom. His country stood by the principles of Security Council resolution No. 435 and would continue to support the Namibian people in their struggle for independence against apartheid.

47. The representative of the United Nations Special Committee against Apartheid stressed that this Committee attached great importance to the work of the ILO Committee on Apartheid and it had also participated at the recent ILO Tripartite Conference on Action against Apartheid in Harare. He observed that the draft updated Declaration which emerged out of this Conference could be an effective framework for the adoption of further measures by the international community against the Pretoria regime.

He informed the Committee that the title of an Information Note which had been issued by the Rapporteur of the Special Committee against Apartheid, in April 1988 in New York, had been Apartheid on the attack. The Note had concluded that the apartheid regime's repression at home and abroad had escalated, including its assassination of members of the National Liberation Movement. It had blocked the avenues of peaceful protest which had seriously undermined the possibility of solving the conflict in that country through peaceful negotiations. The regime's attacks appeared to count on the perceived temporary lull in decisive action by the governments of some major countries. There was a stronger challenge now to the international community and more decisive action was required. The Special Committee was convinced that Pretoria continued to act with impunity because of the support it enjoyed from some Western States, which had refused to join the international consensus on the need to adopt strict and co-ordinated sanctions against the regime. He referred to the statement made by the Reverend Allan Boesak in New York on the occasion of the 25th Anniversary of the Special Committee that the South African people could fight the apartheid regime but could not fight the United States, the United Kingdom and Japan. He noted that some sanctions had already been adopted. However, there was no collective mechanism for monitoring their implementation and for punishing those who violated them. In addition, the measures were varied and provided several loopholes which were used by the Pretoria regime to reduce their effects. He indicated that, in this context, the 42nd session of the General Assembly had adopted resolutions 42/23B on the application of co-ordinated and strictly monitored measures against South Africa which had focused on the loopholes among the individual national sanctions adopted so far, and had urged States to close these loopholes, to strengthen the sanctions and to monitor strictly their implementation. The Special Committee believed that a two-pronged strategy was necessary so that the intransigence of the apartheid regime could be effectively confronted. This included co-ordinated and strictly monitored sanctions, and a systematic programme of assistance - economic and military - to the front-line States. He urged the international community, especially South Africa's major trading partners, to reassess their policies towards South Africa. He noted the significant role played by the Black trade union movement in the liberation struggle. In spite of varied forms of threats from the Government and the employers, they had shown that they were determined to transform their society into a just one. He was of the view that the severe restrictions imposed by the regime in February on COSATU, the bans on anti-apartheid organisations and political leaders and the proposed amendments to the Labour Relations Act had been designed to silence the opposition to apartheid. The Labour Relations Act was an attempt to blunt the growth and the militancy of the Black trade union movement which, in the absence of political channels of protest, had emerged as a major force in the anti-apartheid struggle. He referred to the recent COSATU meeting with the South African Consultative Committee on Labour Affairs (SACCOLA) regarding the Labour Relations Amendment Bill and the workers' three-day peaceful protest against the Bill and the restrictions on anti-apartheid organisations. He revealed that the employers had threatened to use a series of coercive measures against workers who participated in that protest. He also drew attention to the complaint filed by COSATU with the ILO because the provisions of the Bill conflict with international labour standards. He spelt out the implication of the Bill and the fact that, together with the Bill on the Promotion of Orderly Internal Politics, it could paralyse seriously the trade union movement. He informed the Committee that the Chairman of the Special Committee against Apartheid had issued a statement on 3 June 1988 expressing great concern at these developments. He noted that the Director-General's Special Report indicated the numerical growth and strength of the Black unionised workers. In 1987, the estimated number of work days lost through strike action had increased dramatically to 9 million, which represented an increase of 800 per cent over the 1986 figure. He drew attention to the important role played by international solidarity in supporting the struggle by Black workers, and stressed the key role played by international trade union federations in helping to generate public opinion which had exerted pressure on governments to act against the racist regime. He expressed belief that the trade unions could push their governments to move faster. He welcomed the increasing movement by employers, especially Western employers, towards participating more fully in the campaign, and also welcomed the selective actions taken by some governments which in the past had been undisguised opponents of sanctions against South Africa. The actions taken were, however, limited and lacked the compelling and desired effectiveness to bring immediate change. He believed that the United States and the United Kingdom should bear the moral responsibility for the deterioration of the situation in South Africa since they had used their veto powers at the Security Council in preventing the imposition of comprehensive and mandatory sanctions against South Africa. The Special Committee believed that, short of the adoption of comprehensive sanctions, the currently existing sanctions such as the mandatory arms embargo and the voluntary oil embargo, should be closely monitored. In addition, other measures targeted at the vulnerable areas of the South African economy should be taken and strictly monitored, including a gold and coal embargo, a ban on technology transfers, and loans and investment. He drew attention to the conclusions of the Stamberger Institute of the Federal Republic of Germany, which had examined the effects of South Africa's international links and the possible forms of sanctions. The study was a response to the argument that sanctions did not work. He affirmed that sanctions could be effective and could work on the Pretoria regime if only the major trading partners of South Africa exerted effective pressure on the regime. He also referred to the serious problem of sanctions-busting and evasion, and the special Committee's extreme concern at the trend of increasing trade between Japan, some Asian countries and South Africa. The Special Committee was concerned about the form of disinvestment to be adopted by the transnational corporations in South Africa. He welcomed the ILO initiative in trying to identify a banking institution as an alternative to the UBS, and he urged the ILO to continue in this endeavour.

48. The Employers' member of Zambia reaffirmed that the majority of Employers fully supported the draft Declaration and Programme of Action without reservation. He pointed to the significance of the theme of the current International Labour Conference, Human rights – A common responsibility, for the work of the Committee. He recalled that South Africa had been a signatory to some of the human rights instruments of the United Nations and also to the ILO's Constitution and had thus been party to a continuing dialogue on this matter for a long time. This confirmed that the apartheid system could not be reformed through dialogue. However, it was violating human rights with impunity. He stressed that the changes introduced in South Africa were not genuine, and emphasised that the situation was worsening in that country and in Namibia. He provided examples on the various attacks and raids on the front-line States, including one which had been targeted at a clothing factory owned by women refugees under the small business development programme being supported by the Zambia Federation of Employers, the ILO and other United Nations agencies, the Norwegian Employers' Confederation and NORAD. He called on ILO member States who had reservations on mandatory sanctions to withhold them as a sign of their commitment to the achievement and preservation of human rights, and also as a token of their solidarity with the oppressed people in South Africa and Namibia. Furthermore they should refrain from calling for a vote on the Declaration and the Programme of Action.

49. The Workers' member of the United States drew the Committee's attention to the fulfilment of the predictions he had made two years ago concerning the adoption of anti-apartheid legislation including sanctions in the United States. He stressed that this positive trend was continuing and referred to the current work of the United States Congress which was attempting to strengthen sanctions and make them more comprehensive. He stated that the existing United States anti-apartheid legislation was one of the strongest and strictest measures adopted in the world. He pointed to some of the groups that had contributed towards the adoption of this legislation, including civil rights groups and the trade unions which continued to act in concert with the trade unions in South Africa. He observed that the ILO's draft Declaration could permit further pressure and action, and informed the Committee that in the preceding year the President of NACTU had been invited to the United States to testify to Congress, and he had expressed support for the anti-apartheid legislation. Recent events in South Africa had shown that there had been some success achieved by the action taken so far, including that of the Committee. The current stay-away of 90 per cent of Black Workers in South Africa was an indication of the success of sanctions. He urged the ILO that in future Special Reports it should attempt to provide more information on the action that had been undertaken and the areas where such action had had an impact in South Africa and Namibia; they should also specify the fields where further work could be undertaken as well as areas where nothing could be done. He pointed to the omission of his union's name in the list on page 139 of the Special Report, which indicated the organisations that had replied to the ILO questionnaire, despite the numerous subsequent references to his organisation's reply throughout Chapter 2 of the Report. He called upon the ILO to avoid the use of unsubstantiated newspaper reports in the Special Report, such as that already mentioned in relation to Namibian trade unions. He reaffirmed the support of the United States trade unions for the anti-apartheid struggle.

50. The representative of the Secretary-General informed the Committee about a telex, referred to the Committee, which the President of the Conference had received from the President of the ANC, Mr. Olivier Tambo, requesting the Conference to examine the serious developments relating to the current stay-away in South Africa. It was agreed that the Working Group set up by the Committee would consider this telex as part of its work.

51. The Government member of Nigeria shared the views expressed by other delegates about the Committee's special responsibility to make concrete proposals which would lead to action to arrest the deteriorating condition of workers in South Africa. His Government had been dismayed by the treatment of African workers described in the Director-General's Special Report and was grateful to those governments, individuals and organisations – and particularly the Nordic countries which had opposed apartheid and shown their solidarity with the oppressed workers of South Africa and Namibia. Apartheid had been compared to slavery and there could be no peace and stability in southern Africa without its elimination. Nigeria had appealed at every opportunity to the international community to use its power to bring an end to apartheid and peace to southern Africa and supported any measures to that end. Fore economic interests which put their gain before the welfare of Black Workers and collaborated with the racist regime claimed to be championing the cause of the workers of South Africa when they insisted that economic sanctions would adversely affect them. However, they did not hesitate to apply sanctions when their interests were best served as in the case of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Nicaragua, Poland and the Islamic Republic of Iran. It was ironic that the Western world which held fundamental human rights so dear had been the mainstay of the apartheid regime. Economic considerations had, in that case, been allowed to take precedence over moral and humanitarian issues. His Government opposed that argument that foreign economic interests contributed to the social benefit of the people of the region and supported the updating of the list of banks, transnational corporations and other organisations that were assisting the racist regime of South Africa. To reduce the destabilising effects on the economies of the front-line States and the negative impact which sanctions might have on these countries, Nigeria had helped initiate the AFRICA Fund which was open for voluntary contributions. His delegation appealed to all countries, individuals and organisations to contribute generously. The apartheid regime was undeterred in its repressive policies and could not be reformed; it must be dismantled. The Pretoria regime was not prepared to make a peaceful transition. Therefore the Black workers of South Africa must be strengthened in their capacity to resist. They needed the solidarity and support of the international community and their leaders needed material support and access to training and education. The ILO Committee on Apartheid was a unique forum for the formulation of an effective strategy, and he trusted that it would be possible to take full account of, and even incorporate the provisions of, the declaration on apartheid adopted by the summit meeting of the Organisation of African Unity in Addis Ababa in May of this year.

52. On behalf of the Workers' group, the Workers' Vice-Chairman expressed full satisfaction with the work achieved at the Working Party, especially by its chairman who had demonstrated considerable competence which had facilitated the Working Party's work in a constructive way. Turning to the presence of COSATU and NACTU representatives in the Committee, he stressed that it was a great honour for him to introduce three representatives of the people at the forefront of the anti-apartheid struggle, namely the Vice-President and also the Secretary for Education of COSATU, and the Assistance Secretary-General of NACTU. He assured them that they could return to South Africa convinced that they were not alone in their struggle and that the international community was ready to honour its commitment to support various forms of action which they had themselves identified as the most appropriate to bring about real change in South Africa. The people in South Africa were those who actually bore the full brunt of apartheid, and therefore were in the best position to prescribe remedies and to make demands. It was incumbent on the international community to follow these demands rapidly, vigorously and in a concerted manner. He referred to the current strike, the largest ever in South Africa, by voteless Black workers who had made their voices heard. He urged members of the Committee not to disappoint them by expressing reservations or adopting half-measures. He trusted that, with this in mind, the conclusions of the Working Party would be adopted by consensus and would be applied by all the members.

53. The representative of COSATU expressed thanks for being allowed to address the Committee on the current situation in his country at a time when the South African Government had unleashed the most brutal repressive forces against the oppressed masses. The desperate counter-reactions of the racist apartheid regime to contain the struggle was of such a vicious nature that right-thinking people at home and abroad were left with no choice but to add their support to the forces of change. It was important to note that, since its formation in 1985 and under the notorious State of Emergency, COSATU had been subjected to systematic attacks from the State. In 1987, in particular, there had been mass detention of trade unionists, a propaganda smear campaign – especially during the railway strike – and the bombing of COSATU headquarters in Johannesburg. These attacks were taking place in the context of the rising tide of mass resistance to the oppressive racist regime. The South African Government was facing an unprecedented political crisis: the crisis of its legitimacy. It would no longer govern as it had in the past. The oppressed masses on all fronts had registered their opposition to the illegitimate government of South Africa. On the education front, children and parents had registered their opposition to the controls of Bantu education and had organised support for an alternative system of education. On the workers' front, the workers had resisted the attack on their living standards through a living-wage campaign. On the religious front, the churches had demonstrated their contempt of the rule of the racist regime. The South African Government, finding itself with no solution to the political crises, had resorted to the most brutal and repressive measures, similar to those it had resorted to in 1960 against the African National Congress when the ANC was engaged in peaceful methods of opposition. The banning of the 17 anti-apartheid organisations and the restrictions on COSATU were a clear demonstration that it was one of the most vicious dictatorial regimes in history. It was clear to all that the South African Government had started on a path to intensify its repression of its people and organisations. The South African Government had confidently chosen that path because it believed it had the support of its allies in the West, particularly the Reagan Administration, the Thatcher Government, the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany and others. Despite the repressive measures, an outstanding feature of the situation remained the unbroken mode and determination of the people to surge forward. The outcome of the COSATU Special Nation Congress held in May was the clear expression of the experience indelibly imprinted on their minds, the continuing proof that the creation and maintenance of a space within which to organise depended on the strength and determination of the people. The Special Congress set aside three days of national protest action for the people to demonstrate their contempt of the regime. The protest action was particularly against the introduction by the South African Government of the Labour Relations Amendment Bill which was designed to emasculate the power of the independent trade union movement in the country. It was a piece of legislation that would deny the basic democratic right to strike: a right that is taken for granted in most Western countries. It would give the employers the right to sue unions in the event that workers went on strike. The general strike action of the past three days was unprecedented in the country's history. Under the most difficult conditions they were able to rally over 2 million people. It was a clear demonstration of the determination of the people to replace the illegitimate racist apartheid regime with a non-racial democratic South Africa. The action of the past three days had forced the Minister of Manpower to suggest negotiating with COSATU on the proposed Labour Bill. A special COSATU Executive Committee meeting was held on 8 June to decide on the Minister of Manpower's proposal. It was agreed that the Executive Committee would meet the Minister on condition that the agenda should provide that: (1) the Minister would accept the jurisdiction of the ILO as the body with the right to decide on the criteria of the proposed law; (2) SACCOLA – the bosses' organisation – should accept internal arbitration; (3) the Bill should be suspended; (4) a discussion should be held with the Minister on the repressive measures taken against COSATU that affected its legitimate functions as a trade union movement; (5) the discussion should cover the exclusion of farmworkers, domestic and public workers; (6) it should also cover the propaganda smear campaign against the leadership and organisations of COSATU. The representative of COSATU noted that meetings held with employers in South Africa had shown that they supported the Bill. It was clear that they had benefited from the apartheid social structure. The decision to meet the Minister demonstrated the readiness of the mass democratic movement to find a peaceful solution to the political and economic crisis gripping the country. The South African conflict had grown beyond its borders. It had become a matter of global concern. In the international arena, despite the misinformation campaign coupled with press curbs, there was increasing support for the struggle of the South African people and the growing isolation of the racist regime. Although it remained assured of the support of some Western countries, the regime had irrevocably lost the battle for the support of the international community. He appealed to the Committee to increase its support for the struggle in South Africa and to isolate further the South African regime although, according to the restrictions placed on the Organisation, it was illegal for it to call for comprehensive and mandatory sanctions against South Africa. The decisions of the Conference would undoubtedly bring closer the achievement of a non-racial, democratic South Africa.

54. The representative of NACTU thanked the Committee for giving him an opportunity of describing the situation in South Africa. Control of trade unions there was not new. In 1981 the then Minister of Labour brought in measures to control the unions by introducing a law that said that trade unions must be registered in order to negotiate at the industrial council level. The Labour Relations Amendment Bill should not be seen in isolation. There were other oppressive laws. Recently the Government had been debating the Promotion of Orderly Internal Politics Bill and invoking the Fund Raising Act, which empowered the Minister to declare any organisation an "affected" organisation, meaning that it would not be able to receive funds from outside South Africa. It was aimed at curtailing community programmes and also funds sent to defend those charged under various laws in South Africa that lead to imprisonment. Many people mistakenly believed that political activity was clipped by the first State of Emergency in 1986. He reminded people that there had never been any freedom of political activity since the Suppression of Communism Act was passed in 1950. This had culminated in 1960 when both the ANC and PAC had been banned, since when there had been no free political activity in the country. The result was seen in 1977 when the Black consciousness movement organisations were silenced and their assets confiscated by the State. There was still no free political activity. There was often the accusation, especially by employers, that the trade union movement in South Africa was mainly political, that it did not restrict itself simply to economic issues, but the situation was such that it could not. It was incumbent upon the trade unions to express those political rights that were denied. By the time he returned home the State of Emergency would be renewed with more stringent regulations. This meant that in October they would not be able to voice opposition to the local elections. It was their responsibility to question the refusal to recognise the basic human rights of all their members, in the same way as people in various industries who came from the so-called "homelands" and who were said not to be South Africans. There was no way they could tolerate this. They always opposed these kinds of laws. As regards the question of sanctions, it was important to note that, in South Africa, genocide was being committed, especially in the homelands where people were dying a slow and painful death from hunger. When NACTU said that mandatory sanctions must be imposed on South Africa it was told that they would affect the people they were supposed to help. But investments made in South Africa were for the most part capital intensive rather than labour intensive. Black unemployment would not come as a result of sanctions; Blacks had always suffered unemployment in South Africa due to the Pass Laws, decentralisation policies and the rationalisation of companies, that is companies that closed down and moved to another part of the country. Blacks had always suffered unemployment also as a result of lack of education and skills. Those countries and territories in the West and the Far East like Japan, the Republic of Korea and Taiwan, China, that traded with South Africa, and said that they were creating employment, could not be believed. They refused to impose sanctions because of their own economic interests. His organisation had met with the employers in South Africa – including Anglo-American employers – and had made known its opposition to the Bill. A committee of labour lawyers from the trade unions and from the employers was set up to look into this law. It was made clear to the employers that they did not want this law. By the time he left the country he had not received an invitation from the Minister of Manpower who, however, had made an open invitation through the media. An organisation should not be invited through the media by any Minister. It was difficult to talk to a Minister who did not need votes in the next elections. As trade unions they would not talk when they did not have bargaining power. This was not the first invitation received from the Government recently; they had received an invitation from Mr. P.W. Botha, the State President, but turned it down since such meetings do not produce any results. They would continue to refuse to deal with the South African politicians, but left their doors open to deal with the functionaries because they understood what the problems were and could influence policy. Talking to ministers in South Africa was just a ceremony. They would not get anywhere that way.

55. The Committee set up a Working Party to prepare Conclusions to be included in the Committee's Report to the Conference. The Working Party was composed as follows:

Government members: Cuba (Mr. Heredia); India (Mr. Malhotra); Norway (Mr. Vollebaek); USSR (Mrs. Alexandrova); Zimbabwe (Mr. Mawande).

Employers' members: Mr. Chanaiwa (Zimbabwe); Mr. Healy (United Kingdom); Mr. Hernandez (Philippines); Mr. Sumbwe (Zambia); Mr. Tjiriange (Namibia).

Workers' members: Mr. Botvinov (USSR); Mr. Mercier (Canada); Mr. Morton (United Kingdom); Mr. Nedziwe (Zimbabwe); Mr. Sandegren (Norway).

Mr. Vollebaek, Reporter of the Committee, acted as Chairman of the Working Party.

56. In presenting the Working Party's Conclusions, the Reporter expressed appreciation for the spirit of co-operation exhibited by members of the Working Party during the course of its work. He drew the Committee's attention to the main elements in the unanimous conclusions of the Working Party which recommended the adoption by the Conference of the Declaration on Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia and its annexed Programme of Action which was amended and updated at the Tripartite Conference on Action against Apartheid, in Harare, and that the new name of the Committee should be the Conference Committee on Action against Apartheid. The Conclusions then went on to indicate the specific urgent measures that should be undertaken by the tripartite members and by the ILO against the background of the current threats to the independent Black trade union movement in South Africa and to reinforce the anti-apartheid action.

57. The representative of the Secretary-General provided the Committee with information concerning the preliminary response which would be sent in reply to the telex received from the President of the ANC, which indicated that proposals on action were being placed before the Conference by the Committee; he stated further that the text of these would be communicated to the President of the ANC once they had been adopted by the Conference at the plenary.

58. Following the introduction by the Reporter of the conclusion of the Working Party, the Chairman noted that a request for a vote on the adoption of the conclusions had been made by the Government member of the United States, who explained that in the view of his Government there were aspects of the updated Declaration and Programme of Action which it could not support, in particular those relating to the imposition of mandatory sanctions which it considered to be the prerogative of the Security Council of the United Nations. The Government member of the Federal Republic of Germany expressed support for the request of the United States Government member.

59. Following an exchange of views during the course of which a number of Government, Employers' and Workers' members urged those members who had requested a vote to reconsider their decision in the interests of achieving a consensus, in response to which the Government member of the United States indicated, inter alia, that after awaiting instructions from his capital his request would be addressed to the plenary, a vote was taken in the Committee on the adoption of the conclusions, on the basis of a weighted voting system established according to the usual criteria. The result of the vote, as announced by the Chairman, was the adoption of the conclusions of the Committee by 342 votes in favour, 14 votes against, with no abstentions. The quorum was 168 votes.

60. In explaining his vote, the Government member of the Federal Republic of Germany said that although his Government agreed with many of the points and demands contained in the Declaration on Action against Apartheid and the Programme of Action, it had particular reservations concerning the recommendations on the breaking off of diplomatic relations and on the comprehensive and binding sanctions under Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter. These requirements fell within the purview of the United Nations Security Council and exceeded the terms of reference and the competence of the ILO. His delegation therefore regretted that it was unable to assent to the demands in general. With regards to the point raised by the Workers' Vice-Chairman, he added that his Government did not intend to ask for a vote in the plenary of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference on the subject and was prepared to accept the adoption of the conclusions without a vote.

61. In explaining her vote, the Government member of Norway said that her delegation had voted in favour of the adoption of the conclusions presented by the Working Party to the Committee and strongly supported the main thrust of the conclusions, but referred to the two reservations made in the statement by the Norwegian Government member earlier in the Committee's deliberations.

62. In explaining his vote, the Government member of Greece stated that although his Government had voted in favour of the conclusions of the Working Group, it had one reservation regarding the abolition of diplomatic relations. Although his Government saw the usefulness of such a measure in the context of abolishing apartheid, it did not feel that relations between countries were the issue. However, his Government strongly supported the content of the conclusions as adopted by the Committee.

63. The Employers' Vice-Chairman, after expressing thanks to all involved in the Committee's work and remarking on the smooth way in which the proceedings had been conducted, said that the conclusions would undoubtedly be approved by the International Labour Conference and provide a continuing challenge to all freedom-loving people in their commitment to the speedy dismantlement of apartheid. However, certain members of the Employers' group felt the need to reiterate the reservations they had made in previous years during the Committee's deliberations.

64. The conclusions adopted by the Committee are as follows:

The Committee recommends

- (a) the adoption of the Declaration on Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia and the Programme of Action against Apartheid annexed to it, as amended and updated by the Tripartite Conference on Action against Apartheid held in Harare, Zimbabwe, from 3-6 May 1988. The text of the Declaration and Programme of Action are attached to this report.
- (b) that the name of the Committee should henceforth be the Conference Committee on Action Against Apartheid.

Urgent action

In view of the recent measures adopted and planned by the South African authorities that threaten the very existence of the independent Black trade union movement in that country and in view of the continuing deterioration of the situation in South Africa, the Committee further recommends the following urgent action, namely that:

1. The Conference calls upon all governments, employers' and workers' organisations and the International Labour Office to make representations to the South African authorities in order that they refrain from promulgating the proposed amendments to the Labour Relations Act and from enacting the Promotion of Orderly Internal Politics Bill and other measures that threaten the very existence of the independent Black trade union movement.

2. The Conference calls upon employers' organisations to urge their members with subsidiaries in south Africa to refrain from any form of victimisation of the workers and their unions arising from workers' protests against the legislative amendments and similar restrictive measures.

3. The Conference invites trade unions to launch special campaigns mobilising maximum support for the independent Black trade union movement in its protests against proposed legislative amendments and restrictive measures that are clearly intended to cripple it.

4. The Conference calls upon governments to pay particular attention to paragraph II(2) of the Programme of Action against Apartheid in respect of the refusal to roll over South African loans and the denial of new loans and credit guarantees. This paragraph in the Programme of Action reads:

To stop trade and commercial relations with and to prohibit new public and private investment in South Africa as well as the export of nuclear and other technology to the South African Government, parastatals and private enterprise in South Africa. In addition, to prohibit loans, trade credits and gold exchanges by banks to and with South Africa. Furthermore to prohibit collaboration with South Africa in the operation of the international gold market, in particular to prevent the operation of the South African marketing company, the International Gold Corporation (INTERGOLD).

5. The Conference calls upon employers' organisations likewise to pay particular attention to paragraph III(5) of the Programme of Action Against Apartheid, which reads:

To urge banks and other financial institutions to refrain from making loans or providing credit for trade with South Africa and to urge governments to prohibit the activities of the International Gold Corporation (INTERGOLD) in their countries.

6. The Conference invites trade unions to launch special campaigns among their membership to put maximum pressure on banks and financial institutions concerned granting loans and providing credit to the South African authorities and institutions.

7. The Conference invites governments concerned, either multilaterally or unilaterally, to enforce a strict coal embargo and to tighten up the oil embargo by requiring absolute guarantees from buyers and transporters that the oil will not be resold or shipped to South Africa.

8. The Conference calls for concerted action to stop the South African Government's attempts to attain self-sufficiency in energy by (a) the imposition by governments of an embargo on activities designed to assist such attempts; (b) employer action to discourage companies or financial institutions from their co-operation with South African schemes aimed at obtaining energy self-sufficiency.

9. The Conference requests governments, employers' and workers' organisations to give individual replies to the questionnaire on implementation of non-implementation of the measures stipulated in the updated Declaration and Programme of Action.

10. The Conference requests the Director-General to prepare a special report on the implementation and non-implementation by governments, employers' and trade union organisations of the above-mentioned recommendations.

11. The Conference requests the Director-General to continue with his efforts to find alternative banking facilities and to urge those banks and financial institutions whose services are used by the ILO to abstain from granting loans and providing credit to the South African authorities, institutions and enterprises.

12. The Conference further requests the Director-General to prepare a study of the gold market with South Africa with a view to identifying possible sanctions measures in this field for the consideration of the next session of the Conference Committee on Action against Apartheid.

13. The Conference requests the Governing Body, through its Committee on Discrimination, to continue to monitor with increased vigour action against apartheid. To this effect the Conference requests the Governing Body to make financial resources available for the establishment of a special monitoring group of three independent experts nominated by the Governing Body's Committee on Discrimination at its first meeting to follow up and monitor the implementation of sanctions and other action against apartheid throughout the world, as specified in the Declaration and the Programme of Action, with special attention to the actions taken to circumvent such measures and to report in the first instance to the Governing Body Committee on Discrimination. This monitoring should particularly concentrate on carrying out the following tasks: the investigation and evaluation of the effects of present sanctions measures; the conducting of feasibility and case studies on sanctions; regularly surveying and updating the state of world trade with South Africa; maintaining a register of investment and disinvestment in South Africa; publishing, three times a year, the results of the research. This mandate should be carried out in close co-operation with other United Nations bodies and international organisations collecting information on sanctions and other action against apartheid, with the aim of avoiding duplication of work.

Proposed Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Recalling the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa unanimously adopted by the Conference on 8 July 1964 and the updated Declaration adopted by the Conference on 18 June 1981,

Considering that all Members of the ILO have by the Declaration of Philadelphia embodied in the Constitution as a statement of the aims and purposes of the Organisation, solemnly affirmed that "all human beings, irrespective of race, creed or sex, have the right to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity",

Considering that according to its Constitution the ILO exists for the promotion of the objectives set forth in the Preamble thereto and in the Declaration of Philadelphia,

Considering that the Government of South Africa, having refused to promote the objectives set forth in the Preamble to the Constitution and in the Declaration of Philadelphia, adopted and is practising the inhuman policy of apartheid, which is wholly incompatible with the aims and principles of the Declaration of Philadelphia, thus creating an alarming situation, further aggravated by the extension of the apartheid system into Namibia through the illegal occupation of that territory by South Africa, incurred the condemnation of the International Labour Conference and withdrew from the Organisation by virtue of a communication dated 11 March 1964,

Considering that according to the Declaration of Philadelphia the principles set forth therein are fully applicable to all peoples everywhere and their implementation is a matter of concern to the whole world,

Considering that apartheid has been declared a crime against humanity by the General Assembly of the United Nations and that the Security Council, since its resolution 182 (1963) adopted unanimously on 4 December 1963, has affirmed the conviction that the situation in South Africa is seriously disturbing international peace and security,

Considering that the apartheid system in South Africa is the root cause of conflict in southern Africa as a whole and that the independence of Namibia, the freedom of the South African people and the peace and security in the region can only be attained through the elimination of apartheid,

Considering the programme for the elimination of apartheid in labour matters in South Africa adopted in 1964 and all subsequent measures to give effect to the ILO's determination to eradicate apartheid, including the annual Special Reports of the Director-General on apartheid in South Africa and the expansion of the activities of the International Labour Office in this field,

Considering especially the Report of the International Tripartite Meeting on Action against Apartheid held at Livingstone in May 1981, which recognised that the solution to the problem of apartheid must take into account the political implications of that system and went on to recommend specific action for the elimination of apartheid,

Considering also the reports of the Tripartite Conference on Action against Apartheid held in Lusaka in May 1984 and in Harare in May 1988,

Noting that the conclusions of these meetings were subsequently adopted by the International Labour Conference,

Sharing the growing concern of the international community at the deterioration of the situation in South Africa and Namibia under apartheid and the need for action thereon, as shown in the Programme of Action adopted at the United Nations General Assembly and in subsequent resolutions and instruments adopted by that Assembly (including the Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid) as well as the resolutions of the Security Council,

Reaffirming in addition the need to co-operate with all organisations in the campaign to eliminate apartheid, in particular the United Nations, the Organisation of African Unity and international and regional organisations of workers and employers,

Considering that developments which have taken place since the adoption of its Declaration and Programme for the elimination of Apartheid in 1964 have demonstrated that apartheid continues to deprive the Black population of employment and training, full enjoyment of freedom of association and the right to organise, and equality of opportunity and treatment in the field of labour, while recent events have shown that through the "Bantustan" policy and the use of repressive measures the South African Government still acts in a manner which violates international labour standards and which therefore requires urgent action by the international community to secure social justice, peace and freedom for all the peoples of South Africa and Namibia,

Reaffirming its determination to continue to fulfil its responsibility to promote and take its part in securing the freedom and dignity of the peoples of South Africa and Namibia and to fight the policy of apartheid practised by the Government of South Africa,

Faithful to its role as spokesman of the social conscience of mankind and affirming once again its conviction that a government which deliberately practises apartheid is unworthy of the community of nations,

Considering that only urgent and determined action by the international community, in particular the imposition of comprehensive and mandatory sanctions by the United Nations Security Council as the most effective and appropriate measure under the present circumstances, will bring the Government of South Africa to abandon its disastrous policy and to co-operate with employers' and workers' organisations in placing the relations between the various elements of the population of South Africa, and the relations between the people of South Africa and the rest of the world, on the basis of the equality of man, justice for all, good neighbourliness and mutual respect;

1. Solemnly reaffirms its fidelity to the fundamental principle of the Declaration of Philadelphia, according to which "all human beings, irrespective of race, creed or sex, have the right to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity".

2. Emphatically reaffirms its condemnation of the degrading, criminal and inhuman racial policies of the Government of South Africa and their extension to Namibia, which policies are a violation of fundamental human rights and thus incompatible with the aims and purpose of the ILO.

3. Strongly reaffirms its determination to pursue its action until respect for the freedom and dignity of all human beings, irrespective of race, is fully assured in South Africa and Namibia and until, to this end, the following objectives have been attained:

- the total and final elimination of the policy of apartheid in South Africa and Namibia;
- the repeal of all legislative, administrative and other measures which are a violation of the principle of the equality and dignity of man and a direct negation of the inherent rights and freedoms of the peoples of South Africa and Namibia;
- the establishment and consistent pursuit of a policy of equal opportunity and treatment for all, in employment and occupation, irrespective of race, creed or sex;
- the cessation of all aggression, social and economic destabilisation of the front-line countries.

4. Urges the Committee on Action against Apartheid of the International Labour Conference to continue to monitor with increased vigour action against apartheid.

5. (a) Confirms the Director-General's mandate to monitor and follow the situation in South Africa and Namibia in respect of labour and social matters, and to submit every year for consideration by the Conference Committee on Action against Apartheid a Special Report on the subject; to this effect, to request governments, employers' and workers' organisations to provide individually information, in such form as the Governing Body may determine, on the action taken against apartheid in accordance with recommendations contained in the Programme of Action against Apartheid, including information on failure to take action and on the active promotion of relations which strengthen the apartheid system;

(b) invites the Governing Body's Committee on Discrimination to continue to consider the information described in subparagraph (a) above, and to submit a report to the Conference Committee on Action against Apartheid.

6. Invites the Governing Body and the Director-General to take the necessary steps:

- (a) to increase the ILO's educational activities and technical assistance to the liberation movements, the Black workers and their independent trade unions as well as the Black entrepreneurs and their organisations in South Africa and Namibia in their fight against apartheid, in close co-operation with the Organisation of African Unity, the Special Committee against Apartheid, the Commission on Human Rights of the United Nations, and the United Nations Council for Namibia, the international and African workers' and employers' organisations and the front-line States and those States in the neighbourhood of South Africa which are seriously affected by the aggressive actions of South Africa, in particular by:
 - (i) an increase in the resources made available from the ILO regular budget, and from external sources on a bilateral or multilateral basis, for enlarging the ILO's capacity to combat apartheid and to provide assistance to its victims;
 - (ii) the establishment of a voluntary fund for the workers of South Africa and Namibia to which contributions should be made regularly by ILO member States as well as by employers' and workers' organisations;
 - (iii) the broadening of the scope of ILO assistance to liberation movements from southern Africa recognised by the Organisation of Africa Unity, in particular by the use of its technical services in the fields of vocational and management training, labour administration, occupational safety and health, rural development, workers' education, co-operative development, equality of treatment for women workers and advice on the elimination of discriminatory labour legislation;
 - (iv) the establishment of a training institute for South Africa, designed more specifically for the promotion of manpower training and development;
 - (v) assistance to the front-line and neighbouring States providing facilities for refugees from South Africa and Namibia at institutions of their own through the provision of equipment, expertise and fellowships;
 - (vi) the creation of training facilities and employment opportunities for refugees in their countries of refuge in such a way that their skills will be of immediate use and also of assistance to their countries of origin upon their return;
 - (vii) co-operation with the governments of the States in the immediate neighbourhood of South Africa, including the regional organisations, the Southern African Development Co-ordination Conference and the Southern African Labour Commission, in devising and implementing policies which will enable them to reduce their dependence on South Africa, and in particular the supply of migrant labour in South Africa;
 - (viii) providing the front-line and neighbouring States with assistance for infrastructural development to enhance their capacity for withstanding the effects of any retaliatory economic action by the apartheid regime and to develop human skills for the effective management of their national economies;
 - (ix) assistance in the establishment of long-term solutions to problems involving migrant labour including public works programmes and other labour-intensive forms of job creation; the provision, over the short term, of assistance to migrant workers through advice on negotiations concerning their terms and conditions of employment, and through enabling migrant workers to be more fully informed of their rights;
 - (x) the expansion of the programme of the information on apartheid in labour matters and other questions of direct concern to the workers of southern Africa;
- (b) to use existing ILO procedures, including those of the Committee on Discrimination of the Governing Body, to attain the objectives assigned to the ILO under its Programme for the Elimination of Apartheid;
- (c) to encourage and extend financial support to workers' and employers' organisations in their programme of action against apartheid so that they can exert the maximum pressure for the implementation of various recommendations falling within their sphere of competence.

7. Renews its urgent appeal to governments, employers and workers of member States of the ILO to combine their efforts and put into application all appropriate measures to lead South Africa to heed the call of humanity and renounce its shameful policy of apartheid. In this respect, the basic guide-line should be the Programme of Action against Apartheid which is annexed to this updated Declaration.

8. Reaffirms its resolve to co-operate with the United Nations in seeking and guaranteeing freedom and dignity, economic security and equal opportunity for all the peoples of South Africa and Namibia and in particular with the United Nations Special Committee against Apartheid and the Council for Namibia and its desire to co-operate with the Organisation of African Unity in all fields related to the elimination of apartheid.

9. Requests the Governing Body and the Director-General to take the necessary steps to organise systematic consultations with a view to reinforcing ILO co-operation with the Organisation of African Unity, and with the United Nations, including its Special Committee against Apartheid, its Council for Namibia and its Commission on Human Rights, as well as with the other specialised agencies of the United Nations system and non-governmental organisations associated with them in order to intensify and co-ordinate all activities whose ultimate objective is to eliminate apartheid totally in all its facets in a more accelerated pace than hitherto.

Programme of Action against Apartheid

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation, considering it appropriate to give effect to the updated Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa adopted by the International Labour Conference in 1988, following the updated Declaration adopted by the Conference in 1981 and the initial Declaration adopted unanimously by the Conference in 1964,

Urging determined action by the international community to bring the Government of South Africa to abandon its disastrous policy of apartheid,

Taking into account the report of the Tripartite Meeting of Members of the Governing Body on apartheid in May 1980, the Report of the International Tripartite Meeting on Action against Apartheid held at Livingstone in 1981 and the conclusions of the Tripartite Conferences on Action against Apartheid held in Lusaka in 1984 and in Harare in 1988,

Further taking into account the resolutions adopted by the two International Trade Union Conferences against Apartheid in 1973 and 1977, and the Declaration adopted by the International Conference of Trade Unions on Sanctions and Other Actions against the Apartheid Regime in South Africa held in 1983,

Recalling also the ILO Programme for the Elimination of Apartheid in Labour Matters in the Republic of South Africa, which had been adopted in 1964, as well as subsequent measures undertaken by the ILO, in its determination to eradicate apartheid in the field of labour, including the Special Reports of the Director-General on the Application of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia, a wider range of educational and promotional activities carried out by the International Labour Office in this field and the extension of technical assistance within its field of competence to the people of South Africa and Namibia and the national liberation movements and front-line and neighbouring States,

Reflecting on and sharing the growing concern of the international community at the deterioration of the situation in South Africa and Namibia under apartheid and calling for action thereon, as shown in the Programmes of Action adopted by the United Nations General Assembly and the Security Council,

Reaffirming the need to co-operate with all organisations in the campaign to eliminate apartheid, in particular the United Nations, the Organisation of African Unity and international and regional organisations of workers and employers,

Noting that it has become necessary to revise the Programme of Action of the ILO and its Members in the light of the failure by the Government of South Africa since 1981 to abandon its policy of apartheid, its intensified aggression in southern Africa including Namibia, its intransigence in the face of international pressure and the further polarisation of Blacks and Whites in South Africa resulting from the introduction of a new Constitution in 1984 which was further aggravated by the 1987 Whites-only election;

Recommends the following action:

I. Government action through the United Nations

To take the measures necessary to give effect to the Programme of Action against Apartheid adopted by the United Nations General Assembly as well as the resolutions subsequently adopted by that body and other relevant United Nations bodies, in particular:

- (a) To adopt comprehensive and mandatory sanctions against South Africa, in accordance with Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter.
- (b) To establish a special monitoring unit, in co-operation with the International Maritime Organisation, Lloyds Register, the Shipping Research Bureau and other relevant organisations, to ensure that sanctions are strictly applied and to expose sanctions busters.
- (c) To co-operate by all possible means in the implementation of United Nations resolution 435 for the independence of Namibia.

II. Government action

1. To sever political, military, cultural, sporting and diplomatic relations with the South African Government, in so far as such relations with South Africa are maintained.

2. To stop trade and commercial relations with and to prohibit new public and private investment in South Africa, as well as the export of nuclear and other technology to the South African Government, parastatals and private enterprise in South Africa. In addition, to prohibit loans, trade credits and gold exchanges by banks to and with South Africa. Furthermore, to prohibit collaboration with South Africa in the operation of the international gold market, in particular to prevent the operation of the South African marketing company, the International Gold Corporation (INTERGOLD).

3. To adopt, through the appropriate government authorities, including regional and local authorities, stringent divestment/disinvestment measures, to prevent any new investments, and to withdraw all public funds from banks maintaining commercial relations with South Africa as well as to deny contracts for the provision of goods and services to all firms and enterprises having commercial relations with South Africa.

4. To deny the use of facilities intended to circumvent sanctions applied against South Africa.

5. To discourage emigration of their nationals and the promotion of tourism to South Africa, by such means as banning advertising and cutting air and sea links with South Africa.

6. To withhold recognition of Bantustans, deny the establishment of representative offices and the entry of representatives of Bantustans into their territories, to prohibit new investments in and to demand the withdrawal of existing investment from these areas.

7. To increase economic support, including development assistance and the development of alternative trade patterns, to those African countries which are forced through their geographical and economic situation to maintain links with South Africa, with particular emphasis on independent African States enclaved within South Africa and those in the immediate neighbourhood of South Africa.

8. To give material and moral support to the liberation movements, to the independent Black trade union movement and to popular movements struggling for the elimination of apartheid and the establishment of a non-racial democratic system and majority rule with respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms in South Africa and Namibia.

9. To lift all impediments preventing trade unions from participating in solidarity action with the workers engaged in the anti-apartheid struggle and in particular to ensure that the legal system does not prevent trade union action designed to oppose apartheid.

10. To encourage in line with the basic principles of the Constitution of the ILO initiatives which could lead to the elimination of apartheid and the achievement of durable peace in southern Africa.

11. To tighten the licensing procedures for the export and re-export of arms and related material as defined in Security Council Resolution 418 so as to ensure that none of it reaches South Africa and Namibia in violation of the United Nations Security Council decisions and resolutions.

III. Action by employers' organisations

1. To ensure that their members do not maintain trade, commercial or financial relations with South Africa and that economic and financial institutions do not extend loans to South Africa or collaborate with the apartheid regime in any way.

2. To disinvest from South Africa and to transfer these investments to other African countries, especially the front-line and SADCC States. In so doing, employers should ensure that early consultations are held with the appropriate union representing the Black workers in the enterprise on the conditions and terms of disinvestment. Such action should not circumvent the call for disinvestment by transferring the operation of their companies to local South African management whilst still maintaining the same commercial links.

3. To disinvest from and to cease all co-operation with the so-called Bantustans.

4. To refuse to co-operate with the South African authorities in the implementation of apartheid legislation or refrain from the exploitation of all advantages provided by the apartheid system particularly in labour relations and the so-called homelands and to make a firm commitment to the abolition of apartheid.

5. To urge banks and other financial institutions to refrain from making loans or providing credit for trade with South Africa and to urge governments to prohibit the activities of the International Gold Corporation (INTERGOLD) in their countries.

6. To provide technical and financial support for small business development and management training programmes for victims of apartheid in exile in the front-line and neighbouring States, and to organise subregional seminars for employers in such States for this purpose as well as sensitise employers about the plight of the victims of apartheid.

7. To ensure that members refrain from any form of victimisation of workers and their trade unions involved in the defence of workers' basic rights in South Africa and Namibia and in solidarity action, outside the Republic, with the Black workers of South Africa.

IV. Action by trade unions the world over

1. To exert maximum pressure on their respective governments for the adoption and the implementation of comprehensive and mandatory sanctions against South Africa by the United Nations Security Council, in accordance with Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter.

2. To place maximum pressure, including industrial action, on parent companies and their subsidiaries the world over in cases where their South African subsidiaries do not recognise the independent Black trade union movement and act in contradiction with internationally recognised labour standards.

3. To exert maximum pressure on the subsidiaries, outside South Africa, of South African multinational enterprises that are involved in the violation of internationally-recognised labour standards.

4. To increase mobilisation of workers and the public through information campaigns with a view to exerting the strongest possible pressure on their respective governments to adopt comprehensive sanctions against and to sever their links with South Africa, and on companies with interest in South Africa to oblige them to withdraw from that country.

5. To develop extensive educational activities to ensure that workers are informed of sanction measures in their own countries so that they can participate at all levels in the monitoring of such actions and be prepared for industrial action in cases of sanctions busting.

6. To organise consumer and other boycotts in order to promote sanctions against South Africa.

7. To give financial, material and moral support to the Black independent trade union movement inside South Africa and Namibia, including assistance in organising campaigns and educational programmes and legal and relief assistance to imprisoned and restricted trade unionists and their families, as well as organising solidarity action in support of the Black workers and their unions.

8. To organise campaigns to ensure that trade union members do not emigrate to South Africa or Namibia or visit these countries in the course of appropriate sanctions, to ban advertisements for jobs in South African recruitment offices abroad.

9. To withdraw all trade union funds from any company or investment scheme with interests in South Africa or Namibia, and to ensure that no pension funds are invested in such companies, banks or schemes.

10. To exercise the strongest possible pressure on banks and financial institutions to recall their existing loans to South Africa and to prevent the provision of new loans and trade credits to South Africa and Namibia, as well as gold exchanges to and with South Africa. In addition, trade unions should organise campaigns appealing to their members to close accounts with such banks.

11. To take all measures aimed at further isolating the South Africa regime and to support anti-apartheid activities.

12. To ensure trade union representation in delegations to the United Nations and the specialised agencies to press for the fullest implementation of the Programme of Action against Apartheid.

13. To co-ordinate trade union action against apartheid in accordance with the Declaration adopted by the International Conference of Trade Unions on Sanctions and Other Actions against the Apartheid Regime, held in Geneva in 1983.

V. ILO action

1. To give further impetus to the implementation of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid and the Programme of Action, with specific reference to operative paragraph 6 of the Declaration and to the following paragraphs of this section.

2. To increase entrepreneurial and management training and to encourage small business development programmes for the victims of apartheid in exile in neighbouring States and displaced persons as a means of creating self-employment for those deprived people and prepare them for business management responsibilities in a non-racial democratic South Africa and in an independent democratic Namibia.

3. To increase activities in the fields of workers' education, vocational training, assistance to migrant workers, improvements in infrastructures and in other fields of benefit to workers of southern Africa, including broader workers' education programmes for the trade unions of South Africa and Namibia. Such programmes should be conducted in conjunction with trade union organisations of the front-line States, particularly through the co-ordination and co-operation of the Southern African Trade Union Co-ordination Council (SATUCC).

4. To ensure a wider dissemination of public information throughout all member States by all possible means, including ILO publications, about atrocities being perpetrated by the apartheid South African regime within South Africa and Namibia, as well as in front-line and neighbouring States, as a means of countering the news blackout imposed by the South African Government under its oppressive emergency measures and overcoming the silence of the mass media.

5. To address renewed appeals to the UNDP, international financial institutions and all multi-bilateral and bilateral donors to provide additional resources for the above-mentioned activities.

6. To request ILO constituents to provide a precise, itemised report on the Declaration, on each paragraph of the Programme of Action annexed to it and on the conclusions adopted at each session of the Conference.

VI. Other action

1. The Conference calls upon governments, employers' and workers' organisations and the ILO to continue and reinforce the campaign for the release of all trade unionists and political prisoners in South Africa and Namibia. In this connection the Conference deplores and denounces all measures which deny and violate civil and trade union rights in South Africa.

2. The Conference calls upon governments, employers' and workers' organisations, non-governmental bodies and individuals to make every possible contribution to the AFRICA (Action for Resisting Invasion, Colonialism and Apartheid) Fund, as well as to make contributions in order to ensure the early realisation of its objectives.

Provisional Record

Seventy-fifth Session, Geneva, 1988

Nineteenth sitting

Monday, 13 June 1988, 10 a.m.

President: Mr. Beyreuther

ELECTION OF A NEW GOVERNMENT VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE CONFERENCE

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – The first item on our agenda is the election of a new Government Vice-President of the Conference to replace the former Government Vice-President, Mr. Smith, who has resigned. The Government group has already met, and Mr. Aitken, Government delegate, Jamaica, has been elected Vice-President of the Conference on the basis of nominations submitted by the group.

COMMUNICATION TO THE CONFERENCE

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – I now call on the Clerk of the Conference to make an announcement.

The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE – I have received a letter from Mr. El-Assar, Chairman of the Committee on the Application of Standards, which reads as follows:

Madam, referring to the decision taken by the Committee on the Application of Standards on 10 June 1987 and confirmed on 6 June 1988, I request you to announce every day to the Conference from Monday, 13 June, to Wednesday, 15 June 1988, the names of those countries whose representatives have not yet replied to an invitation by the Committee as mentioned in the Daily Bulletin and to urge them to do so as soon as possible.

Consequently, I should like to request the following countries to reply to the invitation of the Committee as soon as possible: Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Congo, Democratic Yemen, Ecuador and Niger.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – We shall now resume our discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

First, however, I would like to recall a few basic principles that the President and Vice-Presidents have endeavoured to apply, and will continue to apply, in directing the work of the Conference.

Firstly, the right to freedom of speech must be exercised in a spirit of mutual respect. Instead of exacerbating international tensions, we must try to co-operate as much as possible in pursuing the objectives of the ILO.

Secondly, delegates' statements must refer to the items that are on the agenda of our session of the Conference.

Thirdly, the statements must be factual and not offend other States, Heads of State or individual delegates.

Fourthly, statements should not exceed 15 minutes. There is still a long list of speakers and everyone should have a chance to speak.

Fifthly, a delegate wishing to reply to a specific comment by another speaker on a concrete point should not raise a point of order but should inform the Chairman in writing, before the end of the sitting, that he wishes to exercise his right of reply. The reply should then be couched in correct and parliamentary language, should not give rise to any further intervention and should be limited to three minutes. The Officers consider it their duty to see that the Conference sittings conform to these principles.

Interpretation from Portuguese: Mr. SILVA PEN-EDA (Minister of Employment and Social Security, Portugal) – In my own name, and in the name of the Portuguese Government, may I congratulate the President and the Vice-Presidents of this 75th Session of the International Labour Conference which is taking place in the year when we are celebrating the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

The excellent Report of the Director-General has made human rights the main topic for consideration at this Conference, analysing it in all the aspects that have been or could be a subject of study for the International Labour Organisation.

Portugal would like to congratulate the Director-General on the relevant choice he has made and all the more anxious to associate itself with it in that my country has expressly referred to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights in the Portuguese Constitution of 1976, article 16, paragraph 2, which stipulates that the Constitutional and legal precepts concerning fundamental rights must be interpreted and integrated in conformity with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

The Report submitted to this Conference reviews the way in which the International Labour Organisation, during the 69 years it has been in existence, has made human rights the focus of its activities and efforts as regards both its standard-setting activities and the technical co-operation extended to Member States, as the standard-setting texts adopted and implemented throughout the world indicate.

This meritorious and fruitful effort has favourably influenced the behaviour of all countries in spite of certain relapses that have occurred in certain parts of the world for economic reasons, in the interests of material development or for other reasons such as intolerance, proselytism, regional wars and, here and there, isolationist trends.

Among the many subjects raised in the Report that give food for thought, my Government wishes to give special emphasis to those relating to employment, non-discrimination, equality of opportunity and treatment, and technical co-operation.

Although the essential purpose of the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), which has been ratified by Portugal, is the promotion of full employment, the Report realistically recognises that this goal has been placed in jeopardy and is becoming ever more remote. This does not mean that it should be abandoned, but rather that it should be considered as a purpose to be achieved as and when the other factors that are not under the direct control of each country bring about the necessary readjustments in inflation, economic stabilisation and the external environment.

Portugal, with a small economy open to the exterior and deeply affected by external factors not under its control, is in exactly the same situation as that described in the Report. In the last few years the rate of unemployment has been reduced and it is now at 6.6 per cent. Since the end of 1985, my Government has adopted a strategy aimed at combating simultaneously four serious macro-economic problems of a structural nature, namely, inflation, the budget deficit, foreign debt and unemployment.

The document summarising this strategy entitled "The programme for structural rectification of the external debt and unemployment" (PCEDED) indicates that the unemployment variable is not residual. This is why the strategy adopted by the Government is a variable that governs the behaviour of the others.

The goals set are being achieved, so we have every reason to believe that the economic growth taking place in Portugal will be accompanied by the growth of employment together with appreciable improvements in productivity and competitiveness.

With respect to the jobless, we are making considerable efforts in regard to vocational training and rehabilitation. We are trying to make employment more flexible and, by considerable financial effort, to improve the welfare benefits for the jobless through the reformulation of unemployment benefits, increasing their duration, and amount and improving the system of allocation.

A vast number of programmes to promote employment have also been introduced through which my Government, together with its social partners and the Permanent Social Consultation Council, has been giving a new impulse to its efforts. The results achieved with regard to job creation have undoubtedly been positive inasmuch as the unemployment rate was gradually lowered from 8 per cent in the first quarter of 1987 to 6.6 per cent at the end of that year.

These results, as well as the considerable fall in the inflation rate from nearly 20 per cent in 1985 to almost 9 per cent this year, are largely due to the agreements reached at the Social Consultation Council on the income policy for 1987 and 1988.

Discrimination is formally prohibited by the Constitution of the Portuguese Republic and by the national laws. The prohibition of discriminatory behaviour and procedures, as enshrined in the standard-setting international texts of the ILO, is intimately bound up with the guarantee of equality of opportunity and treatment, which is also embodied in international legal texts.

Nevertheless, we note – and the Report of the Director-General dwells on this in detail – that a few Conventions, adopted during periods of accelerated economic growth and full employment, are beginning to be of less and less value to their beneficiaries, who being covered by systems of protection with shaky bases and justifications are not as well placed on the labour market as their competitors and are therefore in danger of being edged out by these.

This applies particularly to women, who, although seemingly protected by the prohibition of night work introduced by Conventions Nos. 4, 41 and 89, adopted respectively in 1919, 1934 and 1948, are at a disadvantage compared to men in their access to employment because of this prohibition. Specifically, in the case of Portugal, for an active population of 4,530,000 workers, the rate of activity of men is 55.2 per cent whereas that of women is 38.2 per cent. On the other hand, the female unemployment rate is 55.34 per cent whereas that of males is 44.65 per cent for a total of 356,900 unemployed.

We are particularly satisfied to see that this situation is a source of concern to the ILO which proposes to consider the prohibition of night work for women at its next meeting.

We are convinced that the conclusions of this analysis will make it possible to find satisfactory solutions that will put an end to the torrent of denunciations by industrialised countries, to which my Government has also now begun to give consideration.

It is with great satisfaction that my Government has noted the importance given to technical co-operation within the overall activities of the ILO, and its development during the last few years. In this connection, I should like to refer to the link between technical co-operation at the bilateral and multilateral levels.

My country, within the limits of its resources, is conducting an active policy of co-operation with a number of countries, especially with those with which we believe we have special links, such as the African countries where Portuguese is the official language.

These countries are facing difficulties resulting from the development process, magnified in many cases by regional conflicts, whose burden unfairly falls upon these countries. In other cases, these difficulties are due to the fact that they are single-crop countries, or to natural disasters such as drought.

After having overcome the consequences of decolonisation and struck a balance in our mutual relations, it has been easy for us to find areas of technical co-operation which continue to be developed and deepened. This is true of sectors where it is also possible to carry out technical co-operation programmes under the ILO's responsibility.

We believe that these are not competitive but complementary actions and thus it is necessary to establish links between them.

It is precisely because we believe in this association of efforts that my country and the ILO have recently decided to increase our collaboration in terms of technical co-operation through an additional protocol to the agreement of 1982. We believe that this protocol, which is at present fully executed will be of benefit to all the parties concerned: Portugal, the ILO and recipient countries.

I would conclude my statement by three considerations.

First of all, I should like to emphasise the remarkable number of ratifications of Conventions recorded – 5,311 in all – by the end of 1987, which reflects the importance of the ILO and its standards which continue to guide the behaviour of States in the many forms taken in practice by actions to promote the recognition, protection and enforcement of human rights. The Conventions ratified by Portugal are 65 in number and we are on the point of finalising the ratification process for two other Conventions, including the Minimum Age Conventions, 1973, (No. 138).

Secondly, my country firmly believes that international standards on human rights must be ethical and above the law and must be imposed upon States when these are defining their political regimes. Accordingly, the procedures followed by the monitoring bodies as regards the interpretation and application of these standards in relation to basic human rights must be unequivocal.

Thirdly and lastly, the Portuguese Government is of the opinion, concerning the debate on the rate at which the ILO should be elaborating standards, some prudence should be observed in producing new standards in view of the difficulties confronted by economic development, which determines ratifications that are responsible and generate commitments. It has been noted that the rate of ratification of the most recent Conventions is much lower, which means that the present economic situation is not propitious for the acceptance of the commitments that stem from these new instruments.

On the other hand, this reduction in new standard-setting activities should be accompanied by careful thought about questions relating to earlier Conventions so as to determine whether they are appropriate to the present situation, what are their essential aspects that have to be maintained and whether others are secondary and could be adopted to changing reality.

In this connection, may I make a brief comment. The pace of change in our times has never been experienced before and is generating new problems for the world of labour.

The industrial society based upon units of production which were thought to be eternal has been seriously undermined. Everywhere new production processes are appearing based on flexible units which have introduced new concepts and forms of organisation that cannot be ignored.

It is not easy to reconcile the concepts of flexibility inherent in our times with guarantees making each production unit a place of professional and personal fulfilment. To reconcile essentially economic problems with the more demanding concept of development in which considerations of equity and even of emotional needs acquire increasing importance is the great challenge we have to face in the immediate future.

I am sure that the work done here will increase our understanding of questions which, as a whole, concern what is most precious in any society: human resources and the continued promotion of their total dignity and fulfilment at every level.

Mrs. THALEN (Minister of Labour, Sweden) - I am pleased, Mr. President, to join the many speakers who have congratulated you on your election as President of this 75th Session of our Conference.

I note with appreciation that the Director-General has devoted this year's Report to the ways in which the ILO can enhance its contribution to the maintenance and extension of human rights. I also want to compliment him and his staff for developing this theme on a very broad basis, and for including the particularly relevant discussion of the means by which ILO standards and technical co-operation in many fields can assist to safeguard minimum labour standards.

The ILO indeed has its particular area of responsibility within the overall efforts of the United Nations system to promote and protect human rights. But each State has the duty to observe the human rights that are necessary for a peaceful and secure world, based on universal respect for the freedom and dignity of the individual.

It is not a truism to say so. The United Nations Covenants concerning human rights and the ILO Conventions in this field are those which have received the greatest adherence. Yet, in all parts of the world there exists a gap between the formal acceptance of human rights and the extent to which they are effectively enjoyed. The width of this gap shows that the promotion of the principles of freedom, equality, security and dignity in work and in life cannot be achieved only by the passive acceptance of international standards. It requires a conscious, sustained and vigilant effort by each State, by each trade union, by each employer, by each member of society, as well as by international bodies set up by the world community.

At the same time, in our unequal world it is important also to ensure that individuals are given opportunity to enjoy their social and economic rights. We cannot talk of human rights abstractly from the realities of poverty and lack of resources.

It is only through dynamic and practical policies for economic and social development that States can give real substance to these rights. And therefore we must all contribute to the reduction of the gap between the rich and the poor, between the developed and the developing nations of the world.

But economic development and scientific progress must never become a pretext for flouting human rights. Preoccupations with economic development must not make us forget that the aim of all human endeavour, in whatever field, must be to advance human freedom and dignity. We must never sacrifice the ends to the means!

Facing the grim statistics that in our world some 100 million are unemployed, some 500 million are underemployed and some 900 million are living in extreme poverty, the Director-General puts the question "Have full employment and the right to work become outdated concepts?"

His own firm and bold reply is that such counsels of despair have no place in the ILO. I cannot but agree to that answer. Unemployment represents a tragic waste of economic and human resources, a wasted opportunity for development and social progress, and a threat to many human rights. Both theory and reality tell us that employment provides an essential link between basic economic, social and human needs.

The question is not, therefore, whether full employment should remain a central goal, but how it can be attained.

There is, of course, no universal prescription that can produce the miracle cure to this most fundamental of all the world's social and economic ills. But through an open and frank dialogue, through research and international co-operation we can learn ourselves and inform and teach each other how to reach this goal.

Income-security measures in favour of those seeking but unable to find work, however important such measures may be, cannot be an adequate substitute for productive and remunerative employment. Income-support measures are indeed necessary as a last resort, and here I note with particular satisfaction that this is a basic theme in the second reading of the proposed instrument on employment promotion and social security. Within the context of social security I would also like to stress my Government's support for earlier Conference calls for the elimination of differences of treatment between men and women under social security schemes.

The essence of the important goal "the right to work" is not any kind of legal aspect but the practical policies that promote full, productive and freely chosen employment. It is therefore imperative to create the macro-economic conditions and to undertake the reforms in national policies and international economic relations that will make a resumption of economic and employment growth in all countries possible.

As was stated by the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment last November, this requires a major effort of world-wide structural adjustment, something that we know can be a very painful process. It is therefore critical to understand that the real threats to employment are the attempts to refrain from adjustment. Adjustment should be facilitated rather than impeded. The longer it is delayed, the harder it will be. But while society as a whole benefits from change, it does have an obligation to share the costs of its consequences. The burden of adjustment should be shared among countries and within countries.

In shaping tomorrow's society and world of work we have to eradicate one of the most serious and dangerous human and social evils of our time, namely the problems of discriminatory relations between human beings of different race, colour or ethnic origin. To put it bluntly – the fear we have for those who are different and the way we treat our neighbour who is different.

There is hardly any country that can truthfully claim to have eliminated all tension between races, ethnic and cultural groups, between the majority and the minority. There is hardly any country that is free from the attitudes, prejudices, fears and emotions that fuel hatred and bigotry, violence and discrimination because of skin or creed.

That is one of the reasons why Sweden favours the adoption of a new United Nations Convention on the rights of all migrant workers and their families. Let me add that we have appreciated the ILO's contribution to the Convention, and that we look forward to effective co-operation between the ILO and the UN also when it comes to the supervision of the Convention.

The most persistent and profound example of discriminatory practices is South Africa's policy of apartheid which is a negation of all that is decent and humane, which is a threat to peace and development on a whole continent.

It is often complicated to find the right words when we speak a foreign language. We have to struggle to find the correct nuances. But when we discuss apartheid only the complete abolition of apartheid can radically change the situation in southern Africa.

The three ethical principles of human dignity, of solidarity and of tolerance are echoed in the opening words of the ILO's Constitution that reads: "Universal and lasting peace can be established only if it is based upon social justice."

To contribute to this effort, to realise these principles and to build a society based upon respect and not on fear is indeed a common responsibility.

Interpretation from French: Mr. JUNCKER (Minister of Labour, Luxembourg) – Mr. President, may I first of all extend to you my congratulations and those of the Government of Luxembourg on your election to the presidency of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. Your professional competence and your human qualities will, I am sure, have a favourable influence on the development of the work of the session.

My congratulations and thanks also go to Mr. Francis Blanchard, Director-General of the International Labour Office, and his co-workers for their tireless work in the service of the world of labour within the framework of an international body specifically set up to further the cause of social justice, thereby contributing to ensuring universal and lasting peace.

In a world such as ours, marked mainly by flagrant inequalities between rich and poor countries as well as by a deep crisis of our social and economic systems, the activity of an international organisation like the ILO has become irreplaceable.

On the occasion of the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights by the United Nations, the Director-General of the International Labour Office stresses in his Report the absolute necessity for the ILO to strengthen human rights through the development of its standard-setting activity and technical co-operation.

This task is even more of a priority in that human rights are inherent in the human personality. This concept leads to the consequence that they are inalienable, universal in the sense that they apply to every human being without distinction of race, sex, political opinion or religion, and finally that they are individual, in other words they belong to each human being in particular and not the community, whether it is called the people, the nation or the State.

The idea of the equal dignity of every human being is the very foundation of human rights which are not only civil, political and cultural rights, but also economic and social. Among the latter are freedom of association, freedom to work, the elimination of discrimination and equality of opportunity, the right to work, the right to minimum wages, the right to social security, the right to satisfactory working conditions and standard of living.

These rights should not, however, remain merely theoretical; they must be effectively implemented, which is something the ILO, since its inception, has always been endeavouring to achieve with increasing efficiency on three levels: the definition of human rights through the adoption of Conventions and Recommendations; examination of the application of ILO standards through impartial and objective monitoring procedures; and finally, assistance in carrying out these international labour standards through technical co-operation and advisory services.

To bring into being one of the most important basic rights defined in the Declaration of Philadelphia, namely freedom of expression and association, the ILO has established, through international Conventions, a whole series of principles, of universal application on freedom of association and protection of the right to organise as well as the right to engage in collective organisation and bargaining.

The organisation of workers and employers on an occupational basis in the form of trade unions is one of the fundamental phenomena of modern industrial societies. The trade unions have set their stamp on the social and economic life of most countries.

By ratifying the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949, (No. 98) through an Act of 10 February 1958, Luxembourg has fully adhered to the fundamental guarantees included in those two instruments, which have so far been very reliable guides concerning the protection of unionised wage-earners against discrimination in employment, and the protection of the unions themselves against any interference in their constitution, administration and activities.

On this 40th anniversary of the adoption of these Conventions, we can state that one of the principal merits of the ILO is to have secured recognition of the international value of the principles of trade union freedom and of having contributed to the effective application of the general principle of freedom of association which is one of the main safeguards of peace and social justice.

Although Luxembourg has not yet ratified the international labour Conventions concerning discrimination in employment and occupation, policies and programmes of vocational guidance and training, as well as termination of employment, my country fully subscribes to the standards set therein for the promotion of equality of opportunity and treatment in the fields concerned, for all categories of workers including women and migrant workers.

To take account of recent developments on the social level, I support the proposal of the Director-General of the International Labour Office "to widen the scope of ILO standards concerning discrimination in employment and occupation, so as to make them cover generally distinctions, preferences or exclusions in employment and occupation on any grounds which are not objectively justified."

However, to meet the objections which are flooding in on us as to the rigorousness of certain provisions for the protection of women in employment, I think the time has come to take the necessary initiatives at the level of the ILO to revise certain standards concerning night work for women in industry and maternity protection.

Moreover, as far as the conditions of work and remuneration of migrant workers are concerned, the constant effort of the ILO to ensure protection of migrant workers has been chiefly through the establishment of international rules concerning equality of treatment.

Although this standard-setting activity has not always received the desired response, it does nonetheless continue to provide the necessary impetus and guidelines for the principles of equality of treatment and complete protection of migrant workers in terms of employment and remuneration to be generally implemented for reasons of social justice. I should like to note in this context that Luxembourg will in the near future be ratifying the European Convention concerning the legal status of migrant workers.

Finally, looking towards a promotional approach to the principle of equality of opportunity and equality of treatment in employment, I should like to endorse the ILO Director-General's proposal to examine soon the various forms of precarious work some of which will soon be covered by a specific regulation in Luxembourg.

The Employment Policies Convention, 1964 (No. 122), is based on the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which declares that everyone has a right to work and to a free choice of his work. This is the most important of the international standards relating to economic and social rights from the point of view of employment and requires States which have ratified it to apply an active policy to promote full and productive employment freely chosen.

This Convention - a promotional one - which rather than laying down specific standards which a State is bound to reach through ratification, sets objectives which must be pursued through a programme of continuous activity and requires consultation with the representatives of employers and workers by seeking data, views and reactions on employment problems that concern them and of which they have experience. The interaction both of government initiatives and of the social partners will therefore be a sine qua non for any action to improve the employment situation.

Unemployment is not acceptable in our society and represents a challenge both economically and socially to our national communities. It is therefore indispensable to give priority, as the Report of the Director-General of the International Labour Office indicates, to the various bases for economic growth which will be richer in jobs, particularly by reorienting production towards sectors which will produce more jobs in future.

The adaptation of training to the transformation of the production process is a very important decisive factor in the success of employment policy. It is essential that education and vocational training prepare the young in good time for the new occupations which are emerging due to structural change and the spread of new technologies. Only at that cost and in those conditions can productive and remunerative employment be maintained and developed in the future.

On the social level, wages have always had a symbolic value. Workers, employers and governments must give priority attention to wages policy.

The Declaration of Human Rights and the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights recognise that every person has the right to just and favourable remuneration ensuring a decent existence for the worker and his family. To meet these principles, wages policy, as part and parcel of economic policy in general, must pursue a triple objective to combat inflation, to encourage the growth of production, and, finally, to ensure equitable distribution of the national income. We should be very pleased to see that many countries have ratified the Minimum Wage-Fixing Machinery Convention, 1928 (No. 26) under the terms of which national authorities are called upon to take direct action on determining those wages which economic forces alone might tend to set at too low a level to meet the minimum needs of the workers concerned.

Since its creation, the ILO has borne the brunt of its activity in the field of occupational safety and health largely through establishing international standards on the protection of workers' health on the basis of exhaustive studies. These instruments particularly concern dangerous substances representing specific risks to the health of workers, occupational diseases, compensation in the case of accidents at work, protection of machinery, organisation of industrial medicine in the enterprise and protection of workers against radiation. The member States, too, are given information and advice by ILO, which extends many opportunities to industrial managers, trade union officials, administrators and specialists to extend their knowledge and experience through exchanges taking place at meetings under its aegis, thereby fulfilling a technical assistance function with encouraging results even since it was set up.

Looking to the future, the ILO has the duty of leading governments and the social partners to recognition of the urgency of a more energetic and systematic effort to combat occupational risks, to make available to them the accumulated experience of countries throughout the world, and to suggest that they examine methods of organisation of prevention and techniques of protection which have proved to valuable and provide advice and assistance, when needed.

The right of every individual to social security having been recognised by the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights. The ILO has participated, since it was set up, in spreading and consolidating social insurance on the basis of three fundamental principles – universality, equality and solidarity.

Various Conventions and Recommendations on social insurance, which have dealt successively with unemployment, maternity, compensation for accidents at work and occupational diseases, health insurance, disability insurance, life insurance and old-age insurance, have contributed in large measure to establishing the essential nature of this type of protection and implementing its development.

The dominant trend in the recent development of social security, which corresponds to a profound desire on the part of the persons protected, is to be shown in the increasingly urgent search for effective protection. This permanent search for real security has transformed concepts, methods and techniques of social security.

Thus, national systems of social security today, through their dimension, their cost and the impact of their machinery for allocating and transferring income, represent an essential factor of economic equilibrium and an effective instrument in regulating growth. In addition, programming techniques have made it possible to evaluate the comparative development of social benefit and the national income, taking account particularly of the characteristics of the protected population and legislative guidelines, and have attracted attention to the section of national income devoted to social security and to the possible opportunity for normalising the determined proportion or harmonising its development.

It is therefore essential to improve the procedures of information, consultation and participation to ensure that these new techniques will not be too divorced from social realities and their use. With perfect knowledge of the social aspirations which bring about the advance of traditional methods of protection, the future prospects for social security allow one to hope for a radical simplification of its structure and a considerable extension of its functions so as to ensure more complete and more individualised security, due to improved techniques of communication and social organisation. In particular, in the industrialised countries it is essential to revise the principles and operation of social security in the light of the development of social risks, of the improvement of technical means of organisation and management, as well as of progress in aspirations arising from improved standards of living.

The ILO must respond to this development of social security through its traditional means of information and co-operation, and through means adapted to actual needs, that is, research, co-ordination of standard-setting activities, the application of new forms of international aid for social development in keeping with the principles of solidarity and social justice which have inspired the institution of social security, as well as the activity of the ILO.

These are the few comments I wanted to make in the general discussion.

It is by encouraging the improvement of living conditions with the greatest respect for human rights through renewed standard-setting activity, an effective system of monitoring and strengthened co-operation with the other agencies of the United Nations that the ILO will be able to meet the challenges of the future in the areas of which I have just spoken.

Mr. NOEL (Government delegate, Grenada) – First of all, on behalf of my delegation and myself, and also on behalf of the Government and people of Grenada, I bring to this Conference warmest greetings and felicitations; and secondly, I wish to join all those who have expressed their congratulations to the President, and the Vice-Presidents who have been elected to their respective offices of distinction at this 75th Session of the International Labour Conference.

During the President's inaugural address to this Conference, I was very heartened to hear him say "the ILO is of benefit to all States, whether they are large, medium-sized or small".

Too often are small States ignored when consideration is being given to major economic and social development. This attitude is not only myopic, but is also fraught with danger. Let me emphasise. Grenada is a small island State in the Caribbean. Yet, it was that very island which, from 1979-83, embarked upon an ideological experiment, the result of which should serve as an eye-opener to all democratic nations the world over.

Since that period, however, the reintroduction of parliamentary democracy has restored the political and social balance in the country. This is significant because gone are the days of early morning arrests, torture and imprisonment without due process of law.

All ILO activities are directly related to human rights, and the Director-General's Report has accentuated their importance as a common responsibility.

My Government firmly subscribes to the principles of human rights, for they offer mankind a chance to live in peace, dignity and brotherhood.

As a practical example of intent, the Government of Grenada, since assuming office in December 1984, has taken steps to remove all traces of dictatorship and oppression by restoring fundamental freedom including freedom of the press, freedom of workshop, freedom of expression and association, to the extent that the Government is sometimes accused in some quarters of permitting too much freedom. But such is the paradox of democracy.

Based on the reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General, I wish to advance on behalf of my country some further thoughts, as follows.

Grenada would like to draw the ILO's attention to the high rate of youth unemployment in the world today, but in Granada particularly. One of the cause of our high unemployment rate has been the prices of our agricultural export on the international market. Agriculture is still the main contributor to our gross domestic product, but because of the depressed prices our young people are not attracted to agriculture.

It is really not the best encouragement to tell farmers, especially young farmers, to produce more when they find that the increased production does not enable them to enjoy a higher standard of living because of the wide gap between agricultural export prices and the prices of imported goods. This situation is exacerbated by the protectionist policies of industrialised countries which militate against the developing countries, so that not only are we faced with adverse terms of trade, but we also have to contend with high tariff walls.

Three years ago, I expressed the following view: to say that growing unemployment and social dislocation are due in part to unfavourable terms of trade is potentially explosive. Deteriorating industrial relations do not derive only from poor labour-management relations.

An environment not conducive to fair returns on labour can hardly be conducive to high productivity. It is our belief that the right atmosphere must exist if workers are to feel they are operating in an environment that savours of industrial justice.

This is why the Government of Grenada is fully convinced that the doctrine of tripartism on which the ILO operates is perhaps the only we can harmonise industrial relations.

Our firm commitment to tripartism is not confined to purposes of representation at ILO Conferences. The Government ensures that the principle of tripartism is adhered to. A draft Labour Code for Grenada has been prepared with the technical support of the ILO. The Code is being studied by our Labour Advisory Board, which consists of government, employers' and workers' representatives in equal number. The work of the Board in this regard is aimed at an approved Labour Code by year's end.

As a means of encouraging wider participation in the decision-making process, the Government of my country has set up a special local government advisory committee charged with the responsibility of making recommendations for the reintroduction of local government. To date, the committee has made several recommendations which will be reflected in a green paper, soon to be introduced in Parliament.

Grenada is committed to implement the norms of human rights. We have had a reasonably fair experience in the democratic tradition, so it has become an entrenched institution in my country.

The Director-General's choice of human rights and the ILO must be complimented. But can one speak of freedom, democracy and human rights and neglect the abhorrence which is daily taking place in South Africa in the name of apartheid? All member States of the ILO should work towards putting an end to that scourge against humanity, so that the world – in its conscience – can better implement the indispensable union of ethics and economics, and so take a step further towards greater understanding and, thus, ultimately, to more peace, more freedom and more unity within the human family.

Mr. KATSAV (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Israel) – First of all allow me to congratulate the President on his election as President of this session of the Conference. I am convinced that under his guidance this Conference will be successful.

The theme selected this year by the Director-General – human rights – is very important. The ILO is especially concerned with the implementation of human rights around which many of its activities revolve. First and foremost, there are the principles of freedom of association, the rights of collective bargaining and non-discrimination in employment and occupation, all of which are embodied in ILO Conventions.

I fully agree with the Director-General's observation that it is important for the universal enjoyment of human rights to ensure that workers have the material means essential for their well-being.

Freedom from poverty is one of the most crucial aspects of human rights. Respect for human rights is a cornerstone of Israeli policy. This is well illustrated in recent legislation. Equal opportunity in employment, prevention of discrimination among workers and the establishment of a minimum wage system are some of the areas covered by this new legislation.

Israel has always recognised the right to productive and freely chosen employment, as a target of national policy. Unlike some other industrialised countries, Israel has never considered unemployment as a measure of economic policy. Indeed, even during the state of economic emergency that has existed during the last three years, we have taken all the necessary steps to ensure that, full employment is not affected by recovery.

The economic programme provided for a real cut in the national budget and a certain erosion in the wages of workers. At the same time an agreement was made between the Government, the trade unions and employers on a price and wage freeze.

A further economic programme was introduced in 1987 which aimed at reinforcing the achievements of the first economic programme and paving the way for the start of the growth process for the coming years. Central to the programme was a series of reforms in the areas of taxation, capital, credit and foreign currency. We were aware that our goals could not be realised in the short term. Nevertheless, the first signs of growth could already be seen by last year.

With regard to Judea, Samaria and the Gaza district, the principles of the employment policy of the Israeli Government are: full employment, freedom in choosing one's place of work, and equality of benefits and wages in employment.

In 1987, full employment continued in Judea, Samaria and Gaza and the level of unemployment dropped during the last year to below 3 per cent. In spite of present events, the employment situation is better than it has ever been during the last 40 years.

This full employment in Judea, Samaria and Gaza has been possible thanks to the fact that more than 100,000 residents of these areas have been working in Israel. Most of these workers, about 80 per cent, are commuters who return each evening to their homes and to their towns and villages.

The organised workers in Israel from these areas are employed in accordance with the law and enjoy full social benefits, such as vacation pay, sick pay, health insurance, work accident insurance, and pensions.

In fact, full employment in Israel is one of the main reasons for the social and economic advancement of the residents of Judea, Samaria and the Gaza district.

We were very happy that the Director-General accepted my invitation to visit Israel, and that we had the honour and pleasure of welcoming him on his visit two months ago. We were able to discuss with him, among other matters, co-operation between Israel and the Organisation, which would include projects for the benefit of workers including those of Judea, Samaria and the Gaza district.

We should be glad to increase that co-operation with the Director-General to include further fields of common effort.

We cannot ignore the broad economic and social developments that have taken place since the beginning of Israel's administration in these areas. The economic growth of these areas has been most rapid over the past two decades and the population there has widely benefited from this growth.

Judea, Samaria and the Gaza district have never been an independent self-contained economic unit and their residents have long needed, both before and after 1967, to seek employment outside these areas.

The rapid growth of activities in these areas has been stimulated in no small measure by contacts established with the economy of Israel. Employment in Israel and the subsequent increase in real wages and other income have served to lessen considerably the effect of limited market size or very low purchasing power of the local population.

It is significant that even the increase in unemployment and other economic difficulties two years ago in Israel did not lead to the worsening of conditions of employment for the residents of Judea, Samaria and the Gaza district.

We have to evaluate the social and economic progress of the Arab population under the Israeli administration since 1967. The increased rate of economic growth, the rise in employment and the sharp drop in unemployment, the improvement in the standard of living, wages, social benefits, education and training have been most significant, especially in comparison with what existed previously, with the conditions in neighbouring countries and other developing states, and with United Nations development goals.

In fact, the rate of growth in Judea, Samaria and the Gaza district has been much higher than that of many developing countries during the same period, and in Judea, Samaria and the Gaza district there is a high positive correlation between the growth in gross domestic product and other indicators of the socio-economic progress of the entire population; for example, private consumption per person, the increased investment in housing, the greater expenditure for education and health and the tremendous increase in the ownership of durable goods.

The average wage of workers from Judea, Samaria and the Gaza in Israel is very much above the minimum wage. In addition, in spite of the fact that the workers from Judea, Samaria and the Gaza are not residents of Israel, they enjoy a lower rate of taxation on their income than residents of Israel.

Before 1967, the situation was characterised by a low level of development, slow growth, substantial emigration, very low education levels, very limited capital stock, low employment and the stagnation of income levels.

Many of the difficulties in the employment situation of the residents of Judea, Samaria and the Gaza, such as irregular employment and problems of unemployment among graduates, do not exist in these areas alone – or in Israel alone – those problems are also faced by many other countries in the world.

Moreover, workers from Judea, Samaria and the Gaza district who were dismissed from their work in the Arab countries were absorbed in jobs in Judea, Samaria and the Gaza and in Israel.

As to trade unions, my Government is fully committed to the maintenance of the principle of freedom of association. However, this principle should not be misused to endanger public security and human life. The trade unions' activities as a cover for such hostile acts should be condemned.

Those responsible for the recent events in Judea, Samaria and Gaza have set themselves the declared goal of obstructing and preventing employment in Israel. It is considered by them to justify any means, such as setting fire to employment bureaux and buses and stations that take workers to Israel, and terrorising and physically harming them.

We firmly believe that our Organisation, the ILO, which stands for freedom to work, should make its voice heard against the obstruction of the free will of residents of Judea, Samaria and Gaza who wish to work in Israel.

Before concluding, I would like to refer to the Arab resolution at this Conference. It completely ignored the rules of due process by calling for the condemnation of Israel on the grounds of baseless accusations. They seek to exploit the Conference, in order to attack Israel politically by the introduction of completely external issues into its deliberations.

Let us hope that the ILO will never take part in political conflicts between its Members. I therefore call on all the Members of our Organisation to reject this resolution.

The ILO was established for the sole and express purpose of helping working people in all countries to improve their standard of living and conditions of work, and to ensure that they can lead their lives in dignity. What can this resolution possibly do for the workers in Judea, Samaria and the Gaza district?

This resolution will not harm Israel or help the Arab workers. It is the ILO itself that will be harmed by the adoption of this resolution, because it will be seen as evidence that our Organisation, too, has finally yielded to the virus of politicisation, by which so many other organisations have been infected.

It will be seen as evidence that the ILO will be turned from a valuable instrument for the promotion of workers' interests throughout the world into a platform for empty propaganda.

It would be a tragedy for the ILO and for the whole world community if this were to happen and if, as a result, States were to cease to attach to the activities and work of the ILO the weight that they give it at present. There are indicators of such negative attitudes to the ILO even now. It is therefore our hope that in the best interest of this Organisation itself, the Arab text will fail, so that the Organisation will be able to concentrate on the real work it has to do, in the spirit in which it has been created and on the basis of its principles.

Interpretation from French: Mr. MENSAH (Government delegate, Benin) – It is with delight and great pleasure that we wish to address to the President, on behalf of our country, the People's Republic of Benin, and our delegation, our sincere congratulations on his election to the presidency of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. We are convinced that in view of his personal experience and his qualities he will preside with ease and success over the debates of our session.

May I take this opportunity to express to the Director-General of the International Labour Office, Mr. Blanchard, on behalf of our Government, our deep gratitude for the assistance he has offered to our country and his sincere dedication to our Organisation with the sole aim of promoting peace and social progress in the world.

In conformity with the rules of procedure of our Conference, he has submitted to us for our consideration, as he has always done, and with his usual skill, a Report of excellent quality, the two main themes of which are concerned with Human rights – A common responsibility and the activities of the ILO in the field of technical co-operation.

After a thorough study of this Report, we should like to express our grateful thanks to him and all the members of his staff who have contributed to the planning and drafting of this Report.

As concerns the first theme of this Report, human rights, the Director-General, in opening a debate on such a specific and many-faceted topic as this, is confronting our Organisation with one of the most sensitive and delicate issues of our times.

In praising his courage our delegation intends to make its contribution to this debate which could not in fact have a more appropriate setting than an organisation such as the International Labour Organisation whose standard-setting activities are absolutely in line with the conditions in which human rights should be enjoyed and implemented.

The subject of human rights is a matter of burning topicality.

But above and beyond this consideration, dare we believe that in these circumstances the ILO can find the answer to the uncertainties, anxieties and despair expressed by the silent majority of the populations of our countries, marginalised by hardship, poverty and disease, notwithstanding the existence of human rights?

As members of the international community, have our States shouldered the responsibility incumbent on each of them as concerns the effective implementation of human rights within the spheres of their competence?

Can we, the developing countries, use the same yardsticks to evaluate the failures and successes of our States and the international community in regard to the application of human rights?

On this occasion it is therefore important that we should learn with discernment and conscientiousness how to make this concept more accessible, more comprehensible and more easily digestible with a view to ensuring its effective application in certain parts of the world where its definition will appear ambiguous and the subject of dissension.

In our opinion, the problems of human rights in the developing countries should be expressed in terms of the right to life, the right to survival, the right to respect of the human person, the right to food, the right to freedom, the right to employment, the right to participate fully in the framing of the rules that should govern the life of the international community and those that should contribute towards the furtherance of human well-being at the international level.

It is clear that all of us want to play the leading role in our own history. This presupposes a recognition of our identity and our legitimate ambitions, whatever our race, the colour of our skin, the level of our development, the religion we profess and the opinion we express.

For our part, we believe that human rights as the objective and trend-setting expression of human and community self-assertion cannot exist unless they are affirmed and guaranteed indivisibly and accepted as a genuine universal code of reference in the unity and diversity of our social and cultural values.

Our delegation rejoices at the efforts being made in the field of the implementation of human rights by the international community.

It is important to consider as a part of the concrete achievements of the international community in this respect the legal reforms undertaken by the United Nations which have fortunately led to the adoption of the International Covenants on Economic, Social, and Cultural Rights, and on Civil and Political Rights.

However, our delegation is one of those that believes that, while efforts have been made in respect of human rights, regrettably in some parts of the world, fundamental rights and public freedoms are not yet even enshrined in constitutions and appear to be merely theoretical standards which in the societies of these regions have no legal or moral value.

In this context, our delegation takes pride in the efforts made by our own country to frame and secure the adoption in the appropriate forms of our own Constitution which is for my country a veritable code of democracy.

By means of this instrument our country has committed itself to a process which should enable it to install slowly but surely an integral democracy geared to the promotion of Beninese citizens.

Since it became a modern constitutional State, the People's Republic of Benin has always demonstrated its attachment to the respect of the fundamental freedoms: the right to work, the right to strike, the right to freedom of association, freedom of thought, of conscience, of worship, of opinion. These, in the People's Republic of Benin, are realities for every Beninese citizen.

We should like to add also that any foreigner persecuted for having defended the just cause of peace and democracy may choose to reside in Benin in full security and full freedom.

While the People's Republic of Benin is highly placed today on the least economically advanced countries, it has fortunately not yet acquired the sad privilege of going on record as a country with a reign of terror because in Benin human beings are sacred.

What is more, the hope for an improvement in the process of respect for human rights and public freedoms in Benin is growing as a result of the concrete actions of the competent courts, which in the performance of their functions ensure that laws, rights and public freedoms do not suffer the fate of certain sacred precepts which are violated with impunity.

But I can by no means say here that our country has all the resources it needs to ensure full application of human rights or international labour standards.

However, while it is true that in this respect errors have been committed at certain critical times in our country, this has been the result of misunderstandings that have arisen out of our sole concern for saving the social order in peril.

In this connection I should like to say how proud we are that the legal and structural insufficiencies observed in these circumstances have been remedied as they have been revealed.

Despite the contribution of the international community and our governments, in all honesty we cannot but observe that a wide gap still separates the goals set by the Universal Declaration of Human Rights immediately after the Second World War and the achievements that have taken place since 1948.

But in analysing this situation we see that the gap is likely to widen yet further if appropriate measures are not taken to accelerate the development of the Third World countries threatened by real poverty and technological insecurity.

That is why, in our opinion, in order to remedy this situation it is necessary to redefine a new relationship between rich and poor countries.

This being so, the International Labour Organisation, because of its world-wide prestige, its social objectives, its tripartite structure, its standard-setting activities, should be able to play a pioneering role to ensure that moral strength prevails, together with a political will appropriate to society in which the forces of violence, injustice, war and dehumanisation of man, can give way to other forms of greater value such as peace, security, solidarity and co-operation.

As regards international labour standards in particular as an element of human rights, nobody can be unaware of the praiseworthy efforts made by the International Labour Organisation since its foundation in 1919 in the field of the international Conventions it frames, and for whose application it is responsible by means of a coherent and dynamic system of supervisory machinery.

The International Labour Organisation as a means of implementing human rights should continue its standard-setting activities in accordance with the demands of the international community and our respective States.

This being so, the International Labour Organisation, faced with the need for a new human rights, must engage in few forms of debate with a view to reorienting international relations with a view to saving mankind.

These are the reflections which seem to us to be worth contributing at this stage to the debate on the first part of the Report submitted to the Conference for examination.

As concerns Part II of this Report, mainly devoted to the activities of the Organisation in the course of the year 1987, the Director-General has, in his usual manner, taken stock, courageously and responsibly, of the activities and programmes carried out by the International Labour Office in the field of international labour standards, help for young workers and old workers, industrial relations, social security, employment in the rural world, vocational training and in sectoral activities.

We should like to take this opportunity to express once again to the Director-General, the satisfaction of our Government with the technical and financial support he has provided to us to enable us to carry out various projects in our country, including the financing of a lengthy mission with a view to providing new jobs for the young university graduates and workers with public enterprises.

In view of the interest taken by our country and its leaders in the carrying out of these projects, we venture to hope that the ILO will continue to respond favourably, as it has always done, to our priority needs.

In the case, in particular, of social security it would be desirable for the International Labour Organisation in collaboration with the competent bodies to carry out the technical studies required in order to lend new strength to the social security funds which are at present threatened as a result of the upsurge in redundancies.

As concerns the intensification of technical co-operation activities, our Organisation will continue to be a vehicle for peace, security and fundamental human rights.

There is no doubt that the social development of mankind and the real improvement of the conditions of life of all the workers of the world, together with international co-operation in the field of human rights, will be possible only if people can live in peace and solidarity.

This is why in broadening the scope of its activities in the field of international co-operation in social matters, the International Labour Organisation must continue its struggle against poverty, social injustice and the degrading violations of human rights.

Mr. CALAMATTA (Workers' delegate, Malta) – Mr. President, first of all allow me, as other speakers have before me, to extend to you my congratulations on your election to the high and prestigious office of the presidency of this 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. At the same time I wish to convey to this Conference the greetings of all the workers of the Republic of Malta, both those organised in my union – the General Workers' Union (GWU) – and those represented by the other trade unions which are grouped together within the Conference of Trade Unions (CMTU).

I feel it my duty to comment on Part I of the Report submitted to this Conference by the ILO Director-General regarding human rights which, as he justifiably points out, could be jeopardised by certain economic policies and measures. He warns us that preoccupation with economic issues to the detriment of employment growth and social policy could not only jeopardise human rights but are a threat to democracy and peace itself.

As the Director-General rightly stresses in his Report, gainful employment is a vital link to the enjoyment of other human rights – but full employment has, unfortunately, ceased to be a major goal in many countries as they grapple with inflation and other economic ills.

On behalf of the workers of Malta I agree with him and share his grave concern because governments in many countries in all parts of the world are following policies and influencing the main centres of production, which instead of creating employment are increasing unemployment – and unemployment is a major social evil that could not be justified by laws of profit or economic policies. Unemployment is an evil which prevents working people from earning an honest living and from participating fully in society. Unemployment is also immoral because it deprives so many people of the possibility of realising their own human vocation.

Certainly, such a situation poses the biggest threat to democracy, peace and security. It is the source of so many political and social upheavals in many countries. And all of us must be greatly worried by the fact that world-wide the problem of unemployment is of great magnitude. Suffice it to say, as has been pointed out in another report to this Conference (Report VII on Rural employment promotion), the world needs almost one million new jobs every week between now and the year 2025 to cope with the scourge of unemployment.

We earnestly hope that this Conference can make – indeed, it must make – a constructive contribution to the search for further ways and means to resolve the negative problems affecting so adversely the world of work. We also earnestly hope that this Conference will define in a most positive and effective way the strategic orientation of multilateral co-operation within the ILO in the fight against the scourge of unemployment and the deterioration of the economic and social situation of the workers.

In their panic to try to resolve economic issues, many governments, even those with long tradition of democracy and respect for human rights and moral values, are seeking ways to diminish the strength of the trade unions and, because they consider them as an obstacle to their policies, are attacking the rights and freedoms of the trade unions and the lawful and natural rights of the workers to associate themselves in their organisations to shield their interests.

The onslaught on the very existence of trade unions in many countries and the violation of their rights and those of the workers create a highly dangerous situation. The trade unions are as important and indispensable as are governments, political parties, employers' organisations and even Churches.

The trade unions have a big role to play and without them, and without the enjoyment by the trade unions of the right to act and work in a free and democratic environment, no country could make industrial, economic and social progress which is really tangible and healthy for the population and for all strata of society.

In our opinion, in order to resolve the serious problems confronting the modern world and the ILO we must decisively revise the established approach and the methods of work of the Organisation to meet the interests of all countries and all the parties concerned.

As to the ILO Director-General's Report, I should like to refer in particular to his vision regarding the future of co-operation in the perspective of world-wide collaboration between one and all which sooner or later will have to play its part in the quest for a new international economic order, since the size of the problems faced by the world today constitutes an even more insistent and demanding call for concrete and unwavering solidarity.

The Director-General rightly stresses the need for the support of public opinion in confronting the great difficulties affecting the United Nations system, including the ILO and all other United Nations specialised agencies. This support is vital to the future of international co-operation.

Furthermore, the Director-General draws our attention to the fact that the failure of ILO member States to comply with their constitutional obligations will endanger, threaten and even reduce the Organisation's vital and urgent activities for the reduction of unemployment and eradication of poverty, which are spreading dangerously with the result that the poor are getting poorer and the rich are getting richer.

The gulf existing today between rich and poor and the situation of extreme poverty in which millions of people are living are an affront to humanity. The abysmal difference between the haves and the have-nots is incompatible with natural law and with the common sense which dictates that all humanity must have just and equal participation in the riches of the world.

The world's developed countries have an enormous weight of responsibility to help developing countries. The imbalance between the size of the debt of the underdeveloped countries and the capacity to pay it and the difference between the sums given to borrowers and the profits made by creditors are causing great damage to many countries.

I have spoken at length about human and trade union rights. My thoughts go to the plight of the Black workers and people of South Africa who are suppressed by the apartheid regime in that country. Last year the ILO reinforced its anti-apartheid activities when the Committee on Apartheid adopted conclusions on an updated Declaration.

But in spite of everything, apartheid still reigns supreme in South Africa, and all nations that really respect human dignity must have recourse to much stiffer actions to crush the apartheid regime.

While condemning the apartheid regime in South Africa, we must neither forget nor neglect the explosive situation in the Middle East where the Palestinian workers and people have been struggling for long years for their fundamental rights. All the peace-loving people of the world and all those who cherish democracy must give their moral and material support to the Palestinian so that they can regain the homeland which is theirs by right.

Over the past months we have witnessed the uprisings of Palestinian workers and people in the occupied territories of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

These uprisings have helped more than other events in the past years to show clearly to all humanity the degrading conditions in which the Palestinians are forced to live in refugee camps and in exile.

We condemn the South African apartheid regime, but we also must condemn the highhandedness of the Israeli authorities and the ruthless and barbaric way in which the Israeli armed forces are treating the Palestinians in the occupied territories.

Earlier on I dealt with the unemployment problem in the international context. In the beginning of this decade in Malta there was a time when we registered a high rate of unemployment at around 11 per cent.

The then Labour Party Government took measures and channelled all the country's financial resources into eradicating this problem. Up to May last year when the general election was held, unemployment was brought dramatically down to some 5 per cent.

But the new Government formed by the Nationalist Party is not pursuing as before the policies which guided the Labour Party in office and, as a result, unemployment is going up again and within a year has surged to nearly 6 per cent.

Although this rate is relatively low compared with that of other countries, still it is socially and morally unacceptable to us. Therefore I urge our Government to abandon its present policies because no economic mechanism, no law of profit, no sort of production planning, not even excessive freedom in the game of supply and demand can justify having men of work without jobs and the means of earning their livelihood.

As regards human rights, in November last year a Tripartite Seminar on ILO Human Rights Conventions was held in Malta. Two officials from the ILO, together with representatives from the Maltese trade unions, employers' organisations and government, gave very stimulating lectures.

These kind of seminars, bringing together the three social partners to discuss matters of mutual interest, are indeed very important and I hope that later this year or early next year the ILO will again help us to hold another tripartite seminar, for example on how the Organisation can help developing countries such as Malta in the field of technical co-operation and, especially, in respect of the new, modern and sophisticated technologies which are invading all workplaces.

Earlier on I referred to solidarity as an essential element in surmounting the problems facing workers. Unfortunately, in Malta, within the trade union movement, we have a situation of polarisation. On one hand there is my union – the General Workers' Union – and, on the other trade unions grouped in the CMTU.

We are not happy at all with this situation and at last year's ILO Conference I referred to the repeated appeals made by the General Secretary of my union for the General Workers' Union and the CMTU trade unions to join forces by setting up a national Trades Union Council.

I has asked for assistance from the ILO to help us achieve this aim of forming a TUC because we strongly believe that such a Council is vital to create a climate of real solidarity and fraternity among all Maltese workers and to contribute to strengthening the trade union movement in Malta morally and materially in the best interests of all – the workers themselves, the employers, the Government and the whole country in general.

Unfortunately, till now we have received no assistance in any way from the ILO to realise the formation of a TUC in Malta. Therefore, once again I plead for this assistance from the ILO and also from the ICFTU – of which my union is an affiliate – from the WCL to which the CMTU is affiliated and from the ETUC – of which both the General Workers' Union and the CMTU are members.

One of the technical subjects which we started to discuss at last year's ILO Conference was "Safety and health in Construction". In the broader spectrum of occupational safety and health, the General Workers' Union last year was the first to submit to the Government a report and a proposal to set up in Malta a Workers' Health Authority on a national basis and with a legal status.

I am very happy to state that the Government, through the Minister of Social Policy, Mr. Louis Galea, accepted this proposal and appointed a tripartite working committee to carry out a detailed study and also suggest the required legislation for the establishment of the Authority. The working committee earlier this year completed its task and now the ball is at the Government's feet to submit the necessary legislation for enactment by Parliament.

My union is a democratic labour organisation working in a supposedly free country and therefore we respect the Nationalist Party's right to govern the country since at the polls in May last year it succeeded in polling somewhat less than 51 per cent of the votes. But we expect and insist that the present Government in Malta respect the rights and freedoms of my union and also the fundamental right of the workers to organise themselves freely in my union.

I am saying this because during this past year hundreds of our members employed in government departments, parastatal corporations and state-owned enterprises, including the banking sector, were given transfers and even denied merited promotions for the simple reason that they are members of the General Workers' Union which supports and has a close working relationship with the social democratic Labour Party now in opposition.

From this rostrum, I appeal to the Maltese Government to stop this harassment of my union's members and, before it is too late, to realise that it is permitting the violation of trade union and human rights. This harassment belies the electoral campaign pledge made by the Nationalist Party that when in office it would work to achieve national reconciliation among all Maltese.

And I say something more. Although we wish to see the Labour Party elected to power again as soon as possible, just the same we – as an honest and responsible trade union – want to collaborate with the Nationalist Government, but with the proviso that this collaboration is reciprocated and the Government collaborates with my union.

We want all this collaboration on a mutual basis because we sincerely want to contribute our full share so that Malta can continue making more progress in all spheres and so that this progress can be reflected in social and economic advances for the working people according to the noble norms of social justice.

Recently the Maltese Government announced its decision to ratify a substantial number of ILO Conventions. This is very commendable but on the other hand I have to state with regret that my union was not consulted beforehand on this matter.

The Nationalist Party Government, upon assuming office after last year's general election in Malta, began reconstituting several boards including, for example, those concerning labour, employment and social security which are on a tripartite basis. But in most of these reconstituted tripartite boards there is an imbalance in the trade unions' representations.

For example, there are cases where the other trade unions have three members on such boards and the General Workers' Union only one – this in spite of the fact that the General Workers' Union's membership accounts for nearly 65 per cent of all unionised workers. The General Workers' Union justifiably raised this matter with Mr. Louis Galea, the Minister of Social Policy, and I am happy to state that he agreed with us that there is an imbalance in the trade unions' representation on these boards and he gave us his word that this anomaly is going to be amended. We are certain that the Minister of Social Policy will adhere to his word and we hope that the imbalance in these boards will be rectified as soon as possible without any unnecessary delay.

I conclude my speech with something which perhaps may be of interest to the ILO. Last year my union, the General Workers' Union, took the initiative and started talks with the Unione Italiana del Lavoro (UIL), one of Italy's trade union confederations, on a proposal to set up a Mediterranean Institute for Labour Studies.

Talks are progressing well and the other two Italian trade union confederations – CISL and CGIL – are also showing keen interest in this project.

It is the intention of the General Workers' Union and the Unione Italiana del Lavoro that this Institute would eventually include the other trade unions in Malta and also the trade unions of all the Mediterranean region countries.

The General Workers' Union is also proposing that this Institute be based in Malta, which lies in the very middle of the Mediterranean Sea, and there might also be the involvement of the University of Malta.

I think that the ILO could and should give its assistance in some way or other for the setting up of this Mediterranean Institute for Labour Studies.

Furthermore, we believe that this solidarity and fraternity will make a positive contribution to bring about a climate of good will and trust between the governments of the various countries of the Mediterranean – one of the most explosive and turbulent regions in the world.

Such a climate of good will and trust would eventually lead to the eradication of areas of dispute and conflict and would secure peace and stability, which are essential for the economic and social progress of all humanity.

Interpretation from German: Mr. NOACK (Government delegate, German Democratic Republic) – Mr. President, my delegation is very happy indeed to see that you have been unanimously elected at President of this year's session of the International Labour Conference. May I wish you full success in your activity and very fruitful results of the Conference.

The Director-General in his Report pointed out the inter-relationship and indivisibility of human rights as a whole comprised of civil, political, economic, social and cultural rights. The Government of the German Democratic Republic welcomes this statement; for every human being socio-economic rights and the right to work or rights to social security and health care are just as important as political rights.

The Director-General's Report, as I see it, recognising as it does the indivisibility and reciprocal inter-relationship of human rights, calls for us to reflect and draw the implications for our Organisation. There are three questions I would like to address.

First of all, it follows from the Director-General's statements that the complexity of human rights and the activity of the Organisation must be examined in a well-balanced way. I therefore wonder if it is not perhaps time to review, from this point of view, the classification of the ILO's charter, as was recommended by the Working Party, on International Labour Standards of the Governing Body last year. In the report of the Working Group the heading "basic human rights" covered only the right of association, forced labour and discrimination. Unquestionably these are very important rights. However, to cite only one example, does the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), lag somewhat behind what was termed "basic human rights"? This question becomes even more urgent since not to have a job seems to be the greatest kind of discrimination. To think about this has theoretical as well as practical implications. The consequences for evaluation with a view to ratification of Conventions and the approach to monitoring the application of ILO Conventions are considerable.

Secondly, in my opinion, one contradicts the recognition of the unity and equal importance of human rights if one divides Conventions into binding and less binding ones, so-called promotional Conventions. Again, I am referring here particularly to the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), in respect of which particularly strong attempts have been made to relativise its binding nature. Such tendencies we must decisively oppose. Every Convention, as a covenant in international law, regardless of its subject, contains binding standards. Thus Convention No. 122 calls upon those States who ratify it to "declare and pursue an active policy designed to promote full, productive and freely chosen employment". This formulation points to a step-by-step application and implies the requirement that every State, depending on its national possibilities – for example, the way in which it uses the available resources and lays the socio-economic groundwork – to create the material basis for ensuring the right to work. Of course, this is a target obligation. The target is set in the form of a standard. The obligation of the State is to aim for this target in their policy and practice. Therefore they are required to adopt adequate means to achieve these goals. The way this is done in individual cases depends greatly on socio-economic basic concepts. Is it not necessary in the work of the Organisation to give greater importance to concrete measures and results in assessing how for the member States discharge their obligations under Convention No. 122?

Thirdly, the statements of the Director-General as to the indivisible nature of human rights leads one to conclude that it would be necessary and useful for the Organisation, more than in the past, to examine the reciprocal inter-relationship of these rights and to make the results known. Is it not necessary in the treatment of the question of human rights in its field of activities to make it quite clear that ensuring political rights cannot be separated from ensuring social and economic rights. It would be useful for example, to assess the effect of the employment situation on the participation of citizens in political life.

In the socialist society of the German Democratic Republic, all human rights are given an equal degree of priority. For their implementation as a whole, in the German Democratic Republic, their social facts, the de facto social conditions and statutory legal guarantees have been secured. It is a fact that no one is unemployed or homeless. The right to employment and training is guaranteed on a permanent basis. Every young person, for example, has a legally guaranteed entitlement to a secure place in employment and training.

In accordance with the Constitution, every citizen has the right to take part in the political economic, social and cultural life of the State.

The declared government policy of the German Democratic Republic to ensure at all times the unity of economic and social policy is directly connected with the implementation of human rights and their development. We proceed from the view that human rights, even in a socialist State, are not something static, not something that is accomplished once and for all. Therefore, just as the German Democratic Republic is dynamically developing in process of historical transformation, so human rights are developing further and their implementation is being improved.

Let me give you an example. In 1971, a comprehensive housing programme was started in the German Democratic Republic. It aims to solve the housing question as a social problem by 1990. So far, over 8.5 million citizens have received new homes. This means for more than one-half of the population of our country, better housing conditions have been achieved by securing stable and low rents. The right to living space, today, since we are really tackling the solution of the housing problem, has taken on a new meaning and new guarantees quite different from those of 20 years ago, when it was enshrined in the Constitution. In the history of the German Democratic Republic, human rights and basic freedoms have thus undergone constant expansion and this will continue in future.

The Director-General in his Report, stresses that the efficiency of monitoring of standards depends on the willingness of the member nations to engage in co-operation. We can only emphasise this once more. However, one must add to the Director-General's words the statement that the effectiveness of ILO Conventions very definitely also depends on the application procedure being imbued with a spirit of dialogue and mutual understanding. A co-operative atmosphere does not exclude critical comments, as long as these are limited to facts. However, it would be detrimental to a successful and fruitful dialogue if one were to overstep the limits of criticism and interfere in the domestic matters of individual States.

This question plays an important part in such Conventions which, within the prescribed objectives leave a wide margin for its implementation within States. It is wrong to demand that an interpretation of Conventions according to certain ideas be implemented within other States.

When we talk about human rights today, the first item on the agenda of course, for mankind in the nuclear and space age, is the right to live in peace. Only in conditions in which peace is safeguarded as a matter of life or death for the whole of mankind, can any other human rights take on any practical significance.

The peace policy of the German Democratic Republic is guided by this logic and it must be taken as an elementary human rights policy. With our policy of dialogue and co-operation, we are working towards a secure peace as a normal way of life for nations and a guarantee for the future for the present generation and for generations to come.

Today, disarmament both of nuclear weapons and of conventional weapons, is not only more urgent than in the past, but it is even possible with the new agreement which has just come into effect between the USSR and the United States on the elimination of medium-range and short-range missiles. A first step has been taken, but there must be further steps. The campaign to eliminate nuclear arms will certainly gain a new impetus with the international meeting for nuclear-free zones to be held a few days from now in the capital of the German Democratic Republic.

The world cannot be considered safe as long as human rights are flagrantly flouted. The German Democratic Republic therefore endorses all measures by the Organisation which would lead to a strengthening of the campaign against apartheid in South Africa.

The Organisation also should not relax its efforts to bring about a basic improvement of the human rights situation for the Arab who are employed in the Israeli occupied Arab territories. The carrying out of an international Near East conference under the aegis of the UN with equal representation of all interested parties would be of great significance in this respect.

In conclusion, I should like to say that the German Democratic Republic will also make every effort to contribute to the solution of the problems and the achievement of the goals which the ILO has set itself.

Mr. ATASAYAR (Employers' delegate, Turkey)
— On behalf of the Employers' delegation of Turkey and on my own behalf, I am happy to have the honour and privilege of offering the President my heartiest congratulations on his election to preside over the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. I also extend my warmest felicitations to all the Vice-Presidents who were elected at this Session.

The Report of the Director-General, which offers views on a wide range of problems, including the human rights issue, as they are encountered in developed and developing countries alike, has been highly beneficial to us. Let me point out that I may say that I find these views extremely correct and appropriate in that they usher societies on to a modern path leading to better human relations.

I would like to state that, bearing in mind the importance attached to them by the ILO, we support freedom of association and the idea that the organisations that have representative authority should act in mutual consultation. We believe that such organisations are part of the system.

On the other hand, I am also pleased to state that we equally adhere to the concepts of equal opportunity, remuneration according to living standards, and working conditions updated in the light of actual developments. Today the importance of social security for a society as a whole is universally recognised. Social security as a consequence of mutual solidarity is important not only for the employees but also for the employers.

After having very briefly mentioned the titles of the topics covered in the Report of the Director-General, I would like to take this opportunity to present again, very concisely the views of the Turkish employers and the application of standards in Turkey as far as they are concerned.

First of all, I would like to draw your attention to the fact that all the topics covered by the ILO are closely related to the economic structures and powers of individual countries. In spite of all well-intentioned efforts, inflation and unemployment remain the most important problems for many countries. Thus, creating new employment continues to be an important issue for Turkey, as well.

In Turkey, freedom of association is applied together with the idea of powerful unionism. Both employees and employers can freely, and without authorisation, set up unions and representative organisations.

In my country today trade unions are entitled to conclude collective agreements through reciprocal and free negotiations by using their right to strike. In 1987, 2,343 collective labour agreements were concluded, covering 7,623 workplaces from which approximately 1 million workers benefited.

On the same year 662 collective labour agreement negotiations resulted in a decision to strike and 346 strikes were undertaken. Due to strikes effected in 1987, nearly 2 million work-days were lost. In the first four months of 1988, 123 strikes were carried out which resulted in the loss of approximately 190,000 work-days. These figures prove that a free negotiation system is fully implemented in Turkey.

On the other hand, the application of standards relating to the protection of wages is based on a fundamental rule in Turkey. In wage increase the principle is observed that these should not fall behind inflation. In other words, in collective bargaining, efforts are devoted to obtaining wage increases that surpass the rate of inflation. I would also like to mention that a tripartite minimum wage system is currently being implemented successfully in Turkey.

The problem of environmental protection which affects working conditions in Turkey as well as in many other countries is also being given serious consideration. Apart from occupational health and safety matters, the environmental protection issue has also been covered special legislation.

The existence of an interaction between economic growth and inflation on the one hand and employment on the other is generally recognised, and this connection, I would like to reiterate our conviction that the basic ILO principles pertaining to the development of employment must be strictly adhered to.

We believe that fighting inflations should not result in higher unemployment. I am pleased to report that my country takes the utmost care to maintain this delicate balance. The average rate of growth of 7.5 per cent achieved over the last three years without any significant increase in the number of unemployed persons is a good indication of its efforts in this field. Let me add that in this period Turkey has been the fastest-growing OECD country.

Turkey today is as tranquil as any other European country and is living in internal peace and stability. As a result of this, positive developments have been achieved. The growth rate as compared to the previous year was 5.1 per cent in 1985, 8 per cent in 1986 and 7.4 per cent in 1987. We can safely say that, in recent years, Turkey enjoyed one of the highest growth rates of any European country. The biggest contribution to this growth came from industry. It grew by 6.6 per cent in 1985, 11.1 per cent in 1986 and 9.2 per cent in 1987.

It must be borne in mind that Turkey's high rate of population growth is one of the most important factors underlying many of the country's economic and social problems. With a population of 53 million, Turkey has the youngest population in Europe. A full-scale family planning programme has been put into effect to reduce population growth.

Today, Turkey follows almost all the rules of a free-market economy. Therefore, both employment and investment policies are freely devised and the workers can freely bargain and conclude work agreements.

Before concluding, I would like to stress that the ILO should make greater efforts to ensure generalised implementation of ILO principles and enable solutions to be found to the above-mentioned problems.

As an Employers' delegate of Turkey, I express my sincere wishes for the success of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. AL-FAYEZ (Minister of Labour Affairs, Saudi Arabia) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! Peace and the grace of God be upon you! I should like, as we are continuing our yearly meeting of the Organisation, which is striving for the good of man and humanity as a whole, to seize this opportunity to congratulate the President on my behalf and on behalf of the Saudi Arabian delegation on his election to the presidency of the 75th Session, which God permitting, will under his guidance be able to reach all the noble objectives to which we are aspire.

At the outset I should like to extend our thanks and appreciation to the Director-General for his choice of subject for his report, Human rights – A common responsibility, which coincides with the 40th anniversary of the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. There is a direct relationship between the Declaration and the Constitution of the ILO. All these rights are the basis of the activities of the Organisation, and are expressed in its international standards. The Director-General draws attention to this relationship by reviewing the Organisation's activities in the field of human rights, for example, equal opportunity and treatment, full productive employment, the right to just and favourable remuneration, just and satisfying conditions of work and the right to social security.

The Director-General, in the preface to his Report, pointed to the problems which humanity has always faced and is still facing. He said: "In reading this Report, we shall become aware of the wealth of texts – not only in the ILO but in the United Nations and elsewhere dealing with human rights. We shall also see the gap between the principles laid down in these texts and the situation actually prevailing in a world so crudely conveyed to us by the media."

The Director-General concluded his Report by calling upon us to devote ourselves to the common ideal that all the peoples of the world must strive to reach, which constitutes a moral principle: the respect for human dignity.

And here I must stop a little to tell you that the ideal of my country, the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia, is the Holy Koran and the law of the Prophet Mohammed (may God's peace and prayers be with him!) which is the divine constitution that guarantees well-being, security, stability and peace to all mankind.

These divine principles, which were revealed to our Prophet more than 14 centuries ago, are respected and observed in our country. Saudi Arabia lives under this constitution and its people enjoy prosperity, security, stability, justice, and equality without any discrimination.

Islamic law affirms man's dignity and freedom and his right to peaceful coexistence. I should perhaps summarise some of the rights laid down in it:

- Man's dignity in accordance with the passage of the Holy Koran that says "We have honoured the sons of Adam."
- Non-discrimination in dignity and fundamental rights between men with respect to race, sex, social position and wealth, in accordance with the Prophet's own words: "An Arab has no more merit than a Persian, no a White than a Black: the only merit lies in being a good and caring persons."
- Unity of the human family. The Prophet said that all peoples are the creation of God and that he holds dearest those who do most good to other people.
- Participation in charitable work and good deeds to all people of the world, according to the words of the Koran: "And made you into nations and tribes so that ye may know each other. Verily, the most honoured of you in the sight of God is the most righteous of you."
- Man's freedom of belief and the prohibition of any coercion in that respect, according to the words of the Koran: "Let there be no compulsion in religion."
- The prohibition of aggression against man's blood and property according to the words of the Koran: "Your goods and your blood shall be protected."
- Inviolability of the home, according to the words of the Koran: "Enter not a house other than your own before you have asked permission."
- Solidarity between members of society to ensure every man's rights to a worthy life and freedom from poverty, through the institution of a title on the rich to be spent on the needy, according to the words of the Koran: "And those in wealth recognised the right for the needy who asks and him who is prevented."
- The obligation of every Moslem to combat ignorance, according to the Prophet's words: "The search for knowledge is a duty for every Moslem, man or women."

There are also many other texts of Islamic law explaining and protecting fundamental and inalienable human rights and dealing in detail with social, economic and cultural rights from the standpoint of humanitarian ideals. No discrimination is allowed between one person and another.

Islam not only take these texts as moral sermons but as legal obligations, supported by legislation to guarantee their implementation. This is something which has not been achieved by the Universal Declaration of Human Rights or the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, which remain mere recommendations.

Therefore my country scrupulously implements Islamic law which guarantees human rights, justice, quality, freedom, and well-being without discrimination to all citizens and to all this practical organisation of social justice based on the principles of the Islamic religion. The stability in labour relations which we enjoy, the spirit of brotherhood and harmony between workers and employers are examples of the success of the labour system inspired by the principles of Islamic law and of international labour principles: the right to fair remuneration, paid holiday, limited working hours, occupational health and safety, social security and others. The Government has done everything to protect the rights of both parties and has set up machinery to guarantee the protection of these rights: an effective labour inspectorate, a body to settle labour disputes, and sanctions against offenders.

Because of its attachment to Islamic law, and thanks to the security and prosperity that it enjoys, and the considerable efforts made as part of development plans, the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia has made tremendous progress in the development of infrastructure, industry, agriculture, education and training. It has also provided health and welfare facilities for young and old, the disabled and the poor. Particular attention is given to housing through loans and other facilities. The development programmes and projects cover all sectors in all parts of our large country.

When we look at one of the areas of development in Saudi Arabia, namely education and manpower development, we see that within a very few years the number of educational and training establishments, and the number of people studying there, have more than doubled. We now have seven universities teaching different theoretical and practical subjects, and an impressive number of fellowship-holders who have been sent abroad to specialise in many different fields.

My country is proud to say that education is free of charge, in all branches and, to males and females. In addition students receive their books and all educational supplies free of charge at all levels of education, as well as a monthly allowance which is paid to students pursuing studies in higher education or technical education. All this is in order to encourage education and to enable people to enjoy intellectual rights, we have carefully studied the Director-General's Report as regards the conclusions of the ILO's mission this year to implement the resolutions of 1974 and 1980 concerning Palestine and the occupied Arab territories.

With all the respect due to the efforts exerted by the fact-finding mission which went to see the situation of the Palestinian workers at first hand, it is obvious still that the Israeli entity continues its aggression through violent actions and pursues its repression and inhumane practices which run counter to the most basic human rights and to international rules. It continues to carry out its policy based on racial discrimination and expansion through the setting up of settlements, on refusal to comply with international resolutions demanding that it withdraw from the occupied Arab territories, where the situation of the Arab workers has deteriorated and working and living conditions have become extremely difficult. Therefore we must work more effectively to protect the interests of workers in the occupied Arab territories and to give them some hope for a better life.

In conclusion, I must refer to the immense depletion of human resources because of the ongoing destructive war between Iraq and Iran, despite all the efforts that were exerted to stop it, and despite the fact that Iraq has accepted resolutions calling for a stop to this war.

Therefore, we plead to this Organisation to add its voice to those of persons of good will and to call for the cessation of this destructive war which has already cost the lives of tens of thousands of workers in both countries. We must endeavour to spare strength and human resources and restore peace and security, and devote our efforts to reconstruction.

I wish the Conference every success.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. ELAMAWY (Workers' delegate, Egypt) – It is a pleasure for me to convey to you on my behalf and on behalf of my colleagues, the representatives of the Egyptian Trade Union Federation our congratulations on your election as President of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference, and I ask God to help you in guiding its deliberations and to guide us on the right way to reach positive results and constructive decisions that will help us attain the noble objectives of the ILO.

Allow me to convey my greetings and my appreciation to the ILO and its Director-General, Mr. Francis Blanchard, and his assistants, for the excellent Report submitted to us, which has deep and far-reaching significance, dealing as it does with Human rights – A common responsibility.

In my opinion, the choice of human rights as the subject of the Report of the Director-General of the ILO to this session of the Conference is due not only to our participation in the celebrations of the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, also to what has been pointed out by the Director-General in the Preface to his Report, that "it cannot be denied that fundamental human rights, like human freedom and dignity, far from being more widely respected, are being flouted, often in dramatic circumstances".

The choice is also due to the important relationship, pointed out by the Director-General in his Report, between the right of association and the respect of civil rights in accordance with the Conference resolution of 1970, and to the fact that of the activities of the ILO, and those of other organisations based on the indivisible nature of human rights, which comprise without distinction civil, political, economic, social and cultural rights.

Indeed, we cannot find the words to describe this excellent Report in the short time available to us, since it raises several issues of great importance, each of which in fact merit careful study, whether it concerns the general principles underlying the continual campaign to strengthen human rights, or other issues specifically related to the life of the working masses, such as freedom of association, unemployment, equality between different categories of workers and just remuneration, the rights of migrant workers, the working environment, social security and minimum working standards.

As a Workers' representative of a labour-exporting country, our attention was attracted in particular to what the Director-General pointed out in the part of his Report entitled "Equal opportunity and treatment" to the effect that "In certain regions, one finds differences in wage rates not only between national and foreign workers, but even among the migrant workers themselves, according to the level of remuneration which those coming from different countries may be prepared to accept. In such a situation, the worker becomes a mere import commodity. Such treatment is contrary to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights – which states that 'everyone, without any discrimination, has the right to equal pay for equal work' – and to the specific standards on equality of treatment contained in ILO Conventions dealing with migrant workers."

The human rights situation today is critical. The Director-General, in his Report, has brought a crucial question to human awareness; to answer this question we must state whether we are satisfied with rhetoric about human rights, or are willing to put them into practice. He says: "Although civil and political rights are entirely a national responsibility, no attempt to ensure respect for these rights can be fully successful unless it is backed by development to which all countries without exception whether rich or poor, from east or west, north or south must devote themselves without any further delay. Have we the willpower to overcome the crisis together or are we going merely to continue coping with it as best as we can: are we going to resign ourselves to it?"

In fact, the ILO with tripartite structure, continues its efforts within its sphere of responsibility to put into concrete form the words of its Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia, to the effect that a lasting world peace can only be based on social justice and that social justice is inseparable from the civil and political freedoms and economic and cultural progress.

Allow me to express my appreciation and gratitude to the ILO for the assistance it provides to the trade union movement in Egypt and its institutions. This technical assistance has had its effect on the activities of the movement and on the position of the workers at large. I should like to mention, in particular, the assistance extended to the strategy of employment and vocational training.

On 29 May 1988 a special agreement was concluded concerning support to the second phase of the workers' university project which is in fact the educational wing of the workers' movement. This will have a beneficial effect on the trade union movement. The ILO has also responded to the request to help the trade union movement in Egypt in the establishment of a documentation and information centre which covers all aspects of work and interests of the workers of Egypt. This is in order to help the trade union to take the right decisions to enable it to shoulder its responsibilities and enhance its contribution to the development process. We are counting on ILO to continue its efforts to bring this project to fruition.

We should like to express our appreciation to the Director-General who has appropriately described the restrictions and violations of the rights and freedoms of the Arab workers in the territories occupied by Israel. We agree with what the Director-General says in this part of the Report: that recent events, that is to say the heroic uprising of the Palestinian people in the occupied territories, have indicated "how critically that situation dominates the entire life of the territories. There is an urgent need for a process that will bring peace to this region, since a continuance of the 20-year-old occupation could only lead to a progressive deterioration of the situation, including that of Arab workers".

This leads us to that part of the Director-General's Report on the situation of Arab workers in the Arab occupied territories. To this, we should like to say in all objectivity that the Arab workers' situation under the Israeli occupation needs to be carefully scrutinised and studied because the international community cannot accept in the twentieth century that a Palestinian who is fighting for his right to his homeland and his living should be deprived of the basic rights of fair remuneration and social welfare, and that fundamental freedoms should be violated with impunity.

The Report of the Director-General was clear and firm in drawing a true picture of the deteriorating situation in Palestine and the other Arab occupied territories. We therefore appeal to all countries and to workers' organisations throughout the world to take a positive stand in facing the challenge of the Israeli authorities to the values and principles embodied in the international Declaration of Human Rights.

The decision of the Arab countries, which has received the approval of most Members of this Conference, is a historic decision to strengthen the principles of human rights.

The Egyptian Trade Union Federation also considers that the Gulf war between Iraq and Iran is a threat to world peace, in addition to its adverse effects on the future and progress of the peoples in the region. We therefore appeal for an end to this war and we believe that a solution is to abide by the resolutions of the international organisations, and particularly Security Council resolution 598, which was accepted by Iraq.

The Egyptian Trade Union Federation also appeals to the international community to take practical measures against the apartheid regime in South Africa and to extend assistance to the front-line States and liberation movements in their struggle against colonialism. The oppressive practices still perpetrated against the people of South Africa are a disgrace to the human race. South African workers are deprived of all rights because of their colour and race. All the countries of the world should join together to impose sanctions against the racist regime of Pretoria. Those countries that still have relations with that regime are also called upon to sever those relations in order to isolate it from the international community.

May God guide our steps on the path of goodness, righteousness, peace and justice.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. TSEMBEL (Employers' delegate, Mongolia) – Allow me to congratulate Mr. Beyreuther on behalf of the directors of enterprises of the Mongolian People's Republic in connection with his election to the post of President of the present session.

In our country large-scale work is being carried out to implement the objectives of economic and social development of the MPR for the eighth Five-Year Plan. The objectives set for this Five-Year Plan are to change over to essentially economic methods of management, to improve planning and the national economic machinery and systematically introduce cost accounting to ensure the independence of enterprises, economic units and work collectives. During the past years, much has already been done in implementing these objectives. One of the clear indications that the objectives set are being achieved is the elaboration of the Law on state enterprises.

As is known, in the course of socialist construction, numerous forms of management of social production have been established, where tens of thousands of people are employed, national wealth is created and through work, people's talents and creativity are opened up. Recently, a draft law on state enterprises in the Mongolian People's Republic has been published and brought out for public discussion. This document is of great political significance. It encompasses the whole of the economic strategy of the Government and establishes new legal bases for the economic activities of state enterprises.

The draft law, on the one hand, further centralises solutions for the most important strategic tasks for the development of the national economy as a single entity and, on the other hand, it provides for an intensification of economic methods of management and an extensive use of full cost accounting and self-financing. It is aimed at the further development of self-management and determines relations between enterprises and the organs of state authority and management.

The draft law lays down the policy for effective utilisation of democratic methods and principles of work. The draft law provides for the elective nature of the leadership of all ranks, as well as the councils of workers' collectives and for empowering them to resolve questions connected with production, social and staff matters. This will be a major political measure during the transition to the forthcoming economic self-management programme.

In all the articles of the above document, there are many new provisions which have been brought to the forefront through the very development of our society. There is a clear-cut and largely new formulation of principles on the activities of enterprises. It is built on the basis of the Government's Five-Year Plan, the most important instrument for the realisation of the economic policy of our State. At the same time, the enterprise is based on the principle of total cost accounting and wages will be effected out of funds earned by the working staff itself.

The role and significance of socialist self-management is raised to a new level. The staff is the total master of the enterprise; it independently solves all questions related to production and social development. In the activities of the enterprise, the role of economic competition is growing between enterprises. There is greater fulfilment of consumer demand for high quality production, work and services at minimum cost.

The relationship of enterprises with the above organs will be built on the basis of planned management and respect for the principles of total cost accounting and self-financing, whereas relations with other enterprises will be based on economic agreement. The administration of enterprises is carried out, first of all, through economic methods on the basis of government orders and long-term economic standards.

The systematic implementation of the law on state enterprises, in conjunction with a range of measures which are now being carried out in the economic sphere, will produce an altogether new situation in the national economy. It will accelerate the development of the economy and lead to a qualitative improvement in many aspects of social life. There is no doubt that these transformations will have a positive influence on co-operation within the framework of the ILO.

In the Report submitted by the Director-General, a special place is assigned to questions which are highly relevant today, concerning human rights and common responsibility. Many of the problems raised in the Report of the Director-General and taken up in the general discussion at the plenary of the Conference are of great importance to hundreds of millions of persons upon our planet. And we have every right to hope that the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference will be able to make its constructive contribution to the search for further ways to solve current problems for the world of work and finally determine strategic orientations for the multi-faceted co-operation of the ILO in the implementation of the right to full, productive and freely chosen employment.

The Director-General, in his Report, has emphasised that promotion of human rights and their protection is a continuous process which calls for a constant increase of efforts by the ILO to attain everywhere the level established for all peoples and nations in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Indeed, as far as we are concerned, the Declaration and each one of its parts are indivisible and equal by important, because development is an all-encompassing process in which equal attention should be given to the exercise of political and economic, civil and social rights. In our country, greatly importance is attached to total and constant implementation by all States and peoples of inalienable human rights and fundamental freedoms, especially the right to work.

In this connection, in our opinion, it is important to direct our attention principally to the development of a comprehensive concept of the right to work. In order to stimulate economic growth, improve living standards, fulfil the needs of the workforce and eliminate unemployment and underemployment, the member States of the ILO must, as a matter of priority, implement an active policy aimed at promoting full, productive and freely chosen employment.

We fully agree with the Director-General's opinion in his Report that apart from questions of just remuneration and free employment, international standards on human rights should likewise provide for just and favourable conditions of work. The International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights refers in particular to the reasonable limitation of work time and the guaranteeing of safe and healthy conditions of work. In this connection, we would wish to emphasise that the further activity of the ILO in the sphere of working conditions and the workplace could be centred on the fact that improvements in working conditions and the workplace are a positive contribution to national development, as well as a measure which leads to the successful implementation of economic and social policies.

As for the training of managerial staff and improvements in management methods, in our opinion it is appropriate to step up activities to improve the administration of educational establishments. In addition, we believe that special attention should be devoted to the consolidation of management experience in various sectors of industry. In order to fulfil the increasing number of requests for personnel, we consider it important to draw up and implement special programmes to promote improvement of managerial methods which would encourage the development of small- and medium-sized enterprises.

In conclusion, I should like to emphasise that in order to ensure that human rights and freedoms are fully secured by everyone, everywhere, and at all times, it is necessary to restructure the whole system of international relations, including economic relations and the international monetary and financial system.

We consider that the establishment of a comprehensive system of international peace and security will be able to guarantee total exercise of the rights and freedoms of peoples and of individuals in conditions free from weapons and oppression. The establishment of a comprehensive system would include in particular the realisation of the principles of the just requirements of the concept of a new international economic order and of a new international humanitarian order.

We are convinced that the 75th Session of the General Conference of the ILO will make a definite contribution to the cause of the implementation of human rights and, in particular, the right to work.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. KOVALEVICH (Employers' delegate, Byelorussian SSR) – Allow me to associate myself with the congratulations and good wishes which have been addressed to the President and the other Officers of this session of the Conference.

First of all, I should like to refer to the extensive involvement of public opinion in the foreign policy sphere, including a more active display of interest on the part of business circles in extensive economic co-operation. There is no doubt that international economic relations and their positive influence on the solution of social problems can develop and strengthen only in conditions of peace, stability and mutual understanding. The modern world is marked by inter-relationships, by the existence of global problems which call for their own solution and also by the existence of the threat of nuclear self-destruction. That is why the general, responsible task is actively to utilise the potential for peaceful coexistence and co-operation of all countries and peoples. Answers to the problems of the end of the twentieth century should be sought it is obvious – on the basis of co-operation on an equal footing, respect for the rights of peoples to choose their own path of social and economic development.

We share the position adopted in the Report of the Director-General concerning the close link between respect for human rights, peace and stability. It is particularly necessary to note the provision that employment is a fundamental condition for the implementation of the whole range of social, economic, political and civil rights, mentioned in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and in the resolution of the last session of the International Labour Conference concerning the 40th anniversary of the adoption of Convention No. 87.

Full employment creates the material basis for the exercise of economic and social rights, for freedom, social protection and a dignified life.

In this connection I should like to speak about the experience of economic and social development in the Byelorussian SSR.

Radical reform of the mechanism for managing the economy in the Byelorussian SSR is being accompanied by changes in the sphere of structural and investment policy and by major positive improvements in the development of science and technology and in raising the level of training of skilled workers. In 1987 the technical re-equipment and reconstruction of operational enterprises utilised 21 per cent more capital investment than in the previous year. Energy consumption of national production income for the year was down by about 2.6 per cent, metal consumption by 2.4 per cent. The increase in national income amounted to 5.2 per cent compared with the actual level in 1986, production of the means of production increasing by 6.2 per cent and production of consumer goods increasing by 7.2 per cent.

Practically the entire increase in national income was achieved through the increase in labour productivity. Production costs in industry agriculture and construction have been reduced. In the national economy profits have increased by 13.6 per cent, compared with the actual level in 1986.

At present special attention is being devoted to a radical restructuring of the management of the economy, as well as to implementation of such economy tasks as the reform of secondary and higher education, ensuring that all enterprises are self-financing and able to pay their own way, promotion of the development of co-operatives and the use of individual labour, and the improvement of health care. There is public discussion of a comprehensive programme for the improvement of housing conditions for the population for the 12th Five-Year Plan and up to the year 2000. Approximately one-fifth of the population of the Republic is in need of significantly improved housing conditions in order that each family can have one flat or individual house. The problems has to be resolved by the year 2000.

In the Byelorussian SSR in 1987, as in past years, there is full employment of the able-bodied population. Practically the entire increase in the labour force in 1987 was directed into the trade and services sphere.

There has been a considerable increase in efforts to reduce pollution of the atmosphere and reservoirs, and to make more rational use of land, water, forest and mineral resources. Discharging noxious pollutants into the atmosphere from stationary sources has dropped in the past year alone by 23,000 tonnes. The utilisation of various kinds of secondary raw materials and other sources of material provision has increased.

Together with the continuing solution of many technical and economic problems, the projected measures were almost fully implemented in 1987 in the sphere of social development and the raising of the standard of living of the people. There has been an increase in the average monthly wage of workers and employees in the national economy.

Taking as an example the enterprise of which I am the director, I should like to point to the growing process of positive changes in the situation in which the plant staff is working. The entry into force of the law on state enterprises has made it possible to make more effective use of the production capacity of the enterprise and to stimulate social development. An important role is being played by such conditions for raising the workers' level of interest and activeness as the election of brigade leaders, foremen and heads of production sections, the broad participation of members of the collective in the development, adoption and implementation of decisions on production and social matters.

The authority of the workers' collective is vested in the soviet of the workers' collective. At meetings of the soviet the director of the enterprise reports on the results of financial management, the use of social development funds, and the elaboration of measures to increase the efficiency of production. In close contact with the soviet of the worker's collective the management of the plant solves questions of training and raising the qualifications of the workers, improving living and working conditions, providing safety techniques, labour hygiene and workers' health protection. The decisive contribution to the work of the soviet of the collective is made by the trade union organisation.

The involvement of each worker in the decision-making process on production and social questions makes that worker into an owner of the enterprise. This feeling and an awareness of the common tasks of the collective enable each worker to become a participant in making decisions on the proper distribution of the income of the enterprise, including remuneration for the work of each and every worker.

In the case of disagreements between the soviet of workers and the management of the plant, a final decision is taken at a general meeting of the entire collective.

A new element in the activities of our plant in the past few months has been the productive collaboration with the co-operative which is concerned with the production using waste products from the plant's main production. Moreover, an important prospect for expanding the activities of our plant is the possibility of industrial co-operation with enterprises in other countries and the conclusion of import-export contracts.

To move forward, we have to reconsider many thing and to accumulate new experience in the solution of problems in the sphere of economics and labour relations.

In this connection, I should like to speak of the need to support the spirit of co-operation and mutual respect in the International Labour Organisation, in order to develop an interest in learning from the experience of other countries.

The standard-setting and programme activities of the ILO must be built on that basis. This would be to the benefit of the implementation of the basic tasks of the ILO defined in its Constitution and emphatically reconfirmed at the present stage of scientific and technical progress.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – I should now like to call on Mr. Khasawneh, Government delegate, Jordan, to exercise his right to reply to a passage in the statement by Mr. Katsav, Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Israel.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. KHASAWNEH (Government delegate, Jordan) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! This morning, the Israeli Minister of Labour gave a great deal of incorrect information and made false allegations for the purpose of making delegates believe that the measures adopted by the Israeli occupying authorities are aimed at the protection and welfare of the Arab workers living under the occupation, and the growth of the economy in the Arab occupied territories.

I should therefore like to give the following information in the time allotted to me.

First of all, reference was made to "Judaea and Samaria" instead of "the occupied West Bank". This is a reflection of Israeli conception of the continued occupation of these territories, which is in contradiction with all international laws, conventions and resolutions which consider these territories as being under provisional occupation.

Second, what he said about economic growth and progress is quite untrue. Paragraph 24 of the Director-General's Report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories states that "the employment in the Israeli economy of Palestinian workers from the occupied territories has been, together with the commercial relations, one of the most decisive factors contributing to the forging of particularly strong links of dependence." This of course means dependence on the Israeli economy.

Third, the speaker mentioned that tax rates for Arab workers in these territories are lower than those for Israelis. This is not true. The United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD) in one of its reports said that 34 military decrees have been proclaimed by the Israeli occupying authorities modifying income tax rates and the categories of persons taxable with the result that the minimum threshold of taxable income has been lowered while tax rates have been increased and taxable income brackets have been lowered. The study showed that the tax burden in the West Bank and in the occupied district of Gaza is nine times as much as the tax burden in Jordan.

The remuneration of Arab workers is still low, not more than half that of Israeli workers.

The speaker's allegation that trade unions representing workers in the occupied territories are merely a cover for terrorist activities is designed only to justify terrorist and repressive measures.

There is a great deal more I could say, but I have no time. I shall merely say that it is ironical that the Israeli delegate should talk about the rights of the Palestinians in the Arab countries, disregarding the fact that Israel is the sole and unique source of the sufferings of the Palestinians. As the poet says...

Interpretation from German: Mr. PRESIDENT – I am sorry, Your time is up.

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT (Mr. ADIKO) – We shall now resume our discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Mr. PASARIBU (Workers' delegate, Indonesia) – On behalf of the All Indonesian Workers' Union, SPSP, allow me to congratulate Mr. Beyreuther on his unanimous election as President. With his wide experience and wise leadership, I am confident that this Conference will conclude with successful results. I would also like to congratulate the other members of the Bureau on their election.

First of all, I should like to take this opportunity to convey the heartfelt gratitude of the Indonesian workers to the ILO for all its constructive efforts and assistance.

I feel very honoured to be able to stand before this world-renowned Conference, but I am particularly proud to be standing here in my capacity as representative of the workers of my country, Indonesia.

The interesting Report of the Director-General gives a very comprehensive account of the wide-ranging activities of the ILO, both in the field of human rights and in technical assistance. Human rights issues have always been a topic of deep concern and have been incessantly discussed at various levels in every corner of this planet, whether in the underdeveloped countries, in the developing countries or in the advanced countries.

Certain governments in various parts of the world have been sharply accused of having violated the international accepted standards of human rights formulated in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and in one of the ILO's key human rights Convention – the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98).

We have to be very thankful, for, whatever the motivations are, the objective is to improve the human dignity that has been degraded by poverty, tyranny and a lack of education.

The Declaration of Philadelphia stated that "poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere", and that measures should be taken at the international and national level "to avoid severe economic fluctuations, to promote the economic and social advancement of the less developed regions of the world, to assure greater stability in world prices of primary products, and to promote... international trade".

They are, however, inappropriate charges which need explaining in order to eliminate misunderstanding and to promote mutual respect and co-operation, as well as to cement the "sense of solidarity" in the world trade union movement.

Indonesian workers, as members of Indonesian society, currently find themselves in increasingly improved democratic conditions in which freedom to organise, freedom to bargain collectively and freedom to express their say over whatever matters relate to their welfare are guaranteed by enforced regulations.

The Pancasila industrial relations principles, adopted by a tripartite seminar in 1975, may sound strange to most of you, but it is the system that best suits the Indonesian context. It is consistently based on our Constitution and formulated on the basis of our long-held cultural practices.

The Pancasila industrial relations principles guarantee that workers and employers are fully entitled to use their freedom to the extent that the utilisation of such freedom does not disturb the freedom of others. It very strongly advocates "consensus", meaning that freedom must be used to bring harmony, to create mutual respect and to eliminate hatred.

I am proud to report to you that we in Indonesia now have more and more collective labour agreements concluded, an increased number of local units or plant level unions, less industrial disputes and a decreasing number of strikes.

However, like other developing countries, we still encounter rampant crucial manpower-related problems: poverty, lack of education and unemployment. The widening gap between the growth in population and employment opportunities is now becoming the most critical problem that the Government, the Workers' Union and the Employers Association are grappling with.

Anticipated statistical data for our next Five-Year Plan indicate that we will have an annual population growth of 2 per cent with an annual increase of 3 per cent in the workforce due to the baby boom in the 1960s and 1970s, which means that at least 2 millions jobs will have to be created every year. About 53 per cent of our workforce are young people who do not have any employment experience.

Facing these projections, we have no other choice but to join together to take all possible efforts and programmes through the strengthening action of the national tripartite body of Indonesia, as a means of solving those big problems of labour and manpower by: encouraging domestic as well as foreign investment, population and family planning programmes, transmigration, inter-regional employment, overseas employment, the development of the informal sectors, education and training for entrepreneurship and developing industrial relations, since these factors are very important for the continuation of our national development programmes to reduce unemployment and underemployment.

I strongly believe that most countries in Asia and the Pacific, Africa and South America are facing problems and in this regard, I second the opinion that multilateral co-operation is very decisive in helping resolve the principal problems that more than two-thirds of the world's population encounter.

I would like to appeal through this forum to the advanced countries to contribute their best and sincere efforts to help renew the world economic order by reconsidering their policy in the GATT, GSP and quota determination.

Current international trade seems to favour certain advanced industrial countries and their policies have made developing countries label them as "protectionist". The fluctuation of international currencies furthermore has caused most of the developing countries to devalue their own currencies and this has been an important factor in their present predicament.

I would also like to appeal to the advanced countries and international financial institutions to take into very serious consideration the fluctuation of international currencies in their policies, since it is upon the underdeveloped and the developing countries that the result of the fluctuation falls most, and grant the countries concerned substantial compensation.

I am confident that our deliberations in the present session of the Conference will be conducive to the improvement of the world economic order for a better future for workers, human rights, prosperity, justice and peace.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. ANDREEV (Workers' delegate, Bulgaria) – Firstly I should like to express my conviction that under the President's leadership the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference will be as successful as the workers could desire, all the more so as the subject of human rights, which we are discussing, is an undisputed focus of attention for workers throughout the world. The President's responsibility is all the greater this year that marks the 40th anniversary of the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the anniversary of the adoption by the ILO of Convention No. 87, which we are all celebrating today.

Human rights are obviously not a self-contained field dissociated from the overall context of problems of the modern world, and, as the Director-General's Report rightly underlined, it would be absurd to think that these rights will be automatically attained.

True, the picture drawn in the Director-General's Report of the millions of unemployed of those who are leading a poverty-stricken and precarious existence, of the exorbitant foreign debt of the underdeveloped countries and of the enormous amounts squandered for military purposes is such as to cause lively concern, and the situation of workers in countries where terrorist and racist regimes are in power inspires no less concern.

All these situations are in flagrant contradiction with contemporary ideals but unhappily they are an inherent feature of our times, and thus determine its essential dichotomy.

The responsibility for breaking the Dantesque circle of oppression and class injustice lies with the twentieth century. But together with the gigantic leap forward made in the social development of numerous countries, this century will be remembered for the bloodiest wars ever known in history. What is more, in man's evolution during the second half of this century, we have created the technical means for our complete annihilation. Thus, the supreme right of man – the right to life – has been called in question, and if we do not endeavour to guarantee this right we risk being faced with an absurdity. I do not think I have to produce arguments in favour of this assertion. The sole and permanent requirement is sound reasoning.

Our Conference will therefore fulfil its purpose if, at the same time, it becomes a forum for peace. Furthermore, its timing is exceedingly favourable for this. The Soviet/American agreement signed last year on the abolition of intermediate and shorter-range missiles in Europe and the Soviet/American summit talks just held in Moscow are events of historical importance.

It is an undeniable fact that, for the first time, definite steps are being taken towards nuclear disarmament and that measures to settle regional conflicts have already been initiated. The international climate is undoubtedly less forbidding. There is an evident spirit of rapprochement and of détente and a better mutual understanding between States with different social systems.

All this leads us to believe that the new political thinking is gaining ground. We must not forget, however, that these changes have become possible thanks to the struggle waged by people throughout the world. Accordingly, the only just conclusion we can reach is that we must unite and act to defend peace, and to reduce and eventually completely and definitively eliminate nuclear weapons.

It is often asked today what our legacy to the twenty-first century should be. Certainly we have much to bequeath, but I think our first duty is to transmit above all a healthy and intact planet, a planet on which we live and which is our home.

Human rights is a theme about which we witness fierce arguments between the followers of different ideologies. Even today these polemics are reviving. However, they are often academic as the approaches of different social systems are founded on identical measures.

Human rights are undoubtedly one of the most delicate problems of our times. Nevertheless, we should not interpret them with that blind ideological arrogance to which even the wisest among us are not immune. Let us consider this problem from the point of view of man himself. Apart from the question of class, human rights have a general human meaning and provide a yardstick for measuring the social progress of every society. Let us show respect for the experiences of others, since none of us has the monopoly of truth.

I come from a country which has been building a socialist society for the last 40 years and I can compare what it was in the past to what it is today. We have not yet settled all our problems, but we have managed to solve those that are of vital importance, and make it possible to make radical changes in the situation and the life of the workers.

Firstly, we have put an end to man's exploitation by man, eliminated unemployment and created social guarantees for everybody. The Bulgarian worker has numerous problems but he has absolute confidence in tomorrow.

All these actions are recognised as natural and normal, but new problems have replaced those we have dealt with.

This is why we have been experimenting for a long time now and in the last few years we have already put a new system of administration and management into effect which completely changes the socio-economic situation in our country. The new practices consist in replacing administrative and managerial methods by economic methods. In the middle of the 1960s we had observed that extreme centralisation was slowing down economic and social growth and we decided to decentralise economic life.

In the new situation, all human rights – socio-economic, political and personal – assume a very different appearance. As a representative of the trade union movement, I intend to discuss social and economic human rights in Bulgaria. The principle point I want to make in this respect is that we are moving towards self-management. Self-managing communities, that is to say, the workers' collective in the enterprises enjoy considerable independence. They are entitled to determine the goals and tasks for their own development. It is they who organise production and distribute income. To this end, they have recourse to self-governing organs, the basic principle of which is the eligibility to membership of all organs and all persons with responsibility. The workers thus have a decisive say in social and economic matters, which are of prime importance in society.

As I have said before, democratisation and the rights and possibilities of people to manage their affairs themselves is the core of this process of renovation.

The right to self-management is a recent development, but it is increasingly becoming a fundamental right of the worker, which embodies all other socio-economic, political and personal rights, and comprises the conditions necessary to put an end to the alienation of man from his work and from ownership of property. This is a right which creates interest in a job since workers who have real power to decide on all problems of vital importance to them, are themselves creating the conditions for furthering their own interests. For example, the constitutional right to safe and healthy conditions of work is nothing new but in numerous undertakings the standards laid down in this connection were not respected. The right to remuneration according to the quantity and quality of the work done has long existed but in practice all wages were more or less the same.

What led to this state of affairs was the system of centralised management with all functions of economic management concentrated at the top.

Self-management radically modified the position of man in society. A redistribution of power is taking place, with most of the power being transferred to the self-governing communities. Given its nature, this power is already directly being exercised by the workers since their self-governing organs have already been entrusted with the material resources, property and finances and the right to dispose of all these.

Human rights have been enlarged as a result. Firstly, the right to work has been enriched since it implies the right to the free choice of the employing undertaking or establishment, to work without fear of administrative bans, and to be paid a wage in accordance with one's own contribution and the results obtained. The most important possibility for the worker today is to be able to take part in the appreciation of his own work.

Obviously the realisation of all the measures envisaged will not be for tomorrow. The fact that we have recognised all these human rights as legitimate under the new labour code does not mean that they will automatically come into force. Furthermore, each of these rights inevitably creates obligations and responsibilities towards oneself and towards society. This process will take a long time and be beset by numerous difficulties. There is a wide gap between the right to govern oneself in theory and the responsibility shouldered in achieving efficient self-management. Certain elements will undoubtedly resist the transfer of the power they formerly exercised to workers' collectives. This will not be easy. However, its economic advantages will be appreciable, and great human energies will be liberated as a result that will increase the dignity of man and extend his freedoms.

Obviously, if there are no guarantees, human rights will simply be an ideal. Self-management, in which rights and interests are amalgamated, is in itself a solid guarantee. Legal guarantees too are very important. In their absence, human rights would have no firm foundation. For this reason, we have instituted a general reform of the legislation which must be made in accordance with the principles of self-management. But this action is not exhaustive, for workers' organisations and unions are voluntarily beginning to act as guarantors and defenders of human rights and freedoms. I would like to emphasise, in this connection, the heavy responsibilities that are borne by the trade unions.

First, the trade unions play a basic role in affirming socio-economic rights in a legal context. In Bulgaria, no law or act concerned with promoting standards in relation to work and labour relations, social security and levels of living can be adopted without the participation and agreement of the trade unions.

Second, the unions are an essential participant in the preparation of internal regulations for the self-management of labour collectives.

Third, the unions exercise broad social control over the activities of state and economic organs. The purpose of this control is to protect society from the arbitrary bureaucratic actions of certain bodies of individual managers and to bring together all the conditions necessary for the realisation of human rights.

The restructuring that is in progress at present goes far beyond a mere economic reform.

In our view, human rights have no meaning unless they are part of managerial decision-making. Inspired by this approach, the unions are doing all they can to consolidate self-management in practice.

I do not think that everything is perfect in our country or that our experience is of universal relevance. I have spoken about it in such detail because I wanted to show that something new is emerging in the socialist countries to which the ILO should pay much greater attention.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. BOZO (Minister of Social Affairs and Labour, Syrian Arab Republic) – I have the honour of taking the floor at this august assembly on behalf of the Arab delegation at this Conference – Employers, Workers, Governments – to express their views on the Report of the Director-General concerning the situation of workers in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories.

May I first pay tribute to the efforts made by both the Director-General and the missions that have been sent to these territories for the past 11 years. He untiringly continues to make such efforts despite the problems created by the Israeli occupying forces for the activities of international missions.

The fact that the Director-General decided himself to go to occupied Palestine to monitor personally the tragic situation, the destructive results of the Israeli occupation and the repression it practises against Arab workers in Palestine and other occupied territories deserves our gratitude. We also thank the members of the mission for preparing their outstanding Report. Each page of this report recalls the tragedy of workers and others in Palestine, with constant violations of their basic freedoms and their rights, as well as the policy of discrimination of very kind implemented by Israel, not to mention other methods of torture and terrorism, such as murder, imprisonment, expulsion and exile, the aborting of pregnant women, the destruction of houses, closing trade union headquarters, denial of freedom of association, the continuing policy of confiscating land and water and all the other methods of repression which run counter to the spirit and the letter of the Constitution of the ILO, its humanitarian objectives and international labour standards.

The tragic situation described by the mission has become even worse over the past six months and in particular since the beginning of the popular uprising in occupied Arab Palestine. World opinion, informed of this situation by the media, has seen images of this oppression such as has never been seen anywhere in the civilised world. Here is an underprivileged people with only stones to defend itself and denounce the military occupation of its country. This people is simply calling for its fundamental right to self-determination on the basis of its own will. This is an acknowledged right for all peoples, on the basis of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights of which the world is celebrating today the 40th anniversary.

The report of the mission this year sets out a certain number of objective findings; it highlights a certain number of principles and tasks the ILO should undertake on the basis of its international responsibility. However, the mission failed to mention the various manoeuvres and violations on the part of the Zionists against Palestinian workers and people despite their close links with ILO concerns. Therefore, the Arab delegations wish to submit to this Conference a certain number of comments rooted in our true desire to support the efforts by the International Labour Office to follow up the two resolutions passed by the International Labour Conference in 1974 and 1980:

In paragraph 7 of the mission's report we find that the recommendations made in preceding reports continue to be valid. This means that these recommendations have certainly not in any way been implemented by the occupying Israeli forces and that the continuing policy of racial discrimination and unequal treatment at the workplace between Palestinian and Israeli workers, of colonisation and expropriation of lands, of closing down trade union headquarters, detaining and expelling trade unionists, unequal treatment on social security, all confirms that the Israeli authorities refuse to implement the resolutions passed it upon Conference in 1974 and 1980.

The report, for more than previous reports, clearly and precisely shows that the social, economic and trade union situation of Arab citizens in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories has continued to deteriorate. In the introduction to the report the Director-General refers to this when he says: „The report confirms, if further confirmation were needed, that the situation of the Arab workers, which is already seriously affected by the state of occupation, is likely to be increasingly aggravated if the occupation continues.” Therefore our Conference should raise its voice and demand that an end be put to this occupation and thus to all these tragedies. As to the deterioration in the trade union situation, the denial of the rights and freedoms of workers and employers and of their right to organise, the violations noted by the mission give rise to a feeling of sadness and shame. The mission states that the occupying authorities are indeed continuing their violations of trade union rights and freedoms, closing down trade unions, detaining trade unionists and banning all trade union activities.

The Committee on Freedom of Association of our Organisation, in considering Case No. 1390 in May 1987 and Case No. 1414 in May 1988, found that there were flagrant violations of trade union rights and freedoms on the part of the Israeli authorities.

As to the continuing policy of colonisation by the Israeli authorities and the expropriation of land and water, the mission's report shows that the total of land expropriated is now 52 per cent of all West Bank lands and over 40 per cent in the Gaza Strip, where various ways and means are used to seize this land from its owners. The Conference must be aware of the destructive consequences of this policy of colonisation and expansion, which violates the principles of international law, the fourth Geneva Convention and resolutions of the United Nations and the specialised agencies, in particular the resolution of this Conference in 1980.

Here we wish to affirm that the visit made by the mission to the Golan Heights comes within the prerogative of the mission, in keeping with the Conference resolutions of 1974 and 1980. The mission noted the serious effect on Syrian citizens, in economic, social, cultural and demographic terms, from the policy of expropriation colonisation, with its increased proportion of Jewish settlements and citizens, in order to change the demography, culture and social life in the region. The mission also noted interference by the occupying forces with education policy and changes in curricula in accordance with Zionist policy on annexing the Golan Heights, counter to international instruments and in particular the Geneva Convention.

All these facts noted by the mission in its report are a clear denunciation of the Zionist entity, its Botswana clearly sees the need and the relevance of pursuing active policies of promoting equal opportunities in employment as well as in other areas. This is so because 25 million people in neighbouring South Africa are denied basic human rights. They are discriminated against on the basis of race, colour, political opinion and social origin. The problems that emanate from such discrimination and repressions make us continue to uphold fundamental rights and freedom of all our people and at the same time try to be an example to those who would be willing to learn from us.

The role of the ILO in technical assistance and co-operation, especially for developing economies such as ours, merits mention. Our shortcomings in the areas of capital for funding and lack of skilled manpower have greatly been alleviated by the existence of the ILO's technical assistance. The use of the ILO short-term consultancies with experts, either directly from Geneva or from ILO regional offices, as well as the engagement of national experts where available, needs special mention.

Botswana would once again like to take this opportunity to thank the Director-General for the assistance that the ILO continues to render to her. In particular, the ILO mission which was recently in Botswana has now submitted its reports and the task of the mission was to look at the unemployment challenge in Botswana, prospects for employment generation through diversification of the economy. The two-volume report is being seriously considered by my Government.

Still through ILO technical assistance, Botswana has been able to embark on a project of evaluating our training and localisation policy in the private and parastatal sectors of our economy. This has been necessary in the light of the large and increasing number of applications for work permits by non-citizens, and at the same time the Government's concern to want to see our people occupy skilled, professional and managerial posts. The report on strengthening the labour department and enhancement of training for localisation is being seriously considered for implementation by the Government.

ILO technical assistance in the field of vocational training continues. A new industrial training and trade testing centre, funded through the World Bank and the Federal Republic of Germany, has been completed and ILO technical experts are all in post. The enrolment of apprentices in this trade testing centre began in July 1987, and up until now we have an enrolment of 263 apprentices and we are commencing 12 apprenticeable trades.

Turning to the question of safety and health in construction, my delegation acknowledges the seriousness of the safety situation in the construction industry. It is within this context that Botswana, as one of the rapidly growing developing countries, has seen the need to pay special attention to the welfare, safety and health of workers. Through the building operations and works of engineering construction regulations of 1974 and the establishment of a rudimentary enforcement authority within our Department of Labour and Social Security, the Government has gone some way in achieving better conditions of work.

However, the rapid expansion and technological changes that have occurred in the sector have exposed a need for a better and more modern response to safety and health problems. It is for this reason that Botswana welcomes the timely inclusion of the subject of safety and health in construction in this session of the International Labour Conference, and hope that the deliberations on the subject will in the end produce an instrument that will enhance the safety, health and productivity of the construction sector.

In Botswana, national development plans have increasingly placed emphasis on employment creation. We do realise that paid employment in the formal sector is generally seen by most people as their best avenue of self-advancement. We note, too, that even under the most optimistic assumptions, such employment cannot cater for more than a minority of new entrants into the labour force. Our view has therefore been the adoption of an employment promotion strategy which does not only focus on formal sector employment but has economic opportunities in the broadest sense. It is in the light of this that my delegation will await with keenness the conclusion of the discussions on the question of employment promotion and social security.

I need to point out that up to now Botswana has had no comprehensive social security system except for the administration of a workmen's compensation scheme. However, there are areas in which social security provisions have been made and these include retirement benefits in the public sector, employment benefits subsidised by the Government for public health services and also a local authority welfare grants system for destitutes.

We note with interest that an issue on partial revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107), will be put before the Session. In recognition of the destiny of the remote-area dwellers in Botswana, the Government in 1974 carried out consultations and put into action plans designed to support the special needs of these people.

I wish to point out that no tribe or group of people in Botswana is subordinate to another within the meaning of the country's Constitution. The adaptation of the remote-area dwellers to their surrounding environment in several ways is well recognised and respected. We have taken special care to avoid assimilation and integration as these have indicated an adverse response from the remote-area dwellers themselves.

Apart from the Government's concerted efforts in providing social amenities to the remote-area dwellers, additional efforts are being made to expand their subsistence base by introducing some new economic opportunities to create income and employment. In some areas, livestock schemes and arable projects, a few handicraft projects and other income-generating activities have been introduced.

My delegation therefore looks forward to the discussions on this very important issue.

Allow me now to turn to one of the important issues to be discussed by the Session, and that is the issue of rural employment promotion. The second theme of our Fifth National Development Plan was on rural development. This was in recognition of the fact that most of our people live in rural areas. Thus, our policies must accordingly seek to provide services and income to these areas.

The Botswana Government has over the past few decades identified as its development objectives the racist and repressive practices against the Arab people in Palestine and the other occupied territories. This also constitutes a flagrant challenge to human rights and fundamental freedoms and a clear violation of international conventions and charters. All these crimes call for a firm attitudes on the part of the Conference, so that these crimes do not go unpunished. It is high time for the Conference to adopt the necessary decisions to dissuade a member State that fails to implement the resolution or respect the principles and objectives of the ILO.

Despite the positive aspects of the report, we wish to make the following comments.

The objectivity and commitment characteristic of ILO activity means that it must abide by the terms and concepts contained in the resolutions of the International Labour Conference – fully accepted and binding within the United Nations and its specialised agencies – and in the two resolutions of the International Labour Conference in 1974 and 1980, referring to the situation of Arab workers “in Palestine and in other occupied Arab territories.”

Despite the fact that ten years since the 1978 Recommendations, the mission seems obsessed by them and meanwhile the situation in this part of the world has remained very serious. It has led to an heroic popular uprising, against the occupation and for the right to self-determination, which has been repressed by the occupying forces with a savagery beyond the crimes of Nazi Germany. The report would have been more useful if it had contained practical proposals to cope with the economic, social and humanitarian situation resulting from repression by “Israel” of the popular uprising. There is not a shadow of a doubt that a worsening of its barbaric measures means that it is necessary to take a new, more realistic view which takes into account the new situation brought about by the popular uprising. We hope that the International Labour Organisation will do this as soon as possible.

We are accustomed to the wise experience and fairness of the ILO in revealing the real reasons for problems in society and the world of work. We would have liked the report to mention the deductions at source imposed on Palestinian workers for the benefit of a social security system which they in no way benefit from, nor profit from these sums.

The technical co-operation programmes offered by the International Labour Organisation to Arab workers' and employers' organisations in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories are so modest that they have virtually no impact on Palestinian citizens since they consist only of ideas, of concepts for study and suggestions for sources of finance. However, the mission recognises the restrictions imposed by the occupying authorities on trade unionists to prevent their benefiting from such programmes, intended by the Organisation for them. We hope that the Director-General will double the credits allocated to workers and employers and provide genuine projects in labour matters to meet the real needs of workers.

The report does not fully reflect the problems encountered by economic, social, educational and health institutions, particularly municipal councils, and above all the Jerusalem Electricity Boards, which faces a terrible financial crisis owing to measures restricting their normal activity and to heavy taxation, making it impossible for them to provide normal services to Palestinian people.

I shall restrict myself to these comments so as not to impose too long a list on you. We would not have time to speak of the cause of the suffering of a whole people under the yoke of a disgraceful racist occupation. The repression, barbaric methods and racial discrimination in occupied Palestine are unheard of in the world except in South Africa and Namibia, where the racist Pretoria regime pursues its racist and inhuman practices against the African people, denying them the right to liberty, independence and self-determination. It is perhaps not surprising to see that there is co-operation between the Pretoria and Tel Aviv regimes in the economic, military, political, scientific and nuclear fields and in exchanging experiences in the arts of torture and repression, as well as other well-known regimes are two sides of the same coin. Their policies are the same. Their objectives are the same. And their victims are two oppressed peoples struggling for liberty and independence. It is no surprise that the United Nations passed a resolution declaring that Zionism is a form of racism. Since the International Labour Conference has spoken out regarding the Pretoria regime and compelled it to retire from this noble Organisation, your Conference should also speak out with courage and responsibility against a member State which defies the resolutions of your Conference and of the United Nations, pursues its policy of repression, terrorism, discrimination, colonisation and violation of trade union rights and freedoms, defying world public opinion by repressing the uprising of the Palestinian people by the most abject methods of terrorism, assassination and barbarous repression, denounced by the world community and condemned by the international organisations and all the free people of the world.

I am sure that you are aware that the real solution to all these tragedies and problems lies in the ending of the Israeli occupation of Palestine and the other occupied territories and in the possibility of giving the Palestinian people the right to exercise its lawful right to self-determination and establish its own independent Palestinian State, under the direction of the Organisation for the Liberation of Palestine, its only legitimate representative. Until the Palestinian people can achieve this aim, the United Nations and its specialised bodies, particularly the ILO, should follow closely the situation of Arab workers and offer them every kind of support and protection, in accordance with the principles and aims on which this Organisation is based and the provisions of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

Miss VENSON (Government delegate, Botswana) – I welcome the opportunity and privilege to address this august assembly and, as other speakers before me, I wish to take this opportunity to congratulate the President on his election to this very important office. His election is indeed testimony of the confidence we have in him as well as in his country. I am confident that he will lead the deliberations of this Session to a fruitful conclusion.

It often becomes all too easy to forget the very important role played by the Director-General and his staff in preparing the informative reports that have been made available to us and I therefore wish to congratulate them on that score.

attainment of rapid economic growth, economic independence, sustained development and social justice by reducing some income inequities and at the same time spreading income-generating opportunities particularly in the rural areas.

The Government of Botswana still maintains this approach to ensure that the benefits of development are spread equitably throughout the country, thus helping to bridge the gap in living standards between urban and rural areas. We also recognise that the urban industrial sector falls far short of generating sufficient employment. In most of our developing economies subsistence agriculture serves as a refuge sector for most of our people. Hence, the need to improve not only its labour-absorption capacity but its productivity as well.

While unfavourable climate and soil conditions in the greater part of Botswana make it difficult for us to develop rewarding arable agriculture, the Government has embarked on supportive measures to make rural areas attractive to live in in order to curb the rural-urban migration. The importance of non-farming activities as a source of rural employment is also recognised.

We in Botswana realise, as pointed out by the Director-General's Report, that problems of rural areas and accompanying poverty are far too vast and complex to allow for solutions through official programmes alone. We spare no efforts therefore in encouraging the spirit of self-reliance, as we ardently believe that though outside agents may play a facilitating role in rural employment promotion "the basic initiative rests with the rural people themselves".

It is indeed encouraging to note that in the field of rural employment promotion, the share of rural projects allocated by the ILO amounts to up to 51 per cent in Africa alone, 28 per cent in Asia and 17 per cent in Latin America. As the unemployment problems continue, we can only look forward to such continued subsistence and assistance from the ILO.

As the 40th anniversary of the United Nations Declaration of Human Rights is being celebrated, we need to look with sharpened concern to the continued existence of the abhorrent system of apartheid in South Africa. Botswana welcomes the vigour with which the Director-General continues to show and act in condemning this inhuman system. In southern Africa, we are constantly reminded of and exposed to the innumerable sufferings that the victims of apartheid internally, and those neighbouring South Africa, have to suffer. The recent murder of innocent and defenceless Botswana citizens, including one South African refugee in Botswana by the South African Defence Force, show the bullying tactics now adopted by South Africa. The regime not only demonstrates disrespect for territorial integrity in the front-line States but has also embarked on international terrorism. This has been demonstrated clearly by the murder of Ms. September in France recently. Botswana would want to thank the international community for showing solidarity during these dark hours. I wish to reiterate that the dead were in no way a threat to the South African security.

The existence of democratic systems in the front-line States are not only an envy to South Africa, but a threat to her and she is bent on destabilising them. South Africa continues to be at war with herself and, being unable to control the internal conflict and uprisings, uses her might to direct her internal problems to neighbouring States in the form of military attacks.

There can be no doubt that a major challenging task lies ahead for the international community of man to fight for the total dismantling of apartheid in South Africa. As the 40th anniversary of the United Nations Declaration of Human Rights is marked, the uncanny silence and lack of action by some members of the international community towards the total elimination of apartheid in South Africa can only be described as unfortunate.

By attacking neighbouring countries, South Africa wants to create a sanitary cordon by reducing these independent States to the status of bantustans which are pliable and easily manipulated to ensure that she continues to enjoy external protection of apartheid.

It is gratifying to note, though, that in line with the recommendations of the Committee on Apartheid at the meeting held in Zimbabwe, there is indication that there will be definite action taken against apartheid.

The work of the Harare conference will definitely provide a milestone in reviewing aspects of action which need to be taken against apartheid and also to examine assistance that can be made available to the front-line States to help them resist destabilisation by South Africa.

My delegation wishes to urge the international community to continue to prevail upon South Africa to show her reason and desist from attacking and destabilising the economies of the front-line States and the other neighbouring States.

As Namibia's independence continues to be elusive, we all look forward to the day when the people of that country will be free to determine their own destiny.

In conclusion, I wish to thank the Director-General and the ILO for continuing to be a source of inspiration by providing an appropriate forum where issues that affect all of us can genuinely be discussed in a tripartite atmosphere.

Interpretation from French: Mr. VANIE-BI-TRA (Minister of Labour, Côte d'Ivoire) – First of all, may I express to our President the full satisfaction of my delegation on his brilliant, well-deserved election and we wish him every success in our work under his guidance.

I should like to express my joy at seeing with him, as Vice-President, my fellow countryman Adiko Niamkey, to whom I extend my warm fraternal congratulations. The trust placed in him by his peers is felt as an honour to his country.

And finally, in the same brief praise, I associate the Director-General, Francis Blanchard, who so effectively represents the ILO in his life and activities.

Forty years ago the United Nations proclaimed the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

Forty years ago the ILO adopted one of its main instruments on the same rights – the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention 1948, (No. 87).

Thirty years ago the ILO strengthened its armoury of standards against violation of these rights, adopting the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111).

Twenty years ago the United Nations General Assembly proclaimed 1968 the International Human Rights Year to draw the attention of the world community to the means of working for the recognition and safeguard of fundamental freedoms and rights.

So many memorable dates marking one single anniversary – that of human rights – from the solemn proclamation of the United Nations to the more recent times of 1968 to keep these rights always alive in human memory.

Now, after more than half a century's existence, it may seem superfluous – perhaps pointless – to exalt the enormous achievement of this Organisation which made an essential contribution to maintaining peace in the world by safeguarding social peace. Yet, in a world ever changing, marked as it is by a long recession, by great structural upheavals which darken the horizon, we must assess the results of its action, and sum up the main problems with which the Organisation and its constituents are faced, particularly in their efforts regarding human rights.

This is the concern that is reflected so sharply in that part of the Director-General's Report entitled Human Rights – A common responsibility.

This is an exceptional document, full of profound ideas; facing the gravity of the world economic situation, it calls on our Conference to look into its implications from the point of view of human rights and to ask itself how the standards and principles adopted may contribute to decisions likely to remedy instability and present tensions.

We note with pleasure that human rights are among the main concerns of States now. Indeed, they determine the quality of relations between States.

Apart from the fact that even the greatest Powers on our planet now give human rights pride of place on the agenda of their meetings, numerous small and needy States have been refused aid on account of the liberties they have taken as regards respect of human rights.

It is equally reassuring to see the new awareness among the individuals regarding these rights, leading to the setting up throughout the world of associations that defend human freedoms and dignity. Amnesty International and associations of jurists bear witness to this awakening of consciences to ignorance of and contempt for human rights which lead to acts of barbarism that revolt the conscience of humanity.

The Director-General's clear and well informed analysis is one with which we fully associate ourselves. When referring to the joint responsibility of nations, he not only reminds us all of the commitments entered into in this field but also appeals for the necessary solidarity of nations to bring about the conditions requisite for the enjoyment of these rights.

Some nations should feel more concerned than others by the problem particularly as in the case of my own country if complaints of violations of human rights are made, rightly or wrongly.

It may well appear easy to refute false accusations or to produce evidence in defence, but we think more should be done in a sphere where the highest moral values are involved, especially where attachment to these principles is an underlying theme in one's action.

This is why I wish to make it clear that I have taken the floor not merely as the head of a delegation to the International Labour Conference playing his normal role but above all because our honour has been attacked. For this reason I have come to proclaim aloud, here in the United Nations, the values in which we believe and to describe what we actually do about these values in Côte d'Ivoire. All this can be appreciated in respect both of the values embodied in the preamble to the Constitution of the ILO and of the standards that have been drafted here patiently and with conviction in their justification. In so doing I feel that it is not inappropriate to make known or better known the person who embodies these values for us – our President.

I have had the honour to walk these halls of the Palais des Nations – the United Nations building – each year for 19 years. I have always avoided undue reference to the place where I was born and to what we do there.

And now, for once, I should like to break with this habit as we discuss a topic dear to our hearts in Côte d'Ivoire – human rights. These rights remain the basis of our everyday concern by virtue of our principles and religious beliefs, our economic and social views and our deliberate political choice.

I do not do it often, but I will do it for once: allow me to go over a few stages in the life of Félix Houphouët Boigny, to whom respect for fundamental human rights is almost innate.

He was born in 1905 and, as a child, during a hunting party with his uncle, he swore never to shed human blood after seeing the look in the eyes of a mother ape that had been struck to the death with its young one in its arms.

Houphouët then, obviously, knew nothing of the ILO – which in any case did not exist – or of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which came later. But he had made a commitment as regards respect for life – the first and foremost of human rights.

Indeed, in Côte d'Ivoire one does not kill, one does not torture, concentration camps and political prisons are unknown. The death penalty does appear in our Penal Code but the President's philosophy is such that it has never been applied since independence.

As a medical student, he soon became known for his passion for freedom and dignity. As a doctor he was sensitive to everything concerning human beings. Already in 1925, in now famous articles "We have been robbed of too much", he defended Côte d'Ivoire's plantation workers who were crushed by colonial injustice. Even today he is almost alone in calling attention to the plight of our peasants, who are denied the fruits of their labours by world speculation which disregards the production costs of our exports.

In 1944, he set up the African Agricultural Trade Union to defend the interests of his fellow citizens who, like him, were planters and whose produce was being sold at prices lower than those authorised so that only the colonialists profited.

He knows better than anyone else what trade unionism is. He created the Democratic Party of the Ivory Coast in 1946, when he was a député in the French Constituent Assembly.

This party gave birth, on 18 October of the same year, to the African Democratic Gathering; this great Party which led many French-speaking African countries to national and international sovereignty regaining, thanks to him, their freedom and dignity.

But, before this, in the French Assembly, he worked for the abolition of forced labour which was abolished in the French colonies by a law which bears his name: he is thus remembered for his essential contribution to ending a situation that disregarded freedom, dignity and justice.

The Ivory Coast, as from 1956, enjoyed domestic autonomy under the basic law called the Gaston Defferre Act, and Houphouët Boigny had the privilege and the onerous task of taking on the destinies of his country.

Raising his responsibilities to the height of his conscience, on 28 September 1958 he made the following memorable and profoundly moving statement, which was to remain his creed for the next 30 years: "Every day, when I meditate, I ask God to help me. I say to him: If man's trust gives me these responsibilities for my actions, if, in carrying out my task, you think that the strength and influence I derive from the trust placed in me by my brethren could lead me to commit injustices and trample underfoot the rights of the weak, then, my Lord, take away their trust, take away my office, send me back to my little village, Yamoussoukro, and my little hut."

This dialogue with the Almighty certainly is that of a man of faith, for whom, pace Jean-Paul Sartre, "man is not a pointless passion", and who likes to say that over and above any creed, the greatest and foremost duty of man is to love his neighbour as himself.

But although none of this is new, two essential ideas remained the cornerstone of all his deeds: the persistent search for peace which he made our second religion; peace, which for us "is not a word but a way of life", a value to which ILO is likewise deeply attached: dialogue, without which there can be no true peace and which is for us the "arm of the strong, not the weak".

I think of his memorable press conference held in 1971, in Abidjan. He said: "All the rest, liberty, tolerance, justice, solidarity, the exercise of all kinds of rights, derive from these concepts; all this to reach one objective, human happiness, the end and final cause of all dynamics of actions. Solidarity within the Ivory Coast, among us, and also with the other African countries and with the world and most of all with our closest neighbours: the Ivory Coast never wished to be an oasis in the midst of a desert of deprivation."

After the setting up in 1959 of the oldest African institution for co-operation, mutual assistance and solidarity, the Council of Entente, came the OCAM, the Organisation of African Unity (OAU), the Economic Commission for Western African (CEAO), for Eastern Africa (CDEAO), and nowhere did the Ivory Coast stand aside; more than that, it always made sacrifices for the sake of these organisations, a living expression of our solidarity.

I will not speak of Boigny's exceptional kindness, altruism, his African sense of forgiveness: he is a traditional chief who trusts men of good will, for he believes sincerely that "there is nothing in the world, or outside the world, better than good will".

With the rich experience of his years in the Assembly, then in the Government of a country that proclaimed "human rights" two centuries ago, Houphouët is certainly well versed in the subject of our discussions. This is what made him as General de Gaulle said: "An outstanding political brain, well up on all the questions of his country, of Africa and of the world; having exceptional authority at home and undoubted influence abroad to serve the cause of reason."

As regards respect for human rights in Côte d'Ivoire, let us simply say that our world has become so small since progress has reduced distances that anyone can come and see for himself what we are doing there; there is favourable witness enough.

Whatever values are involved, our basic premise, of which we are as convinced as a mathematic formula, is that a hungry man is not a free man; a man bowed down by material worries has neither the time nor the means to rise above the problems of the moment.

Finally, I think of what President Boigny said in 1985, which came from his very depths, his deepest self, his metaphysical ego, and which, for me, cover the whole question of human rights in Côte d'Ivoire: "Speaking of peace in our country, I mean peace of the heart, peace of mind, peace in our daily behaviour, fed by tolerance, active solidarity, respect for human rights and respect for human life."

Mr. AHERN (Minister of Labour, Ireland) – May I begin by congratulating the President, on his election and by wishing him and his Vice-Presidents every success in their important work during the session.

It is most appropriate that our distinguished Director-General has taken human rights issues as the theme of his Report in this the fortieth anniversary year of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Indeed, the ILO was founded to promote human rights. Its Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia anticipated many of the ideas underlying the Charter of the United Nations. In his Report, the Director-General has demonstrated how these basic texts of the ILO frequently mirror the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

The Director-General's Report provides a wide-ranging review of the role which human rights has played in the new approach to social policy reflected in the work of the ILO over the past 40 years. The United Nations as a whole gives a central position in its work to human rights.

In the ILO the same general principles are translated into practical action by defining standards within its field of competence and by seeking to ensure the implementation of those standards. This orientation owes nothing to either charity or sentimentality. It recognises that social progress must come about through full employment, social security and better living and working conditions.

What is unique about the ILO is that it has the machinery to assess how its standards are put into effect. The fact that controversy has surrounded that machinery is some indication of its effectiveness. The monitoring function of the ILO is vitally important since the value of its work in setting standards is undoubtedly diminished if those standards are not effectively implemented. We know from experience that compliance does not automatically follow once standards are set. Even those who bind themselves to the observance of standards cannot always be relied upon to implement them. The Director-General has drawn attention to the gap between aspiration and achievement. Not only are there situations in which standards agreed by this Organisation are being disregarded, but this regularly involves violations of basic human rights.

The Director-General has emphasised the need to continue to search for more effective measures to ensure implementation of ILO standards. The social policy principles reflected in the Declaration of Philadelphia contained in themselves a new driving force – the collaboration of workers and employers in the preparation and application of social and economic measures.

In many countries, the representative organisations of employers and workers have considerably enlarged their original purpose of safeguarding their members' interests and have become the watchdogs of the public interest. On this international stage, workers' and employers' organisations are now making increasing use of the various opportunities available to them to have problem issues examined by ILO supervisory bodies.

My Government is certainly willing to co-operate fully in that process. We consider that one of the most effective ways for governments generally to contribute to furthering human rights in this anniversary year would be to increase co-operation with supervisory bodies within the United Nations system. We regard these supervisory and review bodies as integral parts of the process of implementation.

I welcome the inclusion in the Director-General's Report of references to the matter of equal opportunity and treatment in employment. While the question of equal opportunity in its broad sense covers a wide range of equality issues relating to sex, race, colour, religion and other areas, I would like to refer in particular to the matter of equal treatment for men and women in relation to employment.

The positive influence of international standards on national law has been particularly significant in this area because the principle of equality between men and women is one of those rules of law which has not been derived from commonly accepted practice. Instead, the achievement of equality in employment often represents a challenge to conventional practices in the workplace.

This has sometimes created internal problems both of principle and practice for employers and trade unions. Tensions can arise, for instance over whether equality issues should be treated as an aspect of industrial relations or as an aspect of fundamental rights.

It is not, of course, enough simply to eliminate unlawful discrimination in order to achieve equality of opportunity. Equality of opportunity is a wider goal. As a concept it has not yet been integrated satisfactorily into the legal systems of many of those countries which originally introduced legislation on equal treatment in the light of the ILO Conventions. We have recently seen the development of what have been called positive action measures, aimed at removing practices and constraints which continue to inhibit the realisation of equality of opportunity and employment. We need to ensure that our laws are sufficiently flexible to incorporate principles of positive action.

We must ensure a proper balance between efficiency and fairness in pursuit of our economic objectives. Looking after the interests of disadvantaged groups in the labour market and establishing broad equality of opportunity represent a solid foundation on which to base a strategy for genuine economic recovery and for improvements in employment.

Failure to take account of these very basic social policy objective will lead to a deterioration in relations between labour and management interests, greater resistance to change and in the long run declining competitiveness and standards of living.

Of course we need to analyse carefully situations in which a lack of flexibility seems to be undermining the effectiveness of the labour force. Trade unions, management and government have mutual responsibilities to ensure that flexibility is pursued as a positive development and not as a means of reducing employment protection and job security.

It is appropriate that the Director-General's Report should consider the implications of the economic difficulties faced by so many countries for the work of the ILO. We do not, of course, underestimate the problems faced by governments grappling with the adverse economic environment. Indeed, we ourselves have first-hand experience of the difficult consequences, particularly in relation to employment.

Current levels of economic performance and investment have been insufficient to bring about substantial reductions in continuing high levels of unemployment. My Government takes the view that the industrialised market economy countries must commit themselves to the application of macro-economic policies designed to increase demand and boost employment.

The tendency instead has been to accept that the best that can be achieved is modest economic growth and low inflation and to take comfort in the fact that high unemployment has ceased to get worse. The Governments of member States must be more ambitious and must focus especially on helping those who continue to suffer as a direct consequence of these conditions.

My own Government has sought to address our national economic situation with the particular objective of providing more employment. Shortly after taking up office in March 1987, it initiated discussions with the social partner with a view to securing an agreed programme for national recovery. These discussions culminated in the successful negotiation of a programme for national recovery to cover the period up to 1990. The programme is based on the recognition that the success of measures to improve economic performance, and particularly those measures directed at tackling unemployment, ultimately depend on the endorsement and support of the community as a whole, the responsiveness of the administrative machinery and especially on the co-operation and good will of employers and trade unions at local level.

We consider that the development of our programme for national recovery on a consensus basis reflects the Director-General's emphasis on involving trade unions and employers' organisations through participation with government in the formulation of policies for economic and social development.

The issue of human rights is of particular and special significance in the area of social security. It is a basic human right that each individual should be enabled to pursue his or her economic, cultural and social development independently and with dignity. That cannot be achieved unless each member of society is able to rely on a certain level of economic support at all times.

The maintenance of adequate levels of social security for categories which need official support must be a priority for governments even in times of economic difficulty when the burdens of adjustment have to be equitably shared by the community at large. Our weaker citizens must be protected always, no matter what the circumstances are.

At the start of my address, I welcomed the fact that our Director-General should devote his Report to human rights issues 40 years after the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. The issue of human rights was also the subject of a Director-General's Report 20 years ago, in 1968, at the 52nd Session of the Conference. On that occasion, Mr. David A. Morse, Director-General, concluded his Report with the expression of "hope that the discussion of my Report at the Conference will provide guideposts to the new avenues which we should follow to establish an ever firmer foundation for the realisation of the ideals of freedom and dignity, economic security and equal opportunity."

It is my hope that consideration of the Director-General's Report will not just renew that expression of hope of your predecessor of 20 years ago or consolidate what has been achieved in the interim, but that it will be instrumental in providing a fresh impetus to the efforts to achieve human rights for all.

Mr. DE KONING (Minister for Social Affairs and Employment, Netherlands) – I should like to associate myself with those speakers who have preceded me in congratulating the President, as well as the other officers.

The Director-General has submitted to this Conference an elaborate Report on human rights, a subject of the highest importance. The Report contains an impressive amount of facts, analyses and ideas. Like most speakers before me, I will limit myself to commenting on a few of them.

First, I should like to say something on the issue of human rights as such. For human rights are of particular significance this year as we commemorate the fact that 40 years ago the Universal Declaration of Human Rights was adopted. The common responsibility of which the Director-General's Report speaks can be directly traced to the Declaration. The issue of human rights is of the utmost importance as, in my view, it is the starting-point for all further developments.

Essentially, the ILO is firmly rooted in the idea of human rights. Any struggle for social justice, as well as against poverty, underemployment and unemployment, is, in the final analysis, linked with fundamental human rights. Social progress must be firmly based on the enjoyment of human rights, or else there is no progress at all. Substantial progress, if it is to be sustained, can only be based on freedom, equality and solidarity.

Human rights also mean a process of continuing progress. We can only move forward to the full and effective implementation of the fundamental principles embodied in these rights. The final goal is clear and may not be compromised. The path towards that goal, however, is of concern to us, as is the pace at which we proceed. Too many words have been written into conventions and declarations, but too few of them have been put into practice.

Looking back, we may nevertheless identify a number of positive developments, as does the Director-General's Report. Our views tend to be influenced by the present situation and perhaps less by what has been achieved over the past 20 or 40 years. Yet, the most pressing questions for our present discussion remains, how we can act in such stark contradiction to our very beliefs and convictions? How is it possible that we witness and condemn the most flagrant violations of human rights while at the same time we all agree that there can be no human dignity without the full enjoyment of human rights?

In part, the explanation for this lies in the so-called indivisibility of human rights. The Report of the Director-General gives a number of examples of the interference of social development with the enjoyment of human rights. But in my opinion this can only be part of the story. I believe that such indivisibility of human rights can never be an excuse for deliberate violations. Hence, I prefer to speak of equality of human rights. Equality implies that their status is linked but not their implementation. I feel that underdevelopment cannot be used as an excuse for the arrest and detention or worse of trade union leaders and trade union representatives, for discrimination, for curtailment of trade union activities etc. What I would like to stress here is that we should be very careful in linking the various elements of human rights to each other. Economic and social development can, in my view, be no precondition for the application of rights such as freedom of association or non-discrimination.

In the same vein, the concept of national sovereignty should never serve as a justification for violating human rights. The international responsibility which the application of human rights demands, calls for monitoring at the international level.

Now, let me comment on some of the other topics the Director-General has raised in his Report. While reading the report, I was struck by the relatively minor attention given to democracy at the workplace. In the context of human rights issues, I think the development of democracy at the workplace, participation of workers, codetermination or whatever name we use, is important as well as necessary. It is supplementary to some of the classic political and civil rights such as the several notions of freedom. In fact, one could say that of concept of democracy at the workplace constitutes more or less the bridge between the classic civil and political rights on the one hand and social and economic rights on the other.

At the political level, we witness in many countries of the world a tendency of central government to step back. In some countries, the role of central government has always been a minor one. More recently, we observe in a number of States in Western and in Eastern Europe that the role of the central government is undergoing a process of revision. These processes of change in both parts of Europe are to some extent identical. The omnipotent central government steps back, as it is felt that at the central level it is no longer possible to foresee and react adequately to all kinds of developments and impulses in and from society.

We all give it different names but essentially it means the same, namely that more responsibilities are placed within society itself and less with central government. In the sphere of labour, the participation of workers can be seen as the necessary supplement to this development. And especially in the context of our discussions on human rights, I felt it was appropriate to pay attention to this subject.

To conclude I wish to thank the Director-General, Francis Blanchard, for the excellent Report he has submitted to the Conference. It embodies his ideas and reflects his inspiration, as well as 15 years of experience as Director-General of this Organisation. Once again, we wish to praise Dr. Blanchard for his wisdom, his intelligence and for the statesmanship with which he has protected the Organisation and for the way he has guided us in our work throughout these difficult years.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. KOVALEVSKI (Workers' delegate, Ukrainian SSR) – First, allow me to associate myself with the congratulations to the President and his Vice-Presidents on their election and to wish them every success in directing our deliberations.

In 1968, in the International Year of Human Rights, the Director-General's Report was devoted to human rights and now, 20 years later, this subject is the theme of our discussion. The Director-General's choice, of course, is no accident. The extreme importance of international documents concerning human rights is becoming ever more obvious.

The changes taking place in the world today, as few can doubt, call for a new political thinking in the practice of international relations.

As never before, our contradictory and complex world is interlinked and constitutes a whole. Recognising this general human truth leads us to the conviction that ensuring international peace and security in the interests of all peoples and each individual calls for co-operation, not confrontation. Favourable possibilities for such co-operation have arisen as a result of positive trends in the world today in international relations, and above all the historic agreements to eliminate two classes of missiles. This is a start to the process of disarmament.

Many people, ordinary people or political figures, international and national organisations, intergovernmental and public organisations, are now much exercised by the complex problems of human rights.

Speaking of human rights we must always remember that this concept may be very broadly interpreted. In our view, there are extremely close links between civil and political, social and economic rights and none of them can exist without the others.

It is extremely important that the ILO should clearly define the basic lines of its action and the fields in which efforts have to be made in the matter of human rights in order to avoid unnecessary duplication of effort with other international organisations and to combine the efforts of all men of good will so as to overcome, in the words of the ILO Report for 1968, "the urge to dominate, eagerness for gain and the forces of hatred, selfishness, prejudice and inertia".

As we see it, the terms of reference that the ILO has enshrined in its Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia unambiguously indicate that the ILO has to concentrate its attention on the social and economic rights of the workers so as to guarantee for each and every citizen a decent standard of living in a world of social justice.

As is well known, major changes are now under way in our country, designed to bring about qualitative renewal in our society. A radical economic reform is taking place, the process of democratisation is being developed and the workers and their organisations are becoming increasingly active socially.

A decisive means of attaining these ends is democratisation, further progress in improving self-management, the reinforcement of the people's power, greater participation by the workers in matters concerning the State, society and their own concerns.

This presents a most responsible task for the main workers' organisations, the trade unions.

In the past few years, the role and the possibilities of trade unions have increased considerably. By making a sensible use of their rights, the trade unions defend the workers' interests, oppose arbitrary action by individual administrative officials, strictly supervise the process of giving effect to decisions so that these are not at the expense of social issues and strive to strengthen the social orientation of economic decisions taken.

A radical reform of our economic procedures, accelerated intensive development, technical re-equipment in production and the introduction of technical innovation will inevitably give rise, and are already giving rise, to significant changes in the structure of the workforce. We are particularly concerned by the fact that this process will render a part of the workforce redundant.

And of course the trade unions cannot ignore those questions which the Director-General mentions in his Report: reconciling the process of displacement of labour with the guaranteed right to work, facilitating the mobility of labour, wage reforms, training, retraining and so on.

So far as the right to employment is concerned, which we consider to mean not only the possibility of getting work so as to earn a subsistence wage, but as a right to skilled creative work in accordance with one's level of education, qualifications and interests, this right is reinforced by law in our country and each worker released is guaranteed other work in the same or another enterprise or in the same organisation in his own profession or speciality. If for any reason this possibility does not exist, the option of retraining in a new profession is guaranteed, bearing in mind individual wishes and the opportunities for appropriate work.

When retraining or further training is undertaken by workers, full time they keep the average wage they earned in the former place of employment or the difference is made up to the average wage throughout the period of training when training is being undertaken full time.

From what I have said, it is clear that the workers released enjoy a high degree of social protection and the difficulties arising from the change in their activity are reduced to a minimum.

The trade unions play a major part in providing such protection. As we see it, it is possible to overcome the unfavourable social consequences of structural change and the introduction of new technology and new systems of organisation of work organisation only if the workers and their organisations – primarily the trade unions – are actively and directly involved in the process of change and innovation, starting at the planning stage.

Everybody knows that new technology can give a powerful boost to labour productivity and job satisfaction. We understand that the achievements of science and technology open up new possibilities for social and economic progress, but to use them for the welfare of people we need a broad democratic supervision of the implementation of new techniques.

We are therefore convinced that in the international instruments which will be adopted under item V of the agenda of this session, employment promotion and social security, provisions should be included acknowledging the right of the trade unions to participate in resolving all economic and social issues relating to structural and technological change, and especially in issues relating to dismissal or relocation of staff.

We can only welcome the attention given in the Report to an issue of such crucial importance to workers as the right to equitable and agreeable conditions of work. The Director-General is right in saying that occupational accidents and disease can and must be checked. We share the view of those who reject flexibility in application of occupational health and safety standards. We also attach great importance to worker's participation in the planning, implementation and observance of safety measures.

In our country, in accordance with the Labour Code, supervision of compliance with occupational health and safety legislation and regulations is the responsibility of the trade unions.

A major role in these matters is played by the technical labour inspectorate a special service rested by law with extensive prerogatives.

The technical inspectors of the trade unions can, without let or hindrance, investigate what is going on in undertakings, issue binding instructions to the management to eliminate infringements of safety standards and regulations and to stop work, if necessary, in individual shops, or on individual machines, and they make use of these rights.

Only last year, the technical inspectorate of the trade unions of the Ukrainian SSR carried out more than 74,000 such inquiries in undertakings. Work was stopped in those shops and undertakings where breaches in occupational health and safety standards were observed and officials guilty of such breaches, in accordance with the legislation in force, were brought to justice or dismissed at the request of the trade unions.

The appearance of new high-energy machinery, robots, microprocessors, flexible automated production systems, conveyor belt systems, and new substances and materials, of course have considerably changed the work done by people and often present new potential dangers. Taking this into account, the trade unions take part in inspecting all new equipment from the design stage up to its installation and use on the shop floor. Thus, in 1987, we undertook technical inspection of robots introduced into industry; machine tool factories were ordered to correct any shortcomings observed.

Participation of the trade unions and all workers in supervising occupational health and safety matters was given a fresh boost by the adoption of the Law on state enterprises. Under this Act, the work collectives play an active part in examining the complex plans for improving working conditions and occupational health measures whilst supervising the effect given to them. Close attention is paid to occupational health and safety when concluding collective agreements. This year, during the run-up to collective agreements (33,200 such agreements and more than 7,000 agreements on occupational health and safety and social issues were concluded in collective farms) the workers took the initiative to include in these agreements a number of major social issues such as housing construction, leisure, health and other matters.

At the beginning of my statement I said that, in devoting his Report to a subject of such crucial importance to workers as human rights, the Director-General repeatedly reminds us of the need for co-operation, both at the national level and between States.

In fact, co-operation on an equal footing and to mutual advantage is one of the basic means of attaining the aims of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and international covenants on human rights, which themselves emphasise the need to help bring about friendlier international relations.

The ILO too, unique in its structure and rich in experience of dealing with the matters within its competence, can do much to develop international co-operation.

Assistance in such co-operation, together with standard-setting activities and technical assistance, can become a major contribution of the ILO in assuring respect for human rights against a background of universal and lasting peace, a world without poverty, hunger, sickness and injustice.

Such action by the ILO will always have our support and understanding.

Mr. MALLIA MILANES (Employers' delegate, Malta) – In opening, I should like to add my sincere congratulations to those of my colleagues on the election by the President to chair this Assembly. We are convinced that he will bring to this office the distinction it has consistently enjoyed in the past.

This year, in his Report, the Director-General has chosen to grasp a nettle – and a particularly prickly one, at that. The subject of human rights, the basic rights of each and every inhabitant of this planet, from the starving child to the surfeited adult, raises many a discussion. Violations of perceived human rights cause protests not only in the country of commission but in the international sphere. This is truly an international issue, which finds expression in numerous forums. It is our obligation to treat it here with the gravity it deserves.

The Director-General warns that preoccupation with economic issues to the detriment of employment growth and social policy could jeopardise human rights, pointing out that gainful employment is a vital link in the enjoyment of other human rights. We in the private enterprise sector share Mr. Blanchard's visualisation of the right to employment as a link in the larger chain of human rights. It has always been the expressed view of my Association that human rights and employment are interlinked and that one should not be sacrificed for the sake of the other. Indeed our consistently-held view is that economic prosperity cannot be achieved in an atmosphere that is anything less than fully respectful of all human rights and freedoms.

It is hopelessly futile to live in a society where, even if you are fully employed, you do not have the liberty to enjoy the fruits of your employment. Conversely, the fullest freedom is illusory if you do not have the wherewithal to expand and take your rightful place in this free society. Man, indeed, does not live by bread alone, but bread is essential for him to continue living.

This, in truth, is the dilemma of the human condition, the continued balancing act which must be played out between the forces of rights on the one side and of obligations on the other, the genuine desire to improve the quality of life on the one hand and the stark reality of economic constraints on the other.

Taking one of the subjects dealt with by the Director-General, occupational safety and health, enables me to illustrate this dilemma. In Malta, an extremely valuable exercise in tripartism has just been completed. A Commission on Health and Safety, completing its task of examining the state of the art within the appointed time (itself an important achievement), has identified a number of areas within which improvements were required and proposed the establishment of an autonomous Occupation Health and Safety Authority, with wide-ranging powers to tackle the problems connected with the workplace in this area. The Commission which carried out this work was fully tripartite in structure.

This Commission, properly in my view, found that the protection of the workers' safety and health was not a matter for negotiation: so basic a right is that to protection of physical integrity that no discussion need take place about the concept. However, when one comes to implement the concept, I perceive that difficulties may begin to arise. Cost, as always, rears its ugly head, and the temptation to cut corners may become overwhelming, especially in the context of industries which may be living close to the margin of viability.

Let us examine another basic right – at least to those who operate a democratic free enterprise system – the right to industrial democracy. In principle, little can be said against the theory of co-determination by the economic partners of their common future. In principle, I repeat, this may be so, but in practice I query, how likely it is that the established lines of demarcation between capital and labour will be redrawn into something completely different at least, in the immediate future. As we have examined two aspects of human rights with a distinctly “industrial” flavour, so may we go on to examine all the others with which Mr Blanchard has so capably dealt. After just such a thorough examination, we will arrive, I would predict, at this conclusion: to each human right are attached such difficulties of definition and attainment that complete harmony is Utopian. Having, effectively, reached something of an obvious conclusion about the human condition to which I referred earlier, I will attempt to be constructive within the limitations imposed by the constraints of time and context.

Our Organisation, in its own sphere of activity, is the epitome of the process which must be undergone if lasting improvements in the more general field of human rights are to be achieved. Here, nothing is done except after discussion by all the parties concerned – the workers, the employers and the Governments. By and large, this pattern tends to be adopted all the way down to the level of the single firm or enterprise, at least in socio-economically developed areas.

If this pattern were to be followed in good faith in other spheres – if, for example, governments had to interact positively with opposition and with the electorate, in time an atmosphere would be generated which I am convinced would result in an acceptable human rights condition overall.

Admittedly, this process is not one of the most practical ones. The oppressor in defiance of an oppressed's human rights is not likely to enter into dialogue with the oppressed, and in the absence of good faith the whole structure collapses. However, I will not allow pessimism to overcome the concept which I believe to be possible. The gradual rationalisation of resources and ideas will result in a world in which we and our children can live in and not just survive.

I should like to inject a note of reality into the proceedings, as employers are wont to do. To everything there is a cost: if the demands made result in too high a cost, it is very possible that a flat “no” will be forthcoming and no progress at all will be made. This thought applies to all levels of the world of work, from this assembly down to the smallest firm.

We should ensure that we do not put the social cart before the economic horse. Rights and responsibilities are inseparable. But one has rights only as long as one is ready to fulfil one's obligations.

May I conclude by a warning note to participants at this Conference. Humanity is confronted with severe problems of unemployment and poverty, particularly in areas where social protection is highly limited or non-existent. This can cause an eruption of large sections of the world's human society. It is time for us to move from words to deeds. As the Director-General rightly points out, “the continuing effectiveness of these mechanisms depends on a genuine willingness by member States to collaborate in a common endeavour to secure the observance of freely assumed obligations. Expressions of support for international supervision must be borne out by actual performance, in the realisation that all nations stand to gain from greater respect for human rights and enhanced social well-being.”

Only this will change the course of history and events. The alternative is illusory.

Mr. BOGGS (representative of the International Federation of Chemical, Energy and General Workers' Unions) – The Organisation I have the honour to represent, the International Federation of Chemical, Energy and General Workers' Unions (ICEF), serves over 6 million workers in 60 nations around the world in the chemical, pharmaceutical, pulp and paper, rubber, cement, energy, including nuclear energy, and petroleum industries, and works closely with the ILO on many fronts. We know, use and appreciate this venerable institution and the broad reach of the programmes and services that it houses.

I have stood on this podium to comment on the Reports of the Director-General for several years, offering our constructive comments where we deem them appropriate, but this year, at this 75th Session of the International Labour Conference, the Director-General has condensed the very essence of the ILO in his volume called Human rights – A common responsibility. The essence of this august institution is precisely that of human rights and the mechanism that puts the ILO far above the other members of the United Nations firmament is the application, the implementation of the human rights and other standards of the ILO. The review process makes the Conventions and Recommendations of the ILO come alive and give hope to workers and their families everywhere.

The Director-General makes us inordinately proud to be associated with the ILO in this Report because human rights and trade union rights are synonymous. Those rights are enshrined in the Conventions of the ILO which are part of the daily bread of workers everywhere, but beyond the right to strike, the right to bargain collectively, the right to organise, the right to equal remuneration, is the right to know. The right to know when an industry plans to close down or move its facilities, to know the risks involved in working with and around substances of hazardous nature, the right to live and work in a safe environment free from the risk of pollution of water and air, the risk of fire and explosion.

We must stress also the increasing difficulties in many countries for unfettered operation of trade unions. While the abuse of human and trade union rights in South Africa, Chile, Paraguay, lately Ecuador, South Korea, Malaysia, Indonesia and many other countries are familiar to many of us here, the industrialised democracies of our world ruled by conservative governments have also been busy clamping down on trade union freedoms.

Of course, this may be perfectly legal, the laws having been carefully tailored to abridge the right to strike, for example, all in the name of justice, but the effect is the same: workers in industrialised democracies find their rights encircled by new anti-union legislation on the one hand, and union-busting consultants, hired anti-labour mercenaries, on the other.

This onerous practice of union busting has spread from its native environs in the United States to the United Kingdom and indeed is beginning to be seen in other parts of Europe as well.

The forum of industrial relations in the United Kingdom has been moved from the negotiating table to the law courts. The sequestration of union funds and the imposition of massive fines for activities that were perfectly legal until recently are an attack on the basic trade union rights to organise and to bargain collectively. Union rule books and constitutions, established over many years of democratic debate and discussion within the membership, are increasingly subject to legal interference and controls. This government use of legislation and the law courts to curb union activity and influence provides an example that many reactionary governments elsewhere are following. The Labour Relations Amendment Bill in South Africa in many of its provisions owes a clear debt to Thatcher and Reagan.

Thus, trade union rights, human rights, can never be taken for granted, hence the international labour standards vigilance of the ILO and the timely Report of the Director-General on the subject of reinforcing, updating and sharpening the application of standards, the freedom of association procedures, the implementation of the human rights Covenants so clearly delineated in the Declaration of Philadelphia and woven throughout the fabric of this notable Conference document.

All eyes are upon Europe, the new Europe of 1992. Trade unionism was born alongside the inequities for workers and their families of the industrial revolution in Europe. Trade unionism and trade union rights have reached their apex in the heart of Europe where social legislation has buttressed trade unionism in the recent past. But clouds gather as new legislation aimed at curbing trade union freedoms becomes more and more evident in parts of Europe. If the process of building a commercially and industrially unified Europe and the emergence of a powerful efficient Europe-wide industrial plant means displacement of workers in weaker European environments then trade union rights vigilance will once again be called to the test. We trade unionists must develop our own strategies to assure both the success of the unification of Europe and the defence of workers' rights and freedoms in that same socio-economic environment. The ILO, too, will have a central role to play in the process leading up to the Europe of 1992.

Last, but by no means least, in the Director-General's Report on human rights is the question of minimum labour standards; indeed, the observance of basic labour standards in all countries is a natural and necessary condition for a relatively free exchange of goods and services worldwide.

Those standards, must of course, include full respect for trade union rights and a just wage for all. Equally important, though, is the health of workers everywhere. Occupational safety and health are human rights, and they are a major concern of the ILO and the ICEF. Both Organisations have helped to create an informed awareness of the issues involved but much remains to be done.

We all know that hazardous jobs are exported from countries with high safety standards to those with laxer rules. In these circumstances, effective regulation of health and safety of the workplace must be international. That is a vital and urgent task for the ILO and for the workers' international representatives.

But trade unions' concern for health does not stop at the factory gate. A livable world is also a human right. The workers and their families demand that their industries build that world and not destroy it. ICEF members realise that public acceptance of their workplaces, and therefore of their jobs, is at stake.

Also, one industry's waste can easily become another industry's problem. The ICEF, for example, organises in both the chemical and paper-making sector. For us, acid rain is an acid test; no trees, no paper.

Environmental protection is now a priority for the ICEF. We would suggest that the ILO, in co-ordination with other United Nations agencies, could help to fight industrial pollution. For this is another international issue par excellence. Pollution knows no frontiers, nor is any country at any stage of development immune to major industrial accidents, as recent history attests.

That brings me to the greatest chemical risk of all: the continued stockpiling of chemical weapons. Inherently unstable, these horrific arsenals are a constant threat in peace as in war. We welcome the progress made so far in the negotiations to rid the world of chemical weapons, but we note that the main obstacle is now the practicalities of verification. In other words, how do we actually make sure that nobody cheats?

This is a more difficult problem than with nuclear armaments because there are thousands of civilian factories that could quite easily produce chemical weapons. Real verification and confidence-building must therefore involve the chemical industry, that is the representatives of chemical workers and employers in all countries. We will be proposing initiatives on this in ILO committees and other appropriate forums.

Ever since the Chernobyl accident, the ICEF has found that purely practical co-operation on nuclear safety issues is possible and necessary between organisations of very different natures. Perhaps the time has come to develop similar, purely practical co-operation on pollution control and the verification of chemical weapons treaties.

I will close by noting aspects of a serious human rights/trade union rights issue that is being discussed in this venerable forum. In Turkey, where my organisation proudly counts six affiliated organisations, recent modifications of a repressive set of laws embodied in the Constitution of 1982 amount to nothing more than cosmetic changes, the end result of which is the continued blatant violation of ILO standards in that country. The Turkish Government promised in 1986 and 1987 to live up to ILO Conventions Nos. 98 and 111; in fact, however, the Committee of Experts' indications have not been taken seriously. The recent amendments to Acts 2821 covering trade unions and 2822 covering collective bargaining makes the repression of trade union freedoms even more Byzantine by extending the ban on the right to strike in so-called essential sectors. My affiliate PETRO-IS is currently prevented from taking trade union action in the chemical sector because it is now included in one of these essential sectors. My affiliates TES-IS and BELEDIYE-IS cannot bargain freely in the government sector owing to relentless government intervention in those negotiations. If Turkey is serious about coming into the Common Market it must take immediate steps to bring its Labour Code into line with ILO and accepted European norms. If it does not, the European trade unions will campaign vigorously until that happens. The ICEF will continue to monitor developments in Turkey on behalf of our affiliated organisations there very closely.

I thank you for your patience and renew our pledge of continued co-operation and support for the ILO and its human rights mission.

Interpretation from Russian: Mrs. TODOROVIC (Workers' delegate, Yugoslavia). – I am particularly pleased to be able to wish the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference every success in its work and heartily to congratulate the President on his contribution which provides a profound analysis of a most important theme from the point of view of the main requirements of human rights in terms of work, social security, trade union freedoms, etc., irrespective of a man's place of birth or residence.

The participation of each one of us in the discussion has been made significantly easier thanks to the extremely well-prepared Report of the Director-General, Mr. Blanchard. The well-founded analysis and proposals for the future activity of participating countries, employers' and workers' groups are giving impetus to the efforts of all progressive forces to overcome the consequences of the economic crisis. The Report showed that the consequences were much more serious and involved the majority of people in the developing countries in the conditions of great external indebtedness of those countries, a fact which it is not necessary to prove to such an august, competent and benevolent assembly as this.

I intend to point to the complexity and difficulties of implementing development objectives which would create the conditions whereby human rights – to which the present session is devoted – would become a reality for all and a requirement for averting the most serious consequences of the economic crisis, which is dividing people into two basic groups: those who have the opportunity to build their own future with their own labour, and those who through no fault of their own find that their basic social security and conditions of existence are placed under threat. The basic message of the Declaration of Philadelphia states: "All human beings, irrespective of race, creed or sex, have the right to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity." This is being placed in jeopardy for a growing number of people in the world due to the consequences of the economic crisis not so much in terms of defining human rights as in the more effective application of ILO standards. It is essential in this case to look again at the ILO's activities as an impetus and as a help – at the Conventions, resolutions and Recommendations – and to monitor obligations that have already been ratified.

Until recently we have been speaking of the problems of the unemployed in our country with an eye mainly to young people seeking first-time jobs. Under the burden imposed by the economic situation several thousand people remain without work as a consequence either of the modernisation of technology or of bankruptcy or of the disappearance of outdated and unprofitable production. At present in Yugoslavia the percentage of unemployed, according to international norms, is almost 14. In the poorly developed regions of our country this problem is even more marked. To this can be added the fact that the reduction and limitation of personal and general consumption countrywide seriously undermines the rights that have already been won. Since the developed countries and those which have developed through great dependence on imported technology are Members of the ILO, we must thank the ILO for the reminder that economic policy "can be only a means for implementing social aims". The exchange of views and experience in the tripartite set-up has enriched the activity of each participant and continually assists the speedier change of positions and broader application of ILO standards.

The signs of economic crisis in Yugoslavia, expressed in terms of a still high level of inflation, and a lowering of real wages and standard of living, demand radical changes in the economic system, and those changes are in fact already under way. In these conditions the trade unions acquire new tasks and bear great responsibility both in the mobilisation of greater productivity and utilisation of every potential, and in the rapid finding of solutions to the problems posed by social security and the maintenance of living standards, especially in conditions of unemployment, and particularly the observance of ILO standards. In our country the consequences of the crisis do not place in question the role of the trade unions in terms of their position in the political system, and trade union freedoms, but to a considerable degree they aggravate their role, particularly because of the complex material possibilities of the economy and the complicated conditions of more rapid economic development. The employment percentage is stagnating, but in some branches of the economy – for example, construction – it is dropping, and together with that the means available for gaining qualifications in a new area of employment and restructuring the economy – which would ensure that people were placed in jobs – are diminishing. So last year the trade unions were very active in taking decisions in the area of economic policy, wages policy and social security, so as to avert the social consequences that go hand in hand with the restrictions accompanying the crisis.

Man is the basic factor in production, and he alone, through his work and creativity, can increase the energy put into it, can apply greater efforts and collaborate only if he himself takes the decisions on objectives, if he knows why and for how long the difficulties will continue, if he sees the effects of his own efforts – and that means if he is fulfilled as a man. In the very difficult conditions in which some collectives found themselves, the difficulties were overcome thanks to the self-managing participation of the workers in the taking of decisions and in the sense of responsibility for the effect of those decisions. Where decisions are taken in an authoritative and one-sided manner there is resistance, temporary work stoppages, discontent and strikes. In the past year we had 1,444 temporary work stoppages involving about 176,000 workers, or 2.5 per cent of the working population. These workers expressed their discontent mainly through their social position, through stopping work, for anything from an hour to several days. As a result of the fact that the aim of the trade union movement is the economic and social development of the workers, these expressions of discontent were a proof and a cause of the fact that seeking solutions in economic reform and economic policy should not threaten the economic and social security of the workers and the unemployed. Last year saw a real drop in wages of 7 per cent. A special report has been written, within the framework of the ILO, on the situation and activities of the trade unions in Yugoslavia, so I shall not dwell on it further here.

Legislation and regulations in many countries are based on the ILO and United Nations standard-setting activity in the field of work: specifically, the elimination of discrimination, which is still a difficulty as far as the position of women is concerned. It is harder for women to find work; the early retirement of women affects women themselves, first of all, but it also lowers the standard of living of the family as a whole, and burdens women with new obligations. Therefore it is valuable to check on formulations concerning the defence of women, so that they can be turned to their advantage and not against them. It is not because of threats to her health, or because of her working capacities or her maternity that the working woman should enjoy equal rights but because of her role as a worker as well as a mother. As for the situation of emigrant workers, the activity of our trade unions at bilateral meetings with trade unions from the developed countries in which Yugoslavs work is proceeding in the direction of implementing the objectives set out in the Report of the Director-General, Mr. Blanchard, concerning the situation of the migrant worker.

It is the right of man to decide himself on the beginning and end of his working life, and on the work he will do. Economic difficulties are more and more frequently jeopardising and restricting opportunities for placing people in work. So this is one area for intensive work by the trade unions. The influence of the commodities market, capital and labour capacity makes these problems more acute in a different sphere; instead of the "right to work" and the consequence in terms of implementing that right, there is increasingly frequent competition between accomplishments and abilities. The conditions in which the possibilities for the economy to open up new workplaces and for the job reallocation authorities to ensure equality of rights and social security for those rejected by competitiveness are both becoming reduced, pose a serious problem, in terms of answering the question as to how and for which specialisms young people should be retrained and given new qualifications, and in terms of educating lawyers, archaeologists, teachers, stomatologists, etc., for whom, at this level of development, there are no real opportunities for job placement and employment in other areas, and many of whom cannot expect to find jobs.

We fully agree that employment and social security are not aims that arise only in a period of economic upturn; they are valuable aims in themselves both for economic reasons and for their ability to motivate people in the current period of crisis. All the measures mentioned in the Report, and the decisions for the implementation of those aims, have proved themselves in our country. We are further convinced that early retirement on pension or deferment of the first job placement are not decisions of an economic or human nature. However, all this has been the subject of repeated and vigorous discussion in the committees of the ILO. Shortening the working day, the working week, the working month, and the length of the working life, and the shaping and organisation of work are considered along with the fact that different kinds of work and conditions interact in different ways and consume labour capacities, and offer the opportunity of finding optimal solutions and confirming them in new ILO standards. As confirmation of this we might mention numerous examples from various branches of activity in our country: from mining, the textile, chemical and food industries, etc., where the arrangement and shortening of working time has meant not only greater productivity, better results in the field of health care and securing the capacity to work, but also the creation of more opportunities for job placement.

In conclusion, I should like to express my gratitude for the support, the warnings and the appeals of the ILO, present throughout the Report of the Director-General, and for the analyses that have been prepared for this session of the Conference – particularly those directed at the developed countries and the IMF – although neither peace nor good international relations can be longlasting if economic policy and the policy of restrictions are jeopardising basic human rights – the right to work, social security and development, everything, in fact, contained in the instruments of the ILO.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. KARDAN (Workers' delegate, Jordan) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! Allow me, at the outset, to join previous speakers in congratulating the President on his election to his high post, with my best wishes for his success in this important task. I am sure that with his wisdom and experience he will conduct the deliberations of our Conference with success, and I am sure that his election to this high post is an indication of the esteem in which he and his country are held.

It is a pleasure for me to congratulate Mr. Francis Blanchard, the Director-General of the ILO, and the ILO as a whole on the successes and achievements of this year, thanks to their efforts, wisdom and constructive collaboration. I should also like to congratulate the Director-General for his excellent choice of subject for his Report for this year. This is an important subject today for we all have mixed feelings of hope and pessimism as a result of the situation in the world today. Wars are going on in several areas and hunger, disease and poverty are increasing day by day despite progress and development. The economic crisis is worsening daily and relations are tense between creditors and debtor countries are increasingly tense. These are phenomena that inspire pessimism about the future of humanity and the progress of human civilisation on our beautiful planet, for a danger in any one place threatens peace everywhere. The spread of hunger, poverty and disease anywhere is a threat to peace throughout the world. What are we to do in these difficult and complex situations? Should we wait for miracles to solve the problems of our international community? This is an impossible dream. Or should we co-operate and devote our efforts to solving these problems in order to ensure peace in the world, to achieve international security and ensure the progress of humanity? Why do we have international organisations if not to take the initiative in this area? And what is the raison d'être of us all if not to co-operate in order to achieve the objectives of these international organisations which have been created to serve the cause and aims of peace in the world, to establish social justice and to fight the three-fold danger of disease, ignorance and poverty?

These organisations have been able to make a number of achievements, but they will be able to do even better with the good will of all the members of the international family. The Director-General has made an extremely judicious choice of theme and title for his Report: Human rights – A common responsibility. If we must co-operate to protect human rights, since it is a responsibility of all of us – countries, organisations or individuals – one might well ask if all countries understand what their responsibility is in that field and play their full and proper role. What are the human rights which must enjoy the protection of all of us? What must be the attitude of the international community to a country which denies its responsibilities, violates human rights, tramples underfoot international conventions, and practises all the acts of which morals and civilisation disapprove? Does a country which stoops to such practices have the right to live in the family of international organisations? Or must we isolate it and forbid relations with it until it responds to the appeal of the human conscience and respects the obligations of its participation in the international organisations, and its obligations in respect of human rights, and places itself at the service of human rights and international conventions?

All these questions are connected with the protection of human rights, and if they are applied to what is going on nowadays in Palestine and the occupied Arab territories, which witness barbarous practices and crimes that exceed even the atrocities of nazism and facism, we could say that a country that perpetuates such acts has any right to be in the international organisation has already adopted resolutions that condemn such acts, and the United Nations in 1975 went so far as to describe this country as a racist country.

Now that events in Palestine and the Arab territories have shown the true face of this State and now that all the make-up has been removed from the face of the Zionist entity, whose unnatural birth was a flagrant violation of human rights, which occupied the territory of the Palestinian people and dispersed them throughout the world, replacing them with a racist entity full of hatred. So can we consider that those who violate others' rights, steal their property, commit sadistic murder and torture are observing human rights? Will the international community continue stand by while the danger in one place threatens peace everywhere in the world, especially when we consider the protection of human rights is a common responsibility? Or is it our duty to move in order to stop these inhuman practices which are carried out by the occupying authorities against the Arab citizens to end the racial discrimination, the provocation, the repression, the arrests and the lawsuits of which trade unionists are the victims and which are totally unacceptable and unimaginable, and to adopt the proper international attitude so as to punish Israel for its barbarous crimes against man and against humanity.

In spite of the dark picture I have painted of the situation in the world, there are some positive indicators which are a source of hope for the future. The treaties on the dismantling of nuclear weapons, the attempts to consolidate the policy of international détente between the two superpowers and the peaceful settlement of conflicts are reasons for satisfaction. The courageous initiative taken by the USSR to withdraw its forces from Afghanistan is a highly appreciated act and a positive example to be followed by others, because it can be considered a victory for human rights and an affirmation of the rights of peoples to self-determination. We hope that all the peoples will be able to exercise this right and that an end will be put to colonialism and the domination of people in every part of the world.

The situation in the Middle East and the Arab-Israeli conflict, with its threat to world peace and security, require the international community to exert pressure on Israel to accept the convening of an international conference under United Nations auspices with the participation of the permanent members of the Security Council and of all the parties concerned including the Palestine Liberation Organisation, the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people.

Unless this conference, which is the sole means of settling the conflict, is held, the possibility of another war breaking out in the area will increase. Such a war will not affect the countries of the region alone but will threaten world peace and security.

A desire for world peace and security, the protection of human rights and freedoms require the international community to exert its efforts to put an end to the Gulf war so that the two warring countries can devote their efforts to rebuilding, eliminating the effects of war, to development and welfare, and to binding up the wounds of a devastating war which benefits no one and serve no end in the region. We feel that Security Council resolution 598 creates a suitable climate for the establishment of peace in the Gulf region.

We are also concerned at the situation in South Africa and Namibia, which is occupied by the military forces of the racist regime of Pretoria, and we condemn the intensification of the practices of the Government of South Africa against the indigenous African people and the territory of Namibia. We condemn these inhuman and immoral practices, and join with those who have called for an end to the policy of apartheid and an end to the occupation of Namibia, with a view to freeing the African people so that they can take their place among the liberated peoples of the world.

Finally, I wish your session every success, the workers of the whole world more achievements on the path to consolidation of social justice, and the peoples of the world progress, prosperity and the achievement of peace on the basis of law and justice. I wish that international efforts will come together at all levels to put a stop to violations of human rights, and to punish the enemies of freedom and human rights in order to protect and promote these rights and enable men to exercise them in freedom and dignity.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. ARAGÓN MARRÍN (Employers' adviser, Nicaragua) – May I first of all join preceding speakers in congratulating the President on his election to the Presidency of this session of the Conference. We are sure that with his skilful guidance, our work will yield fruitful results.

This year the Report of the Director-General refers to the problem of human rights and the responsibility shared by all forums and social protagonists in this field.

Special reference has been made to the problem of economic and social rights, particular emphasis being laid on the critical situation of employment and on social security.

Undoubtedly, as the Report of the Director-General states, without economic growth the possibilities of achieving full productive employment are remote and the needs expectations of an extremely fast growing labour force cannot therefore be met.

However, we must add that there can be no economic growth unless enterprises are truly able to develop their vital activities energetically. No economy in the twentieth century can deny the importance – at the very basis of the economy – of enterprise management as a direct source of work, goods and basic services.

Enterprises are the basic units of economic management. Consequently, to protect their operating conditions is an important prerequisite on which the possibilities of satisfying the employment needs of the economically active population depend.

However, it is necessary to point out that enterprises in the Third World, over and above their nature or specific structure in accordance with the various economic models in existence, operate in extremely difficult conditions.

Unequal terms of trade not only affect governments but also have a direct impact on the true protagonists in production and services. This is all the more important in relation to agricultural enterprises. The prices of our countries' agricultural exports are constantly subject to price fluctuations, and this affects profitability and possibilities for reinvestment in productive units.

Hence, guaranteeing the exercise of economic and social rights is objectively linked with the concept of enterprises, whose operating conditions enable them to become stable sources of dignified and fairly remunerated work.

In Nicaragua, in the new society which is taking shape, we Nicaraguan employers have responsibly accepted the social changes that are inevitable, in the belief that economic democracy is part and parcel of the basic rights that have to be safeguarded.

The right to land, to loans, access to markets on a truly competitive footing are some of the requirements of a society in which the values of social justice and equity are properly combined with the encouragement of a spirit of private enterprise or of joint ventures which pave the way for a productive relationship with fruitful results.

The Nicaraguan employers have chosen to produce, to co-operate in reconstructing the country, and to safeguard the lively presence of private enterprise in this new stage of our history. We are determined to show that the social changes taking place in the present-day world can be accepted without necessarily sacrificing economic freedom in the modern sense of the word, with its unavoidable social connotations.

Therefore, the employers' sectors we represent fully enjoy the legal guarantees established in Nicaragua within the context of the joint economy. While there have been some mistakes and flaws in this, as was only to be expected, they can be corrected, and private and joint enterprises continue to exist in healthy competition with state-owned economic units.

The scope for influencing macro-economic decision-making has been broadened on the basis of our role in adjusting the new social model. Associations of private employers and public bodies are an example of this new relationship, which seeks to strike a balance between individual economic prospects and collective forms of production and ownership.

Against this background, we cannot fail to mention the fact that most employers are truly committed to producing, and they have been affected in recent years by the military conflict that our country is suffering as a result of foreign aggression.

There is no doubt that the economic blockade, while affecting the Government, has actually had a greater direct impact on Nicaraguan employers. Our ability to repair, maintain and expand equipment has been drastically impaired. Financial difficulties which have been caused in the country impair the financing possibilities of the public and private sectors, radically restricting the opportunities for reinvestment and economic growth.

War was then declared in practice, not only against those in Government but also against the direct factors of production, whose rights and possibilities of political and economic survival are allegedly defended.

The situation became clearer when we found that the response to the efforts we were making to amplify and strengthen productive activity and promote job growth in the rural areas of the country was the assassination of more than 2,600 members of our organisations by the forces which purport to be struggling for the restoration of democracy in the country.

For these reasons, we also are firm believers in peace and we have as moral duty to support all efforts in that direction.

A deep-seated feeling of patriotism leads us to reject outside interference by those who seek to boycott the on-going efforts to find a political solution. They are directly to blame for the fact that the conditions for a lasting cease-fire have not yet been agreed upon for they are encouraging military solutions and the ultimate triumph of force.

We hope that the forces of good will triumph over evil and that sooner rather than later we shall manage to achieve a stable and lasting peace that will enable us to reconstruct our devastated country.

(Mr. Tsujino takes the Chair.)

Mr. JESIC (Employers' delegate, Yugoslavia) – Allow me to congratulate the President upon his election and to wish the Conference under his leadership much success in its work and further contribution to strengthening the ILO's reputation as well as to more intense co-operation among its member countries.

It is my privilege and pleasure to greet the President and all the delegates to the Conference on behalf of the Yugoslav Chamber of Economy, an association of all the economic organisations in my country.

All the issues on the agenda are of importance and I believe that comprehensive dialogue will help us to reach the best and most generally acceptable conclusions on what the ILO and all of us should do in the period to come.

In its regular activities, the Yugoslav Chamber of Economy devotes great attention to issues of development of our economy, primarily from the standpoint of the necessary structural changes and a more successful integration of our country into the international division of labour. Closely connected also are our initiatives to develop small-sized business, to set up joint ventures with foreign partners, to achieve further progress in the private-sector economy, in agriculture and services in particular. These objectives are difficult to attain without appropriate personnel training. Our chambers of economy devote particular attention to the training of business executives. Great attention is also paid to developing the economic infrastructure and sources of energy, in particular. We are getting increasingly involved in environmental protection and, within this context, in providing for fair labour standards.

These few remarks have been intended to illustrate that the issues this Conference has on its agenda are also our daily concern. We are therefore highly interested in an exchange of views on these issues and in reaching corresponding conclusions and determining actions to be taken on the part of the ILO. As regards the proposed standards prepared for this Conference, we may state at once that they enjoy our support. We have also participated in their preparation, particularly those on fair labour standards in the building and construction industry and the promotion of employment. This shows our active relationship with the ILO which is also reflected in the way our country respects all the Conventions and Recommendations this Organisation has adopted.

We confirm our full agreement with the past and proposed orientation of the ILO's activities. We believe it is appropriate to mention the need for a constant critical assessment of the economic management of funds. I am of the opinion that in our efforts directed towards finding solutions relatively less funds from the ILO budget should be spent on conferences and administration, while relatively more should be used for other activities which the ILO has quite successfully carried out or in which it has participated, above all in developing countries, for a number of years.

I should say that not only is the need for such an orientation evident, but actual possibilities for doing so exist. We have heard some concrete proposals here.

In his Report entitled Human rights – A common responsibility, the Director-General has dealt with the issue, comprehensively indeed, meeting with our approval and full acknowledgement.

We can clearly see how very complex, but also extremely simple in its essence, this problem is. It is clearly shown that the characteristics of human rights have not been set once and forever; that they depend on a number of circumstances which should be viewed in the broad framework of the world as a whole, recognising in this way our common responsibility. Viewing things in such a way clearly shows the complexity of the issue.

On the other hand, it is an established truth – to which attention was drawn by the greatest men who lived many centuries ago – that the aspiration for the equality of all men, in general, and of every individual person, in particular, is immensely powerful.

Those who founded the ILO, as well as those who have been leading the Organisation up to now, deserve full credit for the pioneering role of the ILO in revealing the perspectives, the historically real sense of the struggle for human rights.

I believe that it is so today, and that we are bound to ensure that it will remain so in the times to come.

As far as my country is concerned, we are continually preoccupied with the aspiration to make human rights richer in content. We are a country with great differences in levels of economic development.

At the end of 1987, for instance, the rate of unemployment in the Socialist Republic of Slovenia was 1.5 per cent; in the Socialist Republic of Croatia, 5.5 per cent; in the autonomous province of Kosovo, it reached 27.5 per cent; while the average rate of unemployment in the country amounted to some 15 per cent.

In addition, our society is a multinational one – which makes conditions still more complex and our task even more difficult.

Human experience has taught us that there is never too much of human rights and freedoms. In my country, particular importance is accorded to the rights and freedoms of man in his working collective and to his right to manage his labour and its results.

This constitutes the basis of our political and economic system, which we briefly call "socialist self-management".

Our experience of almost 40 years of workers' self-management indicates that our general course of development cannot be changed. There used to be some one-sidedness which may still be noted. We were not always fully aware of the "other aspect" of the rights. What I mean is responsibility: first of all, economic responsibility of an individual and of the working collective. Critical evaluation of the experience is under way and reforms of the political and economic system, aimed at further strengthening of the rights of workers and citizens, with a corresponding system of responsibilities.

The ILO documents, some of which have been mentioned in the Director-General's Report, constitute a source of inspiration for proper orientation in widening human rights in every country, with no exception at all.

I wish to stress as exceptionally useful that, as the Director-General reminds us, the ILO Constitution proclaims that labour is not a commodity.

It is well to remember that in the times when the degree of man's mastery over nature was much smaller than it is today, the greatest minds and men of the highest moral qualities became aware of the fact that human labour was not to be treated as a commodity.

We are witnesses to an unfavourable development of the economic situation in recent times which carries some wide-ranging consequences: the close interdependence prevailing in our world today makes mutual responsibility and international solidarity most significant. There is also good reason today to emphasise the responsibility of every individual and every nation for its own development and for more favourable prospects.

We have to admit that we are not capable to recognise common interests without corresponding connections with the others. This is, inter alia, the purpose of international organisations, the ILO being one of them.

In his Report the Director-General tactfully mentions the fact that in the past four years a slowing down has been noted in the rate of ratification of the ILO documents. The reflections on the implications of unfavourable economic conditions in the world, as well as those on the particular responsibility of the developed industrialised countries, are issues very close to us.

In 1968, in the ILO's concluding debate on human rights, it was said that the debate on these rights should be placed in the context of crude reality and everyday life which, for many, unfailingly means underdevelopment and lack of food.

I think that this time we all can and should state in illustration the above-mentioned interdependence and, as a significant element of our today's "crude reality", the problems which result from the indebtedness of the countries of the so-called Third World.

My country is one of those which is relatively heavily in debt and it has a responsible attitude where its liabilities are concerned. It is not my intention to tire this gathering with issues from the sphere of bilateral relations. I wish to share with you our perception and strong conviction – which is not only ours and of which other countries, besides the debtor countries, are becoming increasingly aware – that the so-called debtor crisis is a term only partially correct to describe the problem facing a large number of countries.

In fact, the problem in question is of such a nature that we may frankly say its solution presents a priority task for all the members of the international community and for all international organisations as well, so that the ILO is, with good reason, expected also to make its contribution to this end.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. PONCE ITURRAGA (Workers' delegate, Ecuador) – "Human rights are a common responsibility" as Mr. Francis Blanchard, Director-General of the ILO, has stated in his magnificent Report, presented for discussion at the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference, in which we are participating. Nevertheless this very Report highlights the fact that despite various solemn declarations that have been signed, in practice nothing is actually done. And, in fact, "fundamental human rights like human freedom and dignity are being flouted, often in dramatic circumstances".

The Director-General adds that "at a time when demographic expansion is speeding up, indebtedness is increasing, unemployment and poverty are stagnating and in danger of spreading, when the gap between the rich and poor – individuals as well as nations – is becoming wider, the disarmament process has still to get fully under way and regional conflicts threaten peace."

All these judgements are shared by us, the workers of Ecuador. We are distressed at the national situation which we also qualify as dramatic, which has brought about nevertheless a tremendous unity of the trade unions and people's organisations of all tendencies, and it is on their behalf that I am speaking at this Conference.

It was very opportune and appropriate, in the light of the present situation in Ecuador, that the subject of the Report of the Director-General this year is human rights, although other subjects, on promotion of employment, social security, indigenous populations and tribal peoples, rural employment and apartheid are complementary issues which are closely inter-related with the fundamental human rights of the worker when seen as a human person with dignity.

When we look at the figures at global level in relation to the situation in the Third World, we see that there are more than 700 million unemployed and more than 500 million underemployed, or more than 900 million persons who somehow manage to survive in miserable conditions of extreme poverty, we, the workers of Ecuador, regrettably have to confirm these figures, which in certain cases are even more dramatic. The gap has grown wider between labour and capital, between the working class and a small monopoly group which concentrates in its hands tremendous riches, which in fact further increases the contradiction between the monopolies, financial capital and the rest of the population.

In Ecuador more than 15 per cent of the economically active population is in fact totally unemployed. In addition, approximately 60 per cent of the population is underemployed or marginalised, which has resulted in a situation where scarcely a third of Ecuadorians have a regular income, although this income is itself restricted by inflation and devaluation. The minimum monthly wage is approximately 30 dollars. Therefore, you can well imagine how a family with an average of five persons manages with 30 dollars a month to cover its expenditure on food, clothing; education, housing, health, etc., when the socioeconomic studies of reliable national institutions indicate that in order to survive it is necessary to have at least the equivalent of 100 dollars a month. It is this reality that flagrantly violates the basic human rights of the Ecuadorian workers, and the person primarily responsible for this situation is the present President of the Republic and his élitist team in the Government, which on 1 June of this year we again rejected and protested against calling for a national strike. There was full support for this from all organised sectors of the workers, political parties of the centre-left and also international support from the solidarity groups represented in this Conference by the group of Workers as a whole. And here we should publicly like to express our thanks to them for their support.

We find a repetition if we look back over history and see that the trade unions have no responsibility whatsoever in the light of this profound political, economic, social and cultural crisis experienced by the workers both nationally and internationally. It is the structure of the economic system at present in force that is directly responsible for this situation. It is the models of monetarist development and the élitist systems applied by national governments that violate human rights and the basic principles which have been acquired over the years by the workers.

We accept what the Director-General says when he asks "can trade unions be held responsible for such major aspects of the world economy as turbulence in the monetary system, Third World indebtedness, famine and poverty, or the shifts in methods of production brought about by technological changes?" No. The workers are the ones who suffer the consequences of the crisis, of misgovernment and the violation of human rights.

If we look at other subjects relating to full employment, a fair wage, living and working conditions the questions of social security and minimum standards of work, the national realities are dramatic and there are innumerable and unbelievable examples which we could give you but which would take much too time to recount. Nevertheless, we should like to tell you that during the present Government, all individual and collective guarantees have been violated, despite the fact that they are enshrined in our political Constitution; that the trade union organisations, people's organisations, students' professional and indigenous organisations have constantly been repressed. On 10 August 1984 a repressive and immoral regime was initiated which has completely disregarded the principles of legality and justice.

In this dark, fatal period of our history, there has been an increase in poverty and malnutrition (some 600,000 children from birth to 5 years of age are suffering from serious malnutrition), 2 million Ecuadorians are unemployed or underemployed, there has been an acceleration in the use of our natural resources by pro-imperialist transnational companies, depleting our public funds, and in the light of this mismanagement, the workers have expressed their rejection of this tyrannical Government which has not ceased to perfect its methods of torture, repressing any protest by the people and the trade unions. There are many cases of insurgents who have been assassinated despite the fact that our legislation expressly prohibits the death sentence. There has been a disregard of this legislation by the Government. From this tribune and inspired by the Report of the Director-General of the ILO on human rights, we appeal to the workers of the world to help us in our struggle for freedom and amnesty for all political prisoners in Ecuador.

In order to confirm what is taking place in our country, I should like to say that an ex-Chancellor of the Republic, a personal friend of the Head of the Executive, has stated: "It is impossible that in a country which calls itself civilised and Christian, which is ruled by a so-called democratic and Christian Government, there should have been a case where an injured man was violently killed by police forces." In fact, it was the son of the ex-Chancellor who was referred to.

We are not surprised when we hear the Government of Ecuador state that it respects its rights and its laws, that wages and living standards are rising, that Ecuadorians live in what is almost paradise; but that is very far from the truth.

Human rights cannot continue to be manipulated by those who in practice disregard them and who in fact generate violence, hunger, unemployment, and immoral external debt which cannot be paid, discrimination, apartheid, which are suffered by the poor throughout the world. The responsible force is North-American imperialism.

All aggression against the people of Palestine, of Nicaragua, of Panama should therefore cease. We express our profound solidarity with the people and the workers of Colombia. We join our voice with the millions of voices that are calling for an end to the violence in this and in other neighbouring countries.

I should like, on behalf of the Ecuadorian workers' group in national trade union confederations – CEOSL, CEDOC and CTE – to express our thanks to you for your attention and congratulate the President on his election to the presidency of this Conference. A breath of fresh air is blowing through the ILO and we hope that it will increasingly lead to unity and peace.

Interpretation from French: Mrs. SALA (representative of the Federation of International Civil Servants' Associations) – I should like to start by thanking you for giving the Federation of International Civil Servants' Associations (FICSA) of which I am President the opportunity to address you. It is indeed a great honour for me to address this 75th Session of the International Labour Conference, which focuses on the theme of human rights.

The Federation represents not only the staff of the ILO, but also the staff of all the specialised agencies of the United Nations system, of the UNDP and of certain United Nations offices – some 30,000 officials in all, the majority of whom work away from headquarters and in the field. Although we were interested in a number of items on your agenda, I shall limit my comments to two issues which, in the eyes of international civil servants, are of fundamental importance. On the one hand, human rights, and consequently trade union rights and the right to engage in collective bargaining, and on the other, multilateral co-operation.

The concept of human rights is fundamental to the activities of the United Nations and of its specialised agencies. The ILO has for its part given expression to basic rights in numerous international standards or instruments which have been ratified by a majority of member States. Of course the work of the ILO does not stop there; the Organisation also strives to ensure that these texts relating to basic human rights are implemented, in order that workers throughout the world may live in dignity and freedom.

As international civil servants we are proud to contribute to this immense and inspiring task. We intend to fulfil our mission with all possible efficiency and enthusiasm. An essential condition for the effectiveness of the organisations of the United Nations system is that international civil servants themselves should enjoy the same basic rights and principles as the United Nations strives to have respected throughout the world.

However, in the United Nations system, staff management relations at all levels are totally archaic, compared with labour relations in the industrialised countries and with what is set out in ILO Conventions, notably in Convention No. 151.

Ten years after the adoption of the Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151), it has to be recognised that the international organisations have hardly made any effort to show the way in this field. In solemn denunciation of this shocking situation, the two federations representing the 50,000 officials of the United Nations system have decided to suspend all participation in the activities of the United Nations system have decided to suspend all participation in the activities of the International Civil Service Commission which, at its session in March, did not hesitate, in spite of all our warnings, to take a decision which was both arbitrary and illegal.

We do not ask for privileged treatment. We simply think that it is abnormal that in our system we do not enjoy the right to negotiate. At present we are subject to arbitrary decisions clothed in a cloak of respectability by a system of so-called consultation. This so-called consultation merely enables the bodies which determine our conditions of employment to give a semblance of legitimacy to their decisions.

Negotiation is practically unknown in the international organisations. However, we are convinced that it would serve to increase the efficiency of the system in the interests of the world community.

Indeed, the fact that we insist on having the right to organise and to bargain collectively recognised is because we are convinced that an efficient system of multilateral co-operation, such as the United Nations can provide to its member States, has become more indispensable than ever before. Just one example I shall cite is the enormous effort going into the programme of humanitarian and economic assistance to Afghanistan, thanks to the collaboration of most of the international organisations. Now, the staff is the essential instrument of this co-operation and we believe that it must be given the means to perform its role. The question is first and foremost to determine, through collective bargaining, conditions of service such as to attract the qualified staff the system requires. The work of the organisations is complex. The responsibilities are delicate and the staff, 50,000 in all, are few in number given the task they are called upon to perform.

Civil servants must be able to devote themselves in all independence to serving their organisations. However, more and more member States are granting supplementary payments to their nationals working in the secretariats, as the conditions offered by the organisations have deteriorated to such an extent that they are no longer able to recruit the specialists they need. This practice, just like the deductions made by certain governments, is contrary to the constitutions of the international organisations and can only prejudice the multinational co-operation which has to be implemented by secretariats able to work in full independence. Only collective bargaining carried out in accordance with well-established, objective and impartial procedures can help to determine equitable and satisfactory conditions of employment, and thus to guarantee the independence of the international civil servants.

It is also essential for member States to respect the security of international civil servants and their families. Some 60 of our colleagues or their families are still detained, imprisoned, held hostage or prevented from leaving a country against their will. Some have disappeared or have died in detention. Too often there is a tendency to forget that international civil servants sometimes put their lives or their freedom at risk in the fulfilment of their mission. The Commission on Human Rights deemed the situation to be so serious that at its 44th Session in March 1988 it adopted a very firmly worded resolution in which it requested member States to respect the rights and security of international civil servants and their families. In the absence of such respect the organisations cannot fulfil their mission and programmes of multilateral co-operation cannot be implemented.

I wish to tell you, on behalf of the Federation, how much hope we place in the International Labour Conference and in the ILO.

For almost 70 years the ILO has been constantly striving to develop and implement procedures, norms and principles governing labour relations in the modern world. The ILO has built up an unequalled fund of expertise in this field. In this connection we welcome the proposal submitted to the last session of the Governing Body requesting the ILO, in view of the technical expertise at its disposal, to prepare a report for the Fourth Session of the Joint Committee on Public Service. It is intended that this report should focus on the needs and technical constraints affecting labour relations in the international civil service and we hope that it will lead to concrete solutions being found. The ILO, it seems to us, has a fundamental role to play in helping to resolve the crisis which now exists in the international civil service and which absolutely must be resolved if we do not wish to compromise the work of the organisations and international co-operation. It is to the ILO that international civil servants now turn in order to ensure that their basic rights are respected, notably the right to collective bargaining to determine fair conditions of service such as to attract the best-qualified and most highly committed men and women, and the right to independence and security. We count firmly on the support of the ILO to help restore the status and dignity of the international civil service in the interest of the peoples which the ILO exists to serve and in the spirit of international co-operation which is its driving force.

Mr. SANYAOLU (Workers' delegate, Nigeria) – Please permit me to salute all delegates to this 75th Session of the International Labour Conference, presently being held in Geneva. I want to particularly congratulate the President on his well-deserved election to head this august assembly and sincerely hope that he will apply his experience and maturity to conducting the affairs of this assembly to a successful conclusion.

Apart from the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General, the programme and budget proposals and other financial questions, and information and reports on the application of ILO standards, there are the issues of safety and health in the construction industry, as well as other areas of human activity which will apparently receive considerable attention. The question of employment promotion and comprehensive social security schemes, partial revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107), also deserve attention. The issue of rural employment promotion and, of course, the updating the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa, all these are very vital issues to my delegation.

Previous sessions have already underscored the importance of the construction worker in development. The activities of this group of workers have tremendously assisted in the development of nations. Speaker after speaker has attested to this fact, as have the various committees. What is needed now is positive resolution and concrete proposals on how to provide safety and health in the construction and allied industries.

Another very important item which is relevant to my country is the question of rural employment promotion. Unfortunately, planning in most Third World countries has been to the disadvantage of the rural areas. This has principally led to rural drift of the population to urban areas with its negative consequences. It has also led to the total neglect of the rural areas, thereby impoverishing the rural dwellers.

Today there appears to be widespread agitation against rising unemployment in most parts of the world, particularly the Third World.

Increasing technological advancement has led to decreasing job opportunities; and the IMF and the World Bank conditions have combined to exacerbate the already complex situation in all the Third World nations.

However, it is encouraging to note that the present Government of Nigeria has devised concrete plans and strategies to face up to these grave challenges by a deliberate investment programme being handled by the Directorate of Food, Road and Rural Infrastructures (DFRRI) to improve life in the rural areas of the Federal Republic of Nigeria.

It is also significant to mention that the present Military Government of Nigeria has, under its self-employment programme, created awareness amongst university graduates who have developed their own skills, thus employing their practical knowledge to make the Structural Adjustment Programme (SAP) a reality. The scheme is established by the Government through the National Directorate of Employment (NDE) where small-scale industries are being encouraged with loans granted with government guarantee.

In this connection, the National Directorate of Employment has been charged with the responsibility to create new jobs. So far, thousands of university and college graduates have been gainfully employed. Added to this is an agricultural loan scheme through which thousands of farmers have obtained loans for increased food production throughout Nigeria.

On South Africa, let me add my voice to the recurring issue of apartheid policy. The ILO has consistently declared its opposition to the policy of apartheid in South Africa. Updating the Declaration, therefore, is a reminder that we have not ignored the deplorable condition of workers in that country. But let us propose a more dynamic approach to intensify decisive pressure on that Government for quicker results. The release of Mr. Mandela should be given the priority it deserves.

Please permit me to add a further dimension to this brief address. This has to do with the problem facing trade union movements in Africa.

The question is how to achieve free and democratic trade union movements in Africa.

The history of the struggle of trade unions in Africa is very well known to most of us. Time was when we all joined hands to fight against a common enemy and for our freedom. Having won that freedom, trade unions in Africa were in a dilemma as to what role they should further play to achieve social justice for all.

In some African countries, trade unions are denied the right to democratic existence. We think that this is a travesty of democracy. In Nigeria, however, successive Governments have maintained a record of fostering sound trade union principles based on the desires of the workers themselves.

Admittedly some trade union leaders in Africa offer bad leadership and lack accountability.

It is my view that trade unionists must be answerable for lack of accountability and for deceitful leadership.

African workers demand genuine, free and democratic trade unions. We want responsible, patriotic and independent trade unions that can radiate a positive image in all spheres of our collective endeavour to achieve our set objectives.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. TSAGAAN (Workers' delegate, Mongolia) – First and foremost, allow me to congratulate Mr. Beyreuther and his deputies warmly on their election to the high offices at the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference and to wish them every success in their responsible task.

The agenda of this session of the International Labour Conference is replete with topical problems the solution of which requires the endeavours and co-operation not only of governments but also of all international and national organisations without exception. It is pleasing to note that 1988 is for all of us, especially Workers' representatives, full of many noteworthy dates and events, in particular the 40th anniversary of the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the ILO Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), which was adopted at the suggestion of the World Federation of Trade Unions, the 30th anniversary of the ILO Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention 1958, (No. 111), as well as the tenth anniversary of the World Declaration on Trade Union Rights adopted at the Ninth World Congress of Trade Unions in which are enshrined fundamental human rights as well as trade union rights and freedoms.

However, we are profoundly concerned today that between the principles set out in these and other fundamental United Nations and ILO documents and the real situation existing in many countries, there is a serious gap which has been described objectively in the Report of the Director-General, entitled Human rights: A common responsibility. I wholeheartedly endorse previous speakers' support for the realistic approach and stand taken by the ILO with respect to the indivisibility of human rights encompassing to an equal extent political, civil, economic, social and cultural rights, as well as on the inter-relationship between respect of human rights and the preservation of lasting peace based on social justice.

We proceed from the view that all human rights constitute an integral whole, therefore I would like to draw your attention to the fact that the division of these rights into groups of sub-groups as can be observed in a number of member States of the ILO, runs counter to the interests of workers. One should especially underline the priority significance of social and economic rights, first and foremost the right to peaceful and constructive work, education, the right to safe working conditions, social security, housing and others.

We have considered the rather interesting concept set out in the Director-General's Report, regarding full, productive and freely chosen employment. But it is difficult to agree with those postulates which infer that a member of society will not always need the right to work.

It seems to me correct and advisable to proceed from the view that labour is not only the source of all wealth, but also the fundamental sphere of life in which man reveals his talent and abilities and gains an awareness of his usefulness and significance. It seems to me that a man who does not have guaranteed work is always compelled either to bend unquestioningly to the will of his employer or to join the ranks of the unemployed.

An inseparable, integral part of fundamental human rights are the rights and freedoms of trade union organisations, without respect for which no State is able to resolve the social and economic problems before it.

Therefore the struggle to protect trade union rights and freedoms is directly linked to the observance of human rights.

We express the hope that the ILO, guided by the noble goal set out in its Constitution and in the Declaration of Philadelphia, will continue actively to support the just struggle of trade unions and workers for the protection of their vital interests, especially today, when many countries are undergoing structural changes in their economies, where the employers and transnational corporations are not only undertaking a deliberate assault on the democratic gains of workers but also seeking to establish an "environment without trade unions". In this regard we accord special significance to the International Centre for the Protection of Trade Union Rights set up last year; the co-ordinated and effective actions of this Centre in close co-operation with national and international organisations including the ILO, will undoubtedly contribute to eliminating violations of trade union rights and freedoms wherever they take place.

The Mongolian trade unions and workers most resolutely condemn the flouting of the most elementary human rights in southern Africa and the Israeli-occupied Arab territories as well as in other countries where trade unions are becoming victims of repression and arbitrary violence.

It is well known that 15 years ago apartheid was branded by the international community as a crime against humanity; however, this appalling system continues to function to this day.

We are well aware of the efforts undertaken by the ILO to deal with the Pretoria regime. None the less, this Organisation should not confine itself to a description of whatever cosmetic changes may be taking place under the apartheid regime, but should become actively involved in adopting urgent comprehensive sanctions relevant to its field of competence, with a view to eradicating the existing inhuman regime in that country.

Many of those who have spoken at the plenary sessions as well as in the Committees and in the media bear witness to the gross and wholesale nature of the violations of human rights in the occupied Arab territories. The acts of aggression and oppression against the peaceful Arab population are absolutely incompatible with the concept of compliance with human rights and freedoms.

Forty years of history show that so long as the Palestinians are not granted the right to self-determination, it is not possible to resolve this problem – one of the most painful ones of the modern age.

The inclusion in the agenda of this session of the item dealing with rural employment merits the heightened interest and support of Mongolian trade unions and workers since agriculture continues to play an important role in the economy of our country.

In recent years we have undertaken comprehensive measures to overcome the adverse trend of agriculture output lagging behind population growth, as well as measures to improve further the cultural and day-to-day living conditions of agricultural workers.

Today the attention and activities of Mongolian trade unions are focused on such priority social questions as improving the wages system, making arrangements for leisure and recreation of workers, improving their working and living conditions, and strengthening monitoring and supervision of compliance with labour laws, among other issues. In short, intensive work is under way to implement the decisions of the 13th Congress of Mongolian Trade Unions which took place last year and which set out for the trade union organisations every stage to be reached in order to step up the socially oriented activities of these organisations.

We attach the utmost importance to the involvement of trade unions in drawing up standards related to regulation of labour relations.

In accordance with article 19 of the Constitution of the Mongolian People's Republic, trade unions have the right to take legislative initiative. At present, on the initiative of and with the direct participation of the Central Council of Mongolian Trade Unions, a Bill is being drawn up containing relatively extensive amendments to the Labour Code of our country with a view to consideration by the supreme organ of legislative authority of the country, the Great People's Hural. In this process, special attention is devoted to democratisation of the management of state enterprises and the economy in general, as well as to strengthening the social guarantee of the right to work, which constitutes the basis for other rights and freedoms of citizens, and other specific aspects related to this right, including the rational distribution of labour resources, the provision of privileges and favourable conditions for training, retraining and reintegration in labour, especially for those who may be made redundant in the course of the introduction of the new economic mechanism.

The PRESIDENT (Mr. TSUJINO) – I now call on Mr. Leoro Franco, Government delegate, Ecuador, to exercise his right of reply to the intervention of Mr. Ponce Iturriaga, Workers' delegate, Ecuador.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. LEORO FRANCO (Government delegate, Ecuador) – On behalf of the Government of Ecuador, I would like to say that some of the views and expressions of the Workers' delegate of Ecuador were highly derogatory, and are unacceptable in a debate at the level that should prevail in a body such as this.

In Ecuador, individual freedoms exist, and in particular freedom of expression, which allows the most violent criticisms of the Government to be made.

As regards the question of Workers' rights, a clear account of these has been given on behalf of the Government and on behalf of the Minister of Labour. As regards the economic situation of the country, it is not unique of its kind nor can it be attributed solely to the Government. We all know that the economic crisis is world-wide and that it has created difficulties for all the developing countries, more particularly the Latin American countries which, as you are aware, are burdened by an enormous external debt. None of this is the fault or the responsibility of a particular government, but has to be looked at in the light of an economic crisis that the developing countries are struggling to resolve.

It must all be examined in a much more general context in which the crisis we are passing through and economic problems from which the country is unfortunately suffering cannot be attributed in a personal way and in the terms that have been used in this forum.

(The Conference adjourned at 6.45 p.m.)

Seventy-fifth Session, Geneva, 1988

Twenty-First (Special) Sitting

Tuesday, 14 June 1988, 10.a.m.

President: Mr. Beyreuther

ADDRESS BY HER EXCELLENCY MRS. CORAZON C. AQUINO, PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC OF THE PHILIPPINES

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – It is my pleasure to open this special sitting of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference and to welcome Mrs. Corazon C. Aquino, President of the Republic of the Philippines.

I invite Mr. Blanchard, Secretary-General of the Conference, to introduce Mrs. Aquino to the Conference.

Interpretation from French: The SECRETARY-GENERAL – It is a very great honour for me to introduce to the Conference Her Excellency Mrs. Corazon Aquino, President of the Republic of the Philippines. Her presence affords the Conference for the first time the great privilege of welcoming a woman Head of State in whom are vested the high responsibilities of a country which delights all those who visit its shores and a people who command the affection and respect of all those who know it.

Mrs. President, a few weeks ago you gave me the warmest possible welcome in Manilla. We talked together about this visit you are paying us today at the cost of a long journey. To my knowledge, this is your first visit to Europe. The International Labour Conference assembled before you here cannot but appreciate all the more keenly the honour you are doing it when so many duties claim your attention in Manilla, duties which you discharge with the determination and courage we all admire. You unquestionably owe this strength of character to a happy childhood and adolescence, to the education you received, marked by assiduous studies in your own country and in the United States, and to a harmonious family life for years with your husband and your five children.

But your well-known courage has also been put to the test by trials such as that faced by your country in 1972 with the institution of martial law, against which your husband, Senator Benigno Aquino, rose up in protest. You shared his struggle. You stood by him during the 2,700 long days and nights he spent under particularly harsh conditions in prison. You shared his hopes during his years of exile. These hopes were brutally dashed on that dreadful day of 21 August 1983 when, shot down by a cowardly hand, your husband did not even have the joy of treading his native soil once more. Deeply affected by this tragedy, you showed strength of mind of an uncommon degree and a resolve which has marked the political action you may be said to have carried on – the action in which you had already been engaged with him for so many years, but which after his tragic death you marked with your own personal imprint.

Thus it was that between 1983 and 1986, in the midst of immense difficulties due to an unhealthy political climate, an economy in a state of upheaval, an intolerable foreign debt and armed conflicts in various parts of the country, you waged the battle to find once again the path to democracy, progress and justice.

As soon as you came to power on 26 February 1986, you decreed a general amnesty. You set to work to restore law and order and create a law-abiding State. You defined – most recently on May Day this year – a social policy dedicated to the satisfaction of basic needs, the creation of jobs, equality of opportunity. Loyal to the principles of the ILO, you have encouraged the social partners to handle their relations by means of collective bargaining. You have opposed the banning of the right to strike. Lastly, under your leadership, land reform has just been adopted – I believe it was last Friday – by Parliament.

Mrs. President, approximately 100 years ago, the great patriot José Rizal visited Geneva for talks about his country's struggle for independence and freedom. Could he have imagined that the Head of the Spanish Government would plead from this very rostrum, as he did just a week ago, for the independence of peoples, of all oppressed people? Could he have imagined that a woman would one day come to speak on behalf of a country – her country, your country – which has three times recovered its freedom? It is to you, Mrs. President, that this task is allotted today.

I know that the Conference is impatient to hear you and I therefore request the President of the Conference to be good enough to give the floor to Her Excellency, Mrs. Corazon Aquino, President of the Republic of the Philippines.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – I would now like to invite our distinguished guest, the President of the Republic of the Philippines, Mrs. Corazon C. Aquino, to address our Conference.

Interpretation from French: Her Excellency Mrs. CORAZON C. AQUINO (President of the Republic of the Philippines) – It was with great satisfaction that I received the invitation extended to me to address the International Labour Conference. First of all, because it is concerned with human rights, but also because of the generous attitude shown by Europe towards the historic struggle of the February Revolution in the Philippines to restore human rights.

The European ambassadors were the first to recognise, at first tacitly and then openly, my right to assume the Presidency when efforts were made to defraud the Philippine people and deny my electoral victory.

Other governments waited to see whether right would triumph over the forces of evil; their attitude changed only after it became clear that no government other than mine would be allowed by the people of the Philippines to assume command of the country.

The Europeans acted as their conscience dictated. Undoubtedly, two thousand years of bitter conflict arising from selfish ambitions had somewhat dampened their idealistic ardour, but it was otherwise with the fight to bring freedom to the Philippines. Europe's idealism was rekindled and it offered its help with the rebirth of freedom in the Philippines.

(The speaker continues in English.)

I want to thank the Director-General, Mr. Francis Blanchard, for inviting me to address the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference here in Geneva and for the opportunity to express my people's appreciation of the support that Europe gave to their struggle.

The various themes of the Conference – human rights, labour relations and debt – make this a very appropriate forum to convey their message. After all, our non-violent Revolution was one of the most celebrated victories of human rights in any country. The burden of debt weighs heavily on the developing nations: it threatens to end all prospects of their recovery and growth, and threatens also to create the anarchy and despotism in which human rights are the first victims.

The Revolution reaffirmed the principle that the protection of human rights is the first duty of government, and that the deliberate and systematic violation of those rights by government imposes on the people the sacred obligation to overthrow it. Equally, the Revolution revealed new depths of faith and courage and a new strategy and hope for democratic victories. It is that hope of oppressed peoples everywhere that I must defend against the criticism that the heroism of the people came to nothing in the Philippines.

The Revolution was the work of the people, of the ordinary men and women of the working classes: priests and nuns who work with their hands to care for the poor, clerks, factory workers, school teachers, secretaries, managers, professionals and their families. The involvement of the rich in the Revolution was widely noted, not because they were many but because it was unexpected that there should be any.

The Revolution offers hope, and yet the national experience that provoked it taught a bitter lesson: liberty is non-negotiable; it cannot be traded for progress or social justice.

This truth is self-evident to men and women who respect themselves as persons. Yet many still ignore it, only to learn too late that foregoing freedom for progress or social justice merely adds torture and indignities to worsening poverty and underdevelopment. It is a strange but incontestable fact that countries regarded as too poor to afford the luxury of democracy are precisely those that cannot do without it. The reason is this: nothing can resist the greed of the few, except the power of the people freely exercising their rights and liberties. "Poverty increases in so far as freedom retreats throughout the world", Camus observed. "If this cruel century has taught us anything at all, it has taught that the economic revolution must be free, just as liberation must include the economic."

As the Revolution was the work of the people, it was only right that the order it established should express, in its laws, institutions, policies and leadership, a preferential option for the people, a bias towards their immediate relief and economic improvement, without exacting the price of their virtual slavery in the workplace.

The policies of the Government which the Revolution brought to power have consistently expressed that option and bias.

Thus, immediately after the flight of the dictator, we moved to heal the divisions of our society and establish the framework, institutions and laws essential to the security of the people's rights and the permanence of their freedoms, and aimed at the improvement of their material well-being and at national recovery and progress.

We released all political prisoners, giving special attention to the immediate release of the chief Communist Party ideologue, Jose Maria Sison, against the strong objections of the military faction that had helped in the ouster of the dictatorship.

Again, against the strong objections of that faction, we signalled to the insurgency that we were prepared to negotiate a peace. That effort ultimately failed. Yet in retrospect, it had to be made to establish a moral basis for the resumption of war. Equally, the failure of our peace initiative definitively fixed the predominantly military character of the insurgent challenge, and the necessity of an appropriate military response.

Yet again, we made sure that the renewed hostilities would be conducted, at least on our side, in a manner consistent with the values we are defending against the insurgency. I therefore signed Protocol Two, which accords to the enemy in civil conflicts the protection of the Geneva Conventions.

We drafted a Constitution that would provide a pro-people framework for the policies we were preparing – policies that would upset established patterns of property relations and expectations, and which therefore required a mandate across the spectrum of economic classes. That Constitution which was ratified by a near unanimity of the voting population, provides in its Declaration of Principles and State Policies that: "the State shall promote a just and dynamic social order that will ensure the prosperity and independence of the nation and free the people from poverty through policies that provide adequate social services, promote full employment, a rising standard of living, and an improved quality of life for all."

Further: "The State shall promote social justice in all phases of national development."

"The State values the dignity of every human person and guarantees full respect for human rights."

"The State affirms labour as a primary social economic force. It shall protect the rights of workers and promote their welfare."

In this Declaration are summed up to the primary concerns which the Revolution sought to address, and the lesson which dictatorship had seared in our minds: that we will not accept progress at the expense of the workers or by exacting the price of their liberty.

So that these promises will not remain words on paper, the Constitution empowers the Supreme Court to promulgate rules for the protection and enforcement of constitutional rights.

I shall forthwith take the necessary steps to secure the approval by the Court of the rules for a new Philippine writ of amparo, a special constitutional remedy to enforce human, social, and economic rights through a speedy and inexpensive procedure.

To the security given by the Constitution, we have added the protection of international conventions.

I have ordered the dissemination of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights throughout the Philippines, translated into the national language and the major dialects.

I have submitted the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144), and the Vocational Rehabilitation and Employment (Disabled Persons) Convention, 1983 (No. 159), to our Senate for ratification, along with the Instrument for the Amendments of the Constitution of the ILO, 1986, which will widen Third World representation in the Organisation's Governing Body.

As mandated by the Constitution, human rights have been included in the curricula of all schools.

To answer fears that democracy has proved inadequate in protecting human rights in the Philippines, I have strengthened the Philippine Commission on Human Rights by providing for the permanent tenure of its members and by giving them sufficient powers to bring violators to justice. The Commission recently issued guide-lines to the military to safeguard the rights of arrested persons, including the right of visitation.

We have appointed to the Congress men and women from the underprivileged sectors: labourers, farmers, the poor, the disabled, women, and youth, selecting those who have distinguished themselves despite great disadvantages.

We launched an emergency employment programme to alleviate unemployment, especially in the countryside. Admittedly, the programme was modest, given the number of the unemployed.

A few days ago, after more than a year of bitter debates, I signed into law a Comprehensive Agrarian Reform Program that will redistribute agricultural land to the landless tillers, and more importantly, give them the support services that will make Philippine agriculture productive again. Agrarian reform is not justice if all it achieves is the subdivision of the present miseries on the land. What the Program aims for is the liberation of the economic potential of the countryside, the increase in its standard of living and the creation of a market that will support the industrial progress we likewise seek.

This is only the start. More good might have been accomplished if so much evil did not have to be undone. And we shall go on.

Violations of human rights still happen, even in democratic States most determined to protect them. The attraction of democracy is also its weakness, for it must accord the same constitutional safeguards to the perpetrators as to the victims of human rights abuse. And in the free spaces created by democracy, evil goes about its work, sometimes more efficiently than good.

It behoves us then to narrow the scope of evil. This must be done by expanding democracy, not by curtailing it. By removing the present restraints on human freedom imposed by poverty and underdevelopment, and by granting wider rights and liberties. The next liberation must be economic. This includes a fair resolution of the debt problem, for the tightening grip of its austerities threatens to strangle the life out of the new democracies of the Third World, even as it threatens to upset the stability of the international economic order. The linkage of debt, development and democracy is undeniable and is the most pressing issue this body must address.

The first duty of democratic institutions like the ILO is the protection of human rights. Chronic underdevelopment is the most systematic abuse of human rights. I put before the ILO the challenge of finding a resolution to this threefold issue in the just, sober and democratic fashion that alone can win the consensus and co-operation of everyone involved – a resolution reflecting the spirit of the ancient lawgiver: "I establish this law in the language of the land... for the welfare of the people... to cause justice to prevail and to destroy the wicked and the evil... that the strong might not oppress the weak... to rise like the sun over the people and to light up the land."

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – Mrs. President, may I thank you on behalf of all who are taking part in this 75th Session of the International Labour Conference, as well as on my own behalf, for your most inspiring speech.

You have spoken most impressively of your country's special experience with respect to Human rights – A common responsibility, the subject chosen for this year's Conference by the Director-General of the International Labour Office, Mr. Francis Blanchard.

Your speech will give further impetus to our Organisation as an important forum for exchange of opinions. As a representative of a developing country, you are naturally called upon to express your ideas on what can be done to create proper conditions for the promotion of human rights at the international level. I have in mind most specifically your views on the question of foreign debt. In listening to your words, our conviction has deepened that we have been listening to a true stateswoman who has commendably tackled all the questions which have always been at the heart of our Organisation's activities.

Your words, coming as they did from a person of such high renown, clearly show the heights to which nations can soar when equal rights for all races are not a dead letter but a reality.

Allow me, in bidding you farewell, to say how greatly we have appreciated the opportunity of having you with us and of having heard your ideas on the important matters with which our Organisation and our Conference are concerned.

(The Conference adjourned at 10.30 a.m.)

Seventy-fifth Session, Geneva, 1988

Twenty-second sitting

Tuesday, 14 June 1988, 11 a.m.

Vice-President: Mr. Aitken

NINTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT (Mr. AITKEN) – The first item on our agenda is the consideration of the ninth report of the Selection Committee. I call on Mr. Vargas Escobar, Government delegate, Nicaragua, Chairman of the Selection Committee, to submit the report.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. VARGAS ESCOBAR (Government delegate, Nicaragua; Chairman of the Selection Committee) – It is my honour to submit to the Conference the ninth report of the Selection Committee, which is to be found in the Provisional Record No. 5H.

The report deals solely with changes in the composition of the Conference committees.

I recommend to the Conference the adoption of the report.

The PRESIDENT (Mr. AITKEN) – The ninth report of the Selection Committee is now before the Conference. If there are no objections, I take it that the report is adopted?

(The report is adopted.)

RATIFICATION OF A CONVENTION BY GREECE

The PRESIDENT (Mr. AITKEN) – I have pleasure in announcing to the Conference that the Director-General of the ILO has registered the ratification by Greece of the Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention, 1981 (No. 156).

This brings the total number of ratifications of International Labour Conventions to 5,370.

The PRESIDENT (Mr. AITKEN) – We shall now continue the discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. BOZHINOV (Employers' delegate, Bulgaria) – Our delegation wishes the President success in his complex and exalted mission and expresses confidence that his experience and professional knowledge will help all of us successfully to conclude the work of the present session.

The present session of the International Labour Conference is being held at a time of important international events. We are witnessing real practical steps towards peace and co-operation between the USSR and the United States and towards disarmament and broader economic, scientific, technical and cultural co-operation. In these circumstances, it is extremely relevant to consider the work of the ILO from the point of view of its contribution to protecting and extending human rights. In his Report, the Director-General has quite rightly touched on the close connection between all the human rights listed in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, adopted by the United Nations in 1948 and the rights whose protection is enshrined as being among its fundamental objectives in the Constitution of the ILO and the Declaration of Philadelphia.

The Report put a number of questions for solution before the ILO, namely, technological change, the development in workers' rights, equality of opportunity, the unsatisfactory implementation of the right to freedom of association, rights to safe working conditions, rights to social security, among others. I would like to take this opportunity to note that in Bulgaria obvious positive results have been achieved in these areas.

In our country, we are implementing a broad economic reform and deep-rooted changes are taking place in all spheres of life, introducing many new elements into the organisation of socialist enterprises and the right to work. The substance of these changes is a new high level of democratisation which is taking place as a result of introducing self-management into the economy, the establishment of new principles for the selection of managers of enterprises and economic organisations, introduction of competition in selecting staff, freedom in decision-making and initiatives in the new management of the economy and the provision of wider opportunities for setting up state, co-operative and joint ventures with foreign firms. In our legislation and in practice there are real guarantees for the right to social security with respect to all the risks that are subject to insurance, including illness, accident, childbirth, invalidity, old age, as well as assistance in other cases provided for by law. We consider that the serious difficulties that may affect pension funds and social security funds are easier to overcome with the help of a centralised state insurance system.

Today in Bulgaria there is no difference between the positions of men and women apart from the privileges and special care which mothers enjoy and that is why we support the ILO's efforts to improve the standards of equality in all countries as well as social care for young persons.

We consider it right that the ILO should pay special attention to the position of the Arab employers and workers in the Israeli-occupied Arab territories and the struggle against apartheid in South Africa. We consider this to be the ILO's contribution to the fight for human rights. We feel, however, that this does not exhaust our Organisation's possibilities and we must increase our efforts in the future.

Our position is that the only real action to take is a complete boycott of the apartheid regime and its isolation.

Efforts by employers in market-economy countries to influence the regime from outside have failed and the fact that they are continuing to maintain links with businesses in that country can only be explained by the pursuit of profit, which in practice provides support to the apartheid regime. We support the struggle against the South African regime and the adoption of effective measures by the ILO to that end and we will assist co-operation between the ILO and other organisations opposed to the policy of apartheid.

As regards the ILO's efforts to counteract unemployment and guarantee the right to work, it is recognised that in market-economy countries and other countries efforts are being made along many different lines. For instance, to overcome unemployment, they have had recourse to shorter working hours, early retirement, more holidays and days off, on-the-job training courses, and so on. All these are interesting experiments, but we should not forget the significance of our success in guaranteeing the legal right to work, nor should we accept unemployment as inevitable.

The processes for accelerating the development and efficiency of production which is taking place in the economy of the People's Republic of Bulgaria do not mean that the next stage will be unemployment. For us that lies in the past, and as managers of socialist enterprises we consider that in the future too we shall, in achieving accelerated development and the introduction of high-efficiency technology and production, be utilising released labour resources in those branches of our economy which are still short of trained personnel and understaffed. In our country this is resolved by an effective system of training, retraining and qualification of personnel. It is obvious that the experience of other countries in this field is of great importance, and we shall borrow from it everything that can find an application in our country and is compatible with our economic principles.

As a representative of managers of socialist enterprises in the People's Republic of Bulgaria, I consider that for those working in construction in all countries it is really necessary to create all the conditions for a safe and healthy working environment, and support the adoption of the Convention together with its supplementary Recommendation.

On the basis of what I have already said about the close connection between employment and social security, we support the adoption of a Convention and a Recommendation on employment promotion and social security.

The fourth European regional conference was held recently and noted the need for even broader co-operation and using it as a means of increasing the efficiency with which labour resources are utilised in an effort to increase employment. Of particular interest to us is the study of problems of setting up small and medium-sized enterprises and their role in the utilisation of the released labour force. Managers of socialist enterprises in the People's Republic of Bulgaria are showing an interest in questions of management, technical information and contributing to expanding their share in the production of goods in the training and retraining of personnel and the impact of the introduction of the new technologies on employment, which would be a good basis for co-operation. A subject of co-operation can also be an exchange of experience within the European region on questions of improving working conditions, and occupational safety and health, and also the co-ordination of economic policy directed towards increasing employment, limiting pollution of the environment, and also reducing to a minimum the consequences of accidents in enterprises. What is of interest is the great benefit which co-operation and the co-ordination of the efforts of the European countries can bring in rendering assistance to the least developed countries of Africa and other continents, particularly now when agreement in principle has been reached regarding co-operation between the European Economic Community and the Council for Mutual Economic Assistance.

The positive changes in international relations have been reflected in the results of the ILO's activities. Recently, we have been able to observe certain progress in improving the situation in the Employers' group. The majority of delegates have expressed their support for certain positive changes regarding their attitude to the managers of socialist enterprises and as regards their participation in the work of the Employers' group and in the different bodies of the Conference.

We consider that given the new conditions for the development of international co-operation we, together with the majority of the Employers' group, will be able to find possibilities and common ground for resolving unresolved issues. We believe that this new atmosphere will change the climate in our Organisation, so that we can adopt more constructive and mutually acceptable decisions with respect to implementing human rights and achieve the objectives of the ILO.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. BENNANI (representative of the Arab Labour Organisation) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! First of all, allow me on behalf of the Arab Labour Organisation and on my own behalf to express our appreciation of your competence in directing the work of this session of the Conference. You have already demonstrated that your election was a happy choice, and one which also sanctions the right of all regional groups to occupy the post in rotation.

This session is being held at a time when important events with both local and international dimensions are placing even more weighty responsibilities upon the International Labour Organisation. We note first of all that the basic themes for this session are of capital importance. I am speaking of human rights, updating the programmes for the struggle against apartheid, and the situation of the Arab workers in Palestine and the other occupied territories. This session is also being held at a time when we are celebrating the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, adopted in 1948, which sets forth in a historic instrument all the rights and freedoms to which mankind has aspired over the centuries following devastating conflicts and wars.

Furthermore, the session also coincides with the 40th anniversary of the adoption of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the 30th anniversary of the adoption of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111).

Finally, it also coincides with the extension of the heroic uprising of the Palestinian people, which has been going on now for seven months. Destiny decreed that the Palestinian tragedy broke out in 1948, the year in which the Universal Declaration of Human Rights was adopted, which proclaimed, among other things, that all men are born equal, free and dignified.

The Director-General has, in the most timely manner, in his Report entitled Human rights - A common responsibility, chosen a topical theme which fits, in the most objective manner, into the ILO's mission in defence of man's basic rights and freedoms. To tell the truth, the Director-General's account is objective, serious and forceful, and Mr. Blanchard deserves the respect of all participants in the session. The Director-General was quite right when he said that the protection of rights and freedoms was a common responsibility, and that they were by their very nature indivisible and embraced political, economic, cultural and civil rights. The Director-General has demonstrated the interaction between respect for human rights on the one hand and peace and stability on the other. He has also affirmed that the denial of civil and political rights exerts a negative influence on the enjoyment of economic and social rights.

The in-depth study contained in this Report, which is richly instructive, and the comparative analysis of the conclusions of the ILO mission which has been visiting Palestine and the occupied Arab territories every year for more than ten years demonstrate the flagrant injustice and continuous aggression of which the Palestinian workers and people have been victims since 1967.

For the past two decades now an entire generation has been born and has been growing up under Israeli occupation: a generation which has never been able to enjoy one of the rights or freedoms set forth in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. It was therefore natural that the refusal of the Palestinian people - all categories together - should crystallise in this heroic uprising against occupation and colonisation, which is simply an appeal to the international community to take the necessary measures to make amends for the sufferings and injustices and put an end to the colonial practices, and to the confiscation of lands and natural resources. These practices have reached such a level that one can no longer remain silent and it requires that an end be put to the Israeli occupation.

This uprising asserts before the whole world that the Palestinian people remains attached to its homeland and its land, the land of its fathers and ancestors, and that the Palestine Liberation Organisation is its sole legitimate representative and standard-bearer in its struggle for freedom and independence.

The report of the mission sent by the Director-General to Palestine and the occupied Arab territories is rich in information, facts and irrefutable proof, all of which demonstrate that the Israeli occupation authorities are according no importance to the wishes of our Conference and to the conclusions of the International Labour Organisation's mission.

The ILO's action to ensure that the Conference resolutions are followed up, in particular, the mission sent annually, is undoubtedly useful but is quite insufficient. Clearly, the impact of such action remains modest, particularly in view of the new situation brought into being by the heroic uprising of the people against the Zionist occupation and colonisation. This is why your Conference is called upon to adopt new measures to strengthen the role of the ILO vis-à-vis this tragic situation with its profoundly serious social and human dimensions. These measures should be in the form of follow-up action, or take place in the framework of technical co-operation or again be in the form of permanent pressure on the Israeli occupation forces. This is precisely the substance of the Arab resolution which is now the Resolution Committee.

We have noted in Part I and II of the Report of the Director-General the major challenges that must be met by the international community and the governments of developing countries as regards the development of human resources and of economic development programmes, structural adaptation, external debt problems, the problems relating to the fight against poverty and the problems of migrant workers.

In view of the short time I have been given, I shall make a few brief comments that could, I believe, be usefully discussed in this important international assembly.

Firstly, the development of human resources should be given top priority now and in the future because it is an integral part of the whole complex of economic development activities and one of the most important instruments of such development. The reduction in external economic assistance to the developing countries has had serious repercussions on their possibilities of economic and social development as a result of the decline in investment and public expenditure on infrastructure, education, training and the development of human resources in general. This situation is being exacerbated by monetary fluctuations and the strengthening of protectionist barriers.

Secondly, the principles of justice and equality compel us to keep the problems of migrant workers in mind. The interest of the International Labour Organisation in these questions, and particularly the problems of the second generation, seems to have declined in recent years, although there is a deterioration in the social, economic and humanitarian aspects of these problems. We are still waiting for the project concerning the second generation of sons of Arab workers who emigrated to Europe to be put into effect.

Thirdly, it is extremely important for all the resources, and the human and material energies, of the developing countries to be mobilised for development and growth. Wars are the worst calamity that can befall countries, and especially the developing countries, absorbing as they do all resources available to acquire destructive and death-dealing weapons. That is why we address an urgent appeal for the cessation of the conflict between two neighbouring Moslem countries, the Islamic Republic of Iran and Iraq, and urge the Iranian Government to respond to the appeals for peace, and notably Security Council resolution 598, so that reason and wisdom may prevail and that peace may be established and that the efforts and the material and human energies of the region may thus be devoted to the well-being of the region and of all peoples throughout the world.

We also hope that 1988 will see the end of the Israeli occupation of southern Lebanon as well as the cessation of internal conflicts. We trust that the agreement will be in the interests of the unity and progress of Lebanon.

At a time when the peoples of the world are celebrating the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, it is utterly unacceptable that two racist regimes that are oblivious to the fate of their subject peoples - regimes which retain the same archaic mentality that prevailed in colonial times - should continue to exist in the present-day world. I refer to the apartheid regime in South Africa which is imposing white minority rule on the majority of the African population and continues its illegal occupation of Namibia.

By the same token, inspired by the same ideas, the Zionist forces in Palestine and in the other occupied Arab territories have been illegally occupying other peoples' territories by means of violence and terrorism for more than 20 years. During this period, the Zionists have used every means, all the illegal practices and policies possible, to confiscate land, set up colonising settlements, drive away the inhabitants, destroy the houses, enforce collective sanctions and deprive a whole people of the power to exercise its rights and fundamental freedoms, and in particular its right to self-determination.

In view of these practices and violations contrary to the principles and objectives of the International Labour Organisation, your Conference, which is considered to be the "World Labour Parliament" has not hesitated to assume its international responsibilities.

In 1964 your Conference took the initiative with a Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa, which has been updated and reinforced by the plan of action at the Harare conference this year, and the Committee on Apartheid has confirmed the decisions taken by that conference. We take this opportunity of congratulating the Committee on its work, which can be summed up in a single phrase: "Adoption of the rule for applying global and mandatory sanctions". Our Organisation has made considerable progress in the struggle against apartheid, which deserves our respect and admiration. As for the Zionist entity, which has vital links with the Pretoria regime, it is continuing to defy the entire world, and to defy the wishes of your Conference which have been expressed in two historic resolutions vigorously condemning the policy of occupation and colonisation and confiscation of basic freedoms and rights.

In both cases, the two regimes would not have been able to carry out their practices without the material and political support - and even the military support - of certain governments which, albeit only in words, defend human rights as if they were different according to race, colour and ideological affiliation, while their policies and practical positions remain in complicity with these two racist regimes.

The ILO, which is celebrating the 40th anniversary of the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, is confronted by the need for self-examination in making a historic choice. It must confirm in its practice that its commitment to the protection of human rights, freedom and dignity is a doctrine and a code of conduct. It must therefore reject the pressures which are striving to deflect it from its principles and transform it into an institution which closes its eyes to flagrant violations of human rights and fundamental freedoms by racists and colonisers.

The stone-throwing children in Palestine look towards you with the eyes of a people that has suffered various forms of injustice, oppression and aggression for more than 20 years and which continues to suffer from them. No one has the right, in this Conference, to snuff out the flame of hope in the hearts and eyes of these children.

As long as the Israeli occupation and colonisation in Palestine last, as long as the Palestinian people remains deprived of the exercise of its internationally recognised rights and freedoms, as long as the African people in South Africa remains subject to the racist Pretoria regime, and as long as the African people of Namibia remains deprived of its independence - justice, peace and stability cannot prevail in this world.

May the Peace and Mercy of God be with you.

Mr. TIHELI (Minister of Employment, Social Welfare and Pensions, Lesotho) - I would like to convey to you all warm greetings from the Government and people of the Kingdom of Lesotho. On behalf of my delegation, I wish to congratulate the President on his election to guide the proceedings of this important Conference. I am convinced that, under his chairmanship, this Session of the Conference will reach important conclusions in its deliberations.

The 75th Session of the International Labour Conference is meeting in the year in which the whole world is celebrating the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. We commend the Director-General for having chosen the theme of human rights as an item of the Conference agenda. This demonstrates the importance the Organisation attaches to the subject of human rights, without which there can be neither social justice nor peace.

By adopting a number of human rights instruments on matters falling within the sphere of its competence, which have become and will continue to be a useful guide in the formulation of national policies, the enactment of labour legislation on the part of the ILO member States and the codification of international law, the ILO has gone beyond mere verbal pronouncements.

The work of the ILO is, without doubt, of importance. The ILO is committed to the attainment of universal and, indeed, lasting peace through the promotion of social justice in the world. To this end, it works closely with member States, assisting and guiding them in the development of national policies and practices. The technical co-operation programmes are a means of ensuring the practical implementation of adopted international standards. They are a channel for maintaining the ongoing dialogue between the ILO and the member States. My delegation believes in and supports the use of dialogue as a vehicle for the achievement of social justice and international peace.

We note with regret, that, owing to circumstances beyond the control of the Director-General, there has been a deficit in the finances of the Organisation. We commend the Director-General for his efforts to reduce the deficit, and appeal to all member States to meet their financial obligations in order to avoid the disruption of the Organisation's programmes.

This session of the Conference has on its agenda, inter alia, such items as the Revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention (No. 107) of 1957 and the Updating of the Declaration Concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa. My delegation not only supports the inclusion of these agenda items but also notes with appreciation their timeliness. Discrimination based on colour, creed or race is unacceptable.

We further note with appreciation the inclusion of the "Promotion of rural employment" on the agenda. My Government attaches great importance to the creation and promotion of rural employment. It is common knowledge that the majority of our able-bodied men are employed in South African mines as migrant workers. The evils of the system of migrant labour are well known. It is incumbent upon the Lesotho Government to create jobs for these migrant workers, particularly because there is always the threat that they will be repatriated. For instance, no fewer than 8,000 minners lost their jobs as a result of the miners' strike in 1987. We hope and believe that our partners in development will continue to demonstrate their solidarity as we tackle this problem.

At the present moment, arrangements are under way to lessen Lesotho's dependence on the migrant labour system as the main source of employment for its people. To this end, the Lesotho Government is taking steps to rehabilitate disabled miners, upgrade the skills of returning miners and develop the skills of would-be migrant workers so that they can be self-employed and play a constructive role in the national economy.

We are preoccupied at present with improving our National Employment Service, so that it will be able to process all data relating to labour matters. It is from such data that we hope to be able to match labour market demands with available skills and also to address the question of the skills needed in the market. Once the Service is fully functional, we hope to be able to say which parts of the country are in most need of projects for self-employment.

My Ministry is addressing the question of an overall policy on social security as the present system only covers civil servants and a very limited number of workers in the private sector.

In the year of the 40th Anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and one of the human rights Conventions of this Organisation - Convention No. 87 of 1948 - Lesotho is among the countries that have ratified that Convention, and indeed, a number of other ILO human rights Convention. Consequently, our labour legislation permits and protects trade union activity, including the promotion of the related collective bargaining process. However, it is worth noting that industrialisation is a recent phenomenon in my country. The process of collective bargaining is understood still less and is therefore not widely practised. This is despite the multiplicity of trade unions competing for membership out of about 40,000 workers employed in commercial and industrial establishments within the country. There are, at the moment, 33 registered trade unions, two trade union federations and an employers' union. The two trade union federations have, for over 20 years, not only remained ideologically antagonistic but have also introduced trade union structures which overlap and create rivalry. It is regrettable that, because of their continuing rivalry, the workers in my country failed to designate a delegate to this Conference. I would, none the less, assure the Conference that the Government of Lesotho is doing its best to encourage the development of sound trade unionism in the country and, therefore, the promotion of collective bargaining. We believe too that the absence of meaningful collective bargaining should not unduly result in poor labour conditions. In the circumstances, the Government administers tripartite consultative machinery, which advise my Ministry on all matters of policy, labour legislation, workmen's compensation and labour relations, including the setting of statutory minimum wages. Furthermore, in addition to mediation and conciliatory services, the law provides for tripartite dispute settlement machinery, such as the Unfair Labour Practices Tribunal and Arbitration Services.

In an effort to improve our labour laws so that they can embrace the ideals and principles of the ILO, there is an ongoing consultancy to upgrade and codify these laws. We hope, by this exercise, to simplify and minimise costs in the disputes settlement process.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. AL-ATROOSHI (Deputy Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Iraq) - In the Name of Allah, the Merciful, the Compassionate! It is a great pleasure for me at the outset to present to you my warmest greetings. It is an honour for me to bring to you from Baghdad, from the land of civilisation, love and peace, greetings from the President of the Republic, Mr. Saddam Hussein, and from the people and Government of Iraq, as well as their best wishes for a successful Conference and the achievement of its aims of peace and justice in the world.

I would like to congratulate the President on the occasion of his election and express to him our esteem and confidence. With his personal qualities and abilities, as well as his wide experience, he is the most suitable person to guide our discussions and to help us to achieve the conclusions that will prove most favourable to social progress in the world.

This session of the Conference is being held at a time when the world is at dangerous crossroads: the international economic crisis is worsening and affecting many nations which are suffering as a result of the drop in the price of commodities and the increase in the price of manufactured goods. All this has led to a drop in living standards and increased unemployment. This is occurring at a time of increased military spending, the amounts of which far exceed the amount of aid accorded to development assistance. Thus social justice is declining in the world and more backwardness is on the increase in large numbers of third world countries.

What further compounds the problem is the heightened tension in international relations and the increase in the factors conducive to regional wars. These factors include the intervention of certain States in the domestic affairs of other countries, increased racist tendencies and more hegemonistic and terroristic regimes which are being led by the regimes of Tel Aviv and Pretoria, and other sources of tension, terror and racial domination.

Although I have referred to these conditions in the world of today at the outset of my speech, I nevertheless wish to congratulate the Director-General of the International Labour Office on his fortunate subject for his Report this year, Human rights – A common responsibility.

I agree with the Director-General when he gives this vital subject top priority because recognition of equality of rights for all human beings on the basis of freedom and justice and the struggle against oppression have become today the main factor for peace and security in the world. It behoves international society therefore as well as its organisations and institutions, including the ILO which has forged many instruments to guarantee social, economic and cultural progress throughout the world, to pursue these aims.

I also find myself duty bound to point out from this rostrum some of the achievements of my country in strengthening human rights as well as political, economic and social rights.

Despite the war conditions imposed on us, democratic life is thriving in my country. It is expanding its horizons. Political, occupational and trade union activities are advancing, our democratic institutions are increasing in strength, as is popular participation which is paving the way to a better future.

The years of aggression have been accompanied by great progress in our social life. Parliamentary activity has thrived and democratic practices are taking their natural course. The popular masses of our nation have elected their representatives during two successive sessions of the National Council and are now preparing for a third parliamentary election.

Trade unions and other popular organisations are exercising their activities and rights in an atmosphere of freedom and democracy and for the first time in the history of Iraq, a special law has been promulgated – Act No. 52 of 1987 which gives special importance to trade union rights.

Furthermore, the experience of self-rule for Kurdistan in Iraq is a creative and a humanitarian reflection of our appreciation of human rights. Our political leadership has given the question of self-government special importance and has sought to restore equality of opportunity in daily life. Democratic and constitutional procedures have therefore been set up in this part of the country and two councils, a legislative and executive one, have been established. Federations and other popular organisations have been created in respect of the press, culture and information as well as a number of important development and social projects.

My country's position since the revolution of July 1968 has been characterised by the adoption of the principle of co-operation, which aims at achieving economic and social progress and promoting security and peace throughout the world. This approach has been accompanied by efforts to enhance the conditions of our people through large-scale development plans. However, this peaceful development policy has also succeeded in arousing the ire of the forces of evil who have sought to undermine the achievements of our nation by waging war against us.

From the first week of the war, my country has responded to all international proposals and initiatives for peace. This attitude was repeatedly confirmed by the President of the Republic, Mr. Saddam Hussein (may God Bless him), subject to the total withdrawal to earlier borders, the exchange of prisoners, the signing of a peace and non-aggression treaty, the non-interference in each other's internal affairs and respect for each other's choices.

Here, I would like to refer to the historic resolution 598 adopted unanimously by the Security Council; my country has fully endorsed this resolution, but the other party has rejected it. The international community is therefore called upon to take the necessary measures under the Charter of the United Nations with a view to implementing resolution 598 according to the chronology contained in its operative paragraphs.

We are convinced that our Conference, which represents the social conscience of humanity, will fulfil its obligation, reject the aggression and call for dialogue and understanding to restore peace in our region and throughout the world.

In Part II of his Report the Director-General discusses the activities of the ILO, and in particular the report of the ILO mission concerning the situation of Arab workers in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories, in compliance with Conference resolutions adopted in 1974 and 1980 concerning the violation of trade union rights and freedoms by the Israeli authorities and the establishment of settlements.

I would like to express my thanks to the mission, and to inform the Conference of the inhuman practices to which the occupation authorities have resorted against Arab citizens for the past six months.

The Palestinian people have been bravely confronting this fierce racist attack launched by the occupation authorities, in violation of the principles of the United Nations, international laws and the humanitarian and civilised values of international community. These inhuman practices have been condemned by world public opinion, both officially and by the people. The time has therefore come for us to decide to expel this regime from our Organisation for its failure to abide by the principles of our Constitution and the decisions and resolutions of our Conference.

My Government fully supports and approves of all decisions taken to put an end to apartheid in Namibia and South Africa. We call upon the international community to assume its moral and legal responsibilities by applying mandatory sanctions against the racist regime in Pretoria in order to put an end to it.

The agenda of our Conference includes very important subjects for workers and world progress. The subjects of safety and health in construction, employment and social security and rural development are our top priorities and merit serious discussion.

However, I would merely like to say that social security today has become the main instrument for promoting social justice. Through social security, the State and society guarantee safety, health and the future of the nation. Therefore, social security is no longer a simple humanitarian claim but an economic requirement for the development of any society.

In the light of these facts, social security has been accorded the highest priority since the revolution of July 1968. Occupational safety and health in all sectors, including construction, enjoys the same priority.

Rural employment has suffered in most countries of the Third World, as mentioned in the reports prepared by the Organisation. Without the combined efforts of the international community and the assistance of the rich countries to the poor countries of Asia, Africa and Latin America, the inherent dangers of this problem will not stop at the borders of the Third World, for as the Declaration of Philadelphia states, "poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere". The war against poverty and underdevelopment requires continuous and concerted international efforts.

I would like to point out that my country has worked especially hard to eliminate underdevelopment in areas. Since the revolution, vast projects have been undertaken to promote culture, education, transport, communications, irrigation and agriculture in rural areas. Other projects have sought to enhance the protection of rural women.

Finally, allow me to reiterate my heartfelt wishes for a successful Conference whose results shall serve all humanity.

May the Almighty guide us all to the path of justice and peace.

May the mercy and grace of God be with you.

Interpretation from Polish: Mr. MIODOWICZ (Workers' delegate, Poland) – On behalf of the Polish trade union delegation I would like to congratulate the President on his election to his honourable and at the same time responsible post. We are convinced that his great experience, talent and abilities will contribute to the success of this session of the International Labour Conference.

It was with great attention and interest that our delegation studied the Director-General's Report to the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. The selection of the question of human rights was, in our opinion, right because of its timeliness and significance. This year we celebrate important anniversaries such as the 40th anniversary of the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the 40th anniversary of the adoption by the International Labour Conference of one of the most important instruments in this field, namely Convention No. 87, adopted on the initiative of the World Federation of Trade Unions, and the 10th anniversary of the adoption by the 9th World Congress of Trade Unions of the Universal Declaration of Trade Union Rights.

This offers an opportunity to use this lofty rostrum for an exchange of views and experiences as to how to counteract effectively attempts at curbing the role of trade unions in their struggle for the improvement of working and living conditions of employees. Such attempts are being made across the world, irrespective of geographical latitude or political system.

We in Poland have just won the battle in defence of trade union rights. The first draft of the law on special powers for the Government envisaged considerable restrictions of trade union rights. In the light of the firm stand taken by our member organisations, the All-Poland Alliance of Trade Unions – as their representative – took decisive and energetic action, first of all in Parliament. Despite criticism from certain quarters in the state and economic administration, our efforts produced results and nearly all our demands were reflected in the form of the Government's self-correction and a considerable modification of the texts of laws subsequently adopted. First of all, there were modifications in the principles governing collective disputes instead of the previously envisaged ban on them. Now initiation of collective disputes has been made dependent on gaining the support of a nation-wide trade union organisation. We also managed to prevent the introduction of a ban on strikes and of additional sanctions for taking part in them.

On this issue we are in full agreement with the opinion expressed by the Director-General of the ILO in his Report, that "strike action is one of the essential means available to workers and their organisations to protect their economic and social interests".

However, we are of the opinion that a strike should be the ultimate weapon and that it should be used only after the legal procedure for solving a collective dispute has been exhausted.

In our present economic situation, we Polish trade unionists are trying to observe this principle extremely strictly. We protect the interests of working people within the existing legal order without abusing the strike weapon. In our opinion, organising strikes against the law and manipulation of workers' protests by petty politicians are harmful and cause deep divisions among the workers. They also weaken the effects of our trade union efforts in the struggle for the implementation of economic demands. Some of the strikes that have recently taken place in our country have proved this. On the other hand, we believe that a strike is the ultimate expression of the workers' protests and that it should be settled through negotiations without the use of force.

The Polish trade union movement employs a number of methods for protecting the interests of the working people. The trade unions' right to appeal to the Supreme Court against any binding court sentence concerning labour and social insurance matters is undoubtedly one of them. During the past two years, the All-Poland Alliance of Trade Unions (OPZZ) has appealed against 37 valid court sentences and the Supreme Court has agreed with us in 28 cases.

We have also had positive results in appealing against some governmental decisions to the Constitutional Tribunal as incompatible with parliamentary Acts.

Such authentic activity within the existing legal order for the protection of employees' interests strengthens our position among the workers as well as within the state and economic administration.

I would like to stress that the trade unions which we represent here operate in 27,000 enterprises and have 62.3 per cent of all Polish workers affiliated to them. I said "we represent" because the trade union delegation consists not only of the representatives of more than 23,000 union organisations (about 85 per cent of the total) unified in the OPZZ. It also includes a representative of the nearly 4,000 independent trade union organisations outside our structure. Therefore, the composition of the trade union delegation for the current Session reflects the present structure of the trade union movement, the model of which has been shaped voluntarily and emerged from the very grass roots. We believe that it represents one of the many possible models of trade union pluralism.

The most important thing, in our opinion, is that trade union organisations should independently and autonomously represent the interests of their members in the best possible way. Present legislation gives the basis for such activities. On the other hand, the existence of pluralism in supra-factory structures is quite a different matter. As I have already said, that is why our delegation represents here the present Polish model of trade union pluralism, which requires further development.

Attempts to diminish the role of trade unions are usually accompanied by a propaganda campaign focused on their allegedly negative influence on various spheres of life in a given country. Some of our managers, whenever we have a clash with the Government, especially concerning prices and income policy, try to present us as opponents of the current economic reform. This is not true. We would like to stress that our trade unions have supported the process of reforming the economy since the very beginning. In particular, we perceive the need for an increased supply of goods, for strengthening the national currency and struggling against inflation, as well as for regarding economic equilibrium and enhancing the effectiveness of our economy. However, we oppose half-measures, which eventually end by having a negative impact on the living standards of the working people. We have never confined ourselves merely to criticism, but we put forward our own proposals for alternative solutions. However, the aim adopted of achieving market equilibrium leads to price increases, which cause social discontent. The recent social unrest in Poland was a confirmation of that. For us it was a signal to speed up work on the conclusion of new branch and enterprise collective agreements which requires quick amendment of the legislation concerning the factory remuneration systems. In our opinion it is the best way to extinguish the causes of discontent and sources of conflicts.

The adoption of the ILO Medium-Term Plan for the period 1990-95, that is, the final years of the twentieth century, is one of the major points on the agenda of this Session. The implementation of this Plan will have a decisive influence on the role and position of the ILO in the world. In this context, it seems purposeful for the ILO, independently of other international organisations, to devote more attention in its activity to creating conditions conducive to the development of multilateral international economic co-operation as a means of solving the acute social problems. The international labour movement has faced new realities or world economic development, reflecting the growth of the interdependence of States, the worsening of the economic situation in the world and the rather bleak prospects for its improvement. This has been reflected in the Report of the Director-General. It is obvious that the situation of working people is becoming increasingly dependent on business trends in the world economy and on the undisturbed development of economic exchange. The International Labour Organisation could play a more significant and constructive role in the search for platforms of co-operation, e.g. between the East and the West, which would be helpful in solving at least the problem of unemployment which was so pessimistically outlined in the Report. The elimination or considerable reduction of barriers impeding the process of co-operation among countries with different socio-political systems is a prerequisite for the development of economic co-operation and trade. In the expansion of co-operation we see a chance to improve productivity in Poland and to create additional job opportunities in the West. Regardless of their political convictions, trade unions, as organisations defending the living standards of the working people in their countries, cannot remain indifferent to these issues. The Polish trade unions are prepared to co-operate actively in preparing initiatives and proposals in all spheres relating to the interests of working people. We are of the opinion that tackling the difficult problems of the working people together, levelling out enormous disproportions in development, counteracting the effects of excessive indebtedness and protecting against ecological hazards can contribute to solving those problems.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. BARRERO-STAHN (Government delegate, Namibia) – On behalf of the United Nations Council for Namibia, the legal authority for the administration of Namibia until it becomes independent, as well as on my own behalf, I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate the President warmly on his well-deserved election to conduct the debates of this 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. We are confident that his great ability and gift for diplomacy will enable him to bring our deliberations to a successful conclusion.

We have read with particular interest and close attention the Director-General's Report on the activities of the International Labour Organisation in 1987, as well as the Special Report on the Application of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa which reviews the most recent developments in labour and social matters in South Africa and illegally occupied Namibia, as well as the action taken against apartheid by the Members of the ILO, the Organisation itself and other international bodies.

We are particularly indebted to the Director-General for these Reports and we are especially glad that more emphasis has been laid on the question of Namibia. Nevertheless, we note that in the immediate future the question of Namibia is to be dealt with in a different section of the Director-General's Report.

We have devoted special attention to the draft report of the Tripartite Conference on Action against Apartheid held in Harare, Zimbabwe, last May, which contains an updated version of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia.

We note with special satisfaction that the question of Namibia is once again being given special consideration and express our hope that the updated version of the Declaration will receive overwhelming support.

While the majority of the countries of the world are still trying to find solutions to the problems of unemployment, shortage of housing and other tribulations, the Namibian people are desperately continuing their struggle to free themselves from the illegal occupation of their territory. It has clearly and resoundingly established in the Special Report of the Director-General on the Application of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa that the authorities of that country show no sign of the slightest intention of complying with the decisions of the United Nations on Namibia.

The racist regime of South Africa is continuing arbitrarily to detain and imprison leaders and members of the South West Africa People's Organisation (SWAPO), as well as murdering and torturing innocent Namibians. This regime is also making use of other inhuman means of intimidating the people of Namibia and annihilating their firm determination to secure the achievement of their most legitimate aspirations: self-determination, freedom and national independence. The racist regime of South Africa is continuing to intimidate trade unionists by means such as arrests and illegal detention, the destruction of union offices, among other measures.

By means of an elaborate and unjust, and in essence, illegal system of land expropriation, taxation and the introduction of tight controls, the Black population of Namibia has been dispossessed of its own country. Thus deprived, Namibians have been forced to look for work in the service of the White minority under conditions that resemble those of the colonial system where workers are denied all possibility of claiming their basic and fundamental labour rights.

Namibians have to work under totally hostile and exploitive conditions. There is no labour legislation to protect the workers, they have no right to a pension, they have no wage-fixing machinery, nor is any payment made for days of rest or maternity leave, workers can be dismissed without notice and frequently are.

While all this is happening, the minority of White employees are entitled by law to negotiate freely their conditions of work and their trade union representation. Worse still, the Wages and Industrial Conciliation Act of 1985 deems to be illegal the registration of trade unions attached or affiliated to any political party. It is unquestionable that this legislation was introduced to hamper the activities of the main trade union organisation for the Black population, the National Union of Namibian Workers (NUNW), which was founded in 1978 and is affiliated to SWAPO. This National Union of Namibian Workers is a member of the ILO and its objectives include, in addition to the immediate and unconditional securing of the independence of Namibia under the terms of Security Council Resolution 435 of 29 September 1978, the obtaining of a fair labour system, an adequate national minimum wage and a general improvement of the standard of living of Namibian workers.

Despite the strict laws which deny Blacks the right to strike in Namibia, the number of strikes increased in 1987. On May Day, International Labour Day, 25,000 workers from all over Namibia took part in different events to commemorate the day of the workers, including a march and a meeting organised by the National Union of Namibian Workers. In addition, numerous religious services were held to celebrate this day in the war-torn north of Namibia.

In July last year almost the whole of the labour force of the Tsumeb Corporation, that is to say some 5,000 workers, employees of this Corporation which operates three copper mines, went on strike to demand higher wages, better working and living conditions as well as protective equipment and clothing and better safety in the mines. As agreed with the Mineworkers' Union of Namibia, affiliated to the National Union of Namibian Workers, the Black workers of the Tsumeb Corporation receive an average hourly wage of approximately US$0.51 for a 48-hour week, that is to say about US$97.50 per month. The company in question refused to negotiate with the union and dismissed practically all the workers and evicted them from the hostels in which the company had allowed them to live.

Since we last addressed the Conference at its 73rd Session, Namibian religious and political leaders have frequently and desperately drawn attention to the rapid deterioration in human rights in Namibia. Nevertheless, these appeals have been completely ignored by the international communications media or have received little attention.

The aspirations of the people of Namibia and practically the whole of the international community were greatly encouraged and stimulated when the United Nations Security Council adopted Resolution 435 in 1978, since it was believed at that time that the long hope for the independence of Namibia would finally become a reality. The Resolution made an appeal, inter alia, for a cease-fire and called on the United Nations to supervise the holding of general elections with a view to setting up a constituent assembly and proclaiming independence. Ten years have passed since the initiative was taken and due to the violation of Resolution 435 by South Africa, Namibia continues to be a South African colony in which political and military battles are continuing to take place with increasing intensity.

The Namibian people are the victim of brutal repression and oppression by the racist regime of South Africa. Namibia has become a huge military garrison in which the racist security forces exercise a regime of terror in an attempt to destroy the desire of its noble people to continue the struggle for their inalienable right to self-determination and national independence as well as attempting to destabilise the neighbouring front-line countries.

Throughout all these years the international community has firmly rejected South Africa's claim to a link with Namibia as being alien to the application of Resolution No. 435 (1978). In 1987 the world welcomed, as a new spur to progress on the question of Namibia, the adoption of Resolution No. 601 (1987) by the Security Council, which authorised the Secretary-General to negotiate a ceasefire between South Africa and SWAPO as a further step towards the independence of Namibia.

It is, however, deplorable that the same Security Council has systematically blocked attempts to establish wider ranging mandatory sanctions against South Africa through the regular imposition of a veto by some of its permanent Western members. As a result, the minority racist regime has been encouraged to continue its repressive policy in defiance of the principles and decisions of the United Nations.

In view of the grave and steadily deteriorating situation in Namibia this Conference cannot do less than intensify the international campaign of support for the Namibian cause and denounce all acts of collaboration with the racist regime of Pretoria in the political, economic, diplomatic, cultural and military field. We have to acknowledge that the struggle of the people of Namibia for independence is in the final instance a struggle which has to be settled by the Namibians themselves. Nevertheless, through its firm support the international community can help them to achieve victory and reduce the cost in terms of human life and suffering.

The mobilisation of international public opinion through the dissemination of information on Namibia is a most important aspect of the efforts the ILO can make for the achievement of the independence of Namibia. Despite years of illegal occupation of Namibia by South Africa and growing interest in and attention to the situation in South Africa itself, the great majority of the public have only limited and very restricted access to information about this territory. The communication media in certain countries either publish no information about Namibia or publish it only in a partial and distorted way.

It is therefore imperative that the ILO's position with respect to Namibia should receive proper attention and publicity in order that it can be brought to the knowledge of public opinion, particularly in those countries whose governments have ties with South Africa, so that they may receive fuller and more reliable information.

For our part, as the United Nations Council for Namibia, in pursuance of the mandate given to the Council by the General Assembly as the legal administrative authority of Namibia until it becomes independent, we shall continue our constant scrutiny of social conditions in the territory, as well as development in the social sphere and the struggle of the Namibian people for self-determination, freedom and national independence in a unified Namibia. The Council has expressed on various occasions its profound anger at the violation of the Namibian people's fundamental human rights by the illegal colonial regime of South Africa. The Council has made and will continue to make unstintingly every possible efforts to fulfil the mandate given to it by the General Assembly.

The United Nations Council for Namibia has constantly sought international support for the taking of measures to secure the withdrawal of the illegal administration of South Africa from Namibia in compliance with the relevant resolutions of the United Nations. The Council will continue to oppose South African policy which is evidence of its stubborn refusal to put an end to the illegal occupation of Namibia, its increasing military presence in the territory and constant aggression against its people.

In particular the Council will continue its campaign against the recognition of the illegal administration imposed on Namibia by South Africa, or any other administration or purported entity installed in Windhoek which is not a result of free elections in Namibia under the auspices, supervision and control of the United Nations. The Council will also continue to reject any form of link or parallel between the independence of Namibia and any external or irrelevant aspects; this has been widely recognised and accepted by the vast majority of the international community.

On behalf of the United Nations Council for Namibia, I thank all the governments, employers and trade unions in the West which have taken practical steps to bring pressure to bear on South Africa, with a view to the dismantling of its odious system of apartheid and putting an end to the illegal occupation of Namibia. We appeal to all governments and all delegations of employers and workers to make every effort to secure the immediate and unconditional application of resolutions 385 (1976) and 435 (1978) of the Security Council, which are the only internationally accepted basis for the immediate and unconditional independence of Namibia.

As we have said at past sessions of this great Conference, I should like to take this opportunity to reiterate the request made by the General Assembly in its resolution 42/14C and in earlier resolutions, appealing to all specialised agencies and other organisations to exempt Namibia from the payment of contributions during the time that it is represented by the United Nations Council for Namibia.

I wish to express the gratitude of the Council for the valuable assistance provided by the ILO to the Namibian people and renew our appeal that it continue and widen the range of its action to assist Namibia through SWAPO, its sole and genuine representative, as well as through the same United Nations Council for Namibia. The Council also urges the national community to increase, as a matter of urgency, all types of assistance and political support for the front-line States.

In approving the updating of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa which is on the agenda of this Conference, we insist on the need to bring the greatest pressure to bear on the racist regime in South Africa so as to help the Namibian people to see the realisation of their dearest wishes.

If you want to talk of respect for human rights or their violation, think of Namibia.

Mr. SIMMONS (Government delegate, Barbados) – Mr. President, I join the preceding speakers in offering you my congratulations on your election to preside over this Conference. Your wealth of experience will, I am sure, enable you to discharge the responsibility of the office with great competence. I wish you success in your task.

This is the second session of the International Labour Conference since the democratic Labour Party was returned as the Government of Barbados after a ten-year absence. It is also the first session at which I as Minister of Labour have been afforded the honour and privilege to address this most important and distinguished gathering.

I should like at the outset to reaffirm the commitment of the Government of Barbados to the pursuit of the aims and objectives set out in the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation and pledge my country's continual and unstinting support of, and participation in, the activities of the ILO.

Permet me to seize this opportunity to share with you some of the basic principles upon which the governing party is based. It is imperative that I do so because I feel that those principles find a kindred philosophy with the tenets of freedoms, social justice, harmony and peace – the foundations of this noble Organisation.

Our basic philosophy has always been enshrined in the doctrine of democratic socialism which is all about planning and equality of opportunity. That is why we have been striving and will continue to strive to ensure that every child born in Barbados has every opportunity possible to develop his or her fullest potential physically, mentally, socially and culturally. The notion of the right to work, that is that every man and woman who wishes to work has the right to do so, is a key element in this philosophy. We have always recognised the inter-relationship between this notion and human dignity. For if you take away a man's job, which is his livelihood and his family's livelihood, you take away his pride, his dignity and the wherewithal for him to take care of himself and his family.

I must, however, acknowledge that this goal is becoming increasingly difficult to attain as we continue to struggle in the vicious grasp of worsening economic conditions. I am well aware of the valiant efforts of the International Labour Organisation to obtain from its member States the commitment to the goal of the right to work, through the pursuance of an active policy designed to promote full productive and freely chosen employment. It is unfortunate that the Convention which embodies this principle has only received 71 ratifications out of a total of 150 member States. I am happy that the Government of Barbados considers its objectives to be of such importance that it has seen fit to ratify this Convention.

I should like to urge member Governments to commit themselves to this instrument, which should be like a beacon of hope, an inspiring challenge to meet as we fight our way out of this economic morass. Whereas the goal of full employment is desirable, it is only too obvious that it is a difficult issue confronting almost all nations. But I would implore the ILO to provide more resources to small nation States to increase their capacity to deal with the problem of unemployment. I am sure that you understand that I should want to impress upon you that when, dealing with such issues, the Organisation must give special consideration to the needs of the Caribbean.

The youth unemployment situation in the developing world is virtually at a crisis point. The statistics published by the International Labour Office in 1986 paint a gloomy picture. It is projected that in the more developed regions of the world, the young (15 to 20 years old) economically active population will decrease from some 111 million in 1985 to 104 million by 2025. However, in the developing regions, this same population will increase from 469 million to 608 million by the same time.

You will therefore appreciate the straits of our situation when you consider the incapacity of our labour market to absorb this growing youth population. As the economic outlook unfurls before us, the task, particularly for small developing States, is a daunting one; and it is one that we cannot successfully tackle without the assistance and co-operation of the developed world.

But let me acknowledge at the same time that our survival depends largely upon our self-reliance. I share the view of the Director-General when he says that the developing world must reduce its dependence on the rest of the world and make use of its own resources. In these sentiments he struck a crucial note – a note to which the Government of Barbados fully subscribes.

I feel, however, that the issues involved are so fundamental that they cannot be approached only through self-reliance, for no man is an island and we need each other. It is crucial for us to develop and utilise our natural resources, but it is also crucial for the socio-economic development of the globe that co-operation between the developed and developing countries plays its full role.

As we are well aware, rapid technological change has been taking place all over the world. Although it is generally accepted that these changes have been largely for the benefit of mankind, it must be equally recognised and accepted that they are not without their attendant problems.

The discussion at this time of the subject "Safety in construction" is particularly timely, for although the increasing mechanisation of construction work has resulted in reduced human fatigue and a simplification of tasks, accidents in that industry continue to increase and result in catastrophic injuries to a greater extent than in most other areas of economic activity. These accidents, for the most part, occur in the area of machinery operation, elevation and trenching.

In spite of widespread mechanisation and a high injury rate, the construction industry remains nonetheless one of the most labour-intensive industries. In Barbados, in 1986, the construction industry employed some 7,900 persons, which represents 8.2 per cent of the labour force. The industry is one of the major growth areas, contributing during the same period 6.0 per cent of the country's overall growth in real output and averaging a 6.4 per cent share in the country's gross domestic product.

It is therefore not surprising that this subject has been on the agenda of this Conference for the past two years, and this year the objective is with a view to the adoption of instruments on the subject.

The activities of the ILO regarding occupational safety and health of workers can easily be measured by the number of instruments which the International Labour Conference has adopted over the years calling for improvements in conditions of workers and providing greater benefits for those who have been unfortunate enough to have suffered an occupational injury or disease.

I should like at this time to congratulate the Conference on its initiative and wish the technical committee on the subject success in its deliberations. I know that the preventive and protective measures proposed for inclusion in the new instruments will go a long way towards setting standards to ensure the safety and general health of the workers in the construction industry.

This year's Conference has many anniversaries to celebrate, among them, the 40th year of the existence of the United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights which proclaims human rights as a common standard of achievement for all people and all nations. The Conference also celebrates 40 years of the adoption of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and 30 years of the adoption of another of its human rights instruments, the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111).

I am sure that during these celebrations stock will be taken of the achievements so far, in the area of human rights and a path will be charted for the future. Therefore, I exhort you not to lose sight of our goal which is to rid the world of this scourge upon our economies – the unemployment crisis.

Let us therefore resolve to strive for sustained economic development; let us resolve to strive to put our peoples back to work; let us resolve to strive to raise the morale of our people, particularly our young people, who are the future of our nations, for

I firmly believe that these are the very foundations upon which human rights are cemented.

I could not conclude without some reference to the subject of apartheid which has become a burning issue in international relations and which this Conference has rightly addressed over the years. It is a subject about which my Government feels very strongly.

Barbados was one of the first countries to take steps against the racist regime in South Africa by banning South African goods as early as the 1950s. The Government proposes to continue to assist in maintaining such pressures as it can, until our brothers and sisters in that country are liberated.

The Government of Barbados feels compelled to view the continued defiance of the South African regime in the face of all efforts as a serious indictment against the major actors in the international community. That this regime should continue is due in large part to the support it receives directly and indirectly from some powerful nations that choose to put economic considerations before humanity.

As we focus our attention on the issues of human rights and apartheid during this Conference, it is imperative that we keep before us the blatant disregard by the South African Government of fundamental human freedoms, human dignity and the sanctity of human life. Let us therefore begin to take action to eradicate this evil from our midst.

My Government has recently pledged the sum of $100,000, half of which has already been paid to the Solidarity Fund for South Africa to assist front-line States suffering economic aggression from Pretoria. Let each of us take a stand to show our commitment.

I feel sufficiently encouraged by its good work in the region to say a word of commendation for the Caribbean Labour Administration Centre (CLAC), an agency of the ILO for which my Government has the privilege of providing host facilities.

CLAC provides training for Caribbean labour administrators, a service which has been long needed in the region. Through the organisation of training programmes and working attachments in the region, CLAC has been successfully drawing upon the vast reservoir of knowledge and experience that the region possesses, furthering the concept of technical co-operation among developing countries.

I welcome the demonstration of support by the ILO for CLAC in the recent appointment of an associate expert.

I hope that the Organisation will continue to support this much needed agency and seriously consider its institutionalisation and an increase in its financial allocations to enable it to expand and continue its assistance to the Caribbean region.

To this extent, my Government feels that the capabilities of CLAC should be expanded by recruiting Caribbean expertise in its required services, as in the current offering at the ILO's regional office in Trinidad and Tobago. And these positions should be designed to attract suitable candidates.

Special mention should also be made of the useful contribution being made by the ILO Area Office in Trinidad and Tobago. However, it must be recognised (as in the case of CLAC) the specialist personnel positions are too few for the requirements of the region. I would recall that to date an insufficient response has been the offering of that agency regarding the provision of technical assistance in the area of small business development and youth in particular.

This request has been voiced by the various Caribbean labour ministers at the Conference.

I also hope that the ILO will find it possible to put that Office in a position, staffwise, to enable it too to provide improved technical assistance in the region.

(The Conference adjourned at 12.45 p.m.)

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (Cont.)

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – We shall now continue with the discussions of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Interpretation from French: Mr. DELEBARRE (Minister of Employment and Social Affairs, France) – It is a great pleasure for me to take part in the work of the International Labour Conference and to address to the President, as well as to the Vice-Presidents, my heartiest congratulations upon their election.

May I express my satisfaction and thanks to the Director-General for having devoted his Report this year to the topic of human rights. Of all ILO's activities this is possibly the most essential.

In France, where human rights are concerned we have a particular sensitivity which comes to us from our history and our culture. We have in the 1789 Declaration of the Rights of Man, whose bicentenary we shall celebrate next year, the words: "All human beings are born free and equal in dignity before the law", which are also in the Declaration adopted by the United Nations in 1948.

These principles of individual liberty and of the equality of human beings have subsequently been supplemented by the values of social rights and recognition of the collective identity of the labour world. As Jean Jaurès said, "The code of civic equality quickly becomes a lie when it is not supported by a code of social equality".

These principles and these values together constitute the basis of human rights as they are defined today. The ILO, more than any other, is imbued with these rights.

Established after the First World War, our Organisation has been able to combine faithfulness to the great principles of freedom and equality of the individual with the affirmation of social and collective rights. The Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), states that: "Workers and employers, without distinction whatsoever shall have the right to establish and ... to join organisations of their own choosing without previous authorisation." This one sentence clearly sets forth the collective right to association, the freedom of the individual to join trade union organisations, and the inalienable nature of these rights in all systems and in all latitudes.

The same is true of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), the anniversary of which we are also celebrating.

It is customary to place all of the instruments of the ILO directly inspired by the rights of man under the overall heading of basic Conventions. We should like in this connection to mention the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) and the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100). These Conventions have received more than 100 ratifications. This is a large number but still insufficient in view of the importance of the issues involved. It is to be hoped that there will be further ratification of these fundamental instruments.

The topic of freedom of equality of human rights is also placed very dramatically on the agenda of our Conference in connection with a reality that is profoundly shocking and repulsive to the minds of men – that of apartheid. It is a good thing that year after year this world assembly, which brings together governments, workers and employers, should tirelessly revert to this topic and thus help to mobilise world public opinion. We must all hope that respect for human dignity will some day prevail in that part of the world as well, and that that day will come soon.

In general, I fully support the Director-General's statement in his introduction: "All ILO activities are related to human rights in one way or another because the achievement of human rights is an integral part of efforts to secure man's material well-being and spiritual development, and in this sense economic development cannot be separated from social development."

There are not many forums where the links between economic policy and social policy are so earnestly discussed.

This is why the French Government, under Mr. Michel Rocard, is particularly grateful to the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Blanchard, whose remarkable ability has made it possible to overcome very difficult times and whose role in the Organisation is well known to all. We are grateful to him for having boldly encouraged the idea of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment which was held in November 1987.

The conclusions of this meeting constitute for the ILO, in close and trusting co-operation with the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank, a definition of a new and important mission: to help obviate the adverse social consequences of readjustment policies. This is particularly essential for trade union freedoms. The President of the French Republic, Mr. François Mitterrand, has expressed similar concerns. The stringency which in our countries is imposed by the preservation of basic economic balance makes it more than ever indispensable to maintain social cohesion through increasing efforts to achieve equity and social justice and to safeguard acquired social rights.

The same concern for equity and balance should imbue the search for a solution to the problems of the indebtedness of the poorest countries. That is why, some days ago, the President of the French Republic, in a letter on this question addressed to the countries which are to participate in the Toronto summit, proposed a reduction in the external debt of those countries. As you know, the desire of the President of the French Republic has already been translated into reality. France has committed itself to cancelling one-third of the debt-servicing of the poorest nations. I should like to point out that the proposals of the President of the Republic of Argentina, Mr. Raúl Alfonsín, are on the same lines. I am also very happy to see the collaboration between our Organisation and the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights set up by the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations. The Committee will thus be receiving regular information on the results of the operation of the ILO's supervisory machinery in its sphere of activity.

The introduction of machinery for supervising the application of standards was a bold move when the ILO was set up in 1919. The obligation for member States to submit reports on the application of standards, the setting up of the tripartite Conference committee within which representatives may be called upon to give explanations on the subject was at the time a quite revolutionary innovation.

For about 70 years now, this supervisory machinery has evolved and adapted while the basic structure and principles have been maintained. Thus, the ILO, a world institution, has harmoniously combined the acquired rights of written law as set out in the Constitution and regulations with the contribution of customary law in creating new bodies, which, with time, have proved themselves indispensable.

Lastly, there are procedures for complaints, comments and claims.

In the past few years there has been a large increase in the number of cases brought before the ILO by the social partners, which reflects a relative worsening of social relations in the world and in particular profound economic changes and their social consequences. The reason for the increase in the number of such cases is also that there is a better knowledge of ILO and its operating methods and the possible recourse provided by its procedures.

Such as it is, the supervisory system of the ILO is a composite mechanism, but it is pragmatic and effective, its individual and collective results are clearly visible and, in its field of activity, it makes human rights fully operational, as the lawyers say, by protecting individuals against arbitrariness and government abuse.

However, it is also fragile. It has often been criticised by some States in terms of respect for national sovereignty. I am happy to note, on the occasion of this Conference, that there seem to be new signs of a significant development of opinion on this subject.

The mechanism - and this is, of course, true for the ILO as a whole - cannot function properly unless governments play the game of tripartism by enabling the two non-governmental groups of workers and employers to choose their representatives freely.

Moreover, while the ILO should be able to expand its assistance to the least privileged States on the administrative level, it is also threatened - again, like the ILO as a whole - by current acute financial difficulties.

I should like to dwell on this point for a moment.

Regardless of the fluctuations of the United States dollar, the financial difficulties of the ILO are due to non-payment, partial payment and late payment of some contributions.

The dues payable are, however, proportional to the financial means of member States.

My country pays its own dues regularly, fully and very early in the year. It will continue to do so. I do not consider this exceptional, but just a normal respect for our commitments. We hope that other countries have the same attitude.

However, the most regrettable fact is that owing to defaults in payment of their contribution by certain member States the prospect arises of a decrease in the credit set aside by the Organisation. There is a possibility that it will have make economies, despite the fact that it is extremely efficient, particularly in the field of human rights.

If economies must be made, the opinion of the Government which I represent is that slowing down, still less reducing, programmes already planned must be avoided at all costs.

On the other hand, large economies should be sought in the time table and procedures of meetings. To this end, an indepth and responsible tripartite study ought to be carried out on the traditional formula of Industrial Committees, the number of sessions of the Governing Body and their contents, and on regional conferences. Consideration should also be given to the difficult question of the contents of the General Conference.

Some ideas were put forward at the time of the discussion of the Medium-Term Plan. They should be pursued with determination.

Resources are not everything. The will to act and to progress is fundamental. All the more reason for it not to be hindered by material difficulties, since this will to progress remains indispensable.

When we look at the road we have travelled for a whole century, we should all realise the progress that has been made, particularly by this Organisation, towards greater respect for human rights, victory for the freedom of association, the recognition of trade union rights and the development of social dialogue.

But we also know that there is still much progress to be made, always and everywhere, and that the danger of slipping back, indeed regressing socially, still exists. As a French poet wrote, "nothing is ever acquired for ever". The European countries must therefore ensure that their continent becomes not only a single market, but also an area of progress and social justice. We must, therefore, in all international incidents, be vigilant and persevering in the defence of human rights and of the labour world. This is a continuing struggle.

The existence and the development of the International Labour Organisation helps us in this. The ILO represents, and for this we are profoundly grateful to the Director-General, Mr. Francis Blanchard, a reason for satisfaction and grounds for hope for all who believe, as the French President, Mr. Mitterrand, said a few days ago, that "social cohesion and social dialogue are essential elements of economic modernisation".

Mr. HALMOS (Secretary of State, President of the State Office of Labour and Wages, Hungary) – It is a special honour for me to extend to Mr. Beyreuther, on behalf of the Hungarian delegation and in my own name, our congratulations on his election to the office of the presidency of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. May I express my pleasure to see in the Chair the representative of the German Democratic Republic, with which my country maintains relations of friendship and good co-operation.

My recognition also goes to the Director-General for his timely choice in devoting a special part of his annual Report to human rights issues. The fact that the Universal Declaration of Human Rights was born 40 years ago, and that the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) was adopted by the International Labour Conference in the same year provides an auspicious occasion to assess the action of the ILO to promote the respect for human rights, the achievements and the problems still remaining in this field.

In our view, both instruments, as other international labour standards on human rights, have played important role in furthering social justice, and we recognise the efforts of the ILO to this end.

At the same time, we are aware of the increasing number of complaints because of the violation of freedom of association and trade union rights, as is pointed out both in the Report of the Director-General and by the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations. Apparently there is a lot the ILO can do in the future to assist a more complete realisation of fundamental human and trade union rights, all the more as grave violations of these rights continue to exist. One of the most flagrant forms of them is the policy of apartheid pursued by the Republic of South Africa. This policy has always been rejected by the Hungarian Government at all international forums. Our Government has equally condemned the violation of the human rights of Palestinian Workers and employers in the occupied territories.

Concerning the special topic in the Report of the Director-General, I would like to confine myself to just a few remarks. Although political and civil rights are to be regarded as national responsibilities, I share the view that it is hard to ensure the observance of these rights, if they are not backed by developments reflecting the common efforts of all countries and unless there is enough strength to overcome the world-wide social and economic difficulties.

Worthy of attention in my opinion is the endeavour of the Director-General to consider human rights, such as freedom of association, not in isolation from fundamental economic and social rights but in a reciprocal relationship. He also rightly points to the interdependence between the respect for human rights and peace and stability.

I am persuaded, and last November's High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment, which I had the opportunity to attend, confirmed my conviction, that employment and social protection of workers also belong to the matters requiring concerted international action.

The possibilities inherent in international co-operation based on mutual interests were exemplified by the Fourth European Regional Conference which, as I see it, advanced the convergence of the European countries in the field of social and labour relations. The results were also a good argument for this forum of dialogue among the European member countries of the ILO. Therefore, ways and means should be identified to render feasible the convocation of the European Regional Conference with the same frequency as other regional conferences. And till the next session, we expect the International Labour Office to organise and keep a firm hand on the implementation of the resolutions adopted last September.

We are confident that the negotiations started some time ago between the socialist representatives and other members of the Employers' group will not be discontinued and that they will yield results in the foreseeable future.

I consider the relations between Hungary and the International Labour Organisation to be good and ever improving.

In autumn last year, an ILO employment policy expert mission visited Hungary, at our invitation, to study the situation of the Hungarian economy and the resulting concerns and tasks in the field of employment. Despite the limited time spent in Hungary, they managed to put on the table concrete and practicable proposals. We hope this was a first step in a co-operation which will continue to help us in shaping our employment policy.

The structural adjustment and the unfolding reform process in my country require fundamental changes, and a renewal in our employment policy, too.

We have frequently declared before that we were aiming at simultaneously ensuring full and efficient employment. Our objectives have remained unchanged. However, the interpretation of these notions has changed. We perceive today the term efficient employment not only – and not in the first place – as implying higher productivity and more intensive work and better utilisation of working hours but also as a change in the workforce structure: people should be employed at places where they can produce up-to-date, profit-yielding articles or render such services.

On the other hand, full employment involves neither a right to a particular job nor the highest possible employment. It may be more advantageous for family, children and society alike, if one of the parents stays at home to take care of the children: in that respect, we should create the necessary conditions, instead of encouraging employment.

We are not unaware that the implementation of the government stabilisation programme demands a structural change in our economy which would entail the loss of tens of thousands of jobs while at the same time creating new ones. We realise that many people will not be able to find employment under such circumstances unless they are willing to be retrained, and there will be persons temporarily without work. However, we deem lasting unemployment unacceptable, for both economic and social considerations: we disagree with those who look upon the conflict between full and efficient employment as an unsolvable dilemma.

Our labour administration has managed to prepare for coping with the recently generated employment tensions. Our employment policy instruments are functioning well and easing the strains. Nevertheless, the increase in the number of jobs lost requires our employment policy instruments to be reinforced. We aim at elaborating an active employment policy that would not abandon the goal of full employment but would rather attempt to attain it by promoting labour mobility, thus acting neither to the detriment of efficiency nor at the cost of slowing down the adjustment.

In view of this it is essential to strengthen the employment services, to improve both their informational background and their nation-wide communications network, to widen retraining opportunities for those who are unable to find employment, to broaden the scope of community works, to promote small business start-ups, and to encourage regional mobility of labour.

To counterbalance the growing labour supply, we have stimulated the introduction of forms of employment that would enable family responsibilities to be met in more flexible ways. Our other objective is to reduce, by higher money rewards for regular work performance, the number of those in need of a secondary income.

In addition to the development of our employment policy, or rather as a part of it, we are engaged in elaborating substantial changes in our wage policy, too. At the end of last year, we started with large-scale preparatory works, involving both scientists and practitioners: we have outlined so far the basic objectives of the modifications which will be put to a comprehensive public discussion.

Preparation for these works has been greatly assisted by a conference held in May this year in Hungary. At this Conference, along with the best Hungarian experts, researchers of high reputation from abroad, among them ILO representatives, made a valuable contribution to its success.

We perceive the comprehensive readjustment of our wage system not as a single measure but as part of a broader reform process, therefore, we devise the changes so as to be in harmony with and instrumental in it. As the most important step, we envisage a gradual elimination of the central wage and earnings regulation in the sphere of the market.

These are my thoughts inspired by the Report of the Director-General, the discussion during the session up till now and, of course, our concerns in the field of labour. We hope to be able to praise, at the end of this session, too, the contribution of our Conference to the improvement of the living and working conditions of workers. The Hungarian delegation will do the best in its power toward that purpose.

Interpretation from French: Mr. VAN DEN BRANDE (Minister of Employment and Labour, Belgium) – On behalf of the Government of Belgium, it is a particular pleasure for me to congratulate you on your election to the presidency of this session.

In electing you as President, the International Labour Conference has demonstrated its confidence in you and I am convinced that, thanks to our skilful management, this session will be successful and attain its basic objectives.

It is also a great honour and pleasure for me to address you for the first time.

Since 1988 marks the 40th anniversary not only of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights but also of the important ILO Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention (No. 87), it is most appropriate that the Director-General should have chosen human rights as the central theme of his Report to the Conference I have studied this Report with great interest and was much impressed by its direct style and outstanding qualities. Allow me to congratulate the Director-General for this remarkable success.

The ILO is well placed to study this question. Since its creation, it has never ceased striving to increase human happiness, to protect men and women and to defend their rights and achievements. And even if the expression "human rights" is not used as such in the ILO Constitution, the idea itself is omnipresent both in the objectives and in the principles of our Organisation.

I shall not dwell in detail here on the work undertaken by the ILO in this field.

I do not have to emphasise the importance which a country as profoundly democratic as my own has always attached to human rights and especially to rights protected by international labour Conventions. As the new Minister of Employment and Labour, I am proud to observe that the seven Conventions mentioned in the Director-General's Report have all been ratified by Belgium.

I quite agree with the Director-General when he says in his Report that economic problems cannot be settled at the expense of employment growth and social policy. However, I also believe that in the absence of a sound economic climate, we cannot aspire to increase employment. Hence, our aim is to create conditions favourable to economic development as an indispensable basis for the creation of jobs, without, however, undermining what has been achieved under our social legislation.

The present situation therefore raises the question of the relationship between the economy and social matters. Some people think that economic matters determine social aspects. Others are of the opinion that social matters cannot be considered as a sub-product of the economy but as something entirely separate. I believe rather that we must combine the two aspects. We all need standards which will guarantee a minimum of rights. But on the other hand, we cannot overlook the major changes in the world economy which force us to make certain adjustments. We have to create a framework within which the social partners can react to change, while maintaining inviolate a certain number of rights. The aim is to render legislation more supple with a view to putting it at the service of an employment policy. The Belgian Act of 17 March 1987 on hours of work in undertakings is an excellent example of collaboration between the Government and the social partners. This kind of collaboration has worked also in other countries and shows that a model of economic and social development can be flexible while offering basic social guarantees.

We must, of course, ensure that standards adopted are respected at the world level. The Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), is probably one of the most valuable instruments ever adopted by the ILO. It guarantees workers the right to set up the organisations of their choice and to become members of them. It also affirms that these associations are entitled to draw up their own statutes and regulations, to elect freely their representatives and to organise their programmes in such a manner as best to serve the interests of the workers.

However, I fear that certain countries, whether they have an industrial tradition or are in the process of development, have a tendency to neglect this first principle. I come from a country where collective bargaining, which is a prerequisite of trade union freedom, is at the basis of society. The signing of collective labour agreements at the inter-occupational level or amongst sectors and undertakings is generally governed by laws and regulations. It is for this reason that I am relying very much on the new international inter-occupational agreement to be concluded between workers and employers to establish the necessary climate for the creation of employment which we all need. Social dialogue, which we have practised over a number of years, gives the necessary drive to our society. It is for governments to take the responsibility of guaranteeing free exercise of trade union rights and of other freedoms.

In the same way as my predecessor, Michel Hansenne, who was Minister of Employment and Labour from 1981 to May 1988 and has assumed other duties within the new Government of Belgium, I shall support tripartism as the first and basic condition of economic and social development.

Furthermore, the Director-General's Report emphasises that we cannot neglect the close link which exists between enjoyment of trade union rights and enjoyment of other freedoms. The gradual development of freedoms and basic rights had occurred, as you know, on two fronts: on the one hand, with the declaration of political rights, and on the other hand, with the reinforcement of social and economic rights. These two categories of rights must be further widened and guaranteed if we wish to leave people with enough freedom and responsibility to develop as they wish.

Nevertheless, although these are rights which cannot run counter to human interests, they are often flouted. At this stage, I wish to congratulate and support the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations for the work it has done. This is one of the most valuable instruments of the International Labour Organisation. It is impossible to imagine that there will ever be greater respect for basic human rights without a permanent exchange of views between States.

Apart from freedom of association, the Director-General's Report draws our attention to other standards which are also affected by world-wide economic difficulties. The Reports also mentions the problem of atypical forms of work which could become degraded forms of employment that workers are forced to accept. There is in fact a risk that society will be split into two divergent groups, namely: those who are fortunate enough to have a job with a permanent contract and social benefits; and those who are confined to precarious employment, offering no guarantee of stability.

These atypical forms of employment can be attractive to certain workers, providing they can make a free choice and are protected by an adequate social status. Furthermore, I am convinced that we can go much further in the field of time-sharing. We can take initiatives designed to encourage part-time work. These formulae have the advantage of offering a more classical kind of social protection.

Moreover, this kind of work meets a real need in our societies. In Belgium, about 10 per cent of the workers are part-time employees. Examples from abroad show that progressively we can reach much higher figures than this. As regards career breaks, I am also convinced that our society should be able to work out less rigid arrangements, more especially for men and women who for any reason may wish to leave the labour market temporarily, or re-enter it once again. I also think that to eliminate inequality of opportunity, we must first of all provide workers and young people with the means to be better trained in order to combat, from the outset, the long-term causes of unemployment. Training is essential to facilitate the access of young people to the world of production, to upgrade the occupational skills of those who have a job and to allow those who have lost their jobs to find another one. Improvements in basic training depend not only upon retraining those at work but also upon adjusting training to the requirements of the labour market. Here, incidentally, is a field in which international co-operation, and first and foremost co-operation in Europe, could be profitable. Contrary to what happens today, we should encourage and facilitate training abroad. At a time when national frontiers are becoming ever less impermeable to economic and technological influences, it would be to give priority to training and occupational retraining as a matter of co-operation amongst our various countries.

However, we cannot ignore the fate of long-term unemployed persons who are victims of the economic crisis; in their case, training is inadequate and we have to create programmes of social integration.

I conclude my statement by reaffirming the need for the International Labour Conference to deal with the problem of human rights.

As stated in the Preamble to the Constitution of the ILO: "Universal and lasting peace can be established only if it is based on social justice."

Mr. HORDIJK (Workers' delegate, Netherlands) – At the outset of my contribution to the Report of the Director-General, I should like to congratulate Mr. Beyreuther and his colleagues on their election to the presidency and vice-presidencies of this Conference.

The Director-General delivered a very important Report on an item which is of the highest importance for the establishment of a just, participatory and sustainable society. Human rights are – it is sad to say – at stake all over the world. There are a lot of troubles and tensions in the field of human rights. In my view it has to do with the fact that human rights as such are no juridical phenomena only; on the contrary. Above all, we have to do here with a social-ethical issue. It has to do with the attitude of human beings, their style of life, their full respect for human dignity, for justice and righteousness. In short, we have to deal with the principal question: How can we do justice to the people?

In practice we see that many people who make a plea for human rights are tempted to follow the strict logic of their own position, namely when it is based on power, pure power. The implementation of human rights means that one should be prepared, however, to refrain from pure power positions. If there is no spread of power, if there is no willingness to establish common responsibility; human rights turn into the reverse.

That is why, in my view, the Declaration of Philadelphia is today as significant as it was at the time when it was adopted after World War Two.

The late Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Wilfred Jenks, one of the founding spiritual fathers of the Declaration, made it very clear that the postulate that lasting peace can be established only if it is based on social justice was elaborated into a grand affirmation of the equality of men in the pursuit of freedom and dignity as the central purpose of national and international policy.

The Declaration of Philadelphia was, and is, a programme of action, a statement of social, economic philosophy. It is an affirmation of the unity of mankind, and Wilfred Jenks rightly pointed out that the ILO is a continuing challenge to dictatorship, to bureaucracy and technocracy.

The ILO is a partnership between the welfare of the community at large, represented by the State, and the vitality of effective forces of management and labour. The Declaration will always be an incentive to such partnership throughout the world, irrespective of a political system, an economic doctrine or any social structure.

Reading the Report of the Director-General on human rights, I was reminded of the approach of Mr. Jenks who played such an important role for many, many years, namely in the field which is under discussion at this Conference again.

It is not without reason that if we are looking at the several categories into which ILO Conventions are divided, the first category deals with fundamental human rights, and to that category belong, among others, the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98). It is a fundamental category, underlining the ILO's activities as they are defined in the Declaration of Philadelphia.

The fundamental human rights laid down in those Conventions must be based on the respect for several liberties as enunciated in the Universal Declaration on Human Rights and in the United Nations Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and in the one on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights. Many countries which are fully fledged Members of the ILO forget, however, that interdependence of human rights and for that reason it is a pity that in the past four years there has been a marked slowing-down in the rate of new ratifications, which is currently equivalent to an average of one ratification per member State of every four years. I know it has to do with the economic difficulties many countries are faced with, and for that reason there is a real threat that many countries, taking into account their own specific difficulties, are no longer prepared to stick to the full implementation and application of both the ILO Conventions and the United Nations Covenants concerned.

That is why the ILO has to play in the near future, as has been the case in the past, a crucial and important role in explaining and defending the fundamental human rights which came into existence in a period of many political and economic tensions and that was the case with almost all the countries which were Members of the ILO at that time.

I should like to ask your attention for a very important issue and that deals with human rights and development.

The Director-General refers in his Report to the fact that in 1968 he pointed out that the human rights debate at that time had to be placed in the context of the harsh realities of daily lives which, for many, are the realities of underdevelopment, of undernourishment. Twenty years later, however, in 1988, we see that there are still always the same problems.

For many people in the Third World there is a serious deterioration in the conditions of work and life, and we should realise that any human rights policy is possible only if we can really reduce the gap between rich and poor.

In many discussions on development we can hear the word "liberation", and that word is, for many people, a more acceptable and actual term for human rights. Liberation means setting men free from whatever it is that enslaves them. Millions of people at this moment are enslaved by other human beings. Many systems all over the world, either military, politically or those systems characterised by religious fundamentalism, hamper an effective human rights policy. Instead of liberating people the rulers concerned are oppressing and they use their power in a negative way only. In such a climate human rights policy can never be developed in a due way, and as long as people are not liberated from those evils, they cannot be free from poverty, they cannot be free from control, from fear, from hostility or anything that enslaves them. Any function of human rights policy should therefore be to provide guidelines for action that will humanise society rather than brutalise persons. In that way, we can promote a process of setting men free.

It will become clear from my remarks that one can never promote and stimulate responsible development co-operation if there is no clear linkage with the human rights policy. In my own country we have an advisory committee on human rights and foreign policy. That committee regularly advises our Minister of Foreign Affairs. In a recent report the committee tried to elaborate ideas on the place of civil and political rights, on the one hand, and of economic, social and cultural rights, on the other hand, and that in relation to clear development co-operation. For that reason the advisory committee took the approach that when assessing human rights situations and taking policy decisions in relation to development co-operation, it is necessary to consider human rights in their entirety.

In other words, we have to do here with a simultaneous translation of civil and political rights and of economic, social and cultural rights as well. The linkage between human rights and development co-operation does not mean, however, that we have to do here with a one-way process whereby, for example, Western donor countries concern themselves with the human rights situation in developing countries while the latter are debarred from criticising violations of human rights in wealthy countries.

The Dutch Advisory Committee believes, however, that it is impossible to separate the process of economic and social development from the extent to which citizens of developing countries are allowed to exercise their civil and political rights. There is no example whatsoever from which it has become clear that successful economic and social development is possible in a repressive society.

As long as one has to do with oppression in a society, people can never be free in the real sense of the word. As long as, for example, there is no freedom of expression or of association, there can never be sustained progress. In that connection, we should not forget the important declaration on the right to development as it was adopted by the General Assembly of the United Nations in 1986.

I have to conclude. The last remark I should like to make is that in my view the ILO is the only valuable organisation where, on the basis of tripartism, we can have in the framework of the other United Nations agencies a due and responsible development co-operation.

We should try to implement those ideas everywhere.

Mr. PERERA (Minister of Labour, Sri Lanka) – I have great pleasure in extending to you, Mr. President, on behalf of the Government of Sri Lanka and on my own behalf, warm felicitations on your unanimous election to the office of President of this 75th Session of International Labour Conference. The honour conferred on you and your country is richly deserved. Allow me to convey my sincere congratulations to the Vice-Presidents and others elected to office.

This is the first International Labour Conference I have had the opportunity of participating in after I assumed office as the Minister of Labour in the Government headed by His Excellency J.R. Jayewardene, the President of Sri Lanka. It is a great privilege, indeed a singular honour and good fortune to me personally, because the event and the occasion coincides with a number of significant anniversaries for my country as well as for the ILO and the United Nations.

This, the 40th anniversary of the national independence of my country, it was on 4 February 1948 that Sri Lanka, then known as Ceylon, ended 443 years of colonial servitude and emerged as an independent sovereign State. This is also the 40th anniversary of Sri Lanka's membership in the ILO. The ILO is the first international organisation in which Sri Lanka, soon after national independence, sought and attained membership. We joined the ILO in June 1948 and from that time onwards we have consistently adhered to the principles and ideals of this Organisation and supported and actively participated in its activities.

The Director-General, in his Report submitted to this session of the Conference, refers to a number of significant anniversaries marked by the year 1988, particularly those relating to human rights. Once again, it is the 40th anniversary of the proclamation of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights by the United Nations and it is also the 40th anniversary of the adoption by the International Labour Organisation of its most important human rights Convention – the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

I wish to congratulate Mr. Blanchard, the Director-General, on choosing human rights as the main subject for his Report to this year's session of the International Labour Conference. The choice could not have been better, both in terms of its contemporary relevance as well as in terms of its signal and integral relationship to social justice, for the promotion of which the ILO itself was founded. I read the Report with great interest and considerable benefit, and I wish to commend it as essential reading and reflection by all those policy-makers and administrators responsible for the destiny of peoples.

An anniversary is an appropriate occasion to look back and take stock of the progress achieved. The Director-General has provided us with a very objective and comprehensive account of the situation as seen from the unique vantage-point available to him, as the chief executive of the premier international organisation devoted to the promotion of social justice. In his assessment of the developments over the past 40 years and the situation as it exists today, he refers to two conflicting tendencies. On the one hand are the many examples in which international human rights standards have had a striking impact on attitudes, policies, laws and conduct. On the other hand are the innumerable other situations in which these same standards are disregarded and where the weak and vulnerable suffer merciless exploitation. In South Africa the odious practice of apartheid continues, though 40 years have passed since the Universal Declaration of Human Rights was adopted. In the occupied Arab territories, Palestinians and other people continue to be deprived of their inalienable rights. The existence of such situations – as the Director-General rightly observes – necessarily raises the question of the credibility and effectiveness of all the efforts that have been made.

Human rights embody long-cherished ideas and ideals of emancipated human beings throughout the ages, and all civilised societies the world over. These ideals found international and formal recognition in the proclamation of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. The principles laid down in the texts proclaim a common standard of achievement for all peoples of all nations. To the extent that these principles are rooted in ideals which would always remain ahead of practical reality, and to the extent that there are economic, social and political disparities among nations, the existence of a gap between proclamation and performance in the field of human rights is no cause for surprise and alarm. What causes serious concern, however, is that this gap is daily growing wider and that double standards have entered the indivisible realm of human rights. Even more deplorable is the tendency to ignore the individuality of human rights, to ignore that rights impose reciprocal obligations.

As I have already mentioned earlier on in my statement, this is the 40th anniversary of Sri Lanka's national independence. Therefore, I consider it my duty to present to this august assembly a brief account of the developments in the field of human rights in Sri Lanka. In this regard, it would be most appropriate to quote the words of our first Prime Minister, the Right Honourable D.S. Senanayake, spoken on the inaugural independence day in 1948, and also a statement very recently made by the President of Sri Lanka, His Excellency J.R. Jayewardene. In his statement on independent Sri Lanka's state policy, the Right Honourable D.S. Senanayake said: "We have learned to value the right of individual liberty, the right to the protection of person and property, to freedom of speech, to the free exercise of religion. We value the privilege of equality before the law, of trial by one's peers, of equal opportunity to fulfil one's personality." These words spoken on 4 February 1948 – that is, as you would note, even ten months earlier than the proclamation of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights – mark the beginning of Sri Lanka's record in promoting and protecting human rights.

As for the Sri Lanka Government's endeavours at present, I quote the following statement of His Excellency J.R. Jayewardene, the President of Sri Lanka: "Human rights are deeply respected by the people of Sri Lanka. They have consistently sought – through the Government and through government-supported institutions – to promote and protect these rights. As a Government, we have introduced many safeguards, including solemn constitutional safeguards, which not only entrench human rights but also prevent their abuse. Democracy is the strongest guarantee of fundamental rights, and Sri Lanka has an assured place among developing countries which have preserved and protected democracy. We will continue to preserve democracy in our land, in the highest and purest form."

During the past four decades we have brought our domestic law and practice into conformity with the provisions of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and subsequent Covenants. Human rights and related freedoms are entrenched in our Constitution. They have been made justifiable. The Government has set up the Sri Lanka Foundation with the primary responsibility of promoting and protecting human rights.

Sri Lanka is a developing country with a multi-ethnic, multi-religious and multi-lingual society. In such a society, conflicts of interests are inevitable. As the most appropriate means to minimise and resolve such conflicts, we have strictly adhered to the principles of democracy and the protection of fundamental rights of each and every citizen. In these endeavours, we have achieved a degree of success we can legitimately take pride in. Admittedly, there have been ups and downs over the years, imperfections and blemishes, as would be reasonable to expect in the circumstances we have found ourselves in. Even so, the sincerity and genuineness of our endeavours to promote and protect human rights at all times, under all circumstances, have been consistent.

Part II of the Director-General's Report gives an account of the activities of the ILO in 1987. I am pleased to note that satisfactory progress has been achieved in many fields despite the continuing resource constraints. I wish to thank the Director-General and his staff for achieving such progress. I am particularly pleased to note that there has been a 5.6 per cent increase in the value of expenditure for technical co-operation, which is the field of activity of great importance to developing countries like my own.

The programme of activities proposed in the Medium-Term Plan, 1990-95, are well-conceived and will receive Sri Lanka's wholehearted support in implementation. However, in this context, I wish to draw the attention of the Director-General to the resolution passed at last year's session of the Conference concerning the International Year of Shelter for the Homeless and the role of the ILO. It will be recalled that this resolution, initiated by the Sri Lankan delegation to that session of the Conference, was voted to number one place by the Resolutions Committee. Its operative paragraphs call for special attention to be paid in the ILO's programme of activities to research, dissemination of information, meetings, technical co-operation and advisory services, especially when preparing the Medium-Term Plan for 1990-95, as a means of contributing to the objectives of the International Year of Shelter for the Homeless. I am pleased to note that these proposals are included in the Medium-Term Plan. This is of particular importance to Sri Lanka, as it will be recalled that the International Year for the Homeless was declared by the United Nations on the initiative of the Honourable R. Premadasa, Prime Minister of Sri Lanka.

It is my delegation's expectation that the programme envisaged in this and all other fields in the Medium-Term Plan will be very successfully implemented. Towards that objective, Sri Lanka will extend wholehearted co-operation to the Director-General.

(Mr. Aitken takes the Chair.)

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. MENESES FONSECA (Minister of Labour, Nicaragua) - We should like first of all to congratulate the President on his election to the presidency of the Conference. We are convinced that under his leadership our work will unquestionably yield the best fruits.

On the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the main theme of our discussions at this session of the Conference could only be human rights. The Report of the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Francis Blanchard, unquestionably makes a valuable contribution to the analysis of the difficult conditions now confronting humanity.

The very serious problems of unemployment and poverty, the limitations of social security coverage and the lack of basic services for the enormous majority of the Third World population are the major obstacles to a genuine guarantee of human rights in the economic and social fields.

Whole peoples and nations continue to suffer from various kinds of discrimination on grounds which include race and political beliefs. Dramatic examples of this are to be found in the suffering and struggle of the people of Namibia and South Africa under the abusive regime of apartheid which, in the last decades of the twentieth century, is one of the greatest affronts to mankind.

In the same way, the people of Palestine are subjected to Zionist aggression in their own land, and to a systematic violation of their human rights by the Israeli occupation. They withstand these attacks heroically, and have awakened the admiration and solidarity of the international community and the specialised agencies of the United Nations.

The efforts of the United Nations to safeguard basic human rights deserve our highest respect and recognition. There have unquestionably been certain achievements and progress towards a universal awareness of the importance of the full guarantee of human rights.

The work of the ILO is very important, especially its international standards on basic social and economic rights. International Conventions on freedom of association, the right to productive full employment, social security, and other subjects have truly been banners around which million of workers have rallied.

But as the Report of the Director-General points out, while the standard-setting work of the ILO has unquestionably encouraged the struggle for economic and social rights, their full effect has been hindered by social injustice and inequitable economic relations.

We have only to look at the very serious problem of unemployment to get a better view of this reality. Unemployment in the Third World affects some 70 million persons; more than 500 million are underemployed and 900 million live in extreme poverty. This outlook, which is frightening and terrifying in itself, is growing even gloomier as a result of the economic inequality that can be traced to the technological gap which separates our nations from the developed countries and has serious repercussions on productivity. The moral authority which the ILO has earned over the years should be used persistently and tirelessly to convince the industrialised countries that it is impossible to maintain an economic system when the progress and well-being of a very few stand in such contrast to the misery and backwardness of most countries.

The great poles of industrial development have the responsibility of sharing with the rest of mankind the advances of science and technology; these should not be considered a monopoly, but the heritage of the whole human race.

In these conditions, we must accept the premise which the Director-General lays down in his Report, that the full achievement of human rights in the economic and social fields, including the right to work, can only be obtained through economic solidarity and fairness among nations, as a remedy to the existence of an international economic and political order which is totally unjust.

We must conclude, therefore, that the safeguarding of economic and social rights of the great majorities, in the context of the present economic crisis, must become the top priority of all peoples and governments.

In Nicaragua the triumph of the Sandinista Revolution was the culmination of a struggle to secure the full exercise of human rights which had been denied by Somoza's military dictatorship for 40 years.

The revolutionary government has restored to the whole population in Nicaragua the exercise of their basic rights. Freedom of association in our country has led to the creation of more than 1,500 trade unions, affiliated to eight different trade union confederations. There has been a true explosion in collective agreements: more than 1,400 were signed in the eight years of the revolutionary period.

The first great undertaking of the revolution was a literacy campaign which brought more than 40 per cent of the population of the country out of illiteracy. Basic health services and social security have been extended to the rural regions of the country, to the benefit of large and historically marginal sectors of the population.

The agrarian reform has redistributed more than 1,500,000 hectares of land and more than 3,000 agricultural co-operatives have been set up. These measures have benefited 100,000 rural families which now own land individually or collectively.

As regards housing, the Revolutionary Government has built 51,122 housing units for a like number of families during the eight years since it came to power, thus tripling the number of housing units built in 40 years under the dictatorship.

In an unprecedented gesture in Nicaraguan history, the Government adopted a Regional Autonomy Statute for the Atlantic coast, implying the full recognition of the rights of the indigenous populations of that zone as regards the use of their forms of social organisation and the preservation of their culture. One of the technical advisers to Nicaragua's government delegation to this Conference is a leader of the Mizquitas communities of Nicaragua; she is taking part in the discussions on the revision of Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107), whose integrationist approach must be rejected and replaced.

As concerns respect for individual guarantees and civil rights, above and beyond the procedural limitations and restrictions which are inevitable in defending the sovereignty of the country, the state of emergency has not prevented the population of Nicaragua from exercising its basic rights in accordance with the international responsibilities arising from Nicaragua's adherence to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights.

In spite of the bloodshed in the political and economic aggression of which Nicaragua is a victim, our citizens fully exercised their right to elect the government of their choice in November 1984.

The political life of the country reflects the problems and natural adjustments inherent in the construction of a new society. Fourteen opposition political parties and eight trade union confederations of different ideological tendencies take part, in accordance with the law, in political, economic and social decisions which affect the future of the country.

In the sensitive field of respect for personal freedom, the international organisation "American Watch" stated in its report of February 1987: "In Nicaragua the Government does not hold prisoners indefinitely without trial. Sooner or later, all those arrested are indicted for an offence against the law or set free."

This situation is guaranteed by law. Article 46 of the political Constitution promulgated in January 1987 reproduces the American Convention on Human Rights and declares categorically that basic legal guarantees for the protection of such rights cannot be suspended.

Even in the state of national emergency, these rights have never been restricted. The legal provisions guaranteeing the right to life and physical integrity, and prohibiting torture and cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment, have been fully respected.

For these reasons, we can state with absolute moral authority before the international community and the world that in Nicaragua the Sandinista revolution has rescued human dignity and reinstated the fundamental conquests of human rights.

We must, however, point out that these efforts to guarantee the practical exercise of economic and social rights have come up against obstacles as a result of the aggression of which we have been victims. The economic blockade, the attacks on production units, the destruction of health centres and various basic service establishments, and the general undermining of the economy have thwarted the enjoyment of the right to employment and better conditions of life and work. For this we can thank the Government of the United States.

In spite of these circumstances, the humanistic inspiration of the Nicaraguan revolution has been faithful to the principle of political dialogue as a way of tackling internal problems or conflict between countries. The Government has therefore undertaken a broad range of efforts aiming at solving the regional conflict by means of concertation.

The revolutionary Government has gone far beyond what was expected by the international community as regards respect for the Esquipulas agreements, the foundations of which were laid by the praiseworthy efforts of the Contadora group. There is now a rather complex but enduring dialogue aimed at reaching a permanent ceasefire.

In spite of the cost to my country of the counter-revolutionary action and the systematic violation of the human rights of our civilian population by mercenary forces, which has been denounced by various international organisations, Nicaragua's commitment to peace and the generosity of the revolution have given many members of the "contras" the opportunity of being reintegrated in civilian life and the possibility of changing their ways. Through December 1987, amnesty had been extended to 4,159 veterans of the mercenary army, and 985 pardons were granted as part of Nicaragua's efforts to bring lasting peace to Central America.

However, the most belligerent faction of the counter-revolution, encouraged by those who were financing the aggression, is absolutely determined to thwart all peace initiatives; it has made it impossible in the most recent sessions of negotiation to reach agreement on the basic conditions for a permanent ceasefire. All of this is a consequence of the obstacles set in our path by the militaristic will of the Power which chooses to attack us, just as it is now attacking the people of Panama who are fighting so heroically to defend their right to self-determination.

The Government of Nicaragua would like to repeat on this occasion its determination to continue its efforts to find a political solution to the conflict, without compromising its sovereignty and independence. We undertake this as our responsibility towards our own people and towards the international community. We are prepared to carry out our obligations in spite of the intransigence and arbitrary action of the present North American administration.

Mr. VANRUSSEL (Minister of Labour, Suriname) – May I first of all, congratulate the President on his election to the presidency of the 75th Session of the ILO Conference. We are convinced that under his guidance this session will progress successfully.

In his Report to the Conference, the Director-General has chosen a topic that we believe is of major concern to the world today and to my country, Suriname, in particular I refer to the Report entitled Human rights – A common responsibility.

We wholly agree with the statement made in the Preface to this Report, namely that although civil and political rights are entirely a national responsibility, no attempt to ensure respect for these rights can be fully successful unless it is backed by development.

In his Report, the Director-General gives a review of the Organisation's work from a human rights perspective and it may be emphasised indeed that all ILO activities are in one way or another based on the concept of human rights.

In this respect, may I inform you that the Government of Suriname has expressly laid down in the government policy for 1988-93 that the fundamental rights and freedoms of men, as contained in the different international human rights treaties to which Suriname is a party, will be propagated and protected by the Government, whilst due care will be taken that these rights will be observed.

You will no doubt have learned that the Constitution of the Republic of Suriname was approved by the people in a referendum held on 30 September 1987. This was followed by general, free and secret elections on 25 November of the same year, which resulted in the formation of a democratically chosen Government.

With regard to this, I wish to underline that my Government takes the position that a democratically ordered society provides the best conditions for the enjoyment of the rights and freedoms of man, for the optimal functioning of institutions such as trade unions and business life, and for the best possible development of individuals. The people of Suriname have furthermore learned through hard experience that the existence of peace is a precondition for democratic development and for the enjoyment of the fundamental rights and freedoms.

This Government attaches great value to the fundamental right of man to work. The Constitution of the Republic of Suriname states, among other things, that labour is the most important means for man to develop himself and a substantial source of prosperity.

Our Constitution goes even further and devotes attention to the right to work in a number of articles. I would like to mention Article 26 which rules, inter alia, that "everyone has the right to work in accordance with one's capacities", and Article 27 which provides that it is the obligation of the States to guarantee the right to work, in so far as this is possible, among other things by prohibiting dismissal without sound reasons or on political or ideological grounds.

From the preceding it may be concluded that our Constitution assumes that development is impossible without labour – neither the development of man nor of society. The people have been charged with the special responsibility of giving substance to what has been laid down in the Constitution. Hence, in the preparation, drafting and development of plans of national interest, my Government follows the principle of dialogue, consensus, co-operation and participation.

The Government is aware of the precarious financial and economic situation in which Suriname has been for some years. The present crisis has had far-reaching negative consequences for employment. It has forced us to promote the accelerated development of sectors of the economy other than the bauxite sector, which is the principal foreign exchange generating sector. This will have to take place in close co-operation with the social partners, that is to say, with the employers' and workers' organisations.

As regards the co-operation of the social partners in my country, I am pleased to say that, in view of our critical socio-economic situation and the willingness of everyone to bring about a change, there is an ever-increasing trend to work together on the basis of tripartite discussions.

The Government commits itself to undertake a concrete and well-defined employment policy in order to counteract the consequences of our country's critical economic situation, but our efforts to improve the employment situation are closely linked to the extent to which we will be successful in applying strategies that will result in increased national production.

My Government realises that, if the goal of an improved employment situation is to be achieved, other human rights, as indicated in the Report of the Director-General, should not be neglected, since full employment means fair remuneration, just and favourable working conditions, equal opportunities and treatment, and the right to social security, while freedom of association must be guaranteed as well. The International Labour Organisation has always been the forum "par excellence" for discussing improvements and/or adaptations in the setting of standards with regard to the aforementioned. We would like to compliment the Director-General and the staff of the ILO for the excellent work done in this field.

May I conclude this statement on behalf of the Surinamese delegation by saying that, although my Government is well aware that, as a young developing nation, we may not be able to meet fully all the standards set by the ILO at the present time, this will not keep us from reconfirming our firm belief in and commitment to the ideals laid down in the Constitution of the ILO, the Declaration of Philadelphia and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

We remain convinced that, with the valuable assistance of the ILO and through bilateral co-operation with member countries, the Republic of Suriname will also contribute to achieving the ultimate goal of human rights for all mankind.

Mr. MASHASI (Workers' delegate, United Republic of Tanzania) – Speaking for the first time on this rostrum, I wish on behalf of the Union of Tanzanian Workers to extend to the President congratulations on his election to chair this 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. Permit me also to congratulate the Vice-Presidents, with whom I believe he will steer this session to success.

It gives me a great deal of pleasure to extend my congratulations to the Director-General for the good report of activities he has presented to this Session. The Report which gives this session of the Conference a theme of Human rights - A common responsibility is well researched and illustrative. Human rights, which includes trade union rights, must remain the concern of the International Labour Organisation, for there can be no social progress and social justice without human rights. There can be enormous economic growth resulting from a slavery sort of system, that cannot be acceptable, at least not in the twentieth century.

Human rights have been flouted in many parts of the world. In some instances it happens inadvertently and in some others deliberately, either because the persons in authority consider that to be the best way to maintain monopoly of power or because of incompetence in managing the affairs of their societies. They locate their opponents and take them as scapegoats for their failures. Those States which violate human rights inadvertently find it not difficult to rectify the situation when they are exposed. But those States which violate human rights consciously cling on to their policies even when it is obvious to the entire world that the policies are in contravention of the internationally acceptable standards.

South Africa is a case in point. This session of the Conference, through its Committee on Apartheid, will have heard of the atrocities committed by the South African regime against the non-Whites in South Africa. The Black people who seek to have equal rights in their land are persecuted. Women, children and helpless trade unionists are dying in the struggle for their inalienable right for social justice. It is gratifying that this session of the International Labour Conference will consider updating its Declaration and its action programme as a means to contribute to the struggle against apartheid in South Africa.

My delegation further commends the International Labour Office for its continued efforts in the field of training programmes which now account for one-third of its activities as reported for the year 1987. The training and retraining process should bear a positive approach, especially in the field of transfer of technology from the industrialised countries to the developing countries.

In Africa the objective of developing the agricultural sector was envisaged to include the processing of its products at either semi-finished or finished level ready for export to the industrialised countries. This could have been logical in products such as coffee, cotton, cocoa, sisal, etc.; all these are produced abundantly in developing countries. What we are witnessing today, and this is in my opinion, is the major constraint in economic and social development of our countries. It is that prices of industrial inputs from the developed countries are steadily hiking when prices of exportable primary products of the developing countries, other than energy products, are not proportionally increasing.

Jamal and Weeks testify in their article published in the International Labour Review, Vol. 127, 1988, No. 3, that in my country, for example, in 1980, the volume of imports was the same as in 1973, but the cost in current prices was three times greater.

The consequence of such a situation is that productivity in the agricultural sector must fall, as the sector is not motivated. To a remarkable extent, in my view, this accounts for what has been observed in the Report that, in sub-Saharan Africa, technological change was too slow and narrowly focused to have made any appreciable difference. However, training remains a factor of great importance for the improvement of productivity in our economies.

Some observers have been tempted to overstress the contribution of state policies in explaining the cause of the economic difficulties of the developing countries, especially where the policies have emphasised the social factor. While we are not contending that policies in some instances have contributed to slowing technological change or even hamper economic growth, we have not had evidence to show that this could have been the major cause of slackening technological change.

African States have as varied economic policies as their natural resources and endowment. Policies should, however, be guarded to balance the social values and a need for technological change and development.

It is now evident that sub-Saharan Africa has been deprived of its full capacity to attract and absorb foreign technology, especially for rural development. We need to re-examine the development strategies. Training for rural development must be devised locally to reflect the needs, aspirations and values of the rural population rather than taking to the rural areas an urban-designed stereotype of a training programme to superimpose it on the rural system.

The rural small farmers can easily grasp and assimilate knowledge which uses illustrations emanating from their own environment. This point is clearly reflected in the Report of the Director-General on rural employment promotion. It follows, therefore, that in its technological assistance arrangements, the International Labour Office should review the practice of sending foreign experts with externally designed materials for rural training programmes. The ILO should put more emphasis on utilisation of its regional programmes like the African Centre for the Development of Vocational Training and to ensure that their technical advisory service are oriented to developing meaningful rural training programmes.

At this juncture permit me to express once again on behalf of the Union of Tanzanian Workers and on my own behalf our appreciation of the aid by the ILO to my country in the form of public works programmes. I should only request that evaluation of the programmes should at some stage involve tripartism so as not only to reflect the presence of the symbol and spirit of ILO but also to get the economic and social partners conscious of the aid so that they may get involved in ensuring that the programmes have the requisite impact as a stimulus for economic and social development.

It will be unfair on my part if I do not mention the aid that has been provided to my union by the International Labour Office for workers' education programmes. Such programmes are of great importance to unions and workers of developing countries. It is obvious that ILO could do more to aid the developing countries but, as the Medium-Term Plan shows, it is constrained by inadequacy of resources.

I take this opportunity to appeal to the member States in general and to those of the industrialised world in particular to exert some more efforts in fulfilment of their obligation in respect of funding the ILO for the success of its activities.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. ARTHUR ER-RAZURIZ (Government's delegate, Chile) – In taking the floor I should like to extend my congratulations to the President on his election, and to express the hope that our discussions will lead to a satisfactory exchange of ideas and experiences that will effectively contribute to the improvement of the conditions of the workers in the countries represented at this Conference.

It is precisely in this tripartite forum that the best conditions exist for making a thorough analysis of the life of the workers. Our work should focus on strengthening the mechanisms for understanding and co-operation among the different sectors, and thus enhancing the contribution of this Conference to man's welfare and to peace.

On this occasion particular importance is given to the subject of human rights which, as the Director-General so rightly says in his annual Report, while they are not specifically mentioned as such in the Constitution of the ILO, underlie all the principles, objectives and permanent activities of the Organisation.

In this context we must bear in mind that respect for and protection of human rights requires us to give priority to the creation of objective conditions that will make it possible to raise the standards of living of the most underprivileged sectors of the working population.

Consequently, the inescapable duty facing the governments to promote the economic development of our respective countries, as the only way to guarantee our peoples a life in greater dignity, cannot be regarded as an aspect unrelated to the subject of human rights.

My country's aspiration is to consolidate a wholly free and genuinely equitable society, and has therefore undertaken a far-reaching reform of the political, economic and social structures.

The efforts of the Government to overcome the manifold social and political problems that have arisen – in which there has been a certain lack of understanding and intolerance for the realities of the situation in Chile, has given rise to a process of democratic renovation which will shortly lead to the adoption of highly important political decisions which are the responsibility of the people of Chile alone.

In the political area, we have laid the foundations of a democratic system that does not merely pay lip service to the outward aspects of this but guarantees true freedom to every individual. In economic matters we have promoted a system based on the fullest possible freedom which has led to greater efficiency in economic activity, soaring exports, and in general, to the increased well-being of the population.

We have simultaneously made enormous efforts to extend the right to own property to all our people, because we believe that the exercise of this right is one of the highest expressions of individual liberty.

Through original mechanisms devised by the authorities, thousands of workers have become shareholders in, and now own a large part of, the undertakings in which they work. In many cases, this had made it possible for them to sit on the boards of directors.

Genuine participation of this kind has led to greater integration and a real awareness of the interlinkage of capital and labour.

Thus, workers have acquired a stake in the most important enterprises in the iron and steel industry, nitrates, electric energy, telephones and so on. This has brought with it an improvement in their conditions of work and has enabled an open economic system to be established which we regard as a sine qua non for the existence of a free society.

In this way, Chile is the vanguard of an international trend which aims at creating conditions for the genuine participation of the workers in decision-making and the distribution of profits in economic units.

As regards social aspects, our whole effort has been directed towards combating extreme poverty while promoting economic development. We have set up a vast social network to help the most underprivileged sectors, covering housing, child nutrition, education and social security.

For example, according to the data available in the statistical yearbook of ECLAC for 1987, our country has the lowest child mortality rate in Latin America and the Caribbean. Between 1970 and 1975, for every 1,000 live births 70 children died within the first year. Today there are only 18 who do not survive this period.

The concern of the Government to eradicate extreme poverty is achieving appreciable results. In 1970, 21 per cent of the population were in this situation; today there are only 14.2 per cent.

The same ECLAC report indicates that the rate of illiteracy in Chile decreased by 11 per cent in 1970 and was only 5.6 per cent in 1985.

Finally, with respect to employment, just to give you an idea of our concrete achievements, we would point out that in December 1987, unemployment amounted to 8.4 per cent. This is much lower than the figures prevailing during the period of economic crisis, and is fully consistent with the past statistics of our country.

Our concern for the poorest of our people has led us to carry out a plan specifically aimed at the rural sector.

In compliance with the ILO's Recommendations, my Government has put into effect a national rural development plan so that rural workers areas have absolute equality of opportunities to enjoy the benefits of development:

The promotion of employment in agriculture, the introduction of improved technologies, public investment in irrigation, access to credits for small and medium-scale farmers, rural housing subsidies – all these are policies which promote rural development and consequently raise the standard of living of people in an important sector of our population.

My Government is aware of the fact that the best way to ensure the definitive elimination of poverty is to create more wealth, and to do this, the most effective course has proved to be to stimulate free enterprise.

Statism at the national level and protectionism at the international level discourage private activity, inhibit the creative freedom of the individual, and promote a climate of social distrust which leads to a serious deterioration in the private sector.

The Government has been doing everything it can to invert this system.

Our firm and resolute commitment to the cause of freedom and development has gained the support of both workers and employers, and has led to a radical change in the role of private enterprise in the national economic structure, transforming it into the major source of wealth and activity in the country.

This new economic order has had a positive structural impact that has been internationally recognised. Thus, this year, we hope to reach the highest rate of growth recorded in the history of the country.

Our policy based on private initiative and opening up to external markets has meant that Chile, in addition to being the first copper producer in the world, is the second world producer of molybdenum, the second producer of iodine, the leading producer of lithium carbonate, of nitrates and of fishmeal, is one of the ten major producers of gold in the world, and, agriculturally, is one of foremost fruit exporters in the southern hemisphere.

Employers in Chile today, run risks in full awareness of their social responsibility, being convinced that justice and respect for the workers' rights are the key to prosperity.

This system has yielded real benefits and thus, through sustained economic development, we shall also achieve the social stability that is so essential for the solid democratic edifice we are building.

My Government believes it is indispensable for the functions and activities of the Organisation in the world of labour that a renewed search should be made for types of research, analysis and co-operation that will help to promote a constructive tripartite dialogue that will guarantee the necessary protection for the fundamental and universally recognised rights of human beings.

Human dignity, development and peace are inextricably linked.

Before concluding, may I say that the Government of Chile wishes, once again, to renew its commitment and to reaffirm its confidence that the ILO will continue to promote international co-operation and social understanding in the search for more just and humane labour relations within a framework of freedom and democracy.

Mr. BARAK (Government delegate, Israel) – May I join all the other speakers who preceded me in congratulating Mr. Beyreuther on his election as president of this session of the International Labour Conference. I am certain that under his able guidance the Conference will successfully accomplish its difficult and complex tasks.

In his comprehensive Report on the question of human rights, the Director-General rightly defined the expression "human rights" as covering almost every aspect and branch of the ILO's field of action, namely freedom of association, equality of opportunity and treatment, the promotion of full, productive and freely chosen employment, equal remuneration and conditions of work, social security and minimum labour standards.

Furthermore, in describing, analysing and evaluating the activities of the ILO in relation to human rights, the Director-General not only presented us with a document which is a comprehensive and penetrating account of all the facets of the ILO, but also provided us with some ideas as to the route the ILO should take in the future.

As regards some of the topics mentioned in the Director-General's Report, we in Israel have recently taken measures which are basically along the same lines as those embodied in the Report.

In the field of minimum labour standards, we adopted last year a Minimum Wage Law, under which every worker in Israel is entitled to a minimum wage fixed by law at a rate equivalent to 45 per cent of the monthly average wage prevailing in Israel. Moreover, the minimum wage is also linked to the cost-of-living index. This right is enforceable by the labour courts and applies of course as do all other labour laws in Israel, to all workers who work in Israel whether citizens or residents, permanent or temporary workers, without any distinction whatsoever. Needless to say the law applies also to workers coming from the territories administered by Israel.

Even before the enactment of the Minimum Wage Law, minimum wages were paid under a nation-wide collective agreement between the Histadrut and the employers' organisations, and this applied – as do all collective agreements in Israel – to all workers employed in Israel without any distinction whatsoever, including workers from the administered territories.

Another aspect of human rights touched on by the Director-General is equality of treatment between men and women in employment. It is a universally recognised fact based on research and experience that the average wages earned by women workers are somewhat less than those earned by men workers. This is probably true not only in Israel but in many other countries. The reason for this is, in most cases, not intentional discrimination, that is, actually paying women workers less for the same or similar work, but a tendency to give less senior jobs to women owing to misunderstanding and prejudices concerning the role of women workers in productive employment.

It is, of course, rather difficult to solve this problem (which is basically socio-psychological) by legislation but still in Israel we tried to do so just a few months ago. Our equal opportunity legislation covers all aspects of the problem: employment opportunity, wages and fringe benefits, conditions of work, advancement, redundancy and dismissal compensation.

Another interesting feature contained in this law is the protection of workers against reprisals by the employer in cases of complaint. The protection covers not only the complainant but also other workers who help in submitting the complaint or who testify in support of it. We find this last provision particularly important, since it enables trade unions and members of workers' councils to provide ample assistance to fellow workers in gaining the full benefits of the law, which applies of course to all the workers in Israel, notwithstanding their domicile, occupation, and status at work.

It applies of course to workers from the territories administered by Israel, especially since many of them are members of workers' councils, thus enabling them to benefit fully from the protection afforded by the law.

As regards rural employment promotion, another topic mentioned by the Director-General in his Report, I would like to mention another recently enacted law which deals with membership rights in co-operative societies constituting the legal framework of co-operative villages. As you may well know, most of the agricultural settlements in Israel are organised in the co-operative movement. In some co-operative villages, based on privately-owned family farms, a problem arose concerning the acceptance of spouses, usually women, as members of the co-operative society established for the purpose of marketing, the supply of basic agricultural materials, and the provision of local municipal services. It was argued that each farming unit should be represented in the co-operative society by only one member of the family in order not to disrupt the balance between the farming units.

The Government, however, did not take this view since it upholds the broad concept of equality of opportunity to participate in the decisions taken by the co-operative society which may well influence the well-being of all the people living in the co-operative villages. Thus the law which was recently enacted, following a Bill on these lines introduced by the Government, provides for equal membership rights for both spouses living and working in such villages.

In the field of employment opportunity, the Government has introduced to the Knesset, our Parliament, a Bill permitting the operation of fee-charging private employment agencies, and at the same time strengthening the role of the public, state-managed employment service. Until now, the establishment of private fee-charging employment agencies was not permitted in Israel, but we have learned from experience that in our modern, fast-changing society there might be a place beside the state employment service for private employment agencies, subject of course to strict supervision and licensing as provided in part 3 of Convention No. 96 which Israel has ratified.

A somewhat unique feature contained in the Bill, which is at present being discussed in the appropriate Parliamentary Committee, is the total prohibition imposed on private employment agencies, against the direct or indirect collection of fees, or expenses, from the workers who applied for or received any kind of assistance from it. That means that the employment agency may recover fees only from the employer who, again, is prohibited from being reimbursed by the workers in any way, whether directly or indirectly.

The result is that under this system workers will be able to enjoy more facilities for job placement, while being protected by law from exploitation by unscrupulous employment agencies. I sincerely hope that these texts which we intend to send to the ILO will be studied and published by it, thus making our modest contribution to the field of international labour standards worth while.

During this debate, some delegates, mainly from Arab countries, have attacked my country with baseless accusations and allegations concerning the situation of the Arab workers from Judea, Samaria and the Gaza District. They have also presented a misleading interpretation of the report of the ILO officials sent by the Director-General to examine the situation of these workers. They ignore the fact that these reports over the years have recognised the fact that the policy of the Government of Israel towards these workers has always been one of equality of treatment in occupation and employment and that these workers enjoy free choice of employment through official labour exchanges. They ignore the fact that since 1968 more than 70,500 young people from these territories have learned trades through vocational training courses and other programmes sponsored by the Government of Israel. They ignore the high rate of growth in the standard of living in these areas, which is especially remarkable in view of the low starting base of 1967. They ignore the fact that the opening of Israeli markets and labour to residents of these areas has served to enlarge the markets for local products and to expand their income and purchasing power. They ignore the fact that there is virtually no unemployment in these territories, as compared with the very high level and socially dangerous rate of unemployment that prevailed in these areas prior to Israeli administration. In saying all this, I am not suggesting that difficulties do not exist. There are difficulties, especially concerning clandestine or irregular employment, in other words employment not obtained through proper official channels. The report agrees that this is a common phenomenon, almost inseparable from migratory movements of manpower.

We have been making efforts to combat this phenomenon. Our supervisory machinery had been strengthened, heavy penalties are being imposed on employers hiring irregular workers and leaflets have been distributed explaining the dangers associated with clandestine employment and the benefits of regular, legally-recognised employment, and we shall continue in our efforts to overcome this problem.

Some Arab speakers have blamed us for the consequences of the present disturbances in these areas. My Government has emphasised many times that, unlike the Palestinian subversive elements, we shall not make use of the employment of workers from the administered territories as a political weapon. We consider the right to work as a basic human right, undeniable even during the recent violent disruptions. This attitude is in complete contradiction to the abuse of Arab labour by Palestinian elements who incite these violent disturbances. This was and is still done by means of terror, threats and physical violence against these workers and against those who provide them with transport to their work in Israel. These facts were confirmed by the Director-General's Report (paragraph 33).

Despite all the tension in our area, and the accusations and insidious remarks made by Arab speakers, we shall continue to respect the right to work of every worker, Jewish and Arab alike, without discrimination, as a basic human right for which our Organisation stands.

The ILO's contribution to the development of labour standards through the promotion and implementation of its Conventions, and in other ways, has been one of the major achievements in the development of the international law of human rights. Let us hope that the ILO will be permitted to continue on this constructive path and not be diverted, by politically motivated delegates who have the welfare neither of the ILO nor of workers at heart, into blind alleys which can achieve nothing except to diminish the effectiveness of the Organisation.

Interpretation from French: Mr. PEIRENS (Workers' delegate, Belgium) – We congratulate the Director-General on his excellent Report entitled Human rights – A common responsibility and the choice of this question for our general discussion at this Conference.

Respect for human rights, including trade union rights, is an essential condition if we wish to build a society of solidarity, humanity and efficiency.

The world of labour, and the workers, are today confronted with changes which are real challenges. We are dealing, as the Director-General says in his Report, with more modest growth rates affecting the volume of the employment available, shifts in the nature of the employment and the development of various forms of atypical and precarious employment.

We are also witnessing: the abolition of rules and regulations; flexibility, less rigidity in working hours, often for purely economic reasons, with adverse effects on the worker's life outside the undertaking, and especially on his health; we also observe an increase in part-time and temporary work with conditions of work devised purely with an eye to greater productivity; and above all, we hear it said ever more frequently, "Let's not waste any further time on bargaining with the workers and their organisations."

The common factor in all these changes is that they have adverse effects on certain basic rights of the workers.

This is true of the right to employment.

Article 6, paragraph 1, of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, proclaims that the right to employment includes the right of everyone to the opportunity to gain a living by work which he freely chooses or accepts.

For many people – young and not so young – this text is purely academic.

We also observe a regression as regards conditions of work. This is true in regard to security of employment, pay, protection against the risks to occupational health and safety, the loss of the workers' freedom to choose their hours of work, the abolition of limits on maximum daily hours of work and the concept of the normal working day and working week.

The clearest example is the way in which ideas about night work have evolved. During these last few years, the ILO has received an increasing number of denunciations of Convention No. 89 dealing with this matter. This shows that there is now a challenge to the social welfare action with the advantage being given to economic progress and competitiveness. We cannot accept such trends. It seems to us dangerous to use differences in social treatment and conditions of work as a means of making an undertaking more competitive.

Furthermore, equality is increasingly being invoked as a pretext to adjust wages to the lowest common denominator.

We have said that there is regression in conditions of work and we also say that a step back has been taken in the field of trade union freedoms.

It is not easy for a worker to express himself and to associate freely with others when he has been looking for employment too long.

It is not at all easy to join forces with others if today someone works here, tomorrow somewhere else, and the day after tomorrow somewhere else again.

It is not easy to air one's views in freedom if the employer's first reaction, even to a simple inquiry, is to threaten dismissal or replacement.

It is not easy to talk openly and on an equal footing with an employer if the employer, being the stronger party, reacts by questioning not only action to protect the workers' delegates, but also the laws and collective agreements concerning the activities of trade union representatives.

Many employers claim that trade union action is an obstacle to efficiency in the undertaking. Such a conception is actually the very opposite of the constructive part which the workers and their organisations play.

In periods where there has been a high rate of growth, people were more open to and ready to view change as greater opportunity for progress for everybody. Today, this is no longer evident. There is the danger referred to in the Director-General's Report of a fragmentation of society, and a drift towards a system of occupational castes.

Urgent and effective action is called for. That is why my organisation would like to call on the ILO to give more thought to these changes in employment and to precarious kinds of employment.

Such studies could pave the way for a "joint assumption of responsibility" by the industrial committees and during sessions of the International Labour Conference, in drawing up Conventions and Recommendations.

The adverse affects – sometimes cruelly harmful effects – of unemployment and the introduction of these new forms of labour; the priority given to improvements in competitiveness and to profit at the expense of social progress, all this is felt even harder in the Third World countries.

The indebtedness and its consequences are such that these countries are unable to consider ways and means of achieving any significant progress towards full employment and better conditions of work.

In his Report, the Director-General describes very well the interdependence of human rights and the outward sign of this interdependence not only within each country but also at the international level.

Indeed, we have to shoulder a common responsibility; we must build a world in which there is greater solidarity and confound the idea that the pursuit by the individual of his own interests is a mainspring of progress.

It is for this reason that my organisation, with other affiliated organisations of the WCL, have submitted to this Conference a resolution concerning solidarity and co-operation between the affluent countries and countries of the Third World and the role of the ILO in social and economic development.

The Declaration of Philadelphia clearly states that all human beings have the right to pursue their own development in freedom and dignity and that poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere. It also affirms that measures should be taken to promote the economic and social advancement of the less developed regions of the world.

Unfortunately, the normal, just and authentic development of the Third World countries is prevented by a fall in the value of raw materials, the deterioration in the terms of exchange, the rise of protectionism and the constraints and measures inherent in the foreign debt and servicing of the debt.

The world economic system is such that the developing countries do not have the same opportunities of growth and progress as the industrialised nations upon which they are dependent.

Hence we have to bring into being a new international and economic order thanks to the solidarity and co-operation of the community of nations in order to establish just relations between countries both rich and poor and to ensure the development of all countries.

Last September, the Fourth European Regional Conference approved a resolution concerning the need to promote co-operation between Europe and the developing countries, in particular Africa and the least developed countries in other regions, and the contribution of the ILO to solving their social and economic problems.

This resolution deserves the support of all member States. The ILO can play an essential part in implementing programmes of co-operation to help countries attain their economic and social objectives.

This also holds true for the questions which come within the terms of reference of the ILO, notably those concerning workers' education, the improvement of working conditions and technical co-operation.

We believe that ILO action might have a greater impact if it were better co-ordinated with that of other organisations providing aid to the developing countries, especially those within the United Nations system and in the field, so as to avoid a waste of effort and overlapping.

Interpretation from Czech: Mr. HUBNER (representative of the Trade Unions International of Textile, Clothing, Leather and Fur Workers) – First of all I should like to congratulate the President on his election and extend to him sincere greetings from the 12 million members of Trade Unions International of Textile, Clothing, Leather and Fur Workers, and best wishes for success in the debates of the International Labour Conference.

We are deeply interested in the content of this year's session and in all the items on its agenda because they directly concern workers' interests and coincide with the guide lines of our Trade Unions International's activities. We are extremely anxious about the present situation in the various branches of the textile, clothing and leather industries, where job opportunities are decreasing more than in other industries and in addition to other facts which are also due to the impact of new technologies, there is a systematic intensification of work, increasing rhythm of work, spreading of continuous operating modes with a steadily growing employment of women. At the same time, in individual countries earnings in our industries are far below the national average. The products of our industries accompany people throughout their lives; they are among their essential needs. Yet it cannot be said that everyone is sufficiently well provided with them, that everyone's needs are met.

Naturally, there are abysmal differences between individual countries in the consumption of textiles and footwear per capita. We saw in the application of efficient up-to-date technologies a possibility of bridging these differences, especially for the benefit of the developing countries. Yet with the present way of introducing the results of the scientific and technological revolution, this is as yet not the case. On the contrary, the introduction of new technologies leads to the closing down of more and more factories, to production restrictions and to growing poverty and destitution for millions of workers.

We are, however, convinced that modernisation is not the culprit but the approach to its use. Transnational corporations and big firms more and more often fiercely attack the social advantages which the workers and their unions have won in long years of class struggle. Their onslaughts on social security and social protection laws are intended to rob the working class and all the working people of their legal, social, trade union and human rights and democratic freedoms.

New technologies are a great problem with many negative consequences for our branches. For all these reasons and because we fear for the future of our industries, we are glad that the ILO consistently tackles these issues especially the observance of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention 1948 (No. 87). We have studied in detail the results of the consultative meeting of ILO experts and fully agree with their conclusions, especially when they say that the new technologies can influence not only the demands made on

3. Violation of fundamental rights and liberties and of human rights in Palestine, the policies of repression, murder and imprisonment are aimed at frightening Palestinian citizens in order to keep them under the yoke of military and colonial occupation or force them to leave their country.

The Jewish newspaper Yehodot Aharonot, which appears in Israel itself, reported on 10 January 1988, that is at the beginning of the Palestinian uprising, that 19 of the most eminent Jewish intellectuals and poets had addressed a manifesto to the authorities, in which they said: "No more expulsions, no more detentions, no more violent investigations, no more military tribunals, no more violent patrols in the refugee camps! We will never be able to overcome a people struggling for its freedom."

workers' skills but also represent physical and mental burdens, affect employment prospects and social relations at workplaces. How to reduce these negative effects on the workers has always been, is today, and will remain the main concern of trade union organisations. It is a highly difficult job because its solution is not possible without substantial financial investments that will, however, be no source of profits. In a number of countries there are indirect attacks on trade unions and we see endeavours to break the power and rights of the unions by legislation.

The owners' plans go well beyond restricting trade union rights. In their long-term targets they plan to limit the role of the unions and in many countries they even envisage depriving the unions completely of their role and function. This is why, not infrequently, new technologies are seen as a means of weakening the trade union movement because in most instances the introduction of new technologies goes hand in hand with attempts to prevent this setting-up of new trade union organisations. There are many examples of this from the free trade zones. Big business believes that the trade union movement must be weakening in order to allow greater worker-exploitation under new conditions.

We are therefore convinced that it is necessary more than ever before to unite trade union activities, regardless of affiliation to various trade union centres. We place trust in the effective assistance of the ILO and in good co-operation with it in the pursuance of our goal, that is, that new technologies should create the necessary conditions for making work easier, for the elimination of heavy, harmful and dangerous jobs, without the threat of increasing stress situations during the introduction of continuous manufacturing processes and of raising unemployment. In its activities, our Trade Unions International will consistently be guided by the conclusions of our eighth conference; we shall continue our struggle for shorter working hours with full pay, for longer paid holidays; we shall exert pressure and submit proposals for the creation of new job opportunities and for raising the level of skills and of retraining with the costs covered by enterprise or state funds and not by the workers. We also believe that protection against the harmful consequences of rationalisation has to include the right of trade unionists and the work teams to participate in all negotiations on the introduction of new technologies and on modifications in the organisation of work. Trade unions should have access to all plans for production changes in order to be in a position effectively to influence them. We appreciate the assistance of the ILO in the organisation of various international events and seminars on the impact of new technologies on the workers and in the endeavours to include improved measures into collective agreements.

We also intend to involve engineers and technicians in the struggle for worker interests because their working conditions, too, are deteriorating. Actually, their situation and working conditions do not substantially differ from those of the workers. The unions will also pay much greater attention to the submission of specific demands for environmental protection in connection with the introduction of new technologies. Last but not least, we firmly demand that an end be put to the focusing of science and technology on the development of the instrument of war. In addition to everything else, this deprives civilian production of substantial material resources. With our protest against the abuse and militarisation of science, we want to create favourable conditions for the strengthening of trade union contacts with scientists and technicians and for their participation in the common struggle for the preservation of world peace.

I want to assure you that we shall spare no efforts to achieve these goals, also set down in ILO Conventions. We are convinced that in close co-operation with the ILO, we shall succeed in the very near future.

The PRESIDENT (Mr. AJTKEN) – I now give the floor to Mr. Shahatit, Government adviser, Jordan, for a right of reply to Mr. Barak, Government delegate, Israel.

First, however, I hope you will forgive me if I just take a short while to remind him of the rules that have been developed around the right of reply. The practice with regard to this exercise is that the reply should refer only to the point under debate. It should be brief. It should not exceed three minutes and preferably should not give rise to any further remarks. Of course, it should always be in the language of this chamber, that is, in parliamentary language.

The Chair will have no option but to exercise its powers if the right of reply should exceed three minutes. I trust that the speaker will therefore not exceed three minutes or raise new questions going beyond the brief and factual reply that he wants to make.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. SHAHATIT (Government adviser, Jordan) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I thank you for giving me the floor to exercise my right of reply to the serious allegation, the false and unworthy statements on the reality experienced by the Palestinian Arab people, its workforce and its employers, living under occupation in Palestine and the occupied Arab territories. These allegations have been made by the representative of the Israeli Government in order to try to influence official and popular opinion among the three parts composing this international assembly, who are fully aware of the bitter and tragic situation of the Palestinian people under the yoke of Israeli occupation.

In this context, I should like to point out the following facts, which were noted in the reports on Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories by the missions sent by the Director-General:

1. The aim of the colonialist Israeli occupation is to take possession of the land and water and to confiscate Arab sources of energy. The occupation authorities are pursuing a systematic policy of expropriating lands and water resources in the occupied territories, expelling Arab citizens, enforcing colonisation and obliterating the identity of the Palestinian Arab people.

2. The policies of racial discrimination, discrimination in opportunity and employment and inequality in the various labour sectors are the means used by the occupying authorities to ensure the dependence of the economy in the occupied Arab territories on the Israeli economy.

SECOND REPORT OF THE CREDENTIALS COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND NOTING

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – We begin this morning's sitting with the second report of the Credentials Committee. I call on Mr. Nakamura, Government delegate, Japan, Chairman of the Credentials Committee, to submit the report.

Mr. NAKAMURA (Government delegate, Japan; Chairman of the Credentials Committee) – I have the honour to submit to the Conference the second report of the Credentials Committee, which appears in Provisional Record No. 14. The report contains the Committees's decisions on the objections to the nomination of the Workers' delegate of the Bahamas and the Workers' adviser of Peru, as well as a communication concerning the delegation of Afghanistan, the delegation of Lesotho and the Workers' delegate of Portugal.

As this report was adopted unanimously by the Credentials Committee, under article 26, paragraph 5(b), of the Standing Orders, the Conference is required only to take note of it.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – I invite the Conference to take note of the second report of the Credentials Committee.

(The report is noted.)

TENTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – The next item on our agenda is the tenth report of the Selection Committee. In the absence of Mr. Vargas Escobar, Government delegate, Nicaragua, Chairman of the Committee, I would like to submit to the Conference the report which is in Provisional Record No. 5.

The report merely includes changes in the membership of the various committee of the Conference. I therefore recommend that the Conference adopt the report.

The report is now before the Conference. If there are no objections, I take it that the report is adopted.

(The report is adopted.)

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – We shall now resume our discussion on the Reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Mrs. MOLKOVA (Government delegate, Czechoslovakia) – I would like to congratulate sincerely the President on his election. In the course of this session he has demonstrated that the presidency is in good hands. I wish full success to him and to his colleagues, the Vice-Presidents, in discharging their functions.

The primary focus of the session is directed to human rights and to assessing the work of the ILO in this field over the past 40 years since the Universal Declaration was adopted. I wish to join those who from this rostrum have commended the report of the Director-General on this subject. In the short time available to speakers, I can only make a few comments.

Despite the complexity of the situation in different parts of the world and despite the differences which still exist between the standards embodied both in the Declaration and in the two International Covenants on Human Rights on the one hand, and the realities of life on the other hand, we consider the international recognition of human rights and efforts gradually to enforce them as a landmark in human history. The idea of dignity, the principle of mutual tolerance and the right of human beings to a social and international order which permit the full exercise of human rights, represent in their totality the hope of mankind to rid itself of the threat of wars and to live in lasting peace. Therefore, by working for peace and disarmament, we are simultaneously strengthening the idea of human rights. This applies especially to cases of massive and cruel violations of human rights which are primarily due to outside aggression and occupation, as is the case in the occupied Arab territories and Palestine, or to the absurd denial of human dignity and of the right to life with respect to the whole nation, as is the case with apartheid. In these most serious cases there is a close and evident line between the protection of human rights and the corresponding political solution at the international level which would bring peace to the States concerned and to the peoples in those countries. A political solution seems to be the only possible and satisfactory outcome. It is the moral duty of the whole international community, and of the ILO in particular, to seek and promote such a solution with all available means.

The ILO's role in the field of human rights is significant. It has our full support, reflected among others in the fact that Czechoslovakia actively supports the ILO activities concerning apartheid and that it has ratified most of the human rights Conventions and systematically implements their provisions. In our attitude to the application of these Conventions we emphasise the principle of their indivisibility and interdependence.

The right to work is a key issue. The Director-General is entirely correct to say in his Report: "Work occupies a central place in action to make effective the whole range of economic, social and cultural rights". We are among those who argue that the ILO should explicitly recognise the right to work in a Convention similarly as this right had been explicitly recognised in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and in the Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights. It is true that a number of ILO instruments deal with the individual activities and steps which are designed to contribute to implementing the right to work in member States, but it is also equally known that the right to work tends to be questioned by many. The impact of many ILO instruments, for instance Convention No. 122, would be significantly strengthened by the explicit recognition of this right. We are aware that in most countries it is very difficult to attain this objective due to the present economic situation. It is, however, necessary for the ILO fully to recognise the right to work and more effectively to influence economic policies and programmes at both national and international levels. The ILO should further seek to call the attention of the international financial and economic institutions to the primary importance of this basic right of the workers which should not be abandoned when making efforts to reduce inflation or to make arrangements for more speedy servicing of foreign debts. Therefore, we should give serious thought to the proposal to adopt a Convention on the right to work, to place this right, and the instruments for implementing it, into a logical and realistic context and to contribute to its gradual implementation in all countries of the world.

In our country we face at present problems of a different nature. In further development we are expecting, in connection with the changes of the economic mechanism, structural changes to take place which, together with other measures, are designed to lead to a marked increase in labour productivity. Our workers will not be threatened with unemployment and certainly not with long-term unemployment, but we face demanding tasks, e.g. in the field of training for new and higher skills, retraining, in a more intensive participation of workers in the management of enterprises and in other areas.

I should also like to mention briefly the right to just and favourable working conditions, which includes the right to just and favourable remuneration. This right, too, stems from the Universal Declaration and the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights. However, the right to just remuneration is interpreted in the respective ILO Conventions much more narrowly. Both Conventions Nos. 26 and 131 are directed to minimum wages and most countries – on the basis of these Conventions – have adopted laws guaranteeing workers a minimum wage and not a just wage as provided for by the United Nations instruments. It is, of course, true that minimum wage systems are often supplemented by systems of collective agreements which fulfil better the idea of just remuneration. Collective agreements, however, cover only some of the workers and their numbers are growing smaller because of the erosion of employment stability which is a process going on in many Western countries, and also because many people work only occasionally or are on shorter working hours. In the developing countries the situation is worse still as collective agreements cover only a small minority of workers.

In countries of the socialist community we are endeavouring to improve a different system of remuneration which is more consistent with the conception of just remuneration. I have in mind systems of guaranteed basic wages determined in relation to the level of qualification of workers. At the present time we are also trying to attain greater involvement on the part of workers in achieving higher performance and better quality and a certain part of remuneration depends also on the profits earned by the enterprise. During collective bargaining the trade unions have a chance to co-decide how the enterprise's profits will be distributed, and especially that part of profit which goes to pay wages. Workers are guaranteed that for their work they will receive, under all circumstances, just and adequate remuneration, not only a minimum wage.

Let me make another short comment concerning the supervisory activities which significantly supplement the standard-setting activities and promote implementation of human rights in practice. We support the ILO's supervisory activities so far as they fulfil this function. But we cannot overlook some of their shortcomings. One of them, for example, is that those member States which did not ratify the Conventions are excluded from the main sphere of supervision.

This produces a paradoxical situation where criticism is directed towards countries which have demonstrated the will voluntarily to accept obligations stemming from international Conventions and which co-operate with the supervisory bodies, while on the other hand it is ineffective towards countries which for various reasons refuse such co-operation. One of the possible ways of achieving a more balanced attitude to member States is to place greater stress on reports according to Article 19 of the Constitution and at the same time provide for a more frequent discussion of Conventions or groups of Conventions in the sphere of human rights.

Another sphere to which attention should be given is the relationship between supervisory organs and the Conference. This relationship is not precisely defined. We think that it is essential to increase the role of the Conference in this area, introduce clear relations between individual supervisory organs and specifically define their terms of reference.

We should also think about the function of complaints procedures, chiefly because it focuses the attention of the Organisation towards a large number of what are often partial and sometimes not very important problems, while attention is diverted from widespread and massive violations of human rights. For massive violations of human rights to be discussed by the ILO it was necessary to set up special procedures, because the procedures based on the various articles of the ILO Constitution are not effective in these instances.

If we think about the effectiveness of the standard-setting and supervisory activities in the field of human rights, we realise the importance of the ILO's role and we sincerely wish to create the best possible conditions for its work. A number of problems exist. We must consider the ways and means for promoting more effectively the concept of human rights and at the same time answer several questions, some of which I have raised. Our work will be effective if we discuss the identified problems and seek joint solutions. My remarks here at this session of the Conference were intended as an appeal to this end.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. CHAVES GONZALEZ (Minister of Labour and Social Security, Spain) – May I first congratulate the President on his election. His personal qualities and vast experience in social matters are the best guarantee that he will direct the work of this Conference skilfully and objectively.

This year we are celebrating the proclamation by the United Nations of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and, in the context of the ILO, the adoption of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention (No. 87). The Director-General's report, in its evocative title, tells us that human rights are a common responsibility, an affirmation of special significance in the tripartite structure of this Organisation.

In this context we must pay tribute to the enormous contribution made by international labour standards to recognition of the social context of such rights. The principal contribution of the ILO is, as I see it, that it has been creating system of international labour standards that should to serve as guide and reference for member States in improving conditions of life and work, increasing the possibilities of employment and promoting basic human rights. This contribution is not merely limited to essential instruments concerning trade union freedom, freedom of association, the abolition of forced labour and child labour, non-discrimination, and equality of opportunities and treatment, but should also extend to other instruments which represent the basic requirements of justice and respect for the status and dignity of workers, such as the right to employment, to a guaranteed minimum wage, to fair and decent conditions of work, and to proper social protection.

This body of rights, defined and set forth in international social legislation, is the legal nucleus of what could be called basic social rights, but, as the Prime Minister of my Government recently stated in this same forum, it is inadmissible to proclaim the pre-eminence of social and economic rights at the expense of formal liberties or to be satisfied with the effective realisation of civil and political rights through trust in market forces alone. The State and the public authorities therefore have to provide due guarantees for social and economic rights.

Breaches of human rights have been one of the major concerns of the International Labour Organisation since its inception. Hence, there must be wholehearted condemnation of the system of apartheid, which is not only a violation of one of the basic elements of human dignity, but also an infringement of basic social rights such as the right of freedom of association, the right to employment and the right to non-discrimination.

I should also like to state that my Government supports the search for a just and lasting solution to the conflict in the Middle East, and is concerned about the violation of human and social rights in the occupied Arab territories.

The existence of unjust economic and social situations, as in Latin America, calls for real and effective international collaboration, especially from the countries of the European Economic Community.

The discussion by the Governing Body of the Medium-Term Plan of the ILO has raised questions which call for serious reflection and compel us to reconsider certain social problems in their proper international setting.

One of these problems is unemployment and the struggle to remedy this, which is a fundamental objective of the first importance in the policy of my Government.

The strategy for employment in my country, bearing in mind the external factors involved of inevitable and increasing importance, is based partly on a policy of sustained economic growth, a campaign against inflation and the moderation of distortions in public expenditure, partly on a correct production policy that takes into account criteria of efficiency, competitiveness and occupational skills, and finally, on a social policy based on effective supervision of the groups affected by the economic slump that is both positive and efficacious and not purely palliative, in short, on an adequate public system of social protection.

It is our conviction that a policy of this kind will not be viable in practice unless it is founded on dialogue and negotiations with the social partners – the employers' organisations and the trade unions – which has in fact been a tradition in Spanish labour relations. In this connection, I would mention the offer of dialogue and negotiations made by the Prime Minister of my Government to the social organisations in the hope of finding points of agreement in key questions of economic and social policy.

With this strategy, the growth of the gross national product in Spain has been almost twice as much as in the other European countries, and ambitious targets have been achieved in the campaign against inflation and reduction of the public deficit.

This economic growth and the special action taken to promote employment are having positive effects on employment in Spain. As the Director-General has recalled on a number of occasions and in various Reports, there are no miraculous remedies in this field or policies that will solve overnight the complex and destructive problem of unemployment.

This is why, if we want to be realistic, we cannot hope for spectacular results. Only tenacity and continuity in policies that have been proved to be right in practice will provide the key to the gradual solution of the unemployment problem over the medium and long term.

In my country, as in other countries, the rate of unemployment has reached levels that call for attention by all parties the government, employers, trade union organisations and society as a whole. But, in Spain, the measures taken with regard to employment policy and the economic policy in general are bearing fruit. Since the middle of 1985 a definite recovery has been taking place, and the employed population has increased from 10.5 million to 11.5 million. More than 1,000 jobs a day are being created, and in concrete terms, wage-earning employment rose appreciably in 1986 and 1987, after the slump of the preceding period. The number of persons in wage-earning employment has increased by 746,500 in the last two years.

In recent years, to, a large number of young people and women have been absorbed into the labour market who were excluded before for lack of opportunities. Because of this, the volume of jobs created has not automatically reduced the figures for unemployment, although the unemployment rate was reduced by 1.5 percentage points in the two years 1986-87, when the drop was especially significant in the case of young people. In 1987, the number of young people unemployed declined by 49,000, and the rate of unemployment for young people fell by 2.8 percentage points.

Nevertheless, Spain is becoming increasingly active in the employment of women. Nine out of ten persons taking first-time jobs are women.

Despite this rise, the number of women demanding employment is also rising. According to our latest data more women than men are unemployed in Spain.

As a response to this social aspiration, we are preparing a plan for ensuring equality of opportunity for women containing a considerable member of measures to promote employment and good labour relations.

In application of this plan and in order to make employment compatible with motherhood or fatherhood, we have just approved a law under which there will be an extension of reserving jobs for those who have to care for children, and confinement leave has been extended to 16 weeks. This meets the requirements laid down in the Maternity Protection Convention, (Revised) 1952 (No. 103).

The lack of protection for workers specially affected by the economic slump; the long-term unemployed; young people with particular difficulty in obtaining jobs; discrimination against women in employment and the obsolete occupational skills of many workers are all problems which the government will have to deal with by social action. This will obviously cost money, which, because it will increase budgetary deficits, may be difficult. Nevertheless, in circumstances of sustained growth such as those experienced at the present time by Spain, we may have the resources needed to tackle these problems with a greater margin for manoeuvre to extend the limits of social policy.

As regards the protection for unemployment, I would point out that in my country the average number of people protected in 1987, that is to say enjoying full employment or with cover for unemployment benefit, is 36.2 per cent more than in 1982, and since 1985 on the average the number of people protected has been in excess of 850,000. Nevertheless, this is a question in which the Government, employers and trade unions have agreed to tackle in a constructive spirit in the next round of negotiations.

The necessary industrial development for sustained growth has given rise to two basic problems which I ought to touch on in this statement, namely the impact of new technology and the consequences it has on the health and safety of workers.

New technologies affect not only production and the creation of new products, but also the means of production, the quality of work, industrial relations and the definition and content of some occupations.

This means we must look closely and sometimes critically at the machinery used and the financial resources available if we wish to provide the re-trained labour force with proper perspectives of employment, given the radical changes in systems of production.

The training and occupational insertion plan, now in progress in my country, is in accordance with action decided upon by the Government and directed basically for the benefit of first-time employees. It will enable them to improve their conditions of training and bring them up to the requirements of the labour market, thus making it possible to find jobs.

Since October 1985, when the plan was launched, 584,379 pupils have undergone occupational training courses.

Occupational health and safety are other basic aspects of any labour policy and more so in periods of slump, as now, which sometimes have a negative effect on what is essential to a person, namely his own life and his health.

In my country the number of fatal accidents has stabilised and I should point out that something like 30 per cent of these occur on the way to or from work outside the shop-floor proper, in other words.

However, this is a situation with which we cannot be satisfied. I feel that all the material and legislative efforts which can be made are a basic necessity and to this end my Government is preparing a draft Occupational Health Act which will shortly be referred to Parliament. This will provide the basic frame of reference in this field.

I said at the beginning of my statement that the basic objective of the policy of my Government is the consolidation and improvement of the public system of social welfare protection. Thus we have made great efforts in the last few years to improve social welfare protection, bearing in mind the recommendations made by the Group of Experts which produced the document for the ILO called Into the twenty-first century: The development of social security.

My Government is at present preparing an Act for extending retirement and invalidity pensions to all residents who are not entitled to a pension from the contributive system of the social security system because they have no paid sufficient contributions.

As regards health, we have extended the benefits of health assistance offered by the social security system to workers who did not enjoy them. This has led to an increase in the population protected by something like 5 million people, so that now free public health assistance covers 96.7 per cent of the population.

In my country, we have consolidated a pattern of labour relations based on the autonomy of workers and employers. At the same time, we have completed a framework within which liberties and trade union rights can be exercised, alongside the activities of trade unions and employers' organisations.

This has enabled us to consolidate trade union organisations by ensuring better representation of the workers themselves by means of free trade union elections.

We are committed to strengthening trade unions and employers' organisations, with a view to participation. We have created new organs for institutional participation, such as the General Council for Occupational Training and the General Council for Emigration, amongst others.

In this spirit, it is the intention of my Government that the Economic and Social Council, as an organ of tripartite participation and basically as a consultative body, should become a reality very soon.

With all these actions, we have wanted to reform and consolidate trade union action and to act in accordance with the provisions of our Constitution says on the role of trade unions in society.

The objectives listed are certainly ambitious and call for effort, tenacity and participation by all. To achieve these ends my Government will spare no effort, in the conviction that, in doing so, it is contributing to the building of a more equitable society.

Mr. FOWLER (Secretary of State for Employment, United Kingdom) – I should first like to congratulate the President on his election to his high office. Next, I should like to congratulate the Director-General of the International Labour Office, Mr. Francis Blanchard, on the excellent Report which we are debating here this morning.

In an important section of Part I of his Report the Director-General discusses the world economic problems which set the agenda for much of the ILO's work. Every country was deeply affected by the downturn in the world economy in the 1970s and early 1980s. Each country has had to undertake major reappraisals of its economic policies to adjust to these changes.

The problems confronting the United Kingdom in the downturn in the world economy were particularly severe. When the Government in which I serve took office in 1979 it was obliged to take some hard decisions. Nevertheless, we have continued to pursue these policies and I am glad to say that as a result the British economy is now a very strong one, with rising employment and rapidly falling unemployment. I should like to take just a few moments this morning to explain the main elements of these policies before going on to outline some recent developments in the field of employment.

In the late 1970s, the British economy was crippled by high inflation, low productivity, rapidly rising earnings and unit labour costs, and a damagingly high level of strikes.

Faced with those deep-seated problems, the Government was determined to avoid short-term expedients and pursue instead a strategic approach aimed at the transformation of our economy.

First and foremost, we had to tackle inflation, which was destroying savings, undermining our currency and damaging our industrial competitiveness.

Secondly, against a background of stable money and sound public finance, we had to create the conditions in which enterprise and wealth creation could flourish, by allowing markets of all kinds to operate more freely, with the minimum of government intervention.

And at the same time we had to ensure that our workforce, and particularly the unemployed, were able to benefit from the new job opportunities that the economic success would bring.

How far have we succeeded? Firm financial discipline, supported by low government borrowing, has enabled us to bring inflation down and keep it down. This year, government expenditure as a proportion of Gross Domestic Product will be lower than at any time since the early 1970s. Last year we achieved a budget surplus of around £3 billion and we expect a further surplus this year. Inflation has fallen to well below the levels of the 1970s.

But success in reducing inflation was never enough on its own to bring about the transformation we were seeking. We also set about reviving and rebuilding the economy by releasing the vigour and enterprise of our people. To promote incentives and enterprise, we have reduced marginal tax rates.

We have also taken steps to bring greater competition into all aspects of the economy. We have swept away a whole range of unnecessary and burdensome bureaucratic restrictions on business. I cannot emphasise too strongly the importance of such deregulatory measures for the health of an economy. For too long, governments have stifled the energies of businessmen by imposing a whole range of requirements in the fields of taxation, employment law, even the collection of statistics. Many of these requirements have had nothing to do with the efficient running of a profitable business. The burden of such regulations has fallen particularly heavily on the small businessman and the self-employed. These people cannot look to a personnel or finance department to take care of the paperwork: the entire burden falls upon them. Yet these are the very people to whom we must look for the new jobs of the future. It is vital that they are allowed the time to manage their businesses successfully and that they are not deterred from providing extra employment by the requirements that we impose on them. That is why we have been determined to re-examine the need for regulations, to abolish those which are dispensable and to reduce the burden of those which are not. We have pursued this drive not only at home but also within the various international bodies of which we are a member. But although we have been rigorous in examining the need for legislation, we have at the same time been careful to retain and, where necessary, extend, as in the vital field of health and safety at work, to modernise legislation which is clearly needed to protect the interests of workers.

We have also improved the industrial relations climate by introducing legislation to redress the balance of bargaining power between employers and trade unions and to give trade union members a greater say in their union affairs. In six out of the last seven years the number of working days lost through strikes has never been more than half the level of the 1970s, and in the last three years there have been fewer strikes than in any year since 1940.

Some of our measures have been specifically targeted on sectors which have demonstrated their great potential for growth – notably small firms, self-employment, tourism and the wider services sector. In this connection I have been encouraged to note that the ILO has also increasingly recognised the vital role which the development of small enterprises and self-employment can make to the regeneration of our economies.

But our vital manufacturing base has not been neglected, and has shared fully in the general economic revival. Helped by more flexible working practices, manufacturing productivity has grown faster since 1980 than in other industrialised countries. Manufacturing output has recovered from the depths of the recession to over 20 per cent above its 1981 level. Productivity improvements have been matched by greater competitiveness reflected in much lower unit costs, and by the greatly improved profitability of our industrial and commercial companies.

I now turn briefly to the implications of these changes for employment.

Britain, in common with other European countries, has suffered in recent years from high unemployment. However, since 1983 our economic growth has generated almost 1.7 million new jobs in our country. And in the last two years, unemployment has been falling sharply. Over the last year, unemployment in Britain fell faster than in any other major industrialised country. All regions of our country have benefited from new job opportunities. The number of longer-term unemployed people has fallen by a record figure of over 400,000 over the past year and unemployment amongst younger workers under 25 is now at its lowest level for over five years. For young people under the age of 18 the picture is even brighter. Unemployment amongst this group has now nearly halved in the last five years, and the number of unemployed school-leavers has more than halved in the same period.

It is sometimes alleged that these new jobs are not "proper jobs" on the grounds that not all of them fall into traditional patterns. I think that those criticisms are entirely misconceived. Traditional work patterns are changing. Employment in service industries is expanding and is of increasing importance to the economy – and is in no sense second-rate employment.

Since 1983 full-time jobs have increased by 670,000 in the United Kingdom but there has also been a substantial rise in the number of part-time jobs. That is the result of employers and workers alike seeking more flexible working patterns. Many employers find that part-time work can contribute to business flexibility and this helps them control their costs and stay competitive. Many workers find part-time work valuable in helping them to combine work and family responsibilities. Indeed the research evidence shows that part-timers are just as satisfied with their jobs as full-timers, and only a small minority would prefer to work longer hours. I think it would be quite wrong to deny those people the chance to work by putting artificial restrictions on part-time working.

A developing economy demands not only new and more flexible working patterns but also a wider range of skills and qualifications among all categories of workers. This is an area where responsibilities must be shared by government, employers and workers, including, indeed, the unemployed. For its part, the British Government has given a high priority to tackling the problem of the large number of school-leavers finding themselves unemployed on leaving school. Our Youth Training Scheme now offers two years of high-quality training to all unemployed school-leavers and provides participants with the modern skills and qualifications they need to get worthwhile jobs. The scheme has become the main method of recruiting and training young people for many employers. It has prompted employers to look more seriously than ever before at the training of young people and it has introduced structured training to many sectors where it hardly existed before. The scheme is now the main route into work for 16-year-old school-leavers.

I believe that what we have done in reducing unemployment can be replicated elsewhere. The greatest social problem facing the countries of the European Community, and clearly much more than that, is unemployment. It is essential that we reduce this level of unemployment and actively promote employment growth, and I have no doubt that the sort of policies adopted in the United Kingdom and advocated in the employment growth resolution adopted in December 1986 by the European Council of Ministers could have a major impact on the problem. The key lies in policies to provide more access to training, to deal with the problems of long-term unemployment, to encourage self-employment and enterprise skills, and to provide more flexibility in the labour market. It does not lie in planning and in placing unnecessary burdens and regulations on employers. Superfluous regulation increases employers' costs and inevitably has a negative effect on employment. It would also put at risk the success of the European single market by making companies less competitive. The single market itself should provide the economic conditions under which workers will be able to benefit from better wages and conditions. If we are serious about reducing unemployment across the world, the last thing we should be contemplating is further regulation of the labour market and misguided experiments in social engineering.

I am confident that Britain's recent achievements in the economic and employment fields are highly relevant to the work of this Conference. They are relevant because the success of one of the major industrialised countries is a hopeful development for the world economy as a whole; not least, I think, it is also relevant for the developing countries in this world. They are also relevant because the British Government's policy of creating a sound economy to encourage the growth of real and lasting employment has important implications for the future work of the International Labour Organisation and for all the governments seeking better job prospects and standards of living for their people in all the countries that are represented here.

Ms. McLAUGHLIN (Secretary of Labor, United States) – I would like to begin by congratulating Mr. Beyreuther on his election. I am confident that this session of the International Labour Conference will be successful under his leadership.

I would also like to commend the Director-General for selecting human rights as the theme of this year's session. It is a theme that is as timely as it is appropriate. It is timely, of course, because this year marks the 40th anniversary of the adoption of the ILO's Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, as well as the signing of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. But it is also very appropriate because it highlights the painful contrast between the universal desire of individuals to gain and preserve fundamental human rights and the flagrant disregard for human rights that continues to exist in many parts of the world.

The record of the United States Government in the field of multilateral human rights is clear and it is supportive. We have worked to expand human rights activities and initiatives within the system of international and regional organisations.

We consider the human rights standards in the ILO's international labour code to be the most effective international instruments in the field of human rights today. And we are committed to see to their maintenance and proper functioning.

The ILO's human rights machinery – which many of you have spent a good part of your lives and careers building – has over time become a model of what we think can be accomplished through international law and through collective will.

Economic progress cannot be sustained without parallel improvements in human rights. Moreover, the ILO has – rightly, I believe – long recognised the inter-relationship between human rights and development by broadening its activities well beyond standard-setting.

The ILO is now very actively promoting growth and development through employment creation and promotion of human resources and skills.

With that broader mandate in mind, my remarks today will focus on human rights and the ILO's role and resources. I will outline some of the challenges we face in workplaces in the United States that are shared by ILO member countries and I will conclude with a few observations about how the ILO can most equitably implement its mandate for human rights.

Real economic growth must include an improved standard of living for workers. Worker rights go hand in hand with stable economic growth. The ILO must continue to meet this challenge through its standard-setting activities.

I have asked Ambassador Lawson, who heads up the Bureau of International Affairs of our United States Department of Labor, to convene a symposium in Washington this November to explore the relationship between economic development and international standards.

I believe strongly that worker rights are an important component of sound economic development. I invite you to join us in our effort to develop more effective and coherent ways of promoting economic growth and improving the welfare of our workers.

Developed countries cannot turn their back on the exploitation of the poorest of the poor – the vulnerable men, women and children who are too often exploited for economic gain.

We in America believe that global economic stability is enhanced by democratic values. The President of the United States has called it “democracy on the move”. He has said, “We who live in free market societies believe that growth, prosperity and, ultimately, human fulfilment are created from the bottom up, not the government down.”

I share President Reagan's feeling that only when individuals are given a personal stake in deciding economic policies and benefiting from their success can societies remain economically dynamic, progressive and truly free.

We in America realise that in some developing countries, compliance with what would be considered human working conditions is not always easy – not because of a lack of concern, but because of a lack of resources to implement measures necessary to upgrade working conditions.

The real tragedy is that all human rights abuses cannot be ended by multilateral assistance. Indeed, some individuals cannot attend this session because they have been prohibited from doing so through the most grievous of human rights violations – they have been denied the freedom of speech.

Poverty and underdevelopment may retard the development of human rights, but much more insidious is the deliberate repression of human rights by totalitarian governments who fear the power of freedom, the power of workers and employers freely to organise.

We have found the ILO's supervisory machinery (particularly the Governing Body's Committee on Freedom of Association, the Committee of Experts, the Committee of Inquiry, and the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards) to be an effective means – available to the international community as well as to workers and employers at the national level for preventing or correcting abuses in human rights.

The recent discussions of the ILO's Medium-Term Plan was a good opportunity for members to refocus ILO energies and priorities as we move towards the new century. We believe that the ILO's continued promotion of human rights and its linkage to economic development should surely be included in any list of priorities.

Many members, including my Government, have encouraged the ILO to forge a closer link between labour standards and technical co-operation activities. I have been gratified by the positive response of the Director-General and other members.

I believe that a dynamic programme to promote labour standards and economic development must touch the beneficiaries directly, by seeking to incorporate features of relevant ILO standards in the assistance programmes. But most importantly the ILO needs to promote the understanding that its labour standards are beneficial to long-term growth and development.

Within the context of the ILO's mandate, we support innovative approaches by the ILO at the national and international level to accelerate employment-generating growth, to combat long-term underemployment and unemployment and better to manage human resources.

We also support the Director-General's efforts to highlight the need for socially oriented components in the design of adjustment policies, so that the productive capacity of poorer and more vulnerable groups are then taken into account. We must devise measures to achieve adjustment and growth with minimum social cost.

Now my vantage point as a relative newcomer to both the ILO and the domestic American labour issues has enabled me, perhaps, to see certain important common issues between the activities pursued by the ILO to help developing countries and the problems facing my own country.

At first glance, the differences might appear to outweigh the similarities. Demographically, we in the United States and many developed countries face a future of slower growth in labour supply, while the labour supply in most developing countries is far from peaking.

In the last five years, while most industrialised and developing countries have struggled to create employment, the United States has created 16 million new jobs. Over 90 per cent of these jobs are full-time and well-paying. High-paying jobs are increasing as low-wage jobs are disappearing.

However, we also face many challenges that are common to ILO member. Between now and the year 2000, 80 per cent of the new workers in my country will be women, minorities and immigrants. These demographic changes will present great opportunities.

But these opportunities may very well be lost if we fail to provide this emerging workforce with the ability to perform the new, more demanding jobs our economy is creating through technology and in services. Many of you face analogous challenges in your own countries.

Without a quick and comprehensive response – through better education, better training and retraining – we in the United States are headed for a significant skills gap.

In a period of potential labour shortages, we face the ironic prospect of long-term unemployment for workers without the necessary skill levels.

As we in the United States plan for the future of our workforce, we have become aware of the need to institute reforms that are also being examined within the ILO's activities. I am talking about major improvements in the quality of the workforce – both managers and workers alike.

Such improvements span the entire range of labour concerns: from workers' abilities to reconcile the conflicting demands of work and family, to improved productivity and greater worker protection, to more consistent enforcement of workplace standards.

In recognition of the continued ILO response to a broad range of critical human rights and social and economic developmental issues, affecting the daily lives of much of the world's population, I am pleased to announce that the United States Government, through our Department of Labor, will provide the ILO with a voluntary contribution of US$500,000 in 1988.

This funding will enable the ILO to help members implement appropriate labour standards and to assist countries in skills development, employment growth and improved working conditions.

While we are focusing on human rights and economic growth, I want to clear up any misconception some of you may have regarding my country's involvement in promoting worker rights.

Unfortunately, worker rights has been identified as a trade issue – a trade issue that has been labelled anti-development based on fears that the United States is trying to impose its standards on all those who wish to trade with us.

This is not the way we see it. Yes, lower labour costs are a legitimate element of comparative advantage, under the right circumstances. But the "right circumstances" are those which reflect a respect for human rights.

We are talking about a great deal more than wages. International labour standards, which we all know go beyond pay standards, exist to promote sound, broadly based social and economic development, the kind of development that endures.

It should be noted our emphasis is on protecting people, not markets. And, in fact, the effort to establish international standards geared to the needs and resources of developing countries is intended to do just that.

The United States is not alone in hoping that more can be done to promote minimum labour standards to protect the rights of workers. This issue is not a new one, nor is it likely to be solved soon. The Director-General's Report provides a useful compendium on the issue of minimum standards and the Director-General is to be congratulated for this significant contribution to the debate.

I do not disagree with the Director-General's view that new rules or mechanisms may be needed. But I believe the ILO should give further thought to the question of how existing rules and machinery can respond – and what broader role the ILO could play in the international community to promote the protection of worker rights.

Finally, in looking at how the ILO can most equitably implement the Director-General's human rights theme, I'd like to touch on the importance which we in the United States attach to the need for due process.

Our concern for due process was placed on record as far back as the 54th Session of the International Labour Conference held in 1970, where we cautioned against resolutions that could undermine the constitutional procedures of the ILO before the allegations have been verified by the proper ILO machinery.

We have been heartened by the 1986 Session of the Conference agreement to constitutional reforms that will eliminate possible abuses of due process. But until those reforms are in place we urge members – for the benefit of the Organisation, and in the interests of justice – not to substitute Conference resolutions for the impartial investigation of complaints against member Governments by the ILO's supervisory machinery.

The work we are doing here in Geneva is profoundly important for the prospects of working people everywhere. Respect for human rights ultimately promotes global economic stability, and the progress of peace on this planet.

The idea that global stability hinges on individual freedom and prosperity is the key, I think, to developing the kind of dynamic economies and progressive societies that working men and women around the world deserve. By working together responsibly I believe we shall fulfil the trust that you have vested in us.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. ANTONI PAVAN (Government delegate, Venezuela) – For the fifth time in five years I have the honour of speaking on behalf of the delegation of the Government of Venezuela at the International Labour Conference. I salute the distinguished President and the other Officers of the Conference and I extend to them my congratulations on their unanimous appointment; I wish them success in their work.

I also express our appreciation to the staff of the Office and especially to its Director-General, Mr. Francis Blanchard, for the content of the Report submitted to us, Human rights - A common responsibility, coming as it does on so timely an occasion, as we are celebrating the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Human rights are essential for any policy conducive to man's happiness.

Venezuela, after its independence, endured more than a century of dictatorship and anarchy; because they are familiar with the suffering of civil war, torture, imprisonment and exile, the generations of recent decades have been ardent defenders of human rights. For this reason, the Democratic Government of President Lusinchi, the sixth President to be elected through free, direct and universal suffrage, has made special efforts to preserve these rights in political, economic and social areas. We can state with pride that Venezuela enjoys a political system in which the respect for human rights, in its most far-reaching sense, is an article of faith and the focus of constant vigilance and renewal.

With respect to the relations of the State with the nation's productive forces, we have defined a comprehensive policy with the participation of workers and employers. Unfortunately, for reasons beyond the control of the Government, it has not been possible to satisfy, as we had hoped and wished, everybody's social and economic demands. The crisis of our external sector, arising from the drop in foreign currency earnings as a result of the fall in the price of our major export, oil, has had a strong impact on our economic development, and has been further exacerbated by the substantial drain on capital resulting from the servicing of our foreign debt. Notwithstanding the existence of these two adverse factors, the national Government has undertaken to reduce unemployment by creating new sources of employment and maintaining the inflation rate at relatively low levels.

The labour movement in my country has been demanding in recent months an increase in wages in spite of the fact that the national Government decreed last year an appreciable increase in basic wages which benefited some 3.5 million workers.

The employers in turn are calling for a greater liberalisation of the economy, and in this regard are suggesting that market forces be allowed to set prices for goods and services. The Government has therefore retained the control of prices for a range of essential goods, thus guaranteeing workers, and especially those earning low income, a decent subsistence. Likewise, the Government has set a ceiling for interest rates; this and other measures have so far succeeded in keeping inflation in check (it will not exceed 15 per cent this year) and boosting employment.

I would not hesitate in stating, however, that the Government of President Lusinchi, of which I have been and remain a loyal servant, has planned its action in order to safeguard and bolster the indivisibility and interdependence of human rights; the good results of these efforts should be evident to any observer. It is a pleasure for me to add that we agree with what was said by the Director-General in his Report, that human rights encompass the civil, political, economic and social rights of man. At any rate, this is the understanding and practice of the Government of Venezuela.

There is no doubt that the economic and financial crisis in my country has also affected our commitment to international organisations. Hence, in recent years we have not always been able to meet our obligations in a timely manner. This is also true of our obligations to the ILO. For this reason, we have adopted in the relevant committee an attitude of caution and austerity, pointing to the major difficulties we have in accepting increases in our contributions. We feel it is important to mention the urgent need to establish proper priorities in the programmes of the Organisation whenever national crises and the world economic situation decisively affect the Organisation's finances.

My delegation considers that the action of the ILO in the field of human rights has been of crucial importance, especially since the 1970s, as a result of the Universal Declaration, the covenants on economic, social and cultural rights and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. In this regard, we reaffirm our support for the goals of the Organisation's programme of activities for the period 1990-95, inasmuch as its international efforts require an even stronger defence of these rights, in their broadest sense, through dialogue and technical co-operation. We trust that the standards which have become outdated as a result of social developments and technological progress will be revised, and we note with satisfaction the accomplishments mentioned by the Director-General in his Report. We likewise welcome the efficiency shown by the bodies responsible for supervising the implementation of the standards of the ILO. With respect to co-operation, I cannot fail to express before this important assembly my Government's wish to see it expanded; I endorse the words uttered a few days ago at this Conference by His Excellency, the head of the Spanish Government, Mr. Felipe González, who stated that technical co-operation "...should not be considered as a form of benevolent assistance or condescending instruction but rather as the vital contribution of industrialised countries to the achievement of one of the basic rights of nations: the right to development".

As a result of the implications of this right to development, we lent our support to the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment held here in Geneva last November; I had the honour to preside over that meeting which was attended by government, workers' and employers' delegations from many industrialised and developing countries, and the representatives of at least ten international economic organisations. The Meeting considered the present world economic situation in the light of the social objectives of the ILO, and the implications of international trade, financial and monetary practices on employment and poverty.

There is no doubt that the conclusions reached by that Meeting are extremely positive in recognising that the indebtedness of developing countries affects their levels of employment and the welfare of workers; therefore, there is a need for the ILO, alone or together with other international organisations, to promote, to foster and stimulate growth. It is also a source of satisfaction for us that there is the possibility that these conclusions may be included in the ILO's future activities and even incorporated in the ILO's new strategy for the Fourth Development Decade.

There is no doubt that human rights are a common responsibility; their full realisation and application in the increasingly difficult world economic situation, characterised by the marked injustice between a minority of countries becoming ever-richer and a majority of countries becoming ever-poorer, demands of the ILO an extraordinary effort of imagination in the quest for a necessary consensus on ethical solutions. When I say ethical, I mean equitable, just and worthy solutions to one of the fundamental problems in the process of development. To put it more bluntly, this problem is the absence of hope in the poor countries of obtaining the essential material prerequisites for human dignity, which is an essential condition for liberty, equality and ultimately, the true enjoyment of human rights.

As painful as it may be to say so, the principles of international solidarity have been somewhat forgotten. At least solidarity as we understand it: the effective assistance and co-operation between countries. On the contrary, then is an unsatiable and unjust extraction and transfer of resources from the poor countries to the rich countries.

My country is an example of this. In four years it has paid more than 30 billion dollars in servicing its foreign debt. Of this sum only 5 billion dollars have gone towards the repayment of debt; the remainder has gone to paying interest. This debt servicing accounts for 73 per cent of our total foreign currency earnings. And if the situation is so difficult in a country such as our own, which is relatively well developed, imagine how it is in countries which are less developed.

As was rightly said by the Director-General in his Report, more than 900 million persons live in conditions of extreme poverty in the countries of the Third World, and there are more than 500 million under-employed workers. The unjust trade relationship between countries makes the guarantee of the right to work a chimera, an utopia.

The ILO will have to explore and exhaust all avenues to promote the re-establishment of this ethical foundation of solidarity and co-operation between countries.

The delegation of Venezuela considers that human rights can only be effectively respected in those countries which enjoy a political system that can guarantee freedom in all its manifestations – freedom of expression, assembly, association and religion – that can uphold social and legal equality without discrimination on grounds of race, sex, creed or social condition. At the same time, the political system requires the essential material goods which guarantee human dignity, in other words the right to health, education, work, social security and rest. In short, the right to liberty with prosperity, or, if you will, the right to freedom with development.

Even if this seems ambitious, it will not suffice. We must also have the political will to promote this freedom with development, with a just and equitable distribution of wealth, in order to achieve the ILO's cherished objective of social justice.

Political freedom, economic development and social justice constitute the tripod upon which the Venezuelan delegation believes the dream of all can be realised: that is the dream of peace and happiness of man.

For that reason we call on the ILO, this great melting pot of mankind, to step up its efforts to achieve this goal we have yet to reach.

Interpretation from German: Mr. TEGTMEIER (Secretary of State for Labour and Social Affairs, Federal Republic of Germany) – First of all, on behalf of the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany, may I associate myself with the numerous speakers who have congratulated you, Mr. President, on your appointment. I am confident that under your leadership this 75th Session of the International Labour Conference will be successful in contributing toward the improvement of the living and working conditions of workers throughout the world.

For this, indeed, is the aim and the task of our Organisation. You, yourself, said words to this effect in an interview you gave recently to Neues Deutschland and in your statement at the beginning of this Conference. We took great interest in this statement, in which you paid tribute to the work of the ILO. You rightly appreciated the importance of tripartism for our work. As you also pointed out, this implies the autonomy of each of the three groups: governments, employers and workers. I would like to agree with you on this point. Only if these groups can take decisions independently, can we promote the aims of the ILO in true and constructive dialogue and co-operation. Positive dialogue is the decisive feature of all our efforts in ILO meetings and procedures, including, as you rightly said, the supervision of the application of standards. I was also happy to note that the recognition of the role of the ILO is shared by the East European countries, who supported your candidature, and by other member States, I therefore hope that in this spirit we can achieve positive results in this Conference and in our future works.

This year the Director-General has entitled his Report Human rights – A common responsibility. As usual, the Report of the Director-General is a yardstick by which we can measure social problems throughout the world. The theme of human rights is, of course, an ambitious one. It indicates especially, the heavy moral, political and intellectual dimensions within which we have to view our work. The Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the ILO Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise, Convention, (No. 87), were adopted forty years ago. Both documents give occasion to reflect on the basic questions of our work.

The realisation of human rights is one of the major themes of our time. Hardly any aspect of our political life is of more concern to individuals States and organisations. At the same time, human rights are the expression of an intellectual and moral conflict, however, they also are a legal basis – an increasingly firmer basis – enabling us to cope with specific requirements and destinies. Respect for human rights presupposes that the respect for fellow man is a basic principle of society. The Roman philosopher Seneca said: Homo homini sanctus.

We therefore believe that human rights have their root in human nature, and in man's intrinsic dignity; they are inalienable rights. Human rights take precedence over the rights of States. They are valid throughout the world and at all times, irrespective of the social order. It does not matter whether they are anchored in the positive right of the law of a State or not.

In time, human rights, which were first recognised in natural law, were written down; they became positive law.

The fact that they were transformed into positive law governs our work at the International Labour Conference.

At this forum, we draw up standards which are a challenge to member States; they are able to make these standards binding. And I believe that an impressive body of standards has been built up over almost 70 years, which also applies in the field of human rights. Examples of this are the Convention on freedom of association, on the elimination of discrimination, on equality of opportunity and the abolition of forced labour. The ILO has given effect to the rights set forth in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, in so far as they come within its terms of reference. This is a major achievement which calls for recognition. However, as the Director-General points out, on the one hand human rights are solemnly proclaimed and accepted and, on the other hand, they are frequently flouted. Therefore, human rights have to be a theme for discussion wherever they are subject to violations, whenever freedom of the individual and their organisations is threatened and wherever basic social rights are denied. The Director-General's Report unfortunately bears adequate witness to this, to quote only a few examples. A basic right of workers and employers, namely the right to associate freely in associations and trade unions and to negotiate freely are inexistent or not sufficiently guaranteed in many member States.

There are, in some instances, gross violations of the principle that all people are equal. I am thinking especially about the policy of apartheid in South Africa in this connection. The Government of the Federal Republic of Germany, and especially the Federal Minister of Labour, Mr. Norbert Blüm himself, are taking a close interest in all matters connected with this policy.

However, there are still great differences from one country to another as regards the quality of working conditions. Workers' unemployment, sickness and old age insurance is inexistent or inadequate in many countries.

Throughout the world, more than 500 million people are either without work or underemployed. The right to employment is far from being guaranteed. Unless we respect basic human rights, especially in the field of labour, there can be no social justice. Only where workers and employers can freely organise and where they can defend their interests in independent associations and trade unions; only then can there be social justice. Freedom of association calls for freely established and representative associations which can act in full independence. This is the call made in Convention No. 87, which may be described as the Magna Carta of the ILO.

Governments which forbid or suppress free associations, persecute trade unions or employers or chain their organisation to the State, cannot achieve social justice. This failure to respect our common ends calls for sharp criticism by the international community.

We therefore proclaim our solidarity with all those who cannot take a free decision and especially all persecuted trade unionists. Wherever freedom is subjected to censorship or state disciplinary measures, we must voice our disapproval and protest. Whoever remains silent in the face of oppression and persecution shares in the guilt. Human rights are indivisible; wherever in the world human rights are violated, we must oppose this action. We are not interfering in the inner affairs of other States when we raise our voices against the failure to observe human rights; this attitude only reflects our solidarity with other human beings.

Those who are without work or who are underemployed cannot feed themselves or their families. Not every job is worthy of a human being; it is therefore important to specify that the right to work is the right to productive and freely chosen work. Degradation and exploitation at work degrade a man; they are the remnants or new forms of slavery. That is why the ILO rightly devises standards for humane working conditions.

Making work more humane also implies, first and foremost, the protection of workers' health; for it is the highest good of man and it would be inadmiss-able, as the Pope once said, if raw materials were refined in a factory but the workers were degraded in the process.

We cannot let a day go by without trying to reduce the number of accidents and the number of risks to health.

Social policies, unfortunately, are also often aimed at repairing the damage which has been done. However, labour protection is a field which gives us an excellent chance to tackle the problem at the root; in other words, to prevent sickness and disease, from occurring at all. Labour protection also bears witness to the fact that health and efficiency are not irreconcilable. It is calculated that the cost of accidents that have not been prevented in my country amounts to 20 billion dollars a year; in the member States of the European Community, this represents something like 100 billion dollars a year.

If we are to act in the cause of both humanity and industrial efficiency, efforts devoted to bringing about an internal market in the European Community should be accompanied by energetic efforts to ensure the social protection of labour.

I am pleased that at this Conference, you are discussing a Convention on safety and health construction, with a strong emphasis on labour protection. My Government would be happy if at each session of the Conference, labour protection could be given the priority it deserves. It is not just a question for a few technical experts; in view of the suffering inflicted on workers and their families who suffer occupational disease and injury, or even lose their lives, we have an opportunity for practical altruism. We shall not achieve more humane working conditions by merely making political statements; we have to draw up and respect specific standards. You are working towards this goal in Geneva with devotion and a will to close co-operation. Your standard-setting activities ensure economic and social conditions which meet the demand for social justice, without which human rights are impossible to achieve.

Until very recently, the achievement of human rights remained within the narrow framework of national States. The League of Nations did not manage to produce a declaration of human rights. Only in the wake of the terrible events of the Second World War was there a wide discussion of this question, which then found expression in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights in 1948 and later in other conventions such as the International Covenants on social and civil rights of 1966, in regional human rights documents and the European Convention on Human Rights.

The first sentence in the Preamble of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights of 1948 says that human rights are the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world. Similarly, the Preamble to the ILO Constitution of 1919 states that: "Universal and lasting peace can be established only if it is based upon social justice".

Can we achieve this end in view of the realities depicted in the Director-General's Report? How can we turn human rights, recognised as such, into realities?

The Director-General in his Report, this year, has found the right answer. Human rights are a common responsibility. I hope that by the end of this Conference, we shall go home aware that we are equal to the challenge given to us in Geneva and have made progress in this direction.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – I would like at this juncture to make a comment on the conduct of our debates.

Article 14, paragraph 7, of the Standing Orders stipulates that interruptions and audible conversations are not permitted. I would like to remind you of this provision and ask you to observe it in our further debates.

SECOND REPORT OF THE FINANCE COMMITTEE OF GOVERNMENT REPRESENTATIVES: SUBMISSION AND DISCUSSION

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – The next item on our agenda is the second report of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives.

I call on Mr. Dasanayake, Government delegate, Sri Lanka, Chairman of the Finance Committee, to present the report.

Mr. DASANAYAKE (Government delegate, Sri Lanka; Chairman and Reporter of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives) – I have the honour to submit to the Conference the second report of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives.

This report, which has been circulated in Provisional Record No. 18, contains the Committee's recommendations for action by the Conference on items referred to it by the Governing Body. The proposals submitted to the Committee concerning the composition of the Administrative Tribunal of the Organisation and the adoption of the Financial Report and Audited Financial Statements for the 60th Financial Period (1986-87) were adopted by the Committee by consensus.

The general discussion on the proposed incentive scheme for early payment of member States' assessed contributions, set out in paragraphs 4 to 49 of the report, revealed a wide range of views on the concept of and on the operational details of the scheme. At the completion of the Committee's discussion a record vote has held, the result of which was: 50 member States in favour, 6 against, with 8 abstentions. Details of the vote appear in Appendix IV of the report.

The proposals concerning the Programme and Budget for 1988-89 that were presented to the Finance Committee comprised a $1.9 million reduction in the 1988-89 Programme and Budget; a $15 million reimbursement to the Working Capital Fund in place of the $25 million required under the Financial Regulations; and an addition to the 1988-89 Programme and Budget of $26 million to cover the effect of the depreciation of the dollar against the Swiss franc.

The Committee hear with interest statements by the Director-General, by Mr. von Holten, representing the Employer Vice-Chairman of the Governing Body, and Mr. Muhr, the Workers' Vice-Chairman; these statements are summarised in paragraphs 57-73 of the report.

In response to the view put forward by many member States that the proposed reimbursement to the Working Capital Fund should be further reduced, the Director-General proposed an additional reduction of $7 million, to bring to a total of $17 million the reduction in the reimbursement to the Working Capital Fund. At the same time, the Director-General stressed that the reduced Working Capital Fund level exposed the Organisation to difficulties in treasury management and he urged all member States, particularly the larger contributors, to pay their outstanding contributions as soon as possible. The Director-General also emphasised that this further reduction in the level of the Working Capital Fund was on the understanding that a long-term solution to currency fluctuations would be approved by the Governing Body in November and by the Conference next year.

At the completion of discussion the reduction of $1.9 million in the 1988-89 Programme and Budget was adopted by consensus. A record vote was taken on the resolution concerning the reimbursement to the Working Capital Fund in 1989 and the result of the vote was 60 member States in favour, 5 against, with 18 abstentions. Details of the vote appear in Appendix VI of the report.

A record vote was also taken on the resolution concerning the Programme and Budget for 1988-89. The result of the vote was 54 member States in favour, 18 against, with 11 abstentions. Details of the vote appear in Appendix VII of the report.

The resolutions recommended for adoption by the Conference appear at the end of the report.

Before I conclude, allow me put on report my sincere gratitude to all members of our Committee for the magnificent co-operation they extended to me. I wish to thank the Vice-Chairman of our Committee, Mr. Labat, the distinguished Government delegate of Uruguay, for the assistance and support he gave me. I would like to express my thanks to the Director-General, Mr. Blanchard, who addressed our Committee on more than one occasion and provided it with useful insights and valuable information. I also thank Mr. von Holten, the Employers' Vice-Chairman of the Governing Body, and Mr. Muhr, the Workers' Vice-Chairman of the Governing Bodies for their contributions. My most sincere thanks goes to the Secretariat whose excellent support and assistance greatly facilitated my task as Chairman. In particular, I wish to thank Mr. Ahmad, the representative of the Secretary-General of the Conference on my Committee, and his colleagues, including the Legal Adviser. Last, but not least, my sincere thanks go to all those who rendered yeoman service behind the curtains such as the interpreters, translators and those who prepared the documentation after working diligently late into the nights.

Finally, I would earnestly commend the Conference to adopt the resolutions contained in the second report of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives and would appeal strongly to all Governments and Employers' and Workers' delegates to support them as an expression of solidarity with the aims and ideals of our Organisation.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – The second report of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives is now before the Conference.

Mr. von HOLTEN (Employers' delegate, Sweden) – I would like to inform the Conference that the entire Employers' group discussed the proposed resolutions this morning and will support them all. We join with the Chairman of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives in the sincere hope that the Conference will adopt them unanimously.

Interpretation from German: Mr. MUHR (Workers' delegate, Federal Republic of Germany) – As customary the spokesmen for the two non-Government group have had the opportunity to be heard by the Finance Committee. My own statement is summarised in paragraphs 72 and 73 of the report and so I will not repeat them. I have asked for the floor now to appeal to you to support the resolutions. I am counting on the support of the Workers' group and I hope that nobody will be influenced in the course of the vote, for I believe that the ILO must have the necessary financial resources to carry out all its tasks fully.

I call on everyone to support these resolutions, if possible unanimously.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. LUNA (Government adviser, Colombia) – On my own behalf, and as co-ordinator of the government delegations of Latin America, the government delegation of Colombia wishes to clarify the following points with respect to the serious financial difficulties facing the International Labour Organisation and some of the proposed resolutions adopted by the Finance Committee of Government Representatives at the proposal of the Governing Body of the Organisation, contained in the Provisional Record No. 18.

First of all, at this difficult time, our delegations restate their adherence to the Constitution of the Organisation to the principles of social progress inspiring it and to the programmes which are being undertaken by the Organisation in furthering these principles.

Secondly, we feel we should recall the wise principle according to which budgets of international organisations must be adapted to the real economic possibilities of contributor countries. The persistent world economic crisis continues to affect the developing countries ever more intensively, especially because of the drop in their exports and international commodity prices, as well as the monetary and balance-of-payment problems caused by the excessive burden of external debt and the arbitrary increases in interest rates and exchange rates in international trade. It has been necessary in our countries to adopt painful austerity measures to public expenditure in our countries, which call for tremendous sacrifices from our people since they are most severe in their effects on persons who are economically weak and therefore depend to a larger extent on public investment in order to meet their basic needs. These policies for rationalising of expenditure naturally affect the budgets of the international organisations, especially in the case of the ILO, as the currencies of our countries are being devalued against the dollar, and the dollar in turn is being devalued vis-à-vis the Swiss franc in which the expenditures of the Organisation are calculated and our contributions suffer doubly from this twofold exchange rate effect.

Thirdly, our delegations recognise the value of the efforts which, since 1986 and at this Conference as well, have been made by the Director-General for the biennium 1988-89 in order to rationalise the expenditures of the Office and to reduce the amounts of the contributions requested from member countries in order to combat the budget crisis and financial problems of the Organisation, caused essentially by the fluctuations in the exchange rate of the dollar to the Swiss franc and the serious delay in the payment of contributions due either to the measures taken by some major contributors or to the material difficulties of the developing countries because of the deterioration of their economies.

Fourthly, the need for the Office to make greater efforts to deal with the burden of this financial crisis has been pointed out by our and other important delegations from various regions of the world at last year's Conference, at subsequent sessions of the Governing Body and in the Finance Committee of Government Representatives at this Conference. Furthermore, we have insistently drawn attention to the probability that, by the end of the 1988-89 biennium, even greater imbalances will have been accumulated which will therefore exacerbate the problems for the following biennium unless even more valient measures are taken as of now to reduce the administrative expenditure of the Organisation.

Fifthly, however, the ILO bodies I have mentioned, in their resolutions on the financial problems referred to, have only taken into account to a very modest extent the need to reduce the budgetary burden of the Organisation. In particular the Finance Committee of Government Representatives of this Conference first of all did not understand our proposal that the Chairman of the Committee, through a Working Party, which might be called "Friends of the Chairman", as is customary in international meetings, made up of representatives of groups of Employers and Workers from the various regions and of the Office itself, should study the possibilities of greater budget cuts, of really substantial reductions in the administrative expenditures of the Organisation, that would not appreciably affect the technical programmes. The Committee, after dismissing this opportunity for consensus and sound economics, and rejecting by a vote the proposed amendments of other major delegations, supported by our own, designed to comply at least in part with the principle of rationalisation of expenditure, adopted two proposed resolutions which the plenary now has before it. One is to increase the operational fund by $8,059,627, while the other proposes a $26 million budget increase for the present biennium to make up for exchange rate fluctuations. If these proposed resolutions are adopted by this plenary, a new increase in contributions for the Organisation will be placed on the shoulders of the contributors of our countries, that is essentially on the workers and employers themselves.

Sixthly, as was said in the Committee, our delegations endorsed the consensus on the proposed resolution for a $1.9 million reduction in programmes for the present biennium, although we feel that these reductions are inadequate for the reasons which were fully expressed when this was discussed in the bodies I have referred to, at which our delegation and other major delegations made proposals for further specific essential and substantial reductions.

Seventhly, our delegations call for a record vote on the proposed resolution for the $8,059,627 increase in the operational fund and we say that we shall abstain in this vote. This abstention is explained by the fact that, on the one hand, our delegations approve of the $7 million reduction from the original amount presented to the Finance Committee in the Provisional Record No. 2, since this is a step forward. On the other hand, we feel that the resolution to increase the fund could have been deferred for a year, given that the Organisation has already gone through a year with a $12 million fund and could have continued for another year on the same amount, with heavy restrictions on the use of the fund.

Eighthly, our delegations request a record vote on the resolution calling for a $26 million budget increase for the current biennium to make up for exchange rate fluctuations. For reasons already set out, including the fact that this increase is being carried out on a budget which was deemed excessive in June 1987 by a large part of the Conference, our delegations announce that we shall vote against this resolution.

Ninthly, and lastly, our delegations restate their position with respect to the need for tripartite work from now on, in order to achieve a consensus for measures which will combat the excessive expenditure for the current biennium and set expenditures for the next biennium at a level of austerity and efficiency corresponding to the real ability of member States to contribute to the Organisation, without, of course, jeopardising the technical programmes required to achieve social progress which are constitutionally undertaken by the Organisation.

Mr. HEWITT (Government adviser, United Kingdom) – Those Government representatives who attended the Finance Committee, and they are all here present in the plenary, know well the position that the United Kingdom Government representative took in that Committee on the two issues of the replenishment of the Working Capital Fund to bring it to a total of $20 million in 1989 and the request for compensation for exchange rate losses of $26 million also in 1989.

Our position is fully and correctly reflected in paragraphs 93 and 94 and in paragraphs 156 to 159 of the Finance Committee report. I need not rehearse our arguments here. I should, however, say that we are not convinced that the Office itself could not have taken on more of the financial burden and of the problems facing the ILO. Nor are we convinced that the supplement to the Working Capital Fund to bring it to a total of $20 million in 1989 is a necessary requirement, when the ILO will have managed throughout 1988 with a Working Capital Fund of $12 million.

As I understand it, we are going to be asked to vote only on the resolution concerning the Programme and Budget for 1988-89. The additional $26 million sought there is, of course, only part of the increase in assessed contributions which will be levied on member States in 1989, the total amounting to $34 million. I have already made it clear that my Government would have been able to support a total increased assessment spread among all the member States of $26 million. Since the sum has now been exceeded, I regret that we have no alternative but to vote against the resolution on the Programme and Budget, although I should stress that we fully support the programme reductions of $1.9 million in 1988-89 as set out in the resolution concerning a reduction in the Programme and Budget for 1988-89.

Mr. DANIELSSON (Government adviser, Sweden) – I am making this statement on behalf of the Government delegations of the five Nordic countries.

The Nordic Government delegates would like to express their satisfaction with the outcome of the discussions in the Finance Committee on the questions related to the Programme and Budget for 1988-89. Although we would have preferred that a larger degree of consensus had prevailed in the Committee, we nevertheless are of the opinion that the decisions the Conference is now about to take represent a reasonable balance between the various interests concerned. The approval of an additional assessment of $26 million to cover exchange rate fluctuations during the current biennium means that the principle of safeguarding the Programme and Budget against currency variations is upheld. This means of course an extra burden for member States. On the other hand, the Organisation is sharing this burden through the commitment by the Director-General to absorb any further exchange rate losses during the biennium. The proposal to replenish the Working Capital Fund up to $20 million represents in our minds a minimum of what is required to make it possible for the Fund to meet its primary task, that is to regulate the cash flow during a calendar year.

The Nordic Governments are concerned that the financial crisis of the ILO may be only in its early stage. If no major improvement occurs, it seems inevitable that the Governing Body and the Conference will have to consider programme implementation reductions. The only way to avoid this is for all member States to live up to their financial obligations and pay their assessments fully and on time.

Finally, the Nordic Government delegations support the second report of the Finance Committee and recommend its adoption, including all the resolutions contained therein.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. KOSTINE (Government delegate, USSR) – In connection with the voting that will take place on the Programme and Budget and the resolutions for 1988-89, I am empowered, on behalf of the Government representatives of the socialist countries, to say the following.

Our delegations are concerned at the complicated financial situation of the Organisation and also at the continued increase in budget contributions. We appreciate the efforts of the Director-General in seeking opportunities to reduce the heavy financial burden on member States of the Organisation. A correct step has been taken in that direction with the Director-General's proposal during this session to make further reductions in the Working Capital Fund. However, we feel that those reductions could be bigger, particularly given the measures that have been taken to stabilise the budget in the long term. Furthermore, discussions by government representatives in the Governing Body and the Finance Committee have shown that economies were desired by others which went further than the reductions in the Working Capital Fund.

Our delegations note the Organisation's financial difficulties and, in the light of that fact, the socialist countries have already made their contributions in full for the year 1988 and are further prepared to assist the Organisation to find a constructive solution to the financial problems.

We should like to point out that the contributions made include the means for financing the activities the ILO has undertaken. We hope that the dialogue in the Employers' group will develop and that the problems raised by the directors of socialist enterprises will be quickly solved. That would be in the interest of constructive co-operation in the ILO.

As for the efforts of the Secretariat, we feel that the measures proposed to seek economies generally are not adequate in view of the scale of the increased financial burden placed on member States. Having said that, as far as the resolutions relating to the financial period 1988-89 are concerned, we are going to abstain. This is an abstention which concerns the substance of the question, and not the quorum rule as applied in the ILO.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – We shall now proceed to the adoption of the report, and of the resolutions annexed to it. As regards the resolution concerning the Programme and Budget for 1988-89, there will be a record vote in accordance with the Standing Orders.

First of all, if there are no objections, I shall take it that paragraphs 1 to 181 of the report are adopted?

(Paragraphs 1 to 181 of the report are adopted.)

Resolution concerning the composition of the Administrative Tribunal of the International Labour Organisation

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – May I take it that the resolution concerning the composition of the Administrative Tribunal of the International Labour Organisation is adopted?

If there are no objections, I take it that the resolution is adopted.

(The resolution is adopted)

Resolution concerning the proposed incentive scheme for early payment of member States' assessed contributions

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – May I take it that the resolution concerning the proposed incentive scheme for early payment of member States' assessed contributions is adopted?

I give the floor to Mr. Martins, Government delegate, Brazil.

Mr. MARTINS (Government delegate, Brazil) – I am speaking on behalf of the Brazilian Government delegation and should like to support the statement made by the representative of the Latin American States. But I should like to state to the Conference that my delegation cannot join the consensus on this resolution. As we stated in the Finance Committee, we cannot give our support to the proposal regarding this incentive scheme.

We consider that this plan is an unrealistic and unfair solution to the problem of late contributions, since it does not take into consideration the different aspects of some countries' financial role. It does not take into consideration the difficulties of some member States (especially developing ones) in fulfilling their foreign currency financial obligations. Also, it does not take into consideration that, for political reasons, some very important contributors do not pay their contributions in time, and that an incentive scheme will not change the situation. Moreover, it disregards the real reasons for the financial crisis facing the Organisation, insofar as the plan does not offer an adequate solution in our view.

For this reason, my delegation cannot join in the consensus on this resolution.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. MEZA SOZA (Government delegate, Nicaragua) – The delegation of the Government of Nicaragua wishes to express its agreement with what has been said by the delegation of the Government of Brazil concerning the resolution of the proposed incentive scheme. We consider that this resolution is not consistent with the financial situation and the difficulties experienced by the developing countries. We therefore wholeheartedly endorse what has been said by the representative of the Government of Brazil, and cannot join in the consensus on this resolution.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mrs. HERNANDEZ OLIVA (Government adviser, Cuba) – On behalf of the delegation of the Government of Cuba, I would like to explain our position with regard to the resolution concerning a proposed incentive scheme for early payment of member States' contributions. My delegation feels that this scheme does not address the underlying situation which arises from the financial situation of the member States which are behind in their payments, especially that of developing countries which face great economic difficulties in their national budgets.

This scheme would benefit only a group of countries which, perhaps for political or other reasons, have delayed their contributions. That is why we cannot join in the consensus on this scheme.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mrs. CLAUWAERT GONZALEZ (Government adviser, Venezuela) – My delegation wishes to support the comments made by the spokesman of the Latin American group at this session of the Conference.

The delegation of Venezuela opposed the resolution concerning the incentive scheme at the 239th Session of the Governing Body and in the Finance Committee of this Conference.

The scheme does not take into account the reasons for which many member States cannot pay their contributions on time. We consider this scheme to be discriminatory, and for this reason we shall not join in the consensus on this resolution.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. SALVADOR CRESPO (Government adviser, Ecuador) – As the delegation of Ecuador said in the Finance Committee, our country is opposed to the proposed incentive scheme because it is not equitable. To be equitable, the scheme should take account of the capacity of each member State to pay. In many cases member States are unable to meet their obligations to the Organisation for economic or administrative reasons. That is why our country cannot join in the consensus which has been requested on this resolution.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. CHUBURU (Government adviser, Argentina) – The position of the Argentinian delegation is described in paragraph 11 of Provisional Record No. 18. Our delegation does not believe that this scheme will lead to improvements in the financial situation of the Organisation.

If this resolution had been put to a vote, we would have abstained, given the trial nature of the scheme, and awaited word of its results during the 1989-90 biennium, before taking a final decision. This decision will be conditioned by the concepts which were set out previously by a number of Latin American delegations, and by the results of the implementation of this scheme, which we do not expect will be positive.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. VILLARREAL (Government delegate, Panama) – The delegation of Panama will not join in the consensus on this resolution because it does not take account of the specific realities of each country and because it applies the same yardstick to countries which have the capacity to pay, yet delay in paying their contributions. We wish to make our position clear, as we have in other meetings.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – I give the floor to Mr. Wayarabi, Government adviser, Indonesia, on a point of order.

Mr. WAYARABI (Government adviser, Indonesia) – My delegation would like to know whether are we in the process of voting or of hearing explanations of vote. Or have we already adopted the resolution by consensus?

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – Let me explain the situation as clearly as possible. We are considering the adoption by consensus of the resolution under discussion and noting the various delegations' reservations. If there are no further observations, I shall take it that the resolution concerning the proposed incentive scheme to encourage early payment of member State's assessed contributions is adopted, subject to the reservations expressed here by various delegations.

(The resolution is adopted.)

Resolution concerning the Financial Report and Audited Financial Statements for 1986-87

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – May I now take it that the resolution concerning the Financial Report and Audited Financial Statements for 1986-87 is adopted?

If there are no objections, I take it that the resolution is adopted.

(The resolution is adopted.)

Resolution concerning a reduction in the Programme and Budget for 1988-89

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – May I now take it that the resolution concerning a reduction in the Programme and Budget for 1988-89 is adopted?

If there are no objections, I take it that the resolution is adopted.

(The resolution is adopted.)

Resolution concerning reimbursement to the Working Capital Fund in 1989

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – We now come to the resolution concerning reimbursement to the Working Capital Fund in 1989, and I would remind you that Mr. Luna, Government adviser, Colombia, has called for a record vote. We shall therefore proceed to a record vote on the resolution.

I give the floor to Mr. Muhr, Workers' delegate, Federal Republic of German, on a point of order.

Interpretation from German: Mr. MUHR (Workers' delegate, Federal Republic of Germany) – As we all know, record votes last at least an hour and this would take us well into the lunch hour. There is therefore a risk that a vote taken now would fail because of the absence of quorum. I therefore propose that the record vote be postponed to this afternoon's meeting.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – If there are no objections, we shall resume our discussion at 3 o'clock and start the record vote on this resolution. I take it you agree.

(The Conference adjourned at 12.45 p.m.)

Twenty-fifth sitting

Wednesday, 15 June 1988, 3.15 p.m.

Presidents: Mr. Beyreuther, Mr. Adiko Niamkey

SECOND REPORT OF THE FINANCE COMMITTEE OF GOVERNMENT REPRESENTATIVES: DISCUSSION (cont.) AND ADOPTION

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – As was decided, we shall now continue our discussion of the second report of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives.

We have already examined and adopted the report up to paragraph 181 and we have adopted by consensus the first four resolutions annexed to it. We shall now proceed to a record vote on the two remaining resolutions.

RECORD VOTE ON THE RESOLUTION CONCERNING REIMBURSEMENT TO THE WORKING CAPITAL FUND IN 1989

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – We shall now hold a record vote on the resolution concerning the reimbursement of the Working Capital Fund in 1988, at the request of the Government adviser of Colombia, Mr. Luna, on behalf of the Latin American group of countries.

(A record vote is taken.)

(The detailed results of the vote will be found at the end of the record of this sitting.)

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – The results of the record vote on the resolution concerning reimbursement to the Working Capital Fund in 1989 is the following: 360 votes in favour, 8 against, with 47 abstentions. As the quorum is 261 and since the required two-thirds majority has been attained, the resolution is adopted.

(The resolution is adopted.)

RECORD VOTE ON THE RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE PROGRAMME AND BUDGET FOR 1988-89

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – We now proceed to the record vote on the resolution concerning the Programme and Budget for 1988-89.

(A record vote is taken.)

(The detailed results of the vote will be found at the end of the record of this sitting.)

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – The results of the record vote on the resolution concerning the Programme and Budget for 1988-89 are as follows: 301 votes in favour, 42 against, with 33 abstentions. As the quorum is 261, and since the required two-thirds majority has been attained, the resolution is adopted.

(The resolution is adopted.)

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – I give the floor to Mr. Wayarabi, Government adviser, Indonesia to explain his vote.

Mr. WAYARABI (Government adviser, Indonesia) – I will briefly explain the vote of abstention cast by my Government delegation on the two resolutions concerning reimbursement to the Working Capital Fund in 1989 and the Programme and Budget for 1988-89.

While my delegation understands the reasoning behind these two resolutions, we could not have given our consent to these measures since this would have meant that developing countries would be further burdened by additional contributions to the ILO.

Indonesia, like many other developing countries, has limited resources at its disposal and is particularly severely affected by fluctuations in the rate of exchange between our own national currency and those of other nations. In short, we do not enjoy the necessary economic conditions which permit us to finance an increase in the Programme and Budget of the ILO. I have to state, therefore, at this juncture, that we are unable to contribute more to the ILO's Programme and Budget than we have done in the past.

We would therefore urge a revaluation of the priorities of programmes and activities of the ILO in order to effectively assist us in reducing unnecessary expenditure. In view of this, my delegation is of the opinion that savings should, firstly, be made in administrative areas and with this in mind a reduction in the levels of the ILO meetings in Geneva might be appropriate in order to assist us in our task of finding the level of the Programme and Budget to ensure the optimum functioning of the ILO.

Secondly, we would argue that it would be prudent to identify those programmes which would be implemented only if the necessary funds are available. Programmes such as those benefiting developing countries such as those relating to technical co-operation and on the other hand are of vital importance to developing countries and we would urge that no reduction be made in these important areas. It is for these reasons that my delegation abstained to both resolutions.

Mr. MARTINS (Government delegate, Brazil) – According to instructions from my Government, I would like to put on record the position of my delegation on the adoption of the resolution concerning reimbursement to the Working Capital Fund in 1989 and in the Programme and Budget for 1988-89.

The Brazilian Government delegation wishes to state that it has abstained on the resolution concerning reimbursement to the Working Capital Fund in 1989 of an amount of almost US$8 million. The Brazilian Government delegation does not totally agree with the explanations given to the Financial Committee in order to justify the need to establish a level of about US$20 million for the Working Capital Fund.

The Brazilian Government delegation would have preferred that no definitive decision be taken on this matter during this session of the Conference and that more detailed elements on this subject be presented during the 241st Session of the Governing Body next November. Meanwhile, no reimbursement would have been made and the ILO's Working Capital Fund would remain at its present level of about US$12 million until the next session of the Conference in June 1989. The Brazilian Government delegation also wishes to express its deep concern regarding the use of the Working Capital Fund which is not aimed at replacing the non-payment of contributions by member States.

Finally, the Brazilian Government delegation wishes to call the attention of the Conference to the difficult economic situation that very many member States, mainly developing ones, are facing now. We therefore express our concern on the adoption of solutions which are not solving the serious financial problems of the Organisation but only representing an additional and unbearable burden to member States.

Concerning the vote on the Programme and Budget, my delegation would like to state that we voted against the resolution for the following reasons: the decision of transferring to member States the amount of US$26 million due to exchange rate fluctuations is the easiest one but not the wisest one, for it disregards the real meaning of and the deep reasons for the economic and financial crisis that assails the Organisation. Many member States, mainly developing ones, are now facing a very difficult economic situation which affects severely their capability of accomplishing their foreign currency financial obligations. Therefore, every additional burden on their assessed contributions to the ILO's budget will certainly have unbearable results and in consequence these countries will face new and serious problems to pay their contributions. The wisest solution would have been to examine ways and means of absorbing the amount of US$26 million through, for instance, as pointed out by many other member States' delegations, important reductions in the budget.

For these reasons, the Brazilian Government delegation has supported the proposal made by the Latin American group within the Finance Committee concerning the examination of the whole budgetary matter on a tripartite and informal basis.

We hope that this suggestion will be duly considered in the future by all tripartite delegations as a positive contribution in the identification of the essential needs of the Organisation and the necessary cuts in its expenditure, taking into account its serious financial problems and the financial capacity of payment of its member States. We are firmly convinced that the Organisation cannot spend beyond the financial capacity of its member States.

Finally, I request that the position of my delegation on the matter be duly and fully reflected in the record of this meeting.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – We have now come to the end of our discussion of the second report of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives.

I would like to thank the Chairman of the Finance Committee, Mr. Dasanayake, as well as the members of the Committee, for the work done in this connection.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – We now continue with the discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Interpretation from Portuguese: Mr. GODINHO GOMES (Minister for the Civil Service, Labour and Social Security, Guinea-Bissau) – May I be allowed to associate with those who have had the honour of speaking in this assembly and present to the President and his assistants on behalf of my country and on my own behalf our greetings and congratulations for their well-deserved election to office in the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference.

I should like also to congratulate the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Blanchard, for his valuable and relevant Report in which he has dealt wisely and clearly with urgent matters which are of great interest for all those who struggle, in this world full of contradictions, for a new economic and social order. The member States, organisations and social partners will find in this Report a guide for their reflections on the most varied forms for implementing the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the principles of freedom of association.

If our topic is human rights and freedom of association, it is necessary to speak in the first place of the policy of apartheid which is a crime against humanity and which embodies all the crimes against the rights of the human being, against peace and against progress. It would not be right to overlook the efforts and persistent action of the ILO in defence and in the protection of human rights, particularly in South Africa, which culminated recently in the Tripartite Conference on Action against Apartheid.

My country, which has recently emerged from a long and devastating struggle for national liberation, could in no way ally itself with the sad situation which prevails in South Africa. For this reason, as an independent and sovereign country which 14 years ago won its independence through the blood of its sons, we cannot consider developing relations with South Africa so long as the racist regime prevails. The evils of apartheid have not vanished. Those who died to re-establish the rights of human beings in Guinea-Bissau would rise from their graves if we failed to condemn apartheid. For this reason the action of my Government under the Programme of the United Nations against apartheid is very clear. We have no relations whatsoever with Pretoria. We fully support resolution 435 on the independence of Namibia.

The Republic of Guinea-Bissau recognises and supports, without reservation, the liberation movements, the Black trade union movement as well as the popular movements struggling for the establishment of human rights in South Africa and Namibia. Thus, we condemn all forms of aggression against the front-line States and the barbarities practised against Angola and Mozambique.

We also manifest our solidarity with the struggle of the Palestinian people and the leadership of the PLO and all the people who struggle for their freedom.

In this year, 1988, 40 years after the adoption by the United Nations of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, 40 years after the adoption by this Conference of Convention No. 87, one of the most effective instruments in the implementation of human rights, generally understood as the right of each individual to a guarantee of personal freedom, justice, minimum labour conditions, full employment and equality of opportunity, we cannot fail to refer, with sadness, to the imbalance of development which prevails between the countries of the North and the South, and to the major social and economic problems faced by countries of the African continent: the deficit in their balance of payments, their great external debt, the falling prices of raw materials they export to the industrialised countries. These factors, together with natural calamities, make it difficult to ensure endogenous and self-supported development for the African countries and impossible to accumulate capital for investment and jobs creation, the basis for the guarantee of human rights. To speak of human rights, of freedom of association, without speaking of the creation and guarantee of decent employment, is sheer utopia.

How can the countries of the Third World, and in particular the African countries, create employment, guarantee the right to minimum labour conditions, occupational safety and health and decent wages, if they spend and transfer huge sums for the payment of debt and interest on the debt, sums which could be used otherwise for investments to create jobs?

In fact, for human rights to attain their true dimension and become a common responsibility, it is necessary for the ILO to increase its multilateral technical co-operation to support the development of less-developed countries, in the context of a new economic and social order.

Technical co-operation should be considered as a means of strengthening of the macro-economic administration of needy countries, in the restart of their economy and stabilisation, while taking into account the following conditions: restrengthening the technical and institutional capacity of the departments responsible for the economy; guidance for new activities designed to create durable structures to provide financing for the development of human resources through the implementation of a coherent, co-ordinated and intensive programme for training; provision in contracts with foreign consultants for on-the-job trainings for national cadres; national technicians should have access to the advice of such consultants and to studies to be carried out with a view to tapping human resources.

In order to achieve these basic conditions, technical co-operation should contribute to the efforts of countries in the search for solutions to bring about stability and the productivity of national technicians, especially in the field of housing, equipment and consumer goods; these conditions would make it possible for them to enjoy equal opportunity with respect to the technicians of more advanced countries and develop their capacity and initiative in order to enhance productivity – the sine qua non of development in African countries.

Guinea-Bissau, one of the least advanced countries, has suffered considerable economic imbalance. Besides, it is now facing with courage the challenge of economic reconstruction; its economy has been greatly affected by the struggle of national liberation. Thus, in trying to find solutions for the deep economic and financial crisis which is the result of its fragile economy and overly centralised administration, the Government has adopted a vast programme of structural adjustment in order to stabilise the economy in the short term and as a long-term project to create conditions of self-development to increase production and agricultural exports, to reduce the weight of the public sector in the economy and to increase the role of the State in the new, dynamic process of development.

The execution of a programme of structural adjustment, although it has begun producing some sort of positive results, could give rise to serious social problems, particularly through its negative social impact, that would affect the more vulnerable sectors of the population, with the greatest incidence on the urban sector, inasmuch as the programme of structural adjustment seeks to reduce substantially the number of public officials. In this situation, the Government must, on the one hand, find appropriate machinery to minimise the negative effects of the structural adjustment programme, and, on the other hand, obtain structural funds and have access to technical and multilateral co-operation in the form of financing and assistance to solidify and strengthen the reorganisation of institutional structures in the national economy.

In a few weeks in the city of Geneva there will be a round table on Guinea-Bissau at which many of the countries and organisations which are here today will be represented. We hope that, in the light of the situation I have just described, they will reflect seriously on the form of their participation and the means which they will make available in order to support the Republic of Guinea-Bissau in the restart of its economy, having as a primary objective the creation of better conditions of life for the workers, the creation of employment and the defence and guarantee of human rights.

My Government will submit several development projects to the donor countries in the course of this Round Table. These projects will concern job creation necessary for economic and financial consolidation and stabilisation and development of the Republic of Guinea-Bissau. We appeal to all member States and organisations represented here to support our country in this difficult moment.

To the ILO, and particularly to the Director-General, Mr. Blanchard, we also address our appeal, convinced that as an organisation which defends human rights, it will not fail to make aware countries and organisations of the manner in which they can help us to find a solution to the difficult situation in which our country finds itself. Thus, the ILO will contribute to improved conditions of life of workers and promote peace and progress in Guinea-Bissau.

We would not like to conclude without expressing our great appreciation of what has been done by the ILO in dealing with problems of developing countries, especially those of Africa. In spite of the financial difficulties of our Organisation, its activities and technical co-operation reflect the concern of the ILO in trying to find solutions which make it possible to reinforce the capacity of intervention of government departments that seek to realise the ideals and objectives of the ILO.

In this context, my country has benefited from precious support in the execution of several projects and we would like to continue to deserve this special attention and benefit from increased assistance which gives us the necessary means to reply to the new requirements of development and to implement our programme of structural adjustment.

Interpretation from Farsi: Mr. KAWESH (Chairman of the State Committee for Labour and Social Security, Afghanistan) – First of all, I would like to express, on behalf of the delegation of the Republic of Afghanistan, my sincere congratulations to the President on his election to the presidency of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. I am confident that his guidance will lead to the success of the Conference. Availing myself of this opportunity, I wish to assure him of the full co-operation of the delegation of the Republic of Afghanistan in ensuring that the deliberation of the Conference are crowned with success.

The Report of the Director-General indicates that important issues in the area of labour, particularly the problems which face the workers of the world, have been assessed. Similarly, the activities of the ILO during 1987 are described in the Report. On reading the Report, it becomes clear that, within the framework of the International Labour Organisation, a number of major successes in the areas of labour and social questions have been achieved. The subjects included on the agenda for this year's session of the Conference are of special importance. I hope that, with the all-round co-operation of the representatives of the member countries attending this Conference, positive steps will be taken towards solving these problems and that the activities of this international Organisation will, as always, focus on the real improvement conditions of the work and life of the world's workers.

In our country, ten years of revolution focused on actively seeking ways and means to do away with socio-economic backwardness, as a result of which noticeable changes and developments have taken place in the socio-economic, political and cultural spheres.

Improving the performance of the economy constitutes the main thrust of the people's struggle to consolidate the gains of social progress achieved through our revolution. Despite the extensive damage done to the economic structure of the country as a result of the undeclared war, the Government and the People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan (PDPA) were able to achieve socio-economic growth and to regain and even surpass the pre-revolution level in all spheres of material production.

Success in these respects depends partly on the soundness of economic policy and national planning, together with the wisdom and dynamism of the masses, and partly on private enterprises and the assistance of friendly countries. The gross national product increased last year by 11 per cent as compared to 1979. Similarly, agricultural and livestock production showed a growth rate of 9 per cent and industrial production of more than 15 per cent. National income recorded a growth rate of 10 per cent while foreign trade turnover increased more than one-and-a-half times as compared to 1979. Behind these figures, qualitative changes are now being carried out in the economic life of the country. In this connection, the growing role of Afghan producers, the State's ever-increasing attention to the requirements of the private sector and other socio-economic foundations have played a part.

The new Labour Code of the Republic of Afghanistan and the Civil Service Code, in the preparation of which national conditions, and international norms and standards were taken into account, were put into effect last year to equitably regulate working relations. The new Labour Code, without any discrimination, guarantees the right to work, wages and salaries, vocational training, safety, voluntary participation in trade unions, the improvement of knowledge, a system of social security, pensions and other rights and privileges. According to the new Labour Code, all categories of workers are entitled to a permanent pension.

The salaries of Workers and government employees and student grants have been increased and pensions improved. Profound changes have been made in recent years in the public health sector. A new state system of free medical services open to all has been set up.

In order to stabilise prices and ensure a steady supply of essential goods for people at fixed prices, the Government of the Republic of Afghanistan has taken numerous measures, including subsidies for products to satisfy basic needs, the expansion of consumer stores, etc. In order to improve the living conditions of the people, among the many measures adopted by the national economic institutions, a new and progressive system of wages has been established and various types of material incentives provided to employees. An all-round campaign against illiteracy is continuing. Three and a half million persons have become literate through literacy courses. Free higher and vocational education has been improved considerably at all levels. The number of students in general education has gone up by 900,000. The system of intermediate and higher education has been considerably expanded. In order to train professional workers and craftsmen, the Ministry of Technical and Vocational Education was established last year. The new Ministry plans to play a significant role in the co-ordination of programmes related to vocational training and the training of skilled workers in accordance with the requirements of production enterprises.

In order to provide more favourable conditions for the education of the students, the State has undertaken to bear the cost of their breakfast, uniform, textbooks and other teaching materials. This demonstrates the fact that the Republic of Afghanistan devotes special attention to the upbringing of the young generation in the country who are the future builders of Afghan society.

In recent years, the Government has given great assistance to peasants and the rural community. For instance, the State has distributed free of charge to farmers thousands of tonnes of improved seedlings for cotton and sugar beet production and thousands of tonnes of chemical fertiliser at subsidised prices. It is to be noted that the State has recently established a new institution for the implementation of land reform and water resources distribution, according to which the land and water relationship in the Republic of Afghanistan will be organised in line with the tenets of national reconciliation (characteristic of the national and democratic April Revolution), the establishment of a national order and of a consolidated economic system aimed at the enhancement of the level of agricultural production.

The Government of the Republic of Afghanistan attaches special importance to the promotion of the workers' movement in the country, because this has an very important part to play in improving the living conditions of the workers and all the toilers of the State – in the mixed, co-operative and private sectors – and increases the contribution of the working class to the construction of the new society.

The Constitution of the Republic of Afghanistan and the labour laws of the Republic have made provision for the formation of trade unions and social organisations. Emphasis has often been laid on state assistance in the formation of these organisations in order to promote their role in all spheres of life – political, social, economic and cultural. For instance, besides the trade unions, other societies and social organisations can be mentioned such as the association of lawyers, the unions of writers, of journalists, and of artists, the transport union, the democratic organisation of youth, the country-wide council of women and the union of craftsmen.

The world community is aware that, on the basis of the valuable initiative of the Government of the Republic of Afghanistan and in accordance with the will of the Afghan people, a policy of national reconciliation aimed at the cessation of war, bloodshed and fratricide was declared in the country on 15 January 1987.

The principle of national reconciliation is the only alternative to war, and is the heartfelt desire of our people manifested in clear and unmistakable terms. The cessation of hostilities, non-recourse to armed struggle and bloodshed in solving present and future issues in Afghanistan, the assurance of just representation in political and economic affairs, no assignation of guilt for past political activities, a general amnesty, the preservation and strengthening of historical, national and cultural traditions, and respect for and the observance of the sacred religion of Islam are among the main objectives of national reconciliation.

The policy of national reconciliation, announced about one and-a-half years ago, is the manifestation of the new political thinking. The adoption of practical measures for its realisation has further promoted the status and credibility of the Government of the Republic of Afghanistan and the PDPA. It holds out dazzling spectacular prospects on a world scale. Only the policy of national reconciliation can prepare the ground for the political settlement of the situation in Afghanistan, the cessation of war and fratricide, country-wide peace, the establishment of the coalition Government with the participation of all segments of the Afghan people, including opposition of a free, independent and non-aligned Afghanistan on a multi-party political and multistructured economic basis.

In Afghanistan today, all sectors of Afghan society and all nationalities have equal political, economic and social rights. All Afghans have equal opportunities to work for the benefit of their country and to participate in political life. The national reconciliation policy enables Afghanistan's problems to be settled by Afghans themselves.

The new Constitution of the Republic of Afghanistan is the most important national document, in which the legal principles of the economic, social and cultural policy of Afghan society and the values of national reconciliation have been enshrined. This was approved in the historical Loya Jirgah or General Assembly meeting held at Kabul in November 1987. The new Constitution not only introduced into the country an advanced stage of democracy, as a result of which all political and social forces in society have the possibility of participating in the political and legislative activities, and also share on an extensive basis in political power and in the coalition Government of the country. With each successive day, the peace progress takes concrete shape and yields new and positive results.

The formation of the National Assembly or Parliament through free and democratic elections is another manifestation of the peace process: 1,600,000 persons, comprising 75 per cent of all the country's citizens eligible to vote, took part in the elections. The social composition of elected deputies and senators reflects a national consensus at the highest organ of state power. This legislative body comprises 65.8 per cent intellectuals, 8.5 per cent workers, peasants and craftsmen, 2.7 per cent private entrepreneurs and traders, 10.4 per cent tribal personalities, and 4.7 per cent nomads.

The society's political pluralism indicates that, among the members of Parliament, there are 56 per cent non-Party members, 22.6 per cent representatives of the PDPA, and 3.1 per cent members of the Revolutionary Organisation of the Working People of Afghanistan and the Peasants' Justice Party of Afghanistan.

Following the approval of the Constitution of Afghanistan, and the election of the President of the Republic at the Loya Jirgah or the General Assembly, last year at Kabul, the formation of the National Assembly is of special political significance for the revolution and the consolidation of the principles of administration through the votes of the majority of the people of Afghanistan.

The policy of national reconciliation, in addition to encouraging the opposition to cease its hostility, has also responded to the hopes of tens of thousands of Afghans who have returned home from self-imposed exile.

The conclusion of the Geneva Conventions is the outcome of the policy of national reconciliation and of the efforts made by all the countries concerned and the world community, particularly the efforts of His Excellency Javier Pérez de Cuellar, Secretary-General of the United Nations, and his personal representative, Mr. Diego Cordovez, for whose good offices in the political settlement of the situation of Afghanistan the people of Afghanistan are most grateful. The Accords have been qualified as an important turning-point in reducing and doing away with regional conflicts. They are also regarded as a specific expression of new thinking in world politics. The efforts of the Government of the Soviet Union, emanating from the new political thinking for the solution of international and regional conflicts, enjoy a special significance in world affairs. In pursuance of these Accords, the return of the Soviet military contingent to their peaceful country began on 15 May 1988. The application of the Geneva Accords makes it possible for our countrymen residing away from their homeland to return home voluntarily, and no one has the right to prevent them from returning.

The Government of the Republic of Afghanistan has adopted special measures to receive the returnees. The office handling the affairs of returning compatriots was established at the level of a ministry. At the present time, over 300 reception centres, equipped with all facilities, are ready to welcome the returning compatriots and provide them with all kinds of material and moral assistance. It should be pointed out that the measures taken by the State of the Republic of Afghanistan are not sufficient for the requirements of all the returnees. In view of this situation, the assistance of the United Nations Organisation and other international organisations and friendly countries in the world would be most welcome to tide the country over during the next few years.

The International Labour Organisation, with the means at its disposal, can provide multilateral assistance through its technical, management and training programmes, such as the assignment of experts and the provision of workers' education and training facilities for the large number of professional and skilled workers required for building a revitalised labour force.

Mr. NSIBANDZE (Minister of Labour, Swaziland) – It is for me a great honour and indeed a privilege to have this opportunity of addressing this august assembly, on my behalf and on behalf of the delegates from the Kingdom of Swaziland.

I bring with me, Mr. President, to you, to the Director-General and to the distinguished delegates of this 75th Session of the International Labour Conference, greetings and good wishes from my Head of State, His Majesty King Mswati III, and the people of the Kingdom of Swaziland.

May I at this juncture seize this opportunity to congratulate the President on his election to the seat of presidency. I have no doubt that under his wise leadership, guidance and judgement, this august assembly will be assured of constructive and fruitful deliberations.

It might interest you that only a few years ago the Kingdom of Swaziland had the rare honour to have one of the longest reigning monarchs, the late His Majesty King Sobhuza II. Swaziland, once again, is proud to be ruled by the youngest reigning monarch, King Mswati III.

Not long ago, His Majesty celebrated his twentieth birthday. The young King is devoted to the principles and the philosophies laid down by his late father and, to this extent, he is prepared to lead his people under conditions of social, political and economic stability, while continuing to maintain and strengthen the cultural and traditional institutions that make the Swazi people a peaceful and homogeneous society.

To meet these objectives, the Swazi people stand united and fully supportive of the monarchy, thus giving our King the moral and material support that he needs to lead the nation.

Swaziland, like many other developing countries, has a mixed economy. Some of the major industries include, inter alia, the mining of such minerals as asbestos, coal and some diamonds.

On the other hand, the manufacturing industries have a mixed bag of agriculturally-based enterprises, such as sugar production, cotton production and ginning, processing of wood pulp, fruit canning, and a variety of others.

It is primarily from these mining and agricultural industries that Swaziland earns its foreign exchange. The country's rainfall is sometimes erratic; however, on occasions when we have adequate rainfall, we get good harvests of such crops as cotton, maize, sorghum, etc.

Increasing use is being made of the country's river systems, to develop irrigation to lessen the dependence on dry-land farming.

Swaziland has recently completed the implementation of the fourth national development plan. Our planners and economists are currently making detailed analyses of the failures and achievements, with the object in view of strengthening or restructuring those programmes and projects that deserve such attention, as well as placing into sharp focus the desired targets.

An important feature that has clearly emerged is the fact that the economic performance of the country has, during the last few years, fluctuated very sharply.

The average annual growth rate of our Gross Domestic Product (GDP), expressed in real terms, has been estimated at approximately 5 per cent. This compares favourably with other developing countries. However, like the rest of the world, Swaziland has had to grapple with the problem of rising inflation. The rate of increase in consumer prices also rose considerably in recent years, giving us an estimated annual average of 14.4 per cent.

The country's infrastructure continued to improve, albeit at a steady pace. One of the important developments which came as a relief to farmers and to farm produce retailers alike was the establishment of the country's central market, controlled and directed by a newly-established agricultural marketing board.

It is anticipated that similar marketing facilities will be provided in the rural development areas at strategic places to bring the marketing of produce as close to the producers as possible.

In order to obtain this objective, the extension services have been improved both in terms of numbers and of coverage to respond effectively to the needs of the rural communities.

Alongside the expansion of the extension services has been the creation of multipurpose co-operatives, serving as main agents for the supply of agricultural inputs, credit and marketing systems.

One of the important resources that any country can boast of is its manpower resources. In order fully to utilise our manpower to achieve increased levels of social and economic development, we need to have a healthy population. We also need to address ourselves to the challenges posed by a seemingly high population growth rate, estimated in the region of 3.2 per cent per annum; and an infant mortality rate which is around 15.6 per cent per annum.

Not only do we have to produce adequate and balanced food supplies, we need to strengthen our preventive and curative health programmes to respond to the WHO call of health for all by the year 2000.

The country has continued to strengthen its education and training plans and programmes, principally to achieve universal primary education, to provide primary school children with further education and training concomitant with the abilities and the needs of the individual, taking into account the overall manpower needs of the country.

To achieve these noble objectives, plans are underway to co-ordinate and to harmonise the operations of all the institutions engaged in the field of education and training.

Swaziland has recently conducted a population census. During the past ten years, the Swazi population has been in the vicinity of about half a million people. Although the final analysis of the recent census has not been completed, the indications are that, given the annual growth rate, there has been a rapid increase in the numbers of our people. It is also estimated that about 15 per cent of the entire population are absorbed in the formal employment sector, and the remainder are dependent on subsistence and on semi-commercial farming in the rural sector.

Permit me at this point in my address to mention that Swaziland enjoys a comparatively good industrial relations system, based on the attainment of social justice. Our labour laws provide adequate and comprehensive machinery and procedures for redress in the event of a grievance or dispute.

An aggrieved person or group of persons has a right to be heard at the lowest forum and, if satisfaction or mutual agreement is not achieved, the grievance is brought before the industrial court. This court is the final level in the system. However, if the court's findings are not satisfactory on a point of law, the aggrieved person has the right to be heard in the high court.

Our labour laws, which were structured to be mutually supportive, reflect a number of the ILO Conventions and Recommendations. Another feature of our industrial relations system is the provision of a two-tier system: that is, where an industry union (unions are industry-structured) has not obtained recognition from the employer, a works council undertakes the responsibility of negotiation and collective bargaining.

At present, the industry unions are in the process of organising themselves and already there are those that have been granted formal recognition by their employers or by the association of employers. The attainment of a formal recognition by the employer is considered as a major breakthrough by the unions, and enhancing industrial relations.

Although there is some imbalance in terms of strength and understanding in the industrial relations machinery between the employers and the unions, the Government refrains from imposing collective bargaining as a compulsory measure. This is, of course, in keeping with this Organisation's spirit of good will that, as much as possible, the Government should adopt a low profile to allow employers and their employees to reach voluntary agreements. Strikes and lock-outs are not a common feature but where and when they occur they are often resolved amicably.

The problem of retrenchment and redundancies occasionally occurs where there is either a partial or a full closure of business. Like other countries, we suffer from the effects of unemployment and therefore every means possible is made to protect existing job opportunities. Similarly, every effort is made to diversify and provide skills to promote self-employment and self-reliance. We also operate a system of wages councils to determine minimum wages and other conditions of service. Government encourages and promotes the tripartite structure so that it works towards the attainment of harmonious industrial relations and the enhancement of human rights.

In conclusion, permit me to extend on my behalf and on behalf of my delegation special tribute to the Director-General and to congratulate him for the substance and the clarity of his Report. It is indeed a comprehensive and masterly document and under your wise guidance I am confident that this august assembly will continue to have fruitful deliberations so that member countries can all aspire towards the maintenance of peace and social justice for the total benefit of the international community.

(Mr. Adiko Niamkey takes the Chair.)

Mr. MIRZA (Government delegate, Pakistan) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I feel greatly honoured to have an opportunity to address the august international gathering of the leaders belonging to the world of work.

First of all, I would like to congratulate Mr. Beyruther on behalf of my government and my delegation on his unanimous election as the President of the Conference. I am confident that under his able leadership the deliberations of the Conference will be successful and I assure him of my own and my delegation's full support in the discharge of the business of this Conference.

I take this opportunity to felicitate the worthy delegations of member States of the ILO and express the hope that devotion to the cause of labour, show of respect for others' point of view and firm belief in the common good will help all of us in contributing towards a successful conclusion of the Conference.

Remaining true to its reputation, the annual report of the Director-General has objectively analysed an important subject, that is the question of human rights.

The Director-General deserves our tributes since he has done a great service to all of us present here by arranging a timely discussion of an issue of great importance. His analysis of the current global state of human rights successfully brings home the message that observance of the basic rights of man is the key to world peace, on which hinges the progress and prosperity of all mankind.

It is heartening to note that ILO has successfully led the international struggle for acquisition and observance of human rights. Its standard-setting activities, its crusade against apartheid, its constant global vigil against violation of basic rights of the working classes and its efforts towards establishing a better world of work, bespeak the valuable role which the ILO is and has been playing for the fulfilment of its noble objectives. It is, therefore, necessary that this sacred task must continue with complete devotion, vigour, dedication and broadest possible understanding which is essential for the success of initiatives that have been taken or are proposed to be taken in this direction in future. In this regard the concluding remarks of the Director-General are a source of great encouragement and satisfaction.

An important aspect of the ILO's activities is the promotion of respect for human rights in the Organisation's field of competence. We recognise the ILO's valuable role in promoting freedom of association, freedom of labour, equality of opportunity and treatment, right to work and right to adequate conditions of work which are the fields in which the ILO has decades of experience and has done work of excellence in setting international standards for observance of these rights.

I fully share the Director-General's views that progress towards realisation of human rights requires changes in social relationships and conciliation of conflicting interests. These changes call for continuous dialogue and political acumen to resolve them. I am sure that the ILO, by way of its tripartite structure, provides the best forum for the discussion of socio-economic issues which have been held in this house and have gone a long way in enlightening the governments, the employers and the workers as well as stirring the world conscience on important issues. As such, I express my full agreement with the urgent need of dialogue among the productive forces of the society in resolving a major issue such as the one under discussion now.

A number of harsh realities of the present-day world remind us that we are still far from achieving those cherished goals of freedom, justice and peace which require the recognition of the inherent dignity and of the equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human family. The Director-General's report quite candidly overviews the practices prevailing all over the globe, which gravely violate the basic human rights.

Human rights cannot be viewed in isolation, the prevailing socio-economic inequities at the national, regional and international levels ought to be taken fully into account. It is especially important to redress these inequities at the international level. The ILO should actively contribute towards the realisation of the right to development, which is an inalienable right of all people.

The Director-General's Report notes that, among Third World countries, unemployment is estimated to be about 70 million; 500 million are underemployed while some 900 million are living in extreme poverty. The lesson drawn from the Report is, however, clear: until and unless these millions of people are provided remunerative and productive jobs, the enjoyment of basic human rights will remain a far cry. The provision of jobs on a mass scale requires efficient management of the economies as well as a major effort in human resource development. Mere emphasis on economic growth in the national economic policies can lead to greater inequality of income and unbalanced growth. It is high time that national economic policies emphasise human resource development and social protection with a view to ensuring a balanced and equitable growth of the economy. This is the crying need of the hour and the ILO, which is a tripartite organisation, should play its due role in this regard through a coordinated effort so that the Governments, the employers and the workers all contribute towards this objective. The ILO should design intensive and extensive programmes aimed at human resources development in the developing countries.

Although the importance of human rights to the realisation of the ILO's objectives is well recognised, the ILO should not deviate because of the paucity of its resources from its original path of the protection of the rights of workers and alleviation of poverty. Of late the ILO has most commendably added employment promotion as a major objective of its activities. Let the ILO concentrate on this area and intensify its efforts to ensure protection of the rights of workers and promotion of employment. The promotion of employment would encompass programmes for human resources development, control of population growth, mitigation of the labour displacement effect of technological changes and improvement of social and economic infrastructure. While primary responsibility lies squarely with the developing countries themselves, it is also the collective responsibility of the most affluent among them to come forward and make sincere efforts to help the developing nations in their endeavour to modernise their economies and provide a decent standard of living for their people. The Director-General's Report has repeatedly emphasised this approach and, therefore, deserves the commendation of the developing States because it points towards a one-world approach. It is a matter of great consolation for us, the representatives of the developing nations of the world when the Director-General emphasises the need for greater international co-operation and I quote: "It involves both a far-sighted self-interest in bolstering the chances for a more stable community of nations enjoying reasonable prospects of sustainable well-being, and an element of generosity towards the weak and vulnerable."

The development efforts being made by the developing countries desperately need international support so that there may occur concrete and long-lasting improvement in the life standards of their masses. We are doubly indebted to the ILO for advocating the developing countries' just stand on a new world economic order as well as for its tireless efforts through its technical co-operation programme, aimed at helping its Third World members to pursue the task of economic development while strictly observing the international standards on human rights.

We in Pakistan are striving hard to build a society where basic social and economic rights of every individual are fully guaranteed so that everyone may contribute to the nation's prosperity. We are at the threshold of launching the Seventh Five-Year Plan and I am happy to inform this House that the Pakistan Government is taking significant measures to combat unemployment, which is one of the serious problems of the country. Some broad measures to be taken in this regard consist of: opening new areas for industrialisation; setting up of private investment banks; liberal credit schemes to expand small-scale industries; promotion of self-employment; setting up of 92 vocational and technical training institutions; opening new avenues for rural employment; and establishment of a special fund for development of human resources.

Pakistan has ratified more or less all the ILO Conventions which guarantee human rights like freedom of association, abolition of forced labour and non-discrimination in employment. The laws of the country guarantee minimum wages for the unskilled and various categories of skilled workers. Besides labour welfare measures like free medical treatment, old-age and invalidity pensions, maternity benefits, free education for workers' children up to any level, even postgraduation abroad, and extensive housing programmes are some of the statutory measures in force for providing better living conditions to the workers and their dependents. We acknowledge the contribution of the ILO in the form of technical assistance towards the formulation and achievement of the above-mentioned welfare programmes.

The most disturbing and heinous crime being committed against all mankind is the policy of apartheid being pursued by the racist regime of South Africa. Pakistan strongly condemns the Pretoria regime for its racist policies and practices. There is no doubt that the ILO has spared no efforts to put pressure on South Africa to change its policies of racial discrimination, yet we feel that complete success in this regard can only be achieved when all member States present here decide to act in unison and force the racist regime to abandon its policy of apartheid.

Another grave violation of human rights is being witnessed in the occupied Arab territories. Israel's list of atrocities against Palestinian people which continue to grow every day has left mankind in shock and dismay. It is the foremost duty of the world community to use all conceivable means to force Israel to end its illegal occupation of Arab territories and stop committing barbaric acts against the innocent people of Palestine. I urge upon the ILO to intensify its activities of monitoring the working conditions in occupied Arab territories so that the atrocities being perpetrated against the workers and all other inhabitants of the occupied territories are brought to an end.

The situation in Afghanistan has been a source of great concern to the international community. The recent conclusion of the Geneva Accords marks the first step towards the realisation of a comprehensive political solution to the Afghan problem. The complete withdrawal of the foreign troops would enable the Afghan people to exercise their right to self-determination. It is also our ardent hope that conditions of peace and normalcy will soon be restored in Afghanistan so as to enable the Afghan refugees, of whom over 3 million are in Pakistan, voluntarily to return to their homeland in safety and honour.

Before concluding my speech, I again wish all success to the deliberations of the Conference.

Interpretation from German: Mr. MARX (Employers' delegate, German Democratic Republic) – On behalf of the heads of socialist undertakings of the German Democratic Republic, I should like to congratulate you warmly on your election to the high office of President of this year's International Labour Conference. The course of the Conference so far has confirmed that you have led our discussions with great competence and tact. I wish you further success in your efforts to bring the Conference to a successful conclusion.

The Report of the Director-General clearly demonstrates that the ILO, in its almost 70 years of activity, has made significant contributions to the furthering of human rights. It contains interesting points for discussion on the way of the Organisation might continue in this work. It shows, furthermore, what challenges face the governments, the trade unions and of course also the heads of undertakings in the future.

In order to ensure that workers' basic rights are applied, it is vital that they should be enshrined in the Constitution, in legislation and other legal provisions. These legal guarantees express the recognition of a State of its duties in connection with human rights and raise them up as maxims of state policy. It is equally significant that fundamental rights which are anchored in law should find a practical application in every day life. In our experience the heads of undertakings have a very responsible duty to fulfil in this respect.

In the German Democratic Republic these heads of undertakings are not only responsible for raising productivity and increasing efficiency but, as managers of collective undertakings, they also have to create conditions whereby workers enjoy the application of their fundamental rights every day at the workplace. It is precisely this latter aspect which should have been given greater attention in the Report of the Director-General. The same applies to statements made by employers' representatives from the capitalist countries during the discussion.

In this context, I should like to explain in greater detail what is demanded of heads of socialist undertakings. In the German Democratic Republic, it is declared policy to safeguard at all times the right to work and to ensure full employment. This, however, does not happen a matter of course. The rapid development of science and technology in the German Democratic Republic has resulted in the annual dismissal of 250,000 workers from their jobs; what is more, approximately 3 per cent of our workers have been released due to rationalisation measures. It is the duty of a state-owned undertaking in my country to see that these workers find new jobs. Now, what are the consequences of this policy for a manager? He must take measures to inform the workers of any planned changes in time. This requires personal discussions. As a rule, when an undertaking takes a rationalisation measure, two or three workers have to acquire new skills and be prepared for new and different jobs. This implies obtaining their consent. Of course, other questions have to be taken into account and clarified, questions which sometimes have repercussions on family life.

These problems can only be solved if the workers concerned are involved in the process from the very beginning and if they work in close co-operation with the heads of the undertaking at every stage.

In the German Democratic Republic, in the years from 1981 to 1987, 540,000 workers changed their job in this way. In the case of more than 90 per cent of these workers, new jobs were found for them in their former undertaking; but even when they have to change undertaking, the head of their former undertaking is not freed from his responsibility of making sure that they continue to enjoy the right to work. His duty is, in co-operation with the labour exchanges and the competent state bodies, to offer the worker an appropriate new job which corresponds to his skills. In this connection, I would like to stress that this whole process of releasing workers and finding them new jobs makes great demands upon the planning of labour and vocational training.

Thanks to this process that I have just described, the workers of the German Democratic Republic know that scientific and technical progress is not directed against them but that all problems that arise will be solved in co-operation with them and to serve their interests.

At this stage, the question might be asked whether this is compatible with higher labour productivity requirements; to prepare for this eventuality, I would like to point out the following facts. During the past few years, the gross national product in the German Democratic Republic has increased by approximately 4 per cent per year, and this has been achieved exclusively through higher productivity. Our economic planning for the future is also geared to speeding up the pace of technological and scientific development, thereby increasing the possibility of greater improvements in living standards.

What I have just said about the right to work also applies to other fundamental rights of the workers, for instance, in the field of occupational safety. Here also, the head of an undertaking is responsible for ensuring, together with the workers, that the occupational safety and health standards established by law are respected. I fully agree with the Director-General when he says in his Report that there is no room for flexibility in standards which ensure safety and health at the workplace. It is also true that, in applying these standards, there can be no exceptions.

The accident figures in the German Democratic Republic show that, on the whole, our record is good. Since 1970, occupational accidents have been reduced by 42 per cent. While in 1970 there were 41 occupational accidents for every 1,000 workers, there were only 23.7 such accidents in 1987. The number of mortal occupational accidents during the same period of time was reduced by over half.

So far as my undertaking is concerned, where I am director of production, there were only had 12 occupational accidents for every 1,000 workers in 1987. This result, which is below the national average, shows the necessity of overcoming the disparity in accident levels. However, this alone is not enough because, in the final analysis, every accident is one accident too many.

Scientific and technical progress also creates new obligations for us in this field. New machines and equipment, new technologies and processes do not automatically create greater safety but sometimes even new hazards. We deal with this problem mainly by making occupational safety and health an integral part of research, development and construction. We are therefore trying to apply in advance to the principle of hazard-free technology.

However, damages, breakdowns and occupational accidents in my country have shown that great attention must be paid to the behaviour of the workers for their own protection. The manager must make full use of the subjective factor. This begins with his own attitude towards protection; he must set a good example, and transmit the proper instructions to every worker and, last but not least, ensure that these instructions and the regulations of the undertaking are applied.

In my contribution to this discussion I have stressed mainly the duties and responsibilities of the head of an undertaking in applying the fundamental rights of workers because I wanted to make it clear that there is ample opportunity for exchanges of experiences and co-operation with the ILO.

The new requirements brought about by the scientific and technical revolution also raise the question of whether the time has not come to draw up a Convention concerning the social and economic repercussions of scientific and technical progress and their mastery in the interests of the workers. Co-operation, however, requires participation on an absolutely equal footing by all and, in this connection, there are still a number of obstacles to be overcome – as is well known. In this context, I welcome the decision of the Appeals Board to grant the Employer delegate appointed by the Government of Nicaragua the right to participate with full voting rights in the Conference Committees.

Furthermore, I cannot avoid referring to the statement made by one of the previous speakers, who tried to disrupt the atmosphere yesterday with outdated words and to undermine our efforts at constructive co-operation. This merely proves that the realities, needs and developments of our times have not been understood. It would be desirable for the further proceedings of the Conference if we could concentrate on the items on our agenda.

In conclusion, allow me to state that the needs of socialist undertakings of the German Democratic Republic are ready at all times to participate actively in an exchange of experience and the elaboration of new instruments.

Interpretation from Italian: Mr. VANNI (Workers' delegate, Italy) – The most concrete way to celebrate the 40th Anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights adopted by the United Nations is as the Director-General decided, to take stock from the standpoint of social, economic and civil rights and the enjoyment of freedom, of the progress we have made and have yet to make in order to arrive at a suitable balance between principles and reality.

Undoubtedly the action of the ILO is one of the most appropriate instruments of the United Nations, but also of each country, to evaluate the results achieved. This action allows us to persevere in our continuing struggle against the always present attempts to subject human rights to political options and economic needs – human rights such as dignity, political and trade union freedom and freedom from want.

Positive results have certainly been attained, but they are continuously placed in jeopardy during crises and despite the obvious interdependence between economies and development, we are now faced with a serious underestimation of the need for ever-increasing international co-operation. Even within the ILO, as the Director-General tells us in his Report, the movement towards multilateral co-operation seems to weaken.

It is often a self-sufficient concept of economic and social policies which carries the day, particularly in industrialised countries. Such an attitude tends to block the standard-setting activity of the ILO and lend insufficient support to attempts to create bases for better employment policies or more expansive civil and trade union freedoms throughout the world.

This 75th Session of the International Labour Conference has on its agenda topics which are closely connected with the defence of human rights as we conceive of them in concrete terms. The promotion of employment and social security, safety in construction and the promotion of rural employment are a tangible aspect of defending human rights at the economic and social level.

The revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107), as well as the updating of the ILO Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa, are further steps to defend dignity and freedom by condemning all types of discrimination.

At the technical and political level, our aim is not to make of our decisions separate instruments which we use to deal with individual problems. Rather our decisions should become parts of a mosaic – our contribution to the ultimate, definitive recognition of human rights, whatever the colour of a man's skin and the nation in which he lives.

The tragedy in South Africa, the struggle of the workers in that country and the insane discrimination which still prevails, must mobilise all of us, whatever our own interests, to overthrow a regime which is a disgrace for all of humanity and which might well receive racial wars, which today, and not only in South Africa, threaten peaceful coexistence among people. These wars are a waste of resources which could be used much better to promote a balanced growth in the economy and the attainment of a great objective – freedom from want.

Freedom from want is not an abstract concept of the future of humanity. It is the only way to confront the problems of today. We cannot invoke the weapon of solidarity if we do not have a clear-cut idea of what its ultimate objectives are. Solidarity should not be an occasional instrument: it should be a moral value which unites mankind.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. LIPATOV (Government delegate, Ukrainian SSR) – Mr. President, first of all, I should like to join previous speakers in congratulating you and the other Officers on your election to the high offices of this Session of the Conference and express my conviction that under your guidance we shall be able to achieve some substantial, practical results in the interests of broad international co-operation in the social and labour spheres.

The 75th Session of the International Labour Conference is taking place in an important and responsible period, one that is witnessing the development and extension of political dialogue and in which we are jointly looking for solutions to the most pressing problems of the contemporary world and we are laying the foundations for new inter-State relations for the future.

In these circumstances, our country, guided by the principles of new political thinking, is perseveringly and systematically suggesting ways of setting up a comprehensive system of international peace and security, promoting a climate of confidence and good-neighbourly co-operation among all countries, irrespective of their economic system and social structure.

Our approach is based on an objective evaluation of the current situation and a desire to achieve an equitable balance between the interests of all countries.

Real progress has been made today in the field of nuclear disarmament, which seemed unattainable not so long ago. The actual beginning of this process was the ratification of the treaty on the elimination of medium- and shorter-range missiles.

It seems to me that against this political backcloth, when a need for change is being strongly felt in the world, favourable prerequisites are being created to give a fresh impulse to the development of international co-operation. This includes those spheres which fall directly within the competence of such an authoritative organisation as the International Labour Organisation.

Realising that, although the world today is one of contradictions but in many respects an interdependent and integrated entity, we must recognise that it is only through joint efforts that together the international community of nations will be able to surmount the negative trends emerging in the world economy, characterised by an exacerbation of socio-economic problems, a high level of unemployment, poverty, imbalance in trading, monetary and financial systems, the debt crisis and many other negative phenomena which are felt particularly deeply in the developing countries.

Enormous problems face the ILO in this respect. As previous speakers at this rostrum have pointed out, a good basis for a constructive exchange of opinions and defining guidelines for the future activities of the Organisation is given us by the Report of the Director-General – Human rights – A common responsibility.

We agree with the idea expressed in the Report on the indivisibility and interdependence of human rights in all their aspects and the inseparability of civil and political and socio-economic rights. We also share the idea of the inter-relationship that exists between respect for human rights and support for peace and stability and of the fact that in the realisation of human rights, a vitally important role is to be played by international co-operation and solidarity. We understand the note of alarm sounded in the Report in respect of the negative impact of the world economic crisis on the situation in the area of human rights and concern at the trend towards a decrease in the number of new ratifications of ILO Conventions in this important area.

Our interpretation of human rights and freedoms is thus, in many respects, in consonance with what is stated in the Report prepared for this session of the Conference. Nevertheless, we have the impression that in the interrelation between socio-economic and civil and political rights, a certain priority is given to the latter.

In our view, the ILO should concentrate its attention on questions of international co-operation in the area of socio-economic rights of the workers, because without real guarantees for those rights, declarations regarding civil and political rights acquire a purely formal character.

The International Labour Organisation must act as a generator of multilateral co-operation in the social and labour sphere so as to broaden and strengthen, first and foremost, the socio-economic rights of workers of all countries.

In connection with this theme, we think it appropriate to outline in a few words the essential features

Workers in general, and the Italian workers included, do not underestimate the problems we have to confront and their implications on the economic, social and political level, nationally as well as internationally.

Italian trade unions are profoundly convinced that solidarity has a specific cost, and each worker knows it well. The risk we are running is nevertheless very high. Without solidarity, it will be difficult to overcome the recession and the general drop in the level of respect for human rights.

There are 20 million unemployed in Europe; 30 million in the OECD countries and 70 million in the Third World, not to mention the indigent classes in the underdeveloped countries.

This situation increasingly alienates young people and women; casual forms of work appear with great impact owing to the new models of production which have become more common in the last decade.

We are often told to defend the status quo, to forget that it implies various models which provoke competition in the economic field, even among developed industrialised countries.

The standard-setting activity of the ILO must therefore continue to update obsolete Conventions to confront the problems arising from new production technologies, to protect the health of workers who are suffering from the deterioration of their environment and workplace to struggle against discrimination, to achieve equality of opportunity and remuneration, and finally, to strengthen social security, which has reached a critical juncture as a result of the natural ageing of the population and because of falling levels of employment. These are factors which highlight the need to find new forms of financing and solidarity.

New standards, however, confirm the need for supervision and must overcome the always-present obstacle of a slower rate of ratification. We are convinced that one of the most important tools for the ILO in this field is increased technical co-operation, on the one hand, and the correct functioning of tripartism on the other.

The tripartite nature of the ILO should encourage us, and trade unions in Italy are very aware of this fact, to overcome the notion that there is no room to regulate the new forms of employment and the flexibility our systems of production require.

We must indicate very clearly that this regulation should be subject to negotiation between the parties, and to clear-cut legislation at the national and international level.

Nowadays there are attempts to introduce illicit competition in the field of employment and labour costs; this jeopardises workers' efforts to deal with the new productive requirements of the post-industrial societies and the rules of the free market.

The need to increase productivity, even as an instrument renewed of development, would not derive lasting benefits, if that concept were to prevail.

The productivity of the system in each country or economic community is a fundamental premise if we are to finance a development policy which will overcome the present crisis and give a meaning to the objective of full employment, which is so cherished by the ILO.

We particularly appreciate the results of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment as well as the results of the Fourth European Conference which was designed to find points in common to manage technological progress and the compatibility between resources for development and those for social security.

At a time when governments, including that of Italy, show little inclination towards a more democratic economy in which workers participate in macro-economic decision-making, or towards a harmonisation of trends in development with appropriate policies, trade unions in Italy, diverse as they are, remain convinced that without a joint effort of governments, workers and employers, overcoming this crisis, which marginalises a considerable part of the population in each part of the world, will be increasingly difficult. This marginalisation finds expression in the present level of unemployment; it is caused by the pretext of providing a greater profitability to business, when in fact it is detrimental to human rights and particularly those of workers.

Full employment, the highest possible level of employment now – that is the essential objective towards which we should strive, with a profound conviction that it will alleviate social conflict and even bring about peace in the world.

The subsiding inflation in industrialised countries, even if foreign indebtedness in many developing countries remains an extremely serious problem, will enable us to eliminate recessionary policies which, as workers we have always struggled against, and to redirect resources towards collective consumption and investment. Such a result in the Italian experience was largely brought about by the willingness of workers to maintain wages at 1970s levels and to raise productivity. The same process, which has been deployed in many industrialised countries, has given even better results elsewhere.

Proper utilisation of resources thus made available, restoring to companies earlier levels of self-financing, present attempts to overcome considerable budget deficits which are very considerable in terms of the current account, better fiscal policies – these are factors which make it possible to take off and launch new forms of development and new opportunities for employment by extending the productive basis and adopting concerted policies at the national and international level.

The interdependence of economies increasingly requires the need for an international division of labour and co-operation for more global technological progress.

The transformation of the model of development and the outsourcing of certain processes have created new jobs which mobilise the ILO, not only as a watchdog, but also as regards vocational training.

Persevering in the experience of the high-level meeting, the ILO should seek greater harmonisation within the United Nations, mobilising the collaboration of financial institutions and those engaged in international trade. The ILO should further intensify its study and research activities to enable all countries to tackle the great problems which they face in a more harmonious fashion.

These problems include social security and its financing, technological progress and its relation to employment. A wide variety of solutions might contribute to additional imbalances at the social level and as regards international competition; this would further widen the gap between the wealthy and the poor and relegate the needy to eternal poverty.

of the processes now taking place in our country and which we are convinced are directly related to the question of human rights.

In conditions of the restructuring and further democratisation of all aspects of social life now going on in our country, the full and comprehensive guarantee of the rights and freedoms of the individual is becoming the most important feature of the level of development of the society and an indicator of the degree of social protection afforded to its citizens. It is precisely from this viewpoint that we consider today the standard-setting instruments that have been adopted in our country over the past two years and which reflect clearly enough our desire to increase the social activity of our citizens and to broaden the possibilities for the realisation and protection, by themselves, of their rights and freedoms, and also better regulation of the inter-relationships between the individual and society. Thus, the law on state enterprises (associations) which came into force on 1 January this year, consolidated the right of workers' collectives to elect their own managers right up to the general director of the enterprise and opened up for them broad possibilities for solving production and day-to-day social problems.

In connection with restructuring the management of the economy, a serious reform of labour legislation is taking place, and the basic innovation in this sphere is the removal of the legal obstacles which had previously fettered the initiative of enterprises, and deprived them, for example, of the opportunity to increase payment for highly productive labour and to introduce additional social benefits for all members of the collective or particular categories of workers and salaried employees.

Since May 1987 a law has been in force on individual labour activities. This law opens up new social opportunities for millions of Soviet citizens who are thus enabled to participate more actively, on a new basis in the economy of the country.

In March of this year, the 4th All-Union Congress of Collective Farm Workers adopted a new model Charter of Collective Farms which reflects the new conditions and methods of management, democracy and openness. Particular emphasis is placed on improving self-management and strengthening and developing the social rights and obligations of collective farm members. The Charter makes provision for the right of voluntary membership of the collective farm and clearly defines procedures for leaving the collective farm.

A few weeks ago we adopted also a law on co-operation in the USSR which defines, in accordance with the current stage of socialist construction in our country, the economic, organisational and legal conditions for the work of co-operatives. This document contains guarantees for the free choice of economic activities by co-operatives and makes provision for a broad measure of initiative and self-management.

An important element in the realisation of a basic right of the Soviet citizen – the right to work – was the adoption in December 1987 of a Decree on the provision of effective employment for the population, improvement of the placement system and increased social guarantees for workers.

In a short statement it is impossible to enumerate and comment on all the standard-setting instruments adopted recently relating to the social and labour spheres and making provision for our citizens' rights and freedoms. The important point is that, as part of the overall process of restructuring and acceleration of the socio-economic development of our society, the improvement of legislation has a positive influence on all aspects of social life.

We are already experiencing progress as a result of the process of restructuring. A radical economic reform is under way and the pace of economic development has increased noticeably. A change for the better is also occurring in dealing with top-priority social problems.

In the economy of the Ukraine the influence of intensification has grown and most of the plan targets for the first two years of the Five-Year Plan have been fulfilled and even been exceeded for a number of indicators.

In the Republic we are pursuing the consistent implementation of our social programme. We have been able to raise salaries of workers and salaried employees, wages for collective farm members and payments and benefits from social consumption funds earlier than was originally expected. We have exceeded targets in the provision of new housing, secondary schools, pre-school facilities, hospitals, out-patient stations and polyclinics.

Of course, we also have shortcomings and difficulties, but we face the future with optimism.

In accordance with international standards and conscious of the financial difficulties now being experienced by the International Labour Organisation, the Ukrainian SSR, the Soviet Union and the Byelorussian SSR have, as you know, fully paid up their contributions for 1988. Our countries believe that it is important to observe the financial rules contained in the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation. At the same time, we are concerned by the continuing annual growth of the ILO budget, which represents a serious burden for the member States.

The agenda of the Conference includes important problems whose solution would promote social guarantees for various categories of workers in many countries of the world. While viewing positively the standard-setting activities of the Organisation and considering that the process of ratification of ILO standards should be broadened, the delegation of the Ukrainian SSR wishes to express the hope that this session will come up with mutually acceptable and agreed solutions regarding new Conventions for the promotion of employment and social security as well as in respect of safety and health of workers in construction.

Allow me in conclusion to express the hope that this session of the General Conference will constitute a new phase in the activities of the ILO and will be marked by fresh approaches and a demonstration of good will so that it will be possible to achieve tangible results in continuing and enhanced dialogue and co-operation, which is the very purpose of our Organisation.

Mr. GOBLE (representative of the World Confederation of Organisations of the Teaching Profession) – Permit me, first of all, to extend the congratulations of my organisation to the President and other Officers of the Conference on their election and to wish them well in the exercise of their important responsibilities.

As on several past occasions, I feel it appropriate to begin by complimenting the Director-General on the excellence of his Report, the timeliness of his choice of theme, and the extreme pertinence of his observations.

The WCOTP welcomes the emphasis placed by the Director-General on the fundamental importance of human rights as the basis of all that the ILO strives to achieve. We share his concern for the deepening crisis caused, as he points out, by the gap between the principles laid down 40 years ago and the situation actually prevailing. As an organisation of workers in education we are increasingly conscious of that gap. Teacher leaders in prison or in punishment camps, in exile or under threat of assassination, and the families of those who have died for their belief in freedom of association, can testify to the consequences of being on the wrong side of the gap. Teachers frustrated by the manipulation of legislation to block their bargaining rights, teachers reduced to starvation wages and working among the families made destitute by the intensified drive for profit that is a feature of this decade, are well aware of the double standards which the Director-General deplores in his preface. Their story is clearly told in the current report of the Committee on Freedom of Association, and in the dossiers that are still under study by that body.

For workers in education, this 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Right to Organise Convention (No. 87) is not an occasion for congratulatory celebration, but a time to highlight the contrast between noble words and cynical acts, a time to demand honourable compliance with engagements freely entered into.

It is a time to observe that disregard and contempt for human rights continue to result in barbarous acts that outrage conscience; a time to challenge the member countries of this Organisation to measure their conduct against the standards of the Declaration of Philadelphia to which they profess adherence.

What we seek is simply stated.

We seek the release from imprisonment and detention of those whose only offence was that they sought to exercise the rights guaranteed by Convention No. 87.

We seek the freedom and the restoration to employment of those whose offence, as union leaders, was to criticise the priorities and policies of governments.

We seek an end to interference by governments in the administration and governance of trade unions, and to the attempts of governments to bring trade unions under political control or integrate them into party structures.

We seek an end to the recourse of governments to legislation, regulations or emergency decrees to deprive trade unions of the right to negotiate or the power to protest.

There are differences in the degree of outrage that our members suffer.

In South Africa the practice of apartheid continues to deny the concepts of human dignity and tolerance on which the claim to civilisation is founded. We associate ourselves fully with the policies and aims of the ILO. In our own domain we are advancing strongly towards the unity of purpose and action within that country that is essential for the creation of a free, non-racial society, but we insist that strategies for action must recognise the present fact that the cruelty and injustice of the system bear most heavily on the Black majority, and that the community must be the first and principal partner in our efforts.

In other countries repression may be less dramatically obvious, but it is the same basic rights that are at stake. We commend and share the concern of the ILO for those who have been marginalised by unbalanced development and unscrupulous competition.

We protest against policies of wage attrition, erosion of public services and reduction of employment which, in the name of productivity and the service of profit, continue to increase the numbers of the poor and homeless, and to impair the health and hamper the education of millions on every continent. We decry policies which make of labour not only a commodity, but a cost factor to be attacked. We strongly support the claims of aboriginal peoples not only to the educational and cultural rights that are the professional concern of our members, but to the protection of their health, their environment and their economic status against the rapacity of commercial interests.

In all this we look to the strong, the influential, the prosperous countries to take up again the leadership responsibilities that brought forth the fine Declarations of 40 years ago, and to use their influence to insist that these principles are indeed universal, transcending all pretexts of national sovereignty and cultural difference.

It is with profound dismay that we see some of these countries taking their place instead among the offenders, denying their own honourable achievements, meeting protests with contempt and indifference, and pursuing the deliberate purpose of weakening and undermining the defences of the trade unions. In that context, the recent findings of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, and of the Committee on Freedom of Association, with regard to the WCOTP complaint against the United Kingdom, are of the highest importance. We cannot overstate the importance of safeguarding the integrity of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98, which are more and more called in question.

In the name of the national teachers' unions of 110 countries, we join the Director-General in asking that this 40th anniversary be the occasion for the awakening of conscience and renewed dedication to the vision of the past and the objectives of the ILO. We pledge our support to that endeavour.

Mr. BAKER (Workers' delegate, United States) – I would like to address some of my remarks to the President of the Conference so that people do not get confused – they are not directed at brother Adiko, our colleague on the Workers' side, Vice-President of the Conference.

The 40th anniversary of the United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the ILO Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention (No. 87) is an occasion to reaffirm our commitment to the fundamental principles of human and trade union rights which they embody.

Words are important; but any set of words and statements in support of them must be judged in the context of actions, practices and institutions. In any society, the system of liberties is the system of restraints. Laws, procedures and institutions must exist which are strong and effective enough to restrain those forces which wield political, economic or military power.

This Organisation must function in the real world and not in some fantasy land. We must not allow ourselves to be seduced by mere words, even if these words are contained in a widely distributed newspaper interview. Prior to the Conference, there were discussions among apparently serious people about whether an interview cancelled out a memorandum, as if the two were chemicals which, in combination, form a neutral solution.

The memorandum had one important virtue; it was in harmony with the practices in those countries which supported it. There is a certain logic in denouncing tripartism in an international body if it does not exist at home and in attacking supervisory machinery that allows the ILO to examine implementation, which can cause discomfort to the ruling classes. Unfortunately, the credibility of the interview is undermined by practices which include maintenance of company unions, of legal systems without justice, and of political and economic structures that concentrate power in the hands of tiny elites and defend that power with all the tools and methods available in police States.

We have learned that the former Workers' delegate from one of the President's neighbouring countries and the leader of an important and free trade union has, once again, been denied the right to travel outside his homeland. This not only means that we at this Conference are denied the opportunity to hear views from that country which have not been blessed by the authorities, but it constitutes a violation of trade union rights as clearly established recently by the Committee on Freedom of Association. The United Nations Declaration of Human Rights also proclaims that "Everyone has the right to leave any country, including his own, and to return to his country". In fairness, and in recognition of consistency, it should be pointed out that the group of countries in question abstained when the United Nations Declaration of Human Rights was adopted in 1948, along with the Union of South Africa and one other country.

Nevertheless, words are not always totally without significance, and changes in tone and language, including emphasis on openness and democracy, give cause for hope that meaningful moves affecting human and trade union rights can take place and lead to effective protections and guarantees. Liberty is not only an individual right, but a collective necessity. Its absence limits the progress, development and sound functioning of society.

For those steeped in democratic traditions, there is a danger that, having expected so little from totalitarian States, the significance of small changes can be exaggerated and that hope can triumph over reality. The human and trade union rights instruments adopted 40 years ago remain valid and provide a fair way to measure progress. In the world community, there must be no second-class citizens. No country, regardless of its economic and social system, should allow itself to be demanded or patronised by those who expect from them lower standards in their observance of human and trade union rights than those which, by their very nature and essence, are universal.

The ILO, with its tripartite structure and its supervisory machinery, is uniquely equipped to contribute to the furtherance of human and trade union rights. Progress requires, however, that standard setting should advance at an adequate pace, that Conventions which have been freely ratified are observed, that efforts are made by Members to increase the number of ratifications, that the supervisory machinery is respected, and that all treaty obligations, including the obligation to make full and timely contributions, are honoured. No excuses are acceptable.

The Director-General's Report goes beyond basic and minimum standards to discuss developments that affect human rights in a broad sense. The Report mentions a deterioration in trade union strength in some industrial democracies. In the United States, multinational enterprises have played a role in that process.

There has been far too much useless propaganda against multinational enterprises over the years. They do not constitute an evil empire. However, it is not too much to expect that, when someone comes into your home, he will not befoul it. Nor should it be too much to expect that multinationals will not treat voluntary ILO and OECD instruments with contempt. In the United States, some multinational enterprises have contributed to a degradation of worker's rights and working conditions in important industries, and have undermined the competitive position of organised employers. In order not to appear to be spreading propaganda, it might be useful to give two concrete and current examples.

On 2 February 1988, the French-based company, Carrefour, opened a hypermarket of 15,000 m² in Philadelphia. All of the other supermarkets in the city are unionised. Management and labour have been working together well for decades. One organised supermarket has already gone out of business and another has reduced its hours. The company has refused even to talk to the union. The local manager was quoted in a newspaper as saying "I am not anti-union. I feel that we don't need the union. We want to keep our freedom and our flexibility". In France, the company has a reputation for being exceptional as well, but for maintaining better conditions and salaries than those prevailing in the industry and for having a good relationship with the union. American workers are not so lucky.

The Swedish-based multinational, Electrolux, has combined its acquisitions in the North American appliance industry into White Consolidated, Incorporated. The industry is largely organised. The company engaged one of the most notorious union-busting firms in the country, and one which had on numerous occasions led its clients in anti-union campaigns that were found to be in violation of the nation's labour laws. The vicious attacks on unions included the use of a film referring to workers who supported the union as "pushers", speaking of the dire consequences of organisation and warning that if unions achieve the results they want, we could become "like any workers' state in Eastern Europe". Supervisors had no choice but to join in the effort to convince and intimidate employees. The anti-union campaign, combined with expansion in states in the South where unions are weak, puts intense pressure on companies which respect the rights of workers and on their employees to respond to this unfair competition based on exploitation.

Other examples could be cited in such diverse industries as automobiles and motorcycles, rubber, cement and chemicals. Something must be done to revive instruments concerning multinational enterprises before they change their nature. Voluntary instruments are of no use if they only serve as a political shield to protect companies from mandatory standards without affecting their behaviour. As multinationals assume a greater role in the world economy, the ILO must act to influence their conduct. It is not only governments which can violate trade union and other workers' rights.

The human and trade union rights' standards established 40 years ago are a major and timeless achievement of the human race. The ILO must vigorously promote their respect, defend and strengthen its own machinery and adapt to the new conditions and developments which are both opportunities to extend the observance of human rights and threats of new violations. It is not the time for timidity or business as usual, or for the excesses of diplomacy. We must move forward to translate the words on human and trade union rights into rights in reality for many more millions on this planet.

Interpretation from French: Mr. KIMBEMBE (Government delegate, Congo) – It is a great honour and pleasure to address the 75th Session on the International Labour Conference on behalf of my country, the People's Republic of Congo.

Please allow me to join the numerous speakers who have preceded me in addressing, on behalf of my Government and on my own behalf, the heartiest congratulations to the President on his election to chair the proceedings of the 75th Session of the Conference.

Your personal competence and your profound experience of our Organisation give us reassurance concerning the success of the work of this session.

My congratulations also go to the Vice-Presidents whose assistance is so valuable to the President in carrying out his weighty and delicate task.

I should also like to present my compliments to Director-General, Mr. Francis Blanchard, and through him to all the officials of the International Labour Office, for the constant efforts they make for the cause of international co-operation and for the implementation of the assistance programmes.

I should merely like to recall that the statements I made during the 73rd Session on the extremely worrying financial and economic situation in Africa remains topical.

In the countries of the Third World, and particularly in Africa, the State will remain the largest creator of jobs. Private investment is still very hesitant and timid because it does not want to upset the existing economic relations.

So all the efforts of our Organisation to seek in the informal or rural sectors possibilities for creating jobs may in the long run turn out to have been in vain.

As I said from this rostrum at the 73rd Session, I do not believe in the capacity of the African social security institutions to create jobs because the solidarity of the poor is a mere illusion. I could well envisage the holding of a special session of the International Labour Organisation on debt and employment.

Indeed, the harmonious development of humanity can be assured only in a world in which solidarity will prevail over individualism and which will take into account the well-being of all. Indeed, it is clearly admitted today that the pursuit by each State of its own particular interest cannot be a solution and that is why I am taking this opportunity to recall the Declaration of Philadelphia whereby in May 1944 the International Labour Conference proclaimed that "lasting peace can be established only if it is based on social justice" and that "poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere".

This knowledge should lead to clear-sightedness and common sense.

This session also has to concern itself with four technical items, namely employment promotion and social security, safety and health in construction, the partial revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107) and rural employment promotion.

On the first two questions, my Government expressed its views at the 73rd Session.

The question of the partial revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107) was also of great interest to my Government. It was time to revise this Convention which was based on the concept of the cultural inferiority of indigenous and tribal populations. Adaptation of the Convention in the light of the development of ideas and circumstances will, I am sure, enable the many problems concerning the indigenous and tribal populations to be solved in strict respect for their rights, their autonomy and their culture, by making them participate in taking decisions which concern them and the entire country.

For there is no social justice without participation, free enterprise and respect for human rights. Development is also a matter of culture, since the changes it brings about must respect the values and civilisations of peoples.

In any case, this question does not arise in my country. There is no exclusion for tribal reasons or because of indigenous origins. The Congolese nation was built through the integration of all its nationals, whatever their tribal allegiance or origin. This is a right guaranteed by the Constitution and whose violation is punishable by law.

My Government has for over 20 years been putting into effect a programme of integration of the Pygmy population. They are numerous, live in the same areas as the Bantus, go to the same schools, occupy the same government posts and have the same qualifications, enjoy the same protections, the same rights and the same obligations.

My Government is happy to accept the proposals for revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107).

The question of the rural employment promotion is an essential preoccupation of the Government of the People's Republic of Congo. Indeed, rural employment promotion constitutes one of the main tools in the struggle against unemployment and rural exodus and a prerequisite for the achievement of self-sufficiency in food which my country has set as an objective. The problem has been of such concern to the Government of my country that a policy of encouraging the creation of rural employment has been established, with customs exemptions, reductions of transport and equipment tariffs, the protection of national agricultural production, etc.

In this connection, I appreciate the action of the International Labour Organisation in carrying out a study in my country on employment promotion in rural and urban areas through the Jobs and Skills Programme for Africa (JASPA).

I cannot finish my statement without referring to one of the greatest violations of human dignity today: apartheid.

This year, when we are celebrating the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, we must note that the most serious and persistent challenge to the principles of equality, respect for human dignity, tolerance and solidarity defended by the International Labour Organisation comes from South Africa with its apartheid policy.

The denial of racial equality and the other fundamental rights of man is not only a contempt for the conscience of the world but above all a threat to world peace. We invite all the Members of the International Labour Organisation to pursue relentlessly their efforts for the re-establishment of peace and equality of rights in southern Africa.

As far as we are concerned, at any rate, we vigorously reaffirm our support for the just struggle of the peoples of South Africa and Namibia to throw off the yoke of racism and colonisation in order to build in their countries free and democratic societies where the rights of all citizens will be recognised without distinction of race.

We support any initiative to re-establish peace in all the independent countries of southern Africa, which are victims of the South African policy of aggression and destabilisation.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. IBARRA (representative of the Permanent Congress of Trade Union Unity of the Workers of Latin America) – May I wish the President every success in his task of guiding this important Session of the Conference. Our gratitude also goes to the International Labour Office for making it possible for us to attend the Conference.

We have read the Director-General's Report with interest. We recognise the efforts the ILO has made, but we think that it is necessary to go further in denouncing those primarily responsible for the crisis of capitalism and those who are making money out of the sweat of the toiling masses in the Third World. My Congress, the CUPSTAL, denounces capitalist powers, the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund, and considers them to bear the main responsibility for the worsening of the crisis and its flagrant repercussions on workers.

Workers and their trade unions increasingly understand the causes of their problems. They see that the International Monetary Fund, as guarantor of the interests of monopolies and imperialism, imposes measures that erode the social gains of the workers.

The remedies advocated by the IMF and other credit organisations of that type are nothing but neo-colonialist plans for the greedy plunder of the already exhausted economies of the Third World countries through draconian claims, the privatisation of companies, mass dismissals of workers and even the transfer of land to pay the debt. All this sends prices and inflation skyrocketing, intensifying unemployment, illiteracy, the problems of housing, health care, education and culture.

In a situation such as this, it is infuriating to see the squandering of resources on the arms race. If only 10 per cent of this expenditure were allocated to development, the problem of the external debt would be wiped out. My Congress maintains that the struggle for peace and disarmament are inextricably linked to the battle for better conditions of life and work, for social justice and genuine development, for the New International Economic Order.

At the meeting of the Bureau of the Permanent Congress held in Mexico on 15 and 16 March this year, we reaffirmed our struggle against repayment of the immoral foreign debt and its spurious interest.

My Congress ratified the decision to continue its struggle against indebtedness on the basis of the agreements reflected in the Act of Havana and the Trade Union Conference of Campinas-São Paulo in Brazil, the decisions of the conference on debt held at Lima and of other events dealing with this tremendous problem without ambiguities. There is substantial agreement among all the workers of Latin America and the Caribbean and their trade unions that the external debt cannot be repaid.

Our Permanent Congress will spare no effort in continuing to seek, through sincere dialogue, for agreements on joint action with CLAT and ORIT, with their affiliated federations and with independent confederations to promote the achievement of the workers' objectives, that is improving their conditions of life, progress and peace.

The policy of imperialist exploitation and war, its interventionist schemes, the persistent pillage carried out by the transnationals and monopolies and the usurious actions of the International Monetary Fund do not entirely prevent us, however, from optimistically appreciating positive reactions that are occurring at this time. Our Congress welcomes the transcendent treaty between the USSR and the United States to eliminate intermediate- and short-range missiles, which paves the way to more extensive disarmament in the future. Our Congress suggests that the ILO launch an appeal and undertake activities to ensure that the funds no longer spent on the arms race, thanks to the treaties signed, are dedicated to the development of Third World countries.

On this 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, we are gratified that the Director-General's Report has dealt with this important topic; but the ILO should go beyond rhetoric and energetically tackle this crucial right of workers.

We feel that essential or priority human rights are not guaranteed to a substantial part of the world population. What human rights can we speak of to vast numbers of people who have no medical services, no work, no access to school, whose children are compelled to work, beg or prostitute themselves? Some Western governments boast of acting as champions of the protection of human rights and yet they are supporters and accomplices of dictators and oligarchs who keep their peoples under subjection to oppressive regimes of exploitation, denying their fundamental human rights. The much vaunted freedom of the press is also a farce, of no use to people who do not have five cents to buy a paper, nor can read it even, because they are illiterate. The press is in the hands of wealthy proprietors and powerful consortia which support essentially class interests.

At the meeting of the Bureau of our Congress, held in Mexico City on 15 and 16 March, we discussed solidarity with the struggle of workers and trade unionists in our continent and other areas of the world. We endorse the condemnation of North American imperialism for its aggressive action against Nicaragua and the obstacles it is putting in the way of the peace agreements signed in Esquipulas and Sapoá.

Our Bureau also offered its support to the patriots in San Salvador and the FMLN-FDR in its struggle for a better future for its people.

The Bureau of my Congress put on record its support for Chilean and Paraguayan workers in their patriotic struggle for freedom and democracy.

We condemn the disquieting wave of violence and murders which has been unleashed in Colombia against the forces of democracy and particularly trade union leaders. We express our strongest solidarity with the workers and people of Panama who are firmly defending their national sovereignty; we call for strict compliance with the Torrijos-Carter agreements and reject Yankee interventionism in this country.

My Congress confirms its support for the struggle of African peoples against the shameful practice of apartheid, as well as for the Arab nations which have been forcibly deprived of their territories and particularly for the brave Palestinian people and their heroic struggle.

Finally, my Congress appeals to the entire pluralist and representative trade union movement in Latin America and the Caribbean to come together for an extensive meeting and carry out joint action to confront the problems of the crisis and foreign debt.

My Congress also suggests to the International Labour Office that it take new steps to promote development and the establishment of a new international economic order.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. UBALDINI (Workers' delegate, Argentina) – On behalf of all Argentine workers organised under the General Confederation of Labour, I congratulate the President on his election and express our approval at the way the subjects in the Report are being analysed. They lend support to the belief to which we have always subscribed and reiterated: the importance of this institution to consolidate and achieve progress in labour and social law.

We would like to emphasise that, as a result of the struggle of the General Confederation of Labour, upheld by Parliament, and the promulgation of laws on collective bargaining and trade unions in my country, Conventions Nos. 87 and 98, the pillars of international standards in this field, are fully applied. A trade union system has emerged which guarantees freedom, autonomy and trade union democracy. Collective bargaining has started up again and we have bargaining committees which are entrusted with discussing working conditions and salaries for which we are prepared to fight so that they attain their objectives. I think that we can say that we have collective labour agreements in all the branches in which we had them before, after a suspension of 13 years. With the ratification of the Collective Bargaining Convention, 1981 (No. 154) and the laws on this subject, workers in the central state administration will be able, in one year, to conclude collective agreements as has been the case in many provinces; indeed, we have never accepted the division between state employees and private employees.

In order to guarantee the collective right to work, its institutions – trade unions, collective bargaining, strikes and other machinery to settle labour conflicts – must be anchored in the constitutional system, in a context which guarantees the free exercise of rights which should characterise a democracy, giving broad participation in political and social sectors.

In my country, the unsuitably named laws of the military dictatorship still apply to work contracts and they limit the rights of workers.

We are still concerned with the problems of rural workers, temporary workers and home workers. It is for this reason we have submitted drafts to defend their dignity as workers. We are also campaigning for the effective participation of workers in the drafting of bilateral and multilateral Conventions. It is the objective of the General Confederation of Labour to establish the rights of women and young workers, to bring about the full development of their working life and activities in trade union issues.

The General Confederation continues to campaign to enact legislation to return the ownership and administration of social activities to the workers and trade unions, to guarantee effective services in the fields of health, social tourism and leisure.

We are concerned by the fact that the national Government has not ratified all the Conventions of the ILO, as a basis for labour laws and social legislation.

In Argentina, the Ministry of the Interior has formulated economic policies on the basis of letters of intent granted by the IMF for many years; results show that the economy has contracted, the inflationary process has worsened, the standard of living of workers, pensioners and retired people has deteriorated, there are fewer sources of work and there is a growing dependence of domestic social and political agreements upon foreign economic agreements.

The intrinsic wealth of Argentina has been drained to the extent that our public undertakings which belong to the people are being handed over to international usurers.

The priority accorded to financial activities which produce nothing has thwarted production and given rise to a frivolous culture. This has undermined productive activities and the role of work as a prime mover of economic progress and social justice.

We shall continue to fight for social dignity and economic independence until we attain a new economic social order throughout the world, in which goods will be produced on the basis of accumulated work, and that work will be a factor of dignity for those who have this quality.

In order to propose solutions to bring us out of the crisis and the stagnation on 7 June 1988 the majority of Argentine political parties, employers and our workforce, represented by the General Confederation of Labour, signed a document elaborating the basis for a pact on economic and social transformation, setting out policies to concretise this message. It sets out to contribute towards the consolidation of the constitutional system, within which there is free exercise of the rights which characterise a democracy, with extensive participation of political parties and social organisations, respect for the powers of the nation and the guarantee of social justice.

In Latin America, there is a growing conflict between the privileged sectors and unemployed and marginalised people who live in poverty, without work. Our currency is unstable; we cannot get worth-while prices for our commodities and we live with a terrifying foreign debt, the interest on which exceeds our income. The poverty in Latin America is a breeding ground for intolerance, impiety and violence. This socio-economic instability does not allow for a permanent consolidation of democracy because there is an essential element missing – social justice. As you well know, without justice there is no possibility of peace, or of an ethical dimension in man.

Here in Argentina we fight with faith and optimism for the unity of Latin America, while respecting the natural and unavoidable characteristics of individual countries and the cultures of indigenous peoples. We are struggling so that our continent may offer hope for the future, and a place where the social well-being of all humanity is sought. We hope to form a South American union from the Rio Grande to the Antarctic, so that Latin America will overcome its dependence and contribute to all of humanity.

The General Confederation of Labour knows that our home is Latin America. In the year 2000 there will be 535 million Latin Americans and we are prepared to offer social justice, equality of opportunity and freedom from external bonds.

Among the monstrous problems of our age, we must refer to the flouting of human rights; although they are so well defined in the Charter of the United Nations, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights signed in 1948, and the ILO's Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), transgressions continue.

Despite many efforts, countries which have great military power or which suffer under dictatorships are violating human rights with impunity. We, at this august international forum, express our commitment to continue protecting man from transgressions of this type, and endorse the principles of the Inter-American Convention on Human Rights, known as the "Pacto de San José", signed on 22 November 1969. Next year the General Confederation of Labour, which I direct, will propose a plenary session to commemorate the 20th anniversary of the Pact of San José.

Another topic I would like to highlight refers to the protection of the working environment; the ILO has done a great deal and very successfully to protect the environment, in particular through the Working Environment (Air Pollution, Noise and Vibration) Convention, 1977 (No. 148) and Recommendation (No. 156). The high content of humanitarian and social concern has enabled workers to improve their situation and we should support it.

Similarly, in an overview of the topics which afflict men today, I would like to denounce governments which through practices unworthy of civilisation impose a system of apartheid on their populations, either because of the colour of their skin or because of their religious beliefs, ethnic origin or social situation. It seems fantastic, but it is unfortunately the horrible truth that in areas which have a high level of material development, the human condition is overlooked and equality, the common heritage of mankind, is denied. This is how we arrive at the savage condition known internationally as genocide, which must be stopped wherever it is practised. Not only is it a crime under international law, but it attacks the very essence of the reason for man's existence on this unhappy planet. Policies which sacrifice entire populations just to expand their hegemonistic space must not be tolerated. And the same goes for those engaged in the aberrant trade in drugs or the arms race.

The poverty which afflicts the countries of the South increases, thanks to the policy of oppression practised by capitalists through institutions such as the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank and other credit institutions. Colonialism continues to exert pressure through other methods such as protectionism, and our countries are being overwhelmed and their future eliminated, with no hope of resurgence.

This drama is the result of a catastrophic socio-economic policy which was also applied in most Spanish American countries, and which sought to uproot their machinery of production and tie them financially to the centres of international usury. This is why our position is to call for a moratorium and a rebate on the capital and interest of legitimate debt; this is the only way to arrive at sustained growth, development and social justice.

A sort of conspiracy at the highest level of international money management limited the access of the less developed nations to credit for development and independent technological progress. It tied credit to unproductive, unessential or luxury imports which are not appropriate for creating wealth.

Thus, there came to be a monstrous growth of the so-called foreign debt, with the inevitable repercussions on debt-servicing. At the same time, the world economy dried up, unemployment and underemployment were pushed to irrational limits and the wages of workers were pilfered until they went hungry and could no longer afford basic necessities.

We, the workers in Argentina, do not recognise any legitimacy in the so-called foreign debt. In most cases, it is based on manoeuvres, speculation or overtly criminal organisations linked to financial circles.

This is why from this forum we would like to salute those who are fighting for their dignity and the inalienable right to self-determination; with the strength we derive from speaking on behalf of all Argentinian workers in a single federation, we proclaim that there must be a definite eradication of all forms of dictatorship since it is a form of segregation, an octopus that strangles the dignity of the peoples who suffer from it, just as we must stop the arms race which is pushing humanity towards its own destruction.

This is our undertaking: with our people and with all the peoples of the world, to struggle for peace, dignity, freedom and justice.

Interpretation from Farsi: Mr. POYA (Workers' delegate, Afghanistan) – May I first of all cordially congratulate the President and express my best greetings on behalf of the workers and the toiling people of the Republic of Afghanistan on his election. I wish him every success.

I am very pleased to take part in the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. Now Geneva has a place in the heart of each Afghan worker, for an objective reason. On the basis of the national reconciliation policy in the Republic of Afghanistan which led to the conclusion of the Geneva Accords between the Republic of Afghanistan and Pakistan, birds bearing messages of peace flew from Geneva over the Republic of Afghanistan a few weeks ago and conveyed to our people the good news that an end was to be put to the nine-year-old imposed war.

According to these Accords, the return of the limited Soviet military contingent from the Republic of Afghanistan to their peace-loving country started on 15 May 1988. The Afghan people saw the Soviet internationalist contingent off with bunches of flowers. Future Afghan generations will cherish the valuable memory of the selfless assistance rendered to us by our great friend.

The humanitarian policy of national reconciliation, characterised by common sense and new political thinking was enforced one and a half years ago through the will of all the workers and toiling people of Afghanistan as a politically bold and decisive initiative of the People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan which constituted a turning-point in the history of our country. Since the policy of national reconciliation guarantees the most fundamental rights, namely the right to live, it has been warmly welcomed and supported by the toiling people of Afghanistan and the world as a banner of peace-establishing ideas.

Practical measures have been adopted since the declaration. The following is a brief account of achievements in this regard: the decrees on a general amnesty; the release of prisoners; the restoration of assets and property to the repatriates; and the regulation of principles of agrarian relationships in the Republic of Afghanistan: laws on military service, political parties, the press; the law regulating foreign investment; the Constitution of the Republic of Afghanistan; the law on labour; the convocation of the Afghan Loya Jirgah or Grand Assembly; and the election of Esteemed Najibullah as the first President of the Republic of Afghanistan.

As a result of the realisation of the national reconciliation policy, over 130,000 of our compatriots have returned home and more than 4,000 villages have been peacefully saved. Over 40,000 armed men of the opposition have given up armed resistance and 12,000 prisoners have been released.

As a broad organisation of workers the Afghan trade unions have been entrusted with a special role in the realisation of the national reconciliation policy. These trade unions have the duty of tirelessly broadening their contacts with various special social strata in order to live with and share their aspirations and worries and to explain the nature of the national reconciliation policy, thereby influencing the hearts and minds of millions of people and conveying the truth to each collective managerial establishment, village and town. It is therefore the task of the Afghan trade unions to spread the idea of peace and tranquillity in every Afghan family and to take proper care of those of our compatriots who have laid down their arms and who, after returning home, have joined the popular power.

The nine years of imposed war on the toiling and talented people of the Republic of Afghanistan caused gigantic financial and human loss. Nevertheless, taking care of the workers' situation, assuring better conditions of work and life for them, upgrading their living standards and improving social insurance have been the focus of attention for the Party, the State and the Afghan trade unions. It was on the basis of these convictions that a labour law was adopted for the first time in the Republic of Afghanistan.

The establishment, consolidation and organisation of workers' relations, the assurance of equality of the right to work, the protection of the rights of the workers, the improvement of the management of labour and production, the increase of production and rational use of labour resources, the upgrading of the efficiency of social production, the universalisation of progressive wage and salary scales, the consolidation of discipline in work and production, encouraging a spirit of conscientious and faithful work and the involvement of all workers in management have all been incorporated in and guaranteed by the labour law of the Republic of Afghanistan. The law also ensures the rights and obligations of the workers and managerial staff in the field of work and production. It guarantees safe working conditions, as well as making proper provision for safety, the constant enhancement of workers' skills, and the provision of proper and secure working conditions for all eligible people. Finally the labour law establishes the work contract, the training contract, the collective contract, and so on.

With the enforcement of this law, the Afghan trade unions have acquired ever greater authority as an organisation responsible for mobilising the workers and toiling people of the Republic of Afghanistan and, as such, they have been converted into a powerful organisation.

Our revolutionary State, with the co-operation of the Central Council of Afghan Trade Unions, has been paying serious attention to health and the physical well-being of the toiling people. For instance, compared to 1979, the number of hospitals was increased in 1986 by 41.6 per cent, hospital beds by 106.3 per cent and the number of doctors by 124.3 per cent.

The variety of consumer goods and commodities given to workers and employers against coupons has been increased and free distribution of two coupon items, namely flour and ghee, began in 1987. At the demand of the toiling Afghan people, the State of the Republic of Afghanistan provide all students with breakfast, writing materials and uniforms in the current year and this practice will continue in future as well.

In accordance with the law, the handicapped and the families of martyrs of the April revolution enjoy pensions and coupons for foodstuffs and other goods. The minimum salaries and pensions of the handicapped and families of martyrs of the April revolution have been doubled.

In order to observe basic principles of safety at work and the techniques applying to such safety, the workers have been provided with health insurance against diseases caused by various occupations, and the reduction of ill-effects during production has also been assured. In addition, pregnant women enjoy three months' leave with salary. Hundreds of workers take holidays annually, both inside and outside the country. During the current year alone, some 4,000 children of workers and toiling people are to be sent abroad for rest and recreation. Over 6,500 workers' families have been provided with residential flats and plots of land have been distributed to over 15,000 such families for the construction of residences. Moreover, the construction of state-owned, co-operative, mixed-sector and cheap housing has been considerably increased and the system of rent payments as well as security of tenants has been improved further. Likewise, with the establishment of the Country-wide Union of Craftsmen, the enforcement of the law regulating foreign investment and the adoption of the regulation on Principles of Agrarian Relationships, the ground has been cleared for further employment opportunities and for improvement of full, effective and free recruitment of the population.

I should say that the above-mentioned achievements cannot compensate for the loss incurred by the workers and labourers resulting from the imposed war. For this purpose, local and foreign financial resources are required, particularly in respect of employment and recruitment and more so in the case of those who became disabled and handicapped as a result of the war. Therefore, I would like to request the United Nations, the International Labour Organisation and all donor countries to give their material and intellectual assistance to the young workers, the labourers and the entire war-suffering Afghan people. Our working class really needs help.

The Afghan working people support the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107) for the assurance of their civil rights, the right to own land and to social services for this part of the world population, which constitutes over 300 million people. We stand for revision of the Convention.

On behalf of Afghan workers and labourers, I would like to express once again my full support for all proposals and initiatives intended to prevent nuclear war and which are aimed at dismantling nuclear weapons. Declaring my support for the struggle of all peoples to attain national independence, democracy and social justice, I pronounce on behalf of the Afghan working class and toiling people my resentment towards apartheid and Zionism. I am sure that participants at the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference will adopt more practical and serious measures in condemning the Israeli Government for its policy of Zionism and discrimination in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories and to contribute to the realisation of the right of Palestine to self-determination. I am also sure that the participants will adopt more practical measures for assuring the rights of Blacks in South Africa.

Prior to my departure for Geneva, I received numerous telegram messages and memoranda from workers and toiling people all over the country. They were asking all participants at this important session to support the Geneva accords on the situation relating to Afghanistan and to urge the parties concerned in the accords to ensure faithful implementation of the provisions of those accords. Therefore, I would request you and all workers' delegation participating in this glorious session to declare your support for all-round implementation of the Geneva accords and to ask all parties concerned to implement them faithfully. I am sure that the implementation of the accords would not only dismantle a hotbed in our region but in such a case it could become a good model for the settlement of other regional conflicts and would play a distinguished role in the consolidation of world peace.

In conclusion, let me on behalf of all workers and toiling people of the Republic of Afghanistan wish you success in the work of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference and in ensuring the rights of workers throughout the world.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. ISSA (Workers' delegate, Syrian Arab Republic) – I have pleasure in congratulating the President on his election. On behalf of the Syrian working class and revolutionary trade union movement I hope that our Conference this year will achieve some of the ambitions and hopes of workers throughout the world who are struggling for fundamental and noble causes.

I have read the Report of the Director-General; Part I deals with the importance of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and its conformity with Constitution of the ILO and the Declaration of Philadelphia. The Report describes ILO action in promoting human rights, freedom of association, equality of opportunity and the right to work. I am happy to be able to congratulate the Director-General on what he says concerning Arab workers in Palestine and in the other occupied Arab territories. He has shown how economic development, and consequently employment and the situation of the unions, are always subjected to very harsh restrictions because of the Israeli occupation.

Part II of the Report contains important information on the activities of the Organisation as regards human rights, international labour standards, industrial relations, labour administration and other important subjects deserving our consideration. The Director-General's Report refers to the drop in the level of rural employment and the almost total paralysis of industrial employment and reports a substantial increase in the services sector of construction. It points out that statistics show the situation of Arab workers to be tragic and that the occupation authorities estimate the number of workers in irregular employment at 50 per cent. I must say here that if the workers who are employed through the official Israeli services are subjected to racial discrimination, what must be the treatment accorded to those in an irregular situation? It is clear that they are subjected to the worst forms of exploitation. The Director-General's Report specifies that the universities were closed when his representatives visited the occupied territories, as were most of the schools. The Report adds that 7,000 school teachers were unemployed and that a large number of the closed universities and schools had been transformed into prison camps. This is the fate that has befallen 28 primary and secondary schools. All the Arab media and newspapers have been seized or closed, especially those which denounce the criminal nature of the activities of the Zionist aggressors, which condemn their policies and racist practices and which demonstrates to world public opinion the truth regarding the horrors committed in the occupied territories. All this had led international circles, cultural bodies and organisations dealing with human rights to condemn these policies. The repressive measures have not been directed solely against Arab citizens but also affect a number of citizens from other countries, even those employed by humanitarian or international bodies such as UNRWA and the international Red Cross.

As regards the confiscation of trade union rights and freedoms, the Appendix to the Report specifies that no application for trade union registration has been accepted since 1979 and that Israel has established a military regime to stifle civil liberties and in particular the exercise of trade union rights. Trade union headquarters have been ransacked and closed and their documents confiscated; meetings are banned and restrictive measures taken against trade unionists such as arrest, administrative detention, house arrest, expulsion or deportation. Half the members of the trade union Council and a third of the members of its executive are in prison. The ILO Committee on Freedom of Association has stated that the deportation of trade unionists is contrary to human rights and is extremely serious since it deprives them of the possibility of working in their country, quite apart from separating them from their families.

The Appendix to the Director-General's Report states that lands now under Israeli domination amount to some 52 per cent of the area of the West Bank and 40 per cent of that of the Gaza district. Despite this the occupation authorities pursue their arbitrary and unjust policy and continue to confiscate land, to restrict water supplies, to create settlements, to expel the Arab people from the Golan, the West Bank, Gaza and Southern Lebanon and to encourage Jewish settlers from all over the world to come and take their place. The abject Jewish colonisation plan is being continued to implement the Zionist programme which aims at making the Arab region Jewish and gradually extending Jewish influence in Arab territories to the detriment of the interests of the Arab people. The multiple condemnations pronounced by the international community have made no impression on the occupation authorities – which confirms once again the challenge posed by the Zionist entity to the will of the international community, its infringement of all international resolutions and charters, the pursuit of its policy of racial discrimination against Arab workers in all fields of labour and the aggravation of the measures taken against them. The situation of these workers is worsening day by day, becoming increasingly remote from normal humanitarian feelings.

Moreover, the situation of Syrian Arab citizens in the Golan, who depend on agriculture for their livelihood is deteriorating year after year. As is stated in the Appendix to the Director-General's Report, land confiscation has reached such a degree that it now affects 80 per cent of arable land. The Israeli occupation authorities have confiscated the title deeds to the land and banned the growing of crops without a licence in order to avoid competition with their own produce. The occupation authorities have destroyed a number of villages to establish Zionist settlements in their place, which is in flagrant contradiction with the Fourth Geneva Convention, to say nothing of the various form of economic and psychological pressure exerted on the civilian population to oblige them to emigrate. This is why international institutions, beginning with the United Nations General Assembly and the Commission on Human Rights have regularly and vigorously condemned this serious violation of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the Fourth Geneva Convention and United Nations resolutions.

These comments are contained in the Director-General's Report and its Appendices. While appreciating the efforts made, we consider that the Report and the recommendations of the mission are inadequate when one considers the difficult situation in which the workers and Arab populations of Palestine and of the other occupied Arab territories are living, particularly as regards the pursuit of the policy of racial discrimination and the continuation of repression and Zionist terrorism which are resulting in the deterioration of the economic, social and humanitarian situation of the Arab workers. The occupation authorities accept no opposition to their Facist dominating power and continue with their unequalled barbaric repression, killing women and children without mercy and even going so far as to bury some alive on its television screens. The whole world has witnessed scenes that are an outrage to the human conscience. The occupation authorities lay siege to refugee camps, impose food blockades, ration water, cut off electricity and telephones, prevent people entering and leaving towns, villages and camps, fill the prisons, destroy houses, prevent foreign journalists from investigating their barbaric acts and arrest some of them, fire bullets and use toxic-gas bombs against demonstrators, break limbs and crush bones, and if a mother tries to defend her son who is being arrested, her fingers are broken. The number of martyrs has reached 273. The correspondent of Life International magazine reported on 25 April 1988 that there were 6,000 injured and 20,000 under arrest who are being held in concentration camps where even the simplest necessities of life are lacking and which remind us of the Nazi concentration camps of the Second World War. Some schools have even been closed and turned into prisons when there were no longer enough of the latter.

These barbaric acts and practices are known throughout the world. A professor of political science at the Hebrew University, commenting on the events, went so far as to state that Israel was strong enough to keep the territories but that if it chose this path the years to come would be like the past weeks. He added "If we look at ourselves in a mirror we shall see the reflection of South Africa." The Washington Post of 18 February 1988 stated that some analysts consider that the events in the occupied territories, with their series of acts of repression and terrorism, are no more than a horrible repetition of similar scenes ordered by the racist regime of South Africa, for the whole world has been able to learn of the barbaric practices perpetrated by the Zionist occupation authorities and there is hardly a house in the world that has not seen these repressive acts or heard tell of them. The image of this terrorism cannot be effaced from world public opinion, whatever the art of deception and misinformation practised by the Zionists. The whole world has denounced the measures of the Zionists and their inhuman criminal actions with the exception of the Government of the United State of America, which used its right of veto against all United Nations resolutions condemning Zionism and its repressive methods. This confirm the contempt of the United States for the wishes of the international community and further confirms that this country, by overlooking Israeli crimes and continuing its financial, military and political support for Israel, is isolated from international unanimous opinion and becomes an accomplice of the tragedies that occur daily in the occupied territories. The position of the United States Government as regards Israeli practices in the occupied Arab territories is hardly any different from its position as regards the regime of South Africa, which applies the policies of apartheid, imprisons large numbers of trade unionists, impedes freedom and bans trade union congresses. The nationalist leader Nelson Mandela is still in prison despite repeated appeals from the entire world. This is why, on the occasion of the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, we consider it our duty at this Conference to reaffirm our support for the struggle of the people of South Africa and Namibia. This Conference should express its support for the declaration of the Harare Conference in order to put an end to the other Nazi regime endured by the peoples of South Africa and Namibia.

The glorious uprising of our people in Palestine and in the occupied Arab territories, which has been continuing for over six months, confirm their determination to refuse the occupation and repressive policy applied by the occupation authorities for over 40 years against the Palestinian Arab citizens for the fighting people can endure no more and no longer wishes to remain indefinitely under oppression. This is why the spreading of the uprising signifies determination to keep their national identity and their right to a life of freedom and dignity. The continuation of the uprising is a proof of its vitality and its right to succeed. This was confirmed by President Hafez El-Assad, president of the Syrian Arab Republic, when he addressed the Syrian people in these terms: "Your brothers in occupied Palestine, through their revolutionary activities, have restored the purity of the Palestinian cause. They have affirmed to the world that this people, described by Zionist propaganda as apathetic, is in fact a proud and courageous Arab people who will accept nothing less than their complete identity and their full rights." Syria, through the voice of its guide and of its people, has affirmed its support for the just cause of the Palestinian Arab people, considering that sincerity and devotion to this cause constitute an indication of credibility for any other position. We affirm that any solution which does not guarantee the legitimate national rights of the Palestinian Arab people can have no chance of success. The way to a global and just solution is through an international conference, with the necessary terms of reference, under the auspices of the United Nations, with the participation of the five permanent member States of the Security Council, in the presence of all parties involved in the conflict, including the Palestine Liberation Organisation which is the legitimate and only representative of the Palestinian Arab people, on an equal footing in accordance with United Nations resolutions, on the basis of the withdrawal of Israel from all the occupied Arab territories, the guarantee of the inalienable national rights of the Palestinian Arab people and in particular its right to return home, to self-determination and to the creation of an independent State on its Palestinian national soil.

The International Labour Organisation, which is one of the most important United Nations agencies and the highest authority for defending the rights of workers throughout the world, has particular responsibility for carrying out the decisions it has taken on this subject and for protecting trade union and human rights and freedoms. It goes without saying that we expect the ILO to follow up the application of its resolutions by the Israeli occupation authorities, and especially resolution No. IX, which condemns the occupation authorities for their policies of racial discrimination against the Arab workers and the populations of the occupied Arab territories, of restricting freedom of association and suspending trade union rights, and resolution No. II concerning the harmful effects of the establishment of Israeli settlements in the occupied Arab territories.

The report of the mission sent by the Director-General to carry out investigations in the Arab territories occupied by Israel reveals once again to world public opinion the extent of the violations, which have exceeded all previous ones. The report furnishes proof that the Israeli policy of repression is becoming harsher in the face of the acts of bravery on the part of children and young boys and girls in the occupied Arab territories. This is why it is natural that we should expect the reactions of the international agencies, and first of all of the International Labour Organisation, to match the events which are taking place daily for all the international media to see. We urge the Organisation and the world conscience to condemn the acts of Israel and to proclaim support for these workers and children who are struggling to defend their human rights, their dignity and their lives. We ask the ILO, in the name of the international community, to demand the ending of the Israeli occupation of the Arab territories. It is regrettable and most unfortunate that there are still two regimes in the world which apply the policy of fire and sword: the racist regimes in South Africa and in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories. The combining of international efforts and the co-operation of peace-loving States will alone succeed in putting an end to these two regimes and to their horrible crimes.

I wish our Conference every success.

(The Conference adjourned at 8.30 p.m.)

Provisional Record

Seventy-fifth Session, Geneva, 1988

Fourth item on the agenda: Safety and health in construction

Report of the Committee on Safety and Health in Construction

1. The Committee on Safety and Health in Construction was set up by the International Labour Conference at its third sitting on 2 June 1988. It was originally composed of 141 members (67 Government members, 32 Employers' members and 42 Workers' members). To achieve equality of voting strength, each Government member was allotted 672 votes, each Employers' member 1,407 votes and each Workers' member 1,072 votes. The composition of the Committee was modified seven times during the session and the number of votes attributed to each member was adjusted accordingly.¹

2. The Committee elected its Officers as follows:

Chairman: Mr. Mirza (Government member, Pakistan);

Vice-Chairman: Mr. Halliwell (Employers' member, Canada); and Mr. Chiluba (Workers' member, Zambia).

Reporter and Deputy Chairman: Mr. Panzke (Government member, German Democratic Republic).

3. At its eighth sitting the Committee appointed a Drafting Committee composed of the following members: Mr. Schuster (Government member, Luxembourg); Mr. Bonetat (Employers' member, France); Mrs. O'Donovan (Workers' member, Ireland); and the Reporter and Deputy Chairman of the Committee.

4. The Committee held ten sittings. It had before it Report IV(I), and Reports IV(2A) and IV(2B), prepared by the Office on the fourth item of the agenda of the Conference: "Safety and health in construction". The Committee based its discussions on the proposed Convention and the proposed Recommendation contained in Report IV(2B),

¹ The modifications were as follows:

- (a) 6 June: 143 members (69 Government members with 1333 votes each, 31 Employers' members with 2,967 votes each and 43 Workers' members with 2,139 votes each);
- (b) 7 June: 146 members (69 Government members with 62 votes each, 31 Employers' members with 138 votes each and 46 Workers' members with 93 votes each);
- (c) 8 June: 144 members (69 Government members with 30 votes each, 30 Employers' members with 69 votes each and 45 Workers' members with 46 votes each);
- (d) 9 June: 143 members (69 Government members with 220 votes each, 30 Employers' members with 506 votes each and 44 Workers' members with 345 votes each);
- (e) 10 June: 137 members (69 Government members with 190 votes each, 30 Employers' members with 437 votes each and 38 Workers' members with 345 votes each);
- (f) 13 June: 137 members (70 Government members with 111 votes each, 30 Employers' members with 259 votes each and 37 Workers' members with 210 votes each);
- (g) 15 June: 134 members (70 Government members with 29 votes each, 29 Employers' members with 70 votes each and 35 Workers' members with 58 votes each).

Introduction

5. The Assistant Secretary-General of the Conference, Mr. Morozov, welcomed the delegates and referred to the considerable risks to life and health associated with the activities of the construction industry world wide. The successful completion of the work of the Committee would lead to the adoption by the Conference of new international labour instruments on safety and health in construction, setting new standards for the improvement of working conditions in a major industrial sector of activities in all member States.

General discussion

6. The representative of the Secretary-General recalled briefly the conclusions of the Committee resulting from the first discussion of this item and spoke of the preparation of Report IV(2A) which summarises the comments and proposals received from the governments of member States. The proposed Convention and Recommendation contained in Report IV(2B) had been drawn up by the Office to reflect the observations received. Some observations introduced new ideas or repeated provisions previously discussed but not retained, and it was felt that the inclusion of corresponding changes in the proposed texts was not justified prior to discussion by the present Committee. When proposals were in line with the Conclusions adopted by the 73rd Session of the Conference, and it was considered that they improved the text, the Office had incorporated such observations in the proposed texts. The report had been prepared in two parts in order to facilitate the work of delegates by reducing the time taken to distribute the texts of the proposed Convention and Recommendation. The need had arisen because the amended Standing Orders of the Conference meant that the comments of employers' and workers' organisations were now reflected equally with those of governments in Report IV(2A), and also the considerable response there had been to Report IV(1). Observations or amendments were received from 82 member States and, in addition, replies from 16 member States were received too late for inclusion in Report IV(2): these were available to members of the Committee who wished to consult them.

7. The representative of the Secretary-General referred to several important issues raised during discussions at the 73rd Session. There was the problem which arose for some member States in the interpretation of Conventions whose texts contain absolute terms. The Committee had asked that the problem be studied before the second discussion and there had been consultations between the Office and the Government of the United Kingdom. This question may also affect other legal systems based upon English common law. He stated that the Committee had before it the text of a legal opinion which the Office believed satisfactorily resolved the problem. A related issue of semantics which caused concern at the 73rd Session arose from the use of the word "prevent" in relation to danger in various construction operations. The Office had used a form of words which it believed expressed the intention of all delegates whilst avoiding the problems which arose from different interpretations in various legal terminologies. There had been long discussion at the 73rd Session of an employer's responsibility for the ergonomic design of the plant and equipment he used. The Office had sought to recognise the criticism that the construction employer who is not the manufacturer of construction equipment cannot be responsible for its design, whilst making it clear that he does have the responsibility for ordering construction plant and equipment which is of good design and conforms to ergonomic principles. Finally, the Chairman of the Committee at the 73rd Session had recommended that the Office prepare a compendium of important existing definitions from other Conventions, and this was available for the use of the Chairman.

8. The Legal Adviser to the Conference introduced the opinion previously referred to by the representative of the Secretary-General on the interpretation of Conventions in which the texts use absolute terms. This recalled that during the first discussion it had emerged that in certain legal systems, such as that of the United Kingdom, a requirement of this kind would be construed as an absolute one in the absence of a qualification such as "as far as reasonably practicable". In others, provisions in absolute terms are understood – to use French legal terminology – as involving "an obligation of means, not of results" and accordingly as already incorporating the principle which has to be spelled out in United Kingdom legislation by the qualification "as far as reasonably practicable"; the inclusion of such a phrase in the French text of the Convention might accordingly infer a lowering of the standards of protection which was not intended.

9. International labour Conventions are adopted in two authentic texts, English and French, and are presumed to have the same meaning in each text. Where there is an apparent difference, the meaning which best reconciles the texts, having regards to the object and purpose of the Convention, has to be adopted.

10. Thus, to construe the English text of a Convention in accordance with the rules of interpretation applicable to an English statute would not be the correct approach if this would result in a different meaning from that given to the French text: the two have to be construed together.

11. The general rule for the interpretation of a treaty is that it shall be interpreted in good faith in accordance with the ordinary meaning to be given to the terms of the treaty in their context and in the light of its object and purpose. The ordinary meaning of the terms of an international labour Convention has to be ascertained, of course, by reference to both the English and the French wording.

12. The spokesman for the Employers' members was appreciative of the attempt to resolve a difficult problem. However, the Employers' members would need to look closely at the opinion in relation to the provisions of the proposed instruments before approving it. The spokesman for the Workers' members thought the opinion very helpful. However, further explanation and discussion of the opinion would be necessary. He further stated that, in particular situations which present very serious or lethal risks, the duty to provide adequate protection is to be expressed in absolute terms. The Government member of the Federal Republic of Germany, as spokesman for the Government members of member States of the European Communities (EC), considered the Office had proposed a good solution to a problem which was widely recognised within the EC, and the opinion should be reflected in the report of the Committee. The Government member of India was grateful for the opinion although he believed it was only one of several alternative solutions. The Government member of Uruguay agreed in principle with the opinion of the Legal Adviser. However, there was a need for detailed study of particular provisions of the draft instruments before an official position could be taken. The Government member of New Zealand believed the difficulty which the opinion addressed should be recognised in the proposed Convention. He considered the opinion resolved the problem admirably and supported the conclusions reached.

13. The spokesman for the Employers' members recalled that at the 73rd Session the Employers' members had served notice that unless the texts of the proposed instruments were amended in important respects they would be unable to support the adoption of a Convention. There had been important changes in the text which they welcomed and to which they would give their careful consideration. However these did not allay their concern that the scope of the proposed Convention was still too broad and not only set down principles but attempted to apply those principles in several areas of operations, a task that was proper to a Recommendation. They would seek to amend the text so that any Convention would stand a realistic chance of ratification by member States. Unless the Committee produced a proposed Convention containing a set of principles only it would be impossible to implement in practice. The Employers' members intended to concentrate on issues of major importance. Amendments would be framed only after careful thought and would be kept to a minimum. They were concerned about the present text but would work towards the goal of a proposed Convention which all delegates could support and which member States could put into practice.

14. The spokesman for the Workers' members expressed satisfaction that the proposed instruments under discussion sought to cover the ever-growing scope of the construction industry. While the present definition was fair, still more could be done to broaden the scope. He reminded the Committee that the present discussion was necessary because the Safety Provisions (Building) Convention, 1937 (No. 52), could not cope with the modern working environment in the construction industry. Report IV(2B) provided a sound basis for continuing the discussion begun last year. A refusal to agree to a proposed Convention supported by a proposed Recommendation would put the clock back and fail to recognise that Convention No. 62 was obsolete. The new instruments must take account of the need for employers and workers to co-operate in achieving maximum results from safety and health measures. Even in the interests of flexibility nothing should be done to lower standards of protection and there was a need for measures capable of improving working conditions. Many hazards and dangers could be prevented or minimised and one way was to take account of ergonomic principles when introducing new machinery and equipment into the industry.

15. The Government member of Turkey believed that Reports IV(2A) and IV(2B) provided a reliable and satisfactory basis for continued discussion. Turkey had already begun to apply some of the provisions of the proposed instruments in its inspection programme and was focusing inspection on construction and mining. The construction industry was expanding and providing a large number of new jobs, while Turkish construction firms were increasingly working abroad and there were many Turkish migrant construction workers. Tripartite relationships would increasingly influence construction safety and his Government recognised the importance of the proposed instruments in preventing and combating risks in the industry for many years to come.

16. The Government member of Senegal emphasised the importance of a new Convention in view of the evolution of the industry since 1937. The proposed instruments should take into account the problems faced by developing countries, where the construction industry was an important source of employment, and the proposed Convention should be sufficiently flexible to reconcile the need to protect workers with the need to develop the industry.

17. The Government member of the Federal Republic of Germany, as spokesman for the member States of the European Communities (EC), referred to the new impulse given to the improvement of the working environment, in particular to the safety and health of workers, by the Single European Act which had come into force since the last session of the Conference. Member States were working towards harmonisation of standards, although this would not prevent any member State from adopting more stringent rules. Particular attention was being paid to small and medium-sized undertakings, which were numerous in the construction industry. The proposed instruments were a satisfactory foundation for the work of the Committee.

18. The Government member of the German Democratic Republic said that the safety and health of workers in the construction industry required thorough discussion and the report was acceptable as the basis for this. All the basic rules of safety and health were included in the proposed Convention and the remaining points were in the proposed Recommendation. In the German Democratic Republic, there had been a considerable increase in the construction workforce, particularly in the housing sector.

19. The Government member of China agreed that the proposals for a Convention and Recommendation provided a satisfactory basis for discussion. Some specific requirements should be as flexible as possible to allow member States to work out national laws, regulations and technical standards appropriate to their state of development. His country proposed to strengthen the responsibility of employers for the education of workers in occupational safety and health so that they understood their working environment, with certification after examination for supervisory grades. As a developing country China would draw on the advanced experience of other countries in formulating policies appropriate to national conditions, and the proposed instruments would be important in this respect.

20. The representative of the Commission of the European Communities referred to the Single European Act which would enable safety and health legislation to be adopted by a majority vote. The Commission had prepared a new programme of work focusing attention on the construction industry, which had been identified as one of three high-risk sectors, and was characterised by a labour force of 10 million workers with a high proportion of small firms. The system of bidding for contracts did not require identification of safety and health provisions and might encourage tenderers to propose or to adopt working methods which appeared to be cheaper. The Commission envisaged an EC instrument stressing the need to: incorporate safety requirements at the initial design stage, make safety and health aspects clearer in the tenders, closely define responsibility on construction sites, establish safety-related qualification requirement for certain tasks.

21. The Government member of India believed the report provided a good basis for discussion. However, it would be difficult and costly in the developing countries, particularly if they were as vast in area as India, to implement a law which applied to an enormous number of scattered establishments. The proposed Convention should leave governments with a discretion to exclude very small establishments.

22. The Government member of Hungary considered that the proposed instruments would contribute to a safer and healthier working environment in the construction industry, and that there was no need for major amendments.

23. The Government member of Japan agreed in principle with the texts of the proposed Convention and Recommendation. However, there was a need for measures to take account of the differing technologies, labour relations and working environments found in various countries. The Committee should seek to maintain the standards of protection contained in the present proposals while allowing for such variations.

24. The Government member of Brazil considered that the reports provided a good basis for future discussion. The preparation of a proposed Convention and Recommendation was important to Brazil for, as elsewhere in Latin America, the construction industry employed a high proportion of workers. The risks in the industry should be properly controlled. In 1988 it was proposed with the assistance of the International Programme for the Improvement of Working Conditions and the Working Environment (PIACT) to hold a tripartite seminar for Latin America to discuss the problem of safety and health in the industry and to develop programmes for dealing with them. The application of the proposed Convention and Recommendation would be prominent in the discussion.

25. The Government member of Côte d'Ivoire said that, while his country's comments were not reflected in the reports, its concerns had been met, for example by the use of the word "santé" rather than "hygiène" throughout the text. The reports were a suitable basis for discussion of a proposed Convention and Recommendation which were much needed to revive the Safety Provisions (Building) Convention, 1937 (No. 62), now so much out of date. The proposed Convention should take account of the needs of all regions of the world if it was to be capable of being properly applied.

26. The Government member of Uruguay referred to a recent national tripartite seminar held with the assistance of PIACT which had confirmed the nature of the safety and health problems that arose from the difficult working conditions in the construction sector, and that had helped in analysing and preparing measures which would help in overcoming the difficulties. These included the adaptation and updating of existing legislation, and in this the proposed Convention and Recommendation would be most useful.

27. The Chairman thanked members for their constructive contributions to the general discussion, which he hoped would continue so that the work of the Committee would come to a successful conclusion.

Consideration of the proposed Convention contained in Report IV (2B)

PREAMBLE

28. Since no amendments were proposed, the Preamble was adopted without change.

PART I. SCOPE AND DEFINITIONS

Article 1¹

29. After discussion, the Workers' members withdrew an amendment to delete in paragraph 2 the words "where they exist" which qualify the reference to employers' and workers' organisations. The Employers' members and the Government members of Cyprus and the spokesman for the Government members of member States of the EC preferred the Office text and the amendment was withdrawn.

30. The Government members of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi and Zimbabwe introduced an amendment to paragraph 2 to insert the words "and on the basis of an assessment of safety and health hazards involved". The Employers' members and the Workers' members opposed the amendment, which was withdrawn.

31. The Government members of the member States of the EC introduced an amendment to the French text of paragraph 3 to replace the word "designera" by the words "pourrait désigner": this would be in accord with the English text. The amendment was referred to the Drafting Committee.

32. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to paragraph 3 to delete the words "such" and "as may be specified in national laws and regulations". The paragraph would then apply to all self-employed persons. The Employers' members pointed out that in member States the definition of a self-employed person varied considerably, while the Government member of India thought that to remove the qualification would broaden the scope too much. The Government members of the member States of the EC preferred the Office text. The amendment was withdrawn.

33. Subject to changes in the French text by the Drafting Committee, Article 1 was adopted.

Article 13 (First discussion)

34. The Chairman explained that an amendment submitted by the Employers' members would alter the structure of the proposed Convention and materially affect the future programme of discussion. He proposed, therefore, to have this amendment discussed at this early stage of proceedings. The spokesman for the Employers' members introduced the amendment to add a new paragraph to Article 13 to read:

Without prejudice to the generality of paragraphs 1 and 2 above, precautions to guard against the risks to the safety and health of workers shall be taken in relation to:

- (a) scaffolding and ladders;
- (b) lifting appliances and gear;
- (c) transport, earth-moving and materials-handling equipment;
- (d) plant, machinery, equipment and hand tools;
- (e) excavations, shafts, earthworks, underground works and tunnels;
- (f) cofferdams and caissons;
- (g) work in compressed air;
- (h) structural frames and formwork;
- (i) work over water;
- (j) lighting;
- (k) electrocution;
- (l) explosives.

and to delete Articles 14, 15, 16, 17, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 25, 26 and 27.

35. The Employers' members had given careful consideration to what the Committee was attempting to achieve in a Convention. They saw this as setting guide-lines stating principles which would have an excellent chance of ratification. Ratification would be hampered if the text was so broad and comprehensive that it embraced matters which should properly be in the proposed Recommendation. The proposed Convention should state only that precautions should be taken, leaving the proposed Recommendation to elaborate on the detail. The articles which it was proposed to delete were of a technical nature. It was wrong to put technical standards into a Convention when these could not be comprehensive or exhaustive and would remain frozen for 50 years or more. The Employers' members were seeking to find a compromise which would enable them to support the proposed Convention. A similar approach was often adopted in national legislation with detail left for regulations. There was some indication in the recently circulated questionnaire regarding safety in the use of chemicals at work that the ILO was itself moving towards this view of a Convention, and he asked for clarification.

¹The numbering of the Articles reproduces that of the proposed Convention in Report IV (2B). It does not necessarily correspond in every case to the numbering of the Articles in the proposed Convention reproduced at the end of the Committee's report, which is based on the decisions of the Committee and, in some cases, of the Drafting Committee.

36. The spokesman for the Workers' members said that throughout the world there was a cry for standards to be maintained and improved. The amendment proposed has little to do with constructing standards, more with demolition. It sought to bring together so much without any specification that it finally meant no more than that attention should be paid to the listed items. It sought to put into a single sentence measures to be taken for a wide variety of operations from work in compressed air to explosives. It gave no guidance to governments on how to deal with safety and health on sites. Previous Conventions had contained the sort of provisions found in the proposed Convention. If Articles 14 to 27 were transferred to the proposed Recommendation they would be lost, for a Recommendation could not replace a Convention.

37. The Government member of Argentina believed that a Convention had educative and persuasive value even when it was not ratified. The amendment read like a contents page without reference to principles, and should be rejected.

38. The spokesman for the Government members of member States of the EC said that the amendment was of basic significance for the proposed Convention. He wished to hear about the questionnaire on safety in the use of chemicals at work issued by the Office. The proposed Convention should contain basic obligations and requirements and he wished to know more of what the Employers' members had in mind.

39. The Government members of Austria, Cyprus, Hungary and India believed that the amendment over-simplified the provisions of the proposed Convention so that they were without content and substance. The Government member of Côte d'Ivoire similarly thought the amendment unacceptable to developing countries whose national legislation needed to be guided by a carefully developed Convention.

40. The Government member of the Byelorussian SSR considered that the elimination of the specific articles would convert the proposed Convention into a universal instrument, applicable to all forms of employment and without any particular relationship to construction. The amendment was opposed by the Government member of Canada, who believed the implications had not been clearly seen, and by the Government members of the German Democratic Republic, the United Republic of Tanzania and Zimbabwe who saw the amendment as providing only a stark list of operations with discretion as to the precautions to be taken without any indications as to what these should be.

41. At the request of the Chairman, the representative of the Secretary-General explained the nature of a Convention and a Recommendation as contained in Article 19 of the ILO Constitution, and drew attention to Article 4 of the proposed Convention in which reference was made to the proposed Recommendation.

42. The Government member of the Federal Republic of Germany, as spokesman for the Government members of member States of the EC, and the spokesman for the Employers' members requested that the representative of the Secretary-General clarify any new ILO approach regarding restriction to principles in the questionnaire on chemical safety. The former suggested a working party to seek a reconciliation of the conflicting views.

43. The spokesman of the Workers' members, supported by several Government members, requested that a vote be taken on the amendment. Put to the vote it was rejected by 93,310 votes in favour to 149,296 against, with 7,998 abstentions.

Article 2

44. The Government members of Denmark, Finland, Norway and Sweden submitted an amendment to delete in clause (a)(i) the bracketed words "including cleaning and painting". These were unnecessary and misleading, for a certain amount of cleaning and painting was to be found in construction work other than maintenance, and the Government member of the United States agreed with this view. The Employers' members supported the amendment, for the words could be read to cover daily office cleaning. The Workers' members preferred the Office text, and the Government member of Austria drew attention to Report IV(2A) which made it clear that cleaning of structures, and not housekeeping, was intended. The amendment was rejected by 94,041 votes in favour to 134,633 against, with 6,665 absences.

45. An amendment submitted by the Government member of Denmark, Finland, Norway and Sweden to insert reference to "dredging" in clause (a)(ii) was withdrawn after discussion as the process was already covered by the definition when it was associated with construction processes.

46. An amendment by the Government member of India to include reference to "canals, canal structures and slope protection works" in clause (a)(ii) was withdrawn after the Chairman gave his opinion that these were covered by the reference to inland waterways.

47. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to subparagraph 2(c) to replace the words "need to be" by the words "are required to be". The present wording did not specify who determined need, whereas "required" meant required by the employers. The Workers' members interpreted "need" as the worker being present at a workplace by reason of the work to be performed by him, and preferred the Office text. Several Government members also preferred the Office text and the amendment was withdrawn.

48. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to subparagraph 2(c) to change the reference to "an employer" to "their employer". An employer should be responsible only for the safety of workers on his own sites, for he could not be responsible if a worker visited a construction site not under his control. Each employer was responsible for his own workers on a site and was required to co-operate with other employers on the site. The Workers' members considered that as long as a worker was at a worksite an employer should be responsible for him, particularly if his own employer was not there. The amendment restricted the responsibility of employers to an unacceptable degree. Often there was more than one employer on a site and every employer and worker should observe safety measures in the interest of all. The Office text provided room for this. The spokesman for the Government members of the member States of the EC supported the amendment and withdrew their own amendment which was in similar terms. The proposed Convention should make it clear that each employer was responsible for the safety of his own workers. Several Government members spoke in support of the Office text, which dealt adequately with sites on which there were several employers. Put to the vote the amendment was rejected by 5,208 votes in favour to 5,828 votes against, with 310 abstentions. An amendment submitted by the Government member of Turkey to delete as superfluous the reference to the later definition of employer was withdrawn after discussion.

49. After discussion, an amendment submitted by the Government member of Canada to add a reference to "owner" in clause (e)(ii) was withdrawn, as was a related amendment referring to "the project manager".

50. The Employers' members withdrew amendments to delete subparagraphs (g), (h) and (i) in view of the rejection of their substantial amendment to Article 13.

51. An amendment submitted by the Government member of Brazil to introduce a definition of "good design and construction" was withdrawn after discussion of difficulties presented by national variations in standards.

52. Article 2 was adopted without change.

PART II. GENERAL PROVISIONS

Article 3

53. After discussion, the Government members of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi and Zimbabwe withdrew an amendment to introduce the words "where they exist".

54. Article 3 was adopted without change.

Article 4

55. The Government member of Canada withdrew an amendment to subparagraph (a) intended to provide for the application of the proposed Convention by means other than laws or regulations.

56. The Government members of the member States of the EC submitted an amendment to delete subparagraph (b). Their spokesman said that they were concerned to have a Convention which would be widely ratified and they saw subparagraph (b) as an impediment to ratification. The representative of the Secretary-General had explained the essential difference between a Convention and a Recommendation, and in trying to connect the two, subparagraph (b) would contradict the Constitution. The Government member of Uruguay and the Employers' members were of similar opinion. The spokesman for the Workers' members asked whether similar provisions had been included in other Conventions, and at the request of the Chairman, the representative of the Secretary-General reported that one Convention, the Hygiene (Commerce and Offices) Convention, 1964 (No. 120), contained a similar text. There had been 42 ratifications of that Convention and the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations had on occasion asked governments how far they had been able to give effect to the provisions of the Recommendations, but without follow-up. In the light of this information several Government members spoke in favour of the amendment and it was accepted by the Workers' members.

57. Article 4, as amended, was adopted.

Article 5

58. In view of the discussion on a related amendment to Article 4, the Government member of Canada withdrew an amendment in similar terms.

59. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add a new paragraph requiring standards which are introduced to be according to the principle of tripartism and not to be inferior to those envisaged by Part III, and also requiring equal opportunities for men and women. Several Government members and the Employers' members regarded mention of equal opportunities as inappropriate to the proposed Convention. The spokesman for the Employers' members said that member States which ratified the proposed Convention were bound to maintain its standards and there was already a mechanism for checking that this was done. The proposers withdrew the amendment.

60. Article 5 was adopted without change.

61. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to replace the second and third lines by the following text: "employers, workers and their respective organisations in order to promote safety and health in all construction activities in accordance with national laws and regulations". The intention was to encourage greater understanding and collaboration between employers and workers at levels and to include in this process their representative organisations. Co-operation should not be limited to the workplace but should permeate all construction activities. Governments also would find such co-operation helpful in seeing that the appropriate measures were applied. The spokesman for the Employers' members opposed the amendment which made the scope of the article far too broad. It would, for example, extend it to draughting rooms, design, trucking on highways, and preparation of bids or tenders, whereas the proposed Convention was intended to promote safety and health on the construction site. The spokesman for the Workers' members proposed the deletion of the word "all", but this did not meet the Employers' members' objection. The Government member of Senegal said that responsibility for safety on site rested with the employer and there was no place on site for organisations. The Government members of Argentina, the German Democratic Republic, Côte d'Ivoire and India spoke in favour of the amendment in extending co-operation beyond the site to employers' and workers' organisations and to professional bodies. The Government member of the German Democratic Republic emphasised that even at the design stage safety had to be considered. The Government member of the Netherlands thought the amendment unnecessary, for as members of the ILO, co-operation between employers' and workers' organisations was already incumbent upon them. The spokesman for the Workers' members said that it was not possible to achieve co-operation on the site if it was not a policy in the enterprise. The involvement of organisations was referred to or suggested elsewhere in the proposed Convention through safety representatives and committees, in safety training, and in off-site activities. The worker could not be separated from his organisation and collective agreements were already examples of co-operation between organisations. The spokesman for the Employers' members restated their opposition and emphasised that many construction workers were not unionised, while employers' organisations could not be bound by a Convention.

62. The Government members of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi and Zimbabwe withdrew their amendment in favour of the Workers' members' amendment.

63. The amendment, as subamended by deletion of the word "all", was rejected by 5,301 votes in favour to 5,456 against, with 620 abstentions.

64. The Government member of the Federal Republic of Germany, as spokesman for the Government members of member States of the EC, introduced an amendment to the English text to delete in the second line the word "organised" and to add after the word "with" the words "modalities to be defined by". The amendment was supported by the Employers' members and the Workers' members and was adopted.

65. Article 6, as amended, was adopted.

Article 7

66. An amendment proposed by the Government member of Switzerland was withdrawn in favour of that submitted by the Government members of the member States of the EC. Their amendment to make drafting changes to the text was withdrawn after the spokesmen for the Employers' and the Workers' members indicated their opposition.

67. The Government members of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi and Zimbabwe submitted an amendment intended to improve the text in the following terms: (1) In the second line, replace the words "a safe and healthy workplace and to" by the word "and"; (2) In the third line, after the word "prescribed" insert the words "safety and health"; (3) In the third line, after the word "measures" add the words "at the workplace".

68. The Employers' members and the Workers' members supported the amendment, which was adopted.

69. Article 7, as amended, was adopted.

Article 8

70. After lengthy discussion, the Government members of the member States of the EC accepted a subamendment to their amendment to subparagraph 1(a), proposed by the Employers' members, so that their amendment then read: "the principal contractor, or such other person or body with actual control over or as is primarily responsible for overall work-site activities, shall be responsible for co-ordinating the prescribed safety and health measures and, in so far as is compatible with national laws and regulations, be responsible for ensuring compliance with such measures". The Employers' members then withdrew their own amendment. The Government members of Canada and of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi and Zimbabwe withdrew amendments in favour of that proposed by the Government members of member States of the EC.

71. The Workers' members supported the amendment as it retained the primary responsibility of the principal contractor for safety and health measures.

72. The amendment, as subamended, was adopted.

73. The Government members of the member States of the EC accepted a subamendment to their amendment to subparagraph 1(b), proposed by the Employers' members so that their amendment then read:

In so far as it is compatible with national laws and regulations, where a principal contractor, or such other person or body with actual control over or as is primarily responsible for overall work-site activities, is not present at the site, he shall nominate a competent person at the site with the authority and means necessary to ensure on his behalf co-ordination and compliance with the measures foreseen in subparagraph (a).

74. The Government members of Canada and of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi and Zimbabwe again withdrew their amendments in favour of that submitted by the Government members of member States of the EC. The amendment, as subamended, was adopted.

75. The Government members of the member States of the EC submitted an amendment to add a new subparagraph to paragraph 1 to read:

each employer remains responsible for the application of the prescribed measures for the workers placed under his authority.

The purpose was to make clear that despite the duties imposed in the previous subparagraphs the primary responsibility of the employer remained. The Employers' members thought it necessary to make this absolutely clear and the amendment was adopted.

76. An amendment by the Government member of Turkey to delete the words "with one another" as being superfluous was adopted, as was another by the Government members of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi and Zimbabwe to insert in paragraph 2 after "prescribed" the words "safety and health".

77. Article 8, as amended, was adopted.

Article 9

78. The Government members of the member States of the EC submitted an amendment to delete the words "who will be engaged in its construction". As spokesman, the Government member of the Federal Republic of Germany said that the words were unnecessary because of the definition of "worker" in Article 2. The Employers' members opposed the amendment as broadening the scope of the proposed Convention, for it was not all workers who were within its intention. The spokesman for the Workers' members agreed with the intention to cover workers in all construction activities and to meet the Employers' members' point proposed a subamendment to insert the word "construction" before "workers". The subamendment was acceptable to the proposer and to the Employers' members and the amendment, as subamended, was adopted.

79. The Government member of the Byelorussian SSR submitted an amendment to replace the word "practice" by the word "regulation". The word "practice" was vague and inappropriate and those who designed and planned a construction project should be subject to regulations which may embody national practice. The spokesman for the Employers' members opposed the amendment for many standard practices of the industry were not encompassed in regulations. The Government member of Hungary asked if the expression "national law and practice" had been used in other Conventions and the representative of the Secretary-General said that both "practice" and "regulations" has been used as had been thought appropriate. The spokesman for the Workers' members drew attention to their amendment which covered broader ground by referring both to regulations and collective agreements. The spokesman for the Employers' members commented that collective agreements were industrial relations matters, not matters of safety and health, and they could not be extended to those involved in designing and planning. Several Government members expressed a preference for the Office text and the Workers' members withdrew their amendment. The Government member of the Byelorussian SSR then proposed a subamendment to this own amendment to retain the word "practice" and to insert before it the words "regulations and". This was agreed by both the Employers' members and the Workers' members and the amendment, as subamended, was adopted.

80. After discussion of the appropriate place for the content of Paragraph 9 of the proposed Recommendation, the Workers' members withdrew an amendment to transfer the Paragraph to the proposed Convention.

81. Article 9, as amended, was adopted.

Article 10

82. The Government member of Brazil submitted an amendment to insert at the beginning of the Article the words "National laws or regulations shall provide that". The intention was to guarantee that workers had the rights and duties expressed. The Government members of Austria and Turkey considered the amendment unnecessary because of the content of Article 4. The spokesman for the Workers' members drew attention to similar words in Article 7 and believed the amendment was important for future ILO monitoring purposes. The Employers' members withdrew an amendment to place rather similar words at the end of the Article and supported the amendment, which was then adopted.

83. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to insert after the word "method" the words "and organisation". It was necessary to involve workers in the whole construction process to achieve a safe and healthy workplace. The spokesman for the Employers' members opposed the amendment. Workers had an important contribution to make but it was not their role to manage. Management must have sole control over the organisation of work. The Government members of Hungary, Nigeria, the German Democratic Republic and the Netherlands spoke in support of the amendment and of the workers' contribution to organisational aspects of safety and health. The Government members of Canada, Senegal and Côte d'Ivoire were opposed to the amendment, because since workers did not participate in the organisation of work, they should not be in the position to exercise control over it. The spokesman for the Employers' members considered organisation to include the right to say what should be done from day to day and the activities on which workers were to be engaged, and that decision had never been shared with workers. The spokesman for the Workers' members said that they were concerned with organisation only in terms of safety and health at work and the workers' right to comment on organisation as well as methods was essential. Put to the vote, the amendment was rejected by 2,264 votes in favour to 2,670 votes against, with 660 absentions.

84. The Government member of Côte d'Ivoire introduced an amendment to insert in the fourth line the word "could" after the word "they". It was important that workers should have the opportunity to express their views not only on proven hazards but on those which could arise in the work process. The spokesman for the Employers' members opposed the amendment as it introduced an area of speculation into the text. It was not possible to contemplate everything that could affect safety and health. The spokesman for the Workers' members thought the word "could" was of importance since the text dealt with equipment, methods of work and procedures. The Government member of Cyprus supported the amendment for both possible and probable risks should be covered. The amendment was adopted by 2,580 votes in favour to 2,460 against, with 510 abstentions.

85. Article 10, as amended, was adopted.

Article 11

86. An amendment by the Employers' members to subparagraph (a) to delete in the English text the letter "s" at the end of the word "employers" was adopted. An amendment by the Government members of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi and Zimbabwe to subparagraph (a) to insert after the word "prescribed" the words "safety and health" was adopted.

87. Amendments submitted by the Government members of Canada, Byelorussian SSR, Turkey, Denmark, Finland, Norway and Sweden to the wording of subparagraphs (b), (c) and (d) were withdrawn by their sponsors when they were not supported by the Employers' members and the Workers' members.

88. An amendment submitted by the Government members of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi and Zimbabwe to subparagraph (e) to insert after the word "prescribed" the words "safety and health" was adopted.

89. The Government member of Côte d'Ivoire introduced an amendment to add a new subparagraph to deal with special groups of workers. Although there was agreement with the spirit of the amendment it was felt to be inappropriate to the proposed Convention and was withdrawn.

90. Article 11, as amended, was adopted.

Article 12

91. The Government member of Japan introduced an amendment to paragraph 1 to replace the paragraph with the text of Article 12 of the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155). Some member States, including his own, dealt with the matter by national practice rather than by laws or regulations. The Employers members and Workers' members preferred the Office text and the amendment was withdrawn. After discussion, the Employers' members withdrew an amendment to paragraph 1 to delete the words "national laws and regulations shall provide that".

92. The Government member of the Byelorussian SSR introduced an amendment to paragraph 1 in two parts. The first was to delete the words "has good reason to", and the second to delete the words "and serious". He said that in critical situations one must make the workers' decision to act as easy as possible, while the seriousness of an imminent danger could often only be judged later. The Employers' members believed that there should be good reason for leaving the site and that a minor danger even if imminent would not warrant such action. The Workers' members believed that the amendment provided a better basis for the workers' action and that it should not be necessary to wait for a danger to become serious. The Government member of the German Democratic Republic pointed to the difficulty in practice of deciding either of these issues quickly and supported the amendment. The spokesman for the Government members of member States of the EC opposed the amendment, referring to the discussion at the 73rd Session when the reference to good reason had been added as meaning a legal reason; there were many risks on site such as trailing cables which would not justify evacuation.

93. The two parts of the amendment were voted upon separately. The first part of the amendment (parts 1 and 2 in the Spanish text) was rejected by 2,278 votes in favour to 3,060 votes against, with 180 abstentions. The second part of the amendment (part 3 in the Spanish text) was rejected by 2,670 votes in favour to 2,751 votes against, with 120 abstentions.

94. After discussion, an amendment by the Government member of Switzerland to replace in paragraph 1 the words "he has" by "there is" was withdrawn. An amendment to paragraph 1 by the Government member of Angola to insert after the word "supervisor" the words "or the workers' safety representative" was not supported by the Employers' members or the Workers' members and was rejected. In the light of the discussion on his amendment to paragraph 1, the Government member of the Byelorussian SSR withdrew an amendment to paragraph 2 which was in similar terms. After discussion the Government member of China withdrew an amendment to insert after the word "immediate" the words "and effective". The Government members of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi and Zimbabwe withdrew an amendment to add an additional paragraph dealing with conditions on resumption of work.

95. Article 12 was adopted without change.

Proposed new Articles

96. After discussion, the Government members of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi and Zimbabwe withdrew an amendment to add a new Article to provide that compliance with Part III was the responsibility of employers. The Government members of Argentina and Brazil similarly withdrew an amendment to add a new Article requiring at each site a chronogram showing safety and health procedures.

PART III. PREVENTIVE AND PROTECTIVE MEASURES

Article 13 (Second discussion)

97. The Government members of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi and Zimbabwe withdrew, after discussion, amendments to paragraphs 1 and 3 to delete the words "All reasonable". Identical amendments to paragraphs 1 and 3 by the Government members of Argentina, Brazil and Turkey to replace the word "reasonable" by "necessary", and by the Government members of Uruguay and Switzerland to delete the words "to ensure" were withdrawn after the Employers' members and the Workers' members said that they preferred the Office text. After discussion, the Government member of Turkey withdrew amendments to paragraph 1, to refer to safety committees and to replace "injury" by "damage".

98. Amendments to paragraphs 1 and 3 by the Government members of the member States of the EC to replace the word "reasonable" by "appropriate" were adopted for reasons of consistency. The Employers' members supported an amendment to paragraph 1 by the Workers' members to insert after the word "health" the words "and safety", and it was adopted. An amendment to paragraph 3 submitted by the Government members of the member States of the EC to insert the words "at or" after the word "present", in order to widen the scope of the Article, was adopted.

99. An amendment submitted by the Government member of Turkey to replace the word "arise" by "originate" was not supported and was withdrawn. An amendment by the Workers' members to add a new paragraph was withdrawn without discussion.

100. Article 13, as amended, was adopted.

Article 14

101. An amendment by the Government members of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi and Zimbabwe to add the words "when in use" to paragraph 2 was not supported and was withdrawn.

102. Article 14 was adopted without change.

Article 15

103. The Government member of Turkey introduced an amendment to place subparagraph (c) before subparagraph (b). Lifting appliances had to be installed before they could be maintained and it was logical to treat them in this order. The amendment was adopted.

104. The Government members of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi and Zimbabwe submitted an amendment to subparagraph 1(d) to insert after the word "tested" the words "by a competent person", while the Government members of the member States of the EC proposed to amend the subparagraph by inserting after the word "times" the words "and in such cases"; whereas the Government member of Cyprus proposed to add at the end the words "and the results recorded". All three amendments were adopted. Further amendments by the Governments of Turkey and India did not find support and were withdrawn.

105. Article 15, as amended, was adopted.

Article 16

106. The Government members of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi and Zimbabwe proposed an amendment to subparagraph 1(a) to add the words "taking into account ergonomic principles". This was sub-amended by the Employers' members to insert "so far as possible" after the word "account". Both were accepted by the Workers' members and were adopted. A further amendment submitted by the Government members of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi and Zimbabwe to refer to provision for parking spaces did not find support and was withdrawn.

107. Article 16, as amended, was adopted.

Article 17

108. An amendment by the Employers' members to amend subparagraph 1(a) by inserting the words "so far as possible", as had been done in Article 16, was adopted without discussion.

109. The Government member of the Federal Republic of Germany, as spokesman for the Government members of member States of the EC, submitted amendments to subparagraph 1(c) and paragraph 2. The first was to replace the words "as appropriate" by the words "have been designed unless a use outside the initial design purpose has been assessed by a competent person who has concluded that such use is safe". The second was a consequential amendment to replace the text of paragraph 2 by "Adequate instructions by the manufacturer or the employer for safe use shall be available where appropriate, and followed". The spokesman for the Employers' members supported the amendments, as there were many pieces of construction equipment which were regularly and properly used for more than one purpose, particularly on confined sites. The spokesman for the Workers' members had reservations, for there were risks in using equipment for purposes for which it was not originally intended and for which manufacturers might not accept responsibility, and he questioned whether "competent person" might better be replaced by "competent authority". The Government members of Argentina and Turkey pointed to the difficulty which reference to "authority" would present, particularly for developing countries. The proposer explained that the amendments did not change the substance of the Office text and the spokesman for the Workers' members said that they could be supported if their own amendment to require manufacturers' instructions to be in the language of the users was incorporated. After discussion of the increasing use of pictograms and diagrams in operating instructions, the Government member of Cyprus proposed a subamendment to the second amendment so that paragraph 2 read "Adequate instructions by the manufacturer or the employer for safe use shall be available in a form understood by users". The amendments, as subamended, were adopted.

110. The Government members of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi and Zimbabwe submitted an amendment to paragraph 1 to add a new subparagraph (d) reading:

be operated by workers who have received appropriate training in accordance with national laws and regulations and drew attention to a similar provision in Article 16. The Government member of the German Democratic Republic pointed to the wide range of devices covered by the Article so that national legislation could not be expected to deal with training in the use of hand tools such as hammers. The spokesman for the Workers' members drew a distinction with the type of machinery dealt with in Article 16 where an operator's licence would often be required. The Chairman proposed a subamendment to delete the words following "training" and with this subamendment the amendment was adopted.

111. Article 17, as amended, was adopted.

Article 18

112. The Government member of Canada submitted an amendment to paragraph 1 to replace the word "prevent" by "guard against", pointing out that measures such as safety nets did not prevent a fall but protected workers from the consequences. The spokesman for the Employers' members supported the amendment, emphasising its importance to employers. He restated the position taken at the 73rd Session that employers could not accept a Convention requiring prevention because in the English language this was an absolute term. The French equivalent text already had the sense of "guard against". It was now for the Drafting Committee to find a suitable alternative. The spokesman for the Workers' members opposed the amendment. The requirement to prevent was used in some parts of the proposed Convention with an absolute goal of accident prevention, remembering that prevention was better than cure. The first objective of safety and health measures was prevention, even if it could not be achieved in all cases. This was not one of the cases where "to prevent" could properly be read in the absolute sense but rather in that of avoiding danger at work. After lengthy discussion which included reference by several Government members to the legal opinion given at the general discussion, there was a short recess. At the conclusion of this both the Employers' members and the Workers' members agreed that the amendment should be referred to the Drafting Committee with the observations and recommendations of both the Employers' members and the Workers' members and with the legal opinion referred to. An identical amendment to paragraph 2 by the Government member of Canada was also referred to the Drafting Committee.

113. The spokesman for the Employers' members stressed that they would agree that this matter be referred to the Drafting Committee provided that it was clearly understood that in each case where the word "prevent" appears it should be replaced by "guard against" or some other appropriate expression.

114. An amendment to paragraph 1 by the Government member of India relating to the height and slope of structures was withdrawn after discussion, as was an amendment by the Government member of Turkey to add a new paragraph requiring a medical examination of workers at heights.

115. Article 18 was adopted subject to approval of the text as revised by the Drafting Committee.

Article 19

116. An amendment submitted by the Government members of Argentina and Brazil to insert in subparagraph (c) after the word "gases" the word "vapours" was adopted. The same Government members proposed an amendment to introduce a new paragraph to deal with underground risks other than those from electricity. The Government members of the member States of the EC introduced a subamendment so that the paragraph would read: "In order to avoid risk to workers arising from possible underground dangers such as natural or artificial circulation of fluids (liquids or gases) or pockets of gases, appropriate investigations shall be undertaken to locate them." This subamendment was accepted and the amendment adopted.

117. Article 19, as amended, was adopted.

Article 20

118. Article 20 was adopted without change.

Article 21

119. Article 21 was adopted without change.

Article 22

120. The Government members of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi and Zimbabwe introduced an amendment to delete the word "temporary", as all states of weakness should be covered. The Government member of the United Kingdom, as spokesman for the Government members of the member States of the EC, with whom other Government members agreed, said the intention was to deal with temporary states of weakness during erection and not in the final product. The amendment was rejected.

121. Article 22 was adopted without change.

Article 23

122. The spokesman for the Workers' members introduced an amendment to delete from paragraph 2 the words "by water". The purpose was to extend the Article to transport over water, e.g. by helicopter, rather than transport solely by water. The amendment was adopted and Government members withdrew three amendments all of which had similar effect. The Government members of Argentina and Brazil withdrew an amendment to insert a new paragraph dealing with rescue operations after a consensus was expressed that the matter was covered in subparagraph (b) and in Article 12.

123. Article 23, as amended, was adopted.

Article 24

124. The Government members of the member States of the EC submitted an amendment to change the word "elimination" in the French and Spanish texts, and this was referred to the Drafting Committee. The Government members of Denmark, Finland, Norway and Sweden submitted an amendment to subparagraph (b) to insert after the word "be" the words "planned and". It was agreed that planning was essential to the prevention of demolition accidents and the amendment was adopted.

125. Article 24, as amended, was adopted.

Article 25

126. Article 25 was adopted without change.

Article 26

127. After discussion the Government member of Turkey withdrew an amendment intended to extend the scope of paragraph 2. The Government members of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi and Zimbabwe submitted an amendment to introduce in paragraph 3 reference to national laws or regulations. At the invitation of the Chairman, the representative of the Secretary-General reminded the Committee of the discussion at the 73rd Session at which it was said that many industrialised countries relied upon electrical standards not directly linked to legislation. The Employers' members and the Workers' members did not support the amendment and it was withdrawn. The Government members of the member States of the EC withdrew after discussion an amendment dealing with various elements on a site which, although not electrical in themselves, might affect electrical safety.

128. Article 26 was adopted without change.

Article 27

129. The Employers' members withdrew without discussion an amendment to express the Article in positive terms. The Government members of Argentina and Brazil submitted an amendment to insert after the word "stored" the word "transported" which found general support and was adopted.

130. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to subparagraph (b) to add the words "or under the supervision of" before the words "competent person". The competent person might not always be the appropriate person to handle explosives, e.g. in loading and unloading vehicles. The Workers' members preferred the Office text in view of the nature of explosives and the Government members of Hungary and Canada thought the definition of competent person in Article 2 wide enough to make the amendment unnecessary. After further discussion the amendment was withdrawn.

131. Article 27, as amended, was adopted.

Article 28

132. The Workers' members withdrew without discussion an amendment proposing drafting changes to the first paragraph. The Government member of India withdrew an amendment to add "intensive illumination" to the list of hazards.

133. The Government member of Canada submitted an amendment to paragraph 1 to replace the word "prevent" by "minimise" because it was not always possible to prevent exposure. "Prévenir" in the French text had not the absolute sense of "prevent" in the English text. The Government member of Argentina asked that the Spanish text be left unchanged. The spokesman for the Employers' members contended that a decision had been taken to refer all such matters to the Drafting Committee. The Workers' members believed that the context in which the word "prevent" was used was different to that in the former case; this Article was dealing with exposure. The spokesman for the Government members of member States of the EC proposed a subamendment which would make the English and French texts identical. This would delete the words following the comma and replace them with "appropriate exposure prevention measures shall be taken". The spokesman for the Workers' members preferred the more grammatical words "appropriate preventive measures against exposure shall be taken" but accepted the subamendment, as did the proposer and the Employers' members. The amendment, as subamended, was adopted.

134. An amendment by the Government member of Turkey to reverse the order of subparagraphs 2(a) and 2(b) was opposed as being contrary to established practice of seeking first to substitute harmful substances, and was withdrawn.

135. An amendment to paragraph 3 by the Workers' members to replace the word "space" by the word "area" was adopted.

136. Article 28, as amended, was adopted.

Proposed new Article

137. The Government members of Argentina and Brazil submitted an amendment to add a new Article requiring programmes of supervision of workers' health to supplement and complement the basic measures. The spokesman of the Employers' members considered that it went beyond the scope of the proposed Convention and as the spokesman of the Workers' members expressed doubts as to its content, it was withdrawn.

Article 29

138. An amendment to subparagraph 1(a) by the Government member of Canada to replace the word "prevent" by "minimise" was referred to the Drafting Committee in the light of the earlier discussion. In view of this decision, the Government member of Turkey withdrew an amendment to delete subparagraph (b). As training was thought to be dealt with adequately in Article 33, the Government members of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi and Zimbabwe withdrew an amendment on this matter.

139. Article 29 was adopted subject to approval of the next as revised by the Drafting Committee.

Article 30

140. At the suggestion of the Chairman there was discussion between Employers' members and the Workers' members and the Government members who had proposed four amendments to paragraph 1 to agree a text of a subamendment which was acceptable to all. The following subamendment to the amendment submitted by the Employers' members was agreed so as to replace paragraph 1:

1. Where adequate protection against risks of accident or injury to health, including exposure to adverse conditions, cannot be ensured by other means, suitable personal protective equipment and protective clothing, having regard to the type of work and risks, shall be provided and maintained by the employer, without cost to the workers, as may be prescribed by national laws or regulations.

2. Employers shall provide the appropriate means to make possible the use of individual protective equipment, and ensure its proper use.

Paragraphs 2 and 3 to be renumbered 3 and 4.

141. The subamendment was adopted, and the amendment, as subamended, was also adopted.

142. The Government members thereupon withdrew the four amendments encompassed in the new wording. The Government members of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi and Zimbabwe accepted a subamendment proposed by the Employers' members to their own amendment to paragraph 2, so that it read "taking into account so far as possible ergonomic principles". The amendment was adopted, as was another by the same Government members to delete in paragraph 3 after the word "required" the words "to use" as being superfluous.

143. Article 30, as amended, was adopted.

Article 31

144. The spokesman for the Employers' members introduced an amendment so that the wording of the Article would require that "employers shall make adequate provision for first aid". Facilities for the removal of injured workers for medical attention were not required on city sites and might be impracticable on remote sites. The spokesman for the Workers' members stressed the importance not only of first-aid provisions but of suitably trained personnel; moreover it was not advisable to keep injured workers on site. There were contributions by numerous Government members to the ensuing discussion stressing such matters as the importance of trained first aiders, the removal to safety of underground workers, and the problems of small sites.

145. The Employers' members agreed that personnel should be trained in first aid and the Government members of Cyprus, Austria, and the Government members of member States of the EC proposed a composite subamendment so that the amendment as subamended read:

The employer shall be responsible for ensuring that first aid, including trained personnel, is available at all times. Arrangements shall be made for ensuring the removal for medical attention of workers who have suffered an accident or sudden illness.

The spokesmen for the Employers' members and Workers' members agreed to this text and the amendment, as subamended, was adopted.

146. Article 31, as amended, was adopted.

Article 32

147. The spokesman for the Employers' members referred to a problem with the word "welfare" in the title of the Article in the French text and asked that it be considered by the Drafting Committee.

148. The Government members of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi, the United Republic of Tanzania and Zimbabwe withdrew, after discussion of the problem of interpretation, an amendment to paragraph 1 to refer to hygienic drinking facilities. The same Government members also withdrew an amendment to paragraph 2 (c) to require accommodation for preparing meals after the Employers' members and several Government members doubted the practicability of such provision on small sites. The Government member of New Zealand thought the matter was adequately covered by paragraph 46 of the proposed Recommendation.

149. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add a new paragraph requiring national laws or regulations to provide for specific standards for the quality and quantity of the welfare facilities, as it was not sufficient simply to require that facilities should be available. The Employers' members thought that, as detail, this was properly dealt with in the proposed Recommendation while the Government members of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi, United Republic of Tanzania and Zimbabwe believed that paragraph 2 of the Article was already sufficient. The spokesman for the Government members of the member States of the EC referred to the provision for setting standards in Article 5. After several Government members had spoken both for and against the amendment, it was withdrawn.

150. The Workers' members withdrew an amendment requiring living accommodation on sites remote from workers' homes after there had been reference to the role of collective bargaining, which was discussed at the 73rd Session, and to paragraph 47 of the proposed Recommendation. There was no doubt as to the importance of such provision.

151. The spokesman for the Workers' members introduced an amendment to add a new paragraph to read:

Men and women workers should be provided with separate sanitary, washing and sleeping facilities.

The Government member of the United Kingdom said that there could be practical difficulties with requiring separate facilities in all cases. Several Government members spoke in favour of the amendment, and a subamendment was then introduced by the Employers' members to delete reference to sleeping facilities on the ground that this was dealt with in Paragraph 47 of the proposed Recommendation. The subamendment was accepted and the amendment as subamended, was adopted.

152. The Government member of Austria considered that the amendment should be incorporated in subparagraph 2 (a).

153. Article 32, as amended, was adopted.

Article 33

154. The Government member of China withdrew an amendment intended to strengthen the responsibility of employers to educate workers, particularly young and inexperienced workers, in safety and health, after the Office text was considered to be clearer. The Government member of Turkey withdrew an amendment, also after discussion, requiring information to be provided to be preferably in the workers' mother tongue. It was considered that this subject had already been adequately covered.

155. Article 33 was adopted without change.

Article 34

156. The Workers' members introduced an amendment in the following terms: in the second line to replace the word "reasonable" by the word "prescribed" and to delete the word "such": in the third line to delete the words "as may be prescribed". This was supported by the Employers' members and was adopted without further discussion.

157. Article 34, as amended, was adopted.

PART IV. IMPLEMENTATION

Article 35

158. An amendment by the Government members of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi, the United Republic of Tanzania and Zimbabwe to insert after the word "Member" the words "which ratifies this Convention" was withdrawn as it was considered unnecessary.

159. The spokesman for the Workers' members explained that an amendment to add after the word "penalties" the words "and corrective measures" was intended to introduce a more positive approach. The amendment was adopted.

160. Article 35, as amended, was adopted.

PART V. FINAL PROVISIONS

Article 36

161. Article 36 was adopted without change.

TITLE OF CONVENTION

162. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to the title of the proposed Convention in the French and Spanish texts to delete "la santé" and "y salud" and substitute "l'hygiène" and "e higiene" respectively. An Employers' member explained that there had been a long tradition of using the word "hygiène" in French-speaking countries as it contained within it the idea of prevention. The Government members of Argentina and Uruguay opposed the amendment. The word "salud" in the Spanish text was broader in its meaning and they pointed to its use in the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155), and the Occupational Health Services Convention, 1985 (No. 161). As there was an English counterpart for "higiene" it would be necessary also to change the English text if the amendment were adopted. The Government member of Côte d'Ivoire opposed the amendment to the French text for similar reasons. The representative of the Secretary-General recalled that a decision to use the words "santé" or "salud" rather than "hygiène" or "hygiene" in the French and Spanish texts had first been taken in 1981 in the discussion of Convention No. 155. In 1984 and 1985, after several records votes, the word "santé" or "salud" rather than "hygiène" or "higiene" in the French and Spanish texts had first been taken in 1981 in the discussion of Convention No. 155. In 1984 and 1985, after several record votes, the word "santé" or "salud" was used in the title of Convention No. 161. The spokesman for the Employers' members said the proposed change appeared to be a substantive rather than a linguistic matter and withdrew the amendment.

Consideration of the proposed Recommendation contained in Report IV(2)

163. With the agreement of the Vice-Chairmen and members of the Committee, the Deputy Chairman took the chair in the absence of the Chairman, who was ill.¹

PREAMBLE

164. The Preamble was adopted without amendment.

Paragraph 1

165. An amendment by the Government members of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi and Zimbabwe to clause (a) to add reference to demolition was rejected as it was already covered in Paragraph 2(a). An amendment submitted by the Government member of Brazil to clause (b), to insert the words "and river" after the word "offshore", to delete the words "while under construction onshore", and to insert the word "onshore" was rejected, as its scope was uncertain and it was likely to be covered by the definition of civil engineering.

166. Paragraph 1 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 2

167. The Government members of the member States of the EC submitted an amendment to add a new clause to read:

the term "workers' representatives in the undertaking" means persons who are recognised as such under national law or practice, the term was defined in other Conventions and it appeared in Paragraphs 22 and 39 of the Recommendation. This was opposed by the Workers' members as its purpose was not apparent. "Employer" and "worker" were defined terms and were sufficient for co-operation at the workplace and there was no equivalent proposal to define "employers' representative". The Employers' members thought it necessary to be able to identify the recognised spokesman for the workers on a site. The amendment was adopted by 10,249 votes in favour to 8,436 against, with 999 abstentions.

168. Paragraph 2, as amended, was adopted.

169. Paragraph 3 was adopted without change.

¹The numbering of the Paragraphs reproduces that of the proposed Recommendation in Report IV 2(B). It does not necessarily correspond in every case to the numbering of the Paragraphs in the proposed Recommendation reproduced at the end of the Committee's report, which is based on the decisions of the Committee and, in some cases, of the Drafting Committee.

Paragraph 4

170. An amendment submitted by the Government members of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi, the United Republic of Tanzania and Zimbabwe to insert after the word "prescribed" the words "safety and health", to equate with previous amendments to several Articles, was adopted.

171. Paragraph 4, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 5

172. An amendment similar to previous amendments made to various articles was submitted by the Government members of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi, the United Republic of Tanzania and Zimbabwe to insert after the word "prescribed" the words "safety and health" was adopted.

173. Paragraph 5, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 6

174. An amendment submitted by the Employers' members to replace the words "employers and workers" by the words "workers and their employer" was said to be necessary as workers could enter into joint consultation only with their own employer. The Workers' members spoke of the need for co-operation between all employers and workers on a construction site and after support of the Office text by several Government members the Employers' members withdrew the amendment.

175. The Government members of the member States of the EC put forward an amendment to amend the English text by adding before the words "such measures" the words "depending on the situation". This was to bring it into line with the wording of the French text. The Workers' members preferred the present English text and the amendment was rejected by 8,880 votes in favour to 10,545 against, with 444 abstentions.

176. The Employers' members introduced an amendment with a similar intention to replace the word "should" by the word "may". It was impracticable to apply all of the measures which were proposed on sites employing only two or three workers. The Workers' members considered that the requirement was imperative in nature, and after conflicting views had been expressed by Government members the amendment was put to the vote. It was rejected by 8,103 votes in favour to 11,322 against, with 444 abstentions.

177. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to clause (a) to replace the words "employers and workers" by the words "workers and their employer". In the establishment of safety committees workers would always in practice consult with their own employers. After the Workers' members and several Government members had supported the Office text which they considered envisaged co-operation by everyone on a site, the amendment was withdrawn.

178. The Workers' members introduced an amendment to add a new clause to read: "the training of safety delegates and safety committee members". The Employers' members felt that this was already adequately covered by clause (b) but accepted the amendment, which was then adopted.

179. Paragraph 6, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 7

180. The Committee adopted an amendment by the Workers' members to bring the text into line with the amended text of Article 9 of the proposed Convention. The amendment read: "(i) insert the word 'construction' after the words 'health of the'; (ii) delete the words 'who will be engaged in its construction'; (iii) delete the words after the word 'national' and insert the words 'laws, regulations and practice'".

181. Paragraph 7, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 8

182. Paragraph 8 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 9

183. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to insert after the word "prepared" the words "and undertaken". It was supported by the Employers' members and was adopted.

184. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to insert a new clause to read:

organisation of work including working hours, takes into account the safety and health of workers.

Many accidents occurred because of stress and strain caused by excessive working hours. The Employers' members, supported by the Government member of Switzerland and the Government members of the member States of the EC, accepted the importance of excessive working hours as a cause of accidents but thought that the subject was covered in other Conventions and was not appropriate to the proposed Recommendation. A subamendment by the latter to delete the words "including working hours" was accepted by both the Employers' members and the Workers' members and the amendment, as subamended, was adopted. An amendment by the Government member of Brazil to clause (d) to insert after the words "physical" the words "and biological" was adopted to correspond to the text of Article 28.

185. Paragraph 9, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 10

186. Paragraph 10 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 11

187. An amendment by the Workers' members to insert after the word "they" the word "could" was adopted.

188. Paragraph 11, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 12

189. Paragraph 12 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 13

190. An amendment by the Government member of Canada to insert after the word "hardnesses" the words "or safety belts, whichever is most appropriate" was rejected after members had recalled the discussion of the point at the 73rd Session when it had been said that safety belts were unsafe and banned in some countries.

191. The Workers' members submitted an amendment in two parts to clause (b) to insert the words "and suitable anchor points installed" after the word "provided", and to add at the end of the clause the words "in accordance with the prescribed national standards of design and operation". After discussion of the practice of providing anchorage points, the Employers' members submitted a subamendment to the amendment so that clause (b) remained and a new Paragraph was added to read:

Employers should provide the appropriate means to make possible the use of individual protective equipment, and ensure its proper use. Protective equipment and protective clothing should comply with standards set by the competent authority, taking into account so far as possible ergonomic principles.

The subamendment was accepted and the amendment, as subamended, was adopted.

192. Paragraph 13, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 14

193. The Government members of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi, the United Republic of Tanzania and Zimbabwe introduced an amendment to subparagraph (1) to replace the words "tested in general by testing of types and individually" by the words "examined and tested by a competent person". The Employers' members opposed the amendment as the Office text dealt with two distinct types of testing, which the Government member of Norway agreed was necessary. The Workers' members thought the amendment improved the Office text, and the Government member of Turkey and the spokesman for the Government members of the member States of the EC agreed and did not believe type-testing was excluded. After further discussion the Workers' members introduced a subamendment so that the subparagraph read:

The safety of construction machinery and equipment should be examined and tested by type or individually by a competent person

The Employers' members agreed with the subamendment with the addition of the words "as appropriate" and the amendment, as subamended, was adopted.

194. Paragraph 14, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 15

195. An amendment by the Workers' members to insert Paragraph 15 after Paragraph 20 was referred to the Drafting Committee.

196. Paragraph 15 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 16

197. Paragraph 16 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 17

198. The Government member of Turkey submitted an amendment to insert after the word "scaffold" the words "or ladder". He pointed out that many construction accidents were caused by the collapse or displacement of ladders and that the proposed Recommendation contained no mention of ladders. The Employers' members opposed the amendment as it could imply that a ladder was acceptable in place of a scaffold in a working place. The Workers' members supported the amendment as it recognised the realities of working practice in developing countries. The spokesman of the Government members of the member States of the EC observed that mention of ladders should properly be in a separate paragraph not associated with scaffolds and suggested a subamendment to this effect. The Government member of Turkey thought that Paragraph 17 was the proper place for the amendment and it was put to the vote. The amendment was rejected by 8,658 votes in favour to 10,878 votes against, with 888 abstentions.

199. An amendment by the Employers' members to replace the word "prevent" by the words "guard against" was referred to the Drafting Committee.

200. Paragraph 17 was adopted, subject to approval of the text as revised by the Drafting Committee.

Paragraph 18

201. An amendment by the Employers' members to replace the word "prevent" by the words "guard against" was referred to the Drafting Committee. An amendment by the Government members of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi, the United Republic of Tanzania and Zimbabwe to delete the words "from which a person may fall" as superfluous to the text was adopted.

202. Paragraph 18, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 19

203. Paragraph 19 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 20

204. An amendment by the Workers' members to insert after the word "inspected" the words "and certified" was opposed by the Employers' members, as certification implied a document obtained from a Government inspectorate whereas the inspection was usually by the employer or his representative. They proposed a subamendment to replace the words "and certified" by the words "and the results recorded". This was accepted by the Workers' members and the amendment, as subamended, was adopted.

205. Paragraph 20, as amendment, was adopted.

Paragraph 21

206. The Government members of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi, the United Republic of Tanzania and Zimbabwe submitted an amendment to replace the wording of clause (c) by "at periodic intervals thereafter". This was thought to weaken the Office text and the amendment was rejected.

207. Paragraph 21 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 22

208. The Government members of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi, the United Republic of Tanzania and Zimbabwe submitted an amendment to insert the words "employer and" after the words "and to". There was general agreement that employers should also receive the results of examinations and the amendment was adopted.

209. Paragraph 22, as amended, was adopted.

Proposed new Paragraph

210. The Government member of Turkey submitted an amendment to add a new paragraph to read:

No structural alterations or repairs should be made on any part of a lifting appliance that affects the safety of the appliance without the permission of the competent person.

The Employers' members felt that Paragraph 21 (c) and (d) already covered the point and the Workers' members were concerned about the desirability of having to obtain permission for repairs. The amendment was rejected.

Paragraph 23

211. Paragraph 23 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 24

212. Paragraph 24 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 25

213. Paragraph 25 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 26

214. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to delete the words "when used on soft, uneven or sloping ground", for stability of a lifting appliance was essential on any sort of ground. The amendment was adopted.

215. Paragraph 26, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 27

216. Paragraph 27 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 28

217. The Government members of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi, the United Republic of Tanzania and Zimbabwe introduced an amendment to replace clause (a) by the words "of good health" as reference to the minimum age of work was unnecessary as it was covered by other Conventions. Both the Employers' members and the Workers' members expressed concern at the possibility of discrimination against workers who were not in good health but capable of performing their work and the amendment was rejected.

218. Paragraph 28 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 29

219. The Government members of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi, the United Republic of Tanzania and Zimbabwe submitted an amendment similar to that to Paragraph 28 referring to good health and it was rejected for the same reason.

220. Paragraph 29 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 30

221. Paragraph 30 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 31

222. The Employers' members proposed and the Workers' members agreed that an amendment to replace the word "prevent" be referred to the Drafting Committee. The words "preventive measures to ensure" might be a suitable alternative form of wording. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add the following sentences at the end of Paragraph 31:

Where appropriate earthmoving and materials-handling equipment should be fitted with structures designed to protect the operator from being crushed, should the machine overturn.

A subamendment proposed by the Employers' members to preface the amendment by the words "where appropriate" was accepted and the amendment, as subamended, was adopted.

223. Paragraph 31, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 32

224. Paragraph 32 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 33

225. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to subparagraph (1) to insert after the word "inspected" the words "and certified". They accepted a subamendment by the Employers' members which was in similar terms to an amendment proposed by the Government member of Turkey to replace the words "and certified" by the words "and the results recorded". The amendment, as subamended, was adopted.

226. Paragraph 33, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 34

227. Paragraph 34 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 35

228. An amendment by the Workers' members similar to their amendment to Paragraph 33 and similarly subamended was adopted to insert the words "and the results recorded" after the word "inspected".

229. Paragraph 35, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 36

230. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to insert after the word "construction" the words "taking into account ergonomic principles" and accepted the Employers' members' subamendment to insert after the word "account" the words "as far as possible", as this was consistent with changes made to the proposed Convention. The amendment, as subamended, was adopted.

231. Paragraph 36, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 37

232. Paragraph 37 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 38

233. The Workers' members introduced an amendment to insert after the word "manned" the word "motor". It was considered that power was required for rescue boats for them to be effective. The Employers' members referred to the danger from an outboard motor in some conditions and the Government members of Switzerland and the United States observed that the need for a motor would depend upon whether the water was open water and on such matters as currents and wave conditions. The Government member of Luxembourg proposed a subamendment to insert after the word "boats" the words "motor driven where necessary". The subamendment was acceptable to the proposers and the amendment, as subamended, was adopted.

234. Paragraph 38, as amended, was adopted.

235. The Government member of the United States submitted an amendment to add at the end of subparagraph (3) the words "as prescribed by national laws or regulations." There could be more than one agency dealing with the disposal of waste and it was essential that all should conform to national standards. The amendment was adopted.

236. The Office text was preferred to an amendment by the Government member of the United States to require that instructions on the use of dangerous substances be made available to workers on data sheets or in similar form rather than contained on a label, and the amendment was rejected.

237. Paragraph 39, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 40

238. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to delete the words "employer or the" which would place the responsibility for keeping records wholly on the competent authority. It was supported by the Employers' members and adopted. The Government members of Argentina and Cyprus commented that it was quite impracticable for governments to record information about every construction workplace.

239. Paragraph 40, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 41

240. An amendment submitted by the Workers' members to replace the word "space" by the word "area" to agree with a corresponding provision in the proposed Convention was adopted.

241. Paragraph 41, as amended, was adopted.

Proposed new Paragraph

242. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add a new Paragraph to read:

The manual handling of weights which presents a health and safety risk to workers should be avoided either by reducing the weight or by the use of mechanical devices.

243. A subamendment by the Employers' members to insert the word "excessive" before the word "weights" and to add after the word "devices" the words "or by other means" was accepted and the amendment, as subamended, was adopted. The Chairman remarked that a fresh title would be required.

244. The proposed new Paragraph was adopted.

Paragraph 42

245. Paragraph 42 was adopted without change.

Proposed new Paragraph

246. The Government member of India submitted an amendment to add a new paragraph under "Fire precautions" to read:

Suitable visual indications should be provided to indicate clearly the directions of escape in case of fire.

The Employers' members said that whether this was necessary depended on the state of the site and proposed a subamendment to preface the paragraph with the words "Where appropriate". This was accepted by the proposer and the amendment, as subamended, was adopted.

247. The proposed new Paragraph was adopted.

Paragraph 43

248. Paragraph 43 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 44

249. Paragraph 44 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 45

250. The Government member of Turkey introduced an amendment to insert after the word "personnel" the words "and the workers". It was not possible always to have first-aid personnel on a construction site and workers should also be competent to save life. It was considered impracticable by the Employers' members and the Workers' members to expect every worker to be proficient in the terms of the Paragraph and the amendment was rejected.

251. Paragraph 45 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 46

252. Paragraph 46 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 47

253. Paragraph 47 was adopted without change.

Proposed new Paragraph

254. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add a new paragraph to read:

Whenever new products, equipment and working methods are introduced, special attention should be paid to informing and training workers in occupational safety.

The Employers' members supported the amendment and also accepted a subamendment by the Workers' members to add the words "and health" after the word "safety". The amendment, as subamended, was adopted. The appropriate title would be considered by the Drafting Committee. The Workers' members withdrew a related amendment.

255. The proposed new Paragraph was adopted.

Paragraph 48

256. Paragraph 48 was adopted without change.

Adoption of the Report, the Proposed Convention and the Proposed Recommendation

257. In the course of the consideration of paragraphs 1 to 256 of the draft report, alterations with a view to clarifying, correcting or completing the text of various paragraphs were requested by various members of the Committee.

258. Subject to the modifications agreed on, the Committee adopted the report unanimously.

259. The Committee proceeded to examine the proposed Convention, Article by Article. During discussion on Article 8 the spokesman for the Employers' members said that in both subparagraphs 1(a) and 1(b) the word "or" should be substituted for the word "and" as it appeared between the words "control over" and "primary responsibility". Clearly the sense of the Article was to fix responsibility in the alternative. The Workers' members agreed to such amendments and they were adopted.

260. The Government member of the Federal Republic of Germany, as spokesman for the Government members of the member States of the EC, said that reference to "worksite" in subparagraphs 1(a) and (b) was inconsistent with the use of the defined term "construction site" elsewhere in the instruments. Both the Employers' and the Workers' members agreed to such amendments.

261. Article 8, as amended, was adopted.

262. The spokesman for the Government members of the member States of the EC asked why the words "natural or artificial" had been deleted in English from their amendment to Article 19 by the Drafting Committee. The representative of the Secretary-General said that the Drafting Committee had followed the French text of the subamended amendment submitted.

263. The spokesman for the Employers' members said that in paragraph 2 of Article 30 the reference to "employers" should be in the singular as the responsibility to provide equipment would fall upon an individual employer in respect of his own workers. The Workers' members agreed.

264. Article 30 as amended was adopted.

265. In the course of consideration of the Articles, alterations to the French and Spanish texts to align the wording with that of the English text were agreed.

266. The Committee unanimously adopted the proposed Convention as a whole.

267. The Committee proceeded to examine the proposed Recommendation, Paragraph by Paragraph. During the discussion of Paragraph 14, the Employers' members said that the reference to "employers" should be in the singular for the same reason as that advanced in the discussion of Article 30. The Workers' members agreed to that proposal.

268. Paragraph 14, as amended, was adopted.

269. In discussion of Paragraph 35 the spokesman for the Employers' members suggested an amendment to replace the word "working" by the word "employed". The workers and others should be protected from dangers in an excavation at all times and not only while they were actually working. The Workers' members agreed.

270. Paragraph 35, as amended, was adopted.

271. In discussion of Paragraph 40 the Employers' members proposed that the words "motor driven if necessary" be parenthesised by brackets so that they referred only to boats. The 'Workers' members agreed to that proposal.

272. Paragraph 40, as amended, was adopted.

273. In the course of consideration of the Paragraphs, alterations to the French and Spanish texts were agreed to align the wording with the English text.

274. The Committee unanimously adopted the proposed Recommendation as a whole.

275. The texts of the proposed Convention and the proposed Recommendation are produced below.

276. The Report of the Committee and the texts of the proposed Convention and the proposed Recommendation are submitted to the Conference for consideration.

Proposed Convention concerning Safety and Health in Construction

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,
Having been convened at Geneva by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and having met in its Seventy-fifth Session on 1 June 1988, and

Noting the relevant international labour Conventions and Recommendations and, in particular, the Safety Provisions (Building) Convention and Recommendation, 1937, the Co-operation in Accident Prevention (Building) Recommendation, 1937, the Radiation Protection Convention and Recommendation, 1960, the Guarding of Machinery Convention and Recommendation, 1963, the Maximum Weight Convention and Recommendation, 1967, the Occupational Cancer Convention and Recommendation, 1974, the Working Environment (Air Pollution, Noise and Vibration) Convention and Recommendation, 1977, the Occupational Safety and Health Convention and Recommendation, 1981, the Occupational Health Services Convention and Recommendation, 1985, the Asbestos Convention and Recommendation, 1986, and the list of occupational diseases as revised in 1980 appended to the Employment Injury Benefits Convention, 1964, and

Having decided upon the adoption of certain proposals with regard to safety and health in construction, which is the fourth item on the agenda of the session, and

Having determined that these proposals shall take the form of an international Convention revising the Safety Provisions (Building) Convention, 1937;

adopts this day of June of the year one thousand nine hundred and eighty-eight the following Convention, which may be cited as the Safety and Health in Construction Convention, 1988:

I. SCOPE AND DEFINITIONS

Article 1

1. This Convention applies to all construction activities, namely building, civil engineering, and erection and dismantling work, including any process, operation or transport on a construction site, from the preparation of the site to the completion of the project.

2. A Member ratifying this Convention may, after consultation with the most representative organisations of employers and workers concerned, where they exist, exclude from the application of the Convention, or certain provisions thereof, particular branches of economic activity or particular undertakings in respect of which special problems of a substantial nature arise, on condition that a safe and healthy working environment is maintained.

3. This Convention also applies to such self-employed persons as may be specified by national laws or regulations.

Article 2

For the purpose of this Convention:

- (a) The term "construction" covers:
 - (i) building, including excavation and the construction, structural alteration, renovation, repair, maintenance (including cleaning and painting) and demolition of all types of buildings or structures;
 - (ii) civil engineering, including excavation and the construction, structural alteration, repair, maintenance and demolition of, for example, airports, docks, harbours, inland waterways, dams, river and avalanche and sea defence works, roads and highways, railways, bridges, tunnels, viaducts and works related to the provision of services such as communications, drainage, sewerage, water and energy supplies;
 - (iii) the erection and dismantling of prefabricated buildings and structures, as well as the manufacturing of prefabricated elements on the construction site;
- (b) the term "construction site" means any site at which any of the processes or operations described in subparagraph (a) above are carried on;
- (c) the term "workplace" means all places where workers need to be or to go by reason of their work and which are under the control of an employer as defined in subparagraph (e) below;
- (d) the term "worker" means any person engaged in construction;
- (e) the term "employer" means:
 - (i) any physical or legal person who employs one or more workers on a construction site; and
 - (ii) as the context requires, the principal contractor, the contractor or the subcontractor;
- (f) the term "competent person" means a person possessing adequate qualifications, such as suitable training and sufficient knowledge, experience and skill for the safe performance of the specific work. The competent authorities may define appropriate criteria for the designation of such persons and may determine the duties to be assigned to them;
- (g) the term "scaffold" means any temporary structure, fixed, suspended or mobile, and its supporting components which is used for supporting workers and materials or to gain access to any such structure, and which is not a "lifting appliance" as defined in subparagraph (h) below;
- (h) the term "lifting appliance" means any stationary or mobile appliance used for raising or lowering persons or loads;
- (i) the term "lifting gear" means any gear or tackle by means of which a load can be attached to a lifting appliance but which does not form an integral part of the appliance or load.

II. GENERAL PROVISIONS

Article 3

The most representative organisations of employers and workers concerned shall be consulted on the measures to be taken to give effect to the provisions of this Convention.

Article 4

Each Member which ratifies this Convention undertakes that it will, on the basis of an assessment of the safety and health hazards involved, adopt and maintain in force laws or regulations which ensure the application of the provisions of the Convention.

Article 5

1. The laws and regulations adopted in pursuance of Article 4 above may provide for their practical application through technical standards of codes of practice, or by other appropriate methods consistent with national conditions and practice.

2. In giving effect to Article 4 above and to paragraph 1 of this Article, each Member shall have due regard to the relevant standards adopted by recognised international organisations in the field of standardisation.

Article 6

Measures shall be taken to ensure that there is co-operation between employers and workers, in accordance with arrangements to be defined by national laws or regulations, in order to promote safety and health at construction sites.

Article 7

National laws or regulations shall require that employers and self-employed persons have a duty to comply with the prescribed safety and health measures at the workplace.

Article 8

1. Whenever two or more employers undertake activities simultaneously at one construction site—

- (a) the principal contractor, or other person or body with actual control over or primary responsibility for overall construction site activities, shall be responsible for co-ordinating the prescribed safety and health measures and, in so far as is compatible with national laws and regulations, for ensuring compliance with such measures;
- (b) in so far as is compatible with national laws and regulations, where the principal contractor, or other person or body with actual control over or primary responsibility for overall construction site activities, is not present at the site, he shall nominate a competent person or body at the site with the authority and means necessary to ensure on his behalf co-ordination and compliance with the measures, as foreseen in subparagraph (a) above;
- (c) each employer shall remain responsible for the application of the prescribed measures in respect of the workers placed under his authority.

2. Whenever employers or self-employed persons undertake activities simultaneously at one construction site they shall have the duty to co-operate in the application of the prescribed safety and health measures, as may be specified by national laws or regulations.

Article 9

Those concerned with the design and planning of a construction project shall take into account the safety and health of the construction workers in accordance with national laws, regulations and practice.

Article 10

National laws or regulations shall provide that workers shall have the right and the duty at any workplace to participate in ensuring safe working conditions to the extent of their control over the equipment and methods of work and to express views on the working procedures adopted as they may affect safety and health.

Article 11

National laws or regulations shall provide that workers shall have the duty to—

- (a) co-operate as closely as possible with their employer in the application of the prescribed safety and health measures;
- (b) take reasonable care for their own safety and health and that of other persons who may be affected by their acts or omissions at work;
- (c) use facilities placed at their disposal and not misuse anything provided for their own protection or the protection of others;
- (d) report forthwith to their immediate supervisor, and to the workers' safety representative where one exists, any situation which they believe could present a risk, and which they cannot properly deal with themselves;
- (e) comply with the prescribed safety and health measures.

Article 12

1. National laws or regulations shall provide that a worker shall have the right to remove himself from danger when he has good reason to believe that there is an imminent and serious danger to his safety or health, and the duty so to inform his supervisor immediately.

2. Where there is an imminent danger to the safety of workers the employer shall take immediate steps to stop the operation and evacuate workers as appropriate.

III. PREVENTIVE AND PROTECTIVE MEASURES

Article 13

SAFETY OF WORKPLACES

1. All appropriate precautions shall be taken to ensure that all workplaces are safe and without risk of injury to the safety and health of workers.

2. Safe means of access to and egress from all workplaces shall be provided and maintained, and indicated where appropriate.

3. All appropriate precautions shall be taken to protect persons present at or in the vicinity of a construction site from all risks which may arise from such site.

Article 14

SCAFFOLDS AND LADDERS

1. Where work cannot safely be done on or from the ground or from part of a building or other permanent structure, a safe and suitable scaffold shall be provided and maintained, or other equally safe and suitable provision shall be made.

2. In the absence of alternative safe means of access to elevated working places, suitable and sound ladders shall be provided. They shall be properly secured against inadvertent movement.

3. All scaffolds and ladders shall be constructed and used in accordance with national laws and regulations.

4. Scaffolds shall be inspected by a competent person in such cases and at such times as shall be prescribed by national laws or regulations.

Article 15

LIFTING APPLIANCES AND GEAR

1. Every lifting appliance and item of lifting gear, including their constituent elements, attachments, anchorages and supports, shall—

- (a) be of good design and construction, sound material and adequate strength for the purpose for which they are used;
- (b) be properly installed and used;
- (c) be maintained in good working order;
- (d) be examined and tested by a competent person at such times and in such cases as shall be prescribed by national laws or regulations; the results of these examinations and tests shall be recorded;
- (e) be operated by workers who have received appropriate training in accordance with national laws and regulations.

2. No person shall be raised, lowered or carried by a lifting appliance unless it is constructed, installed and used for that purpose in accordance with national laws and regulations, except in an emergency situation in which serious personal injury or fatality may occur, and for which the lifting appliance can be safely used.

Article 16

TRANSPORT, EARTH-MOVING AND MATERIALS-HANDLING EQUIPMENT

1. All vehicles and earth-moving or materials-handling equipment shall—

- (a) be of good design and construction taking into account as far as possible ergonomic principles;
- (b) be maintained in good working order;
- (c) be properly used;
- (d) be operated by workers who have received appropriate training in accordance with national laws and regulations.

2. On all construction sites on which vehicles, earth-moving or materials-handling equipment are used—

- (a) safe and suitable access ways shall be provided for them; and
- (b) traffic shall be so organised and controlled as to secure their safe operation.

Article 17

PLANT, MACHINERY, EQUIPMENT AND HAND TOOLS

1. Plant, machinery and equipment, including hand tools, both manual and power driven, shall—

- (a) be of good design and construction, taking into account as far as possible ergonomic principles;
- (b) be maintained in good working order;
- (c) be used only for work which they have been designed unless a use outside the initial design purposes has been assessed by a competent person who has concluded that such use is safe;
- (d) be operated by workers who have received appropriate training.

2. Adequate instructions for safe use shall be provided where appropriate by the manufacturer or the employer, in a form understood by the users.

3. Pressure plant and equipment shall be examined and tested by a competent person in cases and at times prescribed by national laws or regulations.

Article 18

WORK AT HEIGHTS INCLUDING ROOFWORK

1. Where necessary, to guard against danger, or where the height of a structure or its slope exceeds that prescribed by national laws or regulations, preventive measures shall be taken against the fall of workers and tools or other objects or materials.

2. Where workers are required to work on or near roofs or other places covered with fragile material, through which they are liable to fall, preventive measures shall be taken against their inadvertently stepping on or falling through the fragile material.

Article 19

EXCAVATIONS, SHAFTS, EARTHWORKS, UNDERGROUND WORKS AND TUNNELS

Adequate precautions shall be taken in any excavation, shaft, earthworks, underground works or tunnel—

- (a) by suitable shoring or otherwise to guard against danger to workers from a fall or dislodgement of earth, rock or other material;
- (b) to guard against dangers arising from the fall of persons, materials or objects or the inrush of water into the excavation, shaft, earthworks, underground works or tunnel;
- (c) to secure adequate ventilation at every workplace so as to maintain an atmosphere fit for respiration and to limit any fumes, gases, vapours, dust or other impurities to levels which are not dangerous or injurious to health and are within limits laid down by national laws or regulations;
- (d) to enable the workers to reach safety in the event of fire, or an inrush of water or material;
- (e) to avoid risk to workers arising from possible underground dangers such as the circulation of fluids or the presence of pockets of gas, by undertaking appropriate investigations to locate them.

Article 20

COFFERDAMS AND CAISSONS

1. Every cofferdam and caisson shall be—

- (a) of good construction and suitable and sound material and of adequate strength;

(b) provided with adequate means for workers to reach safety in the event of an inrush of water or material.

2. The construction, positioning, modification or dismantling of a cofferdam or caisson shall take place only under the immediate supervision of a competent person.

3. Every cofferdam and caisson shall be inspected by a competent person at prescribed intervals.

Article 21

WORK IN COMPRESSED AIR

1. Work in compressed air shall be carried out only in accordance with measures prescribed by national laws or regulations.

2. Work in compressed air shall be carried out only by workers whose physical aptitude for such work has been established by a medical examination and when a competent person is present to supervise the conduct of the operations.

Article 22

STRUCTURAL FRAMES AND FORMWORK

1. The erection of structural frames and components, formwork, falsework and shoring shall be carried out only under the supervision of a competent person.

2. Adequate precautions shall be taken to guard against danger to workers arising from any temporary state of weakness or instability of a structure.

3. Formwork, falsework and shoring shall be so designed, constructed and maintained that it will safely support all loads that may be imposed on it.

Article 23

WORK OVER WATER

Where work is done over or in close proximity to water there shall be adequate provision for—

- (a) preventing workers from falling into water;
- (b) the rescue of workers in danger of drowning;
- (c) safe and sufficient transport.

Article 24

DEMOLITION

When the demolition of any building or structure might present danger to workers or to the public—

- (a) appropriate precautions, methods and procedures shall be adopted, including those for the disposal of waste or residues, in accordance with national laws or regulations;
- (b) the work shall be planned and undertaken only under the supervision of a competent person.

Article 25

LIGHTING

Adequate and suitable lighting, including portable lighting where appropriate, shall be provided at every workplace and any other place on the construction site where a worker may have to pass.

Article 26

ELECTRICITY

1. All electrical equipment and installations shall be constructed, installed and maintained by a competent person, and so used as to guard against danger.

2. Before construction is commenced and during the progress thereof adequate steps shall be taken to ascertain the presence of and to guard against danger to workers from any live electrical cable or apparatus which is under, over or on the site.

3. The laying and maintenance of electrical cables and apparatus on construction sites shall be governed by the technical rules and standards applied at the national level.

Article 27

EXPLOSIVES

Explosives shall not be stored, transported, handled or used except—

- (a) under conditions prescribed by national laws or regulations; and
- (b) by a competent person, who shall take such steps as are necessary to ensure that workers and other persons are not exposed to risk of injury.

Article 28

HEALTH HAZARDS

1. Where a worker is liable to be exposed to any chemical, physical or biological hazard to such an extent as is liable to be dangerous to health, appropriate preventive measures shall be taken against such exposure.

2. The preventive measures referred to in paragraph 1 above shall comprise—

- (a) the replacement of hazardous substances by harmless or less hazardous substances wherever possible; or
- (b) technical measures applied to the plant, machinery, equipment or process; or
- (c) where it is not possible to comply with subparagraphs (a) or (b) above, other effective measures, including the use of personal protective equipment and protective clothing.

3. Where workers are required to enter any area in which a toxic or harmful substance may be present, or in which there may be an oxygen deficiency, or a flammable atmosphere, adequate measures shall be taken to guard against danger.

4. Waste shall not be destroyed or otherwise disposed of on a construction site in a manner which is liable to be injurious to health.

Article 29

FIRE PRECAUTIONS

1. The employer shall take all appropriate measures to—

- (a) avoid the risk of fire;
- (b) combat quickly and efficiently any outbreak of fire;
- (c) bring about a quick and safe evacuation of persons.

2. Sufficient and suitable storage shall be provided for flammable liquids, solids and gases.

Article 30

PERSONAL PROTECTIVE EQUIPMENT AND PROTECTIVE CLOTHING

1. Where adequate protection against risk of accident or injury to health, including exposure to adverse conditions, cannot be ensured by other means, suitable personal protective equipment and protective clothing, having regard to the type of work and risks, shall be provided and maintained by the employer, without cost to the workers, as may be prescribed by national laws or regulations.

2. The employer shall provide the workers with the appropriate means to enable them to use the individual protective equipment, and shall ensure its proper use.

3. Protective equipment and protective clothing shall comply with standards set by the competent authority taking into account as far as possible ergonomic principles.

4. Workers shall be required to make proper use of and to take good care of the personal protective equipment and protective clothing provided for their use.

Article 31

FIRST AID

The employer shall be responsible for ensuring that first aid, including trained personnel, is available at all times. Arrangements shall be made for ensuring the removal for medical attention of workers who have suffered an accident or sudden illness.

Article 32

WELFARE

1. At or within reasonable access of every construction site an adequate supply of wholesome drinking water shall be provided.

2. At or within reasonable access of every construction site, the following facilities shall, depending on the number of workers and the duration of the work, be provided and maintained—

- (a) sanitary and washing facilities;
- (b) facilities for changing and for the storage and drying of clothing;
- (c) accommodation for taking meals and for taking shelter during interruption of work due to adverse weather conditions.

3. Men and women workers should be provided with separate sanitary and washing facilities.

Article 33

INFORMATION AND TRAINING

Workers shall be adequately and suitably—

- (a) informed of potential safety and health hazards to which they may be exposed at their workplace;
- (b) instructed and trained in the measures available for the prevention and control of, and protection against, those hazards.

Article 34

REPORTING OF ACCIDENTS AND DISEASES

National laws or regulations shall provide for the reporting to the competent authority within a prescribed time of occupational accidents and diseases.

IV. IMPLEMENTATION

Article 35

Each Member shall—

- (a) take all necessary measures, including the provision of appropriate penalties and corrective measures, to ensure the effective enforcement of the provisions of the Convention;
- (b) provide appropriate inspection services to supervise the application of the measures to be taken in pursuance of the Convention and provide these services with the resources necessary for the accomplishment of their task, or satisfy itself that appropriate inspection is carried out.

V. FINAL PROVISIONS

Article 36

This Convention revises the Safety Provisions (Building) Convention, 1937.

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,
Having been convened at Geneva by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and having met in its Seventy-fifth Session on 1 June 1988, and

Adopts this _____ day of June of the year one thousand nine hundred and eighty-eight the following Recommendation, which may be cited as the Safety and Health in Construction Recommendation, 1988:

1. The provisions of the Safety and Health in Construction Convention, 1988 (hereinafter referred to as “the Convention”) and of this Recommendation should be applied in particular to:

- (a) building, civil engineering and the erection and dismantling of prefabricated buildings and structures, as defined in Article 2(a) of the Convention;
- (b) the fabrication and erection of oil rigs, and of offshore installations while under construction on shore.

(a) the term “construction” covers:

- 25/27

- (g) the term "competent person" means a person possessing adequate qualifications, such as suitable training and sufficient knowledge, experience and skill for the safe performance of the specific work. The competent authorities may define appropriate criteria for the designation of such persons and may determine the duties to be assigned to them;
- (h) the term "scaffold" means any temporary structure, fixed, suspended or mobile, and its supporting components which is used for supporting workers and materials or to gain access to any such structure, and which is not a "lifting appliance" as defined in clause (i) below;
- (i) the term "lifting appliance" means any stationary or mobile appliance used for raising or lowering persons or loads;
- (j) the term "lifting gear" means any gear or tackle by means of which a load can be attached to a lifting appliance but which does not form an integral part of the appliance or load.

3. The provisions of this Recommendation should also apply to such self-employed persons as may be specified by national laws or regulations.

II. GENERAL PROVISIONS

4. National laws or regulations should require that employers and self-employed persons have a general duty to provide a safe and healthy workplace and to comply with the prescribed safety and health measures.

5. (1) Whenever two or more employers undertake activities at one construction site, they should have the duty to co-operate with one another as well as with any other persons participating in the construction work being undertaken, including the owner or his representative, in order to comply with the prescribed safety and health measures.

(2) Ultimate responsibility for the co-ordination of safety and health measures on the construction site should rest with the principal contractor or such other person as is primarily responsible for the execution of the work.

6. The measures to be taken to ensure that there is organised co-operation between employers and workers to promote safety and health at construction sites should be prescribed by national laws or regulations or by the competent authority. Such measures should include—

- (a) the establishment of safety and health committees representative of employers and workers with such powers and duties as may be prescribed;
- (b) the election or appointment of workers' safety delegates with such powers and duties as may be prescribed;
- (c) the appointment by the employer of suitably qualified and experienced persons to promote safety and health;
- (d) the training of safety delegates and safety committee members.

7. Those concerned with the design and planning of a construction project should take into account the safety and health of the construction workers in accordance with national laws, regulations and practice.

8. The design of construction equipment, tools, protective equipment and other similar equipment should take account of ergonomic principles.

III. PREVENTIVE AND PROTECTIVE MEASURES

9. Construction work should be planned, prepared and undertaken in such a way that—

- (a) risks liable to arise at the workplace are prevented as soon as possible;
- (b) excessively or unnecessarily strenuous work positions and movements are avoided;
- (c) organisation of work takes into account the safety and health of workers;
- (d) materials and products are used which are suitable from a safety and health point of view;
- (e) working methods are employed which protect workers against the harmful effects of chemical, physical and biological agents.

10. National laws or regulations should provide for the notification to the competent authority of construction sites of such size, duration or characteristics as may be prescribed.

11. Workers should have the right and the duty at any workplace to participate in ensuring safe working conditions to the extent of their control over the equipment and methods of work and to express views on the working procedures adopted as they may affect safety and health.

SAFETY OF WORKPLACES

12. Housekeeping programmes should be established and implemented on construction sites which should include provision for—

- (a) the proper storage of materials and equipment;
- (b) the removal of waste and debris at appropriate intervals.

13. Where workers cannot be protected against falls from heights by any other means—

- (a) adequate safety nets or safety sheets should be erected and maintained; or
- (b) adequate safety harnesses should be provided and used.

14. The employer should provide the workers with the appropriate means to enable them to use individual protective equipment and should ensure its proper use. Protective equipment and protective clothing should comply with standards set by the competent authority, taking into account as far as possible ergonomic principles.

15. (1) The safety of construction machinery and equipment should be examined and tested by type or individually, as appropriate, by a competent person.

(2) National laws and regulations should take into consideration the fact that occupational diseases may be caused by machinery, apparatus and systems which do not take account of ergonomic principles in their design.

SCAFFOLDS

16. Every scaffold and part thereof should be of suitable and sound material and of adequate size and strength for the purpose for which it is used and be maintained in a proper condition.

17. Every scaffold should be properly designed, erected and maintained so as to prevent collapse or accidental displacement when properly used.

18. The working platforms, gangways and stairways of scaffolds should be of such dimensions and so constructed and guarded as to protect persons against falling or being endangered by falling objects.

19. No scaffold should be overloaded or otherwise misused.

20. A scaffold should not be erected, substantially altered or dismantled except by or under the supervision of a competent person.

21. Scaffolds as prescribed by national laws or regulations should be inspected, and the results recorded, by a competent person—

- (a) before being taken into use;
- (b) at periodic intervals thereafter;
- (c) after any alteration, interruption in use, exposure to weather or seismic conditions or any other occurrence likely to have affected their strength or stability.

LIFTING APPLIANCES AND LIFTING GEAR

22. National laws or regulations should prescribe the lifting appliances and items of lifting gear which should be examined and tested by a competent person—

- (a) before being taken into use for the first time;
- (b) after erection on a site;
- (c) subsequently at intervals prescribed by such national laws or regulations;
- (d) after any substantial alteration or repair.

23. The results of the examinations and tests of lifting appliances and items of lifting gear carried out in pursuance of Paragraph 22 above should be recorded and, as required, made available to the competent authority and to employers and workers or their representatives.

24. Every lifting appliance having a single safe working load and every item of lifting gear should be clearly marked with its maximum safe working load.

25. Every lifting appliance having a variable safe working load should be fitted with effective means to indicate clearly to the driver each maximum safe working load and the conditions under which it is applicable.

26. A lifting appliance or item of lifting gear should not be loaded beyond its safe working load or loads, except for testing purposes as specified by and under the direction of a competent person.

27. Every lifting appliance and every item of lifting gear should be properly installed so as, inter alia, to provide safe clearance between any moving part and fixed objects, and to ensure the stability of the appliance.

28. Where necessary to guard against danger, no lifting appliance should be used without the provision of suitable signalling arrangements or devices.

29. The drivers and operators of such lifting appliances as are prescribed by national laws or regulations should be—

- (a) of a prescribed minimum age;
- (b) properly trained and qualified.

TRANSPORT, EARTH-MOVING AND MATERIALS-HANDLING EQUIPMENT

30. The drivers and operators of vehicles and of earth-moving or materials-handling equipment should be persons trained and tested as required by national laws or regulations.

31. Adequate signalling or other control arrangements or devices should be provided to guard against danger from the movement of vehicles and earth-moving or materials-handling equipment. Special safety precautions should be taken for vehicles and equipment when manoeuvring backwards.

32. Preventive measures should be taken to avoid the fall of vehicles and earth-moving and materials-handling equipment into excavations or into water.

33. Where appropriate, earth-moving and materials-handling equipment should be fitted with structures designed to protect the operator from being crushed should the machine overturn, and from falling material.

EXCAVATIONS, SHAFTS, EARTHWORKS, UNDERGROUND WORKS AND TUNNELS

34. Shoring or other support for any part of an excavation, shaft, earthworks, underground works or tunnel should not be erected, altered or dismantled except under the supervision of a competent person.

35. (1) Every part of an excavation, shaft, earthworks, underground works and tunnel where persons are employed should be inspected by a competent person at the times and in the cases prescribed by national laws or regulations, and the results recorded.

(2) Work should not be commenced therein until after such an inspection.

WORK IN COMPRESSED AIR

36. The measures regarding work in compressed air prescribed pursuant to Article 21 of the Convention should include provisions regulating the conditions in which the work is to be carried out, the plant and equipment to be used, the medical supervision and control of workers and the duration of work in compressed air.

37. A person should only be allowed to work in a caisson if it has been inspected by a competent person within such preceding period as is prescribed by national laws or regulations; the results of the inspection should be recorded.

PILE DRIVING

38. All pile-driving equipment should be of good design and construction taking into account as far as possible ergonomic principles, and properly maintained.

39. Pile driving should be carried out only under the supervision of a competent person.

WORK OVER WATER

40. The provisions regarding work over water prescribed in pursuance of Article 23 of the Convention should include, where appropriate, the provision and use of suitable and adequate—

- (a) fencing, safety nets and safety harnesses;
- (b) life vests, life preservers, manned boats (motor driven if necessary) and lifebuoys; and
- (c) protection against such hazards as reptiles and other animals.

HEALTH HAZARDS

41. (1) An information system should be set up by the competent authority, using the results of international scientific research, to provide information for architects, contractors, employers and workers' representatives on the health risks associated with hazardous substances used in the construction industry.

(2) Manufacturers and dealers in products used in the construction industry should provide with the products information on any health risks associated with them and on the precautions to be taken.

(3) In the use of materials that contain hazardous substances and in the removal and disposal of waste, the health of workers and of the public and the preservation of the environment should be safeguarded as prescribed by national laws and regulations.

(4) Dangerous substances should be clearly marked and provided with a label giving their relevant characteristics and instructions on their use. They should be handled under conditions prescribed by national laws and regulations or by the competent authority.

(5) The competent authority should determine which hazardous substances should be prohibited from use in the construction industry.

42. The competent authority should keep records of monitoring of the working environment and assessment of workers' health for a period prescribed by national laws and regulations.

43. The manual lifting of excessive weights which presents a safety and health risk to workers should be avoided by reducing the weight, by the use of mechanical devices or by other means.

44. Whenever new products, equipment and working methods are introduced, special attention should be paid to informing and training workers with respect to their implications for safety and health.

DANGEROUS ATMOSPHERES

45. The measures regarding dangerous atmospheres prescribed pursuant to Article 28, paragraph 3, of the Convention should include prior written authority or permission from a competent person, or any other system by which entry into any area in which a dangerous atmosphere may be present can be effected only after completing specified procedures.

FIRE PRECAUTIONS

46. Where necessary to guard against danger, workers should be suitably trained in the action to be taken in the event of fire, including the use of means of escape.

47. Where appropriate suitable visual signs should be provided to indicate clearly the directions of escape in case of fire.

RADIATION HAZARDS

48. Stringent safety regulations should be drawn up and enforced by the competent authority with respect to construction workers engaged in the maintenance, renovation, demolition or dismantling of any buildings in which there is a risk of exposure to ionising radiations, in particular in the nuclear power industry.

FIRST AID

49. The manner in which first-aid facilities and personnel are to be provided in pursuance of Article 31 of the Convention should be prescribed by national laws or regulations drawn up after consulting the competent health authority and the most representative organisations of employers and workers concerned.

50. Where the work involves risk of drowning, asphyxiation or electric shock, first-aid personnel should be proficient in the use of resuscitation and other life-saving techniques and in rescue procedures.

WELFARE

51. In appropriate cases, depending on the number of workers, the duration of the work and its location, adequate facilities for obtaining or preparing food and drink at or near a construction site should be provided, if they are not otherwise available.

52. Suitable living accommodation should be made available for the workers at construction sites which are remote from their homes, where adequate transportation between the site and their homes or other suitable living accommodation is not available. Men and women workers should be provided with separate sanitary, washing and sleeping facilities.

IV. EFFECT ON EARLIER RECOMMENDATIONS

53. This Recommendation supersedes the Safety Provisions (Building) Recommendation, 1937, and the Co-operation in Accident Prevention (Building) Recommendation, 1937.

Provisional Record

Seventy-fifth Session, Geneva, 1988

Twenty-sixth sitting

Thursday, 16 June 1988, 10.15 a.m.

President: Mr. Beyreuther

ELEVENTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – The first item on this morning's agenda is the eleventh report of the Selection Committee. I call on Mr. Vargas Escobar, Government delegate, Nicaragua, Chairman of the Selection Committee, to present the report.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. VARGAS ESCOBAR (Government delegate, Nicaragua; Chairman of the Selection Committee) – I have the honour of submitting to the Conference the eleventh report of that Committee, which is contained in Provisional Record No. 5J. The report deals solely with changes in the composition of the committees of the Conference.

I recommend to the Conference the adoption of this report.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – The eleventh report of the Selection Committee is now before the Conference. If there are no objections, I take it that the report is adopted?

(The report is adopted.)

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON APARTHEID: SUBMISSION AND DISCUSSION

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – The second item on the agenda is the consideration of the report of the Committee on Apartheid.

I have the pleasure to invite Mr. Nkomo, Government delegate, Zimbabwe, Chairman of the Committee on Apartheid; Mr. Hernández, Employers' adviser, Philippines, Employers' Vice-Chairman; and Mr. Mercier, Workers' delegate, Canada, Workers' Vice-Chairman; as well as Mr. Vollebaek, Government adviser, Norway, Reporter, to take their seats on the rostrum.

I call on Mr. Nkomo, Chairman of the Committee, to submit the report.

Mr. NKOMO (Government delegate, Zimbabwe; Chairman of the Committee on Apartheid) – Allow me first to recognise the leader of SWAPO.

At the outset, allow me to thank all delegates to the Conference for their confidence in electing me as Chairman of this Session's Committee on Apartheid. It is indeed a fitting tribute to my country, Zimbabwe, a symbol to a victorious struggle against racism and a living proof that it is possible to build a democratic and non-racial society out of the ashes of racial discrimination.

The Committee has met this year against the background of increased violence and repression unleashed by the apartheid regime against the Black South African trade unions. Pretoria is now bent on promulgating, through the White minority, laws intended to cripple the trade union movement. Your Committee had occasion to listen to the testimony given by representatives of the Congress of South African Trade Unions (COSATU) and National Congress of Trade Unions (NACTU). In that context I wish to recall a statement by a representative of COSATU which, inter alia, stated: "Under the most difficult conditions they were able to rally over two million people. It was a clear demonstration of the determination of the people to replace the illegitimate racist apartheid regime with a non-racial democratic society. The action of the past three days had forced the Minister of Manpower to suggest negotiating with COSATU on the proposed Labour Bill. A special COSATU Executive Committee meeting was held on 8 June to decide on the Minister of Manpower's proposal. It was agreed that the Executive Committee would meet the Minister on condition that the agenda should provide that the Minister would accept the jurisdiction of the ILO as the body with the right to decide on the criteria of the proposed law."

When the President of the ANC, Mr. Oliver Tambo, appraised the President of the developments in South Africa, the Committee was exceedingly grateful that the Workers, Employers and Governments in the ILO authorised the President to send a message of solidarity with the oppressed workers of South Africa. It is our hope that the signal so conveyed would be well understood by the Botha regime.

Before this august body is the report of the Committee on Apartheid, which it has been proposed will henceforth be known as the Conference Committee on Action against Apartheid. The work of the Committee was conducted in an atmosphere of serenity and mutual understanding. It underscored the fact that apartheid had no place in civilised society and had to be eradicated. All the participants were unanimous on the imperative of eradicating apartheid and contributing to the evolution of a democratic and free South Africa. All sentiments and reservations are recorded in this report.

These were the results of our painstaking efforts, and it merely remains for me now to pay special tribute to my two Vice-Chairmen, namely Mr. Hernández, Employers' adviser from the Philippines, and Mr. Mercier, Workers' delegate from Canada. Further thanks go to Mr. Vollebaek, Government adviser from Norway, who was elected Reporter. It was due to their expertise, their experience and talents that my task of Chairman was made easy. I am immensely indebted to them, as indeed to all members of the Committee for the success of the Committee.

Lastly, may I commend that the Conference adopt the report by consensus.

Mr. HERNANDEZ (Employers' adviser, Philippines; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Apartheid) – I wish to convey to the President my most sincere congratulations and those of the Employers' Confederation of the Philippines on his well-deserved election to the presidency of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference and on the efficient manner in which he has ably steered the Conference deliberations.

It is with a deep sense of pride and gratification that I associate myself with Mr. Nkomo, Minister of Labour, Manpower Planning and Social Welfare of Zimbabwe and Chairman of the Committee, in asking for the unanimous adoption by the Conference of the report and conclusions of the Committee on Apartheid. The conclusions of the Committee underscore once again the continuing commitment of the tripartite constituents of the International Labour Organisation and of all freedom-loving peoples the world over to the incessant search for appropriate, effective and urgent measures designed to dismantle and totally eliminate, at all times and at all places, apartheid and racism and any political and social system that impinges upon the principles enshrined in the Declaration of Philadelphia and promotes and exacerbates denial of human rights.

As Mrs. Corazon C. Aquino, the new leader of democracy and beloved President of the Republic of the Philippines, declared in this forum last Tuesday, "Liberty is non-negotiable"; and paraphrasing her, nothing can resist the greed and evil of apartheid except the power and pressure of the international community including – and most especially – the tripartite members of this noble and august Organisation.

The conclusions of the Committee are a response to the continuing refusal of the Government of South Africa to heed and promote the objectives set forth in the Preamble of the ILO Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia and represent quite appropriately an answer to that Government's so-called "total strategy".

The Committee's report is a document for freedom and democracy, for justice and equality as well as an instrument that seeks for liberty and human dignity. There is appropriate stress on the fact that the Committee specifically recommends the adoption of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia and the renaming of the Committee as the Conference Committee on Action against Apartheid. Needless to say the Committee's recommendations are timely and urgent in view of the disturbing developments in South Africa and the universal abhorrence for apartheid.

In commending the report and conclusions for adoption by the Conference, I must with your indulgence reiterate the reservations made during the Committee's deliberations this year and those made in last year's session of the Conference by a very small minority of employers, including those from the United Kingdom, the Netherlands, the Federal Republic of Germany, Japan, Australia, the United States, France, Italy, Denmark, Sweden and Switzerland in respect of certain aspects of the Declaration and the Programme of Action relating to specific measures that are not within the constitutional competence of the Organisation or within the parameters of its current policies. However, despite these reservations the Employers' group expresses its full support for the Committee's report and conclusions and reiterates its adherence to the tenets of democracy and the principles promotive of man's dignity and well-being.

May I request the Conference to lend support to and unanimously adopt the report and conclusions of the Committee on Apartheid.

Interpretation from French: Mr. MERCIER (Workers' delegate, Canada; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Apartheid) – On behalf of the Workers' group, I would like to express our satisfaction with the groups of the Committee, and our sincere thanks to Mr. Nkomo, Mr. Hernández and our Reporter. Without them, the Committee would have met with difficulties that could probably have been insurmountable. But the work we did this year will go down in the annals of the ILO.

As Vice-Chairman and spokesman for the Workers' group on the Committee on Apartheid, I would like first of all to express the hope that our work will be acknowledged by the plenary through the adoption by consensus of our Declaration, programme of action and conclusions, so that these instruments may convey a message of real solidarity with the Black majority in South Africa and Namibia, and an unambiguous message to the South African regime that half-hearted measures are now finished, that we have reached a consensus and a truly comprehensive strategy, and that apartheid has no friends left.

Our Committee has had the privilege of hearing the direct testimony of the representatives of COSATU and NACTU during its sessions. They spoke to us on the days following the third extension of the state of emergency in South Africa. They spoke to us shortly after the three days of protest staged by the Black workers against the proposed amendments of the Industrial Relations Act and the Orderly Internal Politics Bill, both of which seek to choke off the Black independent trade union movement in South Africa. Some 3 million workers belonging to these two federations participated massively in these peaceful protests; it is the only way for those who have no vote to make their voice heard. They were also protesting against the banning of 17 anti-apartheid organisations and against the restriction imposed on COSATU. These restrictions prevent COSATU from requesting the release of their leaders who are in detention, such as Moses Mayekiso, the Secretary-General of NUMSA, the trade union of metallurgists, whose trial is still in progress; from commemorating tragic events such as the disaster of the Kinross mine, in which hundreds of Black miners lost their lives; from asking for clemency for those known as the "Sharpeville Six", one of whom is a young woman trade unionist. The Supreme Court has just rejected a request for a new trial for the Six, thus condemning them to being hanged, unless international pressure is sufficient and manages to convince the South African authorities that hanging people without the slightest proof of their guilt, but merely on grounds of collective guilt, will not go unpunished. COSATU is no longer allowed to express the point of view of the Black workers of South Africa on the role of foreign investment in their country, or even to pronounce the word "sanctions". What is more, COSATU may no longer organise meetings to debate in a democratic manner the way in which apartheid affects Black workers.

Two weeks ago, two members of the Laundry Workers' Union of NACTU were imprisoned simply because they were in possession of stickers which protested against the proposed amendment to the Industrial Relations Act. During the protests last week, at least seven workers were killed and more than 20 wounded. We are told that more than 2,000 workers were sacked. In his Report, the Director-General tells us that at the end of 1987, 322 trade unionists were imprisoned. Everyday we receive new lists of COSATU and NACTU members who have been detained.

Every three months or so the South African regime imposes increasingly restrictive limitations on the freedom of the press. With the extension of the state of emergency, these restrictions have once again been strengthened. The trade union of Black journalists, the MWASA, is the preferred target.

And what is the position of employers vis-à-vis this continuously worsening situation? The largest South African companies such as the Anglo-American, which says it is a "liberal" organisation, have clearly demonstrated in the past few days that they support the proposed amendments to the Industrial Relations Act; these amendments will raise further obstacles to the implementation of internationally recognised labour standards.

It is no surprise therefore that COSATU has submitted a complaint in this connection to the Director-General of the ILO, who will transmit it, according to established procedures, to the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations. We can no longer doubt that the employers directly support the maintenance of apartheid and the shameless exploitation of Black workers.

During the sessions of our Committee, the representative of the CBI, that is to say of the British employers, tried to convince us that British companies invest in South Africa in order to improve the lot of Black workers and to secure for them all kinds of advantages. We had to draw his attention to the chapter in the Director-General's Report which states that only 18 companies, among the 146 which had submitted their reports under the EEC Code of Conduct, were paying their Black workers a higher wage than the bare minimum. Still worse, the lowest salaries were paid by the large companies, such as Shell, Courtaulds and Lonhro.

Along the same lines as the CBI representative, the honourable government representative of the United States based his hopes for change in South Africa on the "economic power" of Black workers. He explained that the Administration did not share the views of Congress in this area, or approve of its efforts to tighten American economic sanctions against South Africa.

This thesis is in total contradiction with the reality of apartheid. We have before us statistics on the miserable wages paid to Black workers, and on the extent of their malnutrition and unemployment. These are the evils of apartheid which, as a matter of fact, had provoked strikes of protests in the 1970s, in other words well before the imposition of economic sanctions. It seems to me extraordinary to base any hope of change on "the economic power of the workers". Why is there this reticence relating to the effectiveness of economic sanctions against South Africa, when the United States Administration itself manifests a continuous enthusiasm for applying them elsewhere against morally bankrupt regimes? And what a contradiction between the fact that the United States, by the very will of the American people, has adopted very severe sanctions, and the fact that the Administration of that country continues to veto much more modest measures proposed by the Security Council of the United Nations!

Rest assured that the regime of South Africa would not impose such drastic restrictions on those who advocate economic sanctions if it were not convinced of the effectiveness of sanctions. We welcome Mr. Sam Nujoma. We are discussing a regime which year after year has defied the international community. Its occupation of Namibia, which was decreed illegal as far back as 1966, should be punished as provided for in the United Nations Charter, for this regime cannot be qualified by any other word than criminal. The representative of NACTU spoke to us about the profound humility of Black workers in South Africa when they look at the sacrifices that the people of the front-line States have made, and the high price they have paid for their solidarity with the Black majority in South Africa. Military aggression, the destruction of the economic and social fabric, political destabilisation – this is the daily lot of those countries.

Our Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa, as well as the Programme of Action against Apartheid, amended and updated by the Tripartite Conference in Harare and our Committee, take into account the reality of the situation. The Declaration will no longer be a Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa, but a Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid. The Workers' group hopes that this small change in the title will reflect a new reality in our commitment to combat apartheid, rather than just complaining about it.

The Workers' group launches an appeal to all the members of our Organisation to adopt by consensus this Declaration and Programme of Action, to demonstrate our collective determination to undertake this struggle, in which our weapons shall be comprehensive and mandatory economic sanctions.

However, it is also our duty to give a vigorous and concerted response to the events which are now taking place in South Africa, which I repeat, are a threat to the whole future of trade union life in that country.

It is in this spirit that the Workers' group has formulated appropriate conclusions to supplement the Declaration and Programme of Action. Guided by the Director-General's statement that only concerted international pressure aimed at the most sensitive aspects of the South African Government will succeed in bringing about a peaceful dismantling of the policy of apartheid, we have tried in our conclusions this year to identify the areas which we consider to be the most sensitive for South Africa, where concerted and specific action is required.

Apartheid is a genuine challenge for the international community. It is absolutely imperative for all of us to accept this challenge together, without any reservation, without a vote, which might give the South African regime the impression that it still has some friends left.

Yes, let us accept this challenge together. Our credibility depends on it, as does that of our Organisation.

Mr. VOLLEBAEK (Government adviser, Norway; Reporter of the Committee on Apartheid) – It is my honour, as Reporter of the Committee on Apartheid, to present the Committee's report, as contained in Provisional Record No. 19.

The report contains an account of the Committee's deliberations, as well as a proposed updating of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia, a proposed Programme of Action against Apartheid and conclusions relating to urgent action to be taken.

The proposed updating relates specifically to the situation in Namibia.

The Committee also proposes that the name of the Committee be changed to the Conference Committee on Action against Apartheid.

I propose that the report be adopted by this Conference.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – The general discussion on the report of the Committee on Apartheid is now open. In a few moments we shall have the honour of hearing Mr. Sam Nujoma, President of the South West African People's Organisation (SWAPO), address us.

However, before giving Mr. Nujoma the floor I would like briefly to say a little about him, about his tireless struggle against apartheid and for the liberation of his country, Namibia.

As an employee of the railroads in the capital of Namibia in the fifties, Mr. Nujoma discovered for himself just how unacceptable is the oppression under which the Black workers live under the apartheid regime which prevails in occupied Namibia.

Very rapidly, he became a militant fighting for the rights not only of the railroad workers but of the population of Namibia as a whole.

Very early on, he stood out as a decisive, courageous and skilful organiser, working for the working population of his country.

His commitment and involvement in the anti-apartheid movement led to his dismissal from service, to his arrest and finally to exile.

Outside his home country, however, Mr. Nujoma continued tirelessly in his efforts to mobilise the international community to fight against the illegal occupation of Namibia by South Africa, while the decisions taken by the General Assembly of the United Nations and decisions taken by the International Court of Justice were being flagrantly violated.

His ceaseless involvement and work led in 1960 to the formation of SWAPO, the internationally recognised liberation movement of the people of Namibia; he was elected first President of that organisation.

It is now ten years since the International Labour Conference, at its 64th Session in 1978, decided that Namibia should become a full Member of the ILO. That is why today is a specially appropriate time to listen to the words of one of the most eminent freedom fighters; someone who incarnates not only the struggle against apartheid, a concern to which the International Labour Organisation has devoted much of its time and effort for many years, but also the efforts of the people of Namibia to achieve absolute freedom and sovereignty.

These are the prerequisites which will make it possible for Namibia to take up its rights and obligations as a Member of the International Labour Organisation.

Therefore, it is a very great pleasure for me to invite Mr. Sam Nujoma to the speaker's rostrum to make his address to the participants to this Conference.

Mr. NUJOMA (President of the South West Africa People's Organisation (SWAPO)) – Permit me to take this opportunity to congratulate you, Mr. President, on your election to the chairmanship of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference.

The decision of the delegates to elect you to this very important position testifies to the trust they have in you and in your competence, skill and experience to guide the deliberations of this august assembly. Your election is also a clear indication of the respect your great country, the German Democratic Republic, has earned among the nations of the world as a champion of democracy, peace and freedom for all the peoples of the world.

On behalf of the oppressed people of Namibia, and on my own behalf, I would like to sincerely thank the Director-General of the International Labour Office, Mr. Francis Blanchard, for having invited me to address the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference in this hall which has a unique historical significance for Namibia. As you may recall, Mr. Chairman, it was in this very same hall where members of the then League of Nations met to discuss the fate of my country, albeit without the participation or even consultation of the Namibian people, and mandated the country to the British Crown to be exercised by South Africa on behalf of Britain.

This hall, therefore, has an important bearing on what has become of Namibia since then. More importantly, it was also in this hall that a historic decision was taken to admit Namibia to full membership of the ILO, thus paving the way for the special relationship which illegally occupied Namibia now enjoys with the ILO.

We value highly the membership of Namibia in the ILO and hope that our country will, in a not very distant future, take its rightful place within the entire family of the United Nations system as a free, democratic and sovereign State. Finally, but not least, I would like to express my delegation's most profound gratitude to the authorities of the Swiss Confederation for the kind and wonderful hospitality extended to my delegation since our arrival here yesterday.

It is of historic importance to the struggle of the Namibian people that I address the International Labour Conference which brings representatives of governments, employers and workers together for a united action in furtherance of the noble cause of social justice and in the interest of workers throughout the world.

It is hardly possible to find words which can adequately express the contribution of the ILO to the promotion of the rights and betterment of the working people's living and working conditions. Since the years of Albert Thomas, the first Director of the International Labour Office, to the present day, under the able guidance of Mr. Francis Blanchard, the ILO has enormously contributed to the lot of the working people and social peace through relentless efforts to improve the social and economic well-being of those in and out of employment throughout the world.

It is in recognition of these commendable efforts that the Organisation was awarded the well-deserved Nobel Peace Prize in 1969.

In its preamble, the ILO Constitution declares that universal and lasting peace can be founded only on the basis of social justice. At Philadelphia, in 1944, the International Labour Conference adopted a Declaration, now an annex to the Constitution, which embodies an even more dynamic concept: it proclaims the right of all human beings "to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity". It further states that "poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere".

But can true and lasting peace be achieved in the face of a vicious arms race which threatens the very survival of the entire human race? Can the social and economic well-being of the peoples of the world be achieved while enormous sums of money are squandered on weapons of mass destruction every day? Can one talk of true and lasting peace when millions of people, Namibians included, still languish under colonial, racial and foreign domination and are denied their basic human rights? According to some estimates, the total global expenditure on armaments now amounts to some trillion dollars, I repeat – trillion not billion dollars. But this senseless spending is occurring at a time when unemployment has reached an alarming proportion in most of the developed and developing countries.

The senseless spending is also taking place at a time when the world economy is in severe recession and developing countries are begging for development money to restructure their dwindling and ailing economies in order to meet the rising consumer demands and to provide employment to the millions of their peoples.

Since the proceeds from the sale of arms only benefit a few people, this has contributed to increasing inequality in the industrialised countries, and to exacerbating poverty and structural maladjustment in the developing world.

I do not need to dwell too much on the link between the arms race and the global economic crisis because this is not a new subject. But the fact cannot be over-emphasised that this world spends huge resources on arms and related materials at the expense of the much needed economic development in areas where development never saw the light of day.

Certainly, there are millions of peace-loving people the globe over, who believe that without disarmament there can be no meaningful development and without development there can be no peace, and without peace there can be no justice.

Our fear and repulsion for the use of force and war is primarily because of the loss of human lives which is involved in such activities. But, in the developing world, human lives are also lost every day in another kind of "war", namely the battle against poverty and underdevelopment. Yes, some people are being killed by the bullets and shells of oppressive and dictatorial regimes. But more many die because of famine and diseases. There is little hope that this kind of war will be ended without sustained economic development, and without development there can be no social justice.

The challenge being posed by this situation to the whole world is moral, political and social. The threat to world peace, security and social justice posed by the arms race cannot any longer be reconciled with the moral imperative that human life and well-being represent the highest value, which we should all try to uphold and protect. Some have argued against the connection between disarmament and the transfer of resources to the development needs of the developing world. That is to say, we have been reminded more than once that the Third World has no automatic right to claim entitlement to the financial resources that would be released from disarmament. But valid as this argument may be, what the developing countries are asking for is the solidarity of all progressive and peace-loving forces of the world to enable them to tackle the problem of development.

It is against this background that we welcome the improving relations between the world's two biggest Powers, the United States and the USSR, which has resulted in the signing of the historic agreement on the elimination of intermediate nuclear missiles, which we hope might give renewed confidence and co-operation, instead of confrontation, between East and West.

This year marks the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the 10th anniversary of the United Nations Security Council Resolution 435 which contains the United Nations Plan for the Decolonisation of Namibia.

Many people have expected that Namibia would be free by now and, therefore, able to occupy its rightful place in the community of sovereign nations. On the contrary, Namibia remains under the yoke of apartheid, colonisation and illegal occupation. The situation has gone from bad to worse, and the apartheid regime is busy brutalising our people and committing untold atrocities, using more than 100,000 racist troops that it has stationed in Namibia today. Among these are specially trained killer units, such as the so-called Koevoet (crowbar) units that are employed to murder innocent civilians and terrorise the Namibian population.

The South African colonial army, police and the terrorist gangs have unleashed a truly genocidal campaign against the Namibian people. Every week that passes, there are fresh reports of atrocities, as Pretoria tries in vain to contain the forward march of the Namibian people's national liberation struggle, under the leadership of SWAPO.

The South African occupation army, the police and the special terror units are conducting a reign of terror in the form of torture, physical and psychological attack and general harassment of our people, both old and young. It is difficult to believe that human beings can go to the extent to which the South African racists in Namibia have gone to inflict suffering on other human beings. As one of Pretoria's common methods of torture, people are being burned alive over glowing charcoal fires. Others are thrown into small prison cells with wooden walls and floors in which sharp nails are driven. We have people who have had their limbs amputated, other than medically.

The occupation army now habitually drives its armoured vehicles and trucks over peasants' planted agricultural fields, destroying crops in the process. Entire villages are wiped out just because they are suspected of assisting SWAPO freedom fighters.

Schools, and even churches, have not been spared this destructive brutality. Fifteen schools have recently been bombed or set on fire and members of their staff arrested and tortured by the South African troops in Namibia. Church property is now and then targeted for bombardment.

For example, in January, February and during the last week of March and the first two weeks of April 1987, the following cases of atrocities were reported and documented: 20 people were deliberately run over and killed by South African armed vehicles while in their homes or walking by the roadside; 10 women were raped by South African soldiers; 31 men, women and children were severely beaten up by the racist forces; 4 people were tortured by roasting them over fires; 6 homes were destroyed by army vehicles; 40 people were abducted and detained; 15 peasant crop fields were destroyed by the occupation army; 20 families were robbed of all their property by South African soldiers.

More than half of the Namibian population lives under martial law and a dusk-to-dawn curfew. Any person found outside his or her house after dark runs the risk of being shot on sight. The racist soldiers and the terror gangs shoot first and ask questions afterwards, even at corpses. These are but a few examples of the atrocities which South African commits in Namibia today.

Allow me now to turn briefly to the labour and employment conditions in my country. The ruthless racial discrimination against the exploitation of Blacks, which is the official practice in both occupied Namibia and South Africa, finds its most vivid expression in the labour market where the working environment of a Black worker is most oppressive and exploitative. A Black worker has virtually no access to adequate remunerative employment opportunity. In the absence of meaningful protective labour legislation, the Black worker has no legal right to a pension, sick pay, maternity leave, etc., as happens in other, democratic, countries.

The bulk of the Namibian labour force works for the foreign economic interests which control 90 per cent of the country's economy. These foreign economic interests are engaged in a merciless exploitation of Namibia's human and natural resources through large corporations and financial institutions from Britain, the Federal Republic of Germany, France, Italy, Switzerland and other Western European countries, the United States of America, Canada, Japan and South Africa. All these foreign corporations operate on the basis and conditions laid down in the licenses issued to them by the South African occupation regime.

The very high profits these corporations are making are a result of the excessive exploitation of the Black cheap labour and natural wealth of Namibia. But while exploiting the captive African cheap labour and Namibia's natural resources, these multinational corporations are providing the racist regime with the necessary revenues to maintain its illegal and brutal occupation of Namibia.

The Black employees of the corporations are by and large accommodated in the so-called workers' compounds. Life in these compounds is horrible, to say the least. Workers are packed into overcrowded barracks with concrete structures for beds. Sanitation is either very poor or non-existent. Most of the inmates of these compounds are people who are separated from their families for the duration of their so-called contract periods. Namibian Black workers have very little or no protection at all in law against industrial injury, illness or redundancy. In most cases, workers are excluded from fringe benefits, pension opportunities and other amenities accorded to White workers. Where social provisions exist, they do not cover the contract workers. The so-called "Conditions of Employment Act", which South Africa has introduced in Namibia, through its puppets in Windhoek, to hoodwink world public opinion, has not changed the ugly reality of this situation.

The underdevelopment of Namibia continues without abatement, and the available statistics show that as much as 60 per cent of Namibia's gross national product is repatriated abroad by the transnationals as company profits before taxes. Of the remaining 40 per cent, a large part is used as operating expenses of the foreign economic interests in Namibia. Per capita income for the Whites in Namibia is approximately 3,000 rands, while the corresponding figure for Blacks is 125 rands – a ratio of 24 to 1. This, surely, is one of the most blatant examples of inequitable distribution of income in the world today.

Over the last two years there has been a resurgence of trade union activity in Namibia, resulting in a number of industrial actions. This has led to the dismissal of thousands of workers by some of the big foreign corporations in Namibia. A case in point was the dismissal of workers from their work at the Tsumeb, Otjihase and Kombat copper mines and other corporations. The workers were dismissed en masse for having demanded better pay and minor improvements in their living and working conditions. However, the mining companies, notably the Tsumeb Corporation Limited, in which Britain, South Africa and the United States have the dominant interest, decided to systematically victimise the workers. The majority of the workers dismissed are those who are union members, thus clearly showing the anti-trade union line which these foreign companies have taken.

The multinationals have for many years worked together with the colonial authorities in Namibia to suppress trade unions and to silence workers' opposition to apartheid oppression and injustices. However, as the repression of the workers has intensified over the decades, so has their commitment to abolish apartheid in Namibia.

Thus, in spite of harsh reprisals from transnational corporations and the colonial regime, the workers have in recent years succeeded in forming mass and effective trade unions, such as the Namibian Food and Allied Union, the Mineworkers Union of Namibia, the Metal and Allied Namibia Workers, and the Namibia Public Workers Union. All these unions are affiliated to the National Union of Namibian Workers. With the formation of these trade unions, the Namibian workers are continuing their historic resistance to colonial domination, repression and exploitation.

We consider it imperative for the international community, particularly the ILO, to come to the aid of the trade unions in Namibia so that they can effectively continue to fight for the rights of our exploited and oppressed workers.

In view of the prevailing critical political, military and economic situation in Namibia, we strongly call upon the entire international community to impose comprehensive mandatory sanctions against South Africa for its refusal to relinquish its illegal occupation of Namibia.

In this connection, we sincerely welcome the measures taken by some countries in imposing sanctions against South Africa. We urge those which have not yet done so to follow suit.

I cannot end my speech without welcoming the updated Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia and the Programme of Action against Apartheid as presented to the Conference for adoption.

I am happy to note that for the first time both the Declaration and the Programme of Action apply equally to the situation in South Africa and Namibia.

I sincerely appeal to the distinguished delegates here assembled to adopt the Declaration and the Programme of Action by consensus. By doing so, you will send a clear signal to the racist colonial regime of South Africa that the international community is fully behind the oppressed people of Namibia and South Africa.

I also congratulate the Director-General of the ILO for the comprehensive report concerning the policy of apartheid in South Africa. I have noted that this year the report covers the situation in Namibia satisfactorily.

However, we feel that the issue of Namibia should be covered in a separate chapter in the Report.

Lastly, we sincerely thank the ILO for co-operating with SWAPO in training Namibian refugees in exile. In this regard, I have to mention specifically the vocational training centre which the ILO and the SWAPO of Namibia jointly constructed for the Namibians at Cuacra in the People's Republic of Angola. The centre is very useful to the Namibians and is a concrete testimony to the wonderful co-operation which exists between SWAPO and the ILO.

I must say that this vocational training centre is the first, because in Namibia we do not have anyone for the Africans, so therefore we thank the ILO for this invaluable contribution to the Namibian people.

In conclusion, I would like to mention that, like the rest of humanity, the Namibian people hope that the current international political atmosphere, which is characterised by dialogue and co-operation, will have positive implications for Namibia's long delayed independence. We in SWAPO, therefore, support recent proposals by Angola to find a settlement in the south-western corner of Africa, leading to the immediate independence of Namibia, security for Angola and the withdrawal of Cuban troops from Angola.

Let me also reaffirm, at the same time, SWAPO's support for and solidarity with the people of South Africa in their just struggle against racism for a democratic, united and non-racial South Africa.

We strongly condemn the racist South African policy of destabilisation of the independent African States in the region, particularly the People's Republic of Angola.

Similarly, SWAPO maintains the view that the question of Palestine is at the core of the conflict in the Middle East. As such, it follows that any just, durable and comprehensive solution in the area must lead to the establishment of an independent Palestine State. We therefore support the Palestinian people, led by the PLO, in their struggle to achieve this goal. We also support the Sahraoui people, led by the Polisario Front, in their fight for the independence of Western Sahara.

On behalf of SWAPO, I would like to express our sincere gratitude to all countries, national and international organisations, which have supported and continue to support our struggle for self-determination. In this connection, I would like to single out the front-line States, in particular the People's Republic of Angola, other OAU member States, the socialist countries, the Nordic countries, Holland, Italy and the member countries of the non-aligned movement.

To the White population in Namibia, I would like to reiterate SWAPO's position that the struggle we are waging is not, has not been, and never will be, directed against individual Whites. Rather, it is a struggle to end apartheid and colonialism. Above all, it is a struggle to restore the human dignity of all our people, Black and White.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – Mr. Nujoma, I thank you most sincerely for this very impressive address which you have just made before this Conference. This will help all of us to understand better your struggle against the problem of apartheid, and to use the means available to us in a better way to show our solidarity with you.

Interpretation from German: Mr. MUHR (Workers' delegate, Federal Republic of Germany) – The time for discussing the pros and cons of sanctions against South Africa is past. The time has now come for action. In the South African Republic, 1987 was a year in which yet again many people lost their lives in their struggle for the recognition of human rights. Thirty thousand persons in the course of one single year were detained for more than a month, as the Report before us indicates.

We are still under the shock of the decision of the Supreme Court of South Africa to refuse to reopen the trial of the condemned Sharpsville Six, and this, despite the fact that statements and testimonies in the original trial were quite obviously falsified.

With the prohibition of the political activity of the Congress of South African Trade Unions (COSATU) and the banning of 17 anti-apartheid organisations, the South African regime has destroyed the last bridges for a peaceful settlement with the Black population. However, this still does not seem to be sufficient for those in power in the southern tip of Africa. Now labour rights are to be further limited.

The changes effected by Parliament since 1987 represent a well-orchestrated attack against the Black trade union movement. Although South African labour legislation grants trade unions the right to exist, their activities can be curtailed in a wide variety of ways. For instance trade union members who take part in a strike – and strikes are legal in South Africa – may find themselves dismissed.

In future, any collective action is going to be considered a strike. Sympathy strikes will also no longer be legal. The trade unions are to be held liable for any damage which occurs during illegal strikes and, according to the recent legislation, almost all of them will be considered illegal.

The industrial council system has been restructured; instead of a negotiating body, there will be a strike prevention and compulsory arbitration system.

We are not able to give an account of the full extent of the planned restrictions on trade union rights here; however, I think this is clear when we look back at the three days of protest last week. Millions of Black workers stayed away from work from Monday until Wednesday and, as a result, the economy was largely paralysed.

The inexorable harshness of the South African regime against the freedom movement has, so far as we know until now, cost ten persons their lives.

We bow with respect and with honour before these and all those who have died in the cause of freedom and human dignity.

We pay tribute to the millions of workers in South Africa who made this three-day general strike, the largest in the history of South Africa. Their courage obliges us to continue to give them our support in their struggle.

If the South African Government were to forbid financial support from abroad for political parties and trade unions, or if it were to take similar prohibitive measures, then we should find ways and means to continue to help the anti-apartheid movement.

We view with revulsion the White minority in South Africa which fails to recognise the signs of the times and continues to maintain its power with weapons and with violence, holding the vast majority of the population in bondage and depriving them of their freedom.

That is why we emphasise, once again, that so long as the apartheid regime shows no readiness to alter its policy of contempt for human beings and maintains its illegal occupation of Namibia, sanctions are a necessary and a legitimate tool of international politics to implement human rights and international law in South Africa.

The German Confederation of Trade Unions (DGB) has therefore renewed its call for a boycott on all goods from South Africa. Together with its member organisations, it is continuing its public information and mobilisation campaign with advertisements and posters against the apartheid regime.

We have already achieved some success. Two of the major chain stores in the Federal Republic of Germany no longer sell any goods from South Africa.

However, these are only the first of our successes. We must also try to exert our influence on those enterprises which are still operating in South Africa.

We must at least demand that they draw no further economic advantage from the application of apartheid and security and emergency measures. The right to strike and the right of staff delegates and trade union officials to be represented in disciplinary and complaint procedures must be granted by them.

A sign of progress is that the metalworkers trade union (IG Metall), the largest of our members in the German Confederation of Trade Unions, together with its South African brother trade unions, has drawn up a list of minimum standards for labour relations and labour conflicts. This is now being applied in the Federal German iron and steel enterprises with branches in South Africa.

South African and Federal German trade unions will jointly monitor the implementation of these principles. This is once again an example of specific economic action taken against this regime's new forms of aggression.

To this effect "minimum standards" have been drawn up on the basis of practical, day to day experience. These standards reflect not only the practical needs of young Black trade unionists but also the experiences of Federal German trade unions in their numerous past efforts to provide help and solidarity in the case of conflict.

The fact that these minimum standards are so closely matched to practical realities and that they were jointly formulated, makes these "minimum standards" a qualitatively new and special step in the long series of political inroads to change circumstances in South Africa. We would be pleased if this example were to be followed in other countries.

By grouping racial, social security and labour rights together, the White minority and in particular the employers in South Africa, have great means at their disposal to control and oppress Black workers and their unions.

Those companies, which, despite international demands for economic sanctions, continue activities in South Africa, must therefore at least declare themselves ready to draw no advantage from this undemocratic and anti-social legal system. We call upon all those concerned to respect all the resolutions taken against apartheid including those yet to be taken at this 75th Session of the International Labour Conference.

We must once and for all put an end to the situation whereby human rights are not applied to the vast majority of the population.

Mr. SUNMONU (representative of the Organisation of African Trade Union Unity) – Permit me, on behalf of the Organisation of African Trade Union Unity (ORTUU), to join you in welcoming Sam Nujoma, President of Swapo, to this session of the Conference. It is the hope of all African and other freedom-loving peoples of the world that the next time, possibly next year, the Governing Body of the ILO invites President Nujoma to address the International Labour Conference it will be in his capacity as President of the Republic of Namibia.

Let me express the profound appreciation of my organisation to the Director-General, Mr. Blanchard, for the excellent way his special Report on the application of the declaration concerning the policy of apartheid in South Africa was prepared this year. It is a great improvement on last year's Report.

From the Report, the conditions under which Black trade unions operate through repressive apartheid laws is a matter of great concern to us. We praise the courage and the indomitable spirit of the leadership and members of COSATU and NACTU. As trade unionists, we cannot accept the tribal intonation of, and collaboration with the apartheid regime of, the Nkatha-formed United Workers Union of South Africa (UWUSA). The struggle for the death of apartheid in South Africa and Namibia will not be served by unions such as UWUSA.

On behalf of the OATUU, I congratulate the Governing Body of the ILO for convening the Tripartite Conference on Action against Apartheid in Harare from 3 to 6 May 1988. Our congratulations also go to the Director-General and all his Officers and staff, and also to the Government and people of Zimbabwe for the successful outcome of the conference. All the delegates, observers and participants of the Harare conference are also congratulated and thanked for the draft Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia, which the Conference Committee worked upon and is presenting for the adoption of this Conference session.

We are glad to see the inclusion of Namibia in the Declaration because of the practice of apartheid in Namibia by the racist regime, as a result of its illegal and criminal occupation of Namibia, in defiance of the termination of its mandate by the United Nations, and Security Council resolution 435 for the independence of Namibia.

The new Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia being put for adoption by this Conference should be supported and adopted by all the three constituents of the ILO unanimously. We are tired of the hypocrisy of the "apostles of human rights and democracy". They call for the practice of human rights and democracy everywhere in the world, except in apartheid South Africa. We would, therefore, like Mrs. Margaret Thatcher and President Ronald Reagan to be kind enough to tell the whole world whether apartheid conforms to their definition of human rights and democracy. If their answer is no, and their alibi is that they have condemned apartheid as inhuman and a crime against humanity, then are they suggesting that apartheid should be destroyed or reformed? Then, how? It is, however, pertinent to inform these two world leaders that it is now universally acknowledged that apartheid cannot be reformed, so it must be destroyed. The world is then left with only two options to destroy apartheid, i.e. through peaceful means or violent means. The only peaceful means to destroy apartheid is through mandatory economic sanctions against the regime. It is, therefore, inconceivable that Mrs. Thatcher's conservative Government and the Reagan Administration, in spite of the overwhelming support of the people of Great Britain and the United States respectively should still adamantly and hypocritically maintain that sanctions would not work against racist South Africa. Why did their respective Governments impose sanctions against other countries like Poland, Cuba, Iran and Nicaragua? We are, however, comforted by the fact that the people of the United States, through their accredited representatives in the two houses of the United States Congress have voted for sanctions against the apartheid South African regime. As equally successfully demonstrated last Saturday at the concert organised by the British Anti-Apartheid Committee at Wembley Stadium in London to commemorate the 70th birthday of Nelson Mandela, we have no doubt that the majority of the British people hate apartheid and they want it destroyed.

I have singled out the Governments of Great Britain and the United States of America not because they are the only Governments supporting the apartheid regime but because of their hypocrisy and double standards. If we must call a spade a spade, then the Governments of the Federal Republic of Germany, France, and Japan are also indirectly guilty of supporting the apartheid regime in South Africa by their refusal to apply sanctions against the odious regime. The same can be said of the employers of all these countries. We are also comforted by the fact that the workers, trade unions and other democratic organisations of the above-named countries have, by their words and actions, condemned apartheid and are fighting it on all fronts. We thank all of them for their fight against apartheid, and the moral and material support they are giving to the victims of apartheid in South Africa, Namibia and the front-line States.

We appeal to the humanity of the supporters, promoters, godfathers and godmothers of apartheid to assist the international community to bring an early and peaceful destruction to apartheid by not only adopting but also implementing the Declaration before this session of the Conference. We especially appeal to all countries of the world, particularly to the Western industrialised countries to impose immediate mandatory economic sanctions against the apartheid South African regime and isolate it politically, militarily, culturally and diplomatically. They should also take immediate steps to disinvest in South Africa, in addition to all the actions contained in the Programme of Action against Apartheid in the Declaration.

May I take this opportunity, on behalf of the OATUU, to warn Japan of the dire consequences Japanese companies face in Africa for their unethical filling of the void created by the withdrawal of United States companies from apartheid South Africa. When the day of reckoning comes, Africa will not forget such treachery.

On behalf of my organisation and millions of African workers and people, I thank the Nordic countries for their principled fight against apartheid, and their assistance to its victims inside South Africa, Namibia and the front-line States. We shall never forget. We appeal to other countries and their non-governmental organisations for similar support. We call for the unconditional independence of Namibia this year and for massive international assistance for the post-independence reconstruction and development of Namibia.

In conclusion, I call for the unanimous adoption of the Declaration and Report of the Committee on Apartheid. We shall consider any negative remark or vote or abstention as support for the practice of apartheid in South Africa and Namibia.

Mr. KAILEMBO (representative of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions) – On behalf of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, I should like to convey to this plenary session the full commitment of the 87 million workers the world over under the ICFTU umbrella to the fullest implementation of the updated Declaration concerning Action Against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia, its Programme of Action and the conclusions adopted by the Conference Committee on Apartheid.

I have listened carefully to Mr. Sam Nujoma's speech which so vividly described the situation of the Black workers in his country. He may rest assured that just as we mobilised maximum international support for the Namibian mineworkers during their strike at Tsumeb, putting maximum pressure on that company, we shall continue making every effort to maximise support for the struggle of the Black workers of Namibia in their efforts to organise for trade union and human rights for the fullest and speediest implementation of United Nations Security Council resolution 435.

While we are meeting here today, the majority of Black workers of South Africa are engaged in a struggle for survival. There can be no doubt that the proposed amendments to the Labour Relations Act and the promulgation of the Orderly Internal Politics Bill are aimed at emasculating, at destroying the independent Black trade union movement in South Africa, at destroying it – because in the absence of rights, after the bannings and restrictions on anti-apartheid organisations – the independent Black trade union movement has come to represent the aspirations of the Black majority.

What do the proposed amendments to the Labour Relations Act really intend to do? They intend to introduce such an incredibly onerous procedure for the calling of a legal strike that virtually all strikes will become illegal. Already, under the existing law, some 90 per cent of the strikes in South Africa are considered illegal. Employers will be able to sue unions and their officials for damages arising out of illegal strikes, that is virtually for all strikes. Under the proposed amendments it will not be unfair labour practice for the bosses selectively to re-employ workers after a strike, thus making sure that union activists are excluded. The proposed amendments will also promote the recognition of minority unions, or racially based unions, intended to divide the workers. In the light of these proposed amendments, the Government's explanation as to the intentions of the Orderly Internal Politics Bill look particularly ominous. The Government explains as follows, and I quote: "What primarily involved is the monitoring of foreign-funding and the placing of controls on the use of funds for politically subversive or illegal activities." As practically all strikes will be illegal, it is clear that the Government intends to curtail solidarity funds reaching the independent Black trade union movement. It is intended to curtail assistance to the victims of apartheid. What is to become of the European Community's so-called "positive measures" in these circumstances?

Prior to the European Community Summit in May, a top-level ICFTU/ETUC delegation made representations to the European Community, pleading for some real sanctions measures, such as a comprehensive coal embargo – more than ever urgent because of the present situation.

In doing so, we had every confidence that we were genuinely reflecting the wishes of the majority of Black workers in South Africa. Already back in April 1985, the ICFTU adopted a comprehensive sanctions programme in its policy statement entitled "Beating Apartheid". This document draws its value from the fact that the independent Black trade union movement played a key role in its drafting. The same applies to the conclusions of the ICFTU/SATUCC Conference on "Beating Apartheid and Strengthening the Front-Line States", which was held in Lusaka in October 1986, which, among other things, led to the establishment of a monitoring unit on sanctions within the ICFTU Secretariat.

Now that it has become illegal for the independent Black trade union movement to call for such measures, the ICFTU considers it as its duty to propagate their message as vigorously as possible. This constitutes elementary trade union solidarity.

On 1 and 2 June the ICFTU called for a special meeting of its Co-ordinating Committee on South Africa, which brings together its affiliates from the industrialised countries, from the African region, from the international trade secretariats and from the independent Black trade union movement inside South Africa. The Co-ordinating Committee examined the most appropriate international trade union response in view of the present crisis we are facing.

It is with great satisfaction that we note that the areas identified for specific target action by the Conference Committee on Apartheid are exactly those that our Co-ordinating Committee recommended for special ICFTU campaigns. Indeed, we committed ourselves to mobilising workers for campaigns to bring about a coal embargo and to stop South Africa from gaining energy self-sufficiency. For example, for this campaign our monitoring unit has already prepared material on the Mossel Bay gas project and Kudu gas fields in Namibia, identifying those foreign companies that are co-operating in these ventures. We have also drawn up a list of those companies that are co-operating with South Africa's SASOL plants, whose management has consistently been anti-union, massively firing workers during strikes, bringing in vigilantes and police squads, and evicting workers from hostels. The NACTU-affiliated South African Chemical Workers' Union is now in its fourth month of dispute with the SASOL management. Another campaign is aimed at putting pressure on banks to stop loans and credit guarantees that promote South Africa's interests.

We have updated our list of companies with investments and interests in South Africa. And if I may summarise, the culprits are: the United Kingdom, with 374 companies; the Federal Republic of Germany, with 333 companies; the United States, with 164 companies; Japan, with 103; France, with 90; Switzerland, with 54. The list endeavours to expose, among other things, those companies that have claimed to withdraw from South Africa while in fact maintaining their interests in the Republic.

The ICFTU very much welcomed the inclusion in the updated Programme of Action of a call for pressure on the subsidiaries of South Africa's transnationals. Indeed, our monitoring unit has been doing extensive research in this field, and an ICFTU list of transnationals with their subsidiaries is now in print.

Our Co-ordinating Committee recommended that we should intensify our efforts to put greater pressure on the south-east Asian countries, some of which are heavily involved in the so-called Bantustans. Moreover, a number of transnationals operating from those countries have apparently been increasing – more particularly Japan and Taiwan – their involvement in South Africa, taking the place of those that are heading the sanctions call. We are approaching our Asian and Pacific regional organisation so that this matter is given a high profile at the forthcoming congress of that organisation, and so that appropriate representations are made to the governments concerned.

We also very much welcome to greater emphasis on the tragic situation of the front-line States in the updated Declaration and Programme of Action. The ICFTU is endeavouring to implement as fully as possible the conclusions of our Lusaka Conference that I mentioned earlier. We sent a special ICFTU/SATUCC mission to Mozambique to see how best we could show solidarity to the trade union movement in that country in its efforts to alleviate the intolerable suffering of the population, caused by South Africa's proxy forces, permanent destabilisation, compounded by drought. As a first gesture we provided blankets for people who had nothing with which to protect themselves from the oncoming winter. Now, we are working on longer-term projects, particularly to help rehabilitate migrant workers expelled from South Africa. We are also carrying out a feasibility study, together with SATUCC, on ways and means of bringing about immediate relief to migrant workers in the whole of the southern African region and planning a longer-term strategy aimed at promoting employment creation in the supplier countries.

In conclusion, allow me to return to the current situation in South Africa – a situation of deep crisis where human lives are becoming increasingly cheap in a spiral of State and overall violence spilling well over the borders of South Africa. Very soon, another six Black people will probably be hanged. I am, of course, referring to the Sharpeville Six.

After months of campaigning, the ICFTU's World Congress, held in Melbourne in March this year, issued a strong appeal to the South African authorities for clemency for the Sharpeville Six. Just as arrangements were being made for a top-level Congress delegation to make direct representations to the South African Embassy in Canberra, we were informed that a stay of execution order had been granted. Now we learn with distress that the request for a retrial has been refused. We call for immediate tripartite action at all levels to save the lives of the Six, who appear destined to be hanged merely to allow Botha to gain a few more votes from his conservative constituents.

I thus add my voice to those who have preceded me in expressing the hope that the updated Declaration and Programme of Action, as well as the Committee's Conclusions, will be adopted by consensus and will be translated into immediate action.

The ICFTU for its part pledges to continue making every possible effort, through its Co-ordinating Committee on South Africa, to maximise all forms of assistance to the independent Black trade union movement in South Africa and Namibia and to mobilise our membership world-wide for the fullest implementation of the commitments made here and endorsed by our governing bodies.

Mr. NKADIMENG (representative of the African National Congress) – Allow me in the first place to congratulate the President on his election to preside over this important session of the International Labour Conference. I think we feel particularly confident in his chairmanship because we know of his untiring assistance to the other liberated countries in Africa, Angola, Mozambique, Guinea-Bissau and Zimbabwe. Allow me to congratulate him in the hope that since his country, and he personally, is one of those very important trenches for the liberation movement, you shall continue to render unqualified assistance to the liberation movement in South Africa and Namibia.

We bring you militant greetings from your fighting brothers and sisters in South Africa who have emerged from one of the most impressive and rousing confrontations with the apartheid regime of the bosses in the recorded history of the workers' struggles in South Africa.

This magnificent show of strength takes place against a backdrop of heavy odds in the struggle of the South African workers and people for national and social emancipation. It is a situation of deep economic and political crisis for the apartheid system.

On the economic plane, the country is plagued by a multitude of malaises. The gross domestic product (GDP) is falling with each passing year. In 1985, it declined by 1.1 per cent, showing a slight improvement of a mere 0.5 per cent in 1986. On the other hand, the population growth rate of 3 per cent per annum outpaces by far the meagre growth rate of the GDP.

The stagnation in industrial performance is due in large measure to the squandering of resources on imports of capital-generating items such as military equipment and exorbitant patents for their internal production. Large quantities also for the sanctions-busting exercise. These measures are designed to make the Pretoria regime self-sufficient on items vital for the perpetuation of the apartheid system. They are meant to cushion the effects of increased sanctions and thus increase the regime's potential for floating national and international pressures for the eradication of the criminal system of apartheid.

During his budget speech to the White Parliament earlier this year, Pretoria's Finance Minister, Barend du Plessis, admitted, however, that due to sanctions and other pressures on the regime, many projects designed to reinforce apartheid had to be abandoned. This is a clear admission by Pretoria of the effectiveness of the international action.

Eight successive years of a devastating drought, dwindling markets both internally and externally have meant a further deterioration in living standards. Wages have dropped by 20 per cent in real terms since 1986.

In the political arena, the racist regime's initiatives, the so-called reform, have grounded to a halt. In fact, all pretences of a reform have been thrown overboard. Increasingly, the regime has come to resort on more and more repression and repressive measures.

Following its declaration of a nationwide state of emergency in 1986, which is in its third continuous year as from 10 June 1988, the Pretoria racist regime has resorted to jackboot methods of governance. Not only has it unleashed its forces of repression and oppression – the army and the police – against the people, it has now come to deploy an array of forces against our people.

Within its system of national security management, it has established a network of what is called joint management centres (JMCs) covering major industrial and economic centres of the country. The JMCs are designed to pool the military and civilian efforts for the suppression of democratic popular protests. In the trail of these JMCs, death and destruction have become the order of the day in my country. Many trade unionists, political activists, youth, women, religious and other activists are in detention or have died at the hands of Pretoria's security forces, vigilante units and forces of its Bantustan creations with greater concentration and ferocity in the Pietermaritzburg - Pinetown - Durban Complex in Natal in recent times.

Economic development and political progress in the region of southern Africa are subjected to intolerable strain and destabilisation by Pretoria. Rebellion is fomented and outright aggression is launched against the countries of the subcontinent.

The militancy and resilience in struggle by workers and other sections of the population of South Africa should be understood within this context of extreme repression by the racist regime with the collusion of the employers. It is a clear demonstration of the determination to do away with the state of emergency, the Labour Relations Amendment Bill, the Fund-Raising Bill, the murder and detention of trade union leaders and workers, the impending execution of three members of the National Union of Mineworkers (NUM). It is a determination to do away once and for all with this threat to peace and security in the region and rid the world of the crime of apartheid.

We feel very honoured, therefore to join you in the deliberations of this august body today, the International Labour Organisation (ILO), as in previous gatherings such as the recent joint ILO/OATUU (Organisation of African Trade Union Unity) meeting in Harare. We of the South African Congress of Trade Unions and the ANC are convinced that the results of this present consultation will further greatly contribute to the speedy demise of the abominable system of apartheid. This crisis which the racist regime is in leaves no other way out.

Let me further state, comrades, brothers and sisters, that despite the unrelenting resistance of the people of South Africa and Namibia and the efforts of the international community, the apartheid system continues to exist. Indeed, with each passing day, the situation in southern Africa continues to deteriorate. This demands urgent action by the peoples of the world to hasten the end of the apartheid system as a necessary condition and prerequisite for the transformation of our country into a united, democratic and non-racial South Africa.

We appeal to this meeting to warn the employers not to compound further the situation prevailing inside our country.

We appeal to this world body to reaffirm and implement the Programme of Action adopted at the Arusha conference: "Peoples of the world against apartheid for a democratic South Africa". The struggle for national liberation and social emancipation of the people of South Africa and Namibia requires your continued support.

We appeal to this meeting for continued assistance to SACTU and the entire democratic trade union movement in South Africa; for the further isolation of the regime and implementation of mandatory economic sanctions; to demand the stay of execution of the three NUM members on the death row; to demand the unconditional release of Oscar Mpethe and all detained trade union leaders and workers; the release of Nelson Mandela on his 70th birthday and all other political prisoners; send letters of protest to employers and their organisations on their stand against COSATU and the workers of South Africa.

Before concluding, may I also associate myself with those who spoke before me to urge for acceptance of this updated Declaration against apartheid by consensus.

Once more, allow me to wish this session success in its deliberations.

A luta continua! Victory is certain! An injury to one is an injury to all!

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT - I have approximately 45 speakers on my list at the present moment and I would therefore like to suggest that speakers limit themselves to seven to ten minutes. We could then proceed rapidly and smoothly and complete our agenda for today.

Mr. MOSAKA (representative of the Pan-Africanist Congress of Azania) - On behalf of the Pan-Africanist Congress of Azania, my delegation wishes to join previous speakers in congratulating the President on his election to the presidency of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. His long record and experience in the labour and social fields befit his choice to guide the deliberations of this Conference. We are confident that under his leadership this Session will come to a fruitful conclusion.

Included in the Director-General's Report this year is the subject of human rights. This year also marks the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Today's plenary sitting is devoted to a subject that is incongruent with human rights, namely apartheid, which negates the pronouncements of this Declaration.

This plenary sitting also coincides with the day on which the regime in South Africa, 12 years ago, unleashed violence against the Black students demonstrating peacefully against inferior education. There exists in South Africa, therefore, a gross violation and disregard of freedom and justice.

In discussing apartheid in South Africa, it is imperative to go to the origins of the system, which became institutionalised in 1948 when the Nationalist Party came to power. We contend that the problem of apartheid did not begin in 1948. We hold that at the root of the problem is the landlessness of the majority population. We were dispossessed of our land three centuries ago. This dispossession was brought about violently. In 1913 the dispossession was formalised by a law in the White Parliament.

The problem, therefore, is not just an attitude of mind of the minority to the majority; the problem is a denial of economic, social, cultural, civil and political rights which form the basic premise of the International Bill of Human Rights.

The ILO, pursuant to these ideals, provides a forum where governments, employers and workers enter into discussion on issues related to these basic rights under the various rules.

South Africa found that the standards agreed upon in the ILO were not in harmony with its discriminatory practices, and therefore did not feel accommodated.

The regime, through its Parliament, to which 80 per cent of the population has no access, passes laws that systematically deny the Black majority advancement.

This Parliament is currently sitting and could pass laws that will severely restrict trade union activity, and the Government will be forced to cut the activities of the trade union organisation.

A new labour relations amendment Act has been tabled which will withdraw the provisions of the 1981 Act, which came into force after a long struggle by the Black workers for recognition of the Black independent trade union.

The regime is resisting granting the Black worker even the limited benefits accruing under the 1981 Act. The Black workers registered their repugnance of this latest move through the three-day national protest from 6 to 8 June. The regime is also planning further curbs on trade unions and their overall organisation through the Orderly Internal Politics Bill, which will restrict internal assistance to these bodies.

The system of apartheid has been indicted as an affront to mankind. Consequently, it cannot be reformed but must be eradicated and a system guaranteeing fundamental human rights must be established, a system that will guarantee individual rights and not group rights. To realise this objective, the people of South Africa will resort to all the forms of struggle at its disposal.

The international community has accepted that apartheid must be ended, and is expected to strive for its termination. In this regard, sanctions have been identified as one measure to complement the internal efforts of the oppressed people.

However, we see that economic expediency has tended to outweigh moral necessity in applying sanctions. We know that the measures that could help to bring about the end of this system are within the jurisdiction of all those who subscribe to peace and social justice. However, arguments against disengagement from South Africa allow for ambivalence with regard to the transnationals doing business there.

We are therefore indebted to the ILO for providing us with assistance in recognition of the just cause for which we are striving. We are also grateful to the Members of the ILO who have responded positively to the requirements of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa. We hope that the Declaration will be translated into action.

Injustice is injustice; it cannot be conveniently ignored, but should be fought wherever it exists.

The regime has denied justice to the majority of people of the land through the denial of basic rights. It follows therefore that an unjust system cannot be justly applied.

We wish to commend the Director-General for the Special Report on apartheid, which relentlessly exposes the injustices perpetrated by this regime.

We wish to thank the ILO and all those who called for the lives of the Sharpeville six to be spared. Only this week these patriots have again been refused a retrial. We request everyone to pursue the campaign to save them. The Sharpeville six have asked for justice and not for mercy.

Our profound gratitude goes to the people of the front-line States, which continue to be subjected to wanton aggression by the South African regime.

We are also grateful to the Nordic countries for taking action against South Africa and aiding the victims of this system.

Our unqualified support and solidarity are extended to the workers and people of Palestine who are engaged in a legitimate struggle for self-determination.

Finally, I am confident that the report of the Committee on Apartheid, the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia, and the Programme of Action against Apartheid will be unanimously adopted by this Conference.

Interpretation from Japanese: Mr. TANAKA (Workers' delegate, Japan) – I should like, at the outset, to congratulate the Committee for the splendid updated Declaration, and also wish to pay my profound respects to Mr. Mercier, the spokesman, and the Worker members of the Committee.

I have been most moved by the speech made by Mr. Nujoma, the President of SWAPO.

My conscience has been deeply stirred to work against apartheid.

I rise to speak as a member of the Japanese trade unions, to state that we are opposed to apartheid and that the Japanese trade unions are doing everything possible to eradicate this evil regime.

I strongly appeal for the proposed Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia to be adopted at this Conference, with the consensus of all its members, as was the case at the last Tripartite Conference at Harare.

The proposed Declaration urges the Committee to continue to monitor with increased vigour action against apartheid, and I believe that this is the most important and essential measure that the ILO can take at this time.

The main theme of this Conference is Human rights – A common responsibility. I believe that apartheid constitutes the most blatant denial of human rights and example of discrimination. It is indeed, as has been said, modern slavery.

I am enraged at the way that our Black worker colleagues of South Africa, because of apartheid, are discriminated against by the Whites and obliged to lead a hard and painful life. I feel deeply angered and indignant at the way so many Black workers of South Africa, fighting to eradicate this evil law, are murdered, or arrested without legal trial and imprisoned for long periods.

Economic sanctions against South Africa have been proposed as one of the measures to eliminate apartheid. I believe that the consistent and thorough implementation of economic sanctions by all countries is one of the most important tasks before us. Unfortunately, I have to admit that my country continues to trade with South Africa, that every year the volume of trade is increasing, and the number of enterprises engaged in business there is also increasing. I am greatly concerned about this.
