CONVENTION CONCERNING EMPLOYMENT PROMOTION AND PROTECTION AGAINST UNEMPLOYMENT

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,
Having been convened at Geneva by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and having met in its Seventy-fifth Session on 1 June 1988, and

Emphasising the importance of work and productive employment in any society not only because of the resources which they create for the community, but also because of the income which they bring to workers, the social role which they confer and the feeling of self-esteem which workers derive from them, and

Recalling the existing international standards in the field of employment and unemployment protection (the Unemployment Provision Convention and Recommendation, 1934, the Unemployment (Young Persons) Recommendation, 1935, the Income Security Recommendation, 1944, the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952, the Employment Policy Convention and Recommendation, 1964, the Human Resources Development Convention and Recommendation, 1975, the Labour Administration Convention and Recommendation, 1978, and the Employment Policy (Supplementary Provisions) Recommendation, 1984), and

Considering the widespread unemployment and underemployment affecting various countries throughout the world at all stages of development and in particular the problems of young people, many of whom are seeking their first employment, and

Considering that, since the adoption of the international instruments concerning protection against unemployment referred to above, there have been important new developments in the law and practice of many Members necessitating the revision of existing standards, in particular the Unemployment Provision Convention, 1934, and the adoption of new international standards concerning the promotion of full, productive and freely chosen employment by all appropriate means, including social security, and

Noting that the provisions concerning unemployment benefit in the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952, lay down a level of protection that has now been surpassed by most of the existing compensation schemes in the industrialised countries and, unlike standards concerning other benefits, have not been followed by higher standards, but that the standards in question can still constitute a target for developing countries that are in a position to set up an unemployment compensation scheme, and Recognising that policies leading to stable, sustained, non-inflationary economic growth and a flexible response to change, as well as to creation and promotion of all forms of productive and freely chosen employment including small undertakings, co-operatives, self-employment and local initiatives for employment, even through the re-distribution of resources currently devoted to the financing of purely assistance-oriented activities towards activities which promote employment especially vocational guidance, training and rehabilitation, offer the best protection against the adverse effects of involuntary unemployment, but that involuntary unemployment nevertheless exists and that it is therefore important to ensure that social security systems should provide employment assistance and economic support to those who are involuntarily unemployed, and ment promotion and social security which is the fifth item on the agenda of the session with a view, in particular, to revising the Unemployment Provision Convention, 1934, and

CONVENTION CONCERNANT LA PROMOTION DE L'EMPLOI ET LA PROTECTION CONTRE LE CHÔMAGE

La Conférence générale de l'Organisation internationale du Travail, convoquée à Genève par le Conseil d'administration du Bureau international du Travail, et s'y étant réunie le 1^{er} juin 1988, en sa soixante-quinzième session;

Soulignant l'importance du travail et de l'emploi productif dans toute société, en raison non seulement des ressources qu'ils créent pour la communauté mais des revenus qu'ils apportent aux travailleurs, du rôle social qu'ils leur confèrent et du sentiment de satisfaction personnelle qu'ils leur procurent;

Rappelant les normes internationales existantes dans le domaine de l'emploi et de la protection contre le chômage (convention et recommandation du chômage, 1934; recommandation sur le chômage (jeunes gens), 1935; recommandation sur la garantie des moyens d'existence, 1944; convention concernant la sécurité sociale (norme minimum), 1952; convention et recommandation sur la politique de l'emploi, 1964; convention et recommandation sur la mise en valeur des ressources humaines, 1975; convention et recommandation sur l'administration du travail, 1978; et recommandation concernant la politique de l'emploi (dispositions complémentaires), 1984;)

Considérant l'étendue du chômage et du sous-emploi qui affectent divers pays du monde à tous les stades de développement, et notamment les problèmes des jeunes gens, dont un grand nombre est à la recherche d'un premier emploi;

Considérant que, depuis l'adoption des instruments internationaux concernant la protection contre le chômage mentionnés ci-dessus, il s'est produit dans la législation et la pratique de nombreux Membres d'importants développements qui rendent nécessaires la révision des normes existantes, notamment la convention du chômage, 1934, et l'adoption de nouvelles normes internationales relatives à la promotion du plein emploi, productif et librement choisi, par tous moyens appropriés, y compris la sécurité sociale;

Notant que les dispositions relatives aux prestations de chômage de la convention concernant la sécurité sociale (norme minimum), 1952, fixent un niveau de protection dépassé aujourd'hui par la plupart des régimes d'indemnisation existant dans les pays industrialisés et n'ont pas encore été complétées par des normes plus élevées, à la différence de celles relatives à d'autres prestations, mais que les principes sur lesquels repose cette convention demeurent valables et que ses normes peuvent encore constituer un objectif à atteindre par certains pays en développement en mesure d'instituer un régime d'indemnisation du chômage;

Reconnaissant que les politiques suscitant une croissance économique soutenue et non inflationniste, une réaction souple aux changements ainsi que la création et la promotion de toutes formes d'emploi productif et librement choisi, y compris les petites entreprises, les coopératives, le travail indépendant et les initiatives locales en faveur de l'emploi, même par la redistribution des ressources actuellement consacrées au financement d'activités d'assistance pure, au profit d'activités aptes à promouvoir l'emploi, notamment l'orientation, la formation et la rééducation professionnelles, offrent la meilleure protection contre les effets néfastes du chômage involontaire, que néanmoins le chômage involontaire existe et qu'il importe en conséquence de faire en sorte que les systèmes de sécurité sociale apportent une aide à l'emploi et un soutien économique aux personnes qui sont au chômage pour des raisons involontaires;

Après avoir décidé d'adopter diverses propositions relatives à la promotion de l'emploi et à la sécurité sociale, question qui constitue le cinquième point à l'ordre du jour de la session, en vue notamment de la révision de la convention du chômage, 1934;

Having determined that these proposals shall take the form of an international Convention, adopts this twenty-first day of June of the year one thousand nine hundred and eighty-eight the following Convention, which may be cited as the Employment Promotion and Protection against Unemployment Convention, 1988:

I. GENERAL PROVISIONS

Article 1

In this Convention:

- (a) the term "legislation" includes any social security rules as well as laws and regulations;
- (b) the term "prescribed" means determined by or in virtue of national legislation.

Article 2

Each Member shall take appropriate steps to co-ordinate its system of protection against unemployment and its employment policy. To this end, it shall seek to ensure that its system of protection against unemployment, and in particular the methods of providing unemployment benefit, contribute to the promotion of full, productive and freely chosen employment, and are not such as to discourage employers from offering and workers from seeking productive employment.

Article 3

The provisions of this Convention shall be implemented in consultation and co-operation with the organisations of employers and workers, in accordance with national practice.

Article 4

- 1. Each Member which ratifies this Convention may, by a declaration accompanying its ratification, exclude the provisions of Part VII from the obligations accepted by ratification.
- 2. Each Member which has made a declaration under paragraph 1 above may withdraw it at any time by a subsequent declaration.

- 1. Each Member may avail itself, by a declaration accompanying its ratification, of at most two of the temporary exceptions provided for in Article 10, paragraph 4, Article 11, paragraph 3, Article 15, paragraph 2, Article 18, paragraph 2, Article 19, paragraph 4, Article 23, paragraph 2, Article 24, paragraph 2, and Article 25, paragraph 2. Such a declaration shall state the reasons which justify these exceptions.
- 2. Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph 1 above, a Member, where it is justified by the extent of protection of its social security system, may avail itself, by a declaration accompanying its ratification, of the temporary exceptions provided for in Article 10, paragraph 4, Article 11, paragraph 3, Article 15, paragraph 2, Article 18, paragraph 2, Article 19, paragraph 4, Article 23, paragraph 2, Article 24, paragraph 2 and Article 25, paragraph 2. Such a declaration shall state the reasons which justify these exceptions.
- 3. Each Member which has made a declaration under paragraph 1 or paragraph 2 shall include in its reports on the application of this Convention submitted under Article 22 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation a statement in respect of each exception of which it avails itself—

Considérant que ces propositions devraient prendre la forme d'une convention internationale, adopte, ce vingt et unième jour de juin mil neuf cent quatre-vingt-huit, la convention ci-après, qui sera dénommée Convention sur la promotion de l'emploi et la protection contre le chômage, 1988.

I. DISPOSITIONS GÉNÉRALES

Article 1

Aux fins de la présente convention :

- a) le terme « législation » comprend les lois et règlements, aussi bien que les dispositions statutaires en matière de sécurité sociale ;
- b) le terme « prescrit » signifie déterminé par ou en vertu de la législation nationale.

Tout Membre doit prendre des mesures appropriées pour coordonner son régime de protection contre le chômage et sa politique de l'emploi. A cette fin, il doit veiller à ce que son régime de protection contre le chômage et en particulier les modalités de l'indemnisation du chômage contribuent à la promotion du plein emploi, productif et librement choisi, et n'aient pas pour effet de décourager les employeurs d'offrir, et les travailleurs de rechercher, un emploi productif.

Les dispositions de la présente convention doivent être mises en application en consultation et en collaboration avec les organisations d'employeurs et de travailleurs, conformément à la pratique nationale.

1. Tout Membre qui ratifie la présente convention peut, par une déclaration accompagnant sa ratification, exclure de l'engagement résultant de cette ratification les dispositions de la partie VII.

2. Tout Membre ayant fait une telle déclaration peut l'annuler en tout temps par une déclaration ultérieure.

1. Tout Membre peut, par une déclaration accompagnant sa ratification, se réserver le bénéfice de deux au plus des dérogations temporaires prévues au paragraphe 4 de l'article 10, au paragraphe 3 de l'article 11, au paragraphe 2 de l'article 15, au paragraphe 2 de l'article 18, au paragraphe 4 de l'article 19, au paragraphe 2 de l'article 23, au paragraphe 2 de l'article 24 et au paragraphe 2 de l'article 25. Cette déclaration doit énoncer les raisons qui justifient ces dérogations.

2. Nonobstant les dispositions du paragraphe 1, un Membre dont la portée limitée du système de sécurité sociale le justifie peut, par une déclaration accompagnant sa ratification, se réserver le bénéfice des dérogations temporaires prévues au paragraphe 4 de l'article 10, au paragraphe 3 de l'article 11, au paragraphe 2 de l'article 15, au paragraphe 2 de l'article 18, au paragraphe 4 de l'article 19, au paragraphe 2 de l'article 23, au paragraphe 2 de l'article 24 et au paragraphe 2 de l'article 25. Cette déclaration doit énoncer les raisons qui justifient ces dérogations.

3. Tout Membre qui a fait une déclaration en application du paragraphe 1 ou du paragraphe 2 doit, dans les rapports sur l'application de la présente convention qu'il est tenu de présenter en vertu de l'article 22 de la Constitution de l'Organisation internationale du Travail, faire connaître, à propos de chacune des dérogations dont il s'est réservé le bénéfice :

- (a) that its reason for doing so subsists; or
- (b) that it renounces its right to avail itself of the exception in question as from a stated date.

4. Each Member which has made a declaration under paragraph 1 or paragraph 2 shall, as appropriate to the terms of such declaration and as circumstances permit –

- (a) cover the contingency of partial unemployment;
- (b) increase the number of persons protected;
- (c) increase the amount of the benefits;
- (d) reduce the length of the waiting period;
- (e) extend the duration of payment of benefits;
- (f) adapt statutory social security schemes to the occupational circumstances of part-time workers;
- (g) endeavour to ensure the provision of medical care to persons in receipt of unemployment benefit and their dependants;
- (h) endeavour to guarantee that the periods during which such benefit is paid will be taken into account for the acquisition of the right to social security benefits and, where appropriate, the calculation of disability, old-age and survivors' benefit.

1. Each Member shall ensure equality of treatment for all persons protected, without discrimination on the basis of race, colour, sex, religion, political opinion, national extraction, nationality, ethnic or social origin, disability or age.

2. The provisions of paragraph 1 shall not prevent the adoption of special measures which are justified by the circumstances of identified groups under the schemes referred to in Article 12, paragraph 2, or are designed to meet the specific needs of categories of persons who have particular problems in the labour market, in particular disadvantaged groups, or the conclusion between States of bilateral or multilateral agreements relating to unemployment benefits on the basis of reciprocity.

II. PROMOTION OF PRODUCTIVE EMPLOYMENT

Article 7

Each Member shall declare as a priority objective a policy designed to promote full, productive and freely chosen employment by all appropriate means, including social security. Such means should include, inter alia, employment services, vocational training and vocational guidance.

Article 8

1. Each Member shall endeavour to establish, subject to national law and practice, special programmes to promote additional job opportunities and employment assistance and to encourage freely chosen and productive employment for identified categories of disadvantaged persons having or liable to have difficulties in finding lasting employment such as women, young workers, disabled persons, older workers, the long-term unemployed, migrant workers lawfully resident in the country and workers affected by structural change.

2. Each Member shall specify, in its reports under article 22 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation, the categories of persons for whom it undertakes to promote employment programmes.

- a) soit que les raisons qu'il a eues pour ce faire existent toujours ;
- b) soit qu'il renonce, à partir d'une date déterminée, à se prévaloir de la dérogation en question.

4. Tout Membre qui a fait une déclaration en application du paragraphe 1 ou du paragraphe 2 devra, selon l'objet de sa déclaration et lorsque les circonstances le permettront :

- a) couvrir l'éventualité de chômage partiel ;
- b) augmenter le nombre des personnes protégées ;
- c) majorer le montant des indemnités ;
- d) réduire la durée du délai d'attente ;
- e) étendre la durée de versement des indemnités ;
- f) adapter les régimes légaux de sécurité sociale aux conditions de l'activité professionnelle des travailleurs à temps partiel ;
- g) s'efforcer de garantir les soins médicaux aux bénéficiaires des indemnités de chômage et aux personnes à leur charge ;
- h) s'efforcer de garantir la prise en considération des périodes au cours desquelles ces indemnités sont versées pour l'acquisition du droit aux prestations de sécurité sociale et, le cas échéant, pour le calcul des prestations d'invalidité, de vieillesse et de survivants.

1. Tout Membre doit garantir l'égalité de traitement à toutes les personnes protégées, sans discrimination fondée sur la race, la couleur, le sexe, la religion, l'opinion politique, l'ascendance nationale, la nationalité, l'origine ethnique ou sociale, l'invalidité ou l'âge.

2. Les dispositions du paragraphe 1 ne s'opposent pas à l'adoption de mesures spéciales qui sont justifiées par la situation de groupes déterminés, dans le cadre des régimes visés au paragraphe 2 de l'article 12, ou destinées à répondre aux besoins spécifiques de catégories de personnes qui rencontrent des problèmes particuliers sur le marché du travail, notamment des groupes désavantagés, ni à la conclusion d'accords bilatéraux ou multilatéraux entre États relatifs aux prestations de chômage sur une base de réciprocité.

II. PROMOTION DE L'EMPLOI PRODUCTIF

Article 7

Tout Membre doit formuler, comme objectif prioritaire, une politique visant à promouvoir le plein emploi, productif et librement choisi, par tous moyens appropriés, y compris la sécurité sociale. Ces moyens devraient comprendre notamment les services de l'emploi, la formation et l'orientation professionnelles.

1. Tout Membre doit s'efforcer d'établir, sous réserve de la législation et de la pratique nationales, des mesures spéciales pour promouvoir des possibilités additionnelles d'emploi et l'aide à l'emploi et faciliter l'emploi productif et librement choisi de catégories déterminées de personnes désavantagées qui ont ou qui sont susceptibles d'avoir des difficultés à trouver un emploi durable, telles que les femmes, les jeunes travailleurs, les personnes handicapées, les travailleurs âgés, les chômeurs de longue durée, les travailleurs migrants en situation régulière et les travailleurs affectés par des changements structureaux.

2. Tout Membre doit spécifier, dans ses rapports au titre de l'article 22 de la Constitution de l'Organisation internationale du Travail, les catégories de personnes en faveur desquelles il s'engage à promouvoir des mesures d'emploi.

3. Each Member shall endeavour to extend the promotion of productive employment progressively to a greater number of categories than the number initially covered.

Article 9

The measures envisaged in this Part shall be taken in the light of the Human Resources Development Convention and Recommendation, 1975, and the Employment Policy (Supplementary Provisions) Recommendation, 1984.

III. CONTINGENCIES COVERED

1. The contingencies covered shall include, under prescribed conditions, full unemployment defined as the loss of earnings due to inability to obtain suitable employment with due regard to the provisions of Article 21, paragraph 2, in the case of a person capable of working, available for work and actually seeking work.

2. Each Member shall endeavour to extend the protection of the Convention, under prescribed conditions, to the following contingencies –

- (a) loss of earnings due to partial unemployment, defined as a temporary reduction in the normal or statutory hours of work; and
- (b) suspension or reduction of earnings due to a temporary suspension of work, without any break in the employment relationship for reasons of, in particular, an economic, technological, structural or similar nature.

3. Each Member shall in addition endeavour to provide the payment of benefits to part-time workers who are actually seeking full-time work. The total of benefits and earnings from their part-time work may be such as to maintain incentives to take up full-time work.

4. Where a declaration made in virtue of Article 5 is in force, the implementation of paragraphs 2 and 3 above may be deferred.

IV. PERSONS PROTECTED

1. The persons protected shall comprise prescribed classes of employees, constituting not less than 85 per cent of all employees, including public employees and apprentices.

2. Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph 1 above, public employees whose employment up to normal retiring age is guaranteed by national laws or regulations may be excluded from protection.

3. Where a declaration made in virtue of Article 5 is in force, the persons protected shall comprise –

- (a) prescribed classes of employees constituting not less than 50 per cent of all employees; or
- (b) where specifically justified by the level of development, prescribed classes of employees constituting not less than 50 per cent of all employees in industrial workplaces employing 20 persons or more.

3. Tout Membre doit s'efforcer d'étendre progressivement la promotion de l'emploi productif à un nombre de catégories plus élevé que celui qui est couvert à l'origine.

Article 9

Les mesures visées par la présente partie doivent s'inspirer de la convention et de la recommandation sur la mise en valeur des ressources humaines, 1975, et de la recommandation sur la politique de l'emploi (dispositions complémentaires), 1984.

III. EVENTUALITÉS COUVERTES

1. Les éventualités couvertes doivent comprendre, dans des conditions prescrites, le chômage complet défini comme la perte de gain due à l'impossibilité d'obtenir un emploi convenable, compte dûment tenu des dispositions du paragraphe 2 de l'article 21, pour une personne capable de travailler, disponible pour le travail et effectivement en quête d'emploi.

2. Tout Membre doit s'efforcer d'étendre la protection de la convention, dans des conditions prescrites, aux éventualités suivantes :

- a) la perte de gain due au chômage partiel défini comme une réduction temporaire de la durée normale ou légale du travail ;
- b) la suspension ou la réduction du gain due à une suspension temporaire de travail, sans cessation de la relation de travail, notamment pour des motifs économiques, technologiques, structurels ou similaires.

3. Tout Membre doit en outre s'efforcer de prévoir le versement d'indemnités aux travailleurs à temps partiel qui sont effectivement en quête d'un emploi à plein temps. Le total des indemnités et des gains provenant de leur emploi à temps partiel peut être tel qu'il les incite à prendre un emploi à plein temps.

4. Lorsqu'une déclaration faite en vertu de l'article 5 est en vigueur, la mise en œuvre des paragraphes 2 et 3 peut être différée.

IV. PERSONNES PROTÉGÉES

1. Les personnes protégées doivent comprendre des catégories prescrites de salariés formant au total 85 pour cent au moins de l'ensemble des salariés, y compris les agents de la fonction publique et les apprentis.

2. Nonobstant les dispositions du paragraphe 1, les agents de la fonction publique dont l'emploi est garanti par la législation nationale jusqu'à l'âge normal de la retraite peuvent être exclus de la protection.

3. Lorsqu'une déclaration faite en vertu de l'article 5 est en vigueur, les personnes protégées doivent comprendre :

- a) soit des catégories prescrites de salariés formant au total 50 pour cent au moins de l'ensemble des salariés ;
- b) soit, si le niveau de développement le justifie spécialement, des catégories prescrites de salariés formant au total 50 pour cent au moins de l'ensemble des salariés travaillant dans des entreprises industrielles qui emploient vingt personnes au moins.

V. METHODS OF PROTECTION

1. Unless it is otherwise provided in this Convention, each Member may determine the method or methods of protection by which it chooses to put into effect the provisions of the Convention, whether by a contributory or non-contributory system, or by a combination of such systems.

2. Nevertheless, if the legislation of a Member protects all residents whose resources, during the contingency, do not exceed prescribed limits, the protection afforded may be limited, in the light of the resources of the beneficiary and his or her family, in accordance with the provisions of Article 16.

VI. BENEFIT TO BE PROVIDED

Article 13

Benefits provided in the form of periodical payments to the unemployed may be related to the methods of protection.

In cases of full unemployment, benefits shall be provided in the form of periodical payments calculated in such a way as to provide the beneficiary with partial and transitional wage replacement and, at the same time, to avoid creating disincentives either to work or to employment creation.

1. In cases of full unemployment and suspension of earnings due to a temporary suspension of work without any break in the employment relationship, when this contingency is covered, benefits shall be provided in the form of periodical payments, calculated as follows:

- (a) where these benefits are based on the contributions of or on behalf of the person protected or on previous earnings, they shall be fixed at not less than 50 per cent of previous earnings, it being permitted to fix a maximum for the amount of the benefit or for the earnings to be taken into account, which may be related, for example, to the wage of a skilled manual employee or to the average wage of workers in the region concerned;
- (b) where such benefits are not based on contributions or previous earnings, they shall be fixed at not less than 50 per cent of the statutory minimum wage or of the wage of an ordinary labourer, or at a level which provides the minimum essential for basic living expenses, whichever is the highest;

2. Where a declaration made in virtue of Article 5 is in force, the amount of the benefits shall be equal—

- (a) to not less than 45 per cent of the previous earnings; or
- (b) to not less than 45 per cent of the statutory minimum wage or of the wage of an ordinary labourer but no less than a level which provides the minimum essential for basic living expenses.

3. If appropriate, the percentages specified in paragraphs 1 and 2 may be reached by comparing net periodical payments after tax and contributions with net earnings after tax and contributions.

Article 16

Notwithstanding the provisions of Article 15, the benefit provided beyond the initial period specified in Article 19, paragraph 2(a), as well as benefits paid by a

V. MÉTHODES DE PROTECTION

1. Tout Membre peut déterminer la méthode ou les méthodes de protection par lesquelles il choisit de donner effet aux dispositions de la convention, qu'il s'agisse de régimes contributifs ou non contributifs, ou encore de la combinaison de tels régimes, à moins qu'il n'en soit disposé autrement par la présente convention.

2. Toutefois, si la législation d'un Membre protège tous les résidents dont les ressources pendant l'éventualité n'excèdent pas des limites prescrites, la protection accordée peut être limitée en fonction des ressources du bénéficiaire et de sa famille conformément aux dispositions de l'article 16.

VI. INDEMNITÉS À ATTRIBUER

Article 13

Les prestations versées aux chômeurs sous forme de paiements périodiques peuvent être liées aux méthodes de protection.

Dans le cas de chômage complet, des indemnités doivent être versées sous forme de paiements périodiques calculés de manière à fournir au bénéficiaire une indemnisation partielle et transitoire de la perte de gain et à éviter en même temps des effets dissuasifs pour le travail et la création d'emplois.

1. Dans les cas de chômage complet et de suspension du gain due à une suspension temporaire de travail sans cessation de la relation de travail, si cette dernière éventualité est couverte, des indemnités doivent être versées sous forme de paiements périodiques calculés de la manière suivante :

- a) lorsque ces indemnités sont déterminées en rapport avec les cotisations versées par la personne protégée ou en son nom ou avec son gain antérieur, elles doivent être fixées à 50 pour cent au moins du gain antérieur dans la limite éventuelle de maximums d'indemnité ou de gain liés par exemple au salaire d'un ouvrier qualifié ou au salaire moyen des travailleurs dans la région considérée;
- b) lorsque ces indemnités sont déterminées sans rapport avec les cotisations ni avec le gain antérieur, elles doivent être fixées à 50 pour cent au moins du salaire minimal légal ou du salaire du manœuvre ordinaire, ou au montant minimal indispensable pour les dépenses essentielles, le montant le plus élevé devant être retenu.

2. Lorsqu'une déclaration faite en vertu de l'article 5 est en vigueur, le montant des indemnités doit être au moins égal :

- a) soit à 45 pour cent du gain antérieur;
- b) soit à 45 pour cent du salaire minimal légal ou du salaire du manœuvre ordinaire, sans que ce pourcentage puisse être inférieur au montant minimal indispensable pour les dépenses essentielles.

3. Si cela est approprié, les pourcentages spécifiés aux paragraphes 1 et 2 peuvent être atteints en comparant les paiements périodiques nets d'impôt et de cotisation avec le gain net d'impôt et de cotisation.

Nonobstant les dispositions de l'article 15, les indemnités versées après la durée initiale spécifiée à l'alinéa a) du paragraphe 2 de l'article 19, ainsi que les

Member in accordance with Article 12, paragraph 2, may be fixed after taking account of other resources, beyond a prescribed limit, available to the beneficiary and his or her family, in accordance with a prescribed scale. In any case, these benefits, in combination with any other benefits to which they may be entitled, shall guarantee them healthy and reasonable living conditions in accordance with national standards.

1. Where the legislation of a Member makes the right to unemployment benefit conditional upon the completion of a qualifying period, this period shall not exceed the length deemed necessary to prevent abuse.

2. Each Member shall endeavour to adapt the qualifying period to the occupational circumstances of seasonal workers.

Article 18

1. If the legislation of a Member provides that the payment of benefit in cases of full employment should begin only after the expiry of a waiting period, such period shall not exceed seven days.

2. Where a declaration made in virtue of Article 5 is in force, the length of the waiting period shall not exceed ten days.

3. In the case of seasonal workers the waiting period specified in paragraph 1 above may be adapted to their occupational circumstances.

Article 19

1. The benefits provided in cases of full unemployment and suspension of earnings due to a temporary suspension of work without any break in the employment relationship shall be paid throughout these contingencies.

2. Nevertheless, in the case of full unemployment—

(a) the initial duration of payment of the benefit provided for in Article 15 may be limited to 26 weeks in each spell of unemployment, or to 39 weeks over any period of 24 months;

(b) in the event of unemployment continuing beyond this initial period of benefit, the duration of payment of benefit, which may be calculated in the light of the resources of the beneficiary and his or her family in accordance with the provisions of Article 16, may be limited to a prescribed period.

3. If the legislation of a Member provides that the initial duration of payment of the benefit provided for in Article 15 shall vary with the length of the qualifying period, the average duration fixed for the payment of benefits shall be at least 26 weeks.

4. Where a declaration made in virtue of Article 5 is in force, the duration of payment of benefit may be limited to 13 weeks over any periods of 12 months or to an average of 13 weeks if the legislation provides that the initial duration of payment shall vary with the length of the qualifying period.

5. In the cases envisaged in paragraph 2(b) above each Member shall endeavour to grant appropriate additional assistance to the persons concerned with a view to permitting them to find productive and freely chosen employment, having recourse in particular to the measures specified in Part II.

6. The duration of payment of benefit to seasonal workers may be adapted to their occupational circumstances, without prejudice to the provisions of paragraph 2(b) above.

The benefit to which a protected person would have been entitled in the cases of full or partial unemployment or suspension of earnings due to a temporary indemnités versées par un Membre visé au paragraphe 2 de l'article 12, peuvent être fixées, compte tenu d'autres ressources dont disposent le bénéficiaire et sa famille au-delà d'une limite prescrite, selon un barème prescrit. En tout cas, ces indemnités, combinées avec toutes autres prestations auxquelles ils peuvent avoir droit, doivent leur garantir des conditions d'existence saines et convenables, selon les normes nationales.

1. Si la législation d'un Membre subordonne le droit aux indemnités de chômage à l'accomplissement d'un stage, ce stage ne doit pas excéder la durée considérée comme nécessaire pour éviter les abus.

2. Tout Membre doit s'efforcer d'adapter le stage aux conditions de l'activité professionnelle des travailleurs saisonniers.

Article 18

1. Si la législation d'un Membre prévoit que les indemnités ne commencent à être versées en cas de chômage complet qu'à l'expiration d'un délai d'attente, la durée de ce délai ne doit pas dépasser sept jours.

2. Lorsqu'une déclaration faite en vertu de l'article 5 est en vigueur, la durée du délai d'attente ne doit pas dépasser dix jours.

3. Lorsqu'il s'agit de travailleurs saisonniers, le délai d'attente prévu au paragraphe 1 peut être adapté aux conditions de leur activité professionnelle.

1. Les indemnités attribuées en cas de chômage complet et de suspension du gain due à une suspension temporaire du travail sans cessation de la relation de travail doivent être versées pendant toute la durée de ces éventualités.

2. Toutefois, en cas de chômage complet :

- a) la durée initiale de versement des indemnités visées à l'article 15 peut être limitée à vingt-six semaines par cas de chômage, ou à trente-neuf semaines au cours de toute période de vingt-quatre mois ;
- b) en cas de prolongation du chômage à l'expiration de cette période initiale d'indemnisation, la durée de versement des indemnités calculées éventuellement en fonction des ressources du bénéficiaire et de sa famille, conformément aux dispositions de l'article 16, peut être limitée à une période prescrite.

3. Si la législation d'un Membre prévoit que la durée initiale de versement des indemnités visées à l'article 15 est échelonnée selon la durée du stage, la moyenne des durées prévues pour le versement des indemnités doit atteindre au moins vingt-six semaines.

4. Lorsqu'une déclaration faite en vertu de l'article 5 est en vigueur, la durée de versement des indemnités peut être limitée à treize semaines au cours d'une période de douze mois ou à une moyenne de treize semaines si la législation prévoit que la durée initiale du versement est échelonnée selon la durée du stage.

5. Dans le cas visé à l'alinéa b) du paragraphe 2, tout Membre doit s'efforcer d'accorder aux intéressés une aide complémentaire appropriée en vue de leur permettre de retrouver un emploi productif et librement choisi, notamment en recourant aux mesures spécifiées à la partie II.

6. La durée de versement des indemnités versées aux travailleurs saisonniers peut être adaptée aux conditions de leur activité professionnelle, sans préjudice des dispositions de l'alinéa b) du paragraphe 2.

Les indemnités auxquelles une personne protégée aurait eu droit dans les éventualités de chômage complet ou partiel, ou de suspension du gain due à une suspension of work without any break in the employment relationship may be refused, withdrawn, suspended or reduced to the extent prescribed—

- (a) for as long as the person concerned is absent from the territory of the Member;
- (b) when it has been determined by the competent authority that the person concerned had deliberately contributed to his or her own dismissal;
- (c) when it has been determined by the competent authority that the person concerned has left employment voluntarily without just cause;
- (d) during the period of a labour dispute, when the person concerned has stopped work to take part in a labour dispute or when he or she is prevented from working as a direct result of a stoppage of work due to this labour dispute;
- (e) when the person concerned has attempted to obtain or has obtained benefits fraudulently;
- (f) when the person concerned has failed without just cause to use the facilities available for placement, vocational guidance, training, retraining or redeployment in suitable work;
- (g) as long as the person concerned is in receipt of another income maintenance benefit provided for in the legislation of the Member concerned, except a family benefit, provided that the part of the benefit which is suspended does not exceed that other benefit.

II. PROMOTION DE L'EMPLOI PRODUCTIF

2. La promotion du plein emploi productif et librement choisi par tous moyens appropriés, y compris par la sécurité sociale, devrait constituer un objectif prioritaire de la politique nationale. Ces moyens devraient comprendre notamment les services de l'emploi, ainsi que la formation et l'orientation professionnelles.

3. En période de crise économique, les politiques d'ajustement devraient comprendre, dans des conditions prescrites, des mesures visant à favoriser les initiatives qui entraînent la plus large utilisation de la main-d'œuvre.

4. Les Membres devraient, au titre d'aides à la mobilité professionnelle, s'efforcer d'accorder, dans des conditions prescrites et de la manière la plus appropriée, notamment:

- a) des allocations contribuant à la couverture des frais de déplacement et d'équipement nécessaires pour bénéficier des services prévus au paragraphe 2 ci-dessus;
- b) des allocations servies sous forme de paiements périodiques calculés conformément aux dispositions de l'article 15 de la convention pendant une période de formation ou de conversation professionnelles prescrite.

Where such agreements do not exist, Members should provide, through national legislation, financial assistance to the workers concerned.

10. Members should, in accordance, if appropriate, with provisions in multilateral agreements, invest any reserves accumulated by statutory pension schemes and provident funds in such a way as to promote and not to discourage employment within the country, and encourage such investment from private sources, including private pension schemes, while at the same time affording the necessary guarantees of security and yield of the investment.

III. PROTECTION OF UNEMPLOYED PERSONS

12. In case of partial unemployment and in the case referred to in Article 10, paragraph 3, of the Convention, benefit should be provided, under prescribed conditions, in the form of periodical payments fairly compensating for the loss of earnings due to unemployment. These benefits might be calculated in the light of the reduction of hours of work suffered by the unemployed persons or so that the total of the benefit and the earnings from the part-time work reaches a sum between the amount of the previous earnings from full-time work and the amount of the full unemployment benefit, so as not to discourage part-time or temporary work, when these forms of work may assist in a return to full-time work.

13. (1) The percentages specified in Article 15 of the Convention for the calculation of benefits should be reached on the basis of the gross earnings of the beneficiary before tax and social security contributions.

(2) If appropriate, these percentages may be reached by comparing net periodical payments after tax and contributions with net earnings after tax and contributions.

14. (1) The concept of suitable employment should, under prescribed conditions, not apply to—

- (a) employment involving a change of occupation which does not take account of the abilities, qualifications, skills, work experience or the retraining potential of the person concerned;

- c) des allocations de séparation ;
- d) des indemnités de réinstallation.

6. Les Membres devraient assurer la coordination des régimes légaux et encourager la coordination des régimes privés de pensions, de manière à éliminer les entraves à la mobilité professionnelle.

7. Les Membres devraient offrir aux personnes protégées, dans des conditions prescrites, des facilités pour leur permettre d'accéder à des emplois temporaires rétribués, sans mettre en danger les emplois d'autres travailleurs, afin d'améliorer leurs propres chances de parvenir à un emploi productif et librement choisi.

8. Les Membres devraient, dans toute la mesure possible et dans des conditions prescrites, offrir aux chômeurs qui souhaitent créer leur propre entreprise ou s'engager dans une autre activité économique un soutien financier et des services consultatifs.

9. Les Membres devraient envisager de conclure des accords bilatéraux et multilatéraux qui prévoient une assistance en faveur des travailleurs étrangers protégés par leur législation qui souhaitent retourner librement sur le territoire du Membre dont ils sont ressortissants ou sur lequel ils résidaient antérieurement. A défaut de tels accords, les Membres devraient accorder, en vertu de sa législation, une assistance financière aux travailleurs concernés.

10. Les Membres devraient, en accord, le cas échéant, avec les dispositions d'accords multilatéraux, investir les réserves éventuelles accumulées par les régimes légaux de pensions ou les fonds de prévoyance, et encourager l'investissement provenant de sources privées, y compris des régimes privés de pensions, de manière à promouvoir l'emploi dans le pays et non à le décourager, sous réserve des garanties nécessaires de sécurité et de rendement des placements effectués.

11. La mise en place progressive, dans les zones urbaines et rurales, de services communautaires, y compris les services de santé, financés par les cotisations de sécurité sociale, ou, par d'autres sources, devrait servir à multiplier les emplois et à fournir une formation au personnel, tout en contribuant de manière concrète à la réalisation des objectifs nationaux en matière de promotion de l'emploi.

III. PROTECTION DES CHÔMEURS

12. En cas de chômage partiel et dans le cas visé au paragraphe 3 de l'article 10 de la convention, les indemnités devraient être versées dans des conditions prescrites sous forme de paiements périodiques compensant équitablement la perte de gain due au chômage. Ces indemnités pourraient être calculées en fonction de la réduction de la durée du travail subie par le chômeur, ou fixées à un montant tel que le total de l'indemnité et du gain tiré du travail à temps partiel soit compris entre le montant des gains antérieurs pour un travail à plein temps et le montant de l'indemnité de chômage complet, de manière à ne pas décourager le travail à temps partiel et le travail temporaire lorsque ces formes de travail peuvent favoriser le retour au travail à plein temps.

13. (1) Les pourcentages spécifiés à l'article 15 de la convention pour le calcul des indemnités devraient être atteints en prenant en considération le gain brut du bénéficiaire, avant impôt et cotisation de sécurité sociale.

(2) Si cela est approprié, ces pourcentages pourraient être atteints en comparant les paiements périodiques nets d'impôt et de cotisation avec le gain net d'impôt et de cotisation.

14. (1) Dans des conditions prescrites, la notion d'emploi convenable ne devrait pas s'appliquer à :

- a) un emploi comportant un changement de profession qui ne tiendrait pas compte des capacités, des qualifications, des aptitudes, de l'expérience professionnelle ou des possibilités de réadaptation de l'intéressé ;

- (b) employment involving a change of residence to a place in which suitable accommodation is not available;
- (c) employment in which the conditions and remuneration are appreciably less favourable than those which are generally granted, at the relevant time, in the occupation and district in which the employment is offered;
- (d) employment vacant as a direct result of a stoppage due to an ongoing labour dispute;
- (e) employment such that, for a reason other than those covered in clauses (a) to (d), and with due regard to all attendant circumstances, including the family responsibilities of the person concerned, the refusal of the employment is not unreasonable.

(2) In assessing the criteria specified in clauses (a) to (c) and (e) above, account should be taken in general of the age of the unemployed persons, of their length of service in their former occupation, of their acquired experience, of the duration of their unemployment, of the state of the labour market and of the repercussions of the employment on their personal and family situations.

15. If an unemployed person has agreed to accept, for a prescribed maximum period, temporary employment which cannot be regarded as suitable within the meaning of Paragraph 14 above, or part-time employment in the circumstances covered in Article 10, paragraph 3, of the Convention, the level and duration of unemployment benefit paid at the end of such employment should not be adversely affected by the earnings of the unemployed person from that employment.

16. Members should endeavour to extend progressively the application of their legislation concerning unemployment benefit to cover all employees. However, public employees whose employment up to normal retirement age is guaranteed by national laws or regulations may be excluded from protection.

17. Members should endeavour to protect workers who are experiencing hardship in a waiting period.

18. The following provisions should be applicable, as appropriate, to the categories of persons mentioned in Article 26, paragraph 1, of the Convention:

- (a) in cases of full unemployment, the benefit may be calculated in accordance with the provisions of Article 16 of the Convention;
- (b) the qualifying period should be adapted or waived, under prescribed conditions, for certain of the categories of persons newly seeking work;
- (c) when benefit is provided without a qualifying period—
 - (i) the waiting period may be increased to a prescribed length;
 - (ii) the duration of payment of benefit may be limited under prescribed conditions notwithstanding the provision of Article 19, paragraph 1, of the Convention.

19. When the duration of payment of benefit is limited by national legislation, it should be extended, under prescribed conditions, until pensionable age for unemployed persons who have reached a prescribed age prior to the pensionable age.

20. Members whose legislation provides for the rights to medical care and makes it directly or indirectly conditional upon occupational activity should endeavour to ensure, under prescribed conditions, the provision of medical care to unemployed persons, including, if possible, those who are not in receipt of unemployment benefit, and to their dependants.

21. Members should endeavour to guarantee to persons in receipt of unemployment benefit, under prescribed conditions, that the periods during which benefits are paid will be taken into consideration—

- (a) for acquisition of the right to and, where appropriate, calculation of disability, old-age and survivors' benefit, and

- b) un emploi comportant un transfert de résidence dans un lieu où il n'existerait pas de possibilités de logement appropriées;
- c) un emploi dont les conditions et la rémunération seraient sensiblement moins favorables que celles qui sont généralement accordées, au moment considéré, dans la profession et la région où l'emploi est offert;
- d) un emploi vacant en raison directe d'un arrêt du travail dû à un conflit professionnel en cours;
- e) un emploi tel que, pour une raison autre que celles qui sont visées aux alinéas a) à d) et compte tenu de toutes les circonstances d'espèce, notamment des responsabilités familiales de l'intéressé, le refus de cet emploi ne pourrait lui être raisonnablement reproché.

17. Les Membres devraient s'efforcer de protéger les travailleurs qui éprouvent des difficultés au cours du délai d'attente.

18. Les dispositions suivantes devraient être applicables selon les cas aux catégories de personnes visées au paragraphe 1 de l'article 26 de la convention:

- a) en cas de chômage complet, les indemnités devraient pouvoir être calculées conformément aux dispositions de l'article 16 de la convention;
- b) le stage devrait être adapté ou supprimé, dans des conditions prescrites, pour certaines catégories de nouveaux demandeurs d'emploi;
- c) lorsque les indemnités sont accordées sans aucune condition de stage:
 - i) les délais d'attente devraient pouvoir être portés à une durée prescrite;
 - ii) les durées de versement des indemnités devraient pouvoir être limitées dans des conditions prescrites, nonobstant les dispositions du paragraphe 1 de l'article 19 de la convention.

19. Lorsque la durée de versement des indemnités est limitée par la législation nationale, elle devrait être prolongée, dans des conditions prescrites, jusqu'à l'âge d'admission à pension de vieillesse pour les chômeurs ayant atteint un âge prescrit précédant l'âge d'admission à pension de vieillesse.

20. Les Membres dont la législation couvre les soins médicaux et en subordonne directement ou indirectement le droit à une condition d'activité professionnelle devraient s'efforcer de garantir, dans des conditions prescrites, les soins médicaux aux chômeurs, y compris, si possible, ceux qui ne bénéficient pas d'indemnités de chômage, ainsi qu'aux personnes à leur charge.

21. Les Membres devraient, dans des conditions prescrites, s'efforcer de garantir aux bénéficiaires des indemnités de chômage la prise en considération des périodes au cours desquelles ces indemnités sont versées:

- a) pour l'acquisition du droit et, le cas échéant, le calcul des prestations d'invalidité, de vieillesse et de survivants;

(b) for acquisition of the right to medical care and sickness, maternity and family benefit after the end of unemployment, when the legislation of the Member concerned provides for such benefits and makes them directly or indirectly conditional upon occupational activity.

22. Members should endeavour to make adjustments of statutory social security schemes which are based on occupational activity to the occupational circumstances of part-time workers. Such adjustments, provided for in Article 25 of the Convention, should relate in particular, under prescribed conditions to—

- (a) the minimum hours of work and minimum earnings necessary for the entitlement to benefits under the basic and supplementary schemes;
- (b) maximum earnings for the calculation of contributions;
- (c) the qualifying period for entitlement to benefit;
- (d) the methods of calculating cash benefits, in particular pensions, on the basis of earnings and of the length of the period of contribution, insurance or occupational activity;
- (e) entitlement to non-reduced minimum benefits and flat-rate benefits, in particular family allowances.

23. Members should endeavour to promote a real understanding of the hardships of unemployed persons, particularly those who have been unemployed for a long period, and their need for sufficient income.

IV. DEVELOPMENT AND IMPROVEMENT OF SYSTEMS OF PROTECTION

24. Since the systems of protection for the unemployed of some Members are in the early stages of development and others may have to consider changes to existing schemes in the light of changing needs, a variety of approaches may legitimately be taken in assisting the unemployed, and Members should give high priority to a full and frank exchange of information on programmes of assistance for the unemployed.

25. With a view to reaching at least the standards laid down in Part IV (Unemployment Benefit) of the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952, Members which intend to develop their system of protection against unemployment should be guided, in so far as is possible and appropriate, by the following provisions.

26. (1) Members should be aware of the technical and administrative difficulties involved in the planning and introduction of social security mechanisms for the compensation of unemployment. In order to introduce forms of unemployment compensation through the payment of benefits of a non-discretionary nature, they should seek to meet the following conditions as soon as possible—

- (a) the introduction and satisfactory operation of a free public employment service containing a network of employment offices and having acquired sufficient administrative capacity to collect and analyse information on the employment market, to register job offers and jobseekers and to verify objectively that persons are involuntarily unemployed;
- (b) a reasonable level of coverage by and extensive experience in the administration of other branches of social security deemed to have priority on social and economic grounds, such as primary health care and compensation for employment accidents.

(2) Members should, as a major priority, seek to meet the conditions set out in subparagraph (1) above by promoting a sufficiently high level of stable employment offering adequate wages and working conditions, in particular through

b) pour l'acquisition du droit aux soins médicaux, aux indemnités de maladie et de maternité et aux prestations familiales, après la fin du chômage, lorsque la législation du Membre considéré prévoit de telles prestations et en subordonne directement ou indirectement le droit à une condition d'activité professionnelle.

22. Les Membres devraient s'efforcer d'adapter les régimes légaux de sécurité sociale liés à l'exercice d'une activité professionnelle aux conditions de l'activité professionnelle des travailleurs à temps partiel. L'adaptation requise, prévue à l'article 25 de la convention, devrait porter notamment, dans des conditions prescrites, sur :

- a) les durées minimales de travail et les montants minimaux de gains conditionnant le droit au bénéfice des régimes de base et des régimes complémentaires ;
- b) les plafonds de calcul des cotisations ;
- c) la durée de stage exigible pour l'ouverture du droit aux prestations ;
- d) les modes de calcul des prestations en espèces et notamment des pensions en fonction des gains et de la durée de cotisation, d'assurance ou d'activité professionnelle ;
- e) le droit à des prestations minimales et à des prestations forfaitaires, notamment les prestations familiales, non réduites.

23. Les Membres devraient chercher à promouvoir une véritable compréhension envers les difficultés des chômeurs, notamment ceux qui se trouvent au chômage depuis une longue durée, et leur besoin d'un revenu suffisant.

IV. DÉVELOPPEMENT ET PERFECTIONNEMENT DES RÉGIMES DE PROTECTION

24. Etant donné que le développement d'un régime de protection des chômeurs en est à ses débuts dans un certain nombre de Membres et que d'autres peuvent être amenés à envisager des modifications dans les régimes existants en fonction de l'évolution des besoins, des approches différentes peuvent être légitimement adoptées pour venir en aide aux chômeurs, et les Membres devraient accorder une haute priorité à un échange d'informations franc et complet sur les aides aux chômeurs.

25. Pour atteindre au moins les normes fixées par les dispositions de la partie IV (prestations de chômage) de la convention concernant la sécurité sociale (norme minimum), 1952, les Membres qui entendent développer leur régime de protection contre le chômage devraient s'inspirer, dans la mesure où il est possible et approprié, des dispositions suivantes.

26. (1) Les Membres devraient être conscients des difficultés techniques et administratives que comportent la planification et la mise en œuvre de mécanismes de sécurité sociale pour l'indemnisation du chômage. En vue d'introduire des formes d'indemnisation du chômage comportant des prestations de caractère non discrétionnaire, ils devraient chercher à réunir, dès que possible, les conditions suivantes :

- a) l'institution et le fonctionnement satisfaisant d'un service public gratuit de l'emploi doté d'un réseau de bureaux de placement et ayant acquis une capacité administrative suffisante pour recueillir et analyser les informations sur le marché de l'emploi, enregistrer les offres et les demandes d'emploi et pour vérifier objectivement le caractère involontaire du chômage des personnes concernées ;
- b) un niveau raisonnable d'implantation et une expérience étendue de la gestion d'autres branches de la sécurité sociale jugées prioritaires sur les plans social et économique, tels que les soins de santé primaires et la réparation des accidents du travail.

(2) Les Membres devraient, à titre hautement prioritaire, s'efforcer de réunir les conditions énoncées au sous-paragraphe 1 ci-dessus en favorisant un niveau suffisamment élevé d'emploi stable offrant des salaires et des conditions de travail necessary and appropriate measures, such as vocational guidance and training, to facilitate voluntary matching of skills on the labour market to available job vacancies.

(3) The co-operation and technical advice of the International Labour Office should continue to be put to good advantage in supporting any initiative taken by Members in this respect in cases where there is insufficient national expertise.

(4) When the conditions specified in subparagraph (1) above are met, Members should, as rapidly as their resources permit, and if necessary in stages, introduce programmes for the protection of the unemployed, including social security mechanisms for the compensation of unemployment.

27. In cases where the conditions referred to in Paragraph 26(1) are not met, Members should give priority to special assistance measures for the most needy unemployed persons, to the extent permitted by the available resources and in the context of national conditions.

28. Members which have set up a national provident fund might examine the possibility of authorising the payment of periodical cash benefits to the holders of accounts whose earnings are interrupted by long-term unemployment and whose family situation is precarious in order to provide for their essential needs. The level of this benefit and the period during which it is payable might be limited according to the circumstances, in particular the amount credited to the account.

29. Members might also encourage employers' and workers' organisations to set up assistance funds at the enterprise or inter-enterprise level. These could advantageously be introduced in the enterprises and sectors of activity which have sufficient economic capacity.

30. Members whose laws or regulations require employers to make severance payments to workers who have lost their jobs should envisage making provision for the employers to bear this responsibility in common through the creation of funds financed by employers' contributions, so as to ensure the receipt of these payments by the workers concerned.

adéquats, notamment par des mesures nécessaires et appropriées, telles que l'orientation professionnelle et la formation, pour faciliter la correspondance volontaire des qualifications avec les emplois vacants sur le marché du travail.

(3) Les services de coopération et les conseils techniques du Bureau international du Travail devraient continuer à être mis à profit pour soutenir toute initiative prise par les Membres en ce domaine, faute d'une expertise nationale suffisante.

(4) Lorsque les conditions visées au sous-paragraphe 1 sont réunies, les Membres devraient, aussi rapidement que leurs ressources le permettent et, s'il est nécessaire, par étapes, instituer des régimes de protection de chômeurs, et notamment des mécanismes de sécurité sociale pour l'indemnisation du chômage.

27. Lorsque les conditions visées au sous-paragraphe 1 du paragraphe 26 ne sont pas réunies, les Membres devraient accorder la priorité à des mesures spéciales d'aide aux chômeurs les plus nécessiteux, en fonction des ressources disponibles et selon les conditions propres à chaque pays.

28. Les Membres ayant institué un fonds national de prévoyance pourraient examiner la possibilité d'autoriser, au profit des titulaires de compte dont les gains sont interrompus par un chômage de longue durée et dont la situation familiale est précaire, le versement de prestations périodiques en espèces pour faire face à leurs besoins essentiels. Ces prestations pourraient être limitées dans leur montant et dans leur durée en fonction des circonstances, et notamment du solde du compte.

29. Les Membres pourraient également encourager la constitution par les organisations d'employeurs et de travailleurs de fonds de secours d'entreprise ou interentreprises. Cette méthode pourrait être mise à profit dans les entreprises et les secteurs d'activité jouissant d'une capacité économique suffisante.

30. Les Membres dont la législation met à la charge des employeurs le versement d'indemnités de fin de service aux travailleurs qui ont perdu leur emploi devraient envisager la mise en commun de la responsabilité des employeurs par la création de fonds alimentés par des cotisations de ceux-ci, afin de garantir le versement de ces indemnités aux travailleurs intéressés.

CONCLUSIONS CONCERNING RURAL EMPLOYMENT PROMOTION

INTRODUCTION

1. Global unemployment and underemployment are the challenge of our time in the present context of growing population and increased urbanisation. Under-utilisation of labour, and the associated problem of poverty, affect many countries at all levels of development. These difficulties have been compounded by an increasingly difficult international environment. The problem is particularly acute in developing countries where decades of unbalanced development have contributed to limiting the capacity of the urban and modern sectors of the economy to generate sufficient employment and economic growth. The debt problem, declining commodity prices, fluctuating exchange rates and protectionism have led to a drastic reduction in export earnings and in the import capacity of developing countries. Faced with this situation, many countries have had to adopt structural adjustment programmes which have affected employment prospects, at least in the short term. In the search for a solution to the employment problem, rural economies of both developed and developing countries will have a major role to play. Economic growth provides the most desirable environment for employment creation and should be accompanied by income growth in particular for the poorest sections of society.

2. Looking ahead, there are challenging tasks to be undertaken. The relationship between agricultural policies of developed countries and the export earnings of, and employment in, developing countries require a more liberal approach to trade in the developed countries. In industrialised market economies an important issue which needs to be confronted relates to the costs and benefits of alternative policy options to deal with agricultural surpluses, protection and food prices. An awareness of problems connected with international trade should be encouraged at all levels within these countries. The results of significant changes in international trade would be complex and would vary between countries and within countries. It can be expected that change would have implications for employment and employment promotion policies in both developed and developing countries.

3. In centrally planned economies the current initiatives towards reform may have far-reaching implications for agricultural productivity and employment. A major issue in this respect relates to the optimum organisational structure and the institutionalisation of the recent reforms. These reforms aim at the expansion of technological innovations with a view to increasing efficiency and labour productivity in agriculture. Such changes would release labour for industry and services and would increase the supply of food for the urban areas.

4. In developing countries the rapid increase of population and the labour force will continue in the foreseeable future. There is sufficient evidence that agriculture alone will not be able to absorb the increase in the labour force, even under the most optimistic scenarios. Major reorientations in social and economic policies will be required to create the appropriate framework for the increase in employment opportunities and incomes of the rural population, who are generally poor, in the agricultural as well as the non-farm economies of developing countries. The lessons of past experience, together with the present difficult international environment, emphasise the need to devise new development strategies at the national and international levels in which the crucial role of the rural sector is fully recognised, and to create more favourable macro-economic conditions for the rural sector. Under the present conditions, in many countries, revival of growth itself requires acceleration of agricultural growth and development of trade linkages between agriculture and industry. There is also an urgent need to increase income growth, to combat mass poverty, unemployment and underemployment in rural areas and to bring about an equitable distribution of the benefits of growth. In pursuing such a strategy, particular attention should be given to closing the rural-urban gap through the creation of appropriate infrastructures, and to the full participation of women.

5. While the challenges of employment are great, taking a forward look points to increased opportunities. There are signs of gradual recovery from the global recession of the early 1980s. Major technological innovations are now being adopted in agriculture, offering encouraging prospects for raising productivity and increasing incomes and employment, but at the same time in some cases exposing workers to new hazards and risks to employment. It is necessary that workers should be adequately protected against potential occupational hazards, for example, chemical and biological hazards deriving from those innovations. There is a growing awareness that efforts at the international level should be directed at protecting the poor, especially the rural poor, against the shocks of negative international developments. All these trends point out the opportunities that exist in facing up to the challenge of global unemployment and underemployment.

NATIONAL ACTION

6. All countries, whatever their level of development, and whatever their economic and social systems, need to give greater attention to the contribution that the development and modernisation of rural areas can make to overall growth, to balanced economic and social development, and to the solution of their employment problems.

7. Countries should ensure that:

- (a) strategies and policies for growth and development lead to a better balance between rural and urban areas, and to a strengthening of the linkages between agriculture and industry. The rural sector, including agriculture, plantations, forestry, animal husbandry, fisheries and non-agricultural enterprises, can make an important contribution to industrial development as a supplier of food and raw materials, as a market for local industrial products and as a provider of investible surplus in rural areas. Small and medium-sized enterprises should be promoted in accordance with the conclusions adopted by the Conference at its 72nd Session (1986) concerning the promotion of small and medium-sized enterprises. Appropriate policies regarding prices, credit, taxation, technology, investment and institutional development should be considered, taking into account their social implications. Rural workers' organisations should be promoted in accordance with the Rural Workers' Organisations Convention, 1975 (No. 141);
- (b) adequate opportunities for gainful and productive employment in farm and non-farm activities, particularly for youth, are provided to the inhabitants of rural areas so as to improve the standard of living in these areas, and to stem the exodus of the rural population to the large cities. The special needs of vulnerable and disadvantaged groups such as the handicapped should be accorded appropriate attention. Special consideration should also be given to indigenous and tribal populations;
- (c) policies for overall rural development make adequate provision for hydraulic, electrical, communication and other infrastructural development as well as health, housing, education and cultural services, thus reducing the gap in living conditions between rural and urban areas;
- (d) every effort is made to provide seasonal, part-time, casual and migrant workers and contract labour with adequate social protection and working conditions. Every effort should also be made to create alternative employment opportunities during the rest of the year. In this connection, attention should be given to the ratification and full implementation of the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 96);
- (e) women's central role in rural development is fully recognised and women are given equal access to basic resources, productive assets and property rights. In recognition of women's double work burden related to employment and family responsibilities, measures to provide them with adequate social services and appropriate technologies should be given priority. In parallel, non-traditional productive activities for women should be supported and women's access to decision-making institutions should be facilitated;
- (f) agricultural policies, including pricing policies, are so designed as to increase productivity, ensure sufficient supply of food to all people, and provide adequate incentives and incomes to food producers, particularly in developing countries;
- (g) every encouragement is given to the development of rural non-farm activities (including rural industries and services) which can on the one hand provide locally many of the goods, services, infrastructural facilities and equipment needed for agricultural growth and employment, using local resources and locally produced inputs to the maximum extent possible, and on the other hand provide employment and incomes to a significant section of the rural labour force. In this context, encouragement and assistance needs to be given to the growth of enterprises in rural areas, especially small and medium-sized ones and co-operatives, ensuring them adequate access to capital, credit, equipment, markets and skills;
- (h) policies for education, vocational training and technical advisory services, available on a continuing basis, and human resource development are so designed as to provide rural populations, including youth, women and children, with the skills and aptitudes required for productive employment, both in the farm and non-farm sectors, in rural areas;

- (i) provision is made for the progressive extension of social security, retraining and other measures to assist the rural population in finding alternative employment opportunities whenever they are affected by changes in the economic environment;
- (j) representative organisations of employers and workers are consulted in the design and implementation of policies, programmes and projects for overall rural development. Encouragement should also be given to local initiatives for employment. In conformity with the Rural Workers' Organisations Convention, 1975 (No. 141) and Recommendation (No. 149), member States should encourage the growth of strong rural workers' organisations, and should take appropriate measures for the ratification and application of those instruments;
- (k) due attention is given to the protection and rehabilitation of the rural environment and particularly to addressing the problems of soil deterioration and erosion, so as to provide the basis for sustainable development and employment growth in rural areas; and
- (l) where rural employment promotion requires the introduction of technological change and innovation, due attention is paid to rural workers' health and safety, including their protection against chemical and biological hazards.

Developed countries

8. In industrialised market economies, important issues include the costs and benefits of alternative policy options aimed at a more liberal trade in agricultural products, a reduction in agricultural surpluses and a diminished production-stimulating support with a view to reducing the budgetary burdens of such support and to further opening up markets for developing countries. In this context consideration should be given to policies designed to: (a) minimise the potentially negative effects, particularly on the poorest regions and the poorest segments of the populations; (b) encourage the development of small and medium-sized enterprises to provide jobs for the farmers and agricultural workers affected; (c) promote the protection and preservation of the rural environment; (d) discourage rural exodus leading to more unemployment in urban areas; and (e) take measures to ensure appropriate food security. Member States should extend social security, training, retraining and other measures to facilitate labour mobility particularly during the transitional phase. Innovative policies in this respect should aim at increasing employment opportunities in the rural areas so as to contribute to a reduction in overall unemployment.

9. The recent developments in centrally planned economies pose a challenge for planners and policy-makers. Attempts at reform and restructuring must give agriculture an important place in future development. These countries, in introducing new policy measures for increasing efficiency and labour productivity in agriculture, should focus on: (a) reforms concerning prices, methods of labour remuneration, and organisation of work; (b) the introduction of institutional changes that guarantee greater farm autonomy and decentralisation in decision-making and access to ownership of land in accordance with national legislation; (c) policies to assist workers who may be displaced as a consequence of the reforms; and (d) appropriate support to the creation of small and medium-sized enterprises in rural areas. These countries should also focus on further increasing their imports of agricultural products from developing countries.

Developing countries

10. The acute situation in developing countries, reflected in massive unemployment, underemployment, poverty, malnutrition and high child mortality rates, requires the assignment of a central role to rural employment promotion. This is particularly important in view of the difficult international environment which has prevailed since the early 1980s. Given the decline in resources available to these countries due to the debt servicing burden, the fall in commodity prices, rising interest rates and trade barriers, member States should mobilise the political will to adopt policies and programmes in support of a rural employment-oriented strategy of development, aiming at the alleviation of rural poverty, the creation of income generating activities and the improvement of the socio-economic well-being of rural people. This should include the following elements:

- (a) in defining their national development strategies, particularly in the context of structural adjustment and the need for recovery, member States should give priority to employment promotion, economic growth and modernisation of the rural sector. Structural adjustment programmes should be so designed as to improve the productive potential of undertakings of all types and increase the productive and income-earning capacity of the weakest groups. The rural sector's share in investment and public expenditure, especially in the development of infrastructure and social services, should be commensurate with its relative importance in population and poverty. Furthermore, pricing, subsidy and other macro-policies should be so designed as to provide adequate incentives to rural producers and to develop market linkages between the rural and urban sectors;
- (b) in designing population policy, priority should be accorded to the promotion of family planning based on education complemented by family and child health care measures and basic literacy in rural areas;
- (c) in order to bring about a more balanced spatial distribution of population, and mitigate the impact of excessive urbanisation, member States should give consideration to the development of small and medium-sized towns and the encouragement of small and medium-sized agro-industrial enterprises, including those processing plantation crops;
- (d) member States should design an employment-oriented strategy of rural development that aims at promoting labour absorption in both the farm and non-farm sectors. The non-farm sector must play a key role in this strategy;
- (e) the promotion of labour absorption in agriculture requires designing an integrated set of programmes in support of smallholders aiming at increasing productivity and employment of this important sector. Such programmes should include the adoption of policies which stimulate crop diversification and the diffusion of high-yielding varieties, appropriate farm equipment, biotechnological innovations and the results of agricultural research, paying due attention to the environment as well as to the health and safety of rural workers, including their protection against occupational hazards; the provision of adequate credit, extension, training and marketing services; the allocation of public investment to irrigation development, and the adoption of programmes of subsidies and credit to enable smallholders to make fuller use of their land through irrigation. In cases where very small holdings are unproductive or inefficient because of their size, voluntary consolidation of holdings or production units should be encouraged so as to optimise production and marketing;
- (f) the right to freely chosen employment and to own property should be recognised. In certain situations, agrarian reform involving redistribution of property rights in land in favour of the landless or small producers, would assist the modernisation of agriculture, employment opportunities and equitable rural development. Wherever appropriate, such reforms should be undertaken within the context of an overall rural development strategy, with the objectives of promoting optimum use of land and facilitating the application of appropriate new technologies, and should be carried out through just legal procedures, providing effective and equitable compensation and access to independent judicial process for those adversely affected. Such reforms would need to be accompanied by measures to improve facilities for credit, input supply, marketing, training and extension services. Since in many countries different types of property title coexist, there should be legal security of property and/or tenure;
- (g) the development of a dynamic non-farm sector (rural and agro-based industries and services) requires: (i) designing innovative policies to provide incentives for the channelling of agricultural resources into value-adding non-farm enterprises; (ii) creating infrastructure and other facilities including credit, training, marketing and technology; (iii) stimulating and respecting various organisational forms of production in conformity with basic human rights; and

- (iv) implementing complementary policies to support and legitimise the role of the informal sector with access to financing, appropriate technologies and enterprise skills;
- (h) any direct employment creation programmes that may exist should lead to an increase in the bargaining power of rural workers, and ensure adequate remuneration and, where applicable, social protection through legislation for both men and women. In this context, priority should be given to the ratification and full implementation of the Minimum Wage-Fixing Machinery (Agriculture) Convention, 1951 (No. 99);
- (i) in designing and implementing rural employment policies, special attention should be paid to enabling women's full participation in the development process. In particular, emphasis should be given to: (i) ensuring their equitable access to training, employment extension services and productive assets including land; (ii) enforcing equality of pay and guaranteeing social protection; (iii) encouraging women's full integration into rural workers' organisations on the basis of a recognition of their particular needs and concerns and ensuring their full participation and influence in rural development processes, including through women's organisations in the service of the community; and (iv) encouraging and promoting women's participation in small and medium-sized enterprises in rural areas;
- (j) national strategies should take full account of the basic needs of the rural population with a view to closing the gap between urban and rural living standards;
- (k) the success of rural employment strategies requires full participation by rural workers and employers through their freely chosen organisations in all phases of planning, implementation and evaluation. Within this context, member countries are called upon to increase efforts to step up the ratification and application of ILO instruments concerning the rural sector, especially the Rural Workers' Organisations Convention, 1975 (No. 141), and Recommendation (No. 149), the Plantations Convention, 1958 (No. 110), and the Tenants and Share-croppers Recommendation, 1968 (No. 132);
- (l) encouragement of rural workers' and employers' organisations to participate more fully in the organisation of services for people's health care; literacy; training; the provision of safe drinking water, electricity, communications and other facilities to the villages; group-based credit programmes for the poor; and the promotion of workers' education for strengthening their active participation in rural workers' organisations;
- (m) production, marketing, credit and other types of rural co-operatives have a major role to play in promoting employment, development and self-sufficiency. The rural population should have free access, democratic control and independence from any external interference in the creation and functioning of co-operatives. Their development should be encouraged, in conformity with the Co-operatives (Developing Countries) Recommendation, 1966 (No. 127). Efforts should be made to develop training, credit, marketing and other facilities to enable co-operatives to mobilise local resources and increase the access of the rural population to productive resources and services;
- (n) policy-making is often constrained by the lack of relevant data, particularly on rural employment and incomes. Member countries should undertake determined efforts to improve the data base for policy-making particularly by providing information disaggregated by sex and by rural and urban sector separately;
- (o) care should be taken to ensure that all appropriate research data are communicated to the local level so that they can be utilised and their benefits realised; and
- (p) existing programmes should be evaluated and the lessons learned taken into account for application in future programmes.

INTERNATIONAL ACTION

11. Recognising the need to improve the international environment for developing countries, and taking account of the Conclusions adopted by the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment and the special responsibility of the ILO in the United Nations system for labour and social matters including the promotion of full, productive and freely chosen employment and its responsibility to examine and consider economic and financial policies in the light of their impact on employment and social conditions, the Conference calls upon the international community:

- (a) to take the necessary steps for a more liberal international trade, avoiding distortions, together with appropriate protective social policy measures;
- (b) to find a solution to reduce the debt burden of developing countries;
- (c) to facilitate increased flows of capital and aid; and
- (d) to develop mechanisms for the transfer to developing countries of appropriate technological innovation, including biotechnology, and the use of raw materials for industrial processing.

THE ROLE OF THE ILO

12. In view of the impact of macro-economic policies, especially those aiming at economic reform and structural adjustment, on employment and livelihood of the rural population, the Conference urges the ILO to reassess present research on the interlinkages between macro-economic policies and employment and poverty in the rural areas with a view to undertaking innovative, original applied research on these topics. The main objective of this research should be to provide sound advisory services and data to ILO constituents in order to assist them in promoting growth strategies for recovery.

13. The ILO should, within its field of competence, combine research, advisory services and technical co-operation to strengthen its assistance to member States in the following areas:

- (a) the design of strategies aiming at increasing labour absorption in rural areas through the promotion of growth linkages between agriculture and the non-farm rural economy. Such strategies should aim at increasing productivity in both sectors through the adoption of innovative and appropriate technology and the promotion of new enterprises. The ILO's work should include: (i) documenting and disseminating knowledge on the appropriate macro and micro policies for promoting economic growth, labour absorption and productivity in agriculture and the non-farm economy; (ii) studying the methods of strengthening the agriculture/non-agriculture linkages in the rural areas; (iii) the formulation of alternative options for employment promotion policies, particularly for the least developed countries; (iv) studying the impact on rural employment and production of different systems of ownership; (v) documenting and studying the ways of developing rural-urban linkages as well as linkages with the non-traditional export markets; and (vi) studying the impact of structural adjustment programmes on employment and food security. The ILO should advise governments on the employment aspects of alternative adjustment programmes, particularly in the least developed countries;
- (b) the promotion of employment in the rural non-farm economy, this being a crucial element in the promotion of employment in the rural areas in the medium term. Technical co-operation projects in this area should shift away from isolated micro projects into more inter-related projects of a coherent programme. In line with the conclusions adopted by the Conference at its 72nd Session (1986) concerning the promotion of small and medium-sized enterprises, the ILO should pay special attention to the role that such enterprises can play in rural development. The Conference calls upon the ILO to organise, where appropriate, non-farm employment strategy missions, in co-operation with other agencies, in order to assist governments and employers' and workers' organisations in the promotion of rural non-farm activities;

- (c) the promotion of labour absorption in agriculture in developing countries. Particular emphasis should be given to: (i) designing the appropriate institutional framework for promoting increased agricultural production and employment; (ii) providing assistance to maximise the employment potential of the introduction of improved technologies such as high-yielding varieties, improved farm equipment and bio-technology; (iii) assisting in the establishment of occupational safety and health programmes for agricultural workers; (iv) acting as a "clearing house" for information on successful experiences of increased labour absorption in agriculture and the real living conditions obtained by the workers; and (v) assisting rural workers' and employers' organisations in the formulation of socio-economic programmes;
- (d) the design of an integrated programme in support of smallholders in the rural areas of developing countries with a view to increasing the production of food and the promotion of employment. Such an approach might include: (i) the design of an innovative institutional framework for improving access to credit, particularly for the poor; (ii) the provision of appropriate training, complemented by access to appropriate technical assistance, by introducing innovative and participatory training approaches and methodologies; and (iii) the provision of technology suited to the needs of small farmers, keeping in view their safe working conditions;
- (e) the development of appropriate approaches to, and programmes for, enhancing technical, managerial, organisational, enterprise and other skills for men and women to enable them to participate in and benefit from the process of growth and development in rural areas;
- (f) the development of strategies, within the International Programme for the Improvement of Working Conditions and Environment (PIACT), for improving the living and working conditions of rural workers;
- (g) the documentation and dissemination of information on the causes and dimensions of rural poverty with particular emphasis on the linkages between rural and urban poverty caused by migratory movements. In this respect emphasis should be given to special anti-poverty and direct employment creation programmes targeted at the most disadvantaged groups. These should include special public works programmes, food-for-work programmes and other direct intervention.
- (h) giving priority to activities in support of rural women. Particular emphasis should be given to: (i) continuing research and documentation on the constraints on employment, conditions of work and differential impact of policies on rural women; (ii) direct measures to increase returns to women's labour in agricultural, productive and economically viable employment opportunities; (iii) encouraging the development of social amenities including provision of safe water supply, easy access to fuel and child-care facilities; (iv) steps to encourage women's full participation and influence in economic and social development; (v) women's access to decision-making bodies; and (vi) developing productive non-traditional activities for women;
- (i) the design of programmes aimed at documenting and improving the legal, economic and social conditions of home-based workers;
- (j) the design of programmes aimed at documenting and improving the legal, economic and social condition of the informal sector, which is now recognised as an important element of the rural sector both in terms of employment creation and in terms of generation of productive activities;
- (k) the promotion of the full participation of employers' organisations and workers' organisations as defined in the Rural Workers' Organisations Convention, 1975 (No. 141), in designing and implementing rural employment policies. In this respect emphasis should be given to assisting the rural population in the creation and development of their own organisations, to the promotion of legislation protecting rural workers and their organisations, and to workers' education programmes for such organisations; and
- (l) the collection and dissemination of data by sex, region and sector, on rural employment, wages, incomes and other aspects of development, and assistance to member States in creating systems to monitor the conditions in rural areas, especially of the poor groups. It should also make greater efforts to disseminate such data and the results of its research on the experience of different countries to a wider audience on a regular basis.

14. The ILO's technical co-operation programmes should aim at the promotion of national self-reliance, respond to the priorities and needs as defined by member States, and be carried out in close consultation with the social partners, including those in the recipient countries. In allocating resources to such programmes, every encouragement should be given to the promotion of human rights, including freedom of association and the right to organise. The ILO should continue and expand its work related to the evaluation and monitoring of the socio-economic impact of technical co-operation projects and ensure the dissemination of the results of its inquiries and the lessons of its experience, both successes and failures. Special attention should be given to the effectiveness of technical co-operation projects.

15. The ILO should vigorously promote and monitor the ratification and application of relevant ILO standards, particularly those related to such basic human rights as freedom of association and the right to organise of rural workers, non-discrimination and abolition of forced labour as well as of child labour. The ILO should also investigate the reasons for the limited ratification of the Rural Workers' Organisations Convention, 1975 (No. 141), and the Plantations Convention, 1958 (No. 110), and promote a tripartite dialogue on the subject. The Governing Body is requested to place on the agenda of an early session of the Conference the revision of the Tenants and Share-croppers Recommendation, 1968 (No. 132). The Conference also calls upon the Governing Body to consider placing on the agenda of an early session of the Conference the question of the application of modern agricultural technologies.

16. The ILO should initiate consultations between workers' organisations and between employers' organisations as to steps which might be taken to improve health and safety as well as employment of rural workers.

17. In the context of the Medium-Term Plan and the Sectoral Activities Programme, the Conference calls upon the Governing Body to convene the Advisory Committee on Rural Development at more frequent intervals. The Governing Body Committee on Employment should keep under review the ILO's work on rural employment. The Governing Body should also consider giving greater priority in the allocation of resources to activities concerning rural labour and employment.

18. The ILO should, within its sphere of competence, contribute to the promotion of dialogue between industrialised and developing countries. The Conference urges that the contribution of the ILO in this area should be based on the Conclusions of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment.

19. In carrying out its activities, particularly technical co-operation programmes, the ILO should continue and strengthen its co-operation with other organisations of the United Nations system to promote employment-oriented patterns of development in the rural sector, and should implement the conclusions concerning technical co-operation adopted by the Conference at its 73rd Session (1987). In the joint committees of the United Nations system in which the ILO participates, tripartite representatives should, whenever possible, be included in ILO delegations.

Accepts the arrangement proposed by the Government of Poland for the settlement of the arrears of contributions due for the period 1980 to 1987 to the effect that:

VIII

Resolution concerning the proposed incentive scheme for early payment of member States' assessed contributions¹

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Recalling that in accordance with article 10, paragraph 1, of the Financial Regulations, member States' assessed contributions for each calendar year are due and payable on 1 January of that year,

Noting that delays in the payment of assessed contributions by some member States have prejudiced the implementation of the Organisation's programme in a timely and orderly manner and placed those member States which pay their contributions in a timely manner at a disadvantage,

Recalling the concerns expressed by the Conference, the Governing Body and the Director-General with regard to the late payment of assessed contributions,

Agreeing that some form of incentive should be provided to member States that pay their assessed contributions in a timely manner;

1. Decides that an incentive scheme based on the setting aside of interest earned on temporarily surplus regular budget funds in any year shall be introduced as from 1 January 1989 for a two-year trial period;

2. Decides further that during this trial period 40 per cent of interest earned on temporarily surplus regular budget funds in each year shall be paid into the Working Capital Fund and that the remainder shall be set aside to provide a total incentive amount available for distribution to those member States which have paid in full their assessed contributions for the current year by 31 December of that year. The total incentive amount so established in each year will be distributed to eligible member States under an incentive points system based on an "S" curve formula which will take into account the dates and amounts of payments of current year's contributions by member States.

IX

Resolution concerning the Financial Report and Audited Financial Statements for 1986-87¹

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Decides to adopt the Financial Report and Audited Financial Statements for 1986-87 in accordance with article 29 of the Financial Regulations.

Resolution concerning reduction in the Programme and Budget for 1988-89¹

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Recalling that the 73rd Session of the Conference adopted the Programme and Budget for 1988-89 on the understanding that programme reductions to reduce the overall level of the budget would be worked out for approval by the Conference at its present session, Decides to make programme reductions of $1.9 million as detailed by major programme in Appendix II to this report.

XI

Resolution concerning reimbursement to the Working Capital Fund in 1989²

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Noting that the Governing Body, at its 240th (May-June 1988) Session, endorsed in principle the introduction in 1990-91 of a system of Swiss franc assessments combined with forward purchasing of the biennium's dollar requirements and agreed that the final decision should be taken at the 241st Session of the Governing Body in November 1988, based on a more detailed proposal presented by the Director-General with consequential changes in the Financial Regulations and Financial Rules,

Expressing the hope that firm proposals in respect of this problem will be made by the Governing Body within the framework of the programme and budget proposals for the 1990-91 biennium;

1. Decides that, as an exceptional measure and in derogation of article 21, paragraph 2 of the Financial Regulations, the amount due to be added to Part III of the budget (Working Capital Fund) in 1989 in order to reimburse the Fund for withdrawals made to finance the excess of budgetary expenditure over budgetary income in 1986-87 be reduced by $17 million, thereby reducing by a corresponding amount the additional assessments which would otherwise be made on member States in 1989 for that purpose;

2. Notes that, taking account of the $17 million, the resulting additional assessment for 1989 required under article 21, paragraph 2 of the Financial Regulations will amount to $8,059,627.

XII

Resolution concerning the Programme and Budget for 1988-89³

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Recalling that the rate of exchange between the United States dollar and the Swiss franc (the "budget rate") for the 1988-89 Programme and Budget was fixed at 1.60 Swiss francs for 1 US dollar,

Noting the depreciation of the US dollar in relation to the Swiss franc since that rate was fixed and in particular the adverse trend over the first five months of the 1988-89 biennium,

Considering the consequential need to cover the additional costs that have arisen and are likely to continue to arise during the execution of the programme adopted for 1988-89;

³ Adopted on 15 June 1988 by 301 votes in favour, 42 against, with 33 abstentions.

1. Decides to modify the budget rate for the 1988-89 biennium from 1.60 to 1.43 Swiss francs to the dollar and accordingly to add an amount of $26 million under Part IV (Effects of exchange rate adjustments) to the budgets of expenditure and of income for 1988-89, it being understood that any additional costs arising from the value of the dollar being lower than the revised budget rate of 1.43 Swiss francs to the dollar will be met through adjustments within the level of the revised Programme and Budget for 1988-89;

2. Approves the revised budget of expenditure and income for the 61st financial period ending 31 December 1989, in the amount of US$357,023,033, resulting from the present resolution and the resolutions adopted at the present session of the Conference concerning programme reductions and reimbursements to the Working Capital Fund, as set out in Appendix I to this report.

PROVISIONAL RECORD

Resolutions

Resolutions submitted in accordance with article 17 of the Standing Orders of the Conference

Resolution concerning the role of enterprises in employment growth, submitted by Mr. Georget, Employers' delegate, Niger; Mr. Lindner, Employers' delegate, Federal Republic of Germany; Mr. Lounis Khodja, Employers' delegate, Algeria; Miss Mackie, Employers' delegate, United Kingdom; Mr. Nasr, Employers' delegate, Lebanon; Mr. Oechslin, Employers' delegate, France; Mr. Pierides, Employers' delegate, Cyprus; Mr. Rossi, Employers' delegate, Brazil; and Mr. Rowe, Employers' delegate, New Zealand; Mr. Smith, employers' delegate, United States

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Recalling the conclusions and resolution concerning the promotion of small and medium-sized enterprises, adopted at the 72nd session of the International Labour Conference,

Recalling also the resolution concerning the creation of enterprises and the growth of employment, which was adopted by the Fourth European Regional Conference in September 1987,

Recalling further the conclusions of the High-level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment, held in November 1987,

Convinced that a key to the solution of the problems of unemployment and underemployment faced by many countries lies in the creation of a favourable climate for the efficient utilisation of human skills, including management skills, and the exercise of individual initiative within the framework of policies that encourage the creation and growth of enterprises that are competitive nationally, regionally and internationally,

Noting that the potential for employment growth is particularly strong in small and medium-sized enterprises,

Considering that the entrepreneurial spirit can thrive only in an environment of free markets and free decision-making within enterprises,

Convinced therefore of the need for such an environment so that enterprises, especially small and medium-sized enterprises, can fully realise their growth potential,

Considering that technological developments and changes in world markets make continuing structural adjustments in the economies of all countries inevitable, especially as economic interdependence between countries is increasing,

Convinced further that liberalising national economies will facilitate the necessary adjustments in ways that maximise economic growth while encouraging job creation and sustainable employment;

Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director-General:

- (a) to give emphasis in the Programme and Budget of the ILO:
 - (i) to activities that encourage the spirit of entrepreneurship, particularly in small and medium-sized enterprises;
 - (ii) to training and retraining programmes directed towards enabling unemployed people to acquire the necessary skills and qualifications to be absorbed into the workforce;
 - (iii) to activities fostering the creation of new enterprises as a prime means of re-employing people who may lose their jobs in the process of structural adjustment, as well as providing employment for new entrants to the workforce;
- (b) to promote and organise exchanges of experience among countries adopting, as essential elements of their economic and employment policies, the encouragement of free enterprise.

Resolution concerning the report of the World Commission on Environment and Development, submitted by Mr. Andersen, Government delegate, Denmark; Mr. Ettarp, Government delegate, Sweden; Mrs. Holmboë Ruge, Government delegate, Norway; Mr. Kristinsson, Government delegate, Iceland; and Mr. Riikonen, Government delegate, Finland

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Welcoming the report of the World Commission on Environment and Development entitled Our common future, in particular its conclusions and recommendations as they relate to the mandate of the International Labour Organisation,

Noting the United Nations General Assembly's resolution 42/187 of 11 December 1987, transmitting to all governments and to the governing bodies of the organs, organisations and programmes of the United Nations system the report of the World Commission and inviting them to take account of the analysis and recommendations contained in the report in determining their policies and programmes,

Noting further that, in the same resolution, the General Assembly called upon the governing bodies of the organs, organisations and programmes of the United Nations system to review their policies, programmes, budgets and activities aimed at contributing to sustainable development,

Bearing in mind United Nations General Assembly resolution 42/186 of 11 December 1987 on the environmental perspective to the year 2000 and beyond,

Considering that the International Labour Organisation can make an important contribution to international efforts towards sustainable development,

Recalling in this connection the resolution concerning the role of the ILO in technical co-operation, adopted at the 73rd Session of the International Labour Conference, particularly operative paragraphs 2 and 4,

Recalling also the resolution concerning employment policy and environmental protection, adopted by the Fourth European Regional Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Bearing in mind the close relationship between a sound environment and safe and healthy conditions at the workplace,

Convinced that, through policy measures at the national and international level, a positive link can be established between the requirements of environmental protection and employment creation, particularly in rural areas of developing countries;

1. Invites governments and, as appropriate, employers' and workers' organisations to:

- (a) take account of the analysis and recommendations contained in the report of the World Commission on Environment and Development and of United Nations General Assembly resolution 42/186 on the environmental perspective to the year 2000 and beyond, in determining their policies and programmes in areas related to the mandate of the International Labour Organisation;
- (b) ensure, through co-ordination between central economic and sectoral agencies, that these policies and programmes promote sustainable development;
- (c) encourage initiatives which take into account the requirements and employment creating potential of sustainable development in areas such as agriculture, the rational use of energy, construction and road building;
- (d) stimulate the restructuring of enterprises which constitute a burden on the environment in order to enable them to attain the necessary environmental standards as rapidly as possible;
- (e) plan the environmental policy in such a way that it contributes to preserving and creating employment.

2. Requests the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director-General to:

- (a) undertake an intersectoral, interdisciplinary study on the basis of the report of the World Commission and of the resolution on the environmental perspective in order to identify issues of particular relevance to the International Labour Organisation, taking into account the tripartite structure of the organisation and with particular emphasis on the standard-setting and technical co-operation activities within the competence of the ILO;

- (b) ensure that considerations concerning the connection between environmental investment and employment promotion will be given due attention in this study;
- (c) in preparing the programme and budget proposals for the biennium 1990-91, take into account the recommendations in the World Commission's report and the resolution on the environmental perspective in all relevant programme areas;
- (d) submit the study together with his own recommendations to the 242nd Session of the Governing Body (February-March 1989) for its consideration and decision;
- (e) submit a progress report, based inter alia on the discussion of the matter at the 242nd Session of the Governing Body, to the forty-fourth session of the United Nations General Assembly on the contribution of the International Labour Organisation to the international effort towards sustainable development.

Resolution concerning the protection of workers' and employers' rights and freedoms in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories, submitted by the Government delegations of Algeria, Bahrain, Democratic Yemen, Egypt, Iraq, Jordan, Kuwait, Lebanon, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Morocco, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, Somalia, Sudan, Syrian Arab Republic, Tunisia, United Arab Emirates, and Yemen; Mr. Al-Jassem, Employers' delegate, Kuwait; Mr. Al-Hujailan, Workers' delegate, Kuwait; Mr. Eid, Workers' delegate, Egypt; Mr. Gharib, Workers' delegate, Iraq; Mr. Habaybeh, Employers' delegate, Jordan; Mr. Hussein, Employers' delegate, Iraq; and Mr. Kardan, Workers' delegate, Jordan

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Taking into consideration the Constitution of the ILO which states that "universal and lasting peace can be established only if it is based upon social justice", and that "conditions of labour exist involving such injustice, hardship and privation ... as to produce unrest so great that the peace and harmony of the world are imperilled",

Taking also into consideration the Declaration of Philadelphia which states that "freedom of expression and of association are essential to sustained progress", and that "all human being, irrespective of race, creed or sex, have the right to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity",

Recalling the resolution concerning trade union rights and their relation to civil liberties, adopted by the International Labour Conference in 1970, which affirms that without independence and political freedom workers cannot fully exercise their trade union rights,

Recalling also the resolution concerning the policy of discrimination, racism and violation of trade unions freedoms and rights practised by the Israeli authorities in Palestine and in the other occupied Arab territories, adopted by the Conference in 1974,

Recalling also the resolution concerning the implications of Israeli settlements in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories in connection with the situation of Arab workers and the resolution concerning the International Year of Shelter for the Homeless and the role of the ILO, adopted by the Conference in 1980 and 1987 respectively,

Affirming that the Fourth Geneva Convention, 1949, concerning the protection of civilian persons in time of war, is applicable to Palestine and other occupied Arab territories, as was reaffirmed by the Security Council in its resolution No. 605 and by the Commission on Human Rights in various sessions,

Expressing its concern at the continued breach of United Nations principles, international rules, conventions on the non-permissibility of the acquisition of land by force,

Affirming the importance of the reports submitted by the Director-General of the ILO every year to the Conference in application of its resolutions of 1974 and 1980, containing the findings of the mission sent by the Director-General to Palestine and other occupied Arab territories,

Expressing its deep concern at what has been stated in the report concerning the persistence of the Israeli authorities' policy of discrimination and violation of human rights and fundamental liberties in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories, at what was stated by the Committee on Freedom of Association in its 251st Report (Case No. 1390) and at the continued violation of the economic and social rights of Arab workers and employers, in addition to the prohibition of strikes, the arrest of trade unionists and the deprivation of their trade union rights,

Expressing also its deep concern at the continued Israeli settlement policy in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories and its direct negative impact on local development opportunities due to the confiscation of land from its rightful owners, as well as the seizing of water sources, the closing down of production establishments, heavy taxation, the deportation of Arab citizens, the dismissal of Arab workers, their deprivation of work opportunities and of the possibility of living in their homeland, the demolition of Arab houses and the imposition of collective punishment in violation of international law, covenants, conventions and resolutions concerning fundamental human rights and freedoms,

Affirming that a member State which pursues a policy of occupation, expansion, oppression of freedom, destruction of production establishments, undermining the interests of the Arab labour force and employers and depriving Arab workers of their social security benefits despite the large cuts made by the Israeli authorities, and which continues to exploit and discriminate against these workers, shall be considered as violating the letter and spirit of the ILO Constitution, the Declaration of Philadelphia and international labour Conventions and Recommendations,

Believing in the ILO's responsibility as a member of the United Nations family specialised in protecting the rights and freedoms of workers and employers, promoting their interests and helping them to face terror, oppressive and inhuman practices and measures that threaten their freedoms, rights, living and working conditions and livelihood;

1. Condemns Israeli terror and acts and methods of oppression aimed at preventing thousands of young Palestinians from work by breaking their hands and toes, incapacitating them for life.

2. Condemns the Israeli authorities' intransigence in refusing to implement the ILO's resolutions of 1974 and 1980, the continuation of their expansion and settlement policies and the violation of the fundamental rights and freedoms of the Arab workers and employers in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories.

3. Calls upon the Governing Body and the Director-General of the ILO, the international development funds and, in particular, the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) to intensify their efforts urgently to provide all forms of assistance and technical support directly to Arab workers and employers in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories, in order to consolidate their technical, social, and economic capabilities and strengthen their ability to counter the arbitrary measures practised against them by the Israeli occupation authorities.

4. Requests the Director-General of the ILO to intervene with the Israeli authorities so that they put an end to their arbitrary acts in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories, release the Palestinian trade unionists, cease their terror policies and practices and discontinue their displacement and expulsion policies, which run counter to the fundamental rights and freedoms guaranteed by the ILO Constitution, the Declaration of Philadelphia and international labour Conventions and Recommendations.

5. Calls for the setting up, at every session of the Conference, of a special committee of Conference members to study the periodic reports submitted by the Director-General to the Conference concerning the conditions of Arab workers and employers in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories, as well as the technical programmes provided for them and the reports submitted by international establishments in this respect, and to submit to the Conference a report on the outcome of its work to be discussed at one of its sittings.

Resolution concerning the role of the ILO in the protection and promotion of human rights, submitted by Mr. Baker, Workers' delegate, United States; Mrs. Buerud Pedersen, Workers' delegate, Norway; Mr. Dreifuss, Workers' delegate, Switzerland; Mr. Jaaskelainen, Workers' delegate, Finland; Mr. Karlsson, Workers' delegate, Sweden; Mr. Mercier, Workers' delegate, Canada; Mr. Morton, Workers' delegate, United Kingdom; Mr. Muhr, Workers' delegate, Federal Republic of Germany; Mr. Sánchez Madariaga, Workers' delegate, Mexico; Mr. Sunderam, Workers' delegate, Sri Lanka; Mr. Svenningsen, Workers' delegate, Denmark; Mr. Tanaka, Workers' delegate, Japan; Mr. Vanni, Workers' delegate, Italy; and Mr. Verzetnitsch, Workers' delegate, Austria

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Reaffirming its deep conviction that respect for human rights is an essential condition for social justice, for balanced economic development and for the establishment of lasting peace,

Recalling that freedom of association and trade union rights constitute a vital and integral part of human rights and basic freedoms and that, at the same time, the full exercise of freedom of association is possible only when basic human rights are respected,

Underlining the special significance of the 40th anniversary, in 1988, of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights as well as of the ILO's Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87),

Welcoming the Director-General's Report to this session of the conference entitled Human rights—A common responsibility, which highlights the significant contribution of the ILO towards the defence and promotion of human rights,

Emphasising the close links between the different forms of ILO action, namely standard setting, its supervisory procedures, the promotion of standard implementation and technical co-operation, as well as the vital contribution obtained through effective tripartite co-operation in these areas,

Affirming in this regard the special importance of ILO standards related to the protection of basic human rights which fall within the ILO's competence, such as freedom of association, the abolition of forced labour and the elimination of discrimination in employment,

Reiterating the fundamental principle that all workers without distinction are entitled to full trade union rights and freedoms, irrespective of the status of their job or whether they are employed in the private, the public or the rural sector,

Expressing grave concern that violations of the principles of freedom of association continue to result in numerous cases of killings of trade unionists, disappearances, forced exile, mass arrest, ill treatment and torture, prolonged and repeated detention without trial, severe sentences for normal trade union activities, occupation of trade union premises, confiscation of trade union property, suspension of trade union activities and dissolution of trade union organisations;

1. Call upon the governments of all member States of the International Labour Organisation:

- (a) to guarantee the full respect for and application of basic human and trade union rights as enunciated in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, in the United Nations Covenants and in the relevant Conventions of the International Labour Organisation;
- (b) to ratify, to this end, all the relevant ILO Conventions and, in particular, to seize the occasion of the 40th anniversary of the adoption of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention (No. 87) to ratify, where this has not already been done, and effectively to implement this Convention;
- (c) to co-operate fully with the ILO in its action for the protection and enhancement of basic human rights that fall within its competence, including through close co-operation with the ILO's monitoring and supervisory machinery;
- (d) to devote special attention to the protection of the basic rights of the more vulnerable sections of the population such as women, migrant workers and low-income groups;
- (e) to stimulate actively effective tripartite co-operation as a means of enhancing the full and constructive contribution of the major productive forces in society to the economic and social development of their countries as well as to the strengthening and adequate functioning of democratic institutions.

2. Calls upon employers' and workers' organisations to intensify their efforts for the promotion of human rights and economic and social justice at the national and international level, and in particular:

- (a) to secure at all times the fully independent and democratic character of their own organisations and to contribute, to the best of their ability, to the strengthening of democratic procedures and institutions in their countries;
- (b) to continue to press for the ratification and full implementation of international labour standards and other instruments related to basic human rights and to co-operate actively with the ILO in monitoring the progress made in this regard.

3. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to request the Director-General:

- (a) to give maximum support and assistance to member States for the further ratification and implementation of ILO Conventions and to put special emphasis in this regard on those instruments dealing with basic human rights;
- (b) to use its technical co-operation activities in all areas of its competence to promote the ratification and implementation of ILO standards and to take into account, in this connection, that persistent violations of standards related to basic human rights and freedoms cannot be ignored in the process of granting technical assistance to member States;
- (c) to explore constantly ways and means of intensifying the ILO's contribution towards the furtherance of economic and social justice in the world and, in particular, its action against unemployment, poverty, exploitation and discrimination;
- (d) to examine for this purpose with the other international bodies concerned the possibilities of establishing a positive interaction between the promotion of basic international labour standards, on the one hand, and policies for trade, aid and development, on the other;
- (e) to continue to secure maximum co-operation with the United Nations for the protection and promotion of human rights everywhere in the world.

Resolution concerning environmental protection and employment, submitted by Mr. Baker, Workers' delegate, United States; Mrs. Buverud Pedersen, Workers' delegate, Norway; Mr. Dreifuss, Workers' delegate, Switzerland; Mr. Jaaskelainen, Workers' delegate, Finland; Mr. Karlsson, Workers' delegate, Sweden; Mr. Mercier, Workers' delegate, Canada; Mr. Morton, Workers' delegate, United Kingdom; Mr. Muhr, Workers' delegate, Federal Republic of Germany; Mr. Sánchez Madariaga, Workers' delegate, Mexico; Mr. Sunderam, Workers' delegate, Sri Lanka; Mr. Svenningsen, Workers' delegate, Denmark; Mr. Tanaka, Workers' delegate, Japan; Mr. Vanni, Workers' delegate, Italy; and Mr. Verzetnitsch, Workers' delegate, Austria

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Welcoming the report of the World Commission on Environment and Development entitled Our common future,

Noting with deep concern that continuing problems of environmental damage present an increasing threat to the human environment and to the quality of human life,

Considering that only economic activity and employment compatible with public health and the environment are secure and acceptable agents of progress,

Emphasising that the problem of drought is partly caused by ecological mismanagement and that the excessive and improper use of pesticides is a danger to both the working environment and the general environment in rural areas of developing countries in particular,

Stressing that the working environment forms an important and integral part of the general environment as a whole and that improvements in the working environment will enhance the quality of the latter,

Convinced that through judicious policy measures at the national and international level a positive link can be established between the requirements of environmental protection and employment creation,

Considering that environmental protection measures at the national level are essential but not sufficient, since pollution does not stop at national borders, and that therefore close international co-operation is also needed to protect the environment and to ensure the positive effect of environmental measures on employment;

1. Calls upon all member States:

- (a) to take full account of the requirements of environmental protection in the elaboration and pursuance of effective industrial and employment policies;
- (b) to encourage, through appropriate economic and employment policies, the creation of jobs which are conducive to the establishment and maintenance of a clean and healthy environment;
- (c) to encourage investments in key areas, such as clean air, soil and water programmes, public transport, rational use of energy, waste disposal, recycling of used materials, environment supervision, nature preservation, countryside protection, improvement of housing areas, which would create jobs as well as protect the environment;
- (d) to stimulate the industrial restructuring of enterprises which constitute a heavy burden on the environment in order to enable them to attain the necessary environmental standards as rapidly as possible and at the same time, as far as possible, to maintain or increase the number of jobs involved in the restructuring process;
- (e) to take special measures for the safe production, use, storage, transport and disposal, compatible with the environment, of highly hazardous substances and for the development of substitutes which are harmless or less harmful for the health and environment;
- (f) to take special and effective measures for the elimination, and pending the elimination for minimising the hazardous effects, of the excessive and improper use of pesticides in rural areas, particularly in developing countries;

- (g) to engage in effective tripartite consultations with a view to bringing about an integrated approach in the elaboration and pursuance of policies for full employment and a clean and healthy environment;
 - (h) to strengthen international co-operation in the fields of environmental protection and employment, in particular in order to slow down, stop and, as far as possible, reverse the process of desertification, to prevent transborder pollution and pollution of the seas, as well as to minimise the environmental effects of industrial accidents.
2. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to request the Director-General:
- (a) to undertake, in collaboration with the United Nations Environment Programme, a programme of ILO action concerning the environment which provides especially for educational and training activities in this field, as well as studies on the economic and social consequences of environmental policies;
 - (b) in preparing the programme and budget proposals for the biennium 1990-91:
 - (i) to take into account the recommendations contained in the World Commission's report in all relevant programme areas;
 - (ii) to include studies on the positive links between environmental protection and employment creation.

Resolution concerning child labour, submitted by Mr. Baker, Workers' delegate, United States; Mrs. Buverud Pedersen, Workers' delegate, Norway; Mr. Dreifuss, Workers' delegate, Switzerland; Mr. Jaaskelainen, Workers' delegate, Finland; Mr. Karlsson, Workers' delegate, Sweden; Mr. Mercier, Workers' delegate, Canada; Mr. Morton, Workers' delegate, United Kingdom; Mr. Muhr, Workers' delegate, Federal Republic of Germany; Mr. Sánchez Madariaga, Workers' delegate, Mexico; Mr. Sunderam, Workers' delegate, Sri Lanka; Mr. Svenningsen, Workers' delegate, Denmark; Mr. Tanaka, Workers' delegate, Japan; Mr. Vanni, Workers' delegate, Italy; and Mr. Verzetnitsch, Workers' delegate, Austria

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Emphasising the serious repercussions of child labour on the health and on the physical, emotional, educational and intellectual development of children,

Affirming that children below the legal minimum age for employment should not work, should not be made to work and should not be taken into employment,

Expressing deep concern that, despite the growing awareness and resentment of world public opinion, child labour remains widespread in many parts of the world and that working children are very often exploited and employed under unacceptable health and safety conditions,

Confirming the commitment of the ILO to make every effort towards the elimination of child labour and the protection of children and to lend maximum support and assistance to member States for the earliest possible fulfilment of these objectives,

Recalling the resolution concerning the International Year of the Child and the progressive elimination of child labour and transitional measures, adopted by the International Labour Conference in 1979 and reaffirming the validity of the proposals for action contained therein,

Welcoming the efforts made by the United Nations for the elaboration of an International Convention on the Rights of the Child which should devote adequate attention to the problem of child labour and, in particular, should include provisions in support of the effective implementation of the relevant ILO instruments,

Stressing the unabated relevance and importance of existing international labour standards related to child labour;

1. Calls upon member States to intensify their efforts for the total elimination of child labour and for the protection of working children, and in particular:

- (a) to adopt and pursue effectively comprehensive economic and social policies to combat rural and urban poverty and unemployment which are the root causes of child labour;
- (b) to ratify on a priority basis, where this has not already been done, the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138), and to implement the provisions of this Convention as well as those contained in the Minimum Age Recommendation, 1973 (No. 146), and the Minimum Age (Underground Work) Recommendation, 1965 (No. 124);
- (c) to take all the necessary social and legislative measures for the progressive elimination of child labour and, pending the total eradication of child labour, to observe ILO standards in the fields of employment, working conditions, health and safety and human resource development and to ensure, in this connection, the introduction and effective implementation of special protective measures for child workers in all sectors;
- (d) to apply fully and effectively a system of compulsory education and training, freely accessible to all sections of the population, and to extend adequate facilities for this purpose;
- (e) to ensure the provision of fair wages and other forms of remuneration which should directly benefit the child;
- (f) to ensure the effective functioning of an adequate system of labour inspection, including for the rural sector and in respect of small and medium-sized enterprises, and to take all other measures conducive to the elimination of child labour.

2. Calls upon employers' and workers' organisations:

- (a) to co-operate fully with governments and other relevant national institutions in all efforts and campaigns for the eradication of child labour, including with regard to the strict application of existing national legislation and international standards in this field;

- (b) to initiate their own schemes and projects, at the community and enterprise levels, that may directly or indirectly contribute towards the progressive elimination or the alleviation of the adverse effects of child labour.

3. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director-General:

- (a) to make every effort to secure the continuation and strengthening of the ILO's action for the elimination of child labour and the protection of working children;
- (b) to stimulate and assist the ILO's constituents in developing programmes aimed at raising public awareness of the nature and consequences of the child labour problem and in educating the public in general, and employers and workers in particular, about the relevant laws and regulations;
- (c) to continue monitoring and publicising experiences and progress made by member States in the elimination of child labour and the protection of children at work.

Resolution concerning the contribution of the ILO to the strengthening of respect for human and trade union rights, submitted by Mr. Al-Hujailan, Workers' delegate, Kuwait; Mr. Andreev, Workers' delegate, Bulgaria; Mr. Bochow, Workers' delegate, German Democratic Republic; Mr. Bulgak, Workers' delegate, Byelorussian SSR; Mr. Escandell Romero, Workers' delegate, Cuba; Mr. Kosik, Workers' delegate, Czechoslovakia; Mr. Kovalevski, Workers' delegate, Ukrainian SSR; Mr. Timmer, Workers' delegate, Hungary; and Mr. Yanaef, Workers' delegate, USSR

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Welcoming the forthcoming 40th anniversary of the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights of 10 December 1948 which, emphasising the interdependence of civil and political rights, on the one hand, and of economic, social and cultural rights, on the other, was proclaimed by the United Nations General Assembly as a common standard of achievement for all people and all nations,

Endorsing the principle embodied in the Constitution of the ILO that universal and lasting peace can be established only if it is based on social justice, which is inconceivable without the effective exercise of freedom of association,

Recognising that full respect for freedom of association is an essential prerequisite to enable the workers to play a constructive role in the economic and social development of their countries,

Concerned that especially in periods of economic crisis the rights of the workers, in particular freedom of association, are under threat in many parts of the world, with the aim of significantly reducing the capacity of their trade union organisations to protect the workers from intensified exploitation and unemployment,

Emphasizing that the failure to respect freedom of association and the right to collective bargaining threatens further economic and social progress in the countries,

Aware that the International Labour Organisation should further strengthen its efforts to contribute, by effective measures, to the implementation of labour standards covering human rights,

Endorsing the resolution concerning the 40th anniversary of the adoption of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), adopted at the 73rd Session of the International Labour Conference in 1987;

1. Reaffirms the ILO's commitment to promote respect for the principles and rights embodied in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights,

2. Appeals to the Governments of ILO member States:

- (a) to recognise and implement the basic human rights embodied in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, respect for which is an imperative precondition for the practical implementation of trade union rights and the normal exercise of trade union activities,
- (b) to ratify and apply fully the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), the Workers' Representatives Convention, 1971 (No. 135), the Rural Workers' Organisations Convention, 1975 (No. 141), and the Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151), and, pending their ratification, to guarantee in law and in practice the observance of the principle set forth in those Conventions;
- (c) to ensure respect for those civil liberties that are essential for the exercise of trade union rights as contained in the resolution concerning trade union rights and their relation to civil liberties, adopted by the International Labour Conference at its 54th Session (1970);
- (d) to refrain from any action which calls trade union rights and civil liberties into question, and, especially, not to allow the condemnation of, or other repressive measures against, trade unionists on account of activities carried out in the exercise of these rights and liberties;
- (e) to require employers' organisations to promote the democratic participation of workers and their trade unions in the enterprise, to enable them to play more effectively the role that falls to them in the economic and social development in their respective countries;
- (f) to promote the recognition of trade union rights and, in particular, to ensure the effective protection of the exercise of these rights in multinational corporations, and to eliminate all social and legal differences between parent companies and subsidiaries.

3. Invites the Governing Body of the ILO:

- (a) to pursue the action undertaken by the Office to assist member States to ensure the full application of the principles and standards of freedom of association and other trade union rights and liberties based thereon;

- (b) to ensure that the necessary financial and human resources are allocated to enable the ILO to give adequate assistance to governments and to organisations of workers on questions related to the implementation of trade union rights and liberties.

4. Invites the Director-General of the ILO to approach governments in order to ensure the effective protection of trade union activists through the strict implementation of the relevant ILO Conventions and Recommendations.

Resolution concerning development, employment and environment, submitted by Mr. Al-Hujailan, Workers' delegate, Kuwait; Mr. Andreev, Workers' delegate, Bulgaria; Mr. Bochow, Workers' delegate, German Democratic Republic; Mr. Bulgak, Workers' delegate, Byelorussian SSR; Mr. Escandell Romero, Workers' delegate, Cuba; Mr. Kosik, Workers' delegate, Czechoslovakia; Mr. Kovalovski, Workers' delegate, Ukrainian SSR; Mr. Timmer, Workers' delegate, Hungary; and Mr. Yanaef, Workers' delegate, USSR

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Considering that in the present situation problems relating to employment and productive investment for the satisfaction of human needs, as well as other problems affecting the world of labour, are subjects of major concern in both industrialised and developing countries and are closely linked to economic and development problems,

Recalling the Preamble to the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation and the Declaration of Philadelphia which affirms that "all human beings, irrespective of race, creed or sex, have the right to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity",

Bearing in mind article 23 of the Universal Declaration on Human Rights which states that "everyone has the right to work, to free choice of employment, to just and favourable conditions of work and to protection against unemployment",

Considering that international détente, development and trade and the adoption of measures to promote employment are crucial conditions for lasting peace and the solution of social problems in the interest of workers and peoples all over the world,

Recalling the resolution concerning development, foreign debt and the social objectives of the International Labour Organisation, adopted at the 72nd Session (1986) of the International Labour Conference, which states "that the external debt of the developing countries and the net transfer of resources from them to developed countries have reached alarming proportions, which, together with other economic factors, thereby compromise the progress of their peoples and their levels of employment and income, rendering it more difficult to satisfy the basic needs of their inhabitants",

Conscious that only within the framework of a wider co-operation based on equal terms pursued in an appropriate manner, supported by sufficient means and with the democratic participation of the population can the revitalisation of development, the reduction of unemployment and the solution of economic and social problems affecting the workers be effective,

Keeping in mind the unavoidable need for steady development for all countries, and particularly the developing countries, based on the principles of mutual advantage and non-interference, with the aim of economic and social progress and economic security for all countries,

Stating that economic insecurity is a major problem for the workers and peoples, as reflected in particular in the external debt, the imbalance of trade and of payments, the deterioration of terms of trade, the high level of unemployment and the deterioration of working and living conditions,

Bearing in mind the resolution concerning employment policy and environmental protection, adopted by the Fourth European Regional Conference of the ILO in September 1987,

Convinced that any policy aimed at economic and social development must be so conceived as to protect effectively and improve the environment,

Noting that the introduction of new technology is causing upheavals in the structure of skills and jobs and in the organisation of labour, and noting with concern that, in many countries, this is leading to a severe reorganisation of the labour market that is detrimental to the workers,

Emphasising that close national and international co-operation is needed to prevent the negative impact of structural adjustment measures and changes in the production process on working and living environment and to increase the positive effect of improved global environment on employment,

Taking into consideration the conclusions of the High-level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment held in November 1987;

1. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to call upon the governments of member States to:

- (a) ensure the full participation of workers' organisations in the formulation and implementation of programmes of economic and social development;
- (b) create conditions for expanding industrial activities, agriculture, agro-economic industries, small-size industries and co-operatives so as effectively to promote policies aimed at full employment;
- (c) take appropriate measures to promote the implementation of the principle of international economic security, a factor of stability, of economic and social progress and of the development of productive capacity and of jobs;
- (d) strengthen international co-operation on environmental protection to prevent or minimise the negative impact of ecologically unbalanced development on all labour-related issues.

2. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to:

- (a) urge strongly the international organisations, and especially the World Bank and the IMF, when formulating their programmes in different countries and regions, to bear in mind the social consequences thereof;

- (b) to urge the governments of member States to pursue a policy of full employment.

3. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director-General to:

- (a) intensify action to assist member States in their economic and social development, particularly in promoting job creation as an important means of improving the working and living conditions of the working people;
- (b) expand the ILO's educational activities into the training and retraining made necessary by new forms of production linked to scientific and technological progress;
- (c) take further steps to discharge the ILO's specific responsibility in respect of improving working conditions and environment and the well-being of workers, through the strengthening of PIACT and its wider co-ordination with other ILO programmes and, as appropriate, with those of other international organisations;
- (d) give an appropriate follow-up to the requests contained in the operative part of this resolution, when preparing the Programme and Budget for 1990-1991 and when implementing the planned activities.

Resolution concerning solidarity and co-operation between the affluent countries and countries of the Third World and the role of the ILO in social and economic development, submitted by Mr. Hordijk, Workers' delegate, Netherlands; and Mr. Peirens, Workers' delegate, Belgium

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Recalling the Declaration of Philadelphia, which states that "all human beings, irrespective of race, creed or sex, have the right to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity", that "poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere" and that measure should be taken at the international and national level "to expand production and consumption, to avoid severe economic fluctuations, to promote the economic and social advancement of the less developed countries of the world, to assure greater stability in world prices of primary products, and to promote ... international trade",

Noting that numerous industrialised and developing countries are faced with serious social and economic problems and that in the countries of the Third World hundreds of millions of persons living in rural areas are suffering from malnutrition, disease, ignorance and unemployment and from depths of poverty that are incompatible with human dignity,

Considering that underdevelopment is the outcome of a whole set of problems attributable to certain geographic and climatic conditions, to unjust or inappropriate economic structures and relations, and to national shortcomings in organisation and management,

Considering that the drop in commodity prices, the deterioration in terms of trade, the rise of protectionism, the constraints and measures inherent in the external debt and the servicing of that debt and the world economic recession prevent the normal, just and authentic development of developing countries and increasingly generate poverty, underemployment, and unemployment,

Considering that inequalities and disparities between populations and between rich and poor countries are becoming more pronounced and that the world economic system has not provided the developing countries with the same opportunities for growth and progress as the industrialised nations on which they are dependent,

Considering the urgent need to seek ways and means of creating a new international economic order through solidarity and co-operation among the Community of Nations, so as to establish between the affluent and poor countries just and mutually beneficial relations which ensure the development of all countries,

Recalling the principle of peaceful international co-operation and the responsibility of the international community in this regard, inasmuch as all States have reciprocal obligations in the field of development which are based on the concepts of interdependence and solidarity,

Aware that economic recovery, a reduction in unemployment and the solution to workers' economic and social problems can be brought about only within the framework of broad-based co-operation among countries that are placed on an equal footing, on the understanding that such co-operation, pursued in an appropriate manner, is sustained by adequate resources and benefits from the democratic participation of the population,

Recalling the resolution concerning the strengthening of action for the least developed countries adopted by the International Labour Conference at its 70th Session (1984), the resolution adopted at its 71st Session (1985) concerning the most urgent problems of Africa, whose economic recovery was the subject of priority programmes based largely on the determination and commitment of the international community to support and supplement the efforts made by the African countries themselves,

Confirming the resolution concerning the need to promote co-operation between Europe and the developing countries, in particular Africa and the least developed countries in other regions, and the contribution of the ILO to solving their social and economic problems, adopted at the Fourth European Regional Conference in September 1987,

Convinced that increased economic co-operation, especially between developing countries, would make a positive contribution to the solution of problems because it would constitute a dynamic factor in the effective restructuring of international economic relations,

Further convinced that efforts should be intensified to attain general and total disarmament and to devote the resources thus released to development activities, especially for the benefit of developing countries,

Believing that the ILO, by reason of its commitment to social concerns, its long-standing experience, the importance and diversity of its technical co-operation and its tripartite structure, has an essential role to play in the implementation of co-operation programmes that are conducive to the attainment of social and economic development objectives among the various nations;

1. Invites the developing countries which are member States of the ILO:

- (a) to adopt social and economic development programmes and policies which correspond to their needs and priorities, paying particular attention to the poorest groups and to the need for an equitable distribution of the benefits deriving from such programmes and policies;
- (b) to encourage the participation of all strata of the population in the development process, by respecting, among others, the international provisions relating to human rights, particularly freedom of association and the rights of workers as well as the right of rural workers to freely establish organisations;
- (c) to implement adjustment policies devised and accepted by workers' organisations, which should enable them to participate more fully in an interdependent world economy;
- (d) to foster economic and technical co-operation among developing countries by promoting the exchange of goods, technology and expertise.

2. Invites the member States of the ILO:

- (a) to adopt policies which ensure balanced economic and trade relations with developing countries;
- (b) to make sure that the various terms and conditions of the various forms of development assistance are appropriate and correspond to needs and that the resources allocated for this purpose are adequate, amount to at least 0.7 per cent of GNP, are increased and are renewed in order to ensure the attainment of objectives and to strengthen the capacity of the beneficiary countries in the various regions so that they may subsequently be able to undertake their social and economic development by their own efforts;
- (c) to take account of the social dimensions of development in co-operation policies by providing the ILO, either directly or through the UNDP, with adequate resources to adapt its technical co-operation programme to the priority needs of rural and urban populations;
- (d) to accord particular attention to the needs of the least developed countries in Africa and in other regions;
- (e) to put an end to the enormous waste of material and financial resources poured into the arms industry and to allocate the resources thus released to co-operation for development and peace.

3. Requests the Governing Body of the ILO to instruct the Director-General:

- (a) to carry out studies in the field of co-operation between industrialised countries and countries of the Third World on questions which fall within the scope of the ILO, relating to:
 - (i) the ways and means of co-operating with developing countries in the areas of labour administration, standards, employment, technical and vocational training, priority action in the education sector, support for food policies, rural development, the promotion of co-operatives, artisanal industries, small and medium-sized enterprises and tourism;

- (ii) the analysis of obstacles to the promotion and effectiveness of the ILO's technical co-operation, the definition of the priority needs of the various countries, and suggestions as to the appropriate forms of co-operation between the affluent countries and the countries of the Third World for the purposes of development;
- (b) to strengthen the link between technical co-operation and international labour standards, which are the ILO's two main means of action for promoting its objectives of progress and social justice, in order to give the developing countries every opportunity to ratify and apply the instruments of the ILO;
- (c) to strengthen relations between the ILO and the various international, regional or subregional organisations, so as to:
 - (i) inform these organisations better of the experience acquired by the ILO in the field of technical co-operation, the possibilities for action which it offers either directly or through its training centres such as the International Centre for Advanced Technical and Vocational Training, Turin;
 - (ii) draw their attention also to the methodological aspect of the ILO's experience of technical co-operation in numerous fields, particularly with regard to the situation of women, the informal sector, and the fight against poverty and rural development;
 - (iii) co-ordinate better the activities of the ILO with those conducted for the benefit of developing countries by the various organisations, and above all within the United Nations system, especially activities carried out in the field so as to avoid waste and duplication of effort;
- (d) continue the workers' education programme and the programme of assistance to trade union organisations in developing countries.

Resolution concerning the promotion of human rights and development, submitted by Mr. Hordijk, Worker's delegate, Netherlands; and Mr. Peirens, Workers' delegate, Belgium

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Considering the Declaration of Philadelphia which affirms that "all human beings, irrespective of race, creed or sex, have the right to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity",

Recalling the Preamble to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights which considers that "recognition of the inherent dignity and of the equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human family is the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world",

Welcoming the forthcoming celebration of the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights whose basic ideas have inspired a relentless struggle against injustice and inequality and for freedom and led to the adoption of instruments and laws for the promotion of human rights at the international, regional and national level,

Welcoming further the 40th anniversary of the adoption of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), which must be an occasion for encouraging and registering further progress in the ratification and application of a Convention that guarantees the existence and functioning of strong trade union organisations, which are necessary in any democracy,

Considering that, although basic human rights and freedoms are clearly laid down in the provisions of the International Bill of Human Rights, in pertinent ILO instruments and in national laws, the conditions have not been created which allow each person to enjoy his economic, social and cultural as well as civil and political rights, and that the machinery for their application, monitoring and international supervision is encountering difficulties,

Considering that the structure of the world economy, marked as it is by inflation, unemployment, the imbalance in North-South relations, economic, trade, financial and monetary difficulties and the foreign debt of developing countries, is not conducive to the furtherance and practical implementation of rights of a collective nature (the right to development, to employment, to an adequate standard of living, to health, to food, to housing, to social services...),

Observing that economic and social underdevelopment is a major obstacle to the enjoyment of economic, social and cultural rights and affects large segments of the population living in tragic conditions of poverty and destitution,

Deploping the fact that the situation in regions and various countries with different political and social systems reflects the institutionalised violation of fundamental provisions relating to human rights and of the ILO's major Conventions concerning freedom of association and the right to organise, equality of opportunity and conditions of work,

Observing that the policy in force and the repressive regime in territories under foreign occupation are repugnant to the human conscience, lead to acts of violence and flagrant injustice and have serious repercussions on peace, liberty, work, peoples' right to self-determination and the process of development,

Concerned that the Black population and workers of South Africa continue to be the victims of daily discrimination, unacceptable conditions of life and work, lack of freedom, the restriction of trade union rights and violent repressive measures,

Considering that in the International Bill of Human Rights the peoples of the United Nations have declared their determination to promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom,

Convinced that any policy aiming at growth and development must go hand in hand with respect for all human rights,

Taking into consideration the conclusions of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment held in November 1987 which recognise the urgent need for measures based on the widest social consensus in order, inter alia, to bring about a balanced world economy, to combat unemployment, and to lighten the debt burden of developing countries, which will further their development, promote employment and reduce poverty,

Convinced that the various financial institutions and international organisations have an important role to play in the implementation of effective adjustment programmes which ensure growth, equitable conditions of life and work, social justice, and respect for and the exercise of human rights;

1. Reaffirms the fundamental principles on which the Organisation is based and, in particular, that:

- (a) labour is not a commodity;
- (b) freedom of expression and of association are essential to sustained progress;
- (c) poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere;
- (d) the war against want requires to be carried on with unrelenting vigour within each nation and by continuous and concerted international effort.

2. Invites States Members of the ILO to foster respect for the basic rights and freedoms proclaimed in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and to take all necessary and appropriate measures inter alia, to protect all workers against all acts of discrimination and to ensure the free exercise of their right to work, right to freedom of association, right to organise and to bargain collectively, right to personal freedom and security and right to protection against arbitrary arrest and detention.

3. Urges the governments of States Members of the ILO which have not done so to ratify and apply fully the ILO's standards on basic human rights relating to freedom of association (Conventions Nos. 11, 87, 98, 135, 141, 151), forced labour (Conventions Nos. 29, 105) and equality of opportunity and treatment (Conventions Nos. 100, 111, 156).

4. Requests States Members of the ILO:

- (a) to facilitate the participation of workers' and employers' organisations in promoting the application of the relevant instruments mentioned above;
- (b) to co-operate fully with the ILO's supervisory bodies by:
 - (i) sending detailed reports on the application of standards;
 - (ii) responding speedily and precisely to complaints and providing supplementary information where required;
 - (iii) agreeing to requests for on-the-spot missions;
 - (iv) complying with recommendations adopted during the examination of specific cases.

5. Requests the Governing Body of the ILO:

- (a) to take all measures to develop and render more effective the supervisory bodies for the application of standards, as well as the various bodies and procedures for examining complaints;
- (b) to instruct the Director-General to intensify the ILO's efforts to:

- (i) promote the ratification and application of ILO Conventions relating to basic human rights, particularly freedom of association and the right to organise;
- (ii) promote studies with a view to framing standards concerning human rights within the ILO's sphere of competence which have not yet been codified;
- (iii) increase awareness and understanding of human and workers' rights and freedoms by means of a world-wide campaign based on the dissemination of documentation and information and the organisation of meetings, symposia and seminars on the occasion of the 40th anniversary of the adoption of Convention No. 87 and of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights;
- (iv) develop and upgrade workers' education activities as they relate to the strengthening of genuine and independent trade union organisations, to workers' rights and to their democratic participation and their role in development, which is closely linked with the enjoyment of economic, social and cultural rights;
- (v) step up efforts in the field of vocational training, workers' education and consolidation of the trade unions of oppressed workers in southern Africa and in the occupied territories of the Middle East;
- (vi) respond positively to proposals and recommendations arising out of the general debate which further the promotion of and respect for workers' rights and human rights and freedoms.

6. As regards developments, requests States Members of the ILO:

- (a) to create economic, social, cultural and political structures which guarantee the development, democracy and the enjoyment of all human rights;
- (b) to give priority to development which seeks to free men from fear, anxiety, hunger, ignorance and oppression, by instituting jointly with workers and employers measures and action programmes which take into account the economic and social dimensions of policies that protect the interests of the most disadvantaged and ensure respect for all human rights;
- (c) to work together to:
 - (i) strengthen international co-operation and devote more financial and technical resources to development and peace;
 - (ii) put an end to injustice and instability in economic, trade and financial relations.

7. Requests the Governing Body of the ILO to instruct the Director-General:

- (a) to strengthen within the ILO's sphere of competence all forms of assistance and aid which further training, employment, working conditions, production, development and respect for rights and freedoms;
- (b) to pursue in close co-operation with the other international bodies concerned the realisation of objectives in the field of development and human rights.

Resolution concerning the promotion of self-employment, submitted by the Government delegation of the Islamic Republic of Iran

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Recalling the Declaration of Philadelphia which recognises the solemn obligation of the ILO to further among the nations of the world programmes which will achieve full employment and the raising of standards of living, and that the Preamble to the Constitution of the ILO provides for the prevention of unemployment,

Recalling the Universal Declaration of Human Rights as it relates to the right to work, to equitable and satisfactory conditions of work and to protection against unemployment,

Noting the international labour standards and resolutions of relevance to self-employment, particularly the Employment Policy Recommendation, 1964, (No. 122), the Employment Policy (Supplementary Provisions) Recommendation, 1984 (No. 169), and the resolution concerning the contribution of small and medium undertakings to economic and social progress and to the creation of employment, in particular in developing countries, and the resolution concerning the promotion of small and medium-sized enterprises, adopted respectively at the 60th and 72nd Sessions of the International Labour Conference,

Noting that self-employment as one of the vehicles for employment creation with modest capital needs can contribute to socio-economic development, particularly in developing countries,

Considering that self-employment can, by marshalling managerial and entrepreneurial initiative, stimulate the development of a pool of managers, entrepreneurs and skilled workers,

Noting with concern the precarious conditions of employment and social security of the self-employed, particularly in developing countries where many of those engaged in self-employment are not covered by the greater part of the labour and social security laws;

1. Invite governments, in consultation with employers' and workers' organisation:

- (a) to promote, as a part of overall employment policy, productive self-employment activities in both the rural and the urban sector;
- (b) to review all policies and regulations affecting self-employment, with a view to removing specific obstacles thereto, providing the self-employed with credit facilities and all forms of assistance, improving their conditions of employment, gradually extending labour and social protection to them and, as appropriate, making special and more flexible regulations for the promotion of self-employment;
- (c) to develop closer links between educational institutions and the world of work so as to strengthen and expand self-employment and entrepreneurship training in the formal as well as in the informal sector;
- (d) to develop reliable and systematic labour market information, occupational information and guidance services in areas offering opportunities for self-employment.

2. Calls on the Governing Body of the ILO to instruct the Director-General:

- (a) to carry out studies on recent trends in self-employment, governments' policies and programmes concerning the conditions of employment and social protection for the self-employed, with emphasis on the urban informal sectors in developing countries;
- (b) to strengthen the ILO's technical co-operation activities in the field of self-employment by increasing the number of appropriate projects and by training policy-makers and officials concerned with self-employment promotion;
- (c) to encourage and strengthen regional co-operation among the member States for the exchange of information and experiences with respect to self-employment policies and programmes.

Resolution concerning occupational safety and health, submitted by Mr. Clever, Government delegate, Federal Republic of Germany; Mr. Rood, Government delegate, Netherlands; and Mr. Schintgen, Government delegate, Luxembourg

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Recalling the resolution concerning the improvement of working conditions and environment and the conclusions concerning future action in the field of working conditions and environment, adopted at the 70th Session of the International Labour Conference in 1984,

Recalling also the resolution concerning the promotion of measures against risks and accidents arising out of the use of dangerous substances and processes in industry, adopted at the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference in 1985,

Recalling further the resolution concerning occupational safety and health, adopted by the Fourth European Regional Conference of the International Labour Organisation in 1987,

Considering the general survey on safety in the working environment prepared by the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations for the 73rd Session of the International Labour Conference in 1987,

Recognising that the overall number of work accidents and occupational diseases in many member States has been reduced considerably over the last few decades, thanks to appropriate efforts,

Noting that the development of modern techniques and technologies has, on the one hand, helped to raise productivity, improve working conditions and do away with arduous physical labour and work methods dangerous to health and life but that it can, on the other hand, give rise to new occupational hazards,

Noting with concern that the widespread and increasing application of new production methods and use of dangerous substances, as well as the hazards connected with radiation and biotechnology, result in increased occupational risks for workers,

Stressing the need for exercising better supervision over the use of dangerous substances,

Underlining the need for systems of occupational safety and health and labour inspection to be further developed and strengthened,

Recognising that active participation of workers and employers, their representatives and their organisations—or, if need be, both—constitutes an essential factor in health protection and accident prevention (regardless of their other duties in this field) as well as in the improvement of working conditions and the working environment,

Stressing the role of training and information in the prevention of adverse effects of the use of new technologies,

Emphasising the importance of complying with international labour standards on occupational safety and health and under the International Programme for the Improvement of Working Conditions and Environment (PIACT),

Convinced that the application of new occupational safety and health measures would enable further progress to be made in safety at work and occupational medicine,

Considering that the development of progressive occupational safety and health measures would have economic advantages and that an international exchange of experience could result in reducing the costs of developing new occupational safety and health measures,

Recognising the need for co-operation between governments and employers' and workers' organisations in the identification and prevention of the adverse effects of new technologies on workers' health,

Underlining the importance of widening and deepening co-operation among member States in the prevention of work accidents and occupational diseases;

1. Requests the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to call upon all members States:

- (a) to incorporate effective legislative, technical, economic and social measures in their internal policies in order to create and maintain working conditions conducive to occupational safety and health, particularly when new technologies are introduced;
- (b) to ratify and apply effectively the international labour instruments specifically related to occupational safety and health and to give effect to the provisions and guide-lines contained in the relevant codes of practice;
- (c) to create better conditions for the establishment and extension of occupational safety and health services and, further promote the establishment of inter-enterprise services for small and medium-sized enterprises;
- (d) to continue to develop training and retraining programmes for safety engineers and works physicians and to promote the training of safety delegates and works council members in occupational safety and health questions;
- (e) to assemble data concerning occupational safety and health experience in the development and use of new technologies in the various fields of application and to evaluate such data from the point of view of workers' safety and health;
- (f) to carry out further research in the occupational safety and health field on the effects of biotechnology and genetic technology on workers' health;

- (g) to evaluate medical findings on work-related illnesses with a view to developing guide-lines for the prevention of such illnesses;
- (h) to make use of the International Occupational Safety and Health Hazard Alert System for international exchanges on new issues and information relating to the protection of workers' health;
- (i) to take special measures for the safe use and, wherever possible, replacement of highly hazardous substances and processes that have harmful effects on the health of the workers concerned or on the general environment and to disseminate information on experience in the prevention of such hazards.

2. Requests the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director-General:

- (a) to continue to strengthen the Office's standard-setting activities for the improvement of the working environment and occupational safety and health;
- (b) to intensify the Office's activities as regards the preparation of handbooks, teaching materials and programmes for worker training in the use of safe work methods;
- (c) to step up the work being done by Office departments and units in the collection, evaluation and dissemination of information on the effects of new technologies on occupational safety and health, having due regard to the recommendations of the Tripartite Ad Hoc Meeting of Consultants on Methods of Prevention of Major Hazards in Industry (October 1985);
- (d) to take due account, in the Office's work programme, of the protection of workers' health in the application of new technologies and, in particular, biotechnology;
- (e) to devote particular attention, in collaboration with the World Health Organization, to the field of work-related illnesses affecting workers, with a view to their early identification and the adoption of technical, organisational and personal preventive measures;
- (f) to convene a tripartite meeting or seminar of occupational safety experts on safety problems associated with the use of industrial robots and data-processing systems;
- (g) to review the schedule of occupational diseases appended to the Employment Injury Benefits Convention, 1964 (No. 121), which was last revised in 1980, and to submit a recommendation to the Governing Body on the basis of the state of knowledge in member States, with a view to including in the agenda of the International Labour Conference an item relating to the consideration and adoption of a new schedule.

Resolution concerning the promotion of employment and social security, submitted by the Government delegation of Italy

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Recalling that the Declaration of Philadelphia entrusted the ILO with the task of encouraging the execution, in the various countries of the world, of programmes aiming at extending social security measures, with a view to ensuring a basic income to all those in need of such protection,

Recalling the Conventions, Recommendations and resolutions in the fields of social security and employment policy adopted by the ILO within the framework of the standard-setting activities peculiar to the Organisation,

Recalling, in particular, the decisions adopted by the Fourth European Regional Conference and, more specifically, the Resolution concerning employment policy and environmental protection,

Considering the general objectives established by the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment,

Noting the general trend, which is emerging in member States, towards the polarisation of structural imbalances both on the labour markets (because of demographic trends, the increase in life expectancy, the greater participation of women) and in the area of social security, in relation to the problems of the financial disequilibrium of these systems (due to the composition and distribution of populations, as well as to the levels of protection attained),

Considering that such situations now make it imperative to reconsider policies for employment and social protection from an innovative viewpoint and that, within this framework, a more rational distribution of national resources and budgets – devoted at present to contingency and assistance objectives – could make it possible to benefit from combined action for the creation of new jobs,

Recognising that, within the same context, it is necessary to reconsider the selective satisfaction of social, collective and individual needs, according to priorities which would safeguard the essential aspects of social protection established by the relevant ILO Conventions,

Bearing in mind, furthermore, that the progressive expansion of labour demand – resulting in particular from the increasing participation of women and young persons seeking employment for the first time as well as the increase in the number of the long-term unemployed – requires the introduction of greater flexibility on national labour markets as well as greater economic growth;

1. Requests the Governing Body of the ILO to appeal to member States:

- (a) to encourage development and economic growth policies for employment promotion, fostering, in particular, policies for vocational guidance, training and rehabilitation;
- (b) to reconsider, within the framework of active employment policies, the possibility of increasing new employment opportunities through the redistribution of resources currently devoted to the financing of purely assistance-oriented activities;

- (c) to encourage the development of entrepreneurship, including small undertakings and co-operatives, as well as self-employment and local initiatives for employment;
- (d) to seek, at all events, ways and means of ensuring the maintenance of the levels of social protection which have been attained, in particular by reconsidering the methods of financing social security systems in order to guarantee them the necessary financial equilibrium;
- (e) to encourage, in relation to problems of structural adjustment and technological innovation, the development of an institutional and standard-setting framework as well as labour relations; with a view to reconciling and rendering mutually compatible the requirements of the growth and development of economies with the competitiveness of business and the improvement of working conditions;
- (f) to promote the implementation of the above-mentioned policies with the co-operation of the social partners within the framework of effective social dialogue at all levels.

2. Invites the Governing Body of the ILO to instruct the Director-General:

- (a) to promote research at the national and international levels, with the collaboration of the International Institute for Labour Studies, so as to assist member States in formulating appropriate policies for the attainment of the policies advocated above;
- (b) to develop study and research activities, with a view to examining in depth the relations which exist between the promotion and flexibility of employment, on the one hand, and the rational use of social security funds, on the other;
- (c) to seek alternative solutions to those generally adopted for the financing of social security, so that the provision of the latter may be ensured by the resources necessary for maintaining or attaining balanced conditions, without detriment to the levels of protection attained;
- (d) to encourage the search for policies as well as action or measures which could be adopted to promote the monitoring of all kinds of irregular work;
- (e) to disseminate the results of the research and studies undertaken with a view to assisting and orienting the development of specific national policies.

Support was also expressed for the reduction of the Working Capital Fund by $5 million.

42. The representative of the Government of Sweden commended the Director-General for having found further savings in the budget. He agreed with the representative of the Workers' group that the conditions under which the Director-General had made a commitment to find savings had not been fully met; large amounts of contributions were overdue.

43. The reduction in funds for Office automation, as expressed by the representative of the Employers' group, might be just short-term savings which might delay the greater long-term savings that would accrue from such automation.

44. He also had grave reservations concerning the proposed cut of $5 million in the size of the Working Capital Fund. He would have preferred this proposal to be examined in conjunction with the exchange rate problem at the Committee's May 1988 meeting.

45. The representative of the Government of Botswana referred to paragraphs 8, 9 and 10 of the document and supported the cut of $127,000 in paragraph 10. Additional savings might possibly result from having candidates for ILO positions interviewed at the respective UNDP offices in the regions. The proposed travel cuts, however, might reduce the technical advisory services furnished by the Office, for which the developing countries had very high regard.

46. The representative of the Government of the United Kingdom noted the proposed cuts were largely in administrative costs, and asked that the Director-General reassure the Committee that the slowdown in Office automation would not limit the Office's capacity to make future savings. Although satisfied with the proposed $5 million cut in the Working Capital Fund, he would like to have the Director-General's view as to the desirable level of the Fund. Recently the External Auditor had reported that the level of the Fund at the equivalent of two to three months' expenditure would be satisfactory.

47. The representative of the Government of the United States registered disappointment that the Director-General had been unable to reduce the budget to $318 million, as anticipated at the June 1987 Session of the Conference. If sufficient contributions were not forthcoming, programme reductions might be necessary. He urged all further possible savings so that assessments against member States could be kept to the lowest possible level.

48. The representative of the Government of Czechoslovakia stated that an organisation had to adapt its activities to its resources. He was concerned at the temporary nature of some of the cuts. The reduction of the Working Capital Fund would have serious repercussions later on. Since there was little hope of improvement in the exchange rate costs problem, he asked whether consideration had been given to the consequences of this reduction? What would happen if the exchange rate got worse? An even larger deficit would arise, leading to undesirable increases in member States' contributions.

49. The representative of the Government of Australia noted and welcomed the proposed budget cuts. He endorsed the representative of the Government of Sweden's view concerning the original commitment of the Director-General to reduce the budget by $6.9 million. This commitment had been based on the assumption that arrears would be substantially paid by the end of 1987 and this had not materialised. He looked forward to the pending consideration of the exchange rate problems and the prospective 1988-89 deficit. He was greatly concerned at income shortfalls and regretted to see press reports that the largest contributor, which had voted for the budget, was now proposing to meet its 1988 budget commitment to the extent of only 80 per cent of its assessment, and that even this was not likely to be paid until November 1988. Pending an opportunity to consider the Director-General's proposals on these two serious problems, his Government wished to reserve its position on how it would respond to the question of replenishing the Working Capital Fund until this matter arose at the Conference in June 1988.

50. The representative of the Government of Venezuela welcomed the proposed budget reductions, which justified his Government's view that such reductions could be achieved without harming programmes. Further savings could be made, for example by further reducing staff travel costs; this might be achieved by purchasing tickets direct from the airlines instead of through the Office's permanent travel agency. The delay in office automation would cause problems, particularly for the Freedom of Association Branch, because of the numerous cases and documents it processed. He also questioned whether the reduction of the Working Capital Fund represented a solution. Perhaps the $5 million cut could have been found in other programme and budget areas. He stated that the $197,000 reduction in publication services was insufficient since further reductions could be made in this area. His support for the proposals was given on the understanding that further rationalisation of expenditure would be pursued.

51. The representative of the Government of China noted with satisfaction that the proposed reductions were in administrative expenditure while avoiding to affect technical co-operation and the other substantive programmes. Many Governments had expressed concern lest the zero growth budget adopted by the ILO in 1987 might jeopardise important programmes in 1988-89. However, he could accept the idea of the reduction of $1.9 million, which had been forced on the Director-General by the current financial difficulties. The reduction by $5 million in the Working Capital Fund should constitute only an expedient, since that Fund should be kept fairly stable in proportion to the size of the budget in order to maintain its capacity to cope with greater financial difficulties that might well arise.

52. The representative of the Government of Malaysia wondered if further reductions could not be found. Since member States had had to reduce their national budgets, it would be difficult for them to pay increased contributions to the ILO. Referring to the $340,000 reduction in the Conference costs, he noted that none had been proposed for the Governing Body and regional meetings. The travel reductions also related to staff travel only. Should this not apply across the board?

53. The representative of the Government of Italy felt that a number of risks were inherent in the proposed cuts, particularly as regards the costs-efficiency aspects of equipment purchasing. However, there seemed no alternative to the proposed savings in the present situation. The greater risk concerned the long-term aspects: the circumstances that had brought about the need for savings meant that certain governments had in effect renegotiated their budgetary contribution. He encouraged the governments concerned to give special attention to this problem in order to prevent the risk of future arbitrary practices. The very balance of the ILO's operations was threatened, and other Members which had, after the usual lengthy procedure for the adoption of the Programme and Budget, agreed to an overall level of services, found it extremely disheartening to have to agree to new cuts. Once adopted, the budget conferred not only a moral, but a genuine obligation on member States to pay their contributions, and it was unfair for countries which honoured those obligations to suffer on account of those which did not.

54. The representative of the Government of Greece supported the proposal in paragraph 18 of the paper. He supported the views of the previous speaker, and suggested that a committee of experts be established to study the possibility of reducing flexible costs.

55. The representative of the Government of France, while accepting the proposals, observed that the real problem had not been resolved. At the Conference in June 1987, the Director-General had undertaken to reduce the Programme and Budget by $6.9 million, on condition that the ILO was once again placed on a sound financial footing, i.e. that States paid their arrears of contributions. The withdrawal of $5 million from the Working Capital Fund was acceptable on a once-only basis, but the problem of late contributions remained; like others, his own Government would not make good the losses due to other States' delays in payments. The losses due to exchange rate fluctuations were inevitable, and strict logic would dictate that only those losses should be covered by the Working Capital Fund. However, realism was necessary and it should be recognised that while acceptance of the proposals was a gesture of solidarity, it did not really solve the basic problem.

56. The representative of the Director-General (the Treasurer and Financial Comptroller) stated in reply to Mr. von Holten that no cost-benefit analysis had yet been carried out on the proposed cuts in purchases of office equipment. However, each request for the purchase of equipment would be carefully evaluated and priority would be given to the more urgent cases; the reduction would have an inevitable effect on long-term productivity. The postponement of the initial testing of the PERSIS data base was regrettable, but this had also been dictated by priorities and the consideration that this was a relatively long-term project that would only bring benefits in productivity several years hence.

57. As regards the reduction in allocations for interview travel, a small amount was left, for it was not intended to halt recruitment entirely; in this connection he stated in reply to the Government representative of Botswana that the ILO in fact used UNDP as well as its own field offices to the extent possible for interviews and screening of candidates.

A. PROPOSED PROGRAMME REDUCTIONS FOR 1988-89 AND AN ADJUSTMENT RELATING TO PART III OF THE BUDGET (WORKING CAPITAL FUND)

2. The following is an extract from the first report of the Programme Financial and Administrative Committee to the Governing Body at its 239th Session (February-March 1988).

Adjustments to the 1988-89 Programme and Budget

35. The committee had before it a document (GB.239/PFA/2/5) containing proposals for adjustments to the 1988-89 Programme and Budget.

36. Mr. von Holtzen, speaking for the Employers' members, stressed again that the Organisation was in a serious financial position. There was the cash deficit and there was the exchange rate problem to which the Committee would come back in May. Furthermore, it was very much to be doubted that the contributions assessed for the current biennium, not to speak of the arrears, would really be paid. The Committee might therefore be forced in a near future to undertake a full revision of the programme with a view to cutting it vertically and not only horizontally as in the past.

37. The Employers, against this background, viewed the Director-General's proposals with misgivings and in particular the proposal to reduce the Working Capital Fund. If that proposal were to be accepted by the Committee, they would have to abstain and asked this to be recorded. As for the other proposals, they questioned the wisdom of further delaying automation and computerisation in the Office and wished to know what cost-benefit analyses had been undertaken in this context. They also questioned the wisdom of cutting the provision for interview travel as the quality of external recruitment should not be allowed to suffer even in hard times.

38. Mr. Muhr said that the Workers' members did not view the proposals before the Committee with much enthusiasm. He recalled that at the 1987 Conference the Director-General had foreseen the probable need for programme reductions and had undertaken to put forward proposals for consideration by the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee. But this undertaking had been made subject to the receipt of large amounts of assessed contributions still owed by major contributors being fully paid by the end of 1987. This condition had not been fulfilled by member States, so that although in theory the Director-General was now freed of his earlier commitment, he had nevertheless chosen to put forward some proposals. This meant that the Committee was now faced with the problem of adjusting the level of certain activities to the means available—a difficult exercise which he was sure all Members hoped would not have to be repeated. It was difficult to pronounce individually on the proposals and perhaps some savings were possible without significant reductions in the activities of the Organisation; however, it was by no means certain that the delays in the acquisition or testing of computer systems would save money in the long run.

39. He noted that the proposal to reduce the level of the Working Capital Fund would be considered by the Conference later in the year. There had been no indication of what the level of the Working Capital Fund should be, but in the light of experience in the last few years it was clearly not high enough to meet the probable calls on it. If the Organisation were to be in a position to overcome financial difficulties such as those it faced now, then a substantial Working Capital Fund was required. The level of the Fund had in fact been reduced some years ago and any further reduction would expose the Organisation to the risk that more and more programme cuts would be necessary in the future if funds were not available from other sources. The Workers' members could not show any enthusiasm for the proposal but on the other hand they had none better to submit to the Director-General. Accordingly, they were prepared to accept the point for decision in the paper before the Committee, but they would reserve the right to express their position again at the Conference when other factors might have come to light. They were therefore prepared to support the proposal in the Office paper, albeit with great reluctance.

40. The representative of the Government of the USSR expressed support for the proposal to reduce the 1988-89 budget by $6.9 million.

41. The representative of the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany agreed with the $1.9 million programme reduction. If this represented the introduction of a crisis plan in the present financial difficulties, designed not to increase the burden of those member States which paid on time, as a result of shortfalls and late payments, the amount was small compared with the $17.3 million cuts that had been made to the 1986-87 budget.

58. It should be realised that the desirable level of the Working Capital Fund depended on the timing of the receipt of contributions: if governments paid on time, it could be allowed to remain low. The Fund in its present form had been created in 1952, when it had inherited some amounts from the League of Nations period of the Organisation's history and stood at $2.25 million, representing some 36 per cent of an annual budget of $6.3 million, and this at a time when the exchange rate was as steady as a rock and when contributions were paid more punctually. If the Governing Body agreed to reduce the Fund by $5 million, it would stand at $32.1 million, representing some 20 per cent of the annual authorised spending limit of the Office. It could not therefore be regarded as high in present circumstances, and in fact a considerable degree of reticence had surrounded the decision to draw it down in the way proposed.

59. A revised budget estimate for 1988-89 would be forthcoming in May, based on the prevailing exchange rate. Depending on the rate in May, the Conference might be asked to increase assessments for 1989 to cover additional exchange costs. Hopefully in this manner, the Working Capital Fund would not be over-taxed as a result of exchange rate fluctuations. Arrears of contributions due to the Organisation amounted to $36.6 million: $23.7 million were due for 1987; $4.1 million for the previous biennium; $10.9 million for previous years; and $0.6 million from States which had withdrawn from the Organisation. If this debt were paid, a considerable reimbursement of withdrawals for past deficits could be made to the Working Capital Fund. However, as to the question of when this would happen, it was for governments, not the Office, to supply the answer to this question. It should be noted that member States had not been asked to pay anything into the Fund other than to replenish withdrawals, since 1971, when it had been some $20 million smaller than at present. Over the years, it had accumulated income and miscellaneous income through investment, not from government payments to build it up. In the present circumstances, a substantial Working Capital Fund was essential to ensure financial security, but those circumstances would hopefully not continue indefinitely. Once long-term solutions to the exchange rate problem had been adopted and the payment of contributions became more punctual, its level could be reviewed.

60. Airline tickets were under some circumstances purchased direct from the airlines themselves, but normally such purchasing was not financially attractive. The Office enjoyed extremely advantageous arrangements, both financial and in terms of quality of service, with its travel agent. Travel costs could only be reduced for staff, as the travel costs of delegates and others attending ILO meetings were a constitutional obligation for the Office. The Conference budget had been cut owing to the amount of external recruitment, it entailed, but the Governing Body involved very little external collaboration, and few cuts had therefore been possible in that programme.

61. The net effect of the proposals was to reduce the budget to a level of $318 million as had been called for by the representative of the United States Government. This represented a reduction of $6.9 million on the initial level, but the different components of that reduction should be clearly understood; the proposed adjustments would save $1.9 million, and the Working Capital Fund would cover the rest. However, Parts III and IV would have to be reviewed by the Governing Body and the Conference this year in order to replenish the Working Capital Fund and to provide for exchange rate fluctuations. None of the governments in arrears of contributions denied that they owed the ILO the amounts due, and it was therefore simply a question of when those amounts were paid. Reimbursements of budget surpluses to governments and additional assessments on them to cover deficits were covered by articles 18 and 21(2) of the Financial Regulations respectively, and those two articles had a balancing effect. When the substantial arrears owed were paid, any surplus of receipts over payments would be reimbursed to the governments.

62. The representative of the Government of Italy emphasised that the proposals should not be regarded as exonerating governments from their constitutional financial obligations. The Director-General should make every effort to persuade the governments concerned to pay what they owed.

63. The Committee recommends that the Governing Body propose the following financial and budgetary measures to the International Labour Conference for adoption at the 75th Session (1988):

- (a) to endorse the programme reductions of $1.9 million and consequent revision of the expenditure budget for 1988-89 to $322,960,000 as detailed by major programme in the Appendix to this report, and
- (b) to decide that, as an exceptional measure and in derogation from article 21.2 of the Financial Regulations, the amount due to be added to Part III of the budget (Working Capital Fund) in 1989 in order to reimburse the Fund for withdrawals made to finance the excess of budgetary expenditure over budgetary income in 1986-87 be reduced by $5 million, thereby reducing by a corresponding amount the additional assessments which would otherwise be made on member States in 1989 for that purpose.

FOR DECISION

3. On the recommendation of its Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee, the Governing Body decided on 2 March 1988 to submit the following resolution to the International Labour Conference at its 75th Session (1988), for adoption:

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

- (a) endorses the programme reductions of $1.9 million and consequent revision of the expenditure budget for 1988-89 to $322,960,000 as detailed by major programme in the Appendix [The Appendix referred to is the Appendix to Report II.] to this report; and
- (b) -¹

B. PROPOSED INCENTIVE SCHEME FOR EARLY PAYMENT OF MEMBER STATES' ASSESSED CONTRIBUTIONS

4. The following is an extract from the first report of the Programme Financial and Administrative Committee to the Governing Body at its 239th Session (February-March 1988).

Collection of regular budget contributions (Fourth item on the agenda)

64. The Committee had before it a document (GB.239/PFA/4/7) reviewing its previous consideration of problems faced by the Organisation through the irregular pattern of receipts of regular budget contributions.

65. Mr. von Holten considered that it was widely recognised that something had to be done to offset the injustice created by the late payment of contributions. Of the alternative courses outlined in the Office paper, the first one was based on the system, originally introduced by the ICAO and since then adopted also by WMO, WHO and UNESCO. This system consisted in paying the interest earned on contributions into a separate fund which served to pay incentives to governments on an "S curve" scale according to the date on which they paid their contributions. It was indicated in the paper that the ILO Members would not have to wait for the end of the financial period to get their incentives but be paid on an annual basis. The disadvantages of such a system were that it reduced the amounts available to the Working Capital Fund and that the size of the resulting incentive was unpredictable. It also required an amendment to the Financial Regulations.

66. The alternative scheme proposed by the Employers' members consisted in establishing an Undistributed Reserve in the expenditure budget out of which Members would be paid rebates, preferably on the same "S curve" scale, according to the date of payment of their contributions. The advantages of this scheme were that Members would know exactly what rebates they would get and be able to deduct them before paying their contributions. Another advantage—at least in the eyes of the Employers—was that the scheme would be financed entirely by those Members who did not pay their contributions on time. Although the Employers preferred their own scheme, they would go along with the Governments if they preferred the ICAO scheme. The important thing was that something had to be done and done at once.

67. Mr. Muhr stated that the Workers' members would support any proposal that effectively brought about the early payment of contributions. However, caution was necessary with either of the proposals to ensure that they did not provide a bonus for payments in the second half of the year; incentives should only apply to contributions paid in full and on time, for example in the first six months of the year only, and late payments should be penalised. It was necessary to monitor the effect of the scheme adopted in order to assess its effectiveness, and he was pleased to note that a considerable number of government representatives now seemed to support the idea.

68. The representative of the Government of France was in favour of an incentive scheme that increased the ILO's resources and rewarded prompt contributors. Caution was necessary, however, so as to ensure that any improvements in the payment of contributions did not ease the pressure on late payers, some of whom were likely to remain late payers. It was therefore advisable to adopt a system that paid total incentives derived from all interest earnings on income surpluses, distributed at the end of the budgetary year to which they referred. A system of incentives could, if unsuccessful, lead to losses for the Organisation, and care should be taken to avoid this.

69. The representative of the Government of Sweden thought it important to take a decision on the matter at the present session. The S-curve interest incentive system seemed preferable, provided the amount set aside represented all the interest earned so as to ensure that the greatest possible incentive was available. However, the proposal in the Office paper would be acceptable for a trial period. It was understood that rebates under the incentive scheme would only be made to governments paying their contributions in full. His own Government would continue to pay its own contribution early in the year.

70. The representative of the Government of Canada expressed a preference for the S-curve formula, but had no strong reservations concerning the alternative: the essential requirement was to do something effective. The disadvantage of the Employers' proposal was that it would entail an increase in assessments under Part IV, which in present circumstances seemed unconstructive, and the alternative system of using the interest earned was therefore preferable, as it was the prompt payers who created the cash surplus on which such interest was earned. In this connection he agreed with the previous speaker that the incentive should be as large as possible, and that therefore all the interest earned should be available.

71. The representative of the Government of Italy remarked that the delays in the payment of contributions were in some cases partially intended as political gestures of disapproval, whilst other delays were due to inability to pay promptly. He was therefore sceptical about the effectiveness of any incentive scheme. Nevertheless, it was worth experimenting, even if the proposals seemed unnecessarily complicated. A simple scheme would be to set aside interest earned on individual payments and reimburse the paying governments with the amounts earned on the investment of their own contributions. No rebate should be made for contributions paid, for example, after end-June; those paying before that date would receive rebates, and those paying after that date would be charged penalties at the same rate of interest.

72. The representative of the Government of Turkey emphasised the importance of ensuring the financial security of the Organisation. The incentive scheme used by the ICAO made an appropriate distinction between early and late payers, but the alternative Employers' scheme based on the use of the Undistributed Reserve seemed more reliable, since the amount of the total incentive would be fixed in advance. The scheme should be introduced on a trial basis and he supported the proposal in paragraph 16 of the Office paper. He agreed that rebates should be granted only in respect of full contributions received during the year for which they fell due.

73. The representative of the Government of Venezuela felt that neither of the proposals took full account of the different reasons for which certain governments paid their contributions late. Some did so for political reasons, other simply because of their incapacity to pay. He could therefore not support the proposals and would abstain on them.

74. The representative of the Government of India considered that the ICAO scheme seemed the more reasonable, and therefore supported the proposal in paragraph 17 of the paper.

75. The representative of the Government of Czechoslovakia, while remaining sceptical about the effectiveness of an incentive scheme, agreed to the proposal in paragraph 17 of the paper on a trial basis.

76. The representative of the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany had no objections to the introduction of an incentive scheme if the majority wished it. He recalled, however, that 90 per cent of total contributions came from only ten countries. The ICAO scheme was preferable, but the full amount of the interest earned on cash surpluses should be allocated to the incentive scheme. This was not crucial, however, and on a trial basis he could agree to the allocation of only 60 per cent suggested in the Office paper. He therefore supported the proposal in paragraph 17.

77. The representative of the Government of the USSR considered that any incentive scheme should be easy to apply, should have the necessary effect and should not involve any addition in assessments. He therefore supported the proposal based on interest earnings on a trial basis, and preferred the use of all the interest earned to finance the scheme.

78. The representative of the Government of the United Kingdom remained doubtful regarding the effectiveness of incentives. He could not support any scheme involving an increase in assessments, but would not oppose the wish of the majority. An incentive scheme was unlikely to produce the desired effect and would probably only touch the surface of the problem.

79. The representative of the Government of the United States was likewise sceptical regarding the likely success of an incentive scheme, and noted that there was no evidence that such schemes had been effective in other organisations. However, if the Governing Body decided to introduce such a scheme, then he could only accept one that was based on the interest earned on regular budget funds.

80. The representative of the Government of Greece observed that the creation of an incentive scheme need not entail the imposition of penalties. For one reason or another any government might find itself in the present world economic situation unable to meet all its financial obligations promptly. Neither of the proposals seemed to recognise the distinction between the poorer member States and the others: of the two proposals, that proposed in paragraph 17 seemed more appropriate as it involved a system based on interest earnings.

81. The representative of the Government of Australia supported the introduction of an incentive scheme, and echoed the views expressed by the representatives of the Governments of Sweden, Canada and the Federal Republic of Germany.

82. The representative of the Government of Japan agreed with the views previously expressed by the United Kingdom Government representative. He would reluctantly accept a majority decision for any incentive scheme not involving an increase in contributions, provided that the scheme was introduced on a trial basis and that rebates would be awarded only to member States which paid their contributions in full and on time.

83. Mr. Muhr wished to stress that, on a vote, the Workers would give preference to a proposal based on paragraph 16, but with the modification that no incentive should be awarded for payments made in the last six months of the calendar year. They would, however, as a compromise be willing to support a proposal based on paragraph 17 in order to achieve consensus at the Conference, even though they had reservations about its effectiveness.

84. The representative of the Director-General (the Treasurer and Financial Comptroller) explained that there were two basic reasons behind the incentive scheme proposals put forward for consideration by the Committee. The first was to try to achieve a greater measure of equity amongst member States, so that those which paid their contributions on time should not continue to carry more than their fair share of member States' contributions to the ILO, and the second purpose was to try to improve the cash flow of the Office. There were a number of points of difference between the two schemes described in the Office paper. The scheme originally proposed by the Employers had not found wide support among the Government members because member States which paid late would in effect be required to pay more. On the other hand, the Worker members had expressed reservations about the interest incentive scheme already adopted by ICAO; and it was in fact very difficult to give any estimate as to its effectiveness because the size of the rebates would depend directly on the rate of payment of member States' contributions. From the discussion so far, there seemed to be a consensus emerging which showed the Government members to be in favour of the ICAO interest incentive scheme, although some comment was required in response to questions raised during the course of the debate.

85. If the interest incentive scheme were to be adopted and if it had the desired effect, so that member States paid their contributions early, the allocation of 60 per cent of interest earnings for incentive rebates would represent quite a substantial amount, depending on the response of the member States. If the Committee took the decision to adopt the interest incentive scheme, he suggested that the length of the trial period be two years; after this trial period the proportion of interest earnings to be set aside for incentive payments, as well as other features of the scheme, could be reviewed from time to time as circumstances dictated, bearing in mind the need for a Working Capital Fund of adequate size. In response to a question from the representative of the Government of Italy, he explained that the Office's cash flow requirements precluded the accumulation of interest in separate accounts in respect of specific member States' contributions.

86. The representative of the Government of Venezuela queried whether the proposals at present being considered by the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee might be more appropriately referred to the Finance Committee of Government representatives at the annual session of the International Labour Conference. The Treasurer and Financial Comptroller confirmed that these matters, considered by the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee, would be referred by the Governing Body to the Finance Committee of Government Representatives and thence to the Conference itself for final decision.

87. In response to a question raised by the representative of the Government of Sweden, the Treasurer and Financial Comptroller confirmed that the incentive scheme proposals, as currently formulated, allowed rebates for full or partial payments on account of current year contributions; but in view of the statement by Mr. von Holten that the Employers' agreement to the ICAO incentive scheme was conditional upon rebates being awarded only for full payment of current year's contributions, the proposals would be redrafted to ensure that rebates were made only to member States that paid their contributions in full.

88. Subject to the positions taken and the reservations expressed during this discussion, the Committee recommends that the Governing Body propose to the International Labour Conference for adoption at its 75th Session (June 1988) the introduction of an incentive scheme to encourage the early payment of member States' assessed contributions in the following terms:

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Recalling that in accordance with article 10, paragraph 1, of the Financial Regulations, member States' assessed contributions for each calendar year are due and payable on 1 January of that year,

Noting that delays in the payment of assessed contributions by some member States have prejudiced the implementation of the Organisation's programme in a timely and orderly manner and placed those member States which pay their contributions in a timely manner at a disadvantage,

Recalling the concerns expressed by the Conference, the Governing Body and the Director-General with regard to the late payment of assessed contributions,

Agreeing that some form of incentive should be provided to member States that pay their assessed contributions in a timely manner;

1. Decides that an incentive scheme based on the setting aside of interest earned on temporarily surplus regular budget funds in any year shall be introduced as from 1 January 1989 for a two-year trial period.

2. Decides further that during this trial period 40 per cent of interest earned on temporarily surplus regular budget funds in each year shall be paid into the Working Capital Fund and that the remainder shall be set aside to provide a total incentive amount available for distribution to those member States which have paid in full their assessed contributions for the current year by 31 December of that year. The total incentive amount so established in each year will be distributed to eligible member States under an incentive points system based on an "S" curve formula which will take into account the dates and amounts of payments of current year's contributions by member States.

FOR DECISION

5. On the recommendation of the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee the Governing Body decided on 2 March 1988 to submit the foregoing resolution to the International Labour Conference at its 75th Session (1988), for adoption.

C. FINANCIAL REPORT AND AUDITED FINANCIAL STATEMENTS FOR 1986-87

6. The following is an extract from the first report of the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee to the Governing Body at its 240th Session (May 1988).

Financial report and audited financial statements

6. The Committee was invited to take note of the Auditor's report and to propose that the Governing Body submit the final account for the 60th financial period (1986-87) to the Conference for consideration and adoption (GB.240/PFA/1/3).

7. A representative of the External Auditor, introducing the Auditor's report on the accounts, drew attention to paragraphs 5 to 7 of the report which recorded the reasons for the External Auditor's decision to qualify his opinion on the financial statements. The Financial Regulations required the External Auditor to report upon any deviations of a material nature in the presentation of the financial statements. These included deviations from generally accepted accounting principles applied on a basis consistent with that of the preceding financial period. This qualification therefore drew to the attention of the Governing Body the effects upon the financial statements of its decision, taken at the 239th Session, concerning receipts of contributions from member States. By this decision, the Governing Body had waived, for the 1986-87 financial period only, the provisions of Financial Rule 3.20(a) to permit some $9.7 million of arrears of contributions, which were received in January 1988, to be brought to account in 1986-87 instead of in 1988-89. Financial statements II and III, together with their supporting schedules, clearly identified the adjustments resulting from this decision. The effect was that a cash deficit on statement II was shown at a value of some $9.7 million lower, and the total assets and total liabilities figures on statement III at a value of some $9.7 million higher than the actual position as at 31 December 1987.

8. The results of the review of programme and project evaluation were set out in paragraphs 11 to 28 of the report. The review included an examination of: the ILO's progress towards programme evaluation; the procedures for monitoring and evaluating multi-bilateral and UNDP technical co-operation projects; the steps taken to ensure that the monitoring and evaluation procedures were followed; and the use made of evaluation information in the planning and design of new projects. The findings fell into three main categories. Firstly, the ILO had made limited progress in introducing evaluation techniques for the Organisation's programme of work set out in the programme and budget document. It was noted that in 1987 the Conference recommended that the ILO should adopt a plan of action to improve the assessment of the impact of both programmes and projects. Secondly, it was noted that procedures existed and operated for the monitoring and evaluation of multi-bilateral and UNDP projects, but it was found that the standards of reporting of the multi-bilateral projects varied and that the ILO's procedures did not formally distinguish between requirements for internal and independent evaluations. Thirdly, it was noted that the ILO had established an evaluation information database which was used by the technical units, but the records did not include all the UNDP evaluation reports.

9. The overall conclusion of the External Auditor, contained in paragraph 28 of the report, was that although the ILO had yet to produce a plan of action to improve the assessment of the impact of programmes and projects, it had established a framework of procedures for the monitoring and evaluation of technical co-operation projects. In the External Auditor's view, the procedures would be enhanced by:

- firstly, the introduction of standard procedures for monitoring multi-bilateral projects to ensure that all aspects of progress were reviewed. These procedures should recognise the need to meet the wishes of individual donors;
- secondly, the formal adoption of the proposal to follow the UNDP practice of mandatory independent evaluations for large and technically demanding multi-bilateral projects;
- thirdly, the ILO should ensure that all UNDP evaluation reports were included in the ILO evaluation unit's database.

10. Mr. von Holten expressed the Employers' gratitude to the External Auditor for his excellent report. As his representative had just explained, the inclusion in 1986-87 income of arrears of contributions received in January 1988 had led the External Auditor to qualify the financial statements since, in his opinion, they did not fairly represent the financial position of the Organisation as at 31 December 1987, they had not been prepared in accordance with the stated policies, and they were not in accordance with the Financial Regulations. The Employers regretted seeing a qualified audit opinion on the ILO's financial statements; as they had from the beginning been of the same opinion as the External Auditor, they had not taken part in the decision which had led to qualification of the audit report, and would certainly make that clear to the Conference.

11. The Employers' members also welcomed the audit examination on evaluation procedures, which they noted had begun some seven years ago. They supported the recommendations contained in paragraph 28 of the External Auditor's report and looked forward to his future reports on this subject.

12. Mr. Muhr, for the Workers' members, also expressed gratitude for the work of the External Auditor. It was always very valuable in an Organisation such as the ILO to have well-qualified and impartial experts examining the finances of the Organisation. From time to time in the past the Organisation had resorted to unorthodox procedures when it had found itself in difficulties, and the Workers believed that those empowered to approve the Financial Rules should also be able to authorise exceptions to them. The Workers still adhered to that view, notwithstanding the qualifications to the audit report.

13. The Committee took note of the External Auditor's report.

14. The Committee proposes that the Governing Body submit the final accounts for the 60th financial period (1986-87) to the Conference for consideration and adoption.

FOR DECISION

7. The Governing Body adopted this proposal on 27 May 1988 and therefore recommends that the Conference adopt the final accounts for 1986-87.

D. PROGRAMME AND BUDGET FOR 1988-89: BUDGET EXCHANGE RATE AND CONSEQUENTIAL ADJUSTMENTS

8. The following is an extract from the first report of the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee to the Governing Body at its 240th Session (May 1988).

Budget exchange rate and consequential adjustments

20. The Committee had before it a paper (GB.240/PFA/2/8) containing information and a proposal concerning the budget exchange rate and consequential adjustments for the 1988-89 biennium.

21. Mr. von Holten said that the Employers' members had serious misgivings about the financial position of the Organisation and feared that the resources at its disposal would not be sufficient to carry out the programme and budget adopted in 1987. They supported the point for decision in paragraph 9 of the Office paper. The overall financial problems had already been identified at the previous session of the Governing Body in February-March 1988 and it now seemed that more drastic measures might be necessary. There was also a clear need for the ILO to develop priorities and concentrate more in future on those areas that were within its specific competence. This philosophy, as developed in the Director-General's General Report to last year's Conference and in the discussion on the Medium-Term Plan, should guide the Office as it prepared the Programme and Budget for 1990-91.

22. Mr. Muhr expressed the Workers' strong support for the point for decision in paragraph 9 of the paper before the Committee. Although the position in which the Organisation now found itself resulted from developments upon which the ILO had no influence, it had been fairly clear at the time the budget rate of 1.60 Swiss francs was adopted that that rate would not be an accurate estimate for the whole biennium. Many proposals on risk strategies had been put forward and considered; if the Committee had taken a more open approach to those proposals at the time, the Organisation would not have found itself in its present predicament. He recalled that both the Worker and the Employer members had taken a very positive attitude to the proposals put forward to the Committee, and hence it was only right that the consequences of inaction should be borne in principle by the governments. The next document for consideration by the Committee concerned proposals for a long-term strategy on exchange rates; it was to be hoped that this would be the last time that the Committee would be called upon to consider this kind of problem. But whatever happened over the next few weeks, the Worker members would be ready to support this point for decision in the Committee, in the Governing Body and at the Conference.

23. The representative of the Government of France reluctantly agreed to the revision of the exchange rate from 1.60 to 1.43 Swiss francs to the dollar, but pointed out that this decision would increase the total amount of 1989 contributions for member States by $26 million. This was an excessive increase. The additional burden for 1989 should be shared so that part of the sum required could be covered by savings on the part of the Office.

24. The representative of the Government of Italy associated himself with the remarks of the preceding speaker.

25. The representative of the Government of Australia recalled that, at the previous session of the Governing Body, his Government had expressed concern about the current budgetary situation and had indicated that it could not support both the $20 million proposed replenishment of the Working Capital Fund and the revaluation of the budget from 1.60 to 1.43 Swiss francs to the dollar at a cost to member States of approximately $26 million. He associated himself with the views expressed by the representatives of the Governments of France and Italy, that there should be significant cuts in the budget so as to relieve the burden which had fallen on all member States during this biennium. He did recognise, however, that the proposed revaluation of the exchange rate was a consequence of a collective decision taken by the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee, which should now assume some responsibility for the position in which the Organisation found itself at present. In conclusion, he strenuously urged all member States to pay their contributions so as to alleviate the difficulties currently facing the Organisation.

26. The representative of the Government of the USSR expressed his concern at the unstable financial position of the Organisation, caused by fluctuations in exchange rates and also by the delay in the payment of contributions by certain governments. All these factors had led to a budgetary deficit and consequently to a considerable increase in contributions which was bound to be of serious concern to member States. For 1989 the Director-General was proposing an increase in the budget of some $26 million in order to compensate for the drop in the exchange rate of the dollar. This was not the only increase, however. There was also a proposal to replenish the Working Capital Fund by some $20 million so the total increase in the budget was $46 million or $44 million after taking into account a reduction in the programme by almost $2 million. This was a significant increase and would cause many governments to give serious thought to the measures that should be taken. He urged the Director-General to consider seriously the views already expressed and inform the Committee of the extent to which the Office was willing to share the financial burden for the rest of the 1988-89 biennium. Internal reserves were available and could be used in order to reduce the financial burden on governments, and there was also the possibility for savings which would allow the Organisation to absorb a significant part of the increase in contributions.

27. The representative of the Government of Japan regretted his inability to express the official position of his Government due to the late arrival of the Office paper. In the meantime he agreed in principle with the statement made by the representative of the Government of France.

28. The representative of the Government of Sweden stated his Government's belief that the budgets of international agencies should be unaffected by currency fluctuations and its readiness therefore to pay the additional contribution proposed in paragraph 9. However, the request had come at an unfortunate time, and the Director-General should examine how much of the additional 26 million dollars could be absorbed by the Office without seriously affecting programmes. For example, because of the recruitment freeze, the number of vacancies should be higher than budgeted for, and this could perhaps provide some savings.

29. Although his Government realised that the request was made because the ILO lacked reserves to cover exchange rate losses, his Government would prefer an arrangement whereby payments were made at the end of the biennium rather than the annual recosting which was currently the case.

30. The representative of the Government of Canada stated that his Government was prepared to accept the additional contributions proposed in paragraph 9. The request that had been made for an adjustment to the exchange rate showed the need to base the exchange rate for the budget more closely on the actual rate at the time of the budget's approval. It was possible that exchange rate losses might still occur, but if member States accepted to pay the extra 26 million dollars now, it should be understood that the Organisation should be responsible for absorbing any further exchange rate losses. His Government reserved its position on the provision relating to the increase of $20 million under Part III of the budget for the replenishment of the Working Capital Fund, as it considered total extra funding of $46 million to be excessive.

31. The representative of the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany accepted that the adjustment as proposed in paragraph 9 to be made, although this situation gave cause for anxiety. An adjustment would mean an extra burden for some member States, and he therefore suggested, in agreement with the views expressed by the representatives of the Governments of Italy, France, Australia and Canada, that losses arising from foreign exchange fluctuations should, as far as possible, be absorbed by the Office.

32. The representative of the Government of Uruguay expressed concern about the implications of accepting the proposals in paragraph 9 for countries such as Uruguay which were experiencing serious foreign debt problems. The burden should be shared, and the Organisation should find ways of making additional savings to reduce the budget.

33. The representative of the Government of Czechoslovakia, while aware that the ILO's financial difficulties were beyond its control and that it was reasonable to request an adjustment to the exchange rate, called for the Office to share some of the burden of the deficit and to consider all possible reductions that could be made to its budget. If member States bore the entire burden of the deficit this would lead to an unacceptably high increase in contributions.

34. The representative of the Government of Switzerland believed that an adjustment to the exchange rate was necessary and supported the proposal contained in paragraph 9. However, it was also necessary to give renewed thought to measures for reducing the problem of exchange rate losses and maintaining the ILO's finances in a healthier state, which should in particular involve the regular payment by member States of their contributions.

35. The representative of the Government of the United States stated that the recalculation of the exchange rate was unacceptable. While agreeing with the Workers' group that the exchange rate of 1.60 Swiss francs to the dollar was unrealistic, and with the representative of the Government of Canada that the budget rate should have been set at a more accurate rate based on the latest available exchange rate, he reminded the Committee that, nevertheless, the adoption at the 1987 International Labour Conference of a budget set at a realistic level would have been impossible for many member States to support. The exchange rate had been set in the hope that favourable conditions would return and thus make unnecessary any difficult decisions. Favourable conditions had not returned and the financial situation of member States had not improved. His Government, in common with other governments, would be unable to fund the budget increases called for, and could not accept the recalculation of the exchange rate for the entire biennium. Keeping the budget at its present level would entail painful decisions but it was essential to live within the means available and establish programme priorities.

36. The representative of the Government of the United Kingdom reminded the Committee that the total amount of the extra contributions called for was $46 million: $26 million to offset the deficit caused by exchange rate losses, and $20 million to reimburse the Working Capital Fund. This represented a 25 per cent increase in annual subscriptions in dollar terms. While it may be thought that countries like the United Kingdom could afford this extra cost, for many member States this was not the case and the demand for extra contributions would probably exacerbate the problem of non-payment or late payment. Both elements of the package should be reconsidered. In regard to the $26 million it would seem sensible to examine what savings could be made in administrative or other costs aiming at maximum absorption.

37. The representative of the Government of Venezuela stated that her Government did not support the proposals put forward in paragraph 9, because of its possible repercussions on the future calculation of contributions. The costs of adjustment should be shared between member States and the Organisation. The Latin American countries were making great efforts to pay their contributions despite their foreign debt problems and the Office should likewise make an effort to reduce its costs.

38. The representative of the Government of Argentina associated himself with the comments of the representative of the Government of France who had recommended that the costs deriving from exchange rate losses should be shared between the Office and the member States.

39. The representative of the Government of Brazil associated himself with other speakers who had already expressed deep concern about the proposal in paragraph 9 of the document before the Committee. Many countries were already experiencing difficulties in meeting their hard currency payments. The Office should find concrete means of reducing the budget to show its willingness to contribute to solving the problem of exchange rate fluctuations.

40. The representative of the Government of China indicated that his Government had not been able to study this proposal in depth because of the late distribution of the Office paper. An adjustment to the exchange rate was necessary but as this would increase the burden on member States the Director-General should also examine ways of introducing economy measures. This could be done by streamlining the administration, cutting the number and duration of meetings, and reducing the number of meeting documents. Fluctuating exchange rates were not the sole cause of the financial problems: delays in payment and the failure to pay contributions were also a problem and member States, particularly the major contributors, should undertake to fulfil their obligations in full and in good time.

41. The representative of the Government of India pointed out that the weakening of the currencies of many developing countries, including his own, against the United States dollar had in any case meant an increase in their contributions. However, an adjustment was necessary and his Government, albeit reluctantly, agreed to the proposal in paragraph 9. Nevertheless the Office should seek ways to reduce its expenditure. As far as possible this should be through cuts in administrative costs and should not affect ILO programmes.

42. The representative of the Government of Cuba also associated himself with previous speakers who had suggested that the Office should put forward a proposal which demonstrated its willingness to share the burden of the exchange rate revaluation. Cuts should focus on reducing administrative costs and should only, as a last resort, be made in technical co-operation programmes.

43. The representative of the Government of the German Democratic Republic agreed that an adjustment was necessary but believed that the $26 million to adjust the exchange rate should be considered in conjunction with the $20 million proposed as a replenishment for the Working Capital Fund. He also associated himself with earlier speakers who called for a proposal showing how the ILO itself could bear a part of the burden. The programme cuts of $1.9 million proposed by the Director-General were insufficient and further savings could be made on administrative costs. In addition, Part II of the budget covering unforeseen expenditure should be frozen and transferred into an emergency fund, and any unforeseen costs should be covered by savings made in Part I of the budget.

44. Mr. Muhr, on behalf of the Workers' members, stressed that the method of making financial adjustments by constantly making cuts to the programme had a natural limit. Ten years previously, when the United States of America had withdrawn from the ILO, member States, rather than making up the shortfall in budget contributions, had cut programmes by 22 per cent. These cuts had never been made up when the United States returned. For many different reasons further cuts, which the Worker members had agreed to reluctantly, had been made subsequently, with the result that now, in real terms, the programme level was lower than during the 1970s. At present further cuts were being requested in order to offset exchange rate losses. This was unacceptable, not because the Workers' members did not accept programme cuts but because there had to be a logical basis for these cuts. Government could not ask for cuts in the programme because of exchange rate losses and yet ask for money to be returned if there was a positive change in the exchange rate. Cuts could simply not be made to the programme each time a financial problem arose.

45. The representative of the Government of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya felt that paragraph 9 of the document under discussion, which called for an increase of $26 million under Part IV (Effects of exchange rate adjustments) of the approved Programme and Budget for 1988-89, gave cause for considerable concern. It was not that the amount itself was high – if it were requested in order to implement necessary programmes – but it was too high just for the purpose of compensating for exchange rate losses. It was doubtful whether governments which were already unable to pay their contributions as they were presently fixed, would be able to meet these additional expenses. The document under discussion reflected the fact that the Committee and the Governing Body had not been very successful in preparing the budget for the present biennium, having used an unrealistic exchange rate of 1.60 Swiss francs to the dollar.

46. The Organisation was now faced with a need to make up the difference of $26 million, and might also be faced with a situation where programmes would have to be reduced, although this should be seen as a last resort. On the other hand, reductions in administrative costs should be possible: they could begin with cuts in meetings of the Governing Body and of Industrial Committees; members could make better use of the time available and thereby reduce the number of days, saving a great deal of money and serving the interests of the workers. Reductions in administrative costs, however, should not include freezing recruitment or imposing a fixed ceiling on salaries; the present internal structure was neither just or equitable, and such a freeze would only mean remaining with the present structure for some time. In principle the Committee should discount the possibility of reducing programmes, and aim at achieving maximum savings in administrative costs. Only then should the additional burden on member States be quantified.

47. The representative of the Government of France was prompted to speak again, in response to Mr. Muhr's statement. In fact, this discussion had already taken place in February 1988. His Government was deeply attached to the objectives of the Organisation and this attitude would not change. Having affirmed this year after year, by paying its contribution promptly and in full, his Government hoped that an increase in contributions would not be necessary, whether the reason for it was fluctuating exchange rates, replenishment of the Working Capital Fund, or non-payment of contributions by certain member States. His Government therefore continued to call for a balanced budget through a combination of savings and contributions.

48. However, it should be made clear that "savings" did not imply a reduction of programmes, which would gradually lead to the dismantling of the Organisation's objectives. It was possible to make savings without programme reductions, but this was not the time to enter into details. The representative of the Government of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya had referred to some measures with which his own Government concurred: it was clearly possible to reduce the length of meetings, with the co-operation of delegates, and considerable savings could be made in administrative costs. A special group could be set up to study these possibilities.

49. Mr. von Holten, speaking for the Employers' members, strongly agreed with the representative of the Government of China on the need for a better payment discipline in the Organisation. If countries could not meet their obligations and make their payments in full, it mattered very little what other measures were taken. The Governing Body had decided to recommend to the Conference that it establish an incentive to prevent the disease from spreading; it might be necessary to supplement this measure by a penalty scheme. It would not doubt be necessary to reduce expenditure considerably. The Director-General himself had pointed out the way towards implementing programme reductions in his report to the June 1987 Session of the International Labour Conference. There was a need to consolidate activities, to eliminate those of low priority and to concentrate on the specific objectives of the ILO in the spirit of the world of today. National institutions had rationalised in recent years and it was right to expect the ILO to accomplish more today, with fewer staff, than in 1978. Considerable economies would be required, a complicated operation which a further delay would only make more difficult; personnel and related costs comprised between 70 and 80 per cent of the budget and this was therefore the area to look at for savings.

50. Responding to the preceding speaker's statement, which implied that, since other organisations had rationalised, it was high time for the ILO to do so, the Director-General pointed out that in fact the ILO had been forced to go through the experience of rationalising its activities when the United States had withdrawn from the Organisation in 1977. This had only been done after the most strenuous efforts, and great sacrifices had been borne by the ILO staff, by governments, and by the workers. The Organisation was still smaller now than it had been in 1978. However, there was yet room for improvement, as in any public administration, national or international. The Office was ready and willing to help the Governing Body proceed to a study of the considerations necessary for greater productivity, but it should not be implied that the present administration was extravagant. In fact, the Organisation had acquired a reputation over the years for its concern with costs and expenditures.

51. The Director-General stressed that in the social situation of the world today, problems were all too frequently settled on the basis of purely economic decisions and the social aspect was neglected. This was precisely the time when the budget of the Organisation should be increased rather than decreased. For the past ten years, the Organisation had been engaged in budgetary exercises which had eroded its work, and yet, in the present discussion, the prevailing talk was of further savings and economies. While it was true that the Organisation was going through a period of austerity, and while it was true that the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee needed to supervise the budget, the Committee was also responsible for preserving the quality and content of the programme and its ability to meet the needs of the workers. If the Organisation were to be constantly retarded in its endeavours by an obsession with savings its future could be seriously compromised.

52. The paper under discussion followed a practice established several years ago, when the dollar began to fluctuate, whereby in the first year of the biennium, on the eve of the International Labour Conference, the budget was assessed in view of the prevailing exchange rate. The purpose of the paper under consideration was to help the Committee decide whether the proposed rate of 1.43 Swiss francs to the dollar was adequate. During the course of the discussion several members of the Committee had stated that it was possible to make savings, and it would certainly be necessary to do so with 19 months of the biennium still ahead.

53. In reply to a remark of the representative of the Government of Canada, the Director-General pointed out that the exchange rate of 1.43 was probably optimistic. The Canadian Government had expressed willingness to absorb its share of the $26 million, it being understood that any additional expenditure beyond that level due to a further depreciation of the dollar would be absorbed by the Office. This was acceptable. At the same time, there appeared to be no way of avoiding the measures set out in paragraph 9 of the document under discussion, which were based on the most optimistic assessment of the difference between the exchange rate approved when the budget was adopted and the actual rate now. But the Organisation had also benefited in the past from exchange rate fluctuations: in 1982-83, for example, $13.4 million were reimbursed to member States; and in 1984-85 there were savings of $26.6 million, which the Governing Body decided to use to cover expenses resulting from the subsequent drop of the dollar in the 1986-87 biennium. This meant that altogether $40 million had been reimbursed to member States in accordance with the Financial Regulations. This showed that there were periods when the Office paid money back to governments, just as there were other periods when the Office needed to request more; both situations were merely a result of the fluctuation of exchange rates.

54. Commenting further on the budget exchange rate and consequential adjustments, the Director-General said that although the problem of the reimbursement of $20 million to the Working Capital Fund for part of the 1986-87 deficit was not under discussion, it should be noted that the overall figure of the proposed increase in the budget amounted to $46 million, $26 million for the exchange rate and $20 million for the Working Capital Fund. Although the Office was not responsible for this situation due to the fluctuation of exchange rates, governments were right to feel concerned. For this reason, the Director-General suggested that they look ahead to the next item on the agenda dealing with a long-term strategy on exchange rates. If the Committee would adopt a method, such as that proposed in the document, the Organisation would be protected against any future fluctuations in exchange rates. Furthermore, this would enable a proposal to be put forward for a reduction of the Working Capital Fund by an additional $5 million, provided the Committee no longer hesitated to take the decision to guard the Organisation against fluctuating exchange rates.

55. In response to those speakers who had appealed to the Office to make every effort to achieve savings, the Director-General said that in November 1988 he would be presenting proposals for adjusting resources and expenses to meet the difficulties foreseen for 1989. At the present stage, however, there was no other solution but to accept the figure of $26 million quantified in the document, with the assurance that expenses due to any further depreciation in the dollar would be met by the Office.

56. The representative of the Government of Italy suggested that, in the light of the discussion, the point for decision in paragraph 9 should be redrafted.

57. The representative of the Government of the United States affirmed that the decision taken last year to use the exchange rate of 1.60 had been based on very sound reasons. His Government recognised at the time that there was likely to be a proposal to recalculate some portion of the biennium budget, but the maximum that would be acceptable would be to do this for the second half of the biennium. The removal of another $5 million from the Working Capital Fund was also not a sufficient measure with regard to the Working Capital itself. His Government therefore could not join a consensus which would accept the $26 million increase proposed in the document.

58. The representative of the Government of the United Kingdom said that his Government maintained its position on the points for decision.

59. The representative of the Government of Venezuela reserved her Government's position on the points for decision in paragraph 9.

60. The Committee recommends that the Governing Body propose a draft resolution to the International Labour Conference at its forthcoming 75th Session (1988) in the following terms:

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Recalling that the rate of exchange between the United States dollar and the Swiss franc (the "budget rate") for the 1988-89 Programme and Budget was fixed at 1.60 Swiss francs for 1 US dollar,

Noting the depreciation of the US dollar in relation to the Swiss franc since that rate was fixed and in particular the adverse trend over the first five months of the 1988-89 biennium,

Considering the consequential need to cover the additional costs that have arisen and are likely to continue to arise during the execution of the programme adopted for 1988-89;

Decides to modify the budget rate for the 1988-89 biennium from 1.60 to 1.43 Swiss francs to the dollar and accordingly to add an amount of $26.0 million under Part IV (Effects of exchange rate adjustments to the budgets of expenditure and of income for 1988-89, it being understood that any additional costs arising from the value of the dollar being lower than the revised budget rate of 1.43 Swiss francs to the dollar will be met through adjustments within the level of the revised Programme and Budget for 1988-89.

61. In view of the proposal by the Director-General to reduce by a further $5 million, i.e. to a total of $10 million, the reimbursement to the Working Capital Fund in 1989 in respect of withdrawals made to finance the excess of budgetary expenditure over income in 1986-87, it will be necessary for the Governing Body to amend its decision taken on this subject at its 239th Session (February-March 1988) (Paragraph 63(b) of document GB.239/8/33).

62. The Committee accordingly recommends that the Governing Body propose the following measure to the International Labour Conference for adoption at the 75th (June 1988) Session:

to decide that, as an exceptional measure and in derogation from article 21.2 of the Financial Regulations, the amount due to be added to Part III of the budget (Working Capital Fund) in 1989 in order to reimburse the Fund for withdrawals made to finance the excess of budgetary expenditure over budgetary income in 1986-87 be reduced by $10 million, thereby reducing by a corresponding amount the additional assessments which would otherwise be made on member States in 1989 for that purpose.

FOR DECISION

9. On the recommendation of its Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee, the Governing Body decided on 27 May 1988 to submit the foregoing resolution to the International Labour Conference at its 75th Session (1988), for adoption.

The final text of the resolution will be incorporated as an appendix to the second report of the Finance Committee of Government representatives.

E. COMPOSITION OF THE ADMINISTRATIVE TRIBUNAL OF THE ILO

10. The following is an extract from the second report of the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee to the Governing Body at its 239th Session (February-March 1988).

57. The Committee noted that the terms of office of two deputy judges, the Rt. Hon. Sir William Douglas and Mr. Edilbert Razafindralambo, would expire on 14 June 1988. The Director-General proposed that the terms of office of each be extended for a further period of three years, in accordance with the terms of the Statutes of the Tribunal.

FOR DECISION

11. On the recommendation of its Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee, the Governing Body at its 239th (February-March 1988) Session decided to submit the following resolution for adoption by the Conference at its 75th Session (1988):

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

In accordance with Article III of the Statute of the Administrative Tribunal of the International Labour Organisation;

Extends the terms of office of the Rt. Hon. Sir William Douglas (Barbados) and Mr. Edilbert Razafindralambo (Madagascar) as deputy judges of the Tribunal for a further period of three years.

Haiti has paid its annuities and contributions for 1979 to 1987. The Conference at its 65th Session (1979) decided, under article 13, paragraph 4, of the Constitution, that Haiti should be permitted to vote. Haiti has complied with the terms of its arrangement and thus continues to be entitled to vote under the provisions of article 32 of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

⁶ Paraguay: The Conference decided at its 45th Session (1961) that the arrears of contributions due from Paraguay in respect of the ILO and other League of Nations organisations for the period prior to 1939, amounting to $140,038, should be cancelled, such cancellation to become effective on the payment by Paraguay of all its arrears of contributions in respect of the period since 5 September 1956, the date when Paraguay rejoined the Organisation.

Saint Lucia 9 April 1980

⁸ Chad: In accordance with the arrangement approved by the Conference at its 69th Session (1983), Chad is called upon: (a) to pay in 1983 its contribution for the year 1983 in full; (b) in subsequent years to pay its current contribution in full in the year for which it is due; (c) to settle the arrears that have accumulated up to and including 31 December 1982, amounting to $122,107, by the payment of 19 equal annual instalments of $6,105 beginning in 1984 and a final instalment of $6,112. The Conference also decided at its 69th Session (1983) that Chad should be permitted to vote in accordance with article 13, paragraph 4, of the Constitution. Chad has paid its annuities and contributions for 1983 to 1986 inclusive. Chad has failed to comply with the terms of its arrangement in 1987 and has therefore lost its right to vote as from 1 January 1988.

Seventy-fifth Session, Geneva, 1988

Addendum to the Special Report of the Director-General on the Application of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa

Report of the Tripartite Conference on Action against Apartheid

(Harare, Zimbabwe, 3-6 May 1988)

Introduction

1. To give effect to the recommendation of the Committee on Apartheid at the 73rd Session (June 1987) of the International Labour Conference, the Governing Body of the International Labour Office decided at its 238th Session (November 1987) to convene a tripartite conference on action against apartheid in a front-line State. It was subsequently decided to accept the offer the Government of Zimbabwe to hold the meeting in Harare, Zimbabwe, from 3 to 6 May 1988.

2. At its 238th Session, the Governing Body decided that the composition of the conference would be on the same basis as for the tripartite conference held in Lusaka, Zambia, in 1984. The composition was therefore as follows: ten Government members, ten Employers' members and ten Workers' members designated by the Governing Body. In addition, an invitation to be represented by a tripartite delegation was extended to each of the front-line and neighbouring States, namely: Angola, Botswana, Lesotho, Mozambique, Namibia, Swaziland, United Republic of Tanzania, Zambia and Zimbabwe. It was understood that any other government wishing to participate in the meeting would be admitted as an observer and would have the right to speak.

3. Invitations to participate in the meeting were also extended to the Organisation of African Unity, the United Nations Special Committee against Apartheid, the African National Congress of South Africa and the Pan-Africanist Congress of Azania. The Arab Labour Organisation, the Organisation of African Trade Union Unity, the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, the International Organisation of Employers, the World Confederation of Labour and the World Federation of Trade Unions, participated as observers. Immediately before the opening session of the Conference, a request to participate as an observer was made by the representative of the Palestine Liberation Organisation, and this was agreed to by the Officers of the Tripartite Conference.

4. A list of participants is appended to the present report (Appendix II).

5. In accordance with the recommendation of the Committee on Apartheid at the 73rd Session (June 1987) of the International Labour Conference, the Governing Body decided that the agenda of the meeting should comprise the following items:

- (a) review of all aspects of action to be taken against apartheid and the continued illegal occupation of Namibia, including sanctions and assistance to the front-line and neighbouring States;
- (b) preparation for the updating of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa.

6. It was understood that the report of the Tripartite Conference on Action Against Apartheid would be submitted, together with the Director-General's Special Report on apartheid, to the Committee on Apartheid which would be set up by the International Labour Conference at its 75th Session in June 1988.

7. The Conference unanimously elected as Chairman Mr. John L. Nkomo, Minister of Labour, Manpower Planning and Social Welfare of Zimbabwe; as Employers' Vice-Chairman Mr. Benildo Hernandez; as Workers' Vice-Chairman Mr. Gerd Muhr; and as Reporter Mr. L. Danielsson. The Conference also set up a Working Party to prepare the updating of the Declaration; it was composed of three Government members (Nicaragua, Pakistan and Zimbabwe); three Employers' members (Mr. Hernandez, Miss Hak and Mr. Sumbwe); and three Workers' members (Mr. Ali Ibrahim, Mr. Svenningsen and Mr. Zimba). It was also decided that the Reporter of the Conference, Mr. Danielsson (Government, Sweden) would act as Chairman of the Working Party.

Opening sitting

8. The Conference was opened by the Secretary-General. Mr. Faisal Abdel-Rahman, Assistant Director-General of the International Labour Office. He expressed gratitude to the Government of Zimbabwe for its generous offer to host the Conference and for the facilities it had placed at its disposal. Both the timing and the venue of the meeting were highly appropriate in view of the importance of the subject-matter both for the ILO and for the worldwide campaign against apartheid, and he conveyed the best wishes of the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Francis Blanchard, for its success. The work of the Conference would have a vital bearing on the policies and activities of the ILO in its efforts to assist the victims of apartheid both in South Africa and elsewhere. Apartheid was the most persistent and profound challenge to the ILO's principles of equality, and this had been recognised in 1964 when the International Labour Conference had initially adopted the Declaration. This was still true today, and the ILO had demonstrated the seriousness of the threat posed by apartheid and that system's capacity to wreak social evil and injustice, repression and deprivation. The ILO had followed closely developments in South Africa in its pursuit of the objectives of the Declaration: each year the Director-General had submitted to the International Labour Conference a Special Report, which had shown the grave affront to ILO principles expressed in official policies and action by the South African authorities. In revising the Declaration in 1981, the Conference had placed emphasis on the responsibilities of governments, employers and workers everywhere to help end apartheid and to strengthen training activities and technical co-operation, and since then the Special Report had included information on such activities. The Special Report to be submitted to the Conference in 1988 was now available, and showed how much remained to be done, particularly in the form of concerted action to help Black workers and the independent trade union movement facing increased repression and the continuing restrictions on movement. The ILO had recently learnt that the Congress of South African Trade Unions (COSATU) would, in the coming week, be organising a special congress to prepare a response to the new restrictions imposed on it, and he felt sure that the Conference would wish to send a message of support and encouragement. The need for radical change in South Africa was more urgent than ever, and this was now generally recognised, thanks in part to the ILO's efforts and the contribution of the previous conferences on apartheid in 1984 and 1981. The ILO's technical co-operation activities were conducted in collaboration with other agencies, and in particular the United Nations Special Committee against Apartheid and the Council for Namibia, as well as national liberation movements recognised by the Organisation of African Unity and with international organisations of employers and workers. The programme was funded from the ILO's regular budget, special funds made available by member States and by multi-bilateral arrangements. The programme covered vocational training and rehabilitation, employment development, workers' education, training in management and small enterprise development and in industrial relations and labour administration, as well as advice on migrant labour problems. It was intended to prepare people to play a useful role in a society free of discrimination and to reverse the effect on neighbouring and front-line States of their growing dependency on South Africa. Attention had also been given to Namibia, where apartheid had been applied by South Africa with the ruthlessness of an occupying power. The programme had brought an increase in ILO activities and heightened awareness of the need for sustained action, through international co-operation, to end apartheid. The present Conference reflected that awareness: its findings would form the basis of the revision of the Declaration to be undertaken at the International Labour Conference in June 1988. The ILO would continue to play its full role in efforts to overcome the system of apartheid, and was confident of the support of the international community in that task.

9. The Chairman of the Conference welcomed participants to Zimbabwe and to the Conference. Zimbabwe recognised the international importance of the Conference as part of the world-wide campaign against apartheid. The people of southern Africa, of the front-line States and the liberation movements viewed it as an indication of international solidarity and a determination to meet the challenge posed by the evil system of apartheid. In this connection, he paid tribute to the International Labour Office for its active role in sponsoring and organising the Conference, which included representatives of governments, employers and workers in accordance with the ILO's tripartite structure. The people of South Africa and Namibia had suffered immeasurably from apartheid, but took some solace from the recognition among the entire international community of the evil of the apartheid system. He trusted therefore that all those present at the Conference – governments, employers, workers, representatives of front-line and neighbouring States and liberation movements – would co-operate to achieve a meaningful consensus on the issues before them, which would in turn help bring about meaningful change in South Africa.

Special sitting

10. The Conference held a special sitting on Wednesday, 4 May 1988, when it was honoured by the presence of His Excellency the President of the Republic of Zimbabwe, Mr. Robert Gabriel Mugabe, and members of his Government.

11. The Secretary-General of the Conference, in welcoming Mr. Mugabe, recalled his leadership of the Zimbabwean people's struggle for independence, which finally brought forth fruit on 18 April 1980. Since independence, Zimbabwe's relations with the ILO had been strengthened and one example of this close co-operation was its generous offer to host the present Conference, as well as the forthcoming Seventh African Regional Conference of the ILO in November 1988. On behalf of the ILO he expressed deep gratitude for these kind and generous gestures. Since coming to office Mr. Mugabe had also worked hard to achieve economic and social emancipation and had in fact just announced innovations in social security conferring considerable benefits on workers. The ILO was proud to be involved in such progress, and commended his concern for the lot of the common man. Zimbabwe had now come to occupy a respected position in the international community, thanks to its political courage and determination. It was playing a vital role in regional affairs through the Southern African Development Co-ordination Conference (SADCC) and also in the Non-Aligned Movement, of which Mr. Mugabe was the current President. His address to the special sitting of the International Labour Conference during which he had outlined his Government's policies and expressed the common concern at the situation in South Africa, complimenting the ILO for its work in monitoring the application of its Declaration was remembered by all. Since then, the ILO's activities had expanded to include technical co-operation programmes for Black workers from South Africa. The ILO remained firm in its stance against apartheid and would maintain its efforts to eradicate discrimination and injustice in South Africa.

12. His Excellency the President of the Republic of Zimbabwe, Mr. Robert Mugabe, extended to the Conference participants a warm welcome to Zimbabwe. Everything would be done to ensure the comfort of the participants as they went about their important task. The decision of the ILO to hold the Conference in Harare was a source of great pride not only to Zimbabwe, but to all the peoples and governments of the other front-line States which shared the ILO's profound commitment to social justice and its determination to rid mankind of the inhuman system of apartheid which was an affront to such values. The Conference was being held at a time when the struggle against apartheid was intensifying and the Pretoria regime was launching a thoroughly unholy war both within and outside South Africa. It had recently executed and threatened to execute freedom fighters, regardless of international pleas for mercy, and had conducted mass arrests of innocent people, and practised torture and the detention of children. It had also perpetrated acts of international terrorism, murdering its opponents in other countries. The front-line States continued to suffer destabilisation as a result of South African aggression; the invasion of Angola and bandit activities in Mozambique and Zimbabwe showed that apartheid could not be reformed but must be dismantled completely.

13. The present Conference, bringing together representatives of governments and of employers and workers, offered a valuable opportunity to work against apartheid alongside other progressive organisations in Africa and elsewhere, including the national liberation movements. There was now an ever increasing need to show solidarity with those people who bore the brunt of apartheid in South Africa and Namibia. At numerous international meetings, representatives of the region had expressed dismay that certain nations, themselves victims of Nazism during the Second World War, continued to aid apartheid economically, politically, diplomatically and in military matters. It was the urgent desire of the people of the region that comprehensive and mandatory sanctions should be introduced to curtail the aggression of South Africa and to hasten the end of apartheid.

14. The ILO had shown its commitment to assisting the victims of apartheid, even more so by increasing its activities and developing a concrete plan of action to help train South Africans and Namibians for future work in democratic institutions in their own countries. Apartheid was incompatible with the fundamental principles of the ILO, whose Declaration remained a clear statement that there was no place for a South Africa that practised apartheid in the ILO. The Special Reports submitted to the International Labour Conference annually provided detailed information showing that year after year the basic rights of workers were being violated under apartheid and highlighting the way in which low wages and inadequate working conditions had increased poverty among the Black population; how unemployment had continued to rise among Black workers; how Blacks had been stripped of their citizenship, land rights and access to jobs; how unfair wages, poor educational opportunities, low social security benefits and inadequate housing had remained endemic within the system of apartheid; and also how the lack of, or interference in, trade union rights to organise and bargain collectively in full freedom, together with physical attacks on trade unionists and trade union premises had become increasingly common. The power of trade unions had been eroded still further by legislative measures, such as the restrictions on COSATU. The updating of the Declaration in 1981 had recognised the growth of the independent trade union movement, to which the ILO had provided assistance alongside that which it gave to national liberation movements and the front-line States. Its tripartite structure was an important feature, for the action taken had not been limited to governments, but had come also from employers and workers. The present Conference would tackle the issues before it with seriousness and imagination. The suffering of the South African people could not be allowed to continue unabated for lack of concerted international action. He was sure that the Conference would result in a strengthening of the means of actions available to the international community in order to bring about the end of apartheid, and he wished the participants success in their endeavours.

15. The representative of the Government of Algeria, speaking on behalf of the Government group, expressed gratitude to Mr. Mugabe for honouring the Conference with his presence. His long experience of the struggle for justice, freedom and peace were a valuable example to all, and the victory of the people of Zimbabwe should be regarded as a prelude to that of South Africa's peoples.

16. The Employers' Vice-Chairman, Mr. Hernandez, stated that the Conference was proud to receive President Mugabe and was deeply grateful to him, his Government and his people for their hospitality and generosity.

17. The Workers' Vice-Chairman, Mr. Muhr, expressed thanks to President Mugabe for visiting the Conference and for his country's generosity and kindness in agreeing to host it. Recalling the recent wave of increased persecution, he emphasised the value of meetings such as the present Conference, which offered an opportunity to assess current ILO action and to update the Declaration. The ILO would be failing to live up to its Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia if it did not ensure that all groups involved in its work took real action to bring about its aims. What was needed was a plan for immediate action to protect the newly developed independent Black trade unions from being destroyed by the new wave of repression. The brutal attacks on COSATU and other unions of the previous year had continued unabated, and the right-wing elements of South Africa now obviously felt that the initiative was theirs. This meant that the chances of a peaceful solution were rapidly diminishing, and the role of the trade unions was being reduced to an absolute minimum by the Government, being denied the free right of appeal against acts of persecution and, more ridiculously, the right to mere celebration of public festivals. COSATU was prohibited from speaking out on such issues as sanctions and forced relocation of populations, and in effect free public assembly was forbidden to them. At a previous Conference held in Livingstone in 1981 it had been observed that any solution to the problem of apartheid inevitably involved the political implications of the system. The sheer extent of apartheid legislation made it impossible for trade unions to defend their members' interests fully without encroaching on issues that extended beyond the problems of the workplace. Now the Labour Relations Amendment Bill promised to undo the achievements of the Black trade unions over the past few years, cutting off external sources of financing and instituting a system of inspection that entailed grave violations of civil rights and heavy penalties for non-compliance. The reporting restrictions had made it impossible for the outside world to witness the daily scenes of violence in South Africa, and at the same time the increased attacks on ANC and other targets had taken their toll of human life both within South Africa and elsewhere, and executions and threats of execution had been used to intimidate opposition. The increasing efforts to destabilise the front-line States was a source of serious concern, and together with the situation in Namibia this made the updating of the Declaration all the more necessary, particularly in view of the appalling conditions in which the Namibian people lived and worked. There also trade unions had been subject to attacks and intimidation, with the usual violations of civil rights and arbitrary arrests. It should be realised, however, that apartheid contained the seeds of its own destruction, and the impetus of the campaign against injustice had to be maintained both in terms of short-term action and long-term strategy. The failure to adopt sanctions was a cause of grave disappointment: what measures had been taken were hardly affecting South Africa, whose present economic problems were due to its monetary policies: between 6 and 8 million Black workers were unemployed, and some 200,000 agricultural workers remained unpaid. Those very same people were demanding sanctions that would bite: the conclusions of the Conference Committee on Apartheid of 1987 contained an important section calling for powerful sanctions concerning gold transactions, bank loans and similar measures, and the revised Declaration could well incorporate these proposals. A bold and courageous stance was needed, not reservations, for no agreement reached at the present Conference would bear fruit if it did not lead to definite action.

Discussion of the items on the agenda of the Conference

18. The Government member of Norway recalled that South Africa had been among the countries which had signed the Declaration of Philadelphia in 1944, thereby subscribing to the principle that "all human beings irrespective of race, creed or sex, have the right to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity". In 1964, just before the ILO adopted its Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa, the South African Government withdrew from the Organisation. This withdrawal was based on that Government's deliberate decision not to pursue the goals of the Declaration. South Africa was not the only country which failed to live according to the principles and objectives of the Declaration. Racism and discrimination existed in his own country and had to be fought at home; but the fundamental difference was that South Africa had established them as its policy. Apartheid was an evil system that completely governed the life of South Africa's population with severe consequences for the country's Black majority which was deprived of its basic rights. Economic life and labour conditions in the country were affected and the so-called reforms had not given the Black population the rights ascribed to it by the ILO. This made the ILO's work to abolish apartheid important. It was deplorable that the Declaration had not had the effect hoped for at its adoption and the fundamental principles had not been implemented in South Africa after 24 years. The updated Declaration did not need a lot of revision but a new willingness by governments, workers and employers of the world to take it seriously and implement the Programme of Action. The Government of P. W. Botha had furthered its repression by restricting the activities of 18 peaceful opposition groups, among them COSATU, the country's most important trade union organisation; and by legislation restricting the transfer of funds. Freedom of assembly was important to the Government of Norway which supported international measures for a peaceful change. Mandatory and comprehensive sanctions adopted by the Security Council would be of crucial importance. The Government of Norway deplored the fact that necessary support for such measures had not been obtained. In 1978 the Nordic Ministers of Foreign Affairs adopted a programme of action against apartheid, the objective of which was a democratic South Africa with equal rights for all. Apartheid was a serious source of tension in all southern Africa. A Norwegian law, which entered into force in 1987, banned trade, investments in South Africa and Namibia and loans, credits and guarantees to persons domiciled in those countries; it also prohibited the carriage of crude oil to and from those countries. At the 41st Session of the United Nations General Assembly, Norway initiated a resolution on an oil embargo against South Africa. Norway's ambassador to the United Nations was chairman of an inter-governmental committee to monitor its application. An economic boycott had limited effect but Norway saw no other peaceful means. Norway supported the inclusion of Namibia in the ILO's Declaration and Programme of Action against Apartheid. Norway recognised the importance of helping countries in southern Africa to reduce their economic dependence on South Africa and in 1987 its aid to those countries totalled approximately US$180 million. It had also contributed US$10 million to the fund mentioned in the Programme of Action, and provided assistance to the liberation movements to take care of refugees; its contribution, including humanitarian assistance to the PAC and SWAPO amounted to approximately US$25 million in 1987. Norway would host a conference in Oslo from 22-24 August 1988 in co-operation with the OAU, the UNHCR and the UNDP to examine what the international community could do to combat the South African policy of destabilisation in neighbouring countries. He hoped that the work of the Harare Conference would make a significant contribution to a closer understanding of the measures needed and the action to be taken in order to abolish apartheid in a peaceful way.

19. The observer of the Organisation of African Unity considered that the present Conference was an ideal framework within which to discuss the means of combating the crime of apartheid, and welcomed the presence of members of the Pan African Employers'

Confederation, which, like the Organisation of African Trade Union Unity, had been created at the insistence of the OAU. The presence of the front-line States and the southern African liberation movements lent particular relevance to the Conference, for they faced the harsh everyday realities imposed on their people by the apartheid regime. The OAU was convinced that no true African independence was possible so long as a White minority continued to impose its evil law on the vast majority of the population and to monopolise the country's riches, to the detriment of three-quarters of the population who lived in deprivation. The situation in South Africa and Namibia continued to deteriorate, with mass imprisonment, the massacre of innocent people, illegal sentences passed by courts, deportation to bantustans and the expulsion of migrant workers. The OAU viewed this constant deterioration with grave concern. Its Liberation Committee strived hard to implement the recommendations made by the highest political bodies in Africa. It supported strongly the initiative taken to update the Declaration, and recommended in particular that the ILO should reaffirm vigorously its condemnation of the apartheid regime; that mandatory sanctions should be adopted against South Africa by the Security Council, in accordance with Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter; that it should encompass the principle of armed struggle in South Africa and Namibia and support anti-apartheid organisations in the liberation of South Africa and the achievement of independence for Namibia; that it should demand the establishment of an international tribunal to judge the crimes committed by the apartheid regime and its allies; and that the ILO should affirm the principle of periodically holding a tripartite conference in a front-line State in order to be closer to reality and to provide moral and political support to the South African and Namibian peoples.

20. The Government member of China welcomed the holding of the Conference, which he considered an absolute necessity in view of the deterioration of the situation in South Africa. The fundamental rights of the Black population of that country were being destroyed and this criminal racist policy had evoked an even greater resistance on the part of the South African people. The Namibian people were also struggling for their liberties and their national independence. In their struggle, these people associated their economic aspirations, such as those for increased salaries and improved working conditions, with the acquisition of political rights and this struggle was progressively spreading from the towns to the rural areas. The legitimate struggle of the South African and Namibian peoples and the courage which they had shown in the face of tyranny had afforded them the ever-widening support of the international community. The Government and people of China had always combated racism in all its forms and they strongly condemned the illegal occupation of Namibia. They would continue, as they had always done, to support the struggle of the peoples of Africa and of the front-line States to safeguard their independence and sovereignty. China remained faithful to its policy of maintaining no political, economic or commercial links with South Africa and applied strictly the pertinent resolutions adopted by the UN and the ILO. As far as it was able, China granted aid and moral and material support to the struggle of the South African and Namibian peoples and to the front-line States and their peoples. The deterioration of the situation in South Africa posed an ever more urgent problem for the international community. All the countries of the world, whether of the north or the south, and all international organisations—whether political, economic, social and cultural—should mobilise to oppose the perverse actions of South Africa and to support the struggle of the peoples of southern Africa. The Chinese Government entirely approved the ILO's decision to revise the Declaration in order to adapt it to the changing situation and to the reality of today. China proposed that emphasis should be placed on the encouragement of all ILO member States to apply the pertinent resolutions of the United Nations and to support the South African people strongly in their struggle against racial discrimination. Above all, the ILO should press the countries which had the most influence on the South African authorities to impose stronger and more effective sanctions in the political and economic spheres in order to bring about the final abolition of the system of apartheid and thereby achieve liberty, dignity and equality between the races of that country. The Declaration should also insist on the necessity of ending the illegal occupation of Namibia and of permitting that country to accede to independence immediately. The ILO must use all its influence and take all the necessary measures to strengthen support for the national liberation movement in order to achieve the withdrawal of the South African authorities from Namibia in accordance with United Nations Security Council Resolution 435. Lastly, it was important to strengthen the moral and material assistance given to the front-line countries which were in the forefront of the struggle against apartheid and suffered from military aggression and economic sabotage instigated by the South African authorities. The ILO and its member States ought therefore to grant to these countries substantial assistance in all fields so as to strengthen their capacity to resist the aggression and political and economic pressures of South Africa. China was entirely in agreement with the suggestion that the title of the annex be changed to "Programme of Action against Apartheid", which it considered more in conformity with the realities of the action undertaken today by the ILO. In conclusion, China was convinced that the Conference would be able, if all were in agreement, not only to carry out the revision of the Declaration, but also to make a valuable contribution to the abolition of apartheid in all its forms.

21. The Workers' Vice-Chairman, speaking in his capacity as a Workers' member and not on behalf of the Workers' group, referred to the policy of the German Trade Union Confederation towards South Africa. The South African regime was waging a war on its own people and had infested the Black suburbs of its cities with a permanent military presence. Neighbouring States were also subject to raids from South Africa by terrorist bands, thereby increasing tension in the region. Aggression was also perpetrated in the front-line States by groups supported by Pretoria which was creating serious problems for their populations. South Africa also practised economic reprisals against the front-line States, taking advantage of its monopoly of the transport infrastructure and control over industrial development, thereby holding millions of migrant workers as economic hostages in such sectors as mining and agriculture. The regime used all forms of economic pressure against its neighbours and threatened to intensify such measures. The German Trade Union Confederation (DGB), in conjunction with the international free trade union movement, promoted a programme of aid in food, medicine and social projects in all the front-line States. Those States needed assistance through the SADCC to develop their trade and transport infrastructure independently of South Africa. A major programme of assistance was also being conducted to counteract the economic reprisals taken by South Africa and to launch development in new areas. Here trade unions had a major role to play, and SATUCC offered a successful example of co-operation between trade unions in southern Africa. This co-operation should help provide a trade union response to aggression against neighbouring States, and, together with the ICFTU, the DGB supported such efforts and informed its members and the public of SATUCC's efforts. This had the valuable effect of obliging employers to negotiate, through their organisations, with the trade union movement and of offering a political response at the international level to the policies of the South African Government. International trade union solidarity had prevailed through the ICFTU's Programme of Action to support the organisation, education and training of Black trade unionists, and also to bring pressure to bear on parent companies to influence the policies of their subsidiaries in South Africa so as to recognise Black trade unions and to co-operate with them. These two parallel activities needed strengthening and promoting so as to remove the ban on political activity and the receipt of external support by trade unions and opposition groups in South Africa. The Metal Workers' Union of his country had, in co-operation with its fellow organisation in South Africa, compiled a catalogue of minimum standards of labour relations and collective bargaining in the West German metal industry with plants in South Africa. The right to strike and to organise and the right to raise grievances must be upheld. South African and German trade unions must together closely monitor developments in this respect, and their efforts were a valuable example of co-operation at the international level to combat the increased repression practised by the regime. The executive of the DGB had on 1 March adopted a resolution on measures to counteract the apartheid regime's action against trade unions and opposition groups, in which it had stated that the ban on political activity by members of COSATU and the ban on 17 anti-apartheid organisations introduced by South Africa had burnt the last bridge on the road back to peaceful and equal status for the Black majority; the ban on COSATU was an attack on the principle of freedom to form international associations enshrined in international labour Conventions Nos. 87 and 98. COSATU considered that this ban was only a prelude to a total ban on its activities. In its resolution the DGB had also strongly criticised the "public relations tour" of the West German politician Franz Josef Strauss, which was an affront to international efforts to combat the regime. Mr. Strauss had by his tour also contradicted the views of the majority of the German people. Like other trade unions, the DGB had a programme of public information on apartheid, campaigning through publicity against South Africa. This programme had been developed in co-operation with the ICFTU's Co-ordinating Committee and South African trade unions. Humanitarian aid was also being strengthened and individual trade unions were collaborating more closely with their counterparts in South Africa and in the front-line States on the resolution of conflict and the improvement of living and working conditions. The DGB would also maintain its pressure on the West German Government to remove its opposition to sanctions and to impose full economic, political and cultural isolation on South Africa. So long as South Africa showed no willingness to change its inhuman policies or to surrender its illegal occupation of Namibia, sanctions were essential to uphold human rights and the rights of peoples in those countries. They were a legitimate instrument of international politics, and should be implemented urgently. Trade union sanctions should hit South Africa as hard as possible so as to remove the economic foundation of the apartheid regime. International economic pressure was, however, perhaps the last chance for a non-violent end to apartheid, and the present economic crisis faced by South Africa should make their success all the more likely. The cost of apartheid had become impossible to maintain for Pretoria, and the differences between Whites and Blacks were now of enormous magnitude. The DGB and the ICFTU therefore campaigned strongly in favour of sanctions. German banks and enterprises should withdraw their financial support: rather, they should strive to benefit from the overthrow of the regime.

22. The Government member of Pakistan appreciated the ILO's pioneering role and supported its assistance to the peoples of southern Africa. Pakistan recognised the crucial role of the workers and trade unions in this struggle and would like the Conference to adopt specific proposals to intensify the struggle against apartheid. Significant developments were taking place in South Africa and the sub-region. The repressive policies of the Pretoria regime posed a great threat to regional peace and security. The need to express solidarity had never been greater. Under the state of emergency, Pretoria had embarked on increased repression. The press had been silenced. South Africa had acted against the United Democratic Front, and other organisations. It pursued a policy of armed aggression and destabilisation of the neighbouring States. Similarly, in Namibia there was an intensifying war with SWAPO. There had been aggressions in Maputo, Paris, Brussels and London. This was a cruel and perverse system which must be eradicated. For nearly 40 years Pakistan had maintained a systematic boycott of South Africa. His Government supported international efforts. The imposition of comprehensive sanctions would be most effective. Pakistan called upon the international community to oblige Pretoria to desist from destabilisation, economic blackmail and aggression. As part of Pakistan's long-standing opposition to apartheid, it had supported vocational training programmes and pledged its support to Namibia and the front-line States.

23. An observer of the ICFTU commended the ILO Governing Body for taking steps to organise the Conference in conformity with the recommendations of the Conference Committee on Apartheid to update the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa. The updating was required because of the new strategies of oppression and repression adopted by the apartheid Government. He emphasised the negative consequences of the apartheid system on the front-line States and drew the Committee's attention to the despair, horror and devastation which he observed during a recent ICFTU/SATUCC mission to Mozambique. He referred members to the diverse anti-apartheid activities undertaken by the ICFTU. It had strongly protested to the South African authorities about the barbaric incursion of the South African Defence Force hit squad into Botswana. A message of condolence was sent to the ANC President, Oliver Tambo, in relation to the murder of the ANC representative in Paris. An ICFTU top-level delegation which had visited South Africa in 1986 to show solidarity with the Black workers noted the Black workers' support for sanctions and, in this connection, the ICFTU organised an international conference entitled "Beating apartheid and strengthening the front-line" which requested the ICFTU to set up machinery to promote sanctions monitoring by union organisations in collaboration with the independent Black trade unions of South Africa and SATUCC. This unit had been monitoring disinvestment and withdrawals by multinational enterprises. At the ICFTU Executive Board meeting in December 1987, the Labour Relations Amendment Bill under discussion in South Africa was examined and all its implications for the unions identified. An attempt was made to mobilise the ICFTU members all over the world in solidarity with the Black workers in South Africa. He stressed the need for the ILO, as an organisation that supported trade union rights and freedom of association, to play a crucial role in this field. The ICFTU 14th World Congress adopted a resolution on South Africa which protested against the recent suppression of a number of anti-apartheid organisations including COSATU, by the South African regime. The ICFTU also raised the matter with the European Community. A special study on coal trade with South Africa was prepared which was circulated to all ICFTU affiliates. An international campaign to increase pressure on the multinational enterprises involved in the Mossel Bay and other energy-related projects for South Africa was being organised by the ICFTU. The ICFTU was also seriously concerned about the current press censorship in South Africa and had adopted various measures to disseminate up-to-date information such as that concerning detained trade unionists. With respect to ILO action, he indicated the need for the ILO to put greater emphasis on adequate monitoring of its Declaration and to play a more effective role in the area of information dissemination. The ICFTU also supported the ILO's increased emphasis on Namibia.

24. Mr. Timmer, Workers' member, referred to the efforts made by the ILO against apartheid and the limited impact achieved. The situation had deteriorated, and this had prompted the International Labour Conference to adopt a new Declaration in 1981. The eradication of apartheid was essential for the achievement of peace, stability and security in southern Africa. The South African Government had ignored the various United Nations resolutions and agreements it had entered into with its neighbours. He stressed the need to isolate the South African regime if apartheid was to be eradicated. In addition, arms and oil embargoes and bans on sporting contacts, imports of South African coal and agricultural produce, exports of technology, granting of loans and investments and air and sea links should be implemented. He urged the United Nations Security Council to impose comprehensive and mandatory sanctions in relation to Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter. The governments, employers' and workers' organisations of countries which maintained links with South Africa had a major responsibility. The trade unions in Hungary had always expressed considerable solidarity with the unions in South Africa and had resolved to provide support to the people fighting the apartheid system in the front-line States.

25. The observer of Kuwait drew the Conference's attention to the contribution Kuwait had made towards the cost of the Conference. He referred, inter alia, to the serious impact of apartheid, the increase in violence and the lack of progress made to eradicate apartheid in spite of the various resolutions and other measures adopted. He appealed for every attempt to be made to end the obnoxious system. Increased pressure should be placed on multinationals and others with investments in South Africa. He referred to the changes recently adopted by the South African Government as minor and cosmetic and urged the adoption of effective measures and the establishment of fundamental human rights. He condemned the relations between South Africa and Israel.

26. The observer of Australia noted that South Africa was on the brink of a tragedy which could be avoided and pointed to the factors that had contributed to this situation. He confirmed that apartheid was at the root of the increasing violence and misery in South Africa, the obstruction of Namibia's independence and the destabilisation of the front-line States. He drew attention to various dimensions of the current situation in South Africa including the state of emergency and draconian measures against freedom of association and public expression. He condemned the restrictions and attacks on the trade union movement and described the Government's latest measures of repression as a move to strangle non-violent self-expression by the Black majority and to prevent the Black workers from defending their industrial rights. He confirmed his Government's support for the attempts being made by the trade unions, churches and others to oppose the new restrictions. He paid tribute to the current efforts by the various races in South Africa to challenge the racist Government's policies and to struggle for fundamental change. Although, as a matter of principle, the Australian Government did not condone or resort to violence, it fully understood the frustration and bitterness felt by the people and hence the measures adopted by them. He underlined the crucial role that could be played by very strong international pressure, and deplored the fact that change in South Africa had been slow. He acknowledged the important role played by the United Nations, especially the Security Council, but stressed that it was inadequate and that much remained to be done. He also acknowledged the role played by the ILO and reiterated Australia's support of the ILO Declaration concerning the policy of apartheid in South Africa and the conclusions of the Conference Committee on Apartheid. It was, however, the Australian Government's view that calls for mandatory sanctions were not within the ILO's mandate but that of the Security Council. Australia supported the imposition of comprehensive and mandatory economic sanctions against South Africa and had itself adopted a number of measures, some of which were covered in the ILO Programme of Action against Apartheid. He indicated that apartheid was a "philosophy" which was completely alien to Australia's way of life and the multicultural society it was building. He informed the Conference about the specific sanctions including the ban on sports and air links as well as wider measures taken with its partners in the Commonwealth which were currently reflected in Australia's law and policy. He stressed that for sanctions to be effective they had to be adopted by all countries.

27. The observer of the United Nations Special Committee against Apartheid stated that the timing of the Conference could not be over-stressed owing to the current restrictions and rapid deterioration of the situation in South Africa. The Special Committee was seriously concerned about the apartheid regime's attempts to undermine the already fragile industrial relations system in the country. He observed that if the restrictions inherent in the Labour Relations Amendment Bill were adopted, they would constitute a frontal attack on the Black labour movement, freedom of association, the right to withhold one's labour and to safe and healthy working conditions which were essential elements of an industrial relations system based on international labour standards. South Africa continued to act with impunity since it could count on the support of some Western States. He emphasised that strong action was needed and that sanctions and support for the front-line States constituted integral crucial elements in the package of international action against apartheid. He drew attention to the co-operation between the ILO and the Special Committee over the years and recent efforts made by the latter at the United Nations to streamline its resolutions submitted to the 42nd Session of the General Assembly which contributed towards obtaining greater support, especially from the Western group, than in previous years. Regarding the updating of the ILO Declaration and the appended Programme of Action, he noted that these responded to the changing situation in South Africa and the international community's concern about it. The Programme of Action reflected what could be achieved and the effective role that could be played by the ILO's tripartite constituents. Since there was no existing monitoring mechanism, he commended the call in the Programme of Action for government action through the United Nations to establish a special monitoring unit. He observed that the mandatory arms embargo should be easy to apply and mentioned some cases of violations. Regarding the oil embargo, he commended the role played by the Inter-Governmental Group to Monitor the Supply and Shipping of Oil and Petroleum Products to South Africa and by the trade unions in exposing violations. He also expressed the Special Committee's concern about sanctions evasion and the ambivalence of recent disinvestments by transnational corporations in South Africa. He referred to the recent report by the United Nations Centre on Transnational Corporations which showed, inter alia, that in most cases the disinvestment adopted by the transnational corporations had not brought a complete end to business ties. The South African economy still had unrestricted access to products of the transnational corporations and to international technology; and it was doubtful if the confidence of the business community in South Africa had been affected by disinvestment. This indicated the urgent need to strengthen measures already adopted. He commended the ILO for taking the lead among organisations of the United Nations system in examining, through the Special Working Group on Banking Facilities of the Governing Body, alternatives to banks which were clearly identified with the apartheid regime, and encouraged the ILO to follow through with its initiative to devise a suitable alternative to such banking arrangements.

28. The observer of the Government of Ethiopia emphasised that the purpose of the Conference was to further efforts to restore respect for human rights, freedom and human dignity in South Africa, since the racist regime had contravened the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination. Ruthless repression of the Black majority was systematic in South Africa, and involved arrest without trial, harassment and torture. In labour matters, there was interference in the internal affairs of trade unions, falling wages and standards of welfare, rising unemployment and increasing numbers of Blacks living below the poverty level and suffering from hunger and malnutrition. Infant mortality was much higher among Black people, and the situation was worsening; South Africa did not effectively prevent child labour, which was permitted after the age of seven years but was often unpaid. The unequal distribution of resources between the Black and White populations was also reflected in the quality of Black education, which was associated with high failure rate and curricula not geared to employment possibilities. Credit was due to the Director-General of the ILO for his Special Report each year to the International Labour Conference, which this year showed that again there had been no change in the situation of the Blacks in South Africa. The ILO's action in assisting the liberation movements had been useful, and particularly the work of the Conference Committee on Apartheid, the Governing Body Committee on Discrimination and the ILO's work to disseminate information. Apartheid would, however, have disappeared long ago through the efforts of the Black resistance and the international community were it not for the support the South African regime received from certain States which placed their economic and strategic interests above the respect for human rights in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations. In her own country, the Government and the trade unions upheld the principle of the equality of all peoples and races, and maintained no relations whatsoever with the South African Government. It had recently increased the assistance it provided to the Black population and had trained some ten thousand liberation fighters and provided scholarships to Black students. Trade unions had raised the awareness among their members of the situation in South Africa, and had pledged to increase their material and financial assistance to the liberation movements. Members of the ILO had to go beyond statements of solidarity with oppressed people of South Africa; comprehensive and mandatory sanctions were essential to bring about the end of apartheid, and governments, together with employers' and workers' organisations, should take effective measures, to apply such sanctions. Co-ordinated tripartite efforts were needed in this respect. As regards the updating of the Declaration, Namibia should be included in the scope of the Declaration, and the idea of using the term "Programme of Action" should be supported. The monitoring system should be strengthened and pressure brought to bear on member States which did not apply the provisions of the Declaration. More serious measures should be taken against those States which failed to observe the Declaration.

29. The Employers' Vice-Chairman drew attention to the fact that the agenda referred to all action to be taken against apartheid. Employers in all countries, aware of the situation in South Africa, were receptive to all proposals to strengthen the Declaration and to reinforce action against apartheid. Previous speakers had been accurate in their descriptions of the situation in South Africa, and the Employers were ready to support the updating of the Declaration so as to improve its application in South Africa and elsewhere and thereby to promote the defence of human rights. Apartheid presented a major challenge to the international community, which should be met with commitment and determination. The working paper had referred to action by employers' organisation against apartheid, but had not stated clearly some major ventures, such as the fruitful co-operation between the Zambia Federation of Employers, their Norwegian counterparts and NORAD in a project providing various forms of training for refugees in Zambia, involving six seminars organised in collaboration with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees on small enterprise development and management training. NORAD had recently agreed to finance the second phase of the project. The Employers would propose at a later stage amendments to the draft updated Declaration and the Programme of Action. In particular, the fourth paragraph of the Preamble should refer to South Africa's failure to promote the objectives of the ILO, and paragraph 4 should refer to the maintenance rather than the establishment of the permanent Committee on Apartheid at the Annual Conference, which had already been established and had been in existence for some time. The road to freedom was hard, and patience and fortitude were needed to complete the journey. The host country, Zimbabwe, was a shining example of the reconciliation between different races that was possible and offered a valuable demonstration of how men of different colours could mix in harmony and co-operate for their mutual benefit. Some Employer members of the Governing Body present at the Conference wished, however, to draw attention to the provisional list of participants, which listed two organisations that were not mentioned in paragraph 2 of the background paper. They would raise this matter at the appropriate time with the secretariat or in the Governing Body of the ILO.

30. At the fourth sitting, on Wednesday, 4 May 1988, it was recalled that the day marked the tenth anniversary of the tragic massacre at Kassinga in Angola, where on 4 May 1978 South African armed forces had attacked unarmed Namibian refugees, resulting in the death of some 700 Namibians, most of them women and children. Several organisations, including the World Council of Churches, were organising solemn functions to commemorate the massacre, and it was appropriate that the present conference should also pay tribute to the memory of the victims. The Conference observed one minute's silence in tribute to the memory of the victims of the Kassinga massacre.

31. The Government member of Botswana proposed that the speech of President Robert G. Mugabe be considered as one of the basic documents of the Conference and be annexed to the report.

32. The Employers' member of Botswana accepted this proposal while pointing out that this speech should be regarded as a basic document of the Conference. The Conference adopted this proposal and the text of the address by the President of Zimbabwe at the special plenary sitting is appended to this report (Annex I).

33. The Government member of the United Nations Council for Namibia stated that the presence of a Namibian Government delegation, which he had the honour to lead, would, in its capacity as the legal administrative authority of Namibia, permit the pre-occupations of the victims of colonial occupation and apartheid to be voiced in the Conference. Colonial occupation and apartheid were separate issues. Despite the ending of South Africa's mandate on Namibia in 1966 and the creation of the United Nations Council for Namibia in May 1967, the adoption of Resolution 264 (69) by the Security Council on 20 March 1969, and the opinion of the International Court of Justice of June 1971 confirming the illegality of the South African presence in Namibia, South Africa remained in control of the country. The failure of the international community to oppose South Africa in unequivocal terms was extremely disheartening. Resolution 435/78 of the Security Council, despite the extensive preparations, had met with obstacles to its application. In the same way, when the United Nations Security Council had wanted to impose mandatory sanctions under the terms of Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter, certain countries had opposed them. It was possible that there were employers and workers who, in good faith, were unaware of the real situation of Namibia and whose determination was for this reason lessened. However, the struggle was being carried out by the Namibian people under the direction of SWAPO on many fronts, and employers' and workers' organisations should help to overcome the opposition of certain governments. The will of the Pretoria regime to apply the system of apartheid in Namibia was a logical consequence of its will to annex Namibia. When South Africa refused to sign the trusteeship agreements in 1945 and stopped submitting annual reports on its mandate in 1949, it had no other aim than to take control of the country, which it achieved in 1968 and 1969 when it divided the country into 10 ethnic groups called Bantustans, reserving an eleventh zone for the Whites. In support of these affirma-tions, the Special Report of the Director-General in 1988 had denounced the brutal laws imposed on the employment of Namibian workers by the White colonial regime, their archaic conditions of work and the racial discrimination which they had suffered for generations in the social and labour field., It referred to the discrimination which prevailed in that country between Whites and Blacks in the field of education and training, discrimination which the budget of 1986-87 only perpetuated. The action so far recommended was insufficient, and he requested all governments as well as all employers' and workers' organisations to take concrete action to encourage the independence of Namibia so that at the next meeting they would hear not the voice of a member of the United Nations Council for Namibia, but the voice of a representative of the free Namibian people.

34. The Government member of Sweden felt that the meeting was an indication of the support of world opinion for the people of southern Africa in their struggle for the total elimination of apartheid, a system which was a negation of all that was decent and humane and violated every principle and purpose of the Declaration of Philadelphia and the Constitution of the ILO. The present situation in South Africa and in Namibia made it imperative for international society to intensify its pressure on the South African regime in order to end apartheid. The ILO's role in this context was vital, since an important aspect of the policy of apartheid concerned the labour market and labour legislation. The Swedish Government fully supported ILO activities in this field and called upon the ILO and other international organisations to increase their assistance to the oppressed people within South Africa and Namibia and to support the front-line States. Regarding the updating of the Declaration of the Policy concerning Apartheid in South Africa, he agreed with the Government member of Norway that there was little need to make drastic changes in the text. Efforts should rather be concentrated on ensuring the implementation of the Programme of Action, and the situation of Namibia should be further highlighted in the Declaration. His delegation would propose some editorial changes to the Declaration at a later stage. Given the serious threat to international peace and security which apartheid constituted, his Government, together with other Nordic countries, had worked consistently for the adoption by the Security Council of the United Nations of mandatory sanctions against South Africa as a way of achieving the abolition of apartheid by peaceful means, and effectively putting pressure on the South African regime to change its racist and aggressive policies. Broad international support for this kind of action would be a clear signal to South Africa that the world community as a whole did not accept its apartheid policy. Government action, through the United Nations, should focus its efforts, first, on the adoption of binding sanctions in areas such as trade, investments, air traffic and nuclear technology; secondly, on the termination of South Africa's illegal occupation of Namibia and for the protection of Namibia's natural resources against illegal exploitations; thirdly, on an effective oil embargo against South Africa, including an oil transport embargo. Information on sanctions applied by Governments should also be distributed widely. Pending mandatory sanctions by the Security Council, Sweden and the other Nordic countries had taken unilateral measures to restrict their economic and other relations with South Africa. Such measures included bans on investments in, or trade with, South Africa and Namibia, and other countries should adopt similar measures. Assistance to South Africa's neighbouring countries and to the opponents and victims of apartheid must be increased to reduce their dependence on South Africa, and employers' organisations and trade unions, as well as the ILO itself, had an important role to play in this respect. His Government was currently directing almost half of its total bilateral assistance towards southern Africa and would continue to take its share of responsibility in this respect. It was therefore encouraging to note the regional co-operation between the front-line States, which was one of the most efficient forces for the achievement of peace and democracy in southern Africa. The international community had a duty to play in establishing a stable and peaceful southern Africa; all members of the Conference had a duty to work out a clear and strong updated Declaration and Programme of Action. Outside the Conference room there was a moral duty to continue to express solidarity with the oppressed masses in South Africa and Namibia, the victims of the crime of apartheid.

35. The Government member of the USSR observed that the relatively small degree of amendment required to the Declaration showed that the situation in South Africa had hardly changed. If anything, it had worsened, Pretoria continued to ignore international public opinion as expressed in decisions and resolutions of the United Nations, and had increased its repression in the form of bans on trade union activity and on the work of democratic organisations such as UDF and COSATU and maintained its policy of destabilising front-line States and its illegal occupation of Namibia. Apartheid had, however, progressed from a merely subregional issue to one of global proportions which constituted a major obstacle to international peace and security. It was an affront to the modern civilised world. It was therefore the duty of all the civilised world to do all it could to bring about a just political system in South Africa, and this meant more than mere rhetoric: the role of the United Nations must be strengthened and its potential utilised to the full so as to ensure the full implementation of its decisions on apartheid, and in particular of Security Council Resolution No. 435 on Namibia and No. 602 on South African aggression against Angola. In addition comprehensive and mandatory sanctions must be implemented immediately, in accordance with Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations. Full observance must also be secured of decisions and resolutions of the ILO and the OAU and other international organisations concerning the withholding of support from the racist regime of South Africa and the denial of military, political, economic and other links, as well as the observance of the embargo on arms dealings and on all forms of co-operation with South Africa in the production and development of nuclear and other weapons of mass destruction. The amendments to the Declaration covered these points. Major attention should be given in the Declaration to assistance to the front-line States, which had suffered immeasurable damage: his own Government already provided assistance, having contributed 100 million dollars to the AFRI-CA Fund and co-operating with SADCC and the preferential trade area. It was hoped that the Conference would give fresh impetus to the ILO's anti-apartheid activities in pursuit of the goal of a just resolution of South Africa's political problems, and peace and stability for the peoples and nations of southern Africa.

36. The Government member of Nicaragua stated that his country was convinced of the need to destroy the forces which attacked, exploited and oppressed the region of southern Africa whose peoples were only defending their right to liberty, democracy and peace. The history of the peoples of southern Africa reflected many heroic gestures against foreign domination and the effects of discrimination and racial segregation. The existence of the apartheid regime, which was kept alive thanks to the historic collaboration it received from powerful allies which supposedly promoted and defended democracy and human rights, constituted a nucleus which generated tension in southern Africa and which represented the greatest danger for international peace and security in the region. The peoples of Central America and of southern Africa were victims of the same enemy, which used all forms of aggression, including economic destabilisation, to attack the sovereignty of those nations. The stubbornness of the United States had obstructed efforts to achieve peace in Central America. The same stubbornness on the part of that Government was evident in southern Africa in its policies designed to defend the interests of the White minority to the detriment of the rights and interests of the Black majority. The double standards inherent in the policy of "destructive engagement" meant that the Government of the United States opposed the application of mandatory sanctions against the racist regime of South Africa, while in Central America its illegal economic embargo against Nicaragua continued. Peace and apartheid were irreconcilable, and the Government of Nicaragua therefore supported totally the call for mandatory sanctions against the Pretoria regime. This was a peaceful mechanism by which the international community could help the peoples of southern Africa to eradicate apartheid and promote genuine democracy in the region. He supported the Programme of Action adopted in July 1986 by the International Conference for the Immediate Independence of Namibia, which called on the United States and the United Kingdom, permanent members of the Security Council which until now had prevented the Council from acting effectively, to reconsider their position in the light of the grave situation in southern Africa and approve the imposition of full and mandatory sanctions, which were the most efficient peaceful means of obliging South Africa to put an end to its illegal occupation of Namibia. His country would always be at the side of the peoples of southern Africa in their just fight to eradicate apartheid, and was convinced that the conscience of humanity had no greater shame than the existence of the inhuman racist regime in South Africa.

37. The observer of the Islamic Republic of Iran considered that of all the problems and difficulties encountered today by the oppressed nations of the world, apartheid and the racist policy of oppression were certainly the most terrible. As soon as foreign investors had decided to exploit the natural resources of certain regions and the cheap labour they found there, the parties in power in those countries allied themselves to those investors to protect the investments and the profit they made from them. These parties in power, thanks to their economic and military means, had eliminated all threats to these investments. One had only to consider the regions of the world where political tension existed to find a confirmation of this policy. Any tendency to independence on the part of the oppressed countries was opposed by those colonial powers and arrogant regimes. The regime of South Africa was among those which protected these imperialist structures and oppressed those movements which desired independence and justice. This was the case in its intervention in Namibia and its aggression on front-line States. In the face of these criminal measures, international organisations and certain countries had condemned the South African regime and adopted resolutions and measures to combat the regime. They had also tried, by means of training and retraining, to help the victims of apartheid to fight racial oppression. It was important today to re-examine the effect of these measures so as to judge their effectiveness and to be able to strike directly at the heart of the economic strength of the South African regime. Since the Lusaka Conference, the policy of apartheid had not only been pursued but had been strengthened. The struggle against apartheid in all its forms must remain a priority, as must economic aid to the front-line countries and liberation movements. The Islamic Republic of Iran was fighting at the side of the liberation movements and front-line States, and had broken off all political, economic, commercial and cultural links with South Africa and had asked those who bought petrol from Iran to undertake not to sell it to the racist regime of South Africa. On the other hand, his country wished to expand its relations with certain neighbouring countries of South Africa, and in particular with the United Republic of Tanzania, Zimbabwe, Mozambique and, more recently, Angola. The triumph of the Islamic revolution in Iran and the nine years of resistance by his country to the imperialist incursions in the Gulf region had shown that racist and authoritarian regimes were unable to halt the just struggle of oppressed peoples for the establishment of social justice and national independence.

38. The observer of the Sudan supported the revolutionary leadership as represented by the ANC and PAC in South Africa and all those in the region of South Africa who had been facing the many forms of oppression by the South African regime. His Government supported action undertaken by SWAPO, and called for the implementation of the 1978 Declaration. He hailed the tenacity and integrity of the struggle of the South African and Namibian people, drawing attention to the important role played by trade unions in South Africa. The Government of Sudan had long ago decided to boycott the regime totally and it called upon other peace-loving regimes to strive to abolish apartheid, which was a monstrous evil practised by an abhorrent regime which maintained dubious relations with other countries of oppression, including Israel. In this connection he hailed the uprising of the Palestinian people under the PLO in an attempt to obtain their legitimate rights in Palestine.

39. The Government representative of the United Republic of Tanzania described apartheid as the most systematic form of institutional discrimination, human oppression and exploitation. It meant the denial to Black people of their fundamental human rights and liberties, their subjection to many repressive laws and regulations and their exclusion from political life. Apartheid should therefore be eliminated. He referred to the attempts made by the international community, including wide-ranging measures adopted by bodies in the United Nations system, to induce South Africa to change its racist policies. The Paris Declaration on Sanctions against South Africa constituted a framework for effective international action geared to the elimination of apartheid. He also pointed to the United Nations' efforts aimed at providing political, moral and material support to the oppressed people of South Africa, and various countries' condemnation of the "bantustanisation" policy. The South African regime's response had been the adoption of harsher and more discriminatory measures. Apartheid continued to exist because of the support obtained by the South African Government from the world powers who maintained close ties with it and supplied it with arms, and he appealed to them to change their ways. Apartheid enabled the international monopolists to reap high profits by providing them with cheap labour, and it was for this reason that the countries of these monopolists continued to defy the various United Nations resolutions and world public opinion. He referred to several repressive measures in South Africa and acts of aggression against neighbouring States which required a serious review of the progress made in the search for a workable solution to the apartheid problem. Since peaceful measures had failed, armed struggle was the only means left to end apartheid. He appealed to the international community to intensify its opposition to apartheid, and to Africa to resort to armed struggle and economic pressure. He acknowledged the effective role that could be played by the trade unions. He commended the Nordic countries for adopting a programme of action against apartheid which should be emulated by all peace-loving people of the world. He was convinced that the ILO Tripartite Conference would provide new strength for the struggle to eliminate apartheid.

40. Speaking as the Chairman of the Pan-African Employers' Confederation, Mr. Georget, Employers' member, thanked Zimbabwe for hosting the conference despite its own financial difficulties. Zimbabwe had had to struggle for its independence and had been able to achieve national unity, and was now a classic example of how a State could achieve unity despite economic difficulties and racial differences. In selecting the participants for the Conference, the Governing Body had demonstrated that apartheid was not a matter which concerned only Africans, but one that involved the whole international community. In this regard, he stressed the unitary aspect of Africa within which governments, employers and workers formed one family. Their common objective remained the struggle against injustice not only in Africa where it was directed in particular against the apartheid regime, but also in other parts of the world where injustice and violations of freedom existed. The Pan-African Employers' Confederation joined hands with workers to work towards the development of Africa and the protection of the rights of all concerned. Finally, he thanked the secretariat for the excellent background paper and for the material arrangements made in collaboration with officials of the host country to ensure that the Conference achieved the success it hoped for.

41. The Government member of Nigeria considered that the presence at the Conference of people from different parts of the world reflected the fact that apartheid was an international issue which posed the greatest threat to international peace and security. An effective solution should, therefore, be found by all. South Africa had given notice of withdrawal from the ILO in 1964, and apartheid was an obvious violation of the Declaration of Philadelphia; 24 years later the South African regime still maintained its obnoxious policy of apartheid. Referring to the various forms of oppression suffered by Black workers in South Africa and the Government's acts of aggression against neighbouring countries, he drew attention to South Africa's continued illegal occupation of Namibia, the worsening unemployment, abject poverty, the lamentable industrial relations and poor education suffered by the workers in that country. He informed the Conference of a number of measures undertaken by Nigeria against the apartheid regime of South Africa, which included the provision of both material and moral support. It had created a Southern African Relief Fund, which provided scholarships in the 1986/87 academic year to Black South African and Namibian students to study in Nigeria. He expressed concern about the issue of migrant labour in South Africa and the South African Government's threats to repatriate such labour. To meet this challenge, he urged the ILO to step up its assistance to the migrant supplier countries to develop contingency employment plans to absorb the repatriated migrant labour and appealed for assistance to the front-line States to reduce their dependence on South Africa. Furthermore, the international community should not relent in its efforts to impose comprehensive and mandatory sanctions on South Africa and to stop investment in, and various forms of trade with, that country. He expressed support for the draft updated Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa as well as its appended Programme of Action.

42. The observer of the Palestine Liberation Organisation referred, inter alia, to the PLO's full understanding of the suffering of the South African people since the Palestinians were also experiencing similar treatment. He pointed to the grave impact of South Africa's aggression on the front-line States, and to the famine, destruction of food crops and infrastructure in Mozambique and the dangerous situation in Angola. Greater assistance was needed for the front-line States, and the national liberation movements. The situation in Namibia could be solved only through international support for the people of Namibia, led by SWAPO, to strengthen their capacity to free their country from South African occupation. He compared the situation in South Africa and Namibia to that in the occupied Arab territories where international charters, conventions, laws and treaties had been ignored for more than twenty years. He drew the Conference's attention to the resolutions adopted by the United Nations and the Security Council since 1947 and also called for the defence of, and respect for, human rights and the laws and other regulations of international organisations such as the United Nations, the ILO and the Non-Aligned Movement. He drew attention to the current uprising in the occupied Arab territories and called for the withdrawal of the invading force and the adoption by the international community of a strong position in favour of oppressed people all over the world.

43. The observer of the Organisation of African Trade Union Unity (OATUU) drew attention to several activities undertaken by his organisation against apartheid. These included information dissemination on the true nature of apartheid, the countries and multinational corporations sustaining the apartheid regime and the economic sabotage and destabilisation of the front-line States practised by the racist government. Following OATUU's exposure of the activities of the Hans Seidel Foundation of the Federal Republic of Germany in Namibia, the OAU Labour Commission at its session in April 1988 had called upon African States to sever all links with this organisation. OATUU also emphasised educational activities, including the provision of educational information on the atrocities of the apartheid system in their workers' education programme. Pressure was exerted on governments to adopt comprehensive mandatory sanctions, and unions were urged to undertake industrial action against multinational corporations operating in South Africa and Namibia which refused to recognise the Black trade unions. It also provided solidarity support including protests about detentions, imprisonment, hangings and other repressive measures meted out to trade unionists by the racist regime and campaigns against white emigration to South Africa and Namibia. OATUU had also appealed to all its affiliates and other unions to dedicate May Day in 1988 to the fight against apartheid and to undertake fund-raising activities to assist the national liberation movements (NLMs) and the independent trade unions in South Africa and Namibia. OATUU also gave financial and other material support to the independent Black trade unions inside South Africa and Namibia and to the national liberation movements. A recent joint OATUU/ILO seminar on international labour standards and trade union action against apartheid, held in Harare, had called for the unity of trade unions within South Africa to ensure unity of action against apartheid. OATUU was ready to provide any assistance requested by the parties concerned to ensure the achievement of this unity. OATUU had also planned joint seminars with the UN Special Committee against Apartheid and indicated their willingness to involve also the ILO. OATUU supported the updating of the ILO Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa and proposed that the name of the International Labour Conference Committee on Apartheid should be changed to "Committee Against Apartheid". He appealed to governments, employers' and workers' organisations and the ILO to withdraw their funds from banks maintaining links with the apartheid regime. He urged the ILO to implement the request in paragraph 5(g) of the background paper to organise a pledging conference to generate additional resources for its anti-apartheid programme of activities, including its assistance to front-line States and national liberation movements. In addition, he called upon the ILO to increase its technical and financial assistance to the Black trade unions in South Africa and Namibia and to SACTU, ATUC and SATUCC, especially in the fields of workers' education, co-operatives, vocational training, migrant workers and assistance to women victims of apartheid. He expressed OATUU's support for the recommendations of the ILO Governing Body's tripartite evaluation mission on technical co-operation projects of the ILO's anti-apartheid programme, and called for such an evaluation mission to be undertaken regularly. In addition, he urged the ILO to employ more African experts in these projects owing to their sensitive nature. He commended the Nordic countries for imposing sanctions against South Africa and condemned the countries that had increased their trade with the racist regime, appealing to the later to stop such action. OATUU remained convinced that sanctions were an effective measure against the apartheid Government, and Namibia should be included in all action against apartheid mentioned in the updated Declaration.

44. Mr. Wang, Workers' member, stated that the holding of the present Conference reflected the increasing concern of the international community at the daily worsening situation in South Africa under the apartheid regime. It again reaffirmed the ILO's determination to continue its anti-apartheid activities. Since the adoption of the Declaration in 1964, more than 20 years had passed, and South Africa had still not renounced its policy of apartheid. The South African authorities continued to repress the people of that country, they had refused to free Nelson Mandela and other political prisoners, and since the proclamation of the state of emergency in June 1986 hundreds of thousands of people had been arrested without trial. A number of democratic organisations had been outlawed, their leaders arrested or forced into exile. The activities of the independent Black organisation were restricted and many trade unionists had been kidnapped, tortured or assassinated. At the same time, despite United Nations resolutions, the South African authorities had continued their illegal occupation of Namibia and launched attacks from that country against other southern African countries. This showed that apartheid was a violation of basic human rights, of the principles of the Declaration of Philadelphia and of international labour standards. Effective concrete action was needed in a number of areas so as to end the apartheid regime, which the South African authorities would never willingly revoke. Greater pressure should first be brought to bear on Pretoria to force them to repeal apartheid. The ILO's constituents should respond to the appeal made in July 1987 by the SADC and impose on South Africa the comprehensive and mandatory sanctions requested. Solidarity should then be reinforced and assistance intensified to the South African people in its struggle. The international community should use all available means to help Black workers and trade unions in South Africa, as well as national liberation movements recognised by the OAU. Assistance should also be increased to the Namibian people and to the national liberation movement which represented them in their struggle against apartheid for national independence, and all available means should be used to secure the application of Security Council Resolution No. 435 concerning the independence of Namibia. Assistance should also be increased to the front-line and neighbouring States, particularly in the economic sphere, so as to enhance their capacity to combat the racist regime. Finally, the ILO should reinforce the monitoring of the application of the Declaration and of the Programme of Action. The necessary expenditure must be earmarked in the regular budget for action against apartheid, especially in the field of technical co-operation, and extra-budgetary resources should be secured as necessary. He hoped that account would be taken of these proposals in the updating of the Declaration, and he supported the amendment to the title of its Annex to read "Programme of Action against Apartheid"

45. The Government member of Algeria stated that the Conference marked the continuation of efforts begun in Livingstone and Lusaka and was therefore part of the ILO's continuing contribution to the activities of the international community to put an end to the system of apartheid, which was based on a denial of basic human rights, constant aggression and destabilisation throughout southern Africa. He strongly associated himself with those who had condemned apartheid. The Conference should focus in particular on the conditions for the intensification of activities against apartheid in all fields, the strengthening of support for national liberation movements and for independent trade unions and the strengthening of the economies of the front-line States so as to reduce their dependence on South Africa. This was all the more essential in view of the experience of recent years, which had demonstrated the determination of the racist regime to ignore the repeated appeals of the international community for the abrogation of apartheid and the independence of Namibia. Such international action was a duty of solidarity with the peoples of South Africa and Namibia and the front-line States, which gave them active support, with backing from the OAU and the non-aligned movement. For this reason the latter had reaffirmed the need for comprehensive and mandatory sanctions against South Africa and had set up the AFRICA Fund to enhance the economic potential of the front-line States, to which Algeria had made a concrete contribution. His country fully recognised the importance of the ILO's role in the fight for equality and dignity, as well as the need to update the Declaration and to adopt a real Programme of Action. In this respect the ILO's capacity to mobilise greater resources for the national liberation movements and front-line States held particular importance for the implementation of technical assistance programmes adapted to the priorities of those countries. The action of the present Conference was part of the efforts of the international community to promote peace, justice and security. The prevailing situation in South Africa inevitably called to mind that suffered by Palestinian workers in the occupied territories, which also called for sustained efforts of solidarity.

46. The representative of the Government of Zambia stressed that apartheid was an abhorrent system, and he condemned it as a major insult to civilisation and a flagrant violation of human rights and of the principles of the ILO. Apartheid was daily becoming more repressive and violent, and the current state of emergency in South Africa made possible the suppression of trade union rights and of basic human rights. The murder of Dulcie September, the attack on Professor Sachs in Mozambique and the murder of innocent children in Angola, Botswana and Mozambique were proof of the inhumanity of apartheid. The front-line States had also suffered from South African attacks intended to destabilise them. The front-line States considered that apartheid could not be reformed but had to be eliminated to ensure lasting peace in the region, and they called on the international community to support the liberation movements in South Africa and Namibia. In this respect expressions of solidarity were not enough, and only concerted action by governments, employers and workers could put an end to this abhorrent system. In this connection he thanked the Nordic countries for providing considerable material support to the struggle against apartheid. The present Conference had one objective—the elimination of apartheid—and this called for concrete efforts by the international community as a whole.

47. The observer of the Arab Labour Organisation expressed deep regret at the deterioration in the situation of Black workers in South Africa and Namibia due to the determination of the South African authorities to continue the apartheid regime. The main task of the Conference was to adopt a Programme of Action to strengthen the struggle against apartheid. The Pretoria regime had already been denounced in the 1964 Declaration, but this had not prevented the South African authorities from pursuing their apartheid policies, for they were helped by certain countries which placed their interests above social values and international principles. The Arab Labour Organisation would have preferred the draft document submitted to the Conference to include a paragraph denouncing relations between South Africa and certain Western governments in vital areas. The Arab people, victims of Israeli occupation, were among those who best understood the sufferings of the South African and Namibian peoples, and this was reflected in their solidarity with the African people, against the racist regime. It was absolutely necessary to develop a realistic and ambitious Programme of Action to restore the confidence of the peoples of South Africa and Namibia, who faced despair on account of the ineffectiveness of international action intended to guarantee fundamental human rights.

48. The observer of the World Federation of Trade Unions stated that the subject of apartheid had been on the agenda of a great many international meetings over the past 25 years, and the situation in South Africa was getting worse. Apartheid was a crime against humanity which seriously threatened international peace and security. Pretoria continued to scoff at international opinion and to suppress the Black majority by all means at its disposal, including terrorist acts in other countries. There was thus an urgent need for effective measures to hasten the end of this inhumane system, particularly in view of the recent intensification of oppression marked by the ban on COSATU's activities and the raids on Mozambique. It was disheartening to note the continued failure by many transnational corporations to withhold financial, economic, technological and even military support from South Africa. Words were not enough in the struggle against apartheid, and he therefore supported earlier suggestions that member States should be further encouraged to take concrete measures against South Africa.

49. The observer of the National Council of Trade Unions of South Africa, speaking by agreement with the Officers of the Conference, drew attention to the recent increase in Pretoria's oppression, and in particular its attack in the free trade union movement. The Labour Relations Amendment Bill, if enacted, would increase this pressure even further. NACTU had organised meetings with COSATU to protest against Government action and had launched a major offensive against the new Bill on the shop floor, as well as resolving to oppose the forthcoming municipal elections which were aimed at undermining the workers' revolution. NACTU had lodged a formal complaint with the ILO calling for the Organisation to undertake a fact-finding commission on South Africa to bring to the attention of the international community the erosion of civil and labour liberties. The recent wave of increased oppression had, however, failed so far to achieve its objective, and had in fact had the effect of raising awareness of the political and labour scene and strengthening the unity of Black opposition groups. The authorities had issued faked pamphlets purporting to present the views of NACTU and COSATU attacking each other in an attempt to divide the labour movement. NACTU had since 1982, when it was still known as CUSA, fought for May Day to be treated as a holiday. On its inauguration NACTU had launched a campaign to unite all the mass democratic organisations. In pursuit of unity NACTU had visited the PAC in the United Republic of Tanzania in August 1987 and the ANC in Harare in May 1988. The harassment and detention of trade union leaders had brought the labour movement even closer to student, youth, church, political and community organisations which organised the much publicised rent boycotts and the boycotts of White businesses in White areas. NACTU's commitment to full and mandatory sanctions against South Africa had intensified. NACTU appealed to the ILO to fight organisations which sought to undermine NACTU and other organisations fighting a legitimate battle against apartheid by often distorting the history of the liberation struggle, thereby generating a partisan approach to assistance. Individuals and organisations were involved in the campaign of lies and disinformation in the international arena. NACTU asked the ILO to set itself achievable objectives within reasonable time-frames so as to strengthen the international campaign against the crime of apartheid.

50. The observer of the Congress of South African Trade Unions, speaking by agreement with the Officers of the Conference, stressed that apartheid was not an academic question. The Black people of South Africa and COSATU were committed to a course of determined struggle against injustice and looked to the international community for active concrete support: they did not ask other nations to bear their burden, for that was impossible, but they asked them to honour what was surely a moral obligation to ensure that South Africa abided by universally accepted rules of human decency and became a worthy member of the international community. Apartheid and peace could not exist side by side: the Black people of South Africa wanted peace for their people. Just what exactly they should do to achieve it was a difficult question to answer given the complexities of the problem, but they were determined to accept no compromise, for to do so would be to gamble with the destiny of their people. They therefore looked to other nations for solidarity with their struggle for their basic human rights.

51. The observer of the African National Congress observed that the Black people of South Africa were now suffering an unprecedented wave of oppression, and this situation offered an opportunity for the international community to show its willingness to respond promptly to hasten the downfall of the criminal apartheid regime. The recent ban on the UDF and other democratic organisations was intended to silence the democratic opposition: strikes were largely illegal, and mass political activity in all its forms was banned. Prospects were hence rather bleak, but ultimately the racist regime was bound to fail, for oppression only strengthened resistance and determination. The present Conference had before it the task of identifying concrete measures to respond to the legalised terrorism conducted by the regime of P.W. Botha against his country's own people and against the people of Namibia. A clear programme of action, based on mandatory sanctions and involving a call for concrete action would be welcome. Such a programme should include an appeal to the international labour movement to refuse to handle goods, ships or aircraft bound to or from South Africa. The programme should also categorise the Pretoria regime as illegitimate, unentitled to international recognition. The ANC relied on such support as that forthcoming from the Conference to help its campaign for the rights of the people it represented, and wished it success in its endeavours.

52. The observer of the Pan-Africanist Congress of Azania, referring to the recent escalation of oppression by the apartheid regime, emphasised that apartheid could not be reformed, but must be destroyed, and that the struggle had to be waged on many fronts. The role of NACTU and COSATU was in this respect crucial. He called on the international community to appeal for clemency in the case of the Sharpeville Six, who were still under sentence of death. Messages of solidarity should be sent to the South African Black Municipality Allied Workers' Union (SABMAWU), the organisation to which the only woman among the Six belonged—Theresa Ramahemola. He also called for the release of Moses Mayekiso, currently awaiting trial with his colleagues, trade unionists, for accusations of treason. Unity was an article of faith for the Black movement in South Africa. In this respect he congratulated NACTU for its sterling efforts to maintain unity among the many opponents of apartheid. The PAC held that all forms of struggle must be encouraged, foremost among them being the armed struggle. In the international arena the PAC continued to campaign for the complete isolation of the Pretoria regime and the imposition of comprehensive and mandatory sanctions. However, international action could only complement efforts within South Africa itself against racism by those directly affected. In this respect the introduction of issues deriving from the East-West opposition into the apartheid debate were extremely unhelpful. The PAC supported unreservedly the efforts of the Secretary-General of the OATUU in his call for unity among all organisations fighting apartheid. He called on all those who loved freedom to support those fighting apartheid and to refrain from sectarian approaches. Finally, the considerable degree of foreign, Western investment in South Africa could not pass without comment: such investment sustained the apartheid system and contributed to the increasing economic dependence of front-line and neighbouring States on South Africa, which were in certain respects the economic hostages of the apartheid regime. He therefore appealed to the ILO and the international community in general to grant them material and other support, as they were now the targets of aggression and destabilisation policies practised by South Africa.

53. The Workers' member of Namibia stated that the Conference was taking place at a crucial stage in the struggle for national liberation in Namibia. The situation was deteriorating daily, with reinforcement of repression in many brutal forms, including murder and arbitrary arrest. Namibia had been turned into a huge military camp, with over one thousand troops committing atrocities against the Namibian people. The workers of Namibia were harassed and intimidated: a score of trade union officials had been arrested, including Jason Angula, SWAPO Secretary for Labour inside Namibia, who had been arrested under section 6 of the Terrorist Act of South Africa and had been held incommunicado since October 1987, possibly in Osire jail, a centre well known for the torture of prisoners. The regime had often used subversion to break up rallies organised by the trade unions and to force the participants into confrontation: Immanuel Shifidi, a veteran worker, had been killed towards the end of 1986. The racist regime was threatening to take draconian action against the workers' organisations and SWAPO and even the progressive media, as was evident from the speech by P.W. Botha during his visit to Windhoek on 9 April 1988, when he announced that South Africa would take firm action against organisations advocating the support of violence and against newspapers printing articles about "terrorism". These remarks were meant to prepare public opinion in Namibia for the formal banning of SWAPO, genuine trade unions under the umbrella of NUNW, and progressive newspapers and publications such as the Namibian and the Namibian Worker. Apartheid was evil and had to be completely demolished: it could not and should not be reformed, for it kept the peoples of South Africa and Namibia under the bondage of oppression and humiliation politically, culturally and economically. The international community should redouble its efforts to contribute effectively and concretely to the practical elimination of apartheid. It was almost ten years since the adoption of United Nations Security Council Resolution No. 435 which called for free and fair elections under the supervision and control of the United Nations. The racist regime of Pretoria defied with impunity the decisions and resolutions of the United Nations and other international forums, and the NUNW hoped that the international community would take steps to secure respect for those decisions. He supported the recommendation that the updated Declaration should also apply to Namibia, for apartheid laws were applied with the same intensity and damaging effects in Namibia. The NUNW thanked the ILO for the technical assistance it had rendered so far, and looked forward to a real increase in such assistance.

54. The Workers' member of Mozambique expressed his conviction that the Conference would strengthen the cause of the ILO and the firm resolution of its member States to pursue vigorously the application of concrete measures to eliminate apartheid in South Africa and Namibia. The regime of apartheid had been declared a crime against humanity: terrible atrocities were being committed against the peoples of South Africa and Namibia and against bordering States: the apartheid regime continued its policy of destabilisation, particularly in Mozambique and Angola, where peace was prevented by South Africa, whose atrocities there were well known and had resulted in more than four-and-a-half million displaced persons, the murder of thousands of civilians and wanton destruction of economic and social infrastructure. Once again, the population was being forced to take up arms. Mozambique was in urgent need of material and financial aid to reconstruct its schools, hospitals, villages, water supplies, roads and railways, which had been destroyed. It needed medicines and food aid, tools for agriculture, seeds and fertilisers, clothes and tents for the displaced persons who had lost everything. The Conference should provide encouragement to the people and workers of Mozambique in their struggle to put an end to terrorism and to rebuild their country in a climate of peace and stability. He fully supported the draft updated Declaration and the Programme of Action against Apartheid, but the Declaration should be accompanied by concrete action by the parties concerned, and governments, employers and workers. The Governing Body of the ILO should endeavour to translate the Declaration into practical action, which was the only hope of eliminating once and for all the hateful regime of apartheid.

55. The Workers' member of the United Republic of Tanzania stated that apartheid was a diabolical form of racial supremacy and only comparable to Nazism and slavery in the sufferings of mankind, hence the concern in the international community at the inhuman system practised by the racist Pretoria regime in both South Africa and occupied Namibia. ILO action against apartheid, based on its Declaration of 1964, was an expression of the international community's abhorrence at that inimical system. However, any action by the ILO towards the dismantling of apartheid would need total co-operation and acceptance by all Governments to apply comprehensive and mandatory sanctions, arms and oil embargoes, with positive financial, material and moral support to the liberation movements and to popular movements and trade union organisations in South Africa and Namibia. It was heartening to see that racial coexistence had been possible in other African countries, and particularly in Zimbabwe. He appealed to those countries still supporting the Pretoria regime to join hands in the process of dismantling apartheid and to support those struggling against it. While he recognised the ILO's commendable technical co-operation in the field of workers' education for trade unions in South Africa and Namibia, that programme should be updated to take into account the harmonisation of trade union growth through education and training in South Africa and Namibia. This action should include those trade unions operating outside the country and should be conducted in conjunction with the trade union organisations in these front-line States and through the co-ordination of these activities within the framework of the ILO, OATUU and SATUCC.

56. Mr. Baker, Workers' member, referred to the clear support for sanctions against South Africa expressed by the two large South African trade union confederations. In the United States the trade union organisations had supported draft legislation in favour of sanctions, and it had been adopted despite the veto of President Reagan. However, the application of that legislation was meeting with problems and the American trade unions were attempting to strengthen the monitoring and enforcement of the Comprehensive Anti-Apartheid Act of 1988 and supported the adoption of additional sanctions legislation in 1988. The United States were not alone in confronting such difficulties, and in other countries attempts were also being made to avoid legally adopted sanctions by importing or exporting products from or to South Africa indirectly or through clandestine arrangements. Some countries not only did not impose sanctions, but even took advantage of other countries' sanctions to increase their trade and economic relations with South Africa. Those countries should be exposed and condemned, and the Governments of those countries must control the activities of their multinational enterprises relating to South Africa. The small number of replies received to the ILO questionnaire concerning the application of the Declaration, and the fact that many of the replies received did not give the desired information about commercial relations with South Africa was disheartening. The monitoring system should therefore be strengthened. On the other hand he welcomed the increased attention given to Namibia: the world should be aware of the brutality of the South African system in that country. In conclusion, he expressed his deep admiration for the courage of the trade unionists in South Africa and Namibia who persisted in their struggle despite the obvious danger. Their very existence was a daily challenge to apartheid. The Black free trade union movement in South Africa played a key role in the struggle against apartheid.

57. It was essential to make new commitment to action rather than mere words against apartheid. Mr. Laurijssen, Workers' member, stressed that the situation of the Black population under the rule of apartheid in South Africa had by no means improved over the last 12 months and that the political scene remained extremely tense. Social unrest had reached new peaks in 1987, as exemplified by the unprecedented number of strikes, and there was no indication of a long-term solution in the immediate future. In Pretoria there appeared to be confidence that the Government was well in control. The economy, which in 1985 was sliding uncontrollably downwards, was now showing signs of recovery. International disapproval failed to carry any significant economic impact or real political persuasion. The regime continued therefore to govern and destabilise the front-line States and its recent victory in the all-White parliamentary election further contributed to this self-confidence. The regime was, however, concerned about the trade union movement, which it had not succeeded in crippling in spite of oppression. On the contrary the independent Black trade unions had grown in strength and become more disciplined and assertive. In July 1987 the regime had issued a public warning to the trade unions to the effect that it was watching "efforts to politicise issues in the labour field and would not hesitate to adopt counter-measures". A current Bill to amend the Labour Relations Act sought to curb further the rights and activities of trade unions. The new amendments contained a biased revised definition of the concept of unfair labour practices and proposed to erode even more the already thin protective layer offered to Black workers by the law. Another serious matter was Pretoria's information blackout aimed at suppressing reports of the ever increasing violence in South Africa. Press censorship had been considerably tightened in December 1986 to include a ban on reporting on what the regime described as subversive acts, including boycotts, illegal strikes and detainees. Controls were further tightened in August 1987 and unions were served with Department of Information press guide-lines. Certain newspapers had had to face closure or accept censorship, and Black journalists have remained major targets of repression. In spite of these policies of systematic repression and intimidation, 1987 had been one of the most turbulent periods of social and industrial unrest in South Africa: the miners' strike had involved 340,000 workers and lasted for three weeks, but it had taken a heavy toll: ten Black miners were killed and dozens injured, while some 35,000 miners were dismissed from their jobs for having participated in the strike. The strike had changed the face of labour relations in South Africa and the union had demonstrated that it was a force to be contended with in its planned campaigns for 1988. The revolt of Black South African workers against starvation wages and intolerable working and living conditions had been the cause of innumerable other labour disputes. Here again the workers' courage to stand up against the system was met with excessive reprisals and displays of power against the strikers and their trade unions. The harsh repression against Black workers and trade unions who stood up for their rights and for social justice at the workplace and in society in general was not restricted to South Africa's own territory. The situation in Namibia in this regard was perhaps less publicised but was equally dramatic. On 26 July 1987, four thousand miners had laid down their tools. They suffered the same repression, but often it was even harsher. Scorning international laws, South Africa continued its illegal occupation of Namibia, where the security forces of Pretoria continued to instil terror. The Miners Union of Namibia (MUN) was one of the prime targets of this repression. At the root of this conflict was the deep-seated discontent of the Black miners arising from their appalling working conditions. An ICFTU delegation visit to Namibia in November 1987 had witnessed the oppression of its people and the intimidation faced by workers: they could be fired on any pretext, enjoyed few rights and were kept dependent on their employers for their basic needs. The hardship, suffering and exploitation in both South Africa and Namibia would only come to an end with the unconditional abolition of the apartheid system. The international trade union movement strongly and actively supported the view of the Black trade unions in South Africa that this could only be achieved if verbal and symbolic support and sympathy from the international community was accompanied by effective, comprehensive and mandatory sanctions against the racist regime of apartheid. The ICFTU welcomed and thanked the Conference for the contribution it would make towards the common objective of abolishing apartheid and establishing social justice and dignity in South Africa and Namibia.

58. The Government member of Zimbabwe, having expressed his gratitude to the ILO for the measures it had taken against apartheid in all its forms, stated that his country was gratified by the condemnation which the apartheid regime encountered in the world. His Government had been fighting for eight years in this cause, and he appreciated the fact that the Conference, in examining the action to be taken and working to update the Declaration against apartheid, was proceeding in the same direction. The apostles of apartheid, which was condemned on all sides, were acting more desperately than ever to stem this flow of liberty, and it was all the more urgent that verbal condemnations should be translated into action. The ILO had the means to act and it had a crucial role to play in this field. Zimbabwe had not ceased to raise its voice among the powerful of the world. President Mugabe had created a solidarity fund to which all had contributed. Zimbabwe had also shown its opposition by hosting numerous conferences on apartheid to which all the victims of that regime had been invited. Within the framework of such organisations as SADCC and the OAU, Zimbabwe had maintained its efforts to reduce its dependence on South Africa and to assist the liberation movements. Turning to the background paper submitted to the Conference, he considered that organisations of employers and workers had the capacity to make a strong impact through the Programme of Action. Joint action on their part would demonstrate the determination of ILO members. The ILO could provide valuable assistance, particularly in the fields of manpower planning and training, and its action ought to be intensified so as to aid South African workers to fill the gaps which had been imposed on their education and training systems. The ILO enjoyed great international prestige, and within the Organisation were men and women of worth whose words gave hope to the oppressed people. These men and women must hold the torch of liberty and equality even higher so that the people knew that they were not alone in their struggle. His country as a front-line State was also the subject of aggression, destabilisation measures and various forms of pressure. It needed help in order to resist. Without that help it would continue to suffer human and material losses, and this vulnerability would only delay the day when its peoples and its Government would be able to devote their resources and energy to increasing the well-being of their workers throughout the country.

59. The Workers' member of Zimbabwe stated that the conference participants were joined by a common goal, the removal of apartheid from South Africa and Namibia. The apartheid regime was never idle, and would be trying to counter the work of the Conference. The current situation required every peace-loving country to adopt a front-line stance, as the front-line States themselves had been turned into a battlefield by South African aggression. The situation in South Africa demanded the extensive use of the international media to publicise daily events there throughout the world and thereby make the atrocities of apartheid known to all the world. The Zimbabwe Congress of Trade Unions called upon the international community to impose mandatory economic sanctions against South Africa, and to sever all connections with the apartheid regime. Lastly, he called upon those who failed to condemn apartheid to do so immediately, for silence on the issue was a crime not only against the people of South Africa but against humanity as a whole. President Botha's Government must be told that yesterday's attitudes were no longer tenable. Zimbabwe, the youngest republic in Africa, born out of a bitter struggle against colonialists, was a clear testimony that one day a free and independent continent of Africa was possible and apartheid would be part of history. The ZCTU would abide by the conclusions of the Conference.

60. The Employers' member of Zimbabwe emphasised the need for concrete measures to hasten the end of apartheid and joined the previous speakers in calling for the intensification of action by employers' organisations, especially those in Africa, and also by the ILO. He was convinced that Employers should take a strong stand on these matters and was satisfied that, if the ILO continued to support management training programmes for Black entrepreneurs in South Africa and in exile, this would contribute considerably to the process whereby apartheid would be ended.

Conclusion

61. The Working Party appointed by the Conference met in three sittings on the penultimate day of the Conference for the purpose of drafting conclusions to be placed before the Conference for adoption as part of its report.

62. In addressing itself to the task which it had been given, the Working Party based itself on the draft which had been annexed to the background paper prepared for the Conference, which contained a revised text for the updating of the Declaration taking into account the conclusions arrived at by the Committee on Apartheid of the International Labour Conference at its 73rd Session in June 1987 and by the Committee on Discrimination of the Governing Body of the ILO at its 239th Session in February-March 1988.

63. Careful consideration was given to each paragraph of the text and to a number of amendments proposed by members of the Working Party during the course of its deliberations as well as those which had been submitted to it by other participants in the conference.

64. The updated draft entitled Declaration concerning Action Against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia and the Programme of Action against Apartheid, which forms an integral part thereof, was approved by the Working Party at its third and final sitting.

65. The Working Party also considered the text of a draft cable to be sent by the Chairman of the Conference on its behalf to the State President of the Republic of South Africa urging the South African Government not to proceed with the Labour Relations Amendment Bill, and recommended that the cable be despatched. The text of the cable is contained in Appendix III.

66. At its closing sitting, the Conference unanimously adopted the draft text of its report, subject to a number of editorial corrections. It also adopted unanimously the draft updated Declaration concern- ing Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia and the Programme of Action against Apartheid annexed to it. The text of the proposed Declaration and Programme of Action is attached to this report.

Proposed Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia¹

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Recalling the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa unanimously adopted by the Conference on 8 July 1964 and the updated Declaration adopted by the Conference on 18 June 1981,

Considering that all Members of the ILO have by the Declaration of Philadelphia embodied in the Constitution as a statement of the aims and purposes of the Organisation, solemnly affirmed that "all human beings, irrespective of race, creed or sex, have the right to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity",

Considering that according to its Constitution the ILO exists for the promotion of the objectives set forth in the Preamble thereto and in the Declaration of Philadelphia,

Considering that the Government of South Africa, having refused to promote the objectives set forth in the Preamble to the Constitution and in the Declaration of Philadelphia, adopted and is practising the inhuman policy of apartheid, which is wholly incompatible with the aims and principles of the Declaration of Philadelphia, thus creating an alarming situation, further aggravated by the extension of the apartheid system into Namibia through the illegal occupation of that territory by South Africa, incurred the condemnation of the International Labour Conference and withdrew from the Organisation by virtue of a communication dated 11 March 1964,

Considering that according to the Declaration of Philadelphia the principles set forth therein are fully applicable to all peoples everywhere and their implementation is a matter of concern to the whole world,

Considering that apartheid has been declared a crime against humanity by the General Assembly of the United Nations and that the Security Council, since its resolution 182 (1963), adopted unanimously on 4 December 1963, has affirmed the conviction that the situation in South Africa is seriously disturbing international peace and security,

Considering that the apartheid system in South Africa is the root cause of conflict in southern Africa as a whole and that the independence of Namibia, the freedom of the South African people and the peace and security in the region can only be attained through the elimination of apartheid,

Considering the programme for the elimination of apartheid in labour matters in South Africa adopted in 1964 and all subsequent measures to give effect to the ILO's determination to eradicate apartheid, including the annual Special Reports of the Director-General on apartheid in South Africa and the expansion of the activities of the International Labour Office in this field,

Considering especially the Report of the International Tripartite Meeting on Action against Apartheid held at Livingstone in May 1981, which recognised that the solution to the problem of apartheid must take into account the political implications of that system and went on to recommend specific action for the elimination of apartheid, ¹ The additions made to this text as adopted by the Tripartite Conference on Action against Apartheid, in Harare, Zimbabwe, 3-6 May 1988, are in italics.

Considering also the reports of the Tripartite Conference on Action against Apartheid held in Lusaka in May 1984 and in Harare in May 1988,

Noting that the conclusions of these meetings were subsequently adopted by the International Labour Conference,

Sharing the growing concern of the international community at the deterioration of the situation in South Africa and Namibia under apartheid and the need for action thereon, as shown in the Programme of Action adopted at the United Nations General Assembly and in subsequent resolutions and instruments adopted by that Assembly (including the Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid) as well as the resolutions of the Security Council,

Reaffirming in addition the need to co-operate with all organisations in the campaign to eliminate apartheid, in particular the United Nations, the Organisation of African Unity and international and regional organisations of workers and employers,

Considering that developments which have taken place since the adoption of its Declaration and Programme for the Elimination of Apartheid in 1964 have demonstrated that apartheid continues to deprive the Black population of employment and training, full enjoyment of freedom of association and the right to organise, and equality of opportunity and treatment in the field of labour, while recent events have shown that through the "Bantustan" policy and the use of repressive measures the South African Government still acts in a manner which violates international labour standards and which therefore requires urgent action by the international community to secure social justice, peace and freedom for all the peoples of South Africa and Namibia,

Reaffirming its determination to continue to fulfil its responsibility to promote and take its part in securing the freedom and dignity of the peoples of South Africa and Namibia and to fight the policy of apartheid practised by the Government of South Africa,

Faithful to its role as spokesman of the social conscience of mankind and affirming once again its conviction that a government which deliberately practises apartheid is unworthy of the community of nations,

Considering that only urgent and determined action by the international community, in particular the imposition of comprehensive and mandatory sanctions by the United Nations Security Council as the most effective and appropriate measure under the present circumstances, will bring the Government of South Africa to abandon its disastrous policy and to co-operate with employers' and workers' organisations in placing the relations between the various elements of the population of South Africa, and the relations between the people of South Africa and the rest of the world, on the basis of the equality of man, justice for all, good neighbourliness and mutual respect;

1. Solemnly reaffirms its fidelity to the fundamental principle of the Declaration of Philadelphia, according to which "all human beings, irrespective of race, creed or sex, have the right to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity".

2. Emphatically reaffirms its condemnation of the degrading, criminal and inhuman racial policies of the Government of South Africa and their extension to Namibia, which policies are a violation of fundamental human rights and thus incompatible with the aims and purposes of the ILO.

3. Strongly reaffirms its determination to pursue its action until respect for the freedom and dignity of all human beings, irrespective of race, is fully assured in South Africa and Namibia and until, to this end, the following objectives have been attained:

- the total and final elimination of the policy of apartheid in South Africa and Namibia;
- the repeal of all legislative, administrative and other measures which are a violation of the principle of the equality and dignity of man and a direct negation of the inherent rights and freedoms of the peoples of South Africa and Namibia;
- the establishment and consistent pursuit of a policy of equal opportunity and treatment for all, in employment and occupation, irrespective of race, creed or sex.

4. Urges the Committee on Action against Apartheid of the International Labour Conference to continue to monitor with increased vigour action against apartheid.

5. (a) Confirms the Director-General's mandate to monitor and follow the situation in South Africa and Namibia in respect of labour and social matters, and to submit every year for consideration by the Conference Committee on Apartheid a Special Report on the subject; to this effect, to request governments, employers, and workers' organisations to provide information, in such form as the Governing Body may determine, on the action taken against apartheid in accordance with recommendations contained in the Programme of Action against Apartheid, including information on failure to take action and on the active promotion of relations which strengthen the apartheid system;

(b) Invites the Governing Body's Committee on Discrimination to continue to consider the information described in subparagraph (a) above, and to submit a report to the Conference Committee on Action against Apartheid.

6. Invites the Governing Body and the Director-General to take the necessary steps:

(a) to increase the ILO's educational activities and technical assistance to the liberation movements, the Black workers and their independent trade unions as well as the Black entrepreneurs and their organisations in South Africa and Namibia in their fight against apartheid, in close co-operation with the Organisation of African Unity, the Special Committee against Apartheid, the Commission on Human Rights of the United Nations, and the United Nations Council for Namibia, the international and African workers' and employers' organisations and the front-line States and those States in the neighbourhood of South Africa which are seriously affected by the aggressive actions of South Africa, in particular by:

- (i) an increase in the resources made available from the ILO regular budget, and from external sources on a bilateral or multilateral basis, for enlarging the ILO's capacity to combat apartheid and to provide assistance to its victims;
- (ii) the establishment of a voluntary fund for the workers of South Africa and Namibia to which contributions should be made regularly by ILO member States as well as by employers' and workers' organisations;
- (iii) the broadening of the scope of ILO assistance to liberation movements from southern Africa recognised by the Organisation of African Unity, in particular by the use of its technical services in the fields of vocational and management training, labour administration, occupational safety and health, rural development, workers' education, co-operative development, equality of treatment for women workers and advice on the elimination of discriminatory labour legislation;
- (iv) the establishment of a training institute for South Africa, designed more specifically for the promotion of manpower training and development;
- (v) assistance to the front-line and neighbouring States providing facilities for refugees from South Africa and Namibia at institutions of their own through the provision of equipment, expertise and fellowships;
- (vi) the creation of training facilities and employment opportunities for refugees in their countries of refuge in such a way that their skills will be of immediate use and also of assistance to their countries or origin upon their return;
- (vii) co-operation with the governments of the States in the immediate neighbourhood of South Africa, including the regional organisations, the Southern African Development Co-ordination Conference and the Southern African Labour Commission, in devising and implementing policies which will enable them to reduce their dependence on South Africa, and in particular the supply of migrant labour to South Africa;
- (viii) providing the front-line and neighbouring States with assistance for infra-structural development to enhance their capacity for withstanding the effects of any retaliatory economic action by the apartheid regime and to develop human skills for the effective management of their national economies;
- (ix) assistance in the establishment of long-term solutions to problems involving migrant labour including public works programmes and other labour-intensive forms of job creation; the provision, over the short term, of assistance to migrant workers through advice on negotiations concerning their terms and conditions of employment, and through enabling migrant workers to be more fully informed of their rights;
- (x) the expansion of the programme of the information on apartheid in labour matters and other questions of direct concern to the workers of southern Africa;

- (b) to use existing ILO procedures, including those of the Committee on Discrimination of the Governing Body, to attain the objectives assigned to the ILO under its Programme for the Elimination of Apartheid;
- (c) to encourage and extend financial support to workers' and employers' organisations in their programme of action against apartheid so that they can exert the maximum pressure for the implementation of various recommendations falling within their sphere of competence.

7. Renews its urgent appeal to governments, employers and workers of member States of the ILO to combine their efforts and put into application all appropriate measures to lead South Africa to heed the call of humanity and renounce its shameful policy of apartheid. In this respect, the basic guide-line should be the Programme of Action against Apartheid which is annexed to this updated Declaration.

8. Reaffirms its resolve to co-operate with the United Nations in seeking and guaranteeing freedom and dignity, economic security and equal opportunity for all the peoples of South Africa and Namibia and in particular with the United Nations Special Committee against Apartheid and the Council for Namibia and its desire to co-operate with the Organisation of African Unity in all fields related to the elimination of apartheid.

9. Requests the Governing Body and the Director-General to take the necessary steps to organise systematic consultations with a view to reinforcing ILO co-operation with the Organisation of African Unity, and with the United Nations, including its Special Committee against Apartheid, its Council for Namibia and its Commission on Human Rights, as well as with the other specialised agencies of the United Nations system and non-governmental organisations associated with them in order to intensify and co-ordinate all activities whose ultimate objective is to eliminate apartheid totally in all its facets at a more accelerated pace than hitherto.

ANNEX

Programme of Action against Apartheid

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation, considering it appropriate to give effect to the updated Declaration concerning Action Against Apartheid in South Africa adopted by the International Labour Conference in 1988, following the updated Declaration adopted by the Conference in 1981 and the initial Declaration adopted unanimously by the Conference in 1964,

Urging determined action by the international community to bring the Government of South Africa to abandon its disastrous policy of apartheid,

Taking into account the report of the Tripartite Meeting of Members of the Governing Body on Apartheid in May 1980, the Report of the International Tripartite Meeting on Action against Apartheid held at Livingstone in 1981 and the conclusions of the Tripartite Conferences on Action against Apartheid held in Lusaka in 1984 and in Harare in 1988,

Further taking into account the resolutions adopted by the two International Trade Union Conferences against Apartheid in 1973 and 1977, and the Declaration adopted by the International Conference of Trade Unions on Sanctions and Other Actions against the Apartheid Regime in South Africa held in 1983,

Recalling also the ILO Programme for the Elimination of Apartheid in Labour Matters in the Republic of South Africa, which had been adopted in 1964, as well as subsequent measures undertaken by the ILO, in its determination to eradicate apartheid in the field of labour, including the Special Reports of the Director-General on the Application of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia, a wider range of educational and promotional activities carried out by the International Labour Office in this field and the extension of technical assistance within its field of competence to the peoples of South Africa and Namibia and the national liberation movements and front-line and neighbouring States,

Reflecting on and sharing the growing concern of the international community at the deterioration of the situation in South Africa and Namibia under apartheid and calling for action thereon, as shown in the Programmes of Action adopted by the United Nations General Assembly and the Security Council,

Reaffirming the need to co-operate with all organisations in the campaign to eliminate apartheid, in particular the United Nations, the Organisation of African Unity and international and regional organisations of workers and employers,

Noting that it has become necessary to revise the Programme of Action of the ILO and its Members in the light of the failure by the Government of South Africa since 1981 to abandon its policy of apartheid, its intensified aggression in southern Africa including Namibia, its intransigence in the face of international pressure and the further polarisation of Blacks and Whites in South Africa resulting from the introduction of a new Constitution in 1984 which was further aggravated by the 1987 Whites-only election;

Recommends the following action:

I. Government action through the United Nations

To take the measures necessary to give effect to the Programme of Action against Apartheid adopted by the United Nations General Assembly as well as the resolutions subsequently adopted by that body and other relevant United Nations bodies, in particular:

- (a) To adopt comprehensive and mandatory sanctions against South Africa, in accordance with Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter.
- (b) To establish a special monitoring unit, in co-operation with the International Maritime Organisation, Lloyds Register, the Shipping Research Bureau and other relevant organisations, to ensure that sanctions are strictly applied and to expose sanctions busters.
- (c) To co-operate by all possible means in the implementation of United Nations resolution 435 for the independence of Namibia.

II. Government action

1. To sever political, military, cultural, sporting and diplomatic relations with the South African Government, in so far as such relations with South Africa are maintained.

2. To stop trade and commercial relations with and to prohibit new public and private investment in South Africa, as well as the export of nuclear and other technology to the South African Government, parastatals and private enterprise in South Africa. In addition, to prohibit loans, trade credits and gold exchanges by banks to and with South Africa. Furthermore, to prohibit collaboration with South Africa in the operation of the international gold market in particular to prevent the operation of the South African marketing company, the International Gold Corporation (INTERGOLD).

3. To adopt, through the appropriate government authorities, including regional and local authorities, stringent divestment/disinvestment measures, to prevent any new investments, and to withdraw all public funds from banks maintaining commercial relations with South Africa as well as to deny contracts for the provision of goods and services to all firms and enterprises having commercial relations with South Africa.

4. To deny the use of facilities intended to circumvent sanctions applied against South Africa.

5. To discourage emigration of their nationals and the promotion of tourism to South Africa, by such means as banning advertising and cutting air and sea links with South Africa.

6. To withhold recognition of Bantustans, deny the establishment of representative offices and the entry of representatives of Bantustans into their territories, to prohibit new investments in and to demand the withdrawal of existing investment from these areas.

7. To increase economic support, including development assistance and the development of alternative trade patterns, to those African countries which are forced through their geographical and economic situation to maintain links with South Africa, with particular emphasis on independent African States enclaved within South Africa and those in the immediate neighbourhood of South Africa.

8. To give material and moral support to the liberation movements, to the independent Black trade union movement and to popular movements struggling for the elimination of apartheid and the establishment of a non-racial democratic system and majority rule with respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms in South Africa and Namibia.

9. To lift all impediments preventing trade unions from participating in solidarity action with the workers engaged in the anti-apartheid struggle.

10. To encourage in line with the basic principles of the Constitution of the ILO initiatives which could lead to the elimination of apartheid and the achievement of durable peace in southern Africa.

11. To tighten the licensing procedures for the export and re-export of arms and related material as defined in Security Council Resolution 418 so as to ensure that none of it reaches South Africa and Namibia in violation of the United Nations Security Council decisions and resolutions.

III. Action by employers' organisations

1. To ensure that their members do not maintain trade, commercial or financial relations with South Africa and that economic and financial institutions do not extend loans to South Africa or collaborate with the apartheid regime in any way.

2. To disinvest from South Africa and to transfer these investments to other African countries, especially the front-line and SADC States. In so doing, employers should ensure that early consultations are held with the appropriate union representing the Black workers in the enterprise on the conditions and terms of disinvestment. Such action should not circumvent the call for disinvestment by transferring the operation of their companies to local South African management whilst still maintaining the same commercial links.

3. To disinvest from and to cease all co-operation with the so-called Bantustans.

4. To refuse to co-operate with the South African authorities in the implementation of apartheid legislation, and to make a firm commitment to the abolition of apartheid.

5. To urge banks and other financial institutions to refrain from making loans or providing credit for trade with South Africa and to urge governments to prohibit the activities of the International Gold Corporation (INTERGOLD) in their countries.

6. To provide technical and financial support for small business development and management training programmes for victims of apartheid in exile in the front-line and neighbouring States, and organise subregional seminars for employers in such States for this purpose as well as sensitise employers about the plight of the victims of apartheid.

IV. Action by trade unions the world over

1. To exert maximum pressure on their respective governments for the adoption and the implementation of comprehensive and mandatory sanctions against South Africa by the United Nations Security Council, in accordance with Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter.

2. To place maximum pressure, including industrial action, on companies which do not recognise the independent Black trade union movement and act in contradiction with internationally recognised labour standards.

3. To increase mobilisation of workers and the public through information campaigns with a view to exerting the strongest possible pressure on their respective governments to adopt comprehensive sanctions against and to sever their links with South Africa, and on companies with interests in South Africa to oblige them to withdraw from that country.

4. To develop extensive education activities to ensure that workers are informed of sanctions measures in their own countries so that they can participate at all levels in the monitoring of such actions and be prepared for industrial action in cases of sanctions busting.

5. To organise consumer and other boycotts in order to promote sanctions against South Africa.

6. To give financial, material and moral support to the Black independent trade union movement inside South Africa and Namibia, including assistance in organising campaigns and educational programmes and legal and relief assistance to imprisoned and restricted trade unionists and their families, as well as organising solidarity action in support of the Black workers and their unions.

7. To organise campaigns to ensure that trade union members do not emigrate to South Africa or Namibia and to withdraw trade union membership cards as a sanction against such emigrants, to ban advertisements for jobs in South Africa and Namibia and exert pressure for the closure of South African recruitment offices abroad.

8. To withdraw all trade union funds from any company or investment scheme with interests in South Africa or Namibia, and to ensure that no pension funds are invested in such companies, banks or schemes.

9. To exercise the strongest possible pressure on banks and financial institutions to recall their existing loans to South Africa and to prevent the provision of new loans and trade credits to South Africa and Namibia, as well as gold exchanges to and with South Africa. In addition, trade unions should organise campaigns appealing to their members to close their accounts with such banks.

10. To take all measures aimed at further isolating the South African regime and to support anti-apartheid activities.

11. To ensure trade union representation in delegations to the United Nations and the specialised agencies to press for the fullest implementation of the Programme of Action against Apartheid.

12. To co-ordinate trade union action against apartheid in accordance with the Declaration adopted by the International Conference of Trade Unions on Sanctions and Other Actions against the Apartheid Regime, held in Geneva in 1983.

V. ILO action

1. To give further impetus to the implementation of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid and the Programme of Action, with specific reference to operative paragraph 6 of the Declaration and to the following paragraphs of this section.

2. To increase entrepreneurial and management training and to encourage small business development programmes for the victims of apartheid in exile in neighbouring States and displaced persons as a means of creating self-employment for those deprived people and prepare them for business management responsibilities in a non-racial democratic South Africa and in an independent democratic Namibia.

3. To increase activities in the fields of workers' education, vocational training, assistance to migrant workers, improvements in infrastructures and in other fields of benefit to workers of southern Africa.

4. To ensure a wider dissemination of public information throughout all member States by all possible means, including the ILO publications, about atrocities being perpetrated by the apartheid South African regime within South Africa and Namibia, as well as in front-line and neighbouring States, as a means of countering the news blackout imposed by the South African Government under its oppressive emergency measures and overcoming the silence of the mass media.

5. To address renewed appeals to the UNDP, international financial institutions and all multi-bilateral and bilateral donors to provide additional resources for the above-mentioned activities.

6. To request ILO constituents to provide a precise, itemised report on the Declaration, on each paragraph of the Programme of Action annexed to it and on the conclusions adopted at each session of the Conference.

VI. Other action

1. The Conference calls upon governments, employers' and workers' organisations and the ILO to continue and reinforce the campaign for the release of all trade unionists and political prisoners in South Africa and Namibia. In this connection the Conference deplores and denounces all measures which deny and violate civil and trade union rights in South Africa.

2. The Conference calls upon governments, employers' and workers' organisations, non-governmental bodies and individuals to make every possible contribution to the Action for Resisting Invasion, Colonisation and Apartheid (AFRICA) Fund, as well as to make contributions in order to ensure the early realisation of the objectives of the Solidarity Fund for Southern Africa.

APPENDICES

APPENDIX I

Speech by His Excellency the President of the Republic of Zimbabwe, Mr. R.G. Mugabe, at the Special Sitting of the Tripartite Conference on Action Against Apartheid, on 4 May 1988

It is a great pleasure for me to welcome to this Conference and to Harare the participants from various parts of the world and the liberation movements. You may rest assured that my Party, Government and the people of Zimbabwe will do everything in their power to make you feel at home as you go about your important task.

That the International Labour Organisation has chosen to convene its Tripartite Conference on Action against Apartheid in Zimbabwe can only be a source of gratification and pride, not only for all Zimbabweans but also for the peoples and Governments of the other front-line States, who share with the ILO a deep conviction in the overriding values of social justice and a determination to rid mankind of the abhorrent apartheid system whose existence is an affront to those values.

This Conference is being held at a time when the struggle to eliminate apartheid is intensifying and the racist regime is launching a total unholy war inside and outside South Africa. Recently, the racist regime has executed or threatened to execute freedom fighters regardless of international pleas to spare their lives. There have been mass arrests of innocent people under the repressive emergency regulations; and the world has also witnessed the torture and massive detention of children inside South Africa. The regime has also embarked on international terrorism as demonstrated by the recent murder of Comrade September in France; the car-bomb attack on Professor Sachs in Mozambique and the murder of innocent and defenceless Botswana citizens and South African refugees in the Republic of Botswana.

The front-line States are continuously experiencing the racist tyranny of destabilisation of their democracies. The unprovoked invasion of Angola, bandit activities in Mozambique and Zimbabwe and constant threats to Zambia demonstrate that apartheid cannot be reformed but must be dismantled completely.

Mr. Chairman, I understand that this Tripartite Conference on Action Against Apartheid brings together representatives of the ILO's constituent governments, employers, and workers' organisations. It thus provides a golden opportunity for all of these to act vigorously together against apartheid alongside other progressive organisations from Africa and elsewhere, including, naturally, the national liberation movements—SWAPO of Namibia, and the African National Congress and the Pan-Africanist Congress both of South Africa. Moreover, this Conference is convened at a time when there is an ever greater need and reason to show solidarity with those of our brothers and sisters who bear the brunt of apartheid in South Africa and Namibia, and with the gallant forces of the national liberation movements who are leading the struggle against apartheid.

Mr. Chairman, it is important to remind this Conference that, at numerous international meetings, we in this region have expressed our indignation and dismay at the fact that certain nations, including former victims of fascist and Nazi aggression, during World War II, continue to aid and abet apartheid economically, politically, diplomatically and militarily. Our earnest desire is that the international community take urgent action in the form of the application of comprehensive and mandatory economic and other sanctions aimed at curtailing the wanton destruction being carried out by South Africa, and also at contributing to the ultimate elimination of the cancer of apartheid.

Mr. Chairman, based on its programmes, it is evident that the ILO is on the side of the victims of apartheid. We believe that the ILO could be assisted to be even more responsive to the challenge of eradicating apartheid and evolving a definite plan under which the ILO could contribute to the training of the South Africans and Namibians in preparing them to build new and democratic institutions in their countries.

Mr. Chairman, over a period of many years now, the ILO has shown quite clearly that apartheid is not compatible with the fundamental precepts on which the Organisation is based. It is nearly 25 years since the ILO's Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in the Republic of South Africa was adopted by the International Labour Conference. That statement of principle, adopted in 1964, was and remains a clear indication that there can be no place for a South Africa which practises apartheid in the ILO.

A valuable element in the entire strategy for combating apartheid also resulted from the Report issued annually by the Director-General of the ILO which provides detailed information on the situation regarding labour under apartheid. It has shown, year after year, the many ways in which the basic entitlements and liberties of workers have been violated under apartheid. The Report has been clear, among other things, about the following:

- the way in which apartheid, through low wages and indefensible working conditions, has led to the immiseration of the Black population in South Africa and Namibia;
- the growth in unemployment among Blacks which has continued unchecked, while the cynical application of various apartheid regulations have deprived the Black majority simultaneously of their citizenship, their rightful entitlement to land and access to adequate job opportunities;
- the sustained inequalities in wages, in educational opportunity, in social security benefits and in housing which have remained endemic within the system applied to Black workers; and
- the absence of, or interference with, fundamental trade union rights to organise and to bargain collectively in full freedom, to say nothing of the physical attacks on trade union leaders and premises which have featured much more frequently in more recent reports on these matters.

All this, and much more, has been carefully documented by the ILO against a background of diminishing political rights under the so-called State of Emergency. Apart from the detention and imprisonment of anti-apartheid activists under that "Emergency", legislative measures have also been taken to break the power of the independent trade union movement which has developed in strength and determination over the years. Restrictions have, for example, been placed on the largest trade union federation, COSATU. These seek to limit its role and effectiveness as a force for change in South Africa.

The growth of the independent trade union movement was recognised when the ILO's Declaration was brought up to date in 1981. That updated Declaration introduced a basis for support from the ILO to these trade unions, and also established the foundations for a new range of ILO activities designed to provide various forms of technical assistance to the national liberation movements and the front-line States.

The ILO has also been able to address wider issues relating to the means of action which can be deployed against apartheid. In doing so, its tripartite character has been a feature of very great importance, for the action in question has not been confined to governments, but also to the employers' and workers' organisations which are such an important and invaluable part of its unique structure.

As we see it, the purpose of this Conference is twofold. Firstly, it should conduct a comprehensive review of all aspects of action to be taken against apartheid and the continued illegal occupation of Namibia, including sanctions and assistance to the front-line and other neighbouring States. Secondly, it should prepare for the updating, by the International Labour Conference next month, of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa.

These two tasks, I trust, will be tackled with the necessary imagination and seriousness at this Conference. The suffering, pain and agony of the people of South Africa and Namibia and, indeed, of southern Africa as a whole cannot be allowed to continue unabated due to lack of concerted international action against the monster that is apartheid.

I am sure that your deliberations at this Conference will result in the sustaining and strengthening of the means of action available within the international community in order to bring an end to apartheid.

I wish you all the success in your endeavours. Thank you.

It covers the period since the last ordinary session of the Conference (June 1987), i.e. the Governing Body's 237th (June 1987), 238th (November 1987) and 239th (February-March 1988) Sessions, but not the pre-Conference sittings of its 240th Session (May-June 1988). An account of those sittings will be given to the Conference by the Chairman of the Governing Body when he introduces the present report. ¹ See paragraph 4 below.

B. MATTERS RELATING TO THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE

I. Ordinary sessions of the Conference

1. Date, place and agenda of the 76th Session (1989) of the Conference

7. At its 238th Session the Governing Body had before it proposals concerning the date, place and agenda of the 76th Session (1989) of the Conference.

Date and place

8. The Governing Body decided that the 76th Session (1989) of the Conference should open on Wednesday, 7 June 1989 and that the session should be held in Geneva.

Agenda

9. The Governing Body chose two new technical items for discussion by the Conference in 1989. It noted that as a result of this decision, and having regard to the standing items that would necessarily be before the Conference and the item likely to be carried forward for second discussion from the 75th Session (1988), the agenda of the 76th Session (1989) would be as follows:

Standing items

- Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General
- Programme and budget proposals and other financial questions
- Information and reports on the application of Conventions and Recommendations

Items placed on the agenda by the Conference of the Governing Body

- Partial revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107) (second discussion)
- Night work (first discussion)
- Safety in the use of chemicals at work (first discussion)

10. The Governing Body also noted that the Conference would, in addition, have before it a special report on the application of the Declaration concerning the policy of apartheid in South Africa.

2. Action on the resolutions adopted by the Conference at its 73rd Session (June 1987)¹

11. At its 73rd Session (June 1987), the Conference adopted resolutions calling for action by the Governing Body on the following subjects: the International Year of Shelter for the Homeless and the role of the ILO; the 40th anniversary of the adoption of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87); measures against drug and alcohol abuse in working and social life; the role of the ILO in technical co-operation. At its 238th Session, the Governing Body, having taken note of the information provided by the Office concerning ongoing or planned action in the areas concerned, requested the Director-General to take appropriate measures to give effect to the requests made in the resolutions. An account of the action taken on the resolution concerning the role of the ILO in technical co-operation is given below in paragraph 68.

II. Maritime session

Action on the resolutions adopted by the Conference at its 74th (Maritime) Session (24 September-9 October 1987)

12. At its 74th (Maritime) Session the Conference adopted resolutions on the following subjects: the health of seafarers with particular reference to AIDS; the co-ordination of welfare activities for seafarers; social and welfare services for seafarers' families; the recruitment of seafarers and the regulation of fee-charging employment agencies; conditions of employment for seafarers; attacks on merchant shipping; the application of international labour Conventions and Recommendations and the more widespread ratification of the Merchant Shipping (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 147); and the expediting of legal proceedings in cases of abandonment of seafarers and in the sale of arrested vessels. At its 239th Session, the Governing Body, having taken note of the information provided by the Office concerning ongoing or planned action in the areas concerned, requested the Director-General to take appropriate measures to give effect to the requests made in the resolutions.

C. INTERNATIONAL LABOUR STANDARDS

1. Application of Conventions and Recommendations

(a) Choice of Conventions and Recommendations on which reports should be required in 1989 and 1990 under article 19 of the Constitution

13. The Governing Body decided at its 238th Session to request governments to submit reports under article 19 of the Constitution on the following instruments:

in 1989: the Merchant Shipping (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 147) and the Merchant Shipping (Improvement of Standards) Recommendation, 1976 (No. 155); in 1990: the Paid Educational Leave Convention (No. 140) and Recommendation (No. 148), 1974; and the Human Resources Development Convention (No. 142) and Recommendation (No. 150), 1975.

(b) Forms for reports on the application of ratified Conventions (article 22 of the Constitution)

14. At its 239th Session the Governing Body decided that the Committee on Standing Orders and the Application of Conventions and Recommendations should meet at the Governing Body's 240th Session (May-June 1988) to approve the report forms for the Conventions adopted by the Conference at its 74th (Maritime) Session.

¹ See also ILO: Report of the Director-General, International Labour Conference, 75th Session, 1988, Appendices.

2. Freedom of association

15. At its 238th and 239th Sessions (November 1987 and February-March 1988) the Governing Body examined the three reports submitted by the Committee on Freedom of Association and approved definitive or interim conclusions in 45 cases.

16. In the introductory paragraphs of its reports, the Committee on Freedom of Association drew special attention to the fact that in a certain number of cases the governments concerned had not submitted replies, despite the time which had elapsed since the presentation of the complaints and despite the seriousness of the complainants' allegations. In some of these cases, relating to Haiti, Morocco, Nepal, Pakistan, Paraguay and Peru, as the Committee had not received substantial replies from the governments concerned, it finally had to examine the complaints presented, in accordance with its procedural rules. In this regard, the Committee emphasised the importance of prompt, detailed and complete replies from the governments concerned, as this was in their own interest, since in any event, beyond a certain time-limit, the Committee would proceed to examine the case, even in the absence of a reply on their part.

17. At its sessions in November 1987 and February-March 1988 the Committee on Freedom of Association examined, in addition to the cases under consideration, 23 cases for which the governments concerned had kept it informed of the effect which had been given to the Committee's recommendations. This procedure is of particular significance since it enables the Committee on Freedom of Association to draw up a balance sheet of its actions and quite often to note the positive outcome of cases of which it had been seized. It was thus that the Committee took note with interest of the reinstatement of trade union members who had been dismissed and the release of trade union leaders in Burkina Faso and Tunisia.

3. Special constitutional procedures

Representations made under article 24 of the Constitution

18. At its 238th and 239th Sessions the Governing Body approved the decision of the Committee on Freedom of Association to defer its examination, pending receipt of the detailed observations referred to by the Government of Turkey, of the representation submitted by the General Confederation of Norwegian Trade Unions under article 24 of the ILO Constitution alleging non-observance by Turkey of the Right of Association (Agriculture) Convention, 1921 (No. 11) and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), as well as a number of other complaints submitted by various international trade union organisations alleging violation of freedom of association in Turkey (Cases Nos. 997, 999 and 1029).

19. At its 238th Session the Governing Body approved the report of the Committee set up to examine the representation made by Japanese trade unions under article 24 of the ILO Constitution alleging non-observance by Japan of the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 96). It also declared the closure of the procecedure initiated following the submission of the representation.

20. At its 238th Session the Governing Body approved the report and conclusions of the committee set up to examine the representation, made by the State Federation of Associations of Employees and Workers of the State Administration under article 24 of the ILO Constitution, alleging non-observance by Spain of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) and the Social Policy (Basic Aims and Standards) Convention, 1962 (No. 117). It declared closed the procedure initiated before the Governing Body as a result of the representation.

21. At its 238th Session the Governing Body approved the report and conclusions of the committee set up to examine the representation made by the Hellenic Airline Pilots Association (HALPA) under article 24 of the ILO Constitution alleging non-observance by Greece of the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) and the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105). It also declared closed the procedure initiated as a result of the submission of the representation.

22. The Governing Body examined at its 238th Session a report of the Officers of the Governing Body, which dealt with a representation submitted in connection with the expulsion of foreign workers by the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya. It decided that the representation procedure should resume its course, in accordance with article 24 of the Constitution, and set up a tripartite committee to examine the representation made against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya.

23. At the same session the Governing Body decided to postpone, to a forthcoming session, its consideration of a report of the Officers of the Governing Body concerning a representation, submitted by the Ontario Secondary School Teachers' Federation under article 24 of the ILO Constitution, alleging non-observance by the Government of the USSR of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) and of the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 112).

24. At its 239th Session the Governing Body declared receivable a representation submitted by the Trade Union Confederation of Workers' Commissions under article 24 of the ILO Constitution, alleging non-observance by Spain of the Minimum Wage Fixing Convention, 1970 (No. 131), and set up a tripartite committee to examine it.

Complaint submitted under article 26 of the Constitution

25. The Governing Body at its 238th Session requested its Committee on Freedom of Association to examine a complaint concerning the observance by Nicaragua of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) and the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144), made by Employers' delegates to the 73rd Session of the Conference (June 1987) under article 26 of the Constitution. At its 239th Session the Governing Body approved the interim conclusions of its Committee on Freedom of Association concerning this complaint, which it examined in conjunction with a number of other complaints alleging violation of freedom of association submitted by various trade union organisations and by the International Organisation of Employers (Cases Nos. 1129, 1298, 1344, 1351 and 1372). the Governing Body approved in particular the decision of the Committee on Freedom of Association to examine at its 240th Session in May-June 1988 the advisability of setting up a Commission of Inquiry to examine the complaint, made by Employers' delegates under article 26 of the ILO Constitution, on the basis of any information supplied by the Government and of the comments by the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations concerning the application of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 by Nicaragua.

D. DISCRIMINATION

26. Giving effect to the Conclusions of the Committee on Apartheid at the 73rd (June 1987) Session of the Conference, the Governing Body decided at its 238th Session to include the question of the updating of the 1981 Declaration on Apartheid in the agenda of the present session of the Conference, and to convene a Tripartite Conference on Action against Apartheid to examine the questions recommended by the Committee on Apartheid. In accordance with the decisions taken by the Governing Body at its 239th Session, this conference was held in Harare from 3 to 6 May 1988, and its report is submitted to the present session of the International Labour Conference.

27. At its 238th Session the Governing Body also examined the continued application of the 1981 Declaration on Apartheid, particularly in the field of the operational activities that are described in the report of its Committee on Discrimination and in the Director-General's Special Report on the application of the Declaration that is submitted to the present session of the Conference. It also examined all the ILO's other activities on discrimination in matters of employment and occupation, again examining in detail the ILO Plan of Action on equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women in employment, particularly in relation to the preparation of the Medium-Term Plan for 1990-95. It was understood that this question would be examined again after the adoption of the Plan.

28. At its 239th Session the Governing Body held an exchange of views, during its consideration of the report of its Committee on Discrimination, on the measures envisaged by the Director-General with regard to the situation in the Arab territories occupied by Israel. The Governing Body expressed the general wish that the Director-General should take due account of the views expressed, in particular as regards the arrangements for, and composition of, the ILO mission to the occupied territories.

E. STANDING ORDERS QUESTIONS

29. At its 239th Session the Governing Body considered the problems resulting from the appointment, as regular members of Conference committees, of government, employers' and workers' representatives who, as a result of the application of either article 13, paragraph 4 (arrears in the payment of contributions) or article 4, paragraph 2 (incomplete delegations) of the Constitution, no longer enjoy the right to vote.

30. Pending further consideration of a proposal to amend article 56, paragraph 1 of the Conference Standing Orders in order to provide that representatives not enjoying the right to vote may be appointed only as deputy members of Conference committees, the Governing Body decided that the practice, introduced in the Government group at the 73rd Session (June 1987) of the Conference, of requesting Government delegates and advisers not to apply for regular membership of any committee if they are not, at the time in question, entitled to vote, should be continued, and that, in so far as may nevertheless be necessary, the weighting coefficients in committees should be calculated on the basis of the number of regular Government members entitled to vote. This proposed change will be brought to the attention of the Conference through its Selection Committee.

F. WORKING PARTY ON CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS CONCERNING CONFERENCE DELEGATIONS

31. At its 237th Session the Governing Body reconstituted the Working Party, which is now composed as follows:

Government members: Cuba, Malaysia, Thailand, USSR, United States, Venezuela

Substitute: Sri Lanka

Employers' members: Mr. Brillinger, Mr. Georget, Miss Hak, Mr. Lindner, Mr. Nasr

Substitutes: Mr. von Holten, Mr. Said, Mr. Tsujino

Workers' members: Mr. Ali Ibrahim, Mr. Baldasini, Mr. Muhr, Mr. Mukherjee

Substitutes: Mr. Adiko, Mr. Mercier, Mr. Svenningsen, Mr. Timmer

32. The Working Party met during the 238th Session of the Governing Body under the chairmanship of Mr. Nik Mohamed Amin (Government member, Malaysia), and again during the 239th Session under the chairmanship of Mr. Heredia Pérez (Government member, Cuba).

33. Under the mandate assigned to it, the Working Party was called upon to continue to examine two linked matters: the financing of Conference delegations and the right to vote of incomplete delegations. Despite extensive discussions at both its meetings, the Working Party was unable to reach agreement on the various issues involved, and accordingly at its 239th Session the Governing Body decided, on the recommendation of the Working Party, that the work of the Working Party should be suspended until the 241st Session (November 1988) of the Governing Body and requested the Director-General in the meantime to use his good offices to undertake consultations on the basis of the views expressed in the Working Party and other relevant information, first with members of the Working Party and also, in so far as he considered it useful, on a broader basis, with a view to arriving at a conclusion. The Governing Body also decided that the Office should submit a report to the Working Party at its November 1988 Session, in which it would report on the results of the Director-General's consultations, evaluate all the available information and, if appropriate in the light of the consultations, put forward specific proposals for the consideration of the Working Party.

G. PROGRAMME, FINANCIAL AND ADMINISTRATION MATTERS

1. Programme and financial matters

34. One of the Governing Body's principal tasks during the period under review was to consider the ILO Medium-Term Plan for the period 1990-1995.¹ The Plan was considered at the 239th Session, six sittings of the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee being devoted to the discussion. In his reply to the discussion, the Director-General stated that full account would be taken of the views of the Committee in the preparation of the Programme and budget proposals for 1990-91. The Governing Body discussed and took note of the programme, Financial and Administrative Committee's report on its consideration of the Plan.² That report, together with the Plan itself, is contained in a supplement to the Report of the Director-General to the present session of the Conference.

35. The Governing Body continued its endeavours to resolve the various difficulties faced by the Organisation as a result of factors which disrupt the implementation of the approved programme of activities. Particular attention was paid to the problems created by wide fluctuations in exchange rates and by the late payment by member States of their assessed contributions. The question of the exchange rate for the 1988-89 biennium was addressed by the Director-General in a paper submitted to the 240th Session, discussion of which will be reported verbally to the Conference by the Chairman of the Governing Body. At the 238th and 239th Sessions the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee held extensive discussions on the late payment of contributions, which led to the Governing Body's decision at the latter session to propose a draft resolution to the Conference at its present session to introduce, for a two-year trial period beginning on 1 January 1989, an incentive scheme to encourage the early payment of member States' assessed contributions.³

36. During the consideration of the Programme and Budget for the biennium 1988-89 by the Finance Committee of Government Representatives at the 73rd Session (June 1987) of the Conference, the Director-General undertook to endeavour to find the means of reducing the budgetary burden by a further $6.9 million, but with the minimum possible disruption of programmes. Proposals to this effect were submitted to the 239th Session of the Governing Body. In accordance with a recommendation by its Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee, the Governing Body decided to submit a draft resolution to the Conference at its present session to endorse programme reductions of $1.9 million for the 1988-89 biennium, and to reduce the amount which under normal statutory conditions would have to be reimbursed to the Working Capital Fund in 1989 by $5 million.³

37. At its 237th Session the Governing Body approved supplementary expenditure for 1986-87 of $15,000 to cover the cost of a tripartite Governing Body delegation to the Second UNIDO Consultation on the Training of Industrial Manpower (Paris, September 1987), to be financed by savings in Part I of the budget for that biennium.

38. The Governing Body continued to monitor the position of the regular budget accounts and the Working Capital Fund. It noted at its 238th Session that, as of 15 October 1987, 65 member States had paid their contributions in full for 1987, compared to 62 at the same date in 1986. Budgetary income to 15 October 1987 for the 1986-87 biennium as a whole totalled $229,717,942, whereas budgetary expenditure, including the effect of exchange rate adjustments of $46,080,180, amounted to $243,009,453, thus exceeding budgetary income by $13,291,511. The overall budgetary results for 1986-87 were noted by the Governing Body at its 239th Session, budgetary expenditure of $291,266,335 then exceeding budgetary income of $266,206,708 by $25,059,627. In the light of this adverse situation and in order to limit the additional assessment on member States in 1989 in respect of the 1986-87 cash deficit, the Governing Body, as a one-time measure, waived the provisions of Financial Rule 3.20(a) so as to permit arrears of contribution for 1987 and earlier years received from 1 to 31 January 1988, amounting to $9,701,921, to be brought to account in 1987.

39. Also at its 239th Session the Governing Body noted that by 31 January 1988 some $28,113,141 had been received in respect of 1988 regular budget contributions, representing 17.3 per cent of the contributions assessed on member States for that year, 19 member States having paid their contributions in full - the same number as in 1987 at the same date.

40. The Governing Body at its 238th Session noted the report on the 45th Session of the Board of the International Centre for Advanced Technical and Vocational Training (Turin). It endorsed the programme, approved the 1988 and 1989 budgets for, and accepted contributions and gifts to the International Institute for Labour Studies; and it approved the 1988-89 expenditure and income budgets for the Joint ILO/International Social Security Association (ILO/ISSA) Account and for the extra-budgetary accounts of the International Occupational Safety and Health Information Centre (CIS) and the Inter-American Vocational Training Research and Documentation Centre (CINTERFOR).

41. At its 238th Session the Governing Body reviewed the question of the financing of a tripartite conference proposed for May 1988 to review action against apartheid, and decided that the cost, estimated at $340,000, be financed in the first instance by voluntary and extra-budgetary contributions, and in the second instance by savings in Part I of the budget for 1988-89 or, failing that, be charged to Part II (Unforeseen expenditure).

42. At its 238th and 239th Sessions the Governing Body, in addition to the $340,000 mentioned above, approved unforeseen expenditure for 1988-89 totalling $1,435,000, as follows: $435,000 to cover the cost of a variety of staff entitlements deriving from decisions of the International Civil Service Commission; $270,000 to cover the cost of giving effect in the ILO to decisions of the United Nations General Assembly concerning staff assessment rates, gross and net salary scales and separation payments for the Professional and higher categories, and education grant; $650,000 to meet the cost of the ILO's share of increased contribution rates to the Staff Health Insurance Fund; $60,000 to cover the ILO's share of amended rates of pension contribution resulting from interim measures adopted by the General Assembly for stabilising certain pensions payable in local currency; and $20,000 to meet the cost of a Governing Body delegation to the Fourth Session of the Joint Committee on the Public Service. Except for the last two items, which were to be financed from savings in Part I of the budget – and in the case of the $20,000, failing that, charged to Part II (Unforeseen expenditure) – these decisions were taken on the understanding that the related expenditure would be financed in the first instance from savings in Part I and that, should that subsequently prove impossible, the Director-General would propose alternative methods of financing at a later stage in the 1988-89 biennium.

43. At its 238th Session, in accordance with a request made by the Conference Committee on Apartheid at the 73rd Session (June 1987) of the Conference,¹ the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee of the Governing Body established a tripartite working group whose terms of reference were to assist the Director-General to find alternative banking facilities for the ILO.² The Committee on Apartheid called for a progress report to be submitted to it at the 75th Session (1988) of the International Labour Conference on action taken by the Governing Body on this subject. At its 239th Session the Governing Body noted that the Special Working Group on Banking Facilities in the ILO had met and presented a series of conclusions in the form of a report³ which had been noted by its Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee. The Governing Body further noted that the Special Working Group would be meeting to consider additional information, which was to be provided by the Director-General, during the course of its 240th Session.

44. At its 239th Session the Governing Body had before it a recommendation by its Allocations Committee concerning the assessment of Poland's contribution to the budget of the ILO for 1988 and 1989, and decided to propose an appropriate draft resolution to the Conference for adoption at its present session.⁴

45. At its 238th Session the Governing Body took note of the annual report of the United Nations Joint Inspection Unit (JIU) on its activities for the period July 1986 to June 1987, together with a report of the JIU on field representation of organisations of the United Nations system: structure and co-ordination. Finally, at its 239th Session, it authorised financing from the Building and Accommodation Fund for the re-waterproofing of the roofs of the headquarters building as and when such work became necessary.

2. Administrative matters

46. At its 238th Session the Governing Body took note of amendments to the Staff Regulations approved by the Director-General, under the authority delegated to him by the Governing Body, which related to a change in the periodicity of performance appraisals. It also noted the amendments approved by the Director-General in accordance with article 14.7 of the Staff Regulations concerning incentives for language proficiency for General Service category officials in Geneva and the special assignment allowance (financial incentive) payable to officials serving in designated duty stations, which gave effect to decisions of the International Civil Service Commission (ICSC) with regard to rates of allowance and benefits and conditions of entitlement. The Governing Body was also informed at that session that the Director-General had amended the Staff Regulations, under the authority conferred on him by the Governing Body at its 236th Session, to introduce new gross and net salary scales and new rates of staff assessment and separation payments for the Professional and higher categories in order to give effect to decisions taken by the General Assembly on the basis of recommendations of the ICSC. The Governing Body also examined the thirteenth annual report of the ICSC, and especially the conclusions and recommendations that were of salient interest to the ILO, namely, the margin between United Nations remuneration and United States civil service remuneration, separation payments, staff assessment of the Professional and higher categories, post adjustment questions, assignment allowance, education grant, the recommendations of the "Group of Eighteen", job classification and other personnel policy matters. The Governing Body took note of the decisions of the ICSC with respect to the scale of separation payments, the revision of the rental subsidy scheme, and the improvement of the assignment allowance, and deferred to its next session action on the recommendations of the ICSC.

47. At its 239th Session the Governing Body reviewed the decisions of the United Nations General Assembly on these recommendations and authorised the Director-General to amend the Staff Regulations in order to give effect in the ILO to the decisions concerning a further modification of staff assessment rates in order to increase the revenue of the United Nations Tax Equalisation Fund, revised gross and net salary scales and separation payments for the Professional and higher categories, and revised entitlements under the education grant for the reimbursement of boarding costs. The Governing Body at the same session also authorised the Director-General to implement, with effect from 1 April 1988, the revised salary scale for General Service category staff in Geneva and any revised rates of allowances established according to ICSC methodology.

48. The Governing Body was informed at its 238th Session that following an evaluation of the personal promotion system, the Director-General had concluded that by and large the objectives of the scheme had been met, as personal promotions had been granted to long-serving officials whose careers had been blocked through no fault of their own; he therefore intended to extend the trial period for a further two years with some improvements in the assessment procedure. The Governing Body also took note of two exceptions which the Director-General had made in accordance with Article 14.6 of the Staff Regulations concerning non-resident allowances and rental subsidies.

49. During its 238th Session the Governing Body examined the conclusions and recommendations of the Board of the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Fund (UNJSPB), noting with satisfaction that the long-term real return on the Fund's investments had improved. At its 239th Session, the Governing Body took note of the decision of the United Nations General Assembly, based on a recommendation by the UNJSPB that the Governing Body had supported earlier, to adopt interim measures establishing "floor" ratios between the initial local currency pensions and the United States dollar pensions. These interim measures would remain in force until 1990, when a comprehensive review of pensionable remuneration and of pensions would be undertaken by the ICSC and the UNJSPB. The Governing Body was also informed of the decisions of the United Nations General Assembly concerning the composition of the Pension Board. It authorised the Director-General to increase the rate of pension contributions to be made by the Organisation in two stages, to 14.8 per cent (7.4 for staff members) on 1 July 1988 and to 15.0 per cent (7.5 per cent for staff members) on 1 July 1989, as approved by the United Nations General Assembly. The Governing Body also requested the Director-General, through his representatives on the UNJSPB, to participate fully in studies requested of the Board by the United Nations General Assembly, with a view to guaranteeing the Fund's long-term financial viability while ensuring adequate old-age protection for ILO officials. Finally, it took note of the report of the Administrative Board of the ILO Staff Pensions Fund.

50. The Governing Body also noted at its 239th Session that, since the beginning of 1987, the financial situation of the ILO-ITU Staff Health Insurance Fund had deteriorated due to escalating medical costs, the stagnation and in some cases reduction of net salaries upon which the contributions were assessed, the sharp fall in the value of the dollar against the Swiss franc and the premature retirement of a substantial number of long-serving officials anxious not to face further erosion of their pension entitlements. The Governing Body noted the Director-General's intention to submit long-term proposals on the future operation and funding of the Staff Health Insurance Fund to it at its November 1988 Session and approved, as an immediate measure with effect from 1 March 1988, an increase in the ILO's share of the contribution rates from 2.0 to 2.3 per cent.

51. With respect to the progressive harmonisation and further development of the Statutes and Rules of the Administrative Tribunals of the ILO and the United Nations, the Governing Body agreed at its 238th Session to reconstitute the tripartite Working Party it had established at its 231st Session to undertake a preliminary examination of proposed amendments to the Statute of the Administrative Tribunal of the ILO. At its 239th Session it noted that the United Nations General Assembly had adopted a resolution requesting the Secretary-General to arrange for consultations between interested member States with the purpose of examining the proposals for the amendment of the Statutes, to invite the Director-General of the ILO to be present at such consultations, to report to the General Assembly at its 43rd Session on the outcome of such consultations and to present proposals designed to enable the Assembly to conclude its consideration of this question at that session. Accordingly, a representative of the Director-General will attend consultations to the extent feasible and a report will be submitted to the tripartite Working Party at the Governing Body's November 1988 session. The Governing Body decided in addition to submit a resolution concerning the composition of the Tribunal to the International Labour Conference at its present session.

52. Finally, at its 239th Session the Governing Body examined and took note of the statistical information submitted annually on the composition and structure of the ILO staff.

H. EMPLOYMENT

53. The Committee on Employment of the Governing Body held its first substantive meeting during the Governing Body's 238th Session. The Committee held an extensive exchange of views on an Office paper entitled: "Overview of the employment situation in the world". On the Committee's recommendation, the Governing Body subsequently authorised the Director-General to publish the paper under his own responsibility after taking account of the views expressed during the discussion and of the comments submitted in writing by members of the Committee.

54. The Committee also held a brief discussion at that session on an Office paper containing a "review and assessment of the activities of the ILO in the field of employment".

55. At its 239th Session the Governing Body examined the report of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment, held in Geneva from 23-25 November 1987. The numerous speakers who took part in the discussion of that report emphasised the significance of the conclusions adopted by the High-Level Meeting and the need for them to be followed by concrete action. The Governing Body took note of various measures taken or contemplated by the Director-General to follow up on the meeting, including regional seminars and meetings, advisory missions and technical co-operation projects requested by a number of countries, as well as the steps taken by the Director-General to secure the co-operation of other international organisations in these activities.

56. The Governing Body also requested the Director-General to circulate the report of the meeting to member States and to the international and non-governmental organisations concerned, and to take into account the conclusions of the meeting in implementing the Programme and Budget for 1988-89, in future revisions of the Medium-Term Plan, 1990-95, and in developing ILO technical co-operation activities in the future. Finally, it decided that its Committee on Employment should in November 1988 have before it a detailed paper on the action to be taken on the conclusions of the High-Level Meeting.

57. The agenda of the Committee at its next meeting will also include the following items: training, retraining and labour mobility; options for future employment growth; and follow-up on the general discussion concerning rural employment promotion held at the present session of the International Labour Conference.

I. SECTORAL ACTIVITIES

58. At its 238th Session the Governing Body agreed to defer to November 1989 the consideration of arrangements for the seventh general review of the membership of Industrial and analogous Committees. Consideration of these arrangements was proposed for that date as all thirteen of the committees would, by the end of the 1988-89 biennium, have held one session with the existing membership, a requirement generally agreed to at the time of the sixth general review. The deferral was intended to enable the Governing Body to consider, at its 240th Session, a background paper concerning a number of requests received by the Office for the creation of additional standing committees.

59. At its 238th Session the Governing Body also authorised the Director-General to communicate the texts adopted by the Eleventh Session of the Building, Civil Engineering and Public Works Committee (April 1987), and by the Joint Meeting on Employment and Working Conditions in Water, Gas and Electricity Supply Services (May 1987) to governments, requesting them to communicate the texts to the employers' and workers' organisations concerned, and to the international organisations of employers and workers concerned. It also requested him to take the necessary action with a view to giving effect to the requests contained in those texts. The Governing Body also took note at its 238th Session of the report of the Eleventh Ordinary Session of the Intergovernmental Committee of the Rome Convention (July 1987) and requested the Director-General to ensure that the memorandum for the promotion of the Rome Convention was disseminated to all the governments and employers' and workers' circles concerned. In addition, the Governing Body invited the Director-General to bear in mind the advisability of resuming the work undertaken by the Office for the elaboration of international labour standards for the protection of performers, by providing for the convening of a meeting of experts.

60. The Governing Body also agreed at its 238th Session on the composition of the Fourth Session of the Joint Committee on the Public Service (to be held in December 1988), together with a reserve list of countries drawn up on a regional basis.

J. MULTINATIONAL ENTERPRISES

61. At its 238th Session the Governing Body adopted the revised report form (questionnaire) to be used in the fourth survey on the effect given to the Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy, covering the years 1985-88. In accordance with earlier decisions of the Governing Body, the questionnaire was streamlined and new questions added on occupational safety and health and export processing zones. The questionnaire was distributed in March 1988 and replies are due by 28 February 1989. The Governing Body also took note of several replies to the third survey that were received too late to be included in the summary presented to the Governing Body at its 234th Session (November 1986).

62. The Governing Body also considered an item brought forward from its 234th Session, endorsing an addendum to be inserted in the Tripartite Declaration listing relevant new instruments introduced since the Declaration was adopted in 1977. As at previous sessions, the Governing Body took note of reports on promotional activities undertaken by the Office, completed studies, progress in current research and developments concerning multinationals in other organisations.

63. At its 239th Session the Governing Body's Committee on Multinational Enterprises considered a draft reply to a request for interpretation of the Declaration prior to its adoption by the Governing Body, as foreseen in the interpretation procedure. The request arose following the abrupt closure of the Belgian subsidiary of a multinational enterprise and the collective discharge of its workers. This interpretation of the Declaration, the second such interpretation, was adopted by the Governing Body on 1 March 1988.

K. RELATIONS WITH OTHER INTERNATIONAL ORGANISATIONS

64. At its 238th and 239th Sessions the Governing Body continued to review relations with other international organisations within and outside the United Nations system.

65. The Governing Body considered the latest developments in the United Nations system of interest to the ILO, including the financial difficulties of the system, the establishment of a Special Commission of the Economic and Social Council to review the intergovernmental structure in the economic and social fields, and the action taken by the General Assembly with regard to Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome (AIDS). The Governing Body also considered the action taken by the first and second regular sessions of ECOSOC in 1987, the International Conference on Disarmament and Development (New York, August-September 1987, to which the ILO had submitted a study), and the Second UNIDO Consultation on the Training of Industrial Manpower (Paris, September 1987), in which the ILO had played a major role. The Governing Body noted with satisfaction the declaration and recommendations of the International Conference on Drug Abuse and Illicit Trafficking (Vienna, June 1987), and instructed the Director-General to continue to give special attention to drug abuse control activities within this framework. It also authorised him to approve on behalf of the ILO the FAO/ILO/IMO Document for Guidance on Fishermen's Training and Certification. The Governing Body took note of the report of the Tenth Session of the Joint ILO/WHO Committee on Occupational Health, and authorised the Director-General to distribute the report to the ILO's constituents as well as to interested institutions and services. It also invited him to take account of the proposals made by the Joint Committee when planning the future programme of work of the Office.

66. The Governing Body considered and took note of the action of interest to the ILO taken by the 42nd Session of the United Nations General Assembly, the Inter-regional Consultation on Developmental Social Welfare Policies and Programmes (Vienna, September 1987), the Tenth Session of the United Nations Commission on Human Settlements, which had held a special sitting to commemorate the International Year of Shelter for the Homeless (1987), and the Second General Conference of UNIDO. The Governing Body was also informed of ILO activities in relation to the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and in support of the WHO's Global Programme on AIDS. In addition, the Governing Body reviewed follow-up to UNEP's World Industry Conference on Environmental Management, held in 1984, and the situation concerning the adoption of an additional Protocol to the European Social Charter.

67. At its 239th Session the Governing Body also considered extensively the results of the two 1987 sessions of the Open-Ended Working Group of the United Nations General Assembly, which is elaborating the draft International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Their Families. The Governing Body took note of the partial results of the elaboration of the Convention; expressed its conviction that appropriate arrangements should be made for effective participation by the Governing Body in the procedures concerning its application; and requested the Director-General to communicate the Office paper on this subject, together with the relevant parts of the report of the Governing Body's International Organisations Committee, to the Secretary-General of the United Nations, and, through him, to the Open-Ended Working Group.

L. TECHNICAL CO-OPERATION

68. At its 238th Session the Governing Body carried out its annual review of ILO operational activities during the previous year (1986), including tripartite participation. It noted that the increase in expenditure that had occurred in 1985 had continued in 1986, and that expenditure had in fact been some 17.8 per cent higher than in 1985. The greatest increase in 1986 had occurred in Africa (23.3 per cent higher than in 1985). Among the major technical programmes, that for sectoral activities registered the highest increase (28.8 per cent), followed by employment and development (21.8 per cent). Increases also occurred in the employers' and workers' activities programmes. ILO activities in the least developed countries (LDCs) continued to grow: in 1986 nearly $37 million were spent on operational activities in the LDCs, almost $29 million being devoted to Africa alone. The corresponding figures for 1985 were $29.5 million and $21.8 million respectively. This growth came at a time when resources available for the LDCs had not been increasing at the expected pace. The Governing Body took note of the measures taken to enhance the overall cost-effectiveness of the programme and of the results of deliberate efforts to reduce the expert component share in overall expenditure: in 1986 experts had accounted for 41.6 per cent of total expenditure.

69. At its 238th Session the Governing Body examined the third progress report on the implementation of the Programme of Action for Africa, a review initiated following the adoption by the International Labour Conference at its 71st Session (June 1985) of a resolution concerning the most urgent problems of Africa, and in particular food security. Considerable progress was noted in promoting the objectives expressed in the ILO Programme of Action appended to the resolution. This was largely due to Office-wide mobilisation and more effective arrangements within the office to expand and reorient ILO activities in that continent. The Governing Body felt that in future it would be more appropriate to report on progress in the programme of Action in the context of the annual overall review of ILO operational activities.

70. At its 238th Session the Governing Body examined the action taken on the resolution concerning the role of the ILO in technical co-operation, adopted by the Conference at its 73rd Session (June 1987). It authorised distribution of the resolution; requested the Director-General, when making proposals for the agenda of the Conference in the future, to bear in mind the request, made in paragraph 7 of the Conclusions contained in the resolution, for a review of the ILO's technical co-operation programme and its effectiveness by the Conference every five years; and requested the Director-General to take full account of the resolution and the Conclusions in the future development of the technical co-operation programme.

71. At its 238th and 239th Sessions the Governing Body examined further information on operational activities questions in the United Nations system. This review concerned the activities of the Administrative Committee on co-ordination and its Consultative Committee on Substantive Questions (Operational Activities) (CCSQ(OPS)), the 33rd Session of the UNDP Governing Council, the 42nd Session of the United Nations General Assembly (Second Committee), and the second regular session of the Economic and Social Council. It also took note of information provided by the Office regarding the High-Level Committee on the Review of TCDC (Fifth Session), held in New York in May 1987, and the UNDP/ILO Review Meeting, held in April 1987.

72. At its 239th Session the Governing Body examined an assessment of selected ILO projects concerning rural small industrial enterprises, taking note of the lessons learned from the review of ten different projects.

M. STANDING BODIES AND MEETINGS

1. Planning

73. During the period under review, the Governing Body fixed the date, place, agenda and composition of meetings provided for in the programme and budget, took decisions as called for on the membership of standing bodies and appointed delegations to represent it at ILO meetings. It reviewed information submitted by the Director-General on symposia, seminars and similar meetings financed under the regular budget and from extra-budgetary sources.

2. Follow-up

74. At its 238th Session the Governing Body considered the record of the Fourth European Regional Conference (Geneva, 15-22 September 1987). It authorised the Director-General to distribute the text of the report of the Committee on Social Security set up by the Conference, and to distribute the texts of the conclusions and resolutions adopted by the Conference, requesting him to take the necessary measures with a view to their implementation. These texts dealt with the following topics: training and retraining – implications of technological change; the strengthening of European dialogue on initial and continuous training and on retraining, taking account of technological change; occupational safety and health; employment policy and environmental protection; migrant workers and their families in Europe; the need to promote co-operation between Europe and the developing countries, in particular Africa and the least developed countries in other regions, and the contribution of the ILO to solving their social and economic problems; the creation of enterprises and the growth of employment.

75. At its 239th Session the Governing Body considered and took note of the report of the Joint Maritime Commission on its 25th Session, which had met in Geneva on 6 October 1987 during the 74th (Maritime) Session of the International Labour Conference. The Governing Body took the action required in respect of the resolutions adopted by the Commission, which dealt with the minimum basic wage of able seamen and the identification of any possible new Conventions to be added by a Protocol to the Appendix of Convention No. 147. It authorised the Director-General to distribute the text of the former and invited him to bear in mind the other requests made in that resolution when drawing up future programme proposals and when formulating proposals for the agenda of a future session of the Joint Maritime Commission. It also invited him to bear in mind the request and recommendations contained in the latter when drawing up proposals for the agenda of a future session of the International Labour Conference.

76. At its 239th Session the Governing Body considered and took note of the report of the Fourteenth International Conference of Labour Statisticians, held in Geneva from 28 October to 6 November 1987. It authorised the Director-General to distribute the report, drawing particular attention to the eight resolutions contained in the Appendix to the report.

3. Invitations to the Conference and other meetings

77. During the period under review, the Governing Body authorised the Director-General to invite various intergovernmental and non-governmental international organisations to be represented at the present Conference session and at other ILO meetings. It authorised the Director-General to invite the Democratic People's Republic of Korea and the Republic of Korea to be represented at the present session of the Conference and to invite Bermuda, through the Government of the United Kingdom, to send a tripartite observer delegation.

N. INTERNATIONAL CENTRE FOR ADVANCED TECHNICAL AND VOCATIONAL TRAINING (TURIN)

78. At its 238th Session the Governing Body took note of the report on the 45th Session of the Board of the Centre, held in Geneva on 6 November 1987. The report was first considered by its Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee. This was the first session of the newly constituted Board, the members having been appointed at the June 1987 Session of the Governing Body for a three-year term of office. The Board welcomed the new Director and the Deputy Director responsible for training activities, and approved the nominations for the Programme Advisory Committee, which, as emphasised by the Director, will play a fundamental role in ensuring that the Centre's programme of activities makes optimal use of available resources. The Centre's lack of financial stability was a continuing cause for concern, and the Director hoped that the issue of closer integration with ILO headquarters would be further discussed in the context of the ILO's medium-term objectives. Despite its financial constraints, the Centre had been able to reduce its operational deficit since the time of preparing the documents for the Board, and it was expected that the 1987 financial year would end without a deficit.

79. As regards the programme and budget proposals for 1988, the Director observed that there was a continuing trend towards shorter, more specialised courses in Turin, involving fellows with a higher level of education. More participants would be trained at the national or regional level; administered fellowships should continue to increase; the Centre would continue to intensify its efforts to diversify sources of financing and to ensure a better distribution of activities over the year. The Board discussed and approved the programme and budget proposals.

O. INTERNATIONAL INSTITUTE FOR LABOUR STUDIES

80. At its 238th Session the Governing Body discussed and took note of the report on the 29th Session of the Board of the Institute held in November 1987. The main points dealt with in the report concerned the Board's review of the report of the Director regarding the activities of the Institute in 1987, its programme and budget proposals for the 1988-89 biennium, and its preliminary draft for the Medium-Term Plan. The Governing Body also accepted with gratitude a contribution from the employers' confederations of Denmark, Finland, Norway and Sweden to finance a fellowship to enable a person from employers' circles to participate in an internship course at the Institute.

P. OTHER

81. During the period under review the Governing Body took note of information supplied in the Director-General's regular reports on the deaths of prominent ILO personalities, the progress of international labour legislation, internal administration and documents and publications issued by the Office. At its 239th Session it took note of an Office paper on activities of the International Occupational Safety and Health Information Centre (CIS) during the 1986-87 biennium.

Proposals were submitted orally to the Selection Committee that the Conference committees should be composed as follows:

Finance Committee: 1 Government representative of each member State represented at the Conference;

Committee on the Application of Standards: 190 members (90 Government members, 35 Employers' members and 65 Workers' members);

Committee on Safety and Health in Construction: 151 members (77 Government members, 32 Employers' members and 42 Workers' members);

Committee on Employment and Social Security: 188 members (71 Government members, 56 Employers' members and 61 Workers' members);

Committee on Convention No. 107: 73 members (40 Government members, 10 Employers' members and 23 Workers' members);

Committee on Rural Employment: 127 members (63 Government members, 25 Employers' members and 39 Workers' members);

Resolutions Committee: 217 members (85 Government members, 60 Employers' members and 72 Workers' members).

The Selection Committee noted that, in accordance with the usual practice, a system of weighting would be applied in each committee to ensure equality of voting strength between the three groups.

The lists of the members of the Conference committees are appended to the present report.

Committee on Apartheid

In accordance with the established practice, the Selection Committee recommends to the Conference that the Committee on Apartheid should, as at previous sessions, be composed of a maximum of 20 members from each group and should meet for a maximum of six sittings. However, in view of its additional workload this year, the Selection Committee also recommends that the Committee on Apartheid should be able to hold additional sittings, the number and scheduling of which should be decided by the Selection Committee on the recommendation of the officers of the Committee on Apartheid.

Composition of the Credentials Committee

The Selection Committee proposes to the Conference that the three members of the Credentials Committee should be the following:

Government member: Mr. Nakamura (Japan)

Employers' member: Mr. Hoff (Norway)

Workers' member: Mr. Svenningsen (Denmark)

Appointment of the Conference Drafting Committee

The Selection Committee recommends that, in accordance with the provisions of article 6, paragraph 1 of the Standing Orders, the Conference Drafting Committee should be composed as follows:

The President of the Conference

The Secretary-General of the Conference

Mr. Maupain, Legal Adviser of the Conference

Mr. Sidibé, Director of the International Labour Standards Department

Mrs. Kellerson, Assistant Legal Adviser of the Conference

Discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General: opening date for the discussion and closing date for the list of speakers

(a) The Selection Committee has fixed the opening date for the discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General at Thursday, 2 June 1988, and decided that the list of speakers will be closed on Wednesday, 8 June at 6 p.m., under the usual conditions.

(b) The Selection Committee proposes that the Conference should remind speakers taking part in the discussion (i) that they must abide strictly by the provisions of the Conference Standing Orders concerning the duration of speeches (maximum 15 minutes), drawing their attention to the arrangements foreseen to ensure that this time-limit is respected and which are described in the "Guide for Delegates" and the "Note for Delegates"; and (ii) that they are requested to concentrate their remarks on the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General and on the activities of the International Labour Organisation.

Examination of information on programme implementation during the preceding financial period, together with proposals for advance planning

The Selection Committee recommends to the Conference that the examination of the documents concerning programme implementation during 1986-87 and the Medium-Term Plan 1990-95, which are submitted to the Conference in the form of supplements to the Report of the Director-General, should take place as part of the general discussions of the reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General.

Suggestions to facilitate the work of the Conference

(i) Quorum

In the plenary sittings a vote is not valid if the number of votes cast for and against is less than half the number of the delegates attending the Conference and entitled to vote. If there is no quorum on a show of hands, a record vote may have to be taken and this wastes much time.

Over the years, the Governing Body has made a number of recommendations to improve the working of the quorum rule, and it is the practice of the Selection Committee to invite the Conference each year to confirm a number of principles based on those recommendations to ensure the satisfactory working of the quorum rule.

The Selection Committee accordingly invites the Conference to confirm the following principles:

- (a) the quorum will be fixed provisionally, on the basis of the credentials received, in the brief report of the Chairman of the Governing Body on the day before the opening of the session. This provisional quorum will remain unchanged until the Credentials Committee, in the exercise of its functions under article 20, paragraph 1(2) of the Standing Orders, determines the quorum on the basis of registrations, it being understood that, if an important vote were to take place in the initial stages of the Conference (once the Credentials Committee has been appointed), the Conference might request the Credentials Committee to determine the quorum in an urgent report;
- (b) once the quorum has been determined on the basis of registrations, the usual practice of adjusting it, under the authority of the Credentials Committee, so as to take into account, on the one hand, new registrations and, on the other, notices of departure from delegates leaving the Conference, will continue as in the past;

- (c) delegates should register immediately on arrival, since the quorum is calculated on the basis of the number of delegates registered;
- (d) acceptance of appointment as a delegate implies an obligation to be available in Geneva personally or through an adviser authorised to act as his substitute for the work of the Conference until the end, since important votes often take place on the last day;
- (e) delegates who are nevertheless obliged to leave the Conference before it finishes should give notice of their forthcoming departure to the secretariat of the Conference. (The form provided for indicating their date of departure also enables them to authorise an adviser to act and to vote in their place.) At group meetings held during the second half of the Conference the attention of members of the groups will be drawn to the importance of completing and handing in this form;
- (f) in addition, one Government delegate of a country may report the departure of the other Government delegate, and the Secretaries of the Employers' and Workers' groups may also give notice of the final departure of members of their groups who have not authorised advisers to act in their place;
- (g) when a record vote is taken in plenary while committees are sitting, delegates are both entitled and expected to leave committees to vote unless they are replaced by a substitute in plenary. Announcements are made in the committees to ensure that all delegates are aware that a record vote is about to take place. Appropriate arrangements will be made for committees meeting in the ILO building.

In arranging the programme of work of the Conference, the Selection Committee will endeavour to ensure that matters which require the holding of votes come before the Conference at the earliest possible moment. The plan of work for Committees endorsed by the Selection Committee takes this requirement into account.

(ii) Punctuality

As in previous years, the Selection Committee recommends the Conference to ask committee chairmen to start proceedings very punctually - except where a technical section has not yet completed its preliminary discussions - irrespective of the number of persons present, but on condition that votes will not be taken unless a quorum is clearly present.

(iii) Negotiations

In order to facilitate more continuous negotiation in committees between the different groups, it is the practice for representatives of each group to meet with the chairman and reporter of the committee and with the representative of the Secretary-General, whenever this is desirable, to ensure that the leaders of each group know fully the minds of their colleagues in the other groups; normally such meetings are held before each group has committed itself to a definite position. The function of these informal meetings is to afford opportunities for a fuller understanding of differences of view before definite positions have crystallised.

The Selection Committee recommends the Officers of the Conference committees to continue the above-mentioned practice.

Participation in Conference committees by Members having lost the right to vote

At its 239th Session (February-March 1988), the Governing Body considered the implications of the appointment, as regular members of Conference committees, of representatives of a member State which had lost the right to vote in accordance with article 13, paragraph 4, of the Constitution of the ILO, having regard to the recent increase in the number of States in this position. It noted that, while the appointment of employers' and workers' representatives from such a State had no practical implications because the employers' and workers' groups operated an effective system under Article 56, paragraph 5(b), of the Conference Standing Orders for ensuring that deputy members of a committee voted in the place of regular members deprived of the right to vote, the same was not true of the Government group. As a result, if a Government that has lost the right to vote is appointed a regular member of a committee, the distribution of votes among the three groups is distorted because the weighting of votes is based on the full regular membership and in practice the Government regular members of committees who are unable to vote do not make use of the possibility afforded by Article 56, paragraph 5(a), of appointing a deputy member to vote in their place.

The Governing Body noted that, in order to avoid such distortions, the practice had been followed by governments in the Government group at the 73rd and 74th Sessions of the Conference in 1987 of not applying for regular membership of committees if they were not at the time in question entitled to vote.

Pending consideration of a possible amendment to the Conference Standing Orders to give formal effect to this practice, the Governing Body recommended that it should be continued. It further recommended that, if it was for any reason not fully respected, the weighting coefficients in committees should be calculated on the basis of the number of Government members entitled to vote.

The Selection Committee accordingly recommends to the Conference that the calculation of weighting coefficients for votes in committees should be based on the number of regular Government members entitled to vote.

Plan of work of Conference committees

The Selection Committee endorsed a plan of work for committees, which is not binding but will enable them in organising their work to take maximum possible account of the overall needs and possibilities of the Conference. The plan is appended in tabular form for the information of the Conference.

Provisional Record

Seventy-fifth Session, Geneva, 1988

First sitting

Wednesday, 1 June 1988, 10.15 a.m.

Presidents: Mr. Russomano, Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and Mr. Beyreuther

OPENING OF THE SESSION

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. RUSSOMANO (Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office) – As Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office I declare open the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference.

With these simple and formal words, I initiate the work of this session by extending a cordial welcome to the members of delegations as well as the national and international authorities attending this session.

This 75th Session has a special feature which in my opinion is highly significant. It is to be addressed, in succession, by two distinguished personalities of modern political life. The two have one common feature: they have marked their governments with the dynamic imprint of their own personalities and as national leaders they have projected their images on the screen of modern history as champions of and witness to our common concern for social justice and the defence of the principles of modern democracy.

I am referring to Mr. Felipe González, the President of Spain, and to President Corazon Aquino of the Philippines.

The 7th and 14th of this month will be red-letter days for this Conference, because we shall hear the words of these two leaders of our times who have demonstrated in the history of their countries that human and democratic values are endowed with the magic force of the phoenix who was reborn full of life when it was thought to have been crushed under the weight of dictatorship.

As observers and witnesses to the historic process of our times, all of us know and recognise the importance of the social achievements, within their governments, of President Corazon Aquino and President Felipe González.

They have shown, in the sometimes difficult game of politics, that in successive periods the deals are always handed out by strong hands and they will inevitably be changed and improved upon by time.

The transition from the twentieth to the twenty-first century has led as far as our generations are concerned to a second rebirth. As in the fifteenth century, today, once again, man is at the centre of nature and life. Yesterday, the compass, the printing press, paper, gunpowder, the great discoveries changed the conditions of life, the face of the world, the philosophic conception of mankind in dealing with reality and his esthetic conception of art. Today also, modern technologies are opening up new interplanetary continents, changing our outlook on the universe. Atomic energy has opened up prospects for mankind. The technological revolution, which is in fact the second industrial revolution, has opened up paths which were previously unimaginable. And in the splendour of this renaissance, man will once again become “the measure of all things” and mankind will be the ground on which we shall sow our hopes and beliefs hope that will bring with them new realities, realities which will be transformed into new hopes.

I do not think that it will be necessary for me to do as is customary and refer to the four technical items and the other matters on the agenda of the Conference. They are relevant topics with which you are familiar and they will be enriched by your debate and consideration.

But since I have stressed the fact that the second renaissance will again be replacing man in the centre of life, I cannot fail to mention the fact that the Director-General's Report this year is not only rich in stimulating ideas but also opens up new paths in so far as the subject chosen – human rights – is concerned. Understood in their fullest sense, over and above civil and political limits and considered as instruments of freedom, human rights, in their social, economic and moral aspects, are necessary prerequisites for social justice.

In April 1948 the American States approved in Bogotá the American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man, which was the first international instrument on this subject.

In December of the same year, 1948, that is to say, just a few months afterwards, the United Nations adopted the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

Forty years have passed and this still has a very strong influence on our political and social institutions.

The ILO, within the bounds of its competence, has a duty to play an important role in this field. The majority of social rights are human rights, that is to say, they are at the root of human nature. They are conditions for human existence. They deserve the same protection as is today afforded to life, freedom, dignity and the rights of each and every one of us to have his own identity.

The ILO is called upon to pursue its efforts for the defence and promotion of the human values of labour, and it would not be excessive to presume and declare that the ILO, in this respect, should be in the vanguard, particularly at a time when the traditional concepts of human rights are gradually being broadened.

Along the same line of thought is the idea which has been included in the agenda of the Conference of a partial revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107). This Convention was adopted more than 30 years ago. For a long time its text has ceased to be in tune with the realities of today. The pace of modern life is very fast. Certain basic issues, however, demand prudence and reflection on our part, but they also demand from us firmness and understanding since the questions involving indigenous and tribal populations are very closely bound up with the human rights of large groups of the world's population.

The double-discussion procedure for debating this subject is a wise one. It allows time for reflection on issues which, as I have said, are serious and which need to be resolved while maintaining a balance between the interests of all parties, yet they require fair, pragmatic and effective solutions.

In conclusion, as concerns the other technical items on the agenda of the Conference, still with emphasis on the defence of mankind and its political and spiritual values, I should like to mention the opportunity we now have to take a step forward in the final eradication of racial discrimination in South Africa.

The ILO has not failed in its duty. It has always been in the vanguard of the universal movement against apartheid. But its appeals, like all the ardent appeals of the international community, have not always had useful results in practice. There is nobody more deaf than he who does not wish to hear and nobody more blind than he who does not wish to see.

The Black majority in South Africa is still suffering constantly from the relentless persecution of intolerance and intransigence. The press, television, the cinema, the radio, books – to which must be added the clamour of all nations – are showing and proving that apartheid has not diminished in the slightest in the rigidity of its principles and the cruelty of its means of action.

This Conference affords yet a further opportunity of enabling us, with the vehemence inspired by the need for justice, to examine this problem, and I hope that from our work will emerge a protest against what is the most long standing, most excessive and most violent violation of human rights in the second half of the twentieth century.

The Conference is being called upon to bring up to date its Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa, bearing in mind the distressing developments that have taken place in that country since 1981 when the Declaration was updated the last time.

But speaking personally, I cannot deny that I consider and declare that so long as apartheid exists it cannot be said that either justice or peace exist in the world.

I could continue at great length in this vein. But I do not think it is necessary to say more. I leave in your hands the technical decisions and social proposals suggested by the agenda of the Conference.

I am convinced that the distinguished members of the Conference, their governments, their workers' and employers' delegations share my wholehearted belief in the love of all human beings for one another, in understanding between the classes and peace among nations.

These ideas will be the lamps which light the way in the work of the Conference now beginning, and I am confident that the work of this Conference will be outstandingly successful and will make yet another contribution to the international community.

As Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office I am confident that this will be so.

ELECTION OF THE PRESIDENT

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. RUSSOMANO (Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office) – The next item of business on our agenda this morning is the election of the President of the Conference. Are there any nominations?

I call on Mr. Meiszter, Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of Hungary, to take the floor.

Mr. MEISZTER (Government delegate, Hungary) – It is my honour and privilege to propose on behalf of the Eastern European socialist countries the nomination of His Excellency Mr. Wolfgang Beyreuther, State Secretary of Labour and Wages and Member of the Council of Ministers of the German Democratic Republic, for the presidency of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference which is beginning today.

Mr. Wolfgang Beyreuther was born in a working-class family and he himself started his career as a metalworker. After 1945 he had various trade union posts; between 1948 and 1956 he occupied several positions in the Confederation of the Free German Trade Unions beginning as an executive member of the local organisation of the metalworkers and becoming a member and Secretary of the Central Executive Council of the Metalworkers' Union. From 1956 to 1959 he studied social sciences and obtained a Masters Degree. After his graduation he was elected to the National Executive Council of the Free German Trade Unions. From 1959 to 1971 he served as a Secretary, then between 1971 and 1977 as the Vice-Chairman of the same body. He was also an alternate member of the General Council and the Bureau of the World Federation of Trade Unions from 1964 to 1975. Since 1971 he has been a member of the People's Chamber, the Parliament of the German Democratic Republic. In 1977 Mr. Beyreuther was appointed State Secretary of Labour and Wages and as such became a member of the Council of Ministers. In this capacity, he has headed the German Democratic Republic's delegations to the annual sessions of the International Labour Conference since 1977. Also he led his country's delegations to the Third and Fourth European Regional Conferences. This personal involvement and experience in ILO affairs is well manifested among others in an interview recently given by State Secretary Beyreuther for the daily Neues Deutschland elaborating on the approach of the German Democratic Republic to the International Labour Organisation. An interview reflecting the interests of the countries in whose name I have the honour to speak in a constructive co-operation within the ILO.

Mr. Beyreuther is also well familiar with the United Nations activities in the social field. Lately he represented his country at the European Regional Conference of Ministers for Social Welfare held in Warsaw in April 1987, and at the Inter-Regional Consultation on Development of Social Welfare Policies and Programmes which took place in Vienna last year.

In view of his proven involvement in the problems of the world of labour and social affairs, his ability and his experience, I am convinced that Mr. Wolfgang Beyreuther will preside efficiently over this session of the Conference and contribute to its success for which we all hope. Therefore I ask the Conference to support unanimously the candidature of His Excellency, Mr. Beyreuther, as President of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference.

Miss VENSON (Government delegate, Botswana) – I stand here on behalf of the Africa group to state our support for the election of Mr. Wolfgang Beyreuther as President of the Conference. We have confidence in his performance, based particularly on his experience both as trade unionist and more recently as Secretary of State for Labour and Wages, and we are confident that he will carry out his assignment as we all expect he will.

Mrs. BALJINNYAM (Government delegate, Mongolia) – In my capacity as co-ordinator of the Asian Government group, it is my honour and privilege to support most formally the nomination of Mr. Beyreuther, Secretary of State for Labour and Wages and member of the Council of Ministers of the German Democratic Republic, for the presidency of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference.

I need hardly repeat the high qualities and qualifications of Mr. Beyreuther, as they have been adequately described by the distinguished Ambassador of Hungary. We are confident that under his able leadership and guidance the proceedings of the Conference will be brought to a successful conclusion.

Speaking personally, let me add that it gives me great pleasure to second him to this high post, a representative of a country with which my country enjoys close friendship and most cordial relations.

Permit me, on behalf of the Asian Government group, to offer him our congratulations and our wishes for the success of the Conference.

Mr. COUNINIOTIS (Government adviser, Greece) – On behalf of the Western European countries, I wish to state that we accept the nomination of Mr. Beyreuther for the post of the President of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference.

We trust that under his presidency we will be able to achieve a successful Conference.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. BOZO (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Syrian Arab Republic) – It is an honour and a privilege for me to take the floor on behalf of the Arab-speaking governments, employers and workers to express our full support for the nomination of Mr. Wolfgang Beyreuther, the Secretary of State for Labour and Wages of the German Democratic Republic, as President of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference.

The Syrian Arab Republic would like to express its support for Mr. Beyreuther, and to acknowledge the excellent relations between our two countries. The support of the Arab Group is based on the competence of Mr. Beyreuther in trade union matters, and on his experience in parliament and international forums. We are confident that his leadership will ensure the success of this very important session of the Conference.

Our support is also based on our high esteem for the policies pursued by the German Democratic Republic at the multilateral level and in the field of international co-operation, especially with the developing countries. Therefore, we shall be heartened to see Mr. Wolfgang Beyreuther presiding over the deliberations of this Conference, especially since human rights issues will be our main topic of discussion.

We would like to assure Mr. Beyreuther of our full support and co-operation in making this session of the Conference a success.

Interpretation from French: Mrs. CARON (Government delegate, Canada) – The Governments of the Americas region fully support the objectives and the principles of the International Labour Organisation. It is in this spirit, and as co-ordinator of the Americas region, that we would like to associate ourselves with those who have spoken before us concerning the nomination of Mr. Beyreuther as President of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. The Governments of the Americas have followed the discussions which preceded this nomination with keen interest and would like to express their profound hope that it will mark not only the beginning of a very fruitful session of the Conference but also a renewed collective commitment by all Members of the Organisation to promote the interests of the ILO and to implement its most noble aspirations.

Interpretation from French: Mr. OECHSLIN (Employers' delegate, France) – On behalf of a large number of Employers' delegates whom I was able to meet before this session, I have been authorised to make the following statement.

The name of Mr. Wolfgang Beyreuther, the Secretary of State for Labour and Wages of the German Democratic Republic, has been put forward for the presidency of the Conference by the group of European governments whose turn it is this year to make a nomination. We shall be happy to work under the presidency of Mr. Beyreuther, whose qualities have just been recalled to us, thus furthering the aims of this Organisation in a spirit of co-operation and dialogue.

We hope that the unanimous election of Mr. Beyreuther will help to strengthen tripartism, which, in our opinion, remains the raison d'être of this Organisation. We are encouraged in this hope by reading certain statements by our future President, in particular, the interview he recently gave to a leading daily newspaper in his own country. We believe, as he said, that Government, Employers' and Workers' delegates should act in full independence from one another. We also believe, as he does, in the application of Conventions freely ratified by member States and the supervision of this application by the bodies set up for the purpose by the ILO.

After listening carefully to Ambassador Meiszter, we trust that these viewpoints are shared by the governments of all the socialist countries of Europe. In this spirit I wish good luck to President Beyreuther and assure him of my wholehearted co-operation, as well as that of my colleagues.

Interpretation from German: Mr. MÜHR (Workers' delegate, Federal Republic of Germany) – On behalf of the Workers' group of this Conference, I have the honour to support the proposal put forward by the government representatives of Europe for the nomination of Mr. Wolfgang Beyreuther, member of the Council of Ministers for the German Democratic Republic and Secretary of State for Labour and Wages of the German Democratic Republic. Mr. Beyreuther's task will not be easy. The crisis in which large sections of the United Nations system find themselves has not spared this Organisation either and there is a fear that this will also have an effect on this Conference. Therefore, we have every reason to wish good luck and support to the President of this Conference. The Workers' group would like to declare its readiness to co-operate with the President here.

I know Mr. Beyreuther personally, because of all the various posts he has held in his own country over several decades. I am quite convinced that because of his personal and professional qualities he will have a very positive effect on this Conference whenever this may be necessary.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. RUSSOMANO (Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office) – Mr. Beyreuther, Secretary of State for Labour and Wages of the German Democratic Republic, has been nominated for the presidency of this Conference. The nomination has been fully supported and seconded.

Since I see that there are no other nominations, I am pleased to declare Mr. Beyreuther President of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference.

I congratulate him most sincerely and I invite him to take the chair.

(Mr. Beyreuther, Secretary of State for Labour and Wages, German Democratic Republic, is elected President and takes the chair.)

PRESIDENTIAL ADDRESS

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – I should like to thank the Conference most sincerely for the confidence it has shown in me by electing me to the presidency of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. I am aware of the honour that has been vested in me, but I fully realise the enormous responsibility inherent in the office of the President of the Conference. I also consider this election a tribute to my country, the German Democratic Republic, and to its policy of peace, understanding and international co-operation for the benefit of mankind.

I have great pleasure in expressing my particular thanks to Comrade Ambassador Meiszter from the Hungarian People's Republic, a friendly ally of my country, who supported my nomination on behalf of the group of European socialist countries to this high office. I should also like to thank most cordially Mrs. Venson, Government delegate of Botswana and co-ordinator of the African countries, for supporting my nomination. My thanks also go to Mrs. Baljinnyam, the Government representative of the Mongolian People's Republic, the co-ordinator of the Asian countries, and to Mr. Couniniotis, Government adviser of Greece, co-ordinator of the Western European countries; I should also like to thank Mrs. Caron, the head of the International Affairs Department in the Labour Ministry and Government representative of Canada, who spoke on behalf of the countries of the Americas region, and Mr. Bozo, Minister of Labour and Social Affairs of the Syrian Arab Republic, who spoke on behalf of the Arab countries. I extend my particular thanks to Mr. Oechslin, the Employers' delegate of France and Vice-Chairman of the Governing Body, speaking on behalf of the Employers. I should also like to thank Mr. Muhr, the Workers' delegate of the Federal Republic of Germany, the Vice-Chairman of the Governing Body, who is speaking on behalf of the Workers' group.

I should like to thank all of you for your very kind and friendly words, which you expressed in connection with my nomination. I take these good wishes as an augury that we shall be able to work together efficiently and in confidence to tackle the most important tasks before us at this Conference and to continue our joint efforts on the basis of the ILO Constitution. I should like to reassure you that I shall try to fulfil the tasks of this high office as President of the 75th International Labour Conference conscientiously and to the best of my ability and in accordance with the Constitution of the Organisation.

This year I am participating in the International Labour Conference for the twelfth time. Over these years, I have become even more convinced that the International Labour Organisation is of benefit to all States, whether they are large, medium-sized or small.

The International Labour Organisation is an important part of the United Nations System. It is able to serve as a centre for dialogue and international co-operation to promote social justice.

The tripartite structure of our Organisation allows the various parties to express their points of view at discussions, which reflect their own standpoints, so that they can reach decisions which balance out their divergent interests. The recognition of the principle of tripartism necessarily implies that we take into account developments which have taken place in the world and are still taking place in the world. The most recent constitutional amendments are a step in this direction. Their entry into force will further improve the effectiveness of this Organisation.

Our meeting is taking place under favourable auspices. As far as the international scene is concerned, we are undoubtedly observing a change for the better. These days, our eyes are turned towards Moscow, as we await the results of the discussions between General-Secretary Gorbachev and President Reagan. They are discussing matters of fundamental importance to the future of mankind; particularly at stake is the securing of peace which is necessary for the efficient working of this Organisation. Peace will also free resources, through disarmament thus providing us with the opportunities to take social and political decisions in the interest of mankind. The treaty concerning the elimination of intermediate and short-range missiles and the negotiations concerning the 50 per cent reduction of strategic weapons are therefore of particular importance.

In all parts of the world, enormous efforts are being made to find solutions to regional conflicts through negotiation. The signing of the agreements on Afghanistan were the result of an attitude of realism and conciliation. The subsequent implementation of the agreement signed in Geneva may undeniably serve as an example for the solution of all other regional problems.

This applies also to the Middle East. The Director-General quite rightly points out in his Report that we must find some way of finally bringing peace and human rights to this region of the world.

I have come to Geneva with the firm conviction that this Conference has everything in its power to reap the benefits of the present positive trends in international relations in order to develop co-operation in the interest of mankind and to make a contribution to the improvement of the international situation.

Dialogue and a readiness to reach an agreement are also necessary if we do not wish our future to be overshadowed by the global problems faced by mankind.

The challenges facing us at the end of this twentieth century are not merely of national or regional scope but are also global. The International Labour Organisation is similarly confronted with these challenges. We are becoming increasingly aware of the interdependency of our world and the global problems which affect us all.

I feel a particular responsibility in being President of a Conference in which the main subject under discussion is human rights. As a representative of a State whose stated maxim is a continuous improvement of working and living conditions, I have high expectations of the discussion of this question of human rights.

I think I am speaking on behalf of you all if I thank the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Blanchard, for his interesting report Human rights – A common responsibility.

This Report contains pointers to the future and also valuable suggestions. I see this as a very worthy contribution on the part of our Organisation to the fortieth anniversary of the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights by the United Nations General Assembly in 1948.

The traditions of our Organisation with respect to human rights are well known. The International Labour Organisation has done a great deal to help codify international law to represent the interests of workers and to support its member States in this area.

As a representative of a State whose emergence was closely bound up with the defeat of fascism, I would like to stress that the Universal Declaration of Human Rights does justice to the very close connection which exists between the guaranteeing of human rights and peaceful coexistence. It is certainly no coincidence that the Declaration of Philadelphia, which guides us all in our work, is also based on the inalienable link which exists between social justice and peace, and in fact the maintenance of world peace is the fundamental prerequisite for the implementation of basic human rights and human freedoms.

The Director-General, in his Report, quite rightly points out that the International Labour Organisation has a very specific responsibility as regards the promotion of human rights in the context of the United Nations. By this, I mean that this forum which has been described as the world parliament of labour, is under the supreme obligation to work indefatigably to make sure that all people can work, live and develop their personality in dignity. Work which plays a useful role in society has always been and remains the foundation upon which intrinsic human forces are built and herein lies the key to human progress. It is quite clear that mass unemployment, which now affects large parts of the world is – and here I would like to quote the Director-General – “a tragic waste” of human resources and “a wasted opportunity for development and social progress”. Apart from this, the guaranteeing of the right to work is an important prerequisite for the exercise of other human rights: work is the basis for freedom, dignity, economic security and equality of opportunity.

I should like to give my wholehearted support to the Director-General's statement that the question is not whether full employment should remain a central goal, but how it can be attained. Of course, there is no universal panacea for this problem which would be valid for all societies and all times. It would be unrealistic to expect the ILO on its own to find a solution to a problem of this magnitude. The various States themselves must play their part in this area.

In a deteriorating world economic situation, the developing countries are confronted with particularly serious problems, in particular those connected with employment. It is well known how they are losing their resources, how they are suffering from an immense foreign debt. The High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment in November of last year brought this out very clearly. I believe that we must all be involved in overcoming the acute and complicated problems of the developing countries and in trying to eliminate underdevelopment. The developing countries are quite right to expect the International Labour Organisation to make an even more tangible contribution to the solution of this problem, in particular in the context of effective technical co-operation.

We have a golden opportunity to tackle this problem of employment, especially in the developing countries, because rural employment promotion is a priority item on the agenda of this Conference.

One of the major areas of the activities of the International Labour Organisation is the preparation of international labour Conventions and Recommendations; 166 Conventions and 174 Recommendations bear witness to the intensive efforts made by the International Labour Organisation to achieve social progress and to improve working and living conditions.

Our Conference is going to continue this work with the preparation of instruments concerning employment promotion and social security, as well as safety and health in construction.

The partial revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107), takes up questions which are of great significance for about 300 million people in this category.

The Conventions adopted by the International Labour Organisation are without any doubt important instruments for the improvement of working and living conditions of workers and for the improvement of their social security.

We all know that when States ratify Conventions they assume the responsibility for implementing the appropriate standards. This year, as in every previous year, we are to have a special committee to deal with the application of ILO Conventions. A country which has freely chosen to ratify a Convention must also ask itself how and whether it is going to implement the Convention; that is quite normal. Any possible disputes with regard to the implementation of standards must always be based on the principles of constructive co-operation. All those who participate in such discussions must be aware of their responsibility to express differences in such a way as to promote the application of the Convention and respect the rights of peoples to a free choice of their social relationships and structure; all this is in the interest of peaceful international co-operation.

The Tripartite Conference on Action against Apartheid that was held in Harare in May this year has provided the International Labour Conference with a proposed updated Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia for discussion and adoption. Everyone knows that the International Labour Organisation in the past has made an important contribution to the struggle against apartheid. It is now a question of further strengthening the capacity of this Organisation to make an effective commitment to the anti-apartheid struggle.

In order that this Conference can fulfil its tasks, it is obviously necessary for there to be very close co-operation amongst us. In carrying out the duties inherent in the office with which you have entrusted me, I see it as my responsibility to continue with tried and tested traditions, whilst having an open mind to new ideas and drawing on collective wisdom. I shall always turn to advice from the Vice-Presidents and the Chairmen of the Committees and the delegations. I am quite convinced that I shall receive your support in this, working in a spirit of dialogue and co-operation, so that we might all contribute to the success of the Conference.

In conclusion, I would like to refer to the wisdom of the great thinker, Saint Simon, who lived in this city of Geneva. He told his contemporaries how fine it was to be able to work for the wellbeing of mankind. Let this be the spirit in which we approach our work.

(The Conference adjourned at 11.15 a.m.)

Credentials

Brief report by Mr. M.V. Russomano, Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, on the credentials of delegates and advisers to the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference, Geneva, 31 May 1988

The Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office has the honour to present the customary report prescribed by article 26 of the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference.

The composition of each delegation and the method of appointment of delegates and advisers to the sessions of the International Labour Conference are governed by article 3 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation.

In accordance with paragraphs 8 and 9 of this article, it is for the governments to communicate to the International Labour Office the nominations made. The Conference examines these nominations and decides, in the case of dispute, whether delegates and advisers have been nominated in accordance with article 3 of the Constitution.

The Conference exercises this power in accordance with the procedure laid down in articles 5 and 26 of its Standing Orders.

In particular, paragraph 2 of article 26 of the Standing Orders of the Conference provides that "a brief report upon these credentials, drawn up by the Chairman of the Governing Body, shall, with the credentials, be open to inspection by the delegates on the day before the opening of the session of the Conference and shall be published as an appendix to the record of the first sitting".

The present report is submitted in compliance with this provision. The list given in the table below was closed on 31 May 1988 at 10 a.m. in order that it might be available for inspection by the members of the delegations that same day, that is, the day before the opening of the Conference.

In addition, the present report serves for fixing provisionally, in accordance with paragraph 1(2) of article 20 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the quorum necessary to give validity to the votes taken.

The table below, based on the files containing the names of the delegates and advisers and the credentials with which they have been provided or the official communications transmitted to the International Labour Office, shows the numerical composition of the Conference. It is to be noted in this regard that persons who have been nominated both as substitute delegates and as advisers, in the letters communicating the nominations, have been included among the advisers.

To date, 115 States have notified the names of the members of the delegations. It is to be noted that only 53 countries deposited the credentials of their delegations with the International Labour Office before 17 May, that is within the 15-day deadline before the date fixed for the opening of the Conference, in compliance with paragraph 1 of article 26 of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

On the other hand, while the Conference and the Credentials Committee have already previously insisted on the obligation which article 3 of the Constitution imposes on governments requiring them to send complete delegations to the Conference, one country (Guinea) has only nominated Government delegates, one country (Somalia) has nominated a Workers' delegate but no Employers' delegate and one country (Algeria) has nominated an Employers' delegate but no Workers' delegate.

It should be noted, finally, that in the letters or telegrams communicating their nominations, a certain number of governments have not mentioned the employers' and workers' organisations which they have consulted and with which they have come to an agreement in appointing Employers' and Workers' delegates in accordance with paragraph 5 of article 3 of the Constitution of the Organisation. In this regard, in order to ensure greater clarity in establishing the credentials, it would be advisable that governments use, for the nomination of delegates and advisers, the form annexed to the memorandum on the Conference which the Office addresses every year to member States.

Finally, I should like to urge delegates and advisers to register in person at the Information and Reception Desk, the quorum being calculated on the basis of the number of delegates registered.

Composition of the Conference and quorum

At present 228 Government delegates, 114 Employers' delegates and 114 Workers' delegates – a total of 456 delegates – are accredited to the Conference.

There are, in addition, 561 Government advisers, 250 Employers' advisers and 320 Workers' advisers – a total of 1,131 advisers.

The total number of delegates and advisers who have been nominated in conformity with the provisions of the Constitution of the Organisation to take part in the work of the Conference is 1,587.

Since one State has nominated a Workers' but not an Employers' delegate and one State has nominated an Employers' but not a Workers' delegate, two non-Government delegates are left out of account in the calculation of the quorum.

Since four of the States¹ now represented are in arrears in the payment of their contributions to the Organisation, those States, under the terms of paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution may not at present participate in the voting in the Conference or any of its committees. Account is therefore not taken of a further 16 delegates in calculating the quorum.

In conformity with article 17 of the Constitution of the Organisation and with article 20 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the necessary quorum to give a vote validity will provisionally be 219.

Observers

On the invitation of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, Bermuda and the Republic of Korea have appointed tripartite observer delegations and the Holy See has appointed observers to the Conference.

Organisations and liberation movements invited

The Conference is also being attended by:

- representative of the United Nations and some of its organs, invited by virtue of Article II, paragraph 1 - relating to reciprocal representation - of the Agreement between the United Nations and the International Labour Organisation, which came into effect on 14 December 1946;

- representatives of specialised agencies and other official international organisations, invited in conformity with Article 2, paragraph 3 (b), of the Standing Orders of the Conference;
- representatives of non-governmental international organisations with which consultative relations have been established, invited in conformity with Article 2, paragraph 3 (j), of the Standing Orders of the Conference;
- representatives of other non-governmental international organisations also invited in conformity with Article 2, paragraph 3 (j), of the Standing Orders of the Conference;
- representatives of liberation movements invited in conformity with Article 2, paragraph 3 (k), of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

A list of these representatives is appended to the List of Delegations published as a Supplement to the Provisional Record of the Conference.

Provisional Record

Seventy-fifth Session, Geneva, 1988

Third sitting

Thursday, 2 June 1988, 11.15 a.m.

President: Mr. Beyreuther

FIRST REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

Interpretation from German: THE PRESIDENT – The first item on this morning's agenda is the first report of the Selection Committee. I call on Mr. Vargas, Government delegate, Nicaragua, Chairman of the Selection Committee, to submit the report to the Conference.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. VARGAS (Government delegate, Nicaragua; Chairman of the Selection Committee) – I have the honour of submitting to the Conference the first report of the Selection Committee, which will be found in Provisional Record, No. 5. This report refers, in the first place, to the election of the Officers of the Committee and contains proposals concerning the setting up and composition of committees of the Conference.

The Selection Committee considered also the numerical composition of the committees which it recommends should be set up. As far as the numerical composition indicated on the first page of the report is concerned, certain corrections should be made in it which I will now give:

- Committee on Safety and Health in Construction: the total number of members should be 141 (67 Government members, 32 Employers' members and 42 Workers' members);
- Committee on Employment and Social Security: the total number of members should be 184 (71 Government members, 52 Employers' members and 61 Workers' members);
- Committee on Convention No. 107: the total number of members should be 74 (41 Government members, 10 Employers' members and 23 Workers' members);
- Committee on Rural Employment: the total number of members should be 128 (63 Government members, 25 Employers' members and 40 Workers' members);
- Resolutions Committee: the total number of members should be 218 (85 Government members, 60 Employers' members and 73 Workers' members).

The Committee made proposals concerning the composition of the Credentials Committee and also made recommendations to the Conference concerning the composition of the Drafting Committee of the Conference.

As regards the examination of the reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General, the Committee decided that the discussion should begin today, Thursday 2 June, and that the list of speakers should be closed on Wednesday, 8 June, at 6 p.m. The Conference may wish to note that it is recommended that the documents on programme implementation in 1986-87 and on the Medium-Term Plan 1990-95 should be taken up during the discussion in question.

The Committee recommends to the Conference to urge those of its members which will take part in the discussion of the report of the Governing Body and the Report of the Director-General to abide strictly by the provisions of the Conference Standing Orders concerning the duration of speeches in plenary, which may, in no case, exceed 15 minutes as is the custom in this Conference. The Committee also proposes that the Conference should urge delegates to focus their statements on the Reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General and the activities of the International Labour Organisation.

May I draw the attention of members of the Conference to the suggestions and proposals made in the report concerning the quorum, punctuality and negotiations in committees, which have been put forward to facilitate the work of the Conference.

With regard to the participation in Conference committees of members which have lost the right to vote, the Selection Committee noted that the Governing Body had recommended that the practice followed by Government members in the previous year should be maintained, namely that they should not apply to be regular members of committees if they did not at the time in question have the right to vote. The Selection Committee recommends to the Conference that if, for any reason, this method is not followed fully, the weighting coefficients for votes in committees should be calculated on the basis of the number of regular Government members entitled to vote.

In another recommendation the Committee proposes that certain non-governmental international organisations be invited to be represented at the Conference and on some of its committees.

Finally, the Committee endorsed the general plan of work for the committees of the Conference, which, although it is not mandatory, would make it possible for the committees to organise their activities so as to take into account as far as possible the needs and possibilities of the Conference as a whole. The Committee took note, in particular, of the fact that the President of the Government of Spain, Mr. Felipe González, will address the Conference on Tuesday, 7 June, and that the President of the Republic of the Philippines, Mrs. Corazón Aquino, will also speak at the Conference on the following Tuesday, 14 June.

I recommend to the Conference that this report be approved.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – I now submit the first report of the Selection Committee to the Conference for discussion. If there are no objections, I take it that the report is adopted?

(The report is adopted.)

RATIFICATION OF THE INSTRUMENT FOR THE AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANISATION, 1986

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – I have pleasure in informing the Conference that the Director-General of the International Labour Office has registered the ratification by Mozambique of the Instrument for the Amendment of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation, 1986.

This brings the total number of ratifications and acceptances of the Instrument of Amendment to 36.

SUBMISSION OF THE ANNUAL REPORT OF THE GOVERNING BODY TO THE CONFERENCE BY THE CHAIRMAN OF THE GOVERNING BODY

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – The next item on the agenda is the submission of the annual report of the Governing Body to the Conference. I call on Mr. Russomano, Chairman of the Governing Body of the ILO, to submit the report.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. RUSSOMANO (Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office) – As Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office it is my duty to submit to you the report which the Governing Body submits to the Conference every year. This report covers the work carried out by the Governing Body at its 237th Session, which was held in June 1987 immediately after the 73rd Session of the Conference, and at its November 1987 and February-March 1988 sessions.

As the 240th Session concluded only a few days ago, the report contained in Provisional Record No. 4 does not cover the deliberations of that session. For this reason I will briefly summarise the main discussions and decisions that were taken at that session, at the cost perhaps of oversimplifying some of the interesting and important information that has been collected by the secretariat of the Organisation.

In spite of my intention to be brief, I must discuss in some detail the financial situation in which the Organisation finds itself as it nears the end of the first six months of the 1988-89 biennium; there is reason for grave preoccupation because of the continuing depreciation of the dollar with respect to the Swiss franc and the fact that certain member States, among them some of the major contributors, are not paying their contributions on time or in full, owing to well-known internal financial constraints. You will remember that when the Conference adopted the Programme and Budget for this biennium in June 1987, it fixed a budgetary exchange rate of 1.60 Swiss francs to the dollar. This rate, however, did not prove realistic: the dollar remained below this level during the first five months of 1988, prompting the Director-General to offer proposals to the Governing Body in May of this year which aimed at compensating the ensuing budgetary deficit.

After much discussion, and subject to the discrepancies and reservations expressed by certain governments, the Governing Body agreed to propose to the Conference that the rate of exchange be altered from 1.60 to 1.43 Swiss francs to the dollar, and consequently to add 26 million dollars to Part IV of the budget, with the understanding that additional shortfalls resulting from a further deterioration in the dollar's rate of exchange vis-à-vis the revised budgetary rate of exchange would entail adjustments to the Programme and Budget for 1988-89.

At the same time the Governing Body agreed to propose that as an exceptional measure, and as provided in Financial Regulations, the reimbursement to the Working Capital Fund in 1989 be reduced by an additional 5 million dollars, for a total of 10 million dollars, thereby decreasing in a corresponding amount the additional contributions requested of member States for this purpose.

The Governing Body submits to the Conference for its examination a resolution and a proposal for a decision on these questions.

For some time now, the Governing Body has examined the possibility of adopting measures aimed at protecting the finances of the ILO against the negative consequences of fluctuating rates of exchange, and introducing an element of stability and certainty in forecasts of the income available to the Organisation, without the need to make additional financial demands on member States. In May 1988 the Governing Body examined a document prepared by the Office relating to long-term strategy as regards rates of exchange; after identifying the various alternatives, the Office proposed to introduce a system based on pro rata contributions in Swiss francs, coupled with the forward purchase of dollars needed. After a lengthy discussion the Governing Body in principle supported the introduction in 1990-91 of a pro rata system in Swiss francs, and the forward purchase of dollars needed for the biennium. Moreover, the Governing Body agreed that a final decision on the subject would not be taken until its 241st Session in November 1988, on the basis of a more detailed proposal to be submitted by the Director-General.

While the measures that I have just outlined are intended to improve the financial situation of the Organisation in the immediate future and in the long term, the capacity of the Office to carry out the programmes approved by the Organisation for the current biennium as well as those for the Medium-Term Plan for 1990-95, which was submitted to you for your information at this session of the Conference, will depend entirely on the willingness of the member States to fulfil their financial obligations to the ILO.

I would like also to refer very briefly to some important discussions and decisions of the Governing Body's most recent session.

The Governing Body first of all examined in a preliminary way the proposals for the agenda of the 77th Session of the Conference of 1990. The final decisions will be taken in November of this year.

The proposals submitted cover the following five points: working conditions in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments; protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer; revision of the Appendix of the Merchant Shipping (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 147); promotion of self-employment – general discussion; preventing and reducing drug and alcohol problems in working and in social life – general discussion.

As a result of an exchange of points of view, the Governing Body decided to ask the Director-General to provide, in November 1988, reports on legislation and practice as well as proposals in greater detail on all the five subjects that I have just mentioned.

Apart from the very important financial questions connected with the rate of exchange for the budget, the Governing Body also looked at a number of other financial and administrative, as well as personnel questions, through its Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee. It took note of a detailed report on the implementation of the programme for the biennium 1986-87. It took note of the financial statements for the 60th budget period 1986-87, which was submitted to the Conference for examination and adoption. It also took note of information concerning the regular budget for 1988-89, and lastly, the position of the Working Capital Fund. It also reviewed the activities of the Turin Centre as reflected in the report of the Centre and approved the recognition of the jurisdiction of the ILO Administrative Tribunal by INTERPOL. It also took note of the report of the second meeting of the special subgroup concerning the banking services of the ILO which was set up last year at the request of the Committee on Apartheid of the Conference, for the purpose of studying possibilities other than the present banking facilities. The Committee on Apartheid was informed of the results of that Working Party.

Through the Committee on Industrial Activities, the Governing Body examined requests that were pending to set up new industrial committees, either joint committees or similar committees, and it decided to set up a Working Party that is to start its work in November 1988 and which will study the present structure of the Industrial Committees. It agreed to postpone until after the end of that exercise the seventh general examination concerning the composition of the industrial and analogous committees.

On the recommendation of the Committee, the Governing Body decided on the priority and agenda of the main industrial committees as well as less important industrial meetings that will be on the programme for 1990-91. It decided to implement the resolutions and conclusions that had been adopted by the Third Tripartite Technical Meeting for the Clothing Industry. It examined the report of the Tripartite Meeting on Salaried Authors and Inventors and invited the Director-General to invite a number of non-governmental organisations to be present at the Industrial Committees that will be held in the last quarter of 1988.

On the basis of the report of the Committee on Standing Orders and the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, the Governing Body approved the report forms for the four Conventions adopted in October 1987 at the 74th (Maritime) Session of the International Labour Conference.

Through the Committee on Discrimination it examined in depth matters connected with apartheid which are especially important in the agenda of this Conference.

Before concluding, I should like to express my gratitude to the Director-General and his assistants, as well as to all members of the Governing Body and, in particular, to Mr. Oechslin and Mr. Muhr, who are the Employer and Worker Vice-Chairmen of the Governing Body, respectively, for their co-operation and for the advice and help which I received from them. This has greatly facilitated my task as Chairman of the Governing Body, but what is even more significant, it was a proof once more of the harmony and the equilibrium which exists between the ILO and the Governing Body, and in the second place, between the members of the Governing Body, and in the third place – last but not least – between the three Groups which make up the ILO and which, as a consequence of tripartism, reflect all the efforts of this Organisation towards the brotherhood that should prevail in the present world.

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL : DISCUSSION

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – I thank the Chairman of the Governing Body and all the members for this annual report which has just been submitted to us and would like to remind you that the discussion of this report and that of the Director-General will start at this afternoon's meeting. I should like to take advantage of the time available to us to make the following statement on behalf of the officers of the Conference. This statement refers to the principles which we propose to apply in guiding this discussion.

These principles will be applied with the greatest possible uniformity to all speeches made by any speaker in the Conference. The principles by which we shall be guided were first established by the Working Party on the Programme and Structure of the ILO and approved by the Governing Body and communicated to the Conference in 1967. You will find these principles in articles 54 to 58 of the report of the Governing Body, which are reproduced in the Memorandum on the 73rd Session of the International Labour Conference. No doubt you all have a copy of this Memorandum. It is a duty for the Officers of the Conference to draw the attention of all delegates to paragraph 58 in particular, which reads as follows: "In periods of acute political tension the ILO has a twofold responsibility – to uphold the values of human freedom and dignity enshrined in its Constitution, and to circumscribe rather than extend the area of international tension by ensuring the fullest possible degree of continued co-operation in pursuit of the objectives of the ILO. Every delegate to the Conference therefore has an obligation to ensure that the Conference does not lose sight of them."

In bringing this particular paragraph to your attention I am discharging that obligation. In full agreement with the Officers and on their behalf as well as yours, I appeal to all delegates to co-operate with us in applying these principles. In particular, we hope that every delegate will recognise that the Officers of the Conference are responsible for ensuring that these principles are observed. My colleagues and I are determined to shoulder this responsibility in all circumstances.

Freedom of expression is a vital feature of the International Labour Organisation. However, in order to exercise this right in a spirit of mutual respect, we all have to accept a certain amount of discipline if we want our work to be carried on in an appropriate way and be crowned with success. It is the duty of the President of the sitting to ensure that these principles are respected, and the Officers of the Conference will not hesitate to intervene in this connection. In particular if there are offensive or insulting remarks made about a member State, particularly any Head of State or Government or if personal insults are directed at any other delegate, the President will intervene immediately.

At the Conference, all delegates should use parliamentary language and respect the accepted procedure, refer only to the items under discussion and avoid raising any question alien to these matters.

It is important that every delegate who wishes to make a reply to a statement should refrain from asking for the floor by raising a point of order. What he should do is to inform the President of the sitting before that sitting finishes that he wishes to exercise his right to reply. A request for a right of reply should be addressed to the Officers during the sitting in which the government or delegation considers that it should exercise its right to reply. These requests should be transmitted to the President through the secretariat and not through asking for the floor at the sitting.

I wish to refer to the practice with regard to the exercise of the right to reply. The reply should refer only to the point under debate. It should be brief (i.e. not more than two or three minutes) and should not give rise to any further remarks. Lastly, it should be couched in correct and parliamentary language.

I wish furthermore to refer to the recommendation made in the first report of the Selection Committee, according to which the Conference invites all delegates participating in the discussion on the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General to respect strictly the provisions of the Standing Orders with the respect to the maximum length of speeches and to concentrate their remarks on these reports and on the activities of the International Labour Conference. I recall that under the terms of article 14, paragraph 6, of the Standing Orders of the Conference it is stated that: "Except with the special consent of the Conference, no speech, whether by a delegate, a visiting minister, an observer or a representative of an international organisation, shall exceed 15 minutes". The time available to the Conference for the examination of its agenda is very short. It is therefore imperative that these provisions be strictly respected. All delegates and ministers attending the Conference will no doubt wish to take into account, in preparing their remarks, this limit of 15 minutes laid down in the Standing Orders, so that the President will not be obliged to withdraw the right to speak from a speaker before he has finished his speech.

May I remind you that, in accordance with practice, the Officers and President organise the general discussion. In particular, it is up to the President to ensure respect for the principles and provisions of the Standing Orders to which I have just referred.

In order to fulfil this responsibility, we shall make use of all the prerogatives conferred upon us by the mandate with which you have entrusted us. We thank you in advance for your help and collaboration in ensuring the proper conduct and success of the Conference.

(The Conference adjourned at 11.45 a.m.)

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – The first item on the agenda this afternoon is the discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Mr. OKONDO (Minister for Labour, Kenya) – Mr. President, on behalf of my delegation and on my own behalf, please allow me to take this opportunity to congratulate you, together with the other Officers of the Conference, on your well-deserved election to guide the deliberations of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. My delegation wishes this session of the Conference every possible success.

My delegation also wishes to take this opportunity to thank the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Francis Blanchard, for the very valuable visit that he paid to Kenya last year to attend the Kenya Federation of Employers/ILO Fourth Top Policy Workshop at Mombasa. The visit boosted the workshop which in turn was a great source of assistance to the Kenyan Government by confirming our conviction that in the long run unemployment can only be fought by investment in viable economic projects, and preferably in the private sector. Mr. Blanchard, you are most welcome to visit Kenya again.

Allow me now to turn to the 1988 Report of the Director-General. My delegation takes this opportunity to thank the Director-General for his most detailed and comprehensive report on the activities of the ILO for the year 1987. The Report, which is divided into two parts, has Part I devoted primarily to human rights, a common responsibility, and Part II deals with the Organisation's activities during the year 1987.

My delegation considers the choice of this year's theme of the Conference – human rights, a common responsibility – as most appropriate for the year 1988.

It is 40 years since the adoption of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights by the United Nations General Assembly. Kenya, as a member of the United Nations, is a party to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

This session of the Conference will provide an opportunity for the member States of the ILO to examine the most critical and urgent human rights issues and problems that may be affecting the world of labour today.

My delegation fully recognises that ILO activities are related, in one way or another, to human rights, since human rights is an integral part of the efforts to secure man's material well-being and spiritual development. My delegation also strongly believes that the promotion and protection of human rights is a continuing process that calls for the constant renewal of the ILO's commitment to the common standard of achievement set for all peoples and nations in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

While my delegation fully agrees with the Director-General's views as covered in Part I of his Report on all the issues, I still wish to highlight the following points.

On the subject of human rights, the ILO's record is truly outstanding. We have noted with appreciation the ILO's continued assistance to the freedom-fighters in South Africa and in Namibia. In South Africa the freedom-fighters have an inalienable right and duty to use any means to rid their country of the uncouth and abominable Nazi-style minority regime of apartheid and to establish a democratic government in its place.

It is most saddening to note that in South Africa a most barbaric police State controlled by an unholy White minority clique is allowed, and with the support of some great Powers, to continue to deprive the greater majority of the people there of their political, social, economic, legal and basic human rights, while the so-called "free" people of the world look on. My delegation condemns unequivocally the abhorrent and evil system of apartheid, a veritable crime against humanity, and the illegal occupation and control of Namibia, the constant aggression and destabilisation of the front-line and other neighbouring independent African States. In Namibia, SWAPO voices the legitimate aspirations of Namibians as expressed in United Nations resolution No. 435, but these demands fall on deaf ears as the major Powers continue to ignore the United Nations. But so did they ignore Hitler's Nazi Germany at a horrendous cost to the world.

While it is true that the denial of social justice and disregard of human rights, whether in South Africa, Namibia, the Middle East or anywhere else, constitutes a real danger to world peace, the ILO still stands stubbornly for universal and lasting peace based upon social justice. This is why Kenya fully subscribes to the very noble principles of this Organisation. Our own national philosophy of "Nyayo", which stands for peace, love and unity, as developed by His Excellency President Daniel Arap Moi, demonstrates clearly and practically our firm support for these noble principles. Kenya continues to re-affirm that the evil and inhuman policy of apartheid cannot be reformed; it must just be destroyed.

We shall continue to appeal to the international community to intensify its campaign for the total isolation of, and imposition of mandatory and comprehensive sanctions against, the Nazi-Style South African regime until the people both South Africa and Namibia are truly liberated from the evil system of apartheid. Those who oppose sanctions at present are unable to find any worthy alternative, while persuasion and pressure have failed miserably. The opposition to sanctions has now assumed the mantle of racism, leaving violence as the only legitimate alternative, no matter how unpleasant.

After all, we all know that in the end Hitler had to be destroyed by violence. So it may be in South Africa.

My delegation also notes with appreciation the recent ILO-sponsored Tripartite Conference on Action against Apartheid, which was held last month in Harare. That was yet another concrete step by the ILO in the fight against the evil regime of apartheid.

On the subject of freedom of association and the protection of the right to organise, my Government's declared labour policy has always been to encourage the formation of strong, independent and financially viable employers' as well as workers' organisations. The Government is satisfied that both the Kenya Federation of Employers and the Central Organisation of Trade Unions are sufficiently well organised and competent to enter into responsible and conclusive collective bargaining on terms and conditions of employment. They have also undertaken their due obligations and responsibilities to the total satisfaction of the Government of Kenya.

My delegation notes with appreciation that you have included in the agenda for this session of the Conference four major technical items. We note that employment promotion and social security, as well as safety and health in construction, are up for discussion for the second time with a view to adopting fully a new Convention and Recommendation to replace the labour standards adopted over 50 years ago.

My delegation believes that the creation of more employment and the alleviation of poverty remain the most daunting challenges facing the ILO today. For this reason my delegation feels that the scheduled general discussion on rural employment promotion is most timely, especially in that dynamic rural development remains crucial to progress towards reducing overall unemployment in the world.

In view of the important role that the ILO has continued to play in world affairs and in the promotion of human rights and advancement of social and economic justice in particular, Kenya will continue to give the ILO what moral and material support she can within her limited means and resources.

At this juncture, please allow me to extend my delegation's congratulations to the Government of the People's Republic of Poland for having taken a final decision to rescind its earlier notice of withdrawal from membership of the ILO. My delegation welcomes the above decision because the continued participation of Poland in the work of the ILO not only helps to preserve the universality of the Organisation but also opens the road for strengthened dialogue between the ILO and the Government, employers and workers of Poland.

Finally, the ILO as a tripartite organisation has a unique role to play in the promotion of social justice, industrial peace and stability. A great deal has been achieved. A great deal more remains to be done. My delegation would like to call upon all Members to continue supporting this worthy Organisation in its noble and difficult task of promoting social justice and improving the quality of life for the benefit of mankind in the years to come.

Interpretation from French: Mr. MARTENSON (Director-General of the United Nations Office in Geneva) – As United Nations Under-Secretary-General for Human Rights, it is most gratifying to me, indeed most encouraging, that human rights should be the theme of the International Labour Conference in 1988 since the whole world, this year, is celebrating the 40th anniversary of the adoption by the United Nations General Assembly of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Furthermore, it is entirely fitting that your Organisation should be hailed and recognised as one of the founders of the edifice which over several decades has been erected and expanded for the global definition and protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms. The Organisation of the United Nations, which has, under its Charter, a comprehensive mandate for the articulation of the whole spectrum of human rights and for ensuring respect therefor, pays tribute today to the pioneering work done by the ILO in this important field of its special competence. In 1948, that is to say the same year in which the Universal Declaration of Human Rights was being elaborated and approved, the ILO adopted one of its key trail-blazing human rights instruments, the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

This Convention is an impressive early result of the continuing undertaking to give concrete meaning and force to the words of one of the ILO's monumental and historic texts, the Declaration of Philadelphia, where it is stated that "all human beings, irrespective of race, creed or sex, have the right to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity".

As well as formulating and codifying those human rights falling within its specific constitutional purview, in particular the rights placed within the broad framework of gainful employment, favourable working conditions, equality of opportunity, trade union freedoms and liberties, social welfare, security and justice, the ILO also has devised and institutionalised implementation procedures and supervisory machinery which are acclaimed for their impartiality, thoroughness and effectiveness and which are as pragmatic as they are judicious.

The ILO has consistently been a precious contributor to the success of the task devolving upon the United Nations to endeavour to extend the frontiers of human rights and to spread their enjoyment ever more widely. Your Organisation should be commended for proving, through its outstanding performance, its belief in what your Director-General, Mr. Blanchard, so rightly indicated in the title of his Report to you, namely that the defence and solid entrenchment of human rights is a common and, I would add, an appropriately shared responsibility.

The community of concerns between the United Nations and the ILO stems not least from the relevant articles of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights: article 23 – the right to work, to equal pay for equal work, the right to just and favourable remuneration and the right to form and to join trade unions; article 22 – the right to social security; article 24 – the right to rest and leisure; article 25 – the right to a standard of living adequate for the health and well-being of the individual and of his or her family; and other relevant articles. I need hardly recall that one of the two international conventions which emanated from the Universal Declaration – the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights – gives a further elaboration and a juridical framework to these guiding principles. In this context, I would like to express particular appreciation to the constructive and productive participation of the ILO in the implementation of the Covenant.

Moreover, our joint efforts and activities encompass the widest range of shared objectives, including our endeavours with respect to migrant workers, the rights of indigenous labour, the combating of all types of discrimination and the delineation of the right to development. As the United Nations Co-ordination for the Second Decade against racism and racial discrimination, nominated by the Secretary-General, I would pay a special tribute to ILO for the strong support, it has given us in the ongoing struggle against the institutionalised practice of racial discrimination that is constituted by apartheid. The latest evidence of that support is the report before you from the Tripartite Conference on Action against Apartheid held in Harare and the work you are undertaking to update the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa and to strengthen its application.

Another example of our fruitful collaboration is the in-depth consideration by your Organisation of certain social and human rights aspects of adjustment policies in which several members of the United Nations system are involved. In completing this list of ILO achievements I would mention the remarkable inventiveness shown by the Organisation in constantly refining the conceptual basis of its mandated Human Rights Programme and in enriching its dimensions for the benefit of the workers, as well as of the less privileged sections of society.

The agenda at this session illustrates just such a tendency. For example, I would make special mention of the Conference's intention to pay particular attention to the observance of human rights standards in monitoring the application of the full range of ILO Conventions and Recommendations.

I would also refer to, and salute, your welcome decision to initiate the process of revising the 30-year-old Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107). It is a matter of ever-growing concern to the United Nations Human Rights Programme. Furthermore, your efforts to develop further the right to a safe working environment are indeed appreciated by all those engaged in the international human rights endeavour.

(The speaker continues in English.)

For the United Nations the promotion and protection of human rights constitute an overriding priority. The world Organisation is founded upon the ideals of equity and justice. The equal rights of men and women, of nations large and small, are explicitly affirmed by the Charter. Indeed, discrimination of any kind is forbidden as the negation of those cardinal principles. Moreover, the same guiding precepts place the assurance of individual rights as the cornerstone of the international society which the world Organisation aims to establish.

Today, looking back over more than four decades of endeavour to meet the aspirations expressed by the peoples of the United Nations in their Charter, I believe that it has been in the field of human rights that the world Organisation has made one of its major advances. It exceeded to a great extent the hopes that first took shape in San Francisco. While much remains to be done and violations of human rights continue to beset us each day, the principles have been accepted, the machinery is in place, and an undeniable momentum of human rights is under way.

We have come to recognise that human rights and fundamental freedoms are inherent to the nature of all human beings without any distinction as to their race, colour, sex, language or religion. They are essential to the fullest development and use of the qualities and potentials that characterise human beings and that have led to the creation of human civilisation.

Yet their relevance goes still further. Lack of respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms is not only a tragedy that directly affects individuals, it is also a primary cause of conditions that often result in the outbreak of violence and conflict affecting entire societies or even nations.

Indeed, it was with the memories of a devastating and cruel war fresh in their mind that the drafters of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights – those men and women of abiding vision such as Eleanor Roosevelt, René Cassin and Charles Malik – clearly affirmed in its Preamble “that recognition of the inherent dignity of the equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human family is the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world”.

The Declaration remains the beacon that lights our path today. Every effort is being made to utilise the opportunity afforded by the occasion of the anniversary year to highlight its importance for all peoples and societies regardless of their political and geographical differences. Our aim is to help generate a universal culture of human rights. An encouraging development in this context has been the United Nations General Assembly decision to request its Secretary-General to prepare a report on the feasibility of a world-wide campaign on human rights which we will present to the Assembly's forthcoming session this autumn.

It is axiomatic that people must be aware of their rights before any real progress can be expected toward the universal realisation of fundamental rights and freedoms. The role of information and education must therefore constitute an intrinsic part of our endeavours. Communication is the heart, the catalyst and the foundation of human rights. The objective of extending and broadening the “outreach” of the United Nations Human Rights Programme has indeed been a priority concern of mine since assuming responsibility last year for this activity. It was with this aim in mind that I established a new Section for External Relations in the context of restructuring the Centre for Human Rights, which will enhance our co-operation with that wider human rights community comprising the academic world, foundations and research institutions, the concerned media and non-governmental organisations. The latter's role in the international endeavours for the promotion and protection of human rights hardly needs to be emphasised and is indeed crucial to the success of the Human Rights Programme. Furthermore, the new section will help to generate public understanding and knowledge of human rights through a much increased programme of publications both for the Universal Declaration anniversary year and beyond, and through other activities in the spheres of information and education.

A second focus of our restructuring efforts is the provision of advisory services and technical assistance. It is my conviction that governments which are striving to meet the human rights aspirations of their citizens must be able to count upon international support and solidarity. In the final analysis it is a strong national system which is the true bulwark against human rights violations. Moreover, by assisting in laying the foundations of national institutions and mechanisms for human rights, we may contribute to the prevention of violations before they occur.

It is in this spirit that I have moved to strengthen the relevant section within the Centre for Human Rights and that we presented, at the latest session of the Commission on Human Rights, a detailed outline of activities encompassing the provision of expert advice, fellowships, training courses, seminars and other activities. The response proved most gratifying, with support expressed by all regions. The very recent establishment of a voluntary fund in this crucial sector is equally a most heartening development, as in the past too many requests for assistance have gone unmet for lack of funds.

The establishment or the strengthening of national infrastructures for the protection and promotion of human rights thus constitutes an essential priority. As one non-governmental organisation put it, such work is not the most dramatic element of our programme, but in the long term it may prove to be amongst the most enduring and valuable. We have already held extremely useful training courses for national officials in the administration of justice and the implementation of international human rights instruments this year and numerous other such courses, expert assistance and technical help are being organised in all regions of the world, taking into account the requests received and the need expressed or perceived.

These two aspects of our human rights programme which I have singled out for your special attention – advisory services and an enhanced international outreach – form an intrinsic part of the overall human rights structure, as I conceive it. Our endeavours are framed in a triangular relationship between the three poles of legislation, implementation and information. The legislative process has scored outstanding achievements since the adoption of the International Covenants emanating from the Universal Declaration. That process is not over: just last year we witnessed the coming into force of a new and most significant international instrument, the Convention against Torture. But the emphasis must lie increasingly upon implementation, whether internationally through the monitoring and control mechanisms or at the national level, where we can assist with advisory services. And, ultimately, the success of the International Human Rights Programme may well depend upon the provision of information and education. While human rights violations and abuses thrive in darkness and silence, information and the knowledge of the Universal Declaration's principles and precepts provide a light to chase away the shadows.

In conclusion, I would recall the high priority attached by the Secretary-General Javier Pérez de Cuéllar to the attainment of universal acceptance of human rights instruments. The Secretary-General uses every opportunity to encourage governments to consider adhering to human rights instruments that they have not yet ratified. Indeed, an ever-widening adherence to the international standards which first took shape in the Declaration would give true meaning to its 40th anniversary and a fresh impetus toward the universal realisation of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

The struggle for human rights is a challenge shared by all the members of the United Nations system. The principles at stake are truly fundamental to our joint endeavours. The international society of equity, security, justice and economic and social progress which we strive to attain must be squarely based upon the conditions of dignity and human rights set out in the Universal Declaration. In this system-wide and global undertaking, I know that all the members of the United Nations family will work ever more closely together and I salute the enduring achievements of the ILO in our common quest.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. FRANCO MORAN (Vice-Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, Guatemala) – On behalf of the Government of Guatemala I would like to congratulate Mr. Beyreuther on his election to presidency of this session of the Conference. His election guarantees the success of the work of this Conference.

I would also like to congratulate the Director-General for his Report entitled Human rights – A common responsibility, which addresses an essential problem of humanity. We share the opinion of the Director-General when he says that: "Failing the requisite action, we must expect the world's economic and social stability to come under increasing strain, as the gap continues to widen between the wealthy few and the masses living in deprivation and despair. In such a setting human rights, democracy and peace itself would be at risk."

All the topics covered in the Director-General's Report are of grave concern to the Government of Guatemala.

The history of Guatemala's independence has been marred by authoritarian regimes and violations of human rights.

From the start, this legacy impelled the present Government to take effective measures to promote the education of our population so that everyone would become aware of what it means to live in a democracy; this implies a wholehearted and a positive approach to human rights. We fully agree with the Director-General when he states: "Nor will progress towards the realisation of human rights take place as a matter of course. It calls for changes in social relationships and the reconciling of conflicting interests, generally attainable only after prolonged debate and political struggle." Guatemala is in the process of democratisation, which implies the political will to promote, develop and attain a broad consensus through intense consultations with the most representative organisations of workers and employers.

The Government of Guatemala subscribes unreservedly to the capital importance attached by the ILO to freedom of association. We are profoundly convinced of the accuracy of the observations of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations as regards Guatemala and the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87). In this connection, the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare, with the valuable advice of the ILO, has undertaken a review of the current Labour Code. International advisers, as well as representatives of all organisations of employers and trade union confederations, universities, lawyers' associations and the Committee on Labour of the Congress of the Republic participated in a seminar under the guidance of the Ministry of Labour. The seminar led to the setting up of a tripartite commission presided by the Minister of Labour, entrusted with the task of receiving even the most general proposals from each and every sector concerning possible amendments or derogations of current labour standards, on the enactment of new standards. Our objective is to submit to the Congress of the Republic this very year, a Bill which will take into account the work of the tripartite commission and faithfully reflect the objective conditions in the country, as well as the interests of all parties, and perhaps include theoretical and scientific advances in the field of labour, and reflect international labour standards adopted at the various sessions of this Conference.

For many years, Guatemala remained isolated from the international community, as evidenced by its failure to ratify countless Conventions.

The current administration has decided to analyse those Conventions in the light of national and international conditions and their political, legal, economic and social implications, and to work for the ratification of all Conventions which tend to modernise labour legislation and promote national development. As a result of this deliberate policy, we expect our Congress shortly to ratify 19 Conventions.

We know that the mere ratification of a Convention is not enough to fulfil the obligations stipulated in the ILO Constitution. We therefore wish to emphasise that the present Government has the firm political will to ensure that all standards presently in force are generally observed.

The Government of Guatemala has set itself an essential national objective: to construct a genuinely democratic system of popular participation, through which the nation will be able to solve basic economic and social problems. We have chosen the path of peace and the establishment of a political movement which will involve all sectors of our society in the search for solutions to be applied not only at the national but also at the regional level.

The establishment of the system we have set as our target necessarily implies a series of steps. In our situation the democratic process starts with carrying out free elections of political leaders, and culminates with the creation of institutions which will make it possible to build a fair and democratic society.

We believe that we cannot make economic or social progress, or create a democratic society, without a politically and socially stable basis.

In 28 months much progress has been achieved, but we cannot yet say that we have reached our goal. Concertation and dialogue with all sectors has been our method: relentless search for new solutions to deal with national problems and the implementation of concrete measures to find formulas which will relegate social injustice to the annals of history. This is what we have done to defend the rule of law; strict compliance with the law is our standard of conduct.

We have made considerable progress on the path to democracy.

In accordance with this essential political orientation, the present leadership of the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare has, since it assumed office last October, paid special attention to defining a strategy, a policy, and short, middle and long-term actions which are described in a document entitled "Labour and social welfare policies".

In strategy, as well as in policy and action, the Ministry attaches special importance to freedom of association and collective bargaining. Although we maintain that the Constitution of the Republic has tacitly derogated a series of secondary standards relating to freedom of association, we believe that from the political point of view, an express derogation is essential, and we are prepared to accomplish this through the partial or total reform of current legislation.

As regards collective bargaining, one of the difficulties we encounter is that in most undertakings there are no trade unions. The present administration, which places a fundamental importance on concertation, is fully convinced of the need to assist the workers in their efforts to organise. The employers are organised and, in an opinion, are prepared to engage in collective bargaining. The workers, now, must organise, and the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare, in keeping with its duty to protect workers, is ready to assist them.

Mr. ABUBAKAR UMAR (Minister of Employment, Labour and Productivity, Nigeria) – Before I venture to comment on the Director-General's Report, Human rights – A common responsibility, permit me to associate myself with earlier speakers in congratulating you, Sir, on your election as President of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. Your election virtually by acclamation to this exalted office, represents a historic triumph for democracy and human rights as a whole, as well as an incontrovertible proof of members' explicit confidence in your ability and wealth of experience to steer the deliberations of this Conference to a happy and fruitful conclusion. While congratulating the President and the other officers elected, it is appropriate, indeed compelling, to pay tribute to the untiring efforts of the Director-General, Mr. Blanchard, the Deputy Director-General, Mr. Kane, and their dedicated supporting staff, without whom the decisions of the ILO would merely remain on paper. I congratulate them all. I believe that I will be echoing the thoughts of my colleagues if I pray that Mr. Bayreuther's election will mark the beginning of a new era; an era when, with competence, integrity, dedication and loyalty to the ideals of this Organisation, every member can seriously aspire to this high position without suffering any disadvantage on account of colour, creed, geographical location or any accident of history.

Once again, and for the 75th time, the "World Parliament of Labour" that is, the International Labour Conference, is convening to discuss, in addition to its standard items, the specific issues of safety and health in construction, employment promotion and social security, the partial revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107), rural employment promotion and the vexed question of apartheid. It is clear to my delegation that the task before us is enormous and to make a success of it, the ILO, its members and agencies will have to double their efforts, reiterate their commitments, continue to build bridges of true and lasting understanding and better appreciate the specific characteristics of member States. I believe that the ILO's ultimate ability to succeed in its objectives is closely bound up with its proper understanding of what really is at stake in the member States.

The Director-General's Report centres on human rights simply put, these connote the rights of each individual human being to personal freedom, justice, full and gainful employment, just and favourable remuneration as well as favourable conditions of work, social security, freedom of association and equal opportunity.

As a member of this august body, Nigeria, my country, will continue to cherish these rights and uphold them in all their ramifications. While the attainment of these ideals remain our goal, it is pertinent to point out that since societies are made not only of individuals but also of institutions, numerous and distinct groups, such as workers, employers governments, the rich, the poor and the deprived, it is obvious that in exercising these rights, individuals or even groups must be mindful of the repercussions of their action on the other constituent components of societies which are also equally entitled to the same rights. The freedoms enunciated above cannot be achieved by individuals acting alone. They are related to civil, political, economic, social and cultural rights, all of which have an international connotation. There is no doubt that civil and political rights are entirely a national responsibility which can best be guaranteed in an atmosphere of peace, without which social and economic development will continue to elude us. The development of particular States and individuals cannot be dissociated from that of other States and the world at large. For instance, the development of the Third World countries is inextricably linked with that of the industrialised nations. It is, therefore, pertinent at this juncture to highlight the economically devastating experience of developing countries at the hands of their developed counterparts as regards the debt-servicing problems and the incessant unstable weather conditions coupled with frequent disasters and calamities, which lead to perpetual uncertainties for governments and people in many parts of the undeveloped world.

Since the human being is the centre of all development, the human condition is the only final measure of development. The world's men and women are the main factors and the ends for whom and by whom the implementation programme of any development must be justified. Regrettably, over the past decade, the human conditions of many countries in Africa have deteriorated. Real incomes of most households and families have declined sharply. Malnutrition has risen, food production has fallen in relation to the population and the quality and quantity of health and education services have dropped drastically. Famine and war have made millions of people refugees and displaced persons. Unemployment and underemployment have continued to stare us in the face. As if this were not bad enough, the price of export products from which most developing countries generate foreign exchange, vital for their real development, continues to decline while, at the same time, prices of imported goods continue to soar to the high heavens. The end result has been and continues to be crippling. How can it be otherwise when the amount of funds needed to finance the African priority programme for economic recovery between 1986 and 1990, as endorsed by the United Nations, stands at 128 billion dollars against a total of 122.58 billion dollars required by Africa to pay for servicing its debts to governments and private enterprises in the developed world? With Africa's debt now standing at over 200 billion dollars, the time has come when both partners have to re-examine the situation with a view to easing it. A situation which forces African governments to allocate up to 30 per cent of their budgets to debt servicing cannot be in the interest of the industrialised nations. Simply put, developing countries in general and Africa in particular, are now in a situation of economic slavery and abject poverty. It is therefore pertinent to remind all those gathered here of the Declaration of Philadelphia which states that "Poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere".

We appreciate the efforts and the objectives of international organisations, especially the ILO, which we believe should continue its standard-setting activities, because such standards had contributed to the social and economic development of many member States. The standards have also improved the working conditions of millions of workers all over the world and have enhanced the promotion of human rights. The ILO should contribute to the establishment of a new social international economic order. More than ever before, there is now an urgent need to correct the tendency to perpetuate the inequality existing between industrialised nations and developing countries. How can we say that a worker, whose country has to export over 30 per cent of her gross national product to service its debt, enjoys freedom? Something has to be done about the debt problem of the Third World if there is to be personal freedom, justice, productive and freely chosen employment, just and favourable remuneration, social security, equal opportunity and freedom of association for all the toiling masses in the developing countries.

The Government of the Federal Republic of Nigeria is doing its best to guarantee the political, economic, social and cultural rights of all its citizens. To this end, the President, Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces of Nigeria, General Ibrahim Babangida, in his 1988 budget speech to the nation outlined a comprehensive programme of complete political transition to civil rule by 1992. This was in addition to the economic recovery programme which the Government has also set for itself. Elections to various local government councils were held on 12 December 1987, while those to the Constituent Assembly were held last month. In the field of economic recovery, the structural adjustment programme set up about two years ago will come to an end some time this year. As it is hoped that the gains of the last two years will be consolidated and further extended, the foreign exchange market will have to be adjusted to the routine working of the financial and economic system without the dramatic periodic market sessions we now have. By the time the structural adjustment programme has officially come to an end, we also expect to have put in place all the major institutional and policy reforms which constitute the essence of the programme. We strongly believe that the achievement of these reforms will guarantee economic freedom and economic advancement to one and all.

In order to alleviate the suffering of the toiling masses through the structural adjustment programme, a special reflation package to increase the sustainable level of the welfare of the people was introduced in the 1988 Budget. Under the reflationary package, generous allocations of funds were made for transport, housing, education, health and employment; furthermore, in order to reflate the economy and move it out of the sluggish phase occasioned by low consumer spending power and bring about the era of deregulation, the wage freeze which had been in force for over five years was lifted. As a result of this, workers have been and are still busy negotiating wages, salaries and fringe benefits which are sensible and feasible with their employers. Indeed, over 80 per cent success has been achieved in both the public and private sectors between 1 January and end of May 1988. By lifting the five-year-old wage freeze, we have demonstrated not only our sympathy for workers but also our belief in the fundamental principle of free collective bargaining between workers and employers.

Finally, I would like to assure this distinguished gathering that the Federal Military Government of Nigeria, believes in the ideals and objectives of the ILO and that is why we are here today. We are proud to belong to this Organisation and we shall continue to do everything possible to improve the lot of the workers in our great country.

Interpretation from Italian: Mr. FORMICA (Minister of Labour, Italy) – Mr. President, first of all I should like to express my warmest and most sincere congratulations on your election.

In September last year, at the European Regional Conference, I had occasion to express some disappointment that eight years had passed since the previous session. Italy has always been of the opinion that strengthening co-operation between the countries of Eastern and Western Europe within the ILO might be fruitful not only in terms of relations between Members but also in terms of the Organisation as a whole, particularly with respect to the expectations of the developing countries.

Your unanimous election is not only in recognition of your outstanding professional abilities and personal qualities; it is also indicative of a desire to make up for lost time so that the countries of Europe can play a more active part in the effort demanded by the ILO's objectives.

It is particularly auspicious that this event coincides with the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

I should also like to express my admiration for the Director-General and reaffirm our appreciation of his dedicated and perceptive work and of the clarity with which he has always guided our discussions.

The documentation we have before us inevitably requires that we ask ourselves whether the Universal Declaration of Human Rights – the indivisibility of which you were at pains to emphasise in an interview with the press – means that we can restrict ourselves simply to managing the current economic and social crisis or whether, on the contrary, it requires us to make an effort to solve the crisis.

In any society standard-setting is an index of sensitivity. In a transition period shortcomings in standard-setting may be merely symptomatic of a tendency towards adopting a wait-and-see policy. In periods of great change such as that through which we are currently passing on the technological and social level, shortcomings in standard-setting is indicative of something more – of the danger not only of standing still but also of retreating.

We have noted with concern the data provided by the Director-General. In the past few years the pace at which Conventions have been ratified has been slowing down, to the point where on average there is only one ratification per member State every four years.

Of course, this is to be seen in a macro-economic context which is characterised by a new relationship between growth and employment.

There is an example of this new relationship in Italy: since the second half of 1983 Italy has experienced a period of rigorous economic expansion. This has enabled us to overcome a number of problems: the rate of inflation has been brought down by more than ten points, firms have regained their competitiveness, salaries have kept their purchasing power.

These achievements were accompanied by a limited increase in employment, which was quite inadequate to meet the demands of the labour force which had increased not only because of demographic fluctuations but chiefly because of the greater participation of women in employment that led to an increase in unemployment in both absolute and percentage terms.

The most recent figures show that while production continues to increase the persistent contraction in employment in industry and agriculture has not been completely compensated for by an increase in the services sector and so for the first time we registered a reduction in the number of jobs overall.

The situation experienced in Italy, which is also found in other countries, has been invoked by all those who claim that the driving force of progress is to be sought chiefly in the competitiveness of firms and the free play of market forces.

According to them, politics should intervene as little as possible and should be limited in the sector we are discussing here, almost exclusively to fitting social shock absorbers.

This is a view we firmly reject, since the measures taken on behalf of the unemployed and those who seek their first jobs, however generous they may be, can never be a substitute for the right to productive work freely chosen.

It is a fundamental right of the individual, and as such it must be constantly guaranteed. In other words, we regard unemployment, which is a waste of human resources, as a national scourge which must be fought against by mobilising all available resources while at the same time respecting the commitments undertaken and the programmes established to counter inflation.

I have mentioned the achievements of the Italian economy. A consequence was a decrease in social conflicts, in the form of a reduction in the number of working hours lost per annum from 100 million to 30 million.

But no social pact can last if it is not based on a fair distribution of costs, on the one hand, and benefits, on the other.

This principle inspired the resolution presented by the Government delegation of Italy concerning the promotion of employment and social security.

This resolution, which has been drawn up in close co-operation with the social partners, and with the aim of finding innovative solutions and developing solidarity, seeks to reconcile economic growth, the competitiveness of enterprises, the promotion of employment and the improvement of working conditions.

The Director-General's Report quite rightly drew our attention to the situation of migrant workers.

Tomorrow, in fact, a conference opens at Bari in Italy which will bring together representatives of the various foreign communities in the country.

It is taking place in a city in southern Italy, although the greatest concentration of foreign workers is in the northern regions.

The choice of this venue for the conference indicates that in facing these problems Italy, which is now a country of immigration, has not forgotten that for many decades it was a country of emigration, particularly from southern Italy.

When I take the floor in Bari, I shall say that here I became fully aware that as far as international interdependency is concerned, there is no other alternative to solidarity. Jobs in the industrialised countries are defended not by clinging to frontier controls but by fighting against poverty throughout the world and by promoting well-being.

The role of ILO in harmonising development strategies is an important one. It must formulate and ensure the application of labour standards, stimulate and channel discussions – here I am thinking in particular of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment – and, lastly, it must promote technical co-operation.

Here may I quote data which came from a meeting on analysis and orientation of ILO-Italy programmes: in 1987, Italy's contribution was 28 per cent, which made it a major contributor to technical activities co-operation in the ILO.

This was in addition to the Italian contribution of $ 8 million per annum to the International Centre for Advanced Technical and Vocational Training in Turin.

The concept of solidarity is also behind the initiative that Tunisia and Italy are putting forward to set up an observation point for migrant flows in the Mediterranean area.

This initiative has enjoyed effective support from the ILO – I should like to thank Mr. Blanchard particularly – and it should develop with a meeting of experts of ten countries of the Mediterranean most directly interested in the problem at the end of next month.

I should have liked to close here on an optimistic note, but we cannot overlook the reports the Director-General has given us on tragic topics: apartheid and workers in the occupied Arab territories.

In South Africa, there is increasingly open defiance of the principle of equality endorsed by the ILO. In February and March last year, President Botha adopted new repressive measures prohibiting political activities for 17 organisations peacefully involved in the struggle against apartheid. At the same time, a bill is in hand that will prevent non-governmental organisations from receiving any kind of financial help from abroad, thus doing away with any possibility of helping the democratic anti-apartheid movement.

In a joint statement, the 12 countries of the European Community severely condemned these new manifestations of political repression and requested assurances that no obstacles be placed in the way of the Community's programme for positive measures in southern Africa.

Bilaterally, Italy not only applied all the restrictive measures decided on by the Twelve but has committed itself to action in favour of the Black population in general and of the front-line countries in particular, in order to reduce their economic dependency on Pretoria.

As regards the situation of the workers in the occupied Arab territories, may I refer to the position of the European Community.

In its declaration on the Middle East at Copenhagen, on 4 and 5 December 1987, the Council of Europe stated that the Twelve reasserted their concern in respect of human rights and living conditions in the occupied territories. Without prejudice to future political solutions, the Twelve would continue to contribute to economic and social development in these territories.

At Bonn, on 8 February last, the Ministers of Foreign Affairs stated that without prejudice to future political solutions, the Twelve stood firm in their decision to work to improve the living conditions of the inhabitants of the occupied territories. The Community was continuing its programme of development in favour of those territories. It has given additional humanitarian assistance to the various Palestinian populations concerned and had decided to promote direct exports of agricultural and industrial products from those territories to the Community market.

Lastly, on 15 April, at Bonn, the Twelve deplored the deportation on 11 April 1988 of eight Palestinians from the occupied territories and Israel's threat to deport another 11. As the Twelve indicated in their note to the Israeli authorities of 12 January 1988, such action was an open violation of article 49 of the Geneva Convention of 12 August 1949 relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War.

It therefore seems to me that the concerns and opinions expressed in the Report of the Director-General are widely reflected in the position of the European Community.

In Italy, the Middle Eastern problem, because of the initiatives of certain political forces, is at the centre of public attention. I should therefore like to request Mr. Blanchard to discuss in depth with the current president of the Community some other points in his report. I am thinking in particular of the possibility of working out an authentic development plan for the Gaza strip, managed by those directly concerned, as well as measures that may be found necessary following the findings of the representatives of the Director-General in Gaza, to make it possible to export Palestinian products to the Community without going through Israeli middlemen.

For my part, I can assure you that I shall not fail to make the Italian Government, in particular the President of the Council and the Minister of Foreign Affairs, aware of these aspects of the report and of any proposals that might arise therefrom.

When I began, I expressed pleasure at your election and confidence in the prospect of collaboration that it opens up. I would like to recall what I said at the beginning and not conclude on a despondent note because of the problems I have just mentioned.

The Declaration on Human Rights is the compass for the course that we must follow so that the precepts of dignity, tolerance and solidarity may develop with time.

On this path we are happy in this companionship given us by this Conference.

Interpretation from Finnish: Mr. PUHAKKA (Minister of Labour, Finland) – I wish to congratulate you most heartily on your election to the presidency of this session of the International Labour Conference. My congratulations are also extended to the other Officers of the Conference.

The Government representative of Finland, together with those of other Nordic countries, has submitted to the Conference a resolution concerning the follow-up of the report of the World Commission on Environment and Development and the environmental perspective to the year 2000 and beyond. There is no doubt that the ILO has an important contribution to make to the international efforts towards sustainable development. We hope that the resolution will win wide support from other delegations at this Conference.

It is my pleasure to express great appreciation to the Director-General for his excellent Report submitted to the Conference for general discussion. This year the Director-General's Report deals with a subject of fundamental importance, namely human rights.

It is most appropriate that the ILO, on this 40th anniversary of the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, analyses the situation today. Furthermore, this year also marks the 40th anniversary of the adoption of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention 1948 (No. 87), and the 30th anniversary of the adoption of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111). On the application of the latter, a general survey has been prepared by the Committee of Experts for discussion in the Conference Committee.

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights echoes the opening words of the ILO Constitution written soon after the First World War that "universal and lasting peace can be established only if it is based upon social justice".

As pointed out in the Preface of the Director-General's Report, the ILO was the first to proclaim the indivisible character of human rights which encompass, without distinction, civil and political rights, as well as economic, social and cultural rights. The ILO's activities have a considerable bearing on the realisation of human rights.

The ILO Conventions cover many dimensions concerning human rights such as freedom of association, freedom of labour, the elimination of discrimination and the promotion of equality of opportunity, the right to work, the right to a minimum income, the right to social security and the right to adequate conditions of work. It is quite another question how the Conventions have been implemented. In too many countries, there still exists a supremacy of the employers over the employees. Many fundamental rights pertaining to human rights have only been included in speeches at festive occasions. Humanity presupposes that the needs of man always take precedence over other needs, irrespective of the political or economic situation prevailing at any time. Democracy also involves the individual right to partake in the decision-making concerning oneself, and this undivided right must be extended to cover working life in its entirety.

As mentioned in the Director-General's Report, there has been a significant increase in the number of ratifications of ILO Conventions dealing with human rights. Yet we cannot ignore the gap between the provisions of the Conventions and the situation actually prevailing in the world today. About 900 million people are estimated to live in extreme poverty. The number of unemployed and underemployed is too high, even in the OECD countries where total unemployment has remained over 30 million and is expected to rise even further.

Despite the gap between aspiration and achievement, international human rights standards, not least those formulated by the ILO, have had a striking impact on attitudes, policies and laws and conduct. In many situations, however, these same standards, including the most elementary rights, are frequently being disregarded. Consequently, the ILO should pay more attention not only to how the Convention, adopted by the Organisation are ratified but also how the member States have implemented these Conventions. Even sustaining the appreciation of the international community demands high morals from member States in regard to the goals adopted by the Organisation. This creates a prerequisite for a fruitful interaction between different countries and cultures, now and in the future.

The promotion of human rights is a continuing process where the ILO has an important role to play. It can serve as a forum for tripartite discussions and promote useful dialogue. The system for the supervision of ILO standards is effective especially in the field of basic human rights. Yet active collaboration by all ILO constituents is absolutely necessary in order to overcome the difficulties in the implementation of these standards. I am convinced that the ratification and coming into force of the amendments to the ILO Constitution adopted in 1986 would enhance the participation, not least of the developing countries. The ILO must continue its standard-setting activities, as stated in the Director-General's Report and in the Medium-Term Plan adopted by the Governing Body last March. Increasing attention has to be paid to ways through which the ILO's standard-setting and operational activities could better complement each other.

Equality is a fundamental condition of human dignity and social justice which must at all times be borne in mind in the determination and application of social policy. It would be appropriate to consider widening the scope of ILO standards concerning discrimination in employment. My Government welcomes the adoption of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia and the updating of the Programme of Action against Apartheid. New standards might also be needed in the near future on the equal treatment of men and women in matters of social security.

It is imperative to create macro-economic conditions and to undertake the reforms in national policies and international economic relations that will make growth of employment possible in all countries. It is also necessary to establish a system of protection against unemployment which covers all contingencies.

The right to just and favourable conditions of work in a field where any new solutions should not be imposed but should be arrived at through full and genuine negotiations with the representatives of the workers' organisations concerned. The introduction of new technologies, substances and work methods should be subject to constant supervision and control and should take into account new hazards and the long-term effects they may have. It is important to safeguard the worker's right to refuse a job when it presents an imminent and serious danger to his life or health. As a matter of fact, this principle was recently confirmed by legislation in my own country.

Special attention should be given to the most vulnerable groups of workers and their social security. Society has to be constructed in such a way that it becomes impossible to split citizens into A and B-group persons. In practice, this requires solidarity in the implementation of social policy.

The functional possibilities of the labour union movement in multinational enterprises and groups of companies with production activities in several countries is also an issue of current interest. The collective agreement mechanisms and labour legislation have been established on a national basis with a view to national needs. The international flow of capital and more and more open capital and stock markets have changed the situation radically. Discussion about this issue and action for developing negotiation and collective agreement systems to meet the needs of the modern world form a task which is compatible with the role of the International Labour Organisation.

At the initiative of the Nordic countries, the Fourth European Regional Conference last year adopted a resolution concerning the status of migrants. The Nordic countries have also brought up the issue of the status of so-called project-tied workers, which is at the moment under review in the Organisation. The changing structure of the labour market will increase the amount of temporary work performed by special groups of workers in countries other than their own. Increased co-operation in the field of practical training and education should also be taken into consideration. Conditions should be made such that the labour force and trainees moving from one country to another would enjoy "migration security". Any person moving to another country should be aware that he is transferring to a labour market where he is protected by an established social system and by labour legislation. He should also be able to return to his country of origin. Furthermore, it is important to guarantee immigrants the right to study the language of the country of employment, as well as their right to their native language and culture in all member States.

Efforts to secure the enjoyment of human rights involve the entire international community. It is therefore important, as I have already said, to harmonise ILO's action with the efforts of other organs of the United Nations. Collaboration among nations is vital in trying to achieve our common goal: greater respect for human rights and enhanced well-being.

I hope that this will be our common future.

(Mr. Tsujino takes the Chair.)

Mr. LEE (Minister for Labour, Singapore) – On behalf of the Singapore delegation, I wish to congratulate the President on his election to chair this Conference. Under his able leadership, I am confident that this Conference will be a success.

Forty years have passed since the United Nations proclaimed the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. This conference is therefore taking stock of the action taken by the ILO to promote and protect the enjoyment of human rights.

As fellow human beings, we are naturally drawn to concepts such as human dignity, natural justice and civil liberties. However, one should be wary about imposing one's own ideals or norms on other countries and peoples without realising that there are important differences in their political, economic and social set-up. There can be no human rights if law and order break down and anarchy prevails. Then, it is back to the law of the jungle.

Amongst the most basic of human rights must surely be the right to live in security within one's own boundary, the right to work and the right to bring up one's family in peace and harmony. Yet, today, in the Third World alone, more than 900 million people are still living in poverty.

The Director-General of the ILO correctly pointed out in his Report that the human rights debate must be placed in the context of the harsh realities of daily lives. People the world over aspire to a decent standard of living.

Governments are therefore duty-bound to create the environment and the opportunities for social and economic advancement.

It is ironic that some of the most vocal of human rights activists come from countries where the citizens dare not walk the streets at night, for fear of being mugged. Some of their laws seem more concerned with protecting the rights of criminals, rather than those of the vast majority of law-abiding citizens.

Singapore is a small country where 2.6 million people are crammed into an island of only 620 square kilometers. Like other people, we aspire to rising standards of living for our people and for continued social and economic progress.

Singaporeans are fortunate to have enjoyed political stability and rapid economic progress over the last two decades. Despite its small size, Singapore ranks nineteenth in the world in terms of per capita income. Any Singaporean who wants to work can get a job in Singapore today. We have to admit foreign workers to overcome our labour shortage. Our standard of living is second only to that of Japan in Asia.

Two reasons account for our happy state of affairs. Firstly, the Government enjoys the support and confidence of the people. Secondly, it has committed itself to the basic objective of building a better life for all Singaporeans through economic expansion and social advancement. We have built up the political, social and economic institutions which best suit our unique circumstances without trying to ape other countries.

As a small trading nation, Singapore's economic future is very much linked to the world economy. We are concerned with continuing uncertainties in the world economic outlook. The basic problems remain intractable. A concerted effort by the world community is needed to overcome the difficulties caused by the large imbalances in the international payments system, volatile exchange rates, the huge indebtedness of Third World countries, high unemployment and rising protectionism. Slower economic growth has strengthened the forces of protectionism in the industrialised countries. Instead of seeking out new sources of growth, protectionist policies are being advocated to protect industries that may have lost their competitiveness. There is a worrying trend among some countries to link international trade with preconceived notions of human rights; this is merely another form of protectionism in disguise. International trade problems are multi-dimensional and complex. Resolving them requires political will and the willingness to tackle fundamental problems. We should not be barking up the wrong trees.

The ILO should express its serious concern at the increasing trend of protectionism in the world today. Urgent measures are needed to preserve and promote free trade. Only with free trade will we be able to create employment opportunities and a better life for our peoples.

Mr. KHAN (Minister of Labour and Manpower, Bangladesh) – It is a great honour and pleasure for me to address the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference as the Minister of Labour and Manpower and leader of the Bangladesh delegation. On behalf of my delegation and on my own behalf, I would like to congratulate Mr. Bayreuther on his unanimous election to the presidency of this session of the International Labour Conference. My delegation is confident that with his rich experience and under his able leadership the International Labour Conference will be steered to a successful conclusion. We also congratulate the Vice-Presidents on their unanimous election.

My delegation would also like to take this opportunity to convey our deep appreciation and thanks to the Director-General of the ILO for presenting his thoughtful Report.

Having associated myself with the trade union movement over the past few decades, it has been my pleasant duty to watch the performances of this international organisation with keen interest. Needless to say, the ILO has been able to take firm root in almost all the countries of the world and it deserves our compliments for the remarkable contribution it has made to the upholding of the dignity, rights and the noble cause of labour. The Organisation has lived through considerable changes, gathering strength and prestige over the past seven decades, and the ILO is almost a household name with workers, employers and trade unions all over the world today. Its success story lies in its very character – tripartism.

Today most of the developing countries have been experiencing enormous social and economic problems. Deficits in the balance of payments, low growth rate, low capital formation, heavy external debts, unabated inflation, low prices for primary produce, protectionism, high rates of demographic growth, famine, drought, floods and natural calamities are common characteristics of the economies of those countries. The burden of debt has become unbearable and the net transfer of resources from developing countries to developed ones has reached alarming proportions. These factors hinder the progress of the developing countries and compromise their capacity of investment and employment, creating social tensions and undermining living standards and human dignity. Against this backdrop, the ideals and objectives of the ILO must be translated into practice for the welfare of the toiling masses.

In his Report, the Director-General identified the crucial areas of strain in the world economy. He has correctly pointed out that workers' rights relating to freedom of association, equal opportunity, minimum wage protection, working conditions and social security do not fare well with the existing economic conditions in the member countries. I hope the distinguished delegates will consider the points raised in the Director-General's Report and will come up with concrete proposals for obliterating the baneful effects of the "pursuit of self-interest" and "unfettered competition".

I may add that the noble ideals and objectives of the ILO cannot be materialised without bringing about the new world economic order which would bring North and South closer materially, mentally and spiritually, physically and philosophically, thereby overcoming their apparent contradictions.

Bangladesh, with 105 million people, is faced with an uphill task of creating employment opportunities for its ever-growing workforce and adequate training facilities for this workforce. The Government has initiated a series of forward-looking innovative measures with a view to creating new employment opportunities. One of these is our self-employment programme. We deeply appreciate the assistance received from various bilateral and multilateral sources which have contributed to its successful implementation. However, given the enormity of the problem of unemployment of Bangladesh today, a lot more remains to be done. We hope the generous assistance received by us so far from the international community and various international organisations, including the ILO, will continue to be extended to us to bolster our national efforts to solve our most formidable unemployment problem.

Bangladesh has taken measures to ensure freedom of association of workers and employers. There are as many as 18 national federations in the country; there are also some craft federations. These federations are in constant touch with the Government and the employers in the country and thereby work as a sentinel of the rights and interests of workers. They have in recent years also entered into national agreements for the furtherance of workers' legal, financial and social benefits. They are also represented in the national Tripartite Consultative Committee (TCC) which offers guidance to the Ministry of Labour and Manpower in the field of development planning, leg-isolation and international standards. The TCC also reviews matters relating to labour-management relations, employment and unemployment, with a view to helping the Government to take appropriate measures.

The question of equal opportunity is very close to the heart of the people of Bangladesh. Provision is made in the Constitution for equal opportunity, irrespective of sex, caste, creed or religion. Employment is open to all and the Government has adopted measures for helping the disadvantaged groups, including the tribal people and the less educated and unskilled workers, to find employment through special quotas.

Working conditions in factories and establishments are under constant review and inspection. The Government has sought multilateral support for the establishment of centres for occupational health and safety measures.

In the area of social security, Bangladesh is yet to have a comprehensive social security plan for the entire population. Nevertheless, workers in factories and establishments are covered under duly constituted provident fund and pension schemes. The Conference would be happy to know if even workers who have been dismissed are now entitled to all these benefits. In this particular case, Bangladesh seems to be in a unique position; indeed, this was one of the provisions of the national agreement which the federations of workers entered into on 21 May 1984 with the Government. As a signatory to that agreement on the side of the workers, I find this very gratifying.

Developing countries have common problems and they need resources – technical and financial. World resources have been diverted for the continuing arms race which threatens mankind and civilisation as a whole. But, however, some light is in sight in the tunnel following the signing of the Intermediate-Range Nuclear Forces Treaty by the superpowers last December. I would also recall the Brandt Commission in its report stated that a mere 0.5 per cent of the resources spent annually on world armaments would be enough to finance Third World food imports by 1990. In this regard, the ILO has a positive and effective role to play.

I would like, at this point, to congratulate the Director-General on his fair Report entitled Human rights – A common responsibility. Everyone knows what has been happening to human rights in the occupied Arab territories and in South Africa. The Israelis have been killing and wounding Arabs in occupied Arab lands. They are being permanently maimed. These are not isolated incidents. They are emanating from a systematic policy decision of the Zionist authorities.

Atrocities perpetrated by the Israeli authorities have shocked the world conscience. They must stop their arbitrary acts and policy of terror in Palestine and other occupied territories, release the Palestinian trade unionists and discontinue forthwith displacement and expulsion policies which are contrary to human rights, the Philadelphia Declaration and ILO ideologies. We reaffirm our solidarity with the oppressed people of Palestine and hope that the ILO will intensify its efforts to ensure the full respect of the legitimate rights of the Palestinian workers in the occupied territories.

The universal conscience also continues to be afflicted by another tragedy resulting from the policy of apartheid being pursued by the racist regime of South Africa. The Director-General in his Report has aptly stated that “the most persistent and profound challenge to ILO principles on equality has come from South Africa’s policy of apartheid”.

We renew our solidarity with the people who are fighting apartheid. We firmly believe that racial discrimination in any form is a serious affront to human dignity and constitutes a grave threat to global peace. We condemn firmly and unequivocally apartheid and all other forms of racial discrimination as being in direct contravention of the United Nations Charter.

Bangladesh holds the ideals and objectives of the ILO in high esteem and has been persistently endeavouring to implement the ratified Conventions of the ILO. We appreciate the importance of standard setting and the adoption, ratification and implementation of standards. However, we would like to stress that economic development is a precondition for the implementation of the ratified Conventions. The Third World’s – particularly the LDC – economic condition is anybody’s guess. The mere will of the member States to change the situation coupled with the ILO’s assistance for implementing the ratified Conventions, is probably not enough. Capacity for that must exist. Capacity of the member States varies among nations in terms of economic development. It is, therefore, perhaps not wise for the ILO to adopt the same set of standards for an African or Asian LDC as for an industrialised nation. This aspect of the question should be addressed whenever appropriate.

Member States having divergent socio-economic backgrounds, local conditions and employment practices are facing insurmountable obstacles to the implementation of the ratified standards. The ILO, with its effective system of supervision of standards and rich experience in this field, may help adopt more flexible and implementable standards, by discarding, revising and updating the old ones....

THE PRESIDENT (Mr. TSUJINO) – Your statement has already exceeded your time by two minutes, so will you please conclude now.

Mr. KHAN – Bangladesh attaches great importance to the early entry into force of the amendment to the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation. Accordingly, we have already ratified the amendments. We sincerely expect and hope that other member States will take soon complete the ratification process.

To conclude, I would like to reaffirm our confidence in the efforts of the ILO to promote international economic policies which may contribute to equity and social justice. In fulfilling this objective, the ILO has to take adequate measures for implementing its own resolutions, including those which call for a major world-wide structural adjustment to reduce the large imbalances in the world economy, for national and international action to achieve employment by ensuring that international agencies promote employment-generating growth and for greater and more convergent efforts by international agencies to promote employment and alleviate poverty.

In doing so, the ILO can achieve social security and thereby foster socio-political stability and progress in the world. Without resolving these basic, vital issues of international relations, there can be no stable peace on our planet or substantial progress anywhere.

We look forward to the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference with renewed hope and wish the Conference every success.

Mr. PRASHAD (Government delegate, Guyana) – Mr. President, I should like first of all to extend to the President and the Vice-Presidents my heartiest congratulations on their election to office. Their election is an assurance that the tasks we must pursue, and which are aimed at achieving the social progress of the countries we represent, will be fruitful.

I would like to compliment the Director-General for his very excellent and comprehensive report, and in particular to commend him for choosing human rights as the subject for Part I of his report. The respect for human rights is consistent with the objectives of governments and freedom-loving institutions all over the world, but it has a special meaning for the International Labour Organisation. Since its inception in 1919, and even before that formal beginning, the framers of the ILO and its forerunners have always sought to protect the rights of citizens, particularly the workers of this world, and they have always endeavoured to guide the patterns of behaviour of governments and employers and to foster respect for such rights. Many of the Conventions, Recommendations and resolutions of the ILO have as their underlying concept the rights of freedom of association and freedom of choice. The ILO therefore stands as a bastion for the protection of human rights, and it will continue to do so, as long as the opportunity afforded me today continues to be offered also to the representatives of workers and employers to make known their points of view before this august body. The ILO will continue to do so as long as it continues to review and update the standards embodied in its Conventions and Recommendations.

It is therefore with the greatest pleasure to myself and my country, the Co-operative Republic of Guyana, that I take advantage of this occasion to address this august and distinguished body. I am accompanied by a truly tripartite delegation which comprises government, employers' and workers' representatives. I know that we will be given adequate opportunities to be fully involved in the various sessions of the Conference.

Let me say from the very outset that the Government of Guyana values highly its association with employers and workers. The Employers' Confederation especially has contributed immeasurably to training, retraining and the development of skills in national industry, services and commerce. The Government considers prior consultation and collaboration with the Trades Union Congress and the private and co-operative sectors in high esteem and treasures its relationship with the trade union movement, which it views as a partner in national development.

I have to refer to the address of the Honourable Prime Minister of India, at the 71st Session of the International Labour Conference on 17 June 1985, when he alluded to the larger problems of the world. He said: "It is in this large perspective that we have to consider the role of the ILO. What we do here must relate to the major issues of our time, else our work and our achievements will not endure."

Today, the major issues are still war and peace, prosperity and poverty, development and underdevelopment. In effect, structural imbalance in the Third World leads to economic instability. I trust that we in our debates will not lose sight of these objectives.

It is apposite to note that the ILO, because of its plurality – a representation of different, divergent interests – draws its strength from its apparent international contradictions, thereby ensuring its continuity and longevity.

But the basic objective of the ILO is to secure social justice and peace through international co-operation. Hence, the struggle to provide for the basic human needs of the poor and hungry must be intensified. The Government of Guyana believes that such goals can only be realised through dedication and renewed commitment to the cause of humanity.

For poverty is a function of growth and since, as it is said, "poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere", the alleviation of poverty should be the focus of government action.

The most enduring institutions of the world are plagued with doubt, discord and dissent on the issues of world peace and economic prosperity. Some countries have set up barriers to trade, while others are asked to open up their economies.

The adverse policies of some nations have had catastrophic effects on job opportunities in the developing countries. Protectionism often appears in the guise of a demand for fair labour standards.

No country is immune to international crises which threaten global economic stability. By country, Guyana, gained its political independence in 1966, 22 years ago. Twenty-two years is a short time in the life of any country, and in that period my Government has worked strenuously to restructure the economy and the nation's social institutions to reflect the wishes and aspirations of its people.

We are a country which exports primary products, mainly agricultural and mineral, while importing finished capital and consumer goods and technology. In that pattern, we share the fate of most developing countries. Our economy has been bedevilled by low export earnings and high import prices. That situation has worsened owing to the rising cost of fuel which we must import as we are not yet an oil-producing country. Nevertheless, we have a high rate of literacy, with sound educational institutions from primary to university level, which have produced a versatile and well-trained labour force. We must develop our country by the application of the talents of our people to the resources with which we are endowed.

Guyana is therefore in need of an injection of technology and investment in its wider frontiers of development. In pursuance of this, Guyana is prepared to do business with all those who are ready to engage in legitimate, purposeful business. Moreover, Guyana treasures the contribution of overseas investors who are prepared to honour their social responsibilities.

We in the Government appreciate and acknowledge the necessity for both overseas and local investment. Hence, we are proceeding apace with the task of attracting investors.

To this end, the Government and people of Guyana, under the able leadership of the President, Hugh Desmond Hoyte, are mobilising all positive factors in their assiduous efforts to implement policies of reform and achieve the goal of national economic development.

The President has repeatedly stressed the importance of the private sector in economic reinvigoration, by identifying areas for investment by local entrepreneurs or joint ventures by local and overseas investors.

The pitiless logic of the facts indicates the preponderance of an all-pervasive mood of optimism, which has taken control of the entire country. It is our considered conviction that the whole edifice of society obviously lies in the foundation of a structured economy. It is a belief that makes and seals destinies. The inflow of investment and its concomitant benefits will serve to galvanise the people into feverish endeavours to reinvigorate the economy.

I wish to assure all those who are interested that we in Guyana stand as a people united, single of purpose and ready to sacrifice all our energies in order to set the wheels of industry and commerce rolling. In the words of the President, Hugh Desmond Hoyte, "there is business to be done in Guyana and Guyana is ready to do business". The Government of Guyana is most appreciative of the work of the ILO, more especially of its support and assistance in the field of labour, co-operatives and industrial and vocational training.

The work of the ILO in the promotion of small enterprises is commendable. Over the years, there has been a tendency to provide institutional support only to organised labour. In Guyana, organised labour represents about 33 per cent of the total labour force. Hence, there is a large body of productive people in need of protection, particularly in both the rural and urban informal sectors. There is a need for further assistance in co-operatives, cottage industries and other crafts. The creation of employment and self-employment must no doubt be part and parcel of a deliberate government policy.

More specifically, there seems to be a definite need for help from the ILO in the area of labour standards. More and more countries are finding it difficult to make a meaningful contribution to the promotion of new instruments. Fewer instruments are being ratified and there must be more flexibility in the approach to matters through general discussions and resolutions. In our opinion, it would be opportune for a regional adviser in labour standards to be based in the Caribbean Office to facilitate member State's compliance with the relevant requirements.

Certainly, in this harsh economic era, one must resolve the conflict between idealism and reality. In this, my first Conference, I look forward to action-oriented deliberations, for when the pendulum swings, it will swing not in favour of empty rhetoric but of positive action.

I would like to express the sincere hope that our Organisation, through its standard-setting activity, through programmes in promoting employment and social security, through exploratory discussions on the development of rural employment and its technical co-operation programmes, may make an even more lasting contribution to safeguarding and strengthening peace, social justice and freedom, consistent with the ideas that brought it into being and have guided its progress in the past. In this regard, we must be ever grateful to the Director-General for committing these ideals to posterity through the splendid construction of his Report to which I have already referred. May this 75th Session advance our efforts towards democracy, international solidarity and happiness for all people.

Mr. ROWE (Employers' adviser, New Zealand) – The Director-General has this year provided us with another thoughtful and thought-provoking Report. I should like today to comment on some of the issues raised in the Report, partly with the intent of narrowing the gap which the Director-General has emphasised between words and actions, rhetoric and reality.

In particular I shall touch on the reciprocal nature of rights and responsibilities, the interdependence of macro- and micro-policies in social as well as economic matters, the possible – nay, probable – incompatibility of some multiple goals which are often rolled off the tongue in international circles, the elusiveness of national and international consensuses and finally the strictly limited power of governments to do good.

The Director-General ends his Report with a plea for renewed dedication to the vision of "a world in which human beings shall enjoy freedom of speech and belief and freedom from fear and want". This is indeed a noble vision, not generally realised, but it needs to be said that in some countries it has been substantially realised – to an extent never before seen. They are our exemplars.

Rights and responsibilities are inseparable. Rights are not a free good, manna for heaven. Indeed, one has rights only to the extent that one fulfils one's obligations. It is here, I think, that something has gone badly wrong in the human rights debate.

Rights and responsibilities are inseparable for organisations as well as for individuals, and in particular for trade unions as for workers – the two being not identical, as is sometimes assumed in this Organisation.

Rights and responsibilities go together fairly evidently in social matters. Their inter-relationship is not so obvious in economic affairs. Still less well appreciated is the interaction between social rights and economic performance.

To take a few examples: full employment is impossible unless people are prepared to work and to be trained for it; trade unions have a responsibility not to make the world of work so rigid as to inhibit the economy's ability to cope with technological or market changes impacting on it; and too much emphasis on the exercise of human rights today may gravely impair the economy's prospects tomorrow. One must not put the social cart before the economic horse.

As it touches on economic issues the Director-General's Report has a déjà vu Keynesian flavour, in an increasingly post-keynesian world. Thus there is great emphasis on macro-policies and actions along with an implicit faith in governmental and international initiatives.

So it is said that "although faster growth and expanded employment are clearly necessary, the fight against inflation has emerged as a greater pre-occupation for many of the world's policy-makers" and that "less costly means of curbing inflation than recession and unemployment must be found".

The question immediately arises: what if less costly means cannot be found? Governments of whatever hue would love to be able to solve their economic problems at no cost, and often try to do so by borrowing too much.

Despite the superficial attraction of inflation, it is to the credit of many countries that they are really trying to stamp it out. Inflation solves nothing; it only creates more problems, for tomorrow as well as for today. The sooner it is eliminated the better for everyone.

In discussing social security, the Director-General asserts that it is everyone's right but he accepts that this implies extensive social solidarity – a big assumption. He clearly regards as intolerable the persistence of poverty in affluent societies which have the resources and the potential administrative skill to remove it. Unfortunately people are involved as well as resources and administrative skills. I really doubt whether it is possible totally to eliminate poverty in any society.

Certainly I believe this to be impossible at the national level. Ultimately, "human rights" means caring for people, and it is becoming increasingly clear that this is best done as close to people as possible – at individual, family, voluntary organisation and local authority level rather than nationally, still less internationally.

Multiple goals feature largely in the Director-General's survey of human rights discussions. The key issue from an ILO standpoint is the famous trilogy "full, productive and freely chosen employment". Their compatibility is far from obvious, however well they sound together. They constitute a grand goal but they await a new technology, so to speak.

Let us be frank: some people do not want very much to work nor to prepare themselves for work, and it may simply not be possible always to anticipate technological, demographic or societal changes. To talk of "societies' failure to ensure full employment" is to impute blame for what in the circumstances may be unavoidable. Human societies are complex and seldom flexible.

We must also accept that the economic problems of today are sometimes the social mistakes of yesterday. The Director-General himself draws attention to the rigidity of social and economic structures.

It would be nice if everyone in the world could have satisfying, productive and remunerative jobs, but to think that this will result automatically from governments giving adequate weight to and promoting employment, human resource development and poverty alleviation is not realistic.

Perhaps we should be fairer on governments than we sometimes are! Surely they would do good things more often if they were more easily done.

The answer lies in recognising that economic growth and social advancement share the same road – they are not on separate routes; either without the other is unstable, together they reinforce each other.

Implicit in many of the things which the Director-General has said is the question whether social consensus exists, is possible, or even if it is desirable. In the ILO, where the term consensus is a little carelessly used, we need to remember that there are many consensuses in the world which others regard as detestable. Everyone agreeing – or, in practice, not disagreeing too vocally – is not necessarily a good state of affairs.

In this house we should also ask ourselves whether tripartism is compatible with pluralism. Looking further afield: is global solidarity a sensible goal? I hope that the enjoyment of human rights by those who presently are denied them will not have to await the achievement of global solidarity.

The strictly limited power of governments to do good is a prominent notion of Sir Kark Popper. With it goes his conviction of the almost unlimited power of governments to do harm, economically, socially and in terms of national security.

This pessimistic view of governments, and by extension of supranational agencies, is not of course popular with politicians or bureaucrats, but it fits the facts better than starry-eyed faith in actions from on high. Leaving aside motive, Popper cautions us not to ask, or expect, too much from governments.

Popper's pessimistic or realistic view leads him to believe that the ability to get rid of a government without bloodshed is the essence of democracy. Looking around the world, there are not many countries that satisfy that criterion. Perhaps this is the first and most important human right that has somehow been lost sight of.

So far as I am concerned, of the elements in another famous trilogy "liberty, equality and fraternity" I have no hesitation in plumping for "liberty".

Interpretation from French: Mr. BARNABO (Workers' delegate, Togo) – Mr. President, on behalf of the workers of Togo grouped together in the National Confederation of Workers of Togo (CNTT), of the workers' delegation to this 75th Session of the International Labour Conference and on my own behalf, I should like to congratulate the President on his brilliant election to preside over this Session and on the excellent way in which he is conducting its debates.

My congratulations are also extended to all the Vice-Presidents – those who represent the governments and the employers, and particularly the Workers' Vice-President, my dear comrade Adiko.

I should also like to congratulate the Governing Body on the very efficient part it is playing in the general management of our Organisation and particularly in the good organisation of the present session of the Conference.

Finally, I should like to congratulate Mr. Francis Blanchard, Director-General of the International Labour Office, on the quality and clarity of his Report.

The agenda of the present session has very important items on it.

As regards the matters on the agenda every year, the Director-General's Report on the activities of the ILO in 1987 takes up some points of the utmost importance to my organisation. I refer to the World Employment Programme and the sectoral and regional activities of our Organisation.

The 75th Session of the International Labour Conference is taking place at a time when the whole world is going through a generalised crisis which shows no sign of ending. In these unsettled times, the workers of the industrialised countries are suffering great hardship as a result of economic recession which is leading to dismissals and retrenchment. Most economic sectors are affected, even ultra-modern industries such as electronics, while the financial sector is at its wit's end to recover from this situation.

The dollar, which is the benchmark currency, is undergoing major fluctuations. Investments for the creation of new jobs are jeopardised and as a result world unemployment has reached a very high rate.

The developing countries feel the effects of the crisis even more keenly. Many workers are losing their jobs, and young people who have acquired skills find no jobs in which to exercise them on the employment market.

In Africa, the countries south of the Sahara are forced to acquiesce in the economic recovery plan recommended by the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank.

All over Africa, this period is characterised by the closing down of state enterprises, privatisation leading to misunderstandings between the trade unions and political leaders, on the one hand, and between trade unions and employers on the other. The workers in certain African countries are paid no wages for two or three months at a time or even longer, while others receive only half their wage at the end of the month. Agreements between employers and employees are being revised in certain countries to take account of the economic context; in others they are purely and simply ignored.

The situation cannot improve unless a solution is found to the problems of the deterioration in the terms of trade and the burden of public debt for our countries.

In this difficult economic environment, trade unions must feel more concerned and must define their role in dealing with this phenomenon which seems to be enduring and to have become a fact. In our humble opinion, that role ranges from the settlement of collective or individual disputes with employers to the development of national and international employment policies. For these reasons our trade union confederation has been fighting since it was founded in January 1973 to secure the adoption and observance of collective contracts and agreements which will ensure a guaranteed career, fair wages and better social security. This is being done within the context of a policy of responsible participation involving consultation, negotiation and persuasion. In this context the trade unions greatly appreciate the understanding that prevails among all the social partners in our country.

The activities of the ILO concerning public works programmes, manpower planning and employment, information systems, the employment market, appropriate technologies, rural development, the situation of women workers and refugees and population questions are of great interest to us. We have greatly appreciated the special programmes of the ILO on basic problems of institutional support, the maintenance of infrastructures and the involvement of the people, as well as technical co-operation projects dealing with vocational training, programmes for co-operatives to formulate policies and co-operative strategies, revise legislation, train trainers and members of committees and the staff of the co-operative division. We have also greatly appreciated the programmes of action for the informal sector which are designed to promote employment and economic growth.

As concerns co-operatives, we consider that they afford effective means for enabling workers of both sexes in our developing countries to fend for themselves and improve their conditions of work and life.

For these reasons the National Confederation of Workers of Togo has faith in co-operative ventures and spares no effort to promote the development of co-operatives, especially consumer and production co-operatives.

Finally, our trade union confederation supports the ILO's programmes of action for the informal sector designed to promote employment and economic growth. It is in this spirit that we have helped to form several craft unions: for dressmakers and tailors, hairdressers, jewellers, mechanics, surveyors and topographers. At present, these unions are all grouped together in the National Federation of Arts and Crafts.

I should like to conclude my remarks by congratulating the Director-General of the ILO on everything that is being done to combat the policy of apartheid in South Africa, assuring him of the unswerving support of the workers of Togo. Apartheid has lasted too long and we make an earnest appeal to all the groups – Governments, Employers and Workers – to redouble their vigilance in the areas within their competence, to put an end to the regime of apartheid which is a blot on the civilised world. I wish every success to the 75th Session of our Conference, and reiterate the congratulations and support of the workers of my country to the Officers of the Conference, to the International Labour Office and to its Director-General, Mr. Francis Blanchard.

Interpretation from French: Mr. MAHMOUD (Minister of Employment and the Public Service, Mali) – It is great honour for me to address the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference and I take this opportunity of congratulating Mr. Bayreuther on his brilliant election, on behalf of the Government of the Republic of Mali and the Malian delegation, which I am leading at this session, and on my own behalf.

This election is a sign of confidence in Mr. Bayreuther's abilities and a well-deserved tribute to his country.

I should also like to congratulate the eminent persons who have been entrusted with assisting the President during this session. We are persuaded that our debates will take place in excellent conditions.

I also extend my warm congratulations to the Director-General of the International Labour Office and all his officials for the exceptional quality of the Report before us.

The wealth and relevance of the matters dealt with in this report augur well for an exceptionally fruitful debate, if only because this year the Report takes up the difficult problem of human rights.

This is of course no accident in so far as this year we are celebrating the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the anniversary of one of the key ILO Conventions in the field of human rights. I refer of course to the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

My country attaches special importance to the application of this Convention. Indeed, only if it is observed can there be any effective defence of workers' and employers' interests and a guarantee that they participate actively in economic and social life.

The universal value of the principles enshrined in this Convention has been often stressed at previous sessions of the Conference.

Only recently the 73rd Session adopted a resolution concerning the 40th anniversary of the adoption of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

As regards my own country a law recently adopted by Parliament has reinforced our arsenal of legislation concerning this matter.

What is more, a point of no less importance is being taken up, namely employment promotion and social security.

The creation of productive employment and reduction of poverty are the principal challenges which the ILO has to face. It is for this reason that the general discussion on rural employment promotion is very timely. Dynamic rural development is vital to our country because the majority of its active population live in rural areas. This initiative would certainly go a long way towards solving the problem of unemployment which arises in our countries.

However, in addition to this, our countries are now faced with grave problems such as the world economic crisis, drought and the burden of debt.

Any improvements in working conditions, the promotion of employment, social justice – the prerequisites of peace – and the fulfilment of men's aspirations are, alas, imperilled by the difficulties which I have just mentioned.

Like you, Mr. Director-General, we believe that the Conference must be a means whereby we can more effectively tackle the problems and policies of rural employment in our member States.

In this connection, my country has taken a decentralised and interdisciplinary approach to get village communities involved in their own development.

The ILO will, of course, draw strength from its ability to adapt and the quality of the answers it gives to the basic preoccupations of its member States, particularly the developing countries.

The international community, engaged in an effort to ensure peace and economic development, must struggle against the forces which deny human dignity to many thousands of human beings.

These retrograde forces, which we will continue to denounce, are Zionism and apartheid.

My country, while highly appreciative of the considerable efforts made by the ILO through its technical co-operation programmes for the benefit of both rural and urban peoples and while warmly thanking the Director-General and all his officials for making themselves available at all times, would express the hope that the ILO should be endowed with greater resources in order that it may undertake and pursue specific actions in favour of our countries.

(The Conference adjourned at 5.45 p.m.)

Provisional Record

Seventy-fifth Session, Geneva, 1988

Second item on the agenda: Programme and budget proposals and other financial questions

First Report of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives

1. The Finance Committee of Government Representatives met on 2 June 1988 with Mr. D.M.P.B. Dasanayake (Sri Lanka) as Chairman and Reporter, and Mr. J.P. Labat (Uruguay) as Vice-Chairman.

I. REQUEST OF THE GOVERNMENT OF THE REPUBLIC OF CHAD, UNDER PARAGRAPH 4 OF ARTICLE 13 OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANISATION, FOR PERMISSION TO VOTE

2. The Committee had before it a request from the Government of the Republic of Chad for permission to vote at the Conference. This request was referred to the Finance Committee as a matter of urgency in accordance with paragraph 1 of article 31 of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

3. The text of the request, dated 28 March 1988, is as follows:

(Translated from French)

The Ministry of Labour and Employment N'Djamena
Republic of Chad

N'Djamena, 28 March 1988

Dear Mr. Director-General,

I have the honour to refer to the arrangement for the settlement of the arrears of contributions due by the Government of the Republic of Chad to the International Labour Organisation that was approved by the 69th Session of the International Labour Conference in June 1983, under which an amount of $18,762 was due to be paid to the ILO before 31 December 1987.

I would now advise that due to extremely severe economic and financial conditions confronting my country, the above amount due to be paid in 1987 was paid on 18 January 1988, which represents a delay in payment of 18 days.

In the light of the very short delay on the above payment and as my country wishes to participate fully in the work of the International Labour Organisation, I would request that you transmit to the International Labour Conference my Government's request that its delegation to the 75th Session of the Conference in June 1988 be granted permission to vote in accordance with article 13, paragraph 4, of the Constitution of the Organisation.

Yours faithfully,

(Signed) ROUTOUANG YOMA GOLOM

II. REQUEST OF THE GOVERNMENT OF POLAND, UNDER PARAGRAPH 4 OF ARTICLE 13 OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANISATION, FOR PERMISSION TO VOTE

4. The Committee also had before it a request from the Government of Poland for permission to vote at the Conference. This request had been referred to the Committee as a matter of urgency in accordance with paragraph 1 of article 31 of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

5. The text of the request, dated 16 February 1988, is as follows:

(Translated from French)

Ministry of Labour and Social Policy Warsaw

Warsaw, 16 February 1988

Dear Mr. Director-General,

I should like to thank you for your letter of 16 December 1987 to Ambassador Bogumi Sujka, Permanent Representative of the Polish People's Republic to the United Nations Office in Geneva, in which you provided specific and valuable information regarding Poland's contributions to the ILO which have been in arrears since 1980.

You will recall that this issue was raised during your visit to Poland and later, towards the end of last year, in meetings between representatives of the International Labour Office and Mr. Zbigniew Borawski, Director-General in the Ministry of Labour and Social Policy. During these meetings, Mr. Borawski described the complex economic and financial situation in Poland and outlined Poland's proposals regarding settlement of its outstanding contributions.

I should like also to stress that the Polish authorities are making every effort to ensure that, in the second stage of the economic reform, it will be possible not only to improve the living conditions of the population, but also to fulfil our country's financial commitments abroad.

Bearing in mind the difficult situation in our country, I should like to submit the following proposals regarding payment of contributions to the ILO in arrears since 1980:

1. to pay the contributions due for 1980-87 in instalments, amounting to US$9,039,336 (US$8,229,228 plus US$810,048);
2. to spread the payment of the sum of US$9,039,336 over 20 years;
3. to pay in 1988 the contribution due for the current year and to continue regular payment of forthcoming contributions, together with that of contributions in arrears, in accordance with the decision to be taken by the Conference in June 1988.

I should like to assure you that, as the economic situation in our country improves, we shall adopt appropriate measures to shorten the period of settlement of our obligations towards the Organisation.

I should like to express the hope that our consultations and a favourable decision of the General Conference, together with your personal involvement, will make it possible this year to restore a situation in which Poland may enjoy full rights as a Member of the ILO.

Yours faithfully,

(Signed) IRENEUSZ SEKULA
Minister of Labour and Social Policy

The Director-General
International Labour Office
Geneva

6. The Committee noted that paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation provides as follows:

4. A Member of the Organisation which is in arrears in the payment of its financial contribution to the Organisation shall have no vote in the Conference, in the Governing Body, in any committee or in the elections of members of the Governing Body, if the amount of its arrears equals or exceeds the amount of the contributions due from it for the preceding two full years: provided that the Conference may by a two-thirds majority of the votes cast by the delegates present permit such a Member to vote if it is satisfied that the failure to pay is due to conditions beyond the control of the Member.

7. The Committee also noted that article 31 of the Standing Orders of the Conference provides as follows:

ARTICLE 31

Procedure where proposal is made to permit Member in arrears to vote

1. Any request or proposal that the Conference should nevertheless permit a Member which is in arrears in payment of its contributions to vote in accordance with article 13, paragraph 4, of the Constitution, shall be referred in the first instance to the Finance Committee of the Conference, which shall report thereon as a matter of urgency.

2. Pending a decision on the request or proposal by the Conference, the Member shall not be entitled to vote.

3. The Finance Committee shall submit to the Conference a report giving its opinion on the request or proposal.

4. If the Finance Committee, having found that the failure to pay is due to conditions beyond the control of the Member, thinks fit to propose to the Conference that the Member should nevertheless be permitted to vote in accordance with article 13, paragraph 4, of the Constitution, it shall in its report -

- (a) explain the nature of the conditions beyond the Member's control;
- (b) give an analysis of the financial relations between the Member and the Organisation during the preceding ten years; and
- (c) indicate the measures which should be taken in order to settle the arrears.

5. Any decision which may be taken by the Conference to permit a Member which is in arrears in the payment of its contribution to vote notwithstanding such arrears may be made conditional upon the Member complying with any recommendations for settling the arrears which may be made by the Conference.

8. The Committee had before it the following table showing the amounts due by the Republic of Chad for each of the years 1983 to 1988, together with the amounts paid during this period and the amounts remaining unpaid at the present time.

Year	(a)	Amounts of instalments due under the 1983 arrangement	Amounts paid	Amounts unpaid

9. The Committee recalled that the International Labour Conference at its 69th Session (1983) adopted an arrangement proposed by the Government of Chad for the settlement of the arrears of contributions due for the period 1975-82 amounting to $122,107. The terms of the arrangements were:

- (a) in 1983 the Republic of Chad will pay in full its contribution for the year 1983, amounting to $12,338;
- (b) in subsequent years the Republic of Chad will continue to pay its current contribution in full in the year for which it is due;
- (c) The Republic of Chad will settle the arrears that have accumulated up to and including 31 December 1982, amounting in total to $122,107, by the payment of 19 equal annual instalments of $6,105 beginning in 1984 and a final instalment of US$6,112.

10. The Committee noted that the Government of Chad had explained in its letter of 28 March 1988 why it had been unable to pay the amount of $18,762, due before 31 December 1987 by that date, and noted further that it had been paid on 18 January 1988.

11. The representative of France said that the request put forward by the Government of Chad merited special consideration and he strongly supported the proposal before the Committee.

12. The Committee being satisfied that the failure of the Republic of Chad to pay its arrears was due to conditions beyond its control, in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 4 of article 31 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, reports to the Conference as follows:

- (a) the Committee finds that the failure of the Republic of Chad to pay the amounts due in 1987 in conformity with the arrangement set out in paragraph 9 above is due to conditions beyond its control; these conditions are summarised in the letter appearing in paragraph 3 above;

- (b) the financial relations between the Republic of Chad and the Organisation for the past ten years have been as set out in paragraphs 8 and 9 above.
- (c) the Government of the Republic of Chad has paid the amounts due in 1987 on 18 January 1988, thus bringing itself up to date within the terms of the arrangement for the settlement of the Republic of Chad's arrears approved by the 69th Session (1983) of the Conference.

13. The Committee accordingly recommends unanimously the adoption by the Conference of the resolution concerning the granting to the Republic of Chad of permission to vote under paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation, the text of which appears at the end of this report.

14. The Committee also had before it the following table showing the amounts due by Poland for each of the years 1978 to 1988, together with the amounts paid during this period and the amounts remaining unpaid at present.

Year	Contributions assessed	Amounts paid	Contributions due
1978	1209 815	1 209 815	—
1979	1 664 534	1 664 534	—
1980	1 874 768	514 768	1 360 000
1981	1 180 341	—	1 180 341
1982	1 463 986	—	1 463 986
1983	1 517 632	—	1 517 632
1984	904 341	—	904 341
1985	904 341	—	904 341
1986	898 647	—	898 647
1987	810 048	—	810 048
Total	9 039 336

15. As at 2 June 1988 the total arrears of Poland amounted to $9,039,336. The amount of the contributions due from Poland for the last two full years (1986-87) was $1,708,695. Since the total arrears outstanding exceeded the last two full years' contributions by $7,330,641, under paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution Poland was not entitled to vote unless the Conference should decide, in accordance with that article, to grant the permission to vote.

16. The Committee, being satisfied that the failure of Poland to pay its arrears was due to conditions beyond its control, in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 4 of article 31 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, reports to the Conference as follows:

- (a) the Committee finds that the failure of Poland to pay its arrears is due to conditions beyond its control, as explained in the letter appearing in paragraph 5 above;
- (b) the financial relations between Poland and the Organisation for the preceding ten years have been set out in paragraphs 14 and 15 above;
- (c) the measures which should be taken in order to settle the arrears are as set out in the resolution concerning the arrears of contribution of Poland, the text of which appears at the end of this report.

The Committee accordingly recommends unanimously the adoption by the Conference of the resolution concerning the granting to Poland of permission to vote under paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation, the text of which appears at the end of this report.

17. The representative of Poland expressed his appreciation of the Committee's decision to recommend to the Conference the adoption of the resolution which would give his country permission to vote.

Provisional Record

Seventy-fifth Session, Geneva, 1988

Fifth sitting

Friday, 3 June 1988, 10 a.m.

President: Mr. Beyreuther

SECOND REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – The first item on the agenda is the second report of the Selection Committee. I call on Mr. Vargas, Government delegate, Nicaragua, Chairman of the Selection Committee, to submit the report.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. VARGAS (Government delegate, Nicaragua; Chairman of the Selection Committee) – It is my honour to submit to the Conference the second report of the Selection Committee, found in Provisional Record No. 5A.

This report refers, firstly, to the composition of the Committee on Apartheid. The Selection Committee recommends that the Committee on Apartheid be composed of 20 Government members, 14 Employers' members and 20 Workers' members. The list of the members of the Committee on Apartheid is appended to the report.

Secondly, the Committee recommends that the resolution concerning employment promotion and social security, which was published in Provisional Record No. 1, be referred to the Committee on Employment and Social Security.

The Selection Committee further recommends that the Palestine Liberation Organisation be invited to be represented in the Committee on Apartheid and the Resolutions Committee, in accordance with article 56, paragraph 10, of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

The Committee also recommends that a number of non-governmental international organisations should be invited to be represented at the 75th Session of the Conference and in one of its committees.

Finally, at the Committee's meeting, the Employers' spokesman mentioned that the late arrival of delegations' credentials is causing problems, inasmuch as it prevents us from knowing the exact composition of the Conference. His statement was supported by the Workers' group. It would be appropriate in future for governments to make a special effort to ensure that their credentials reach the Director-General within the time provided for by the Standing Orders.

I would like to recommend the adoption of the report to the Conference

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – The second report of the Selection Committee is now before the Conference. If there are no objections, I take it that the report is adopted?

Interpretation from German: THE PRESIDENT – Before we begin the general debate I would like to remind delegates that, in accordance with the Standing Orders, their statements should not exceed 15 minutes. I urge them to keep to this limit.

We now move on to the next item on the agenda, the discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. AL ANSARI (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Qatar) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate!

I am very happy, Mr. President, to begin my statement by congratulating you most heartily on behalf of the Qatar delegation and on my own behalf on your election as President of this session of the Conference.

Allow me also to express our complete confidence in your competence and wisdom, which will undoubtedly contribute, with the assistance of the various delegations, to the success of the session and to the achievement of the objectives it has set itself.

At each session the Director-General has presented us with a General Report dealing with the main problems facing our Organisation in the various fields of its activity. The Report is an objective one and remarkable by virtue of its overall approach and scope. It draws on the efforts made by the Members of our Organisation and the views they have expressed concerning the improvement of the working conditions, well-being and standard of living of all mankind.

This year, the Director-General has chosen as the theme of this Report one of the most noble causes in the long history of mankind. He has made a fervent plea on behalf of man, who finds himself confronted by forces responsible for developing general policies and taking decisions which touch upon the fate of society and individuals who make it up and which determine international social relations. The Report is dedicated to the cause of human rights as defined in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights which was proclaimed 40 years ago and which has guaranteed the dignity of man and his freedoms, and has established a link between the meaning of his existence and his ability to express himself freely in an atmosphere of dignity, freedom, security and peace.

The International Labour Organisation, with its achievements both before and after the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, is seen as the conscience of mankind, bearing the brunt in dealing with the problems faced by societies, groups and individuals, particularly with respect to the rights and freedoms connected with the problems of labour, and at the same time bearing responsibility for finding the best solutions to those problems through reliance on the Organisation's own efforts and abilities and on international efforts that might contribute to alleviating the problems and their effects upon the lives of individuals and upon peace and stability in social relations. The rights and freedoms relating to labour problems are, as the Director-General says, an integral part of human rights; they are indivisible and inalienable.

The International Labour Organisation, due to the human spirit which has been a distinguishing feature throughout its history, and due to its active role, has succeeded in dealing with the problems of labour and the rights of workers and in establishing an impressive array of international labour standards in the form of Conventions and Recommendations, each of which can be regarded as a declaration of principles, a plan of work, an equitable solution for all the interested parties and a detailed, practical manifestation of human rights. In the light of these standards, the Organisation has endeavoured to improve the working conditions of workers as far as is possible.

However, we need only to look at the realities of life for people on this globe to realise that, despite the achievements already made in questions of the rights, freedoms and safeguards necessary for a dignified life, there is still a great deal to be done before the body of principles, standards and objectives set by the international community for the purpose of assuring rights, freedoms, security, peace, justice and well-being can be put into effect. There are still numerous areas where people are living in deplorable conditions and where their basic rights, freedoms and dignity are trampled upon. This situation should prompt us, as well as all the forces and institutions concerned, to redouble our efforts to eradicate injustice and to create the requisite conditions to enable people to enjoy their rights and freedoms in a climate of peace and stability.

The Director-General also referred to a basic truth that must be taken into account in dealing with human rights. Certain States are faced with very difficult economic and social conditions that prevent them from strictly observing the standards and rights established. In some cases conditions may even have deteriorated with regard to acquired rights.

The logical approach to such situations would undoubtedly be an objective assessment of the specific conditions and a wholehearted response in the form of co-operation and assistance to enable those countries to overcome their difficulties.

We would like to point out here that rigour as well as flexibility are required in examining the application of international labour standards since the ratification of Conventions, although a definite indicator, is not the only one to take into account. If delays occur in ratifying Conventions, this does not necessarily mean that the members concerned are not applying all or some of the standards set. This is the approach that has been adopted by the ILO authorities and is deserving of our gratitude and appreciation. Qatar, for instance, has not yet ratified certain international labour Conventions but this in no way diminishes our concern to respect their provisions in our practical labour relations. For example, we take pains to make job opportunities available to all our citizens, to provide social security and medical insurance, to make monthly financial payments to the handicapped, old people, widows, orphans and divorced women, and to assure everyone of a dignified life. It goes without saying that the precepts of our religion, as well as those of other revealed religions, teach social solidarity, the need to help those in want and the combating of poverty by all possible means, since we believe that poverty is a fearful phenomenon which we hope will shortly be eradicated from the face of the earth. Apart from the sufferings it inflicts, poverty represents an enormous waste of energies that could otherwise be used to contribute to development and progress in the world. I should perhaps mention in this connection that one of the problems with which mankind must deal is the arms race and the development of weapons of mass destruction while millions of people are suffering from hunger, every sort of privation and even from the lack of the most basic human needs.

Human rights must in fact be a common responsibility, not in the academic sense but in the sense of a specific and practical commitment to safeguard them. In this domain the ILO has a special mission and role. The Director-General, in speaking of equality of opportunity and treatment in employment alluded to the situation in the Arab territories. He stated that the continued occupation was leading to a deterioration of the situation and that the ILO should continue to give assistance to Arab workers so long as the occupation remained in force. In speaking of human rights there inevitably come to mind the revealing pictures of the violations of human rights and the inhuman practices used with regard to the citizens of areas such as Palestine, the occupied Arab territories and South Africa.

While thanking the Director-General for the position he has taken, we consider that the action of the International Labour Organisation should be commensurate with the acts committed by the occupation authorities. For more than 40 years the Arab people of Palestine have been the victims of the harshest forms of oppression both within and outside the occupied territories. This is confirmation of the fact that their enemies have a premeditated plan to eliminate them. Their terrible sufferings have taught the Palestinians to regard life and death in the same light, and that is why they have risen up as one man to lay claim to their freedom and to a dignified life on their land. The response has been a resurgence of death, repression, arrests, confiscation of land, the destruction of houses and banishment. Through force of circumstances it is not possible to recognise the right of this people to self-determination in the same way as other peoples since, in the view of Zionism, that would constitute proof of the existence of a Palestinian people and of a Palestinian homeland.

If we are really seeking to respect human rights, the least we could do is to cry out the truth in the face of the oppressor and the aggressor and stand by an oppressed and attacked people. We consider that the least we could do would be to take similar measures to those that have been taken against the racist regime of South Africa, especially in view of the fact that Zionist policy and Israeli practices are of an even more aggressive nature since they are aimed at ridding the land of its inhabitants, not merely ex-plotting them and violating their rights and freedoms. This prompts us to reappraise Israel's participation as a Member of this Organisation.

An another subject, we consider that it is necessary at this session of the Conference for us to take a stand on the continuing war between Iraq and Iran and the danger it poses to our entire region. This danger has recently assumed new proportions with the extension of the so-called "war of the cities", in other words the death of civilian populations not participating in the war. A war at this level is without doubt a threat to the most important of human rights, namely the right to life. There is also, of course, the threats to shipping in the Gulf and the damage suffered by States which are not party to the conflict.

This is why we consider it our duty, in the International Labour Organisation, to condemn those who insist on pursuing this war and to call for an immediate halt to this devastating war and for the establishment of peace and good-neighbourly relations between the peoples of the two warring countries.

This august international assembly gathered here at this session of the Conference, when discussing the question of human rights, can only express its disquiet at the assaults upon those rights which are taking place in various regions of the world, and call for measures to be taken to deter those who are continuing their acts of aggression, repression and humiliation against third parties, and declare that it is time for the international organisations to be open henceforth only to the good citizens of the world. In that way we shall preserve the pure image which the peoples of the world have of these organisations, just as we shall preserve the hopes which they place in them to guarantee their freedom and dignity.

In conclusion, I should like to express once again my profound gratitude and esteem to the Director-General for his excellent Report and wish this session of the Conference every possible success in its work.

Mrs BAPPOO (Government delegate, Mauritius) – I am honoured again, this year, to be given the opportunity to address the impressive gathering of member countries of the International Labour Organisation at the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference.

On behalf of the delegation of my country and in my own name, I join the preceding speakers in congratulating you warmly on your election to the chairmanship of this Conference. We are confident that your leadership will bring our discussions to a successful conclusion.

Again this year, my Government has respected the Constitution of the ILO and has sent a fully tripartite, albeit modest, delegation to the Conference. My Government will continue to press for some form of financial assistance to be given to faraway countries to attend our meetings in Geneva. Otherwise, the effective participation of many countries may soon be lost.

This year, our work will centre around employment creation and social security, a burning subject. As we have already seen, it is of particular relevance to young people, for whom a reorientation of educational and training patterns is essential. We place great hopes in the ILO's contribution to the fundamental human problem of job security.

Another item of special interest to my country is safety in construction. I will readily admit that the rate of accidents is high on construction sites in my country and I hope that we will come out of this meeting with positive measures to reduce suffering and improve productivity in this sector.

Apartheid, yet another item on the agenda, is now recognised as the most loathsome legalised system of treatment of human beings in the twentieth century. Our stand is clear on this issue. We will co-operate with all countries of Africa to eradicate apartheid from our continent.

All these issues will require international co-operation so that we all learn from one another and use our knowledge for the benefit of our countries and our peoples.

I had barely reached Geneva when delegates were teasing me on our "economic success". It is true that we have experienced a certain progress. The recipe which we used was quite simple, after all – a full dose of political stability by democratic means, a total belief in the Government's will to development, a vigorous push towards a mixed economy, quick adaptation of the population to modern methods of production, friendly relations with all countries and a matching policy of social justice.

I must lay stress on the last ingredient – that is the element of social justice. Not only have we reduced unemployment from 22 per cent to 4 per cent, inflation from 18 per cent to 2 per cent, while maintaining a rate of growth of over 5 per cent, but have given substantial wage increases and fringe benefits in the most important economic sectors and also an increase across the board for everybody. Our policy of sharing the national wealth with its producers has resulted in an increase in the total wage bill by 37 per cent within five years.

We are now consolidating and broadening the economic base, and going forward with intensive training to meet the increasingly complex needs of our agricultural and industrial development.

Again, we will match economic development with social considerations. We are conscious of the turmoil created within the workforce by the restructuring of the agricultural sector and by rapid industrialisation. With the assistance of the ILO, we have launched an intensive workers' education programme so that workers and their representatives can face the situation of today and of years to come. The credibility of the project has been achieved by the presence of the head of the relevant department of the ILO in person at its launching.

We are also upgrading our legislation and the level of training of our technical staff in factory inspection so as to provide a healthier and safer working environment, and here, too, the ILO is proving to be of immense help.

We are also progressing with our policy of providing better welfare well beyond the workplace, and the two most important economic sectors now have the financial resources to look at the welfare of workers within the family and the community.

These examples demonstrate our will to bring about social justice in our country, for we believe that progress has, as its ultimate aim, the improvement of the quality of life of the whole population.

While taking all these measures, we have created the mechanism for harmonious relations. Only 50 years ago, the workers of my country had to shed their blood and life to be recognised as human beings and to have a labour office created for them. Today, every citizen enjoys freedom, equality and dignity. An impressive set of labour laws provides for fundamental rights, basic conditions of employment in all sectors and a comprehensive system for industrial relations. For a potential working population of 432,000, my service covers the whole of the country's 2,000 square kilometres with 40 sub-officers and a technical staff of 118 to provide law enforcement, health and safety at work, good industrial relations and workers' education. This infrastructure and the degree of maturity of our society enables us to say that confrontation among the social partners, which we used to have in the 1970s, can and must be replaced by consultation.

We are introducing the concept of consultation wherever possible so that, even where consensus is not reached, the final decision is taken after all voices have been heard. This is our practice of tripartism which, to us, is the path of harmonious relations where the combining of efforts is leading to socio-economic progress.

If I have dwelt somewhat on my own country, it is because I wish to point out that my Government believes profoundly in social justice obtained through social peace and in social peace obtained by social justice. We will continue with this policy because we think that it will continue to pay dividends, and yet, our efforts may be shattered by happenings in the international field in so many countries.

We all honour one another by joining together, year after year, to participate in the shaping of a just and peaceful society for our countries. If we all work effectively towards the aims we agree upon here, our individual societies will continue to evolve for the upholding of the dignity of man in freedom and equality, for mixed economy to prosper, for the working class to have its voice heard, and for the people to be cared for by its true representatives. The 40th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia this year should remind all of us that a society can change only in peace, harmony and mutual respect.

The International Labour Office can play a positive role in this respect. In my country, for example, it is helping in our development and the maintenance of social peace in many areas like workers' education, health and safety. I take this opportunity to express my deep gratitude to Mr. Francis Blanchard, the Director-General, for his keen interest in Mauritius. Indeed, he was represented by his Deputy to participate in the local celebrations which we organised last month to mark the Golden Jubilee of the Mauritian Labour Administration.

We have, in our Office, a tremendous wealth of knowledge, expertise and guidance which we could use more effectively for our socio-economic progress. My country can boast of having positive and friendly relations with all the departments of the Office. It is these very harmonious relations which allow me to invite the attention of the Director-General to the need for restructuring his women's department.

Thus, if we have the will, we also have the mechanism of this august institution to work towards the happiness of our people, on the one hand, and towards dialogue among our countries, on the other hand.

(The speaker continues in French.)

Because my country is multilingual, I should like to end my statement in French. We, the representatives of governments, the employers' organisations and the workers' organisations, are all constantly searching for justice, peace and harmony. Man will be increasingly enlightened by this search. Let us therefore combine our efforts and strengthen the links of a lasting chain of world brotherhood. Small and humble Mauritius, the meeting-place of tolerance, stretches out the hand of friendship to all peoples, so that man's happiness on earth, which we have all come to seek here, may be ensured.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. GOMEZPERALTA DAMIRON (Under-Secretary for Labour and Social Welfare, Mexico) – Mr. President, the Mexican delegation would like to express its most cordial congratulations to you on your election.

It is now 40 years since the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. There is no denying the close link between the activities of the ILO and the enjoyment and preservation of human rights, as the Director-General of the ILO has emphasised in his Report.

Today, the world of work is facing different but no less serious problems from those of the time of the Declaration; a generalised crisis, recession, structural readjustment, demographic trends and new technologies.

Their effects are disrupting the standard of living and preventing access to indispensable goods and services. Shortages make poverty all the worse and raise the spectre of social disruption. Structural changes taking place, involving extreme, irrevocable decisions and increasing uncertainty as regards the future. Demographic trends complicate forecasts, given the disparity of measures envisaged to achieve ideal population models. Incessant technological and scientific progress in many of its aspects overtakes existing structures and changes the very concept of labour. We think that life is organised by science, whereas in fact life orders itself according to its own values.

Today, the standard of living is a global concern. But it is not the only problem. Where all ought to have the same rights, we can still see differences on the one hand and, on the other hand, unequal opportunities.

Every State is working to overcome the evils of our time. Every State, with its own instruments and resources and with its own formulas, is taking up the challenge of inflation and unemployment, insecurity, lack of social protection, malnutrition and bad health conditions.

In Mexico, once again it has become clear that concertation is the way to find a solution to the problems caused for our country by the major economic crises of recent years.

In 1917, 71 years ago, minimum labour standards and rights were included in the Constitution, as a true expression of the values of a culture in which equity and concertation constitute the source of peace and social harmony. Equity is the basis of justice; concertation has characterised the solutions we have found to social problems, based on combining the interests of capital and labour. Its role is the establishment of working conditions and solidarity to oppose the great evils besetting us.

Therefore, Mexican labour law, a synthesis of equity and concertation, has been rather more than just a code that has to be respected; it has been a combination of standards which help us to live; a combination of voices answering the questions which these times of crisis pose for us today.

In the last year, in the last few months, when we were running the risk of seeing progress that we have made in the structure of the Mexican economy nullified, and in the face of the need to provide a more definite prospect for foreseeable economic evolution and effective protection for the purchasing power of incomes, the Government, the workers, the peasants and Mexican entrepreneurs combined in an action reflecting our realities, different from the actions taken in other latitudes and appropriate to our own way of life: to work out and agree a covenant pooling and strengthening each one's efforts against inflation, loss of real income, the shortcomings of the market and the problems of public finance.

This Covenant of Economic Solidarity, resulting from a renewed effort of national concertation, with the aim of attacking the roots of inflation and avoiding reduced purchasing power or worsening conditions of employment for the low-income population, particularly workers with fixed incomes and the middle class, has been able to reassure producers, traders and providers of services that the evolution of their costs will generate a favourable environment which will avoid a change in prices. Thus, it has been possible in a period of five months to reduce inflation from the 15.5 per cent recorded in January to 8.2 per cent in February, 5.1 per cent in March, 3.1 per cent in April and 1.7 per cent in May. And thus, we were able to provide support for everybody's attitude regarding the protection of real income and to fight for the elimination of extreme conditions leading to injustice and disturbance.

The economic panorama in Mexico is now different. Once again, equity and concertation have put us on the right road to finding a solution.

I think I may say that amongst the economic difficulties that we are now decisively attacking through the Covenant and in order to counteract the effects of the crisis, we have strengthened our capability for action in labour institutions such as social security, housing programmes, income and consumption protection for workers, the system of profits and benefits distribution and the promotion and development of co-operatives and other ways of establishing enterprises in the social sector.

We have not allowed our productive basis to be destroyed. The employment index, based on a clear method of determination using social security records applying only to new permanent posts, has shown an average of 3.5 per cent growth in the last five years.

In the 75,000 strikes that have taken place in the federal jurisdiction in the last five years, the success of conciliation has been such that only 1.4 per cent created major problems. Practically 5,000 collective agreements under the same jurisdiction, on the other hand, show advances in economic and labour benefits.

The creation of productive jobs and reduction of poverty, as the Director-General of the ILO says in his Report, continues to be one of the most difficult problem facing the Organisation today.

The Organisation's task is to propose solutions to the working world which are practical at all times and for everybody, not simply pie in the sky, that would include the worker, the lynchpin of our time.

Without justice the word "progress" has no meaning. Justice is the basis of progress in social security and employment in all its aspects, freedom of association, equality of opportunity and treatment. No crisis, no new technology can supersede the enjoyment of human rights. Nothing should prevent the growth and development of countries.

As the President of Mexico has said. Nothing should be done to reduce the standard of living of the peasants or reduce the real incomes of workers.

We must not forget that this would be a different world without the economic disruptions that we have suffered in the last few years which so far have not been combated by a global policy of justice and equity, a policy to distinguish our time not by reason of the problems assailing us but by reason of the just means, over and above the proclamations and declarations, that we may find of resolving them.

Mexico has taken part in international forums with the inspiration of free men to achieve the agreement of all nations in the search for the material and spiritual welfare of all peoples; that is why we support the international organisations which propose and seek the universal good.

Mexico joins each one of you in solidarity, in our struggle against inequality and in favour of justice in the working world. That is the reason for our coming here today. Between all of us, for all of us, let us protect human rights.

Mr. LEE KIM SAI (Minister of Labour, Malaysia) - Mr. President, on behalf of the Malaysian delegation to the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference I wish to congratulate you on your election as the President of this Conference. I am confident that you will steer the proceedings of this Conference smoothly and bring it to a successful conclusion. I also wish to take this opportunity to offer my congratulations to the three Vice-Presidents who have been elected to assist you.

The Report of the Director-General gives a clear and comprehensive account of the wide-ranging activities of the ILO both in the fields of human rights and of technical assistance. The ILO is not specifically charged with responsibility on human rights; nevertheless, on account of its role in the cause of workers and their rights, matters concerning human rights feature prominently in the work of the Organisation. As the Director-General states in his Report, though the expression "human rights" as such does not appear anywhere in the Constitution, the concept nevertheless pervades the constitutional objectives and principles of the ILO, and all ILO activities are related to matters concerned with human rights in one way or another.

As a representative of a developing country, permit to express some of my views on these and other issues that are before us. Since attaining independence in 1957, we in Malaysia have devoted our attention and energies to the building of a united nation of peoples of divergent race, culture and religion. This is not an easy task, but it is made even more difficult by the fact that in Malaysia race is generally identified with economic functions. Thus, we are also engaged in restructuring Malaysian society so as to reduce and eventually eliminate the identification of the different races with wealth or affluence. Our economy, which is an open one and dependent on international trade, is also subject to the fluctuations of international markets.

Our policies on trade, investments, national development and other questions have contributed to the overall economic growth of the country. This has led to the creation of many jobs for our growing workforce. However, in the past few years, we have been faced with difficulties due to the global economic downturn which has seriously affected the Malaysian economy and caused a considerable increase in the rate of unemployment.

Despite these setbacks, our overall success hitherto has contributed towards the improvement in the general standard of living of our people, including our workers. Today we have succeeded in reducing the incidence of poverty to about half of what it was when we achieved independence in 1957. There have also been considerable improvements in income distribution which have led to the emergence of a growing middle-income group.

Policies on labour and labour legislation, while basically safeguarding the rights and interests of workers, are also designed to contribute to overall economic growth. Malaysia's labour laws are tailored to ensure the adequate protection of our workers as well as to maintain industrial harmony. Malaysian employers and their interest are also protected. Tripartite consultation and co-operation is practised in Malaysia in the formulation and enforcement of labour legislation at the highest level through the National Labour Advisory Council under my chairmanship.

As with all other aspects of Malaysian society, the freedom, rights and privileges accorded to our workers and employers are not unlimited. Nevertheless, the freedom and benefits enjoyed by all workers have led to the growth of a strong and independent workers' trade union movement in Malaysia. Most of our trade unions are affiliated to a variety of international trade union organisations. These organisations have in turn appointed a number of Malaysian trade unionists as their regional or area representatives to propagate and further develop the trade union movement in the countries of Asia and the Pacific region. This is a clear acknowledgement by these international organisations of the strength and progress of the Malaysian trade union movement and is a clear testimony to the freedom and rights that it enjoys in our country. Similarly, the Malaysian employers, too, have well-developed organisations that have also come to be recognised internationally as being some of the premier organisations in the region.

There are different approaches and methods in addressing issues of human rights and freedom of association. In Malaysia they have evolved and developed in the context of local cultures, customs and habits and in keeping with the socio-economic and political features of the country. They no doubt differ from those of Western democracies, but then we should not be judged by Western standards and values. In our context the right to employment and the right to a decent standard of living are the more important aspects of human rights.

In considering human rights issues I observe that the recommendation of the Brandt Commission has called for internationally agreed fair labour standards as a means of facilitating trade liberalisation. However, taking into account the tremendous disparity between the developed and developing countries in so many areas, it is, in my view, not possible to draw up internationally acceptable fair labour standards. What is considered fair in one country may not be so in another. Fair labour standards, being subjective, are really determined by various factors such as the prevailing economic and social conditions and the state of development of a country. While labour standards as an ideal are objectives that nations should aspire to achieve, the imposition of certain standards on developing countries appears to me to be a perpetuation of the disparity between the developed and developing countries.

I am convinced that the ILO has a great role to play in contributing to reduce global inequalities. For example, as the Report of the Director-General states, the activities of the Organisation during past years show the considerable scope and potential that the ILO possesses in rendering technical assistance. Malaysia has also benefited from such assistance which is greatly appreciated. In my view there ought to be a greater intensification of such activities in providing pragmatic assistance to Third World States. Such assistance should be given liberally without any conditions such as their linkage to issues related to international labour standards.

The International Labour Organisation can and should transform itself into a dynamic and vibrant institution through its technical assistance programmes. There is a great deal of technical expertise and professionalism within the Organisation which are needed in developing countries. The ILO should be clearly seen as playing a complementary and supplementary role in the overall development of the developing countries rather than being seen in a role that is inconsistent with national priorities or the more urgent needs of these countries.

This calls for a shift in emphasis in the programme of activities of the International Labour Organisation from those concerned with standard-setting activities to those of technical assistance based on the needs and priorities of the developing countries. We must acknowledge the growing necessity for this change which can go a long way in reducing friction and confrontation between the developed and developing countries.

The Director-General in his Report also states that those who proclaimed the aim of universal enjoyment of human rights needed to prove their sincerity by greater efforts and greater sacrifices to reduce the gap between rich and poor, between the developed and developing countries of the world. Previously the Director-General had called for faith in multilateral co-operation as the means of promoting universal peace and understanding.

However, many of us from the Third World are becoming more disillusioned and disappointed with the existing political, economic and social order of the world. While not all the blame for our plight today can be placed on the developed countries there is no denying that there is a lack of understanding and goodwill in these countries in truly wanting to assist in the development of less developed countries. Such an attitude has manifested itself very often in multilateral negotiations.

The ILO, which was established in 1919, is today a global organisation. The critical issues confronting many of us in the Third World are far removed from those of the founding fathers. While the high ideals and noble aims and objectives of the ILO may be as valid today as they were when first established, the means of achieving these objectives have changed drastically.

The differences in perceptions and approaches to these and other issues have led to the development of a North-South debate in a number of ILO meetings in recent times. Such confrontations clearly stem from a sense of frustration and disenchantment on the part of the developing countries. It is my view that the International Labour Organisation, being the oldest United Nations agency, should take heed of these developments and respond in a more positive manner to the aspirations of the developing countries. This is the only way to ensure the continued strength and unity of the Organisation.

The Director-General states that the slowing down in the rate of ratification of ILO standards in recent years is not unrelated to the economic difficulties faced by many countries. I fully agree with him. It is the economic, social and political development of the countries of the Third World and the narrowing of the gap between the North and the South which are the real key to the greater attainment of human rights, social justice and the universal observance of international labour standards.

In conclusion, I call upon the ILO to display greater pragmatism in the efforts to achieve the objectives of the Organisation in its future programmes and activities.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. AL-KHALIFA (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Bahrain) – In the name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful! Mr. President, on behalf of the Bahrain delegation and in my own name it gives me pleasure to congratulate you on your election to the presidency of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference, wishing you every success in running the affairs of this session, and in reaching its objectives.

I would also like to express to the Director-General of the ILO our deep appreciation for the clarity and objectivity that characterise his Report on the question of human rights and on the great challenges facing the ILO in its endeavours to make social justice, equality and human dignity the fundamental principles of human rights and the basis of all activities undertaken by the Organisation.

We agree with the Director-General that the major challenges facing the ILO in its promotion of human rights require effective political will and sincere international solidarity in order to consolidate world economic co-operation and counteract the adverse impact of economic protectionism, indebtedness and unemployment. Moreover, we support the Director-General when he says that the ILO must reinforce the defence of human rights through a positive dialogue concerning international labour standards and technical co-operation activities in the next few years. We also support the conclusions of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment which was held in November 1987, and the concern it expressed over the adverse impact of economic policies adopted by the major industrial countries and the increasing indebtedness of the Third World countries. We wish to stress another conclusion reached by this meeting, namely the role of the ILO in such circumstances, in terms of efforts to increase the rate of growth and the creation of employment, thus complementing the activities of the other international organisations. I am confident that this Conference will be able to launch new initiatives and adopt guidelines that will help the ILO to consolidate human rights in the Medium-Term Plan 1990-95.

Appendix III of the Director-General's Report contains an account of the conditions of Arab workers in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories. In this context, I should like to refer to the findings of the ILO mission, namely the continued policies of the Israeli authorities who are guilty of discrimination and violation of human rights and fundamental freedoms, and the adverse impact of this policy on local possibilities of development. These practices are a flagrant violation of all international norms – customs charters, agreements and conventions – and contradict the letter and spirit of the ILO Constitution, Conventions and Recommendations. I would appeal to this Conference to condemn these Israeli acts of oppression and terror which are designed to deprive thousands of young Palestinians of work by breaking their arms and legs and thus disabling them for life. I also call upon this Conference to denounce the continued refusal of the Israeli authorities to abide by the two resolutions adopted by the ILO Conference in 1974 and 1980. I am fully confident that this Conference will endorse the proposals of the Governing Body and the Director-General and international funds for development, so that efforts may increase to extend all forms of support and technical assistance to the Arab workers and employers in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories. I should also like to point out that it is important for the Conference to set up a special committee at each of its sessions to study the periodic reports submitted by the Director-General to the Conference on the condition of Arab workers and employers in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories, the assistance granted them and the reports submitted by other international organisations. This committee could submit a report on its conclusions for discussion by the Conference at one of its sittings.

Mr. CHRISTOPHIDES (Minister of Labour and Social Insurance, Cyprus) – Mr. President, may I join all those who preceded me in congratulating you on your election to the presidency of this session of the International Labour Conference. The Cyprus delegation is confident that under your experienced leadership and patient guidance this session will be led through constructive debate to effective and substantive conclusions.

At the threshold of the twenty-first century numerous and grave are the problems which are threatening international peace and the political and social stability of many developing countries.

Despite the scientific and technological progress accomplished during the twentieth century and the abundance of food and goods it has produced, the majority of mankind lives under degrading conditions of poverty.

The ambitious target of the United Nations to build a world based on peace, security and justice is far from being realised. Despite the principles and efforts of the United Nations, foreign aggression, occupation, racial discrimination and violation of human rights continue unabated.

The Declaration of Philadelphia affirms that "all human beings, irrespective of race, creed or sex, have the right to pursue their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity". These noble aims remain for the majority of mankind a remote and unseizable hope.

It is against this background that we view as very pertinent the decision of the Director-General to select human rights as the central theme for his Report. Cyprus, which has experienced massive and flagrant violations of the human rights of its people as a result of the tragic events of 1974, is particularly sensitive to this matter.

We fully agree with the Director-General that there is a gap between the principles laid down in the wealth of international texts dealing with human rights and the reality prevailing in the world. To bridge this gap a sustained and global effort is needed. Particularly, the ILO should continue its important role in the promotion and defence of human rights by strengthening even further the links between international labour standards and technical co-operation activities, and by harmonising its efforts with those of other components of the United Nations system. Equally imperative in promoting the enjoyment of human rights is international co-operation and international solidarity: as rightly pointed out by the Director-General, human rights are indeed a common responsibility.

The Republic of Cyprus from the outset of its independence has pledged its full commitment to the cause of human rights. Both internally and externally we have worked energetically and consistently for the promotion of the principles contained in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and other relevant international instruments.

The central aim and ultimate objective of the social and economic policy of the Government of Cyprus has been the achievement of social justice and the improvement of the quality of life for all through employment, education, training, social security, the establishment and operation of free and independent social institutions, the promotion of tripartite co-operation and the observance of human rights in general.

More specifically, to follow the points made in the Report, freedom of association is guaranteed by article 21 of our Constitution and safeguarded through the ratification of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98. Our system of industrial relations, governed by the procedures stipulated in a freely agreed upon Industrial Relations Code and based on free negotiations and freely concluded collective agreements, is a model of tripartite co-operation.

Equal opportunity and treatment are guaranteed by article 28 of the Constitution, the right to freely chosen employment by article 25 and the right to just and favourable remuneration by article 26, which protects the citizens from exploitation and recognises the right to freely concluded contracts.

Cyprus has ratified and observes fully the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) and the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122). A major development in Cyprus, since the last session of the Conference, for the promotion of equality among men and women in employment opportunities and benefits has been the ratification of the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100).

The right to just and favourable conditions of work is realised through specific legislation and the ratification of the appropriate Conventions including the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), the Guarding of Machinery Convention, 1963 (No. 119), and the more recent Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155), to mention but a few.

Finally, the right to social security is recognised in article 9 of the Constitution of the Republic of Cyprus as one of the basic human rights to which everyone is entitled.

From the very beginning the Government of Cyprus set, among its development priorities, the progressive improvement of social security. The limited personal and material scope of the Social Insurance Scheme, which Cyprus inherited from the colonial government, was gradually, but steadily, extended to protect adequately every person gainfully employed on the island. Moreover, through legislation introduced in 1975, a minimum standard of living is guaranteed to every citizen who cannot secure for himself and his family the basic necessities of life.

We, therefore, fully share the view of the Director-General of the ILO that in determining the measures to be taken in all fields of social security, three basic principles should be borne in mind: universality of protection, equality and solidarity among the members of society.

What I have said so far provides, I believe, sufficient evidence of the importance which the Government of Cyprus attaches to human rights and of the significant contribution of the ILO in their realisation.

By the above I am, by no means, suggesting that everything possible has already been achieved. We are well aware that social economic realities keep changing. Foreseeing, facing and influencing the implications of the new realities leaves much scope for action both at the national and international level.

At this point, and bearing in mind the statement of the Director-General that human rights are indivisible, I believe that it would be an omission not to express my Government's regret that a large number of the people of Cyprus are still deprived of the enjoyment of certain basic rights and fundamental freedoms such as the right to property, freedom of movement and freedom of settlement in one's own country because of the continued occupation for 14 years now of approximately 37 per cent of the island.

In conclusion, I would like to express my Government's appreciation for the ILO's significant contribution in the realisation of human rights, and to congratulate the Director-General for his thought-provoking Report.

The common objective of all Members of the ILO should be to streamline our actions in the field of human rights with the ultimate aim of creating a world community in which freedom, human dignity, justice and peace will prevail.

Mr. YAHAYA (Government delegate, Ghana) – Mr. President, allow me first of all to extend to you, on behalf of my delegation of Ghana, on my own behalf, my warmest congratulations for your well-merited election to this high office. I am confident that your wide experience and knowledge will lead the discussions of this session to a very successful conclusion.

My heartiest felicitations are also due to the Workers', Government and Employers' Vice-Presidents and finally to the Director-General and his staff who have as always worked hard to keep our Organisation on an even keel.

The Director-General has presented us with an extremely interesting Report on a problem which, as the title of the Report indicates, is of concern to millions of people throughout the world. Human rights is truly a common responsibility of us all and so it is opportune that on the occasion of the 40th anniversary of the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and one of the ILO's key human rights Conventions – the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and 20 years after the International Year for Human Rights, we should reaffirm our faith in these codes and the Declaration of Philadelphia and take stock of our performance in their implementation. The Report of the Director-General gives us a wide and thorough basis for this important exercise.

By its Constitution, the ILO undertakes to ensure that all people, irrespective of race, creed or sex, enjoy reasonable living and working conditions, economic security and develop intellectually in freedom and dignity. The Declaration of Philadelphia also basically enjoins the ILO to work towards the freedom, equality, economic security and dignity of man. These aims and objectives are as relevant today as they were at the time of their formulation as reflected in the ILO's Medium-Term Plan for the period 1990-95. The Medium-Term Plan stresses that the Organisation's future activities will be concentrated in the following areas: encouraging employment growth, vocational training, the improvement of working conditions, living standards and economic security and the defence of workers' rights.

Since its inception, the ILO has done a great deal for the promotion and protection of human rights. Many Conventions relating to human rights have been ratified by States Members and many legislative systems have followed recommendations in this respect. In fact, to date, the ILO has adopted 166 Conventions and 174 Recommendations on a very varied range of subjects on social policy and labour issues. They have contributed significantly to the improvement of the living and working conditions of workers as well as raising their economic security. I am proud to be able to say that within the limits of its resources, both human and material, and having regard to its present stage of development, my country has not failed in its obligation to ratify and implement those Conventions and Recommendations which deal with such fundamental human rights as freedom of association, equality of opportunity, the right of collective bargaining, the advantages of a social security system and a system of wage protection. In addition, Ghana can take legitimate pride in the fact that within its territory there is no form of forced labour, and no kind of discrimination with regard to employment or occupation.

In a developing country such as ours, there is always the risk that some firms might be tempted to apply terms of service which are less favourable than local law and ILO standards require. To prevent this, my country attaches great importance to labour inspection to ensure that basic standards are at least maintained. And here I must express my country's appreciation of the help which the ILO has given to Ghana in this field through the fellowships and training courses offered to our labour officers under its technical assistance programme.

It is not at all difficult to see that all the activities of the ILO, operational and standard-setting, contribute both directly and indirectly to the realisation of the rights and freedoms within its special competence. The experience of history and our new understanding of the process of development have shown us that certain basic problems must be identified and tackled if the gains so far made are not to be eroded. As the Director-General himself recognises, in adverse economic conditions ILO standards come under strain. Freedom of association, the right to work, for example, can hardly be guaranteed and protected when there is no work available. How far can or should the struggle for greater benefits and better conditions of employment of organised labour be harmonised with the basic aspirations of the rural poor for a life free from the fear of hunger, disease and squalor?

While we in the developing countries have been no less ardent in our recognition of and support for the various rights and freedoms that form the theme of the Conference this year and agree that we must persevere to make these ideals a reality, we have had to contend with a not so propitious international economic environment. The international trading environment has continued to deteriorate. Notwithstanding the solemn pledges of the developed industrialised countries to remove discriminatory protectionist measures, the developing world's share of international trade continues to decline at an alarming rate. Developments in the Uruguay Round of Multilateral Trade Negotiations indicate that some developed countries are more concerned with their own interests and mutual relations to the detriment of developing countries. Commodity prices are at an all-time low. Our economies are stagnant; in some cases even negative growth has been recorded.

In my own country, the reversal of more than a decade of national economic decline has been a major preoccupation of the Government of the Provisional National Defence Council since its accession to office on 31 December 1981. Throughout the 1970s and early 1980s real incomes fell substantially. The vast majority of Ghanaians, many of whom were already in difficult economic conditions, experienced a decline in living standards; the social and economic infrastructure fell into disrepair; and high inflation and a fixed nominal exchange rate contributed to declining exports and periodic foreign exchange crises. The Economic Recovery Programme (ERP), initiated in 1983, has managed to reverse this trend and place the economy once again on the growth path. But despite promising medium- to long-term growth prospects, the economy is still fraught with widespread poverty and economic hardship. Moreover, the Economic Recovery Programme will not be able to alleviate the economic hardship of many of the poor in the short run. Indeed, some components of the Economic Recovery Programme have and will exacerbate the economic problems of certain vulnerable groups in the short run, and this may impede the sustainability of the recovery programme itself. With international support, therefore, we have embarked upon a programme of action to mitigate the social costs of adjustment and developments known as PAMSCAD for short. PAMSCAD seeks to address the needs of vulnerable groups who are in a precarious condition due to the adjustment programme or due to earlier period of economic decline through direct assistance as well as creation of new jobs for the unemployed. But however much we try to assuage the difficulties of these vulnerable groups our efforts are hampered by resource constraints arising from the continuing drop in world price of cocoa – our major commodity – and the commitment of large resources to debt-servicing obligations.

The debt problems of developing countries remain at the forefront of our concern by reason of their devastating impact on the economic, social and political stability of the debtor countries. It is against this background that we ask for urgent measures to alleviate the crushing debt burden of developing countries.

The truth is that we cannot improve the international economic and trading environment and thereby ameliorate the working conditions of workers without an honest review of the current inequitable international economic order. The call for a new international economic order is as relevant today as it was in the early 1970s. Genuine efforts should therefore be made by all sides to find solutions to all the issues currently before the Uruguay Round of Negotiations.

The ILO should continue to seek the co-operation of other international agencies concerned as called for by the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment and to impress upon them the social and economic consequences and the threats to the cause of social justice and human rights that would inevitably arise if the legitimate needs of the developing nations continue to be ignored.

In his Report the Director-General very rightly says that the right to employment and decent working and living conditions implies a right to vocational training and education. Indeed the ILO has assisted in the establishment of vocational training institutes in some countries and sent experts to teach in others, but very much still remains to be done if we are to achieve the high and laudable objectives we have set ourselves.

In the field of social security, my Government is studying proposals to convert our Social Security Provident Fund into a National Pensions Scheme.

If human rights are to be successfully protected and extended, international peace is needed. It will be a serious mistake to imagine that the social and economic problems considered by the ILO can be solved outside the political events taking place in the world. As the Director-General has rightly pointed out in his Report, "the most persistent and profound challenge to ILO principles on equality" and, I would add, freedom "has come from South Africa's policy of apartheid". The White minority in South Africa continues to enforce the apartheid system despite international condemnations. Week by week, the scaffold receives its batch of Black workers brave enough to rebel against the implacable cruelty of their oppressors. Not content with enforcing their supremacy within South Africa itself, the racist tyrants of Pretoria have ignored the resolutions of the United Nations and the ILO to leave Namibia, where they have extended their system of discrimination and oppression. The war being carried out by the racist regime against the peoples of Angola, Mozambique and Botswana are all examples of a policy of violence and brutal violation of human rights. We join with all peace-loving peoples in the condemnation of the apartheid policy of South Africa and reiterate our call for mandatory comprehensive sanctions against the South African regime.

Recent acts of aggression in the occupied Arab territories cannot go without condemnation. Hundreds of thousands of Arabs in the occupied territories face a hopeless future in the land of their birth. International action seems to be impotent in the face of this systematic oppression, this continuous violation of human rights and freedoms. To achieve a comprehensive, just and lasting peace in the Middle East, it is necessary for all parties, including the PLO, the acknowledged representatives of the Palestinian people, to come to the negotiating table on an equal footing. The massive uprising of the Palestinian people in the occupied territories is the expression of a people who are determined to fight for their freedom.

How can the activities of the ILO in defence of workers' rights be truly successful, without active endeavours to stop aggressive war, to liquidate all the remnants of colonialism, and to ensure a lasting peace? Wars and the arms race, and the militarist fever which accompany them increase fear and hatred throughout the world. In addition, they consume national resources which would be better used in improving the lot of the poor and deprived.

It is impossible to implement a policy of human rights unless we are prepared to wage a decisive battle against the ideas and policies of oppression and racialism. It would be improper for this 40th anniversary year to come to an end without a serious and determined effort to liberate the working populations of South Africa, Namibia and the occupied Arab territories from the clutches of oppression.

The Director-General has rightly pointed out that the promotion and realisation of human rights within the ILO's competence will continue to tax the ingenuity, resolve and resources of the Organisation for generations to come. This is a challenge and an obligation we cannot and should not shy away from. We hope that we will all together strive to make this 40th anniversary of the Declaration of Human Rights a watershed in its true observance in all fields of human endeavour.

Interpretation from German: Mr. TIMMER (Workers' delegate, Hungary) – Mr. President, on behalf of my organisation and on my own behalf, I would like to congratulate you on your election as President of this International Labour Conference.

First of all, I would like to pay tribute to the ambitious, truthful and substantive Report of the Director-General. Contrary to the Report of previous years, the contents and tone of this year's Report is more optimistic and more encouraging. If one considers the main topics of the last Conference and Regional Conference, i.e. international co-operation, the protection of human rights in particular with regards to freedom of association, the link between structural adjustments and employment, I think we can see that our discussions focus increasingly on really important question which are directly related to our goals and affect the workers and trade unions. If the statement made by the first Director-General of our Organisation, Mr. Albert Thomas, applies and our Organisation can be compared to a machine where the driving force is provided by the workers' organisations – and history has testified to the accuracy of this statement – it should be added that it is more relevant than ever today for the solution of the serious problems affecting our times. The elimination of lasting world-wide inflation and unemployment, as well as development and stability, can only be achieved through strong, effective and unified trade unions. The main prerequisite for this is the full implementation of trade union freedoms. Trade union rights also represent the rights of humanity, those of the working population. Their implementation influences the organisation of our work, our social situation, our cultural life and our lives as a whole. I am convinced that on behalf of their millions of members, the unions will follow this course more or less successfully, with an occasional setback.

We should not, however, overlook the fact that, alongside the trends pointing towards progress, co-operation and development, there are also opposite trends. In more than one country, trade union rights and their activities have been curtailed through political pressure and even through physical means. A further reason for concern is the fact that the Committee on Freedom of Association of the Governing Body has to deal with an increasing number of serious complaints related to the violation of trade union rights which are in fact often flouted. This increasing trend threatens everything that has been achieved by trade unions and the workers often as a result of bloody struggles.

One of the greatest shames in the world today, the apartheid system in South Africa, is quite unbearable. It has managed to continue thanks to the open or covert support of certain circles, despite the resolutions of the United Nations and the ILO.

In this connection, I think it would be justified to ask and examine whether trade unions with their present structure and with the powers their officials have can meet the major challenges of our times.

As I see it, we still have a great deal to do in this respect. This is a highly complex question which can be seen at the regional level and it often manifests itself in a different way in various countries. Some countries still have to set up strong effective trade unions whereas others are faced with an increased demand for trade union participation in the decision-making process. I think it is a sign of success that trade unions are now able to participate successfully in collective bargaining in a number of countries. We are still far from a situation in which trade unions can bring influence to bear on the development of policies on such complicated matters as, for example, economic development, social programmes, stabilisation and anti-inflationary programmes, the development of employment and advances in social security. In the light of this changing situation and with a view to solving these problems, efforts will have to be made by the International Labour Organisation, both in the field of international labour standards with regard to freedom of association and in the field of training programmes for workers and supervision of these programmes.

Concerning the other technical items on the agenda of the Conference, the Hungarian trade unions agree with the adoption of international labour standards governing employment promotion and social security just as we agree with the proposed revision to the Safety Provisions (Building) Convention, 1937 (No. 62) and to the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107). We feel that the draft documents provided give us a suitable basis for discussion. We believe that the application and implementation of these documents will contribute towards overcoming the problems in this area.

In our statement in the general discussion on rural employment promotion, we have based our arguments on the premise that agricultural workers still represent the majority of employed persons throughout the world. At the same time, their organisations and system of representation are not highly developed and their working and living conditions are the most backward. As I see it we should place priority on land reform and the setting up of co-operatives and organisations based on the principle of self-help in agriculture; we should also concentrate on the improvement of working and living conditions, the meeting of basic needs, and the organisation and strengthening of representative organisations, primarily trade unions; we must also foster equal treatment and an improvement of equal opportunities for women occupied in agriculture, whose lot is even more difficult than that of men.

I note with great satisfaction that the Organisation has given clear priority to these questions in its past activities, as well as in the new draft Medium-Term Plan.

I should like briefly to refer to the Medium-Term Plan for 1990-95. I welcome the fact that the draft programme was made available by the Office on time, which enabled governments, employers' and workers' organisations to submit their comments and proposals on the draft before the deadline and in a proper manner.

At the 239th Session of the Governing Body the draft was already before us for discussion, and further deliberations are still being held on the subject. As we have already explained, we would once again like to express our support for the draft as well as for the questions and topics that serve the cause of workers and give them priority. May the Report of the Director-General submitted to the Conference provide us with an opportunity to lay even greater stress in the draft programme on trade union freedoms and human rights on the development of the economy and social welfare and on the training and further training of all workers.

The international conditions for the solution of our problems are most auspicious. We are on the way to achieving and securing peace. We welcome the negotiations and the results achieved in the field of disarmament, which also represent a contribution to increasing international solidarity. The extent to which we succeed in creating a world of lasting peace will also depend on us and the solidarity we achieve, and it is a prerequisite for fulfilling the task we have set ourselves.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. GLAIEL (Government delegate, Syrian Arab Republic) – Allow me first of all to convey to the President my sincerest congratulations on his election as President of this Session on which we place high hopes. We hope that the items discussed, the views exchanged and the opinions expressed will all contribute to producing resolutions and Recommendations enshrining the principles of the Organisation and reflecting the noble ideals that it pursues. I am happy on this occasion to state that in the Syrian Arab Republic we attach particular importance to our co-operation with this Organisation. We respect and will continue to respect all its Recommendations, Conventions and decisions, past, present and future, because they serve the interests of the workers and encourage development within the framework of the sovereignty and the economic and social system of our country, Syria, and all Arab nations. We will work to continue and constantly increase such co-operation. In our country, Syria, we have a special regard for labour and, as the President of our Republic Hafez el Assad, has said, "we pay tribute to work and to workers, and we resist exploitation and exploiters, and we consider work to be an honour. The workers are the very basis of life and its development, and it is they who ensure its permanence and progress."

Our Organisation, in accordance with its Constitution, has the duty to protect not only work and workers as such, but also human rights, as the Director-General of the ILO stated in the first part of his Report submitted at this Session under the heading Human rights - A common responsibility.

Here, I would like to express my thanks to the Director-General of the ILO for the efforts that he has made in preparing this Report and its Appendices, which describe the efforts, the activities and also the achievements of the Organisation and which, of course, deserve our closest consideration.

I would like to stress in particular certain aspects of the Report that "the whole range of ILO activities was in fact related to the promotion of human rights", since the realisation of such rights is an integral part of the efforts deployed to ensure the material well-being and spiritual development of man, and the protection of human rights is a continuous process which require constant renewal by the International Labour Organisation of its commitment to achieve a common standard for all peoples and all States as set out in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

I would also like to pay tribute to the Director-General's comments in the Report, particularly those relating to human rights and, in Appendix III, the situation of Arab workers in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories. He affirms that the expression of human rights forms the basis of all the activities of the International Labour Organisation, which was the first organisation to proclaim the indivisible nature of all civil, political, economic, social and cultural rights, without any distinction. The Director-General also stressed that fundamental human rights, freedom and dignity are sometimes derided rather than respected and recognised and that there exists a wide gulf between ideals and realisation. Despite the many standards established by the United Nations to strengthen human rights, beginning with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and despite the many countries which respect them, there nevertheless exist innumerable situations in which these rights are completely denied. Many people, including the most vulnerable, are subject to violation of these rights. Many people are disgracefully exploited.

This situation, as reported by the Director-General, compels us to take note of such violations of human rights, particularly the suffering of the Arabs in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories, which are due to Zionism. These violations are universally known. Murders and persecution take place with no regard for the principles and feelings of peace-loving peoples.

In his 11th report on the Arab workers in Palestine and the occupied Arab territories, the Director-General notes that their situation is well known to the Conference. However, their situation has been aggravated by the uprising, the clashes and the consequent repression. The Commission of Inquiry which visited the occupied territories was able to observe this directly. Its report mentioned that the situation of the Arab workers, which is already affected by the occupation, could deteriorate considerably in the near future if the present situation continues. All this might well have very serious consequences for employment, and for conditions of life and work.

I am sorry that because of lack of time I am not able to describe in detail the various inhuman practices to which the Arab workers of Palestine and the occupied Arab territories are subjected. But I would like to confirm statements in the report to the effect that Israel has installed a military regime in the occupied Arab territories with all the consequences as regards civil freedoms and the exercise of trade union rights, and that it applies a policy of discrimination and unequal treatment against Arab workers, enterprises and employers, and confiscates agricultural lands, water resources, and threatens privately owned farms.

Despite all the appeals made by the international community to the Israeli authorities to reconsider their position, the Zionist leaders' persistent refusal reflects Israel's crisis and blindness to reality. Israel continues to close its eyes to the realities of history.

The Arab workers, and the youth in particular, see history more clearly; stone by stone, they are undoing the fragile structure that Israel has built in the last twenty years: the youth of the occupied Arab territories have a rendezvous with history. But still, the Israeli leaders, full of arrogance, have remained deaf to the call of reason, prisoners of their pride, and unwilling to see the truth, even at the cost of their existence. Instead, the Israeli leaders redouble their acts of racism, persecution and oppression.

That is the situation of the Arab workers and citizens living under the Israeli occupation of Palestine and other Arab territories. What, then, should be the task of the ILO, as a specialised agency within the United Nations system, established to preserve the rights and freedoms of workers and employers, and to protect their interests in the face of racism, oppression and terrorism which threaten their employment, their conditions of life and work and their livelihood?

Our Conference must condemn the Israeli oppression and terrorism, and condemn also the efforts of Israeli authorities to prevent thousands of young Arabs from working in Palestine and the occupied Arab territories by stoning them and mutilating them for life.

Notwithstanding the ILO's resolutions of 1974 concerning the policy of discrimination, racism and the violation of trade union freedoms and rights practised by the Israeli authorities in Palestine and in the other occupied Arab territories, and the resolution of 1980 concerning the implications of Israeli settlements in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories in connection with the situation of Arab workers, Israel continues to pursue its policy of expansion and its violation of the fundamental rights and freedoms of Arab workers and employers in Palestine and the occupied Arab territories. Israel refuses to implement the Fourth Geneva Convention of 1949, continues unabated in its racist and arbitrary policies against the workers and population of Palestine and the occupied Arab territories, particularly in violation of article 147 of the Fourth Geneva Convention; these grave actions constitute serious violations which are considered as war crimes, as confirmed in article 85 of the Protocol to the Geneva Convention. Israel has refused to apply Security Council resolutions 605 of 1987 and 607 and 608 of 1988, which affirm the applicability of the Fourth Geneva Convention to all the Arab territories. There is nothing surprising in this because the Zionist regime has always ignored the United Nations and ILO resolutions for the very simple reason that these resolutions are in contradiction with the objectives of international Zionism and American imperialism which installed Israel at the very heart of the Arab homeland as a military bastion of aggression to be used by imperialism for its own plans. Israel is the instrument of this policy, which is directed against the liberty of the Arab people, the security of its territories and of its children.

For all these reasons we have come to this Conference to ask it to shoulder its responsibilities in dealing with the acts perpetrated by the Israeli authorities, which continue their occupation by expanding to the detriment of neighbouring lands, and continue to violate the freedoms, destroy the productive enterprises and jeopardise the interests of the Arab labour force and the Arab workers and to deprive them of their fundamental rights, including social security. They also discriminate against these workers and exploit them systematically. These acts are contrary to the spirit and the letter of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation, the Philadelphia Declaration, and international conventions and recommendations. This Conference must therefore reconsider the participation of the Zionist entity as a Member of this Organisation.

We call upon this Conference to intercede rapidly with the Israeli authorities to put an end to the arbitrary and barbarous acts against our children and our brothers in Palestine and the other Arab occupied territories, to free the trade union workers who have been detained, and to cease their terrorist practices and their policies of deportation and expulsion which are contrary to the most basic fundamental rights and freedoms laid down in the Constitution of the ILO, the Declaration of Philadelphia and the international labour Conventions and Recommendations.

The Syrian Arab Republic, with full faith in the principles of freedom and peace, reaffirms the need to pursue the efforts to convene an international conference with the participation of all the parties involved in this struggle, including the Palestine Liberation Organisation and the permanent members of the Security Council. This Conference must be effective.

It must have full powers to bring about a just and comprehensive peace on the basis of the principles of the United Nations Charter and the resolutions of the United Nations concerning the Israeli-Arab conflict, and on the basis of Israel's withdrawal from all the Arab occupied territories including Jerusalem, and the recognition of the inalienable rights of the Arab people of Palestine, in accordance with the resolutions of the United Nations.

We in Syria are fighting for peace, freedom, the advancement of the people, and the protection of basic human rights, and we strongly support the struggle against racial discrimination in all its forms, as the principles of freedom, dignity, equality and fraternity have been rooted in our Arab nation since time immemorial.

For 25 years the International Labour Organisation has concerned itself with the question of Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia – on which the Director-General is presenting a report to this Conference – but to no purpose, as the Government of South Africa continues to practise racial discrimination in all its forms and to deprive the Black peoples of their legitimate rights despite all the resolutions and appeals of the international organisations and regardless of the international community. This is why we affirm that the delegation of the Syrian Arab Republic upholds and endorses all resolutions directed towards contributing to put an end to racial discrimination in South Africa, in Namibia, and elsewhere in the world.

The Syrian Arab Republic has given priority attention to development problems, and believes that work and workers are a basic prerequisite for the achievement of the objectives of development plans. This was borne out by our President and guide, Mr. Hafez El-Assad, when he said: "We consider that man is the cornerstone of the development edifice just as we consider that the labour force is one of the main pillars of development plans. Our development strategy is aimed at mobilising all the national resources and energies so as to put them to the best possible use in the promotion of employment and social security."

Lastly, I wish our Conference every success and hope that its work and resolutions will realise the objectives for which we have come together here.

I would like to congratulate all those who have taken part in the preparations for this Conference under the leadership of the Director-General.

Interpretation from French: Mr. CARRENARD (Minister of Labour, Social Affairs, Social Security, Women's Affairs, Youth and Housing, Haiti) – I feel privileged, in my capacity as Minister of Labour, Social Affairs, Social Security, Women's Affairs, Youth and Housing, to extend on behalf of my Government, under President Leslie F. Manigat, and on behalf of the Haitian delegation to the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference, the fraternal greetings of the Haitian people to the distinguished members of the delegations meeting here in this august assembly.

I would like to take this opportunity, Mr. President, to extend to you the sincere and warm congratulations of my Government and my own on your election, and wish you the greatest success in conducting the deliberations of this important meeting.

Our congratulations, of course, are also directed to the Vice-Presidents and other distinguished officers.

We have read the eloquent report of the Director-General entitled Human rights – A common responsibility with great interest, and find it praiseworthy.

First of all, we are struck by the forcefulness, clarity, nobility and humanism evident in this document to which we fully subscribe. We would like to recall the universal legal instruments from which this report draws its inspiration: the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, proclaimed 40 years ago by the United Nations; the adoption by our Conference of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87); the adoption in 1958 by the International Labour Conference of an equally important instrument – the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention (No 111); and lastly, the designation of 1968 as the International Year for Human Rights.

This report, which is of the greatest interest, clearly sums up the results of the ILO's broad efforts in various fields which aim at guaranteeing full enjoyment of fundamental human rights, be it from the point of view of standards which have had an irreversible influence on the updating of a number of national legislations as regards labour and social security, or from the practical point of view of technical co-operation in the field aimed at solving certain technical or other problems which impede the full enjoyment of human rights. The document goes beyond pure human rights, as it extends to social, economic and cultural rights and, quite rightly, establishes a common responsibility for the implementation of policies to guarantee the triumph of these rights.

In this respect, co-operation and solidarity – as the Director-General has emphasised – are undeniably vital elements for access to the enjoyment of human rights in the broadest sense of the term.

At this dramatic turning-point in the life of peoples, when unemployment, underemployment and poverty are the world's scourges, we feel that it is appropriate to put an end to these violations of fundamental human rights. In order to achieve a natural balance of the world's peoples, we urgently need a global strategy for employment, especially productive employment.

This not only implies national political responsibility, but also requires urgent measures of solidarity by the industrialised countries, given the negative effects on human rights in developing countries of external debt, world prices of raw materials and structural adjustment policies which are often imposed; these conditions have disrupted or stopped economic growth, worsened unemployment and lowered the standard of living of many unprotected populations abandoned to their dismal fate.

These are the realities we in Haiti face, following the recent elections. The Government is completely and transparently committed to a process of democratic transformation, and seeks to modernise outdated structures which are based on a system of inequality and age-old social injustice.

For the Government which it is my honour to represent, the moment of truth has come: it is now the time to turn to concertation and dialogue to establish a state of law, for without it, democracy cannot flourish.

We are determined to succeed. Appropriate measures and policies are being updated within the context of a healthy management of the country in all fields.

For instance, strategic priority is to be given to agriculture, while we intend to recognise agro-industry as the engine of planned development: the possibility for young people and women especially the long-term unemployed, to acquire new skills; the creation of new institutions, such as the Ministries of Culture and Co-operatives, and the Secretariat for Women's Affairs and Youth; the development of the informal sector, because it can help to generate durable employment; updating labour-intensive community projects; reorganising the machinery of administration according to the specific criteria of competence, efficiency and honesty.

At the same time, the fundamental objective of the Haitian Government is growth with fairness.

In the light of this political philosophy how can we not jealously guard respect for the rights of the individual?

The Government's quiet struggle against unemployment and poverty, the Government's daily fight for the dignity of the Haitian born at home and abroad, and the Government's organised battle for the necessary social redress, form the backdrop of our everyday work. In this respect, we should like to mention the authorities' sincere appeal to the nation for a collective debate on a clearly thought out and viable agrarian reform to set up, on the basis of the distribution of state-owned land, a co-operative, inalienable and indivisible rural heritage.

As regards my particular field, I should like to mention the strengthening of the administrative and technical machinery of my Ministry, which has now in fact become the Ministry of Labour, Social Affairs, Social Security, Women's Affairs, Youth and Housing. Before, it was only the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs.

On the basis of this approach, we are now implementing the necessary processes, namely: the revision of the Labour Code which will give the country a balanced, fairer, more human and realistic labour legislation taking account of the specific features of Haitian society; the reorganisation of the management of social security institutions, by setting up a tripartite administrative council and reforming the system to make national coverage gradually available to workers and provide automatic protection for those who have been forgotten by society; promotion of tripartism through dialogue and consultation between the main social partners: the public authorities, the workers and the employers; support for the rural and urban informal sectors, to create new jobs and improve incomes.

I should not wish to conclude without formally reiterating, on behalf of my Government, Haiti's full and complete dedication to the equitable concept of tripartism which, as we see it, is the basic element of the ILO's foundation.

We solemnly subscribe to the principle of human rights, the implementation and viability of which can only be expressed through a vast and noble movement of fraternity and solidarity between the peoples of the earth, without exception.

Mr. HASAN (Employers' delegate, Bangladesh) – I am very pleased to have this opportunity of ad-addressing the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference.

Let me begin by congratulating you, Mr. President, on your election to the esteemed office of President of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. I have also much pleasure in offering congratulations to the Vice-Presidents.

The Director-General deserves appreciation for presenting once again an erudite report to the Conference. His Report has outlined the importance of universal human rights in the realisation of the ILO's objectives. He has also enumerated the forms of ILO action to promote and safeguard human rights. I hope that the discussion of the Report will lead to a common endeavour to improve human rights in member countries.

We fully agree that human rights issues ought to be debated in the context of the harsh reality of daily life in low-income countries, a reality of widespread underdevelopment and undernourishment. In many parts of the low-income countries the employment and poverty situation has worsened in the 1980s. As pointed out in the Director-General's Report, in the Third World countries there are over 70 million unemployed, 500 million underemployed and 900 million are living in extreme poverty. In such a situation, how can one ensure universal enjoyment of human rights?

The Director-General has correctly highlighted the fact that efforts to secure the enjoyment of human rights involve the entire international community. Indeed, the international politico-economic environment is a major factor in economic growth, which must be improved to ensure progress in the promotion of universal human rights. The unfavourable world economic climate, rising protectionism and adverse terms of trade have been the principal cause of the widespread threat to the efforts of developing countries to improve the lot of the teeming millions referred to in the Director-General's Report. The achievements of some of these countries have been remarkable, but the low-income developing countries still have a very small share in world manufacturing output. Many such countries have diversified from traditional labour-intensive products to higher-value-added engineering and electronic products. There are now fears that micro-electronics and robotics will reduce the labour advantage which many low-income countries have exploited to expand their role in world manufacturing.

The ILO has adopted various human rights Conventions covering freedom of association, freedom of labour, promotion of equal opportunity, the right to work, the right to a minimum income, the right to social security, etc. Nearly all low-income countries tend to see most of the ILO standards in the above areas not as positive factors of development but as affecting their industrial viability vis-à-vis the developed countries. Moreover, the ILO's human rights standards mainly protect the interests of those who are privileged with employment. As such, the standards have very little relevance to the plans and programmes of low-income countries where workers constitute an insignificant portion of the total population and employable labour force. In the developed countries, where the workers constitute an overwhelming majority of society, the ILO's standards in the fields of human rights have prima facie relevance to the plans and programmes of development in socio-economic fields. The problems, priorities and nature of the economies of developed countries are therefore different from those of developing countries, particularly the low-income countries.

In the developed countries where workers are more or less fully employed in the organised sector, the main problem is to maintain a marginal increase in the level of employment through demand management. In these countries increases in productivity are assured through continuous investment in research and development; social and political stability is hardly threatened. The adoption and implementation of international labour standards for the protection of workers and the improvement of their conditions pose no major problems in these countries, because the necessary resources are generated by the workers in their respective places of employment. The main problem in such a situation is the distribution of the GDP among the population, which is marked either by no growth or by very marginal growth. Standards formulated on the basis of objective conditions in developed countries often become the target set by labour and political agitators.

We do not agree that the protection provided to the working class through various ILO standards can be depended upon to be conducive to social development and in turn provide an impetus for higher productivity. Improved benefits and welfare facilities do not automatically increase productivity. What is required is the reconciliation of sectoral interests with national development requirements. There is a need at least for the low-income countries to make a bold departure from the academic approach to issues such as the creation of a congenial atmosphere through better facilities, job protection, etc., that has been pursued in the past. It is essential to recognise that better facilities and job protection will continue to have only a marginal impact on industrial harmony and productivity so long as the labour movement suffers from structural and functional weaknesses such as a low rate of literacy of workers, the multiplicity of unions and the politicisation of trade unions. The long-term welfare of the workers will greatly depend on how the trade unions and their leaders change their attitudes towards the national interest as against sectoral interests.

The ILO's efforts to secure respect for human rights should be so designed as to ensure that countries at different stages of development are not handicapped in extensively using their abundant supply of workers. The best security can be provided to the workers only when a country is economically developed and reaches a stage where it can offer employment opportunities to all who want to work. At a time when the ILO is engaged in a review of the operation of its standards, the long-term interest of low-income countries must be kept firmly in view. It should be borne in mind not only when formulating and adopting international labour standards but also when supervising the application of ratified Conventions and when including the revision of old and adoption of new standards in the agenda of the Conference.

Despite serious resource constraints deriving mainly from the adverse international economic environment, our country, Bangladesh, has been sparing no efforts to provide the people with the fundamentals of human life – food, employment, shelter. During the past three years about 3 million new jobs have been created, though there are still over 10 million waiting for employment opportunities. The workers as a community have also shared the success which has been achieved in improving the value-added in the industrial sector. The workers' wages now constitute 32 per cent of the value added generated in the manufacturing sector as compared to 26 per cent in the early 1970s. Real wages have also registered a significant improvement, rising by almost 20 per cent in the manufacturing sector during the past three years. Workers also been given a statutory right to organise themselves, join trade unions of their choice, elect their own leaders for trade union activities, bargain freely and exercise the right to strike. As correctly stated by the United Nations Secretary-General, "human rights violations do not occur in a vacuum". The rights and privileges presently enjoyed by those who are fortunate enough to be employed can continue and improve if injustices and inequalities can be eradicated from socioeconomic fields through the creation of new opportunities of employment and livelihood for the teeming millions who are still waiting for jobs. Any impatience or excesses by those who are fortunate enough to have employment can be a major setback for the promotion and safeguard of human rights.

Finally, the deterioration in the world politico-economic environment confirms that the nations of the world have nearly reached the limits of international co-operation. But the world community cannot remain oblivious to the consequences of those limits. We must find a common path of action for the prosperity of all nations. This will be the best guarantor of universal human rights.

Interpretation from German: Mr. THIEL (Representative of the International Social Security Association) – It is a great honour and pleasure for me to speak on the Report of the Director-General of the ILO as representative of ISSA, the International Social Security Association.

Seventeen years ago I took part in the preparation of the Benzene Convention, 1971 (No. 136), at the International Labour Conference as a Worker representative and member of a chemical workers' union.

Since then I have devoted my undivided attention to the question of health and safety at work and during leisure time.

In my institution in Austria, the Austrian Accidents Insurance Institution, we lay great stress on prevention. In the ISSA International Section for the Prevention of Occupational Risks in the Metal Industry top priority is given to safety in the metal industry and to the health of metalworkers.

In the ISSA Permanent Committee of Experts on Prevention of Occupational Risks which I have the honour of chairing, all activities are devoted to this worthy goal of health and safety. I am therefore very grateful to be able to pursue these personal aims of improving the safety and health of workers in a world-wide organisation, the ISSA, and to do this in close co-operation with the ILO.

Humane, safe jobs, secure lives, good health, work for all and guaranteed retirement are our goals. It is the objective of ISSA to attain these goals. ISSA makes a world-wide contribution to social security with a small secretariat and a minimum of expenditure. We do this in a spirit of universality, equality and solidarity as mentioned in the Report of the Director-General. We constantly discuss these questions in symposia, in conferences and in round-table talks. This requires money. ISSA is financed through contributions from its members and the ILO also makes a major contribution by providing means and making resources available to us directly. For the staging of conferences and publishing of documentation, a number of ISSA Members make voluntary contributions over and above their membership contributions.

ISSA was founded just over 60 years ago in 1927. Its tasks were defined in conjunction with the ILO and aimed at supplementing the latter. Looking back over this period of 60 years we can say that the basic principles are still relevant and a great deal has been done and much has been achieved. However, there have also been a number of changes. ISSA has grown; it now includes 300 members from 125 countries. Workers' problems and the problems of the working environment are dealt with in ten technical committees. Within the framework of the Permanent Committee of Experts on the Prevention of Occupational Risks we have nine international sections working on the improvement of occupational safety in specialised areas. They are working on improving information and provide information on the research done on occupational safety and health.

ISSA also holds meetings and discussions and does research work. These findings are made available to all interested parties, throughout the world, through the media, through publications and through conferences. I would like to thank the Director-General of the ILO for having given a full account of ISSA's activities and paid tribute to them, in his Report to the International Labour Conference.

In his Report, the Director-General also refers to our joint activities. In the framework of permanent co-operation on the questions of training and information, we should mention our joint meeting on occupational safety. An international congress on occupational safety is held every three years. The last World Congress on the Prevention of Occupational Accidents and Diseases, organised jointly by the ILO and ISSA, was held in Stockholm in 1987 and enabled 2,000 participants from more than 70 industrialised and agrarian countries to hold a useful exchange of views for the improvement of health and safety for all human beings.

The special interest of the ILO in this subject, which is so important for social security throughout the world, can be seen from the large number of conventions on safety as well as from the present agenda of the International Labour Conference.

As we know, on account of constantly changing working conditions, construction work remains one of the most dangerous branches of industry, despite the fact that occupational safety has improved considerably as a result of the efforts of the ILO and ISSA and that the number of accidents has been reduced considerably.

These achievements have been possible because experts in the field of health and safety in the ILO and ISSA have striven jointly to make the world a healthier, safer place.

Recent industrial disasters have shown that danger knows no borders; therefore there should be no ideological or geographical borders in our struggle to overcome these dangers. We should not be restricted in any way in our attempts.

Some 17 years ago in Geneva we spent a whole month discussing the dangers of benzene. Today, every day, I repeat every day, two new potentially dangerous substances are introduced into the working world or put into the market and there is no single laboratory in the world which could carry out the necessary tests alone and produce them in time. These changes are not only seen in the increase in potential dangers but also in the development of comprehensive safety programmes.

At the last meeting of the Permanent Committee of Experts on the Prevention of Occupations Risks in Helsinki, we discussed the development of safety policies. An ISSA study involving 53 countries showed that out of 100 fatal accidents, seven occur at work, 37 are traffic accidents and 56 occur in private life – during sporting activities or at home. This was different in the past, when most accidents occurred at the workplace. We have successfully reduced the dangers on the job; however, accidents are expensive no matter where they occur. A further study has shown that several per cent of GNP are devoted to accidents. It is usually young people in the prime of life who are struck down by accidents. Sound occupational safety and health policies are not only humane, they also contribute considerably towards financing social security.

In Helsinki the role of management and supervisors was stressed in connection with healthy, safe jobs. Most industrial accidents can be attributed to bad management. This applies to all spheres of life. Everyone, regardless of where he works, should serve as an example when it comes to health and safety and when it comes to adopting a humane attitude towards legislation, economic and environmental questions. Only then will we be able to convince others and put our world into practice.

All of us who have the honour of expressing our thoughts in this international body hold the great responsibility not only of promoting dignified living conditions accompanied by social security and freedom and of establishing a framework for these standards and laws, but we must also adhere to this attitude at all times, and this task is so difficult that it can only be achieved jointly, inspired by the example of others and strengthened by your co-operation.

Today there is no human being, no enterprise, no country and no international organisation that can solve our problems alone. Our planet has become very small. We recognise its limits, but we are also aware of our big family, our brothers and sisters, fellow sufferers, from whom we can learn much. In the same way that we learn from each how to live a healthy, safe life and how not to extend the limits of prosperity where they are no longer within the reach of all, or deplete the finite resources of the world in the permanent committees, sections and working groups of ISSA, this International Labour Conference, aware of its world-wide social responsibility, deals with questions such as tribal populations, the rural population, full employment and repressed persons; all these questions are vital in a world which goodwill and peace could make so wonderful if there were no fears, distrust, or refusal to consider others as brothers and sisters.

It gives me great pleasure to take this opportunity as a member of ISSA, to assure you that our members have identified with and will continue to identify with the concerns of the ILO and that we support them wholeheartedly. If we unite our forces we should succeed in creating a world in which all human beings who wish to work can work; a world characterised by social responsibility towards all human beings.

This principle has been emphasised by the Director-General in his Report, Human rights – A common responsibility, and I would like to thank him personally for that. We all want a world in which we harm neither those who produce or those who consume; a world which leaves the water, air and soil intact as they are the very source of life and in which the sky is the limit for man's ideological concepts.

Let me come back to earth, to what is feasible and can be achieved. The vision of a perfect world on earth and beyond has motivated mankind for thousands of years. In the 60 years of ISSA's existence we have taken a number of steps together to move towards this lofty goal.

As I have already mentioned, every three years ISSA organises a joint meeting with the ILO and organises a world congress on occupational safety. The next World Congress on the Prevention of Occupational Accidents and Diseases will take place in Hamburg in 1990 and the next General Assembly of ISSA will take place in 1989 in Vienna in my home country. At all meetings we discuss questions of social security and occupational health. I only hope that many persons from throughout the world will participate at these meetings and I help us attain the goal of universal health and greater safety.

At this turning point in history we must look towards the unknown future and help shape it in a responsible manner and in compliance with human rights. Let us choose life instead of death; peace and freedom instead of danger, and provide an all-encompassing network of social security which we have the privilege of contributing towards in accordance with our capabilities.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – In accordance with the Standing Orders, I give the floor to Mr. Danieli, Government adviser, Israel, to exercise his right of reply.

Mr. DANIELI (Government adviser, Israel) – In reply to the statement delivered in the course of this morning's session by the Ambassador of Syria, my delegation first wishes to emphasise that the allegations, accusations and defamations introduced by the Syrian Ambassador in to his speech are baseless and totally rejected by us. I am sure that every one of you is aware of the real facts regarding the true situation of the Arab workers in the territories administered by Israel. Furthermore, my delegation expected that on such an occasion the Ambassador would refer at length to the situation of Palestinian workers and trade unionists, who have long been subject to harsh measures and persecutions in Syria. The degree of this harassment obliged even the recent meeting of the Arab Ministers of Labour held in Baghdad last March to issue an appeal to the Syrian Government to release imprisoned Palestinian trade unionists. Suffice it to say in this regard that Syria has not ratified the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), in fact prohibits any trade union activities.

This example marks only the visible tip of an iceberg of daily and constant violation and deprivation of the very few rights that the Syrian workers have been granted. The very fact that Syrian delegates preach labour standards in this forum makes a mockery of the very spirit of the ILO. Advocating draft resolutions of the kind that the Government of Syria is sponsoring jeopardises our good prospects of making some real progress in our deliberations in this Conference.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – We shall now continue our discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Interpretation from French: Mr. HABİYAKARE (Minister for the Civil Service and Vocational Training, Rwanda) – Allow me, Mr. President, to offer you my warmest congratulations on your election as President of this assembly and also to salute joyfully the holding of this remarkable 75th Session of the International Labour Conference, which gives representatives of States and peoples the world over the opportunity to hold discussions on a topic of such importance as human rights.

May I take this pleasant opportunity to express my gratitude to Mr. Francis Blanchard, the Director-General of the International Labour Office, and, through him, to the whole of our illustrious Organisation for the dynamic efforts which they have been tirelessly deploying in order to establish throughout the world the basic rights of the citizens of our planet.

The initiative taken by the Director-General to present for the Conference's observations and reflection such a thorough and moving Report on human rights, comes at an appropriate and crucial time in the history of humanity when the peoples of the world feel, although in different degrees, a real and immense need for it. We are living, in fact, in an unusual and controversial era when human conscience is constantly disturbed, even tormented, by the many conflicts of interest which govern relations among individuals, peoples and nations, when, in many places, the concept of basic human rights has been eroded to the point at which total confusion reigns and when uncontrollable social differences are undermining humanity's essential confidence in itself.

While universal solidarity conceived of and practised according to the precepts of the most elementary natural justice calls for the exercise and promotion of a spirit of tolerance and equity for the greater well-being of the human community, we note, here and there, the rule of dehumanised and anonymous justice, fragmented by the divergent interests of the great and powerful who are waging an unequal and all too often unjustified struggle against the small and weak.

While the fundamental mission of all men and women on our planet is to develop it and to make it bear fruit and, in order to do so, it is each person's inalienable right to develop fully without any limit other than that inherent in the faculties of each individual and in the social order. Certain groups in the human community still cling to the old and degrading theories of predestination which claim that certain so-called elite classes possess discretionary powers over the rights of the people, reserving for themselves the right to grant or to refuse these. Armed with these theories and others of the same kind, they ruthlessly impose on peace-loving underprivileged and defenceless people political and social economic conflicts justified by ephemeral ideologies.

We are all aware of the fact that it is not the poor and the under-privileged who are responsible for social unrest, disputes and fratricidal wars which plunge the world into mourning each day. They are not the ones who reject and trample upon the right of equality, fraternity and solidarity among people, because all they ask of fortune is to be able to live their lives in an atmosphere of peace, serenity and harmony.

It is in this perspective of universal peace and harmony for all people, culminating in the restoration of the human rights of each citizen of each country, that we should thoroughly and objectively consider the Report of the Director-General so that, after conscientious reflection, we can arrive at firm and feasible resolutions. In the absence of this perspective, negotiations, alliances and other treaties of friendship, non-aggression and mutual assistance among peoples and nations will be devoid of all meaning.

Any step of this kind should have as its aim the liberation of man whoever he is and wherever he may be. The benefits and enjoyment of human rights should no longer be monopolised by anyone and the obligation to fight for the protection of such rights should be incumbent upon each member of the human community.

This is why Rwanda is profoundly indignant at the attitude of certain backward regimes such as that of apartheid in South Africa which we condemn unreservedly for its disregard of the human rights of Blacks which it wants to maintain in slavery.

Since its creation, the ILO has been the champion of human rights and has never ceased to promote solidarity and unity in the diversity of member States. One of its principal merits is that, despite everything, it has remained faithful to its ideal of justice and equity, so much so that it has been prepared to reform its most fundamental structures in order to comply with the legitimate expectations and rights of its member States. Rwanda has deeply appreciated this long-awaited reform and has not hesi-tated to ratify the Instrument for the Amendment of the Constitution of the Organisation, 1986, thus becoming, since November 1987, one of the first member States to have positively honoured its commitments.

My delegation would like to express its surprise and concern at the indifference and reluctance of those member States which refrain from ratifying that instrument of amendment, thus risking its becoming purely and simply inoperative, and consequently nullifying the good wishes expressed through the majority vote of the assembly at the 75th Session of the Conference. We would like to think that these hesitant or completely negative attitudes do not reflect an unadmitted position in some cases when the question of their contribution to the defence of human rights is at issue. We therefore appeal to all those States so that, over and above their individualistic preoccupations, and for the sake of international solidarity, to which more than lip service should be paid, they should specifically manifest their attachment to the innovative ideals of our Organisation by promptly ratifying this instrument.

Our country, Rwanda, is a young and independent State and has not yet acquired enough years of experience to be in a position to lecture to any other States on human rights as they are envisaged in modern democracies. Nevertheless, for us, the people of Rwanda, one thing is certain: Rwanda can only be developed by the sum of the efforts, of all its sons and daughters. We cannot afford the luxury of dispersing our energies in the pursuit of adventurous or illusory objectives. The modest nature of our means forbids us to do this, and our socio-cultural identity does not permit it.

We are convinced that misery, poverty and want are one of the greatest challenges facing fundamental human rights and freedoms, and that, wherever there is fear, resignation and silence, justice and law no longer have a place.

It is with this in mind that the Government and people of Rwanda under the auspices of His Excellency Juvenal Habyarimana, President of the Republic and Founder President of MRND, have undertaken a far-reaching reform of the mentality of society in Rwanda by mobilising all the living forces of the nation with a view to greater and more satisfactory production, this through the strictest and well-founded observance of the basic principles of human rights and the rights of every citizen living under the rule of law in a State such as the present-day Rwanda.

Concerning the situation of human rights in Rwanda, we can rejoice at the remarkable progress that has been made in that respect in our country which, after all, is not sheltered from the adverse and limiting events of our times, and, more particularly, repercussions of the world economic crisis, from which we have not been spared.

In its constant effort to develop, Rwanda is moving ahead and has recorded a succession of important achievements. The struggle continues to gain new victories, and the people of Rwanda, convinced of the justice and validity of its fight for progress and for the enjoyment of civil and political rights as well as economic and social rights, are currently conducting a campaign for the association and integration of all the children in our country in the common effort for self-development.

Like all peoples enamoured of peace, justice and liberty, the people of Rwanda will no longer traffick with its dignity. The strict and judicious observance of universal principles of fundamental human rights are for us a prerequisite for survival and one of the best possible investments for the well-being of present and future generations.

We believe that in the sound application of the precepts of international solidarity, our partners, regardless of their trends and ideologies, should always take account of realities and national possibilities such as ours.

It is through respect for the right to differ, mutual understanding and tolerance that peoples and nations will make it possible for the cause of peace and human rights to triumph on earth, by and through universal solidarity.

Interpretation from German: Mr. DALLINGER (Federal Minister for Labour and Social Affairs, Austria) – Allow me first of all to congratulate you on your brilliant election to the presidency of this session of the International Labour Conference. Your election is an expression of the co-operation of all groups within the International Labour Organisation and a sign of the recognition which this Organisation and its principles, particularly the tripartite principle, enjoys throughout the world. Indeed, you spoke only recently along these same lines in a highly acclaimed interview.

The International Labour Organisation was the first international organisation to focus international efforts on the protection of individual human beings, their rights and their dignity. Since then, it has been making a decisive contribution to the protection of human rights and freedoms in the social and labour fields. It is continuing to do so with a new approach that brings nations closer together.

The Director-General of the International Labour Office was therefore quite right to choose "Human rights - A common responsibility" as the theme of his Report to the Conference this year. However, it is all the more painful to see that the actual situation in many parts of the world is in stark contrast to these ideas. It would seem as if the gap between this reality and international human rights standards cannot be reduced; on the contrary, it is becoming ever wider, and the fundamental basic rights of many human beings are being violated more than ever before.

In addition to this, technical development is not only opening up new opportunities but also new dangers and these both extend beyond the borders of States and the divides between the various political and social systems.

I believe that the implementation of human rights and attempts to bring them closer to changing economic, social and cultural realities can no longer be left solely to individual States. We must work together for these improvements; we must endeavour together to change unfavourable social or economic relationships in such a way that the people who live in those States can live in dignity and have a proper job in humane conditions.

The enormity of these tasks was made quite clear in the figures published recently by the International Labour Organisation: in the next four decades an average of 47 millions jobs must be created throughout the world if the millions of unemployed and underemployed are to find work and be able to live in dignity. That means that if we are to achieve full employment by the year 2030, we need 2,000 million new jobs.

If we look at the current situation, this goal seems just as unachievable and utopic as other goals: a truly lasting and just peace for all people or the re-establishment of an ecological balance.

But we must be quite clear that the achievement of these utopias cannot be left to chance; they are decisive for the future of our planet and the people who live on our planet.

The social policy of the past few years has been shaped by the problem of unemployment and we can expect this problem to continue for many years.

This fact has obviously not yet been understood fully by the general public as indeed it should; and the fact that this has not led the industrialised countries to take political measures and strategies to try to give the fight against unemployment some chance of success seems to me to be an alarming sign that they are turning away from their humanitarian and political responsibilities. It is for this reason that we seem to be as far away as ever from a solution to the global employment crisis. National measures appear to be too weak to provide an effective solution to regional problems. We therefore need more international co-operation. This can also be seen in OECD statistics: the figure of 30 million unemployed people will increase; in the next year it is expected that there will be 32 million unemployed, of which 20 million alone will be in Europe.

Unemployment is increasing in Austria as well. The unemployment rate of 2.4 per cent in 1981 rose to 5.6 per cent last year. We do not expect to exceed the 6 per cent mark but unemployment will continue to grow.

Apart from the increase and the rate of increase in unemployment, the structure of unemployment itself is a good reason to reinforce labour policy measures in Austria. Young people, women, the disabled, foreign workers and people whose subjective qualifications do not meet current needs of the labour market are particularly hard hit.

A whole series of measures have been taken against this development in Austria: for instance, youth labour programmes have enabled us to cut unemployment amongst young people by about 2 per cent; the labour programme for women offers help to all women who want to return to the labour market after a long absence or who have had particular problems in the past; a new regulation on foreign workers has made it easier for people who have been living in Austria for a long time to enter the labour market, particularly the second generation; an energetic skills upgrading campaign has improved the individual chances of workers; special measures taken in the steel industry, ranging from early retirement to special qualifications programmes, have helped to curtail unemployment.

All these measures have not, however, put an end to unemployment in Austria; all the best training measures in the world cannot fill such a marked gap.

Last year, there were six applicants for every job. But our measures have contributed to keeping the level of unemployment as low as possible and to attenuate the impact of unemployment.

Today, we are faced with a new phenomenon; today's unemployment is quite different from unemployment before the Second World War. First, the standard of living is much higher and social security is far more extensive. Second, today's unemployment is, to a certain extent, structural rather than cyclical.

This development is made more difficult not only because of the increased competition from threshold countries, but also about by advances in microelectronics in the industrialised countries.

The technological revolution of the present far exceeds, in terms of its scope and repercussions, any structural changes we have hitherto witnessed. In the past, the production sector absorbed all those who left agriculture. Up until the present day, there has been a massive shifting of workers from the production sector to the services sector; however we have yet to see a "fourth" sector which could absorb people who are entering unemployment.

Aside from this shifting trend, social policy must also take on the challenges arising from demographic developments.

Whatever measures are taken to alleviate pressures on the labour market – especially as regards young people – inevitably create problems with respect to old-age insurance.

According to current predictions from the Austrian Statistics Office, the number of people of working age will go down over the next three decades, whilst the number of people of pensionable age will increase considerably. The share of the population over 60 years of age will rise from 18 per cent at present to around 38 per cent in 30 years' time.

This trend gives us some idea of what demands are going to be made on the financing of the social security system in the future. We therefore need reforms but if they are going to be both effective and socially acceptable they must be implemented slowly but surely over a long period of time. These figures forced us to make measures towards reform in the past few years.

The Austrian system of social security is very closely related to the participation of the labour force. It could be said that effective full employment is the alpha and omega of an acceptable social system.

An employment policy, which clearly sets out to attain full employment once again is therefore of key concern to us.

This, however, does not exclude structural changes; neither does it require a naive fetishism of growth which sees a rapid quantitative growth as being the only solution to our labour market problems. The growth rates attained earlier in industrialised countries are probably – and have been for some time – a thing of the past; and we must ask ourselves whether – when we consider our limited resources and the state of our environment – whether we really want to reach them again.

Even if we rule out this way to full employment, we still have, alongside educational policies and job-creating measures, the option of a fairer distribution of the available volume of labour. This can, above all, be achieved by a reduction of working time.

I am quite aware of the fact that labour market policies and to cut working time often conflict with the desire of individual workers to raise their incomes. However, I believe that a reduction in weekly hours of work would be a gesture of solidarity on the part on those who still have a job towards those young people who do not have a job.

I feel that it is quite right and timely to discuss a possible Convention dealing with employment at this Conference. I welcome the discussion on a Convention on safety and health in construction. This sector is vital in the economies of all countries and safety measures must be taken on all sites. However, there can only be a reduction of accidents if all participants – employers, workers and the relevant authorities – fulfil their responsibilities as regards the implementation and control of protective measures.

This, however, does not help only individual workers but rather society as a whole. I therefore acknowledge and welcome all efforts which the International Labour Organisation undertakes to improve the working and living conditions of each and everyone. This theme is particularly relevant now that we are in a tense labour market situation; for an increased reserve of labour could lead to an elimination or a deterioration of social law and protective measures. Under greater pressure of competition, ever more workers are prepared to work for wages and under conditions which do not meet proper standards. We must decisively work against such dangers in our international co-operation.

In the same way, efforts to improve human rights in all parts of the world can only bear fruit if they are part of an international process.

The Report of the Director-General refers to the indivisible character of human rights which encompass, without distinction, civil and political rights and economic, social and cultural rights. However, this implies that the dignity of human beings cannot be guaranteed if the necessary economic, social and cultural conditions have not been met. Adverse social and economic relationships can never justify the rejection of individual basic freedoms and rights.

We must not forget that relations between these two groups of human rights are both complementary and strained; whilst civil and political rights guarantee freedom from the State, economic and social rights provide security for individuals in the event of danger and other contingencies through the State. The first category requires a withdrawal of the State, while the second category demands its intervention.

However, there is a correlation between a policy that respects the value and dignity of individuals and a policy that strives to maintain peace. If human rights are constantly flouted and ignored, there can be no real peace. The demand for international peace and the demand for the recognition of human rights are therefore complementary.

A basic principle for peace is the inner peace of each society, i.e. social peace. This not only involves the will of governments and political systems, but also a greater understanding on the part of people in all countries of human rights, thereby making them more tolerant. Only then can we achieve the goal in Article 1 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights: "All people... should act towards one another in a spirit of brotherhood".

It is time now that the international society reinforces its efforts to reach this goal. Let us work together to achieve this great objective.

Interpretation for German: The PRESIDENT – May I take this opportunity to remind everyone that the speaking time is limited to 15 minutes.

Interpretation from Korean: Mr. CHOI (Government representative, Republic of Korea) – It is a great honour and pleasure for me to speak on behalf of the Government and people of Korea at the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference.

At the outset, I should like to extend my heartfelt congratulations to you, Mr. Beyreuther, on your unanimous election to the presidency of this session. I am confident that this Conference will be guided, under your distinguished leadership, to the most productive conclusion.

Examining the Report of the Director-General, I was impressed by the outstanding performance and progress achieved by the ILO during the past year. I should also like to pay special tribute to Mr. Francis Blanchard, Director-General of the ILO, and his staff for their tireless efforts in preparing for this session.

This year marks the 40th anniversary of the proclamation by the United Nations of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights as well as of the ILO's adoption of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), which is one of the principal human rights conventions.

In this respect, I believe that the Director-General's Report on human rights is indeed timely and fitting, as this Conference touches upon these fundamental issues.

As the Republic of Korea has made sustained efforts in pursuit of economic and social development since the early 1960s, Korea today is recognised as one of the successful newly industrialised countries in the world. In the course of continued socio-economic development, the working conditions, income distribution and standard of living of workers in my country have steadily improved. Furthermore, the efforts to improve worker's welfare continues to be a major policy concern for Korea.

As you may recall, however, labour-related issues have become a central concern for Korea with the changes in the socio-political environment which were brought about in the course of more active liberalisation and relaxation measures taken since the democratisation initiatives of last year. Over 3,700 labour disputes occurred in 1987 – a record in our recent history. These developments could be regarded as an unavoidable transitional phase in my country's industrialisation process. Meanwhile, the event we experienced last year may reflect the fact that workers, employers and Government have not paid sufficient attention to the changing environment surrounding labour-management relations.

In an effort to use these experiences to develop more mature labour-management relations in Korea, labour laws – including the Trade Union Law and the Labour Dispute Adjustment Law – were amended to reflect the views and opinions of all concerned. Under the new legal safeguards, exercise of basic labour rights by Korean workers is now further ensured. As a matter of fact, trade union activities in Korea have been greatly strengthened recently, with more than 1,400 establishments being newly organised, a 34 per cent increase in a year. Their collective bargaining has also been more fully activated. Another significant point is that the Equal Employment Law was passed and became effective from this year so as better to protect female workers from discrimination.

On the basis of Korea's recent experience, I believe that in order to guarantee basic labour rights and promote industrial peace in developing countries not only should the labour laws be properly instituted but also the importance of labour issues should be fully recognised by society as a whole and continued efforts made to establish institutions and practices through which labour problems can be effectively resolved. Such practices and institutions cannot take root in a short period of time; however, by experimenting, a country can find the solutions best suited to its culture, social laws and traditions.

I strongly believe that the wisdom and experience of the ILO will be of great value in these efforts, and I am convinced that the ILO will continue to support and co-operate with developing countries in these matters.

In accordance with the spirit and guiding principle of the ILO, more than 80 ILO Conventions have been incorporated into Korean labour legislation. Specifically, the right of association and collective bargaining, mentioned in the Director-General's Report, have already been fully ensured.

As long as the vast majority of workers world-wide are deprived of opportunities for a decent life, their freedom, their dignity as human beings and stability in their daily lives cannot be guaranteed. In this respect, the activities of the ILO, including the role of standard-setting, supervision and consultation, should be further strengthened in order to guarantee basic labour rights and promote workers' welfare.

I should like to make a brief observation on the agenda of this session. Agenda items on employment promotion, social security, and safety and health in construction were discussed as central issues at the 73rd Session of the Conference by my predecessor on behalf of the delegation of the Republic of Korea.

Therefore, I should like to speak on the issue of rural employment promotion, which is one of the main subjects for general discussion at this session.

In the course of industrialisation, rural workers migrate towards urban areas to seek employment and better incomes. However, this phenomenon, which is generally observed in all developing countries, results in various socio-economic problems such as overpopulation in urban areas and the relative decline of rural areas.

A similar situation is observed in Korea. As the young labour force moved to urban areas during the industrialisation process, rural areas experienced a marked decline in the quality of the labour force, with a rising proportion of the elderly and females.

Faced with such problems, the Korean Government has been pursuing a vigorous rural industrialisation policy since the early 1980s. The Government has built small and medium-sized "rural industrial estates" and the infrastructural facilities required to provide inexpensive industrial sites. Also, in order to induce manufacturing industries to move to these estates, the Government has provided various incentives in terms of financial support, tax exemptions and technical and managerial assistance services.

In addition to the direct effect of increased rural household income through the creation of additional manufacturing jobs in rural areas, this policy will also encourage a variety of private-sector investments as the rural infrastructure improves. This will generate additional employment in tertiary sectors and also improve the provision of leisure and cultural facilities, thereby controlling outmigration and eventually promoting more balanced regional development.

The Korean Government plans to develop more than 200 rural industrial estates in 152 cities and counties by 1991, the target year of the 6th Five-Year Economic and Social Development Plan period. It is expected that in line with this programme, around 3,000 factories will be in operation with over 410,000 jobs being created.

Furthermore, since the 1970s vocational training centres have been established in rural areas to make better use of the rural labour force. The programmes in these training centres are designed to promote rural employment by providing vocational training that caters to local manpower needs.

In most developing countries, rural households rely heavily on farming activities for their income, and other types of job opportunities are limited. Therefore, I am of the view that in pursuing projects related to promoting rural development, the ILO should place greater emphasis on the promotion of rural industrialisation and the transformation of the rural employment structure.

Today the world is faced with problem such as slow economic growth, unemployment and poverty, and to solve them more effectively co-operation between nations must be closer than ever. The Republic of Korea is committed to promoting international co-operation and to consolidating closer ties with ILO member-countries in order to help solve these problems. In this spirit, Korea is ready to co-operate with any country in the world, regardless of ideology and political system.

Also, the Republic of Korea wishes to play a more active part in all ILO activities as a responsible member of the international community and to share with all other developing countries the experience and know-how we have acquired in the course of our socio-economic development. In this respect, I hope that we shall be able to join the Organisation as a full member in the near future.

It should be noted that, in pursuance of the principle of universality, the desire of the Republic of Korea to be a full Member of the ILO has been widely recognised and has received favourable responses in such international forums as the Eleventh Conference of Asian and Pacific Labour Ministers.

Before closing, I should like to extend my sincere wishes that this Conference will be a valuable occasion to seek ways and means for the further improvement of the human rights of workers and for closer international co-operation on labour issues and, in the long run, will prove to be a step forward for the common prosperity of all mankind.

I look forward to welcoming many of you in September, on the occasion of the Seoul Olympics, and thank you very much for your kind attention.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. ARIQAT (Minister of Labour and Social Development, Jordan) – In the name of God, the Merciful and Compassionate! Mr. President, it is a pleasure for me, on behalf of the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan and on my own behalf, to congratulate you on your election as President of this session of the International Labour Conference. This is proof of the confidence we have in you and your wide experience in the field of labour. I wish you every success in carrying out your task, of conducting this Conference to a successful conclusion.

This session of the Conference is taking place at a time when we are celebrating the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration on Human Rights proclaimed in 1948. This is why the Director-General's Report, Human rights – A common responsibility, is of particular importance. It deals with human rights issues in all their various aspects in an objective manner which reflects full awareness of the importance of this issue and the adverse effects it can have on the security and welfare of man as well as on the economic, social and political stability of the people of the world, and on peace.

The Report of the Director-General is in full conformity with the principles in which Jordan believes. This is why Jordan has always sought and will continue to seek greater progress in the implementation of human rights and the principles of justice and equality at both national and international levels. It has constantly endeavoured to develop and update labour legislation to ensure welfare and social justice without discriminating between individuals or groups on the basis of race, language, creed, ideals or sex.

Jordan has always condemned and will continue in all its forms to condemn the policy of racial discrimination throughout the world. It supports the efforts of the international community to eradicate this policy for the benefit of peace and human welfare.

Jordan has also ratified the major ILO Conventions directly concerned with human rights because of its firm belief in the need to protect these rights in order to ensure the social and economic development of the human being.

We therefore support the Director-General's invitation to take stock of the general situation of human rights on the occasion of the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration. This is particularly important since the ILO's resolutions and labour standards have clearly emphasised its vital interest in the human rights issue, especially the rights of workers such as freedom of association, protection against forced labour, against discrimination in employment and occupation, the right to work, trade union rights, the right to organise, the right to collective bargaining and so on.

In this context, it would be appropriate to recall the following. First, in 1961, the International Labour Conference strongly condemned the policy of apartheid. In 1964, the Conference adopted the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa. This Declaration was renewed in 1981. It called upon member governments, workers' and employers' organisations to make more effective measures to combat the policy of apartheid in South Africa. Second, in 1974, the Conference, in one of its resolutions, condemned racial segregation and racism, the flouting of trade union rights and freedoms by Israel in Palestine and in the other occupied Arab territories. In 1980, the Conference adopted a resolution condemning the Israeli settlement policy applied in Palestine and the occupied Arab territories and the effect of that policy on the situation of Arab workers living under the occupation.

This session of the Conference coincides with the continued uprising and revolution of the Arab Palestinian people who have been living under the yoke of Israeli occupation in the occupied Arab territories for more than 20 years. They are having to cope with the ugliest methods of repression, savagery and racism. This uprising of the Arab Palestinian people is a veritable revolution which is aimed at putting an end to the Israeli occupation, using the means available to recover their freedom and their legitimate rights.

It is important here to refer to certain passages of the Report of the Director-General's mission this year on the situation of Arab workers in Palestine and the Arab occupied territories. The Report contains detailed information and facts on the systematic policy of the Israeli occupying authorities and on their repressive and arbitrary practices against the workers, employers and institutions living under the yoke of the occupation. This well-calculated policy and the inhumane practices have resulted in a deterioration of the economic, social and labour conditions of workers and employers, and violations of trade union rights and freedoms are increasing.

We should like to mention the following facts which were contained in the Report.

First of all, the mission confirmed that the Arab workers working in the Israeli economy are still employed in low-paid jobs needing few qualifications in order to meet the specific needs of the Israeli economy. The mission acknowledged in its Report that this situation has affected the sectoral structure of the labour force in the Arab occupied territories; employment in agriculture has decreased, the industry and services sectors are totally stagnant.

Second, the mission pointed out that equality of opportunity and treatment between Israeli and Arab workers living in the Arab occupied territories is far from being achieved, especially in the fields of employment and vocational training, social security and job promotion. Furthermore, they are continually exposed to arbitrary firing.

Third, the mission confirmed the findings of the reports of previous missions, that the majority of Arab workers in the occupied territories and working in the Israeli economy are doing so on an irregular basis. This means that they are exploited, that their working conditions are unfair: working hours are long, wages are low and safety conditions are practically non-existent, which is contradictory to the human rights and international labour standards. Most of these workers are employed in seasonal work which gives them absolutely no opportunity of improving their qualifications, technical skills and income.

Fourth, the mission confirmed the continuous flouting of trade union rights and freedoms as well as human rights by the Israeli authorities. Trade union headquarters are practically all closed down and most trade union leaders have been expelled, arrested or placed under house arrest.

Fifth, with regard to the establishment of settlements and their effects on the situation and way of life of Arab workers under the occupation, the mission stressed that the aim of Israel is physical occupation, that is, confiscating Arab land in order to establish more and more settlements. The mission has confirmed that the continued confiscation of land and property in the Arab occupied territories has led to a radical change in the economic structure of these regions which has had effects on employment and development. Furthermore, the Israelis are appropriating water resources and continuing to harass the economic and productive institutions of the Arab Palestinian people. One important measure of harassment by the Israeli authorities is the appropriation of the Jerusalem Electricity Company. They have reduced the Company's concession and are undermining its work, with the aim of confiscating and liquidating it.

I should like to express the appreciation of the delegation of Jordan to the Director-General for continuing to monitor the situation of the Arab workers in Palestine and the other Arab occupied territories. We should like to reaffirm what we have already said – that the Report should contain a more thorough study and analysis of the bitter reality faced by the workers and employers living in the Arab occupied territories, should put forward the necessary recommendations to rectify this situation, in conformity with the resolution adopted by the International Labour Conference in 1980.

In view of the revolution of the Palestinian people subjected to occupation, the aggravation of the catastrophic situation in the occupied Arab territories, the real and serious dangers threatening the existence of the Arab Palestinian people in their land, in view of Israel's continued use of the practices we have mentioned, it was proper to submit to this session of the Conference a resolution concerning the protection of workers' and employers' rights and freedoms in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories.

On this basis, and from this rostrum, we should like to call upon all the members of this tripartite Conference: Governments, Employers and Workers, in the name of the principles of justice, human dignity and freedom to support this draft resolution which we have submitted.

The alleviation of the suffering and injustice faced by the Arab Palestinian people living under Israeli occupation can be achieved only by putting an end to this occupation and by the implementation by Israel of the resolutions of the United Nations, by recognising the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people and including their right to self-determination in a land of their own. On this basis, a comprehensive, just and lasting peace could come to the region.

We are extremely concerned at the unstable conditions prevailing in a great many areas in the world, which affect international peace and security. It is the duty of our Conference to adopt a clear stand on these situations in order to support the efforts of the international community to settle them. The Iran-Iraq war is one of the bloodiest and most dangerous wars today, not only because of its economic and social effects, the loss of human life and destruction that it involves, but also because it is a threat to regional and hence to international peace and security.

In conclusion, I should like to pay tribute to the positive relationship and excellent co-operation between Jordan and the International Labour Organisation. I should like to express my full appreciation to the Director-General and his staff, and to the Chairman and members of the Governing Body, for their continuous efforts in this field. I wish this Conference all the success possible in achieving positive results which will serve the interests of workers, governments and employers, improve industrial relations and ensure respect and protection for human rights and fundamental freedoms.

Interpretation from French: Mrs. SASSO-MAZZUFFERI (Employers' delegate, Italy) – Mr. President, you have already been congratulated on your election, but may I add to those congratulations which I heartily endorse my own personal expression of confidence that under your guidance our work will lead to positive and constructive results.

This year the Director-General's Report offers us a clear and accurate analysis of the impressive number of standards for the safeguarding of human rights, accompanied by the ILO's acknowledgement of its special and specific responsibility in this delicate field, and of the fact that much remains to be done, with courage and firmness.

Indeed, there are at least four ways in which the ILO can intervene: the adoption of standards, their ratification, their respect, ensured by all possible means of persuasion, and finally assistance to member countries for the effective implementation of these standards through the most modern and effective method, in other words, technical co-operation.

Technical co-operation deserves particular encouragement, and should give rise to increased synergy between the two priority areas of international action: on the one hand, standards, and on the other, pragmatic and cultural efforts which give a new impulse to technical co-operation.

I want to emphasise this cultural link which characterises these two aspects of ILO activity: it gives new life to the instruments of our Organisation, which for far too long have been viewed from a strictly legalistic perspective, and gives much greater dignity and loftier, more ambitious aims to pragmatic action in the field.

The Report of the Director-General devotes an entire chapter to minimum labour standards; this very complex subject has acquired greater importance. It should be discussed in the appropriate forums; but we must go beyond the results thus far obtained, and recognise that a link should exist between the introduction of products on the international market and the respect for the fundamental standards of the ILO in the areas of human rights, trade union rights, conditions of work, safety and health, within the tripartite framework proposed by the ILO since the beginning of this century. That is certainly a subject which merits closer attention.

Looking at the future needs of our societies, I think we must recognise that the instruments already adopted are sufficiently comprehensive, but that they need revising and updating, though I do not underestimate the need for adopting new standards as new areas of interest or concern are discovered.

In this spirit, we should also rethink the structure and the content of the industrial committees and the technical meetings to adapt them to the needs of our modern sectors. We should make more flexible and modernise this machinery in order to obtain from these meetings results more relevant to the rapid changes which are taking place not only in the industrial sectors but in other sectors of our evolving economies.

The employers' experience in their everyday activities difficulties which may be traced to rigid or static legislation and conventions, especially in areas which are by definition constantly evolving, such as the labour market and industrial relations.

While it is true that precarious and atypical forms of employment deserve greater attention, it is equally true that all means of making matters more flexible should be studied and put forward for consideration in order to improve the balance between the demand and supply of labour, to promote the creation of enterprises and jobs, particularly where unemployment is high and growing.

The Director-General's Report is realistic in wondering whether the right to work and full employment are dated concepts; it concludes that they are still valid objectives, though the means should be re-examined.

In Italy, for example, employers have experimented successfully with vocational training contracts. Around 400,000 persons were involved in this process in 1987 and most of these initial contracts were converted to contracts of employment without limit of time. It is a very solid and constructive response to unemployment, not only in terms of quantity, but especially in terms of quality.

Unemployment, however, remains a serious problem in our country, especially in certain areas where development is slow, and especially for young people and women. They are at a disadvantage owing to the rigid nature of our system.

The problem of employment calls for new forms of analysis and intervention to find viable and modern solutions.

Quantitative and qualitative differences in demand and supply of labour require that we go beyond the logic of any measures which would smack of assistance, and certainly that we avoid obsolete bureaucratic procedures, which are still all too prevalent.

The needs of enterprises, the attitudes of workers and what I would call the typology of new opportunities offered by the labour market call for a much more pragmatic approach which goes beyond sterile ideological confrontation.

The ILO is urging us to move in this direction in presenting the conclusions of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment, which advocate a global effort to facilitate structural adjustment and ensure a job-creating growth process. The crux of the matter is growth, growth as a direct means of creating good and lasting jobs, without subsidy or assistance. For this we will require a much greater mobilisation of resources and more effective use of the same.

Recently, the Italian employers clearly expressed their preference for this choice and pleaded for a greater efficiency of the "State's machinery" in all its most important functions, and for an infrastructure policy which would be able to revitalise the economy and society.

Above all, in many countries, what is needed is to prevent the preservation or creation of obstacles to the growth of small enterprises and ensure that the cost of financing, the availability of financial instruments and the condition of infrastructures and services do not impair the capacity of small enterprises to create viable jobs.

Inside and outside Europe, enterprises may thrive on institutional and administrative synergy and on a social context in which production imperatives are elements of growth. These conditions, which favours the growth of new opportunities of production and work, are important achievements of the most socially and industrially advanced societies and provide a model which should be followed much more widely throughout the world. But, of course, this implies the need for a special effort on the part of workers and management. The social partners have shown on several occasions the courage and the determination to undertake even difficult and painful options. The results have often matched their highest hopes, as exemplified by the common struggle of many European countries to reduce the rate of inflation.

Obviously much remains to be done. Perhaps we should begin by searching for areas where joint action would lead to mutual benefit and be free of conflict.

From the point of view dialectical confrontations between the social partners have already begun; and they will certainly multiply to cover a wide range of problems where international, economic and social realities will stimulate us to measure up to the task. This situation, with a cultural dimension, is bound to affect industrial relations in all countries.

To engage in constructive and open confrontation in the search for new flexibility and opportunities for economic growth and social development is the challenge which awaits the social partners in every country. Indeed, workers and employers carrying out their institutional tasks effectively and in new ways, and respecting their corresponding roles, can offer an example and contribute ideas and proposals to the administrative and public system. They can demonstrate the effectiveness of dialogue and the will to co-operate in national development and modernisation.

Only joint efforts to achieve widely shared aims will be able to break the constraints of the past and develop modern tools for the job – whether they be legal, economic or social tools – and make the best use of available human resources which have not yet been harnessed to the full measure of their intrinsic value and potential ability.

(Mr. Adiko takes the Chair.)

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. YANAEV (Workers' delegate, USSR) – Allow me first of all to congratulate the President on his election to this lofty and responsible post and to wish him success in carrying out the task of guiding this Conference.

We, and indeed all who represent workers' interests within the International Labour Organisation, are happy with the Director-General's choice of the main topic for discussion at this general Conference.

The 40th anniversary of both the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention (No. 87) provides the appropriate background for a general review of all the ILO's activities in the area of protection of workers' and trade unions' rights during that time and also future prospects for activity in this area.

We cannot but agree with the thesis of the Report that in many countries "fundamental human rights, like human freedom and dignity, far from being more widely respected, are being flouted often in dramatic circumstances". Such attempts to violate the basic rights of trade unions and workers are also committed in many States with bourgeois democratic systems, not to mention military dictatorships such as Chile. We therefore fully support the view expressed in the Report that "never before has there been such a need for international co-operation, in which everyone takes an active part" and of course it is precisely the ILO, with its standard-setting activity

As we speak out against this brutality, we call upon the international community to take action against South Africa under Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter before southern Africa is engulfed in flames which may threaten international peace and security. My Government has already made it clear that it stands ready to play its full part in the implementation of comprehensive sanctions against South Africa. Hence we do not subscribe to the view that sanctions would hurt more victims than villains.

The United Nations General Assembly has already drawn a link between apartheid and zionism. The persistence of these ideologies underscores the fact that in the world today there are two standards of human rights, those which are universally acknowledged and those which are born out of economic greed. Consequently, the immorality and the violence of denying the people of Namibia independence is routinely condoned by those who perceive strategic and economic gains in sustaining the regime in South Africa.

In that context, we also condemn Israeli atrocities against the Palestinian people. Our solemn responsibility, particularly for us in the Non-Aligned Movement is to galvanise the moral and political strength of all the nations of the world to challenge the Israeli occupation of Palestine. To that end, we reiterate our conviction that durable peace in the Middle East will be attained only through the convening of an international conference in which the PLO participates as a full and equal member.

As we look back at the impressive labour standards which have emerged from this Organisation we can state that the ILO has played its part in holding high the ideals of freedom and humanity which are embodied in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. However, we concur with the Director-General's concern over the pace at which old Conventions are being updated, let alone the opening up of new frontiers for standard-setting. A standstill in ratifications and drafting of new Conventions may not be all that positive. Let us take heed of the advice of a German philosopher, who wrote that he who moves not forward goes backwards.

The technical co-operation activities of this Organisation have played a catalytic role in the realisation of the development objectives of the developing countries. Africa, in particular, is a continent which is engulfed in an intense economic crisis. The future for that continent lies in the development of its human resources. To that end, we wish to underscore the fact that in the light of the political and economic realities obtaining in that region, African projects in the 1988-89 biennial budget should be retained.

As a tribute to the realisation of human rights through a struggle against apartheid and catering to the needs of the 55 million disabled population of Africa, we call upon the ILO and other organisations to intensify their support for the African Regional Labour Administration Centre (ARLAC) and the African Rehabilitation Institute, both of which my country is privileged to host on its territory. Indeed, it was a happy moment for Africa and my country when the President of Zimbabwe formally inaugurated the ARI Complex on 11 May 1988. In view of the turmoil in southern Africa and of our conviction that Namibia and South Africa will be free, we further call upon the ILO to increase its sponsorship of training programmes at ARLAC for southern Africa patriots who are battling against apartheid.

My delegation fully supports the principles behind the proposed instrument on Safety and Health in Construction. The construction industry is one of the sectors which has consistently recorded unacceptable levels of fatal accidents. Therefore we stand ready to make our contribution to the evolution of guide-lines on safety measures in the construction sector.

I note that the Conference will address for the second time the aspect of employment promotion and social security with the hope of coming up with an instrument on it. My Government is concerned at the fact that many workers retire at the end of their working lives with no income at all. Having taken cognisance of the plight of such workers, Zimbabwe was impelled to establish a social security scheme. We wish to place on record our appreciation of the assistance which the ILO gave us in that achievement.

With regard to the intractable crisis of unemployment, the Government is making every effort to mobilise the resources of the nation towards that challenge. With the assistance of the ILO, my Government is carrying out a comprehensive study on employment promotion.

In conclusion, allow me to state that if the 19880s have been called a decade of lost development, here in the ILO it is also a decade of lost human rights. What else can we say when 280,000 children die weekly from malnutrition and preventable diseases, yet a trillion dollars per year is spent on armaments? Where is the place of human rights in a world where a billion people are destitute and unemployed?

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. AL-ALAFI (Minister of Social Affairs and Labour, Yemen) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I have pleasure, at the beginning of my statement, in offering my congratulations to the President of the Conference on the confidence he has received and on his election as President of this important session of the International Labour Conference. I wish him and the Vice-Presidents all success in their work of guiding the Conference and its deliberations.

Part I of the Director-General's Report deals with a very important question closely bound up with the dignity and very existence of humanity: Human rights – A common responsibility. This confirms the responsibility of this Organisation, which stems from its terms of reference and its tripartite structure.

The general concept of human rights represents the corner-stone of this Organisation, its subsidiary bodies and its many activities. Our Organisation was the first to proclaim the indivisible character of human rights which encompass, without distinction, civic, political, economic and social rights.

This is what the Report tries to show as regards the application of human rights within the framework of this Organisation. We are talking about trade union freedom, the elimination of forced labour, the struggle against all forms of discrimination, the equality of opportunity and treatment and other social rights. We affirm here that any effort exerted to ensure respect for these rights can only be effective if it is based on complete conviction and tireless efforts on the part of all countries without exception, whether rich or poor, and particularly if they are Members of this Organisation.

social life in many of the developing countries. This makes us wonder whether or not the sanctity of life is any part of the human rights which some States seek to champion by all means. Our view is that no means that negate human life can be consistent with the objective of championing human rights.

A much more dreadful development is that some of the powerful countries have given themselves the right to prescribe human rights to other nations. In that process of human rights, the right to development and to choose one's own form of government in particular have suffered.

We submit that human rights standards are a universally shared ideal whose enforcement or interpretation cannot be the responsibility of any self-appointed custodian of international human rights. Similarly, we cannot accept that labour standards can be set and enforced unilaterally by a single country outside the tripartite framework which the ILO affords the member States.

A world in which 70 million people are unemployed, half a billion are under-employed and close to a billion living in extreme poverty is one in which there is a massive violation of human rights. At the centre of this development is the reality that a consensus on full employment no longer exists either nationally or internationally.

Amidst such developments, the Director-General may legitimately ask whether employment and the right to work have become outdated concepts. Unfortunately, no easy answer can be given. On the occasion of this reflection we are challenged to bring back into the political agenda of nations issues associated with the indignity of unemployment, the plight of the homeless, the anguish of the sick, the misery of the poor, the plight of the aged and the deprivation of the young. In the aftermath of the Second World War the world forged a consensus on full employment. In our times we need a new consensus, a consensus on development, one which will restart the engine of multilateralism and mow away hunger, disease, illiteracy and unemployment the world over.

The present world economic crisis has not only resulted in an erosion in the quality of life but it has eroded the principles under which international trade takes place. Consequently, during the 1980s, the developing countries' trade suffered serious setbacks. The share of developing countries in world exports decreased from 29 per cent in 1980 to 20 per cent in 1986. Despite the fact that in today's world the economic destiny of nations is interlinked, domestic policies, particularly in the trade policy areas, have had an adverse impact on the weaker trading partners.

Furthermore, macro-economic imbalances among the major economies coupled with exchange rate instabilities have continued to cast a cloud of uncertainty over the growth prospects of the world economy. Without a resumption of growth, a massive transfer of real resources to the developing countries, the remainder of this century may not see any advancement in the realisation of human rights.

This state of depression in global economic activity mirrors a failure to pursue co-ordinated policies aimed at sustaining socio-economic life in which respect for human rights would reign supreme. As it is, developing countries are being forced to restructure or "export" themselves out of the present economic crisis – a crisis which is a result of the combined policies of the developed countries.

The irony of it all is that developing countries are being requested to bear a disproportionate burden of this economic malaise. Through rock-bottom commodity prices, the terms of trade of the developing countries have deteriorated to the extent that over the period 1981-86, they have, as a group, transferred over $39 billion to the developed countries. Against that background, amidst so much fanfare, the IMF has established a new concessional lending facility to provide some $8.4 billion to low-income countries in support of economic and structural programmes.

The debt crisis is one of those developments which over the past eight years has practically reversed the development process in most of the developing countries. The crisis itself mirrors a malaise whose depth and scope is much larger than appears from the financial markets. It is an indictment of the asymmetrical structures and policies which underpin contemporary international economic relations.

The scale of the economic human rights violations as a result of the crisis has already claimed more casualties than any recorded war. At a time when developing countries are in need of capital, they have between 1982 and 1987 exported to the developed countries $145 billion in debt repayments. Instead of importing raw materials, building hospitals, buying medicines and importing machinery, their export earnings are earmarked for debt repayments.

What is at stake is not only the human rights of the present generation but also of future generations. The present economic crisis is inseparable from the environmental crisis. We owe a lot to the Brundtland Commission Report, entitled Our common future, which has reminded us that a world in which poverty and inequality are endemic will always be prone to ecological and other crises. Without an environment which can support future life, there is no future for human rights.

Geography has destined Zimbabwe and the southern African countries to be the neighbours of a country that had to be expelled from this Organisation because of its inhuman and unjust system of government, known as apartheid. Apartheid is not only an affront to humanity, it is also a crime against mankind. In addition to, being an international outcast that illegally occupies Namibia, the fascist regime in South Africa sponsors terrorism, international assassins and the political destabilisation of the front-line States. South African-trained murderers, rapists and looters roam the countryside of Mozambique creating havoc and severe dislocation.

In Mozambique as in Angola, parts of which are occupied by the regime, the targets of South Africa are schools, roads, hospitals and railway lines. South Africa's war, therefore, is a war against humanity, it is war against all the values which civilised society symbolises and above all it is a war against the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. South Africa and those who support it may wish to take pride in the fact that South African brutality by the end of this year will have produced a million refugees from among the citizens of Mozambique. Recently, a United States official consultant by the name of Ambassador Robert Gersony made a chilling report to the authorities on how South Africa's proxy army, the MNR, murders, rapes and maims men, women and children. Sometimes, the report notes, people are executed for exercising a right as elementary as the possession of a packet of salt.

The war in the Gulf area is also a source of concern for every country of the region and the world. While welcoming the constructive attitude of Iraq, which responds favourably to any peace initiative, we address ourselves both to Iran and Iraq with an appeal for peace, to put an end to this war so that they can devote their wealth to the peaceful development of the economy, to reconstruction and the strengthening of peace and security.

Mr. IANGALOI (Minister for Labour and Employment, Papua New Guinea) – It is a great pleasure for me, as leader of the Papua New Guinea delegation, to convey to the President on behalf of the Government and the people of Papua New Guinea our warmest congratulations on his election to chair this 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. I am quite confident that under his direction this Conference will achieve its aims and objectives.

I wish also to convey our sincere greetings to delegations from other countries who have, with us, come to discuss problems and issues many of which are common to us all in this international forum.

Furthermore, may I take this opportunity to express our gratitude to the International Labour Organisation for its generosity in continuing to provide financial and technical assistance to Papua New Guinea.

My country, as a developing nation, is not spared the troubles that beset the Third World nations, and we are doing whatever we can within the constraints of the scarce resources at our disposal to meet the social and economic needs of our people. Hence, any external assistance should only complement our national efforts. In this respect, we have high expectations that this Conference will not only set a high standard of discussion but will also enlighten us as to the methods we may adopt to find solutions to the issues and problems in our countries.

The problems of unemployment, underemployment and poverty span the globe but when the rich and the poor nations are compared, it is the poor nations that suffer the greatest. Furthermore, when the origins of these problems are traced, it will be found that a greater proportion of them are created for the developing nations by the developed countries through such measures as trade barriers, economic sanctions, the manufacture of synthetics to substitute for natural commodities, interest rates and price fluctuations, conditional financial and technical assistance and the like.

While developed economies can be blamed for the disparities faced by the developing countries, the governments of these nations, including mine, should not use that as an excuse to hide their weaknesses and failures. Rather we must try our best to do whatever we can within the constraints of the scarce resources at our disposal and any external assistance should only complement our national efforts.

My country has a population of 3.2 million people. It has been estimated that the population is increasing at a rate of 2.5 per cent each year. Hence the main concerns of my Government are how to create enough jobs to match the rapidly increasing labour force and also how to provide the essential services to improve the quality of life of the majority of our people in the rural areas.

Of our total labour force, only a very small percentage is engaged in the formal wage-earning sector, whilst the bulk of this force lives in rural areas and is engaged in subsistence and other informal activities. Despite the narrow formal sector, we have pressing problems: unemployment, industrial disputes, shortage of skilled manpower, just to mention a few. The present decade's recession has worsened the unemployment situation. However, the Government, rather than relying on the narrow formal sector to create employment opportunities or on the forces of supply and demand to achieve economic growth, is actively involved in the development of human and natural resources. This development is centred on vocational training, youth development schemes and rural improvement schemes.

The Government lays great importance on the policy of rural development; through the use of youth and church groups, rural co-operatives and other customary groups to build roads, schools, hospitals, etc., with the government backing of funds and building materials. However, it cannot continue with these programmes for long because of budget deficits. Its efforts therefore can be strengthened and accelerated only with the necessary external financial and technical assistance.

Having described in general the problems in my country and my Government's efforts to counter these problems, I should now like to move on to the topic of our discussion, the human rights issue.

Perhaps you will agree here that for any one country to be economically developed, it needs to have the one and only resource that is second to none. This resource is the human resource. In order for a country to progress economically, it must develop its manpower resources. However, the needs of its manpower must be met, thus ensuring economic stability, and growth.

Part I of the Report of the Director-General gives us all a fairly good account of the International Labour Organisation's continued policy of protecting human rights throughout the world. My Government is a great believer in human rights and freedom, and therefore ensures that the rights and freedoms of every person within its bounds is protected.

The national Constitution of my country, which is the forerunner to all the legislations in the land and also the guiding principles by which the Government functions, has enshrined in its provisions all the basic human rights: freedom of employment, freedom of speech, freedom of association, the right to equal treatment and the right to equal remuneration, just to name a few. These rights and freedoms are further provided for and also protected under various other lesser legislations.

The Industrial Relations Act of Papua New Guinea and the Industrial Organisations Act provide for the right of workers to organise for the purpose of collective bargaining. These Acts also provide protection to any member of any industrial organisation from unjust treatment by his employer.

Papua New Guinea, upon becoming a Member of the International Labour Organisation, has ratified 19 international labour Conventions concerning the basic human rights, ranging from labour inspection, safety, health and welfare at work environment, workmen's compensation, minimum wage-fixing machinery, industrial relations and the work. These ratified Conventions have been legally applied in the country without any modifications to their provisions.

Today more than ever we need international co-operation on respect for human rights. The elementary principles of human dignity require this.

I need not remind you of the principles of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and of the Constitution of our Organisation, in considering the conditions of work which subject man to widespread deprivation and injustice, endangering international peace and harmony.

No one can be unaware that the struggle against injustice by the Palestinian Arab people on their own land shows clearly their active rejection of Zionist occupation. The war of stones has shown that belief in rights and justice is stronger than anything else. The international conscience has been awakened and international opinion has been moved in the face of injustice and arbitrariness.

It is the duty of our Organisation and our Conference to adopt a responsible attitude and to stand by the Palestinian people – on the principle that human rights are our joint responsibility – by condemning the methods of Zionist repression which aim to make thousands of young Palestinians unemployed by breaking their limbs, handicapping them for life in violation of the fundamental rights and freedoms of Arab workers and employers in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories.

This Conference and the international community in general must put an end to the arbitrary acts carried out by the Zionist entity, such as aborting pregnant women, using poisonous chemicals and burying children alive. It is essential that we put an end to the forced emigration and expulsion policy, which runs counter to the rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Constitution of the ILO, by the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, by the Declaration of Philadelphia and by the Conventions and Recommendations of our Organisation.

The policies carried out by the Zionist authorities against human rights have confirmed their contempt for the Constitution of the Organisation and its Recommendations and Conventions. This should urge us to revise the conditions of its participation as a Member of the ILO since its policy is not different from the policy of apartheid in Namibia and South Africa, in either content or form or in its violation of human rights and freedoms, contrary to the purposes and principles of this noble Organisation.

May I take this opportunity to say what the Arab Republic of Yemen has achieved in the area of employment, training, standards of work, equality and liberty, despite the modesty of our technical resources and the recent establishment of our administrative structure.

Twenty-five years after the 1962 revolution which gave liberty to the Yemeni citizens, thanks to the revolutionary Government and the political direction of Colonel Ali Abdallah Saleh, we have succeeded in making great progress in the aims of this glorious revolution particularly in the political, economic, cultural and social spheres, as well as in secondary and university education, professional and vocational training and the provision of social services and modern means of communication.

The State has paid particular attention to young people, to workers and to women in view of their importance in the building up of our economy and in global development. This is in accordance with our permanent Constitution and the principles of our national covenant entitled "The political way of the people". This specifically lays down the guarantee of trade union liberty, the guarantee of all freedoms including trade union rights, freedoms of choice of employment, equality, freedom to set up people's vocational sectoral organisations and co-operatives. These large-scale organisations put into practice the overall plans and programmes for development and act as a framework for the democratic participation of the people in the political process of the Yemeni population.

This month free and democratic elections are taking place to elect the Council of State which is the highest legislative body in our country.

Convinced of the importance of the resolutions and Recommendations of the ILO and in accordance with the principles of this Organisation and hence of our responsibility to guarantee and observe human rights within the framework of the ILO and the United Nations, our country has ratified 15 international ILO Conventions. The latest are the Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention, 1981 (No. 156) and the Termination of Employment Convention 1982 (No. 158). In addition, other conventions concluded by other international organisations have been ratified. Although our technological and administrative resources are quite recent and limited, we have managed to do this.

Yemen's development plans over the last few years have always been concentrated on the development of mankind, because man is the main purpose and the main instrument of development. Man is the instrument in building, agriculture, industry and management. Guarantees for the promotion and social security of workers have been provided. We are paying particular attention to occupational vocational and technical training. We are aware of the need to raise the level of specialisation in trade, agriculture, industry, craft industries and administration. We have recently set up the Higher Education Council for Technical and Vocational Training, which draws up several policies of training and education and co-ordinates and co-operates with other partners in order to formulate projects and programmes and obtain the necessary financial and technical resources to encourage and strengthen vocational training, an essential factor in promoting employment. We are happy to be able to mention here before this forum the assistance and advice which we have received from the International Labour Organisation over the last few years. As regards social security, Act No. 2 on social security was promulgated in 1980. It guarantees social security for the family in old age or disability, and puts into practice the principle of solidarity in social security.

In accordance with this principle of social solidarity, we recently promulgated Act No. 16 of 1986 on social insurance. We also have Act No. 17 of 1986 on the setting up of a social insurance institution which guarantees present and future livelihood of workers and their families and provides insurance when they are prevented by disability, disease or death from being able to continue.

I began my statement by speaking about our concern at the humiliation of the Palestinian people and the people of Namibia and South Africa. I should therefore, against that background, like to mention my concern about Arab countries that are victims of repeated threats and aggression.

and system of supervision, which could be the proper organiser for such co-operation, strengthening the co-ordination of activity in this area in the framework of the Organisation itself.

It is from this point of view that we come to assess the Director-General's report, Human rights - A common responsibility, in which the problem is quite rightly considered in the light of the Constitution, Conventions, Recommendations and other instruments of the ILO, together with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights of 1948 and the 1966 Covenants on Human Rights.

The Report rightly raises the question of a close link between the respect for human rights and the problems of preserving peace and stability, as well as inter-relationship of civil, political, social, economic and other human rights. Our point of view is that each individual must fully enjoy the whole range of political, civil, economic, social and cultural rights on the basis of full equality and social justice. Indeed, we cannot conceive of a truly free individual without a guaranteed right to work, education, housing, medical care, social security and, most important of all, the right to life, without which declarations political and civil liberties become largely meaningless. For this reason, we consider all human rights, without exception, as being indivisibly inter-related.

We see human rights as a system of social and legal guarantees making it possible to reconcile the interests of the individual and the whole society, without sacrificing the individual, but also without absolving each individual from the duties imposed on him as a member of society. We therefore see no foundation in the statement contained in the Report that the recognition of the right to work does not carry with it the duty to work. This statement is in contradiction to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and to current practice, indeed to the Director-General's Report itself, which clearly states that "man of course finds it necessary in practice to engage in gainful activity in order to ensure subsistence, and work as a moral duty finds a place in many value systems". We might add that this principle of the duty to work is also included in the laws of many countries and does not have anything in common with forced or compulsory labour.

Mass unemployment, where the worker not only has no choice in his job but does not have even the possibility to work, is of course, another matter. In this respect we fully agree with the statement in the Report that "massive unemployment represents a tragic waste of [human] resources, and a wasted opportunity for development and social progress".

In our country, work is the main yardstick for determining the worth of an individual and his usefulness to society. The Constitution of the USSR states this duty clearly and distinctly, an honest useful job is a duty and an honour for each able-bodied citizen.

In the USSR at present we are actively working on a process of democratisation of all aspects of our society. We are strengthening law and order and increasing the interest and participation of workers in the solution of all the most important questions. The role of the soviets of people's deputies has grown significantly and we have broadened the rights of labour collectives. Election of managers by the workers themselves is being introduced in enterprises and institutions.

Work is also being done on legislation so as to bring it fully into line with the international obligations of the USSR.

Since the beginning of this year, we have implemented the law on the socialist state enterprise. It will become the basis for a new system for democratic management.

We have adopted laws on individual labour activity, on the procedure for appealing in court against illegal actions by public servants which infringe citizens' rights and other acts which vitally extend citizens' rights.

The social organisations, and first and foremost the greatest mass organisation - the trade unions - have been called upon to play an important role in the changes taking place in the USSR. We proceed from the fact that the social and political structure of our society is such that each organisation reflects the interests of the workers, but each in its own way and with its own specific means and in its own particular form. This is the essence of socialist pluralism.

In the case of the trade unions, this sphere is defending the social interests of workers. In other words, they are supposed to be the social counterweight to "technocratic pretensions", at the same time seeking to ensure that the acceleration of economic development is not an end in itself but a means for improving the welfare of workers and developing the individual. Precisely in order to guarantee these tasks and defend these rights we are now preparing in our country a law on trade unions.

In that connection I should like to say a few words about the chapter of the Report entitled "Freedom of association". The authors of the Report, while underlining the importance of the principles of independence of the trade union movement, give a dual interpretation of the interdependence of the trade unions and the political parties and of the unity of the trade union movement.

Proceeding from the quite correct premise that the trade unions, "in accordance with national law and practice... and at the decision of their own members", may establish relations with political parties, a contradictory statement is made to the effect that "a relationship imposed by law" is contrary to Convention No. 87. The same contradiction is also mentioned in respect of the unity of the trade union movement.

Similar attempts at a contradictory interpretation of national legislation and ILO documents over the years have provoked stormy and unjustified discussions in the Committee on the Application of Standards and is not in fact helping the ILO to become, as the Director-General himself notes, "a forum for discussion... in testing evolving ideas and practices against established values".

Of course, implementation of proclaimed human rights through ILO Conventions and international treaties is undertaken first and foremost at the national level. At the same time, we put the question: is international co-operation possible in this rather delicate area? And our answer is in the affirmative. All the objective bases exist for it.

Our faith is borne out by the proposal made by the USSR to make the question of human rights a component part of the overall system of international security.

We feel that the ILO could be actively linked to the process, which has already begun, of creating within the United Nations humanitarian and social blocs for international security. It seems that the degree to which the ILO is linked to this process will have a significant influence on its authority and the importance of the "regulatory" role which this Organisation will be able to play in the new system of international law and order which is being formulated.

In this respect I should like to suggest that the ILO conduct studies on the social aspects of international security so that this question might soon become the subject of a report by the Director-General or a special agenda item for general discussion at the International Labour Conference.

The ILO could be then guided by a quite specific set of social and economic rights, consideration of which is within its field of competence and these rights are listed in the Report.

Unquestionably, for the ILO to be more actively involved in the process of observing human rights and trade union freedoms, it would be helpful if the largest possible number of member States were to ratify the basic ILO Conventions, which are after all the touchstone for testing the genuine concern of States and Governments in guaranteeing legal rights to their own citizens.

I should point out that, through the ILO trade unions could make an important contribution to the fight for workers' rights and freedoms, since they hold a special place among social organisations in terms of both influence and a high degree of organisation.

A sober assessment of the prevailing state of the world trade union movement, however, makes it difficult to count on overcoming in the near future the organisational split between its three major sectors. In these circumstances, is it feasible to suggest unified action as the slogan of the day? We feel it is, because, after all, we are talking not about an ideological political compromise but about an open and equal partnership between all sections of the world trade union and workers' movement to achieve the solution of concrete problems of equal importance to all. There is no need to highlight our differences and insist on the correctness of our own points of view. If we want progress, we have to respect the opposite point of view, to recognise the differing circumstances of trade unionism that have developed in each country and to look for common ground between us in the interests of the workers.

It is only necessary to compare the documents of the leading international trade unions and most national professional bodies to be convinced that the selection and even the order of their priorities is practically the same. The struggle for peace and disarmament, the social consequences of technological progress and consequent structural changes, the defence of trade union rights and freedoms, the environment, the problems of development among the least developed countries and many others: these are of equal concern to us all.

There is no disagreement either on the position taken by the vast majority of international trade unions on the situations which have arisen in the various hotspots of the world. I am thinking above all of the inhuman policy of apartheid and the suppression of elementary human rights in South Africa, of the violation of the rights of Arab workers in the Israeli occupied territories, of genocide practised on trade union activists in Chile and Colombia, among other terrible situations.

The Report rightly mentions the inter-relationship between respect for human rights and the maintenance of peace and stability. However, this topic has not been properly developed in the Report, which does not even attempt to define a role for the ILO in working out a new economic role for the world in the current conditions of disarmament. In this connection, I should like to point out the positive results achieved by the United Nations Conference on Disarmament and Development in September 1987 and to call on the ILO to respond to the appeal made by that conference to United Nations institutions to devote greater efforts to the question of disarmament and development.

I am glad to have voiced these thoughts on some of the points contained in the Director-General's Report.

Mr. NKOMO (Government delegate, Zimbabwe)

— On behalf of the Zimbabwe delegation I wish to congratulate the President and Vice-Presidents on their unanimous election to preside over this Conference. I further wish to express our confidence in Mr. Bayreuther as well as to assure him of our co-operation as he guides the proceedings of this Conference.

Across time and space, civilisations of different nationalities have always endeavoured to immortalise their achievements and aspirations in monuments. Ours is no different from that of its predecessors but it is certainly the only one which is truly global and truly universal. Among other instruments, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights has provided a chain of brotherhood among races, social classes and nations.

The Declaration is perhaps one of our modern monuments to humanity and a commitment to higher ideals of fraternity which all persons as individuals, groups or nations aspire to achieve. Without such a commitment, the frontiers of enlightened humanity would recede, and once again the world would be revisited by that era of generalised wars which has already made our century a litany of anguish, albeit amidst historically unparalleled outbursts of technological and scientific advances. It is those fears that make the theme of human rights a timely one for this session of the International Labour Conference.

The Non-Aligned Movement of Countries, of which my President, His Excellency Robert Mugabe, is the current Chairman, represents not merely a commitment to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights but a commitment to fight and struggle for the attainment and the universalisation of those rights in all spheres of human endeavour.

The past struggles of the Non-Aligned Movement and other developing countries have culminated in other instruments such as the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States and resolutions which all stress the interdependency and the indivisibility of civil, political, economic, social and cultural rights.

An essential condition for the realisation of human rights is the existence of peace. The goal of peace is much more than the avoidance of a third world war, and yet there is no continent in the developing world that does not have a spot where war has taken its toll on human rights.

Once again, intolerance of plurality in international political relations has fuelled the disruption of

I should like, at this point, to draw your attention to the fact that although my country has not ratified Convention No. 87, the principal Convention which provides for freedom of association and the right to organise, the basic principles of the Convention are silently practised in Papua New Guinea.

Papua New Guinea's ratification of Convention No. 98 concerning the right to organise and collective bargaining has paved the way for workers to organise and form trade unions to bargain collectively for their common economic and social interests.

The amalgamation of various trade unions from both the private and public sectors to form the Papua New Guinea Trade Union Congress signifies the economic and social changes which my country is at present undergoing. My Government considers this move as a concerted effort by workers to have their demands heard.

Thus, rather than repressing the actions of the trade unions in Papua New Guinea, the Government, as one of the largest employers in the country, takes the position of a mediator and in so doing provides avenues for the settlement of industrial disputes, in our case the Arbitration Tribunal. However, the Arbitration Tribunal is used as the last resort in dispute settlement where all other methods of dispute settlement have failed.

My Government applauds the efforts of the International Labour Organisation in its continual endeavours to review and set new minimum labour standards. As we all know, the world we live in today is continuously changing economically, technologically and socially. It is therefore essential that new and more appropriate labour standards should be formulated to keep pace with these changes.

I conclude by wishing this Conference every success and I am confident that in the days to come we shall participate in stimulating fruitful discussions on the important agenda items before us, and I hope the conclusions and resolutions arrived at will be of benefit and use to us all.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. MOLANO (representative of the World Federation of Industry Workers) – The World Federation of Industry Workers (WFIW) of the World Labour Federation congratulates you, Mr. President, on your election to the Chair and also congratulates the other members of the Bureau and wishes you great success in your very important task.

The WFIW welcomes the Report of the Director-General on human rights, which puts its finger on the open wound caused by the innumerable sufferings of humanity in this respect in the closing years of this turbulent twentieth century.

We are particularly satisfied to see the repeated references to the interdependence of human rights, their universality, their indivisibility and above all the profound impact of the current world economic disorder on human rights, made even more severe by the recession and crisis.

A short while ago, we pointed out this aspect of the matter at the seventh session of the United Nations Conference for Trade and Development, which met in this very place.

The World Federation of Industry Workers naturally gives priority in its concerns to the specific problems of workers in the different sectors of industry. When we look closely at these problems, however, when we analyse their causes, and when we confront the disregard for the rights of industry workers, we are compelled to recognise that all this originates in a contexts of conflict that goes far beyond the firm or the sector. The conflict is situated in an entire system of economic and social relations which are ever more unjust, more irrational, more cruel and more inhumane, and which affect not only industry workers but also agricultural and service workers. This is so throughout the world: in the underdeveloped countries where the consequences are much more serious, and also in the developed countries.

The basic rights of workers which are being attacked, eroded or completely annihilated, starting with the right to a job with dignity and pay, are clearly described in the Director-General's Report and there is no need to repeat the long list here.

What we must do urgently before it is too late is correct the course of the world economy, reorient it towards true development and the satisfaction of the essential needs of peoples, and change North-North, North-South and South-South relations, all this ever without disregarding the vital framework of justice, freedom and solidarity. This indeed would be a substantive contribution to the safeguarding of human rights which, as is clearly stated by the title of the Report we are looking at, is the responsibility of all: of governments, of employers, of workers, of rich countries, of poor countries, of women, of men, of young people and of the less young.

This task of correcting the parameters of the world economy is supremely difficult because of the complexity of the factors involved and the magnitude of the problems and distortions. This does not mean that it is impossible though; certainly, a concerted and sustained effort is needed by all of the collective powers in society with no exceptions. The ILO, because of its universal, its tripartite and pluralist character, is perhaps the international organisation in the best position to conduct this effort which requires political will, technical capacity, inspiration and a series of ever increasingly comprehensive and profound consensus agreements.

There are problems that need immediate solutions: hunger and infant mortality in vast regions of the world cannot wait – this is the right to life; the debt that is asphyxiating the countries of the Third World is intolerable; this is impeding the right to development. Africa has become a net exporter of capital to the industrial countries which is an aberration given that the poorest countries of the world are to be found there; Apartheid: this is the most hateful of the types of discrimination condemned by the Universal Declaration on Human Rights; support for new democracies re-establishing civil, political and trade union liberties is urgently needed. It is vital to isolate dictatorships which deny those rights; the curbing of unemployment and underemployment is a priority not only from the social point of view but also from the economic and political standpoints; there are many human rights which suffer from this scourge.

There are other questions that require concerted solutions, more extended negotiations and longer processes, but which must be resolved: the stability of commodity prices; the abolition of the unjust protectionist barriers affecting manufactures from the Third World; the increase of world trade; exchange stability and monetary balance – substantial reforms in the current system and its mechanisms have proved to be absolutely vital; co-operation in the various facets of development; effective control of transnational companies; the impact of new technologies; social security, conditions of life and work and protection of the weakest levels of society particularly the huge mass of people driven into the informal economy.

In any case, it is of vital importance in attempting to set a solid basis for a new international economic order that all-out competitiveness must cease to be the sole motive force in relations among the countries of the North. Paternalism, dependency, economic colonialism and exploitation must cease to be the characteristics of North-South relations; and fragility, suspicion and rivalries must cease to be the keynotes of relations among countries of the South.

May I add a brief thought on the industrial workers who have undoubtedly been most affected by unemployment in the last few years.

In traditional industries, they have been the victims of closures, restructuring and modernisation. In the so-called high-tech industries, they are being forced to work like draft animals, that is whenever the boss wants, for as long as he wants, and doing whatever he wants, all this, of course, in the name of “flexibility”, “deregulation” and sacrosanct “productivity” and “competitiveness”.

This situation is tending to become more acute in Europe in view of the new situation that will prevail as from 1 January 1993. In the Third World, where these methods are not unknown either, the processes of incipient industrialisation have been brutally curbed in many countries by the impossibility of importing the necessary equipment and spare parts owing to the lack of foreign exchange (as a result of the external debt). Such equipment, however, should come from the industrialised countries (as a result of irrationality). And what about the workers? In some places they are becoming frustrated; in others, they are being pushed into marginality for lack of unemployment benefit. Is there a link between these phenomena and respect for human rights, the dignity of workers and the stability and happiness of their families?

The WFIW held last year in Brussels a World Trade Union Symposium on Industrialisation, Employment, Development and North-South Relations in which the European Community and the ILO participated. This year, we held a seminar on the rubber industry to analyse matters more specifically. On both occasions, we noted the correlation existing between the deterioration of respect for human and trade union rights and the unjust distribution of the profits of economic activity, at both national and international levels.

We would like to congratulate the Director-General of the ILO for the honest, objective and brilliant way in which he has presented this topic of historic importance in this supreme international forum of the ILO and we hope that his appeal will be taken up without delay and will produce the specific results the world needs.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. ESCANDELL ROMERO (Workers' delegate, Cuba) – Mr. President, first of all, I should like to express to you our warm congratulations on your election. For many years we have worked together in the international trade union movement and we welcome your election with pride. He is from our sister republic – the German Democratic Republic – a socialist country where there are no exploiters and no exploited, and it is extremely significant that for the first time in the 69 years of the ILO's existence, a representative of a country which is constructing socialism holds the presidency of this Conference.

After arriving here from the island of Cuba, which stands at the vanguard of the Americas and knows and suffers from the inequality imposed by the rich and insatiable North America on a Latin America with “blood running from its veins”, we reaffirm our conviction that it is urgent that we fight for more realistic and constructive positions, because progress towards economic co-operation, mutual understanding and peace must be based on the guarantee of equal opportunities for development for all peoples.

In taking up the topic of human rights, and denouncing the apartheid regime as one of the most monstrous violations of human rights, this 75th Session of the Conference is certainly responding to the most pressing concerns of humanity.

We cannot ignore the echoes which reach us from the Fourth Summit in Moscow. Our hopes are renewed when we hear that cautious steps are being taken towards a fitting destination. We can see encouraging signs in the international scene which favour peace and slow the arms race. This is the result, first and foremost, of the struggle carried on by the peoples and workers of the world, and a consequence of the peaceful policies of socialism, and particularly those of the Soviet Union.

Humanity urgently wishes to eliminate nuclear arms, and wants the funds which today are spent for war to be put to the service of development and the elimination of foreign debt, thus doing away with unequal terms of trade. For otherwise, the tumour of debt will reappear, with all the problems that are inherent in it. And thus it is necessary to establish a new International Economic Order which will eradicate these imbalances and open the path to new and fair relations between more developed industrialised countries and the countries which are victims of underdevelopment and which are brutally stricken by unemployment, stagnation and in many cases, regression.

The steps that are being taken at present to solve military confrontations should encourage us to seek solutions to the confrontation between the hunger of the exploited and the opulence of the exploiters. As was pointed out by our comrade, Fidel Castro, President of the Council of State and Ministries of the Republic of Cuba, it is necessary to fight to prevent the criminal death of more than 240,000 children who die in the Third World every two days, victims of hunger and malnutrition. This is roughly equivalent to the explosion every two days of atomic bombs such as those dropped on Hiroshima and Nagasaki. It is not enough to stop the war of bombs: we must also stop the bombs of hunger and exploitation. The resources freed as a result of measures taken to reduce stock-piling should be used as quickly as possible to promote development and to save millions of lives.

The Report of the Director-General refers to human rights on the 40th anniversary of the Declaration on this very important matter. I would like to make a few comments on his Report.

The imperialists in their hypocritical campaign, continue to abuse and make a mockery of the term "human rights". Their first and foremost concern, however, is to perpetuate their system of exploitation, using the inhumane system of class division and social inequality. As the Director-General points out, quite rightly, human rights are indivisible and they "cover, without any distinction or division into rights in categories, economic, social and cultural fields, as well as civil and political rights".

Can imperialists therefore talk of human rights? Can there be a more humiliating and inhumane system than that of transnational companies and monopolies? It was under this system that so much of humanity lived through centuries of colonisation, that Blacks from Africa, Indians from America and Asians were sold into slavery. Capitalism discriminates against women, against the Black; it exploits workers; it condemns millions of workers to unemployment; it is associated with gambling, drugs, prostitution and all forms of vice which corrupt the health and conscience of man.

It does not matter to the exploiters, to the imperialists, whether children are educated, or what their destiny holds; they do not worry about the health of their citizens; they are concerned only with profit, which is the foundation of their philosophy. The current income of the IMF, which is cutting back education and public health expenditures in many countries of the world, is proof of the imperialists' obvious contempt for human rights. A further example is the massacre of Palestinians in the occupied Arab territories.

In Cuba, before the revolutionary period, when the oligarchical government imposed by imperialism tortured and assassinated 20,000 Cubans, the imperialists never sought to condemn the regime for violations of human rights; nor did it raise its voice when there were almost a million unemployed, when the country was a den of drugs, gambling, and prostitution to satisfy the sailors of the great Power of the North. Everything was fine, and there was no talk of human rights when unscrupulous bandits, using the henchmen's bayonets, took over the headquarters of the CTC in Cuba and the trade union movement, establishing compulsory trade union dues and violating the most basic rights of the workers. Everything was fine for their accomplices.

Now that all this evil has been eradicated, for ever, together with exploitation of monopolies, when we have eliminated unemployment, filth, prostitution, when we have achieved full dignity for man – those in the North say we are violating human rights.

But who do they think they can fool? The workers and all our people not only scoff at this ridiculous lie, but are prepared to defend what they have achieved to ensure that we never return to the corruption, death, servility, indignity and despair which were imposed on us by neo-colonialism's main agent, and its corrupt puppet governments.

In my country, socialist Cuba, the working class and the trade unions are preparing to celebrate the 50th anniversary of the creation of the Cuban Workers' Central next summer at its 16th Congress. Today the Cuban trade union movement functions in full democracy, enhancing the participation of workers in the building of socialism. Today, free of the scourge of unemployment, our working masses reaffirm their commitment to fight to achieve the most in terms of what they can do in their working day, aware that we are creating riches for ourselves and not for exploiters. We are increasing savings in human and material resources, improving the quality of products and services, reducing costs and achieving greater effectiveness.

In commemorating the 60th anniversary of the birth of the heroic Ernesto Che Guevara, in a few days' time, the CTC and the Cuban trade unions are paying tribute to this great fighter, who gave his life for the poor and downtrodden. We are also preparing to celebrate the 30th anniversary of the triumph of the Cuban Revolution on 1 January 1989; our revolution is moving victoriously along the path to socialism in spite of the criminal Yankee blockade.

From this rostrum we ask for an end to imperialist aggression against Central America, Angola and the Middle East. We ask that the exorbitant resources used for military expenditure be used for development, to meet the world economic crisis and the growing economic and social problems which are made more acute by the foreign debt and its interests.

We reiterate our militant solidarity with the workers, trade unions and people of Chile and Paraguay in their fight against oppression, and with all those who are fighting against imperialism, neo-colonialism, racism, zionism and apartheid. To the Nicaraguan people and the Sandinista Revolution we offer our full support.

We support, as well, the Arab people, and particularly the heroic Palestinian people.

We express our solidarity with the Colombian workers and trade unions and in particular the CUT, and we demand that the lives of the trade union leaders in our sister country be respected.

We join in solidarity with the workers of capitalist countries who are victims of unemployment.

We also join in solidarity with the workers, people and Government of Panama who are demanding compliance with the Torrijos-Carter treaty and resisting imperialist aggression.

We are at the threshold of the twenty-first century and while men are flying in space, while scientific and technical progress is opening up many possibilities in cybernetics, biotechnology and computers there are many people who are left to rot in miserable housing without medicine, food or education. Nothing can justify the abysmal inequality between the opulent and the starving, between rich and the poor.

Let us fight for a better world, for peace and for social, political and economic equality. Only thus will the ILO leave this century with a clear conscience.

Interpretation from French: Mr. HEMMERLE (representative of the Trade Unions International of Agricultural, Forestry and Plantation Workers) – Our international trade union would like to congratulate the ILO on the judicious choice of subjects for discussion at this 75th Session of the International Labour Conference particularly the question of human rights on the occasion of the 40th anniversary of the adoption of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention (No. 87) and – of particular concern to us – the promotion of rural employment.

While reserving for ourselves the possibility of making more detailed contributions in the various committees dealing with the agenda of this 75th Session, we should like to give our view on some of the points to be dealt with during this session.

First of all, the problems of human rights. Our organisation, as a representative of the workers in agriculture, forestry and plantations, has a lot to say on the matter.

Workers on the land form the largest working population on our planet but also the poorest and most exploited, therefore the population which suffers the most violent, bloody and lethal assaults on their fundamental rights.

This situation is not the result of mere accident or fate. Which are these countries and societies that do not respect basic rights such as the right to work, to nourishment, to social protection, to education, and so on? If such rights are not guaranteed at the outset, all talk of freedoms and democracy becomes demagogic.

One should not need to be reminded of the tens of millions of unemployed people in the so-called developed industrialised countries and the massive impoverishment of hundreds of millions. More than 1.2 billion people are undernourished, a quarter of the world's population.

What about human rights then? Where are human rights when there are 3 million registered homeless in the United States; when the so-called developed industrial countries, through their relations with one another, implicitly support the racist South African regime; when in Central and South America, but also in Africa and Asia, under pressure from those same countries, from the transnational companies, and from the employers, millions of people are living in absolute misery and are literally dying of hunger, particularly through the use of the external debt of the developing countries which has long since been reimbursed out of the plundering of their national resources; when in Palestine Israel is implementing a racist policy of savage and bloody repression?

I could develop this argument at some length but I shall restrict myself to the aspects of trade union repression which are particularly flagrant in our branches of industry. The capitalist economic system which exists in these countries increasingly rejects the presence and activity of trade union organisations. For instance, Israel bans workers' trade unions in Palestine. In South Africa COSATU is banned. DISK is still banned in Turkey. In the Philippines 6,200 people have been arrested for political or trade union activity and one in three has been tortured. In Great Britain anti-trade union laws and measures have been adopted. In the Federal Republic of Germany we know of "Berufsverbot". In France trade union activists are fired, taken to court and summarily sentenced for having defended workers' rights, particularly the constitutional right to work. In this country, where the first declaration of human rights was promulgated in 1789, a trade union activist from our walk of life has just become a victim of an assassination attempt which was financed by his employers. His crime in the eyes of the assassins was to have defended the demands of the workers in his firm and to have denounced a black market trade in meat organised by his employer.

We cannot pass over in silence the assassination of 350 peasants in Haiti in July 1987, the assassinations of rural trade union activists in Colombia (138 since 1986), the assassinations of more than 1,100 rural workers in Brazil since 1964, the arrest of agricultural trade unionists in Bangladesh.

The list could be even longer, and without wishing to dramatise the situation you can see that it is extremely serious. Among the examples there are governments of countries which are in the habit of trying to lecture others on respect for human rights. I feel that they would do better to clean up their own house first.

At the Tenth Conference of the Trade Unions International of Agricultural, Forestry and Plantation Workers which has just been held in Prague and to which the ILO was invited, delegates representing 74 million members in all continents testified to the extent of trade union repression. We unanimously adopted the charter of trade union rights and democratic freedoms of rural workers, and it has been forwarded to the ILO. This charter constitutes a summary of the experiences of rural workers and their professional organisations in pursuing a number of objectives relating to their principal demands, rights and freedoms. We feel that this document could be very useful in preparing guide-lines and proposals on trade union rights and freedoms.

The deliberations of this session should decide on specific measures for a firm implementation in all countries of Convention No. 87 adopted by the ILO in 1948 on the initiative of the World Federation of Trade Unions and Convention No. 141 dealing with rural workers.

Large-scale international action might mark the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the convention on trade union freedoms and the protection of the right to organise. It would be desirable if such an event were to take into account the tenth anniversary of the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Trade Union Rights by the Ninth World Trade Union Congress.

Faced with the scope of the attacks against trade union rights and freedoms, all international trade union organisations should organise a joint response supported by the ILO.

With respect to the proposals for the Programme and Budget and other financial matters, we feel that a reduction in expenditure should not be carried out either to the detriment of the quality of ILO programmes relating to activities concerning workers or to risk endangering the democratic functioning of the Organisation.

Consequently, we are against the proposal to hold the regular session of the International Labour Conference only every two years.

On the other hand, we do support maintaining the present role and pace of the ILO's standard-setting activities involving legal obligations for ILO member States. The same holds for the convening of the world conference on training.

As a trade union organisation we cannot agree to replacing industrial committees or analogous committees by meetings of experts. This would reduce or even exclude the participation of workers, particularly since the quality and positive results of the work of experts closely depends on their taking account of workers' experience.

The ILO should also undertake to counteract the activities of multinationals.

As regards employment promotion and social security, we are convinced that workers should have a regular income through the right to work for all and not through unemployment benefits.

In our opinion, the application of any convention of this type should be supervised and administered exclusively by trade union organisations.

The system of remuneration should be uniform and jointly financed by the enterprises and by the State.

I should now like to make a few comments on this draft so that it may become a Convention in the interest of all workers. All the wage-earners or people seeking their first job should have an unemployment grant. Civil servants' payments should be made by regional organisations and the State. No qualifying conditions including the loss of a job, should be taken into account. Unemployment benefits should be paid on the first day of unemployment without limitation of duration, and their amount should correspond to the previous wage and not be adjusted to the family situation. They must assure a decent income and satisfy the basic needs, such as housing, food, clothing, culture and travel, of any young person looking for a first job. There should be no restrictions on the number of categories protected, provided they are all wage earners.

Any appeal in this respect should be brought before a body made up of trade union representatives of workers, divided up proportionally according to their influence at the national level, in the member State concerned.

In respect of the partial revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107), these peoples have been victims of plunder of the riches of their territories. They have been displaced, reduced to object misery and in fact sometimes even exterminated.

As the proposed conclusions contained in Report VI (2) underline, we feel that any Convention should clearly give unconditional priority to the respect of cultures and life-styles of aboriginal and tribal populations, and recognise their right to preserve their culture.

These peoples are very frequently members of our occupations: they have been robbed of their land and they now become agricultural workers, underpaid and condemned to wander in a hostile world. The agricultural population is generally the most disadvantaged, and the aboriginal and tribal people are at the bottom of the totem pole.

I cannot speak at length about this, but our Organisation is particularly concerned by this serious and difficult problem.

As far as promotion of employment in rural areas is concerned, any serious approach requires our getting rid of the so-called liberal, market economy theories advocated by technocrats of institutions such as the World Bank, by governments dependent on multinational enterprises and by employers' organisations. We feel that it is not necessary to re-invent new solutions to the problem. We note that the suggestions contained in Report VII do not take account of the real causes of the situation, and therefore do not offer real solutions. We feel that we must apply the resolutions and international decisions which have already been taken, particularly those taken at the International Trade Union Conference for genuine agricultural reform, which was held in 1978 in Algiers, as well as the World Conference on Agrarian Reform and Rural Development, held in July 1979 in Rome.

In respect of industrial market-economy countries, the problem is not one of agricultural overproduction or suppression of protectionism; rather, it is the obvious failure of their economic system.

Consequently, our Organisation believes that for these countries agricultural development should be partly subject to the proposals which we have transmitted to the Committee on Rural Employment, which call for radical and democratic agricultural reform and the cancellation of foreign debt, etc. But also it should go together with an overall increase in purchasing power, with development of economic relations on the basis of equality and mutual respect and co-operation between socialist and developing countries, and no longer be dependent on financial interests. Our contribution will be particularly detailed within the Committee dealing with this matter.

At last point on apartheid: because of its internal inhuman policy and its bloody aggression against the neighbouring countries, the racist Government of South Africa should be unanimously condemned by all the countries of the world. It must be completely isolated by boycott measures touching upon all aspects of its relationship with other countries. Those who do not apply these recommendations should be considered as accomplices and should be denounced as such before world public opinion.

In conclusion, the TUIAFPW reaffirms that it will always be prepared to participate actively in the application of any programme formulated by the ILO with the aim of improving the economic and social situation of rural workers and their families, in order to try sincerely to solve the problems of poverty and hunger throughout the world.

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT (Mr. ADIKO) – I invite Mr. Danieli, Government adviser, Israel, to exercise his right to reply. Might I point out that he will only have three minutes and his reply must deal basically with the question in point.

Mr. DANIELI (Government adviser, Israel) – The distinguished Minister of Labour of Jordan probably believes that major defamations are impossible to refute. Such is not the case when it comes to the territories administered by Israel, for two basic reasons. One, Israel has long registered considerable achievements in the advancement of labour and social issues in these territories, achievements which have been annually recorded by ILO missions. The distinguished Minister was somewhat selective in referring to the recent mission's report. Two, prior to 1967 Jordan was in control of these territories and marked almost no progress in labour-related fields in the course of 19 consecutive years. This discussion provides an opportunity for the Minister of Jordan to dwell on issues the delegates of the Conference are not familiar with – for example, the labour policy and programmes of his own Government or the situation of workers in the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan, which also forms part of the historical and geographical entity called Palestine. If he had opted for this preferred course the Minister would probably have told us of his intentions to pursue his own declared policy of expelling tens of thousands of Arab and other migrant workers from Jordan, as he officially stated only last October. He could also tell us of the severe restrictions imposed by his Government on Jordanian and other workers of Palestinian origin and of the case brought against his Government before the Committee on Freedom of Association some time ago in this respect. He could tell us that Jordan cannot, by virtue of its legislation and practices, become party to the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and other major labour Conventions.

My delegation wishes to assure to the Minister of Jordan that much could be achieved for the benefit of the Palestinian workers through peace and bona fide regional co-operation but very little through the mere adoption of a series of political and defamatory resolutions.

(The Conference adjourned at 6.15 p.m.)

Credentials

First report of the Credentials Committee

1. The Credentials Committee of the 75th Session of the Conference is composed of Mr. Nakamura, Government delegate, Japan, Chairman; Mr. Hoff, Employers' delegate, Norway; and Mr. Svenning-sen, Workers' delegate, Denmark.

Composition of the Conference

2. Since the signing of the brief report made by the Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, a number of modifications have occurred in the composition of the Conference.

3. The number of member States of the International Labour Organisation represented at the Conference is at present 138. To date 12 States (Belize, Djibouti, Dominica, Fiji, Democratic Kampuchea, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Paraguay, Saint Lucia, Sao Tome and Principe, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Solomon Islands) have not sent a delegation.

Accredited delegates and advisers

4. The total number of accredited delegates is 545, comprising 275 Government delegates, 135 Employers' delegates and 135 workers' delegates.

5. There are 1,323 accredited advisers, comprising 680 Government advisers, 279 Employers' advisers and 364 Workers' advisers.

6. The total number of accredited delegates and advisers is therefore 1,868.

7. With regard to the resolution concerning the participation of women in ILO meetings, adopted by the Conference at its 67th Session in June 1981, the Credentials Committee wishes to inform the Conference that there are 29 women among the 545 delegates accredited to the Conference and 153 women among the 1,323 accredited advisers. The total number of women accredited to the Conference is therefore 182 as against 159 last year.

Registered delegates and advisers

8. Since the present session of the Conference has decided to continue the practice adopted at its 49th Session of fixing the quorum on the basis of the number of delegates registered, the Committee considers it desirable to advise the Conference as to the situation concerning the registration of delegates.

9. At this time the number of registered delegates is 489, comprising 245 Government delegates, 123 Employers' delegates and 121 Workers' delegates.

10. In addition, the number of registered advisers is 1,087, comprising 572 Government advisers, 202 Employers' advisers and 313 Workers' advisers.

Quorum

11. Twenty-three advisers, who are substitutes to delegates who have not registered, are taken into account in calculating the voting strength of the Conference.

12. Since seven States¹ represented at the Conference are in arrears in the payment of their contributions to the Organisation, these States, under the terms of paragraph 4 of Article 13 of the Constitution, may not at present participate in the voting in the Conference or in its committees. The 24 registered delegates designated by these States are hence not taken into consideration in fixing the quorum.

13. In addition, one registered Employers' delegate and one registered Workers' delegate are not taken into account in the calculation for the quorum because of the provisions of Article 4, paragraph 2, of the Constitution.

14. At the present time the quorum required to give a vote validity is 243.

15. The Committee notes that the quorum calculated on the basis of the number of accredited delegates would be 260. The difference between the quorum calculated on the basis of the number of delegates registered and that which could have been calculated on the basis of the number of accredited delegates is due to the fact that some accredited delegates have not yet registered. The Committee urgently appeals to delegates present at the Conference to register so that the quorum will be as nearly exact as possible and that their presence can be taken into account in its calculation. The Committee stressed, in this connection, the need for the registration of delegates and advisers to commence as early as possible on the morning preceding the opening of the Conference to enable the delegates and advisers concerned to attend their respective pre-Conference group meetings.

Incomplete delegations

16. The Committee notes that a certain number of delegations are so far incomplete. The delegations of Costa Rica and Dominican Republic are exclusively governmental. In addition, one country (Zaire) has not accredited an Employers' delegate and one country (Lesotho) has not accredited a Workers' delegate. The Committee wishes to affirm once again the necessity for governments to comply with the requirement of Article 3 of the Constitution that a complete tripartite delegation be sent to the Conference. The Committee recalls that pursuant to a decision of the Governing Body, the Director-General each year requests the governments of all member States which did not send complete tripartite delegations to the Conference to indicate the reasons for their failure to do so, and that the information received in reply to that request is duly communicated to the Governing Body.

17. The Committee also notes that there is some imbalance between the number of advisers to the delegates of each group and also between the number of Employers' and Workers' advisers. It once again urges governments to take greater account, when nominating delegations, of the proportions in the composition of the Conference envisaged by paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 3 of the Constitution. The Committee further recalls the request contained in the resolution concerning the strengthening of tripartism in the overall activities of the International Labour Organisation, adopted by the Conference in 1971, and expresses the hope that Governments will accord equal treatment to each of the groups when appointing advisers to their country's delegation to the International Labour Conference. The Committee recalls in this connection the obligation of Members under Article 13, paragraph 2 (a), of the Constitution, to pay the travelling and subsistence expenses of their delegates and advisers and trusts that this obligation will be respected for the whole duration of the Conference.

Observers

18. In addition to the observer delegations mentioned in the Brief Report of the Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, the Democratic People's Republic of Korea has nominated an observer delegation to the Conference.

Organisations and liberation movements invited

19. The Conference is also being attended by:
- representatives of the United Nations and some of its organs invited by virtue of Article II, paragraph (1) - relating to reciprocal representation of the Agreement between the United Nations and the International Labour Organisation, which came into effect on 14 December 1946;
 - representatives of specialised agencies and other official international organisations, invited in conformity with Article 2, paragraph 3(b), of the Standing Orders of the Conference;

- representatives of non-governmental international organisations with which consultative relations have been established, invited in conformity with Article 2, paragraph 3(j), of the Standing Orders of the Conference;
- representatives of other non-governmental international organisations also invited in conformity with Article 2, paragraph 3(j), of the Standing Orders of the Conference;
- representatives of liberation movements invited in conformity with Article 2, paragraph 3(k), of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

A list of these representatives is appended to the List of Delegations published as a Supplement to the Provisional Record of the Conference.

Objections¹

20. To date, the Committee has before it a number of objections or communications concerning the credentials of certain delegates and advisers. It has forthwith commenced its examination. The Committee considers that its work would be facilitated if the Credentials would reach the Office within the time limit provided for under Article 26, paragraph 1, of the Standing Orders and if all governments utilised the suggested form for credentials of delegates, appended to the Memorandum communicated to governments every year prior to the session of the Conference. It would be particularly helpful if governments would provide exact information on the employers' and workers' organisations consulted in nominating Employers' and Workers' delegates and advisers as well as on the organisations which have agreed to such nominations.

21. The Credentials Committee submits the present report to the Conference in order that the Conference may take note of it.

Geneva, 3 June 1988.

Chairman.

Provisional Record

Seventy-fifth Session, Geneva, 1988

Seventh sitting

Monday, 6 June 1988, 10 a.m.

Presidents: Mr. Beyreuther, Mr. Smith

COMMUNICATION BY THE PRESIDENT TO THE CONFERENCE

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – Before taking up the first item on this morning's agenda I should like to make a communication to the Conference.

On Friday afternoon, 3 June 1988, I received a communication from Mr. Marco Gonzales Pastora, Employers' delegate, Nicaragua, in which he lodges a complaint concerning the composition of certain committees of this Conference. It is my duty to inform you of this letter, and I therefore beg the Clerk of the Conference to read it out.

Interpretation from French: The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE – This communication is written in Spanish. It is dated 3 June 1988.

(The speaker continues in Spanish.)

Mr. Wolfgang Beyreuther
President of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference

Dear Sir,

I am Marcos Gonzales Pastora, Employers' delegate from Nicaragua to the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference, and I wish respectfully to bring the following to your attention.

As Employers' delegate, I asked the Employers' group to be included as a titular member of the Committee on the Application of Standards, and for my adviser, Mr. Aragón, to be assigned to the Committee on Rural Employment. Neither I nor my adviser were included among the voting members of these committees.

For these reasons and on the basis of the resolution adopted on 14 June 1959 by the Conference, I request that the Appeals Board be convened to examine our complaint and have us included among the voting members of the Committee on the Application of Standards and the Committee on Rural Employment.

Yours etc.,

(Signed) Marcos GONZALES PASTORA,
Employers' delegate, Nicaragua

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – This complaint comes under the procedure adopted by the Conference on 8 June 1959. It must therefore go to the Appeals Committee which I shall convene without delay. I invite the author of the complaint to be good enough to send me in writing, before tomorrow Tuesday at midday, a brief note summarising his position so that I can transmit it to the Appeals Board as soon as possible. The Board will decide on the procedure it intends to follow but, bearing in mind earlier practice, I would request the complainant and all other persons concerned to be good enough to place themselves at the disposal of the Board in case it wishes to hear them. The hearings will take place as soon as possible, most likely on Wednesday, 8 June.

THIRD REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – We shall now continue with our agenda, beginning with the third report of the Selection Committee. I call on Mr. Vargas Escobar, Government delegate, Nicaragua, Chairman of the Selection Committee, to submit the report to the Conference.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. VARGAS ESCOBAR (Government delegate, Nicaragua; Chairman of the Selection Committee) – I have the honour to submit to the Conference the third report of the Selection Committee which is to be found in Provisional Record No. 5B. The Committee suggests that certain non-governmental international organisations be invited to be represented in the Conference and in some of its committees. It also recommends that the Conference approve some changes in the membership of certain committees of the Conference, which will be found in the document I have just mentioned.

I recommend to the Conference that the report be adopted.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – I submit the third report of the Selection Committee to the Conference for discussion. If there are no objections, I take it that the report is adopted.

(The report is adopted.)

RATIFICATION OF THE INSTRUMENT FOR THE AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANISATION, 1986

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – I would like to inform the Conference that the Director-General of the International Labour Office has registered the ratification by Rwanda of the Instrument for the Amendment of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation, 1986.

This brings the total number of ratifications and acceptances of the Instrument to 37.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – The next item on the agenda is the discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Mr. AHMED (Workers' delegate, Pakistan) – I feel it my great privilege to associate myself with other distinguished speakers in offering sincere felicitations to the President on his election at this historic Conference, as well as other Vice-Presidents including Mr. Adiko, my old friend representing the Workers' group.

I also take the opportunity to convey fraternal greetings on behalf of the Workers' delegation of Pakistan and myself to all the participants, in particular the Workers' group of this Conference.

May I take the opportunity to convey our deep appreciation of the work of the members of the Governing Body headed by Mr. Russomano, the Ambassador of Brazil; in particular, the part played by the Workers' group under the leadership of Mr. Muhr, ably assisted by Mr. de Vries, secretary of the group. The report of the Governing Body has been outlined in Provisional Record No. 4.

We also appreciate the leadership of Mr. Francis Blanchard, the Director-General of the International Labour Office, in carrying out the decisions of the Conference and the Governing Body. On this occasion, we appeal to all the member States which have not yet done so to ratify the important Instrument for the Amendment of the Constitution; so far it has been ratified only by 36 member States, including Pakistan.

Mr. Francis Blanchard, Director-General of the International Labour Office, has chosen an important subject for this report, Human rights – A common responsibility, on the eve of the 40th anniversary of the passage of historic documents, namely the Universal Declaration of Human Rights by the United Nations and the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87). Since the founders of the ILO have committed themselves as far back as 1919 that universal and lasting peace can only be established if it is based upon social justice in its Constitution as well as reaffirmed by the fundamental principles on which this Organisation is based and declared in the Philadelphia Declaration that labour is not a commodity and freedom of expression and association is essential to sustained progress.

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights also reiterates some of the important cardinal principles of the rights of workers, namely articles 22 and 23. It reiterates the right to work and the right to equal pay for equal work, the right to just and favourable remuneration and the right to form and join trade unions. Article 22 states the right to social security of workers and article 24 reaffirms the right of workers to rest and leisure. Similarly, article 25 also asserts the right to standard of living, education, health and well-being of the worker and his family. To this end, the working class may rightly stress to member States that they should not only ratify the key ILO Conventions concerning the basic rights of workers such as freedom of association and collective bargaining – Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 – as well as Convention

No. 141 concerning rural workers' organisations, the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), and the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105), but also arrange its implementation in letter and spirit.

Our country has ratified these Conventions long ago. It is really distressing to find that there are a large number of pending complaints against many governments in violation of the basic human rights convention within their respective countries.

Not only does the ILO supervisory machinery, in the form of the Committee of Experts, report on the implementation of ILO Conventions and Recommendations and the ILO Governing Body Committee on Freedom of Association, need to be further strengthened but also their observations regarding the violation of basic human rights conventions by the member States need to be redressed promptly. At the same time, the ILO should strengthen its technical assistance programme to the government, workers' and employers' organisations in member States to develop and strengthen the appropriate infrastructure to implement these Conventions, as well as strengthen education and training on basic ILO standards.

The Director-General rightly pointed out that the denial of civil and political rights tend to have adverse effects on the enjoyment of economic and social rights which has been reaffirmed by the Secretary-General of the United Nations in his remarks quoted in the Director-General's Report: "human rights violations do not occur in a vacuum ... Rather, they are more appropriately viewed as the natural consequence of systems rooted in injustice and inequality and which are often created and reinforced by a range of consciously pursued political, social and economic policies."

Therefore, civil and trade union rights go hand in hand with economic and social rights. How can the severe problems of mass unemployment, abject poverty, ignorance and disease be fought out within the nation and between nations if the rich are allowed to be richer while the poor remain devoid of basic needs? In order to improve the quality of life of peasants and working-class and lower strata of society, and war against want requires to be carried out with unrelenting vigour within each nation and by continuous and concerted international effort in which the representatives of workers and employers enjoying equal status with those of governments join with them in a free discussion and democratic decision with a view to the promotion of common welfare as proclaimed in the Declaration of Philadelphia. Since there are more than 900 million people living in Third World countries in a state of extreme poverty, more than 500 million people are underemployed and 620 million people are illiterate, and 90 million children are subject to harsh labour due to the extreme poverty of their parents. These problems are aggravating day to day with the rise of population, on the one hand, and widening the gap between the rich and poor within nations and between nations, on the other hand. On the contrary, US$1,000 billion are being squandered every year on mass armaments build-up, stockpiling of nuclear holocaust enough to eliminate the species of mankind from this earth. Similarly, the prevalence of an unjust international economic order is against the interest of Third World countries in the form of trade, monetary system, exchange rates, indebtedness due to international monetary policies, fixation of unfair prices to their products and commodities are further multiplying the economic and social sufferings of the people of Third World countries. They are paying more than US$700 billion, almost one-third of their export earnings in debt servicing. In such a situation, there is a dire need to change this scenario by diverting technology, material and human resources for improving the social and economic conditions of the poor, on the one hand, as well as associating the masses in decision-making process through their strong and independent trade union and rural workers' organisations by strengthening a participative democratic society.

In this context, we welcome the signing of the nuclear short-range missiles agreement between the United States and the USSR, as well as the Geneva Accord on Afghanistan as a step further for the promotion of peace in the world. However, we abhor and strongly condemn the racist regime of South Africa for pursuing the policy of apartheid, which is a crime against the whole of mankind, as well as the denial of trade union and human rights and liberation to Arab workers in the occupied territories and the commission of atrocities against them by Israel. I urge the ILO to continue to strengthen its support for the liberation movements. We assure them of our complete solidarity and support for their just cause.

We in Pakistan are striving hard to strengthen the institutional framework of human rights, and the working-class movement has been a torch-bearer of this cause. That is the reason that our Government has restored fundamental rights laid down in our Constitution. However, the Workers' group, in a recently held national tripartite labour conference, urged the Government to introduce progressive amendments in labour legislation to bring it into line with ILO Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 and remove other obstacles. The Government of Pakistan has introduced new measures for the promotion of education for the children of workers, free of cost, as well as allocating 178 million rupees for the construction of workers' housing on the eve of May Day. However, the working class is putting pressure upon the Government to bring more positive economic and social reforms to relieve the workers from inflation and unemployment and enlarge measures for vocational education and training, and improve the working and living condition of workers and introduce land reforms for the welfare of peasants and more facilities for the young, women and rural poor for their economic and social upliftment.

We also take this opportunity to stress that the ILO should continue to strengthen its technical assistance programme in the area of vocational education and training, improving working and living conditions, employment promotion, rural development and workers' education, international standards, population planning, women and young people's and children's welfare policies, and the development of appropriate technology for Third World countries, including Pakistan.

We appreciate the work of these branches of the International Labour Office, including the Workers' Relations Branch, and such activities undertaken by the International Labour Office, including the work of the Asia and Pacific Regional Office and the Area Office of Islamabad, is appreciated.

We hope that the conclusion of this important session of the Conference under your presidency will be a step further towards the amelioration of living and working conditions of working men and women all over the world so that they can build a better tomorrow.

Interpretation from French: Mr. NDOYE (Minister for the Civil Service and Labour, Senegal) – Mr. President, I wish to take the opportunity afforded me today in order to offer you, on behalf of the delegation of Senegal and personally, my most heartfelt congratulations upon your election to the presidency of our Conference which every year draws the attention and raises the hopes of the world of work. I remain convinced, Mr. President, that, thanks to your competence and your distinguished qualities, the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference will be a major landmark in the strengthening of the work of our Organisation, which so far has been extremely fruitful.

I likewise wish to congratulate the other Officers, whose assistance and advice will be valuable to you in the fulfilment of your lofty functions.

It is also an opportunity for us to pay tribute to Mr. Francis Blanchard, Director-General of the International Labour Office, for the skill and dedication with which he unceasingly serves the cause of our Organisation.

The fact that the subject of our general discussion this year is human rights must not be viewed as mere lipservice to the celebrations surrounding the 40th anniversary of the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights; it must provide confirmation that the ILO, because of its calling, has always, throughout history, inestimably helped man to develop his full potential through the humanisation of work.

Indeed, our Organisation, one of the oldest within the United Nations system, has as its mission to recall to the conscience of mankind its duty or rather its obligation with respect to workers, who are pursuing their well-being and seeking a just recompense for their work and a participation in decisions affecting their future; is this not the condition for social justice without which, as stated in the Declaration of Philadelphia, no peace can be lasting?

It is in this respect that the standard-setting action of the ILO reflects the goals of the United Nations Charter, which are aimed at safeguarding and promoting fundamental human rights.

The Report of the Director-General, whose loftiness of purpose we hail, recalls this mission of the ILO; indeed, Albert Thomas, the first Director of the ILO, said that this mission fulfilled the deep aspirations of all countries.

However, it should be pointed out that if the ILO's universal standard-setting activities, are to be strengthened, they must take into account regional characteristics, economic difficulties and the concerns of the developing countries.

If we have frequently stressed the need to bear in mind these specific characteristics it is not because we want to create "substandards for subhumans", but rather to highlight the necessary adaptation of standards to the limited capacities of such countries.

Universality, understood in this sense, does not mean uniformity; it is in keeping with the process of adjustment, ensuring that common goals are attained, taking into account the cultural, social and economic environment of the various regions.

Adopting the methodology of the global approach to human rights, their interdependence and especially their indivisibility, the Report of the Director-General is based around three main ideas: freedom, participation and solidarity which are the key concepts of social progress.

In this respect, we are pleased to note that this same approach has been used by the Senegalese authorities, since they advocate the right to development as a human right, without which no social progress is possible. To quote Judge Kéba M'Baye, Vice-President of the International Court of Justice, we stress it is because man cannot live without development, that the right to development is a human right.

Indeed, civil and political rights, in other words, the so-called formal liberties, would have no meaning for humans who are suffering under conditions of famine, malnutrition, ignorance and terror.

The right to development, viewed as a comprehensive right, better expresses the concept of interdependence between human rights and presupposes the prerogative which each and everyone must have to meet their needs in accordance with their aspirations to the fullest extent that equitable enjoyment of goods and services produced by the community affords.

In other words, as far as Senegal is concerned, the conventional concept of formal liberties, as expressed in the various international instruments, must be brought in line with the socio-economic and cultural realities of peoples.

The Senegalese authorities have, in fact, acted accordingly by attaching great importance to the concepts of freedom, participation and solidarity, which are the prerequisites for development. Fired by this conviction, the Head of State of Senegal, President Abdou Diouf, proclaimed that the Senegalese are convinced that without respect for fundamental human rights, without participation of the individual, without minimal freedom to act and think, there is no real development.

In agreement with the Report of the Director-General, we believe that freedom and non-discrimination through the protection of the rights to organise remain the only instruments available to the worker to safeguard his interests. In Senegal, the exercise of the right to organise is part of daily reality and takes the form of the power that workers have, through their freely constituted associations, to defend their material and moral interests, under republican legality.

One of the foremost demands of workers is equality of opportunity and treatment, both as regards access to jobs and remuneration.

But we must not forget that the bastion of apartheid is still standing in Africa and that it has made discrimination into a governmental system, thereby excluding millions of Black workers from the benefits of minimal working standards and social security.

We must also not forget that, paradoxically – and this is almost a provocation – the apartheid regime is celebrating its 40th anniversary precisely at a time when mankind is celebrating that of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

Our organisation is duty-bound once again to condemn the anachronistic system of apartheid and incorporate the struggle for its downfall into the great movement to defend and promote human rights.

With this in view, Senegal, in reaffirming the objectives of the Declaration on Southern Africa, adopted at the 23rd Summit of the heads of State and Government of the OAU in July 1987, supports unreservedly the proposition that only the application of global economic sanctions will make it possible to overcome this crime against humanity.

By the same occasion, the situation of Arab workers in the territories occupied by Israel, including Palestine, continues to be a source of serious concern, compounded by the uprising of young Palestinian civilians whose future is unfortunately far from promising.

As was pointed out in the Report of the Director-General, the policy of establishment of Jewish settlements in the occupied Arab territories is an obstacle to the realisation of the principle of equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and social security. It is for this reason that the Government of Senegal is anxious to see the organisation of an international conference on peace in the Middle East in which all the parties concerned, including the PLO, the legitimate representative of the Palestinian people, would participate on an equal footing without any preliminary conditions.

This position must not however defer the possibility to apply immediate measures for development for the benefit of Arab workers, advocated in the conclusions of the Report of the Director-General.

We are further convinced that participation, through the tripartite principle and collective bargaining, is a factor of social progress. Being the cornerstone of social and political liberties, participation through the tripartite principle makes it possible to free energies, bring out creativity and promote dialogue between the social parties.

However, the denial of political and civil rights has unfavourable repercussions on the enjoyment of social and economic rights.

In Senegal, the most representative trade union has freely opted for what is normally known as "responsible participation" with the political party in power and the Government has set up a permanent framework for tripartite consultation with the employers' and workers' organisations. This bears witness to the fact that, far from denying unions their freedom, the public authorities have understood that the tripartite principle must be viewed in a positive way and not seen to be the outcome of a conflictual attitude.

In this respect, the Government of Senegal has always encouraged collective bargaining, the aim of which is to substitute collaboration for antagonism between workers and employers, in order, among other things, to guarantee social peace especially within a context of widespread economic crisis.

Finally, we remain convinced that solidarity is the precondition for social and economic development. Never more than today has there been such a need for energetic, international co-operation. The international economic crisis which is challenging our governments calls for a common will to look for solutions at a time when the debt of the Third World and the deterioration of terms of trade are resulting in the closing down of enterprises, unemployment, underemployment and a decline in living standards.

Our efforts must be geared towards building the foundations of a new economic order through the democratisation of international relations.

The ILO is in a privileged position to foster such co-operation because, as Albert Thomas said, it must forge the common social conscience, which is only possible if there is a climate of solidarity.

It is with this view in mind that the ILO will have to step up its defence of human rights, through a combined action of standards and technical co-operation. This is the price we shall have to pay if our Organisation is to play a role equal to its calling.

Allow me to dwell on the interdependence between human rights; there can be no freedom without economic security and any neglect of the latter will prevent the aims of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights from being fulfilled.

All-out attempts for growth must not undermine respect for human dignity because the final goal of development is the constant improvement in the well-being of the population as a whole.

Whatever sacrifices may be required by the population, the requirements of growth must not either justify nor excuse denial of human rights.

As so clearly stated by President Franklin Roosevelt, economic policy cannot be a role in itself; it can only be a means of achieving our social objectives.

In the trilogy of growth, employment and the satisfaction of basic needs, employment is an essential feature. We must therefore insist on the need to humanise our countries' structural adjustment policies which are dictated by the drastic international economic situation.

These policies, as Senegal views them, must not overlook the social dimension of development nor the dramatic repercussions they have for the world of work.

To conclude, may I stress the Government of Senegal's firm intention to spare no effort to promote human rights, which constitutes one of the cornerstones of its domestic and foreign policies.

However, if efforts to promote international standards on human rights are to be effective, they must reflect the common will of all the Members of our Organisation, working in close co-operation to assume the common responsibility so aptly mentioned by the Director-General in his Report.

Mrs. SIGURDARDOTTIR (Minister of Social Affairs, Iceland) – Mr. President, I should like to begin my address by congratulating you on your election as President of the 75th Conference of the International Labour Organisation. I am quite certain that you will serve in this position of trust with responsibility and firmness so that this Conference will be able to bring to a conclusion the important business on its agenda.

Part I of the Director-General's Report to the present 75th Session of the Conference deals with developments in the field of human rights with regard to the increasing economic problems and growing unemployment in many parts of the world. In this way the ILO is making its own contribution to the commemoration of the 40th anniversary of the United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

The promotion of human rights is one of the subjects that the ILO has had on its agenda from the beginning.

Although much has been achieved, human rights are still too widely violated. Some instances stand out. In South Africa apartheid is still the reigning policy of the Government of the White minority even though the world's condemnation of this cruel policy is fortunately becoming more and more outspoken. The Icelandic Government has made it clear that it is firmly opposed to the policy of apartheid and has been co-operating with other Nordic Governments in their determined stance against this policy. Some steps have been taken by the Government in this regard. I would specifically like to mention the resolution adopted by the Icelandic Parliament last April for a trade embargo on South Africa.

In Northern Europe, the part of the world to which Iceland belongs, fundamental human rights, such as the right to free expression and free assembly, have been held in great esteem for a long time. The countries have very different priorities from those of the nations where these rights still have to be established. This is mentioned in the Director-General's Report.

In Iceland, the aspect of human rights which has been discussed most extensively is equality of the sexes. The present Government, which came to power in July 1987, has placed special emphasis on matters concerning equality and the family. In the formal agreement concluded between the political parties represented in the present Government, the equality of women and men is emphasised, with special stress laid on equal pay. It is also emphasised that people should to some extent be able to regulate their working hours themselves, and that working hours could be shortened without any loss of pay.

The aspect of equal rights which has recently been studied specifically under the auspices of my Government involves the situation of women on the labour market. It has been found that women's contribution in employment is not valued as highly as men's. Men tend to receive all kinds of extra payments much more than women, such as a car allowance, extra pay and payment for overtime. The percentage of women in positions of responsibility is much smaller than that of men, even though very great progress has been made in women's education during the past decade.

The Government of Iceland is planning to make determined efforts to ensure equality of the sexes in Icelandic society over the next four years. One of the things we shall try to do is to have every Ministry and every official institution draw up a plan for increased equality within each institution regarding both equal pay and equal possibilities of promotion. The Government has high hopes that these plans will prove effective. I should also mention that Iceland is taking part in a common project with the other Nordic countries to develop and test methods for breaking down the male-female division of the labour market.

During the past few years developments in Iceland have nevertheless been to the advantage of women. A significant milestone was passed when an Icelandic woman became the first woman in the world to be democratically elected as Head of State. The election of Mrs. Vigdís Finnbogadóttir as President of Iceland has been a great incentive for other Icelandic women to make their mark in all facets of society.

One of the fundamental goals of the Government of Iceland in its economic and employment policies has been to keep the country free from unemployment. For the last 40 years we have had virtually no unemployment. Thus, Iceland has actually fulfilled the objectives set forth in Article 2 of the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122). Unemployment in Iceland has, in fact, been less than 1 per cent of the available workforce. But it has not always been easy to maintain these conditions. The greatest single factor influencing this is the undiversified nature of our exports. Iceland bases its livelihood on fishing. More than 70 per cent of the country's foreign exchange earnings come from exports of fish and fish products. When there have been difficulties in the fishing industry, whether from falling prices on our export markets or from reductions in catches, the Government has been forced to apply very strict economic measures in order to maintain full employment. In his Report the Director-General recognises that conditions vary within the member countries in these respects. It is certainly a matter of concern that the Icelandic Government has at times had to resort to enacting laws to restrict pay rises. However, the purpose of passing such laws is first and foremost to protect job security, to reduce the rate of inflation and to secure the purchasing power of wages, especially for the lowest-income group.

I am glad to announce that my Government is now preparing the ratification of several international Conventions, among them the Employment Policy Convention (No. 122).

The present Government of Iceland is searching for various means of improving the competitive position of Icelandic industries and thus increasing job security.

Among the resolutions passed at the Fourth Regional European Conference of the ILO, convened last September, there was one on vocational training which laid great stress on the need for tripartite co-operation to increase the opportunities for workers of receiving vocational training and re-education. This is a message which the Icelandic Government takes seriously. It has been preparing an overall plan in these matters, on which it continues to work.

The organisations of employers and workers are fully aware of the importance of this plan. Recently, an increasing number of its provisions have been included in wage agreements concerning re-education.

On the agenda of this session of the Conference there are numerous important matters. Before us we have a proposed new international convention on employment promotion and social security. Even though Iceland is one of the few countries where unemployment is virtually unknown, we wholeheartedly endorse the views put forward in the proposal before this session of the Conference. We have to fight unemployment with all the means available. Human dignity is at stake in this.

The number of accidents in the building industry in Iceland is far too high. The Icelandic authorities have been trying by various means to reduce the number of accidents in this trade. We have very comprehensive laws on security and hygiene in the workplace. The Icelandic Administration of Occupational Safety and Health has been tightening up its inspection of the implementation of these laws, especially at construction sites. But I am of the opinion that we have to seek new alternatives in these matters. A new convention and recommendation on the subject will undoubtedly be a valuable contribution towards accident prevention in the building trade.

The finances of the ILO are a matter of concern. The financial straits in which the Organisation has found itself will result in decreasing assistance and service. This will mainly affect the small and poor nations that are most in need of assistance. Many of these nations find it difficult to pay the cost of sending a trilateral delegation to take part in the three-week session of the ILO Conference. I am of the opinion that the Organisation should take more notice of these matters. Its objective should be to make it equally easy for all Member States to take part in its work, whether they are big or small, rich or poor. Every State has its role in the community of nations, including those which are small and poor. The summit meeting between General Secretary Gorbachev and President Reagan held in Iceland in 1986 shows that small nations can contribute in their own way to international co-operation and at the same time to lasting peace in the world.

In conclusion I should like to extend my best wishes for the future work of the ILO in its important task of abolishing social injustice in the world, and in this manner making the world a more peaceful place.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. PAZZIANOTTO PINTO (Minister of Labour, Brazil) – On behalf of the Brazilian Government, I wish to congratulate Your Excellency on your welcome election to the presidency of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. I am happy that all these delegations of the member States – representatives of governments, employers and workers – are meeting here for a further important stage of negotiations and discussions.

I extend my greetings to the Director-General, Mr. Francis Blanchard, who with his outstanding talent and experience, has led the ILO through a dynamic period of undoubted significance in the world field, providing a free and democratic forum where the major problems connected with the world of labour are usefully discussed.

I consider the ILO meeting of this year to be of particular importance, because we are celebrating here the 40 years of existence of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

Adopted by the General Assembly of the United Nations on 10 December 1948, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights is the most significant political document of this century and will certainly be seen as such throughout the next century. It affirms the equality of man in dignity and in rights and states that, endowed with reason and conscience, men should act towards one another in a spirit of brotherhood. It proclaims the universal right to free choice of employment, to just conditions of work, to protection against unemployment, to equal pay for equal work, to just remuneration ensuring workers and their family an existence worthy of human dignity. Drafted in the same spirit that has guided the ILO since it was first set up in 1919, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights further proclaims the right to form and to join trade unions for the protection of the workers' interests.

For its part, Convention No. 87 has reached its 40th anniversary with all the prestige attaching to its more than 100 ratifications and by the general conviction that trade union autonomy and freedom of association are the essential touchstones of the organisation of democracies. Forty years after its approval at the San Francisco Conference, Convention No. 87 retains its authority as a basic document of trade unionism today, as opposed to the fascist co-operative models of the thirties and forties; and with its force and relevance it should serve as an inspiration and as a guide for those who engage, with effectiveness and due awareness, in the struggle for modernity in the difficult field of collective labour relations.

For Brazilians, this year is also significant because it marks the centenary of the abolition of slavery. It was on 13 May 1888 that the Imperial Princess Isabel d'Orleans, as a member of the regency of the Empire, signed, in the midst of great rejoicing, the law which put an end to that greatest, most shameful plague.

The Black race made and is still making a notable, undoubted and generous contribution to the development of Brazil. Through its untiring and creative work, its artistic talent, its religiousness, its strength and skill, its dedication, its heroism when necessary, the Black population, an important part of the Brazilian population, is a strong and vital feature of our human landscape, our economic life and our cultural, social and political activities. President José Sarney, in his speech commemorating the centenary of the abolition of slavery, recalled that in Brazil racial discrimination is a crime, that the Blacks brought an original and moving ingredient from Africa to the soul of Brazil. It is impossible to imagine Brazil without its richest and most original feature, making it unique in the world: the presence of Black people in every sector of the leadership of our country, in a fruitful revolution of redemption which still prevails.

As I said in my previous statements, with the Government of President José Sarney, Brazil began to carry out a widespread effort to achieve simultaneously political transition and economic recovery, two Herculean tasks which require the need to do away with old structures held up by decades of arbitrariness, authoritarianism, maladministration, waste, graft, embezzlement and indebtedness.

Thus, in my country, we are facing a doubly difficult but also doubly fascinating task: to transform a system which was authoritarian for centuries into a new democratic organisation creating durable institutions to resist the crises which frequently assail young nations with a high degree of concern combined with a great desire for growth.

In the political sphere, the transition is moving steadily forward, soon, we hope, to be crowned by the work of the Constituent National Assembly. It should be recorded that in this Assembly, representing all economic sectors, all trends of political thought, from the communists to the monarchists, and including the various left-, centre- and right-wing movements, social questions are among those which arouse most interest and controversy, leading us to believe that the future Federal Constitution of Brazil will express the thoughts of the majority of the Brazilian people. Although the Constituent National Assembly is continuing its task the changes in the field of labour relations promoted by the Government are of enormous significance, as the Employers' and Workers' representatives have acknowledged from this rostrum at this Conference. There have been some unfortunate episodes of violence, involving workers, rural land owners and eventually indigenous people in which the Government played no part; but the Government is earnestly taking energetic action to investigate the facts and identify those responsible, who will be brought to justice.

In these last three years the trade union movement has been particularly active. There have been over 5,000 strikes involving essential public services. The Government, through its present legislation, has recognised more than 1,060 new trade unions of which 400 are rural workers' organisations.

Other government measures bear witness to the Government's concern for labour, such as the establishment of unemployment insurance, support for craftsmen, systematic combating of industrial accidents and occupational diseases, approval of the standards regulating rural labour, acceleration of the process of ratification of ILO Conventions, and a new salary policy providing for monthly adjustments particularly with respect to the minimum wage.

The economic transition is slower than the political one, because of our poverty and because it depends, inter alia, on large-scale investments. I wish now to turn to a subject which has often been mentioned – the external debt.

Although it must be said that Brazil has made some progress in its negotiations with its creditors and with the International Monetary Fund, according to the most recent information given by the Minister of Economy, it is imperative to halt the economic, social and political constrictions caused by the need to make payments which are frequently beyond the economic capacity of the debtor country.

Brazil has placed itself in the worthy situation of one who wishes to comply with its responsibilities. It will do so even at great cost and sacrifice, but it must not do so by having to impose recessive policies of unemployment, massive export of resources, low wages, hunger and poverty.

The division of the world into developed and non-developed countries may be unfair, but it can be understood. However we cannot allow the policy of strangulation practised by the developed countries when they are creditors, towards the non-developed debtor countries, particularly because this policy generates political instability and can result in social upheaval which will have repercussions on the industrialised countries themselves.

In the last ten years, Brazil has transferred abroad in payment of debts and debt-servicing net resources of the order of 143 billion dollars. For this year the prospect is for a trade surplus of the order of US$12,600 million, 85 per cent of which will have to be used for debt servicing.

This sum could have paid for 330,000 direct jobs in industry, calculating an average per job of 30,000 dollars – without counting the indirect and multiplier effects of the jobs that might have been created in the internal market and abroad. The obligations imposed by the debt continue to prevent Brazil from importing the equipment indispensable for extending and modernising its industry.

The fact that the external debt is closely linked with the political and social destiny of the developing countries has been very properly noted by the Director-General in various parts of his very detailed report on human rights. I congratulate him warmly for having included this topic in his important document.

Likewise, I am happy that the International Labour Organisation has continued to deal with the problem and to take steps in this regard. These include the resolution on development, external debt and the social objectives of the ILO which was an important milestone in the history of the Organisation since it dealt for the first time with the problem of the debt and its serious social consequences for the developing countries. This was followed by two international meetings: a meeting on the democratic administration of labour in the face of the crisis, convened by the Inter-American Centre for Labour Administration in Brasilia in September 1987, and the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment held in Geneva in November.

At the former meeting, six labour ministers from Latin America (Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Peru, Uruguay and Venezuela), had an opportunity for a full and frank exchange of ideas about the serious economic and social crisis facing Latin America today as a consequence of the external debt burden.

At the High-Level Meeting, participants emphasised the fact that the ILO's activities in the field of employment stem directly from its special responsibility for labour and social issues within the United Nations system and in particular with respect to the promotion of productive, freely chosen employment. It was also pointed out that the number of unemployed and poor in today's world is alarmingly high, and according to the latest forecasts, will increase, thus requiring efforts through jointly agreed measures of a national and international nature to accelerate growth, generate employment and combat prolonged unemployment.

In this context, the industrialised countries must, among other measures, stimulate investments and create new employment, maintain and extend a unilateral open trade system in order to facilitate investment and international financing, allow the commodities from the developing countries access to their domestic markets and adopt flexible policies with respect to the external debt problem.

The developing countries, according to the High-Level Meeting, must adopt policies of structural adjustment that will enable them to take a better part in an interdependent economic world, sharing to the extent of their possibilities with the industrialised countries true responsibilities of maintaining and extending an open system of international trade.

Brazil has tried to carry out a policy of stability combined with a new structural order. Its new industrial policy, which was recently announced by the President of the Republic, provides incentives and encouragement to Brazilian and international employers while taking due account of our characteristics as a developing country and our requirements. Our Government has launched a challenge to investors to generate employment and wealth and to replace the old, hitherto necessary policy of import substitution by a policy of risks in a system that must be based on competition, quality and prices.

We are carefully assessing the possible consequences of an open economic policy in a country whose economy is still weak and requires protectionist barriers to achieve a certain level of industrial development.

The Government of President José Sarney has a clear idea of the difficulties facing our country and the rest of the world. We have tried to reduce the social debt handed down from past years, but we have problems, and the most serious of these is a lack of resources required to overcome poverty.

It is with renewed confidence in the role of the ILO that we have come back here in the certainty that the 75th Session of this Conference will take an enormous step forward in establishing more effective links among the member countries, workers, employers and governments.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. AL-SABAH (Minister of Social Affairs and Labour, Kuwait) – Mr. President, Wolfgang Beyreuther, distinguished delegates, in the name of the State of Kuwait and its people, I greet you as well as all the delegations participating in this session of the Conference, which I have the pleasure to attend for the first time. I extend to you my congratulations, Mr. President, on the occasion of your election as President of this session. I also extend my congratulations to the deputies of the President, who won the confidence of this Conference.

The reason for our meeting is not the exchange of courteous statements. We are fully confident that you and your deputies, as well as all the delegates, will endeavour to make this session a success.

We appreciate the Director-General's choice concerning the theme of human rights for this session. It is a vital issue which relates to the aspirations and feelings of millions of people on this planet. The Director-General spared no effort in preparing and presenting it in a comprehensive manner. We thank him for that.

The Report has rightly stated that even though the expression "human rights" is not contained as such in the ILO's Constitution, the concept of human rights is the basis on which all the activities of the Organisation are founded. The ILO has in effect always emphasised the interdependent principles of civil, political, social and cultural human rights. Any impartial observer cannot fail to notice this in the activities of the Organisation.

Please permit me to make a few comments on the Director-General's Report.

First, the gap is widening between the principles forcefully stated in ILO documents, resolutions and Conventions, and the real situation in many parts of the world. This gap is a source of grave concern. We think that the governments, employers' and workers' organisations which make up this Organisation share the tremendous responsibility of bridging the gap between written principles and the actual situation in each and every country. They also have an obligation to urge countries with a poor human rights record to remedy these shortcomings. Because of the regional and international interdependence of the world, any violation of human rights in any country can affect not only the stability of that country, but also that of neighbouring or non-neighbouring countries.

Second, the concept of human rights is expanding. Undoubtedly, unemployment, poverty, indebtedness, wars and the forceful occupation of land directly affect human rights. Undoubtedly also, our concerted efforts are required to find a solution for the problems of unemployment and the accumulation of debt in the Third World. The present situation requires the adoption of a new international economic order for the purpose of finding solutions that respect the interests of all parties and protect the prices of raw materials in the developing countries from speculation. If the international community fails to find satisfactory solutions to these grave problems, the concept of human rights will remain a verse written on paper, without any real effect.

Third, we are celebrating the fortieth anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. This Declaration is the result of the unfortunate events which led to the Second World War, and of all the actions committed during that war which were, as the Director-General has rightly said in his report, "barbaric actions". While the whole world condemns such actions, I would like to remind my fellow delegates in this Conference of the similar barbaric actions taking place today in the Palestinian territory occupied by Israel. Those actions are committed against Arab citizens who have lost their freedom under the occupation. The whole world has seen how the Israelis arbitrarily violate the basic rights of the Palestinian people who live under occupation and who have had no other choice but to resist the repression with stones for more than six months now. The way the Israeli occupation is treating the Palestinians in the occupied territories by displacing and imprisoning them, by removing them from their lands, by demolishing their homes and depriving them of food and clothes is a repugnant aspect of these barbaric actions that the world community cannot accept.

We call upon the Conference to condemn these actions and confirm the political, social and cultural rights of the Palestinians to achieve the goals for which the PLO, their legitimate representative, is struggling.

Fourth, as the Director-General's Report has pointed out, wars are a form of violation of human rights, especially when they lead to the forceful occupation of territories of other nations. Unfortunately, the world has so far ignored the Iraq-Iran war, which is about to enter its ninth year, and which is taking place in one of the most vital regions of the world. It has claimed the lives of hundreds of thousands of men from both sides, cost billions of dollars, and jeopardised the security of other countries in the region. It is fair to say that Iraq has time and again declared its willingness to sit at the negotiating table in order to put an end to this destructive war. Unfortunately, Iran has refused all the offers, prompting world public opinion and the peace-loving countries to spur the Security Council to take its famous resolution 598 which calls for an end to the conflict. Iraq has accepted this resolution and we have to do everything we can to have Iran accept it also.

Fifth, although there has been a 54 per cent increase in the number of ratifications of the seven human rights Conventions between the years 1968 and 1988, further efforts and measures are needed to promote human rights at various levels, particularly in view of the fact that the present economic situation facing many countries necessitates further discussions of a number of general political issues in the social field, to which thought should be given by the Organisation and its component elements.

Our region has been adversely affected by the Iraq-Iran war. Besides the fact that a great number of innocent people have been killed, and money and resources, which some economic experts estimate to be more than the income both countries have accumulated since the discovery of oil, wasted, economic and social development has come to a halt in this vital region of the world. The damage is even greater when one considers that many workers, on whom the countries relied, have been diverted from their work.

Kuwait, on whose behalf I am speaking, has suffered and continues to suffer materially and morally from the war. The same applies to the other peaceful countries of the Gulf.

This leads me to say that terrorism is one of the evils of our era. It is also an obstacle to human rights.

Terrorist gangs strike indiscriminately in all directions. Their victims are in most cases innocent citizens. My country has suffered more than once from terrorism.

I wish to refer in this Conference to the ordeal that the innocent passengers of the Kuwaiti airliner endured two months ago during its hijacking. The attitude that Kuwait adopted by refusing to submit to terrorism and blackmail and by maintaining its pride and dignity was an excellent lesson which a country, small in terms of area and population, but great in terms of principles and will, has given to hijackers. No surrender to terrorists. No accomplishment of their objectives. The Kuwaiti airliner was a means for terrorism to demonstrate the surrender of peaceful forces. It ended up, however, as an example of pride and steadfastness.

We believe that it is our responsibility to work for the achievement of the civil, political, economic, social and cultural rights of all peoples, by respecting the basic principles of tolerance, solidarity, freedom, human rights, social justice and equality of opportunity in order to achieve a lasting peace.

While we are discussing human rights, we cannot but refer to Kuwait's excellent record in safeguarding human rights. According to many international and non-aligned documents, Kuwait has achieved – without boasting – a high degree of protection of human rights for citizens and residents of Kuwait alike. Our country provides social, economic and cultural services that ensure a decent life for all our citizens. Our workers have their own unions, which receive help and support from the State. Citizens and workers receive equal salaries for equal work. Women in our country enjoy the right to work and social equality.

From this podium, we call for the elimination of any double talk when dealing with human rights. Our language must be straightforward, aiming at the protection of human dignity, encouraging solidarity and tolerance between people; it must be rational since the language of force cannot prevail after widespread destruction.

Human rights are also closely and surely affected by the risks of nuclear war which threaten the world. If we do not find a mechanism to control nuclear arms, the human rights of every persons on this planet will remain incomplete and constantly threatened.

Social evils are still around us everywhere: there are wars, as we have just mentioned; occupation, especially that affecting the Palestinian people; unemployment in many countries of the Third World; pollution of the environment; indebtedness. These are the major issues that we have to deal with. Their solutions cannot be found without co-operation.

We condemn, as we have already done in all forums, the racial discrimination in South Africa. Also, we support all people who struggle to recover their complete freedom.

Our objectives are huge, but we can achieve at least some of them through co-operation and good will.

I have reviewed some of the issues that I regard as important and that Kuwait considers urgent and basic. But I can assure you that we feel compassion and sympathise with our brothers in the Third World, and we do our very best to help them promote their development and overcome their difficulties. As a peace-loving country we always support just causes, and the cause of human rights in particular. Our religion and morals urge us to do so. The leadership of our Emir, His Excellency Sheik Jaber Al-Ahmad Al-Sabah, and the wisdom of our Crown Prince, Prime Minister His Excellency Sheik Saad Al-Abdallah Al-Salem Al-Sabah, has taught us to condemn any violation of human rights, regardless of its origin.

Mr. BATUBARA (Minister of Manpower, Indonesia) – On behalf of the Indonesian delegation, allow me to congratulate you, Mr. Beyreuther, on your election as President of the 75th Session of the Conference of the International Labour Organisation. Under your able guidance and wise leadership and with your extensive experience in manpower development, we are convinced that the discussions of this world-famous Conference will yield fruitful results which will not only engender the right decisions and stimulate action-oriented programmes but which will also contribute greatly to the betterment of men and women in today's world.

I would also like to take this opportunity to congratulate the other members of the Bureau who represent governments, employers and workers' organisations.

May I also take advantage of this occasion to express my sincere appreciation to Mr. Francis Blanchard, the Director-General of the ILO, for his searching Report which constitutes a fitting challenge to the delegates at this Conference and to all nations concerned in matters of human rights in a broad sense.

We Indonesians, like many other emerging nations in the twentieth-century world, have struggled for more than 150 years to gain our freedom and independence from colonial powers and the right to govern our own country. Within our Constitution we have clearly defined principles which state that freedom is the right of every nation large or small. To implement these principles our Government ensures the right of all our people to both form and join organisations and to express their views freely, the right of all our people to worship, choose their religion and practise their beliefs freely, the possibility for the individual to choose employment freely in keeping with personal abilities and inclinations, and the elimination of all forms of discrimination based on sex, creed, race or religion in respect of employment opportunities.

We are justly proud of these ideals and commend them to the peoples and governments of all nations. In general, the ILO and the Government of Indonesia hold the same views and support the same principles. We strive towards the same goals which embrace democracy and human rights. We strive for the freedom of the working man and woman and for their children and for economic prosperity and social stability in the years that lie ahead.

It is well known in the world today that various nations and their respective societies are at different stages in the development of democracy. Further, the degree to which democracy can be practised is dependent upon many factors, some of the more prominent being, inter alia, the efficient functioning of the government, the educational level of the population, the economic structure and the social conditions prevalent in the country.

We are most happy to be able to state that, in Indonesia, our laws promote a climate for the full implementation of democratic principles that ensure the well-being of the individual and society as a whole. At the same time, we in Indonesia are fully aware that, in the implementation of true democracy, the balancing of the rights of the individual in keeping with the needs of the nation must be ensured.

Freedom for the individual must take into consideration the freedom of others. The interests of the individual must take into account the macro-aspects of society at large, if they do not, then the balance of democracy is destroyed. Axiomatically, the major task of any government is to maintain this balance so that freedom for the individual is in effect freedom for all.

In any democratic society, public goals are best achieved by the integration of people into organisations of various categories both private as well as public in nature. Once an individual becomes a member of an organisation, he or she must moderate his or her views in keeping with the views of the majority which constitute an overview of the whole. By participating in such organisations, citizens are able to modify national behaviour profiles, transform aspects of their environment and achieve many national objectives such as the eradication of poverty, the improvement of medical and associated services, low-cost housing for all, expanded educational provisions and the enhancement of living standards, especially for the underprivileged.

These aspects are certainly evident in Indonesia and we are rightly proud of our achievements in developing a firm foundation for the practice of democratic rights as enshrined in our state ideology PANCASILA. Through PANCASILA, we are able to build up our infrastructure and bring together organisations to engage in continuous dialogue that leads to a consensus of opinion. The application of PANCASILA to commerce has facilitated the development of industrial relations which means in turn that we are able to practise the principles of the duly ratified ILO Conventions.

Indonesia is proud of the fact that, within a relatively short time after achieving independence, we have been able to establish a substantial number of bipartite and tripartite organisations in the country. In this respect too there are a significant number of commercial undertakings functioning with collective labour agreements. The value and virtue of the industrial relations system in our country lies in the fact that the collective labour agreements were developed in and through discussion between the entrepreneurs and the trade unions themselves without the need for intervention by the Government, although when necessary the Government does assist in facilitating such meetings.

Our experience is that when bipartite and tripartite bodies exist, and when these are supported by collective labour agreements, most manpower problems and labour disputes can be solved through dialogue and the resultant consensus. In this way, conflicts and work stoppages can be reduced to minimum levels which in turn lead to the creation of genuine industrial peace throughout the workforce.

My delegation is most keen to participate in the discussion sessions, especially when employment promotion is the topic involved. Statistically, Indonesia is the fifth most populous country in the world, consequently its greatest challenge in the near future is in this very context. It is for this reason that over the past 20 years we have addressed the issues of expanding our employment potential and raising the standard of quality both in terms of end products as well as worker standards. Special attention has and is being given to casual undertakings and part-time employment.

Without question, countries such as Indonesia can never hope to outpace the technological developments of the industrialised nations with their incredible advances in robotics and similar automated mechanisms. My country, much like others in the same category, has still to contend with a predominantly labour-intensive workforce situation. We still have to face up to the reality of an economic structure that heavily emphasises traditional approaches to the manufacture of all manner of products and outputs. In our present stage of development, small-scale industry and informal sector intensification constitute the most appropriate approach to our labour and human resources problems. However, we regard these contingencies as being stepping stones along a meaningful route to more sophisticated methods and improvements. In this respect we appeal to the more advanced nations of this world for their comprehension of the reality of our situation. In this particular regard we ask them to bear in mind the following: firstly, our most urgent needs are for appropriate technology in our labour-intensive environment; secondly, we need the industrialised countries to open their doors to import our handcrafted products; thirdly, employment problems in developing countries involve not only the expansion of job potentials but also the elimination of poverty and the provision of basic human needs from which stems one of the foremost and most noble ideals of the ILO itself – the dignity of the worker and the human being per se.

Permit me therefore through this renowned Conference to address the ILO with a plea that much more detailed consideration be given to the real needs of developing countries in this decade, so as to place far greater emphasis on more effective means for human resources development and utilisation within predominantly labour-intensive environments. The ILO as an international body of repute can play a most effective bridging role to assist developing countries in their efforts to optimise natural and human resources and share relevant technology for the benefit of all. In this respect, such approaches as technical co-operation among developing countries (TCDC) programmes are particularly applicable and practical, and we would like to see many more innovative strategies implemented to the greatest extent possible.

Finally, let us work together as brothers and sisters in the common quest to better our people, to raise standards of living globally and to eliminate poverty through the best possible utilisation of the most precious resources of all – people – our people, who are surely the “salt of the earth”.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. KOSTINE (Government delegate, USSR) – Mr. President, first of all allow me to congratulate you on your election to this lofty post. We are convinced that your considerable experience in labour relations will contribute to a successful session of the Conference.

It goes without saying that discussion by the session of Human rights – A common responsibility is very timely. Its significance is determined not only by the great importance of the problem of human rights in the present world, in international relations and in the activities of many international organisations, including the ILO, but it is also related to an important anniversary – the 40th anniversary of the adoption by the United Nations of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

The problem of human rights relates to some of the highest priority Organisation documents, since the International Labour Organisation in particular, as is rightly pointed out in the Report, was the first to speak of the indivisibility of human rights involving in equal measure political, civil, economic, social and cultural rights. Basic human rights, especially in the social sphere, have found their expression in many international standards within the framework of the ILO.

We feel that the Report of the Director-General is a good basis for a broad discussion of the problem of international co-operation in the sphere of human rights from the point of view of new political thinking, general human interests and more human international relations.

We are in full support of the Report when it calls upon all Government members of the ILO to deal with the question of workers' rights and to develop international co-operation in this area. We also share the view that social questions should not take second place in drawing up economic growth and improvement programmes.

The Communist Party and the Soviet Government are now giving priority importance to social development, and are providing for a decisive strengthening of social direction in our plans and in the economic decisions we are taking. A radical economic reform has begun in our country which is aimed at accelerating economic development, increasing the role of the human factor, further activating social policy, creating an effective system to motivate and stimulate all workers to work fruitfully for the common good. This will be decisive in attaining a qualitatively new level of well-being for the people and all-round development of each Soviet citizen.

In the course of “perestroika” (restructuring), which is now taking place in our country, workers' rights in all areas of activity are being broadened and there is a broad development of democracy, “glasnost” (openness) and self-management. In accordance with the law on state enterprises and their transfer to the system of self-accounting and self-financing, all the basic questions relating to the activity of a particular enterprise are now being resolved by councils of labour collective elected by the workers. All managerial posts – from the general director to the foreman and brigade leader – are now elective.

The individual and, particularly, the co-operative activity of the workers is developing. Last month the Supreme Soviet of the USSR, following a general discussion and lively debates, adopted a law on co-operatives. Even before the law was adopted the number of co-operatives (not counting collective farm) was more than 20,000, including 6,000 that were set up in the last three months. Under this law the co-operatives become completely independent in all spheres of their activity.

Individual and co-operative work is an important means for more fully satisfying the demands of the population for goods and particularly services. More than that, they are, together with the rapid growth of the non-manufacturing sector, helping to provide full and effective employment. This is becoming a particularly timely problem for us in view of the planned reduction by the year 2000 of the number of workers in the State manufacturing sector by some 15 to 16 million.

The Soviet concept of human rights is based on the indissolubility and interdependence of all rights.

We do not set social rights against political and civil rights. They should all, so far as is possible, provide man with a dignified existence.

In our view, without real security of social and economic rights – and they should be at the centre of ILO's activity – declarations on individual freedoms acquire a purely formal character.

We consider that depriving able-bodied people of their right to work, the lack of an opportunity to give one's children the education of their choice and the situation where the health of an individual and his very existence become directly dependent on the size of his income are violations of human rights. We regard as a violation of human rights to deny the needy the right to housing, and to turn them on to the streets with the assistance of the authorities and the police. We have always been actively against the violation of human rights in the Republic of South Africa and in the Arab-occupied territories by Israel.

How can you reconcile human rights with the threat to use means of universal destruction? The world cannot be considered safe if the basic human right – the right to life – is disregarded.

The question of interdependence between peace and social justice is stressed in the Constitution of the ILO, occupies a central position in the Declaration of Philadelphia and should also be adequately reflected in the activity of this Organisation.

We are open to discussion of questions on human rights in terms of comparing the practice of guaranteeing human rights in countries with different social and economic systems and in terms of the possibility of developing international co-operation on the matter. One of the most recent demonstrations of this was the proposal Mikhail Sergeyevich Gorbachev made to President Ronald Reagan at the talks recently concluded in Moscow to broaden the discussion on human rights. In the Soviet Union, such questions are now being widely discussed, in particular through the mass media.

Our country and socialism as a whole have something to show in terms of historical achievements in guaranteeing human rights. However, we are in favour of ridding the subject of demagoguery, which obscures the genuine substance and meaning of the very concept of "human rights" and takes the question from the realm of constructive co-operation into that of sterile confrontation.

Given the different approaches to and understandings of human rights in different countries and among different individuals, it is extremely important to have a broad exchange of views on these questions, both within individual countries and between countries. Little by little we are assembling a mechanism for international co-operation in the sphere of human rights. For instance, there is an agreement to create a standing body to deal with human rights with deputies to the Supreme Soviet of the USSR and members of the United States Congress taking part. We now have "tele-bridges" (televised debates) between cities in the USSR and other countries in which questions of human rights are touched on or specially discussed. This year alone we had 18 "tele-bridges" between cities in the USSR and cities in the United Kingdom, the Federal Republic of Germany, the United States, Japan and Switzerland.

The Soviet Union is one of the co-authors of the United Nations Charter, and of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and is a party to international treaties on human rights and to most other basic international agreements in that area. As is well known, we have ratified and we abide by the main ILO Conventions on human rights. Provisions concerning human rights from the Helsinki Final Act entered the Constitution of the USSR as an integral part, which is far from being the case with all states parties to the Final Act.

Our country is actively participating in the ILO's standard-setting activity. We consider that the elaboration and adoption of and monitoring of compliance with international standards is one of the main tasks of our Organisation and we are prepared to do everything we can to assist its development in an environment of honest, constructive and many-sided dialogue.

We should like to support the measures mentioned in the Report of the Director-General on the further improvement of standard-setting activity as a contribution by the ILO towards guaranteeing human rights. At the same time, we should mention that not all aspects of human rights related to the tasks of the ILO have been adequately incorporated in ILO Conventions and Recommendations. Following the adoption in 1977 of a tripartite declaration of principles concerning multinational companies and social policy, the ILO did not take effective steps to protect the interests of the workers from abuses by multinational corporations.

Today, in the USSR, in a spirit of socialist humanism and taking account of international practice, we are working to amend and improve legislation and practice in accordance with the provisions of ratified Conventions. In March of this year, the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of the USSR issued a special decree on changes and additions to certain labour laws in order to bring them into line with the provisions of ILO Conventions. The preparation of a whole range of new legislation, such as the law relating to annual leave and the new law on social security, among others, is also being undertaken to take due account of international labour standards.

Since last year, we have introduced new rules on entry to and exit from our country. At present, there is a draft decree before the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet on additional measures to improve further the rules on entry into the USSR and exit from the USSR for both Soviet and foreign citizens.

Speaking of human rights in the USSR I should like to touch upon the question of freedom of conscience and the freedom of religion. The Constitution of the USSR states: "Citizens of the USSR are guaranteed freedom of conscience, that is, the right to profess or not to profess any religion". At present, in the USSR, we have approximately 7,000 active churches of the Russian Orthodox Church, 1,120 Catholic churches and several thousand other places of worship: mosques, Lutheran churches, synagogues, evangelical, Baptist and other churches. In June of this year, the Millennium of Christianity in Russia is being widely celebrated.

We also have quite a few problems with human rights. Some violation of our laws and rights take place. Suffice it to say that the courts reinstate about half of those dismissed from their jobs who appeal to the court if they consider the administration's or trade union's actions to be unjustified. In order to achieve wider protection for the rights of our citizens, we have adopted in January a law which came into force on the appeal procedure in cases of illegal actions by officials limiting human rights.

Considering the difficulty of upholding human rights, we feel that particular importance should be attached not only to the existing international system for the protection of human rights, but also to the creation of favourable international conditions for further promoting an effective national and social policy to seek solutions for the problems of indebtedness, development, employment and to establish a new, just international economic order.

The Soviet Union, of course, supports developing countries in their struggle to attain real economic independence and equality. Developing countries must be given active assistance with their social and economic development. We therefore support the ILO's activity as regards technical co-operation programmes and regional activity. In the light of the Geneva agreement on Afghanistan, therefore, we hope that the International Labour Organisation, within the terms of its reference, will also provide the necessary assistance to the Republic of Afghanistan. I may say that our country is prepared, together with the whole international community, to take all necessary steps in that direction.

In conclusion, allow me to express our firm conviction that the discussion on human rights at the present Conference will contribute towards more active participation by the ILO in the protection of workers' rights throughout the world in the spirit of social justice and co-operation.

Interpretation from French: Mr. BOKAM (Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, Cameroon) – Mr. President, the delegation of the Republic of Cameroon, which I have the signal honour of heading at this 75th Session of the International Labour Conference, wishes first of all to associate itself with previous speakers in offer its heartfelt congratulations to Mr. Beyreuther, on his election to the post of President of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. I am firmly convinced that under your direction, and thanks to your outstanding knowledge and experience, the work of the Conference will be conducted under favourable conditions and will lead to positive results.

I should also like to congratulate the other officers of the 75th Session. Likewise, I wish to congratulate the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Francis Blanchard, for the outstanding report he has submitted to us. It is extremely useful for our debate and for all the other action adopted to ensure the success of this Conference.

Part I of the Report of the Director-General entitled Human rights – A common responsibility contains interesting suggestions concerning the different questions with which the international community is confronted in the promotion and defence of human rights.

Be it the reaffirmation of the independence of the labour movement, the pursuit of the struggle against apartheid, the measures to be adopted for the benefit of migrant workers, the macro-economic measures to be adopted for the promotion of full employment, we subscribe fully to the solutions as they are advocated.

However, may I be permitted to dwell on two questions: productive and freely chosen full employment, and equality of opportunity and treatment. As was so aptly pointed out by the Director-General in his Report, unemployment, which is the denial of full employment, has become a world-wide scourge which spares no nation.

Without ignoring the importance of the other rights, primary responsibility for which falls upon our Organisation, – and here I should like to point out that my country has ratified all the Conventions relating to the fundamental principles and is endeavouring to apply them – it is clear that employment is the sine qua non condition for exercising these rights. Without employment, man cannot exercise the right to organise, nor can he claim to have social security benefits, or equality of opportunity and treatment because he finds himself outside the labour market. Priority must therefore be given by our Organisation to achieving this right.

In this connection, the Director-General has proposed a course to be followed by the developing countries. It is to reduce, as far as possible, their dependence upon the rest of the world by relying first of all upon their own strength. We share this point of view and the Government of Cameroon has not awaited this analysis to get down to work. Since 6 November 1982, which is the date of the accession of His Excellency Paul Biya to the presidency, the development of Cameroon has been based upon the following four fundamental options: community liberalism which encourages private initiative as the driving force of progress – this assigns to the State the job of regulating, guiding and mobilising efforts and alerts Cameroonians to their duty of national solidarity so that liberalism is not perceived as the possibility left to the rich freely to exploit the poor; the establishment of an independent national economy capable of satisfying autonomously the essential economic needs of the people – this presupposes the mobilisation of all the available domestic resources; social justice which enables everyone to find his own fulfilment, to participate in the development of the nation and to benefit from the fruits of growth, the goal being to ensure better distribution of national wealth so as to raise the living standard of the population and particularly the rural people, to reduce unemployment and to provide education and social coverage for the population as a whole; national integration as the ultimate phase of national unity, in other words, that which makes it possible to transit from living side-by-side to a genuine union of the hearts, the kind which makes it possible to establish a bridge between the various entities of the nation so as to bring them to open themselves to each other.

On the basis of these fundamental options built into our Sixth Five-Year Development Plan we can already note an attempt to achieve self-sustained development taking into account the rural situation.

But more specifically, efforts to control our development have taken the form in the last few years of an active policy to promote small- and medium-sized enterprises to allow, in the long run, the formation of genuine national capital which in turn would shelter us from dependence. As regards the development of the rural world, Cameroon is an essentially agricultural country and therefore particular attention has always been devoted to that sector.

The Government of national renewal has set five guide-lines for this sector during the Sixth Plan: decentralising the action of the administration which will in the long run result in the implementation of projects by development companies; the revitalisation of leadership; extending the modern agro-industrial sector; promoting medium-sized operations; integrating young people into the rural environment.

Among the accompanying activities I might mention the following: improvement of living conditions in order to stop rural migration: at present 60 per cent of rural localities have a water source. By 1990-91 we intend to have 6,500 water sources and 350 water systems; electrification is also following its course - 212 villages have been electrified during the Sixth Plan; the opening of rural tracks encourages development and the goal is the introduction of a network of 5,000 km of rural tracks by 1990-91.

The income of rural workers is very much lower than that of city workers, and this difference contributes to the development of rural migration.

In order to remedy this, my Government intends to work out an index of production costs for the main crops; to set up a follow-up system of agricultural prices on the domestic market and for commodities on the external markets; to set prices for producers for export products varying according to changes in production cost and consumer price indices, in such a way that agricultural revenues can be maintained at an attractive level; to support the prices of food products by establishing agencies that can buy on the market at minimum prices: gradually to make the price and bonus policy more important than the policy of subsidy.

Other action is contemplated for the rural sector in the field of education, health, and so on. It would be too wearisome to enumerate all this here, especially since I merely wanted to show that the solution proposed by the Director-General is operational in my country. But these activities to promote productive and freely chosen full employment cannot succeed in the present economic environment.

The constant decline of our export prices has made it impossible for us to achieve our goals. As an example, for the budgetary year 1986-87 our export earnings have fallen by approximately 200 billion CFA francs, whereas the prices of imports are constantly increasing.

How, then, can we reach our goals if nothing is done to ensure a fair price for our products?

The situation of my country is similar to that of many other developing countries. It is the cause of the debt which is now threatening the very foundations of the world economy. We are going from one moratorium to another, and not tackling the very heart of the problem which is the establishment of a new economic, social and cultural order. Since the interests of the rich nations as well as the poor ones are involved in the debt problem we believe that the establishment of a new economic, social and cultural order is at hand. Hope is permitted. It is also possible to hope with respect to the hateful system of apartheid.

For many years, a racist and backward minority has constantly violated the rights of the Black majority in Azania. The Republic of South Africa is now the only country in the world where racial segregation is proclaimed in the Constitution, even though there have been other examples in the recent past.

My country, faithful to the United Nations Charter and to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, has always condemned this system which continues to defy the whole of mankind. We are happy at the efforts made by the international community to eliminate this scourge and particularly the action of our Organisation in this respect. The time, it seems to me, has come to go from boycott to economic sanctions as advocated by the Security Council, which certain major Powers still hesitate to apply thereby reducing the chances of decisively weakening this abominable and inhuman regime.

Although the Government of Pretoria is yielding to some extent by introducing a few reforms, which are incidentally insignificant for the Black people of South Africa, what is needed in this part of our continent is not reforms but the abolition - pure and simple - of the odious apartheid regime.

The two matters that I have discussed have a point in common. Human societies do not seem to become aware of the need for change until they have their backs to the wall. This is true of the establishment of a new economic, social and cultural order, and it is even more true of apartheid. If this attitude does not change, the human rights that we are all hoping for will not be achieved tomorrow.

This wait-and-see attitude must be abandoned and any situation that involves the germ of domination with respect to human rights must be dealt with before it is too late.

From this standpoint, international solidarity in conformity with the Philadelphia Declaration must be one of the values to be promoted in the years to come.

Peace is possible at this price, and indeed only at this price.

Interpretation from French: Mr. ABOUBACAR (Minister for the Civil Service and Labour, Niger) - Mr. President, it is a pleasure for me to join those speakers who have spoken before me in extending to you, on behalf of my Government, on my own behalf, and that of my delegation, our very warmest congratulations for your election to the presidency of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference.

We are convinced that under your enlightened leadership the discussions of this session will be a total success.

I would like to take this opportunity to present to the Director-General, and to the entire staff of the International Labour Office, our sincere gratitude and our warm congratulations for their full devotion to the noble ideals of the Organisation, which is reflected in the excellent documents which have been submitted to our Conference.

We have reviewed the report on the activities of the ILO for this past year and we see very clearly that our Organisation is committed to the tripartite principle, which is indispensable in order to pursue the goals we have set. We shall not dwell on this report, which speaks for itself.

However, it is indispensable to emphasise the success of the 75th (Maritime) Session. In this connection, Niger, despite the fact that it is land-locked, would like to express its satisfaction with the remarkable work accomplished at that session; we are convinced that the new standards adopted will improve the conditions of seafarers.

The High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment is also of considerable interest because of the relevant conclusions it reached. It is indeed undeniable that a large-scale action will have to be carried out throughout the world to promote employment and bring unemployment under control.

We have noted with satisfaction that despite the financial difficulties encountered by our Organisation, it has strengthened its operational activities in Africa by providing technical assistance in various fields.

Nevertheless, as is so relevantly noted by the report submitted to us, the economic crisis in Africa is continuing to worsen, thus engendering an increase in needs and therefore a greater demand for technical assistance from the International Labour Office. We hope that the expenditures of the Organisation in the field of technical co-operation will be commensurate in the forthcoming years with the level of external debt, the pressures arising from population growth and the various factors which hamper the harmonious development of our States.

The ILO must continue its action in the fields of employment promotion and labour and social security administration, particularly in the countries which are most seriously affected by drought and other natural disasters.

I cannot conclude these brief comments on the report of the Director-General devoted to the activities of the ILO without referring to the activities of the International Centre for Advanced Technical and Vocational Training in Turin. There again we note the efforts deployed towards Africa with a view to responding to the ever-growing volume of requests. Given the increasing demand on the Centre, it must be strengthened through additional sources of financing for the implementation of its programmes.

In this connection, I should like to launch an urgent appeal to the international community, particularly to the wealthy countries, requesting them to support the activities of this important tool of technical co-operation of our Organisation by ensuring its regular financing, and even by allocating to it a certain percentage of the yearly contributions of the member States of our Organisation.

I wish also to congratulate the Italian Government for the considerable aid it has always given to this institution.

I should like to deal now with the very important section of the Director-General's Report entitled Human rights – A common responsibility. The choice of this theme, 40 years after the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, seems to me to be relevant from very many aspects. Indeed, it affords a retrospective assessment of what has been done hitherto, and also a view of future directions in an area universally recognised as primordial.

Africa, for its part, has recently adopted an African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights, which takes due account of the specific values, traditions and cultural identity of our continent.

The 75th Session of the International Labour Conference is being held at a time when the efforts of the countries of the South to ensure their development are unfortunately thwarted by the ever-growing deterioration of their terms of trade with the countries of the North. Yet all human efforts aim at guaranteeing man's greater liberty and dignity.

That is why we feel that the situation which continues to prevail in South Africa must be given the attention it merits by all peace-loving and justice-loving peoples. Apartheid, the shameful crime against mankind, is a source of deep concern for my country. This flagrant violation of human rights is unbearable for us morally. We have always denounced any form of economic, cultural or military co-operation with the regime of South Africa, and we reiterate our commitment to respect all the United Nations decisions aimed at eradicating the despicable system of apartheid.

In the OAU my country has never failed to give its unstinting support to the cause of the South African populations, and to that of the Palestinians, in the form of material and moral aid to the liberation movements and to the workers of those countries. Despite the difficulties it is experiencing, Niger has recently again contributed financially to the Organisation of the Tripartite Conference on Action against Apartheid held in Harare, Zimbabwe, from 3 to 6 May 1988.

Our position on any form of violation of human rights arises from our conviction of the value and dignity of man. This conviction is embodied in a series of national measures we have adopted.

Since the end of the 73rd Session of our Conference, my country adopted a National Charter to guarantee further the fundamental individual and collective freedoms and rights of all the people of Niger.

In the implementation of that Charter, the President of the Supreme Military Council, the Head of State, Colonel Ali Saibou, has sought to institute favourable conditions to enable our citizens to fully exercise their rights. In this connection, may I mention a few examples: – First, the action deployed in favour of occupational rehabilitation and the integration of physically handicapped or socially disadvantaged persons; – Second, many measures, particularly in the field of housing and the struggle against unemployment, as well as the promotion of initiatives designed to improve the social conditions of the people of Niger; – And, finally, actions aimed at promoting productivity and boosting incomes in rural areas. We should note in this connection the holding of a symposium on the rural sector in March 1988, and the scheduling in the very near future of another symposium on the private sector.

I cannot end this list of measures without referring to the implementation of a programme to support private initiative and the creation of employment, which aims at modernising the national economy by producing a new generation of businessmen who can provide the basis for a true economic revival and guarantee the promotion of true full employment.

Furthermore, with a view to ensuring the implementation and follow-up of the different resolutions and recommendations of the ILO, a reorganisation is taking place within the Ministry for the Civil Service and Labour, leading to the creation of a Department for Employment, and a restructuring of the Department of Labour and Social Security, so as to increase the protection of the workers against occupational risks and give new impetus to consultations and contacts between the social partners and with the Ministry responsible for employers' and workers' organisations. Finally, as regards social security, a new protection service has been set up.

Finally, may I be allowed to wish success to the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference.

Interpretation from German: Mr. MUHR (Workers' delegate, Federal Republic of Germany) – I had the honour of supporting your nomination as President of this Conference on behalf of the Workers and I should like to congratulate you on your unanimous election following this nomination; I am sure that you will lead the Conference to a successful conclusion.

When the United Nation was first founded in 1945, we all hoped that the post-war period would usher in a truly peaceful order. Yet, today, 43 years later, we know that this order is still deficient and far too frequently threatened.

Forty years after the pioneering Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the respect for and protection of human dignity cannot be taken for granted. Instances of violation and injustice, oppression and misery demonstrate how much has to be done to establish such elemental human rights. There are also new threats to face which are due to the population explosion, dangers to the environment and the burden of debt in many developing countries. The ILO has a hard task before it to combat these problems. Economic and social obstacles should be done away with as soon as possible since they stand in the way of human rights.

Far too frequently we turn away from the misfortunes of this world and human rights are measured with double standards. When it suits a given political and economic concept, they are publicly condemned; not infrequently, they are tolerated when political or economic interests are at stake. However, when human rights are assessed exclusively in the light of nationalistic or economic interests, they lose their moral force and their universal nature. Human rights, peace and freedom are, and will remain, indivisible.

The ILO has the important role of supervising basic human rights in the world of labour and of improving the lot of the poor, as well as that of many workers.

I thank the Director-General for his excellent and exhaustive survey on the social dimension of human rights. He also rightly described the human rights aspect of the ILO's basic social standards. In its standard-setting activities, the ILO has successfully supplemented the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and made its provisions relevant for workers. It bears witness to the consensus existing at the time it was signed as the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), dates from the same year. The supervisory machinery of the ILO also makes it clear that these rights are not merely moral in nature but also have legal implications.

Unfortunately the rate of ratification has slowed down over the past few years. Even basic instruments such as the Conventions on freedom of association, forced labour or equality of opportunity and treatment have not been ratified by all the member States of the ILO. Even industrialised countries are reticent when it comes to ratifying worthwhile important minimum standards. They opt for a policy of deregulation and flexibility in social attainments in the mistaken belief that they will then be able to compete better in the world market.

What lies behind this policy which is also pursued by the employers in an ill-disguised attempt to reduce real wages, increase inequalities, make jobs less secure and cut social security. Should such a deregulation policy become widespread, not only will the set of values which we have established in the ILO be endangered but we shall not witness the creation of new jobs either in the industrialised countries, or in developing countries; on the contrary.

The industrial countries should be aware of the fact that they bear full responsibility for the unfair economic differences existing between north and south and thus for the ensuing social unrest.

The ILO provides the member States with a platform upon which they can dispel doubts as to their credibility and give us proof of their sincere desire to achieve human rights.

A further requirement is the effective application of standards that have been adopted and ratified. The gulf between the formal adoption of the standards and their actual implementation is very often tremendous.

Human rights should not only be the object of statements but should be translated into reality as soon as possible. The Director-General puts forward in his Report certain practical ideas and suggests actual measures to be taken, for instance, on the extension of Convention No. 111.

Crimes against humanity perpetrated by the system of apartheid in South Africa are among the most serious abuses of human rights. I shall not, go into this subject more deeply at present because there is a special session of the Conference to consider the Director-General's Report on apartheid, and I shall have the opportunity to return to it then.

In many parts of the world the infringement of fundamental trade union rights seems to have become the norm. The many complaints before the ILO testify to this. Time and time again, trade unionists are prevented from doing their work, are persecuted and arrested.

Even in places with long-standing democratic traditions, opportunities for trade unions to exercise their rights in full freedom are often restricted. The upholding of trade union rights is, however, vital to the existence of free, democratic societies.

Trade unions in the Federal Republic of Germany have also had occasion to submit complaints to the ILO supervisory bodies concerning the non-compliance of Convention No. 87. For instance, under German law civil servants can be called in against their will to replace striking workers. The German Confederation of Trade Unions (DGB) considers this to be inconsistent with the content and letter of Convention No. 87.

Certain courts have even dismissed trade union protests against economic and social policies of the Federal Government. In this respect too, we have also turned to the ILO supervisory bodies to ensure that protests of this nature in the Federal Republic should not be in dispute.

Basic trade union rights should be upheld everywhere, regardless of the prevailing economic, social or political conditions. In respect of Convention No. 11, our Federal Government had to submit to an extensive procedure and the Committee came to the conclusion that: "the undifferentiated application of the duty of faithfulness to all officials, without regard to the effect which their political attitude or activities may have on the exercise of the functions assigned to them" was not in compliance with the Convention.

The Federal Republic has accepted the procedure and we now expect it to carry out the recommendations by the Committee.

Over and above its standard-setting and supervisory activities, the ILO must also work towards making necessary to all people the economic and social means necessary for them to attain their right to human dignity. We must constantly bear in mind that human rights are not only denied by dictators but also through poverty and a lack of opportunity. Freedom from fear and freedom from want are inextricably linked. The weakest and most disadvantaged members of our society have to bear the brunt of the present employment and distribution crisis.

Approximately 900 million people now live in abject poverty. The situation is particularly depressing in Africa, where the number of the poor will probably double between 1980 and 1995.

Yet the world spends approximately $1,000 billion every year on armaments. People would not go hungry if the money, instead of being spent on arms of extermination, would be spent in order to improve the quality of life and to close the gulf between poor and rich, developing and industrialised countries.

Many countries are on the brink of economic bankruptcy and are fighting for their bare survival. It is vital that the highly indebted countries of the Third World should have prospects for the future and a real chance to overcome their economic problems.

A new international development strategy is necessary, as was pointed out by the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Change. Industrialised countries not only have a special responsibility to bring about necessary adjustments in the world economy and reduce protectionism but also to find a solution to the debt problem of the developing countries.

One of the specific tasks of the ILO is to ensure that when working out adjustment programmes, ILO standards should not be undermined. At the same time, the social needs and problems of the poorer segments of society must be taken into account and the participation of workers' and employers' organisations secured.

More than ever we need a universal binding set of values, which will become legal standards for all States and not be questioned by any government, even in a case of emergency.

The ILO's system of standards constitutes a good basis upon which social and human rights can be made a driving force; it is also a cornerstone for a true world order based on peace without hunger and without need. We must not flag in our attempts to attain this common goal.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. ARROYO SAN MARTIN (Employers' delegate, Mexico) – I congratulate you, Mr. President on your election, and on behalf of the Mexican employers I wish you success in your task.

"Freedom of expression and association are essential to sustained progress".

"The war against want requires to be carried on with unrelenting energy within each nation, and by continuous concerted international efforts in which the representatives of workers and employers, enjoying equal status with those of governments, join with them in free discussion and democratic decision with a view to the promotion of the common welfare."

These concepts of freedom of speech and association, as well as the constant tripartite effort to promote the common welfare, embodied in the Declaration of Philadelphia, are some of the principles which have prompted Mexican employers to continue to be present and active in the future, as we have been in the past, through widespread and fruitful participation in this Organisation.

Mexicans, independently of the sector to which we belong, have always been interested in the work of the ILO and have participated in the Governing Body and the Conference as well as in practically all the activities of this great Organisation.

I agree with Mr. Francis Blanchard that it is the responsibility of all of us to see to it that human rights are fundamental and inalienable, and that they are in force at all times and in all places. All human beings are entitled to these rights regardless of the specific conditions of countries or their particular political systems. This is the goal which the ILO is striving towards. From this international rostrum I congratulate Mr. Blanchard on his magnificent work.

Fortunately, I am able to state that human rights in my country are observed to a very high degree, even those applying to racial minorities – a subject that will also be dealt with in this Conference.

Mexico is a country that was the cradle of great civilisations such as those of the Mayas, the Olmecs, the Toltecs and the Aztecs. Because of the advancement, the brilliance and the splendour of these cultures, their material achievements have lasted to our day and continue to enrich Mexico and the entire world.

Mexico is a mosaic of indigenous peoples, mixed races and Europeans and, through the centuries, has succeeded in amalgamating vastly different traditions, races and cultures into a unified whole in which, with full respect and guarantees for our human rights, we Mexicans all strive to promote the common good. Nevertheless, in the present-day world, there are, sadly, still differences in human rights which we must analyse and help to remedy. Freedom of speech and association are essential for sustained progress, according to the Declaration of Philadelphia, which is now in force in most countries, but, speaking as an employer and as a Latin American, I wish to express my regret at the presence of negative elements that are hostile to employers' organisations in Central America. On occasion they have done physical and material damage to the organisations, even leading, in some cases, to the imprisonment of their leaders. This situation must undoubtedly be collectively rejected if there is to be any hope of remedying it internally.

In establishing a link between freedom of expression and freedom of association as a factor of progress, the Declaration of Philadelphia emphasises the close relationship existing between the exercise of the right of association and other civil liberties.

The normal exercise of freedom of association entails respect for the right to liberty and security of person as well as protection against arbitrary arrest and detention, freedom of opinion and expression, the right of assembly, the right to a fair trial by an independent and impartial tribunal, and the right to protection of the property of employers' or trade union organisations.

These concepts, which are contained in the Report of the Director-General, together with the principle of solidarity which we employers have unswervingly supported, leads my delegation to endorse all the measures which the ILO may adopt with respect to apartheid in South Africa. At the same time, however, we demand an expression of solidarity by this Assembly in condemning the violation of the right of free association which has occurred in Central America.

The continuous and concerted efforts in which the representatives of workers and employers, enjoying equal status with those of government, join with them in democratic discussion with a view to the promotion of the common welfare have assumed particular significance in my country.

In Mexico, as of 15 December last, we have brought together the agricultural and other workers, employers and government representatives in an economic pact of solidarity in order to make a common effort to combat inflation and the economic crisis facing us no doubt as a reflection of the world economic crisis, of the crushing external debt and of a lack of economic discipline.

The pact is in force and has begun to yield positive results, thanks to the joint efforts of all the sectors involved and, in general, to the sacrifice made by all Mexicans in managing to reduce the inflationary rate substantially from 15 per cent in January to 2 per cent in May through cuts in public expenditure and the gradual privatisation of the state companies.

Social consensus within respect for the autonomy and freedom of the truly representative social partners has once again proved its effectiveness in solving the major social problems. These are principles that emanate from the ILO and that safeguard human rights both individually and collectively.

As long as this joint effort is continued, proper economic discipline is maintained and the principles of freedom that should be observed in countries with a tradition of democracy and freedom such as ours, are respected, it should be possible for us to place our economy on a healthier footing.

Mexico is making efforts to recover its rightful place in the world context by introducing structural changes, reducing the size of the government sector and eschewing the paternalistic and populist policies that have done so much damage to us, adopting an open attitude to trade which will compel us to become aware of the need for productivity and international competitiveness. This will lead, no doubt, to the rethinking of our legislation, to administrative simplification and decentralisation, to labour flexibility, to industrial reconversion and, in general, to a positive evolution towards new and modern structures.

But this is not enough, as article 28 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights clearly states: "Everyone is entitled to a social and international order in which the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration can be fully realised".

There can be no application of human rights if countries and their inhabitants suffer from growing impoverishment, if social well-being decreases instead of increasing, if young people instead of finding job opportunities, are frustrated in the legitimate aspirations and have no way out of their poverty.

The crushing external debt of the Latin American countries is leading us in the developing countries into disregard for human rights.

Mexico needs the understanding of its creditors who, through a consensus that will be beneficial to all parties, and in which our long story as punctual payers, and the efforts we have made to render our economy healthy, will be taken into account and will allow us to take advantage of the discounts provided for commercially in our debt and to seek creative proposals for the reduction of interest – all this within a concerted renegotiation that would be beneficial to all parties concerned.

I look upon the Universal Declaration of Human Rights as a common ideal for all peoples and all nations.

The ILO, as a tripartite organisation, has a privileged role and also a special responsibility in the constant struggle to uphold human rights.

(Mr. Smith takes the Chair.)

Interpretation from French: Mr. BENLAKHDAR (Workers' delegate, Algeria) – On behalf of the General Union of Algerian Workers, I should like first of all to offer my congratulations to Mr. Beyreuther upon his election to the office of President of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference.

At the plenary of this 75th Session, we have decided to make a statement in order to put forward our own reflections, comments and suggestions after a careful reading of the Report submitted by the Director-General which is entirely devoted to the question of human rights.

By choosing to deal with this subject at a time where certain burgeoning hopes have difficulty in finding their place in a world that continues to inflict the most abject aggression upon certain peoples, the most intolerable and flagrant injustices, the Director-General of the ILO has offered an opportunity to us – representatives of the workers of a developing country, a country profoundly attached to the principles of dignity, freedom and justice – to voice our misgivings, our hopes and our commitment in the case of the enormous and exalting undertaking, the incomplete, constantly restarted undertaking – the defence, preservation and the expansion of human rights.

In this connection, and given the way things have to be seen by and within the ILO, we deem it appropriate to quote the Director-General who emphasises in conclusion that a discussion of the ILO's contribution to the realisation of human rights must start from a consideration of relevant principles and standards.

Is this not a turn of style that might let it be thought that the ILO in this specific field of human rights is not competent to get to the bottom of things, in other words, to identify, denounce and condemn all the national or international entities which by their own actions or their open support or colluding silence, are behind what may be called the outright generalised and permanent violation of human rights in certain parts of the world and specifically in South Africa and Namibia, in occupied Palestine and Chile, to mention just these countries.

As far as our labour organisation, the UGIA is concerned, we are thoroughly convinced of the appropriateness, usefulness and effectiveness of the ILO's action in the defence of human rights in all parts of the world.

However, we are just as convinced of the need that the ILO should go beyond the formal limitations imposed upon it by the texts in order to be even more worthy of its calling.

In this respect, if the ILO is naturally competent to inquire into the conditions governing the exercise of workers' rights throughout the world through a perfect knowledge of national political, economic, social and cultural realities, it also has a duty to adopt firm and unqualified positions and to take comprehensive and effective action in favour of the workers and peoples living under the racist yoke of Pretoria, Zionism, colonialism and fascist dictatorships.

Specifically, in the case of the tragic situation of the South African and Namibian workers we are gratified that the policy of apartheid remains, as Mr. Blanchard says, the most serious and persistent challenge at the principles of equality that are defended by the ILO.

However the UGTA is entitled to wonder whether in South Africa and in Namibia, this systematic and unequalled violation of human rights would have been possible without the open support of certain Western countries for the Pretoria regime.

We therefore wonder if the international community has assumed all its responsibilities in the face of the odious crimes perpetrated daily by the Pretoria regime against the workers and peoples of South Africa and Namibia.

The Report of the Director-General also deals, quite naturally, with the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories by the Zionist aggressor.

In this case the UGTA is also highly pleased at the role adopted by the ILO in defending the fundamental rights of the Arab workers in the occupied territories.

However, we must ask whether the ILO is fully meeting the legitimate aspirations of these workers by confining itself to "examining the situation of these workers and the measures to be taken in order to improve their living and working conditions in the light of ILO standards."

Once again, a comment is called for – must the ILO standards be a frontier that cannot be crossed, a border that prohibits the ILO from clearly stating that the improvement of living and working conditions of Arab workers in occupied territories implies in the first instance, the recognition of the right of the Palestinian people to establish a sovereign and independent State in its usurped fatherland under the leadership of its sole and legitimate representative, the Palestine Liberation Organisation.

Alongside questions connected with the right to organise and equality of opportunity and treatment, the Report also deals with full employment as a essential constituent element in human rights.

In this field also, the tremendous work done by the ILO, the convincing results achieved over many decades are evidence of the effectiveness of its activities.

Nevertheless, we are wondering if today and in the future the ILO would not stand to gain if it expanded its vision and field of action and affirmed its action in order to go to the deep-rooted causes of unemployment throughout the world.

In this connection, we say that in the long term the answer to the problem of unemployment cannot go hand in hand with selfish and isolationist attitudes of adjustments and restructurings carried out at national level.

Along these lines, our conviction is that the fairest and most effective solution to this problem is inescapably to be achieved through the establishment of a genuine dialogue between industrialised and developing countries, through the establishment of actions which stand in solidarity between the North and the South and also through all, rich and poor, powerful and destitute, becoming aware that the future of all the countries of the world and all the economies of the world is indissolubly linked.

We also believe that the great powers of this world have a decisive role to play in the implementation of a global employment policy to benefit the poorest countries.

Let us call a halt to the colossal waste of human, material and financial resources devoted to war and the destruction of humanity, and let us work for the triumph of wisdom and solidarity for the good of those deprived of employment and those millions of men and women suffering famine, disease and ignorance in Africa and in other regions of the world.

It is in this direction, we are convinced, that the ILO must orient its efforts and its means. It is under these conditions that the principles of dignity, freedom and solidarity will flourish in a world reconciled with itself.

To include, I should like on behalf of the General Union of Algerian Workers to renew our total support to all workers and peoples struggling for the realisation of their legitimate aspirations in South Africa, in Namibia, in occupied Arab Palestine, in Chile, in New Caledonia and in western Sahara, where, I am glad to say, wisdom, perceptiveness and attachment to the ideals of peace, justice and freedom on the part of all concerned is now opening a prospect of a just and lasting solution to this unfortunate problem which has for so long threatened peace, stability and security in the region and constituted a real obstacle to the establishment of a Great United Arab Maghreb, a great task to which my country attaches the greatest importance.

Thank you for your attention and I wish total success for our work.

The PRESIDENT (Mr. SMITH) – There are two requests for the right of reply: one by Mr. Tizmaaghz, Government delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran, the other by Mr. Danieli, Government adviser, Israel.

I would like to remind the Conference of the practice regarding the exercise of the right of reply. The reply should refer only to the point at issue. It should be brief, it should not exceed three minutes and it should not give rise to any further remarks. Lastly, it should be couched in correct and parliamentary language.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. TIZMAAGHZ (Government delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran) – In the Koran, Heaven proclaims that he who has aggressed you must be aggressed by the same means and the same weapons. Certain speakers of Arab delegations have referred, in terms which are not suited to the dialogue which should prevail within this Organisation, to a subject which calls for an answer on my part. I request the President of the Conference to give me this right of reply which refers only to the questions on the agenda, the Reports of the Director-General and of the Governing Body.

We were not the aggressors. We defend ourselves, as we have since aggression and war were imposed on us, an aggression which has lasted for 8 years. Everybody knows who has been the aggressor, who has disregarded the Algiers Convention, who has bombed the cities, the villages, who has violated the Fourth Geneva Convention of 1949 relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, and who started to attack merchant shipping, and who has burnt and massacred merchant seafarers. As the delegate of Kuwait has stated, if these States had done what they had said, there would be peace. However, it was Kuwait that called on the navy of the United States in the Gulf, and everybody knows that it was on the invitation of Kuwait that war has been extended. If you want peace, why do you call on the great Satan, why are you arming the enemy, why are you supplying it? You have aided a State which denounces all international conventions, which uses chemical weapons against civilian populations, in towns and cities – and especially in the liberated town of Halapjai, where more than five thousand civilians perished. And today you claim...

The PRESIDENT (Mr. SMITH) – I give the floor to Mr. Hussain, Employers' delegate, Iraq, on a point of order.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. HUSSAIN (Employers' delegate, Iraq) – The speaker who spoke just now mentioned an Iraqi town which he considered to have been liberated by his country's forces. This is a serious infringement of the sovereignty and independence of my country. Also, this statement...

The PRESIDENT – What is the point of order?

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. HUSSAIN – It is that the previous speaker requested the Conference to consider the Reports of the Director-General and of the Governing Body, and yet he exceeded the framework which he himself asked us to abide by. If this is not, in your opinion, a point of order, I would like to reserve for myself the right to reply to what the speaker said in respect of the sovereignty and independence of my country.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. TIZMAAGHZ – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! Everybody knows of the terrorism which has been directed at the President of the Republic, the Chief of State, the President of the Supreme Court and 72 of our Iranian brothers. Our villages have been bombed. The war has been broadened. The United States navy and reactionary forces have been called in. Without this support, the aggressors would have been punished by an international court of justice, as evidenced by resolutions of the United Nations.

Justice should be done. We don't want this Conference, contrary to the Constitution of the ILO, to become a forum for a two-sided dialogue between two delegations; but let us recall that we did not start it. As the Director-General has said, political and military conflicts should be settled outside this Organisation. We are here in a specialised agency, a technical organisation, we are a tripartite organisation – workers, employers and governments – gathered here to improve the conditions of work, and not to discuss topics which are quite extraneous to this Organisation. Mr. President, I urge you to see to it that equal treatment prevails here, and that we confirm our remarks to the agenda.

The PRESIDENT (Mr. SMITH) – May I just remind you, Mr. Danieli, that the limit for the exercise of the right of reply is three minutes. I must ask people speaking on a right of reply not to exceed three minutes.

Mr. DANIELI (Government adviser, Israel) – My delegation associates itself with the plea of the Minister of Labour and Social Affairs of Kuwait to avoid double talk on human rights and workers' rights, and to condemn violations of those rights wherever they occur. We all know that, if this policy were implemented back home in Kuwait, its workers and residents could mark real progress, which has been avoided so far.

The term "human rights" in the Middle East is often a code word for criticising Israel. Most of this attention can be attributed to the Arab States themselves, including Kuwait. In Kuwait alone, where 300,000 Palestinians constitute one-fifth of its population, only 250 individuals have been granted Kuwaiti citizenship. Many of the resident Palestinians have lived and worked there for 20 or more years but do not have any immediate prospects of enjoying the benefits of Kuwaiti citizenship such as better salaries, landownership, pensions and other social benefits. Incidentally, to date, in Israel ...

The PRESIDENT (Mr. SMITH) – I must interrupt you for a point of order. I give the floor to Mr. Al-Jassem, Employers' delegate, Kuwait.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. AL-JASSEM (Employers' delegate, Kuwait) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I will be very brief. I think it is disgraceful that this speaker should be encouraging the Palestinians to seek the status of immigrants or the nationality of another Arab State. The statement of His Excellency, the Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, did not touch upon the question of nationality. He only spoke of the suffering imposed on the Palestinian people because of the inhuman and barbarian treatment imposed upon them by the Israeli occupying forces. That is my point of order.

Mr. DANIELI – Contrary to the situation in Kuwait, in Israel benefits from work do not depend on citizenship. Labour legislation and collective agreements apply to everyone, without distinction whatsoever, including Palestinian workers. In Kuwait Palestinians and other non-Kuwaitis have very few civil rights and no political rights. The Decree of the Emir of Kuwait of July 1986, which dissolved the National Assembly, added to the restrictions on the rights of all residents and of Palestinians, in particular. Further measures were adopted by the Government of Kuwait

The PRESIDENT (Mr. SMITH) – Could I ask you to yield for a point of order, again. I give the floor to Mr. Al-Jassem, Employers' delegate, Kuwait.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. AL-JASSEM – I am very sorry to be asking for the floor again. I just wanted to draw your attention to the fact that no delegation, and certainly not the previous speaker, has the right to speak about matters which are within the purview of our domestic sovereignty.

I think you should propose to the speaker who represents the occupying forces to restrict himself strictly to his right of reply, and therefore mention only whatever has been said in the speech by the distinguished Minister of Labour and Social Affairs. I insist on this point, Mr. President. I hope that you will prevent the speaker from touching upon any other point; otherwise, I would have to reserve for myself the right to reply on behalf of my delegation.

Mr. DANIELI – Approximately 30,000 Palestinian workers were expelled from Kuwait during the past two years. In the field of labour, there are unions only in the petroleum sector. Many union activities are funded by the Government and are subject to official approval. Moreover, you might be interested to know that Kuwait has so far ratified only 13 out of some 170 labour Conventions. That figure speaks for itself.

(The Conference adjourned at 1.15 p.m.)

Eighth sitting

Monday, 6 June 1988, 3 p.m.

President: Mr. Smith

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

The PRESIDENT (Mr. SMITH) – We continue with the discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. MARTANS (Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, Panama) – I would like to join the speakers who have spoken before me in expressing to Mr. Beyreuther my most cordial congratulations upon his appointment as President of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. We are sure that his experience and personal and professional qualifications will guarantee a balanced and objective leadership which will lead us with success to the end of our important discussions.

I regret to have to refer on this occasion to the problems of correspondence, which form a real obstacle to the proper functioning of our delegations. It is regrettable that we have not had prior access to the report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations nor to the first part of the Director-General Report dealing with human rights and the ILO. My delegation has made this point on other occasions and we again appeal to the ILO to review its postal procedures and try to send out documents pertaining to the Conference in the fastest and most reliable way possible so that delegates can prepare themselves properly and in good time.

We received only Part II of the Report of the Director-General, with its detailed account of the wide range of activities deployed by the ILO in 1987. We have studied it with great care. We have to acknowledge the open and determined collaboration we have enjoyed with the ILO regional offices, giving us flexible and frequent contact and a prompt response to our requests for co-operation and advice.

In view of the irregular situation we have been experiencing in Panama in the last 12 months, as a result of attempts at destabilisation at the national level, characterised by frequent disturbances of public order, we have been compelled to suspend some co-operative activities envisaged for this year and we hope that we will be able to carry them out soon. Nevertheless, we have continued to receive the valuable support of the Central American office of the Regional Employment Programme for Latin America and the Caribbean (PREALC), whose staff, in collaboration with our technicians, are helping in the search for alternative solutions to counteract the violent effects produced by the activities I have mentioned, culminating in the economic measures recently imposed upon Panama.

The ILO continues to have a decisive role in the international labour community. Nevertheless, the general crisis of the last few years represents a new challenge for the Organisation, which will have to lay greater emphasis on practical actions to help to alleviate the effects of the crisis and bring us closer to a definite solution. It is essential that this should be accompanied by a thorough discussion of the present international economic system, which is cruelly unfair to those of us who wish to advance along the road of development, as is the inalienable right of all peoples. We trust that our Organisation will be able, with the help of all, to face this challenge.

As regards human rights, the decision of the Director-General to devote his Report to the theme of human rights seems to us proper and relevant, as a tribute to the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights by the General Assembly of the United Nations and the adoption by the ILO of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

For many years we have recognised the work of the ILO in promoting and defending human rights and thus we are sure that our position will not differ from those set out by the Director-General.

We are happy to be able to state that human rights, their protection and defence, constitute and have always constituted a fundamental concern and priority of the Panamanian State. Panamanian legislation, and particularly the Labour Code, enshrines the most advanced ideas in this field. We have managed to maintain active participation in all international forums dealing with this theme and we have signed and participated in the most important Conventions or international legal instruments aimed at promoting and maintaining human rights.

It is well known that our country, in striving to achieve and maintain proper levels in the field of health and education, has attained excellent results in the region and it is on this that we base our conception of human rights – the right of our peoples to live, to feed themselves, to be educated – as a fundamental, indispensable premise of being truly capable of taking decisions, choosing their own path and achieving real freedom.

We cannot speak of the full exercise of human rights as long as part of the population – and in many Third World countries this means the vast majority of the population – has no food, no housing, no opportunity for education and is, practically speaking, denied the right to earn its living by its own efforts.

We must point out, here in this forum, that these fundamental rights are under serious threat for Panamanians. Panama is the victim of systematic economic aggression through the imposition of unwarranted and illegal economic sanctions and the application of a financial blockade which violates the basic principles of legal relations agreed between States.

This economic aggression has a political basis which should not be dealt with at this Conference and we also consider it inadvisable to dwell on the details of these measures. However, it is imperative that we mention some of the harmful effects on the labour population and the economy in general, which have subjected the country to the most serious crisis it has ever faced in its history.

In the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare, we can see day by day the tragic situation facing our country.

More than 100 workers a day are expelled from the labour market through dismissal or redundancy upon request. Suspensions from work without pay for two, three and even four months are affecting an average of 193 workers a day. More than 200 workers are affected every day by reductions in work days and wages, delays in wage and benefit payments and all kinds of changes for the worse in working conditions. Every day, companies are occupied by workers who are trying to make sure that they can continue to work. The building industry is totally paralysed. It is estimated that some 20,000 workers in the building industry are unemployed.

Dozens of companies have closed their doors and many others are in danger of collapse. This is the result of economic aggression.

The irrational and frequent use of stoppages by the employers as a political weapon against the Government, encouraged by extranational companies, has gone on for months, culminating in violence and economic aggression against our country. This has brought the Panamanian crisis to an unbearable level.

In 1988 Panama will therefore be facing open unemployment figures which were never expected, and this may lead to explosive social and political situations and will, in fact, become a problem of national security. If we add up the 89,000 unemployed recorded in a household survey in August 1987 and the 26,000 expelled from the labour market because of the crisis, and the 20,000 new active people who join the workforce every year, it becomes clear that 135,000 people, 17 per cent of the labour force, of my country are in fact unemployed. But these figures do not really show the size of the employment problem because the economy has not finished adjusting to the thrust of the aggression, nor have we considered the problems of under-employment which has tended to worsen, with a reduction in the number of hours of work and in workers' income, which affects most of the country's economic and social sectors and also thousands of non-wage-earning urban workers whose activities depend on the earnings of the modern sectors of the economy. In addition there are thousands of small farmers who are facing great difficulties in purchasing the necessary equipment and inputs to develop their productive work on a small scale, and their possibilities of becoming wage-earners are also limited because of the same problems that face the big farmers.

Some 45,000 small farmers may be in this situation – those who farm less than 5 hectares – and some 90,000 independent agricultural workers who supplement their income by wage-earning.

Faced with this serious labour situation, the Government passed Decree No. 13 of 27 May last, which provides for urgent temporary labour measures to protect labour sources and relations. This new law enables the government to control dismissals, lay-offs, redundancies on request and suspensions and changes in relations in labour.

But these measures do not provide a solution to the problem. They are only palliatives because the social cost of the aggression is much greater. It is indeed impossible to assess the exact levels of malnutrition, hunger and poverty facing the Panamanian people and which it will continue to face because of the destruction of its present and future sources of income. It is impossible to assess the level of despair and frustration among young people from 15 to 24 years of age, representing 21 per cent of the total Panamanian population, when they see their possibilities of fulfilling their hopes of work in the next few years dashed. Serious and mostly irreparable damage has been done to the national economy and it will be many years before the economy recovers its level of 12 months ago.

This desperate situation compels us to draw attention to the urgent need for the Organisation to send a high-level commission to Panama to assess the effects on labour of the economic aggression and all its facets. We request the ILO and the countries that are able and ready to do so to give us urgent support in carrying out our various programmes and projects that will help us to face and to overcome this unexpected crisis.

On previous occasions, the Government delegations of Panama have made use of this forum in order to denounce the permanent violation of the Torrijos-Carter treaties by the North American administration. We shall not do so today, not because the situation has been rectified but because today we are faced with an economic aggression which goes beyond the various Canal problems and endangers food, health, labour and the very life of our people. The labour discrimination against Panamanians in the Canal therefore becomes a secondary problem when we are faced with measures which openly violate fundamental principles of international law, which we are obliged by necessity to denounce before this forum. The unfair and illegal sanctions applied by the United States to Panama, the effects of which we have already mentioned, violate the principle of self-determination as laid down in article 1, paragraph 2, of the Charter of the United Nations; the principle of refraining from the threat or use of force laid down in article 2, paragraph 4; article 41 of the Charter which reserves to the Security Council the exclusive right to apply coercive measures of an economic nature; and article 32 of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States which says that no State may use or encourage the use of economic, political or any other type of measures to coerce another State in order to obtain from it the subordination of the exercise of its sovereign rights. In addition, many other precepts and international instruments of regional and continental scope have been violated.

How can we explain to our workers that their jobs are being lost and their sources of work are drying up as a consequence of the irrational, inhuman attitude of a State that says that it is the champion of democracy and the defender of human rights?

The attitude of the people and constitutional Government of my country, as pointed out by the Minister President of the Republic in his message to the nation on 21 March, is one of total rejection. We know that we must defend our rights as in the past, and, to quote his words, we reiterate our commitment to carry out this struggle on our own behalf and in order to defend the dignity and rights of the whole of Latin America and the Caribbean.

Mr. VANDERVEKEN (representative of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions) – Warm congratulations are due to the Director-General not only for having chosen as the theme of his report, Human rights - A common responsibility, but also for the way in which he has dealt with his priority of priorities.

Indeed, respect for human rights, of which trade union rights are an integral part, is an essential condition for the realisation of humane and efficient societies. As a matter of fact, respect for human rights is the life-blood of the free trade union movement itself. Trade unions are set up and function as a result of the determination of workers to exercise their basic civil liberty of freedom of association for the purpose of achieving their individual and collective economic and social rights. It is no coincidence that the founders of the ICFTU, now nearly also 40 years ago, gave the organisation as its motto: "Bread, peace, freedom". To be sure, for free trade unions, economic and social justice and freedom are not only values to be cherished in themselves; they are also the preconditions for peace within and between countries. The recognition of that simple truth explains our deep attachment to the ILO – its principles, its objectives, standard-setting and operational activities and its supervisory procedures. We agree fully with the Director-General when he says that it is particularly urgent in these times of crisis to ensure the full observance of the principles and objectives and to strengthen the procedures and activities.

Convention No. 87 is one of the most widely ratified ILO Conventions. However, there is a serious gap between promise and performance, between ratification and implementation. I can tell you that hardly a day passes for me without receiving information and taking action – often through the ILO – on cases of violations of trade union rights. Despite certain improvements in some countries, the overall picture remains grim. And these violations range from a total denial of freedom of association to a gradual undermining of these rights, or from murder, torture and imprisonment to legal and administrative restrictions and sophisticated methods of union-busting. The most flagrant violations of trade union rights are undoubtedly taking place in countries under dictatorship, irrespective of their ideological orientation. However, in many other countries, even those with long-established democratic traditions, there are also restrictions and infringements of these rights. Whatever form these violations may take, they are all aimed at preventing trade unions from doing their job of defending the interests of their members and the workers in general, and of playing a constructive role in economic and social development. For the ICFTU, there cannot be any double standard: all countries, whatever their political system or level of economic development, must fully respect basic trade union rights in all circumstances.

An important element in our fight for these rights is to inform our membership and the world community at large of what is happening – objectively and fully. That is why since 1984 the ICFTU has been publishing an "Annual survey of violations of trade union rights in the world". The 1988 issue will be distributed in a few days. Special attention in this year's survey is given to the 40th anniversary of Convention No. 87 and the ILO supervisory machinery on trade union rights.

Last March, the ICFTU held its 14th World Congress in Melbourne where we had the privilege of welcoming, as one of the main guest speakers, the Director-General of the ILO. Among the conclusions and decisions adopted by the Congress were two resolutions of direct concern to the ILO and which placed renewed emphasis on the paramount importance of its contribution in the field of human rights. On the basis of these resolutions, a number of delegates from ICFTU affiliates have submitted to this session of the Conference a resolution on human and trade union rights. While calling on governments to create the conditions for the strengthening of autonomous and effective trade union organisations, the resolution also emphasises the responsibilities for employers' and workers' organisations themselves in securing the independent and democratic character of their own organisations and to contribute to the best of their ability to the enhancement of democratic institutions and procedures in their own countries. It is my fervent hope that this resolution will be adopted by this session.

In so doing, you will be giving added momentum to the 40th anniversary of both the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and Convention No. 87 and stimulate governments as well as workers' and employers' organisations, each at their own level of competence, to take further steps for the ratification and full implementation of international labour standards related to basic human rights and to co-operate genuinely and actively with the ILO in monitoring progress in this regard.

The main theme of the ICFTU World Congress was "The challenge of change". The challenge of change facing the international free trade union movement in the decade ahead is the elaboration of strategies and structures which continue to meet the diverse needs of workers in an increasingly interdependent world economy in the midst of a technological revolution.

It was the unanimous view of our Congress that in this ever more interdependent world, strong joint government action through international co-operation for development, employment and an end to poverty are essential. A crucial element in this are measures to bring the world economy into a vigorous growth path. The contribution of developing countries to world economic expansion must be activated by an ample flow of resources enabling them to accelerate their economic and social development. Resumed growth in industrialised countries depends fundamentally on faster growth in developing countries, and vice versa.

The ICFTU Congress held that international co-operation to improve the world's economic prospects must be based, amongst other things, on the following: a commitment to working for full employment, equality of opportunity between men and women, and an end to poverty world-wide; a fair sharing of the costs and benefits of economic change within as well as between nations; a recognition of the responsibility of governments, both individually and collectively for the establishment of a strong framework for the conduct of economic relations; and a massive increase in the resources of the multilateral financial institutions, so as to enable a new approach to the debt crisis to be implemented, involving substantial debt relief and the replacement of failed deflationary programmes by new policies based on conditions which enable adjustment through growth.

The international free trade union movement firmly believes that in order to achieve the desired results there must be a much bigger role for the ILO in the design of complementary social and employment policies. The Director-General, in his Report, makes a number of pertinent remarks and valuable suggestions to enhance recognition for the competence of the ILO to deal with the social dimensions of world economic co-operation. This is absolutely vital to underpin the human aspect of major structural transformation. A narrow financial perspective on adjustment is doomed to failure.

Hence, our concern for the relevance of ILO standards to international trade. A social clause – a matter also raised in the Director-General's Report – which would link observance of a short list of basic ILO standards to trade (for example, those dealing with freedom of association, discrimination, forced labour, child labour, health and safety, and so on) would help to prevent cut-throat competition undermining social conditions. This is not a protectionist device in disguise. On the contrary, this would constitute an anti-protectionist measure contributing signally to the promotion of an open world trading system which gives special preference to the needs of developing countries, furthers the improvement of working and social conditions in all countries, prevents unfair and damaging trading practices and contributes to a steady and sustained expansion of world production.

I have said it before: respect for human rights, the enjoyment of civil liberties, the realisation of economic and social justice, the establishment of world peace: these are inseparably linked. To those who still would have doubts, I refer to South Africa and its abhorrent apartheid regime. That regime denies human rights and civil liberties on account of a racist ideology: it makes a mockery of economic and social justice and it is a threat to world peace; it still has Namibia in a stranglehold, and it jeopardises the peaceful development of its neighbours. Against all the odds, Black workers have banded together in their trade unions which continue to grow. But the Pretoria Government persistently strengthens its arsenal of repressive laws and regulations. A recent example is the promulgation of the Amendment Bill to the Labour Relations Act and the banning of 17 anti-apartheid organisations, which also affects one of the major Black trade union federations. Black workers and their trade unions inside South Africa reiterate their call for mandatory economic sanctions as the only adequate measure that the international community in Harare last month unanimously agreed to update and strengthen the ILO Declaration and Programme of Action in this sense, and I sincerely trust that this Conference will unanimously adopt the updated Declaration.

I mentioned that the ICFTU Congress had as its theme "The challenge of change". I believe it is clear from my address that the challenge we face is to channel change efficiently towards the realisation of our perennial values, to give mankind a chance to live in dignity, in freedom and in peace. The creation of a peaceful world is not solely a matter of resolving military conflict; frustrated aspirations for economic development and social justice fuel tension and conflict within and between countries. The free trade unions play a significant role in alleviating this by campaigning for resources to be devoted to meeting those aspirations, rather than being wasted on massive military expenditure. Our ICFTU Congress also, once again, took the position that the ILO is for us, in this struggle, an irreplaceable ally – indeed, we took the position that the ILO and the international free trade union movement have a common responsibility.

Mr. MAPURANGA (Assistant Secretary-General of the Organisation of African Unity) – It is a singular honour and privilege for me to be afforded this opportunity of addressing this august assembly on the occasion of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. On behalf of His Excellency, Mr. Idé Oumarou, Secretary-General of the Organisation of African Unity and the entire secretariat of the OAU, it is my pleasant duty to convey to you, Mr. President, and the session, greetings and best wishes for fruitful deliberations.

Before I proceed any further, let me join the distinguished speakers who have preceded me in congratulating Mr. Beyreuther on his well-deserved election to the high office of President of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. In view of his rich experience and personal qualities, I am confident that he will steer this session of the Conference to a successful conclusion.

The 75th Session of this Conference is taking place at a time when Africa is still choking and groaning under the unbearable weight of the socio-economic crisis which continues to strangle and constrain African countries' individual and collective efforts towards development. Indeed, the African continent is still afflicted by the ravages of the socio-economic crisis which is being exacerbated by drought and desertification. The gradual deterioration in the standard of living is attributable to both internal and external structural constraints. The developmental efforts of many African countries are still being undermined and thwarted by the adverse effects of the fuel crisis and the soaring import bills; the ever-growing foreign debt and debt-servicing burden; monetary instability and plummeting commodity prices; as well as ever-deteriorating terms of trade.

In addition, the African condition has been exacerbated by internal forces, ranging from inappropriate financial, economic and social measures in such areas as rural and agricultural policies, investment strategies, choice of technology and utilisation of human resources.

The fact of the matter is that considerable social gains and progress achieved by African countries in the last three decades of independence are now being considerably eroded. As a result, the socio-economic consequences on the African labour force, of our continent's external debt crisis range from a rapid rise in unemployment and underemployment levels, a drastic fall in real wages and labour productivity in most African countries, rising malnutrition and infant mortality, falling educational and training standards, a general increase in absolute poverty levels and ever-widening income differentials, a chronic shortage of foreign exchange resulting in low-level investment, labour retrenchment, closure of industries as well as undercapacity production.

At this juncture, I wish to pay well-deserved tribute to the ILO for the prompt and timely response to the African social and economic crisis as evinced by the ILO's Programme of Action which contains a number of specific medium- and long-term projects aimed, in particular, at developing the infrastructure to counter the effects of drought and desertification, and at rehabilitating agriculture and rural development as well as promoting human resources. In addition, it places special emphasis on the expansion of employment and agricultural income.

The ILO Programme of Action outlines the main priorities for ILO action in relation to African economic recovery and identifies specific areas for ILO intervention in relation to short-term, emergency-related needs, such as management training in relation to transport (ports, railways, roads), crash training for repair and maintenance, to mention but a few.

While paying tribute to the ILO, mention should also be made of the increased ILO expenditure on technical co-operation. We are grateful that these funds were spent on critically important areas in the continent's socio-economic life ranging from ongoing projects to new approvals in the fields of tripartism and implementation of international labour standards. We are optimistic and hopeful that the ILO will continue to intensify and expand its technical co-operation programme in Africa in order to contribute to the alleviation of the continent's critical problems.

Allow me also to commend the ILO for having prepared its Medium-Term Plan 1990-95 at a time when the economic recession continues to ravage African economies and when the prospects for improvement remain limited. It is encouraging to note that the Medium-Term Plan 1990-95 is designed and developed around four major objectives, namely the defence and promotion of human rights, the promotion of productive employment, the continuous improvement of working conditions, and the maintenance and strengthening of social security and welfare.

It is a matter of great satisfaction that the agenda of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference includes four major technical items, two of which have been the major themes of the tenth and eleventh sessions of the African Labour Commission, held in Arusha, United Republic of Tanzania, and Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, in April 1987 and 1988 respectively. One such item is employment promotion and social security which we consider appropriate for Africa in particular and for developing countries generally. It is therefore hoped that while discussing the item, the session will highlight the relationship between employment promotion and social security with a view to coming up with flexible strategies that will not only take into account the different levels of socio-economic development of member States but that will also cover certain categories of the disadvantaged and vulnerable groups who find it difficult to find employment or obtain assistance in moving between occupations or geographical locations.

Another item of great relevance is rural employment promotion. Given the fact that unemployment is so rife and rampant in Africa, the creation and provision of productive and gainful employment and the alleviation of poverty are also some of the most daunting challenges facing the OAU and its member States. Since dynamic rural development remains crucial to progress in resolving the problems of unemployment, it is again my sincere hope that this session will certainly raise awareness and appreciation of rural employment problems and policies for the benefit of member States and their developmental partners.

In our efforts to implement the recommendations contained in the Lagos Plan of Action and Africa's Priority Programme for Economic Recovery in the field of labour, employment and related social issues, we in the OAU are currently preoccupied with the serious concern of promoting and providing productive and gainful employment in the three sectors of the African economy, namely the rural or agricultural, the informal and the modern sectors. We are also discussing the matter regarding the role that can and should be played by a modern Ministry of Labour in the creation of productive employment. A related question we are discussing in the African Labour Commission is the desirability of restructuring African Ministries of Labour and even changing their appellation so as to reflect, as well as to be able effectively to deal with, the important issues of employment promotion, human resources development, planning and utilisation, and vocational training, in addition to their traditional function of protection and improvement of the workers' conditions of life and work. Of course, the carrying out of these functions efficiently presupposes that the Ministry is accorded adequate financial, human and material resources.

It is with a deep sense of appreciation that I now wish to pay tribute to the Director-General of the ILO and his collaborators for the comprehensive and informative reports they have prepared and put at our disposal. In this connection, I particularly wish to commend the Director-General for his great vision and foresight in choosing and devoting Part I of his Report to human rights issues.

The architects of the OAU's Charter adopted 25 years ago were convinced that it is the inalienable right of all people to control their own destiny. They were also conscious of the fact that freedom, equality, justice and dignity are essential objectives for the achievement of the legitimate aspirations of the African peoples. Furthermore, they were persuaded that the Charter of the United Nations and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the principles of which they reaffirmed their adherence to, provide a solid foundation for peaceful and positive co-operation among States.

The latest milestone in Africa's concern for human rights was the adoption by the African Heads of State and Government of the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights in Nairobi in 1981 which came into force in October 1986, after ratification by simple majority of 26 OAU member States. By the end of December 1987, the number of ratifications had come to 35 countries, and the African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights was formally inaugurated as one of the statutory organs of the OAU. This is a clear manifestation of the vital concern with which the OAU views the question of human rights.

Whereas the ILO Constitution, the Declaration of Philadelphia and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights are the historical and authentic international documents in which are enshrined the freedom of association, freedom of labour, elimination of discrimination and promotion of equality of opportunity, the right to work, the right to a minimum income, the right to social security, the right to adequate conditions of life and work and participation of individuals to promote and safeguard human rights, there are two members of the United Nations Organisation whose human rights record is a glaring crime against humanity.

In Africa, there is the infamous so-called Republic of South Africa whose philosophy of apartheid is characterised by the general denial of political, social, economic, legal and human rights to the large majority of the African people. The continuation of the abhorrent and inhuman system of apartheid and the illegal occupation and control of Namibia by racist South Africa, coupled with that regime's incessant aggression and destabilisation of the front-line and neighbouring independent African States is heightening the state of tension and conflict and endangering regional peace and security. The Black workers in South Africa, particularly, continue to suffer from a form of institutionalised racism and generalised racial discrimination. Their rights and freedoms to assemble, to organise and to collective bargaining have been drastically curtailed to the point that they no longer exist. The incarceration, torture and murder by the fascist forces of trade union leaders and organisers are too well known to be dwelt upon here.

A related matter to which I wish to draw the attention of this Conference relates to the looming or actual expulsion and forced repatriation of African migrant workers by the Government of the racist regime of South Africa. The crux of the problem is what is to be done for, and with, these expellees and their dependants who suffer and will bear the brunt of South Africa's wrath in retaliation for the justified economic sanctions against it by the international community. On behalf of the OAU, I wish to call on the ILO to be prepared to render timely assistance to the countries of southern Africa so that they can work out specific emergency and contingency plans and programmes for absorbing the repatriated migrant workers.

It would be remiss of me, while talking on South and southern Africa, not to underscore the commendable role played and being played by the ILO in the fight against apartheid.

Most recently, the ILO organised a Tripartite Conference on Action against Apartheid in Harare, Zimbabwe, from 3 to 6 May 1988, which was another step in the fight against apartheid. Mention must also be made of the projected holding of the Seventh ILO African Regional Conference also to be held in Harare from 29 November to 7 December 1988. It is our hope that the Seventh African Regional Conference will devote part of its deliberations to action against apartheid as well as support and assistance to the liberation movements and to the front-line and neighbouring States.

Apart from the racist regime of South Africa, the other arch-violator of human rights is the Zionist entity in the Middle East.

Let me just conclude, by saying that the ILO and its organs have been rightly referred to as the conscience of the whole world, in that the Organisation is the champion of the cause of the common man, the worker, the creator of the world's wealth. But the ILO's role goes beyond the world of labour. It is concerned with the destiny of man in his totality. This is a noble role, and the OAU urges the Organisation to continue along that road.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. MARTINEZ BRITO (Government delegate, Cuba) – Mr. President, I congratulate you upon being appointed to such a lofty responsibility and in doing so I am particularly happy with the fraternal relations that unite our two countries, I am convinced that under your leadership, the success of our meeting is assured and I appreciate the full significance and magnitude of the fact that, for the first time, a session of the Conference of the International Labour Organisation is being presided over by a representative from a Socialist country.

The Director-General in his Report very rightly points out the interdependence of human rights. The Report is based on the premise that civil and political rights are the responsibility of the State and states on page IV that the action required to ensure respect for these cannot be fully successful unless it is based on development. It must be emphasised, however, that development as a part of economic and social rights is also the responsibility of the State, which must create the proper structures in order to promote the harmonious development that will create the necessary economic basis for the enjoyment of freedom and for the dignity of all men on an equal footing.

We cannot speak of human rights for some to the detriment of the human rights of others, any more than we can emphasise certain human rights, while dodging or evading the importance of others without which the former cannot be exercised in isolation. This has often been repeated and the Director-General asserts in his Report that the availability of gainful employment is a vital link to the enjoyment of other human rights.

The countries that have reached more advanced levels in guaranteeing human rights as a whole, in eliminating the shameful regime of exploitation that leads to the accumulation of huge fortunes in privileged hands and the existence of vast masses of people deprived of the most elementary human rights, use the resources available to them in the cause of development and the progressive improvement of the levels of living for the population as a whole, thereby creating the necessary bases for full employment, have dignified work and raised it to the status a moral virtue of the individual, constituting, as in the case of my country, a right, a duty and an honour for each citizen. To dignify work is to dignify man.

But the situation is quite different in social systems which have not approached the question of the right to employment, on the basis of equality, and social justice, education, health and culture. In these cases we cannot see the relationship that exists between work as a right and as a moral obligation of a citizen in the endeavour to guarantee the levels of living of the people, because they have been unable to guarantee the basic rights of all human beings.

In many countries the economic crisis and its harmful effects such as the immoral and unpayable external debt seriously impair the rights of the workers, and in this field the ILO can make a considerable contribution through the proper allocation of priorities to its objectives and activities on the one hand, and through the realistic implementation of labour standards on the other.

The guide-lines contained in the ILO's Medium-Term Plan for the years 1990-95 must be taken into account in the formulation of future programmes.

Unfortunately, the world economic situation has an impact on the adoption of the Organisation's budget and this makes it all the more necessary to establish priorities in main lines of work for the ILO in the five-year period 1990-95. We consider that the four objectives mentioned in the introduction to the Plan are correct, namely the defence and promotion of human rights, the promotion of employment, the continuous improvement of working conditions, and the maintenance of and strengthening of social security and welfare. The relevance of these objectives can be seen clearly from the analyses of the present situation, because the extraordinarily high rate of unemployment prevailing in most countries, whether industrialised, developing, or those with market economies, and the alarming number of people living in extreme poverty in the developing countries constitute a challenge to this Organisation.

The promotion of employment and of training activities, continuous improvement of conditions of work and the strengthening of social security and welfare are basic activities for the exercise of civil and political rights which must be properly balanced by the ILO in its sphere of work.

The implementation of international labour standards in an objective and realistic manner would undoubtedly lead to greater respect for human rights. Hence the struggle against exploitation, unemployment, destitution and poverty inspired by the Preamble to the ILO Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia must become the basic commitment of this Organisation because we are dealing here with basic human rights which it is imperative to guarantee for the existence of freedom and social justice.

In this connection it is necessary to emphasise the fact that all forms of racial discrimination, colonialism, apartheid, foreign domination and occupation, aggressions and threats against the sovereignty, national unity and territorial integrity and the refusal to recognise the right of peoples to their own development, to self-determination and the exercise of complete and full sovereignty over their natural resources constitute flagrant violations of human rights and essential freedoms which the International Labour Organisation must reject.

The people of Cuba welcome the fortieth anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, boasting significant achievements and developments with respect to the relevant standards of the International Labour Organisation made possible by the revolutionary triumph of 1 January 1959 and three decades devoted to building a new society.

Guaranteed employment with equality of opportunity, decent remuneration, proper working conditions, a progressive social security system covering 100 per cent of the workers, full respect for trade union rights, which in our economic and social system enable active participation of trade union organisations in the management of production and services – these constitute some examples of the ways in which the Government of Cuba has complied with the essential provisions of ILO instruments. Since we are dealing with human rights, I might also mention free education, guaranteed from the primary-school level to the higher levels, and specialised medical care for the entire population.

Further to the economic and social rights enjoyed by the Cuban people, some of which we have mentioned, our Constitution, approved by almost the entire population, guarantees the full exercise of individual rights.

Where there is exploitation, racial discrimination, poverty and unemployment, it is not possible to speak of human dignity or freedom. The wholehearted struggle against those terrible evils which today affect much of mankind is the true struggle for human rights, to which we must dedicate all our efforts. My country is ready to participate in this struggle, together with the International Labour Organisation and its member States.

Let us dedicate ourselves in this session to the study and debate of these vital problems in order to justify this Conference and make it useful, and prevent the immoral and unscrupulous political manipulation of this topic within our Organisation.

On the occasion of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference, there are other matters of extraordinary importance which we must mention.

Once again, it is necessary to raise our voices in order to condemn the hateful and brutal regime of apartheid in South Africa, as well as the aggression of that country against neighbouring independent countries. South Africa is the true source of the conflict in southern Africa, supported actively by its well-known allies.

Cuba once again reiterates its support for the application of resolution 435 of the Security Council of the United Nations concerning the independence of Namibia, as well as the right, as long as there is no peaceful solution, for SWAPO to make use of all means available to it to achieve Namibia's independence.

The military defeats suffered by the South African aggressors at the hands of the Angolan fighters and the Cuban international troops in South Angola have compelled the racists to sit down at the negotiating table. Angola and Cuba have made proposals to achieve a significant agreement which would facilitate a peaceful solution to the conflict in southern Africa. We must now await the outcome of these negotiations.

This session of the International Labour Conference is being held at a time when the criminal aggression of the Israeli Zionists against the people of Palestine is mounting.

My delegation reiterates its support for the just struggle of the Palestine Liberation Organisation and is ready to participate actively in approving the resolution submitted to this Conference by a group of delegates, condemning the criminal aggression and monstrous crimes committed against the Palestinian people in the occupied territories of Gaza and the West Bank.

Cuba also supports the serious efforts deployed by the Sandinista Government to negotiate peace and put an end to the dirty war which for five years has been heroically and victoriously waged by the Nicaraguan people against the criminal and "well-paid" counter-revolution, supported and financed by the revolting and brutal neighbour from the North. In closing, the Government delegation of Cuba expresses its respect and solidarity for the worthy attitude of the Government and people of Panama in the face of the aggression against its sovereignty, organised by those who can think of Latin America only as their backyard. I am talking about international terrorism and Yankee imperialism.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. AL-SABBAH (representative of the Palestine Liberation Organisation) – It gives me great pleasure at the beginning of my statement to express to the President, on behalf of the Palestine Liberation Organisation and its Chairman, Brother Yasser Arafat, our sincere congratulations on his election to chair the 75th Session of the Conference.

I am convinced that the choice of yourself reflects the eminent position occupied by the German Democratic Republic on the international plane and its positive role in supporting the causes of freedom, development and peace in the world. I should also like to express my confidence in you, by virtue of qualities of competence, experience and honesty which will be a positive contribution to making a success of the work of this Conference and in upholding the aims and principles of the International Labour Organisation in serving the causes of development, progress and peace.

As far as the Director-General's Report on the situation of the Arab workers in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories, which has been submitted to this session, is concerned, I should like the Director-General to visit occupied Palestine personally and see for himself the tragic situation in which the Palestinian people are living under Israeli occupation. I should like to pay tribute to the efforts made by the mission and to acknowledge the difficulties it had to cope with in drawing up the report.

There is no doubt that the Director-General's Report this year has caught the Israeli authorities red-handed, for this time they will not be able to conceal their terrorist practices, as they have been doing for so many years. The mission confirmed in its report all the practices and violations, in particular the policy of expanding settlements, the confiscation of land and water resources, and the continued implementation of a policy of repression, terrorism, murder and arrest, and the denial of all forms of rights and freedoms, be they political, economic or social.

The world still suffers from racist movements stemming from a common idea and practice, represented by the Zionist movement and the Pretoria regime in South Africa, which are unfortunately under the protection of a great power. How long will member States remain silent in the face of the ineffectiveness of international resolutions and the paralysis of the international community through recourse to the right of vetoing all resolutions resulting from the international will against Zionist entity which represents the wickedest form of fascism in the world?

Previous sessions of this Conference have taken a firm stand on the racist regime of South Africa and forced it to withdraw from this Organisation in 1966. The present session is called upon to uphold this Organisation and its principles by telling the Israeli regime that it is no longer worthy of continuing to be a member of this Organisation. We recall the provisions of Article 4, paragraph 49, of the Geneva Convention of 1949, which requires the great powers to enforce respect for that paragraph by their partners. This regime continues to occupy Palestine and refuses to implement the resolutions of the United Nations and the other international institutions. It practises the most horrible forms of repression, murder and expulsion. It breaks the limbs of young people, buries them alive, and throws them on to burning car tyres. It uses asphyxiating gases which cause pregnant women to abort and asphyxiates children. It practises a policy of expansion, confiscation and appropriation of land. It does not recognise trade union, political, social and economic rights and freedoms.

The area of lands confiscated has reached 52 per cent of the total area of the West Bank and 40 per cent of the Gaza Strip.

The number of people arrested has reached nearly 20,000; 11,200 have been injured, 4,600 of whom have been seriously injured and will be handicapped for life. There have been 1,100 cases of abortion provoked by beatings or asphyxiating gases. Some 385 persons have been martyred.

The Israeli authorities have also used bombs equipped with electric charges which provoke epilepsy and paralysis.

A week ago the Israeli occupation authorities arrested Brother Chaher Saad, Chairman of the Federation of Palestinian Workers on the West Bank, and seven members of the Federation's Executive Committee.

You have no doubt followed on your television screens and through the various mass media the policy of repression and terrorism practised by the Israeli occupation authorities against the Palestinian people, its workers, its farmers, its women, its young people, its children and its elderly. Since the beginning of the popular uprising which is the result of the occupation and the worsening acts of repression and terrorism, that is since 8 December 1987, the Palestinian people has been pursuing its legitimate liberation struggle, armed only with the force of its rights, the stones of its land and its faith in its just cause against a settlement colonialism amply equipped with American weapons of destruction which strikes where it wishes and whose air force daily carries out barbaric raids on the inoffensive inhabitants of the Palestinians camps; which has occupied southern Lebanon since 1982 and which every day threatens to carry out a new invasion; which strikes at nuclear reactors in Iraq, which threatens to strike Syria; which even threatens to destroy missiles which the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia has acquired to defend itself; which launches its aircraft from the vessels of a great power in the Mediterranean to bomb the headquarters of the PLO in Tunis; and whose terrorism reached Tunisian territory on 16 April 1988 when it added a new crime to its long list of terrorist acts with the assassination of militant leader Khalil El-Wazir (Abu Jihad) in his home in front of his wife, his daughter and his three-year-old son. The Israeli air force has bombed the camp and Lebanese villages, and the Israeli occupation forces have opened fire on Palestinian people who went out on the streets peacefully to express their feelings after the martyrdom of one of their leaders. As a result of these operations 17 Palestinian citizens died and 300 were injured; dozens were arrested.

The Israeli authorities are pursuing a policy of collective punishment of thousands of citizens by cutting communications between regions, cutting off their means of subsistence, preventing medical supplies and aid getting through, closing or besieging mosques, preventing journalists and representatives of the news agencies from doing their jobs, by ordering the closure of newspapers, and other fascist and terrorist practices of which you are all aware. What is more, the authorities have used a new weapon which is a form of powder that has the effect of paralysing a person's limbs so the victim is taken to hospital in an inanimate state. All this is in flagrant violation of the United Nations Charter, international law and the principles of the International Labour Organisation and all international conventions.

I am pleased to congratulate the Director-General of the International Labour Office for his judicious choice of the subject of his Report this year: Human rights – A common responsibility. This choice chimes with the objectives, mission and aspirations of the International Labour Organisation at a time when the whole world is celebrating the fortieth anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and when we are also celebrating the fortieth anniversary of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87). I agree with the Director-General when he says that the notion of human rights is indivisible and that these rights encompass civic, political, economic and social rights. These rights also cover people of Palestine, whose land has been occupied for 40 years and who live scattered and in wretched conditions. The International Labour Conference, when discussing this question, will also be reviewing the main problems and challenges which the International Labour Organisation has to face in order to guarantee the implementation of human rights for the benefit of all mankind.

The Zionist entity is practising discrimination and inequality in the various fields of work. It is violating the trade union and basic rights and freedoms of the Palestinian people by invading and closing trade union headquarters, seizing their property and arresting their leaders. The Zionist entity is proceeding to subjugate the Palestinian economy to the benefit of the Israeli economy to destroy the economic infrastructure and impose restrictions on Palestinian products. It is imposing exorbitant charges and taxes on the employers in order to weaken national enterprises. It is practising discrimination in the field of social security despite the fact that sizeable deductions are made for the purpose from the wages of Arab workers. To sum up, these practices are innumerable and are daily proof of the fact that the Zionist entity is applying a policy of racial discrimination and violation of human rights and basic freedoms. All this is set out in the report of the ILO mission.

The United Nations and the other international organisations have adopted hundreds of resolutions, but the Zionist entity has recognised none of them, just as it has not recognised the provisions of the Fourth Geneva Convention on the protection of civilian populations in time of war. The expulsion of Palestinian citizens from their land constitutes a flagrant violation of Article 49 of the Geneva Convention, and the destruction of properties and houses constitutes a violation of Article 53 of the same Convention. Israel has flouted all international laws, conventions and practice. Its very existence represents a real threat to the principles and institutions of the United Nations. The ILO, which is the most specialised organisation, must reconsider the participation of the Israeli entity as a member in order to preserve the principles and objectives of the Organisation.

The deliverance of the Palestinian people from its sufferings cannot be achieved unless the occupation is ended and this people is allowed to exercise its right to self-determination and to establish an independent State in its own homeland. The convening of an international peace conference under the aegis of the United Nations and with the participation, on an equal footing, of the major powers and the permanent members of the Security Council as well as all the parties concerned, including the Palestine Liberation Organisation, the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people, offers a practical means of reaching a fair and comprehensive solution, which would spare the peoples of the region the sorrows of a destructive war, provided that the Conference is given all the necessary powers to impose peace on the basis of the resolutions of the United Nations General Assembly. We proclaim in this Conference our complete solidarity with the workers and people of South Africa and Namibia in their struggle for liberation from the policy of apartheid and for their freedom, independence and right to self-determination, because the struggle against apartheid and nazism in this world is an indivisible whole. We are convinced that all racist regimes will inevitably disappear and that the African people of Namibia and South Africa will eventually be victorious. We likewise reaffirm our solidarity with all peoples struggling for liberty, independence, progress and peace.

Wars bring nothing but ruin and destruction to the people and to the workers. This is why we have a common responsibility to stop the war between Iran and Iraq and to establish peace between these two neighbouring countries in accordance with all the clauses of Security Council resolution 598. There is no justification for the continuation of this war, and it is imperative for the future of the two peoples and their workers that it should be brought to an end so that they can dedicate themselves to the reconstruction of their countries. The party which did not respond to the appeals for peace should stop the war, accept resolution No. 598 and establish peace in the region.

The Palestine Liberation Organisation, which respects international agreements and customs, will pursue its just and legitimate struggle for peace founded on justice. These were the pragmatic words of Yasser Arafat, President of the Executive Committee of the Palestine Liberation Organisation, when he declared, from the most important rostrum in the world, that he carried an olive branch in one hand and a gun in the other and urged the international community not to let the olive branch fall from his hand so that justice, without which there could be no peace, might be achieved.

Interpretation from German: Mr. ARBESSER-RASTBURG (Employers' delegate, Austria) – Allow me first of all to congratulate Mr. Beyreuther on his election to this high office. I am convinced that he will be successful in solving the difficult tasks which lie before us in this Conference.

I should like to highlight four specific points from the excellent Report of the Director-General.

First, as a permanent representative of the International Employers' Organisation to the United Nations and UNIDO in Vienna, I should like to express my satisfaction that the co-operation between the ILO and the UNIDO has been strengthened since the latter became an independent United Nations organisation. For instance, the ILO took part in September 1987 in Paris at the second UNIDO Consultation on the Training of Industrial Manpower. A tripartite delegation of the Governing Body also took part in that meeting.

Second, as an Austrian, I should like to stress particularly that the only working party of the International Labour Organisation which is based in Vienna has been able to chalk up quite a few successes. In close co-operation with Danish, Finnish and Norwegian institutions, the fourth phase of the inter-regional project for the production of material and techniques for co-operative management training (MATCOM) was prepared. In the first half of 1987, there were 634 training events with 22,689 trained staff and 494 trained teachers using MATCOM training materials.

Third, when I first participated in the work of an industrial committee 30 years ago as an Austrian employers' representative, I had no idea of the importance of such committees to the work of the ILO and those employed in the respective sectors. I can now understand from the Director-General's Report to what extent the conclusions adopted at the first Session of the Forestry and Wood Industries Committee, which I attended as Employers' member of the Governing Body, must have an impact on activities in this field. In this context, I should like to mention studies on the participation of contractual forestry workers in India and Canada and on the protection of forestry workers in tropical countries.

Fourth, the tripartite nature of our Organisation is considerably strengthened by the aid given by the ILO to employers' organisations in developing countries.

At this point, I should like to express thanks to the Danish International Development Agency (DANIDA), the Norwegian Agency for International Development (NORAD) and the Swedish International Development Authority (SIDA). These organisations, together with the international employers' organisations and the ILO have been and still are of great help to the developing countries. In addition, they co-operate with the United Nations' Environment Programme (UNEP). I am convinced that assistance of this nature considerably strengthens the tripartite nature of our Organisation.

We stress with pride that we are the only tripartite organisation in the family of the United Nations; it is therefore one of our most decisive joint tasks to consolidate this tripartism so that it can benefit the future of the International Labour Organisation.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. EJAPA BOLEKIA (Government delegate, Equatorial Guinea) – May my first words be to support the speakers who have spoken before me at this rostrum in order to congratulate Mr. Beyreuther on behalf of the delegation of the Republic of Equatorial Guinea and on my own behalf for his well-deserved election as President of this 75th Session of the International Labour Conference, and to express our trust that his excellent personal qualifications and lengthy experience will lead our debates to the success we all hope for; these congratulations we also extend to the vice-presidents.

We consider that it is a pleasant duty indeed to express our most sincere congratulations to the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Francis Blanchard, for the quality of the Report that he has submitted to us and the very relevant way in which he has dealt with the subjects in that Report.

In a world such as ours, today facing great challenges – such as the economic crisis, with its profound effects and lengthy duration; conflicts of interests and unfair trade relations; international indebtedness and heavy burden of debt servicing; unemployment, the illegal use of drugs and alcoholism. In a world where many human beings are struggling in order to achieve minimum levels of survival, while others are living in opulence; in a world where many are suffering and being deprived of their inalienable rights for mere racial considerations; where most of the efforts are dedicated to the solution of economic problems and neglecting social problems to a considerable degree; in which programmes of structural adjustment require great sacrifices in order to achieve equilibrium in the balance of payments and the trade balances and so on – there is no doubt that human rights are facing a great trial indeed and hence the choice of the theme of human rights as food for thought by this Conference is very timely and appropriate.

The Report of the Director-General this year invites us to reflect on the commitment which all our countries must assume to comply with the ideals of peace and social justice advocated by the ILO, to which all peoples must have the right and must legitimately aspire. There is an appeal here to sincere dialogue and frank and close co-operation on a world-wide level, bearing in mind the fact that the world is facing difficult times and it is therefore up to all the peoples to combine their efforts to improve not only their social conditions and their internal economic situations but also the international conditions which enable them to develop properly; a message of solidarity to improve the lot of man in a world which is becoming ever more independent and where more than ever there is a latent need to create at the international level conditions of support for the economic and social development of each and every country in the world.

Respect for human rights is a task which the Government of the Republic of Equatorial Guinea, presided over by His Excellency Obiang Nguema Mbasogo, has imposed upon itself since it took power on 3 August 1979. As far as our Government is concerned, the human being is the supreme goal of the State. It is our obligation to respect and protect the human being; this we have laid down in article 19 of our Fundamental Law.

The right to freely chosen paid employment, freedom of association and equality of opportunity and treatment in employment; the principle of equal pay for equal work; stability in employment, the right to social security; the right to receive vocational and technical training to upgrade skills and knowledge applied to efficient development of production; equality before the law; the right to dispose of one's salary freely, just to mention a few rights, are all duly reflected in our laws and present in our ideals. Despite the economic difficulties we are facing, we are optimistic that through peace we can guarantee happiness and justice for our workers.

Peace and justice have been made a constant feature of our Government of the Republic of Equatorial Guinea, despite the great economic difficulties we are facing as a consequence of the general world economic recession, the lack of capital flows and because of trade protectionism which displaces the commodities of countries such as ours from the market by imposing low prices on our raw materials and high prices on manufactured goods. We are convinced that the well-being and progress which we all hope to achieve does not reside exclusively or decisively in possessing and accumulating material goods, but more specifically in peace of mind and moral and spiritual satisfaction, and in the firm guarantee of security created in man when he lives in peace and harmony in a society of freedom, justice and order.

We attribute vital importance to anything which directly or indirectly contributes to promoting the human being, and for that reason we should like to pay a particular tribute to the ILO for the efforts it has deployed throughout its 70 years of existence in order to promote and safeguard human rights, bearing in mind its skilful standard-setting work and its efficient procedures and governing bodies; and these efforts are supported by the member States in carrying out this common task which is to achieve universal lasting peace based on social justice.

We are happy that progress has been recorded in the measures adopted by governments in order to bring their national legislation and practice in line with the Conventions ratified as we see from the report of activities of the ILO for the year 1987, and this fills us with hope and enthusiasm.

We value highly and support the activities carried out by the ILO to promote equality and particularly its decisive action to help eliminate apartheid and end the illegal occupation of Namibia, in the shape of various technical co-operation projects and other forms of aid to national liberation movements and workers suffering from the harmful effects of this policy in South Africa, its independent trade unions and the front-line States.

I am happy and I consider it right to record the fact that the International Labour Organisation has always given valuable co-operation to the Ministry of Labour and Social Security and Promotion of Women in the Republic of Equatorial Guinea and this co-operation has been extended to other sectors of my country. We value it highly and this we said to the Director of the ILO Office for Central Africa in Yaoundé, during his recent visit to our capital from 7 to 9 April last year, when he came to assess co-operation between the ILO and Equatorial Guinea.

We hope and trust that the ILO will further strengthen this co-operation, as we said to Mr. Raymond Negre.

The delegation of the Republic of Equatorial Guinea endorses the thoughts expressed by the Director-General and expresses its hope of success in this Conference, which we hope will foster close co-operation between the peoples and achieve a world of greater solidarity.

Mr. WALCOTT (Workers' delegate, Barbados) – I would like to join those who have spoken before me in congratulating Mr. Beyreuther on his election as President of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference.

This year appears to be a most appropriate one to discuss the question of human rights which has universal application and relevance to peoples all over the world.

The present economic crisis facing most developing countries clearly emphasises the importance of the human resource element in the development process. Buffeted by adverse terms of trade, protectionism, the debt problem and other factors which hinder their economic development, such countries find it increasingly urgent to depend on domestic solutions to their problems. Inevitably, more demands are being made on the workers who constitute the prime element in the furtherance of national growth and development.

At the same time, the limitations of small domestic markets made up by the micro-States of the Caribbean have urged a policy of export-led growth, in an attempt to gain access to the wealthy markets of the developing countries.

This macro-economic policy which has been developed in most Caribbean countries has definite implications for human rights practices, and can increasingly place the trade union movement under pressure in its attempts to protect its constituents.

The policy developers in the Caribbean appear to be faced by two equally stark alternatives. High unemployment is a major characteristic of the area. This is, in itself, a major human rights problem as the victims of unemployment, largely young people and women, find it difficult to project the values of self-esteem and independence which are at the base of human existence. Unemployment has become an important political issue in these countries, and governments are sorely taxed in their efforts to improve the ravages of this economic and social evil.

In looking for an answer to the problem of unemployment, governments have sought further injections of foreign capital and the stimulation of trade with the developed countries. In order to encourage both, some governments have had to enter into agreements and offer incentives which provide for low wages, resulting in a dilution of the trade union privileges fought for and won over the years. Indeed, an increasing aspect of economic development in some Caribbean countries is a low-wage sector, usually in free zones, which is bereft of the normal trade union protection. In their search for international competitiveness, businesses, aided and abetted by governments, come together in agreements which tend to militate against trade union intervention. Trade unions are thus cast in the role of institutions bent on seeking to disrupt the status quo and prevent the countries from experiencing growth and development. The paradox is that while there is a disadvantaged sector of low-income workers, there are clear signs of a relatively prosperous middle and upper income group which benefits from such programmes. It appears that the role of the trade union movement in upholding workers' human rights must be a priority at this time.

Another macro-economic strategy which is developed by some governments is that of drastic reduction of government expenditures, resulting in wide-scale redundancies in the public sector and cuts in the social and welfare programmes. When governments take the lead in enforcing such measures, it is normal for the private sector to follow suit, with possible disastrous consequences for workers, and the social and political stability of these territories. The problem is further aggravated by the fact that some countries do not provide workers with access to redundancy payments, unemployment benefits, and a level of pensions which can cushion them against the impact of traumatic job loss. As this option is utilised more widely in the Caribbean, there will be need for even more vigilance in the trade union movement to protect the hard-earned rights won on behalf of the workers.

We cannot stress enough at this time the importance of interdependence among all nations of the world if we are to continue doing away with violations against human rights.

As I read the excellent Report of the Director-General and reflected on the subject areas treated in it, I could not help realising that many of the problems relating to human rights have their roots in the economic sphere. This is not to suggest that prosperity will necessarily eradicate human rights problems. However, it is clear that economic relations between the developing and developed countries have a tremendous bearing on the rights enjoyed by workers in the developing countries. For this reason I applaud the Director-General for including the sector on minimum standards which examines the role of trade in the guarantee of human rights.

Direct reference is made in the Report to the impact of the fall of the price of sugar on workers in the Dominican Republic. Many of the developing countries in the Caribbean still depend largely on exports of primary products to the markets of the industrialised countries. The countries now find that as a result of protectionist measures affecting these primary products, multitudes of workers, indeed sometimes the entire countries' economies, are faced with gloomy prospects. In many cases the earnings from these exports provide a major source of foreign exchange to purchase the needed materials from the developed world. The structure of these countries' economies cannot easily and quickly adjust to such a loss in income and the results for human rights can be catastrophic.

It is my hope that, as we focus on this important topic of human rights, we will be able to continue to set a standard for the world to follow in our deliberations on the hateful system of apartheid. As long as this abhorrent practice is allowed to exist, it presents a serious challenge to the world community. Indeed, there is now a discernible cleavage in the world, with some nations being aligned on the two sides of this great divide: the supporters and the antagonists of this system. We all know that apartheid cannot exist without substantial assistance and collusion from other States. While we applaud the obvious signs that more positive actions are being taken against the system, we also urge that efforts be stepped up to bring apartheid to an end. Whatever measures are taken to improve the living standards and the rights of other workers all over the world, the continuing monolith of apartheid stands as a repudiation of these efforts. We all have a duty to help in removing this blot against humanity, and the continuing efforts of the Director-General and the International Labour Organisation in this direction must be applauded.

In concluding, I should like to congratulate the Director-General on his Report, and particularly on his focus on a matter of primary importance for workers in the developing world. Let me express my hope for a successful completion of the Conference agenda under your able guidance.

Interpretation from Farsi: Mr. GANJEI (Senior Deputy Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Islamic Republic of Iran) – In the name of Allah, the Merciful, the Compassionate. "By the essence time, Lo! man is in loss, save those who believe and do righteous works, exhort one another to truth, and exhort one another to endurance." (Chapter 103, Holy Koran).

The 75th Session of the International Labour Conference coincides with the 40th anniversary of the Declaration of Human Rights.

The Director-General in his Report has emphasised the respect for human precepts while recalling pertinent ideas and practices. Observance of human rights as incorporated in and considered by various ILO instruments or gatherings has been recommended to the world through Conventions dealing with freedom of association, freely chosen employment, equal opportunity, equitable remuneration, desirable labour standards and the right to social security. He has also made reference to the services rendered by the ILO, including the adoption of favourable provisions, expressing concern at the shortcomings, non-compliance and non-observance of the principles implying, in fact, neglect of human rights.

Perhaps the Conference recalls that we have stressed in previous discussions that prescribing superficial solutions and imposing the whims of the industrialised world upon oppressed countries would lead to no outcome but to the further deepening and transfer of the crisis; indeed, man's fate and the fulfilment of basic human rights beings would remain shackled by the fetters of instruments in the form of serious obstructions and threats wielded by the money-grabbers and belligerent arrogant powers. This fundamental issue has been touched upon by the Director-General who has, in his present report, called for the strengthening and mobilisation of a much-needed common will, to overcome the crisis.

Respect for human rights in the Director-General's Report has been discussed as a means for attaining social justice. This is being proposed at a time when the West has achieved material progress at the expense of the natural resources and wealth of the so-called Third World and has greedily monopolised the fruits of such progress; meanwhile the oppressed world is deprived of the opportunity to utilise its own God-given possibilities to promote material development at a time when the industrialised world extracts the costs of its excessive epicurean lust for pleasure out of the pocket of the poor through wars waged with the help of its military power.

It is noteworthy that the Director-General's discussion on human rights opens with reference to ethical notions contained in the text of international instruments and concludes by pointing out the need to pay attention to ethical precepts.

At the beginning of my speech, I quoted a chapter from the Holy Koran in which the Almighty Creator has stressed that man shall gain nothing unless he is equipped with faith so that his acts become meaningful on the basis of divine insight, doctrinaire belief and action, social co-operation and constant good works, in which case man's gain will be perfection itself.

The root causes of all the difficulties referred to by the Director-General also lie in the lack of obedience to divine values in relation to man's enjoyment of the natural rights bestowed upon him by the Almighty. What the world needs is an order in which man's material and spiritual development is a top priority. The mechanism applied in the ILO dialogue in broaching new issues and testing evolving ideas and practices against established values, as stated in the Director-General's Report, can only be constructive if it is utilised in achieving that goal.

If true human rights are to be attained, it is vital that technology, sciences and economic potential be freed from the monopoly of powers seeking domination through world organisations. Science and technology have been achieved throughout history by all people. They should not, therefore, be monopolised, because this would be a treason against all humanity and our human spiritual heritage.

As a minimal step towards the realisation of man's material rights and the respect of human rights, it is also necessary that an international committee be established to supervise the printing and distribution of "dollars" as a currency used in international transactions; in this way, a few from a far-away settlement would be stopped from imposing their illegitimate wishes upon people all over the world.

In the era of software, the sovereignty of capital and modern warfare and at a time when there is a wide gap between the declarations and acts of both the arrogant powers of East and West, a discussion on human rights might sound more like a pipe dream than a practicable assumption.

At a time when the Palestinian worker and the Lebanese farmer are continuously being suppressed and denied their legitimate rights by military agents of international Zionism, when human beings are being classified according to the colour of their skin and deprived of their natural rights, when the Great Satan maliciously sets our oil platforms on fire with the intention of preventing the Islamic Republic of Iran from enjoying the most fundamental natural right of human communities, that is the right to self-determination, when the United States capitalist system arbitrarily prints some colourful papers called "dollars" as a means to dominate the world economy under the umbrella of its militarism, when the world capitalist system greedily accumulates those unbacked papers and pours a rain of chemical and lethal weapons upon liberation-seeking but armless people in civilian residential areas in our region, killing thousands of innocent human beings all at one instant; then indeed, talking about human rights seems a biting satire.

Human rights concept embrace the whole range and depth of man's life. Newly born children do not know whether their parents are rich or poor, Black or Anglo-Saxon and cannot tell whether they have been born into an imperialist or dominated land; only some time later will they know whether it they are going to be exploiters or be exploited. Right from early childhood, even without any perception of meanings of words, they will perceive existing distinctions and, if they are not attached to the few clans exploiting the world, they will be obliged to accept misery and misfortune instead of enjoying the beauties and flowers of life. Otherwise, they may be marked as an anarchist or a terrorist; but, inevitably, they will end up in some jail or with early death. Thus has the Namibian Black, the West Banker, the Latin American, or the Asian child been condemned to remain divested of very basic human rights by the world usurpers – even before birth.

Life is beautiful for all colours, for all groups, for all nationalities – not just for a few circles, races or individuals. The beauty of life may only become tangible if everyone truly respects human rights. Human rights will only be realised through divine teaching. The Satanic world rule overshadowed by the present hateful chaos must radically be converted into an acceptable humane order.

As you are aware, hardly ten years have elapsed since the victory of the Islamic revolution in Iran – with nearly eight years coinciding with a destructive war, a brutal oppression. Nevertheless, the Islamic Republic of Iran has done its utmost to restore the rights of her subjects for it views man as the highest of God's creatures.

Redistribution of the usurped land among farmers has brought hereditary landlordship to the verge of decline. The Supreme Labour Council annually adjusts the workers' purchasing power and consumption capacity by public means, despite the war and the political, economic and military sanctions imposed against us. The new labour laws have already been adopted, amazing all those groups who claim to be supporting workers' interests. The newly adopted Unemployment Insurance Act is now being enforced, which still seems like a dream to many of the oppressed – or, as termed by the international organisations, the "developing" countries. In addition, the Early Retirement Act has been adopted with a view enabling more young people to enter the labour market.

In order to promote self-employment and reduce worker-employer conflicts, labour co-operatives in the agricultural, industrial and service sectors have been set up. Those lacking the necessary means can now turn to these co-operatives and work on their own behalf instead of working for others; up to 80 per cent of each project is finance by public institutions.

Finally, as regards the socio-political participation of workers, it should be mentioned that workers, like all other social groups, nominated their own candidates for the third parliamentary elections which have just been held. They had full freedom of choice and the revolutionary people of Iran resolutely voted under the rain of rockets and bombs that fell upon our cities. All this bears witness to the respect for human rights in the Islamic Republic of Iran.

Resistance and struggle for the rights of human beings are the most important factors for the restoration of man's dignity.

The Islamic Revolution in Iran has been striving for the cause of man's material and spiritual development, resisting all sorts of plots instigated by the world's arrogant powers, which range from sanctions to the war imposed upon it. It is progressing ever more vigorously with the strong conviction that great aspirations require a great sacrifice, and that man's liberation demands an indefatigable fight against the enemies of humanity. We have started on our mission. The task is difficult but feasible. Indeed, the prospect alleviates suffering and sweetens all bitterness.

Peace be upon us and the true followers of Allah!

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. VILLALOBOS (Employers' delegate, Venezuela) – I would like to join in the general approval of Mr. Beyreuther's appointment as President of what he has so aptly called the World Parliament of Labour. His opening speech on taking office augurs well for the fulfilment of our wishes and the success of his task.

As was the case in the 1968 International Labour Conference, the central theme of the Report of the Director-General commemorates the Universal Declaration of Human Rights by the United Nations and the two international agreements which preceded it: the one dealing with civil and political rights and the one dealing with economic, social and cultural rights, though we must not forget the fact that legally both categories are inseparable. This commemoration emphasises the fact that respect for and the effectiveness of these rights should be striven for daily, whereas in fact the reality is diminished, deformed, or, still more often, totally disregarded, shamelessly and with impunity.

Nor should we overlook the role of the United States Constitution and France's Declaration of the Rights of Man and the Citizen as the roots of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. We must also recall, as the Director-General, David Morse, noted in 1968 the influence that the ILO Constitution and the Philadelphia Declaration exercised on the Covenant which specifically enshrined economic, social and cultural rights.

It redounds to the honour of Western culture that this combination of rights and guarantees constitutes the nucleus and substratum of democracy. Many of those who used to be ideological opponents are today moving slowly but surely, with the sun behind their backs, from the inexorable, negative conditions of yesteryear towards democracy.

The ILO, through its Conventions, with the natural force of an international covenant, and its Recommendations, with their clear practical influence, is a pioneer in the essential function of setting specific legal standards in this Universal Declaration. It is also a pioneer in creating operating procedures for taxation and applying the instruments it adopts, whether through information, in situ recognition, the reports of its Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, the conclusions of the Tripartite Committee on Application of Standards, the Tripartite Committee on Freedom of Association, the Commission of Inquiry, the resolutions of the Governing Body or the judgments of the International Court of Justice. All this is worth enumerating because it shows clearly the distance separating ratification of Conventions from their effective implementation, in the same way as the vigorous and constant efforts deployed by the ILO to obtain this implementation do not always meet with success.

To mention only two eloquent examples of such failures: the infringement with impunity of the obligation, laid down in article 13, paragraph 2 (a), of the Constitution, according to which member States will pay the travelling and subsistence expenses of delegates and technical advisers from Employers' and Workers' groups, as well as their own.

There are nuances in the constant violation of this duty, according to whether it is carried out against workers or employers. With respect to the former, political motives and personal discrimination predominate. As to the latter, the stress is on ideological retaliation and an anti-Employer attitude, or, at least, pose the residual product of an abandoned revolutionary posture sometimes spiced with a sad awareness of other people's real or supposed well-being.

Among the non-complying governments there are those which can adduce their dire poverty on their deeply serious financial situations, but long experience shows that both the one and the other is open to despoliation for the benefit of the public treasury and its predators. Then there is the lack of compliance with the obligation, indicated in article 3, paragraph 5, of the Constitution, according to which Governments are obliged to nominate non-Government delegates and advisers in agreement with the professional organisations which are most representative of employers and workers, as the case may be, if such organisations exist in the country in question.

On our continent, there is a well-known case, which has been rejected, of a Government, which is obstinately and rudely contrary to all the evidence, refusing to give the most representative organisation of its country, the Supreme Council of Private Enterprise (COSEP) its proper representation and title at these Conferences. I say "at these Conferences" because the most recent Regional Conference of American States Members of the ILO, held in Montreal in 1986, unanimously without abstentions, approved a proposal of its Credentials Committee which, in passing judgement on the permanent complaint of failure in this regard, stated categorically that there was no doubt that COSEP was the most representative employers' organisation of its country. This judgement was all the more delivered on America's own territory where we know each other best and where we best know where the shoe pinches.

These two violations to the Constitution of this Organisation are serious and frequent. And they change and distort the fact and composition of these assemblies, which should therefore undertake a revision of this Covenant in order to suppress them once and for all. But the geographical, political and personal appetites or the demagogic postures disguised as democratic claims should be mentioned because they were, among other, determining motives of the most recent constitutional revision already out of date, which took place after twenty years of tough, tiring and largely futile discussions, involving incalculable human resources, time, typewriters, typing ribbons and paper, as well as an enormous and precisely quantifiable sum of money which deserved a better fate, since it is always scarce and urgently required for the proper duties and functions of this useful and necessary Organisation.

There is an increasing scarcity of funds which affects the whole United Nations system. And this leads us to insist on an old argument of ours, to the effect that we should decrease the number of items on the agenda of these Conferences because not all of them are absolutely necessary and the Governments do not pay for the travel and per diem of the many technical advisers required by their discussions. We should also decrease, with a view to their complete suppression, the traditional and periodical meetings of the Tripartite Committees to examine and improve working conditions and social security in sectors and subsectors of various branches of the economy because these objectives can be achieved more quickly and effectively through collective agreements, which this Organisation rightly advised and promoted as being the proper instrument par excellence, not only to render flexible and to adjust the social and economic claims of the workers to the potential of the company or companies or a given economic sector or subsector but also to strengthen trade unionism by respecting its commitments.

These far-reaching reflections apart, attention should be given to the proposed revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107). Indeed, we were well aware at that time that because the instrument covers certain areas which fall within the competence of other international bodies, it required, as it still requires, the effective institutional participation together with ILO of the United Nations, FAO, UNESCO and WHO. That did not prevent reservations from being made by various States with respect to the competence of the ILO.

In these circumstances, as a minimum procedure for the proposed revision, the text should have been drawn up with the active participation of the above-mentioned international organisations or, at least they should have given, in writing, their full agreement with the text. There is no mention of this in the two volumes of the report on the subject as distributed to this Conference.

Thus, the ILO was quite right to express reservations as to its competence "ratione materiae" when Convention No. 107 was adopted, when the United Nations Economic and Social Council authorised the creation of a working party on indigenous populations and when that group at its fourth session held in 1985 decided that the goal would be to draw up, as a first formal step, a draft declaration on indigenous rights that the General Assembly could adopt.

In the light of these events, it would seem that there is undue haste in wishing to revise Convention No. 107, and for this reason I must insist here on the suggestion that a working party should be set up, composed of the legal advisers of the ILO and the other international organisations, that collaborated in preparing and drafting this Convention, and that they should determine the competencies of the various organisations of the different areas of the Convention.

A serious question of substance compels me to make a few more comments on the matter.

Among the recommendations that the meeting of experts submitted to the Governing Body for the purpose of placing the revision of the Convention on the agenda of this Conference, there is one which states literally that the scope of the revision should be limited to the social, economic and cultural aspects.

However, if we compare this recommendation with the ambiguous questionnaire sent to Governments and the draft text of the revision which supposedly reflects the majority replies to this questionnaire, we are surprised to see that with a view to terminological consistency in international language, the word "populations" has been replaced by "peoples". This is to overlook the very important universal political connotation, intimately bound up with national sovereignties, which for thousands of years has been attached to the concept of "people" in domestic and international law, as well as the very important legal and political consequences and effects. The draft text attempts to demonstrate its case with sentences such as the following: "Governments should have the responsibility, in co-operation with the peoples concerned"; "policies should be adopted, in co-operation with the peoples thereby affected"; "to this end they should be involved, to the extent possible, in the formulation and implementation of plans and programmes for the development of the areas which they inhabit"; "Procedures should be established to resolve any cases of conflict between customary and national law."

Because of the legal and political implications of the concept of "people", the word "lands" (private law) is replaced by "territory" (public law). The penal customs of the people are mixed up with the rights of States, which are quite different, because in applying sentences you take into account the cultural evolution of the population of which the accused is a member, which is an orthodox discretionary method in penal law and even I as a judge applied it before it was laid down in Convention No. 107.

In addition, the individual property of indigenous population is done away with without any argument. Only the collective property and possessions of the peoples concerned are mentioned, in several paragraphs.

So we are convinced that the guide-lines for the revision of Convention No. 107 contribute nothing or very little to the subjects of concern to the ILO. These guide-lines could serve to set up micro-States within States as sanctuaries to shelter subversion, guerilla warfare, drug trafficking and common delinquency, at least in Latin America. That is why we will vote against the revision of the above-mentioned Convention.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. ISAIAS (Government delegate, Dominican Republic) – I am very honoured to take the floor at this session of the International Labour Conference as Secretary of State for Labour of the Dominican Republic. Allow me first of all to congratulate Mr. Beyreuther on his election to the presidency of this Conference. We know that he is capable of directing the deliberations of this Conference and that our work will be crowned with success. In particular, I am very happy to be in this international forum and glad to greet all those present on behalf of the Dominican Government and the people of the Dominican Republic. I would like to associate myself with them in the overall framework of our discussions.

I do not intend to make a detailed analysis of the achievements or social problems of my country, but I must say something about crisis we are experiencing as a result of the external debt, the reduction of import quotas and the drop in prices for our traditional exports.

This very difficult situation has compelled our Government to devise solutions with the social partners in order to alleviate its consequences.

In this respect our Government's attention has concentrated on the promotion of employment, on protecting the purchasing power of the lower income groups, and institutionalising tripartism and concertation as forms for debates on these problems.

To fight the acute problem of unemployment, which has such tremendous social consequences, the Government undertook a campaign of public investments which led to the creation of 150,000 new jobs, the building of thousands of new homes, and basic infrastructure projects to improve the situation of the most disadvantaged classes.

We have also sought to facilitate the creation of new enterprises, especially through free-trade areas throughout the country, which have absorbed tens of thousands of unemployed workers.

In order to protect purchasing power, wages have been increased nominally through tripartite negotiations between Government, employers and workers.

To this I must add indirect measures which have a direct influence on the purchasing power of the workers, such as the policy of guaranteed minimum prices for basic commodities and the extension of social security in the near future to many poor families.

Another measure that has had an effect on wages is our Government's promotion of collective bargaining, and the establishment of a legal basis within our labour legislation for genuine collective agreements which may be renewed from time to time to adapt to the economic situation and raise the standard of living.

The institutionalisation of negotiations through tripartite dialogue has, despite certain difficulties, given very good results; in addition to the above-mentioned extension of social security benefits to poorer families, these negotiations have led to the revision of the income tax Act in order to favour the lower income groups, to a 40 per cent increase of the minimum wage, to the revision of sections 69 and 78 of the Labour Code relating to the dismissal of workers by increasing trade union guarantees and job security, and to the creation of a permanent secretariat, under the supervision of the Catholic Church, to search for new agreements to promote a social consensus.

As regards the Dominican Republic's application of Conventions 77, 81, 87, 95, 98 and 105, the administration of President Joaquín Balaguer, which prides itself on its faithful compliance with the law and with all international instruments ratified by Congress, in response to the comments made by the Committee of Inquiry of the International Labour Organisation which visited our country in 1983, adopted resolutions concerning the employment of minors, medical examinations and labour inspection, and banned payment through vouchers redeemable only at the company store for workers in the sugar-cane industry.

We promote freedom of association and collective bargaining, as shown by the revision of sections 69 and 78 of our Labour Code.

Since the President of the Republic, Doctor Joaquín Balaguer, came to power, the Government has taken a number of steps to promote respect for freedom of association, and foster an atmosphere which encourages the development of trade union activities. Since August 1986 more than 200 trade union organisations have registered in accordance with the provisions of our Constitution and international instruments on freedom of association and the protection of the right to organise.

Collective bargaining has also benefited and many agreements have been signed.

In our legislation there is nothing to prevent foreign workers from joining existing trade unions. Likewise, the negotiations between employers and workers concerning section 69 of the Labour Code will ultimately prevent abuses such as those which arose formerly under this section of the Code; this is characteristic of the political thinking of the present Government.

Aware of the importance of standards and measures to promote their implementation, the Secretary of Labour, assisted by experts from the Interamerican Labour Administration Centre, has undertaken a restructuring of labour inspection machinery so as to ensure its modernisation and greater efficiency; the aim is not only to do away with the bureaucratic tendencies of former times, but to foster a more active and responsive role, consistent with the guidelines which Conventions lay down to ensure the application of labour legislation.

On the legislative level we have reintroduced Bills to improve labour legislation and bring it into line with international Conventions. We can thus refer to the Bill which calls for the establishment of labour courts to facilitate the settlement of labour disputes.

Before concluding I would like to emphasise my Government's commitment to the principles and standards of the ILO.

I would like to say that at present the people and the Government of the Dominican Republic are firmly committed to respecting and implementing all the standards established in the field of human rights. Therefore, it would be most fitting for this international body, which on previous occasions has denounced certain violations in my country, to acknowledge that the Dominican Republic has espoused human rights, in general, and labour rights, in particular, even when the latter have had adverse effects for native Dominican workers who, like others, suffer the unfortunate consequences of unemployment.

Mr. RAGUNATHAN (Workers' delegate, Malaysia) – It is with much pleasure that I congratulate Mr. Beyreuther, on behalf of the Malaysian Workers' delegation, on his election to the presidency and wish him every success in your task. I also extend my congratulations to the three Vice-Presidents who have been elected to assist.

I would also like to take this opportunity to convey to the Director-General of the International Labour Office, Mr. Francis Blanchard, the Malaysian Workers' delegation's deep appreciation of his Report. The Director-General's choice of the theme for this year, Human rights – A common responsibility, is most apt. Nearly 40 years have passed since the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, yet in many parts of the world governments have not translated the principle they accepted into a global reality. The twentieth century has been a century which has witnessed the grossest violations of human rights. The struggle against human rights violations cannot be left to governments. It should be undertaken by ordinary men and women through effective action. No institution is more suited to discuss this vital aspect of man's freedom than the ILO.

The ILO's commitment to tripartism and tripartite consultation would be of great assistance in helping the international community to realise that recognition of the inherent dignity and the equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human family is the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world. The promotion of universal respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms must be a primary role of the ILO. As the Director-General so aptly put it, all ILO activities are related to human rights and the ILO has a special responsibility. It is ironic that the greatest violation of human rights is to be found in the Third World where man's material welfare and well-being are least developed. There appears to be a correlation between economic standards and the nature of human rights. Civil and political rights and economic, social and cultural rights appear to be directly related to economic levels.

As stated by the Director-General in his Report, "although civil and political rights are entirely a national responsibility, no attempt to ensure respect for these rights can be fully successful unless it is backed by development."

So long as the Third World countries continue to be plagued by poverty and lack of capacity for economic development, the question posed by the Director-General in his Report, "Have we the will-power to overcome the crisis together or are we going merely to continue coping with it as best as we can; are we going to resign ourselves to it?", will remain a question continuously asked without a will to overcome the crisis together.

It cannot be denied that what is happening in the Third World nations is the making of the developed nations. As the indebtedness, unemployment and poverty spread and the gap between the rich and poor, both amongst individuals as well as nations, becomes wider, the regard for human beings, ethical notions and ideals and human dignity lose their values.

As the Director-General pointed out way back in 1968, the human rights debate must be placed in the context of the harsh realities of daily lives which for many were the realities of underdevelopment and undernourishment. Those who proclaim the aim of the universal enjoyment of human rights need to prove their sincerity by greater efforts and greater sacrifices to reduce the gap between the rich and the poor, between the developed and developing nations of the world. Here the developed nations have a special role to play.

Two decades ago the Director-General warned against the danger that preoccupation with economic development might make us forget that all human endeavour must be aimed at ensuring the freedom and dignity of man.

In the Third World, in an attempt to squeeze economic progress achieved over two centuries by the developed nations into two decades, the slogan to achieve that progress is that "freedom and dignity of man must be sacrificed in the interest of the nation". The developed nations, on the other hand, in their attempt to exploit cheap labour and low-priced primary commodities, impose conditions that leave the Third World nations with no choice but to use the basic rights and freedoms of the workers as pawns. The denial of this freedom is hawked by the Third World nations in their competition for the capital and technological resources of the developed nations.

While moving resolutions, declarations and Conventions in this august body, the governments and employers back home continuously disregard the rights, standards and principles set by them.

In the environment of today, where the world economy is going through serious tests, improvements can be achieved only through the joint efforts of the three parties involved in development. Trade union rights are an integral part of the improvements that are being sought. The rights of workers are a part of respect for civil liberties. The development of strong and independent workers' organisations is an essential element of progress and social advancement. Unless governments and employers are prepared to accept these truths, the possibilities of achieving the goals set will remain remote.

With the gravity of the world economic situation as it is today, there appears to be a concerted move by nations, both in the developed as well as in the developing nations, to restrict human rights, standards and principles, in particular to restrict the rights of workers.

A solution to the instability and tensions resulting from such an economic situation seems to be found not only in the restriction of the rights of workers but also, in an alarming way, in the privatisation of public enterprises. In this endeavour, governments completely disregard the fact that trade unions have a primary role to perform in promoting social and economic development and the advancement of the community as a whole.

The trends towards the privatisation of public enterprises are bound to contribute to unemployment and underemployment in an ever-increasing way, in particular in the developing countries where capital structures are still weak and unstable.

In the anxiety to get over inflation and economic ills, privatisation seems to be the solution found by governments. Full employment does not seem to be of any concern. Austerity programmes are enforced even if they result in unemployment. A kind of policy is adopted to create unemployment as a means for underemployment. It is a way of creating a competitive labour market for underemployment. These then become havens for the commercial giants to move in, to maximise their profits and have a field day, to exploit the vulnerable economies of the developing nations.

Perhaps at this moment I may pause and draw your attention to an exercise of looking at ourselves and the institutions of the United Nations agencies and their work, in all fields of endeavour, in particular the economic and social fields. For nearly half a century, tremendous work has been put in. Valuable literature has been produced. Resolutions, declarations and conventions have been passed on human rights, the economy and social development.

A widening gap is clearly appearing between the impressive standards set and the achievement of those standards. Are we plagued by a syndrome of honesty, sincerity and integrity? Do those who represent national governments in drawing up standards and in participating in the adoption of resolutions, declarations and conventions act without mandates? Is the gap really a credibility gap? The time has come to address ourselves to these questions. It is not good enough to be just satisfied that the standards formulated by the ILO have values in that their striking impact in attitudes, policies, laws and conduct are in themselves achievements.

At no time have the values of global institutions like the ILO been put to the test as they are now. As the Director-General puts it, "under the impact of an adverse economic environment, ILO standard setting is under strain". Is this the result of an adverse economic environment or is there a growing tendency for national governments, in particular those among the developing nations, to view the endeavours of the ILO to secure, in particular, respect for human rights, as the means formulated by the developed nations to weaken the economies of the developing nations? In such an environment, will the ILO succeed in making the nations where two-thirds of mankind live ratify the standards, and in ensuring compliance with ratified standards? There is an urgent need to address ourselves to these fundamental questions and find answers to them.

It is at a session like this that real meaning could be given to the Declaration of Philadelphia. The Universal Declaration of Human Rights, as the Director-General points out, could be realised in real terms only through ILO objectives. Much work had been done in the past in this field. It will, however, remain only on paper unless ratifications and compliance with ratifications are enforced. The greatest of the challenges to the ILO lie here. The credibility of the ILO's standard-setting activities will have to be seriously reviewed to ensure firm and effective systems of supervision.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. EL-HADJ SASSI (representative of the Arab Federation of Petroleum, Mines and Chemical Workers) – In the name of God the All Merciful, I have the pleasure of addressing you for the third time, as representative of the Arab Federation of Petroleum, Mines and Chemical Workers in order to convey to you the greetings of the Secretary-General of the Federation and the members of the Governing Council. I wish you every success in your deliberations.

I take advantage of this opportunity to convey to the President our greetings and respects and to wish him success. I congratulate him on the great trust that has been placed on him by the international community that has elected him to this position. It is clear evidence of his scientific capabilities, his moral integrity and his qualities of leadership. It is also a great tribute paid to his country.

At preceding sessions we have spoken about our Federation, its objectives and the activities that it carries out in the fields of trade unionism, training and science. We have referred to its national, regional and international relations; its actions in defence of the rights of Arab workers, to protect their rights, and to ensure their training and education. We have also spoken of the information made available on current problems, and particularly the Palestinian problem which is at the very heart of the concerns of the Arab world, of its activities to promote Arab unity and of other activities that I need not go into again here.

I would like to say something briefly about the reports of the Director-General, and particularly the report on human rights in Palestine and South Africa, as our Federation is interested in these problems which bear, as a whole, the rights of workers in the Third World and the Arab world.

On this occasion I would like to refer to the Report of the Director-General entitled Human rights – A common responsibility. We are very satisfied with the valuable information contained in it, especially as we see that the ILO has paid particular importance to human rights in the achievement of its objectives, since the concept of human rights pervades the Organisation's basic objectives and principles as well as the ILO Conventions, in particular the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, the Forced Labour Convention, the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, the Equal Remuneration Convention, the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, the Employment Policy Convention and in other international Conventions which cover human rights in general, and the rights of the workers in particular, given the close links existing between these rights.

We appreciate the efforts made by the ILO in the field of human rights, which have finally resulted in a series of safeguarding measures that have contributed in a tangible fashion to the improvement of conditions of work and life and to respect for human rights. All these efforts echo the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. This is the common ideal of all peoples and all nations since it crystallises the moral principle of respect for human dignity. The Declaration aims at ensuring the moral and physical security of every individual on the basis of a body of legal standards.

In this connection we would like to say something about the practices and legal standards relating to human rights, whether they are negative or positive.

From the positive standpoint, we would like to mention the recent measures adopted by the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya in the field of human rights. This country has released all political prisoners and annulled all judgements against them. This general amnesty was extended to all prisoners condemned to prison, whatever the type, or to death. These measures had considerable impact both outside and inside the country. This State showed tolerance and extended its pardon to prisoners of conscience – an example which every country should follow. In addition to all this, authorisation was granted to all those who had been previously prevented from leaving the country to leave if they wished and to return to the country without any restrictions. Lists of persons under the ban were torn up – and passports that had been confiscated were returned to their holders. All citizens were allowed to leave and re-enter the country freely. These measures are in conformity with the provisions of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Furthermore, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, in surpassing all these humanitarian measures, issued the national Declaration of Human Rights which, amongst other things, re-establishes freedom of movement and introduces the right to work, to property and education. It abolishes all special courts and makes all citizens equal under the laws promulgated by the People's Courts; it invites all those who left the country to return, without any restrictions and limitations, and annuls any ruling made against them. Now, this Declaration also looks into the final abolition of the death penalty. These positive measures can be considered as a victory for freedom everywhere in the world, and the final elimination of dictatorship, arbitrariness and exploitation.

From a negative point of view, we should like to note what was said in the Report of the Director-General with regard to the population of the occupied Arab territories in Palestine and of the situation in South Africa. In the Director-General's Report relating to human rights, we have noted that he does not expressly mention the repressive measures applied by the Zionist occupation against the populations of the occupied Arab territories but the basic and general principles contained in it, and which the Report calls on to be followed and applied, are really an explicit condemnation of these arbitrary Zionist measures. The declaration contained in the Report presented by the Director-General to the 70th Session of the International Labour Conference expressly says that the situation is very bad in the occupied Arab territories. He described the situation as being identical with that in France during the Nazi occupation. The condition of Arab workers in the Gaza Strip is sheer hell. This is absolutely clear and constitutes a denunciation of the arbitrary measures taken by the Zionist authorities in the occupied Arab territories.

Through the various international mass media, even those which are favourably disposed to the Zionist authorities, the world has witnessed the injustice, iniquity and repression to which the Arabs in the occupied territories are subjected. Old men, women and children are murdered and torture is carried out with means which were not even used by fascism and Nazism. You cannot have forgotten the pictures of Israeli soldiers breaking the limbs of two young Arabs and burying alive four other Palestinians, the use of toxic gases which resulted in the killing of small children and abortion for 40 pregnant women, the expulsion and deportation of Palestinian citizens, the destruction of houses, aggression against the Arab press in the occupied Arab territories, the ban on correspondents and press photographers entering the confrontation zones, and, what is more, the desecration of holy places, the theft of cultural property, the destruction of historic monuments, and the oppression, discrimination and exploitation of which the Arab workers are victims. All this appears in the Report of the Director-General.

In the face of all these arbitrary measures applied by the Zionist authorities towards the Arab workers and population of the occupied territories, and in the face of the determination of the Palestinian people which is unceasingly demanding its legitimate rights to the creation of a state on its land, and its right to self-determination, the Arab federation denounces all these arbitrary and inhuman measures which violate human rights; it insists that an end be put to all these practices so that the Palestinian people may enjoy their fundamental rights and freely establish their own State.

We have read carefully the Special Report of the Director-General on the application of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa. We support this report and we call upon the international community to take even more forceful economic, political and military action to put an end to this abominable racist regime, and to eliminate once and for all this regime which applies racist practices which are contrary to international principles and standards of morality. This regime might have been more easily eliminated had the international community firmly decided to fight it, and had the great powers ceased to provide it with military, economic and political support. It is precisely this support that enables the regime to occupy Namibia and continue its aggression against Angola and the front-line States' liberation movements.

The war between Iraq and Iran is entering its eighth year of horror and tragedy. It has become an obsession for us. It is an unjustified war, wreaking destruction, death and devastation.

During preceding sessions, we called upon the warring parties to reason and stop this human and economic haemorrhage, turning from bloodshed to constructive production.

At the previous session, we foresaw the external consequences that might arise from the war's continuation. We warned against military and political dangers. Now we see that our fears were warranted. Western fleets are now sailing in the Gulf, imposing their force and engaging in conflicts with both of the warring parties. The war threatens to encompass other Arab States in the Gulf, and certain Arab countries have broken off diplomatic relations with Iran. We sincerely hope that the war will soon be ended in order to avoid serious regional and international consequences.

We support all the measures taken by the ILO in the field of freedom of association and to promote employment and social security. We approve the proposals made for the partial revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107). We ask that further action be taken and Conventions adopted to preserve the rights of the workers and to free them from humiliation, exploitation and servitude. We call for the application of new international standards regulating participation in production and in benefits and the suppression of posts – with all the ensuing negative repercussions this implies – so that the workers will no longer be subjected to the exploitation of the employer. In this way, the Libyan dictum that producers should be “partners and not wage-earners”, will see light of day. We also demand that trade union freedoms be applied without restriction and that all imprisoned trade unionists be released in accordance with international conventions.

The PRESIDENT (Mr. SMITH) – I give the floor to Mr. Peterson, Government adviser, United States, to exercise his right of reply to the statement made earlier by Mr. Martans, Minister of Labour and Social Welfare of Panama. I would like to remind the Conference that the reply should refer only to the point under debate; it should be brief, not exceeding three minutes, and should not give rise to any further remarks. Lastly, it should be couched in correct and parliamentary language.

Mr. PETERSON (Government adviser, United States) – I have raised a point of order and now appreciate this opportunity to exercise a right of reply to the Panamanian representative's statements earlier this afternoon. First, let us be absolutely clear that the sanctions referred to by the Panamanian representative were requested by the legitimate Government of Panama. The aim of United States policy is to support the Panamanian people in their effort to control their economic and political institutions and re-establish a civilian constitutional Government. We recognise that economic...

The PRESIDENT (Mr. SMITH) – I give the floor to Mr. Martans, on a point of order.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. MARTANS (Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, Panama) – I just wanted to point out that the delegate of the United States is straying from the subject. He is referring to a legitimately constituted Government. Our Government is legitimately constituted and that is why we are here.

The PRESIDENT (Mr. SMITH) – I invite Mr. Peterson to resume, taking due cognizance of what has been said.

Mr. PETERSON – We recognise that the regime of Mr. Noreiga, together with the legal actions taken by the representatives of President del Vallo to freeze official Panamanian assets in United States banks, has had an adverse effect on the Panamanian economy. However, we should note that the blame for this damage lies with Mr. Noreiga. He has put his personal welfare above that of the Panamanian people. We cannot tolerate the drug trafficking that is so adversely affecting United States citizens...

The PRESIDENT (Mr. SMITH) – I give the floor to Mr. Martans on another point of order.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. MARTANS – The delegate of the United States is referring to something which is completely extraneous to the subject we are discussing here. I therefore urge that we stick to the subject at hand.

Mr. PETERSON – Mr. Noreiga has been charged with federal narcotics violations; he has exploited his official position of public trust and received pay-offs in return for assisting and protecting international drug traffickers, for protected cocaine shipments flown to the United States. We do not want to continue the application of sanctions longer than necessary...

The PRESIDENT (Mr. SMITH) – I give the floor again to Mr. Martans on a point of order.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. MARTANS – We demand that we apply the Standing Orders of the Conference. In my statement I never mentioned any political aspects; carefully I explained that the political motives behind our problem and the economic aggression had nothing to do with this Conference. The delegate, however, is speaking specifically about this. Mr. President, I request that you have him abide by the Standing Orders.

Mr. PETERSON – We believe it would be a tragic error if a premature lifting of the sanctions permitted the Noreiga regime to cling to power in Panama and frustrate the desire of the Panamanian people to determine their own economic and political destiny. We have stated that we are prepared to assist Panama in a programme of economic recovery once the true Government is restored in that country...

The PRESIDENT (Mr. SMITH) – Do you wish to make a point of order, Mr. Martans?

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. MARTANS – Yes, Mr. President. Since there appears to be a misunderstanding, I would like the Legal Adviser to clarify the Standing Orders of the Conference.

The PRESIDENT (Mr. SMITH) – The matter will be referred to the Legal Adviser. However, I will read to you the relevant provisions of the Standing Orders: "A delegate may at any time rise to a point of order, which shall be decided forthwith by the President". That is taken from article 14, paragraph 5. You may wish to put in writing the points you would wish me to raise with the Legal Adviser.

(The Conference adjourned at 6.15 p.m.)

Provisional Record

Seventy-fifth Session, Geneva, 1988

Ninth (special) sitting

Tuesday, 7 June 1988, 10 a.m.

President: Mr. Beyreuther

ADDRESS BY HIS EXCELLENCY MR. FELIPE GONZALEZ, PRESIDENT OF THE GOVERNMENT OF SPAIN

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – It is my pleasure to open this special sitting of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference and to welcome Mr. Felipe González, President of the Government of Spain.

I invite Mr. Blanchard, Secretary-General of the Conference, to introduce Mr. González to the Conference.

Interpretation from French: The SECRETARY-GENERAL – Mr. President, it is a great honour for me to present today to the International Labour Conference His Excellency Mr. Felipe González, President of the Government of Spain.

The presence of President Felipe González in this assembly, often referred to as the World Labour Parliament, is of great significance, particularly this year which commemorates the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

It is true, Mr. President, that defence of human rights and freedom of association have profoundly marked your life.

During your youth in Seville, your home town, you shared, as a young university student, the life of workers and underprivileged people living in Andalusia. Much affected by their fate, you undertook to serve them as a lawyer. With your knowledge of law acquired at the university of this same town, you committed yourself fully, together with your friends, to fight for the defence of workers' rights and for freedom and democracy in your country.

The outcome of all this was that you were elected by a majority of voters in Madrid to the Cortes in 1977, where you have remained ever since. Only a few weeks ago, I was privileged to visit this assembly of the Spanish people; the Cortes, once again, to speak about the work of the ILO.

Under your firm guidance, the Spanish Workers' Socialist Party won the legislative elections twice, in 1982 and 1986, and you were invested with the high mission of presiding over the Spanish Government.

But the range of your activities very quickly extended beyond the frontiers of Spain.

You gave your personal stamp to that historic occasion, when Spain joined the European Community.

What is more – because I have heard you are a tireless traveller – you have travelled around the world as an emissary of democracy and peace. We know how much the support you have given during your travels in Latin America to democratic movements has lent their arguments weight and helped them make their voices heard, thus leading this continent once more towards the path of democracy. You have given them hope and courage gained through your experience in your long struggle, over many years and often in secret, to restore liberty and democracy to your own country.

Let us not forget, Mr. President, what an important moment it was for the International Labour Organisation – and so long awaited – when your country, Spain, ratified Conventions Nos. 87 and 98.

You have before you the International Labour Conference which has followed with passion and hope Spain's political, economic and social developments. It sees you as a man of openness and dialogue, characteristics that inspire and mark any action on the part of the ILO. I know that the governments, employers and workers of the almost 150 countries present here today are anxiously awaiting your words.

I would therefore like to conclude by asking the President of the Conference to invite His Excellency Mr. Felipe González to take the floor.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – I would now like to invite our distinguished guest, the President of the Government of Spain, Mr. Felipe González, to address our Conference.

Interpretation from Spanish: His Excellency Mr. FELIPE GONZALEZ (President of the Government of Spain) – First of all, I should like to express my thanks to the Director-General, Mr. Blanchard, for having extended to me this invitation to attend this assembly today and to share with you some thoughts on the current international situation and its impact on the work and future of this Organisation.

Might I also, Mr. President, express to you my satisfaction in seeing you in front of this important annual meeting and express my confidence that you will lead this Conference to a successful close.

Thank you, Mr. Blanchard, for your kind words of introduction and for having recalled a past that is closely linked to the work of the International Labour Organisation.

The International Labour Organisation shares in full the ideals, goals and principles of the United Nations, but one could also say, bearing in mind the many years of existence and experience of the Organisation, that this is one of the organisations of the United Nations system which has best been able to combine idealism and pragmatism in addition to having served as an excellent forum for dialogue and negotiation.

The evolution of Spanish society has been closely linked with the International Labour Organisation. Spain, a founding Member, undertook at an early stage and particularly in the 1930s a broad programme of social reform specifically based on the international labour Conventions that it was ratifying.

Spain was absent from the Organisation as a result of the regime set up by the Civil War, but returned to the Organisation in 1956. From that time on the Spanish Government of the time was faced with an ongoing conflict between the principles of trade union freedom defended by the ILO and the labour structures that existed at that time in the country.

Indeed, my first steps – as Mr. Blanchard recalled – in the professional and political field were taken as a labour lawyer who, together with many other Spanish democrats, sought to apply the principles of this Organisation to the working world in Spain in dealing with the paternalistic and restrictive concepts imposed by the dictatorship.

Today Spain has fully recovered its democracy, and progress and social well-being are goals to be achieved in freedom. It owes a special debt of gratitude to this Organisation for the firm vigilance shown in difficult times when we had not yet recovered our public freedoms.

This debt and our recognition were particularly highlighted by the visit of the King of Spain and his speech in this forum in 1979, a date which marked the beginning of a new and fruitful stage in the history of relations between Spain and the ILO.

The principles and ideals of this Organisation have inspired the labour philosophy of our Constitution, by virtue of which international labour Conventions – once ratified – become part of internal law and are directly applicable by the courts of justice. When one considers that Spain has ratified 115 of these international instruments, one can understand the degree of social commitment of my country to the ILO and how much it values the international labour standards.

This year we are celebrating the 40th anniversary of the proclamation by the United Nations of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. I think it is timely to highlight the anticipatory recognition of these rights to be found in the basic texts of the ILO in the Preamble to its Constitution in 1919, and subsequently recalled in the Declaration of Philadelphia of 1944.

It has often been stressed – and this is something that is fully endorsed by the United Nations although it is not always recognised and applied in practice – that human rights as a whole are indivisible and interdependent.

Indeed, it is not acceptable to proclaim the theoretical predominance of social and economic rights using as an excuse the fact that formal freedoms do not guarantee the satisfaction of the primary needs of the individual and the community.

Today we cannot be satisfied with the effective implementation of the entire range of civil and political rights, trusting that market forces and the various interests involved will solve the economic, social and cultural needs of society as a whole.

Within the framework of this Organisation, at the threshold of the twenty-first century, it is more necessary than ever that public authorities should duly guarantee the collective rights of a social nature which are above all the rights of each individual.

As the Director-General very well puts it in his Report to this Conference: "The denial of civil and political rights tends to have adverse effects also on the enjoyment of economic and social rights: neglect of social protection and well-being goes hand in hand with the inability of poorer and more vulnerable population groups (or the people as a whole) to have a voice in influencing decisions."

Spain knows very well that the fight for social conquest, which will have an impact on the well-being of the majority, for real trade union freedom and true representativeness almost always goes hand in hand with the fight for civil and political freedom. This rule is applicable in any latitude and whatever the ideological content of the political system which, in practice, stifles any type of freedom.

Therefore, the right of expression, trade union freedom and social justice are part of a single whole – the irrefutable dignity of men and women as citizens and as workers.

At the same time, it is the clear duty of politicians and the collective organs of this Organisation to move from the stated to the real, especially in such times of crisis as we are now experiencing.

We must, above all, be imaginative and practical and we must find ways to ensure that the progressive adoption of new technologies will lead to a higher level of social well-being for all. Technological progress morally cannot and must not be accompanied by higher unemployment and therefore frustration for the entire population.

It is therefore our duty to give impetus, in consultation and dialogue, to the search for solutions to the problems that worry us most and that have greatest impact on the most underprivileged sectors: on workers with little vocational training who have little resistance against the movement towards technical innovation; on young people whose frustration understandably grows when they cannot find a worthwhile job after great intellectual and material investment; on women who quite rightly demand that the vestiges of inequality be eliminated; and on migrants who are always welcome in times of prosperity but are rejected and banned in times of crisis.

Anyone who claims that this Organisation is not entitled to deal with political problems is wrong. All of the organisations of the United Nations system are by their very nature political, even if some of them deal with specific technical problems. It is also clear that the violation of human rights is the very focus of the concern of this Organisation.

One of the systematic violations of this right is the perpetuation of the apartheid system, and it is logical that the ILO should have been paying due attention to this important matter. Evidence of this is the recent convening in Harare of a specific conference on this topic. All the voices of the various multilateral forums are not enough to denounce this intolerable denial of human dignity by the South African regime.

It is also logical that we have become increasingly concerned in the past few months at the violation of human rights in the Arab territories occupied by Israel. The Spanish Government supports the search for a comprehensive, just and lasting solution to the Middle Eastern conflict and supports any decisions adopted by the International Labour Organisation within the framework of its jurisdiction.

On the other hand, in Central America, almost a year ago, a path towards hope and realism opened up. Whilst expressing our satisfaction at this initial progress, I must reiterate that any external interference in this process will be counter-productive, and I would also recall that at the root of the ills of the region is the continued existence of an unjust economic and social situation, which will have to be dealt with by international co-operation.

With respect to international social and economic matters, we must note the success obtained in the recent High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment which was convened by this Organisation. Its conclusions, adopted unanimously, demonstrated the serious social impact of economic adjustment in industrialised countries, thus highlighting the problems of international commodity prices and the burden of the foreign debt.

It is also timely to determine the best use in the future of the ILO's two major means of action: international labour standards and technical co-operation.

No one has questioned the inestimable work of the international labour instruments in creating a common international social law, but there have been various opinions on the rate of standard-setting, the way the standards are applied and the control systems.

Many international Conventions have become outdated and it seems vital to create a new set of standards by revising those already in existence. This is a prime task of the Governing Body which must cautiously but audaciously undertake this task when the agenda of future International Labour Conferences is decided.

We must also recognise the very important role of the bodies which monitor the implementation of such international instruments. To my mind, the supervision system does work satisfactorily and does not constitute any interference whatsoever in the internal affairs of States Members. The fact of ratifying an international Convention is a demonstration of the sovereignty of the State which, when accepting obligations under international law, must be consistent in its legal commitment to meet those obligations satisfactorily.

Another major question is minimum labour standards, that is those which, to grant workers a basic level of protection, must be accepted and observed at world level. Some have felt that this might constitute a hidden form of protectionism, but in any case the increasing trend towards international competitiveness should not be at the cost of exploiting the workers. International economic relations cannot be based on what has come to be known as "social dumping".

Together with its standard-setting activities, the ILO has developed a second means of action to achieve its objectives: technical co-operation. Technical co-operation should not be considered as a form of benevolent assistance or condescending instruction but rather as the vital contribution of industrialised countries to the achievement of one of the basic rights of nations: the right to development. Might I reiterate here the Spanish commitment to this form of co-operation, whether bilateral or multilateral.

The recent economic and financial crises have had repercussions on programmes and the labour market, aggravating such critical problems as unemployment, further eroding the strength of workers in industrial relations, and fueling the spread of clandestine employment.

Moreover, the terminology of social relations has become populated by terms covering polyvalent realities. Labour flexibility is one such term, if not the most important. To some social economists, this flexibility is limited to the job market, the deregulation of industrial relations and the reduction of legal guarantees as regards job security.

For others – and this is the case in Spain – flexibility is a vast concept which applies to modalities of employment contracts, forms of remuneration, distribution of working time, duration of working life and the structures of vocational training, which are closely linked to the requirements of the labour market. Flexibility, therefore, is not a code word for total economic licence, but describes a reasonable adaptation to a broader and more dynamic understanding of economic conditions.

In the fight against unemployment, which is our top priority, we seek imaginative and varied solutions that can strike a proper balance between the promotion of self-employment, the regulation of part-time work, the protection of homeworkers and, invariably, the adaptation of the educational system to job opportunities.

The diversification of production processes encourages the development of new models of collective bargaining which are more sectoral and more decentralised. The greater complexity of major collective agreements makes it more difficult to reach mutually acceptable results. The transformation which is taking place in workers' and employers' organisations is closely related to this phenomenon and requires a new methodology in the practice of internal and external relations.

Growing difficulties have been encountered in social dialogue and concertation as the economic crisis gradually fades. We are convinced, however, that these difficulties can be solved through dialogue, and that is where we are investing our efforts.

Recent years in Spain have been marked by two milestones: first, the passage from an authoritarian political system to a system of freedom, and second, the overcoming of the economic crisis.

Looking back, one cannot fail to appreciate all work that has been carried out in these years of transition to improve the conditions of life and the protection of workers, and to promote the participation of trade unions in the life of the nation.

Nor can one fail to notice legislative efforts to set up a democratic framework for industrial relations. New legislation has been drafted in consultation with employers and workers; to a great extent, it has satisfied their needs and aspirations. In many cases, the essence of reforms had been agreed previously through social pacts. This process of democratic consolidation and our success in overcoming the economic crisis would not have been possible without responsible attitudes displayed by the social partners.

The current Government has worked hard to reverse the trend of falling levels of employment, which was so prominent in Spain in the period 1975-85, by attempting to bolster the competitiveness of Spanish enterprises, and consequently their capacity to create new employment.

Without wishing to go into too many details, the introduction of the 40-hour week, 50 years after Francisco Largo Caballero introduced the 48-hour week in Spain, the broadening of unemployment protection, the rationalisation and extension of the social security system, the full introduction of trade union rights for workers and civil servants, the settlement of disputes concerning the award and use of the assets of trade unions of the past, in accordance with ILO guide-lines, and our efforts, which we recognise as still insufficient, to bring young people and women into the productive process, the establishment of consultative councils and the General Vocational Training Council, confirm the Spanish Government's commitment in the social field, and its admission that more still remains to be done.

Then is no question of Spain's strong economic growth, which was twice the European average last year; or of its success in controlling inflation, modernising the productive apparatus, improving the purchasing power of wages and pensions and increasing the ranks of the employed. We have reason to look with confidence to the challenge of the expansion of the European Community market in 1992, and the chance to continue to improve the outlook for job creation in our country.

For 1992 we want a Europe for everyone. We are looking forward to social conditions in Europe which will guarantee cohesion, so that we may eliminate the differences between areas with different levels of development through greater inter-regional solidarity.

We are aware that any effort in the social field can be perfected. Ours is an ongoing struggle. Our priority is still the creation of jobs; thanks to economic growth, we hope that this policy will enable us to offer more and better jobs while improving the well-being of our citizens and promoting social equality. We are going to develop new occupational health legislation which will enable us to take up the challenge of constantly changing production processes, new technologies and new environmental agents.

We are also about to create a new forum – the Economic and Social Council – in which workers and employers will be able to participate in formulating the major aspects of Spain's economic and social agenda.

In conclusion, I would like my last words to be words of encouragement and support for the tasks and future of this Organisation. Everyone knows that a recurring topic in these past few years has been the so-called crisis of the United Nations and its specialised agencies.

A financial crisis, granted. But let us be frank: a crisis of credibility. Certainly, there is a lot to be changed, and perhaps cost-cutting measures are possible. This process of reform has already been undertaken and is now starting to bear fruit. But let no one delude himself and try to draw political gain, for everyone would lose in the end.

The international organisations can be perfected; they are capable of taking decisions which we do not like and, indeed, sometimes they take the wrong decision. In the final analysis, they are not supranational organisations, and the member States are not infallible either.

Let us apply to this democracy of nations the same standards we apply to our own democratic political systems. Let us accept the opinions of the majority with due respect for the minority. Obviously, this should not be a pretext for demagoguery, together we are capable, with humility and without any prior bias, of ensuring that the multilateral machinery works better and achieves that which the men and women of our planet are expecting. Spain will not relent or falter in this task.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – On behalf of the delegates to this 75th Session of the International Labour Conference and on my own behalf, it is a great pleasure for me to express my thanks to His Excellency Felipe González, President of the Government of Spain, for the message that he has given us.

We have listened with the greatest interest to your comments on human rights and on economic and social progress, issues of grave concern to mankind. We have heard your act of faith and your recognition of the principles of international co-operation in social and economic matters as set forth in the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation and in the Declaration of Philadelphia. Your speech has shown quite clearly the extraordinary value that you attach to our Organisation and its work within the United Nations family for the welfare of mankind.

Your visit is particularly significant because it comes at the same time as the 40th anniversary of the adoption of those important international instruments, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

Your words will be an inspiration to our Organisation to continue to fight for the further recognition and implementation of human rights – civil, political, economic, social and cultural.

In listening to you, we were all aware that we were listening to a politician whose personal dedication to the cause of dialogue and co-operation in international relationships is recognised throughout the world. Your commitment to the solution of regional conflicts reflects the desire of the peoples of the world for peace. For decades peace has been symbolised by a dove, which has found masterly expression in the work of that great Spaniard of world repute, Pablo Picasso.

I believe that I speak on behalf of everyone here when, with your message still in our ears, I assure you that the hopeful signs of increasing solidarity in the international arena will encourage the Members of this Organisation to work even harder to improve the living standards of the workers.

Mr. President, your visit to this session of the International Labour Conference is an honour. We bid you farewell with the conviction that today we have heard a true statesman whose name is esteemed throughout the world. We should like to thank you with all our hearts for your contribution to our common work.

(The Conference adjourned at 10.45 a.m.)

Provisional Record

Seventy-fifth Session, Geneva, 1988

Tenth sitting

Tuesday, 7 June 1988, 11 a.m.

Presidents: Mr. Tsujino, Mr. Beyreuther

FOURTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT (Mr. TSUJINO) – The first item on this morning's agenda is the adoption of the fourth report of the Selection Committee. I call upon Mr. Vargas Escobar, Government delegate, Nicaragua, Chairman of the Selection Committee, to submit the report.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. VARGAS ESCOBAR (Government delegate, Nicaragua; Chairman of the Selection Committee) – I have the honour to submit to the Conference the fourth report of the Selection Committee which appears in Provisional Record No. 5C.

The report deals exclusively with changes in the composition of the Committees of the Conference. I recommend to the Conference that it adopt this report.

The PRESIDENT (Mr. TSUJINO) – The fourth report of the Selection Committee is now before the Conference. If there are no objections, I take it that the report is adopted.

(The report is adopted).

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

The PRESIDENT (Mr. TSUJINO) – The next item on the agenda is the discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Mr. RODGER (Minister of Labour, New Zealand) – I should like first of all to join those who have addressed this Conference before me in congratulating Mr. Beyreuther on his election as President of the Conference this year. The Conference has a full agenda and much important work to do. We wish him success in his efforts. The New Zealand delegation will provide him with its co-operation and support to that end. I also wish to express my compliments to my friend and colleague, Director-General Blanchard, who has provided us with another thoughtful and important Report this year.

New Zealand welcomes the focus on human rights at this Conference. I feel it is most significant that, at a time of world-wide economic volatility, we focus on human rights as being central to the establishment of a decent quality of life.

New Zealand has long been a party to the principal human rights agreements. We give firm support to the very comprehensive body of international law relating to human rights, to which the ILO has made a substantial and practical contribution.

Commitment to the ILO's standards, in my view, offers one of the most effective ways of ensuring that basic human rights and freedoms are preserved and protected by all nations.

We recognise that more work needs to be done in certain areas, but we are also mindful that in elaborating new standards duplication is best avoided. New Zealand therefore welcomes the revision of existing Conventions in agenda items IV, V and VI.

New Zealand, like most countries represented here, is facing economic and social challenges. My Government is determined that both be met, for we believe that with greater economic efficiency we will also be able to achieve a fairer and more just society.

In my speech last year, I discussed the reform of our industrial relations system as a means of ensuring that it keeps pace with economic reform and of enhancing the concept of freedom of association. This culminated in the implementation of the Labour Relations Act in August last year.

This Act is designed to encourage the development of effective union and employers' organisations so that they can operate independently of legislative support.

It encourages the formation of larger unions more capable of providing the services and protection workers need. It provides for registration which confers certain rights and obligations on those unions, such as the right to use the institutions administered under the Act and the right to negotiate on their members' behalf.

A key feature of the Labour Relations Act is that it allows the parties the freedom to negotiate, administer and enforce awards and agreements relevant to their workplace.

Freedom of association and the right to organise are also guaranteed.

In April this year, we passed the State Sector Act. This carried the reforms of the Labour Relations Act through into the state sector.

This means that state sector unions become registered industrial unions, with no restrictions on the activities they engage in or the matters they negotiate with their employers. Private sector provisions, which ensure the accountability of unions to their members and provide a democratic procedure for extending the coverage of registered unions, now also apply to state unions.

The most substantive variation from the Labour Relations Act is in the provision of arbitration. Where a private sector union has access to voluntary arbitration, a state union under the State Sector Act may invoke a clause effecting a trade-off between compulsory arbitration and the right to strike or lock-out.

The State Sector Act has also made changes in management structures.

Each government department now becomes an individual employer of staff, headed by a Chief Executive who is appointed on a fixed-term contract. Provisions are included to protect working conditions.

The Chief Executive is required to comply with the principle of being a good employer, according to certain specific requirements.

These include good and safe working conditions, an equal employment opportunities programme, the impartial selection of suitably qualified persons for appointments based on merit, and the recognition of the employment requirements of the indigenous Maori people, women and the disabled.

Throughout this process of industrial relations reform the Government has continued to review the activities and objectives of state organisations, many of which have had a sometimes contradictory mix of social and commercial objectives.

This has resulted in the establishment of a number of commercially oriented state-owned enterprises, in such fields as forestry, land management, coal, postal and telecommunications services, and electricity. These enterprises now have clearly defined business objectives and are expected to make a substantial return to the New Zealand taxpayer.

Reform of the public service has also included the restructuring of many departments, leading to greater accountability, efficiency and quality of service.

For example, in my own department, an internal review recommended that the Department of Labour establish five single-function service units.

These units are employment, occupational safety and health, immigration, training and industrial relations. All will have clear accountability and definition of function.

Against this background, my Government is also focusing on the issue of industrial democracy at the workplace level. Consideration is being given to the establishment of an inquiry to review all the options, and employers, unions and workers will be fully consulted before policies to promote worker participation are introduced.

Occupational safety and health is one of a number of social policy priorities in New Zealand. We are developing a new policy on this subject, with the assistance of the Tripartite Advisory Council on Occupational Safety and Health.

The Convention and Recommendations on safety and health in construction proposed for adoption at this Conference will be taken into account in this work. We do, of course, already have many occupational safety and health standards in force. We recently adopted a code of practice on visual display units; another recent code dealt with employee participation in workplace safety and health.

Protection of equal opportunity and remuneration have become important issues in this period of economic change.

A working group on equal opportunities and equal pay is considering legislative and administrative options to secure equality of employment opportunity and equal remuneration for work of equal value, following completion of an equal pay study at the beginning of this year.

To protect the low-paid, the statutory minimum wage was, in February, again increased, in line with wages generally. A unit within my department has ongoing responsibility for undertaking research on lowpay issues, and its findings are made available to employers and workers.

For those displaced by economic change, a government committee is considering redundancy, re-training and relocation issues.

Unemployment is still an issue of major concern in New Zealand.

Last year I spoke of our new training initiative called ACCESS. The purpose of ACCESS is to give unemployed people an opportunity to be trained in the skills required by their local labour markets. ACCESS aims to enhance the employment prospects of the most disadvantaged groups in the labour market. Current indications are that the programme is indeed reaching these groups and generating positive outcomes.

My Government is also engaged in a major review of the administration and funding of post-compulsory education and training.

The driving force behind these reforms and reviews is our deep and underlying commitment to human rights and freedoms.

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which we are commemorating this year, established a frame of reference that all of us here today recognise.

Our world is small and interdependent and ultimately, like any family or community, depends on caring for the individual's dignity and well-being.

It is timely that we reaffirm our commitment to human rights throughout the world.

U THANG (Government delegate, Burma) – It is my pleasure to extend to Mr. Beyreuther, on behalf of my delegation as well as my own, our congratulations on his election to the chairmanship of this session of the International Labour Conference. I am confident that under his able guidance, the discussions and deliberations of this Conference will be objective and fruitful. I hope that this Conference will indeed reflect the noble principles of the ILO. May I also congratulate the Vice-Presidents whose election amply demonstrates the high esteem in which they are held by the distinguished delegates in this hall.

I must also compliment the Director-General for the lucid Report he has submitted to the Conference, the first part of which is focused on human rights. He has correctly pointed out that this would provide an opportunity for the Conference to take stock of the measures taken by the ILO for the promotion and protection of human rights. It is quite opportune that the facts set out in the first part of the report are in harmony with the spirit of the 40th anniversary of the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights as well as the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention – one of the key Conventions of the ILO on human rights. The second part of the Report, which describes the activities of the ILO, is also satisfactory.

The ILO standards have contributed immensely to the promotion and protection of human rights. As a matter of fact, the ILO standards and human rights have become practically inseparable. The truth of this statement is adequately demonstrated by the history of the International Labour Organisation. The Conventions adopted by the ILO reflect many facets of basic human rights which we all hold dear and subscribe to as a common responsibility of mankind. The Conventions and Recommendations on conditions of work, social security, employment of young persons, migrant workers and tribal populations and so on are all designed to deal with both social and economic problems of the present-day world.

We believe in the welfare of human society. We respect the dignity of labour and, moreover, the dignity of man and his creative ability. To achieve this, we are striving to the utmost, guided by the belief that man will be emancipated from the want of basic needs only when exploitation of man by man is brought to an end. Thus, we always support the lofty ideals of the ILO. In trying to realise these ideals, we should not forget that our Organisation is composed of many countries with different political, economic and social systems. However, these differences should not be stumbling-blocks in our endeavour to achieve unity and cohesion in the work of this Organisation. Thus, one of the main criteria to be considered seriously in adopting a standard is that it should be acceptable to the majority of member countries.

If we are truly realistic and practical in adopting the international labour standards, I am confident that the allegation that some have made that the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards is taking a judicial role by investigating the activities of member countries will finally end. If we are to be successful in undertaking our most important task of setting up international labour standards to improve the working conditions of workers who have different historical and cultural backgrounds, we have no alternative but to commit ourselves to finding the right approach acceptable to all of us.

We are about to adopt two instruments, "Safety and health in construction" and "Employment promotion and social security" at this session. Our views on these two instruments were clearly expressed in the statement by the leader of the Burmese delegation to the 73rd Session in 1987. At the same time, we are about to commence discussions on partial revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Population Convention, 1957 (No. 107), and will also be having general discussions on rural employment promotion. The Declaration of Philadelphia affirms that all human beings have the right to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity. Bearing this in mind, this Organisation, at its 40th Session in 1957, adopted the Convention concerning the protection of indigenous and other tribal populations. This Convention, which came into force in 1959 and is now ratified by 27 member countries, enumerates the basic rights in the economic, social and cultural fields of the minority groups in independent countries. Three decades have passed since this Convention came into force and many distinguished delegates would certainly agree with me that it is now time to review it in order to meet the needs of the changing international situation. By examining whether the provisions contained in this Convention have been successfully implemented or not, we should be able to formulate appropriate amendments. In order to ameliorate the conditions of mankind, suffering from inequalities in the economic and social sectors, serious consideration should be given to the objective developments in the respective countries.

The common characteristic in the economies of developing countries is the presence of excess labour in rural areas. The acute urban unemployment problems in these countries are making it impossible for them to pay due attention to the rural areas. It is high time for us to have a general discussion on promotion of the employment of the rural labour force for the social and economic development of Third World countries. Unless we come up with an appropriate approach, we shall not find any satisfactory solution to this problem. Our objectives are to improve the living and working conditions of the rural labour force, to raise their cultural and material standards, to eliminate poverty and to ensure stable employment under tolerable conditions.

Both the international financial and trade situations in the world seem to be unfavourable to the majority of the Third World countries. Although various regional groups have been formed and attempts are being made to correct the state of affairs through dialogues and co-operation, to be candid, the results thus obtained are quite far from satisfactory. Third World countries suffer more and more from trade imbalances, instability in the international monetary markets and protectionism practised by the industrialised countries. The above factors are no doubt the root causes of disparity between the developed countries on the one hand and developing and less developed countries on the other. The international market prices of the raw materials and goods produced by the Third World countries are deliberately kept down while the industrialised countries raise the price of their manufactured goods, shielding behind protectionism.

Because of these trade and financial imbalances, the poor countries become poorer while the rich get richer. Against this backdrop of the ever-widening gap, the big powers are engaged in military build-ups and armament races, thereby wrongly channelling the resources and wealth of the world which is the common heritage of mankind. If such military expenditures were redirected for the development of mankind, most of the social and economic problems of the Third World countries would be solved, leading to peace and stability throughout the whole world. Only by concerted efforts on the part of all nations based on mutual understanding, co-operation and respect for each other, can we overcome the economic and social difficulties of the entire world.

In conclusion, allow me to reiterate our conviction that, under the wise and able guidance of the President and through the sincere efforts of all of us gathered here, this session will bring us nearer to our objectives of universal and lasting peace and well-being for all mankind.

Interpretation from French: Mr. RUPHIN (Minister for the Civil Service, Labour and Social Legislation, Madagascar) – On behalf of the delegation of the Democratic Republic of Madagascar that I have the honour of leading at this 75th Session of the International Labour Organisation's Conference, I should like to address my warm congratulations to Mr. Beyreuther, Secretary of State for Labour and Wages of the Democratic Republic of Germany, on his election to the presidency of this Conference. I should also like to congratulate the other Officers on their election. We wish them every success in their high duties and hope that under their guidance and thanks to their experience, this session will produce positive and beneficial results for all member countries.

We should also like to thank Mr. Blanchard, the Director-General of our Organisation, for his excellent Report that we are going to discuss during this Conference.

His clear and precise analysis, his objective views on our world and the information contained in these documents merit our particular attention. As he has pointed out in his Report, we are commemorating two anniversaries this year: the 40th anniversary of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the 30th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights adopted by the General Assembly of the United Nations.

What harbingers of hope these anniversaries are in a world in crisis in this year of 1988. They provide us with an opportunity to view our Organisation in its true light and to determine its role in the future.

The agenda before us shows the continuing concern of the International Labour Organisation to devote itself to improving workers' standards of living. I shall refer only to two items, but these, in themselves, sum up the relentless will of our Organisation to embrace all aspects of the world of labour: employment promotion and social security; rural employment promotion.

But I could not overlook what we consider capital in the Director-General's Report, Human rights - A common responsibility.

Everything hinges on their significance and scope.

In fact, the concept of human rights dates back to 1789. Since then, other texts and conventions have followed the same line of thought: the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights of 1961, which came into force in 1976; the Universal Declaration of the Rights of Peoples, drawn up in Algiers in 1976; the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights, Nairobi 1981.

In addition, the Declaration on Social Welfare, Progress and Development adopted by the United Nations General Assembly in November 1969 advocates a change in international economic relations. As for the International Labour Organisation, it has not failed to define rights and to recognise them and facilitate their application.

With the emergence of new independent States in the 1960s and the advent of structural economic crises, new attempts to explain human rights have been made. For instance, the interdependence between human rights and the rights of peoples presupposes self-determination and sovereignty. No economic progress can be achieved without self-determination and national sovereignty, whatever the country or its riches.

The ethnocentric approach to human rights and those of peoples which advocate national, almost stereotyped behavioural patterns imposed legally by a civilisation supposed to bring progress and light, must be banned. However, this does not mean that we can justify barbaric acts which infringe the rights of man when critically examining human rights. Developing countries continue to show solidarity and co-operation in interdependence. In this context, human rights will no longer be merely a formal matter but will enable millions of humans to emerge from their poverty and fears. The developing countries have gone beyond this stage of sterile claims.

However, it is relevant to raise this problem in a forum like ours because it enables us to have a fresh view of certain concepts - or even to review those that might be out of date. A case in point is the application of the principle of human rights in the field of freedom of association during this year so rich in anniversaries. It is most auspicious that Conventions Nos. 87, 98, 29, 105, 100, 111 and 122 of the ILO endeavour to apply these noble ideas.

Let us not be afraid to raise these contemporary problems. The Director-General has traced the path for our discussion in his Report. Another scandalous problem which affects human rights is the debt. This is an idea that we would like to launch to this august assembly since rights are purely and simply the guarantee of human dignity. We are convinced that there is no dichotomy between the rights of rich people and the rights of the poor; this would be contrary to the elementary principles of democracy that we understand. Ever since we started denouncing the pernicious consequences of the debt, no consensus has been reached to settle this gangrene which is the debt. Amongst the stop-gap measures suggested are: case by case studies, annulment and restructuration; however, these lose their impact because they are totally ineffective.

What right do we have to speak of human or workers' right in Third World countries, when the industrialised countries pay ridiculous prices for the products of farmers who account for 85 per cent of the active population in the developing countries?

What right do we have to speak of the right to work and trade union rights when measures advocated by international financial organisations lead to the closing of factories and enterprises which employ over 30 per cent of the labour force of developing countries?

The recent ministerial meeting of the OECD countries, which is preparing for the summit of the rich in Toronto, dwelt upon the debt problem but gave us no glimpse of a future solution. Apart from some wishful thinking, we nevertheless had the satisfaction of hearing people advocating a reorganisation of the world economy which necessarily implies a restructuring of the present monetary system. World economic problems, amongst them the debt, may result from factors outside those developing countries such as enormous budgetary deficits, which exist alongside surpluses. Errors have been committed due to a lack of control over planning, which was mostly based on fluctuating export revenues. There are three approaches adopted at present by the creditor countries towards the debt. First, there are the pragmatics who have opted for immediate and radical solutions. Unfortunately the level of their financial commitments are rather low. Second, there are countries who are full of good intentions but for various reasons, their action is not very convincing. Third, there is a last group countries that put forward no idea and maintain a regrettable status quo.

During this time, the producer countries of raw materials have become irremediably submerged in the crisis. In international forums, developing countries have advanced the following propositions: first, a 20 years' moratorium; second, a partial or total remission of debts; third, the transformation of credits into capital or participation; and fourth, the limitation of the debt to a reasonable threshold of 10 to 20 per cent of export receipts.

At present, no planning is possible and unemployment is gaining disquieting proportions of the active population. Much water has passed under the bridge since the Marshall Plan came to the help of European economies ravaged by the Second World War. The countries of the Third World have neither spared their efforts nor their means to find original or national solutions. This is why Madagascar has advocated the setting up of three funds between development countries; that is a monetary fund between non-aligned countries, a development fund and a price and raw materials stabilisation fund, including petroleum.

Along the same lines, the delegation of the Democratic Republic of Madagascar wishes to broach the subject of rural employment. In collaboration with the UNDP and the ILO, a number of labour-intensive projects will be extended to other regions, following the success of pilot projects. These projects will all take place in rural areas since our aim is to tap the abundant local resources during the off-season to develop social and economic infrastructures. The project pays the workers equitable wages and improves their standard of living. This policy is consistent with our objective of achieving nutritional self-sufficiency among peasants and farm-workers. I do not wish to pre-empt the discussions of the Committee on Rural Employment, so I shall merely identify some issues that may cloud its debates. Developing countries, however well covered by the media, remain the victims of unflattering clichés: apartheid, drought, famine, war, poverty, etc. In the present circumstances, external aid is certainly indispensable; it is the basis of solidarity. But this assistance, be it humanitarian or nutritional, should focus on the core of the problem, and not be seen as charity.

Recent diplomatic events are grounds for hope in mankind's quest for a better life.

The last summit of the super-Powers opens a new chapter in history. We have passed from conflict and antagonism to a phase of dialogue and co-operation. We hope that this summit is a prelude to a true rapprochement between the rich countries and the developing countries that will enable us to tackle long-standing problems, including the settlement of debt, which will spur growth in the developed countries and make it possible for the Third World countries to get their economies off the ground. The era of peace which is heralded by the summit meeting between the United States and the USSR should spur each of us to work to stamp out the poverty and unemployment that affect billions of people.

The ILO, thanks to its universal character, can and must lead the drive to answer the legitimate aspirations of the Third World countries for the settlement of external debt, and to set up fair terms of trade between developed and developing countries, and thus lead the world towards peace.

Finally, I am sure you will agree that the apartheid regime in Pretoria, allied with Israel, is a shame for our Organisation and an insult to democracy. Its elimination and that of Zionism, which oppresses the Palestinian people in the occupied Arab territories, should be uppermost in the mind of the international community.

Before concluding, I would like to thank you for your attention and wish every success to the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference.

Long live the International Labour Organisation!
Long live international co-operation!

(Mr. Beyreuther takes the Chair.)

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. LEORO FRANCO (Government delegate, Ecuador) – Mr. President, I would like to read out the address that the Minister of Labour and Human Resources, Mr. Chang Durango, would have made to the Conference had he not been held up at the last moment and be unable to arrive until the day after tomorrow.

First of all, I should like to congratulate you on your election to the presidency of this great assembly of labour, a wise choice which holds out the hope of fruitful results as the product of fairly and democratically conducted debates. I thus associate myself with the congratulations you have received from all those who preceded me on this rostrum.

Like all the other participants who have spoken, I shall now refer to the Report presented by the Director-General. In doing so, I would stress the fact that I find it fair and reasonable that the question of human rights should have been chosen as the basic theme of this Report.

These rights relating to the equality and dignity of persons, to their security and protection, to employment and to the free choice of this are an integral part of the national laws of Ecuador.

As the Director-General has done, we would like to express our views on the philosophy and modalities of those human rights and on the various bodies of the United Nations system that deal with the subject within their respective jurisdictions. We want to see these bodies act fairly, without discrimination and with due heed for the balanced interlinkage of national laws and international conventions, which are directed towards the same goals.

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights, proclaimed by the General Assembly of the United Nations on 10 December 1948, enumerates the basic rights and affirms in article 29 that it is only within the community that the free and full development of each one's personality is possible. It is in the community, the legally organised society, that human rights, whether individual or social, can be enforced. It is the State which guarantees the prerogatives of the individual and of the citizen, so that the full realisation and enforcement of the rights, powers and liberties of persons entail, on the other hand, the respectful observance of the law, respect for the political and legal existence of the State, without ever seeking to destroy the State or to dismantle it, which would be a basic contradiction of the validity of the principles that guarantee these same human rights: tranquillity, social order, national development and the very existence of a legal order of the State, without which laws and international treaties would be meaningless.

Although the basic rights of countless members of the human family have been scorned and flouted in the past, the shocking and barbaric acts recalled in the Preamble to the Universal Declaration of 1948, and which gave rise to its proclamation – whose fortieth anniversary we are now commemorating – cannot recur nor can humanity be subjected to oppression and tyranny, since the premises of this Declaration are irremediably founded on the continued existence of the legal order of the State freely established and agreed to by the people.

It is only with this in mind that we can understand article 28 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights which states textually that: “Everyone is entitled to a social and international order in which the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration can be fully realised”. Nor must we not forget that the first article of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights fully enshrines the basic principle that “All peoples have the right of self-determination. By virtue of that right, they freely determine their political status and freely pursue their economic, social and cultural development”. It further states that: “All peoples may, for their own ends, freely dispose of their natural wealth and resources without prejudice to any obligations arising out of international economic co-operation... In no case may a people be deprived of its own means of subsistence”. It is incumbent upon us, therefore, to realise that human rights not only comprise the rights of the individual and the duties of States with respect to the individual, but also the obligations of the individual to others, to society, and to the State, which they sometimes appear anxious to see as a body without the right and the duty to protect its internal and external security, and to prevent arbitrary interference in its sovereign decisions on the organisation of its internal system or the disposal of its resources. A State could not exist in an international society in which the basic principles of the Charter of the United Nations were not fully observed by all – by States and by international organisations. These organisations do not and cannot have supranational powers.

Thus, if we truly wish to see the full realisation and enforcement of human rights and freedoms with all their powers, we must respect all rights, laws and the institutional legal order. If committees or councils, however eminent their members, consider themselves entitled to follow their whims in examining international standards interpreting national legislation and adopting resolutions intended to disrupt laws freely enacted after careful thought, in keeping with the national realities, by the constitutional bodies of those States, this would simply deprive public security of all protection and violate the provisions which make it possible to have an international legal community whose basic and immutable standards are enshrined in the principles of the Charter of the United Nations.

My country, as defined in its political Constitution, is a sovereign, independent, democratic and unified State. Its Government is republican, presidential, elective, representative, responsible and rotatory. The current Government of Ecuador, which I have the honour of representing in this hall, is the product of completely free elections in which it obtained the majority vote of Ecuadorians. The Ecuadorian people exercises its political rights without any restriction whatsoever. Each citizen is entitled to vote and exercises that right every four years in designating the President of the central Government. The National Congress is also elected every four years and the provincial deputies are elected every two years by direct universal suffrage.

Democratic rotation is a vital reality in my country where we have just had an uncorrupt, free general election in which the opposition triumphed. The present Government has thus shown that it abides fully by the laws and respects the decisions of the national political collectivity. The next administration will take power on 10 August this year. Sovereignty resides in the people. The rulers exercise their mandate for and on behalf of the citizens.

Ecuador wholeheartedly abides by the principles laid down in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and in the Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. This is a tradition; it is nothing new. The constitutional history of my country shows this. Ecuador came into being as a democratic republic and remains one. Its institutions have been perfected over time, with a view to the common good. Naturally, we condemn apartheid and we hope that this inhumane practice will shortly be done away with.

In my country there is no death penalty. The maximum penalty for the most serious crimes cannot exceed 16 years' imprisonment. There is no slavery in my country and no forced labour. We have been saying this for many years. On many occasions we have quoted the enlightened provisions of the Ecuadorian Constitution of 1845 which stipulate that “No one can be born into slavery in the Republic nor can be introduced into the Republic in such a condition without being freed”. Over the years, therefore, the last forms of unpaid agricultural work (concertaje) and casual labour have been done away with. The Penal Code severely penalises violations of these liberating provisions.

In Ecuador, everyone is entitled to a job, and this is considered as a moral obligation. Even prisoners are granted the right to a freely chosen job and a fair wage for that job. Ill treatment is prohibited. The prison system has been planned in a humanitarian manner for purposes of rehabilitation. The Constitution grants equality of civil and political rights to men and women and prohibits discrimination for reasons of race, religion, ideology or social status. Ecuadorians are entitled to move freely within the national territory, to leave it and to return, and are equal before the law.

The people of my country are protected against interference in their private and family life; they are entitled to dignity, honour and culture; they enjoy freedom of thought and expression, the right of peaceful assembly and association; freedom to rest and to have leisure time. All this is laid down in the Constitution and the laws and is enforced in practice. Trade union freedom and the right of association are guaranteed and protected. The child, the mother and the family are protected by law. The social policy of the Government has been aimed at protecting the living conditions of the people, improving working conditions and maintaining purchasing power. Under the current administration, the minimum wage has been increased four times, and since 1984 it has increased 119.7 per cent.

At the present time, a further 25 per cent increase is being considered in the National Congress.

Comparing the figures for the last Government and this one with respect to labour conflicts, we see that there were 1,746 conflicts under the former, of which 1,648 were settled while, under the current Government, there were 1,143 conflicts of which 1,065 were settled.

With respect to strikes, there were 451 under the previous Government and 289 under the present Government.

As regards vocational skills, under the previous administration 6,899 courses were organised, that trained 143,525 workers in 60 months; under the current Government, 8,281 courses have been given, training 156,498 persons in 45 months.

With respect to employment, the greatest efforts have been made to maintain and extend the sources of work despite the crisis facing the country and the world. We have promoted the development of sources known to generate jobs; we have managed to prevent the closure of companies, and have reactivated them. We have set up a microfirm programme, which is giving admirable results in providing skills and financial assistance and in promoting the informal sector, as part of an effort to transform persons who were unemployed or underemployed into independent, productive workers. We have also encouraged the handicrafts sector. The National Government has relied on the usefulness and desirability of trade unionism and the efficiency of dialogue. It has encouraged collective negotiations as an appropriate instrument for regulating labour relations and facilitating wage-fixing. It has judiciously controlled calls for general strikes, limiting government action to preventing vandalism and protecting the security of citizens. Despite such movements, which usually lacked a platform with proper labour demands, the Ecuadorian Government is gratified to state that the period between 1984 and 1988 has been one of relative and beneficial harmony in the labour field. Since August 1987, 157 new trade union and handicrafts organisations have been registered.

The Ecuadorian Government, which I have the honour of representing here, has approved the new regulation on workers' health and safety and the improvement of the working environment, which safeguards the important values of the health and very life of the worker, and can also pride itself on the great conquest of extending social security to the rural sector.

Thus, my Government has made a living reality of the principles which the Director-General rightly included in his Report as additional human labour rights.

I would reiterate my congratulations on your appointment, Mr. President, and my confidence in the fact that, under your democratic leadership, this session of the Conference will have the hoped-for results for the member States of the ILO.

Interpretation from Hungarian: Mr. GASPAR (representative of the World Federation of Trade Unions) – Mr. President, it is a great honour for me to be able to congratulate you, on behalf of our Federation, on your election to this most noble, but by no means easy, post. I am convinced that under your chairmanship our session will be able to face its multiple tasks and play an important role in improving the lot of workers in the world.

Allow me to express our thanks and appreciation to the Director-General for the Report, and for the documents – which are so rich in content and give rise to new ideas – which have been presented to the present session of the Conference and to the Committees.

It is with great satisfaction that we welcome the special part of his Report dealing with the question of human rights, thus conferring on the subject recognition as the central theme of this year's session.

The 40th anniversary of the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights is a good opportunity to take stock of what the International Labour Organisation has done to enhance the principles embodied in the Declaration.

Our Federation and its member organisations – although there have been discussions and divergent opinions have been expressed on certain specific matters – pay tribute to the work done by the ILO in this field. What characterises the aspirations of the ILO is the fact that, in the year when the Declaration was adopted, an agreement on freedom of association and protection of the right to organise was adopted by the International Labour Conference.

It is an historic experience that trade union rights and their development constitute an extremely complex problem, and the struggle for them is as old as the history of human society. The demand for the guarantee of fundamental human rights has been a key aspect of the work of trade unions throughout their existence. For us, all human rights are equally important, but we believe that nowadays priority should be given to the most important of them.

We consider that, when speaking of the defence of human rights, one should stress above all the importance of the fundamental right – that of the right to life – for this is the prime condition for any kind of human progress.

I think we are all very happy that our session has met this year, in a period when we can hope, and even be confident, that the world will take the path of guaranteeing a peaceful future rather than one of confrontation. It is natural that the not insignificant results achieved in the negotiations on armaments reduction and the promising prospects give hope to hundreds of millions of workers. The workers expect, and with good reason, that the vast material resources freed as a result of disarmament will serve to improve their living and working conditions and to solve the most acute social and economic problems. The ILO – if it wishes to remain faithful to its vocation and to the aspirations it has expressed so far – should give rigorous support to the process of disarmament, which guarantees the fundamental human right and serves progress.

We are fully in agreement with the idea expressed in the Report of the Director-General according to which the question of human rights must be dealt with only on the basis of taking into account real economic and social conditions.

Nowadays, unfortunately, we often witness manipulation of human rights and the dissociation of different rights for political ends. This is unacceptable to trade unions. We are confident that the synthetic aspects of the question, the close correlation between its different components make it essential that in international co-operation each should have strict respect for the principles of equality, justice and mutual understanding.

One must therefore respect above all the rights of peoples to self-determination. The guarantee of this right is fundamental from the point of view of civic and political rights as well as social, economic and cultural rights.

In the matter of human rights, as with many initiatives serving workers' interests, the World Federation of Trade Unions has always been the partner of the ILO, and it will continue to be so. The WFTU takes part in such work with pleasure since guaranteeing fundamental human rights in the social and economic field has always been a prime demand of our Federation, and it will continue to be so in the future as well.

We are of the view that respect for trade union rights is an important aspect of the supremacy of human rights. Respect for the freedom to organise is of vital importance in defending the interests of the rights of workers. It is not merely by chance, therefore, that to stress its importance, our member organisations have submitted a resolution to the session on human rights and trade union freedoms.

In our opinion, the ILO must make greater efforts than it has in the past on behalf of the more efficient defence of human rights and trade union freedoms. Brutal and serious violations of these freedoms are increasingly frequent in the world. As result, trade union leaders are often taken to court and in many cases their lives have been threatened. The current system of examining grievances is incapable of coping with the situation.

The Governing Body must devise and submit to the Conference for discussion and adoption specific measures that can discourage States once and for all from violating trade union rights. It is high time that the Conference developed some kind of efficient machinery for guaranteeing the right to organise and the enforcement of the other basic principles embodied in the Organisation's Constitution.

We are convinced that the application of the principle of the independence of the trade union movement endorsed by the ILO is essential to the normal functioning of trade unions.

As I have already mentioned, our Federation firmly supports the people and nations struggling for their inalienable right of self-determination. The reinforcement of the policy of pitiless repression in the occupied Arab territories, including Palestine, and in South Africa and Namibia is a source of serious international concern. We appreciate highly the ILO's efforts to combat apartheid and consider the updating of the 1981 Declaration of priority importance. However, the ILO's action in this field needs to be better co-ordinated with the activities of the United Nations. The ILO should not just describe the changes that are taking place within the apartheid system, but should demand its total eradication. Only in this way can we put an end to all forms of racial segregation in this part of Africa.

Our Federation is prepared to participate in every form of international action aimed at intensifying the solidarity with the South African people, with Namibia, with the Palestinian population in the occupied territories and with any other region where human rights and trade union freedoms are being grossly violated.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. FOMICHI – (Government delegate, Byelorussian SSR) – Mr. President, allow me to add my congratulations and wishes for your success and that of your Vice-Presidents on your election to the elevated post of president of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference.

This 75th Session of the International Labour Conference is taking place at an important period in the development and intensification of international political dialogue. The Soviet Union and other socialist countries are constantly and consistently proposing concrete ways of building a secure world in which, Mr. Gorbachev has said, "an atmosphere of trust and neighbourly co-operation would be strengthened among all nations regardless of their social and economic systems". The vital necessity to save humanity from the threat of self-destruction requires every country assiduously to seek answers to the problems posed by the new reality of the end of the twentieth century. Efforts are being made to intensify the process of removing the nuclear threat, banning and eliminating chemical warfare and undertaking the limitation and reduction of conventional weapons. If this is achieved, extensive possibilities of economic and social progress for all countries will open up. Furthermore, favourable conditions are being created to give new impetus to international co-operation between all States of the world. This correspondingly increases our common responsibility eventually to take full advantage of the new possibilities within the ILO and elsewhere and to take considered decisions on solving economic and social problems.

While I would like to call on the ILO to improve its work still further, it is worth pointing out that the search for the way of dialogue and practical co-operation is becoming increasingly evident within our own Organisation, as we may see from the Director-General's Report, Human rights – A common responsibility. Our consciousness of the interdependence of various aspects of international life means that we must recognise that we cannot consider the problem of ensuring human rights in isolation from international security, the lawful right of nations to self-determination and strict respect for national sovereignty. It follows that the different social and political structures of the various countries, with their accumulated traditions, must be taken into account. This means that interference in the internal affairs of other States is unacceptable. The need therefore arises to protect this sphere from any extraneous distractions, political prejudice or a confrontational approach, to find practical, attainable forms and criteria for international co-operation, to concentrate our efforts on the most important problems of vital interest to States and to ensure compliance with the universally acknowledged principles of international law and inter-governmental relations.

The experience of the last few years has shown that the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, whose 40th anniversary is being celebrated this year, has received wide recognition in the international community and was an important stage on the road to the preparation and acceptance of the international covenants on human rights as well as several ILO Conventions. The present aim must therefore be that these documents should receive universal acceptance, in other words that all governments should ratify them.

In talking of human rights, our starting point is the inseparable, mutual link between all the fundamental rights: political, economic, social and cultural. In in this context, we share the objections already expressed in general discussion to the Director-General's thoughts on the ILO's priorities regarding the rights of political groups as opposed to other rights. The ILO Constitution states that the basic efforts of the Organisation should be directed to the provision of social and economic rights for workpeople, in particular the solution to the problem of unemployment.

Ultimately, the yardstick for the development and achievement of full human rights is the extent to which the material, social, economic and political conditions of life in any given society serve the purpose of opening up wide possibilities and opportunities for each person.

In the Byelorussian SSR the process of speeding up social and economic development and high quality re-education in every aspect of life has progressed on a broad front. However, we do not consider the process of attaining all the rights and freedoms of human beings to be completely fulfilled. Our priority therefore is to improve socialist democracy and to strengthen its legal and material guarantees of citizens' rights and freedoms. The perestroika (restructuring) now taking place in our country is predicated on people's best qualities: their knowledge and intelligence.

Particular attention is being paid to various aspects of the problem of self-management, that is, the extent of involvement by working people in industrial and social decisions. For example, the right to work is a basic condition of not only economic, but also political human freedom. This right is guaranteed by our Constitution and is provided for by the planned development of the national economy. However, this right in our opinion involves not only the possibility of obtaining work, but also the right to a creative job, corresponding to the level of education, qualifications and interests of the worker.

In the developed capitalist countries, as the Report of the Director-General points out, there are at present more than 30 million unemployed and their number is expected to increase. It is our conviction that to deprive so many workpeople of the possibility of earning their means of subsistence by their own labour is incompatible with the aims of the ILO and with the principles of democracy, freedom and equality. My delegation would therefore like to emphasise the important standard-setting role of the ILO in its work for human rights, which can be seen in the increase in ratification of ILO standard-setting acts.

ILO activity must also be improved in the field of applying Conventions and Recommendations to provide practical help to member States. We support the proposal that national legislations in the area of human rights should comply fully with international standards.

The Byelorussian SSR therefore firmly supports effective international co-operation in human rights. The efforts of the ILO are also essential to halt the terror and repression of the South African racists against the African majority in its country and to put an end to Pretoria's aggressive policy against its neighbouring African States and its aim to retain its domination of Namibia, which it occupied illegally.

We would like to express our solidarity with the Arab countries in denouncing and condemning the policy and practice of state terrorism by Israel against the Arab countries and peoples. Our position is that the only correct solution of the Middle East problem would be to call a plenipotentiary conference on this topic under the aegis of the United Nations, with equal participation by all interested parties, including the PLO and the permanent member States of the Security Council.

As regards Part II of the Report of the Director-General on the ILO's activities, we should like to point out that such Reports should preferably not be limited to expounding this or that set of procedures and facts, but should also contain in-depth analysis of their causes, a view of possible future change and, above all, an analysis and assessment of the effectiveness of measures taken by the ILO.

Our delegation takes a positive view of the ILO's achievements over the last year on the problems of the external indebtedness of developing countries and would like to express its support for the importance of carrying out the decisions made in November of last year by the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment. At the same time, we regret that the Governing Body of the ILO continues to take no action on carrying out the resolution concerning the economic and social consequences of disarmament adopted by the Conference in 1981, although the Report of the Director-General stresses the organic interdependence between war and peace on the one hand and social and economic development on the other.

In conclusion, I should like to emphasise that the realities of the contemporary world compel us to understand that progress for all means progress for each, that material and spiritual riches and economic, scientific and technical achievements open up new horizons for overcoming separateness and developing security in the interests of all.

May I express the hope that this session will give new momentum to the ILO's activities and will be outstanding for its fresh approach and demonstrations of goodwill in the interests of achieving concrete results in the future through more fruitful dialogue and co-operation in order to achieve social progress, which is the purpose of our Organisation.

(The Conference adjourned at 12.30 p.m.)

Eleventh sitting

Tuesday, 7 June 1988, 3.15 p.m.

Presidents: Mr. Adiko, Mr. Beyreuther

RATIFICATION OF TWO CONVENTIONS BY THE USSR

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT (Mr. ADIKO) – I have pleasure in announcing to the Conference that the Director-General of the ILO has registered the ratification by the USSR of the following Conventions:

Working Environment (Air Pollution, Noise and Vibration) Convention, 1977 (No. 148);

Vocational Rehabilitation and Employment (Disabled Persons) Convention, 1983 (No. 159).

This brings the total number of ratifications of international Conventions to 5,345.

RATIFICATION OF THE INSTRUMENT FOR THE AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANISATION, 1986

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT (Mr. ADIKO) – It is also my pleasure to inform the Conference that the Director-General of the ILO has registered the ratification by the United Arab Emirates of the Instrument for the Amendment of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation, 1986.

This brings the total number of ratifications and acceptances of that Instrument of Amendment to 38.

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT (Mr. ADIKO) – We will now continue our discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Interpretation from Portuguese: Mr. VAZ D'ALMEIDA (Minister of Labour and Social Security, Sao Tome and Principe) – First of all, may I congratulate the President on his brilliant election to the presidency of this session.

On my own behalf and on behalf of my delegation, may I express our confidence that under his brilliant and wise leadership, our efforts will be crowned with success.

We have carefully examined the Report of the Director-General and we consider it outstanding. It is clearly a reflection of the Director-General's talents, and yet another in a long line of excellent reports.

Might I express in this august forum, our gratitude to Mr. Francis Blanchard for the work carried out by the ILO in 1987, and for the valuable results of that work.

Since my country was admitted to this Organisation, we have received great support; we would like to express before this august assembly our thanks to the Director-General, for much of this support is due to his noble and arduous efforts.

My country, like other countries of the so-called Third World, is undergoing an economic and financial crisis which prevents us from properly meeting our obligations to this prestigious Organisation, particularly as regards our financial contributions.

Owing to the crisis, my country is engaged in a programme of structural adjustment, in accordance with the outcome of negotiations with the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund and the African Development Bank. This programme entails various restrictions and limitations.

The economic crisis has led us to concentrate our efforts and energy on solving our major national problems.

All the institutions in my country are engaged in this effort, meaning that some problems take priority over others.

The relative scarcity of specialised staff is another factor which has kept us from fulfilling our obligations.

However, I am pleased to report that my Government has submitted all the instruments adopted at the 68th, 69th, 70th and 71st Sessions of the International Labour Conferences to our national legislative body.

We have also taken internal measures with a view to submitting the necessary reports on the application of ratified Conventions. At great cost, we also have paid all our back contributions to the ILO, and this shows the importance that we attach to the ILO and to our participation in it.

We feel that the various items on the agenda are of great importance. Owing to the over-population of urban centres it is very appropriate that we should discuss the promotion of rural employment.

With respect to Sao Tomé and Principe, inasmuch as our programme of structural adjustment compels us to reduce employment in the public sector, one of the best ways of dealing with the social impact of such measures is to promote rural employment.

Thus, we ask for and count on the valuable co-operation of the International Labour Office in the search for realistic and coherent solutions to this difficult situation.

We feel that the partial revision of Convention No. 107 is very timely because the instrument's paternalistic orientation is not in line with the times.

We endorse the report of the Director-General on apartheid. We are pleased to see that it is on our agenda, evidence of the Organisation's preoccupation with situation in the southern part of Africa.

The position of my country with respect to the conflict in that region is well known. We would like to join our voice with those condemning the hateful regime in South Africa, and reiterate our solidarity and unfailing support for our brothers in Namibia, Angola, Mozambique and the other front-line States.

Before concluding, might I assure this Conference that my delegation and I personally will do everything in our power to ensure success of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. FRANCO GUACHALLA (Government delegate, Bolivia) – First of all, may I, on behalf of my Government, my colleagues in my delegation and on my own behalf, sincerely and cordially congratulate Mr. Beyreuther on his well-deserved election to chair this august assembly convened to discuss very important matters of the labour world.

I should also like to congratulate the Governing Body and the Director-General of the ILO for their extremely realistic Reports to the Conference. They reflect the effort, skill and great spirit of solidarity of those who, together with the ILO, must cope with the problems which afflict our nations. We admire this vocation of service to the cause of concern to us, the cause of social justice.

Mr. Blanchard referred to the fact that the general trend in the world economy and the social repercussions which have ensued, are matters of profound concern: "Since 1982 growth rates remain modest and markedly lower than in the 1960s ... The long-term trend is towards a decline in growth rates. Subject to any major decisions of policy that may be taken by the principal industrialised countries to counteract that trend, it appears set to continue – if not indeed to worsen – in the years immediately ahead."

The prodigious scientific and technological revolution influences and will increasingly influence the life of the medium-sized powers and underdeveloped and dependent countries which must face a restructuring of the international division of labour and the change of roles imposed by it. In a partial and asymmetrical form, these changes will alter the internal structures of production, totally modifying the philosophy of marginal companies.

We, the underdeveloped countries and, in particular, the Latin American countries, cannot face the remodelling of our modes of social existence with success if we do not make the necessary internal changes and if we do not revigorate the processes of economic and social integration with a view to building a continental community to move closer to the ideal of Bolivar the Liberator of a great nation of republics.

We must also point out that for our countries the foreign debt problem continues to be the main factor limiting our possibilities of reactivating production and of once again making economic and social progress. The amortisation of capital and the payment of interest, despite the efforts made to renegotiate and find other means of alleviating the debt, are taking a large proportion of the hard currency received for our exports, thus reducing the financial resources available for projects for the production of goods and services at national, sectoral and regional level.

In order to remove or substantially reduce the harmful impact of these problems, it is necessary to have the concerted participation of the entire international community, from east to west, from north to south, to deal with the challenges of the year 2000, so that together we can reduce the ever-increasing poverty in the labour sector in urban and rural centres, which is leading to marginality and social ills on a large and dangerous scale.

The ILO and member States must give consideration to solving the problems arising from the increase in the informal economy which is giving rise to atypical employment, sometimes in depressing conditions, because of the pitiless exploitation of the workforce which is in over-supply, without the minimum conditions of institutional protection and legal protection.

The efforts of the present constitutional Government of Bolivia to climb out of one of the most tragic situations of economic and financial deterioration caused by hyper-inflation are well known and appreciated. In the middle of 1985 our hyper-inflation reached 22,000 per cent, which is a record for the depreciation of a national currency. The democratic Government under Paz Estenssoro had to take drastic and heroic measures to avoid the destruction of the Bolivian economy. We reduced the crazy rate of inflation to the healthier rate of 10.5 per cent, which is the average annual rate of our monetary depreciation today.

This feat was accomplished in the worst imaginable conditions, when there was a landslide in the international price of tin and the prices of other minerals and agricultural exports went down as well. Five hundred years of mining were at an end. We had to face foreign debt problems, we do not have normal earnings from traditional exports and we depend to a certain extent on natural gas, a non-renewable resource. Lastly, the external credit market has narrowed considerably, and it is much more difficult now to get fresh money and conditions are harder than ever.

Despite the efforts made by the constitutional democratic Government, it is true that the Bolivian economy has shrunk. In other words, the national "cake" is smaller and we do not have enough money to satisfy either the just requests for salary increases, operating capital for companies or resources for work of regional and national development. Our greatest desires as a government are frustrated by stern reality.

As citizens and as men with a social conscience, we are saddened by the depressed situation of many of our compatriots. We are a de-capitalised country without sufficient financial resources. What we have done in the social field may be considered insufficient, but we cannot do more than what we are trying to achieve.

Using the financial resources of the Emergency Social Fund, which is sustained by donations from friendly institutions and countries, we have created new temporary jobs in public works and openings for self-employment and we have reinforced the co-operative system as a way of reactivating the small and medium-sized company economy which can absorb skilled unemployed workers.

His Holiness Pope John-Paul II, in his recent five-day visit to Bolivia, identified quite rightly the factors and problems which hold back our development. He therefore urged the industrialised countries and international bodies to look at the need for ongoing co-operation and, more importantly, for productive and social plans and programmes in Bolivia, while urging the Bolivians to enter into the necessary dialogue and understanding for the adoption of shared solutions which will put into practice the values of solidarity with authentic Christian faith and hope.

At the same time, the Ministry of Labour launched an appeal to all the forces of the country, particularly the productive elements and the political and intellectual leadership, to put aside their doctrinaire positions and partisan interests and talk about the philosophy appropriate to a new stage of profound change in the world economic structure, so that Bolivia can confront the current crisis and so that we can all agree on the basis of a new economic structure. We must bring this about by adapting our reality to this change, made necessary by the scientific and technological revolution which has brought down the old structures erected by the first and second industrial revolutions, on which the current superstructure is based.

What type of economy should we set up in Bolivia? What can our country export to the known world? What type of industrial economy can we talk about?

The national plan drawn up by the entire leadership of the country can give us cohesion, fraternity, the will to achieve and the security to overcome the crisis.

I would like now to refer to the excellent relationships that we have had with the ILO. In 1987 and at the beginning of this year, we have received from the ILO, through its Regional Office in Lima, services of evaluation in work administration.

A regional adviser for labour legislation has drawn up an outline working programme so that a commission of national advisers can undertake a revision of the diffuse existing social legislation, drawing up new labour legislation to bring it into line with the principles, Conventions and Recommendations of the ILO. This is a major step on the path to legislative modernisation which Bolivia feels it has a duty to follow.

In accordance with the agenda of this Conference, there are two topics of great interest to my country.

The first is the partial revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107). Countries such as Bolivia with aboriginal populations feel that this is a subject of major importance, which must be treated without falling back on any discriminatory criteria or false notions of racial supremacy. The human race is one race. We can only talk about human types who in specific conditions of life can produce particular cultural and material values.

The second topic relates to the general discussion on "Rural employment promotion". The most underprivileged social sectors in the developing countries are indeed the rural peoples. More than 30 years ago the national revolution, headed by Victor Paz Estenssoro, initiated a vast agrarian reform, totally abolishing semi-feudal lands and giving the land to the rural workers, under the slogan "The land is for those who work on it". However, it was not enough to make former servants into owners, since the primitive conditions of life continue, we still have hand tools and poverty among our rural workers, though they are the demographic majority. Their work must be remunerative so as to improve their living conditions, but these conditions can only be achieved with international financial co-operation which will enable us to create the necessary public service infrastructure with a view to industrialising the countryside, providing new villages and reorganising our agricultural sector for the sake of exports and industrialisation.

In conclusion, may I say that I hope the ILO will continue its mission of cementing peace in the world on the basis of a profound dialogue which must take place between the factors of production and the political leadership of all countries of the international community associated with it in order to deal with the crisis brought about by the scientific and technological revolution originating in the computer and communications revolution. Manufacturing man is being replaced by programmable robots, the second generation of which will be equipped with sight and touch. But we cannot cut ourselves off from these decisive new influences. Still less should we be like the Luddites and destroy what human intelligence is creating for the sake of progress. It is time to make all the workers of the world understand that the current stage of history is a transition between a dying life and culture and a new one which was born with the splitting of the atom. It is revolutionising the very structure of the economic conditions of life and looks to replace man with the computer. It is up to the ILO to speak now.

Mr. CHAUDHARY (Government delegate, Nepal) – It is a great honour and privilege for me to have the opportunity of addressing this august gathering. I would also like to take this opportunity, on behalf of my delegation and on my own behalf, to extend our heartiest greetings and congratulations to Mr. Bayreuther on his election as President of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. I am confident that under his wise leadership and able guidance the Conference will achieve the desired results.

My delegation is pleased to reaffirm Nepal's support to all the efforts made by the ILO over the years to improve the working and living conditions of the labour force and to promote peace throughout the world. Nepal has adopted the non-party Panchayat democratic system which envisages a society free from exploitation, where all citizens can live together in harmony with freedom, justice and peace. Our foreign policy is based on the principles of the Charter of the United Nations and the objectives of non-alignment. The basic tenet of our foreign policy has always been to promote peace and foster harmonious relations among nations. This is reflected in the proposal put forward by our august sovereign, His Majesty the King, to declare Nepal a "zone of peace". So far, 87 friendly countries have extended their support to this noble proposal. Bearing in mind the close nexus between peace and development, we wish to have peace institutionalised in our country so that the meagre resources that we have may be utilised to raise the economic standards of our people. It is a well-known fact that we live in an interdependent world where a country's efforts to achieve its desired goal of economic progress are also dependent upon the co-operation and policy of other countries. This has led us to support the creation of a new world economic order based on justice and equality, to attain peaceful coexistence and prosperity throughout the world.

My delegation considers the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General to be working documents of great value. On behalf of His Majesty's Government of Nepal, we would like to express our thanks to Mr. Blanchard for his tireless endeavours and pragmatic approach.

In view of the large proportion of the labour force employed in the construction sector of the economy, we consider the issue of safety and health in construction to be of great importance. My delegation believes that human life is precious and this concern must find expression at the workplace. We believe that adequate provisions should be made to protect workers from industrial accidents and illnesses. Considerations of profit should not impose conditions which may endanger the health and security of workers. The time has now come to devise and strengthen an appropriate system for preventing and monitoring workers' occupational accidents and health hazards, especially in the developing countries.

We believe that employment promotion and the creation of social security systems deserve special attention as unemployment is a pressing problem in most countries, particularly in the Third World. In order to improve the employment situation, His Majesty's Government is in the process of establishing a central labour supply centre – a training institute in Kathmandu, the capital of Nepal. Currently, there are labour supply centres in a few districts outside the Kathmandu Valley. Existing vocational training centres in and outside Kathmandu have been strengthened to overcome the shortage of national, skilled labour. In fact, in all our skill-development training programmes and activities, the main emphasis is placed on producing skilled manpower to gradually replace expatriate workers. In addition, various measures have been undertaken to promote employment in income-generating activities. Soft loans and marketing facilities are also made available to encourage self-employment activities.

As regards social security systems, Nepal, like any other less developed country, has a long way to go. Retirement pensions and superannuation benefits are mainly confined to public sector employees. Unemployment and disability benefits, as well as family allowances, have yet to be instituted. However, there are various Acts, rules and regulations to safeguard and promote labour welfare in the country. The Bonus Act and Rules, the Apprenticeship Training Act, the Disabled Persons Act, and the Overseas Employment Act contain several provisions to protect the workers' interests. Plans are also under way to improve the existing legislation and to enact new laws. It may be mentioned here that the Social Service National Co-ordination Council, which is chaired by Her Majesty Queen Aishwarya Rajya Laxmi Devi Shah is actively engaged, through its various social organisations, in improving the lot of the weaker and underprivileged section of society, such as women, children and the physically handicapped.

With regard to item VI of the agenda, my delegation agrees with the view that respect be accorded to the culture, ways of life and traditional institutions of the indigenous and tribal populations whilst they are being integrated into the main stream of national development.

My delegation strongly feels that the promotion of rural employment is of strategic importance to most developing countries. The rural population constitutes one of the most vulnerable groups having to face serious problems such as economic uncertainty, unemployment, poverty and ignorance. Promoting rural employment, however, is no easy matter. None the less, this aspect has received due attention in our ongoing Seventh Five-Year Plan.

I would like to turn to the issue of updating the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in South Africa. We have always raised our voice against injustice and have condemned any discrimination based on caste, colour, creed and sex. My delegation fully appreciates the efforts made by the ILO to protect and promote equality of rights and to eliminate apartheid in South Africa.

Before I conclude, I would like to mention that in accordance with the noble wishes of our beloved monarch, His Majesty King Birendra Bir Bikram Shah Dev, my country is embarking upon a comprehensive programme to provide for the basic needs of the people such as food, clothing, shelter, health, education and security by the turn of the century. Nepal is one of the least developed countries with more than 40 per cent of its population below poverty level and more than 40 per cent of its young people unemployed or under-employed. These programmes will certainly help improve the living conditions of workers and peasants in the lowest income group. Nepal is also faced with the problem of providing appropriate training programmes and creating adequate job opportunities. I would, therefore, like to urge the ILO to extend more support to help us achieve our national objectives. Apart from technical assistance, we require more opportunities for training and fellowships for government officials as well as for representatives of both workers and employers.

I hope that future ILO activities will consist of more programmes geared to the specific needs and requirements of the developing countries. It is heartening that the agenda of this Conference deals with issues of critical importance to developing countries.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. JIMENEZ AGUILAR (Employers' delegate, Spain) – On behalf of the Spanish employers, I should like to express our hope that the debate and activities of this 75th Session of the International Labour Conference will be crowned with success.

This session of the Conference has a particular meaning for us because of the presence, as a special guest, of Mr. Felipe González, President of the Spanish Government. In a forum such as this, whose cornerstones are tripartism and social dialogue, we take his presence to be a recognition of the role that employers' and trade union organisations have played in Spain through the policy of concertation and a reflection of his personal commitment to this policy of social dialogue which must be the basis of tripartite efforts in the process of adapting our economic and social structures to the new framework for Spain within the European Economic Community.

In 1988, the ILO celebrated 40 years of work in favour of human rights, basically from the social and economic point of view. The Report of the Director-General reviews the unceasing and meritorious work task of both promoting and safeguarding such rights.

The participation of the employers' organisation in achieving these goals has been and is continuous within the tripartite framework of the ILO.

The Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise, Convention 148 (No. 87), is, in our view, an essential factor for the development of all these tasks and commitments. As is logical, I refer not only to the freedom of association of workers but also to the freedom and right of association of employers.

When, in 1985, new legislation on freedom of association was established in Spain, we, as employers, saw with satisfaction that our role in labour relations and society seemed to be covered and protected by the international conventions signed by my country and, in particular, by those of the ILO.

At the same time, pluralism within democracy, if it is to be effective, requires social agents who can independently promote and defend their legitimate economic and social interests.

In the Spanish Constitution, article 7 recognises that employers' organisations are a social agent of the first order together with trade unions.

From 1977, when Spain ratified Convention No. 87 and from 1978 when our Constitution was approved, the employers' organisations have been developing their activities and consolidating their position in their work, thus contributing to social order and understanding through labour relations in which collective negotiations came to be recognised as an instrument aimed primarily at social stabilisation rather than a mere factor of conflict.

Social concertation, as seen in major social pacts and agreements in Spain, although this has always not been so in periods of prosperity as is the case now, had none the less contributed to creating a social climate in which difficult problems such as inflation or conflict have largely been solved.

The ILO sent a mission to Spain in 1984 to make a report on labour relations. At the time, the representatives and experts of the ILO were able to see that much of the substance of the international Conventions and the Recommendations of the ILO were being shaped not only into national legislation, but also into the context of collective negotiation.

None the less, we should not hide the fact that some of the problems to which the Director-General's Report refers this year still need to be dealt with and solved. There are, for example, the problems of strike regulation and of the measures to be taken by employers in case of conflicts.

The absence of standards on these matters has not only been highlighted by the Government, but also by some of the events that have occurred in 1988, mainly in the public sector, and which have required court decisions.

Although employers created more than 800,000 jobs in Spain in 1986 and 1987, thanks to intensive investment and modernisation, we must not ignore the problem of youth unemployment.

On this topic, the Report of the Director-General has some very interesting things to say. This is a problem which adversely affects industrialised countries as well. Therefore, as the Director-General has said, it is sometimes necessary to resort to special programmes for young people that combine job-creating procedures and measures which will give them work experience and temporary employment, thus making it easier for them to find a more permanent job.

Spanish employers, through the CEOE, have been paying particular attention to the employment and training of young people in the past few years, sponsoring measures favourable to young people and making them widely available. For instance, contracts for training and practical work for young people increased from 7,235 in 1981 to almost 450,000 in 1987. But there are still young people who are unemployed or who need to improve their qualifications. This is why we have noted with interest some government initiatives that have been publicised in Spain in the past few weeks, such as the project of educational reform which is under way.

Another aspect on which the Director-General made some thought-provoking observations is that of social security.

The CEOE, since it was established, has constantly endeavoured to ensure that the social security system in Spain is viable and of high quality, but in such a way that it does not imperil the hiring practices for competitiveness of companies.

On certain occasions, there has been criticism of the level of social protection in Spain based on cold and unconnected macro-economic figures. It is true that out of a general state budget of some 14,000 billion pesetas, 5,000 billion are allocated to social protection. The effort in terms of contributions has been, and continues to be, extraordinarily broad and substantial for firms and for employment, and the increased contribution of the State to the coverage of social security expenditure has done little to alleviate the burden on Spanish firms.

Between 1979 and 1988, although the contribution of the State increased by over 1,000 billion pesetas, expenditure over that same period increased by 3,200 billion pesetas.

What matters is not to spend more but to spend exactly what is necessary; managing the expenditure in such a way that benefits reach people in time and are provided with thoughtfulness and humanity, as is especially in health assistance.

The CEOE has offered its co-operation in whatever social security reforms have been undertaken, and we will, of course, continue to offer it in the reforms that will inevitably have to be made in both financing, which penalises employment and reduces competitiveness, and the management of social security benefits.

Another of the subjects for reflection in the Director-General's Report is health and safety in the workplace.

This is one of the most noble subjects in the field of human rights in which workers and employers can work together in their respective spheres of responsibility.

Future legislation in Spain should, therefore, to our mind, follow a line that is consistent with economic and industrial reality, as pointed out by the ILO in the most recent instruments adopted and in the PIACT programme.

In all the fields that we have mentioned, the CEOE has done all that it could, using dialogue as its philosophy for reaching solutions.

Finally, I should like to refer to the work of the ILO in promoting employers' activities, which coincides with one of the current priorities of our Confederation.

In view of the very difficult employment situation in Spain, which, as in many other countries, hits the young particularly hard, we are convinced that the creation of small firms and the development of own-account employment could offer an effective solution to this major problem.

A society that is permanently changing, that is dynamic and that has to adapt to new economic and social realities must find in the development of employers' activities the clearest expression of its values of freedom, initiative and individual effort within the framework of social responsibility.

Our Confederation devoted a series of events to this last week in Barcelona, in the firm belief that anything that contributes to the creation and training of new employers is the best guarantee of future progress in Spain. We hope that this concern of the employer's organisations will be shared by other sectors of society, particularly the administration, the trade unions and young people.

I hope that the Governing Body of the ILO, at its meeting next November, will decide to include on the agenda for the 1990 Conference the topic proposed on the promotion of own-account employment, which should complement the discussions held last year on the promotion of small and medium-sized firms.

These are the concerns which we, Spanish employers, wished to voice in this forum for social dialogue provided by the ILO and which we hope to share with governments, trade unions and employers throughout the world in the search for the greater well-being of all our countries.

Mr. ENGSETH (Minister of Local Government and Labour, Norway) – On behalf of the Norwegian Government, I would first of all like to congratulate Mr. Beyreuther on his election and I wish him every success in his task. I am confident that we shall all benefit from his competence and vast experience.

Human rights has been chosen as a main theme for this session of the International Labour Conference. This is a suitable way to commemorate the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and that of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87). In this connection Norway welcomes the Report of the Director-General on Human rights – A common responsibility.

Despite the many standards set by the international community to protect human rights and prevent the abuse of state power, it is a sad fact that millions of human beings are victims of violations of basic human rights. Unfortunately, these grave violations also result from the failure to implement standards adopted by the ILO.

Unemployment, underemployment and poverty in countries all over the world lead to tension and social conflicts. All too frequently such situations result in repression and the use of force against workers' and employers' organisations, and their members and leaders.

The need for active maintenance and monitoring of ILO human rights Conventions is as great today as ever before. My Government will continue to give active support to the work of the ILO in this area.

Today no country can pursue its economic and social policies in isolation from the development of the world at large. That is especially true of the economic policies of the industrialised countries. There is a need for a global approach to the debt of the developing countries and the technological and economic gap between the developed and developing countries. International collaboration and solidarity are vital factors in resolving these problems. It is in the interest of all countries to find workable solutions.

International solidarity is also important if we are to achieve the respect of human rights world-wide. However, the main responsibility for the respect of human rights rests with individual governments. It is their duty to pursue economic and social policies which can improve the living conditions of the most vulnerable groups of society.

One human right – the right to work – should be inseparably linked with the implementation of economic and social policies of all countries. Employment not only provides the economic basis for survival but also gives the human being a feeling of self-respect and dignity.

The ILO should continue its standard-setting work and advisory assistance to governments in their efforts to fulfil their obligations, and strive for effective systems of supervision. Special attention should be given to the exploitation of children and to the discrimination and exploitation of women. Equal payment for men and women should be ensured. It is also necessary to give high priority to measures to prevent injuries and occupational diseases, especially those due to chemical or biological hazards.

Among the human rights' questions facing the ILO is that of apartheid.

My Government is pleased to note that the drafts for updating of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia were adopted by consensus at the recent tripartite Conference in Harare. This is a sign to the oppressed Black majority in South Africa that they are not forgotten. It is my earnest hope that our work at this Conference will demonstrate our concern and determination to eradicate apartheid.

If the deplorable and totally unacceptable situation in South Africa and Namibia is allowed to continue, it could lead to an escalation of violence and threaten international peace and security. In an effort to contribute to the eradication of apartheid, Norway, together with the other Nordic countries, has introduced an economic boycott of South Africa. We hope this will stimulate other countries to follow suit, and that together we may be able to carry out effective measures against apartheid. If we do not take the situation seriously, we shall all be responsible for the disaster that may be the fate of South Africa.

The world of labour is closely linked to factors affecting the environment. There is a clear relationship between safe and healthy conditions at work and a sound general environment. The working environment is an important and integral part of the human environment as a whole. Improvements in the working environment will also enhance the quality of the general environment. Furthermore, we are convinced that there is a link or inter-relationship between environmental requirements and employment creation.

The ILO could and should play an important role in the follow-up of the report of the World Commission on Environment and Development. The basic message of the Commission's report is the need for sustainable economic development. The Commission makes recommendations to ensure that today's economic activities do not erode the very resource base for future economic activities. It is not just environmental protection in the traditional sense, for the sake of the preservation of the environment, as such. It is also a question of preserving the environment and natural resource base in order to provide for future employment opportunities, employment creation and employment growth.

We have noted with great satisfaction the very positive attitude of the Director-General towards the report of the World Commission, and we appreciate the measures already taken by the Office in preparation of the ILO's contribution to the international follow-up of the report.

Efforts are now being made to integrate the principle of sustainable development into the plans and programmes for the coming years in all United Nations agencies. To this end, a conference will be held in Oslo in July which will be attended by the United Nations Secretary-General, as well as the heads of its major agencies – including the Director-General of the ILO.

My Government is very much looking forward to this event.

To this year's session of the International Labour Conference, the Nordic Governments have submitted a resolution on the follow-up of the report of the World Commission. My Government sincerely hopes that this Conference will adopt a resolution on these matters, to serve as guide-lines for the ILO's work on environment, employment and development in the coming years.

This session of the Conference is also considering the revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107).

The Norwegian Government welcomes this revision of the only existing international instrument for the protection of indigenous peoples. Norway is engaged in these matters from an international perspective, inter alia, through the United Nations Commission on Human Rights, as well as on a national basis, since about two-thirds of the world's Sami population live in Norway. Norway has not ratified the existing Convention, because of its orientation towards the assimilation of the indigenous population, rather than the respect for their cultural and social identity.

I will not go into the details of this revision work. That is a matter for the committee concerned, in which we participate actively. But I would like to stress that the Norwegian Government gives high priority to close co-operation with the representatives of the Sami people, especially in cultural and social matters. According to a new Act, a Sami Assembly will be elected by the Sami people in 1989. Recently the Norwegian Parliament added a paragraph to our Constitution, concerning the Sami people's right to maintain and develop their traditional culture.

The international economic situation is difficult. Many countries are experiencing an economic crisis. This unfortunate situation sometimes makes it difficult to achieve progress in the implementation of ILO standards. At the same time, one can say that the problems many countries face make the work of the ILO even more important. The ILO should, therefore, not be allowed to suffer, or be forced to reduce its activities. It is precisely when the international community is faced with serious problems that international co-operation is most needed. In order to ensure that the ILO can make its contribution, all member States must do their utmost to live up to their obligations to the Organisation so that it can serve us well in the difficult times ahead.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mgr. MULLOR GARCIA (Apostolic Nuncio, Permanent Observer of the Holy See in Geneva) – This session of the International Labour Conference commemorates very convincingly the proclamation the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, adopted 40 years ago. The distinguished Director-General has devoted the first part of his Report to this topic, highlighting the relations that exist between the respect of human rights and social progress.

Indeed, where the former are respected, the latter move to new and major frontiers. But when social conquests stop, there are very menacing dangers for the freedom of man. Recent history has shown that this is so. Vain are the efforts of those who claim to build the integral well-being of man whilst denying him the right to think, to express himself, to pray and to decide his destiny according to the dictates of his own conscience.

The delegation of the Holy See would like to take up this evidence and show the contradiction – relative at least – between the classical dispute between partisans of the primacy of civil and political rights and those who defend the predominance of social and economic rights. Both series of rights constitute ideological and existential pillars of that just and universal peace which is mentioned in so many political programmes and above all in the intimate convictions of all men. The dove of peace, might I point out, as the President did this morning, cannot fly nor can it take its message of peace and hope to the four corners of the earth if one of its wings is wounded or missing. And these wings today are called freedom and work. Respected freedom and ennobled work together in fact summarise the formula for peace.

To believe this, it is enough to look without passion or prejudice at socio-political developments today and in the past. Of the two major blocs which dominate the world today, one is centred on the idea of freedom and the other on the idea of work. The ideologists of both sides try to show the advantages and supremacy of their respective systems. Politicians who put their postulates into action are fighting to impose on their countries, if not on whole regions of the world, programmes which promise peace and well-being that never become reality. The efforts of both sides sometimes turn into struggles which unfortunately leave millions of dead on fields which in order to give rich harvests of peace, instead of the blood of soldiers and the pounding of cannons, need drops of calm sweat and the happy songs of workers.

Years and years of ideological confrontation and even armed peace have shown that, alone, neither liberty nor work can guarantee peace or well-being. If it is not to lead to antagonisms which benefit those who are strongest economically and politically, freedom needs the moral counterweight of other rights which are guaranteed to those who are weaker, less gifted, more fragile, those who are poor and those who are most exposed to marginalisation. In order to be an effective source of social well-being and an agent of political progress, work cannot be reduced to a mere economic category nor can it be seen only from a materialistic point of view. Both freedom and work and the entire series of rights arising from them require a moral climate which involves both and which puts them both within the framework of solidarity and social and political peace.

These considerations give their full meaning to the triptych made up of the social Encyclicals of John Paul II: Redemptor hominis, Laborem exercens and Sollicitudo rei socialis. All three endeavour to provide a message of hope by offering dispassionate solutions to serious and specific problems. In the first, the Pope highlights the intrinsic dignity of man as a subject of creative and inalienable freedom. In the second he exalts the value of work as an activity which complements creation and is an imperative universal value for all members of the human community. In the third and most recent Encyclical, he suggests a bold framework of measures to correct the adverse consequences for the integral development of peoples and for each individual of the dynamics of blocs which leads to cold war or war by proxy, thus keeping alive the tragic menace of total and open war.

The Pope's analysis and the measures that he proposes are not dictated by material interests. He is moved only by the desire to serve men in all latitudes and at all times. Following the Second Vatican Council, as a result of assiduous contact with the realities that he has seen for himself in the five continents, John Paul II is giving a dynamic impetus to social doctrine in the Church, and this doctrine, far from being an intellectual ghetto for those who profess Catholicism, is a proclamation of truth inspired by the Gospels and at the same time is open to the consideration of any honest person who wishes to contribute to the creation of a social and political climate which is more worthy of man.

This represents an effort that has been going on for almost a hundred years by the Roman Pontiffs from Leo XIII to John Paul II, and according to the latter it "is not a third way between liberal capitalism and Marxist collectivism nor even a possible alternative to other solutions less radically opposed to one another. Nor is it an ideology, but rather the accurate formulation of the results of a careful reflection on the complex realities of human existence, in society and in the international order in the light of faith and of the Church's tradition."

Precisely because the social doctrine of the Catholic Church is not a third way, its postulates can be useful for anyone who, from the point of view of defending basic rights or of giving greater dignity to the working class, wishes to propose outlines for a society whose achievement do not meet the hopes of those in the regions of the world where these outlines are given concrete form in daily life.

In the past few years the liberal world has experienced the arrival in its midst of masses of unemployed and new poor, people who have degrees but no work, young people facing an uncertain future or exposed to paralysing frustrations. Liberty is going through a crisis which leads to unsuspected servitudes such as the use of drugs or uncurbed consumerism. In extreme – but not unusual – cases the exercise of free will is jeopardised when a choice has to be made between quantity and quality.

Despite often gigantic efforts to try and give the worker greater dignity and make him the centre of political and social concerns, the collectivist world is increasingly witnessing the contrast between bureaucrats and proletarians: these two new social groups, one the leader and the elitist and the other submissive and silent, who, by means of a strange and unforeseen alchemy, have replaced those social classes whose disappearance led to bloody revolutions and raised hopes of liberty and dignity for the masses that had always been oppressed.

Aside from the limitations of certain basic rights and freedoms in this world, as the Director-General's Report points out, we have seen the advent of the disturbing phenomenon of unemployment and labour conflicts; this, in turn, calls for a reform in economic management.

Both systems have their positive and negative aspects. With the increase in communications, everyone will become more aware of their own limits and those of others. As the world, as a whole becomes more accessible, it also becomes smaller and makes people realise the need for solidarity. The existence of a first, a second, a third and a fourth world – the worlds of liberal economy, controlled economy, emerging economy and negative economy – is only due to the fact that there are areas in our one and only world of which the limits – whether wealth or poverty, development and underdevelopment and even super-underdevelopment, peace and war – have not yet been defined.

On this eve of the third millennium, only those whose minds are centred on national, personal or class interests will dare to fly in the face of this evidence. The Director-General of the ILO, in his latest Report, has highlighted the interdependence between human rights, pointing out that "the denial of civil and political rights tends to have adverse effects also on the enjoyment of economic and social rights" and that each day it becomes more evident "that no country can pursue economic and social policies in isolation from developments in the world at large".

Looking at the situation from his own moral standpoint, after having stressed that a world divided into blocks dominated by rigid ideologies is a world submitted to the structure of sin, John-Paul II points out that "interdependence must be transformed into solidarity" and asks the "stronger and richer nations" to "surmount every type of imperialism", inviting them to "have a sense of moral responsibility for the other nations, so that a real international system may be established which will rest on the equality of all peoples and on the necessary respect for their legitimate differences".

The International Labour Conference this year is celebrating its 75th Session and is undoubtedly the most senior member of all international organisations. As such, it is a privileged forum to examine this moral call. The delegation of the Holy See hopes that this call will be taken up and acted upon by all those taking part in our discussions and by all those who in other social, political, economic and financial institutions set out to create a better future for humanity; a future in which, by drawing fully upon their creative freedom, all men and women may, through their work, contribute towards finding once again whatever it is that makes creation fall short of the "paradise" that the first man and woman lost because they used their freedom wrongly. Freedom and work will therefore be harmonious once again so that we can create a true climate of hope and peace.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. MARIN (Vice-President of the Commission of the European Communities) – May I begin by saying that I am pleased to see that the items on the agenda of this Conference largely reflect the social issues and problems faced by the European Communities, particularly in relation to employment, social security and occupational safety and health.

But I do not wish to dwell on matters that will be discussed at length during this session of the Conference.

I would rather take this opportunity to share with you some thoughts concerning the great challenge facing the European Community. I am referring, of course, to the inauguration in 1992 of the unified common market, which will give birth to a community of 325 million European citizens, unencumbered by borders and able to move freely, without restrictions of any kind.

The approval and ratification of the Single Act, which calls for the establishment of the unified common market in 1992, will give new life to the building of the new Europe and enable the Community to play its part of the world's political and economic stage, while safeguarding its own economic development, cohesion and stability.

However, we must be honest with ourselves.

The establishment of this market is not enough to make a community. It is a necessary condition but not a sufficient one. It should be considered as an instrument, a tool, and not as an end in itself.

It is most unlikely that we are mistaken in saying that the unified common market will likely fail if objectives, such as a convergence of economic policies, and therefore the strengthening of the European monetary system, as well as scientific and technological co-operation, the formulation of a common foreign trade policy, and a greater social and economic cohesion through the community, are not pursued simultaneously.

Economic convergence presupposes, in the first place, a higher standard of living and the development of the Community's less developed regions and countries.

The per capita GNP, measured against a Community average of 100, is 115 in the Federal Republic of Germany and Denmark, but only 54 in Portugal and Greece.

These figures cause some to view the unified common market with apprehension, fearing that all its benefits will accrue to the more structurally sound members of the Community. And these benefits are substantial: economists estimate that the unified common market may add to non-inflationary growth to the tune of 200 billion ECUs, at 1988 prices, and lead to the creation of 5 million new jobs.

From the beginning, the Commission and the Council have been aware of the political dimension of this apprehension, which is why they propose doubling the level of structural funds – a proposal which will be adopted by the Council of Ministers in the very near future, bringing the total of community financial resources for structural purposes to 13 billion ECUs.

The economic convergence also presupposes a more homogeneous financial environment in which the freer flow of capital will lead to closer co-operation between financial authorities and spur progress in the European monetary system that may eventually lead to the establishment of a central community bank.

However, the Community is not only an economic unit and it did not take the Single Act to make this clear.

Those who drafted the Treaty of Rome had already foreseen the social dimension of the Community when they acknowledged the need to improve the conditions of work and life of workers, and to achieve equality through progress.

One might be inclined to think that this would be a natural consequence of setting up the great single market, just as those who drafted the Treaty of Rome placed all their hopes in the Common Market.

To be sure, the less developed countries will experience a higher standard of living, provided they manage to secure a share of the additional resources generated by the elimination of all barriers.

However, this will not be enough.

The social dimension of the unified common market must be seriously tackled, and not merely talked about in an effort to persuade the workers of the unguaranteed promise of the unified common market.

The workers, on the contrary, must be involved in this objective, in its profits as well as in its difficulties so that they will understand that they are genuine protagonists in its fulfilment, and not merely helpless observers of what politicians, employers and technocrats may do.

As I have said, words are not enough. For this reason, the Commission in 1985 renewed the social dialogue which, as you know, subsequently led to the Single Act.

The difficult task of translating into European terms the elements of social dialogue and negotiation prevailing in individual member States must not again prevent employers and workers from reaching common solutions which can give impetus to the labour-bargaining process in each country, and which will enable the Commission to achieve a very specific aim.

Indeed, it is a question of developing a consensus among the social partners on which to establish simple and clear rules of social relations; namely minimum guaranteed social rights; the development of continuing training for all workers; the participation of the workers in the management of the European enterprise of tomorrow, etc.

The Commission, furthermore, is not overlooking the social aspects of the economic and technical harmonisation required to bring about this unified common market. This concern is reflected in the efforts of the Commission, in particular as regards occupational safety and health, as part of the general harmonisation of policies in preparation for the internal market of 1992.

In conclusion, I repeat my firm conviction that we will not be able to set up the unified common market without taking into account its social dimension.

We must never consider this social dimension incidental, but as essential and positive. I am convinced that one day, as foreseen by the Single Act, collective bargaining will take place on the European level.

Interpretation from French: Mr. RUHIGIRA (Workers' delegate, Rwanda) – It is a great honour for me to be able to address this august assembly for the first time in the name of thousands of workers in Rwanda grouped in the Confederation of Trade Unions of Rwanda.

I should like to take this opportunity to address my hearty and sincere congratulations to our President who has been elected to chair the proceedings of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. Thanks to his wisdom, his experience and his great knowledge, the work of this Session will undoubtedly proceed in a brotherly atmosphere and be crowned with success.

My congratulations also to Mr. Francis Blanchard, Director-General of the International Labour Office, who, despite many difficulties, continues to lead this Organisation in its struggle for world justice as a sine qua non for the achievement of lasting peace and for enabling everyone to exercise their right to pursue freely their economic and social development.

For two years or so now the Workers' delegates of the Rwanda Republic have been addressing this august assembly in order to announce the establishment of the Confederation of Workers' Trade Unions of Rwanda. They have spoken to you of their organisation and its difficulties, but also of its achievements and hopes.

May I, today, in my turn, tell you about the way in which the trade union movement is taking root in our country. Our Confederation now comprises about 70 per cent of the workers counted in the country. On 21 and 22 December last year, we held our second National Congress which elected a new executive team to replace the provisional team which had been responsible for managing the Confederation since the first Congress in August 1985. We have now effectively changed over from the provisional to the definitive but we have not yet attained our cruising speed. This is why I am taking this opportunity in order to thank, on behalf of all the workers of Rwanda, all the fraternal trade unions, the International Labour Organisation and the other organisations that have come to the aid of our young trade union organisation in one way or another. All I ask of them is to continue to give us a hand since we still need their help and their wise counsel.

I know that the present world economic recession is very hard on workers, particularly those in developing countries. I feel, however, that in this very difficult situation, international solidarity must come to the fore. Without such solidarity to help us through hard times I am afraid that world peace, the promotion of the exercise of human rights and social well-being will be hopelessly compromised. Let us all work together then for a better world, and preserve what we have already achieved despite the current economic problems. In this respect, I would like to join my voice to that of Mr. Blanchard who said "In difficult times equity and regard for human needs and aspirations are all the more important in determining choices and priorities".

In the Report of the Director-General to the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference we see that the accent is placed on basic human rights with reference to the ILO Conventions on freedom of association. I think this is a most important aspect for workers, particularly in these difficult times. We must alert politicians and the public authorities not to sacrifice the workers' interests and employment on the pretext of economic problems. It is precisely at these difficult times that consultation and general consensus, bringing together all the living forces of the nation, are needed to face up to the new challenges.

I am happy to be able to announce to this august assembly that such consultations have begun in my country and that, on the whole, the trade union movement is progressing on a favourable legal basis. The Government has already ratified the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87); the Workers' Representatives Convention, 1971 (No. 135); the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98). Additional instructions have been given in order to facilitate the application of these international instruments. The political climate is also favourable to the exercise of the right to organise, and the President of the Republic himself stresses, whenever he has the opportunity, that his ambition is to make Rwanda a true State of law.

Unfortunately we cannot say the same of the trade unions in South Africa which are threatened with extinction by the minority government of the country. The shameful application of the criminal policy of apartheid remains one of the main obstacles, and, unless eradicated, the world can never hope to attain either universal peace or social justice which have been the main concern of our Organisation since its inception.

The Confederation of Workers' Trade Unions of Rwanda, despite its youth and its very meagre resources is, like the Government of my country, in favour of joining with all other organisations, national and international, which have already been instituted or are about to be instituted, in order to courageously pursue the struggle for the liberation of the inhumanly oppressed majority people in South Africa.

I should like to conclude this brief statement by thanking most sincerely all those who have already come to the aid of our young organisation. I appeal once more to the generosity of all trade union and other organisations to support the workers of Rwanda in their process of organisation. I also appeal to the International Labour Organisation and its executive arm, the International Labour Office.

Long live the International Labour Organisation!
Long live international solidarity!

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. AL-JASSEM (Employers' delegate, Kuwait) – It is my pleasure as I take the floor to convey to the President the best wishes and esteem of the workers of my country whom the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Kuwait has the honour to represent at the local and international levels. I congratulate the President most sincerely on his election to chair the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference, while wishing him every success in directing its work. I am sure that he will be completely successful thanks to his experience, his abilities, and his wisdom, which are recognised by all.

It is also my pleasure to congratulate the Vice-Presidents of the three groups, and I wish them every success.

Many speakers have preceded me at the rostrum and have left little for me and those who follow me to add to what they said. That is why my remarks will appear to be to some extent restatement and repetition. But we are all in agreement on proclaiming what is right and speaking the truth, and remarks that are repeated here are not done so needlessly since they have the force of unanimity and consensus, particularly when it is a question of human rights.

Human rights, which the Director-General chose as the theme of his Report to this year's session of the conference, are undergoing a profound crisis which threatens to snuff them out altogether in many regions and fields. Most of the communities which have power and money and which have an influence on the regional as well as the international plane are in practice content to adopt the attitude of spectators who sometimes revel in, sometimes despise and sometimes express rather ineffective indignation at what is happening. Some of these communities do not hesitate to distort the truth, disguise and support evil, and revive bloody conflicts if their material interests so demand.

Those who stand in judgement are those who have delivered up human rights to ruin and destruction. They are those of whom God said in His Book that they disguise evil and conceal the truth in all conscience. They move heaven and earth for marginal or individual incidents if they find a favourable response with them or serve their interests. But their information media fall silent, their tears dry and their principles are cast aside and forgotten, when it is a question of the tragedy of an entire people, or even of many peoples. Often, in fact, they are implicated in the horrors of colonialism and racism from which the peoples of the world suffer and in the supply of instruments of death and destruction to the forces of oppression and aggression.

Guided by the firm stance adopted by the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Kuwait, which I have the honour to represent, in steadfast defence of human rights in general and employers' rights in particular, I address my distinguished colleagues, representing the employers of the developing and the industrialised countries, and ask them to meet their responsibilities in full and in the face of the injustice suffered by the Arab employers in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories, adopt an honourable and just attitude similar to the humanitarian attitude they have adopted on other less serious and less harmful occasions in other regions of the world in the past. For injustice, repression, arrests and expropriation are the same and do not differ whether in Palestine or any other country in the world. The situation is extremely grave and no delay or shilly-shallying is admissible.

The Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Kuwait expresses the views of the employers in my country, Kuwait, when it confirms the position adopted by the Director-General of the ILO, which states his respect for the ideals and values set out in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which is aimed at eliminating the injustices and sufferings of which men are victims wherever they may be, whatever their sex, race or creed, and to establish justice, equality and freedom of opinion and belief. In fact, these values fill the hearts of us Arabs and Muslims, since they were inculcated in us more than fourteen centuries ago by our glorious Islamic religion with a generosity of spirit which has known no equal. But the employers of my country do not share the view of the Director-General that the ILO has a specific area of specialisation in the field of human rights which is restricted to promoting their international standards of work, technical assistance programmes and certain missions specified by the Conference or the Governing Body. We feel and we believe that the ILO is, in its essence and by virtue of its objectives, a humanitarian organisation whose activities and actions are all aimed at achieving the freedom and dignity of man as the basic and objective of development. Therefore, the ILO must follow and pursue the events and conflicts taking place in various parts of the world, as well as their negative impact on human rights – through their influence on economic activity, the development and utilisation of human resources, the stability of labour relations and on other areas which are related to the life and preoccupations of the three parties which constitute the structure of the ILO.

We should have liked the Director-General's Report to have exposed and analysed the flagrant violations of human rights perpetrated in many countries and territories of the world, so that your august session may face up to its responsibilities and confront the forces of oppression and aggression which are spilling man's blood with impunity and violating his dignity and rights as if God has made them masters of the destiny of mankind.

The world you represent, whether at the official level or at the economic or labour levels, expects from your session the adoption of a historic position which would restore to human rights a part, even a tiny part, of their violated greatness and squandered values. This is not to demand the impossible of a conference which represents the conscience of the social world, and each of us must realise that if we are silent in the face of injustice suffered by others, then the corollary is that we might suffer in silence ourselves in some not far distant future.

Turning to the part of the Director-General's Report dealing with the treatment to which the Arab workers in Palestine and the occupied Arab territories are exposed – despite its cautious style and language – we can only ask the session to adopt a firmer stance with respect to the unjust and inhuman practices, which concern not only workers but also employers through exorbitant taxes, the closing down and wrecking of business, the destruction of industrial plant, the arrest of a large number of employers and the expulsion of others.

This is why I should like to take this opportunity to ask this august session to expand the field of the ILO's concerns and efforts so that it includes investigation of the conditions and the situation of employers in Palestine and the occupied Arab territories, since they suffer the same acts of injustice, repression and oppression as their brother workers at the hands of the Israeli occupation authorities.

In this context, may I remind delegations present here of what was said this morning by Mr. Felipe Gonzáles, the Head of the Spanish Government, about his Government's concern and the importance it attaches to the Palestinian cause and the problem of the Middle East, and also of what he said about the need for the ILO to take into account the sufferings of which man is a victim all over the world, whether on the political, social or economic plane.

There is no doubt that you share the opinion of the Kuwait employers that the continuation of the war between Iraq and Iran, which has been going on for more than eight years, is a terrible nightmare not only for the two warring States but also for their neighbours and for the whole world. We trust that the international community will adopt a firmer, more credible attitude, so that this war which is having a devastating impact on economic and human resources which could be utilised for the cause of development and progress may be brought to an end.

We cannot but support the positive attitude of Iraq which has launched appeals for peace, and we should like to launch an appeal to Iran that it may hear the voice of reason...

(Mr. Beyreuther takes the Chair.)

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – A delegate of the Islamic Republic of Iran is calling for a point of order. I should like to point out that, as we decided at the beginning of this session of the Conference, you can ask for a right of reply and I should like to ask the delegate of the Islamic Republic of Iran to make use of his right of reply if in his view the speech has not been within the limits of the basic topic of the session. I should like to appeal to the session to be quite clear that we must speak on the topics which are on the agenda of the Conference. If you abide by this rule, you are not going to find yourself in contradiction with another delegate. I should like to ask you to make your speech as brief as possible and it should not contain any insults or accusations against any other delegations. You may now continue.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. AL-JASSEM – At the beginning of the session you said that if a delegation had a comment to make it could be done after the speech which was then being read was completed.

I was saying that we support the position of Iraq in its appeals for peace, and we should like to ask those responsible, in Iran, to heed the voice of reason and put an end to the bloodletting and conserve resources and energies for the good of man on earth, in accordance with the principles of Islam.

Part II of the Director-General's Report mentions all the activities undertaken by the ILO in the past year which are characterised by continuity and diversity. We are proud to see that in spite of its financial situation and the diminution of its resources the Organisation has been able to maintain a high level of competence which we all recognise. For this reason, the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Kuwait, which I have the honour to represent, has sought to co-operate with the ILO in a joint programme which we began together last year and which took concrete form with a project for training and exchanging experience for a certain number of officials of Arab chambers of commerce. We trust that this co-operation will be continued and will extend to officials from other chambers of commerce in the near future.

As regards the training courses, I should like to draw your attention and that of the organs of the Organisation to the fact that the participation of the Arab countries in the workshops and seminars devoted to the Asia region has been at a low level in spite of the fact that they belong to that region in accordance with the resolution of the Governing Body adopted at its 216th Session in May 1981. I hope that the Organisation's organs will take that into account in future.

To return to the main subject of human rights, we are facing a grave violation of human rights in several regions of the world. I am sure that delegates present here will share my view when I say that the most arrogant symbols of the violation of human rights are Israel and the racist regime in South Africa, not to mention the forces supporting them. The role played by the Government of the racist minority in South Africa, which constitutes a base for colonialism and expansionism, is complementary to the role played by Israel as a base for colonialism and expansionism in the heart of the Arab and Islamic world.

There is no doubt that the co-operation between the two racist States on the political, economic and military levels and their pernicious methods of oppression, violence and terrorism prove that the racist Government of South Africa is an African Israel and that Israel is a racist South Africa implanted in the very heart of the Arab and Muslim world.

To conclude, I appeal, on behalf of the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Kuwait and the employers of Kuwait, to all delegates present here to make concrete their support for the values of justice, fairness and liberty in acts of which this session will be able to be proud. That could take the form of support for the resolution presented to this session of the conference on the rights of the workers and employers in Palestine and the occupied Arab territories. The very people whom the occupation authorities have deprived of their most elementary rights and who have become strangers and foreigners in their own homeland. It would be regrettable and unfortunate if we were to call this session the human rights session and close it without adopting such a resolution.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – Before I give the floor to the next speaker I should like to point out once again a few basic principles on which we agreed at the beginning of this session of the Conference. At the time we said that freedom of expression was a important aspect of the International Labour Organisation. If, however, we want to exercise this right in a spirit of mutual respect, all of us have to accept a certain degree of discipline so that our work may continue in an orderly manner and be successful. We must therefore be careful and abide by these principles. The Officers of this Conference have committed themselves to observing these rules. I repeat once again that your President has the duty to intervene in a debate whenever a speaker is slandering a State or a Head of State or is insulting another delegate. We are all delegates to this Conference and I urge you to make use of parliamentary language and only to speak on subjects which are relevant to this Conference and to avoid digressing from them. The other point I would like to make is that if a delegate present disagrees with a statement or cannot agree to such a statement for whatever reason, he has the right of reply at the end of the debate of a given morning or afternoon session. They should therefore notify the President of his intention to exercise the right of reply. That is how we agreed to proceed. We stressed that the right of reply should be brief, no longer than three minutes. It must also deal only with the topic under discussion and under no circumstances be a pretext for a new statement. Furthermore, in exercising his right to reply, the delegate must restrict himself in his comment to concrete and relevant topics and not resort to any insulting statements.

I thank you for having listened to this statement and for having listened to my repetition of the rules upon which we have all agreed for this Conference. I urge all the speakers to continue making their statements in this spirit.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. GHARIB (Workers' delegate, Iraq) – In the name of God, the Merciful and Compassionate!

I have the pleasure of greeting you and of transmitting to you from Bagdad, the city of civilisation and peace, the greetings of the workers of Iraq and their trade union organisation. Allow me, Mr. President, to congratulate you on the occasion of your election to President of this assembly and to wish you every success.

I must pay a tribute to the Director-General of the International Labour Organisation for his Report and wise selection of the topic, Human rights – A common responsibility. I share his point of view concerning the humanitarian guide-lines mentioned there and reiterate my thanks for the choice of topic, which he has made at a time when the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights is being celebrated and 20 years after the International Year of Human Rights.

There are a number of ideas and moral values of general value in the Universal Declaration but also certain specific items having to do with work and workers. The ILO, within its terms of reference, has translated this general trend into concrete reality through the elaboration and adoption of numerous international Conventions and Recommendations having to do with freedom to work, trade union freedoms, the workers' right to minimum wages, the right to social security, equality of treatment and the right of workers to satisfactory living and working conditions.

The Organisation, over a period of 70 years, has adopted legal instruments which have contributed and continue to contribute to strengthening the foundations and principles of human rights in general and workers' rights in particular. The workers of Iraq, like workers throughout the world, aspire to greater achievements in this vital sphere.

May I be permitted briefly to mention in connection with the first part of the Director-General's Report, certain achievements in Iraq and the innovative role assumed by the trade union organisation in that country. The workers and their trade union organisation have been in the forefront of struggle and productive work since the revolution of 17-30 July 1968, thanks to the permanent support and guidance of our President of the Republic, his Excellency Saddam Hussein – may God grant him long life! These active forces, which were previously marginalised and powerless have now become a key element in public life and are making a vigorous contribution to building a brighter future.

The revolution has provided proper guarantees for the establishment and maintenance of trade unions. It ensures and preserves the right to association. Thus the trade unions have been able to assume their rightful role in the workers' lives and in society, in a climate of democracy and progress. There has therefore been an increase in workers' participation in trade unions in all areas.

In the legal sphere Iraq has acceded to labour Conventions, both Arab and international, and this has made it possible for trade unions to fulfil their mission: reaffirming the sanctity of labour, protecting the workers' rights, helping them to preserve their dignity and improve their qualifications and talents. The trade union organisation has achieved these results by guaranteeing each citizen who is capable of working the right to work in equal conditions and with equal opportunities for everybody without distinction of sex, race, language or religion. The worker also receives satisfactory wages to meet the basic needs of himself and his family.

It was with considerable interest that we read the part of the Report on the activities of the ILO in 1987. I am gratified by the praiseworthy activities carried out in the five continents concerning human rights and international labour standards, the promotion of equality, women, and labour relations. This part of the Report also deals with the International Programme for the Improvement of Working Conditions and Environment, occupational safety and health, social security, manpower planning and demographic policy. Once again I should like to pay tribute to the efforts deployed, but I should like to stress the importance of workers' activities, both horizontal and vertical. This would be very useful, in fact even more useful than the programmes carried out by the Organisation, particularly when we think of the high level of qualifications required to be able to cope with technological progress in this era. Considerable work has already been accomplished by the ILO. Our Conference is requested to pay greater attention to the items on the agenda of this session of the Conference. The topics to be discussed are of capital importance for the cause of the workers of the world now and in the future, and worthy of due attention in discussions in Commissions and at the Plenary Session of the Conference.

Since 4 September 1980 Iraq has been the victim of an armed aggression aimed at slowing its progress and development and sapping its freedom and independence. Iraq has declared itself prepared to heed the appeals of regional and international organisations. This pacifist attitude had met with rejection on the part of our adversary who continues to make war and has extended it to neighbouring countries, while continuing to bomb residential neighbourhoods, schools, hospitals, factories, houses of worship and educational institutions.

As workers, we feel solidarity with the workers of the world in their aspirations and hopes. We know that those who lose most in a war are the workers. This is why we have always supported our political leaders in their efforts to put an end to this war and restore peace. We have supported workers throughout the world in this respect, when through national, regional and international conferences and meetings they have expressed their considerable concern over the continuation of the war.

The last such conference was the World People's Conference for Peace, which was held the last week of May; it was attended by more than 1,000 persons, including politicians, trade union officials, writers, journalists and intellectuals from around the world, who reaffirmed their opposition to this war and requested the application of resolution 598 of the Security Council.

From this international platform, friendly and fervent appeals have for seven years been launched for an end to hostilities. While transmitting the cordial wishes of the workers of Iraq to all who long for peace and ask for an end to the war, I should like to share with you their hope that the adversary will listen to reason and put an end to the war, by accepting ...

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – A delegate from the delegation of the Islamic Republic of Iran has raised an objection. I should like you to take note of this and not to deviate from the topic of the Conference. You may continue now.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. GHARIB – The International Labour Organisation says on the first page of its Constitution that its objective is peace and I am only advocating peace here, nothing more. We are only asking for peace but in return we get war. Isn't this deviating from the topic or from the Constitution of this Organisation?

It would seem, the people here are all seeking peace. This is not contrary to the objectives of this Organisation. Am I not permitted to ask for peace? Must I ask for war? Well, then let us all ask for war, since that is how it is here.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – I should like to ask you to refrain from polemics. You yourself pointed out that your subject would add an explosive note to our discussions. The problem that you raise cannot be solved by this Conference. We have no dearer wish than to see warfare brought to an end. There, we agree with you. However, you must refrain from making value judgments here. Please take these factors into account when making your speech.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. GHARIB – As I was saying, we accepted the unanimously adopted resolution, i.e. the resolution No. 598, adopted by the Security Council in 1987, and we subscribed to all its provisions.

Our Conference is urged to speak up in favour of an end to hostilities, to launch an appeal for the peaceful solution to conflicts and to encourage the adverse party to renounce the war and to agree to a just and durable peace.

For more than six months, the occupied Arab territories have been the scene of a massive popular uprising against the policy of the Zionist occupation authorities which is founded on expulsions, murders, the shedding of blood, the confiscation of land, the levying of taxes and the suppression of freedom. Women, children and old people, armed with a rare courage, are rising up against this racist policy in spite of unprecedented mass extermination and barbarous tortures. The Zionist occupation army is using destructive weapons of all kinds to crush the sons of Palestine and the citizens of the occupied Arab territories who have no other weapons than the faith in the justice of their cause.

The barbarity of the fascist crimes perpetrated daily bear witness to the fact that the Zionist occupation authorities have flouted all the rules, all the customs, all the charters and all the international resolutions and conventions. They are pursuing a policy which rejects humanity; they are defiling honour, cutting drinking water and building settlements on the corpses of their victims. The report submitted by the mission to the International Labour Office, in accordance with the two resolutions adopted by the International Labour Conferences in 1974 and 1980, reports on the findings of its inquiry and confirms that the policy of settlement and racial discrimination is continuing! This, as well as information received by the Committee on Freedom of Association, make it vital that the Zionist entity should be expelled from humanitarian organisations, especially the ILO, for having flagrantly violated humanitarian values and principles.

However, there is another racist regime, that of South Africa, which continues to apply its fascist, racist policy and, as in the case of the Tel Aviv regime, shocks all that is humanitarian in us.

I invite this august assembly to work towards the victory of peace and justice and to vote in favour of the Resolution concerning the protection of workers' and employers' rights and freedoms in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories.

In conclusion, I thank you for your attention, and may God be your guide on the road towards truth, justice and freedom.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. CIGANIK (Employers' delegate, Czechoslovakia) – Mr. President, may I congratulate you on your election. I have no doubt that you will deal with this responsible task very successfully. I would like to express the conviction that your election heralds a speeding up of the process of democratisation in the ILO for fuller equality of rights of all members and also equitable representation of the socialist countries in all its organs and its three groups. I also wish every success to the Vice-President in the Conference.

I would also like to thank the Director-General for his report on human rights which stresses our joint responsibility for fulfilment of these rights in practice. The adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights is a landmark in the progress of mankind. If we look back over the past 40 years of peaceful development, we see more and more that the implementation of human rights, particularly the economic and social rights which are within the terms of reference of the ILO, is a goal to be achieved step by step, the fulfilment of which requires constant effort.

For the practical implementation of the right to work and the attendant rights to freedom of association, the right to organise, non-discrimination at work, favourable and fair conditions of work and remuneration, social security and the rest, it is necessary to make available economic resources and to ensure their equitable distribution. The time since the adoption of the Declaration shows that some countries have been successful in developing their economy, although the 30 million-strong army of the unemployed in the OECD countries bears witness to the existence of great social problems, which confront the developing countries in a yet more drastic form in their struggle for the most basic living conditions.

The development of the economy has recently been widely discussed in the socialist countries. In Czechoslovakia, too, in spite of the fact that considerable success has been achieved, it is still necessary to seek new avenues of approach. What we consider most essential is that our citizens should be guaranteed basic social conditions and self-fulfilment in their work in harmony with the interests of the individual and of society. At the present time, we are trying to carry out economic changes which will lead to substantive growth in the efficiency of our economy. We have come to the conclusion that, to achieve such improvement, it will not be enough in the future to develop the existing economic mechanisms. We believe that the road towards it lies through enterprise development and an increase in managerial responsibility within the enterprise; in other words, by developing the process of democratisation in industry and in society. These changes should speed up the modernisation of industrial structures, particularly the structures of the engineering and processing industries. In enterprise development we depend particularly on medium-sized enterprises, on account of their flexibility in carrying out innovations and modernisation projects and on the initiative of our technicians and workers with their traditional high level of skill.

As the representative of the Czechoslovak Chamber of Commerce and Industry, I know that we cannot, in the short term, achieve this substantial task of modernising the industrial structure of the economy by ourselves. For this reason, we shall continue to depend on the traditional co-operation of the socialist countries, particularly the Soviet Union, which has for so long supported our economic development. However, we would like to develop greater co-operation with all other countries, including such new forms of co-operation as industrial co-operation and the founding of joint enterprises. We understand that the road to greater efficiency goes through integration on the world market and the fulfilment of its high requirements. We believe that to achieve these aims, we shall meet with full understanding from our colleagues in the Employers' group and from the employers whom they represent.

The Czechoslovak employers understand that their aim in the new conditions is to ensure full and productive employment. For this reason, we shall take steps to expand capacity for retraining and improving qualifications and to guarantee social security for workers who have been released from their jobs, in order to avoid negative social consequences as a result of the proposed changes. We hope for the full co-operation of our trade unions, whose role in this field is considerably increasing. We understand that our task in this field will be more complicated, the more successful we are in our aspirations to reach higher levels of productivity.

We would also wish to ensure for our workers full enjoyment of the right, mentioned in the Director-General's Report, to fair remuneration, not only as guaranteed by the Minimum Wage Fixing Convention, 1970 (No. 131), but also a full guarantee of basic wages for each occupation and each level of qualifications. By comparison with current practice, however, there will be a considerable growth in the role of those workers who are directly dependent on the economic results achieved by individual enterprises. Here there is new scope for collective discussion and increasing responsibilities for employers, workers and their organisation.

We also are prepared not only to retain but to strengthen our workers' rights to fair and favourable working conditions. When introducing new technologies, we shall take care to comply with existing world standards and requirements in the field of occupational health and the working environment. We have shown our readiness in this respect by our recent ratification of the Occupational Health Services Convention, 1985 (No. 161).

The discussion at this Conference shows that among member countries, depending on national conditions, major efforts are developing to achieve human rights, particularly those rights covered by ILO Conventions. However, the economic conditions to achieve this are not always present, so part of our appeal to strengthen the solidarity of all member States is to help one another in overcoming economic difficulties.

On the other hand, we look with anxiety at some other places in the world where there are still political conditions which make it impossible for human rights to develop. I am thinking particularly of the situation in South Africa, the policy of apartheid and the illegal occupation of the Arab territories of Palestine, which has already gone on for 20 years, in which the living conditions of workers and their families are constantly deteriorating. We fully support the measures which the ILO is taking to improve the situation. We will work for the adoption of further effective measures in accordance with the proposals laid before this Conference for discussion.

Our Organisation, thanks to its tripartite representation and its universality, has great potential for the further development of co-operation. We attach great significance to the regional conferences and associated bodies where so many practical proposals have been expressed along these lines. I have in mind the Fourth Session of the European Regional Conference. I believe that the ILO, in its future programme, will provide sufficient scope for the development of peaceful co-operation among its Members, particularly those States which have different social systems.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. POZO LEDESMA (representative of the International Association of Students in Economics and Management) – First of all, I must express my thanks to the Director-General, Mr. Francis Blanchard, for having invited us to participate in this 75th Session of the International Labour Conference and congratulate him on his Report.

I also wish to congratulate you, Mr. President, on your unanimous election to the chair of this vitally important international conference.

The International Association of Students in Economics and Management (AIESEC) was established in 1948 and is an apolitical, independent, educational and scientific international organisation run entirely by students. Our Association is present in 564 universities in 67 countries of the five continents.

AIESEC is composed of students and recent graduates in the sciences related to economics and management, and our principle is non-discrimination for reason of race, colour, sex, ideology, religion and national or ethnic origin.

Our purpose is fully in line with the aims of the International Labour Office: to contribute to the development of our countries and their inhabitants while strongly committing ourselves to international co-operation and understanding.

We are concerned with the development of our societies and are therefore carrying out various educational programmes such as the International Exchange Programme, through which students and professionals from 564 universities in the world receive practical experience in firms, institutions and organisations with a view to increasing the exchange of new technologies and thus contributing to the better educational preparation of youth. We also participate in social projects and programmes through which we make a direct contribution to the development of our societies. For example, we have the Global Seminars Series, with the title of "Our common future: The challenge of co-operation".

The AIESEC is one of the bodies that are educating and developing international leaders committed to world peace. We invite the government, employer and worker sectors to establish links with us to exchange their ideas and experiences with us because we, as young people, need your constant advice and support since it is we who will be the future workers, employers and rulers.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – Before, I give the floor for a right to reply, I would like once again to recall the established practice.

The reply should relate solely to the point under discussion. It should be brief, last a maximum of three minutes, and give no reason for further comment. It should also be drafted in proper and courteous speech.

I now give the floor to Mr. Hosseini, Government adviser, Islamic Republic of Iran, to exercise his right of reply to specific passages in the speeches made by Mr. Al-Jassem, Employers' delegate, Kuwait, and Mr. Gharib, Workers' delegate, Iraq.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. HOSSEINI (Government adviser, Islamic Republic of Iran) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate!

(The speaker continues in English)

Actually, I did not wish to disturb the smooth running of this assembly but, unfortunately, the Kuwaiti and Iraqi representatives have introduced extraneous issues in order to divert the attention of this Assembly from important issues that the ILO is facing.

It is well-known to all the distinguished delegates, that the Iraqi regime has ignored the basic principles of the Charter of the United Nations and of international rules and regulations, and specifically article 2, paragraph 4, of the Charter of the United Nations, has engaged in a total war of aggression against my country...

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – Mr. Hosseini, may I ask you to respect our rules of procedure and speak solely on those comments to which you wish to refer.

Mr. HOSSEINI – The regime which invaded my country on 22 September 1980 ignored all principles of international law and regulations, including the Charter of the United Nations. The repeated use of chemical weapons by that regime was a clear violation of all international law and regulations, especially the 1925 Geneva Protocol. The use of chemical weapons is unconditionally banned by the 1925 Geneva Protocol. That regime has used chemical weapons even against its own people. The same regime has again bombarded civilian areas, killing thousands of people, violating the 1949 Geneva Convention. And, now, the representative of this regime is asking for peace. If they were really interested in peace, why did they invade my country?

The Employers' delegate of Kuwait too was talking about peace. If Kuwait is interested in peace, why is it involved in the war? Why is it giving massive financial and whatever means it has at its disposal to that regime? Why did it invite one of the super-Power's armada to come into the Persian Gulf? This has created tension in the area. Now they are again talking about peace. It is ridiculous.

(The Conference adjourned at 6 p.m.)

Seventy-fifth Session, Geneva, 1988

Twelfth sitting

Wednesday, 8 June 1988, 10 a.m.

Presidents: Mr. Beyreuther, Mr. Tsujino

FIFTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – The first item on this morning's agenda is the fifth report of the Selection Committee. I call on Mr. Vargas Escobar, Government delegate, Nicaragua, Chairman of the Committee, to submit the report.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. VARGAS ESCOBAR (Government delegate, Nicaragua; Chairman of the Selection Committee) – I have the honour of submitting to the Conference the fifth report of the Selection Committee which appears in Provisional Record No. 5D. The report deals exclusively with changes in the membership of the Committees of the Conference. I accordingly recommend that the Conference adopt this report.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – The fifth report of the Selection Committee is now before the Conference. If there are no objections, I take it that the report is adopted.

(The report is adopted.)

FIRST REPORT OF THE FINANCE COMMITTEE OF GOVERNMENT REPRESENTATIVES: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – The second point on our agenda this morning is the adoption of the first report of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives. I call on Mr. Dasnayake, Government delegate, Sri Lanka, Chairman and Reporter of the Committee, to submit the report.

Mr. DASNAYAKE (Government delegate, Sri Lanka; Chairman and Reporter of the Finance Committee) – Mr. President, this is the first opportunity I have had to speak at the plenary of this Conference, and I take the opportunity to offer to you, Mr. President, my warmest congratulations on your eminently deserved unanimous election as the President of this Conference.

I have the honour to submit to the Conference the first report of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives, which has been circulated in Provisional Record No. 8.

The report contains the record of the Committee's consideration of requests for permission to vote submitted by the Governments of Chad and Poland, in accordance with paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the Organisation.

In the case of the Chad the Conference had in 1983 adopted an arrangement for the settlement of the accumulated arrears over a 20-year period. The Committee noted that, notwithstanding the persistence of severe financial and economic difficulties, Chad has honoured the terms of its arrangement for the years 1983-86 and had paid the amount of US$18,762, due by 31 December 1987, on 18 January 1988.

In the case of Poland the Committee has recommended that the Conference accept an arrangement under which Poland has agreed to pay its contribution by 31 December 1987 and, further, that the arrears of contributions that had accumulated up to 31 December 1987 would be consolidated and made payable over a 20-year period, beginning in 1988.

In both cases the Committee unanimously recommends that the Conference grant permission to vote in conformity with paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution in recognition of the difficult financial circumstances faced by these two member States in the recent past. The related resolutions, together with the resolution containing the proposed arrangement for the settlement of the arrears of Poland will be found at the end of the Committee's first report. The Committee also unanimously recommends that the assessment of the contribution of Poland to the 1988-89 Programme and Budget be fixed at 0.64 per cent. It gives me great pleasure to commend all four resolutions for adoption by the Conference. By doing so the Conference will enable our fellow Members to participate fully in all the work of the Organisation and of the present session of the Conference. Moreover, to the extent that the requirements of the arrangements for the settlements of the arrears are met in future years by both Members, the right to vote will in future be retained by them automatically under the Standing Orders of the Conference.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – The first report of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives is now before the Conference. If there are no objections, I take it that the report is adopted.

(The report is adopted.)

RECORD VOTE ON THE RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE GRANTING TO THE REPUBLIC OF CHAD OF PERMISSION TO VOTE UNDER PARAGRAPH 4 OF ARTICLE 13 OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANISATION

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – We shall now proceed to a record vote on the resolution concerning the granting to the Republic of Chad of permission to vote under paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the ILO.

(A record vote is taken.)

(The detailed results of the vote will be found at the end of the record of this sitting.)

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – The result of the vote is as follows: 384 votes in favour, none against, with 1 abstention. Since the quorum is 252 and since the required two-thirds majority has been obtained, the resolution is adopted.

(The resolution is adopted.)

ADOPTION OF THE RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE ARREARS OF CONTRIBUTIONS OF POLAND AND RECORD VOTE ON THE RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE GRANTING TO POLAND OF PERMISSION TO VOTE UNDER PARAGRAPH 4 OF ARTICLE 13 OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANISATION

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – We shall now proceed to the adoption of the resolution concerning the arrears of contributions of Poland and to a record vote on the resolution concerning the granting to Poland of permission to vote under paragraph 4 of article 13 of the ILO Constitution.

(A record vote is taken.)

(The detailed results of the vote will be found at the end of the record of this sitting.)

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – The result of the vote is as follows: 325 votes in favour, none against, with 1 abstention. Since the quorum is 254 and since the required two-thirds majority has been obtained, the resolution is adopted.

If there are no objections, I take it that the resolution concerning the arrears of contributions of Poland is also adopted.

(The resolutions are adopted.)

ACCEPTANCE OF THE INSTRUMENT FOR THE AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANISATION, 1986

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – I now have pleasure in informing the Conference that the Director-General of the International Labour Office has registered the acceptance by Angola of the Instrument for the Amendment of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation, 1986. This brings the total number of ratifications and acceptances of the Instrument to 39.

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL DISCUSSION (cont.)

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – We shall now continue with our discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of Director-General.

(Mr. Tsujino takes the Chair.)

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. EL-HAK (Minister of Manpower and Training, Egypt) – Mr. President, I have pleasure in congratulating you on your election as President of this session of the International Labour Conference. I am quite sure that with your able guidance, experience and wisdom you will ensure its success, to which we attach great importance for the protection of human rights and the guaranteed security and future of man.

I should also like to congratulate the Director-General on the achievements of the ILO during the past year in every field of its activities.

We have noted with great interest that half the technical co-operation budget has been allocated to Africa and the Least Developed Countries, which confirms the desire of the international community to achieve the objectives of social justice and co-operation for the well-being of peoples provided for in the Constitution of the ILO. In this context we should like to emphasise the importance of intensifying technical co-operation programmes for rural development in Africa and the need to pay special attention to programmes to extend craft industries and support for small and medium-sized enterprises, and to employing young people and women in the informal sector because it has the capacity to provide a large number of employment opportunities. We stress the need to have greater recourse to the services of national and regional experts and to link projects benefiting from technical assistance with regional development plans and programmes. We hope that the Organisation is going to speed up the implementation of labour information systems in order to facilitate the operation of data bases relating to employment, the labour market and social security, which will help us in the follow-up and evolution of the Organisation's projects.

We have noted that the technical co-operation resources allocated to the Arab region have been rather few in spite of the special circumstances which call for greater efforts and intensified programmes on the part of the ILO in the occupied Arab territories.

We have reviewed the Organisation's Medium-Term Plan for the first half of the 1990s, and greatly appreciate the priorities given to implementation of the United Nations Programme for Economic Recovery in Africa and the Lagos Plan of Action to meet the needs of the African continent in the fields of food security, agricultural development, the creation of employment and the elimination of racial discrimination. We agree with the principles established by the Director-General and which form the basis of this Plan. We emphasise the importance of promoting human rights and the guarantees they involve, and the development of human resources which in fact represent the greatest challenge the world has to face in order to ensure a better future.

The Director-General's Report on human rights is exhaustive, detailed and realistic in its analysis of the dimensions of this problem, and he rightly considers it to be a common responsibility. The Report concluded by saying that the activities of the ILO are of course aimed at fulfilling the principles set out in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, but that 40 years after the proclamation of these rights the gap between reality and aspirations remains a very wide one. We cannot blame the peoples of the world, especially those in the developing countries, for the concerns and anxieties they display vis-à-vis this rather bitter reality. We cannot deny that far from being respected everywhere, the rights of man to freedom and dignity are being denied and violated. We might even say that the world today is in danger of losing sight of the common development objectives, although they are repeatedly proclaimed in international forums we have every right to ask ourselves if it is possible to guarantee man's civil and political rights without guaranteeing his economic and social rights. Civil and political rights issues are an exclusively national responsibility, but each country's efforts to achieve its economic and social development cannot be isolated from the development of world phenomena since the policies adopted by the great industrial powers have a considerable effect on the stability of the international economic order.

The continued imbalance in the international terms of trade to the advantage of the rich countries has led to a decrease in the investment rate in the developing countries and to the inability of their economies to create employment opportunities to meet their development needs. If we add to this the very heavy burden of accumulated foreign debt, amounting to 40 per cent of their GNP, we should be right to wonder whether these countries will be able to sustain their development rates and guarantee the right of their citizens to productive employment at a fair wage and with adequate social security benefits.

The High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment has shown that the industrial countries assume prime responsibility and that what is required is political will and renewed efforts to help the developing countries to set their economies right; if that is not done, international social and economic stability will be subject to violent tensions and the gap between the rich countries and the rest of the international community which is living in misery and suffering privations will become even wider. In such circumstances human rights, democracy and peace will be jeopardised.

It is the duty of all of us to work together in a sprint of solidarity and with a sense of common destiny, if we wish to guarantee human rights which the Director-General has rightly described as our common responsibility. This does not apply only to States; it applies also to the relations between this Organisation and the other international organisations, for there is a need to co-ordinate the efforts of all institutions to achieve a convergence in their policies and programmes in order that they can overcome the problems they have to face.

The High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment was a pioneering experience in this field, despite the fact that it did not achieve the desired objectives, namely the establishment of a political dialogue between the parties, because of the absence of the great industrial powers, and the low level of representation of the other industrial countries. However, the meeting is a milestone in the life of the ILO, for it represents a new form of co-operation for studying problems and proposing solutions – we hope that this will continue in the future.

The Director-General has referred in his Report to the question of migrant workers. In this context I should like to recall what I called for in my statement to the International Labour Conference last year, that is that the International Labour Office should – and this is a necessity – strengthen its participation in the work of the working group set up by the United Nations General Assembly to prepare a convention on the rights of migrant workers and their families. I was pleased to see that the Governing Body, at its 239th Session last March, took a decision on the need to make the necessary arrangements to ensure effective participation in the work of this group so as to avoid any contradiction in the preparation of international labour standards concerning migrant workers and to ensure that the new convention is more progressive and relates more to reality than the existing convention.

My country is making great efforts to guarantee human rights as laid down in the conventions and other international instruments. We firmly believe that all men are equal in their rights and duties irrespective of their national origin, language or creed. This is why fundamental human rights and freedoms are not only guaranteed in Egypt by law, but also provided for in our Constitution, which stipulates that work is a right, a duty and an honour guaranteed by the State; it bans forced labour and requires that any service carried out in the public interest should be fairly remunerated. It also requires the State to guarantee social security benefits, health care and pension payments against invalidity, unemployment and old age.

The Constitution also provides for the need to reconcile a woman's duties in the family and her role in society, and makes her the equal of man in the political, economic, social and cultural spheres. The Constitution also provides for the right to set up democratic trade unions and federations responsible for defending the rights and freedoms of their members. Moreover, the Constitution grants free education to all citizens at every level including the university level. Labour laws and social security apply to all men and women equally without discrimination as regards wages or other conditions of work.

The principles of this Organisation reflects the will of peoples and the international community to establish freedom, well-being and social justice. Every year we come to this Conference to discuss the implementation of international labour standards and their violation in the case of individuals or groups. What can we say when a whole people, in South Africa and in Palestine, and in the other occupied territories are the victims of flagrant injustice?

The Director-General has confirmed in his Report the continued deterioration of the situation of Arab workers in the occupied Arab territories due to the Israeli policies and practices to deny them the possibility of benefiting from respect for human rights and for their legitimate national rights. What is of even more concern to us is to learn from the Report that the problems of employment in the occupied Arab territories always assume a political dimension, and that the root cause for this situation is the occupation itself; this imposes conditions which militate against any real progress in employment and any improvement in conditions of work and life.

We agree with the Director-General when he says that the present situation cannot go on indefinitely. We must therefore work unremittingly for a political solution. We support his appeal for effective efforts to be made to develop the occupied Arab territories in view of the insufficiency of the resources allocated in aid and for all international organisations, including the ILO, to implement a development plan that would enable the populations of the region to preserve their identity and to take part in their own development process.

Egypt has clearly stated its policy concerning the Iran/Iraq war on many occasions and in a variety of forums. Egypt also emphasises that peace can never be established on the basis of violence, terrorism and repression of the Palestinian people. Peace must be founded on respect for all the international instruments on the need to put an end to the Israeli occupation and to enable the Palestinian people to exercise their right to self-determination and to enjoy all their freedoms. It is not enough for the super powers to play the role of firemen here and there. Good office missions for peace are not enough to end war either unless the whole of humanity works together to solve the problems of the liberation of peoples, of their national, cultural, and social liberation by supporting the peoples who are oppressed. The international community must realise that those who have nothing to lose will not take part in a peace process unless this opens the way to justice and self-determination.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. TONELLI (Minister of Labour and Social Security, Argentina) – May I first of all extend to the President the warmest congratulations on the part of my Government and my own part on his unanimous election to this high office. It constitutes a tribute paid to the noble and friendly country, the German Democratic Republic, which he so well represents.

I should also like to congratulate the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Francis Blanchard, on the excellent quality of the Report that he has submitted to this 75th Session of the Conference. But, equally, the Government of Argentina unreservedly commends the choice of the subject of human rights as a basic focus for this international debate.

The Director-General has rightly said that this is an ideal common to "all peoples and all nations. The Universal Declaration of Human Rights recognised that the realisation of this objective depended on both national and international action. While expressing a universal morality of respect for human dignity, it also sought to safeguard the individual's physical and moral integrity through a series of legal standards".

My country still has fresh in its mind the memory of a difficult period in its history when human rights were trampled upon, is intimately aware in its national consciousness of the profound truth embodied in these concepts of the Director-General.

Today, in Argentina the national Constitution and the laws of the nation are fully applied. The judicial branch of the Government functions with absolute independence and there is no restriction whatsoever, despite the economic difficulties we are experiencing, on the freedom of association and collective bargaining, while the security and integrity, both physical and moral, of persons are safeguarded.

The Director-General said that it is in difficult times that we must give even greater attention to social justice. Argentina is passing through an acute economic and financial crisis resulting from the burden of external debt that my Government inherited when it took office and aggravated by an unprecedented fall in international market prices for our export products. To complete the picture of our difficulties, we must add the protectionist barriers and new forms of dumping which deprive us artificially of enormous resources that could be used for the spiritual and material development of our society.

Therefore, in order to keep social justice in mind in spite of the difficult period through which Argentina is passing in the process of transition towards the full flowering of the democratic system, a number of legal instruments have been enacted in the intervening year since the last session of the Conference, which considerably facilitate the participation of the social partners as far as remuneration and the qualitative aspect of labour relations are concerned. These are, first of all, Act No. 23,544 by which the National Congress ratified the Collective Bargaining Convention, 1981 (No. 154), adopted by the ILO in 1981. The legislative ratification of this Convention introduces a novel element in the commitment undertaken by Argentina to extend the system of collective bargaining to the public administration. Under the Act, within a period of 365 days, the new legislation that will establish the modalities for applying collective bargaining to public employment must be enacted. Within this framework, the National Executive has reactivated the Joint Commission on Wage Policy and other Conditions of Employment for the Public Sector, which is composed of representatives of the State and of the most representative unions, with, among other tasks, the responsibility for drafting the legislation to which the Act refers. Secondly, there is Act No. 23,545 which re-establishes, with some modifications, Act No. 14,250 which had originally been adopted in 1953. This Act, which is the substantive law for regulating collective labour agreements, had been abrogated by the de facto Government. The third of the instruments to which I refer is Act No. 23,546 which regulates the procedure of collective bargaining, and in which it is emphasised, inter alia, that the initiative for holding a discussion of agreements must come from the partners – employers and workers – who must notify the Ministry of Labour and Social Security of their decision. The last two Acts were immediately supplemented by enabling regulations in the form of two decrees this year to allow a start to be made on the collective bargaining without delay, as did indeed occur.

After 12 years, the best method for regulating labour relations in pluralist societies was re-established whereby the social partners – workers and employers – negotiate and reach agreement freely, through their legitimate representatives.

In accordance with the new legislation, the social partners freely discuss and agree on many aspects of labour relations with a view to their improvement such as reclassification and re-evaluation of tasks and jobs; plans to improve production and productivity with sharing of the profits arising from the implementation of these plans; the creation of joint bodies to assume with the aid of the State, the responsibility for everything connected with the improvement of the health, safety and quality of life of workers; the elaboration of agreed systems to prevent, and settle conflicts so as to contribute voluntarily to the maintenance of social order and to avoid causing harm to third parties; vocational training on a permanent basis for workers on the job and outside undertakings; utilisation of the contractual possibilities offered by undertakings and, of course, the wage system. Both parties will have equal powers of initiative in making use of this vast world of concrete possibilities that is opened up by the new legislation. The Ministry for which I am responsible will provide technical support at the request of the partners so that the negotiations will be successful. In this context, more than 150 negotiating committees representing approximately 3 million workers out of an active population of 7.5 million, have already been set up.

The 500 sectoral agreements that will be concluded in the course of this year can also be the basis on which to build the social compact advocated by so many representatives of national and international political thought. It is possible, therefore, that through collective bargaining we may find the Argentine method for giving effect of this social compact that is so greatly desired.

The Government of President Alfonsín, in putting into effect this labour system which he promised society, has chosen to look to the future with hope, trusting in the clearheadedness, imagination and sense of responsibility of workers and employers, who, through negotiation, which is always more fruitful than confrontation, will take the lead in democratising labour relations.

A set of machinery and systems for participation were set up within this framework of trade-union freedom. The Adjustable Minimum Basic Wage Council was re-established, representing the State, workers and employers, on a tripartite basis. On two occasions, the Council has already set the amount of this basic wage, which is paid to approximately 1.5 per cent of the workers. Starting in April 1988 the National Commission of Agricultural Labour started to meet. This Commission has recreated tripartite conditions for the discussion of general labour conditions and other questions specific to workers in the National Agrarian System. In this Commission some 600,000 workers are represented and they contribute to the creation of 14.6 per cent of the gross national product.

The fourth instrument which has been put into effect is Act No. 23,551 which does away with the repressive legal system imposed by the de facto Government, which weighed so heavily on trade union freedoms. With the consensus of the workers' organisations this Act established the whole system of trade union organisations that will provide a legal framework for the full and free development of all bodies representing the workers.

The subject of industrial safety and health in the construction industry, which is being examined at this session, is a very important source of concern to my Ministry. I am very happy to see that the pioneer work which has been carried out for some years, is today resulting in a true tripartite activity which is reflected in the constant holding of meetings, courses and seminars. One of our cardinal principles is that health is not for sale, but must be defended, and it is entirely foreign to our national policy to exchange health for money. My Ministry wishes to include the subject of working conditions in the joint discussions to which I have referred.

The Government of Argentina is determined to give rural workers the best possible conditions for developing and expanding their social organisations, through collective agreements freely entered into. To allow all rural workers the possibility of creatively participating in a dialogue, my Ministry has decided to introduce the operation at national level of the National Commission of Agricultural Work to which I have already referred, which is a strictly tripartite body which meets the demands of the social partners. It will be responsible for setting wages and laying down conditions of work, safety and health, formulating plans for vocational training and protecting the individual and family life of agrarian workers.

The problem of employment is a very critical question in my country as in all countries. The Ministry is therefore, with the technical co-operation of ILO experts, to whom I should like to pay a public tribute of recognition and thanks, trying to follow a policy of promoting and creating jobs, particularly in small and even very small undertakings.

But I must stress the enormous efforts which we developing countries are having to make in order to give our workers a standard of living compatible with human dignity. The results will not be commensurate with the efforts that are made as long as the industrialised countries do not provide a political solution to the foreign debt which is now such a paralysing burden for us, and do not free international trade from the discriminations which deprive us of very important markets for the products that we make with such recognised efficiency.

President Alfonsín, with other great thinkers in Latin America, is struggling along this path and in New York has just made a concrete proposal as a solution to this issue which is so important to our political systems. We believe that it is not too much to ask for fairer treatment that will reconcile all interests.

Argentina is going through difficult times but our difficulties are not insurmountable. The organisations of workers and employers to whom democracy has returned their role of essential participation, criticise or support the Government depending on their own legitimate interests, and with points of view which may be different but are exercised in absolute freedom. What we are doing is nothing more or less than ensuring a better future for our country through the unfaltering determination to preserve and strengthen the democratic system in the full power of human rights so that Argentina in future may participate in the marvellous adventure of creating a future without injustice, without marginal levels of the population, without war.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. RODRIGUEZ CAMPOS (Minister of Labour and Social Promotion, Peru) – May my first words be to offer the greetings of the Government of Peru to the delegates attending this 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. I congratulate the President of the Conference on the fact that he has been chosen to steer our deliberations, which I hope and trust will be highly successful.

One great virtue of the Director-General's Report this year is that it revolves around the question of human rights. This is a matter of outstanding importance at a time when the world is faced with a grave economic and social crisis and with irrational violence designed to undermine the very foundations of our civilization and to unsettle democracy itself.

Since the last world war, we have been experiencing a kind of euphoria of hopes and ideals. It was believed that the forces that had been generated by the fighting had burned out and that from the murder of millions would emerge a society in which permanent peace would reign guaranteed by the United Nations; this would be governed by a moral code based on the Universal Declaration of Human Rights which extended the rights already obtained in the economic and social fields.

Optimism was the order of the day and the people of the world began to look forward to a permanent peace accompanied by economic and social welfare.

Forty years have elapsed and unquestionably we have been unable to construct a new economic international order obedient to the principles enshrined in the Universal Declaration of Human rights.

During this brief period, there have been some remarkable increases in production productivity, national income and employment; we can admire the scientific and technical progress in uncovering the secrets of the immensely big and the very small; we can also view with concern the affluence which squanders goods and services. There has been unquestionable progress in the levels of health, education, expectation of life, and so on; however, this progress has obviously not been general, on the contrary, there is a steadily widening gap between a handful of developed countries and the undeveloped three-quarters of mankind, where we can observe widespread poverty, ignorance, high infant mortality, malnutrition and unemployment.

Hopes of a permanent peace are fading and the very existence of mankind is threatened. Wars between nations are becoming more frequent and there is growing internal violence and terrorism inside countries themselves.

In short, we are increasingly incapable of guaranteeing freedom and welfare for all peoples despite our command of nature, despite the efforts made by governments and international organisations, despite the conferences held and the statements made about peace and development.

The world we live in is a world of paradox and contrasts. The burden of foreign debt and nuclear threat call for generous reflection and decisive action to bring about a new order. This is by no means an impossible attainment if we take advantage of the maturity of human thought we have achieved; if we make use of science and technology; if we overcome the obstacles of financial egoism, the unjust inequalities between nations and recourse to violence as a mean to achieve our ends.

Mankind, which is steadily growing and becoming more aware of its dignity, is demanding a new society based on values which are enshrined in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

It is for these reasons that although we understand and respect the division of functions among the international organisations of the United Nations family we can neither talk of work in isolation nor ensure its protection and development in a vacuum. At this difficult time we must admit that labour problems are inextricably linked to economic realities and to the world crisis in every sphere. We can do little to achieve full productive employment, which is freely chosen and duly rewarded, and to extend protection of labour or improve social security if there are still major stumbling blocks to economic and social development in so many countries and if no solution is found for the grave problems affecting the world in general, especially the underdeveloped countries.

Many countries in the Third World, amongst them Peru, are still staggering under the burden of the repayments and interests on the foreign debt. This problem has still not been solved by the financial organisations. Economic co-operation is given in accordance with rigid rules which reduce inflation but increase the social sacrifices demanded of our peoples, who in any case are exceedingly poor. Underdevelopment is becoming a permanent state in most of the countries of the world where more than 2,500 million people enjoy incomes of less than 300 dollars a year.

The International Labour Organisation also derives its inspiration from the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and shoulders the heavy responsibility of intervening in the debate between the wealthy countries and the poor ones and establishing a new international economic order, despite the specific functions assigned to it. If it should fail to do so, the structure of labour standards patiently built up over the years will deteriorate and the standards themselves will not be applied.

This is not the time to adopt new Conventions but to reflect upon existing ones and their applicability. We need to make inquiries and exchange views on how to stop the undermining of the legal protection of labour and the appearance of certain atypical phenomena in the modern sector of the economy. We need to see how labour law can be extended beyond the traditional limits of employed labour to cover new forms of employment arising throughout the underdeveloped world.

We request a permanent exchange of views with the ILO so that we could make our new needs known and obtain the necessary co-operation. We call for increased co-operation between the regional organisations of the ILO and the ministries of labour so that we might receive their assistance, without discrimination, in priority areas for the governments.

I represent a country governed by a social and political movement which struggled for 60 years to be able to carry through a revolution in full freedom. We reached power, elected by an enormous majority of the Peruvian people, at a very difficult time when Peru was undergoing a stabilisation programme, based on the classical traditions of the International Monetary Fund, which reduced employment and workers' pay to an alarming degree. Nevertheless, this did not prevent the crisis from affecting productive activity, an expansion of the urban informal sector and an alarming extension of terrorism.

As I said last year in this assembly, in the face of this grave situation, the Government is applying an emergency economic programme: it is encouraging self-sustaining economic growth, drawing upon that part of industry lying idle, developing agriculture, making use of unemployed labour, expanding consumption, cutting inflation and decentralising growth. We are utilising economic resources derived from reductions in payments on external debt to no more than 10 per cent of export earnings.

It was thanks to this economic policy that the domestic product rose by 8 and 7 per cent these past two years and the level of remuneration did not fall; unemployment and underemployment were also considerably reduced. In other words, Peru's growth has been greater than other Latin American countries.

After this stage, there was an inflationary surge due to structural reasons traditionally affecting our country. The Government therefore decided this year to apply a long-term policy to deal with these specific factors. This includes dealing with the explosive population growth, and directing industry towards the satisfaction of essential needs. We shall try to take advantage of our own resources, no longer depending on foreign investment. We shall give a boost to work in the countryside by granting interest-free credit in some cases. We shall decentralise the machinery of government by eliminating maladjustments which have resulted in the concentration of all activities in the capital. We are also promoting exports with higher added value and national resources and limiting imports to the basic needs of the population.

All these efforts of transformation and change are being carried out despite great difficulties due to the still insuperable problem of debt, the shortage of currency, the scourge of drug-trafficking and terrorism.

As regards labour and social matters, my Ministry has analysed in depth the problems which affect labour and we have devised the general lines of a social and labour policy to take shape in our annual plans and programmes.

The Government gives the social and labour policy priority within its general policy, implemented by a political party formed by an alliance between manual and non-manual workers. Since its foundation it has contributed to the development of labour legislation with several Bills which it has persuaded Parliament to adopt.

The Government has begun to put some order into our chaotic labour legislation. To this end, work is in progress on a general labour Bill which I shall shortly put before Parliament. We have ratified the Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention, 1981 (No. 156), the Vocational Rehabilitation and Employment (Disabled Persons) Convention, 1983 (No. 159), the Occupational Safety and Health (Dock Work) Convention, 1979 (No. 152), and the Weekly Rest (Commerce and Offices) Convention, 1957 (No. 106). The executive has submitted to Parliament a draft Bill on collective labour relations governing the right to collective bargaining and the right to strike for workers in the private sector.

As regards social security, we have enacted Act No. 24786, dated 30 December 1987, referring to the structure and functions of the Peruvian Social Security Institute.

We have also enacted regulations for the Labour Stability Act and a set of legal provisions designed to speed up labour procedures.

As regards labour relations, I am happy to report that there has been an appreciable drop in disagreements between capital and labour, from a total of about 17 million man hours lost in 1986 as a result of strikes to 9 million in 1987. It is significant, too, that we have reduced the average number of days lost on strikes from 7.5 per cent in 1986 to 5.6 per cent in 1987 and to 5 per cent to date this year.

As part of our wages policy, the Government has given special attention to the defence of the purchasing power of the workers in the public and private sectors to avoid their being affected by inflation. In this context the Ministry of Labour and Social Promotion has to regulate workers' salaries in the private sector. Thus we are granting periodic wage increases to those workers whose wages are not regulated by collective bargaining, while in respect of those who depend on this system of readjustment we have devised machinery called "Additional wage increases" whereby apart from the initial increase given under the collective agreement, an additional increase is awarded after six months have elapsed. Similarly, my Government is constantly concerned to improve the wages of the unskilled who receive the minimum legal wage. Evidence of this concern is that in the two years and ten months that this Government has been in office the minimum wage has been increased by approximately 978 per cent.

The same policy has been followed with workers who by reason of age or infirmity have retired from work. We have taken a step of great social significance by introducing a mechanism laying down that there should be an increase in pensions, at the employer's expense, from 1 January 1988, depending on seniority and adjusted to the degree of skills acquired by the worker during his career.

In the field of employment, we have noted a significant drop in unemployment and underemployment, which had reached alarming proportions in July 1985. The policy of economic reactivation and emergency programmes has made possible a fall in unemployment from 10 per cent in July 1985 to 4.8 per cent in May 1988, while underemployment in the same period in metropolitan Lima, where 65 per cent of the active population is situated, has dropped from 42.5 per cent to roughly 34.9 per cent.

The Government is also extending occupational training to all economic activities, in both the formal and the urban informal sector. We are busy setting up a national system of occupational training to guide and co-ordinate the various institutions concerned. To this end, it is necessary that the ILO should avoid bringing in other institutions with aims inconsistent with labour orientations.

The Ministry of Labour and Social Promotion has by no means neglected other areas of the administration of labour such as occupational health and safety, social participation and development of preventive inspection. We have continued the process of decentralisation by creating other branch offices in various parts of the country and at present we are studying a new structure and new duties to improve the labour administration, particularly within the regions. These are now being organised under the Regionalisation Act currently in force.

The social and labour policy in force in Peru is applied in an atmosphere of full respect for the rights of workers, employers other sectors of the community. There is full respect for the Constitution and the law, including freedom of association, collective bargaining and the right to strike.

Four trade union federations represent the workers of my country in full democratic freedom and with guarantees for such freedoms. Trade union organisations have never been so numerous: 450 in the two-and-a-half years of this Government.

Under its national plan the Government, and, consequently, the Minister of Labour and Social Promotion is anxious to cope with the great problem of drug trafficking and terrorism. We are convinced that only with the unity of all Peruvians, will we be able to cope with these evils and that only agreement on various points will lead to development. We are trying to bring about long-term agreements between the political, social, labour and productive forces of the country on a programme which will go beyond the electoral programme to achieve long-term ends, leading to the revolution with freedom. Only so will we feel that we are faithful to the principles enshrined in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

In this great campaign by our country to overcome underdevelopment and the grave problems of the present slump, we shall need ever more help from the International Labour Organisation to ensure that international co-operation is an effective instrument.

All of us, nations and international organisations, must show by our deeds, not only through meetings and documents that we identify ourselves with the ideals and principles which inspired the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the 40th anniversary of which we are celebrating this year.

(The Conference adjourned at 1.15 p.m.)

Thirteenth sitting

Wednesday, 8 June 1988, 3.15 p.m.

Presidents: Mr. Beyreuther, Mr. Smith

COMMUNICATION BY THE PRESIDENT TO THE CONFERENCE

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – Before I call on the first speaker on my list, please allow me to take the floor for a statement by the President.

Following the incidents at the end of both sittings on Monday, 6 June, when a right of reply was granted to certain delegates, in the course of which a number of points of order were made; following also the representation which has subsequently been made to the Chair by the Government delegate of Panama, after consultation with the other Officers of the Conference and the Legal Adviser, I wish to provide the following additional clarification on the manner in which a right of reply should be exercised and the limits which should be respected.

As I indicated in my opening statement, concerning the principles which the Officers of the Conference propose to apply in guiding the discussions, a reply should refer only to the point under discussion. In other words, it must be limited to answering the matters referred to in the contested statement and must not introduce other issues of a different or more general nature.

Needless to say, the right to reply should not contain any personal offensive or insulting remarks about any Head of State or Government. The same applies to the general discussion, as I said in my original statement of principle at the beginning of the general debate.

In view of the very limited time available to the Conference, no right of reply to a reply will be granted.

In future, I and my fellow Officers will stop a speaker exercising a right of reply who goes outside these limits, that is: if he exceeds the maximum of three minutes; if he raises new questions going beyond a brief and factual reply; and if the intervention takes the form of a contribution in its own right to the general debate. In this way, there will be no need for a delegate to make a point of order from the floor.

I would also wish to draw the attention of the delegates to the nature and limits of a point of order, which is in essence a request to the President to ensure the observance of the Standing Orders, in accordance with his responsibilities under article 13, paragraph 2. Thus, in support of a point of order, a delegate should always refer to the specific provision of the Standing Orders which, in his opinion, is not being respected.

If this is not done, the President may refuse to entertain the point of order as not being valid.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – We now continue with the discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. NACHEV (Minister of Economy and Planning, Bulgaria) – Mr. President, allow me to congratulate you and your Vice-Presidents on the occasion of your election to your responsible posts at the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. Allow me, also, to wish you full success in your leadership of the Conference, the agenda of which has included a number of most important matters linked to the main directions of the activities of the ILO, of particular interest for the member States of the Organisation in the social and economic fields.

The current 75th Session is taking place at a momentous and significant period in the development of the political dialogue, in the framework of which we see a change in the traditional approaches to the solution of the problems of our times, with States setting aside old stereotypes and laying foundations for new inter-state relations for the future. The Soviet Union, together with other socialist countries, has proposed implementing a wide range of measures to strengthen confidence in Europe and the world and also to achieve a real decrease in military confrontation, with a view to changing drastically the military and political situation in the continent and the entire character of relations between East and West.

In the Address to the NATO States and to all the participants of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe there are a number of vitally important initiatives and proposals, the implementation of which would create an atmosphere of trust and co-operation between all countries, irrespective of their economic system or social structure. The basis of the proposals by the socialist countries lies in an awareness of the fact that the new situation in the world correspondingly dictates a new logic for political thought and a new content and form for the foreign policy activities of States. In today's world States live and operate in a single system of relations for them all. Their mutual activities, within the framework of this system do, inevitably, to a certain extent, lead to similar aims and problems, and more or less similar foreign policy interests which involves their acting together in many cases, not only in matters of maintaining and providing peace and security, but also in the social and economic fields. Without such a community of interests, it would not be possible to implement the principles of peaceful coexistence, of international co-operation between States on a bilateral and multilateral basis. In this regard we are all encouraged and stimulated by the positive results of this approach to international affairs.

Against this political background, we see the emergence of favourable prerequisites in order to provide new dimensions to the development of co-operation between ILO member-countries. Simultaneously, there is an increase in the responsibility of countries for a full and timely utilisation of the new possibilities directed at the enhancement and extension of this co-operation, at implementation of the objectives of the ILO and the utilisation of its potential for improving the living conditions of workers.

There is an indissoluble link between the problems of disarmament and the maintenance of peace and the provision of the possibilities for achieving the socio-economic rights of workers. In this connection, we fully share the spirit and approach of resolution 1987/9 of the Commission on Human Rights and more specifically the provision to the effect that the ideal of a free human being enjoying civil freedoms and free from fear and poverty can be achieved solely if the conditions are created for each human being to utilise his or her civil and political rights on an equal basis with his other economic, social and cultural rights.

Considering the matter of human rights in a context of general responsibility, we should like to congratulate the Director-General for the review he has presented of the activities of ILO in this field. We share the opinion expressed in the Report to the effect that the present moment is an appropriate one for a discussion of this theme. This is all the more feasible in view of the seriousness of the economic and social situation in many countries of the world and the urgent need to adopt of decisions that could assist in overcoming the present uncertainty and tension, in eliminating injustice, creating a political and legal order which would be founded on a strict ethical basis and respect for man.

The People's Republic of Bulgaria is one of the first States to have ratified the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights in 1975. Our country is also one of those which have ratified the greatest number of Conventions on matters of labour and social security drawn up by the ILO. I should like to refer in this connection to the ILO Conventions on freedom of association (Nos. 11, 87 and 98), the Forced Labour Convention (No. 29), the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention (No. 111), and the Equal Remuneration Convention (No. 100). Accepting the corresponding international obligations, the Government of the People's Republic of Bulgaria is implementing all necessary measures for their strict observance. This is in accordance with the socio-economic policy being carried out in the country, the main aim of which is to secure the prosperity of man, the achievement of social justice and equality for all.

Social justice, which is one of the characteristic features of socialist society, finds its expression in the true sovereignty of the people and in the achievement of genuine economic, political and social equality and in the creation of conditions for the all-round development of the individual. It also finds its expression in the availability of broad social guarantees providing real opportunities for work, access to education, attainment of culture, health service, housing, care of the young and the aged and the protection of the mother and child.

The dynamic development of Bulgarian society is also to be seen in the effort to secure the ever-wider and more complete achievement of the economic, social and cultural rights on which labour relations are based. The adoption in 1986 of a new labour code is of great political, social and legal significance. It reflects the entire essence of our social system, its purposes and principles, the democratic forms of the direct management of labour relations, the rights and duties of all categories of workers. The code consistently develops the ideal of a casting vote which must be available to the collective and to each individual in managing labour and labour relations. Thus, a qualitatively new stage in the development of socialist democracy is consolidated in law, and the basic substance of it lies in the transfer from the predominantly consultative participation of workers in management to the right independently to take management decisions on production, social and personnel matters. its role in joint social development is to be seen not only in the fact that it determines the legal status of the labour collective and its members but it provides the workers and their representative organs with a number of rights in the sphere of the strictly production socio-political and socio-cultural activity. The legal labour standards in the Code strengthen the genuine freedom of labour and establish behavioural models which open up a wide possibility for the participation of workers in the various spheres of social life, in the creation and distribution of material and spiritual goods, assisting in the development of the socio-political and creative activity of workers and the satisfaction of their many-sided interests.

In considering Part II of the Report of the Director-General dealing with the overall activity of the ILO, the Bulgarian delegation would like to mention particularly the efforts of the Organisation in its most fundamental activities, namely the protection of workers from the negative consequences of scientific and technological progress, the implementation of new technology, massive unemployment and the restriction of labour possibilities. We are glad to say that all these fields of activity are reflected in a number of programmes in the new medium-term work plan for the years 1990-95. For our country the experience of the ILO is most important in the field of setting international labour standards, the training of personnel at all levels, the improvement of working conditions and the increase of employment.

We are convinced that the framework of the ILO, with its participation by countries with different social and economic systems, provides a forum for a useful exchange of views, opinions and practical experience on a wide range of matters within the terms of reference of the Organisation, covering new methods and forms of labour organisation: professional and vocational training, methods for increasing labour productivity and a more effective utilisation of human resources. We are also convinced that co-operation must be implemented on the basis of equality and a balance of interests, taking full account of the positive experience in solving socio-economic problems that we have gained over the years of socialist organisation. In stressing the role and the possibilities of the ILO in this field, our country believes it is essential that the Organisation should enjoy the necessary conditions to prevent any power limiting or hindering the fullest development and utilisation of this experience to bring about co-operation on a multilateral basis. The successful session of the Fourth European Regional Conference last year and the positive results it achieved will not only assist in activating co-operation between the countries of this region, but shows the possibilities for the Organisation in cases where the participating countries are united on the objective factors and in their political will for achieving the constitutional aims of the ILO. This is where we see the main tasks of the Organisation under the new conditions, leading to the activation of political relations between countries. It is most important for the Organisation not to stand aside in such cases where dire violations of human rights take place. The ILO must increase its activities in struggling against racism and apartheid. More attention should also be paid to the problems linked to the clear violations of the rights of Arab workers in territories occupied by Israel.

The Bulgarian people are living through a revolutionary period of reforms. The latest Party Congress has established directives for a planned general enhancement of socialism on the basis of accelerating socio-economic development and the provision of a new qualitative situation for Bulgarian society. In order to achieve this aim the restructuring of all areas of the national economy is taking place and work is being undertaken on a broad front for the implementation of the decisions of the Congress. A particularly important role in the implementation of the course charted by the Party in accelerating socio-economic development was played by the July 1987 Plenum of the Central Committee of the Party, which adopted the concept of restructuring and a many-sided programme aimed at its implementation.

A central part in the restructuring of the economy is occupied by the primary productive entity, the workers' collective. Still more important, provision is to be made for considerable strengthening of economic management methods and for greater independence for economic units. We should also stress that the principal direction of the restructuring is the enhancement of the human factor in every aspect of life, on the basis of the principle of social justice.

The activation of the human factor presupposes the establishment of favourable conditions for labour, daily life and leisure. The everyday needs and concerns of the human being must always be put first.

The State and the Party have charted a course leading to the practical implementation of a strong social policy. We are convinced that this policy is a powerful tool for speeding up the development of our country, raising the labour and socio-political activities of the people, forming a new human being and affirming the socialist way of life. In pursuing this policy, striving to solve our socio-economic problems, we do not disparage what has been achieved by other countries; on the contrary, we strive to use all that is rational, useful and valuable in their experience, as well as all the possibilities of the international organisations, including the ILO, and to this end, inasmuch as human and social factors are the foundation of all progress, we are prepared to work actively for the achievement of all the constitutional aims of the Organisation.

Mr. KALAYANAMIT (Government delegate, Thailand) – It is an honour and a privilege for me to lead the delegation of Thailand to this 75th Session of the International Labour Conference and to be able to address this august assembly comprising distinguished international personalities from the world of work.

The regularity of these International Labour Conferences since the founding of the ILO in 1919, the continuity of the forum they have provided for deliberations involving various aspects of the economic and social conditions of people at work and out of work, and the zeal and commitment displayed by the delegates in the course of their deliberations, manifest the hope and conviction of nation – more particularly those belonging to the Third World countries – on the ideals on which the International Labour Organisation is founded.

Before I proceed with my comments on the subject matters included in the Conference agenda, may I extend on behalf of my delegation, as well as my Government, our warm and sincere congratulations to Mr. Beyreuther on his unanimous election as President of this assembly. I also wish to extend our heartiest congratulations to the Vice-Presidents that with their wisdom and experience they will discharge the difficult task assigned to them with distinction and bring the deliberations of this Conference to a successful conclusion. I wish to assure the President that he and his colleagues have the full co-operation of my delegation and myself in their onerous task.

The Director-General and the International Labour Office have once again displayed their time-honoured efficiency, by providing us with a very stimulating report on human rights and a comprehensive report on the activities of the Office during 1987. My delegation is very impressed by the conceptual and analytical approach adopted in the reports and other documents which have been made available to us to facilitate our deliberations. It is also very encouraging to us to glean from the reports that, despite conditions of austerity emanating from budgetary uncertainty and constraints, the Office has been able to maintain the high quality of its programmes to which member States are accustomed. We wish to place on record our appreciation of the skill and proficiency with which the Director-General and his Office have been able to mobilise their constrained resources to provide us with the programmes to which they were committed earlier as well as new programmes which they felt justified. This is another indication of the ILO's consistent endeavour to enrich the quality of life of working people.

A few of the distinguished delegates at this assembly may be aware that Thailand was one of the founder members of the ILO. Together with other founder members, Thailand pledged its support to the concept of human rights which has been the underlying theme of all ILO activities. While certain concepts in the field of labour are universally recognised, such as certain concepts of freedom of association, the right to organise and bargain collectively, the prohibition of any form of forced or compulsory labour, a minimum age for employment of children and acceptable condition of work with respect to minimum wages, hours of work and occupational safety and health, our belief in and our commitment to human rights in its wider concept, without any distinction, are enshrined in our Constitution. Any person, irrespective of his or her religion or religious beliefs, ethnic origins, sect, creed or sex is guaranteed civil and political rights under our Constitution. He or she is free to form or join an association, trade union or a political party and hold meetings, seminars and rallies without interference from the Government.

Labour unions exist in both the private and state enterprise sectors and many of them maintain unrestricted relations with recognised national and international trade union centres, labour bodies or trade secretariats. The right to strike is recognised and unrestricted in the private sector. Trade unions in the private sector have the right to bargain about working conditions and wages. In the state enterprise sector, however, collective bargaining is undertaken only in respect of working conditions.

Our Constitution generally affirms the citizens' right to free speech and a free press. Thai citizens enjoy substantial freedom of speech and are free to criticise the Government's policies. International publications circulate freely as does a wide range of political and social commentaries published by privately owned presses. All persons are equal before the law.

The right to education is met by the provision of compulsory primary education and there is complete freedom to continue one's education to higher levels, specialising in any area of the student's choice and in which he or she is capable of progressing.

Labour protection laws accord the protection of a minimum age for entry into employment and minimum standards of working conditions which the worker has the right to expect. In these standard-setting activities my Government works closely and in collaboration with both employers' and workers' organisations as well as other related social groups. The Constitution prohibits compulsory or forced labour except in exceptional cases arising from the need to avert or overcome calamity, armed conflict or war or where a state of emergency has been declared.

Creating employment opportunities, and making workplaces safe, so that workers in Thailand can exercise their right to work and to work in a workplace free of hazards to health and safety, are among the more important objectives engaging my Government today. Towards the attainment of these objectives the Sixth National Social and Economic Plan (1987-91) provides for the creation of 3.9 million jobs to offset the demands of the increasing labour force. To ensure that the workseeker is equipped with basic education and elementary skills, formal training institutions are being encouraged to relate their training programmes to changes in skill demands in the labour markets. For the small-scale sector, where the majority of the labour force is employed and will continue to be so, encouragement is being given to supplement on-the-job training with courses in basic industrial skills, especially those related to small-scale engineering. Emphasis is being given to small-scale industries in the provincial areas. These courses would be combined with other training programmes to upgrade industrial skills for workers intending to migrate abroad.

In this framework of creating employment opportunities and providing safe workplaces, the rural and the informal sectors, which comprise numerous small and medium-sized enterprises and where more than 60 per cent of Thailand's labour force is employed, have been identified for special development approaches. One hundred million US dollars per annum have been allocated under the Sixth Plan to the improvement of the socio-economic conditions of the rural people. The need for a more comprehensive social security scheme, including sickness benefit, has been felt, but because of many constraints we were unable to widen the scope of our present modest scheme which provides for workmen's compensation benefit. However, in response to this need and with the earlier constraints easing, my Government has drawn up draft legislation for a wider coverage, and this draft is now under study.

In its activities to make workplaces free from hazards, to improve the health and safety of those who work there and to remedy unsatisfactory working conditions, my Government is making significant progress. With the assistance of the ILO and the UNDP, the National Institute for the Improvement of Working Conditions and Environment (NICE) has been established and it constitutes an important division of the Department of Labour. Since its establishment in 1983, NICE has been actively involved in strengthening the existing institutional systems, procedures and technical capabilities within the Department of Labour, which has the primary responsibility for the protection of workers. Its efforts are demonstrated in the strengthening of our labour inspection system and administration, in the improvement of regulatory procedures, in an increase in promotional activities concerning safety and in the increase in provision of safety and health training and information services to employers, workers and to the community at large.

My Government's commitment in this area is also reflected in the Sixth Development Plan. Again, with the assistance of the UNDP Plan of the ILO through the PIACT, the activities of NICE, which now serves as a national centre, are being extended to growth centres in provincial areas. Three regional centres are being set up – in the eastern, western and northern regions of Thailand. Under a third project, also with the assistance of the ILO through PIACT, and the UNDP, a Major Accident Hazards Control System is being developed to control potential major hazards arising from the use of dangerous chemicals and to improve the working conditions of industrial workers exposed to such hazards. With assistance from the Canadian International Development Research Centre (IDRC) the Occupational Safety and Health Information Centre of NICE is being strengthened and upgraded to process and disseminate to users information relating to the whole gamut of occupational accident prevention, protection from occupational diseases and provision of improved working conditions. I am confident that we could expect to see in the foreseeable future a substantial number of workplaces in Thailand meeting the workers' right to work in safe, healthy and satisfactory conditions. My Government wishes to record its appreciation of the ILO's assistance it continues to receive towards improving the working conditions of workers and providing them with protection from occupational injuries and diseases.

I wish the Conference every success in its deliberations.

(Mr. Smith takes the Chair.)

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. CHEIKHROU-HOU (Minister of Social Affairs, Tunisia) – I would like to begin by extending our warmest congratulations to Mr. Beyreuther on his election to the presidency of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. I am convinced that his vast experience will ensure the success of our work. We also hope that, under his enlightened guidance, we shall be able to adopt a body of resolutions and Recommendations that will be devoted to the objectives for which this Organisation was created and give tangible form to the aspirations of the international community for justice, peace and freedom in the world.

The judicious choice by the Director-General of the International Labour Office of Human rights – A common responsibility as the theme for his Report demonstrates, if further proof were required, the desire of the International Labour Organisation – this body which represents the social conscience of the international community – to respond to people's concerns and their hope of freedom, dignity and justice.

The analysis made by the Director-General covers every aspect of the subject, in particular the activities of the ILO in safeguarding human rights, more especially since the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights in 1948.

Tunisia, which since its early years of independence has ratified the international Conventions and Recommendations on human rights, has made great progress in this field by guaranteeing decent conditions of life for citizens and protecting their fundamental rights and freedoms.

The political reform which took place in Tunisia on 7 November 1987 embodies the aspirations of Tunisians for democracy, freedom and social justice. These aspirations were echoed in the profound faith felt by the author of this reform, President Zein-el-Abedine Ben Ali in the principles on which the rule of law and respect for human rights, be these civil, political, economic or social are founded.

The basic principles of this reform have been translated into a number of measures, the most important of which are as follows: the limitation of preventive detention, the abolition of the Court for State Security and the Office of the Attorney General of the Republic, the release of political prisoners and the annulment of judgements rendered in the case of certain Tunisian political personalities.

Moreover, the Constitutional Council was set up to control the constitutionality of the laws, and the Economic and Social Council was reorganised in order to open it to various intellectual and political currents of thought.

As regards the safeguarding of democratic values, a new law on parties has been passed, while press and the electoral Code and a law on associations are now being prepared.

With respect to freedom of association, to which attention has been devoted in the Director-General's Report, President Zein-el-Abedine Ben Ali has made it possible for the organisation of Tunisian workers, i.e. the General Confederation of Tunisian Workers, to emerge from the crisis in which it has been caught up for several years. The trade union leader, Elhabib Ashour, was released immediately after the reform of 7 November and efforts were then made to promote cohesion among the unions, and trade unionists of various persuasions announced on 1 May this year that a national committee for trade union understanding was being set up to organise an extraordinary conference of the Confederation of Workers.

Thanks to this political initiative, the Confederation of Workers has been revived and now occupies its rightful place in our society and among the other organisations, because we believe in the value of dialogue among the different forces in our country.

When we examine the Report of the Director-General entitled Human rights – A common responsibility I have to admit that we still have a long way to go, and that the chronic problems of equality in social matters, and of equal opportunity in work, and economic rights such as the right to employment and to the satisfaction of our basic needs demands concerted efforts, both nationally and internationally, to achieve the requisite progress in this field.

The problem of the promotion of rural employment, to which our session devotes one of the items on its agenda, is closely related to our chances of success in eradicating poverty and establishing the minimum conditions necessary for human dignity.

Economic stagnation, which most of our countries have experienced in the last few years, has prevented us from finding adequate solutions to the problem of unemployment. This is becoming an increasingly heavy burden, chiefly because of the growing number of young people seeking employment and the drop in the rate of production in many countries. As a result we are witnessing a recrudescence of the rural exodus and the over-crowding of the towns which, in numerous countries, has led to a deterioration in the quality of life.

Our capacity to master these problems is conditional upon our capacity to devise a rural development policy which will boost production, absorb job-seekers, diversify rural employment alternatives and lead to the formulation of special rural development programmes.

Tunisia has given special priority to these problems; it began, 15 years ago, to implement rural development programmes to complement national programmes designed to promote agricultural development and increase food production. Agricultural production is now less vulnerable to adverse meteorological conditions, thanks to greater irrigation, but is still dependent upon the level of rainfall. Tunisia has acquired much experience in the mobilisation of unemployed workers in large-scale soil and water conservation projects and in the development of the rural infrastructure. These projects provide supplementary employment for workers affected by slack periods in agricultural production.

This policy has been strengthened during the past few years in order to alleviate the negative effects of the economic reforms on employment incomes. In this connection, the Tunisian Government adopted several measures to provide assistance to the poorest families.

In order to improve and strengthen these programmes, we have undertaken, with the ILO's assistance, methodical efforts to acquire a better understanding of poverty in order to devise projects to raise the standard of living of the poor and to bring them more fully into economic life.

May I take this opportunity to express my deep gratitude to the Director-General for his support and for the technical assistance the ILO has provided to help us to implement this pilot project, and express the hope that this assistance will continue and extend to other projects for the benefit of the poor in our country.

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights continues to be violated by regimes founded on injustice, chief among them the racist regime of South Africa and the State of Israel.

The tragedies and injustice to which the Palestinian people in the occupied territories are exposed are a flagrant affront to the conscience of humanity and a violation of human rights.

From this august rostrum, I should like to pay tribute, on behalf of Tunisia, to all forms that the Palestinian struggle is taking to try to change this bitter situation and combat all the measures – which include torture, expulsions and liquidation – taken by the State of Israel to impose its will on these people, uphold their colonisation policy and deprive Palestinian citizens of their most fundamental rights of dignity and freedom. I should also like, on behalf of Tunisia, to pay tribute to the struggle of the children who are casting stones and rocks and who have created – and are still creating – the framework of a new situation in which their people's right to freedom will be guaranteed.

We believe that human rights are indivisible and the credibility of our speech on behalf of human rights is dependent upon the capability of the international society to do away with all forms of exploitation, racial discrimination and the deprivation of people's rights to self-determination, freedom and dignity.

Tunisia has always endeavoured to respect all its commitments towards the International Labour Organisation. Given the interest it attaches to the standards set down by this Organisation, the Government of my country is making all the necessary efforts to submit the Conventions and Recommendations to the competent authorities with a view to their ratification and implementation. In this context, I am pleased to inform the Conference that the ratification procedures concerning the Labour Administration Convention, 1978 (No. 150), have been completed and that steps to ratify the Human Resources Development Convention, 1975 (No. 142), are under way.

I would also like to mention the support the ILO has given to an initiative by Italy and Tunisia to set up a Tunisian enterprise and the support given by the centre to study migrant flows in the Mediterranean area.

As stated by my Italian colleague, Mr. Reno Formica, in his speech on 2 June, this initiative is the outcome of a meeting of Labour Ministers of the countries concerned which was held last year and the work of experts involved in this project.

Before concluding, I would like to express my great consideration for Mr. Francis Blanchard, Director-General of the International Labour Office, for the great competence he has shown in the fulfilment of his duties and for his important achievements which have helped to consolidate the influence of this Organisation so that it might remain a living expression of universal consciousness and be an intellectual force with which to reckon.

Mr. NYAKATURA (Deputy Minister of Labour, Uganda) – I should like to join other distinguished delegates who have spoken before me in congratulating Mr. Bayreuther and the other Officers upon their election to guide the work of this Conference. I wish also to assure them of my delegation's support and co-operation throughout the deliberations.

The Director-General could not have chosen a better topic for discussion this year than the topic of Human rights – A common responsibility, at a time when, as Members of the ILO, we are marking the 40th anniversary of the adoption of one of the key human rights Conventions of our Organisation, the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87); what is more, the United Nations Commission on Human Rights also held its 44th Session in this same hall in February-March this year. As you are aware, the Commission met to review the human rights situation throughout the world and I am glad to state that Uganda was fully represented by my colleague, the Minister of Justice and Attorney-General. In his address, he recounted the political turmoil of nearly 20 years which my country went through before the coming into power of the present Government two-and-a-half years ago.

Because of that terrible experience, the people of Uganda have become aware of the value of human rights and freedoms. We therefore know from practical experience what it means when one loses them. The trampling down of human rights in Uganda until two-and-a-half ago is still fresh in the minds of all peace-loving people; thus, while I shall briefly refer to that past human tragedy, I shall also endeavour to show the steps my Government has taken since coming into office to ensure that the re-established fundamental human rights and freedoms of the people of Uganda are never violated again.

The socio-economic and political problems of Uganda started in 1966 when the then Prime Minister Milton Obote, in order to avoid elections, abrogated the Constitution and replaced it with one which made him a self-imposed executive head of state. This he achieved through the use of the might of an inherited colonial army headed by his protégé, the infamous Colonel Idi Amin. From that time onwards and for nearly two decades, Uganda experienced the deliberate use of state power and state machinery by those in government authority to violate the fundamental human rights and freedoms of the people.

The eight years of Idi Amin's rule was not only a continuation of what Obote had initiated but it intensified the terror that had been started. Hundreds of thousands of Ugandans were brutally murdered, arbitrarily arrested and subjected to all forms of despicable torture, cruelty and inhuman and degrading treatment by government security forces and intelligence agencies. People throughout the country disappeared without trace on a massive scale. The infamous regime legitimised these disappearances by promulgating a Decree entitled "Estate of Missing Persons (Management) Decree 1973" which, ironically, was to alleviate some of the social problems caused by this phenomenon. The promulgation of the Decree was a clear testimony that the new phenomenon of "missing persons" had come to stay.

The era of the second Obote regime in the first half of this decade witnessed yet another epoch of brutalisation of the Ugandan people. This time, grasping his second chance of state power and determined more than ever before to entrench himself, Obote once again meted out terror on the people of Uganda. Hundreds of thousands of lives were lost through state-inspired mass murders and disappearances. Arbitrary arrests and detentions were the order of the day. New forms of torture of persons under detention, using molten liquids and other inhuman and degrading types of treatment, were evolved and intensified. Families and entire communities were uprooted from their homes and land on ethnic grounds on an account of real or imagined political affiliation. The destruction of houses of the alleged opponents and the looting of personal property became normal practice. Hundreds of thousands of innocent Ugandans, including professionals, were forced to flee their country and become destitute refugees in other countries. All these atrocities were being committed despite the fact that at national level, fundamental human rights and freedoms were entrenched and guaranteed under the Constitution.

It is against this background that Ugandans, under the leadership of Yoweri Museveni, launched a people's war against the fascist and repressive forces of our country; they were finally defeated on 26 January 1986.

When the National Resistance Movement took over the leadership of the country, it pledged as its primary objective the restoration, observance and protection of people's human rights and freedoms. In its Ten Point Programme setting out the guide-lines for the administration of the country, the National Resistance Movement recognises democracy, security and the rule of law as fundamental prerequisites for the enjoyment of human rights as well as for the economic, social and cultural advancement of any people. During the last two-and-a-half years my Government has been in office, considerable strides have been made in this regard.

Having realised that the country's past misfortunes were mainly caused by corrupt politicians who manipulated the armed forces to commit inhuman activities, we have developed a truly motivated, people's army out of a disciplined and politicised guerrilla force, that is fully committed to protecting people and their rights.

Last year, when the defeated armies of former regimes at the command of their discredited political cohorts sought to disrupt security in some parts of the north and east of the country, the National Resistance Army demonstrated not only that it was capable of defending the hard-earned peace and security, but that it could do so without compromising its commitment to the respect for human dignity and the protection of people's rights. In the process the so-called rebels came to realise how they had been misled and misused in the past by former politicians. Consequently, a large number of them have accepted the presidential amnesty and surrendered. In a spirit of reconciliation and accommodation, the Government has accepted, after a screening exercise, to integrate those who qualify into the new army and rehabilitate into useful citizens those it cannot integrate. With this achievement, peace and security have been re-established. It is now the determination not only of the Government, but also of the entire Ugandan people, to guard it jealously and never again permit it to be whittled away. Every person is subject to the law; nobody is above the law.

Bearing witness to the seriousness the National Resistance Movement Government attaches to human rights, it appointed a Commission of Inquiry into the violation of human rights in 1986. The Commission is now engaged in collecting evidence regarding the manner in which and by whom human rights in Uganda were violated during past Governments. One of the duties of the Commission is to recommend possible ways of preventing the recurrence of such massive violation of human rights in the future.

Within the first year of its office in Government, the NRM Government became one of the first few OAU member State Governments to ratify the OAU Human Rights Charter.

It is on the basis of this positive development in my country that I am able to state with confidence that the rights of all the Ugandans in general and the workers' and employers' organisations in particular are for the first time guaranteed. As the Director-General has rightly stated in his Report, the absence of these civil liberties removed all meaning from the concept of trade union rights. This was quite true in the case of my country because, whereas fundamental human rights and freedoms are guaranteed under the national Constitution, the trampling of these same liberties by state agents made a mockery of these very guarantees. Under the circumstances, the employers' and workers' organisations in order to save their skins preferred to keep a low profile without exercising their rights. This was the case despite the fact that Uganda has for a long time been a signatory to a number of key ILO Conventions relating to the protection of human rights, namely, the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention 1949 (No. 98), the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957, (No. 105) and the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122). However, since the coming to power of the present Government which, as already explained, has ushered in an era of peace and security without interference or intimidation, the employers' and workers' organisations have gained self-confidence. As a result, both organisations have been able to conduct elections for their leaders at every level without undue interference from Government. Various trade unions are also freely conducting collective bargaining for better terms and conditions of employment and carrying out their educational programmes without hindrance.

The Government further recognises the principle of tripartism. It is currently carrying out consultations with the social partners so as to reconstitute a nationally representative tripartite labour policy advisory organ.

As already stated, the majority of ILO Conventions related to the protection of human rights are covered under our Constitution, so that in practice their aims and aspirations are fully recognised and appreciated by the Government. In this respect, special reference is made to the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) and the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), and the principle of the right to full, productive and freely chosen employment. The Constitution makes it absolutely clear that there shall be no form of discrimination in employment based on sex, creed or ethnic origin. There is open competition for jobs and appointment, based on merit.

To actualise the aspirations of the Constitution and these ILO Conventions, the National Resistance Movement Government has appointed five women as Ministers, one of whom is responsible for women's affairs.

The Government further recognises the right of the workers to just and favourable conditions of work and the right to social security. In line with this, it has ratified the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), and has enacted the relevant legislation, namely the Employment Decree, which ensures just and favourable conditions of work; the Factories Act which protects workers against hazards arising from machinery, equipment, etc., and the Social Security Act which has transformed the Social Security Department of the Ministry into a corporation to provide for better services and benefits for the workers.

As one of the measures to improve the employment situation in the country, the Government has embarked on a vigorous policy of rehabilitating the infrastructure, including construction and repairs of both major and feeder roads, factories, the hotel industry, etc. And since Uganda is primarily an agricultural country, the Government is convinced that the provision of road communications to open up rural areas, complemented by the provision of soft-term agricultural loans in the form of rural farmers' credit schemes will improve the level of employment and the general standard of living.

At this juncture, on behalf of my delegation, the Government and entire people of Uganda, let me take this opportunity to thank all friendly countries, international donor agencies and organisations who are rendering assistance in various fields in the rehabilitation of our country.

Before leaving the topic of human rights I wish to register my Government's condemnation of the evil policy of apartheid by the regime of South Africa, with its violation of fundamental rights and freedoms of the Black people of Azania and Namibia. We are not against the White people in South Africa; we are vehemently opposed to the institutionalised system of apartheid.

In the same vein, my Government condemns the repressive measures meted out by Israel to the Palestinian people in their own occupied land. We urge the international community to intensify their efforts to ensure that the oppressed people of South Africa and the Palestinians regain their human rights and their homelands.

Before I conclude my remarks I wish to take this opportunity to thank the ILO for its programme of assistance in Africa in general and Uganda in particular. My Government particularly appreciates the concern the ILO shows for the development of Africa considering that more than half of the regular budget is devoted to technical assistance to African States. In this connection, I wish to thank the ILO for the successful Special Public Works Programme in my country. It is the earnest wish of my Government that the programme should be extended to other areas in the country. I should also like to thank the ILO for the ongoing manpower survey which we are confident, when completed, will give us very useful data for our planning purposes to rehabilitate our economy, for the workers' educational programmes and for the recently launched "Improve your business" programme.

Finally, on behalf of my delegation and indeed of my country, let me conclude by commending the ILO for its efforts in promoting the observance of human rights, freedoms and social justice of the individual. In this endeavour my country will always remain an ally of the ILO.

Mr. TYTLER (Minister of State for Labour, India) – I extend to Mr. Beyreuther, on behalf of my country, my delegation and my own behalf, our heartiest congratulations on his election as President of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. We also extend our felicitations to the Vice-Presidents who will be assisting him in the conduct of this Conference. I am sure that he and his colleagues will guide this Conference through fruitful discussions to conclusions on the important items of the agenda.

Human rights have to be the basis for the evolution of an equitable, just and humane world social order. Peace and stability are based on deep respect for human rights. This is irrespective of political beliefs, because human rights are above all political systems and governments. India welcomes the discussion of the ILO's role for the realisation of human rights, not only in the past but even in the future. To this extent, we welcome the Director-General's report on human rights, which has been placed before this Conference. At the outset, my delegation would like to place on record its view that human rights cannot be confined within, or related solely or even principally, to the activities and set standards of the ILO. This would confine the evolution of the social, economic and international order for the attainment of human rights within perhaps too narrow a compass, as compared with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

The world has changed beyond recognition in the past 40 years. Nations once economically powerful are today displaced from their positions. Vast technological changes have come about, affecting every aspect of society. These include the general ethical notions contained in the Universal Declaration. Factors like: declining growth rates, the restrictive trade policies of some developed economies, the negative transfer of resources to the poorer nations from the industrially advanced countries and the profound changes in the organisation of work arising from the technological revolution have led to the emergence of grave unemployment, halting economic growth, a crushing burden of debt and diminished prospects for the future. Any standards, if they are divorced from a careful analysis of their affects on human rights, will pose the following dilemma.

Large segments of the working populations in developing countries are in the unorganised sector. Since the standards are mainly designed for organised workers, they may mean the denial of human rights for the unorganised, given the constraints to growth, and also the low availability of resources. In my country this dilemma is evident in the fact that over 90 per cent of the labour force is in the unorganised sector, and that mostly in agriculture. The share of agriculture in our net domestic product has come down in the past 40 years from around 60 per cent to a little over 30 per cent. The proportion of the population in agriculture has come down only marginally, from around 70 per cent to 66.5 per cent. Consequently, per capita NDP in the organised sector is nearly six times that of agriculture, while the unorganised non-agricultural sector has an NDP which is 2.5 times that of agriculture. Per capita incomes would also reflect these disparities. Set standards of human rights will not have much relevance to those who face such disparities and whose lives are subjected to the deprivation of the very basics of human dignity.

We do not minimise the importance of standard-setting or maintenance of standards. The point is that too narrow a focus on achievement of standards carries the risk of leaving behind those vast numbers who for various reasons have fallen outside the scope of different standard-setting exercises. The redressal of this dilemma has led us to re-examine our entire approach. The basic anchor-stones of our policy remain the same as set out by our first Prime Minister, Jawaharlal Nehru – socialism, equity and justice. Within the framework of these we look for alternatives. In this, the greatest importance is attached to creating productive employment, based on labour-intensive technologies wherever possible. This would assure a living income to the entire working population. All else follows from a perception of this dilemma.

My plea to this Conference and to the International Labour Organisation is that the basic issues of growth, adjustment and employment must be pursued. They must find an adequate place in the ILO's plans, whether in terms of objectives, or means of action, or plans and programmes for the future. May I recall, that my Prime Minister, Rajiv Gandhi, in his address to this Conference in 1985 said that the ILO should give the highest priority to the problems faced by unorganised workers. They lack work, adequate social protection, they lack economic security and organisation for protecting their interests. The thrust of ILO activities in the years to come must take into account the basic facts of the world economic scene, and especially that obtaining in the developing countries.

From these perceptions, my delegation would urge that the Governing Body of the ILO when framing its Medium-Term Plan for the period 1990 to 1995 must reassess its priorities and concerns. It should make an effort to move away from concentrating too much on previously established patterns of thought or activity. It is indeed comfortable to continue as before, with marginal changes in means of action, objectives, priorities and programmes. But the marginalised among the world's workers expect that their concerns should take first place, as they must, in planning for the ILO's future activities. We note that the Director-General has stated, in his document on human rights, that "counsels of despair have no place in the ILO". While supporting this statement, we look forward to the evolution of practical plans and programmes which address the issues which I have set out.

India fully endorses the ILO's efforts to promote fair labour standards. We are of the view that standards should not be set so low as to be meaningless or so high as to be largely unattainable except in the very long run. India has been second to none in its desire to achieve minimum labour standards and in fact to go well beyond them. However, we are also of the view that no linkage exists between the observance of fair labour standards and international trade relations. The Director-General too seems to have reached the same conclusion as it can be seen from his report on human rights that "the mere existence of divergence even from basic labour standards may not in itself justify a modification in trade relations".

May I now say a few words about the items on the agenda of this Conference. In view of the importance of the safety and health of construction workers, the proposed Convention, supplemented by a Recommendation, is welcome. Another item concerns employment promotion and social security. The Conference Committee will, I hope, take into account the availability of resources obtaining in most developing countries, before deciding upon a Convention. The item on promotion of rural employment is welcome, inasmuch as it is of great relevance to countries like India. The most crucial item on the agenda, from our point of view, is the proposed partial revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107).

In the course of its long history, India has been a melting-pot of diverse religious and ethnic groups. While historians and academicians are free to study the different cultural, ethnic and linguistic groups in the chronological sequence of their appearance in the subcontinent, the fundamental position is that there is no difference in independent India between those who may be the original inhabitants of India and those who came later. The term "indigenous population" is perhaps relevant to those countries whose colonial past was a period in which foreign settlers and colonisers pushed the original inhabitants to the margins of civilisation.

My country has no objection to the revision of this Convention in so far as the revision is directed towards removal of those terms and phrases which carry connotations of cultural inferiority. We do have certain specific suggestions on the more fundamental aspects of the proposed revision.

First of all, in relation to this Convention, my Government suggests that it is the Conference itself that must decide whether or not a change in orientation is necessary. The approach of bringing the tribal and local populations into the mainstream of national life holds different meanings in different countries and political systems. It is necessary for this Conference to define the concepts before rushing to any conclusion that Convention No. 107 requires amendment because of its approach towards integration. We all may recall that long and complex discussion in the group of experts that met in September 1986 to define an alternate concept.

I would also like to introduce a word of caution relating to the concept of "self-determination". In the United Nations parlance, self-determination is normally used to indicate the self-determination of people under colonial rule or in non-self-governing territories. To introduce this concept for a group of people who constitute an integral part of independent countries would be tantamount to introducing a political concept into the work of the ILO.

In India the population of scheduled tribes has special provisions in the Constitution. These provide protective measures and safeguards for tribal populations. It was recognised that the disabilities and poverty from which they suffered at the onset of independence in 1947 were institutional, since the tribal populations were not only poor, but also suffering from social and economic handicaps. It was recognised by the framers of our Constitution that the benefits of economic development would not reach the tribal populations unless these institutional barriers and handicaps were removed. It is, accordingly, provided in our Constitution that the tribal populations have reserved seats in both the National Parliament, as well as in the State Parliaments. They also have reservations of posts in services.

There are also tribal sub-plans in the economic plans of the States, funds which cannot be diverted for other purposes once they have been provided for at the national level. Special constitutional provisions exist for the administration of tribal areas in the shape of autonomous districts and autonomous regions. These have district councils and regional councils as a feature, with wide powers being delegated to them. In the States where tribal populations are in a majority, it is they who form the governments under free and fair elections. As a result, in these States, located principally in north-eastern India, truly representative governments which reflect the tribal and other populations in the areas are in charge of their political, economic and social life. Recognising that the resources of such north-eastern tribal States may not be adequate to sustain their development plans, funding of their plans is done almost entirely by the central government.

India, therefore, provides constitutional, legislative, economic and social protection to its tribal populations. We deem it necessary that the complexities which exist and vary from country to country be taken into account before embarking upon changing the basic orientation or the other articles of Convention No. 107.

We note with approval that UNESCO has stated that "some indigenous peoples prefer one approach and some the other ...", and further that "what is needed is a number of possible models, all of which involve principles of equality and of participation in decisions affecting their community". We fully support this approach since, as I have already stated, the Indian Constitution does indeed structure its approach to all these exceedingly sensitive and complicated issues on the principles of equality and participation.

(Mr. Beyreuther takes the Chair.)

Interpretation from French: Mr. ROUTOUANG YOMA GOLOM (Minister of Labour and Employment, Chad) – Before presenting the modest contribution of the Chadian delegation to the work of the Conference, I should like to present our sincere congratulations to Mr. Beyreuther on his election to the presidency of this session of the International Labour Conference. This sign of confidence constitutes to our mind a guarantee for the excellent conduct of work of the Conference.

I should also like to underline the satisfaction that we have felt in reading the Report of the Director-General of the ILO. We should like to congratulate him not only for the clarity and the precision of the document but also, and particularly, for the wise selection of the subject submitted to our discussion.

This very full report attempts to highlight the fundamental rights which, in the framework of the International Labour Organisation, have found their expression in the numerous international labour standards and other texts adopted by the official organs of the ILO. These refer to trade union freedom, to the struggle against forced labour, to discrimination in all its forms, to equality of opportunity and treatment, as well as to a considerable range of more specific rights in the social field.

Turning now to the subject of our debate, I should like to say that my delegation has drawn useful information in reading the report, as no one can ignore the importance attached to human rights by a peace-liberty- and justice-loving country like Chad.

The end of the twentieth century has been marked by regional and subregional conflicts in which barbarous and terrorist acts are commonplace; in which the most inhuman practices are carried out against innocent populations in violation of elementary rules of legality and morality. This deplorable situation is an affront to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which enshrines the concepts of human dignity, of tolerance and solidarity.

For this reason the Government of the Third Republic under the leadership of President Al-Hadj Hissein Habre, which came to power on 7 June 1982, enshrined in the Fundamental Act of the Republic a sacrosanct principle of rights which all Chadians would enjoy, through the introduction of a democratic system which would guarantee the fundamental freedoms and rights of the individual, of associations and collectivities and the effective participation of all social classes in the management of public affairs. We believe that freedom of expression and association must lead to the reinforcement of the dignity of all Chadians for the progress and the economic and social development of our country.

In the Report of the Director-General of the ILO, the questions that refer to human rights are of capital importance in view of their implications for the economic, social, cultural and political levels.

The Director-General of the ILO quite rightly stressed, in 1968, during a discussion about human rights, that any debate on such matters should be placed within the context of the harsh realities of everyday life, which for many people are the realities of underdevelopment and of under-nourishment. Far from carrying out any economic analysis, we also believe that any human effort must be linked to economic and social development and this should be done in the spirit of solidarity, in order to ensure social justice and humane working conditions.

Trade union freedom, equality of opportunity and treatment, the right to full, productive and freely selected employment, the right to just and favourable remuneration, the right to social security and minimum labour standards (to mention just these) constitute for us a list of themes which deserve particular attention from all member States which seek equality, liberty and social justice, the indispensable preconditions for the development of the individual.

As regards trade union freedoms there are two trade union centres, the CST and the UNATRAT, which are operating to the satisfaction of our workers. But, as was stressed in the 49th Session of the International Labour Conference, the Government of my country is committed to their unification in order that they may become an efficient instrument in the interest of our courageous and progressive workers. As you will be able to tell, this unity will be the achievement of the wishes of the leaders of these two trade union centres. There is no question of any pressure on the part of the Chadian Government to lead them and to transform them into tool of its policy. The support which they have given to the Government in efforts towards peace, reconciliation and the re-establishment of national unity were greatly appreciated.

Equality of opportunity and treatment, the right to just and favourable remuneration, the right to full, productive and freely chosen employment are inter-dependant factors and have a common denominator in dignity, in the feeling of being oneself, and of one's usefulness in society. The Philadelphia Declaration stated that equality of opportunity and of treatment and non-discrimination in employment are a right for all human beings – irrespective of their race, religious beliefs or sex – in order that they may pursue their material progress and spiritual development. What could be abnormal in a situation in which women and men accomplish the same task and carry out the same productive and freely chosen employment, and thus participate in economic and social life of a country?

Nevertheless, I am very happy to see that in Africa today, women who are until recently been carrying out traditional tasks are now taking on an ever-growing number of responsibilities in work which involves the same risks and with the same problems as jobs carried out by colleagues of the opposite sex. It is deplorable that this is not so in South Africa, where millions of Black workers are subject to discrimination in the field of employment and of treatment – based not only upon sex but also upon colour.

At the national level, the Government of Chad intends to eliminate discrimination in all its forms because it is a divisive factor, in order to move towards equality of opportunity and treatment in employment. Our legislation, our legal texts, our institutions have made this the leitmotiv; non-discrimination based upon sex, race, beliefs, political opinions – because we believe that equality is a fundamental precondition for human dignity and for social justice. Thus women actively participate in the management of public affairs at all levels of national life – one finds more and more women responsible for more and more services on the same level as men. This is all the more important because they have contributed, and are contributing, to the economic and social progress of our country, which has suffered for so many years of war. The Chadian Government intends to extend its action in this field by encouraging women to even higher achievements.

To be able to give dignity back to the individual is also to give individuals full employment, productive and freely chosen, and therefore to provide the human being with the right to a just and favourable remuneration that would allow the worker and the worker's family to lead a decent existence.

In spite of the disastrous economic and social situation in Chad, which is linked to the international economic situation and to the permanent war imposed on it by a brother neighbouring country which has violated the United Nations Charter and menaces the human rights of all Chadians, Chad has spared no effort to ensure each Chadian's full development. As regards the right to just and favourable conditions and minimum standards of work, it should be stressed forcefully that it is reasonable to limit the hours of work to guarantee workers' health and safety. This should be the constant preoccupation of all governments, employers and workers, in view of the risks related to hazardous machinery and to the use by the introduction of certain toxic substances. Governments, employers and workers must pool their efforts in order to improve the quality of working conditions and of health and safety at work. In the medical and health field, no one should forget that health is a precious, irreplaceable, unchangeable element, which can neither be bought nor sold. In improving their working conditions and their workplace, worker will contribute quantitatively and qualitatively to the economic and social development of our country.

The respect for hours of work, the provision of weekly rest, of paid annual leave, protection maternity and child protection are indispensable factors for the protection of workers facing an environment which is more and more dangerous for them.

As far as working hours are concerned, we believe that in respecting them we would gain not only from the point of view of health but also from the point of view of productivity. We also know that the reduction of the working hours poses a serious problem and is a subject of heated debate. We nevertheless believe that it is a factor in the creation of employment and thus allows a long-term possibility for the elimination of unemployment to the benefit of workers and enterprises. We should therefore call for the strict observance of working hours. Chad, like many other countries, has ratified a number of Conventions pertaining to the protection of workers and wishes to adhere carefully to them and to improve them. Among these Conventions, we should refer to those related to night work of women and children, the minimum age for work, working hours, weekly rest and paid leave.

As for the right to social security, it is a universal principle and an indispensable protection of the worker. Nevertheless, we deplore the fact that this social security is not extended to all categories of workers, among whom we would mention peasants, workers in the informal sector and the self-employed.

We remain convinced that the fulfilment of the right to social security can only be reached by the gradual, progressive development of protection depending upon the resources available. But there are many countries like Chad that have a fragile or moribund economy. However, as the ILO wishes they should try to cover four of the nine possibilities. Thus Chad, despite the difficulties related to the situation describe above has been able to cover certain benefits such as compensation in cases of accidents at work, industrial diseases, family allowances, old-age pensions, and invalidity and survivors' pensions. The coverage is incomplete, but the Chadian Government wishes to extend all the facilities progressively to cover other categories of workers as the country's economic development permits.

I do not wish to abuse your precious time, but I would like to stress that the Report of the Director-General is an inexhaustible source of information about human rights, through the various aspects covered in it. The Report would be incomplete if it was not accompanied by a balance sheet of the activities of the ILO in 1987 in Africa in general and in my country in particular.

No one should forget the difficulties faced by our continent and the challenge facing our working world.

The Chadian Government has greeted with satisfaction the many activities carried out by the ILO throughout Africa, including the technical co-operation provided by the International Labour Office in many fields, and also its programme against apartheid. For example, in 1987, an expert mission advised the Chadian Government on labour legislation, on labour administration and on professional training, as a part of the CHD/ILO project. The Regional African Administration Centre for Labour (CRA-DAT) with the financial and material assistance of the ILO, has organised the training of middle management in the field of labour administration in October 1987.

Thus it can be seen that the International Labour Organisation (through the International Labour Office) is carrying out important measures to help my country. I would therefore like to express, on behalf of the Chad Government, our gratitude to the ILO for its sustained assistance to our country as we undertake the complete reconstruction of our economy, which has been destroyed by so many years of war.

The Government of Chad wishes, through me, to thank most sincerely all the delegations at the ILO for the massive vote they gave us, so permitting us to participate fully in the Conference.

Interpretation from Turkish: Mr. YILMAZ (Workers' delegate, Turkey) – Mr. President, I should like first of all to extend to you, on behalf of the Confederation of Turkish Trade Unions and on my own behalf, our heartiest congratulations on your election to the presidency of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference.

I should also like to take this opportunity to congratulate Mr. Francis Blanchard, the Director-General of the ILO, for his excellent Report submitted to the Conference for general discussion.

This year, the Director-General's Report deals with a subject of fundamental importance for everyone.

As we all know, 1988 marks the 40th anniversary of the proclamation of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the adoption of one of the key instruments of the ILO, the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

The Turkish Workers' delegation considers the choice of this year's theme of the Conference, Human rights - A common responsibility, as most appropriate for the year 1988. Almost the entire range of ILO activities have a bearing on the realisation of human rights set out in the Universal Declaration. I do believe that this session of the Conference will provide an opportunity for the member States of the ILO to examine the most urgent human rights issues and problems that may be affecting workers everywhere.

I should, at the outset, point out that the situation in many countries as regards respect for human rights in general, remains far from satisfactory; freedom of association in many instances is restricted. As has been stated on numerous occasions, in many countries freedom of association and the right to engage in voluntary collective bargaining are severely curtailed for reasons of economic difficulties, or in the name of pressing development needs. In others, civil liberties and trade union rights are restricted and freedom of association seriously curtailed, usually on economic grounds or in the name of the need to take measures to combat political instability, social unrest and violence.

Turkey, unfortunately since 1980, is among such countries where curtailment, based on similar reasons, has taken place.

This is to be regretted, since freedom of association is not only an essential prerequisite for progress towards social justice, it is also essential for the proper functioning of the ILO, based on tripartism and rational dialogue.

The principle of freedom of association is one of the fundamental objectives embodied in the ILO Constitution. It should accordingly be observed by the member States by reason of their membership in the Organisation. I believe that the ILO has to strengthen its action for freedom of association and trade union rights. The success of any Organisation lies in the accomplishment of the very objectives outlined in the Constitution. And I believe that the future of the ILO is closely linked with the degree of success which may be achieved in this field.

Last year, in my intervention as regards the trade union situation in Turkey, I pointed out that Acts Nos. 2821 and 2822 on trade unions and collective bargaining and strikes, respectively, continue to constitute a legal strait-jacket in which trade unions find themselves. They are faced with interference in, or control of, practically every activity which unions should normally be able to carry out, free from any state interference. This year, I regret to say that nothing has changed, despite some amendments recently enacted.

Turkey is a member State, which has not ratified Convention No. 87. But, as I have already indicated, although Turkey has not ratified the Convention, it is unquestionably bound under the ILO Constitution to respect the principle of freedom of association. Acts Nos. 2821 and 2822 and several provisions of the national Constitution of 1982, which severely restrict basic trade union rights, apparently prevent Turkey from fulfilling its international obligations.

The 1982 Constitution and the provisions of Acts Nos. 2821 and 2822 are in violation of the very principles which the ILO stands for, notably: the right of workers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish organisations; the right of organisations to draw up their constitutions and rule and elect their representatives in full freedom; the right of organisations to organise their administration and activities and to formulate their programmes; and the right of organisations to affiliate with international organisations.

Several provisions of the above-mentioned Acts and of the 1982 Constitution are also in violation of Conventions Nos. 98 and 111 which Turkey has ratified.

There are several restrictions to the right to strike. These include the prohibition of the right to strike in several sectors which cannot be considered as essential services; the authority granted to the Government to postpone a strike leading to compulsory arbitration (as is the case in sectors where strikes are prohibited) through a board controlled by the Government; the requirement to implement a strike decision within a defined period; and the very strange condition that the right to strike shall not be exercised contrary to the rules of good faith or in such a manner as to damage society or destroy national wealth, etc.

These restrictions have been questioned by the supervisory bodies of the ILO since 1982. It is most regrettable that the Turkish Government persistently disregards the observations of the Committee of Experts and the recommendations made by the Committee on Freedom of Association in connection with its international obligations.

As I already indicated last year, the Turkish Government has, on several occasions, especially in 1986 and 1987, pledged to take whatever steps or measures might be required to ensure full conformity with the obligations assumed by Turkey upon ratification of Conventions Nos. 98 and 111 and with the principles of freedom of association enshrined in the ILO's Constitution and the ILO standards relating to this question.

I sincerely hope that on this occasion of the 40th anniversary of the proclamation of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and of the adoption of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Turkish Government shall honour its pledges and thereby make a positive contribution to the working of the ILO system.

I do hope that I can report progress in this field next year.

Interpretation from French: Mr. SEHOULIA (Minister for the Civil Service, Labour, Social Security and Vocational Training, Central African Republic) – On behalf of the delegation of the Central African Republic and on my own behalf, I wish to be associated with previous speakers in congratulating Mr. Beyreuther on the occasion of his outstanding election as President of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference.

This unanimous election, without doubt, is a recognition of his personal qualities. It is also owing to his great experience in the social field and I am convinced that the mission entrusted to him as President of the Conference will be entirely successful. My congratulations are also addressed to the Vice-Presidents whose assistance is very valuable to him in his duties.

Finally, I should like to extend my compliments to the Director-General, Mr. Francis Blanchard, and through him to all the officials of the International Labour Office for their constantly sustained efforts in the cause of international co-operation and the implementation of the programmes of activity of our Organisation.

Allow me once again to affirm the confidence and hope that my country places in the International Labour Organisation and its total support for the goals pursued by the Organisation.

My country, although among the least-advanced countries of the world and landlocked, has always made efforts to participate in the various activities of our Organisation and to meet its obligations. My country will continue as in the past to do everything within its power to meet its obligations in respect of our Organisation.

The Report of the Director-General of the International Labour Office is devoted to the question of human rights. I welcome this initiative which allows me to provide some accurate information on the evolution of this issue in my country and to respond to the groundless and threatening accusations which have been levelled at the Government of the Central African Republic by certain countries and international trade union organisations.

My country has been the target of accusation in connection with the alleged violation of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

These accusations are based on erroneous information coming from certain parties who, allegedly hoisting the standard of the trade union movement in the Central African Republic, are attempting to show to international opinion that arbitrariness and terror are now being imposed in the Central African Republic.

All this is wrong and has no basis whatsoever.

A brief reminder of certain historic events in the Central African Republic appears necessary in order to throw light on the various features of this question.

In 1981 we experienced certain serious political disturbances which sorely tested national unity and social cohesion.

These disturbances were initiated and maintained by political parties without a programme defending special interests under the banner of tribalism, and unfortunately they were supported by certain trade unions. This was far removed from the legitimate aspirations of workers in the Central African Republic.

In view of this situation General André Kolingba decided on 1 September 1981 to put an end to this state of laissez-faire and anarchy. This decision made it possible to restore and consolidate peace, national unity and stability, thereby creating the conditions necessary for a return to the state of law.

The process of democratisation was started up and thus the people of the Central African Republic gained a Constitution and elected the President of the Republic by universal suffrage in 1986.

As I mentioned last year at this same rostrum, open legislative elections were indeed organised and the parliament was established.

At the end of last month municipal elections took place throughout the territory of the Central African Republic. This enabled us to put democratically elected councillors at the head of all communes.

I am pleased to be able to inform you that the suspension of trade union activities has ceased since the National Assembly in my country last month adopted a law on trade union freedom and protection of the right to organise. This text is in all respects in conformity with international Conventions ratified and with the real situation in the Central African Republic.

You can thus see that the bases of democracy in my country have been established.

However, if you will allow me, I should like to come back to what I could refer to as disinformation in an attempt to deceive you.

Certain disgruntled people, imitating groups of the past, are trying to cast aspersions on democracy in the Central African Republic.

It is sad to note that just a few individuals benefiting from the fact that they are relatively well-known, are in fact waging a personal combat in line with their own egoistic ambitions. They only represent themselves and in no way do they represent workers in the Central African Republic.

The international trade union organisations were thus deceived by persons who for a long time have been indulging in misrepresentation. The information that you have been receiving which rightly caused concern are without basis.

More serious still, a great country recently based itself on this erroneous information in order to threaten to suspend aid to my country because of violation of workers' rights.

I note, however, with sadness the guilty silence observed by this great country during the dark period which my country experienced, which was characterised, in particular, by failure to respect the human personality, the stifling of trade union organisations, and the suppression of training for inspectors of labour and social legislation.

The Central African Republic is progressively adopting measures in line with its own national situation, drawing lessons from our own history.

In the preamble of its Constitution the Central African Republic affirms its will to ensure the dignity of each individual.

This principle we refer to in our national language as "Zo Kwé Zo So Zo La". This means that any individual irrespective of his origin must fully enjoy the rights which are recognised and protected by law.

The Central African Republic did not await orders from any other country in order to accede to a number of international instruments in the field of human rights. In particular, I refer to the International Covenant on Economic, Cultural and Social Rights, the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, the African Charter on Human and People's Rights; the Protocol relating to the Status of Refugees, the Supplementary Convention on the Abolition of Slavery, the Slave Trade and Institutions and Practices Similar to Slavery.

The Central African Republic has always made efforts to apply the provisions of the Conventions to which it has acceded.

A demonstration of this is that on 3 April 1987 the commemorative medal of the International Year for Peace was awarded by the United Nations to a very few countries including the Central African Republic, for their activities and efforts in favour of peace in the course of the International Year for Peace.

My country deems unacceptable the pressures and threats against it by those who unjustly condemn it and ignore the real situation in the Central African Republic.

I am convinced that they themselves will rectify their position after the explanations I have just made.

The Central African Republic has always expressed the wish to receive advice and aid in order to review and revise its texts and national practices so that they should be in harmony with the international standards which it has freely ratified.

With regard to these international standards the Central African Republic gave long explanations in writing to the Committee on the Application of Standards of the International Labour Office and threw light on the actual situation prevailing in the Central African Republic.

I accepted the sending of a direct contacts mission but I postponed the date because of the implementation of the programme to establish institutions provided for under the Constitution of 1986 and because of certain national imperatives.

I can assure you that a warm welcome will be extended to the direct contacts mission at the appropriate time.

Before concluding my statement I should like to congratulate and thank Mr. Francis Blanchard, Director-General of the International Labour Office for all the aid which he provides to my country, particularly in the area of training of personnel in the labour and social security spheres and for the increased material assistance.

This assistance has helped us to improve and strengthen the effectiveness of the Ministry of the Civil Service, Labour, Social Security and Vocational Training.

I thank you once again for having afforded me the opportunity to allow the voice of my country to be heard. I express the hope that the work of the Conference will be successful.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. GAIDAIENKO (Employers' delegate, USSR) – As I am taking the floor for the first time at this session of the Conference I would like to start by congratulating Mr. Beyreuther on his election to this exalted and responsible post. I am sure that his vast experience will enable our Conference to achieve substantial results commensurate with the high principles aspired to by the International Labour Organisation.

We note with interest that the Report of the Director-General calls on us to discuss the key issue of social progress, the problem of human rights. This issue touches the very root of people's lives regardless of social and economic systems and it is no accident that it became a topic of discussion at the recently held summit meeting in Moscow. The problem of human rights in our nuclear age stems from the right of humanity as a whole to survival. The discussion of this subject at a session of the International Labour Conference is particularly significant by virtue of the tripartite principle, which differentiates the activity of the ILO from that of other international organisations, both within the United Nations framework and outside it. As I see it, this will promote a more profound and interesting discussion, pinpointing and comparing different points of view, which in turn will give the International Labour Organisation a wealth of food for thought and for the elaboration of new programmes of activity.

The problem of human rights is all the more relevant today as the situation in world labour is giving rise to serious concern. The worsening conditions of employment, working conditions, the comparatively high levels of unemployment still existing in many countries, even in developed ones, all testify to the fact that their governments, fearful of renewed inflation, have drastically reduced measures to maintain adequate employment levels. This process in its turn gives rise to increasing difficulties in achieving workers' social and economic and civil rights in the framework of the political systems in these countries.

At the same time we see marked signs of improvement in the international climate as a whole. We can see a gradual move away from stereotyped confrontation and a turn towards mutually beneficial international co-operation. A new growth of fresh political thought is fighting its way through the jungle of misunderstanding and prejudice, and this process seems to be slow but sure.

In this context, we support the approach of the Director-General to the problem of human rights, when respect for these rights is looked at in conjunction with peace and stability, as stated in his Report.

With this as a background, the discordance between general political and social conditions cannot fail to be of concern to us. We realise that the key problems of employment vary depending on regional characteristics and differences in the social and economic systems of ILO member countries, and correspondingly the problems themselves are more or less acute. In market economy countries the more substantial problems arise from adaptation to structural differences and the rationalisation of production brought about by strong competition and the free play of market forces, whereas developing countries come up against a whole range of difficulties which add up to what is known as the "development crisis". External debt plays an important role in this, as well as the trade imbalance and their demographic situation. Most of the socialist countries, where, thanks to the system of centralised planning, there is no employment problem as such, are trying at present to solve the problem of retraining the labour force in connection with the restructuring of investment policies and the improvement of the management system.

I am deliberately stressing the employment problem, as our philosophy is based on the principle of the unity of the socio-economic, political and civil rights of mankind. We fully agree with the statement in the Report of the Director-General that "the availability of gainful employment is a vital link to the enjoyment of other human rights" (English text, p. 38). The Report quite rightly points out that, while a substantial part of the labour force on our planet is deprived of the possibility of earning its living in a satisfactory, productive and remunerative manner, this mass of people will be deprived of the material basis for the enjoyment of freedom, dignity, economic security and equal opportunities.

Of course the Director-General is right when he reminds us that the expression "human rights" does not figure in the Constitution of the ILO. However, as I see it, we can make only one logical deduction from this fact, namely that we should compensate for the absence of any reference to human rights in the Constitution of the ILO by elaborating the Organisation's own viewpoint on this very important matter. In noting the importance of this fortieth anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), we have every reason to expect that the role of the ILO in this sphere will not be limited to simply noting the problems that occur, but will define effective ways and means of solving such problems.

In the Report of the Director-General, the problem of employment within the restructuring process of the socialist economies is set out seriously and correctly as a question of reconciling the displacement of the labour force with the guaranteed right to work (English text, p. 38). At every level, socialist economies are trying to find an answer to the problem of how, through improved structural and investment activity, to ensure that there is an active influx of labour resources into the new priority spheres of employment, at the same time making up for the outflow of the labour force from less economically viable sectors. This task is set out at a macro-economic level.

At the micro-economic level too, the economic reforms being carried out in the Soviet Union are also now creating a fundamentally new situation. Moving away from a strictly administrative system of managing the economy, developing trade and monetary relations and decentralising external economic relations substantially expand the rights of directors of socialist enterprises and their independence in solving the majority of problems. Article 8 of the law on state enterprises (associations) requires a director to possess above all attributes such as socialist enterprise, a high degree of professionalism, and a grasp of basic management skills and the principles of economics.

Article 8 of the law forbids ministries to interfere in the operational and economic activity of an enterprise. The same article stipulates that if a higher economic body infringes the rights of an enterprise, as a result of which the enterprise incurs losses, those losses will be reimbursed to the enterprise by this body through state arbitration.

The law also stipulates that an enterprise draws up and approves its own five-year plan independently (article 10) and that is the basis of the entire system of planning and operation of each enterprise.

In conditions of economic accounting (khozraschet) and self-financing, an enterprise enters into new and purely economic relation with the State. Their basis is a state order and long-term economic standards and limits. According to the 1987 law, the director of an enterprise is given freedom of action in relation to that part of the production output which does not fall within the state order section but is achieved through direct agreements with consumers.

The enterprise independently carries out technical reconstruction and the technological renewal of production. It makes use of bank credits and carries out its own social policy in accordance with existing legislation. It is given extensive rights in carrying out export-import transactions, industrial co-operation and the setting up of joint ventures.

To sum up, I should like to say that as a result of the reforms a Soviet enterprise director has the right of economic choice which places him in qualitatively new circumstances.

It is essential to add to this that the law on co-operation in the USSR recently adopted by the USSR Supreme Soviet – the law on co-operation in the USSR creates state enterprises – especially in branches such as light industry, the food industry and the service industries – and the possibility of competition from the co-operative sector. Such a situation is already taking concrete form, for instance in the services sphere in the Soviet Baltic republics, and the Soviet press has reported it.

The stated processes contain a significant element of novelty and are extremely complex in their nature, and that is why they do not always run smoothly and painlessly. The main source of difficulties has already been revealed – the divergence between intra-branch expenditure and the prices structure. At the initial stage situations of conflict cannot be ruled out – both between the ministry and the enterprise and within the enterprise between the administration and the labour collective. Such situations have occurred not infrequently this year following the entry into force of the law on state enterprises. However, we are not disposed to dramatise them, rather to regard them as a consequence of the process of more clearly delineating the rights and responsibilities of all interested parties in the conditions of the new economic mechanism. In the final analyses, it is a historical landmark, living testimony of the democratisation of the social, economic and political life of Soviet society.

In conclusion, I should like to remind you of the theme of the Director-General's Report: Human rights – A common responsibility. We really do bear common responsibility for human rights in their totality. However, common responsibility entails common efforts to achieve the goals that have been set. I should like to express the hope that the International Labour Organisation will be able to pool its common resources in the interests of securing equal rights, freedom and human dignity.

Interpretation from French: Mr. NADARUZANIYE (Minister of Labour and Vocational Training, Burundi) – On behalf of the delegation of the Republic of Burundi and on my own behalf, it is my great honour to address the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference, the work of which has been taking place for the past week under the wise and perceptive guidance of Mr. Beyreuther, Secretary of State for Labour and Wages and member of the Government of the German Democratic Republic. May I associate myself with the speakers who have preceded me on this rostrum and greet all the delegates to this Conference, and present my sincere congratulations to you, Mr. President, on your election and that of the Officers who assist you.

You will, I am sure, carry out the noble mission with which have been entrusted with great wisdom, dignity and success; you have already shown evidence of this during the past week. Your long experience in international forums augurs well for this 75th Session of the International Labour Conference, for which we all express all our hopes of success, so that there might be harmonious development in all continents.

May I take this opportunity to pay tribute to Mr. Francis Blanchard, the Director-General of the ILO, for having dealt so objectively and with such perspicacity with the subjects in the Report he has submitted to this assembly. These subjects are proof once again how the International Labour Organisation is concerned with key problems affecting the well-being of human beings and the development of their potential. The member States should do the same and make every effort to find appropriate solutions to these problems which threaten the peace of the world.

Indeed, several subjects remind each member State, as well as the employers and workers, how important it is to combine our efforts when faced with the scourges that are threatening the world, and undermining national and international economies:

The urgency of strengthening sustained international co-operation, in which all countries participate, whether they are rich or less rich, should be seen by each one as a duty and an obligation upon which their survival depends. Indeed, the scourges of the present international economic crisis – which we cannot manage, but which we must combat – manifest themselves in various forms and no country can escape them. One could cite the population explosion, the weight of indebtedness affecting the developing countries, unemployment, ignorance and poverty and the wasting of resources on arms, which are a source of political instability and regional conflicts.

All these problems prevent the full development of man and risk jeopardising once and for all the peace and development of the whole world, if countries do not overcome their subjective views to combine their efforts in a common struggle so as to safeguard this just and noble cause which puts man in the forefront of any action.

In Burundi, the Government of the Third Republic under His Excellency Major Pierre Buyoya, the President of the Military Committee for National Salvation and President of the Republic, has given pride place to the respect of human personality by introducing freedom of expression and institutionalising dialogue and consultation at all levels; indeed he has made it the cornerstone of the development and co-operation activities in our country. Priority has been given to introducing social justice so as to attain the harmonious development of all levels of the population.

Many actions have put this political determination into effect. These include the release of political prisoners illegally detained by the former power in the amnesty granted to common law criminals; the reinstatement of workers and officials wrongly dismissed; the increase in the minimum guaranteed wage; the removal of taxes on foodstuffs; the doing away with obligatory saving so as to reduce the burden of household expenses of all citizens, especially those in the country.

On the subject of social justice, clear recommendations are being drawn up, together with the social partners, to liberalise employment. These are geared to making the vocational guidance system more flexible and to setting up job-creation projects in rural areas.

The Government of the Third Republic is quite convinced that it is through work – one of the fundamental rights of man which it is indispensable to protect – that one can consolidate social justice. The implementation of social and economic development programmes should go hand in hand with a policy to protect our labouring masses.

But unfortunately, the economic crisis affecting the world has hardly spared Burundi and the structural adjustment policies called for by the IMF the World Bank are not being applied without difficulty. Efforts have however been made to try to maintain a growth rate likely to improve the living conditions of the people. The dialogue between the workers, employers and government has thus been stepped up so that there might be an adequate adaptation to structural adjustment policies, in full respect of tripartism in all the bodies concerned.

In the enterprises, the system whereby workers are involved in the management and running of the enterprise has been introduced once again. Workers are represented in all the planning and decision-making bodies and they play a consultative role. The trade union workers' representatives are covered by legal provisions. Works councils and health and safety committees work with the participation of the workers – to their great satisfaction.

At the national level, whilst always respecting tripartism, the Union of Burundi Workers and the Association of Burundi Employers participate in all the decisions involving social policy on employment and work and co-operate very closely on standard-setting activities through the national labour council, which constitutes an appropriate framework for dialogue with government officials in charge of the social and labour sector. As regards vocational guidance, the Association of Employers and Workers participate in the tripartite National Employment Commission. I should also point out that workers and employers are represented in the bodies responsible for organising the training and further training of workers.

Having outlined the present situation in Burundi, may I comment on some aspects of the social and economic deterioration of our modern society.

Given the difficulties besetting mankind, the time has come for greater international co-operation and solidarity, as the Director-General has stressed. Greater assistance to the poor countries deserves all the attention of this Conference at a time of profound historical changes which can for the most part be traced to the world economic crisis.

The Third World countries, and the African countries in particular, have reason to be concerned over the sharp cut in development assistance, especially because the poor countries are making serious efforts to emerge from their underdevelopment.

The International Labour Organisation has the duty to provide its firmest support to the African countries in their drive towards industrialisation and social and economic development – the basis for social justice. We appeal to the international community, and to the International Labour Organisation, in particular, its current difficulties notwithstanding, to help us in our efforts to ward off the scourges which may well enslave the developing countries in poverty and dash their hopes for a brighter future.

We realise that the world economic situation and the depreciation of the United States dollar have affected the finances of our Organisation. However, we note with satisfaction from the financial report of the Director-General that the developing countries, and the African countries in particular, have been given preferential treatment as regards current development programmes. The statement made by the Director-General at the working meeting of the African group on 31 May last concerning the budget for Africa, was proof of the firm determination of the leaders of our Organisation to work for the development of the poorer countries.

The Government of Burundi has excellent relations with the ILO. The projects in which the ILO is involved in our country are progressing well. Consultation missions have always been very effective. We repeat our wish to see this co-operation strengthened to help us in our efforts to develop.

It is obvious that the ILO's programme of activities should be supported by the Members' respect for their obligations, including the payment of their contributions. This is why we appeal to each member State to help to cover the financial deficit of the Organisation, so that it will not be forced to reduce its programmes, especially those which are aimed at the developing countries.

The international economic and trading system will not offer the poor countries a reassuring future as long as hundreds of millions of people in poor countries throughout the world are unemployed, underemployed or engaged in crafts which condemn them to poverty.

To get out of the present impasse in international co-operation, we must resolve the dilemma which is recognised around the world.

The rich countries, the creditors of the poor countries, must make more flexible the conditions for the repayment of debt and provide more government assistance or opportunities for poor countries to export.

Rich countries should do away with protectionism and support regional economic co-operation activities.

African countries realise that they must take the first step in creating a more humane world in which solidarity can flourish. The support of the industrialised countries in building this world is essential and requires a great deal of money and technical assistance.

Africa's most urgent need is for help in gradually easing and liquidating the burden of debt. This form of assistance has the advantage of making additional resources available for the purchase of imports, which the creditor countries would welcome.

I am sure that the International Labour Office will do everything it can to channel the assistance from member States of the Organisation to development efforts carried out by our Governments and populations.

I should like to come back to technical co-operation, in which our interest is obvious. The financial efforts made by those who provide the money should first of all benefit those for whom the projects are intended.

We note, however, that much of the help given is used to remunerate international and bilateral experts, rather than to benefit those for whom the projects were designed. This complex problem deserves particular attention from the International Labour Office. A solution might consist of using national skills to a greater extent, with international experts used only when absolutely necessary for the success of the project. This solution would make it possible to increase allocations for scientific and technical research or training, which is the most effective form of assistance that the rich countries can give to the poor. The thorny problem of technical assistance affecting most of our countries could be finally solved to the mutual interest of the partners.

I finally come to the burning problem of the conditions of life and work in southern Africa. We shall never tire of denouncing the crimes perpetrated by the leaders of South Africa in the flagrant violation of basic human rights of people in general, and of Black people in particular. The silence of the member States of our Organisation would betray the ideals which we claim to support. The Director-General's Report on human rights is explicit on this point.

I am making a pressing appeal to all member States of our Organisation to work for the elimination of apartheid and racism in southern Africa. The survival of peace in Africa and throughout the world depends on it. We have a heavy responsibility towards history and to all those who live the horrors of racism and apartheid. Much more radical measures should be taken against the last outposts of racism and colonialism in South Africa, Namibia and Palestine by giving massive support to all freedom fighters.

In this year, the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the international community should redouble its efforts to combat racism and apartheid in all its forms.

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights has during these 40 years awakened hopes which no one has the right to betray. Our Conference should help to make these hopes a reality. This is the earnest wish of all peace-loving and freedom-loving people.

I am sure that this is the spirit that inspires all of us, and I express my greatest desire to see the whole of mankind enjoy fully their basic human rights.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. JALLOUD (representative of the International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I wish to be associated with those who have preceded me in congratulating the President and his Vice-Presidents on their election to their high offices. I hope that, under their guidance and thanks to their remarkable abilities, the present important session of the International Labour Conference would be steered towards the objectives it had before it.

I would also like to express my appreciation to the Director-General and his colleagues, as well as to the Committee of Experts and to thank them, on behalf of the International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions, for the work they have done in preparing the reports submitted to the Conference.

The Report on the ILO's activities gives a detailed account of the activities of the Organisation during the past year in the different social fields. However, we have noted, once again, that the Arab region and Arab workers are still far from being allocated the share of these activities that they deserve in view of their situation and their needs. Nevertheless, we recognise that the co-operation between the ILO and our Confederation has improved considerably in the past few years.

The Report on human rights is in a sense an alarm bell, and shows how necessary it is to continue to devote attention to human rights and their protection as well as to trade union rights and freedoms, especially on the present 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights which coincides with the 40th anniversary of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention 1948, (No. 87), as well as the 40th anniversary of the most blatant violation of human rights and peoples, namely, the violation of the rights of the Palestinian people on its own land and in its life.

We share the Director-General's hopes and concerns with regard to the status of human rights in many countries, to which he implicitly alludes in his Report, and especially the situation in South Africa, Palestine and other parts of the world, as well as to the conditions of migrant workers and problems of freedom in numerous developing countries.

I would like to dwell in particular on the Report of the Director-General in so far as it relates to the Arab workers in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories.

The Director-General, who has personally visited Palestine, has described the gravity of the situation and his concern at seeing it reflected in the level of employment and the conditions of life and work. The report of the ILO special mission acknowledges the deterioration in the economic, social and working conditions of Palestinian citizens and shows that the occupying authorities have installed a military regime in the occupied Arab territories with all that that means in terms of repercussions on civil liberties, and, in particular, on trade union rights and activities.

The events that have been taking place in Palestine and the occupied territories for more than six months testify to the way the occupation authorities ride roughshod over rights and freedoms, human life and international values, doing so in a far more flagrant manner than has been indicated in the Director-General's Report or the report of the ILO mission.

Press reports and official and unofficial testimony of eyewitnesses establish that the Zionist occupation authorities have engaged, and continue to engage, in the vilest forms of repression against children, adolescents and women whose only weapons are stones, words, determination, and faith in their rights. These authorities have not hesitated to use poison gas, bullets and clubs to disperse demonstrators. They have imposed a food blockade and thrown a cordon sanitaire around population centres, cut water pipes, terrorised the people, broken the limbs of young demonstrators, killed and thrown some of them from helicopters, forced others to climb high tension pylons where many of them were electrocuted, and buried others alive.

The international lawyers' mission affirmed that the occupation authorities were, in no case, able to give any proof that the shots fired against Palestinian citizens had been in self-defence. Testimony by UNRWA, corroborated by a Tel Aviv newspaper, states that the gas used leaves strange symptoms and causes respiratory problems, sometimes ending in death by asphyxiation.

A Tel Aviv magazine has described the orders given by the Minister of Defence as barbaric and with no historic parallel.

The Norwegian Ambassador in Tel Aviv, angered by the events he had witnessed on 23 March 1988, said that in all the records of the Second World War he had never heard of Nazi soldiers torturing children as the Israel soldiers were torturing young Palestinians.

The Zionist policy adopted in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories is to systematically destroy the Palestinian economy. The policy of establishing Zionist settlements and of stealing water has adversely affected agriculture, which is the backbone of the Palestinian economy. Zionist industry, subsidised by foreign capital, has outmatched Palestinian industry, forcing Palestinian Arab workers to emigrate without any hope of returning, or to work in Zionist enterprises. There are now more than 150,000 of them, including a large number of children pushed into the black market by the social and economic conditions resulting from the occupation, where they work in atrocious conditions of discrimination. The facts indicate that Palestinian workers are paid 30 per cent of the wages of Israeli workers – if an Israeli worker can be found to do the exhausting and degrading work the Arabs have to do. Moreover, Arab workers do not benefit from the social security funds although mandatory deductions are automatically made from their wages for those funds and in the interests of the Histadrut, but these workers do not enjoy any trade union or legal protection. Moreover, the occupation authorities try to prevent them from becoming aware of their rights by confiscating the publications which could inform them of their rights, and arresting those who distribute such publications. The occupation authorities have gone so far as to arrest ten trade union members on the West Bank and prevented six others from going to Jordan to attend an educational seminar arranged by the ILO in March 1988.

The municipality of Acre dismissed Palestinian workers who had taken part in a demonstration of support for the uprising of their people, and a factory near Beit-Shams dismissed 400 Arab workers as punishment for having taken part in a strike. Workers' and trade unionists' missions from various countries and trade union organisations, including the World Federation of Trade Unions, the Confédération Générale du Travail, Confédération Française Démocratique du Travail, and others, confirmed the difficult conditions in which the workers in the occupied territories were living and the terrorism to which the trade union movement in these territories is subjected. More than 50 per cent of the members of the General Council of the Federation of Workers in the West Bank are in prison, and the headquarters of the trade union movement have been besieged and searched in many towns, and dozens of trade unionists have been arrested and interrogated. The ILO and its Director-General have intervened on a number of occasions with the occupation authorities, but without any result.

Lebanon and its workers are still experiencing an acute economic crisis as a result of the occupation of most of south Lebanon by the Israeli forces and as a result of aggression and repeated land, sea and air raids on Lebanese economic establishments, the farms and villages. These attacks, which have led to great losses of life and property, have also aggravated the problems of that country, which has been living under disastrous civil war for many years, a war begun and maintained by the American Zionist imperialist policy in the area. This policy has often been condemned by international public opinion, and its practices have been reportedly denounced in the resolutions of the United Nations.

An entity that behaves like this, that takes no account of international resolutions, the United Nations Charter or the Convention of the ILO, that violates human rights in the way that we see every day, must not remain a Member of this Organisation because to be a Member means that it is committed to the ILO's rules, and if it does not do so it should be expelled.

The report on South Africa confirms our great concern: This racist regime continues its practices and many States and official and non-official establishments continue to bypass the boycott decisions and to co-operate with this hateful regime which is practising the policy of apartheid, or murder, violation of human rights and freedoms, uprooting and annihilating the Black population and continue aggression against neighbouring States. We strongly condemn this regime and those who co-operate with it, and we assure our brothers in Namibia and South Africa of our solidarity with their struggle until they gain their legitimate rights.

Our world is witnessing serious attempts to eliminate the dangers of nuclear war and to consolidate international detente. We pray God that peace, cooperation and understanding will reign and that the countries concerned will be able to reach an agreement which will remove the spectre of nuclear war from mankind and allow these countries to use the enormous sums spent on the arms race for development and the consolidation of social peace and economic growth in a system based on justice and respect for human rights.

We affirm that peace cannot reign unless it covers the whole world. For many years the Arabian Gulf area has been the scene of a destructive war. Many foreign fleets are parading in the area, using the pretext of this continued war. This war is a source of great concern to the peoples of the region because of the deterioration of the economic and social situation of the two warring countries, grave losses on both sides and the threat to international peace and security. We ask both countries to cease the war immediately, to implement Security Council Resolution No. 598 and to be good neighbours in the future.

We also affirm that peace in the Middle East can only be attained by recognising the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people: their right to return, their right to self-determination, their right to set up a State on their national soil, Palestine, under the leadership of their sole legitimate representative, the PLO.

Peace be with you!

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. MURILLO DE LA ROCHA (Employers' delegate, Bolivia) – On behalf of the Bolivian employers, we have great pleasure in congratulating the President on his well-deserved election to chair the 75th International Labour Conference. We are quite sure that he will carry out his work with impartiality and facilitate the interchange of ideas and dialogue on the matters of undoubted importance on our agenda.

The attention of this assembly is focused on essential points which are part of the standing terms of reference of the ILO. The promotion of employment generally and now with special emphasis on rural areas, human rights and many other basic subjects connected with constructive labour relations are without doubt vital in guaranteeing our societies full development in harmonious and fair coexistence.

We have read with very great interest the Report of the Director-General of the ILO. The accurate comments and the serious analysis contained in this document paint a worrying picture of the area of employment and foreshadow a future which could be even more dramatic. The judgements and data contained in this Report are really worrying. It is depressing to read that in the so-called Third World countries there are more than 70 million unemployed and almost 500 million underemployed, while another 900 million people live in extreme poverty.

After almost 70 years of untiring labour in the ILO and 40 years after the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, it is discouraging to note that we have not been able to keep up with the expectations generated in so many international forums. And this discouragement is even more intense when we see no short-term solutions and observe that industrialised nations are apparently not making their policies more flexible so as to reverse this adverse situation.

I should like to stress the foregoing, because without denying the legitimacy of the rights of each State to adopt those measures that it considers best meet its interests, it is appropriate to recognise that powerful countries have greater possibilities of contributing to the solution of labour problems and to those arising from the unequal terms of international economic relations.

However, in saying that, we do not want to ignore the fact that the great social objectives are the responsibility of the whole of the international community in different ways but in solidarity. We only want to point out that nations with a high level of development, thanks to their greater potential and economic capacity, have effective and even decisive instruments to help reduce or at least not to increase social tensions. The Director-General's Report says very specific things on this subject, and he stresses that in the underdeveloped countries the situation is even more complex because they have been forced to take drastic measures to stabilise their economies due to external factors.

Last year I told this assembly about how Bolivia was facing up to this severe crisis affecting us. To give you an idea of its dimensions, I may tell you that the crisis led to a mega-inflation that by mid-1985 was 23,000 per cent a year, which required severe measures to be adopted in August that year. This was the seventh highest rate of inflation in the world and the most serious in Latin America.

It is always relevant to stress certain concepts and give more information on experiences like the one we have just mentioned because they are valuable food for thought and make it possible to make a better and more objective evaluation of the role of each member State and of each sector making up tripartism.

Faced with the enormous crisis of the Bolivian economy, it is easy to imagine the magnitude of the efforts that have had to be made to avoid irreversible collapse; an effort that has required sacrifices from all citizens without exception and which has been carried out in the midst of adverse international circumstances.

Almost at the same time as the stabilisation measures, there was a sharp fall in the prices of the raw materials exported by Bolivia and the need to pay off the interest from a high foreign debt could no longer be put off, while there was greater protectionism by the industrialised countries.

Bolivian exports in the period 1980-87 fell by 50 per cent which obviously led to a severe contraction of the economy, with inevitable repercussions on society and on production. In spite of this complex picture, we managed to achieve a rate of inflation for 1987 of only 10.7 per cent, thanks to strict fiscal measures and restrictions on internal credit.

In these unfavourable circumstances, Bolivian employers are making extraordinary efforts to raise the productive capacity of industry and thus alleviate to some extent the impact of recession on employment. In addition, private Bolivian enterprises have to face high financial costs, the narrowness of the internal market and some shortcomings in implementing the programme to reactive national production.

The Bolivian employers are making every possible effort in this exceptionally difficult time to overcome the crisis. There are some encouraging signs, although for these to be consolidated, there has to be a new attitude by the international financial community which would require measures to alleviate the burden of foreign debt the service of which is very high as a proportion of exports.

It is not enough just to have good intentions. Sometimes these intentions meet with barriers that cannot be overcome just by good will.

The specialised studies of the ILO refer to such situations in many texts. There is no other way out for some serious dilemmas. Anti-inflationary measures seriously affect employment and sometimes employment measures can increase inflation. The question is, therefore, how far, in view of the unfavourable circumstances confronting some States, is it right and proper to attempt solutions at the risk of undermining the wage-earning purchasing power?

It is useful in our view to stress these points, and this is the right place to do it. The ILO has to maintain close contacts with the realities of its member States and tripartite components. In this way it will ensure that its resolutions and Recommendations receive full support and that they are not just abstract messages. This will also make it possible to strengthen the action that has to be taken to achieve common ideals.

It is also necessary that unions should always choose to take independent action rather than action based on political or ideological stances, for their principal mission, which should prevail over any other considerations, should be the clear defence of the interests entrusted to them, but as part of a community that seeks conciliation and dialogue.

It is absolutely necessary to adopt and apply flexible financial and trade policies facing up the challenges of the future. The world economic recession, the means of production introduced by technology which tend to eliminate the need for manpower, will have to be changed.

We have to reach the third millennium with a mentality of change. Otherwise, there will be an accentuation of present contradictions. It is neither just nor logical that on the threshold of the 21st century, when technology has discovered limitless horizons for the development of mankind, huge parts of society should continue to have unacceptable low standards of living.

We are sure that our discussions will be enriched by all the experiences of member States, and we reaffirm our support for the principles of the ILO in the hope that we shall make progress with a renewed impulse in the search for great social objectives.

(Mr. Adiko takes the Chair.)

Interpretation from French: Mr. KISOLOKELE (State Commissioner for Labour and Social Welfare, Zaire) – First of all, I should like to carry out the very pleasant duty of conveying to this august assembly the warmest greetings from the first president of the People's Revolutionary Movement, the President of the Republic, Marshall Mobutu Sésé Séko and from all the Zairian people who have assured us of their confidence in taking part in this present meeting.

On behalf of my delegation and on my own behalf, I should like to join with previous speakers in congratulating most warmly the President, as well as the Vice-Presidents, of the Conference, on their election to these high offices of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. I am convinced that their experience and eminent personal qualities will enable them to conduct our discussions so that we achieve fruitful results.

I should also like to take this opportunity of expressing my gratitude to Mr. Francis Blanchard, Director-General of the International Labour Organisation, and his colleagues, for the serious work he has undertaken and the quality of the documents that have been submitted to us.

The Report of the Director-General gives us a clear overview and a penetrating analysis of those matters which should receive priority attention from the Conference. Part I of his Report, Human rights – A common responsibility deals with a subject which deserves a great deal of thought, given its present relevance and importance.

This world is undergoing a continuing crisis, which is characterised by a turbulent monetary system, demographic expansion, the growing indebtedness of developing countries, unemployment, famine, the ever-increasing gap between the rich and the poor – both as regards individuals and at the national level – and the renewal of regional conflicts: and in this world, fundamental human rights, liberty the dignity of man, far from being recognised, are often flouted in dramatic conditions.

This is why the delegation of Zaire feels that on this occasion of the 40th anniversary of the proclamation of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, it is necessary to evaluate and take stock of the main problems which the Organisation and its mandates are confronting in order to ensure that the fundamental rights of man are fulfilled.

Zaire remains convinced of the importance of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Proclaimed quite rightly as an ideal to be achieved by all people and all nations, the Universal Declaration seeks to safeguard the physical and moral integrity of the individual through a set of legal standards. It covers, without making any distinction, economic rights, social and cultural rights, as well as civil and political rights.

The mandate conferred upon our Organisation as regards the protection and promotion of fundamental rights has been laid down in the Declaration of Philadelphia which proclaims that "all human beings, irrespective of race, creed or sex, have the right to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity".

We therefore feel that there is every reason to affirm that the standard-setting and practical activities of our Organisation contribute towards attaining rights and freedoms for the greatest number of people.

However, in order to preserve its momentum and credibility, the standard-setting bodies of the International Labour Organisation should have a supervisory system which can be adapted, when and where required, to changes.

In Zaire, the People's Revolutionary Movement, our Party State, has committed itself to freeing Zairian men and women from all their bonds and to helping them attain a truly democratic and social republic.

The Manifesto of N'Sele, our fundamental charter, proclaims that human freedom is the main priority of the People's Revolutionary Movement and that Zairian men and women must be delivered not only from material constraints but also from political and spiritual constraints, whether they be traditional or more recent ones.

The Constitution of Zaire guarantees the basic rights of man. Indeed, Article 12 of the Constitution establishes the principle of non-discrimination before the law. It states that all Zairians are equal before the law and have the right to equal protection through these laws. No Zairian can be discriminated against in education, in access to public functions or in any other way, whether it results from a law, from an Executive Act, on the grounds of his religion, racial or ethnic origin, sex, place of birth or residence.

Moreover, in order to defend the rights and freedoms of the citizens and to contribute towards social peace by means of the law, the first president of the People's Revolutionary Movement, President of the Republic, citizen Mobutu Sésé Séko, set up the Department of the Rights and Freedoms of the Citizen within the Executive Council on 31 October 1986. This mechanism to promote human rights is the only one of its kind on our continent.

Far from replacing the Legal Council, which is a party body responsible for laying down the law, the Department of the Rights and Freedoms of the Citizen comes to the aid of citizens who have been unjustly deprived of their rights or freedoms when all the ways and means of legal recourse have been exhausted.

We can affirm categorically that in light of the number of cases the Department has taken on it has fulfilled the aspirations of the people.

Externally, the Department of the Rights and Freedoms of the Citizen continues to confirm its credibility. It has just signed a protocol of collaboration for the protection and promotion of human rights with the Association of African Jurists.

Concerning Part II of the Report of the Director-General, the delegation of my country is very glad to see the positive results that have been registered in many technical fields, in particular in the field of standard-setting activities, technical co-operation and the dissemination of information through publications. All this demonstrates the dynamism and efficiency of our Organisation in accomplishing its tasks.

We are very happy to note that in spite of the severe problems facing us nowadays, the International Labour Organisation has attempted not only to maintain but even to reinforce most of its activities, especially those concerning the promotion of standards, the respect of human rights, the World Employment Programme for training and industrial relations.

Our Organisation's main objectives are, of course, to defend human rights, to overcome unemployment and poverty and to set up favourable conditions for a world economy which is dynamic, prosperous and just.

Nevertheless, we feel that it is necessary, on the one hand, to re-evaluate technical co-operation to ensure that it corresponds to the needs, possibilities and capacity of the International Labour Organisation and, on the other hand, to study and improve the interaction between international standards and technical co-operation to guarantee correct application of these standards.

In the Republic of Zaire, as a result of the crisis which has hit the labour world, the Executive Council is seeking ways and means to promote full, productive employment and fight against poverty and unemployment.

Thus, within a framework of development strategies in its third seven-year term, which is devoted to solving social problems, the President of the Republic has proclaimed 1987 a year for the mobilisation of internal income and domestic production.

This year, the watchword is productive labour for the improvement of the living conditions of the people of Zaire. In order to put this watchword into practice, the Executive Council has made it its mission to unite employers and workers in a common effort of action to increase their productivity and hence their income.

However, in order to find some answers to the problems of unemployment, the Executive Council had first of all to obtain accurate information on the employment market. To this end, it conscientiously carried out a census of the unemployed, starting off in January 1986 in Kinshasa where an experimental pilot job centre was established.

This operation has just been extended to Lubumbashi in the Shaba region, the second economic centre of the country, where another job centre has been opened.

Although the results are, as yet, modest, the census of the unemployed will enable us to set up a data bank with a view to a rational utilisation of our national manpower.

Moreover, as I said last year at this rostrum, given the virtual saturation of the modern industrial sector, the Executive Council continues its activity to promote the informal or non-structured sector, which at present offers the best prospects for the creation of new employment.

We should also note that, within the framework of technical co-operation between the ILO and my country, the Executive Council is financing, jointly with the UNDP and the ILO, an important project relating to the implementation of a reform of the social security system. Zaire hopes to benefit in the near future from technical assistance from the ILO, in order to carry out this project successfully.

Before concluding, I would like to stress that the Republic of Zaire actively condemns the intransigence of the racist and regressive regime of South Africa. It demands the immediate independence of Namibia and an end to aggression against the countries bordering Namibia by South Africa.

We feel that the ILO should continue its efforts to mobilise its members in order to promote the abolition of the apartheid regime, and intensify the technical co-operation it provides to the national liberation movements and the independent trade unions of South Africa, Namibia and the front-line States. The intensification of economic sanctions and the prohibition of travel and trade relations between member States of our Organisation and South Africa should be encouraged.

We hope that the work of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference will further the cause of the International Labour Organisation, and contribute to its objectives of social justice, social progress and freedom.

Interpretation from Portuguese: Mr. CORREIA GANANCIO (Workers' delegate, Mozambique) – On behalf of the Mozambique Workers' Organisation, I would first of all like to present our congratulations to Mr. Beyreuther on his election to the presidency of this 75th Session of the International Labour Conference, and also hail the Reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

We still live today in an atmosphere marked by a strained political and dramatic economic situation. The most significant expressions of this are as follows: regional military conflicts with international consequences; the constant increase of external debt that can only be described as a calamity; unemployment in developed countries which has reached astronomic proportions and characterised now by permanent unemployment; ever-growing poverty in underdeveloping countries that victimises millions of human beings and, above all, children.

All this constitutes a waste of material and human capacities that cannot be justified. Taking into account the high level of consciousness and intelligence, and the available means and progress already achieved in our time, in view of all this the situation which we are experiencing today can only be qualified as a crime against humanity. There is an urgent need to put an end to this situation. Fortunately, some positive signs are starting to appear in this connection. If the contrary were true, we might lose hope and lose our faith in man.

Therefore, we warmly hail the agreement signed between the United States and the Soviet Union for the elimination of short- and intermediate-range nuclear missiles. We also wish to hail the recent developments regarding consultations for a peaceful solution of the regional conflicts.

In this context, experience shows that this objective can be achieved through vigorous and concerted action by all nations, all men of good will and all sincere people, particularly those involved in the world of labour, and the workers, ranging from the simple peasant to the worker and up to the scientist.

Therefore, we are convinced that the ILO, as an international body which represents the world of labour, should continue as in the past its efforts to promote the well-being of all mankind.

We wish to show confidence that this session will take decisions regarding important concrete actions that will constitute valid and adequate contributions to dealing with complex, dramatic and extremely dangerous situations that we are today experiencing.

The situation in southern Africa, where my country is situated, continues to be explosive. The apartheid regime unceasingly perpetrates acts of state terrorism and these are accentuated by direct attacks against neighbouring independent States, promoting acts of destabilisation as well as assassinations of Black and White South Africans in exile through its gangs of professional murderers. And apartheid can be said to be non-racial in terms of practising such assassinations.

The eradication of this heinous, anachronistic and unacceptable system in our contemporary civilisation continues to represent a fulcrum for the solution of all the problems experienced in the region.

We note with great satisfaction that there is a recognition of the need to eliminate apartheid, not only to condemn it but to work for its removal by applying concrete measures. Therefore the strength of apartheid depends on its economic and military power, supported by external forces. The survival of the apartheid regime, as well as its condescending behaviour, depends on external support – as is often said, “it is well backed”.

The following statistics demonstrate how the apartheid regime has jeopardised the economy of my country through destabilisation.

Income from exports was reduced from US$280 in 1981 to US$80 million in 1986.

Moreover, for the same year, income from exports only covered 14 per cent of imports.

In 1986, foreign currency income through international ports and railways covered or accounted for only 17 per cent of the 1981 level.

Therefore, all those who support the apartheid regime are responsible for the crimes committed by it.

In this context, it is, as far as we are concerned, a matter of principle to demonstrate militant solidarity with the South African people, led by the ANC, in their struggle against apartheid. We support the struggle of the people of Namibia, led by SWAPO, for their independence by applying Resolution 435 of the United Nations Security Council. We also support the struggle of all people struggling for their freedom and social justice.

However, in spite of the situation created by apartheid, the people of the region are continuing their struggle and are fully aware that their destiny ultimately depends on themselves.

The Southern African Development Co-ordinating Conference Member States (SADCC) is continuing to move forward, not only in the process of liberating people from economic dependence in relation to South Africa, but also jointly and individually supporting economic development.

The workers in the region are conscious of and taking into account the importance of this struggle.

The economic rehabilitation programme that we started in our country in 1987 is now producing positive results.

The cessation of economic slump and the recovery of economic growth in 1986 gave rise in 1987 to a global overall growth of GNP by 4 per cent. Productivity has greatly increased. Food prices doubled and consumer goods have trebled in price three times, which in fact corresponds to an increase of 100 per cent in salaries and the equivalent of 250 per cent in minimum salaries.

It is true that our workers experience great sacrifices imposed by the apartheid regime but they are accepting these sacrifices because it is necessary to fight for a hard-won independence and maintain it, but also to assure the future that we wish to build.

On the other hand, the new policy on prices and wages has an important impact on economic recovery in the production sectors, and there is now a better balance of income and expenditure.

The decisions and positions adopted by the ILO are of great importance to the labour world and may also influence decisions taken in other bodies with responsibilities in various complex areas of competence.

For that reason, our decisions and positions in relation to the problems affecting us must not be removed from our own specific role, since we represent the world of labour, that is, a fundamental and active force in society.

In conclusions, we would like to affirm, as we did in our last statement at the 74th Session of the International Labour Conference, that we are convinced that this 75th Session will fulfil with dignity its role. The world of labour must carry on its mission in contributing to the well-being of mankind as a whole.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. MENESES ALVELO (Workers' delegate, Panama) – It is a great pleasure for me to address this august assembly and express, on behalf of the Panamanian workers and the National Council of Organised Workers, the CONATO, our warmest greetings to the delegates meeting in this important international forum to discuss and examine the problems facing our countries.

May I congratulate the President on his election. We are sure that under his wise leadership our meeting will achieve fruitful results.

We are pleased that the Director-General's Report has dealt with human rights on the occasion of the 40th anniversary of the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

It is of great importance that this report also deals with freedom of association and the right to organise vital principles, yet so often violated by governments and employers. It should enable the 75th Session of the Conference to evaluate the measures adopted by the ILO to promote and defend the respect of human rights.

The task of defending human rights is not an easy one if we bear in mind the scorn for human life shown by transnational enterprises and governments, and their willingness to sacrifice the lives of workers for a profit.

For the trade union movement, human rights means more than respect for freedom of association, even though we acknowledge its importance. Without the right to work, the right to organise is secondary.

The human rights which we are defending every-day in our countries and enterprises are closely linked to the fight for peace. Everyone who struggles for peace is struggling for human rights: 2 million dollars are invested in weapons each minute, while in the Third World countries 120,000 children die of hunger or owing to the lack of medicines every three days.

The rights of workers and of peoples are increasingly threatened by misery, disease, hunger and unemployment owing to the failures of government, the yoke of an unpayable foreign debt, and constraints imposed by financial organisations such as the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund, as a consequence of the unequal terms of trade between small and large capitalist nations.

We have often said that the problems affecting our countries will not be resolved until we espouse a new international economic order. At the present, studies by specialists and scientists show that for Latin America the problem of foreign debt is a hemorrhaging wound. According to the Permanent Secretary of the Latin American Economic System, in spite of the massive transfer of almost 150 billion dollars from 1982 to 1987, basically in payment of interests, the debt of the region increased from 330 to 410 billion dollars.

This means that the efforts of the Latin American countries to restructure their economies and service their debt have been virtually in vain; the region cannot hope to have the problem solved by the generosity of the creditor banks or the good will of creditor countries. The time has come for Latin American countries to get together and devise real solutions.

Those of us who come from Panama, where imperialism, in the interest of its strategic objectives, has since June 1987 planned, financed and carried out criminal actions in the country through the so-called "National Civic Crusade", with the objectives of implanting a compliant government which would submit to the orders of the White House, imposing a revision of the Torrijos-Carter Treaties and negotiating a new military agreement to keep their troops on our soil past the year 2000 and guarantee that the canal once it is turned over to Panama will not be state-owned but controlled by the multinationals.

Eleven months have passed since the start of harassment by the United States Government; it has brought our small country to the most serious economic crisis in its history. They froze our funds in United States banks. They appropriated the income generated by the Canal, leaving the country without cash. They provoked the close-down of the Panamanian banking system, creating a financial panic. They created all types of street disorders, spurred by the actions of the Ambassador Arthur Davis, his daughter and many officials from the United States Embassy, and launched a propaganda campaign of the most despicable kind ever seen so openly in any country. They brought in troops and threatened to invade us. We condemn this aggression.

We have experienced serious difficulties, with a foreign power trampling on the most elementary human rights. In this political crisis the Del Valle Government fell; there is now another President; the internal military coup failed; the crusade has become fragmented; the Church's mediation has failed; the employers' closing of businesses...

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT (Mr. ADIKO) – Would you be kind enough to keep to the main points of the Report of the Director-General. We are here to work for peace, not to foster animosities. Please go on.

Translation from Spanish: Mr. MENESES ALVELO – Mr. President, the Standing Orders of the Conference recognise freedom of speech, provided one does not offend or denigrate anyone. I have done neither. I was referring to the human rights mentioned in the Director-General's Report; there would be no point in coming here from Panama and repeating what the Director-General has already said, without describing what is going on in my country as concerns human rights.

The crisis is receding; our enemies have realised that there is nothing to be gained from it, and that the people and the present commander of the armed forces, Manuel Antonio Noriega, he whom imperialism and the oligarchy blame for the crisis that they themselves provoked, have resolved to stand firm.

The internal problems of Panama, including the problem of our armed forces, will be resolved by the Panamanians without the interference of foreign powers or the presence of imperialists.

The consequences of the crisis have been serious. In 1987, 6,846 workers were dismissed, and in 1988 there have been 5,823, according to official data.

According to reliable sources, 35,000 workers were dismissed, bringing the total number of unemployed workers to almost 200,000 a large number in a small country like Panama.

It is fashionable today for enterprises to send workers to holiday homes, on leave, but without pay. Collective agreements are no longer negotiated owing to economic problems; we have to take over enterprises to guarantee workers' benefits.

The workers' movement is fighting and maintaining its readiness to confront this new attack. My trade union, together with the Federation of Public Employees, the Confederation of Trade Unions of State Enterprises and the National Confederation of Rural Workers, has formed the United People's Front with branches in the provinces, and we have organised a national dialogue among 23 political organisations from different sectors; we hope that the results of this dialogue will be put into practice for the benefit of our people.

This is another historic battle. We give public thanks for the international support received from the international trade union movement, and particularly from the WFTU, and we thank from this rostrum the governments here who, in spite of pressure, stood up for the cause of Panama. We thank the world of trade union movement for participating in a trade union meeting of solidarity with Panama.

We regret that some in the world trade union movement, under pressure, abandoned us in the heat of the battle, but we continue the fight and we shall continue needing the support and solidarity of the international community.

This crisis has revealed the courage of the men, women and young people who today form the battalions of dignity for the defence of our country against aggression. This is a triumph over our enemies, who are only capable of paying mercenaries to invade other countries.

Once again the fundamental objectives of the ILO, as defined in the Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia, which cover the broad spectrum of social justice, a requirement for lasting peace, and the rights of all human beings without distinction of race, creed or sex to material well-being and spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, economic security and equality of opportunities, have been violated.

Allow me to paraphrase the words of Omar Torrijos Herrera before the United Nations Security Council in March 1973. The awakening of Latin America should not be hindered, but supported in order to ensure peace. A new awareness is blossoming in Latin Americans and there can be peace only if this awareness is allowed to follow its own course. Anyone opposing this process will create hostility and encourage tumult. Those who would prevent us from undertaking peaceful change are pushing our peoples to seek violent change.

Interpretation from French: Mr. ONDONDA (Workers' delegate, Congo) – I should like first of all to express my great pleasure at having an opportunity to address this august assembly, the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. It is thus, with genuine pleasure too, that I address my sincere congratulations to the President on his election.

This session of the Conference represents a very opportune moment for reflection on the serious so-wards a broader process of disarmament, not only in respect of nuclear weapons but also in the field of conventional armaments, has been welcomed throughout the world by all those who hold peace, justice and freedom dear.

In conclusion, I wish to reaffirm my wish that the work of the 75th Session will provide results that will be a source of great satisfaction to working people of all nations.

Interpretation from French: Mr. JUREK (representative of the Trade Unions International of Workers in Energy) – On behalf of the Trade Unions International of Workers in Energy, I should like most cordially to greet all the tripartite delegations, the representatives of the Governing Body, the Director-General and his assistants, and all those who participate in various ways in the work of the present session.

I should also like to associate myself most warmly with the congratulations that were addressed to the President upon his election and I should like to wish him and the other officers every success in carrying their tasks.

It is the second time since the birth in 1986 of the union that I represent that we have been invited to take part in the work of the International Labour Conference. Our 7 million members throughout the world are justly proud that we are taking part in this august international tripartite assembly in order to exchange opinions and experience as well as to take decisions in the field of labour and its socio-economic components.

The importance of the present session lies in particular in the fact that it is striving to summarise, in the context of the ILO's activity, one of the fundamental problems of man's life today – that of human rights, a problem that has been brilliantly expounded in the Report of the Director-General of the ILO, entitled Human rights – A common responsibility. This problem is also a focus of concern and of interest in the Trade Unions International of Workers in Energy. This is why we should like to join with you in the celebration of those documents that have been indelibly penned on the pages of the contemporary social history of mankind, namely the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and Convention No. 87 of 1987 which 40 years ago were given to the peoples and workers of the whole world by the United Nations and by the ILO respectively. Today, we look back at these two great documents, together with the Universal Declaration of Trade Union Rights adopted ten years ago by the Ninth World Trade Union Congress, and sum up the scope of their practical application and of their effective observance over the years since their adoption, and draw conclusions for the future.

The main conclusion that emerges is that these documents have lost none of their relevance today, because before our eyes an immense human drama is unfolding, characterised by poverty, hunger, unemployment, underemployment, malnutrition, housing shortages, the repression of trade unions and anti-union legislation, the enormous indebtedness of many countries, the plundering of developing countries, regional conflicts and warfare, shameful apartheid, racism, discrimination, and many other negative social and economic factors and destructive scourges which undermine the rights and the dignity of man. This drama involves in various degrees and in various aspects many hundreds of millions of human beings in most of the countries of this world.

Moreover, even nature is ringing alarm bells which can be heard throughout our planet as a result of the disgusting pollution which severely affects all our flora and fauna. To think that all this is happening at a time when technical, technological and scientific progress has reached a level capable of ensuring that the whole of humanity has a decent life. Unfortunately this is not the case and it will not be the case just as long as we still have an arms race in the world and until it is replaced by mutual understanding, international co-operation and dialogue between all the States of the world, and above all, between the two worlds, the socialist and the capitalist worlds, on the basis of peaceful coexistence and on the basis of a new international economic order. This is objective reality.

This picture of the world should be an appeal to the ILO at a time when it is making choices, to act even more dynamically and find new ways and means of working that are better geared to the realities of this world. The Report of the Director-General underlines the fact that the ILO should not avoid its obligation to adapt to a changing world. While I am fully endorse this idea, I nevertheless think that the activities of the ILO should promote changes in the world along the lines of a well-balanced development of the world economy, continual pursuit of social progress and more respect for human rights so as to put an end to the evil which is affecting all mankind while making sure that this change does not end in a nuclear, chemical or bacteriological disaster.

The world of labour in the energy industries, by its very nature, is a world of peace, of progress and of science. It makes its beneficial contribution to the promotion of the material and spiritual development of humanity. The Trade Unions International of Workers in Energy makes its contribution to this through its organisational and educational activities. It is therefore deeply interested in setting up a permanent committee on energy within the ILO and we have already taken the first steps by asking the competent bodies of the ILO to take this very important matter into consideration. I should like to take advantage of this opportunity to beg for your support as well for this just cause, which will help to strengthen and expand ILO activities in the field of labour on which the promotion of development depends.

The Trade Unions International of Workers in Energy is deeply attached to the fundamental principles set out in the Constitution of the ILO and will continue to work for them and for the effective implementation of the ILO programmes for the present and for the years 1990-95.

Moreover, we feel that the tendency to limit the activities of the ILO can only harm the well-founded interests of workers, of their trade unions and all the countries, both Members of the ILO and non-members. This tendency holds back ILO's activity in promoting international and multilateral co-operation. The ILO must not weaken in its activities just when the recent agreement and the Soviet and American dialogue at the summit meeting, the importance of which we fully recognise, has given the world a spark of hope for peace in the future.

In this conviction, and in the light of what I have said, I hope that you will accept the best wishes of cio-economic and political problems that are shaking the contemporary world in general and the world of labour in particular.

Exactly one year, to the day since our last meeting, we note with a heavy heart that the economic and social position of the world has not significantly changed. The world is still facing the same challenges: the poverty of millions of workers, the struggle against the ferocious exploitation of multinational corporations, the struggle of peoples against underdevelopment, the struggle for democracy, the struggle for social well-being and the political development of peoples. This is where we venture to think that this Conference will provide us with an opportunity to assess in an exhaustive manner the activities carried out by the different parties involved in the area of labour, even though we are aware of the differences that exist among them. The Report of the Director-General provides us with a relevant and penetrating analysis of these major challenges. It assesses critically the changes that have occurred in the political, economic, social and vocational fields at the international level and then proceeds to consider a series of activities which the workers must undertake.

We welcome the convergence of views, ideas and opinions which characterises the Workers' group within the International Labour Organisation which can enable us to make consistent defence of the gains achieved by workers throughout the world. Indeed it is to the honour and merit of the International Labour Organisation that it constitutes an instrument for international solidarity and economic interdependence working for the harmonious development of all states for the establishment of a new international economic order. Indeed, the International Labour Organisation is one of the few organisations of the United Nations system which brings together three diametrically opposed entities by the nature of their interests, but which are always called upon to seek consensus in order to save the international community from economic and social disaster. It is extremely regrettable to note that despite the unstinting efforts extended by workers and peoples for a better world and a more just society, nevertheless, mankind is far from having overcome definitively the chronic ills which impede its development. The crisis which is shaking the economies of countries throughout the world, including the countries of the Third World which feel its effects particularly harshly, makes it more necessary than ever to call for increased commitment from the parties represented here.

Neo-colonial exploitation, with its main agents being the multinational corporations and the voracious international financial institutions, has thus exacerbated the already-precarious situation of the young independent States of our continent, Africa. Thus, lacking resources for internal accumulation which would allow the self-financing of their economies, African countries are compelled to have recourse to credits and external loans. As is well known, this approach has considerably changed the structure of African debt, which is becoming a terrible burden for the economies of the developing countries.

This financial handicap is serving to increase the rate of unemployment every day. Endemic underemployment, the low level of productivity, insufficient income levels and, on top of that, accelerated population growth, are all crucial problems that Africa must resolve in line with its own development needs.

The protection of employment is a common responsibility to the extent that robotisation and excessive mechanisation, the fruits of modern technology, the failure of many enterprises, stoppages and lower production – all this is throwing thousands of workers on to the streets and is condemning entire peoples to live at poverty levels. It is therefore more than urgent to guarantee the right to work, training, health and social security – rights without which workers and their families are mere instruments at the mercy of monopolies and cyclic economic crises. Indeed, one of the solutions adopted by African Governments to stem the debt crisis has been the adoption of austerity budgets, and this has led to a significant reduction in public expenditure devoted to social services, including health and education. The lack of subsidies has profoundly affected the realm of education where there is a continuous lowering of the level of education provided and the quality of training.

Since the last Conference, no positive change has occurred in the political situation prevailing in southern Africa. The challenge represented by South Africa to the international community is a permanent one. The Pretoria regime, is continuing deceitfully and with impunity, the massacre of members of the Black population and is intensifying its acts of terrorism, perpetrated directly or indirectly through the financing of mercenaries, in the front-line States and in other countries. It is in this context that we should view the diabolical assassination that occurred on 28 March 1988 of the representative of the ANC in Paris, Mrs. Dulcie September, and the recent attack in Mozambique against an official of the ANC and the refusal to implement resolution 435/78 of the Security Council of the United Nations concerning Namibia.

Repeated aggression against Angola and Mozambique is a striking demonstration of the arrogance of the Pretoria regime, more than ever determined to destabilise southern Africa.

Since the last Conference, the Congolese Trade Union Confederation has been associated with all the events organised, nationally and at the level of the African continent, against apartheid. It therefore contributed to the collection of funds launched by the Organisation of African Trade Union Unity for the benefit of workers in South Africa and Namibia and has also contributed significantly to the Africa Fund.

We are living through a complex and contradictory period, one that could even be qualified as critical. The huge stockpiles of weapons are continuing to grow.

The developing countries themselves are also being brought into the inhuman arms race. Conflicts and violent confrontations that are generally exacerbating the international situation are continuing and they affect the Third World above all. The threat of a nuclear war, which would mean the end of civilisation, weighs upon all of us. Never has mankind been so near to self-destruction.

From the above, it is quite clear that the struggle for peace and disarmament is the main task of our age. For this reason, the agreement reached in Washington on the elimination of short- and intermediate-range missiles, which should open the way to the Trade Unions International of Workers in Energy for the work of the 75th Session of the Conference.

Mr. MATHEW (representative of the Trade Unions International of Transport Workers) – Let me at the outset congratulate the Director-General on the deep and thought-provoking Report that he has presented to this session. He has rightly pointed out that civil and political rights can be ensured only through economic development. He has also stated that in large parts of the world the pursuit of self-interest is considered the motor of progress. "Increasing tendencies have manifested themselves in various parts of the world to let social policies be dictated largely by market forces". He has hit the nail correctly on the head by saying that progress towards realisation of human rights can be attained only by changes in social relationships resulting from political debate and struggle. We have no hesitation in accepting the Report as a good basis for discussion.

What are the changes immediately needed in social relationships?

We are living in an age of domination of the world economic scene by huge transnational corporations which are increasingly finding it possible to decide matters according to their wishes. Gone are the old days of free enterprise, free competition and the free market. On the other hand, we have deliberate manipulation of the markets including the money markets by using the enormous power of the big corporations and banks and these operations are carried on internationally. The results have been growing indebtedness of the Third World countries, the widening gap between them and the developed countries and the extreme poverty of about a billion people around the world. In the developed market economy countries the results are growing unemployment and the fragmentation of the labour force.

Therefore, policies of introducing structural changes to augment the domination of the monopolies should be discarded by the market economy countries. Deregulation and privatisation should be stopped. The transnational corporations should be curbed. The economies should be reorganised on the basis of social justice. Thus alone can full employment and equitable international economic relations be attained. Only in such an economic climate will human rights become realisable in the market economy countries.

It is noteworthy that structural changes are afoot in some of the socialist countries also and these are based upon the need to further modernise their economies. It is also seen that the mechanisms of the market, such as profitability of enterprises, incentives for work and competitiveness, are being utilised for the restructuring. As the Director-General has rightly pointed out in his Report, these reforms will require new policies regarding the placing of labour, retraining and remuneration. The added productivity resulting from the reform could lead to more benefits for everyone and may eventually include reduced hours of work as well. The level of realisation of human rights could improve further.

Although the Director-General's Report has refrained from mentioning the deep differences in value-judgements and historical backgrounds regarding human rights, it is worthwhile discussing these questions with a view to securing human rights for all people.

In the market economy countries movements for civil and political rights arose as espoused by people who were able to appreciate these rights and utilise them to further their economic, social and cultural situation. But the large majority were not in a position to do this. When the workers were able to organise strong trade unions and to better their lot they became capable of struggling for civil and political rights as also of enjoying these rights to some extent. Thus in these countries civil and political rights came to acquire a pre-eminent position, even relegating economic, social and cultural rights to the background. The governments of these countries did not assume any responsibility to provide the people with material well-being in the past. They were not considered human rights at all. That situation has changed in varying degrees in different countries as a result of long and arduous struggle and these rights are accepted as a programme to be implemented over a period of time subject to availability of resources. Early realisation of human rights as a whole, especially the realisation of the right to work is what is needed.

In the socialist countries the emphasis has been to ensure economic, social and cultural rights, especially the right to work which creates favourable conditions for the realisation of all the other rights including civil and political rights.

The Director-General has raised the question whether it would not be appropriate to guarantee the right to work to be embodied in an international Convention of the ILO. After making a summary review of the situation, he has answered that full, productive and freely chosen employment must remain a vital goal of national policy for all States. He has not failed to state that there is need for a greater sense of urgency, for greater political will and for new efforts of thought and imagination. He has also stated: "Failing the requisite action, we must expect the world's economic and social stability to come under increasing strain, as the gap continues to widen between the wealthy few and the masses living in deprivation and despair. In such a setting human rights, democracy and peace itself would be at risk".

It is felt that the adoption of a convention embodying the right to work would help in imparting the sense of urgency about which the Director-General has so earnestly made his remarks.

However, it has to be stated that the adoption of the Convention should be considered only as an important step leading to further activities of the ILO for ensuring full employment. Such further activities of the ILO in our opinion should concern the following areas: international monetary and trade practices which are creating massive unemployment and poverty in the developing countries. In this issue the ILO could intervene with the other specialised agencies concerned in the United Nations Systems; creation of rural employment. First steps could be taken based on the conclusions arising from the discussions on this problem in the session; ensuring full co-operation of workers and their trade unions in the formulation and implementation of employment programmes of the various governments. The Director-General has rightly stressed this point.

We appreciate that the ILO Medium-Term Plan 1990-95 concentrates on the priority issues of human rights, employment, working conditions and social security. These being vital problems for all the workers of the world, we are of the opinion that the Plan itself should be placed before the session for examination and approval.

It is seen that some countries, such as Chile, Colombia, El Salvador, Guatemala, South Africa, the occupied Arab territories, Iran, etc., are frequently being discussed in the Committee on Freedom of Association. Apparently these countries are carrying on violation of trade union rights as a matter of policy. Therefore the present procedure of dealing with individual complaints of violation seems to have become infructuous and insufficient. We therefore consider that it is time to think about more expedient and effective measures under the Constitution. We appeal that the Governing Body may consider what further steps are to be adopted.

Finally, I welcome the exchange of documents ratifying the Intermediate-Range Nuclear Forces Treaty between Gorbachev and Reagan, thereby eliminating an entire class of nuclear weapons. It is a truly historic achievement towards total disarmament. It is also hoped that further progress will be made in the effort for reduction of strategic nuclear weapons. Peace is vital for the world in as much as the resources saved by disarmament could be utilised for solving the serious problems facing mankind including the problems of full employment and human rights.

On behalf of the Trade Unions International of Transport Workers I wish the Conference every success.

Mrs. DOURTCHEVA (representative of the Women's International Democratic Federation) – Allow me first of all to express my gratitude for the opportunity given to the Women's International Democratic Federation to address this high forum on behalf of women of its 138 national affiliated organisations in 124 countries and to convey their concerns and their aspirations as workers and citizens.

The WIDF highly appreciates the increased attention the ILO has given in recent years to the problems of women workers in implementation of the 1985 Conference resolution on equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women in employment and of the Forward-Looking Strategies for the Advancement of Women till the year 2000, adopted by the World Conference for Women in Nairobi in July 1985.

We fully share the evaluation in the Director-General's Report that the elaboration and adoption in 1987 of the Plan of Action on Equality of Opportunity and Treatment of Men and Women in Employment "provides a framework for ILO efforts in the future to improve the situation of women workers and translate into practice the principles embodied in relevant decisions and international labour standards".

The full scope of implementation of this Plan, however, continues to be dependent not only on its proper coverage in the Programme and Budget 1988-89 and the Medium-Term Plan 1990-95, but to an even greater extent on the political will and practical action of ILO Members. We fully appreciate the support given from this rostrum to the importance of international instruments as a vehicle for international co-operation and a common measurement scale on performance. However, the millions of women workers in question live and work under the specific conditions of their country of origin or domicile and even the most perfect international instrument cannot suffice if action is blocked at national level. Valid proof in this respect has been handed over to delegates with the basic set of documents, namely Report III, (Part 4B), Equality in employment and occupation.

The WIDF would like to avail itself of this opportunity to congratulate the Governing Body on selecting the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958, (No. 111), and Recommendation (No. 111), 1958, for discussion under item III of the agenda at this busy Session of the International Labour Conference, having as a main topic Human rights – A common responsibility.

Even more so, because in spite of the efforts and some achievements in the 30 years since the adoption of Convention No. 111 and in spite of the number of new legislative Acts in other spheres of social life adopted at national level during the United Nations Decade for Women (1975-85), the discrimination to which women in many countries are still subject in the field of employment and occupation is seconded by continuing discrimination in the field of remuneration, lack of sufficient maternity protection, if any, etc., problems also covered by ample ILO standards. The ILO Year Book of Labour Statistics is the best evidence of the still traditionally biased structure of the female labour force, of a wage differential of up to 60 per cent in the extreme cases for work of equal value in a number of countries, not to mention that most of the women are still clustered in the low-paid, low-prestige jobs where this unit measure does not apply.

Special assistance is needed for women workers subject to overt discrimination under apartheid and in the occupied Arab territories and everywhere where racism and racial discrimination make them victims of double and sometimes of triple discrimination.

Against the background of the existing information the WIDF would like to launch one again the call for further urgent practical action for strict implementation of the ILO standard-setting instruments related to the situation of women workers, with the immediate target of abolishing existing discrimination and ensuring for women the place of equal partners in the field of work.

Affirmative action is also needed to cut the roots of the perpetration of discrimination in new forms. Women's education and training for employment in the era of fast advances in scientific and technological progress should be geared to make women compatible in the labour market, properly equipped to face the challenge of new technologies.

While this is valid for the female labour force as a whole, specific attention is needed in the case of young women, who as a group combine into one the severe problems of two large vulnerable groups – youth and women. As an outcome of an international semina, sponsored jointly by nine international NGOs on the theme "Young Women's Equal Opportunities for Education, Employment and Training for Employment" (Barcelona 4-7 May 1987), we would suggest a more detailed study on this subject by the Youth Division and the Office on Women Workers' Questions jointly. Immediate action in this field is an important investment in the structure and qualifications of the female labour force of tomorrow. There is already a rich stock of positive experience in this respect accumulated by now in the countries with centrally planned economies, which in addition to all educational and training aspects have even gone so far as to provide maternity benefits usually allocated to working women to female university students with children as a form of preinvestment of the female labour force.

The WIDF appreciates highly the second discussion on employment policy and the eventual adoption of a Convention and Recommendation on employment promotion. However, a document aimed at promoting employment and laying down some basis for cutting down unemployment, by which women en masse are worst hit, both as individuals and as members of the family of an unemployed person, will be incomplete without the specific commitment of the ILO to the guarantee of the right to work. Even more so in the year when humanity is celebrating the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which solemnly proclaimed the right to work as an inalienable right of all human beings. This right has already been vested in a number of other international instruments adopted by the United Nations, among them the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights.

In the world of today how can one ensure the full enjoyment of all other human rights without a guarantee of the right to work, how can millions break through the vicious circle creating the class of "newly poor", as if the poor were not enough? In our opinion it is the unique expertise, accumulated in this Organisation, which if coupled with its pledge to the right to work as a fundamental human right could provide the legal basis for consistent national and international action to combat unemployment and help create conditions conducive to full employment.

The WIDF is fully aware that changes cannot take place overnight, that the situation of women workers is closely dependent on the social, economic and political circumstances of the individual societies in which they live. The implementation of their human rights as workers, especially in the developing countries, is dependent on the availability of resources, both human and financial. Effective introduction of the New International Economic Order and solving of the foreign-debt problem will place women of the developing countries among the most conscious beneficiaries and agents of the development process as it means bread, and often water, housing, education for them and their children.

The inter-relationship between respect for human rights and the maintenance of peace and stability, mentioned in the Director-General's Report and emphasised by a number of speakers before me, is another key factor, offering a solution to the problems of workers, including women. The positive developments in the international climate, the first steps taken in the direction of effective disarmament with the signing and ratification of the INF Treaty and the ongoing other negotiations raise the hope that the huge human and material resources, wasted for decades on the arms race, will finally be re-directed in favour of development. The United Nations Conference on Disarmament and Development established a sound framework in which we hope more practical thought can be given by the ILO to how part of the resources released through disarmament can be used to promote the social and economic conditions of women workers.

In conclusion, allow me to join the Director-General in his high appreciation of the activities of the Office of Women Workers' Questions, whose unbiased, profound studies and publications have proved to be of tremendous value to us as a source of information and a stimulus for action.

Interpretation from French: The PRESIDENT (Mr. ADIKO) – I call on Mr. Becker, Government adviser, United States, to exercise his right of reply.

Mr. BECKER (Government adviser, United States) – Just yesterday Mr. Peterson of the United States delegation found it necessary to call a point of order and request the right of reply in the face of polemical, non-germane and irrelevant remarks by another Panamanian delegate. At that time the United States delegate explained the background and causes of the United States economic sanctions towards Panama, a subject raised at the time by the Panamanian speaker. Again we find ourselves back to non-germane and irrelevant subject material raised by the distinguished Workers' delegate from the Republic of Panama, Mr. Meneses. We must respond a further time. Among other statements, Mr. Meneses has drawn the United States, the White House and "aggressive" United States troops into his remarks. I note that United States forces are in Panama under the Treaties of 1977. The United States has never faltered and remains fully committed to honouring all of its commitments under the Panama Canal treaties of 1977.

In conclusion, I would quote one phrase from the English language translation of a letter that I found on my desk from the Consejo Nacional de la Empresa Privada to the International Organisation of Employers, and the one phrase that I would quote is: "The fundamental issue in Panama is not foreign intervention but the countywide armed occupation of our own armed forces."

Presidents: Mr. Beyreuther, Mr. Adiko

SIXTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – The first item on our agenda is the sixth report of the Selection Committee. I call on Mr. Vargas Escobar, Government delegate, Nicaragua, Chairman of the Selection Committee, to submit the report.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. VARGAS ESCOBAR (Government delegate, Nicaragua; Chairman of the Selection Committee) – It is my honour to submit to the Conference the sixth report of the Selection Committee, which is to be found in Provisional Record No. 5E.

The Selection Committee first proposes that some non-governmental international organisations be invited to have themselves represented at the Conference and in one of its committees.

Furthermore, it recommends that the Conference approve certain changes in the composition of certain Conference committees.

In addition, the Selection Committee, at the request of its Workers' Vice-Chairman, supported by the Employers' Vice-Chairman, urges the governments that have been requested by the Committee on the Application of Standards to provide it with information to do so as soon as possible in order to facilitate the organisation of the work of the Committee.

I recommend that the Conference adopt this report.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – The sixth report of the Selection Committee is now before the Conference. If there are no objections, I take it that the report is adopted?

(The report is adopted.)

RATIFICATION OF THE INSTRUMENT FOR THE AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANISATION, 1986

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – I have pleasure to inform you that the Director-General of the International Labour Office has registered the ratification by Togo of the Instrument for the Amendment of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation, 1986.

This brings the total number of ratifications and acceptances of the Instrument to 40

COMMUNICATION BY THE PRESIDENT TO THE CONFERENCE

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – I would like to make the following announcement. The President of the African National Congress (ANC), Mr. Oliver Tambo, has sent me a telex in my capacity as President of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. In the telex Mr. Tambo informs me that on 6 June a three-day peaceful protest began by the whole trade union movement and the workers under the leadership of the Congress of South African Trade Unions (COSATU). This protest was directed against the most recent amendments to the law in South Africa and the violation of the basic rights of the workers.

The National Executive Committee of the ANC decided on this basis to appeal to the International Labour Conference to discuss this issue, which is vital for the South African workers, and to give every possible support to the South African workers.

After a discussion with the Officers, it is our view that we should act in accordance with this justified request and we therefore propose that the telex be transmitted to Committee on Apartheid of the Conference because that Committee is considering the questions to which the telex refers. We are certain that the Committee on Apartheid will propose the necessary steps and will take up the telex in its report to the Conference.

Furthermore, I should like to inform you that at the moment contacts are taking place to mark the solidarity of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference with the justified claims of the South African workers in an appropriate manner.

If you agree, we can proceed in this way.

Interpretation from German: The PRESIDENT – We now continue with the discussion of the report of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. AL-JUMAIRY (Under-Secretary for Labour, United Arab Emirates) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! It is my pleasure to address my congratulations to the President on the occasion of his election to the presidency of this session of the International Labour Conference. We very sincerely wish him every success in the guidance of its work in a spirit of responsibility, objectivity and wisdom, so that this Conference may bear its hoped-for fruit.

I should also like to congratulate the Vice-Presidents of the Conference and wish them every success as well.

This Conference is taking place in international and regional circumstances that are delicate. The world is facing many challenges. The international economic crisis facing the world since the beginning of the 1980s is making things even more difficult. The problems of poverty and unemployment are affecting millions of people. Regional conflicts are exposing millions to destruction and death. The freedom and dignity of man are continually suffering from injustice, oppression and persecution. The rights of human communities to nationhood and self-determination are still too often denied or scorned. International co-operation is on the decline and the indebtedness of developing countries is worsening the international situation.

In this context, it was perfectly natural for the Director-General of the ILO to choose human rights as the theme of his Report for this session, for many reasons including the obvious relationship of the subject with our Organisation. The International Labour Conference is urged therefore to react to the events that are shaking our world as far as human rights are concerned, because the objectives of this Organisation are to establish peace and social justice. The Conference must therefore fulfil its duty with a sense of responsibility that is worthy of the Organisation's rank at the international level, and of its tripartite structure.

The Director-General's Report has laid considerable stress upon the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the role of the Organisation in promoting and protecting these rights. He has made an objective and realistic summary of the state of affairs in the world as regards these rights today. He has reviewed the problems and obstacles that are preventing the enjoyment of these rights, and urged the international community to shoulder its responsibilities. We must therefore thank the Director-General for his valuable Report and pay tribute to the ILO and the other United Nations specialised agencies for their efforts in the protection of human rights. We believe that this Report, with all the information, opinions and ideas it contains, is a useful basis for our discussions. It therefore provides a starting point for further work to strengthen and protect human rights.

Forty years have passed since the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, but the Islamic religion was revealed as an immortal message to the whole of mankind 1,400 years ago. The essence of this message is equality between human beings, the preservation of the rights of man and respect for his beliefs, for his personal integrity and property. In Islam, human rights are intangible and inalienable, and are seen in the context of a comprehensive doctrine and a structured jurisdiction which clearly establish man's relationship with his creator and the relations between people in all spheres of life.

In the United Arab Emirates we take Islamic law as the main source of our legislation, and the Islamic civilisation, a pioneer in the field of human progress, as a model in building a society with a highly developed sense of civic responsibility based on principles of equality and social justice. It is a society that guarantees its citizens equality and security, calm and equality of opportunity without discrimination on the basis of origin, nationality, religious belief, or social position.

Our Constitution has clearly established the fundamental freedoms of which we can quote as examples the freedom of the individual; the prohibition on violating the moral or physical integrity of an accused person; the freedom and secrecy of correspondence by any means of communication; the freedom to meet and associate within the law. Foreign nationals in our country enjoy all the rights and freedoms established by the international charters and instruments.

In the field of employment, the Constitution guarantees the right to choose employment and prohibits forced labour. Freely chosen productive work is considered an essential foundation of society and progress. The State ensures the promotion and protection of employment by legislation that guarantees the rights of workers and employers in accordance with the most advanced international labour standards.

In the field of economic planning, the policy of the United Arab Emirates is to try to find a balance between economic and social development. That is why my Government has paid constant attention to the development of human resources and the social and cultural development of the human being. The State provides very extensive health, educational and vocational training services. There is comprehensive social security going beyond international labour standards and not limited to wage-earners alone.

The position of the workers with respect to safety and health at work is constantly improving, which contributes to a reassuring environment.

As far as ratification of the international Conventions is concerned, we have adhered to the international labour standards essential to the observance of human rights, including those regarding hours of work, the banning of forced labour, labour inspection and night work for women.

Part II of the Director-General's Report reviews the ILO's activities in 1987, and mentions many activities and achievements in all regions of the world.

With regard to the ILO's activities in the Arab States, I should like to point out that these countries need technical co-operation activities in all the spheres of the ILO's competence, particularly the development of human resources.

I should like to draw the attention of the Conference to the 16th Session of the Arab Labour Conference held in Baghdad last March which extended the implementation of the regional development project of the Arab labour administrations for a three-year period from June 1989. We would invite the Governing Body and the Director-General to take all the steps necessary to put into effect this important project to develop Arab labour administrations.

The Director-General has also presented a report on apartheid in South Africa and a report from the ILO mission on the situation of the Arab workers in the occupied territories. Here again we must express our gratitude to the Director-General for the efforts that he has made in this respect. We must also state our unshakable position of support for the African workers in southern Africa. We support them in their courageous struggle for self-determination and for freedom from the racist policy of the South African regime.

My delegation appeals for material and moral support for the oppressed workers of South Africa and Namibia, to help them continue their struggle. We also request that all the Conventions and Recommendations adopted by the Conference concerning the programme of struggle against racial discrimination in South Africa should be put into effect.

As regards the report of the ILO mission to the occupied Arab territories, we must thank Mr. Francis Blanchard, the Director-General of the ILO, for his visit as for his efforts. He has thus been able to see for himself the deplorable situation in which Arab workers are living in the occupied territories; he has been able to appreciate for himself the serious and objective nature of the resolutions on the subject adopted by the Conference in 1974 and 1980, and to realise the need for the ILO to intensify and continue its efforts to implement these two resolutions as long as the occupation lasts.

The report on the occupied Arab territories records once again the inhuman conditions of the Arab workers there which have, moreover, become worse. The main point we want to make in this connection is that the recommendations of earlier missions were disregarded by the occupying Israeli authorities who continued to enforce their policies of settlement and racial discrimination aimed at removing the Arabs from their own land and depriving them of their identity in order to establish Israeli settlements in fundamental violation of the rights of the Palestinian people.

These policies and practices have driven the Palestinian people to rebel against oppression and injustice and against the policy of occupation in order to demonstrate to the whole world their determination to fight against the Israeli occupation. The Palestinian people as a whole has valiantly armed itself with stones and catapults to manifest its rebellion. We cannot refrain from praising this noble uprising which should be supported materially and morally by all peace- and freedom-loving forces in the world.

The whole world has been a witness to the savagery with which the Israeli occupation authorities have repressed the uprising of the Palestinian Arab people. They have resorted to oppression, assassination, the mass expulsion of the inhabitants, the destruction of houses, arrests, imprisonment, a policy of famine, the seizure of children as hostage, the forced abortion of women, searches in places of prayer, mosques, and the breaking of people's limbs in schools, universities and other educational and training establishments. All these acts constitute flagrant violations of human rights.

This colonialist policy of Israel's is in complete contradiction with all international instruments; it flouts international conscience and world public opinion. This policy, these extortions, which contravene the most elementary human rights, as well as the international labour Conventions and Recommendations, the United Nations resolutions and international covenants and practices, have made thousands of innocent victims, have widowed thousands of women, orphaned thousands of children, and driven thousands of Arabs from their homes. This policy is the most recent example of an expansionist and colonialist policy in our times. It is for the international community and the conscience of humanity to rise up against it in a responsible and objective spirit in accordance with the principles of human rights and the obligations inherent in membership of international organisations and institutions, particularly the ILO. It is now that we must ask ourselves whether Israel deserves to remain a member of this Organisation, which represents the conscience of the international community and which strives for peace founded on social justice. The delegation of the United Arab Emirates therefore invites all delegations that believe in human rights and subscribe to the principles and objectives of the ILO – peace, freedom and justice – to support the Arab resolution submitted to this session on protection of the rights and freedoms of workers and employers in Palestine and in the other occupied Arab territories.

Finally, I would like to thank you all for your kind attention and wish the Conference every success.

Interpretation from Chinese: Mr. LI (Government delegate, China) – I should like to congratulate the President on his election as the President of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. Although this session of the Conference is confronted with arduous tasks, I believe that with your experience and wisdom the Conference will surely be guided to complete success.

This year marks the 40th anniversary of the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the ILO's Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87). Substantial in content, the Report by the Director-General to the Conference gives a fairly comprehensive analysis of the ILO's activities in the area of human rights. It serves as a basis for discussion at the Conference, which offers us an opportunity to explore together how to further protect the basic rights of the working people. This is of great significance. It is our belief that in the last few decades the ILO has done a great deal of work in safeguarding the basic rights of working people through formulating labour standards and providing technical co-operation. We hope it will continue its efforts along these lines.

The Chinese Government has always respected and safeguarded the basic rights of the people. After the founding of the People's Republic of China, the rights of the people, for which we had struggled for decades and paid in blood, were written into the Constitution, which stipulates that all citizens regardless of nationality, race, sex or belief may enjoy the basic rights. It should be pointed out emphatically here that the working class is the leading class in China. Trade unions, as the representatives of the working class, participate extensively through various channels in the management of the State and society. The Chinese Government has established with the trade unions good relations of consultation on an equal footing. At present, we in China are working hard to improve socialist democracy and the legal system and to build a material civilisation with an advanced socialist culture and ideology. This will provide, in practical terms, legal and material guarantees for the rights enjoyed by the people.

It is the belief of the Chinese delegation that the ILO should make efforts to safeguard the working people's right to work as the focus of its human rights activities. The right to work or the right to employment is of special importance in the world, which is now faced with serious unemployment and poverty. Unemployment represents a disaster for a vast number of working people, in particular young people. They are not only deprived of the guarantee of a livelihood but also suffer psychologically. Under such circumstances, they cannot genuinely enjoy their other economic and social rights. The 1979 session of the International Labour Conference pointed out correctly that, in the trilogy of growth, employment and fulfilment of basic needs, employment is the key link. To ensure respect for human rights, practical efforts must be made to ensure employment of the working people.

The Chinese Government has always regarded the safeguarding of people's right to work as one of the purposes and objectives of its work. It is explicitly stated in our Constitution that citizens of the People's Republic of China enjoy the right to work and that the State creates, in various ways, employment opportunities. For nearly 40 years, the Chinese Government has made unremitting efforts to ensure employment for one-fifth of the world's population.

In the early years after the founding of the People's Republic, in the light of national conditions in China, the Chinese Government adopted a policy of low wages and more employment, thus successfully tackling the serious unemployment problem inherited from the old Government. Starting in the late seventies, when the reform of economic restructuring began, a series of policies and measures have been formulated to invigorate the economy, develop production and create extensive employment opportunities. In ten years' time, more than 75 million urban young have obtained employment and with government assistance more than 80 million surplus rural workers have shifted to non-agricultural sectors. In these efforts, we have ensured that women enjoy equal opportunities with men. The Chinese Government has also taken special care of the handicapped. By the end of 1987, the number of welfare enterprises established and operated with governmental assistance exceeded 24,000, which provided 385,000 handicapped people with employment. In recent years, the Chinese Government has also attached great importance to the rational flow and use of professionals and educated people, provided opportunities for young people waiting for employment as well as to various forms of training and further education for employed workers, and opened centres for the exchange of professionals and labour markets. Since 1986, the State has reformed its employment system and introduced the labour contract system, thus enabling both enterprises and workers to make their own choices under certain conditions. On the basis of extensive employment, China follows the principle of "from each according to his ability and to each according to his work", and by creating an employment insurance system provides people with a secure life.

An important part of human rights is the right to economic development. The basic reason for the long-term failure to solve the problems of unemployment and poverty in the world is economic underdevelopment. For the effective promotion of employment and elimination of poverty, the ILO is bound to pay great attention to the question of development. I am mainly referring to the Third World countries when talking about the right to development. At present, trade protectionism practised by the developed countries has been steadily growing. This has restricted the developing countries' export markets and brought about a drastic decline in commodity prices in the international market, thus leading to ever-deteriorating terms of trade for the developing countries. The repayment and servicing of the heavy external debt of the developing countries constitute a big drain on their limited funds. All this gravely hinders the economic recovery and growth of those countries. Therefore, in spite of the high price they have paid for their economic adjustment, the developing countries are still in very difficult circumstances. It is our belief that, if the failure to guarantee to right of the Third World countries to economic development continues for a long time, it will not only restrict the improvement of the human rights situation in the world but also affect world peace and stability. In view of this, the international community, and the developed countries in particular, should take into consideration the millions upon millions of poverty-stricken and desperate people in the Third World, adopt effective measures in regard to international trade, foreign debt and assistance, change the unjust international economic relations and help the developing countries to overcome their difficulties and to restore the momentum of their economic development. The ILO should continue to make development and employment its priority and vigorously step up technical co-operation so as to help the developing countries to surmount the difficulties they encounter in their economic development and expansion of employment.

The Chinese delegation maintains that, in discussing human rights, the atrocities of the brutal violation of human rights caused by colonialism, racism, and foreign armed invasion and occupation should in no wise be ignored. As we all know, the South African authorities are still obstinately carrying out their barbarous apartheid policy, and the basic human rights of the Palestinian people and the people in the occupied Arab territories continue to be seriously violated. In addition, as a result of foreign invasion and military occupation, the independence and sovereignty of some countries have been trampled upon, leaving large numbers of refugees displaced and homeless.

The international community, including the ILO, should continue to pay special attention to the atrocities represented by the large-scale violation of human rights. The international community should be mobilised more extensively to condemn the atrocious violation of human rights by South Africa and condemn the other acts of brutality committed in trampling upon the sovereignty of certain countries and their right to national self-determination, support the South African and Palestinian peoples in their just struggle, force the South African authorities to desist from their shameful policy of apartheid, safeguard the legitimate rights of all citizens of South Africa, call upon the Israeli authorities to withdraw from the occupied Arab territories and restore the national and basic rights of the Palestinian people.

The world is created by working people and the working people are entitled to extensive rights and freedoms. It is our hope that the ILO will do effective work in the above mentioned four areas, step up its activities related to the implementation of labour standards and develop technical co-operation, thus making a greater contribution to safeguard the basic rights of the working people. To this end, the Chinese Government is ready to co-operate actively with the ILO.

Interpretation from Polish: Mr. SEKULA (Minister of Labour and Social Policy, Poland) – It gives me special pleasure to convey to the President, on behalf of the Polish Government delegation, sincere congratulations on his election to the honourable function of President of the current session. The election of the Minister of Labour of the German Democratic Republic to this post is also an important event in the life of this Organisation.

The Director-General has justly entitled his Report Human rights – A common responsibility. This common responsibility exists in the relations between States, as well as within States – in relations between social partners. An honest and constructive dialogue has always been the key to common responsibility and common action.

The development of the international situation, including the recent important summit meeting of Secretary-General Gorbachev and President Reagan, prove that dialogue and rapprochement in problems important for the future of the world are possible, though the path to them may often be long and difficult. We welcome this dialogue, so essential for all of us, with appreciation and hope.

At the same time, in this very spirit of common responsibility, we view with the utmost concern situations which still threaten us with an explosion of unpredictable results, in particular the situation in southern Africa and in Arab territories occupied by Israel. What is urgently needed is common action leading to their solution. Time is working against all of us.

Human rights issues are specially close to us. Poland has rich historical traditions in the struggle for the right to national independence, not only that of our country but also of those countries where Poles set their feet; we also cherish the traditions of the struggle for collective and individual human rights to live and work in better economic and social conditions. We have ratified the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, as well as the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, adjusting our legislation to the requirements of those instruments. We believe that sovereign States should base their co-operation in the field of human rights on negotiated international legal instruments which are the result of their common experience and compromises which in such cases are necessary. Poland has been an initiator and co-author of many such instruments. This year, the work on the convention on the rights of the child, undertaken at our initiative, has entered its final stage.

In a spirit of sincere and open dialogue, Poland has resumed its activity in the International Labour Organisation. Yesterday, we noted with satisfaction the decision of the Conference by which our delegation regained its voting rights. In our view, certain disagreements that occurred during recent years between the Polish Government and the ILO, having their background in the exceptionally difficult internal situation in my country, already belong to the past, though time is still needed to overcome the consequences of that uneasy period. What we also need is dialogue and understanding.

The question of the application of some of the requirements of Convention No. 87 in our country still stands as an important problem. I wish to stress that the issue of trade union monism or pluralism, today connected with the difficult social and economic situation in my country, in the light of Polish trade union legislation, remains open. Its prospects are linked with the directions of the further evolution of political life in Poland and constitute a part of a wider vision of a Polish model of pluralism in public life. Future solutions in this field will be connected with more general political considerations. Quite recently, the authorities of our State declared that they are for a pluralistic pattern of co-operation and common responsibility. An important expression of this could be a kind of "anti-crisis pact" – a wide, reform-oriented coalition, covering the representatives of different moral and political orientations.

In such circumstances the final solution of the issue of trade union pluralism has obviously to be deferred to a later stage. The Polish authorities are looking forward to the ILO's understanding of this need, its benevolent patience, as well as its assistance should that be necessary.

Our aim is the full application of adopted international standards. By a special decision taken this year I have established a working group consisting of eminent experts in constitutional, labour and international law, with a the task of making an in-depth analysis of the legislation at present in force and its conformity with the ILO Conventions ratified by Poland, and of presenting appropriate conclusions to the Legislative Council responsible to the Prime Minister.

The dialogue between social partners is a fundamental and necessary prerequisite for agreement. It requires a lot of goodwill and courage to take responsibility for the results of freely assumed obligation to act in common.

Poland enters the second stage of the economic reform which constitutes an indispensable condition for our country to pull through its immeasurably difficult economic and social situation. The need for the reform was supported by the majority of Polish society in the referendum that was held in October 1987. Action taken by the Government aims at the possibility of rapidly achieving increased production, productivity and profitability based on greater economic and financial autonomy for the enterprises. We are facing the difficult task of economic restructuring and its possible repercussions in the field of employment and social policy. The Report of the Director-General mentions these new and important challenges to some of the socialist countries in reforming their systems of economic management.

Action connected with the second stage of the economic reform as well as with the implementation of some recommendations by the World Bank and International Monetary Fund, especially relating to wages and, above all, prices has inevitably had effects on the living standard of society. Aware of the burden of sacrifice imposed on our society, the Government has taken appropriate protective measures, inter alia increases in pensions and social benefits. Unfortunately, in recent months in some enterprises there has been a certain climate of impatience, expressed in work stoppages accompanied by economic and political demands. In connection with this I want to emphasise that the Trade Union Act of 8 October 1982 provides the possibility of striking as an ultimate solution after prior negotiations between trade unions and the management of the enterprises and institutions in question. This procedure provided by law has not always been observed. In fact, however, not strikes, but negotiations have finally and positively settled recent disputes which had economic causes. The authorities are always ready for a frank and honest dialogue – within the existing legal order – with the working people and the trade unions representing them on both general and specific questions, but except them to adopt the same attitude. This is the only way – as the Director-General states in his Report – to achieve a satisfactory settlement of contentions questions and to avoid drastic tensions that may only cause irreparable damage, as has been the case in my country.

The reforming action taken so far has not had fully satisfactory results. New solutions in the second stage of reform are not yet operational and have not yet reached their final form. Therefore, on 11 May this year, the Parliament of the Polish People's Republic enacted legislation conferring extraordinary prerogatives upon the Council of Ministers. This should by no means be considered as a retreat from the programme of reform. On the contrary, the special prerogatives are aimed at an acceleration of the process of reform, shortening the time expected for signs of an improvement in our economy to become more visible. The special prerogatives granted to the Government until the end of this year should serve as an additional back-up to economic mechanisms which are still not sufficiently effective. They are also expected to be of help in removing factors that hamper reform.
