CONVENTION CONCERNING INDIGENOUS AND TRIBAL PEOPLES IN INDEPENDENT COUNTRIES

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,
Having been convened at Geneva by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and having met in its 76th Session on 7 June 1989, and Noting the international standards contained in the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention and Recommendation, 1957, and Recalling the terms of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, and the many international instruments on the prevention of discrimination, and Considering that the developments which have taken place in international law since 1957, as well as developments in the situation of indigenous and tribal peoples in all regions of the world, have made it appropriate to adopt new international standards on the subject with a view to removing the assimilationist orientation of the earlier standards, and Recognising the aspirations of these peoples to exercise control over their own institutions, ways of life and economic development and to maintain and develop their identities, languages and religions, within the framework of the States in which they live, and Noting that in many parts of the world these peoples are unable to enjoy their fundamental human rights to the same degree as the rest of the population of the States within which they live, and that their laws, values, customs and perspectives have often been eroded, and Calling attention to the distinctive contributions of indigenous and tribal peoples to the cultural diversity and social and ecological harmony of humankind and to international co-operation and understanding, and Noting that the following provisions have been framed with the co-operation of the United Nations, the Food and Agriculture Organisation of the United Nations, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation and the World Health Organisation, as well as of the Inter-American Indian Institute, at appropriate levels and in their respective fields, and that it is proposed to continue this co-operation in promoting and securing the application of these provisions, and Having decided upon the adoption of certain proposals with regard to the partial revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957
(No. 107), which is the fourth item on the agenda of the session, and

Having determined that these proposals shall take the form of an international Convention revising the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, adopts this twenty-seventh day of June of the year one thousand nine hundred and eighty-nine the following Convention, which may be cited as the Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, 1989:

PART I. GENERAL POLICY

Article 1

1. This Convention applies to:
- (a) tribal peoples in independent countries whose social, cultural and economic conditions distinguish them from other sections of the national community, and whose status is regulated wholly or partially by their own customs or traditions or by special laws or regulations;

CONVENTION CONCERNANT LES PEUPLES INDIGÈNES ET TRIBAUX
DANS LES PAYS INDÉPENDANTS

La Conférence générale de l'Organisation internationale du Travail, Convoquée à Genève par le Conseil d'administration du Bureau international du Travail, et s'y étant réunie le 7 juin 1989, en sa 76^e session ; Notant les normes internationales énoncées dans la convention et la recommandation relatives aux populations autochtones et tribales, 1957 ; Rappelant les termes de la Déclaration universelle des droits de l'homme, du Pacte international relatif aux droits économiques, sociaux et culturels, du Pacte international relatif aux droits civils et politiques, et des nombreux instruments internationaux concernant la prévention de la discrimination ; Considérant que, étant donné l'évolution du droit international depuis 1957 et l'évolution qui est intervenue dans la situation des peuples indigènes et tri-bales dans toutes les régions du monde, il y a lieu d'adopter de nouvelles normes internationales sur la question en vue de supprimer l'orientation des normes antérieures, qui visaient à l'assimilation ; Prenant acte de l'aspiration des peuples en question à avoir le contrôle de leurs institutions, de leurs modes de vie et de leur développement économique propres et à conserver et développer leur identité, leur langue et leur religion dans le cadre des Etats où ils vivent ; Notant que, dans de nombreuses parties du monde, ces peuples ne peuvent jouir des droits fondamentaux de l'homme au même degré que le reste de la population des Etats où ils vivent et que leurs lois, valeurs, coutumes et perspectives ont souvent subi une érosion ; Appelant l'attention sur la contribution particulière des peuples indigènes et tribaux à la diversité culturelle et à l'harmonie sociale et écologique de l'humanité ainsi qu'à la coopération et à la compréhension internationales ; Notant que les dispositions ci-après ont été établies avec la collaboration des Nations Unies, de l'Organisation des Nations Unies pour l'alimentation et l'agriculture, de l'Organisation des Nations Unies pour l'éducation, la science et la culture et de l'Organisation mondiale de la santé ainsi que de l'Institut indigéniste interaméricain, aux niveaux appropriés et pour leurs domaines respectifs, et que l'on se propose de poursuivre cette coopération en vue de promouvoir et d'assurer leur application ; Après avoir décidé d'adopter diverses propositions concernant la révision par-tielle de la convention (n° 107) relative aux populations autochtones et tri-bales, 1957, question qui constitue le quatrième point à l'ordre du jour de la session ;
Après avoir décidé que ces propositions prendraient la forme d'une convention internationale révisant la convention relative aux populations autochtones et tribales, 1957, adopte, ce vingt-septième jour de juin mil neuf cent quatre-vingt-neuf, la convention ci-après, qui sera dénommée Convention relative aux peuples indigènes et Les peuples intéressés doivent, chaque fois que c'est possible, participer aux avantages découlant de ces activités et doivent recevoir une indemnisation équitable pour tout dommage qu'ils pourraient subir en raison de telles activités.

Lorsque les peuples intéressés expriment une préférence pour une indemnisation en espèces ou en nature, ils doivent être ainsi indemnisés, sous réserve des garanties appropriées.

RESOLUTIONS

I

Resolution on ILO action concerning indigenous and tribal peoples¹

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,
Having adopted the Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, 1989,

Determined to improve the situation and status of these peoples in the light of the developments which have taken place since the adoption of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention (No. 107) in 1957,

Convinced of the vital contribution that indigenous and tribal peoples from the regions of the world make towards national societies, and reaffirming their socio-cultural identity,

Motivated by its firm desire to support the implementation and enhancement of the provisions of the revised Convention;

National action

1. Calls upon member States to consider ratifying the revised Convention at the earliest possible time; to fulfil the obligations laid down in the Convention; and to implement its provisions in the most effective manner.

2. Calls upon governments to co-operate in this respect with national and regional organisations and institutions of the peoples concerned.

3. Calls upon governments and employers' and workers' organisations to engage in a dialogue with the organisations and institutions of the peoples concerned about the most appropriate ways of securing the implementation of the Convention, and to establish appropriate consultative machinery enabling indigenous and tribal peoples to express their views on all aspects of the Convention.

4. Calls upon governments and employers' and workers' organisations to promote educational programmes, in collaboration with the organisations and institutions of the peoples concerned, in order to disseminate knowledge of the Convention in all sectors of national society including programmes consisting of, for example:

- (a) material on the content and objectives of the Convention;
- (b) information at regular intervals on the measures taken to implement the Convention;
- (c) seminars designed to promote a better understanding, the ratification, and the effective implementation of the standards laid down in the Convention.

International action

5. Urges the international organisations cited in the preamble of the Convention and others, within existing budgetary resources, to collaborate in developing activities to achieve the objectives of the Convention within their respective fields of competence, and urges the ILO to facilitate the co-ordination of such efforts.

ILO action

6. Urges the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director-General to take the following action, within existing budgetary resources, and to propose the allocation of further resources in future budgets for these purposes:

- (a) promoting the ratification of the Convention and supervising its application;
- (b) assisting governments in developing effective measures for implementing the Convention with the full participation of the indigenous and tribal peoples;
- (c) providing the organisations of the peoples concerned with information and training on the scope and content of this Convention and of other ILO Conventions that may be of direct concern to them, and possibilities for exchanging their experiences and knowledge;
- (d) strengthening the dialogue between governments and employers' and workers' organisations about the objectives and content of the Convention, with the active participation of organisations and institutions of the peoples concerned;
- (e) conducting a general survey, at an appropriate time, under article 19 of the ILO Constitution on the measures taken in member States for the implementation of the revised Convention;
- (f) producing, analysing and publishing relevant, comparable and up-to-date qualitative and quantitative information on the social and economic conditions of the peoples concerned;
- (g) developing technical co-operation programmes and projects that will directly benefit the peoples concerned, addressing the severe poverty and unemployment affecting them. These activities should include income and employment generation schemes, rural development, including vocational training, promotion of handicrafts and rural industries, public works programmes and appropriate technology. These programmes should be financed by the regular budget, subject to existing budgetary constraints, and by multi-bilateral and other sources.

II

Resolution to place on the agenda of the next ordinary session of the Conference an item entitled "Safety in the use of chemicals at work"¹

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Having adopted the report of the Committee appointed to consider the sixth item on the agenda,

Having in particular approved as general conclusions, with a view to the consultation of governments, proposals for a Convention and a Recommendation concerning safety in the use of chemicals at work;

Decides that an item entitled "Safety in the use of chemicals at work" shall be included in the agenda of its next ordinary session for a second discussion with a view to the adoption of a Convention and a Recommendation.

III

Resolution concerning harmonisation of systems of classification and labelling for the use of hazardous chemicals at work¹

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Considering the importance of chemicals in industry, agriculture and services,

Recognising the common concern for avoiding risks associated with the use of chemicals at work,

Stressing the need to provide information to the user about hazardous properties of chemicals,

Recognising the value of the existing system of classification and labelling for transport of dangerous goods by road, rail, ship and air and also of several national and regional classification systems for the protection of the general public, marketing and use of chemicals at work,

Noting the existence of the International Register of Potentially Toxic Chemicals established by the United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP), Bearing in mind the cost of establishing individual national classification and labelling systems for the use of chemicals at work,

Considering the large volume of trade of chemicals between countries and regions,

Expressing concern about the varying systems for classification and labelling for the use of chemicals at work and for the transport of dangerous goods,

Noting that many governments in their replies to the questionnaire of the ILO on Safety in the Use of Chemicals at Work in connection with the envisaged adoption of international instruments by the International Labour Conference have stressed the need for international harmonisation of systems for classification and labelling as incorporated in Report VI (2) to the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference, 1989;

Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to request the Director-General:

- (a) to assess the size of the task of harmonising national and regional criteria and classification systems established for the use of chemicals at work, consistent with the United Nations classification system for transport of dangerous goods, in co-operation with UNEP and WHO within the International Programme on Chemical Safety (IPCS), with other relevant international organisations, and with government, employers' and workers' organisations;
- (b) to prepare a report on the result of this assessment and present this report as soon as possible;
- (c) to establish co-operation with other international bodies to ensure a system of harmonised national and regional criteria and classifications which protect workers using chemicals.

IV

Resolution to place on the agenda of the next ordinary session of the Conference an item entitled "Night work"¹

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Having adopted the report of the Committee appointed to consider the fifth item on the agenda,

Having in particular approved as general conclusions, with a view to the consultation of Governments, proposals for a Convention and a Recommendation concerning night work and for a Protocol revising the Night Work (Women) Convention (Revised), 1948;

Decides that an item entitled "Night work" shall be included in the agenda of its next ordinary session for a second discussion with a view to the adoption of a Convention and a Recommendation concerning night work and of a Protocol revising the Night Work (Women) Convention (Revised), 1948.

VII

Resolution concerning the long-term strategy on Budget exchange rates²

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Recalling that adverse wide fluctuations in the Swiss franc/US dollar rate of exchange have had disruptive effects on the implementation of the Organisation's approved Programme and Budget and have resulted in unforeseeable and often major increases in member States' assessed contributions,

Noting the past consideration of possible solutions to this problem by the Governing Body and its Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee,

Recalling the decision of the Governing Body at its 240th Session (May-June 1988) to endorse in principle the introduction in 1990-91 of a system of Swiss franc assessments combined with forward purchasing of the biennium's dollar requirements, and its agreement to take a final decision at its 241st Session (November 1988) based on a more detailed proposal by the Director-General, together with consequential changes in the Financial Regulations and the Financial Rules,

Noting the decision of the Governing Body at its 241st Session (November 1988) to propose to the General Conference at its 76th Session (June 1989) the adoption of such a scheme;

1. Decides to introduce in 1990-91 a system of Swiss franc assessments combined with forward purchasing of the biennium's dollar requirements and to approve, effective 1 January 1990, the consequential changes in the Financial Regulations contained in the Appendix to the present resolution.

2. Decides that the net premium earned from forward purchasing of the dollar requirements for the biennium be distributed in the ratio of one-half to member States and one-half to the incentive scheme for early payment of member States' contributions, the net premium being arrived at by adding to, or subtracting from the premium earned, any residual gain or loss on exchange from the operation of the Swiss franc assessment system and any gain or loss on exchange resulting from any supplementary forward purchasing contracts that might have to be concluded in order to reduce or increase the approved level of spending in US dollars.

3. Decides additionally that the one-half share of the net premium to be distributed to eligible member States shall be apportioned among the member States on the basis of the proportion of the total of each member State's assessed contributions during the biennium in which the net premium was earned to the total of the assessed contributions for the biennium of all member States; the amounts so established shall be used to reduce the contributions of member States in the following way: member States which have paid their assessed contributions in full during the biennium in which the net premium was earned shall have their share of the net premium deducted from their contributions assessed for the second year of the succeeding biennium; other member States shall not be credited with their share of the net premium until they have paid in full their assessed contributions for the biennium in which the net premium was earned; when they have done so, their share of the net premium shall be deducted from their contributions assessed for the first year of the next biennium for which a budget is adopted after such payment.

4. Decides further to adopt the following transitional measures:

- (a) the conversion of all arrears of contributions and undistributed surpluses from previous biennia at 1 January 1990 from United States dollars to Swiss francs at the budget rate of exchange for 1990-91;
- (b) the conversion of any cash surpluses for 1988-89 from United States dollars to Swiss francs at the budget rate of exchange for 1990-91 for the purpose of reducing the assessed contributions of qualifying member States, under article 18 of the Financial Regulations;
- (c) the conversion of any cash deficit for 1988 and 1989 or for the 1988-89 biennium from United States dollars to Swiss francs at the budget rate of exchange for 1990-91 for the purpose of making an additional assessment on member States in accordance with article 21.2 of the Financial Regulations;
- (d) the conversion of the balance of the Working Capital Fund at 1 January 1990 from United States dollars to Swiss francs at the United Nations accounting rate of exchange for January 1990.

APPENDIX

AMENDMENTS TO FINANCIAL REGULATIONS (AMENDMENTS AND ADDITIONS ARE IN ITALICS, DELETIONS ARE SHOWN IN PARENTHESES)

- (1) For every financial period, the Director-General shall prepare programme and budget proposals containing estimates of the income and expenditure of the Organisation and the proposed budget rate of exchange between the United States dollar and the Swiss franc;
- (2) the estimates of expenditure shall be expressed in United States dollars. The estimates of income shall be expressed in United States dollars and in Swiss francs converted at the budget rate of exchange.

Article 9.3 (New)

- The assessed contributions shall be payable in Swiss francs.

Article 10.2

- As soon as possible after the Conference has adopted the budget and the total amount appropriated has been apportioned among the Members of the Organisation in the manner prescribed by the Conference, the Director-General shall transmit all relevant documents to the Members of the Organisation, indicating that the contributions for the financial period are due and payable in Swiss francs on 1 January of each of the years to which they relate and requesting each Member to remit its contribution on or as soon as possible after the due date. (The Director-General shall, at the same time, request each Member of the Organisation to state the methods it desires to employ for cash remittance.)

Article 10.5 (New)

- All contributions received in a financial period shall be accounted for in United States dollars at the budget rate of exchange for that financial period.

Article 18

- If the difference between budgetary income and expenditure in any complete financial period expressed in United States dollars constitutes a credit balance, the Swiss franc equivalent of the corresponding cash surplus, calculated at the budget rate of exchange for that financial period, shall be used to reduce the contributions of Members in the following way: Members which paid their ordinary contributions in the financial period in which the cash surplus accrued shall have their share of the cash surplus deducted from their contributions assessed for the second year of the succeeding financial period; other Members shall not be credited with their share until they have paid the contributions due from them for the financial period in which the cash surplus accrued. When they have done so their share of such cash surplus shall be deducted from their contributions assessed for the first year of the next financial period for which a budget is adopted after such payment.

- If in any calendar year sums withdrawn from the Working Capital Fund or borrowed to finance budgetary expenditure pending receipt of contributions or other income and/or expenditure incurred in the financing of contingencies and emergencies under prior authorisation of the Governing Body cannot be reimbursed in the course of the same year owing to the fact that the total budgetary income for that year falls short of total authorised expenditure incurred during the year, the sums so borrowed or withdrawn shall be reimbursed to the lender or lenders and to the Fund in the second year following the year of such withdrawal by adding to the contributions assessed on member States for that year an additional assessment in Swiss francs, equivalent to the amount so borrowed or withdrawn; provided that temporary surpluses of budgetary income over expenditure occurring at any time shall be utilised to the extent possible to reduce the amount of outstanding loans or advances.

Article 26

- The final accounts of the Organisation shall be prepared in United States dollars. The accounting records may, however, be kept in such currency or currencies as the Director-General may deem necessary. Details of contributions assessed, received and outstanding shall be presented in Swiss francs in supporting schedules.

VIII

Resolution concerning the abolition of Part V (Undistributed Reserve) of the Budget¹

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Recalling the circumstances which led it to decide in respect of the budgets for the 1978-79 biennium onwards to include provision in the Budget for an

Undistributed Reserve (Part V) equal to the net assessment on certain member States which, based on certain criteria, are deemed not to participate actively in the work of the Organisation,

Noting that the criteria adopted have, in recent years, applied to only one member State and that the amount provided in Part V of the Budget has not been significant, representing only 0.01 per cent of the Budget;

Decides to abolish Part V (Undistributed Reserve) of the Budget with effect from 1 January 1990.

IX

Resolution concerning the adoption of the Programme and Budget for the 62nd financial period (1990-91) and the allocation of expenses among member States¹

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

In virtue of the Financial Regulations,

Passes for the 62nd financial period, ending 31 December 1991; the budget of expenditure for the International Labour Organisation amounting to US$330,440,000 and the budget of income amounting to US$330,440,000, which, at the budget rate of exchange of 1.75 Swiss francs to the US dollar, amounts to 578,270,000 Swiss francs, and resolves that the budget of income, denominated in Swiss francs, shall be allocated among member States in accordance with the scale of contributions recommended by the Finance Committee of Government Representatives.

PROVISIONAL RECORD

Resolutions

Resolutions submitted in accordance with article 17 of the Standing Orders of the Conference

Resolution concerning the effective participation of delegations to the International Labour Conference, submitted by Mr. Georget, Employers' delegate, Niger; Mr. Lindner, Employers' delegate, Federal Republic of Germany; Miss Mackie, Employers' delegate, United Kingdom; Mr. Nasr, Employers' delegate, Lebanon; Mr. Oeschlin, Employers' delegate, France; and Mr. Pierides, Employers' delegate, Cyprus

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Stressing the obligation for all member States of the International Labour Organisation to designate complete delegations and the need for them to participate effectively in the full range of the work of the International Labour Conference,

Conscious of the fact that the widely different costs of sending delegations to Geneva from all over the world are not taken into account in the assessment of contributions to the ILO,

Recalling the resolution concerning the financing of expenses of delegations to the International Labour Conference, unanimously adopted at the 59th Session (1974) of the Conference,

Noting that since then there has been an increased awareness of the imperative need to strengthen the tripartite basis of the work of the International Labour Conference and of regional conferences,

Recalling to this effect the resolution concerning freedom of association and the tripartite participation of African member States in the work of the International Labour Conference, adopted by the Sixth African Regional Conference (Tunis, 1983),

Recalling further the resolution concerning the strengthening of tripartism in the States of the Americas and in the activities of the International Labour Organisation, adopted by the 12th Conference of American States Members of the ILO (Montreal, 1986),

Recalling also the resolution concerning the financing of delegations to the International Labour Conference, adopted by the Seventh African Regional Conference (Harare, 1988),

Noting the deliberations of the Working Party on Constitutional Amendments concerning Conference Delegations, designated by the Governing Body in February-March 1987;

1. Requests the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director-General to prepare concrete proposals aimed at:

- (a) the designation of complete tripartite delegations to the International Labour Conference, in accordance with constitutional obligations;
- (b) the payment of travel expenses and adequate subsistence to members of Conference delegations to enable them to be present at the conference.

2. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct its Working Party to give further and urgent consideration to the financing out of its regular budget or otherwise of the expenses of delegations to the International Labour Conference.

3. Requests the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to consider the extent to which the above measures could apply to regional conferences.

Resolution concerning the role of enterprises in employment growth, submitted by Mr. Georget, Employers' delegate, Niger; Mr. Lindner, Employers' delegate, Federal Republic of Germany; Miss Mackie, Employers' delegate, United Kingdom; Mr. Nasr, Employers' delegate, Lebanon; Mr. Oeschlin, Employers' delegate, France; Mr. Pierides, Employers' delegate, Cyprus; and Mr. Smith, Employers' delegate, United States

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Recalling the conclusions and resolution concerning the promotion of small and medium-sized enterprises adopted at the 72nd Session of the International Labour Conference,

Recalling also the resolution concerning the creation of enterprises and the growth of employment, which was adopted by the Fourth European Regional Conference in September 1987,

Recalling further the conclusions of the High-level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment, held in November 1987,

Convinced that a key to solving the problems of unemployment and underemployment faced by many countries lies in the creation of a favourable climate for the efficient utilisation of human skills, including management skills, and the exercise of individual initiative within the framework of policies that encourage the creation and growth of enterprises that are competitive nationally, regionally and internationally,

Noting that the potential for employment growth is particularly strong in small and medium-sized enterprises,

Considering that the entrepreneurial spirit can thrive only in an environment where markets and enterprises are free from government interference,

Convinced therefore of the need for such an environment so that enterprises, including small and medium-sized enterprises, can fully realise their growth potential,

Noting that, in the framework of structural adjustments, the ILO and other United Nations agencies are increasingly responding to requests by member States for assistance to encourage and develop entrepreneurial spirit, as well as to foster the private-sector potential for growth and employment,

Considering that technological developments and changes in world markets make continuing structural adjustments in the economies of all countries inevitable, especially as economic interdependence between countries is increasing,

Convinced further of the need to deregulate national economies to facilitate the necessary adjustments in ways that maximise economic growth while encouraging job creation and sustainable employment;

Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director-General:

- (a) to give emphasis in the Programme and Budget of the ILO to:
 - (i) activities that encourage the spirit of entrepreneurship, especially in small and medium-sized enterprises;
 - (ii) training and retraining programmes directed towards enabling unemployed people, including new entrants to the workforce and those displaced by structural adjustment, to acquire the necessary skills and qualifications to be absorbed into the workforce or re-employed;
 - (iii) activities fostering the creation of new enterprises as a prime means of re-employing people who may lose their jobs in the process of structural adjustment, as well as providing employment for new entrants to the workforce;
- (b) to promote and organise exchanges of experience among countries adopting, as essential elements of their economic and employment policies, the encouragement of enterprise free from government interference.

Resolution concerning the contribution of the International Labour Organisation to sustainable and environmentally sound development, submitted by Mr. Andersen, Government delegate, Denmark; Mr. Kristinsson, Government delegate, Iceland; Mr. Lidal, Government delegate, Sweden; Mr. Riikonen, Government delegate, Finland; and Ms. Ruge, Government delegate, Norway

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Recalling the United Nations General Assembly resolutions 42/186 on the environmental perspective to the year 2000 and beyond, and 42/187 on the report of the World Commission on Environment and Development, and in particular the conclusions and recommendations as they relate to the field of competence of the International Labour Organisation,

Noting also that the General Assembly will consider at its 44th session the question of the convening of a United Nations conference on environment and development,

Recalling the resolutions concerning the questions of the environment and employment adopted by the Fourth European and Seventh African Regional Conferences of the International Labour Organisation,

Considering that sustainable and environmentally sound development should be a guiding principle for all relevant activities of the International Labour Organisation, and that the Organisation can make an important contribution to the international efforts towards such development,

Recognising that "environmental concerns" have been established as one of the priority themes in the Programme and Budget for 1990-91, and commending the Director-General for activities already undertaken or started in this area,

Convinced that through judicious policy measures at the national and international level a positive link can be established between the requirements of environmental protection and employment creation,

Stressing that the working environment forms an important and integral part of the general environment as a whole and that improvements in the working environment will enhance the quality of the latter,

Recalling in this connection the resolution concerning the role of the ILO in technical co-operation, adopted at the 73rd Session of the International Labour Conference, particularly operative paragraphs 2 and 4;

1. Invites governments and, as appropriate, employers' and workers' organisations to:

- (a) take account of the analysis and recommendations contained in the report of the World Commission on Environment and Development and of United Nations General Assembly resolution 42/186 on the environmental perspective to the year 2000 and beyond, in determining their policies and programmes in areas related to the mandate of the International Labour Organisation;
- (b) ensure that government ministries, agencies and other institutions review their policies and programmes, including their industrial and employment policies, with a view to promoting sustainable and environmentally sound development;
- (c) encourage initiatives which promote sustainable development in areas such as agriculture, fisheries, energy, industry, construction and road building, and which also promote employment and income opportunities;
- (d) encourage investments in key areas, such as clean air, soil and water programmes, public transport, rational use of energy, waste disposal, recycling of used materials, environment supervision, nature conservation, countryside protection, improvement of housing areas, which would create jobs as well as protect the environment;
- (e) promote environmental policies which contribute to preserving and creating employment and employment policies which contribute to environmental protection and rehabilitation,

- (f) stimulate the industrial restructuring of enterprises which constitute a heavy burden on the environment in order to enable them to attain the necessary environmental standards as rapidly as possible and at the same time, as far as possible, to maintain or increase the number of jobs involved on the restructuring process;
- (g) take special measures for the safe production, manufacture, import, export, sale, use, storage, transport and disposal, compatible with the environment, of highly hazardous substances and for the development of substitutes which are harmless or less harmful to the health and environment;
- (h) take special and effective measures for the elimination and, pending the elimination, for minimising the hazardous effects, of the excessive and improper use of pesticides and other hazardous substances in rural areas, particularly in developing countries, and to seek their replacement by substitutes which are harmless or less harmful to health and the environment;
- (i) strengthen international co-operation in the fields of environmental protection and employment, in particular in order to slow down, stop and, as far as possible, reverse the process of deforestation and desertification, to prevent transborder pollution and pollution of the seas, as well as to minimise the environmental effects of industrial accidents.

2. Requests the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director-General to:

- (a) continue to explore ways and means of integrating environmental considerations in all relevant ILO activities, and to ensure that relevant ILO projects and programmes are screened in the light of their compatibility with sustainable and environmentally sound development;
- (b) give higher priority to drawing together expertise from more than one ILO technical unit, so as to ensure that projects reflect a more co-ordinated and integrated approach to sustainable development;
- (c) establish a practical environmental impact review process so as to ensure that relevant projects and programmes take adequate account of environmental considerations;
- (d) ensure that the study on employment and environment included in the Programme and Budget for 1990-91 examines the interrelationship and positive links between sustainable and environmentally sound policies and employment creation, in both developed and developing countries, with particular emphasis on environmental policies which contribute to preserving and creating employment and employment policies which contribute to environmental protection and rehabilitation;
- (e) ensure that activities aimed at alleviating poverty and income generating activities in developing countries will be given due attention in this study in the context of the ILO's technical co-operation programmes, especially its labour-intensive public works programmes and its programmes for rural employment promotion;

- (f) give increased attention to the linkages between the working environment and the general environment, and co-ordinate the ILO's activities concerning the working environment more closely with the work of other international agencies and organisations dealing with the general environment;
- (g) give high priority, particularly through the ILO's PIACT programme, to the development of innovative approaches to the improvement of the working environment of the rural and urban poor in developing countries, giving special attention to activities which will improve the conditions of work and life of women and children;
- (h) give increased attention to the need for effective assistance to member States to formulate national policies on major hazard control and for training programmes to prevent major industrial accidents;
- (i) continue to strengthen the linkage between the ILO's technical co-operation activities and international labour standards so as to assist developing countries to implement ratified Conventions, especially those concerned with the working environment;
- (j) give increased attention to environmental education and training by integrating environmental considerations more effectively within training activities related to ILO programmes in all areas, e.g. concerning rural development, co-operatives, labour-intensive public works projects, employment and technology projects, and activities related to occupational safety and health and conditions of work and life;
- (k) develop internal staff training and advisory support activities in order to assist ILO staff at headquarters and in the field to integrate environmental and sustainable development considerations more effectively in their traditional activities;
- (l) collaborate more closely with other international agencies and organisations working in the area of environmental education and training, in particular UNESCO and UNEP;
- (m) consider, when preparing the Programme and Budget Proposals for 1992-93, including early in the biennium a special tripartite meeting of experts to review a priority topic of special relevance to the work of the International Labour Organisation in the field of sustainable and environmentally sound development;
- (n) collaborate with the Secretary-General of the United Nations with a view to preparing the ILO's contribution to the proposed global conference on environment and development.

Resolution concerning the protection of Arab workers' and employers' rights and freedoms in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories, submitted by the Government delegations of: Algeria, Bahrain, Democratic Yemen, Egypt, Iraq, Jordan, Kuwait, Lebanon, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Morocco, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, Somalia, Sudan, Syrian Arab Republic, Tunisia, United Arab Emirates, and Yemen; Mr. Al-Ahlasi, Employers' delegate, Yemen;

Mr. Al-Jassem, Employers' delegate, Kuwait; Mr. Habaybeh, Employers' delegate, Jordan; Mr. Hussain, Employers' delegate, Iraq; Mr. Abu Khormah, Workers' delegate, Jordan; Mr. Al-Na'ami, Workers' delegate, Yemen; Mr. Gharib, Workers' delegate, Iraq; Mr. Issa, Workers' delegate, Syrian Arab Republic; and Mr. Sahbani, Workers' delegate, Tunisia

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Taking into consideration the preamble to the Constitution of the ILO which states that "universal and lasting peace can be established only if it is based upon social justice" and that "conditions of labour exist involving such injustice, hardship and privation to large numbers of people as to produce unrest so great that the peace and harmony of the world are imperilled",

Recalling the resolution concerning the policy of discrimination, racism and violation of trade union freedoms and rights practised by the Israeli authorities in Palestine and in the other occupied Arab territories, adopted by the International Labour Conference in 1974, and the resolution concerning the implications of Israeli settlements in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories in connection with the situation of Arab workers, adopted by the Conference in 1980;

1. Deplores the persistent refusal of the Israeli occupying authorities to implement the terms of the aforementioned resolutions.

2. Condemns the policies and practices of these authorities towards Arab workers and employers in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories which take the form of the constant deportation and arbitrary detention of trade unionists, the demolition of houses and destruction of productive establishments, the dismissal of Arab workers and the denial of their fundamental rights and freedoms, particularly the right to work and their economic and social rights.

3. Decides to constitute a special committee composed of delegates to the Conference at its 77th Session (1990) to look into the annual reports of the Director-General to the Conference, as well as the reports on the situation of Arab workers and employers in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories, and determine what can be provided to them in terms of programmes and technical assistance and to submit a report on its conclusions to the Conference.

Resolution concerning the promotion of self-employment, submitted by the Government delegation of the Islamic Republic of Iran; and Mr. Hoobakht, Employers' delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Recalling the Declaration of Philadelphia which recognises the solemn obligation of the ILO to further among the nations of the world programmes which will achieve full employment and the raising of standards of living, and that the Preamble to the Constitution of the ILO provides for the prevention of unemployment,

Recalling the Universal Declaration of Human Rights as it relates to the right to work, to equitable and satisfactory conditions of work and to protection against unemployment,

Noting the international labour standards and resolutions of relevance to self-employment, particularly the Employment Policy Recommendation, 1964, (No. 122), the Employment Policy (Supplementary Provisions) Recommendation, 1984 (No. 169), and the resolution concerning the contribution of small and medium undertakings to economic and social progress and to the creation of employment, in particular in developing countries, and the resolution concerning the promotion of small and medium-sized enterprises, adopted respectively at the 60th and 72nd Sessions of the International Labour Conference,

Noting that self-employment as one of the vehicles for employment creation with modest capital needs can contribute to socio-economic development, particularly in developing countries,

Considering that self-employment can, by marshalling managerial and entrepreneurial initiative, stimulate the development of a pool of managers, entrepreneurs and skilled workers,

Noting with concern the precarious conditions of employment and social security of the self-employed, particularly in developing countries where many of those engaged in self-employment are not covered by the greater part of the labour and social security laws;

1. Invites governments, in consultation with employers' and workers' organisations:

- (a) to promote, as a part of overall employment policy, productive self-employment activities in both the rural and the urban sector;
- (b) to review all policies and regulations affecting self-employment, with a view to removing specific obstacles thereto, providing the self-employed with credit facilities and all forms of assistance, improving their conditions of employment, gradually extending labour and social protection to them and, as appropriate, making special and more flexible regulations for the promotion of self-employment;
- (c) to develop closer links between educational institutions and the world of work so as to strengthen and expand self-employment and entrepreneurship training in the formal as well as in the informal sector;
- (d) to develop reliable and systematic labour market information, occupational information and guidance services in areas offering opportunities for self-employment.

2. Calls on the Governing Body of the ILO to instruct the Director-General:

- (a) to carry out studies on recent trends in self-employment, governments' policies and programmes concerning the conditions of employment and social protection for the self-employed, with emphasis on the urban informal sectors in developing countries;
- (b) to strengthen the ILO's technical co-operation activities in the field of self-employment by increasing the number of appropriate projects and by training policy-makers and officials concerned with self-employment promotion;

- (c) to encourage and strengthen regional co-operation among the member States for the exchange of information and experiences with respect to self-employment policies and programmes.

Resolution concerning environmental protection and employment, submitted by Mr. Ahmed, Workers' delegate, Pakistan; Ms. Andriassen, Workers' delegate, Norway; Mr. Baker, Workers' delegate, United States; Mr. Cal, Workers' delegate, Italy; Mrs. Dreifuss, Workers' delegate, Switzerland; Mr. Edstroem, Workers' delegate, Sweden; Mr. Etty, Workers' delegate, Netherlands; Mr. Foulkes, Workers' delegate, New Zealand; Mr. Gopal, Workers' delegate, India; Mr. Madariaga, Workers' delegate, Mexico; Mr. Mansfield, Workers' delegate, Australia; Mr. Maruyama, Workers' delegate, Japan; Mr. Mercier, Workers' delegate, Canada; Mr. Morton, Workers' delegate, United Kingdom; Mr. Mourgues, Workers' delegate, France; Mr. Muhr, Workers' delegate, Federal Republic of Germany; Mr. Redondo, Workers' delegate, Spain; Mr. Svenningsen, Workers' delegate, Denmark; and Mr. Walcott, Workers' delegate Barbados

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Supporting the conclusions and recommendations contained in the report of the World Commission on Environment and Development entitled Our common future,

Noting with deep concern that continuing problems of environmental damage present an increasing threat to the human environment and to the quality of human life,

Considering that only economic activity and employment compatible with public health and the environment are secure and acceptable agents of progress,

Emphasising that the problems of drought and the excessive and improper use of pesticides are a danger to both the working environment and the general environment in rural areas of developing countries in particular,

Emphasising that the application of adequate regulations in some countries should not result in the disposal of hazardous wastes in other countries with less comprehensive regulations,

Stressing that the working environment forms an important and integral part of the general environment as a whole and that improvements in the working environment will enhance the quality of the latter,

Convinced that through judicious policy measures at the national and international level a positive link can be established between the requirements of environmental protection and employment creation,

Considering that environmental protection measures at the national level are essential but not sufficient, since pollution does not stop at national borders, and that therefore close international co-operation is also needed to protect the environment and to ensure the positive effect of environmental measures on employment;

1. Calls upon all member States:

- (a) to encourage, through appropriate economic and employment policies, the creation of jobs which are conducive to the establishment and maintenance of a clean and healthy environment;

- (b) to encourage investments in key areas, such as clean air, soil and water programmes, public transport, rational use of energy, waste disposal, recycling of used materials, environment supervision, nature preservation, countryside protection, improvement of housing areas, which would create jobs as well as protect the environment;

- (c) to stimulate the industrial restructuring of enterprises which constitute a heavy burden on the environment in order to enable them to attain the necessary environmental standards as rapidly as possible and at the same time, as far as possible, to maintain or increase the number of jobs involved in the restructuring process;

- (d) to take special measures for the safe production, use, storage, transport and disposal, compatible with the environment, of highly hazardous substances and for the development of substitutes which are harmless or less harmful for the health and environment;

- (e) to promote actively national and international measures and regulations to ensure that the export and disposal of hazardous waste is subjected to strict and universal regulations with proper control and enforcement so as to secure worldwide observance of the highest possible health, safety and environmental standards;

- (f) to take special and effective measures for the elimination, and pending the elimination for minimising the hazardous effects, of the excessive and improper use of pesticides in rural areas, particularly in developing countries;

- (g) to engage in effective tripartite consultations with a view to bringing about an integrated approach in the elaboration and pursuance of policies for full employment and a clean and healthy environment;

- (h) to strengthen international co-operation in the fields of environmental protection and employment, in particular in order to slow down, stop and, as far as possible, reverse the process of desertification, to prevent transborder pollution and pollution of the seas, as well as to minimise the environmental effects of industrial accidents.

2. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to request the Director-General to undertake, in collaboration with the United Nations Environment Programme, a programme of ILO action concerning the environment which provides especially for educational and training activities in this field, as well as studies on the economic and social consequences of environmental policies.

Resolution concerning AIDS and the workplace, submitted by Mr. Ahmed, Workers' delegate, Pakistan; Ms. Andriassen, Workers' delegate, Norway; Mr. Baker, Workers' delegate, United States; Mr. Cal, Workers' delegate, Italy; Mrs. Dreifuss, Workers' delegate, Switzerland; Mr. Edstroem, Workers' delegate, Sweden; Mr. Etty, Workers' delegate, Netherlands; Mr. Foulkes, Workers' delegate, New Zealand; Mr. Mansfield, Workers' delegate, Australia; Mr. Maruyama, Workers' delegate, Japan; Mr. Mercier, Workers' delegate, Canada; Mr. Morton, Workers' delegate, United Kingdom; Mr. Mourgues, Workers' delegate, France; Mr. Muhr, Workers' delegate, Federal Republic of Germany; Mr. Redondo, Workers' delegate,

Spain; Mr. Svenningsen, Workers' delegate, Denmark; and Mr. Walcott, Workers' delegate Barbados

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Expressing grave concern that infection with the human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) and the acquired immunodeficiency syndrome (AIDS) represents an urgent worldwide problem with broad social, cultural, economic, political, ethical and legal dimensions and impact,

Recognising, however, that there is no evidence to suggest that HIV can be transmitted via insects, food, water, sneezing, coughing, toilet facilities, urine, swimming pools, sweat, tears, shared eating and drinking utensils or other shared items such as protective clothing or telephones and that there is also no evidence to suggest that HIV can be transmitted by casual person-to-person contact in any setting,

Considering that in the vast majority of occupations and occupational settings, work does not involve a risk of acquiring HIV or of its transmission between workers or between workers and clients, with the possible exception of employment in health, laboratory and some social services,

Emphasising the need to protect the human rights and dignity of individuals affected – or believed to be affected – by the AIDS virus, in particular by avoiding their stigmatisation and discrimination against them at the workplace,

Stressing the urgent need, including at the workplace, to demystify the problems of AIDS and HIV by eliminating ignorance, prejudice, misinformation and misunderstanding concerning infection risks,

Affirming, at the same time, the common interest of both trade unions and employers in participating actively in public information and education programmes focused on ways and means of avoiding the contraction and transmission of AIDS, and that the workplace, as a location for industrial relations, occupational health and safety, training, education and information activities, offers an excellent platform and multiple opportunities for this purpose,

Welcoming the joint initiatives undertaken by the WHO and the ILO to examine the problems and possibilities for action related to AIDS and the workplace,

Supporting in particular the comprehensive set of guide-lines and proposals for action concerning health promotion and health education strategies for HIV/AIDS in the workplace, adopted by the WHO/ILO Tripartite Consultation on AIDS and the Workplace (June 1988);

1. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to call upon employers' and workers' organisations in all member States to examine the above-mentioned WHO/ILO guide-lines with a view to engaging, where appropriate in co-operation with governmental agencies and other organisations including the ILO, in information and educational activities for the protection of workers' rights and health in relation to HIV/AIDS at the workplace.

2. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to request the Director-General:

(a) to make a maximum effort to follow up and implement the WHO/ILO guide-lines concerning health promotion and health education strategies for HIV/AIDS in the workplace and to hold regular consultations with the WHO to this effect;

(b) to undertake further initiatives in co-operation with the WHO on the question of AIDS and the workplace, including full ILO involvement on a tripartite basis in planned consultation on the problems and conditions of workers employed in specific occupations that involve a risk of acquiring or transmitting HIV/AIDS;

(c) to make every effort to encourage and assist employers' and workers' organisations to participate actively in the development and practical implementation of health promotion and education strategies in respect of HIV/AIDS and the workplace.

Resolution concerning drugs and human rights, submitted by by Mr. Ahmed, Workers' delegate, Pakistan; Ms. Andriassen, Workers' delegate, Norway; Mr. Baker, Workers' delegate, United States; Mr. Cal, Workers' delegate, Italy; Mrs. Dreifuss, Workers' delegate, Switzerland; Mr. Edstroem, Workers' delegate, Sweden; Mr. Etty, Workers' delegate, Netherlands; Mr. Foulkes, Workers' delegate, New Zealand; Mr. Madariaga, Workers' delegate, Mexico; Mr. Mansfield, Workers' delegate, Australia; Mr. Maruyama, Workers' delegate, Japan; Mr. Mercier, Workers' delegate, Canada; Mr. Morton, Workers' delegate, United Kingdom; Mr. Mourgues, Workers' delegate, France; Mr. Muhr, Workers' delegate, Federal Republic of Germany; Mr. Redondo, Workers' delegate, Spain; Mr. Svenningsen, Workers' delegate, Denmark; and Mr. Walcott, Workers' delegate Barbados

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Expressing deep concern at the devastating effects of drug abuse and illicit drug trafficking on the lives of working people and their families throughout the world,

Stressing that criminal activities and corruption emanating from drug production and trafficking pose a threat to the stability and integrity of nations and are depriving individuals of their basic human rights, including the fundamental right of freedom of association which is essential to sustained progress and development,

Condemning particularly, in the strongest terms, the killings, violence, and atrocities committed in some countries against large numbers of trade unionists, peasant leaders and human rights activists by armed drug gangs and hired killers,

Emphasising that the condition of poverty affecting millions of rural workers is one of the main reasons why land and facilities remain abundantly available for drug cultivation,

Welcoming the measures taken, in some countries, to curb the cultivation and export of drugs as well as the criminal practices of drug gangs and death squads, and the steps taken, in other countries, to prevent the import and distribution of drugs as well as of the huge dividends derived from illicit drug trafficking,

Regretting, however, that these measures have proved to be largely insufficient,

Welcoming the efforts undertaken by the United Nations system to promote and co-ordinate international action against drug abuse and illicit trafficking,

Welcoming also, in this connection, the valuable contribution made by the ILO on the basis of the resolution concerning measures against drug and alcohol abuse in working and social life, adopted by the International Labour Conference at its 73rd Session, and of the complementary proposals for action approved by the 242nd Session (February-March 1989) of the Governing Body;

1. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to call upon governments of all member States:

- (a) to promote actively and strengthen effective national and international strategies to combat drug abuse and drug trafficking through campaigns for the simultaneous reduction in the supply of and demand for illicit drugs;
- (b) to devote special measures and priority to the adequate protection of citizens from drug-related violence, corruption and intimidation, with particular attention to major target groups and potential victims such as trade unionists, peasant leaders and human rights activists.

2. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to call upon governments as well as upon employers' and workers' organisations in all member States to intensify their efforts and mutual co-operation with a view to:

- (a) expanding public information and education activities aimed at reducing drug problems at the workplace;
- (b) increasing their vigilance and efficiency at all levels in the tracing, identification, exposing and winding up of channels used for the export, import, and trafficking of drugs as well as for the manipulation of funds and assets derived from illicit drug-trade and related criminal activities.

3. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to request the Director-General:

- (a) to pursue and strengthen, as much as possible, the ILO's activities in combating drug abuse, focusing particularly on areas such as information and education aimed at reducing the demand for drugs; the promotion of integrated rural development programmes to reduce poverty among rural workers and their dependence on drug cultivation; vocational rehabilitation and social re-integration;
- (b) to encourage and assist the ILO's tripartite constituents in member States in developing their own programmes in the above-mentioned areas;
- (c) to continue the ILO's active co-operation with the United Nations system in the strengthening of a concerted programme of international action to combat drug abuse and illicit trafficking, and to put special emphasis in this context on the imperative need and priority to protect the basic rights and the lives of trade unionists and peasant leaders who are increasingly becoming the victims of drug-related crimes and violence.

Resolution concerning the promotion of self-employment, submitted by the Government delegations of Bolivia, Chile, Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua and Peru

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Recalling the Declaration of Philadelphia which recognises the solemn obligation of the ILO to further among the nations of the world programmes which will achieve full employment and the raising of standards of living, the Preamble to the Constitution of the ILO which provides for the prevention of unemployment, and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights as it relates to the right to work, to equitable and satisfactory conditions of work and to protection against unemployment,

Recalling the international labour standards of relevance to employment and self-employment, particularly the Employment Policy Recommendation, 1964 (No. 122), and the Employment Policy (Supplementary Provisions) Recommendation, 1984 (No. 169),

Recalling the conclusions of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment held in Geneva in November 1987,

Convinced that one essential way of solving the unemployment and underemployment problems confronting many countries is to create a climate that is conducive to the efficient utilisation of human skills, including managerial skills, and the exercise of the individual's initiative,

Noting that self-employment as one of the vehicles for employment creation with modest capital means can contribute to social and economic development, particularly in developing countries,

Considering that self-employment can, by marshalling managerial and entrepreneurial initiative, stimulate the development of a pool of managers, entrepreneurs and skilled workers,

Recalling the decision taken by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office at its 241st Session (November 1988) to place the question of self-employment on the agenda of the International Labour Conference in 1990;

1. Invites governments, in consultation with employers' and workers' organisations:

- (a) to promote and stimulate, as a part of overall employment policy, productive self-employment activities in both the rural and the urban sector;
- (b) to review all policies and programmes affecting self-employment with a view to removing specific obstacles to its development and growth in the following crucial areas:
 - (i) promotional, training and organisational policies designed to ensure freer access to credit and all forms of technical assistance;
 - (ii) the removal or relaxation of restrictive regulations or administrative procedures which impede the development of such activities and the adoption of more flexible standards for the promotion of self-employment;
 - (iii) the improvement of conditions of employment and work with a view to gradually extending social and labour protection to such workers;
- (c) to develop closer links between educational and training institutions so that:
 - (i) more intensive vocational training can be imparted to self-employed workers to upgrade their skills;

- (ii) educational programmes contain elements which alter negative attitudes to self-employment;
- (d) to develop reliable and systematic labour market information and occupational information and guidance services in areas offering opportunities for self-employment;
- (e) to support the necessary measures to fend off false self-employed workers whose sole purpose is to evade social and labour protection obligations;
- (f) to co-operate amongst themselves for the exchange of information and experience on self-employment policies and programmes.

2. Calls on the Governing Body of the ILO to instruct the Director-General to ensure that the ILO's programme and budget lays emphasis on:

- (a) studies on recent trends in self-employment and in government policies and programmes concerning conditions of employment and social protection for the self-employed, with emphasis on the urban informal sectors in developing countries;
- (b) activities facilitating the promotion of self-employment as an essential means of providing employment for new entrants into the labour market who swell the ranks of the workforce, as well as new jobs for persons who have lost theirs in the process of structural readjustment;
- (c) the promotion of access to credit and, in particular, the creation of machinery to overcome the problem of real guarantees while at the same time providing more comprehensive information on how to approach international funding bodies;
- (d) the revision of the regulations and procedures in force so as to prevent their impeding its development;
- (e) the possibilities of protection for such workers and, in particular, the scope and potential of the existing social security systems;
- (f) the analysis and promotion of more adequate institutions for the implementation of policies in this sector;
- (g) vocational training and recycling programmes so that the unemployed may acquire the qualifications, attitudes and skills necessary for their entry into the labour market through self-employment;
- (h) technical co-operation activities by increasing the number of relevant projects and by training decision-makers and officials responsible for the promotion of self-employment;
- (i) measures designed to facilitate co-operation among member States for the exchange of information and experience.

Resolution concerning the 70th anniversary of the founding of the ILO and its future tasks in social and economic development, submitted by Mr. Andreev, Workers' delegate, Bulgaria; Mr. Bochow, Workers' delegate, German Democratic Republic; Mr. Bulgak, Workers' delegate, Byelorussian SSR; Mr. Escandell Romero, Workers' delegate, Cuba; Mr. Haibizai, Workers' delegate, Afghanistan; Mr. Kovalevski, Workers' delegate, Ukrainian SSR; Mr. Nagy, Workers' delegate, Hungary; Mr. Neubert, Workers' delegate, Czechoslovakia; Mr. Tsagaan, Workers' delegate, Mongolia; and Mr. Yanaev, Workers' delegate, USSR

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Appreciating the role and contribution of the ILO, since its founding, to economic development, to social justice and to the promotion of human and trade union rights, and hoping that the Organisation's credit will be further enhanced in the years to come,

Recalling the Preamble to the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation and the Declaration of Philadelphia which affirms that "all human beings, irrespective of race, creed or sex, have the right to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity",

Stressing that the continuing adverse economic situation underlines the urgent need for the establishment of a just and equitable world economic system that is conducive to growth, whilst also protecting the environment,

Recognising that full respect for freedom of association is an essential prerequisite for workers to be able to play a constructive role in the economic and social development of their countries,

Stressing that attacks on freedom of association and the right to collective bargaining also threaten countries' economic and social progress,

Considering that problems relating to employment and investment for the satisfaction of human needs, as well as other problems affecting the world of labour, are subjects of major concern in both industrialised and developing countries and are closely linked to economic and development problems,

Noting that a majority of the world's population still has no access to elementary education and knowledge, and that greater investment in training facilities is required in order to meet future labour market trends and provide all the workforce with meaningful employment opportunities and fair remuneration corresponding to qualifications,

Aware that it is only in the context of broad co-operation between countries on an equal footing, and only if such properly implemented co-operation is supported by adequate means and enjoys the democratic participation of the workers and peoples, that economic recovery and improved working and living conditions may be ensured,

Stressing that, if present trends in the world economy – that is, the low rates of growth which were a feature of the international economy in the 1980s – are still prevalent in the 1990s, they will only aggravate the already serious problems of adaptation faced by the heavily indebted developing countries and hinder any recovery in their growth,

Noting that the international financial institutions themselves have recognised that the structural adjustment policies they have recommended have often led to negative social consequences in the indebted countries, resulting in increased poverty and social tension;

1. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to call upon the governments of member States to:

- (a) ensure the full participation of workers' organisations in the formulation and implementation of economic and social development programmes;
- (b) create conditions for expanding industrial, agricultural and service activities to promote effectively policies aimed at full employment;
- (c) refrain from any action which calls trade union rights and civil liberties into question.

2. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to:

- (a) contribute to the preparation and implementation of a New International Development Strategy for the 1990s; in this connection, the ILO should emphasise that employment, environment, poverty, training, the conversion of the arms industries and the protection of vulnerable groups should be part of the International Development Strategy for the Fourth United Nations Development Decade;
- (b) contribute actively to the preparation and holding of the Special Session of the United Nations General Assembly devoted to international economic co-operation in April 1990;
- (c) pursue the action undertaken by the Office to assist member States to ensure the full application of the principles and standards relating to freedom of association and other trade union rights and freedoms based thereon.

3. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director-General to:

- (a) explore constantly ways and means of intensifying the ILO's contribution to the furtherance of economic and social justice in the world and, in particular, its action against unemployment, poverty, exploitation, discrimination and the restriction of trade union rights;
- (b) concentrate in the follow-up action to the High-level Meeting on Structural Adjustment and Employment on the following objectives:
 - (i) ensuring that better account is taken in macro-economic policies of their social consequences and repercussions on the labour force;
 - (ii) promoting tripartite consultation;
 - (iii) strengthening the participation of the ILO in the search, along with other international financial institutions, for a global approach to structural adjustment that would integrate all economic and social factors;
- (c) promote larger training and human resources development programmes, taking account of long-term development concerns and associating the participants to the greatest extent possible in the general process of economic and social development;
- (d) undertake research on the consequences of new technology for employment and skill requirements;
- (e) prepare studies on the effect of the external debt of developing countries on employment and training and on workers' rights and living conditions;
- (f) intensify the ILO's studies on the social aspects of the conversion of the arms industries as part of structural adjustment;

- (g) when preparing the programme and budget proposals for the biennium 1992-93, include:

- (i) a tripartite conference on the influence of new technology on employment;
- (ii) an international symposium on workers' participation in decision-making at the enterprise and industrial level.

Resolution concerning development, employment and environmental protection, submitted by Mr. Andreev, Workers' delegate, Bulgaria; Mr. Bochow, Workers' delegate, German Democratic Republic; Mr. Bulgak, Workers' delegate, Byelorussian SSR; Mr. Escandell Romero, Workers' delegate, Cuba; Mr. Haibizai, Workers' delegate, Afghanistan; Mr. Kovalevski, Workers' delegate, Ukrainian SSR; Mr. Nagy, Workers' delegate, Hungary; Mr. Neubert, Workers' delegate, Czechoslovakia; Mr. Tsagaan, Workers' delegate, Mongolia; and Mr. Yanaev, Workers' delegate, USSR

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Convinced that all economic and social development policies should be designed effectively to protect and improve the environment and the workplace and that only economic activities and employment which are compatible with public health and the environment are real factors of progress,

Believing that the workers and their representatives should take action and enjoy their rights in all areas concerning the environment and the risks to the population and natural surroundings,

Noting with deep concern that continuing problems of environmental damage present an increasing threat to the human environment and to the quality of human life,

Emphasising in this connection that close national and international co-operation is needed to prevent the negative impact of structural adjustment measures and changes in the production process on the working and living environment and to increase the positive effect of an improved global environment on employment,

Noting that, in its resolution 43/196 of 20 December 1988, the United Nations General Assembly stressed the major importance of sustained economic growth and development in all countries, particularly in developing countries, for sound management of the environment,

Welcoming the fact that the report of the World Commission on Environment and Development, appointed by the United Nations, has proposed a comprehensive programme of action to deal with the vast problems of safeguarding the environment,

Recalling also the resolution concerning employment policy and environmental protection, adopted in 1987 by the 4th European Regional Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Convinced that, through appropriate measures at the national and international level, a positive link can be established between the requirements of environmental protection and employment creation, particularly in the rural areas of developing countries,

Considering that the International Labour Organisation can contribute significantly to the efforts being made at the international level to ensure permanent development and environmental protection;

1. Invites governments and, as appropriate, employers' and workers' organisations to:

- (a) strengthen international co-operation on environmental protection to prevent the negative impact of ecologically unbalanced development;
- (b) engage in effective tripartite consultations aimed at the design and pursuance of policies to promote the creation of adequate numbers of skilled jobs in a clean and healthy environment;

- (d) strengthen and build up research and training in all areas concerning development, employment and environmental protection.

2. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director-General to:

Resolution concerning development, employment and the protection of the environment, submitted by Mr. Schweitzer, Workers' delegate, Luxembourg

The General conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Considering that in the present economic and social situation the pursuit of rapid economic growth, sustainable development and a solution to the social and labour problems affecting above all the world of work is a major preoccupation of industrialised and developing countries,

Noting that every country anxious to survive and prosper engages in productive activities and develops techniques that often entail serious hazards for the working environment, for the environment and health of human beings and for the protection of natural resources and ecosystems, because of pollution, the accumulation of toxic substances and residues and the abundant consumption of raw materials and energy,

Stressing the growing attention being devoted by public opinion to the need to protect and restore the environment,

Welcoming the report of the World Commission on Environment and Development entitled Our common future,

Welcoming also the Declaration issued in March 1989 at the Hague meeting regarding the fundamental duty of all States to protect the Earth's ecosystem and the adoption of the Basle Convention on the Control of Transboundary Movements of Hazardous Wastes,

Recalling the resolution concerning employment policy and environmental protection, adopted by the Fourth European Regional Conference of the ILO,

Convinced that a sustainable economic and social development that takes into account the vital need to combat poverty, satisfy the basic needs of mankind, create employment and safeguard the environment can be achieved by the pursuit of co-ordinated policies at the national, regional and international level,

Recalling the principles of international co-operation and the responsibility of the international community whereby all States have mutual obligations with respect to development and the protection of the environment;

1. Invites all member States:

A. At the national level

- (a) to implement programmes of sustainable social and economic development that are geared to needs and priorities, with particular attention to the most underprivileged strata of the population;
- (b) to adopt policies to:
 - (i) develop human resources;
 - (ii) restructure and develop services and productive activities that are conducive to conservation, the creation of employment and the safeguard of a livable environment;
- (c) to take appropriate measures to ensure the safety and health of workers and of the population as regards the problems posed by the production, transport, storage and elimination of dangerous residues;
- (d) to control the importation and use of agro-chemical products, especially in developing countries, by means of the dissemination of useful information and of research into new replacement products that are not toxic for health and the environment;
- (e) to undertake studies and research into the possibility of reducing the production of waste;
- (f) to ban for moral, ecological and safety reasons the exportation of toxic waste to third countries, by having them treated and eliminated where they are actually produced;
- (g) to encourage, and to involve workers' and employers' organisations fully in, the design and implementation of such programmes and measures;
- (h) to ratify and apply the international decisions and conventions on the protection of nature and of the environment;

B. At the regional and international level

- (a) to intensify regional and international co-operation and increase the allocation of financial resources in various domains, in close collaboration with the relevant international institutions, with a view to:
 - (i) the rational management and protection of natural resources;
 - (ii) the carrying out of studies and the adoption of model agreements and legal instruments for the prevention and control of pollution and the safeguard of the ecosystems;
- (b) to sign and ratify the international decisions and conventions on the protection of nature and of the environment, including the FAO's International Code of Conduct on the Distribution and Use of Pesticides;
- (c) to take all appropriate steps to promote their effective application;
- (d) to assist developing countries, and specifically those suffering from pollution and the degradation of the environment, in the carrying out of studies, the exchange of information and the gaining of access to the necessary technology and instruments to define standards and guarantee the protection of the environment.

2. Requests the Governing Body of the ILO to instruct the Director-General:

- (a) to urge governments:
 - (i) when formulating their restructuring and adjustment policies and their development programmes, to take into account the vital importance of creating productive employment in order to satisfy the priority needs of the rural and urban population and to ensure safety and health at work and the protection of the environment;
 - (ii) to involve the workers' and employers' organisations fully in the design and implementation of these economic and social development and environmental policies and programmes;
- (b) to strengthen the ILO's technical co-operation activities in order to help member States:
 - (i) to pursue an active manpower policy and resolve the most serious problem of our time, namely unemployment;
 - (ii) to adopt modern, rapid training methods, especially for young persons, and to improve the conditions of work, health, safety, life and the environment;
- (c) to carry out studies on the major hazards posed by industrial plants from the standpoint of the production, handling and storage of dangerous merchandise and their impact on the environment;
- (d) to disseminate widely the findings of these studies and all relevant information in order to generate an awareness of the environment crisis and tackle it effectively;
- (e) to define an ILO programme of environmental activities coming within its sphere of competence and to include it in the next programme and budget proposals.

Resolution concerning the achievements of the International Labour Organisation on its 70th anniversary, its role and the need to strengthen its activities in a changing world, submitted by Mr. Schweitzer, Workers' delegate, Luxembourg

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Considering that its present session is being held on the 70th anniversary of the ILO and on the 40th anniversary of the adoption of the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98),

Recalling the Preamble to the Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia concerning the aims and purposes of the Organisation,

Stressing that the ILO, despite the fact that modern times have been troubled by war, ideological conflict, pockets of tension in some regions and economic and social crises, has successfully adapted its methods and structure so as to fulfil its mandate properly and foster greater social justice in the world,

Taking pride in the award of the Noble Peace Prize to the ILO on the occasion of its 50th anniversary,

Convinced that the adoption of standards accessible to all countries and having significant objectives, the supervision of the application of Conventions and Recommendations and the various activities undertaken to improve employment, conditions of work and equality and, above all, the defence of freedom of association, contribute to the social advancement of workers, to development and to world peace,

Noting the 'industrialised countries' spectacular progress in science and technology, which has not brought real social progress to all, while in many developing countries poverty is increasing and becoming more and more firmly entrenched and the population is growing and, in the North as well as the South, employment is precarious, unemployment is on the increase, purchasing power is declining and, often, social protection of workers is diminishing,

Considering likewise that the preservation of peace, cutbacks in military expenditure and the re-conversion of armaments industries into peaceful industries are preconditions for economic and social progress,

Concerned by the present world economic, social and political situation, which is characterised by:

- violations of human rights,
- economic, commercial, financial and monetary difficulties,
- the imbalance in North-South relations,
- the stockpiling of armaments,
- the developing countries' foreign debt burden, and
- the social consequences of austerity measures and adjustment programmes, which do not further the development of all mankind in conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity,

Convinced that the ILO, by virtue of its social vocation, its long experience, the magnitude and diversified nature of its technical co-operation activities, its tripartite structure and its capacity for adaptation and innovation, still has an essential role to play in the implementation of programmes which promote economic and social development and justice in the various countries;

1. Reaffirms the basic principles on which the Organisation is founded.

2. Pays tribute to the ILO's beneficial achievements since its founding and hails its 70th anniversary.

3. Invites all States to celebrate the anniversary in an appropriate manner by:

- (a) promoting the application of international labour standards with the active co-operation of employers' and workers' organisations, by ratifying and applying them fully, notably those relating to basic human rights, freedom of association, the right to organise and collective bargaining, forced labour, equality of opportunity and treatment, employment, and the improvement of conditions of work;
- (b) redefining, in the context of adjustment measures and economic and structural change, their strategies and means of action with a view to achieving a harmonious development of the various strata of the population;
- (c) giving priority to the social problems connected with employment, education, vocational training and retraining, and social protection;
- (d) co-operating effectively with the ILO in the various fields falling within its competence and, in particular, by supporting technical co-operation activities through an increased allocation of technical and financial resources for the struggle against poverty and for social justice.

4. Calls upon:

- (a) the industrialised countries to improve their economic, commercial and financial policies so as to remove the obstacles hampering the development efforts of the Third World countries;
- (b) the chief military powers to make fresh and major efforts to speed up the disarmament process;
- (c) all States to reduce and effectively limit their expenditure on armaments and to utilise the resulting additional resources for productive investment, the struggle against unemployment, the improvement of the social conditions of the masses and the development of poor countries.

5. Requests the Governing Body of the ILO to instruct the Director-General:

- (a) to undertake:
 - (i) research, studies and meetings on the problems of development, employment, income and social security with a view to framing and implementing new programmes of action;
 - (ii) technical co-operation activities for the benefit of the developing countries, particularly those hard hit by the effects of the world economic crisis;
- (b) to take steps to bring about an effective decentralisation of activities, which is particularly important in its own right and at the same time enables the regions to act more in line with reality;
- (c) to invite the governments of the States Members of the ILO, and in particular those of the industrial and financial powers, to increase the volume of their development aid;

- (d) to take all necessary measures to develop relations with the international financial institutions and the specialised agencies of the United Nations in order to examine and co-ordinate their activities designed to achieve the economic and social objectives of the Charter of the United Nations.

Resolution concerning development, foreign debt and the social objectives of the International Labour Organisation, submitted by the Government delegations of Argentina, Bolivia, Chile, Guatemala, Honduras, Mexico, Nicaragua and Venezuela

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Reiterating the principles of the ILO Constitution and of the Declaration of Philadelphia, whereby universal and lasting peace can be established only if it is based on social justice, poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere, and national and international policies and measures, in particular those of an economic and financial character, should be accepted only in so far as they may be held to promote the material well-being and spiritual development of human beings, in conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity,

Having considered the 1989 Report of the Director-General of the International Labour Office entitled Recovery and employment, Recalling its resolution on development, foreign debt and the social objectives of the International Labour Organisation, adopted on 24 June 1986,

Bearing in mind the conclusions of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment held in November 1987,

Taking note of the Guatemala Agreement on the Social Debt, signed by the ministers of finance and planning present at the VIth Regional Conference of Employment Planners in Latin America and the Caribbean, and the First Conference on the Social Debt held in Guatemala from 5 to 8 December 1988, under the auspices of PREALC (ILO),

Concerned that, far from being resolved, the foreign debt crisis in developing countries is growing worse as time goes on, thereby seriously threatening their economic, social and political stability, compromising the progress of their peoples and their level of employment and income, rendering it more difficult to satisfy the basic needs of their inhabitants and giving rise to tensions that undermine workers' living standards and dignity and make industrial peace more precarious,

Convinced that the pursuit of strict adjustment policies with a view to improving the balance of payments and servicing the debt and its high interest leads to large transfers of wealth abroad, to the detriment of employment, social services and economic development, and that such adjustment policies seriously hamper compliance with international labour Conventions, particularly those relating to fundamental trade union rights;

1. Reaffirms its resolution concerning development, foreign debt and the social objectives of the International Labour Organisation, adopted on 24 June 1986.

2. Reiterates its profound concern at the situation created in numerous developing countries by their accumulation of a huge foreign debt and by the net transfer of resources, which are crucial economic factors that, as long as they exist, will continue to compromise the well-being of the people and social peace in those countries and, thereby, the achievement of the objectives embodied in the Declaration of Philadelphia and the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation.

3. Endorses and adopts as its own the Guatemala Agreement on the Social Debt signed on 8 December 1988 and invites the Governing Body to continue, by taking all appropriate measures, to support the national and international efforts of developing countries to cope with the social debt, as an essential factor in the structural adjustment of their economies.

4. Invites the Governing Body of the ILO to renew its request to the governments of all States Members of the ILO:

- (a) to examine jointly the problems involved in servicing the foreign debt, taking into account the capacity to pay based on export incomes, the needs of development and the economic and social requirements of developing countries;
- (b) to encourage a dialogue among governments, international financial institutions and investors to find practical means of resolving the problems of financial resources and external indebtedness and to find a more balanced solution to the international economic and social situation as well as improvements of the international monetary system.

5. Instructs the Governing Body of the ILO to request the Director-General:

- (a) to keep the Governing Body and the General Conference informed of the effects on employment, incomes and poverty of the various structural readjustment programmes applied in debtor countries and, to that end, to put forward proposals and suggestions to ensure that such policies and programmes are compatible with developing countries' growth and overall development;
- (b) to intensify the necessary measures to strengthen the role and influence of the International Labour Organisation in international discussions on the problems of financial resources, external indebtedness and the international monetary system, so that they take full account of social and labour considerations;
- (c) to continue to ensure that the international financial bodies take fully into account the social and political situation of debtor developing countries and that the expansion of employment and the protection of incomes form the basis of any strategy to promote stable economic and social development;
- (d) to convene a second world meeting of high-level officials, preceded if necessary by preparatory regional meetings, for the purpose of monitoring continuously, in the light of the ILO's social objectives, the world economic situation, and in particular the repercussions of trade, financial and monetary practices on employment and poverty, and reviewing the application and implementation of the conclusions of the first High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Readjustment.

Resolution concerning the role of the ILO in environmental protection and employment, submitted by Mrs. Baljinyam, Government delegate, Mongolia; Mr. Chernyshov, Government delegate, USSR; Mr. Fomich, Government delegate, Byelorussian SSR; Mr. Lipatov, Government delegate, Ukrainian SSR; Mrs. Molkova, Government delegate, Czechoslovakia; Mr. Natchev, Government delegate, Bulgaria; and Mr. Noack, Government delegate, German Democratic Republic

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Considering that a criterion of success of the economic activities of member States, their associations and the world economy as a whole is the achievement of long-term social objectives, which according to the ILO's Constitution include the eradication of poverty and the promotion of material well-being and spiritual development in conditions of peace, freedom, dignity and equal opportunity,

Recalling that one of the ILO's basic aims is the protection of life, of workers' health and of the working environment,

Emphasising that the maintenance of the environmental equilibrium is a necessary condition for the permanent improvement of living conditions and social progress,

Expressing concern at the fact that industrial activity and the way of life of people on our planet are increasingly threatening that equilibrium, as well as the conditions of life of future generations,

Noting in particular the problem of desertification, the harm to vegetation and to human health caused by industrial waste, the development of transport, water pollution, the breaching of the ozone layer and the creation of conditions giving rise to a hothouse effect,

Believing that it is necessary to weigh efforts to achieve further economic development against the effects of human endeavour on the environment and to engage only in such economic activities as will not upset the ecological balance,

Welcoming the report of the World Commission on Environment and Development entitled Our common future, which analysed the above-mentioned and other ecological problems and emphasised that ecological problems transcend all frontiers,

Referring to the resolutions adopted by the United Nations General Assembly on environmental questions, and in particular resolutions 42/186 and 187 and 43/196 concerning the Environmental Perspective to the Year 2000 and Beyond, as well as the corresponding decisions of the United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP),

Stressing the importance of the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development to be held in 1992,

Recalling the resolution concerning employment policy and environmental protection, adopted by the Fourth European Regional Conference of the ILO,

Considering that efforts to preserve a healthy environment must be undertaken on the widest possible basis and must stem from active co-operation among all countries and the organisations of the United Nations system,

Noting the ILO's competence in respect of working environment issues, as well as the close link that exists between the working environment and the living environment,

Convinced that, within its sphere of competence, the ILO can contribute substantially to ensuring that increased world-wide attention is paid to environmental problems, as well as to joint efforts to promote sustainable and environmentally sound development;

1. Appeals to the governments of member States, as well as to employers' and workers' organisations:

- (a) to take into account environmental protection needs in carrying out energy, industrial, agricultural and transport activities as well as in implementing employment policies;
- (b) to ascertain whether economic and social plans that have been adopted and are due to be implemented take sufficiently into account their direct and indirect impact on the environment and whether they provide for alternative technologies aimed at protecting the environment;
- (c) to give increasing attention to working environment issues and to their inter-relationship with the general environment;
- (d) to give priority support to such types of development and capital investment policy as take into account long-term effects on the environment and are aimed at air, soil and water regeneration, the rational utilisation of human resources and energy, the reduction of energy wastage, the introduction of non-waste technologies, the protection of nature and the conservation of biological species;
- (e) to limit as far as possible the harmful effects of production processes, which are one of the main threats to the working and general environment;

- (f) to reduce to the minimum, in developing rural areas, the harmful effects of chemical substances, and in particular pesticides, and to favour biological methods for protecting agricultural crops;
- (g) to give due attention to environmental protection and conservation issues in educational and training policies;
- (h) when planning environmental protection measures, to take into consideration their effects on employment creation;
- (i) to foster regional co-operation with a view to protecting the environment.

2. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to request the Director-General:

- (a) to co-operate closely with the United Nations Environment Programme and the other bodies concerned in the United Nations system with a view to making full use of the ILO's possibilities in carrying out technical co-operation activities relating to environmental protection;
- (b) to take purposefully into account working and general environment aspects when carrying out vocational training and rural development programmes;
- (c) to prepare an analytical report on the inter-relationship between the environment and ILO programmes concerning employment, rural development, working conditions and other issues, in particular PIACT, with a view to ensuring the more efficient use of the resources allocated to these ILO technical assistance programmes and to reinforcing, within these programmes, measures for the protection of the environment (for example, afforestation, anti-desertification projects, etc.);
- (d) to submit this report, together with appropriate proposals for action, to the 245th Session of the Governing Body;
- (e) to provide in the ILO programme and budget proposals for 1992-93 for a tripartite meeting on ILO action in the field of environmental protection.

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Taking into account the preamble to the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation which states that "universal and lasting peace can be established only if it is based upon social justice", and that "conditions of labour exist involving such injustice, hardship and privation to large numbers of people as to produce unrest so great that the peace and harmony of the world are imperilled",

Recalling the two resolutions adopted by the Conference in 1974 and 1980 concerning the violation of trade union rights and freedoms, and the effect of Israeli settlements in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories on the situation of Arab workers;

1. Deeply deplores the persistent refusal of the Israeli occupying authorities to implement the terms of the aforementioned resolutions.

2. Condemns the policies and the practices of these authorities towards Arab workers and employers in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories which are manifested in the continuous deportation of trade unionists and arbitrary detention, as well as the demolition of houses and the destruction of productive establishments, the dismissal of Arab workers and the denial of their fundamental rights and freedoms, particularly the right to work and economic and social rights.

3. Decides to establish a special commission of members of the Conference at its 77th Session (1990) to study the annual reports of the Director-General to the Conference concerning the conditions of Arab workers and employers in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories, as well as the other reports relating to this matter, to consider what further programmes and technical assistance can be provided to them and to submit a report on its conclusions to the Conference.

Appendix I Statements showing the status of collection of annual contributions.

The point for decision is in paragraph 3.

A. APPOINTMENTS TO THE ADMINISTRATIVE BOARD (ILO STAFF PENSIONS FUND) AND STAFF PENSION COMMITTEE (UN JOINT STAFF PENSION FUND)

2. The following is an extract from the second report of the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee to the Governing Body at its 243rd Session (May-June 1989):

12. The Committee considered a paper (GB.243/PFA/6/6) which recalled that, in accordance with article 3 of the ILO Staff

Pensions Fund Regulations and article 6(c) of the Regulations of the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Fund, three members and three substitute members were appointed for three years by the Conference to the Administrative Board of the ILO Staff Pensions Fund and the ILO Staff Pension Committee of the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Fund. In order to ensure a reasonable degree of continuity in the work of these committees, the Director-General proposed the reappointment of Mr. D. Pelekanos and Mr. R. M. Schibli and the appointment of Mr. W. M. Yoffee as titular members, and the reappointment of Mr. W. M. Rogers as a substitute member. Two vacancies having been created by the fact that Mr. G. Falchi and Mr. H. Maier would no longer be available to serve on these bodies, the appointment as substitute members of Mr. Y. Chotard, representative of the Government of France on the Governing Body, and Mr. R. Vanni, deputy Worker member on the Governing Body, was proposed.

13. The Committee recommends that the Governing Body submit the following resolution to the International Labour Conference at its forthcoming session:

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation:

Appoints to the Administrative Board of the ILO Staff Pensions Fund and the ILO Staff Pension Committee (United Nations Joint Staff Pension Fund), for a period of three years until 8 October 1992, the following members and substitute members of these bodies, namely:

Members:

Mr. R. M. Schibli (Switzerland)
Mr. W. M. Yoffee (United States)

Substitute members:

Mr. Y. Chotard (France)

Mr. R. Vanni (Italy)

B. PROGRAMME AND BUDGET FOR 1990-91

4. The following is an extract from the first report of the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee of the Governing Body at its 243rd Session (May-June 1989):

Budget exchange rate

13. The Committee had before it a paper (GB.243/PFA/2/2) concerning the budget exchange rate for the Programme and Budget for 1990-91.

14. The representative of the Director-General (the Treasurer and Financial Comptroller) pointed out that the paper before the Committee referred to a premium of some 7 million Swiss francs which would be produced on the forward purchase of the 1990-91 dollar requirements, based on the market conditions applicable at the time the document was prepared. Since then Swiss interest rates had been increased and under current market conditions the premium would be reduced to about 5.8 million Swiss francs. This would, however, be compensated for to some extent by the higher rates of interest that would be earned on Swiss franc deposits held by the Organisation.

15. The Committee took note of the Office paper.

² Bolivia: In accordance with the arrangement approved by the Conference at its 54th Session (1970), Bolivia is called upon: (a) to pay in 1970 its contribution for the year 1970 in full; (b) in subsequent years to pay each current contribution in full in the year for which it is due; (c) to settle the arrears that have accumulated up to and including 31 December 1969, amounting in total to $159,597, by the payment of 19 equal annual instalments of $7,980 beginning in 1970 and a final instalment of $7,977. Bolivia has paid its annuities for 1970 to 1988 inclusive. Bolivia has also paid its contributions for 1970 to 1987 inclusive and has made a payment of $1,392 on account of its 1988 contribution. Bolivia has thus reduced its outstanding arrears to an amount less than its contributions due for the preceding two full years (1987 and 1988) and is thus entitled to vote in accordance with Article 13(4) of the Constitution.

A Member of the Organisation which is in arrears in the payment of its financial contribution to the Organisation shall have no vote in the Conference, in the Governing Body, in any committee, or in the elections of members of the Governing Body, if the amount of its arrears equals or exceeds the amount of the contributions due from it for the preceding two full years: Provided that the Conference may by a two-thirds majority of the votes cast by the delegates present permit such a Member to vote if it is satisfied that the failure to pay is due to conditions beyond the control of the Member.

⁴ Comoros: In accordance with the arrangement approved by the Conference at its 70th Session (1984), the Comoros was called upon: (a) to pay in 1985 its contribution for the year 1985 ($12,737) in full; (b) in subsequent years to pay its current contribution in full in the year for which it is due; (c) to settle the arrears accumulated up to and including 31 December 1984, amounting to $56,739, by the payment of nine equal annual instalments of $5,674 beginning in 1985 and a final instalment of $5,673. The Comoros made a payment ($5,000) on account of its 1985 annuity in 1986. The Conference also decided at its 70th Session (1984), under paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution, that the Comoros should be permitted to vote. The Comoros failed to comply with the terms of its arrangement in 1985 and therefore lost the right to vote as from 1 January 1986.

The Dominican Republic has paid its annuities and contributions for 1977 to 1984 inclusive. The Conference at its 65th Session (1979) decided, under paragraph 4 of article 13 of the ILO Constitution, that the Dominican Republic should be permitted to vote. The Dominican Republic failed to comply with the terms of its arrangement in 1985 and therefore lost the right to vote as from 1 January 1986.

Seventy-sixth Session, Geneva, 1989

Report submitted by the Governing Body to the Conference for the year 1988-89

1. The present report on the work of the Governing Body is submitted to the Conference in accordance with article 14(1) of the Standing Orders of the Governing Body. It covers the period since the last (June 1988) session of the Conference, i.e. the post-Conference sittings of the Governing Body's 240th Session (May-June 1988), and its 241st and 242nd Sessions (November 1988 and February-March 1989), but not the pre-Conference sittings of its 243rd Session (May 1989). An account of those sittings will be given to the Conference by the Chairman of the Governing Body when he introduces the present report. The information provided below is a summarised account of the work of the Governing Body, stressing the more important decisions. Detailed information can be found in the minutes and documents relating to the different sessions.

A. MATTERS RELATING TO THE GOVERNING BODY

2. At its resumed 240th Session the Governing Body elected its Officers for the year 1988-89 as follows: Chairman: Mr. N. G. Mensah (Bénin); Employer Vice-Chairman: Mr. J.-J. Oechslin (France); Worker Vice-Chairman: Mr. G. Muhr (Federal Republic of Germany).

3. During the period under review, the Governing Body took note of a number of changes in its composition and that of its committees and various bodies.

B. MATTERS RELATING TO THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE1. Date, place and agenda of the 77th (1990) Session of the Conference

4. At its 241st Session, the Governing Body had before it proposals concerning the date, place and agenda of the 77th (1990) Session of the Conference.

Date and place

5. The Governing Body decided that the 77th (1990) Session of the Conference should open on Wednesday, 6 June 1990, and that the session should be held in Geneva.

Agenda

6. Having followed the procedure laid down in article 18 of its Standing Orders concerning the method of voting in order to fix the agenda of the Conference when agreement had not been reached without a vote, the Governing Body decided to place two new technical items on the 1988 Conference agenda, one being for general discussion. It noted that, as a result of this decision and having regard to the standing items which the Conference would have before it and the items likely to be carried forward for second discussion from the 76th Session (1989), the agenda of the 77th Session (1990) would be as follows:

Standing items

- Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General
- Programme and budget proposals and other financial questions
- Information and reports on the application of Conventions and Recommendations

Items placed on the agenda by the Conference or the Governing Body

- Night work (second discussion)
- Safety in the use of chemicals at work (second discussion)
- Working conditions in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments (first discussion)
- Promotion of self-employment (general discussion)

7. The Governing Body also noted that the Conference would, in addition, have before it a special report on the application of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia.

2. Action on resolutions adopted by the Conference at its 75th Session (1988)¹

8. At its 7th Session (1988) the Conference adopted a resolution calling for action by the Governing Body on the subject of rural employment promotion. At its 241st Session the Governing Body, having taken note of the information provided by the Office concerning ongoing and planned action in this field, requested the Director-General to take appropriate measures to give effect to the requests made in the resolution.

C. APPOINTMENT OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL

9. At its resumed 240th Session the Governing Body adopted a set of rules governing the election of the Director-General, and at its 242nd Session, in accordance with those rules, elected Mr. Michel Hansenne as Director-General of the International Labour Office for a five-year term of office which began on 4 March 1989.

D. INTERNATIONAL LABOUR STANDARDS

1. Application of Conventions and Recommendations

Forms for reports on the application of ratified Conventions (article 22 of the Constitution of the ILO)

10. At its 241st Session the Governing Body approved the report forms on the application of the Safety and Health in Construction Convention, 1988 (No. 167), and the Employment Promotion and Protection Against Unemployment Convention, 1988 (No. 168).

2. Freedom of association

11. At its 241st and 242nd Sessions (November 1988 and February-March 1989) the Governing Body examined the reports submitted to it by its Committee on Freedom of Association and approved definitive or interim conclusions in 50 cases. Some of the cases were dealt with by on-the-spot missions to Colombia, Côte d'Ivoire, Haiti and Nicaragua.

12. In addition to the cases it examined, the Committee on Freedom of Association at the Governing Body's 241st and 242nd Sessions examined 27 cases in which the government concerned had kept it informed of the effect it had given to its recommendations. This procedure is of particular interest, as it enables the Committee on Freedom of Association to assess its activities and to note that, in many cases, the matters it has dealt with have shown positive developments. Thus, the Committee noted with interest the reinstatement of dismissed trade unionists in Côte d'Ivoire and Spain, as well as the condemnation by the courts in the United States/Puerto Rico of the practice of maintaining black lists of trade unionists.

3. Special constitutional procedures

Representations made under article 24 of the Constitution of the ILO

13. At its 240th Session the Governing Body postponed its consideration of the report of the Committee set up to examine the representation made by the Federation of Egyptian Trade Unions under article 24 of the Constitution of the ILO, alleging non-observance by the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya of the Protection of Wages Convention, 1949 (No. 95), and of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111).

14. At its 242nd Session the Governing Body appointed Mr. M. V. Russomano, representative of the Government of Brazil on the Governing Body, as a replacement for Mr. H. Charry Samper, former representative of the Government of Colombia on the Governing Body, as the Government member of the Committee which it had set up to examine a representation submitted by the Trade Union Federation of Workers' Commissions under article 24 of the Constitution of the ILO, alleging non-observance by Spain of the Minimum Wage-Fixing Convention, 1970 (No. 131).

15. During the period under consideration, the Governing Body approved two interim reports of its Committee on Freedom of Association on the representation submitted by the General Confederation of Norwegian Trade Unions concerning the application of the Right of Association (Agriculture) Convention, 1921 (No. 11), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), by Turkey.

Complaints submitted under article 26 of the Constitution of the ILO

16. At its 240th Session the Governing Body noted that the complaint made under article 26 of the Constitution of the ILO by the Government of Tunisia in connection with the expulsion of foreign workers by the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya had been withdrawn following an agreement between the parties, concluded with the assistance of the good offices of the Director-General, and declared the procedure closed.

17. At its 241st and 242nd Sessions the Governing Body approved the interim conclusions of its Committee on Freedom of Association on the complaint concerning the observance by Nicaragua of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), and the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144), presented by several Employers' delegates to the 73rd Session (1987) of the International Labour Conference under article 26 of the Constitution of the ILO. This complaint was the subject of a study mission which visited Nicaragua in September-October 1988, and whose report was taken into consideration in the report submitted to the Governing Body by its Committee on Freedom of Association in November 1988.

E. DISCRIMINATION

18. At its 241st Session the Governing Body examined the application of the Declaration concerning Action Against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia, as updated in 1988, in particular as regards the operational activities undertaken by the Office during the past year within the context of the Declaration. Those activities were reviewed by its Committee on Discrimination and are discussed in the Director-General's Special Report on the Application of the Declaration submitted to the Conference at its present session. It also examined the effect given to the recommendations contained in the Conclusions adopted by the Conference Committee on Apartheid in June 1988.

19. At its 241st Session the Governing Body also considered ILO action on discrimination in employment and occupation. In particular, it took note of the examination by the Conference in 1988 of the General Survey of the Application of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention (No. 111) and Recommendation (No. 111), 1958, conducted by the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations. In addition, the Governing Body noted developments concerning the ILO Plan of Action on Equality of Opportunity and Treatment for Men and Women in Employment.

20. The Governing Body also held an exchange of views, during its discussion of the report of its Committee on Discrimination at its 241st Session, on the measures envisaged by the Director-General with regard to the situation in the Arab territories occupied by Israel. The Governing Body noted that the Director-General would submit to its Committee on Discrimination, at the Governing Body's 243rd Session in May 1989, a short descriptive paper containing information and proposals on ILO activities relating to the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories.

F. STANDING ORDERS QUESTIONS

21. At its 241st Session the Governing Body reviewed the question of the appointment, as regular members of Conference committees, of the governments and employers' and workers' delegates of member States which have lost the right to vote, and noted that the practice it had recommended to the Conference in the past had been successfully followed at the 75th Session of the Conference. According to this practice, at the preliminary meetings of the Government group at the beginning of each session, delegates and advisers are requested not to apply for regular membership of any committee if they are not, at the time in question, entitled to vote, and weighting coefficients are calculated on the basis of the number of regular Government members entitled to vote. It accordingly decided that, since the practice would be continued, no further consideration need be given for the moment to a proposal to amend article 56, paragraph 1, of the Conference Standing Orders so as to provide explicitly that representatives of Members not enjoying the right to vote may be appointed only as deputy members of Conference committees. Apart from this, no action has been taken by the Governing Body on Standing Orders questions since the last session of the conference.

G. WORKING PARTY ON CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS CONCERNING CONFERENCE DELEGATIONS

22. The Working Party met during the 241st Session of the Governing Body under the chairmanship of Mr. Heredia Pérez (Government representative, Cuba).

23. The Working Party was constituted at the 234th Session of the Governing Body in November 1986 to examine proposals to amend article 13, paragraph 2, and article 4, paragraph 2, of the Constitution of the ILO. The proposed amendment to article 13, paragraph 2, is designed to permit the inclusion in future budgets of provision for the financing of full tripartite delegations to the International Labour Conference from selected member States, while the proposed amendment to article 4, paragraph 2, is designed to deprive Government delegates of States which send incomplete delegations to the Conference of the right to vote.

24. Extensive discussions during 1987 failed to reach agreement on the various issues involved, and accordingly, at its 239th Session in March 1988, the Governing Body decided, on the recommendation of the Working Party, to suspend the work of the Working Party until the 241st Session, and requested the Director-General to use his good offices in an attempt to break the deadlock that been reached.

25. The Director-General presented a report to the Working Party at the 241st Session of the Governing Body, in which he concluded that to enhance the chances of the reform envisaged becoming really operational, it appeared desirable not to examine the proposed constitutional amendments in isolation, but to place them in the broader framework of the rationalisation of meetings, including the possibility of holding the Conference on a biennial basis, preparatory work being performed by technical Conferences in the intervening year, in which case delegates' expenses could be supported on a broader basis than previously envisaged.

26. While the general approach aroused interest, the latter proposals met with various objections, and at the 242nd Session of the Governing Body the Director-General presented a further report setting out further ideas and options. In a preliminary exchange of views on the paper,¹ the view was expressed that the proposals would assist the Governing Body in its reflections with a view to subsequent discussions which might take place at a future session and would provide a basis for consultations with representatives of Members of the ILO which are not members of the Governing Body. It was suggested that the next session of the Conference would provide an opportunity to undertake such consultations.

H. PROGRAMME, FINANCIAL AND ADMINISTRATIVE MATTERS

1. Programme and financial matters

27. The Governing Body faced two principal tasks during the period under review. First, at its 241st Session it concluded its discussion of a long-term strategy on budget exchange rates. Secondly, it had before it at its 242nd Session the Director-General's programme and budget proposals for 1990-91.

28. Details of the discussions concerning the long-term strategy on exchange rates and the programme and budget proposals appear in Report II submitted to the present Conference Session.² The Director-General's original budget proposals are reproduced as a supplement to that Report.

29. At its 242nd Session the Governing Body was informed through its Allocations Committee of continuing action by the United Nations Committee on Contributions, and of the fact that the Fifth Committee of the United Nations had recommended to the General Assembly that the Committee on Contributions should carry out in 1989 a comprehensive review of the current methodology being applied, and that the proposed United Nations scale of contributions should be adopted for 1989 and 1990, and also for 1991, unless the scale for that year was changed as a result of the 1989 review. The General Assembly having adopted these recommendations, the Governing Body decided that the United Nations scale for 1989-91 should be the basis for the ILO scale for 1990-91, and accordingly proposes to the Conference the adoption of the draft scale of assessment of ILO contributions for 1990-91 which appears in Report II (Annex 3).

30. At its 241st Session the Governing Body took note of the financial position of the Organisation as it was evolving over the 1988-89 biennium, and in particular of the likely magnitude of shortfalls in budgetary income for the biennium. It examined a set of proposals by the Director-General to meet this situation, and approved a package of programme reductions for 1988-89 totalling $12,652,607.

31. The Governing Body continued to monitor the position of the regular budget accounts and the Working Capital Fund. It noted at its 242nd Session that contributions received for the year 1988, totalling $127,282,613, added to the $21,834,243 of arrears of contributions received in that same year, gave a total budgetary income of $149,116,856, as compared with expenditure of $147,429,243 incurred in the first year of the biennium. At 31 December 1988, 75 member States had paid in full their 1988 contributions, the same number as had done so at the end of 1987 in respect of 1987 contributions. The total 1988 regular budget contributions received ($127,282,613) represented 77.9 per cent of the contributions assessed on member States for 1988, compared with 81.4 per cent of the total 1987 assessments that had been received at 31 December 1987. At that same session, the Governing Body noted that the total amount of contributions received in 1989 by the time of its February-March meeting was greater than that received in the equivalent period in 1988. The hope was expressed that this was a sign that the incentive scheme for the early payment of contributions, introduced with effect from 1 January 1989, was beginning to take effect.

32. In response to a request by the Governing Body, the Director-General submitted a paper to the 242nd Session of the Governing Body concerning the purposes and operation of the Working Capital Fund. Noting that the 1988 Session of the Conference had already reduced the nominal level of the Fund from $37 million to $20.1 million, the Governing Body decided that it would be appropriate to wait and assess the full impact of the proposed system of Swiss franc assessments and of the incentive scheme for the early payment of contributions before reviewing the subject again.

33. The Governing Body at its 241st Session noted the report of the 47th Session of the Board of the International Centre for Advanced Technical and Vocational Training (Turin). It also accepted contributions and gifts to the International Institute for Labour Studies. It took note of the annual report of the United Nations Joint Inspection Unit for the period July 1987 to June 1988 and, at its 242nd Session, of the report of the United Nations Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (ACABQ) to the 43rd Session of the General Assembly.

34. At its 242nd Session the Governing Body considered the financing of an independent group of experts to follow up on and monitor the implementation of sanctions and other action against apartheid, and decided that, should it decide to establish such a group, then the cost of the group in 1989, estimated at $75,000, should be financed in the first instance from savings in Part I of the budget or, failing that, be charged to Part II – Unforeseen Expenditure – of the 1988-89 Programme and Budget.

35. As indicated above, at its 242nd Session the Governing Body endorsed the provisional programme level set out in Parts I to IV of the Programme and Budget for the biennium 1990-91, and proposes to the Conference a draft resolution for the abolition of Part V (Undistributed Reserve) of the budget with effect from 1 January 1990, together with a draft resolution for the adoption of the programme and budget for the 62nd financial period, ending 31 December 1991, which would be completed both as to the US-dollar amount appropriate for the budget of expenditure and the Swiss-franc amount appropriate to the budget of income, on the recommendation of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives at the present session of the Conference.¹

2. Administrative matters

36. At its 240th Session the Governing Body took note of further developments concerning the margin between the United Nations and United States civil service remuneration, resulting in a delay in the lifting of the freeze of the New York post adjustment until June 1988. It also noted the other main conclusions reached by the International Civil Service Commission (ICSC) and the need for good relations between the ICSC, common system agencies and staff representatives.

37. At that same session, the Governing Body also decided to amend the Staff Regulations so as to provide for the Director-General to be appointed for a period of five years.

38. At its 241st Session the Governing Body noted amendments to the Staff Regulations approved by the Director-General under the authority delegated to him by the Governing Body. These amendments concerned salary on promotion, probationary performance appraisal, assignment allowance, scales of pensionable remuneration in the Professional and higher categories, salary scales of General Service category staff in Geneva, salary scales (rates of staff assessment for the Professional category and above, gross and net salary scales at the non-family rate and salary scales for the purposes of separation payments), and the reimbursement of boarding costs for service in designated duty stations. The Governing Body also examined the fourteenth annual report of the ICSC, and in particular the conclusions and recommendations of interest to the ILO, namely, the margin between remuneration in the United Nations and in the United States civil service, questions concerning post adjustment and cost-of-living survey methodology, pensionable remuneration, the comprehensive review of the remuneration system, children's allowance, secondary dependant's allowance, admissible educational expenses and boarding costs, and other personnel policy matters, as well as the functioning of the ICSC and its relations with staff representatives. In this regard, the Director-General had addressed the 28th Session of the ICSC, deploring the decision of the staff to suspend participation in its work and stressing the ICSC's responsibility to make every effort to ensure greater transparency and a fruitful dialogue with staff and administrations. The Governing Body endorsed the ICSC recommendations, subject to their approval by the United Nations General Assembly, and authorised the Director-General to give effect in the ILO, through appropriate amendments to the Staff Regulations, to the measures decided on by the United Nations General Assembly in respect of the ICSC's recommendations on family allowances and the education grant from the date of implementation decided by the General Assembly, the cost of this to be financed in the first instance from savings in Part I of the budget, on the understanding that, should this subsequently prove impossible, the Director-General would propose alternative methods of financing at a later stage.

39. The Governing Body at its 241st Session authorised amendments to the Staff Regulations to bring the use of established posts into line with the current practice and operational needs of the Office. It noted that the Employers' group, dissociating itself from this decision and considering that there should be a complete review of the Staff Regulations to ensure that they were clear, coherent and transparent, requested the Director-General, when communicating the Governing Body's decision to the ICSC, to draw the latter's attention to the views of the employers' group.

40. With reference to long-term proposals to restore the financial viability of the ILO-ITU Staff Health Insurance Fund (SHIF), the Governing Body approved a package of measures which had been proposed by the Management Committee of the SHIF, affecting both the income expenditure of the Fund. In relation to expenditure, the measures included a temporary franchise, a ceiling on reimbursement of hospital costs and an increase in the threshold for the payment of supplementary benefits. The Governing Body approved an increase in the ILO's share of the contribution to the SHIF for serving officials to 2.6 per cent with effect from 1 January 1989, and to 2.8 per cent with effect from 1 January 1990, and for retired officials to 2.6 per cent with effect from 1 January 1989, and to 5.6 per cent with effect from 1 January 1990. The additional cost was to be financed in the first instance from savings in Part I of the budget on the understanding that, should this subsequently prove impossible, the Director-General would propose alternative methods of financing at a later stage.

41. At its 241st Session the Governing Body considered progress made by the Working Party on the progressive harmonisation and further development of the Statutes and Rules of the Administrative Tribunals of the ILO (ILOAT) and the United Nations (UNAT). The Working Party would make a series of final recommendations for consideration by the Governing Body once the United Nations General Assembly had taken a final decision on the proposed revisions to the UNAT Statute. The Governing Body also approved the recognition of the jurisdiction of the ILOAT by the International Fund for Agricultural Development. At its 242nd Session the Governing Body decided to submit a resolution concerning the composition of the Tribunal to the International Labour Conference at its present session.

42. The Governing Body examined and took note at its 242nd Session of statistical information regularly submitted on the composition and structure of the ILO staff. It also took note of the report of the Administrative Board of the ILO Staff Pensions Fund. Finally, it considered the adjustment to the salary scale for General Service category officials in Geneva which was due with effect from 1 April 1989 and, although the detailed scales were not yet known, in order to avoid the considerable administrative work and consequential costs of making retroactive payments, authorised the Director-General to implement with effect from 1 April 1989 the revised salary scale and any revised rates of allowances to be established according to the ICSC methodology, which would also be implemented in the other organisations in Geneva.

I. EMPLOYMENT

43. The Committee on Employment of the Governing Body held its second substantive meeting during the Governing Body's 241st Session in November 1988. The Committee held an extensive exchange of views on an Office paper entitled "Training, retraining and labour mobility". This paper, and the subsequent discussion, dealt in general with a broad range of issues relevant to the training and retraining field. The Committee decided that this general discussion should be followed by a more specific discussion on policy initiatives. The Committee accordingly decided to place on the agenda of its next meeting an item entitled "Plan of Action for training, retraining and labour mobility". In addition, the Committee recommended that the Governing Body request the Director-General to explore the possibility of convening a World Conference on Training for Employment.

44. The Committee also held a substantive discussion on an Office paper entitled "Options for future employment growth". This report identified key elements in the relatively successful labour-market performance of certain countries in the difficult period of the 1980s. Based on these case studies, a number of general conclusions emerged concerning the location and nature of jobs being created and the broad policy settings that seemed most conducive to employment expansion. The Committee decided to pursue its discussion on these issues with an item at its next meeting dealing more specifically with the means of ensuring and promoting future employment. As a result of this discussion the Committee included on its agenda for the next meeting an item concerning adjustment, employment and labour market policies.

45. Finally, the Committee briefly discussed follow-up on the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment. The Committee recommended the Governing Body to request the Director-General to contact the heads of the international organisations that had participated in the High-Level Meeting with a view to obtaining information on the measures they had taken or planned to follow up on and implement the conclusions of the High-Level Meeting, and to prepare a paper for discussion by the Committee at its next meeting.

J. SECTORAL ACTIVITIES

46. At its 241st Session the Governing Body decided on the composition of the Fifth Tripartite Technical Meeting for Mines other than Coal Mines and the Third Tripartite Technical Meeting for the Printing and Allied Trades, adopting also a reserve list of countries drawn up on a regional basis. Both meetings were originally scheduled to take place in the 1988-89 biennium. However, the rescheduling of the Tenth Session of the Coal Mines Committee into this biennium made it necessary to postpone the meetings concerning the Printing and Allied Trades and Mines Other than Coal Mines to 1990. At the same session the Governing Body also agreed on the composition of the Joint Meeting on Conditions of Employment and Work of Fire-Fighting Personnel, adopting also a reserve list of countries drawn up on a regional basis. The Governing Body also decided at that session to change the nature and the title of the meeting from a meeting of experts on firemen to a joint meeting on fire-fighting personnel.

47. At its 241st Session the Governing Body further authorised the Director-General to distribute the texts adopted by the Twelfth Session of the Coal Mines Committee (April 1988), with the exception of its resolution (No. 98) concerning peace and disarmament. It also requested him to take the necessary action to give effect to the wishes contained in the texts distributed. The Governing Body also authorised the Director-General to distribute the texts adopted by the Committee on Conditions of Work in the Fishing Industry (May 1988), requesting him to take the necessary action to give effect to the wishes contained in those texts.

48. At the same session the Governing Body took note of the periodic reports on the effect given to the requests of the Third Tripartite Technical Meeting for the Leather and Footwear Industry (December 1985) and the Tenth Session of the Petroleum Committee (April 1986). Finally, the Governing Body authorised the Director-General to invite a number of intergovernmental and non-governmental international organisations to be represented by observers at the Ninth Session of the Committee on Work on Plantations (April 1989), as well as an additional non-governmental organisation to be represented by an observer at the Fourth Session of the Joint Committee on the Public Service (November-December 1988), the original list of such organisations invited to this meeting having been authorised by the Governing Body at its 240th Session (May-June 1988).

K. MULTINATIONAL ENTERPRISES

49. At its 241st Session the Governing Body, as at previous sessions, took note of a report on promotional activities and technical advisory services undertaken by the Office and of a report on completed studies and progress with current research. Another paper concerning follow-up on the Declaration informed the Committee of the number of replies received at that date in respect of the fourth survey on the effect given to the Tripartite Declaration (the deadline for the receipt of replies was set at 28 February 1989). The Committee also discussed a section of that paper concerning the procedure followed when the Committee considered proposed replies to requests for interpretation of the Declaration. This discussion may be resumed by the Committee at a future session.

L. RELATIONS WITH OTHER INTERNATIONAL ORGANISATIONS

50. At its 241st and 242nd Sessions the Governing Body continued to review relations with other international organisations within and outside the United Nations system.

51. It considered the latest developments in the United Nations system of interest to the ILO, including efforts to review the intergovernmental structure and functions of the United Nations in the economic and social fields, and was informed of the transmission to the United Nations Secretary-General of a complaint submitted by the Congress of South African Trade Unions (COSATU) alleging various infringements of ILO standards on freedom of association by the Government of South Africa. The Governing Body also considered the action taken by the Economic and Social Council at its first and second regular sessions in 1988, and by the Oslo Conference on Sustainable Development (Oslo, Norway, 9-10 July 1988), which the Director-General had attended.

52. The Governing Body considered at length the results of the Open-Ended Working Group of the United Nations General Assembly, which is preparing the draft International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and their Family. The Governing Body expressed general satisfaction with the participation of the ILO in the United Nations Working Group, and noted the arrangements that had been made for the participation of the ILO in the Convention's supervisory machinery (without the right to vote). The Governing Body took note of the policy guide-lines for the harmonisation of the activities of the agencies of the United Nations system regarding science and technology for development; of the renewal, for a period of six years, of the Memorandum of Understanding on the International Programme on Chemical Safety by the Executive Heads of the ILO, UNEP and WHO; and of the Annual Overview Report of the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination (ACC) for 1987. It was informed of the action taken by the Director-General in the field of drug-abuse control; it endorsed proposals for future action in this field and requested the Director-General to pursue consultations with other organisations of the United Nations system with a view to achieving an intensified programme of action against the use and abuse of illicit drugs.

53. The Governing Body considered and took note of the action of interest to the ILO taken by the 43rd Session of the United Nations General Assembly. This included, in particular, the resolutions adopted on human rights questions, including the celebration of the 40th anniversary of the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights; the establishment of an Ad Hoc Committee of the Whole for the Preparation of the International Development Strategy for the Fourth United Nations Development Decade; the holding, in 1990, of a special session of the General Assembly devoted to international economic co-operation; the convening in 1992 of a conference on environment and development; an action plan for an International Year of the Family; and the adoption of the Global Strategy for Shelter to the year 2000. It also noted that the General Assembly had decided that the designation "Palestine" should be used in place of the designation "Palestine Liberation Organisation" in the United Nations system, without prejudice to the observer status or functions of the Palestine Liberation Organisation in the United Nations system.

54. The Governing Body considered and took note of ILO co-operation with the WHO in support of the Global Programme on AIDS, and in particular of the result of the ILO/WHO Consultation on AIDS and the Workplace (Geneva, 27-29 June 1988); of the report of the Independent Commission on International Humanitarian Issues; and of the report of the 44th Session of the Commission on Human Rights (Geneva, February-March 1988).

55. The Governing Body considered in depth the ILO's contribution to environmentally sound and sustainable development and decided that document GB.242/IO/6/3, suitably revised to take account of the discussions in the International Organisations Committee and the Governing Body, should be transmitted through ECOSOC to the General Assembly and to the Governing Council of the United Nations Environment Programme as the ILO's response to General Assembly resolutions 42/186 (Environmental Perspective to the Year 2000 and beyond) and 42/187 (Report of the World Commission on Environment and Development).

M. TECHNICAL CO-OPERATION

56. At its 241st Session, through its Committee on Operational Programmes, the Governing Body carried out its annual overall review of ILO operational activities during the previous year (1987), including tripartite participation. It took note of the recent changes in the volume, substance and modalities of executing the programme, which registered an increase in expenditure of 5.6 per cent by comparison with the previous year. During 1987 the size of the programme in the African region increased slightly. The programme devoted to LDCs continued to represent nearly 35 per cent of total ILO expenditure on operational activities. Also significant was the increase in the volume of activities geared towards employers' and workers' organisations (37.2 and 26.3 per cent respectively). Due note was taken of the further measures taken in 1987 with a view to fostering a closer relationship between international labour standards and technical co-operation activities.

57. In accordance with a decision taken at its 240th Session (May-June 1988), the Governing Body's annual review of ILO operational activities also took account of progress achieved in the implementation of the Programme of Action for Africa. It took note of the use made by the Office of the special regular budget allocation for Africa, with was designed, inter alia, to develop a broad-based pipeline programme in the priority areas identified in the programme of action.

58. At its 241st Session the Governing Body examined information on operational activities questions in the United Nations system. In this connection it considered the work of the Consultative Committee on Substantive Questions (Operational Activities - CCSQ/OPS) of the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination (ACC) which met in Geneva from 6 to 8 April 1988; the 35th Session of the UNDP Governing Council; and the second regular session of the Economic and Social Council in 1988. It noted the Office's response, appended to Office paper GB.241/OP/2/2, to General Assembly resolution 42/196, submitted in accordance with a decision taken by the Governing Body at its 239th Session.

59. At its 241st Session the Governing Body took note of the final text of the statute of CIADFOR, which, subject to minor editorial changes, was adopted by the Ministerial Conference held in Côte d'Ivoire in November-December 1987. The final text reflects the modifications requested at earlier sessions of the Governing Body, particularly as regards the representation of employers and workers.

60. At its 241st Session the Governing Body took note of a JIU report on technical co-operation between organisations of the United Nations system and the least developed countries,¹ on which comments of the ACC had been received.

N. STANDING BODIES AND MEETINGS

1. Planning

61. During the period under review, the Governing Body fixed the date, place, agenda and composition of meetings provided for in the programme and budget, took decisions as called for on the membership of standing bodies and appointed delegations to represent it at ILO meetings. It reviewed information submitted by the Director-General on symposia, seminars and similar meetings financed under the regular budget and from extra-budgetary sources.

2. Follow-up

62. At its 242nd Session the Governing Body considered the record of the Seventh African Regional Conference (Harare, 29 November-7 December 1988). It expressed its profound gratitude to the Government of Zimbabwe for the facilities generously provided to the Conference as well as to the Government and to the employers' and workers' organisations of Zimbabwe for the warm hospitality they had extended to the participants at the Conference. It authorised the Director-General to distribute the texts of the conclusions and resolutions adopted by the Conference, requesting him to take the necessary measures with a view to their implementation. These texts dealt with the following topics: rural and urban training; co-operatives; southern Africa and apartheid; economic development and social progress in Africa; the promotion of women workers' activities within the ILO Plan of Action; the protection of the working and general environment in the African region; the respect of human rights and fundamental freedoms; and the financing of delegations to the International Labour Conference.

63. At its 241st Session the Governing Body considered and took note of the report of the Tripartite Symposium on Working Time Issues in Industrialised Countries, held in Geneva from 17-25 October 1988, authorising its distribution.

64. At its 242nd Session the Governing Body considered and took note of the report of the Joint ILO/UNESCO Committee of Experts on the Application of the Recommendation concerning the Status of Teachers (Geneva, 18-27 October 1988). It authorised the Director-General to distribute it and to take into consideration its conclusions in planning future ILO activities, and decided to forward the report to the Conference at its present session for examination by the Committee on the Application of Standards.

3. Invitations to the Conference and other meetings

65. During the period under review the Governing Body authorised the Director-General to invite various intergovernmental and non-governmental international organisations to be represented at the present Conference session and at other ILO meetings. It authorised the Director-General to invite Bermuda, through the Government of the United Kingdom, to send a tripartite observer delegation.

O. INTERNATIONAL CENTRE FOR ADVANCED TECHNICAL AND VOCATIONAL TRAINING (TURIN)

66. At its 241st Session the Governing Body took note of the report on the 47th Session of the Board of the Centre, which was held in Geneva in November 1988. The report was first considered by its Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee. The under-utilisation of the Centre's facilities remained a cause for concern, and the Employers in particular emphasised this problem. One way of improving the situation would be to integrate the Centre's activities more closely with the ILO's technical co-operation activities. All three groups made major statements on the Centre's objectives, requesting that, at its session in May 1989, the Programme Advisory Committee of the Board of the Centre should undertake a highly detailed study of the Centre's future objectives.

67. The Board paid tribute to the work of Mr. Francesco d'Attilia, Director of the Centre, who had devoted his energies to redressing the critical situation faced by the Centre in summer 1987.

68. The Board also examined and approved the programme and budget proposals for 1989, which foresaw a deficit of US$427,000.

P. INTERNATIONAL INSTITUTE FOR LABOUR STUDIES

69. At its 241st Session the Governing Body discussed and took note of the report on the 30th Session of the Board of the Institute, held in November 1988. The main points dealt with in the report concerned the Board's review of the report of the Director regarding the activities of the Institute in 1988, and the Medium-Term Plan of the Institute for 1990-95. The Governing Body also accepted with gratitude a number of grants and contributions to the Institute.

Q. OTHER

70. During the period under review, the Governing Body took note of information supplied in the Director-General's regular reports on the deaths of prominent ILO personalities, the progress of international labour legislation, internal administration and documents and publications issued by the Office.

Appointment of the Conference Drafting Committee

The Selection Committee recommends that, in accordance with the provisions of article 6, paragraph 1 of the Standing Orders, the Conference Drafting Committee should be composed as follows:

The President of the Conference
The Secretary-General of the Conference
Mr. Maupain, Legal Adviser of the Conference
Mr. Sidibé, Director of the International Labour Standards Department.
Mrs. Kellerson, Assistant Legal Adviser of the Conference

Discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General: opening date for the discussion and closing date for the list of speakers

- (a) The Selection Committee has fixed the opening date for the discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General at Thursday, 8 June 1989 and decided that the list of speakers will be closed on Thursday, 15 June at 12 noon, under the usual conditions.
- (b) The Selection Committee proposes that the Conference should remind speakers taking part in the discussion (i) that they must abide strictly by the provisions of the Conference Standing Orders concerning the duration of speeches (maximum 15 minutes), drawing their attention to the arrangements foreseen to ensure that this time-limit is respected and which are described in the "Memorandum on the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference" and the "Note for Delegates"; and (ii) that they are requested to concentrate their remarks on the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General and on the activities of the International Labour Organisation.

Preliminary debate on programme and budget proposals

The Selection Committee has decided that, in accordance with Article 11 bis of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the Conference should hold a brief debate in plenary sitting on Monday morning, 12 June, to examine the draft programme and budget for 1990-91.

Suggestions to facilitate the work of the Conference

(a) Quorum

In the plenary sittings a vote is not valid if the number of votes cast for and against is less than half the number of the delegates attending the Conference and entitled to vote. If there is no quorum on a show of hands, a record vote may have to be taken and this wastes much time.

Over the years, the Governing Body has made a number of recommendations to improve the working of the quorum rule, and it is the practice of the Selection Committee to invite the Conference each year to confirm a number of principles based on those recommendations to ensure the satisfactory working of the quorum rule.

The Selection Committee accordingly invites the Conference to confirm the following principles:

- (i) the quorum will be fixed provisionally, on the basis of the credentials received, in the brief report of the Chairman of the Governing Body on the day before the opening of the session. This provisional quorum will remain unchanged until the Credentials Committee, in the exercise of its functions under article 20, paragraph 1(2) of the Standing Orders, determines the quorum on the basis of registrations, it being understood that, if an important vote were to take place in the initial stages of the Conference (once the Credentials Committee has been appointed), the Conference might request the Credentials Committee to determine the quorum in an urgent report;
- (ii) once the quorum has been determined on the basis of registrations, the usual practice of adjusting it, under the authority of the Credentials Committee, so as to take into account, on the one hand, new registrations and, on the other, notices of departure from delegates leaving the Conference, will continue as in the past;
- (iii) delegates should register immediately on arrival, since the quorum is calculated on the basis of the number of delegates registered;
- (iv) acceptance of appointment as a delegate implies an obligation to be available in Geneva personally or through an adviser authorised to act as a substitute for the work of the Conference until the end, since important votes often take place on the last day;
- (v) delegates who are nevertheless obliged to leave the Conference before it finishes should give notice of their forthcoming departure to the secretariat of the Conference. (The form provided for indicating their date of departure also enables them to authorise an adviser to act and to vote in their place.) At group meetings held during the second half of the Conference the attention of members of the groups will be drawn to the importance of completing and handing in this form;

- (vi) in addition, one Government delegate of a country may report the departure of the other Government delegate, and the Secretaries of the Employers' and Workers' groups may also give notice of the final departure of members of their groups who have not authorised advisers to act in their place;
- (vii) when a record vote is taken in plenary while committees are sitting, delegates are both entitled and expected to leave committees to vote unless they are replaced by a substitute in plenary. Announcements are made in the committees to ensure that all delegates are aware that a record vote is about to take place. Appropriate arrangements will be made for committees meeting in the ILO building.

In arranging the programme of work of the Conference, the Selection Committee will endeavour to ensure that matters which require the holding of votes come before the Conference at the earliest possible moment. The plan of work for Committees endorsed by the Selection Committee takes this requirement into account.

(b) Punctuality

As in previous years, the Selection Committee recommends the Conference to ask committee chairmen to start proceedings very punctually - except where a technical section has not yet completed its preliminary discussions - irrespective of the number of persons present, but on condition that votes will not be taken unless a quorum is clearly present.

(c) Negotiations

In order to facilitate more continuous negotiation in committees between the different groups, it is the practice for representatives of each group to meet with the chairman and reporter of the committee and with the representative of the Secretary-General, whenever this is desirable, to ensure that the leaders of each group know fully the minds of their colleagues in the other groups; normally such meetings are held before each group has committed itself to a definite position. The function of these informal meetings is to afford opportunities for a fuller understanding of differences of view before definite positions have crystallised.

The Selection Committee recommends the Officers of the Conference committees to continue the above-mentioned practice.

Participation in Conference committees by Members having lost the right to vote

At its 239th Session (February-March 1988), the Governing Body considered the implications of the appointment, as regular members of Conference committees, of representatives of a member State which had lost the right to vote under article 13.4 of the Constitution of the ILO, having regard to the recent increase in the number of States in this position. It noted that, while the appointment of employers' and workers' representatives from such a State had no practical implications because the employers' and workers' groups operated an effective system under article 56, paragraph 5(b) of the Conference Standing Orders for ensuring that deputy members of a committee voted in the place of regular members deprived of the right to vote, the same was not true of the Government group. As a result, if a Government that has lost the right to vote is appointed a regular member of a committee, the distribution of votes among the three groups is distorted because the weighting of votes is based on the full regular membership and in practice the Government regular members of committees who are unable to vote do not make use of the possibility afforded by Article 56, paragraph 5(a) of appointing a deputy member to vote in their place.

The Governing Body noted that, in order to avoid such distortions, the practice had been followed by members of the Government group at the 73rd and 74th Sessions of the Conference in 1987 of not applying for regular membership of committees if they were not at the time in question entitled to vote.

The Governing Body accordingly recommended that this practice should be continued, and that, should it for any reason not be fully respected, the weighting coefficients in committees should be calculated on the basis of the number of Government members entitled to vote. It reconfirmed this principle again at its 241st Session (November 1988).

The Selection Committee accordingly recommends to the Conference that the calculation of weighting co-efficients for votes in committees should be based on the number of regular Government members entitled to vote.

Plan of work of Conference committees

The Selection Committee endorsed a plan of work for committees, which is not binding but will enable them in organising their work to take maximum possible account of the overall needs and possibilities of the Conference. The plan is appended in tabular form for the information of the Conference.

Appointment of members of the Appeals Board panel

At its 43rd Session (1959), the Conference adopted proposals relating to the procedure for the appointment of committees.

In accordance with section III, paragraph 5(a) of those proposals, the Governing Body is required to recommend a panel of five persons of internationally recognised independence and impartiality for appointment by the Conference and from which, prior to every session of the Conference, the Governing Body appoints an Appeals Board of three persons.

The Selection Committee transmits the following proposals of the Governing Body to the Conference:

to reappoint Mr Paul Gottret to the panel from which the members of the Conference Appeals Board are selected, for a period of three years expiring on 30 June 1991; to appoint Mr. J. Calero Rodrigues to the panel for a period of three years expiring on 8 June 1992.

The Employers' members took no part in the decision on this matter.

RAPPORTS DE LA COMMISSION DE PROPOSITION

NEUVIEME RAPPORT

Demande de représentation à la Conférence présentée par la Communauté internationale bahá'ie

A sa cinquième séance tenue le mercredi 14 juin 1989, la Commission de proposition avait à son ordre du jour, parmi d'autres questions, une demande de représentation à la 76e session (1989) de la Conférence internationale du Travail présentée par une organisation internationale non gouvernementale, la Communauté internationale bahá'ie. Le document soumis à la commission sur cette question indiquait que cette organisation présentait une telle demande pour la première fois et donnait, à l'usage des membres de la commission et conformément à la pratique habituelle, un résumé des informations émanant de la Communauté internationale bahá'ie sur ses objectifs et sa structure.

Sur cette base la Commission de proposition a recommandé, sans débat, à la Conférence que la Communauté internationale bahá'ie soit invitée à être représentée à la 76ème session de la Conférence internationale du Travail conformément à l'article 2, paragraphe 3j), du Règlement de la Conférence.

A la seizième séance de la Conférence, le jeudi 15 juin 1989, le Président de la Commission de proposition a présenté le sixième rapport de la Commission de proposition (CRP 4E) comportant, entre autres, cette recommandation. Au cours du débat qui suivit cette présentation plusieurs orateurs ont demandé que la demande présentée par la Communauté internationale bahá'ie soit rejetée. Le Président du groupe des travailleurs a demandé à ce que, dans la perspective d'un vote, une information plus substantielle sur la Communauté internationale bahá'ie soit fournie à la Conférence; parlant au nom de son groupe, il a par ailleurs demandé qu'au cas où l'on procéderait à un vote sur cette question le vote ait lieu au scrutin secret en application des dispositions de l'article 19 du Règlement de la Conférence. Compte tenu de l'ensemble des interventions faites dans le débat sur le sixième rapport de la Commission de proposition, le Président de la Conférence a proposé que cette question soit renvoyée à la Commission de proposition pour un plus ample examen, le reste du sixième rapport de la Commission étant adopté. Il en a été ainsi décidé.

A sa sixième séance, la commission a examiné, sur la base du document CP/D.9, la situation qui a découlé de la décision prise par le Président de la Conférence de renvoyer à nouveau cette question à la commission.

Au cours de la discussion, des doutes ont été exprimés quant à la pertinence d'un nouvel examen par la commission d'une recommandation qu'elle a déjà adoptée. Dans le même temps, des opinions divergentes ont également été exprimées sur l'opportunité d'accepter la demande présentée par l'organisation en question.

A sa septième séance la commission a été saisie du projet de point appelant une décision suivant proposé par le Président avec l'accord des autres membres du bureau:

"La Commission de proposition voudra sans doute décider:

- "a) en conformité avec la déclaration faite par le Président de la Conférence, à la suite de la discussion du sixième rapport de la Commission de proposition, d'annexer au prochain rapport qu'elle soumettra à la Conférence, les informations qui figurent dans l'annexe au document CP/D.9;
- b) d'inviter la Conférence à se prononcer le mercredi 21 juin, à 15 heures, sur la recommandation de la commission relative à l'organisation en question qui figure dans son sixième rapport (Compte rendu provisoire n° 4E)".

Dans la discussion qui a suivi plusieurs orateurs y compris les représentants des gouvernements de la Chine et de l'Inde, ont fait observer que les informations fournies par la Communauté internationale bahá'ie contenaient des erreurs sur la désignation des pays et territoires mentionnés, ce qui a été reconnu par le Président. D'autres orateurs ont estimé que ces informations comportaient des inexactitudes sur la nature de cette organisation. A cet égard il a été regretté que les informations fournies à la commission et figurant dans le document, ne proviennent que d'une seule source, et des réserves ont été exprimées sur ce point.

Plusieurs membres de la commission, en particulier les représentants des gouvernements du Koweït et de la République islamique d'Iran ont également estimé que les objectifs de la Communauté internationale baha'ie étaient sans rapport avec ceux de l'Organisation internationale du Travail et que, pour cette raison, il n'y avait pas lieu de l'inviter à être représentée à la Conférence.

Un certain nombre de membres de la commission, notamment le membre travailleur du Soudan et les membres gouvernemental et employeur du Koweït ont estimé qu'il incombait à la Commission elle-même de se prononcer clairement sur la question de l'invitation de cette organisation sans la renvoyer à la Conférence.

Le membre gouvernemental de la Jamahiriya arabe libyenne a alors proposé les amendements suivants au projet de point pour décision proposé par le Président afin de tenir compte des diverses objections opposées par certains membres de la commission: ajouter à la fin de l'alinéa a) : " ... et dont la validité a été contestée par de nombreuses délégations"; et modifier le libellé de l'alinéa b) comme suit: "A la lumière des objections opposées par diverses délégations à la demande de la Communauté internationale bahá'ie, d'inviter la Conférence à se prononcer le mercredi 21 juin, à 15 heures, sur cette demande".

Le représentant des Etats-Unis a estimé, à cet égard, que l'on devrait s'en tenir à la recommandation initiale de la commission.

Le représentant du gouvernement de la République islamique d'Iran a estimé qu'il pourrait être nuisible de prendre une décision sur cette question à cette session de la Conférence.

Il a été rappelé que le Président du groupe des travailleurs de la Conférence avait annoncé que, au cas où l'on procéderait à un vote sur la question, celui-ci devrait avoir lieu au scrutin secret en application de l'article 19, paragraphe 11, du Règlement de la Conférence.

La commission a alors adopté les amendements suivants proposés par le représentant du gouvernement de la Jamahiriya arabe libyenne:

La Commission de proposition décide:

- a) en conformité avec la déclaration faite par le Président de la Conférence, à la suite de la discussion du sixième rapport de la Commission de proposition, d'annexer au prochain rapport qu'elle soumettra à la Conférence, les informations fournies par la Communauté internationale bahá'ie, dont la validité a été contestée par de nombreuses délégations;
- b) Compte tenu des objections opposées par diverses délégations à la demande de la Communauté internationale bahá'ie, d'inviter la Conférence à se prononcer le mercredi 21 juin, à 15 heures, sur cette demande.

Demande de représentation à la Conférence présentée par une organisation internationale non gouvernementale.

La Commission de proposition recommande à la Conférence d'inviter l'Union syndicale européenne de la fonction publique locale et régionale à se faire représenter à la 76e session de la Conférence, conformément à l'article 2, paragraphe 3 j), du Règlement de la Conférence.

Fondée en 1844. Cette organisation réunit des adeptes de la foi bahá'ie, religion mondiale indépendante fondée en Perse (aujourd'hui, République islamique d'Iran) par Mirza Husayn-'Ali (1817-1892), connu sous le nom de Báha'u'llah, la Gloire de Dieu. La foi Bahá'ie est intimement liée à la foi Babi, fondée en 1844 par Mirza'Ali-Muhammad (1819-1850) connu sous le nom de Báb qui a annoncé l'imminent avènement du prophète (Messager de Dieu), prédit par toutes les religions du monde; en 1863, Baha'u'llah a déclaré être le prophète annoncé. Après avoir été banni à plusieurs reprises, il est arrivé en Terre Sainte où il est décédé. Il a désigné son fils aîné Abdul'l-Baha (1844-1921), pour lui succéder à la tête de la Communauté Bahá'ie et pour interpréter les Ecrits Baha'i. Abdu'l-Baha a désigné, à son tour, l'aîné de ses petits fils, Shoghi Effendi (1896-1957), pour lui succéder comme Gardien de la Cause et comme interprète autorisé des enseignements baha'i.

Buts. A travers les enseignements de la religion Baha'ie, l'organisation vise à promouvoir l'unité de la race humaine, en éliminant les préjugés fondés sur la race, la classe et la religion; à proclamer l'unité de la religion et l'unicité de Dieu; à prôner la recherche indépendante de la vérité, l'harmonie de la science et de la religion, l'éducation universelle obligatoire, l'égalité entre les hommes et les femmes, une juste solution des problèmes économiques, une langue auxiliaire internationale, un tribunal universel et l'union des nations.

Structure. L'organisation est gérée par une "Universal House of Justice" - Maison universelle de justice, composée de neuf membres. La "Maison" est établie au Centre mondial baha'i, "Baha'i World Centre" et est élue tous les cinq ans selon une procédure fixée dans les écrits de Baha'u'llah. Elle compte également des assemblées spirituelles nationales et locales, élues annuellement. Personnel: il est composé de 350 personnes travaillant au Centre mondial. Financement: l'organisation est financée par les seules contributions volontaires de ses membres inscrits.

Statut consultatif. ECOSOC; FISE. L'organisation entretient des relations de travail avec l'OMS. Elle coopère avec la FAO; le PNUD; et le PNUE. Relations ONG: l'organisation est membre de la Conférence des organisations non gouvernementales ayant le statut consultatif auprès du Conseil économique et social des Nations Unies, du Centre de liaison pour l'environnement CLE, du Conseil international HABITAT, du Comité d'organisations non gouvernementales auprès du FISE, et du Comité spécial des ONG internationales pour les droits de l'homme.

Activités. Rassemblement, classification et publication de textes sacrés baha'i; entretien des sanctuaires baha'i et des lieux saints au Centre mondial baha'i; dotations internationales. Mise en oeuvre de programmes mondiaux pour l'expansion et le développement des communautés baha'ie en vue d'améliorer la qualité de la vie par le renforcement spirituel et moral, y compris par le recours aux grands moyens d'information, à des conférences, des instituts et des écoles baha'ie. L'organisation se préoccupe des questions ayant trait aux droits de l'homme, au développement économique et social, à la condition de la femme, à l'environnement, aux établissements humains, à l'alimentation mondiale, à la science et à la technologie, à la démographie, à la prévention de la délinquance, à la toxicomanie, aux jeunes, aux enfants, à la famille, à la paix et au désarmement. Les relations entre la Communauté internationale baha'ie et l'Organisation des Nations Unies remontent à 1948. Une nouvelle Maison de culte, destinée au sous-continent indien, a été consacrée le 24 décembre 1986. Evénements annuels: Journée mondiale de l'unité des races, Journée mondiale de la paix, Journée mondiale des religions. Provisional Record

First sitting

Wednesday, 7 June 1989, 10.15 a.m.

Presidents: Mr. Mensah, Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and Mr. Nkomo

OPENING OF THE SESSION

Interpretation from French: Mr. MENSAH (Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office) – On this solemn occasion which has brought us together for the opening of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference, I should first of all like in my capacity as Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, to wish a very warm welcome to all the tripartite delegations present in this room of the Palais des Nations which represent States Members of the International Labour Organisation, observers, international governmental and non-governmental organisations, and all those who, in one way or another, will undoubtedly contribute to the success of this international meeting.

I should also like to welcome the representatives of the Republic and Canton of Geneva who receive us here every year and also the representatives of the Swiss Confederation. Finally, I should like to welcome the members of the press, television and radio who give a skilful account of the work of this Organisation to the outside world, in particular to the world of labour.

I cannot declare open this session of the Conference without welcoming first of all our new Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, who is present here at the rostrum and who was brilliantly elected by the Governing Body at its 242nd Session on 13 February 1989. Mr Hansenne is not a newcomer as far as many of you are concerned. In his capacity as Belgian Minister of Labour from 1981 to 1988, he has already on several occasions addressed the Conference in a dynamic and well-informed manner. I am convinced that, like his predecessor, Mr. Francis Blanchard, he will ensure that the ILO does not fail in its vocation as a champion of social policy, to paraphrase his own words, and I am sure he will stamp the activities of our Organisation with his characteristic enthusiasm and rigour. I wish him every success in his post and should like to assure him, on your behalf and with your permission, of our support and extend to him a very warm welcome.

Like its predecessors, this session of the Conference has to accomplish a considerable amount of work. Its importance will be emphasised by the visit tomorrow from the distinguished Head of State of our host country, the President of the Swiss Confederation, Mr. Jean-Pascal Delamuraz. We are awaiting his address with impatience. At the same time, we shall be celebrating the 70th anniversary of the foundation of this Organisation, which shall give us an opportunity to review the work that has been accomplished and, I hope, to look to the future with confidence in the value and the vitality of our institution.

Knowing its problems, its working methods and its achievements, I am convinced more than ever of the Organisation's capacity and potential for constructive action in coping with problems which are becoming ever more acute in the world of labour. The work that has been accomplished since its foundation deserves to be recorded in the annals of history, but what we hope to achieve in the future is also rich in promise, providing that we are all capable of using the opportunities afforded us by our Organisation with discernment and efficiency.

In conformity with usual practice, at the plenary sessions, you will have to examine the Director-General's Report concerning the ILO's activities in 1988 as well as the Report of the Governing Body which I shall have the honour of presenting to you tomorrow.

Part I of the Director-General's Report this year is entitled Recovery and employment. Drawing on the conclusions of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment, held in November 1987, it outlines an approach to international economic problems which is likely to provide for an effective implementation of structural adjustment, a resumption of growth and a greater degree of social justice.

Emphasising the fundamental link which exists between economic and social matters and their complementarity, it advocates various measures which would lead to a correction of present imbalances and to the promotion of an employment generating process. In fact – and I quote – “the main lesson learnt during this decade is that without growth it is very difficult to tackle social problems”. The priority task is therefore to re-establish our capacity for growth, but this growth must combat poverty and must also lead to employment. This may appear as self-evident, but experience has also shown us that growth does not automatically guarantee the attainment of social objectives. Therefore, today, we have to find the means to overcome the serious imbalances which exist in the world economy while guaranteeing more dynamic and equitable growth. It is becoming more and more clear that in order to take up this real challenge, the creation of employment must be a priority objective in any development and adjustment policy. This objective has tended to be lost from sight over the last few years. The Director-General's Report invites us once again to emphasise the social and human purposes of any economic policy.

If the ILO stresses the need for economic development, it does not do so to overreach its mandate, but because of the repercussions which this growth has, from the human point of view, on workers' rights, protection, well-being and remuneration, and because it takes into account the great importance of the efforts made and the role played by human beings in this growth.

The ILO, just like other international organisations which deal with economic and social development, has an important role to play in the elaboration of the International Development Strategy for the Fourth United Nations Development Decade. Everyone agrees that one of this Strategy's important objectives is to mitigate poverty, which is hard to envisage without the stimulation of employment. Many signs lead us to believe that we should contribute to putting the human being back at the centre of development.

While we do not have any special responsibility in economic and financial matters, it is nevertheless clear that as a tripartite Organisation we must continue to focus our attention on the fundamental problems which humanity is facing if we are to develop the world economy and the community of man.

The other reports which the Director-General has submitted to you for your examination also bear witness to this same concern with placing the human being at the centre of all ILO activities, namely the report on the situation of the workers of the occupied Arab territories and the Special Report of the Director-General on the application of the Declaration concerning action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia. Whatever our political and ideological convictions may be, I am confident that we all share an abhorrence of racial discrimination; above all when it takes extreme forms. Every form of progress, however limited it is, which we may achieve through dialogue to bring about better understanding amongst peoples, will contribute to eroding the wall of incomprehension and hatred which makes man his own enemy.

I would also like to draw to your attention the fact that this year, on your agenda, you have three questions which are to lead to the preparation of international instruments.

The first, that is the partial revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107), aims at promoting the full achievement of the social, economic and cultural rights of those peoples, who constitute the largest disadvantaged group in the world (roughly 300 million people), helping them to preserve their cultural identity and to live according to their own traditions and ways of life. This is a crucial issue in vast areas of the world and I have no doubt that we shall strive successfully, with wisdom and compassion, to give these men and these women the means to live better and above all to live in dignity.

The question of night work, as well as that of safety in the use of chemical substances at work, will also give rise to an important discussion; I am firmly convinced that the instruments, which are due to be adopted next year as a result of these deliberations, will considerably contribute to the improvement of the working conditions of the workers they set out to protect.

However, and I would like to remind you of this, standards only have value to the extent that they are truly implemented and applied by the countries which ratified them. The Committee on the Application of Standards, which will examine cases brought to its attention, will try once again this year not to set itself up as a tribunal but to help States to have a better understanding of the implications of ratification of standards, which are voluntarily accepted, and to assist them to apply these instruments more effectively.

As in other years you have also received a certain number of draft resolutions which deal with major topical problems. How can I fail to mention that certain important activities of the ILO originated in resolutions adopted by the Conference. Two of them spring immediately to mind; the Programme of Action for Africa and the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment. This bears witness to the fact that the work of the Resolutions Committee can enrich the Organisation's programme if its work concentrates on the major social problems which fall within our mandate.

Finally, the Conference will also be called upon to examine the draft programme and budget for the 1990-91 biennium, which constitutes the cornerstone of the future activities of our Organisation. It will be called upon to take a final decision on the proposal that the member States' contributions to the budget will be in Swiss francs in the future, the currency in which most of the expenditure of the Organisation takes place. The draft which has been submitted to you was adopted after a very thorough debate and unanimously, which is a very rare occurrence and augers well for the future of this Organisation. It was adopted at the 242nd Session of the Governing Body which I had the honour to chair. I would like to invite you to devote the greatest possible attention to this document and to adopt it with the same degree of unanimity.

The task before you is therefore complex and three weeks will not be too long a period in which to conclude this work.

Before closing, I should like to remind you about an important event which took place last year; as an African, it gives me particular pleasure to mention it. I am speaking of the Seventh African Regional Conference, held in Harare in Zimbabwe from 29 November to 7 December 1988. This Conference, which brought together many representatives of governments, employers and workers from African countries, made it possible for the Organisation to deal seriously with the fundamental problems of economic and social development in Africa, focusing its attention on certain major problems such as women's work, rural and urban training and co-operatives. These discussions placed great emphasis on the need to deal with these problems in a co-ordinated manner. They also stressed the need for the African countries themselves – but also for the ILO – to mobilise the continent's immense human potential in order to tackle constructively and decisively the enormous economic and social problems prevailing in Africa.

Time is pressing; I should therefore like to invite you to commence our work without further delay.

My colleagues from the Governing Body join with me in wishing you every success in achieving fruitful results at this international meeting.

It is with these words of good wishes and encouragement that, in my capacity as Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office,

I declare solemnly open the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference.

ELECTION OF THE PRESIDENT

Interpretation from French: Mr. MENSAH (Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office) – Following this introductory speech we will now proceed to the next item on our agenda – the election of the President of the Conference.

For this purpose I would like to ask whether there are any nominations?

I call on Mr. Karikurubu, Minister of Labour and Vocational Training, Burundi.

Mr. KARIKURUBU (Minister of Labour and Vocational Training, Burundi) – The Burundian delegation has the honour and the privilege to propose on behalf of the African group the candidature of the Honourable John L. Nkomo, Minister of Labour, Manpower Planning and Social Welfare of Zimbabwe, as the President of the Conference.

Here is the curriculum vitae of the Honourable Minister of Labour, Manpower Planning and Social Welfare of the Republic of Zimbabwe.

He was born on 22 August 1934. He has a diploma in teaching and another diploma in finance. He is a life-long trade unionist in the textile industry and a leader of the teachers' union. During the liberation struggle he was a member of the African National Congress. He was also member of the Central Committee of PF/ZAPU from 1963 till today and he was a restricted person for three-and-a-half years. During the independence talks of his country, Zimbabwe, he was a delegate to the Geneva Southern Rhodesia constitutional talks in 1976. He was also delegate to the Malta constitutional talks in 1977. He participated in the Lancaster House independence talks in 1977 which led to independence elections in 1980. Following independence, he was first elected to Parliament in 1980. He was then appointed Minister of Industry and Technology in 1981. In 1984 he became a backbencher and in 1985 he was re-elected to Parliament. He played a crucial role in the unity agreement between the two major parties, PF/ZAPU and ZANU. In 1987 he was appointed Minister of Labour, Manpower Planning and Social Welfare, and in 1988 he was elected chairman of the Seventh African Regional Conference of the ILO.

Mr. KGABO (Minister of Labour and Home Affairs, Botswana) – It is a great privilege for me to second the nomination of the Honourable John Nkomo, Minister of Labour, Manpower Planning and Social Welfare of Zimbabwe, to the presidency of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. We could not have hoped for a better candidate to guide the discussions of this Conference.

The Honourable John Nkomo has behind him wide knowledge and experience to enable him to guide this Conference. A teacher by profession, learned in the field of finance, a trade unionist, a liberator of his own country, Zimbabwe, and now a politician and a cabinet minister, Mr. Nkomo has on many occasions lead Zimbabwe's delegations to various international conferences; and his recent presidency of two ILO conferences, namely the Tripartite Conference on Action against Apartheid, held in May 1988, and the Seventh African Regional Conference, held in November-December 1988, both in Harare, speak volumes of his capabilities. On the basis of the above, I, in my capacity as Chairman of the Southern African Labour Commission (SALC), have no doubt that the Honourable John Nkomo will diligently lead the proceedings of this Conference, and I personally wish him success.

Interpretation from French: Mr. OECHSLIN (Employers' delegate, France) – On behalf of all the Employers' delegates that I have consulted, I can confidently say that it is my great pleasure to support the candidature of Mr. John Nkomo, Minister of Labour, Manpower Planning and Social Welfare of the Republic of Zimbabwe, as President of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference.

I will not dwell on Mr. Nkomo's role in his country's independence movement nor his parliamentary and ministerial career since 1980. I would prefer simply to bear witness to what I myself have seen. Having personally had the privilege of participating in the Seventh African Regional Conference in Harare, chaired by Mr. Nkomo, I can tell you of his talent, his impartiality and his dedication. Having furthermore briefly visited his country, I can also bear witness to the social concern of its leaders and the consideration shown to employers' and workers' organisations. The Employers therefore have no hesitation in supporting the proposal by our colleagues, the representatives of Burundi and Botswana, on behalf of the African governments.

Interpretation from German: Mr. MUHR (Workers' delegate, Federal Republic of Germany) – The Workers' Group was extremely pleased to learn of the African region's proposal that Mr. John Nkomo, Minister for Labour, Manpower Planning and Social Welfare of Zimbabwe, should be elected as President of the International Labour Conference this year. Not only have our African friends known Mr. Nkomo for many years and admired his activities in his own country, many of us have also seen him here at the International Labour Office on many occasions and witnessed his activities in Africa. It was my pleasure and honour, under his chairmanship, to lead the Workers' Group at the Tripartite Conference on Action against Apartheid in Harare in May last year and I was able to appreciate his human and political qualities at that time. One of his qualities, which also marked him out for the presidency of this Conference, was his ability to smooth things over when necessary – and this I am sure will be an invaluable asset for this Conference.

We would be pleased to work under Mr. Nkomo's presidency of this Conference and promise him the full support of the Workers' Group in his responsible activity. I am sure that under his leadership this session of the Conference will be a success.

Mr. RODGER (Minister of Labour, New Zealand) – On behalf of the Asian governments I support the nomination for President of Mr. Nkomo, Minister of Labour, Manpower Planning and Social Welfare of Zimbabwe. Mr. Nkomo is very well qualified for this position. He has experience of the trade union movement, of industry and of government, and of course he is already well-known by the delegates here who have had the pleasure of working with him at recent ILO Conferences. I had the honour of nominating Mr. Nkomo to preside over the British Commonwealth Labour Ministers Conference. He undertook that task with dignity and great effectiveness. I am sure that he would do the same here for this much larger Conference. The Asian governments group has no hesitation in warmly supporting his nomination.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. LAZO (Government delegate, Chile) – On behalf of the governments of the Americas' group, it is for me a great honour to express our support for the candidature of the distinguished Minister of Labour, Manpower Planning and Social Welfare of Zimbabwe, Mr. Nkomo, to the presidency of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference.

The qualities of Mr. Nkomo and his experience in trade union, parliamentary and governmental posts, and also his international career, particularly within our Organisation, are the best guarantees that under his presidency we will be able to achieve the considerable goals that we have set for ourselves. We wish his administration the best possible success and Mr. Nkomo may be assured that the Americas' group will lend him its very loyal co-operation.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. VAJNAR (Government delegate, Czechoslovakia) – On behalf of the governments of the socialist countries of Eastern Europe, I have the honour to support the proposal put forward by the African countries that we should elect to the presidency of this Session of the International Labour Conference the Minister of Labour, Manpower Planning and Social Welfare of Zimbabwe, Mr. Nkomo.

I am sure it is not necessary for me to repeat what we know about all the important humanitarian qualities of Mr. Nkomo because they have already been described in detail by previous speakers.

We very much appreciate his competence with regard to labour and social matters and his very rich experience acquired in his parliamentary activities and at international meetings.

Mr. Nkomo is someone we also know from his active participation in the International Labour Organisation's activities. Under his chairmanship, there was a successful end to the ILO's Tripartite Conference on Action against Apartheid and Seventh African Regional Conference.

We are sure that his experience, his qualifications and his devotion to the ILO are sufficient guarantee of the fact that under the presidency of Mr. Nkomo this present session of the International Labour Conference will be successful and will achieve specific and positive results.

We would like to assure Mr. Nkomo that we will support him in his very responsible post. He will be able to count fully on the support and co-operation of the group of countries for whom I am speaking now.

Mr. HEWITT (Government adviser, United Kingdom) – On behalf of the governments of Western Europe, I am pleased to support the nomination as President of this Conference of Mr. Nkomo, the Honourable Minister of Labour, Manpower Planning and Social Welfare of the Republic of Zimbabwe. Mr. Nkomo has a long and distinguished record in the development of Zimbabwe, most notably his contribution to the Lancaster House negotiations in London which led directly to Zimbabwe's independence, and more recently as Minister of Labour of Zimbabwe. Mr. Nkomo is a politician whose name is well known, not only throughout Africa, but more widely around the world. He also has a special place within the Commonwealth, serving this year as Chairman of Commonwealth Labour Ministers. There is no doubt about his qualities. I am sure he will bring to the proceedings of this Conference the same dignity, sagacity and concern for the interests of all groups and participants which he displayed in his good chairmanship of the ILO's Seventh African Regional Conference in Harare last year. We wish him well in his guidance of the Conference and I guarantee him the support of the governments of Western Europe in that task.

Mr. CHIHANA (representative of Southern African Trade Union Co-ordination Council) – Perhaps I should not have spoken because my leader, Gerd Muhr, has already spoken, but I want you to take it as an innovation that I should add the voice of the southern African workers to that of Mr. Muhr.

I am adding my voice, and more importantly, the voice of the Southern African Trade Union Co-ordination Council to the felicitations already expressed in happily and heartily congratulating the Honourable John Nkomo, Minister of Labour, Manpower Planning and Social Welfare of the Republic of Zimbabwe, on his very deserved candidature for the presidency of this 76th Session of the International Labour Conference.

In SATUCC we do not take Mr. Nkomo's election for granted. We strongly believe that the Honourable Nkomo deserves to be elected to this high office and we do not even intend to embarrass him when I say that in SATUCC we consider Mr. Nkomo as an African and a high priest of tripartism, the very foundation and character of the International Labour Organisation. In pursuit of his beliefs and commitment to the work of the ILO, the Honourable John Nkomo, to whom the workers in southern Africa are deeply indebted, was extremely instrumental in changing the character of the Southern African Labour Commission from an exclusively governmental organisation of labour ministers to a fully tripartite one, and perhaps the only subregion to be tripartite. Our gratitude is therefore no platitude or pleasantry but a deep appreciation of the minister's commitment to the work of the ILO. Indeed, no candidate, and of course no president can any more ably exemplify the very character of the ILO than the Honourable Nkomo. We therefore wholly support his candidature.

Interpretation from Arabic: Mr. MOUBARAK (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Iraq) – I have the honour and privilege, on my own behalf and on behalf of the Arab group as a whole, governments, workers and trade unions, to second the candidature of Mr. J.L. Nkomo, Minister of Labour in Zimbabwe, to hold the office of President of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference; this is a very important session, during which we will be celebrating the 70th anniversary of the ILO.

The Arab group seconds this candidature because it is confident of the experience of Mr. Nkomo, who has proved himself on more than one important occasion under the auspices of the ILO, including the chairmanship of the Tripartite Conference on Action against Apartheid, as well as the presidency of the Seventh African Regional Conference. All these are proof that he will be most able to steer our deliberations. We second his candidature also because he is a son of the sister nation of Zimbabwe, which is currently chairing the non-aligned movement in its steadfast struggle against the apartheid regime and which was a paragon for peoples struggling for freedom and independence. Mr. Nkomo is a son of Africa, the continent which we love and respect.

I do not want to be lengthy, I would like simply to stress that the unanimous support of the Arab group is a translation of the sentiments of love and respect we hold for his country and a sign of our respect for his own competence and experience.

Interpretation from French: Mr. MENSAH (Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office) - I observe that Mr. John Nkomo is the only candidate who has been proposed and you have all heard the support that his candidature has been given. May I take it that Mr. John Nkomo has been elected as President of this Conference?

Your applause I think has clearly shown that Mr. John Nkomo has been elected. I would like to congratulate him most warmly and I would like to ask the Head of Protocol of the ILO to be kind enough to accompany Mr. John Nkomo to the President's chair.

(Mr. Nkomo, Minister of Labour, Manpower Planning and Social Welfare of Zimbabwe, is elected President and takes the chair.)

PRESIDENTIAL ADDRESS

The PRESIDENT - The Under-Secretary General of the United Nations and Director-General of the United Nations Office in Geneva, the Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, the Secretary-General of the International Labour Conference, Your Excellencies, distinguished delegates, ladies and gentlemen:

I wish to express my profound gratitude for being elected to the esteemed office of President of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. It is in fact a great honour which you have bestowed, not only upon me but also upon the Government and the people of Zimbabwe. I am sure you are fully acquainted with the great importance that Zimbabwe, as current Chairman of the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries, attaches to the laudable activities of the International Labour Organisation. It is my humble belief, then, that this collective strength will be a source of inspiration to me during the coming three weeks.

Allow me to voice my pleasure at the trust and confidence shown in me by all the different geographical regions, as well as by the Workers' and Employers' Groups. I should also like to express my thanks for the kind remarks made by Mr. Karikuru, Minister of Labour and Vocational Training of Burundi, who proposed my nomination; Mr. Kgabo, Minister of Labour and Home Affairs of Botswana; Mr. Oechslin, spokesman of the Employers' Group;

Mr. Muhr, spokesman of the Workers' Group; Mr. Rodger, Minister of Labour of New Zealand, on behalf of the Asian group; Mr. Lazo, Government delegate of Chile, on behalf of the Americas; Mr. Vajnar, Government delegate of Czechoslovakia, on behalf of the Eastern European group; Mr. Hewitt, Government advisor of the United Kingdom, on behalf of the Western European group; Mr. Chihana, Executive Secretary of the Southern African Trade Union Co-ordination Council; and Mr. Moubarak, Minister of Labour and Social Affairs of Iraq, on behalf of the Arab group.

This generous and unanimous support definitely augurs well for our work. On my part, I should like to reciprocate this trust and confidence you have reposed in me by pledging to execute the challenging tasks of this office to the best of my knowledge and ability.

However, the success of this Conference will very much depend on your active participation and co-operation. It is therefore of vital importance for us to adopt a constructive and active attitude, and in that vein I appeal to all the distinguished delegates to put the business of the Conference in the uppermost part of their minds.

I am also hopeful that the Conference will deal conclusively with the items on the agenda. My hope rests on the knowledge that our basic goal and that of this Conference are one and the same, the principal aim being that of improving mutual co-operation in a progressive and positive way. Indeed, our common desire to improve the well-being of our peoples through collective action has been the foundation of a common political will which gives the ILO its credibility as well as its moral authority in an otherwise turbulent world.

The ILO has scored notable achievements in those areas covered by its mandate, such as working conditions, employment promotion, human resources development, rehabilitation of the disabled, social security, occupational safety and workers' education. All these positive strides are a product of the tried and tested principle of tripartism, which fosters general cooperation and is also the cornerstone of the ILO working structure. The approach that brings together all social partners, namely governments, employers and workers, must of necessity enhance the decision-making process. Consequently decisions thus taken are more likely to be objective, fair and accommodative of the divergent interests of all the concerned parties. In that spirit, I would urge all the members to respect this principle of tripartism in their deliberations.

This 76th Session of the International Labour Conference is taking place in a complex and changing international setting. Whilst we welcome the growing relaxation of tension in international politics, the world economic crisis continues to give us cause for concern. It is against this background that the ILO has to fulfil its tasks and adapt to the changing character of interdependence in the world economy.

It will not be an exaggeration to say that hunger, abject poverty and the fast growing gap between the haves and the have-nots continue to cast a dark shadow over the celebration of the ILO's 70 years of existence. If the governments of the world do not now begin to seriously focus on these pressing socio-economic problems, then I am afraid that we have to brace ourselves for a disaster of untold proportions.

Without continuing high-level political involvement and active support from all of us, the future would be very bleak indeed.

The Director-General's Report which is before us is a highly informative document. It accurately describes the current global economic situation and its effect on the general level of employment and employment development. It points out future trends and key areas requiring concerted attention and action. I think the Report forms a sound basis for identifying and addressing the problems that confront the ILO and for conceptualising the way forward. It correctly focuses on the perennial issues of economic recovery and the creation of employment opportunities.

The major concern of this Conference should, therefore, be to find ways and means of initiating definitive practical programmes that can absorb and productively utilise the excess labour so abundantly available in our countries and put our economies back on a healthy footing. In this regard, I am convinced that the key to solving the problems of unemployment and underemployment faced by many countries lies in the creation of a favourable climate for the efficient utilisation of human resources and the exercise of individual initiative within the framework of policies that encourage sustainable socioeconomic growth and development.

While the Report acknowledges that economic growth by itself does not and cannot solve the problem of unemployment, it nevertheless suggests possibilities of how economic recovery can have a positive effect on employment creation.

An issue that also deserves serious attention during this Conference is the one concerning night work for women. Although we uphold the principle of non-discrimination, the increasing number of women engaged in night work is worrisome and calls for close scrutiny. Night work involves certain risks, among which are strained relationships between spouses, disruption of social life and possible infamy at work. It is my sincere hope that we will come up with a consensus on this very important issue.

Health and safety, especially where the use, handling and disposal of chemicals is concerned, demands special focus. Developing countries have witnessed the widespread and increasing application of certain new methods of production in industry and agriculture. Due to obvious material constraints this development has not been followed by necessary and adequate safety investments. All efforts by the developing countries to improve on health and safety are being hampered by increasing costs and sophistication of the methods applied. Although the effects of harmful chemical substances are exacerbated by poor economic, social and welfare standards, we note with great dismay moves by some developed countries to turn Asia, Africa and Latin America into the world's garbage bins. We deplore totally these blatant, mercenary-type machinations that seek to take advantage of lower occupational protection standards and underdeveloped national health and safety infrastructures in the developing countries. It should be our paramount duty to formulate together a framework that takes care of the concerns and interests of both the developed and developing countries alike.

We note that in the Appendices (Volume 2) of the Report of the Director-General a description is given of the current situation of the Arab workers of the occupied Arab territories and developments in their situation over the past 12 months. The Report notes that the recommendations contained in the Report of the Director-General to the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference last year are still most relevant and urges the adoption of additional and specifically energetic measures to achieve the objectives stated in those recommendations in order to eliminate inequalities which still persist in various fields such as vocational training, social security and the impact of the policy concerning Israelis settlements on employment and development.

Recent developments following the implementation of the United Nations Plan for Namibia contained in Security Council resolution 435 have been a cause for concern to the international community. We have been witnesses to the evil designs of the apartheid regime of South Africa of attempting to scuttle the whole process or, failing that, tampering with it in order to create undeserved advantages to its puppet allies. We urge all the member countries to intensify their efforts in the support of the rights of the people of Namibia to self-determination and genuine independence. Unless the international community sends an unambiguous and strong message to the apartheid regime on the tragic consequences of its adventurous moves, the forces of darkness may indeed succeed in turning the wheels of history backwards.

The labour situation in apartheid-ruled South Africa itself remains deplorable. Improvements in the conditions of the labour force of that country can only come about after the total liquidation of apartheid is achieved. We must all insist on an honourable solution that gives full and unfettered rights to all the people of South Africa, irrespective of colour, gender or creed. I am sure that we would all like to see the people of South Africa pursuing their lives in conditions of full freedom, human dignity and equal opportunity for all. Promises of reform are not enough: justice and fair play must be seen to be done in that deeply troubled country.

I would like to conclude my short statement by expressing the hope that our discussions and our work will continue to contribute to the attainment of our enshrined goals. Together we can do it, I have no doubt about it.

(The Conference adjourned at 11.30 a.m.)

Credentials

Brief report by Mr. N.G. Mensah, Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, on the credentials of delegates and advisers to the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference, Geneva, 6 June 1989

The Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office has the honour to present the customary report prescribed by article 26 of the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference.

The composition of each delegation and the method of appointment of delegates and advisers to the sessions of the International Labour Conference are governed by article 3 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation.

In accordance with paragraphs 8 and 9 of this article, it is for the governments to communicate to the International Labour Office the nominations made. The Conference examines these nominations and decides, in the case of dispute, whether delegates and advisers have been nominated in accordance with article 3 of the Constitution.

The Conference exercises this power in accordance with the procedure laid down in articles 5 and 26 of its Standing Orders.

In particular, paragraph 2 of article 26 of the Standing Orders of the Conference provides that "a brief report upon these credentials, drawn up by the Chairman of the Governing Body, shall, with the credentials, be open to inspection by the delegates on the day before the opening of the session of the Conference and shall be published as an appendix to the record of the first sitting."

The present report is submitted in compliance with this provision. The list given in the table below was closed on 6 June 1989 at 10 a.m. in order that it might be available for inspection by the members of the delegations that same day, that is, the day before the opening of the Conference.

In addition, the present report serves for fixing provisionally, in accordance with paragraph 1(2) of article 20 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the quorum necessary to give validity to the votes taken.

The table below, based on the files containing the names of the delegates and advisers and the credentials with which they have been provided or the official communications transmitted to the International Labour Office, shows the numerical composition of the Conference. It is to be noted in this regard that persons who have been nominated both as substitute delegates and as advisers, in the letters communicating the nominations, have been included among the advisers.

To date, 129 States have notified the names of the members of the delegations. It is to be noted that only 56 countries deposited the credentials of their delegations with the International Labour Office before 23 May 1989, that is within the 15-day deadline before the date fixed for the opening of the Conference, in compliance with paragraph 1 of article 26 of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

On the other hand, while the Conference and the Credentials Committee have already previously insisted on the obligation which article 3 of the Constitution imposes on governments requiring them to send complete delegations to the Conference, two countries (Congo and Democratic Yemen) have only nominated Government delegates, and five countries (Afghanistan, Angola, Benin, Botswana and Cape Verde) have nominated a Workers' delegate but no Employers' delegate.

It should be noted, finally, that in the letters or telegrams communicating their nominations, a certain number of governments have not mentioned the employers' and workers' organisations which they have consulted and with which they have come to an agreement in appointing Employers' and Workers' delegates in accordance with paragraph 5 of article 3 of the Constitution of the Organisation. In this regard, in order to ensure greater clarity in establishing the credentials, it would be advisable that governments use, for the nomination of delegates and advisers, the form annexed to the memorandum on the Conference which the Office addresses every year to member States.

Finally, I should like to urge delegates and advisers to register in person at the Information and Reception Desk, the quorum being calculated on the basis of the number of delegates registered.

Composition of the Conference and quorum

At present 252 Government delegates, 122 Employers' delegates and 127 Workers' delegates – a total of 501 delegates – are accredited to the Conference.

There are, in addition, 609 Government advisers, 294 Employers' advisers and 346 Workers' advisers – a total of 1,249 advisers.

The total number of delegates and advisers who have been nominated in conformity with the provisions of the Constitution of the Organisation to take part in the work of the Conference is 1,750.

Since five States have nominated a Workers' but not an Employers' delegate, five non-Government delegates are left out of account in the calculation of the quorum.

Since seven of the States¹ now represented are in arrears in the payment of their contributions to the Organisation, those States, under the terms of paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution, may not at present participate in the voting in the Conference or any of its committees. Account is therefore not taken of a further 28 delegates in calculating the quorum.

In conformity with article 17 of the Constitution of the Organisation and with article 20 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the necessary quorum to give a vote validity will provisionally be 234.

Observers

On the invitation of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, Bermuda and the Republic of Korea have appointed tripartite observer delegations and the Holy See has appointed observers to the Conference.

Organisation and liberation movements invited

The Conference is also being attended by:

- representatives of the United Nations and some of its organs, invited by virtue of article II, paragraph

1 - relating to reciprocal representation - of the Agreement between the United Nations and the International Labour Organisation, which came into effect on 14 December 1946;

- representatives of specialised agencies and other official international organisations, invited in conformity with article 2, paragraph 3(b) of the Standing Orders of the Conference;
- representatives of non-governmental international organisations with which consultative relations have been established, invited in conformity with article 2, paragraph 3(j) of the Standing Orders of the Conference;
- representatives of other non-governmental international organisations also invited in conformity with article 2, paragraph 3(j) of the Standing Orders of the Conference;
- representatives of liberation movements invited in conformity with article 2, paragraph 3(k) of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

A list of these representatives is appended to the List of Delegations published as a Supplement to the Provisional Record of the Conference.

Provisional Record

Seventy-sixth Session, Geneva, 1989

Third (special) sitting

Thursday, 8 June 1989, 10 a.m.

President: Mr. Nkomo

ADDRESS BY HIS EXCELLENCY MR. JEAN-PASCAL DELAMURAZ, PRESIDENT OF THE SWISS CONFEDERATION

The PRESIDENT – It is my pleasure to open this special sitting of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference and to welcome Mr. Jean-Pascal Delamuraz, President of the Swiss Confederation.

I invite Mr. Hansenne, Secretary-General of the Conference, to introduce Mr. Delamuraz to the Conference.

Interpretation from French: The SECRETARY-GENERAL – It is an honour and a real pleasure for me to introduce to the International Labour Conference Mr. Jean-Pascal Delamuraz, President of the Swiss Confederation.

The presence of President Delamuraz in this hall today has a special significance, as it comes on the occasion of the 70th anniversary of the founding of the International Labour Organisation. It is also the first time that a President of the Confederation has addressed this Conference.

Your visit, Mr. President, is eloquent witness of the importance that Switzerland attaches to this institution. As the host country and a friend, the Swiss Confederation has played an important role in this Organisation throughout its history.

As the host country, Switzerland has permitted the ILO to establish its headquarters on an outstanding site on the shores of Lake Lemman, so highly praised by Rousseau, Chateaubriand and so many others. As a native of the Canton of Vaud, you will be particularly aware of its charm and I may say that one of my first pleasures, when I took up my duties as Director-General three months ago, was to gaze through the windows of my office on the tenth floor of the ILO and observe this marvellous landscape of lake and mountains that on a clear day extends from Geneva to Lausanne and beyond.

The Organisation has always in difficult moments been able to count on Switzerland as one counts on a real friend. This was particularly the case during the ILO's financial crises. Just under ten years ago Switzerland also suspended payment on the loans that the Organisation had contracted for the construction of its headquarters in Geneva. Switzerland has just repeated its generosity for last year and this year, and I would like to take this occasion to thank you once again.

There is, of course, much more. Your country has played a major role in the implementation of some of the objectives of our Organisation and in the solution of conflicts that can arise as a result. I refer in particular to human rights and, more generally, to the application of international labour standards. Thanks to their realistic approach to social progress, their sense of open-mindedness and conciliation, the Swiss delegates in the various bodies of the ILO and particularly the Conference have made a major contribution to the implementation of principles adopted therein.

I should like to mention the names of several eminent Swiss citizens who have served the Organisation: William Rappard; Jean Möri, the only Workers' delegate up to now to have been called to preside over the International Labour Conference; Paul Ruegger, who played a major role in the Committee of Experts on the Application of ILO Conventions and Recommendation; and Charles Kuntschen.

You need no introduction to the International Labour Conference. You have already attended as a Minister and I know that this assembly, this international labour parliament, is impatient to hear the message which you have kindly agreed to deliver on behalf of your country, despite your many other obligations, so I will not take up any more time.

Interpretation from French: His Excellency Mr. JEAN-PASCAL DELAMURAZ (President of the Swiss Confederation) – The Government and the people of Switzerland are happy to welcome in Geneva – in the presence of the cantonal and municipal administrative authorities – the participants in the 1989 Session of the International Labour Conference.

A session which is very special in that it allows us to celebrate together the seventieth anniversary of an organisation which is both strong and lively and devoted to its mission in the service of labour and workers.

I should like to welcome in particular Mr. John Nkomo, President of the Conference, and I congratulate him upon his election; Mr. Michel Hansenne, the new Director-General of the International Labour Office, to whom I wish success in the execution of his important duties and to whom I warmly recommend sometimes to abandon the paper which is the lot of office workers and to contemplate the beautiful lake that Switzerland, and also neighbouring France, offer him from his office window.

I wish to greet the old Directors-General, Messrs. Morse and Blanchard, present here today, and I wish to convey to them my gratitude for the services which they have rendered to the Organisation and the significance which they have conferred to it through their charisma and their personalities.

The International Labour Organisation came into being as a result of the Versailles Treaty, at the same time as the League of Nations; 1919 was a year of chaos, during which the remodelling of Europe and of other parts of the world was initiated. People believed this restructuring to be a definitive one as they emerged from the war to end all wars, but the events of the following years, followed by the events of the Second World War, rapidly shattered that belief, plunging the planet into even more monstrous cataclysms. However, at the end of the First World War, a few major outlines of the future organisation of the world had already been made. They were made during a time of sorrow, destruction, poverty, disease, unemployment and social tensions. The world was waiting to be revived and regenerated. Then came a few brighter years during which mankind could look forward to the fulfilment of the words of the "Creation" by Joseph Haydn:

Thus, before the sacred rays, the dreadful shades which haunted the darkness have flown;

chaos gives way to the power of light.

Created at the dawn of this new day, the International Labour Organisation devoted itself without any delay to its main mission of promoting social justice, improving working conditions, and founding and then strengthening the economic and social security of workers. This was an immense undertaking based both upon political peace, on freedom, on economic progress, all of which were essential conditions for the fulfilment of mankind. A fulfilment which implied the possibility of working in dignity and security, without being subjected to the constraints of fear, of need or of poverty.

Of course, experience shows that the proclamation of great humanitarian goals is a far cry from their universal realisation. And yet, thanks to a system of standards, of agreements and of recommendations, the International Labour Organisation was able to find a way of realising its goals slowly but surely with competence, patience and, above all, with tenacity.

The value of a system cannot be measured only by the technical quality of the institution nor the technical quality of the decisions it takes. It depends, the value of a system that is, most profoundly on the credibility of the institution in question. The International Labour Organisation, in this respect at least, and here resides its historical merit, during the course of its activities has reached the highest level of worldwide credibility possible, so that it has always been able to fulfil the delicate tasks that have been entrusted to it and it has always succeeded in marshalling and strengthening the confidence of nations in the course of its most difficult missions. Economics, and more specifically labour, concerns man as the essential ingredient – man as a leader of society, man as head of State.

Switzerland – which has the honour of welcoming upon its territory the International Labour Organisation and this since its foundation – has invited the latter from the outset to adopt a particular structure born of conclusive experience which it had itself built up for decades – the tripartite mechanism and the participation of social partners. The strength and the autonomy from which heads of enterprises and unions benefit in the organisation of the world of labour, and their participation in the national policies, are elements which must be put to full use directly within the framework of the International Labour Organisation.

I agree that the complex tripartite mechanism is not easy to grasp at first glance and that it is probably easier to define and to apply a simple procedure at the national level than to manage, in a triphase system, an international organisation which comprises, moreover, more than 150 member States. But what do we observe? We observe that this principle has turned out to be extremely appropriate and that it has functioned well and continues to do so. The current applicability of the decisions taken 70 years ago is one of the most fascinating characteristics of our Organisation's history and pays particularly great tribute to the imagination, the intelligence and the far-sightedness of the pioneers. They have given us an instrument which, I repeat, has turned out to be extraordinarily up to date.

The International Labour Organisation has adopted decisive measures in order to harmonise labour conditions throughout the world. It has contributed substantially to strengthening the rights and the protection of workers, to improving social conditions and to promoting human dignity. It has converted labour into more than a mere necessity for the fulfilment of vital needs. It has given it a new dimension, namely to promote individual fulfilment and enrichment. It has conferred upon the concept of work all of the dignity that it merits; it has simply, but this was capital, put the social dimension of human existence upon the agenda of political life nationally and internationally.

The ILO has admittedly not succeeded in overcoming famine, poverty or unemployment throughout the world. The conditions are far too different from one State to another and the initial opportunities too unequal. But it has substantially contributed to highlighting the disastrous consequences of famine and poverty and pointed out development strategies which would overcome them. It has not succeeded either in establishing everywhere the freedom and human rights without which there can be no dignity in work and no social security, but it has constantly denounced the violations and has courageously struggled to see to it that in all States these unconditional principles would be respected.

This is the surprisingly rich and extremely valuable heritage of which we today are the beneficiaries. What then are the tasks and mission which lie ahead for the International Labour Organisation after 70 years of enriching and strengthening experience and achievements? I think that, in the light of the principles which I have just recalled, the Organisation has a permanent mission, more relevant than ever before, because human needs in terms of freedom, justice, dignity and work under decent conditions, with the guaranty of social security, are no less commanding in 1989 than they were in 1919.

The timelessness of the ILO's tasks appears entirely clear. The world today is characterised by changing conditions, such as the increasing gap between rich and poor, the new distribution of roles in the world economy, the access of young States to the circle of economically strong nations, the growing interdependence arising from the international distribution of labour and the predominance of economic pragmatism in ideological programmes. I am nevertheless confident that, given all those conditions, the International Labour Organisation is equal to its task today as it was in the world 40, 50 and 70 years ago when conditions were quite different, some of them completely different, from what I have just described for our own period. But now, as before, only a strong international organisation, one which rigorously ensures the harmonisation of working conditions and of social security, will make it possible for men everywhere to reach higher, to gain more freedom and to achieve more dignity. A strong international organisation in itself is undoubtedly not sufficient for the accomplishment of this great design, but it is one of its basic prerequisites. Thus our duty is to prevent with vigilance any weakening in our Organisation, to bring it steadily and without any concessions to the highest level of efficiency and, especially, of international authority, an attribute which has emanated from it throughout its existence.

But everything depends upon the global organisation of the world, and the International Labour Organisation will not achieve its goal unless other essential purposes, which are the responsibility of other international organisations, are not simultaneously achieved. I am thinking of the mandate, programmes of action and work of the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund, GATT, UNCTAD and OECD, to mention but a few of those whose purposes are essential.

The ILO's fate is bound up with the fate of those organisations, and conversely, so that, after having pleaded for its own solidarity, I plead for its cohesion with the other international organisations so that major worldwide actions are not, or no longer, accomplished in a dispersed fashion contingent on sectoral circumstances, but are the result of global, concerted and logical undertakings. There is not only co-ordination but an effective synergy to be found and to be maintained.

Indeed, we must set common goals so as to give genuine unity to the international community so as to breach the gap between the poor and rich nations to eliminate the North-South and East-West divides, and to bring the States within a regenerated community.

What is as urgent as it is essential is a new global policy, certain modalities of which may of course differ from one region to another but whose principles and inspiration are universal. This is an exacting task, requiring perseverance, a burden at times overwhelming but which must be tackled at all costs if we want to break the growing imbalances and perilous tensions, both for the world economy as well as for social peace.

The challenges which States must now face are famine and poverty, underdevelopment, domestic and external conflicts, diseases, unemployment, pollution and destruction of the environment. These serious problems lead ultimately to the loss of human dignity and the violation of human rights if they exist at the very time that mankind today has enormous possibilities both technical, economic and financial to fight against them effectively. This implies on our part abandoning our selfishness and that of the State, and this also implies an appeal for political innovation and an urgent invitation to concentrate our economic and spiritual forces not exclusively upon ourselves but to incorporate them into planetary purpose of a new globality within the service of mankind.

There is no State which is too small to participate effectively in such an undertaking. Ideas are not dependent upon the size of a country or upon its economic significance; but this mission, let us be quite clear about this, places an obligation upon us, particularly in regard to partner States which are burdened with debt and which must fight against poverty and disease.

It is to them that we are committed. It is in the combination of our efforts and in the partnerships that we will find solutions. Open and frank collaboration is the way, the only way, toward greater equanimity.

This ideal action has frequently come up against internal policies which do not work and which have deprived these countries of international discipline, either for long or short periods.

Unfortunately, I cannot speak in the past only of these unfortunate circumstances, I must, in 1989, speak of them in the present and I am afraid also that I might have to refer to them in the future.

Let us be quite clear, unfortunate circumstances, indeed tragedies which occur in a country, have the consequences that are unacceptable and unfortunate not only for the workers of the country concerned, and this already should mobilise us, but also for the workers and for the human beings throughout the world. There can therefore be no global progress without national effort. The resistance of a chain is as great as its weakest link. It is therefore important for the weakest members to be strengthened so that the chain as a whole can be strong. Our joint duty is to commit ourselves to reorienting those who have strayed.

I have just made an appeal in favour of the global nature of our policies and of our policies in general.

Alvin Toffler wrote that some generations are born to construct a civilisation, others to safeguard a civilisation. In our present position, our task is of course maintenance, but still more construction. In this we have, I repeat, possibilities which no other generation has had throughout history. Development, technical progress and especially the ever clearer perception of the need to act – in terms of awakening the political will – must be our motivation.

When I see the youth of all countries planting the flag of hope on new shores, when I see so many men and women liberated from their chains, sometimes very recently, what joy it is to see them. I am certain that we are on the path to a new world, provided that we can renew a vital impetus where obscurantism or violence have repressed it.

Our Organisation must play a leading role in humanising this new world, as truly new as the New World which Christopher Columbus discovered five centuries ago, in imparting hope to every person, in reminding governments of respect for their obligations and in encouraging the social partners to find imaginative, consistent solutions.

I greet you all, Mr. President, ladies and gentlemen, who together make up the international community. Switzerland is proud to be the seat of the International Labour Organisation and it will exert all the necessary effort for this to be a place of rapprochement and closer communication between men.

The celebration taking place this morning thus acquires its full meaning: the commemoration of 70 years, sometimes difficult, sometimes happy, but 70 years of movement and, moreover, of a firm political will to continue to give the International Labour Organisation and its members, united in responsibility, a new strength drawn from the living spring of freedom and human dignity.

In conclusion, the reference to the guiding values of our civilisation leads me to apply to the world as a whole, particularly since we are dealing here with the International Labour Organisation, what Jean Monnet said of Europe, to the effect that we are not bringing together States, we are uniting men.

The PRESIDENT – Your Excellency, President Delamuraz, on behalf of the delegates to the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference and on my own behalf, I have the pleasure of expressing our deepest gratitude for the moving and inspiring message you have given to this assembly

Your speech has touched on vital issues of the contemporary life of millions of people all over the world. Human rights, the problem of Third World debts and access to work are issues of much concern to all of us. The resolving of these problems is of high priority because their persistence is a threat to both peace and democracy. You have also spoken of the challenges the world and the ILO have to face in the years to come. Your vision of the future world will no doubt guide us, and I would therefore like to thank you once more on behalf of all those who have had the privilege of listening to you today.

It is not just a coincidence that the President of the Swiss Confederation addresses us this morning, on the day we are celebrating the 70th anniversary of our great Organisation. Your country, Mr. President, has not only been the host of the ILO for more than half a century but also one of its strongest supporters. Your presence today amongst us and the message you conveyed is yet another testimony of Switzerland's close relations and solidarity with the ideals and objectives of our Organisation. Was it not the Swiss Government which took the initiative in 1880 in proposing to other European governments an international treaty on factory legislation which was to result in the adoption of regulations concerning work in mines in 1890 at the Berlin Conference? Was this not one of the forerunners of ILO international labour standards?

Seventy years ago at Versailles a number of statesmen and trade unionists, under the leadership of Samuel Gompers, people with ideals and a vision, sat together to reflect on the future of our world; a world which, in the wake of the First World War, suffered from devastation, misery and poverty. They realised that there could be no peace without social justice and that such a peace could only be achieved by involving workers and employers in promoting social justice. This is how the ILO was created with its unique tripartite structure, a structure which over the years has proven to be the strength of this Organisation and perhaps the most important factor which has enabled it to survive the turbulent years of this century.

Seventy years is a long time in the life of an individual but for an Organisation like ours it is very short. This is why the ILO is still as vigorous and dynamic as it was in 1919. It has always had, and still has, the strength to adapt itself to new situations, to new needs and to new aspirations. But it has also remained faithful to its major aims, the promotion of humane conditions of work and the protection of human rights.

It is not my intention to review the impressive record of achievements which the ILO has realised since its existence. There are too many to be mentioned here. Yet, at this solemn occasion, there are four important achievements which I would like to share with you. Perhaps the most important one is that, after seven decades, the ILO has started to convince the world that peace and social justice cannot be separated. It has demonstrated that economic growth without social progress is dangerous to stability and development. Nevertheless, I must emphasise that this message has yet to be fully understood and that, in the years to come, the ILO will have to be more forceful in transmitting it to those who ignore it or do not want to believe in it.

The ILO's human right's record is equally impressive. Has the ILO not been at the forefront of freedom of association, of equality between men and women, and of equal wages for equal work? And yet, one of the most disturbing phenomena in recent years has been the increasing number of cases of violation of human rights. The increasing number of cases submitted to the Governing Body Committee on Freedom of Association is a sad reminder of the non-observance of the very elementary principles of human rights, which has become a great concern for all of us.

The ILO has no doubt succeeded in demonstrating to the world at large that international labour standards are not just a moral imperative, but an intrinsic part of human rights whose legitimacy should not depend on economic reasoning. While we appreciate the need for flexibility, this does not mean that labour standards should be lowered. Flexibility does not mean lower wages or longer hours of work; nor does the application of labour standards mean higher labour costs or lower profits. International labour standards have never been in conflict with development and progress. On the contrary the spectacular economic growth which the industrialised world has witnessed after the Second World War has only been possible in conditions of fairness and social peace guaranteed by progressive labour legislations based on international labour standards.

The fourth great achievement of the ILO which I would like to share with you is its programme of technical co-operation. While remaining faithful to its traditional functions of standard setting, research and dissemination of information, the ILO embarked, after the Second World War, on an unprecedented large-scale technical co-operation programme. Technical co-operation has now become the cornerstone of ILO activities. It has become the activity from which developing countries have benefited enormously and which has been greatly appreciated. I would therefore like to take this opportunity to thank all the donors who have generously contributed to the financing of ILO technical co-operation projects. I would, however, like to emphasise that, in our rapidly changing world, developing countries will continue counting on the ILO to transmit the knowledge and experience recently gained in industrialised countries.

Seventy years have elapsed since the ILO was established and the obvious question one needs to ask is: "Has the ILO achieved its goal?" I would venture to say we are still far from it. Despite the ILO's impressive record of the last seven decades, poverty and misery still persist, unemployment and underemployment continue to be the concern of many countries both developed and developing, precarious types of jobs exist, the gap between the rich and the poor is growing and human rights are violated day after day. We are approaching the twenty-first century and there are still millions of people who suffer from discrimination policies such as apartheid. The ILO will have to address itself to these evils and try to eliminate them. In setting the goal of peace through social justice the founders of the ILO thought that this could be achieved in a few years or perhaps in a few decades. The task has, however, proven to be formidable. I am nevertheless confident that the ILO, with its vigour, its tripartite structure and the spirit of consensus which has characterised this great Organisation in recent years, will strive to attain its noble goals and achieve its objectives.

Interpretation from French: Mr. MENSAH (Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office) – Mr. President of the Swiss Confederation, you have just referred in terms which are both just and warm to the 70th anniversary of the International Labour Organisation. I should like in turn to express, as Chairman of the Governing Body of the ILO, the meaning which its members attribute to this commemoration.

We would wish this anniversary to be an opportunity to go back to the source. Seventy years after the foundation of our Organisation is a good time to assess how far we have come.

The beginning of the nineteenth century saw the emergence of the idea of offering, at the international level, protection to workers by seeking to introduce comparable labour legislation in the industrial countries. A small number of political personalities and enlightened heads of enterprises were the initiators of this idea. But admittedly, they were very few. It was not until the upsurge of the humanistic movement of the second half of the century that the newly germinating ideas produced tangible results.

The first of these was the convening of the first international conference in Berlin in 1890. It was followed by other conferences leading up to that of 1900, which set up an International Association for the Legal Protection of the Workers. This forerunner of the ILO succeeded in having two international Conventions adopted as early as 1906: one prohibiting the use of white phosphorus and the other banning night work by women in industry – this is a subject which will be referred to at great length this year by our Conference. The adoption of these instruments opened up a new chapter in the history of international relations.

But what was needed was the series of upheavals accompanying the First World War for the aspirations of our forerunners to take tangible effect. At the end of hostilities, a new opportunity for progress arose. At the urgent request of the trade unions of several countries the Peace Conference of 1919 established within itself a Commission on International Labour Legislation, of which prominent figures of the union movement were members: the American Gompers, the Frenchman Jouhaux, the Belgian Mahaim, and the Englishman Harold Butler, who later became the Director of the ILO. The commission adopted a text which, on 11 April 1919, became Part XIII of the Peace Treaty of Versailles and the central element of the Constitution of the ILO. The authors of that text went much further than their precursors. They decided – and this was a revolutionary idea for the time – to have employers' and workers' representatives sit side by side with those of governments in the bodies of the new Organisation. Thus was born the tripartism which seems so normal to us today, and to which we are so attached.

The International Labour Conference first met in Washington in October 1919, and the first Director of the International Labour Office was a man of exceptional stature who was to impart to the Organisation its original aims which are still alive today: it was Albert Thomas who was chosen. From the outset, the ILO addressed the most pressing problems of the time. It drafted the first standards on subjects such as the limitation of the working day to eight hours, the struggle – already at that time – against unemployment and the regulation of the work of women and children. The standard-setting structure which it was to set up during the first two decades of its work would mark the real beginning of international co-operation.

1940 to 1945: the ILO survived the Second World War. The International Labour Conference held, in May 1944 in Philadelphia, its first session after an interruption of five years. It spelt out once again the goals and objectives of the ILO in terms which are known to most of you but which are so important and so relevant 45 years after they were drafted that I think I should recall them:

All human beings, irrespective of race, creed or sex, have the right to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity.

That says it all. This sentence covers it.

The Declaration adopted in Philadelphia proclaimed also that "poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere". The ILO was thus the pioneer of international solidarity in this struggle against poverty, a struggle which has become one of the collective responsibilities of mankind.

Did the ILO, a living body, adapt itself over these past 70 years to the requirements of the new times and the needs of its constituents?

The Organisation is gradually approaching universality, its membership growing from 42 member States in 1919 to 52 in 1948 and, with the countries formerly under colonial administration gaining independence one after the other – for Africa alone there were 30 between 1955 and 1965 – reaching its present number of 150. It has also become world-wide in scope through its programmes, which are regularly reoriented to take account of the concerns as well as the social and labour problems encountered by governments, employers and workers of all the regions of the world.

The first task of the ILO, at its very beginnings, was to improve working and living conditions by laying down internationally applicable standards. Through tripartite discussion, the Conference adopted in 70 years 168 Conventions and 176 Recommendations which to date have garnered more than 5,400 ratifications. We have thus woven this International Labour Code, which is a common fund of experience of exceptional originality. At the same time, we must continue to give high priority to the defence of human rights, in regard to which apartheid is one of the most acute problems of our times, and that of freedom of association, which has been flouted in so many regions of the world, and the struggle against all forms of discrimination. Let us not forget that in order to induce States to comply with the international standards set, we have at our disposal a set of supervisory tried and tested machinery, of which the Committee on Freedom of Association, the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations and the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards are irreplaceable elements.

Obviously, they have proved their worth. Let us not allow them to weaken. Let us not permit them to be ignored or bypassed.

Standard setting: the law is there. But practical activity is not forgotten either: for nearly 40 years the ILO has also succeeded in facing up to the problems of development and will be an important partner in the international technical co-operation pursued within the framework of the United Nations system.

For its part, it has done innovative work by proposing a model for development based not only on growth but first and foremost upon the struggle against poverty, of which the spearhead is the World Employment Programme launched in 1969. Through this programme, the ILO sounded the alarm in order to focus the attention of the international community on the serious threat raised by the increase in unemployment and underemployment, which looms not only in the developing countries but also in the industrial countries. It became quite evident that economic growth would not automatically reduce poverty and inequality and it would not succeed in creating jobs in sufficient numbers within an acceptable time. The ILO, through the World Employment Programme, therefore committed itself to seeking a new course for development which would make it possible at the same time to stimulate growth and to increase the volume of employment. A vast research and action programme aimed at reaching these goals, has been one of the main activities of the ILO during these past two decades. But the economic environment has changed during these past years, and the ILO has had to confront these problems in the context of enormous debts in a considerable part of the developing world. Here again, it was necessary to convince countries that the required structural adjustments had to include an important social dimension. Our Organisation had the honour to proclaim this, in particular at the High Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment held in Geneva in November 1987.

The last decade of the second millennium will probably, unfortunately, see many gaps increasing between rich and poor peoples. These gaps are fraught with dangers for social peace, for peace as such. It will be up to the ILO to continue to ensure that the flame of social justice shines throughout the world; a flame without which, as the Preamble to its Constitution recalls, there can be no peace.

Interpretation from French: Mr. OECHSLIN – (Chairman of the Employers' group of the Conference) – On behalf of the Employers' members of this Conference, I would like to thank the President of the Swiss Confederation for his address. His words are a source of inspiration which I hope will spur us to action.

It was not by accident that we set up our headquarters here in Geneva 70 years ago; it was not only to enjoy the beauties of the countryside of Geneva or of the Canton of Vaud, or the high standards of communications and transport. Albert Thomas was determined to set up the Organisation in Geneva, despite the reservations expressed at the time by the League of Nations, for he recognised the symbolic value of having the organisation headquartered in a country whose public spirit matched the spirit of the Organisation.

Allow me, Mr. President, though I am a foreigner (albeit with some Swiss antecedents), to venture into this area. The public spirit of the Confederation is one of tolerance; that is, respect for other and the recognition of their equal dignity and worth.

But we have to be careful here, for there are two kinds of tolerance: there is the tolerance which comes from lassitude and indifference, and there is the tolerance which emerges from facing and overcoming challenges.

I believe that Switzerland's internal peace, and the industrial peace to which you referred, is not a blessing from heaven. Rather, it is the result of deliberate effort, a tolerance built on the basis of disputes and challenges which have been overcome. It is in this sense that it is exemplary and that it coincides with our concept of tripartism.

For us, tripartism does not mean a denial of diverging interests. On the contrary, we acknowledge that there are different interests between the different social groups. But the conflicts which arise from these divergent interests must be overcome, while respecting the autonomy and specific role of the social partners, and promoting negotiation.

That is the central message of the International Labour Organisation. As you said earlier, Mr. President, this spirit coincides with a well-rooted Swiss tradition. That is why we are happy to be here in Switzerland.

Today we commemorate 70 years of common history and perhaps this is a good time to look back on 70 years of joint work.

It seems to me that our Organisation has been faithful to its mandate and has enriched that mandate. Allow me to explain. Its mission in the 1920s concerned social dialogue, mainly as regards conditions of work. In the language of the times, it was referred to as relations between employers and workers. Of course, the question of the improvement in the conditions of work has not been settled and our agenda still includes items concerning the improvement of working conditions, and it is perfectly natural that it should be so. But we also know that our concerns have widened and that our specific approach to social dialogue has also extended to other concerns. First of all, it is not sufficient to improve working conditions, that is, conditions of employment; it is also necessary to create jobs, productive employment and wealth, and therefore to improve training, for we must improve the productive capacity of workers.

The Chairman of the Governing Body has just referred to the Declaration of Philadelphia, which represents a turning-point in the history of our Organisation and which enlarged the scope of its mandate. The work accomplished since the war, for which Mr. Morse and Mr. Blanchard deserve much of the credit, has shown the value of social dialogue, and that the promotion of employment is not a matter for governments alone, but also for employers and workers.

We have expanded the scope of our considerations to another equally important area – the relations between the industrialised countries (those which are often called wealthy countries although they do not consist only of rich people), and the developing countries. This, also represents a development which followed the Second World War, which was led by our Directors-General of the time, and spurred widespread by the decolonisation of the 1960s and a dramatic increase in the number of our members. Today, in this room, all countries of the world are represented on an equal footing. There is still much to do, and perhaps some of our early dreams will have to be reviewed. But if we have found a place among the various United Nations agencies dealing with questions of development, it is because our Organisation can contribute not only its competence, but a method of direct contacts with its constituent members, which are not only governments, but employers and workers – the real triggers of economic development. In more recent years we noted that the world economy, which seemed to be in a phase of lasting growth, has in fact moved more into a phase of instability, but also into a process of globalisation where all economic events have repercussions everywhere, where nobody can remain isolated, and where national economies must adapt continually to a changing world. This sort of adaptation also creates a new mission for the International Labour Organisation; specifically, it must carve out a place for social dialogue in the process of adaptation. Here again, Mr. President, you referred to the role that the ILO can play in co-operation with other international organisations. There is no point in establishing economic plans if we fail to establish a social consensus as well.

But I cannot close on a triumphal note. Although social dialogue, a corner-stone of our Organisation, is needed to solve the world's problem, it is meaningless unless the social partners can express themselves freely.

Freedom is a prerequisite for social dialogue. Without it, we have nothing more than a poor puppet show, manipulated by invisible hands. Consequently, I believe that the freedom of individuals to establish and join organisations, to express their opinions and to participate in economic life – in short, human rights – are an essential part of our Organisation's mandate. In this area, we have only just begun. For an Organisation like the ILO, 70 years is very little. There is still much to do. My employee colleagues and I draw inspiration and encouragement from your words.

Interpretation from German: Mr. MUHR (Workers' delegate, Federal Republic of Germany) – Today we are commemorating the 70th anniversary of the International Labour Organisation. This is certainly an event which makes it worth our while to pause a moment in our work to think back to the origins of the Organisation, to the reasons for its being founded at the time and to compare these with the situation throughout the world today; but we must also think of the men and women who have shaped this Organisation.

I should like first of all on my own behalf but also on behalf of the Workers' group at this Conference to thank His Excellency the President of the Swiss Confederation, Mr. Delamuraz, for honouring us by his presence and conferring prestige upon this occasion.

Our gratitude to you is linked with our gratitude to Switzerland and its citizens who have always welcomed us and been most understanding for the past 70 years.

Your country, Mr. President, is inseparably linked with the struggle for peace between peoples. The city of Geneva is renowned for its multifarious efforts to give peace a solid foundation and to bring human beings fresh hope. Geneva is also a city in which the largest humanitarian world-wide Organisation has its headquarters; and Switzerland is a country which has set the example of peace both within its own borders and beyond, for centuries. Indeed it bears witness to the fact that a nation with many peoples does not necessarily have to live with internal dissensions and division. Where could the ILO have found a better site for its headquarters?

But it is not only the International Labour Organisation which is celebrating a special anniversary this year. Trade unions all over the world are remembering even more that the first of May has for 100 years been the day of the common struggle which from the outset was – and still is – led under the banner: Peace, Bread and Freedom.

Those who know the history of the International Labour Organisation are aware that its origin, the idea for its realisation, goes as far back as that of the first of May.

Both emerged to overcome the poverty, hunger and exploitation of the working people.

Although, the workers themselves wanted to fight world-wide for their objectives, far-sighted humanists, scientists and politicians also rose to fight against the circumstances which prevailed at the time.

Was this war on two fronts successful? Have the aims being reached which the initiators had in mind?

If we read the demands of the International Labour Congress of 1889 in Paris, we might believe that they were part of a discussion of current agenda items of the International Labour Conference, at least for part of our efforts to put into practice existing Conventions of our Organisation.

Amongst the subjects they discussed were: the eight-hour day, the prohibition of child work, a six-hour day for youth, a ban on night work if not absolutely necessary for production and technical reasons, a general ban on night work for women and young people, a weekly rest break of at least 36 hours, a ban on workers' middlemen (we might call it labour-only contracting today), a ban on private employment offices, the supervision of health conditions in workshops and industrial plants by the State.

Of course, 1989 is no longer 1889, but who could deny that a number of these items are still burning issues throughout the world today – and that others are more relevant now in large parts of the world than they have ever been?

Some people even feel that several of these issues are once again coming to the same front.

However, to deny the success that has been achieved would also be to deny success of the trade union struggle, which has often gone hand-in-hand into repression and resulted in the death of trade union officials.

Again 1989 is not 1919. Our Constitution at that time wrote that "women were also eligible to the Governing Body" Anyone reading that sentence today, particularly young people, would believe that our founding fathers were incredibly out of date.

But if we think of more recent history, we realise how progressive in fact they were. This Organisation was one of the first to take up the cause for the emancipation of workers, but also for equal rights.

Today, these old problems still exist and new problems have emerged world-wide. Social disparities in the world should trigger an unanimous outcry of all righteous people. The Preamble of our Constitution should open our eyes to the seeds of conflict inherent in this situation; indeed, at the very beginning, it states that: "Universal and lasting peace can be established only if it is based upon social justice".

Peace and social justice are inseparably linked by their very nature. Peace is more than the mere absence of war. Peace is the fruit of justice. This is what the President of my country said here at this forum three years ago.

"Poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere", as stated in the Declaration of Philadelphia of 1944. Who could be so foolish as to claim that we have already come to the end of our struggle? The foundation of our Organisation 70 years ago was necessary and right; and it is just as necessary and right today to support it to the best of our ability in both its old and its new aims.

Last year we celebrated another anniversary, or rather two parallel anniversaries, which were not only linked with regard to time but also with regard to their objectives. I am thinking here of the adoption of the United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the ILO Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention (No. 87).

The right of workers to join with other workers in order to defend their joint interests is – and will always be – an inalienable human right. It is a fundamental democratic right and the great number of violations against that right show to what extent it is an obstacle to those in power. These violations have not decreased in number; quite the contrary.

But there are also signs of hope. Increasingly, and in a larger number of countries, the principle that the right of association is a right of freedom and not of compulsion is being upheld. It must be left to the workers themselves to decide how they wish to associate and how they wish to formulate their objectives. This is a principle which has become more widespread because of the indefatigable struggle of the ILO.

Fundamental human rights also include the right to work and to a free choice of occupation and activity. Fundamental human rights are not respected as long as need, hunger and poverty still afflict large number of the world's population.

As long as human beings are compelled to endanger their health in order to earn a living for themselves and for their families we must ask ourselves two questions: How far are we still from the achievement of these human rights? And for how many people across the world are we in fact going further away from these targets?

There is as much need today as there was 70 or 100 years for organisations which work for human rights on a world-wide basis.

Nobody should be persecuted or threatened because of race, beliefs, political convictions or nationality.

Let us look to South Africa where a racist system flouts these principles. But we should also not forget that alongside this particularly flagrant example of violations of human rights, there are a number of other examples which are just as shocking.

It is now one hundred years that trade unions have been struggling for a better life for the workers; 70 years that the ILO, has been in existence; 40 years since the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention were adopted. On the threshold of the next millennium we have the duty to continue to fight for the realisation of these rights.

Indeed, we owe it to those who have sacrificed their lives and their health for these aims. And we also owe it to our children and to coming generations that this struggle will not last as long again as it has already.

Interpretation from French: The SECRETARY-GENERAL – An anniversary is a special moment because it is an opportunity to look back and commemorate; but it is also a time for taking stock, for making certain that we have not strayed from our chosen course, for taking new sightings in order to continue our journey in the right direction. You, Mr. President, have given us an optimistic speech which for us will be a source of inspiration.

But what is this course that we have set ourselves? What are the objectives, what are the basic principles that govern our actions? It is in fact not very difficult to find them. You are all quite familiar with them, because these objectives are contained in our Constitution and in the Declaration of Philadelphia. Let us recall some of them. Even if some of the speakers before me have already done so, I think it is particularly important that we do so.

"Universal and lasting peace can be established only if its based upon social justice". This was true in 1919. It is true in 1989. It is a simple fact.

"Freedom of expression and of association are essential to sustained progress." This was true in 1919. It is true today.

"Conditions of labour exist involving such injustice, hardship and privation to large numbers of people as to produce unrest so great that the peace and harmony of the world are imperilled". This was true in 1919. It is also unfortunately true in 1989.

"An improvement of those conditions is urgently required," and the Constitution mentions among others the prevention of unemployment, the provision of an adequate living wage, recognition of the principle of equal remuneration for work of equal value, the protection of the worker against sickness, disease and injury arising out of his employment, the protection of children, young persons and women, provision for old age and injury, freedom of association, and the organisation of vocational and technical training. True in 1919, and still true in 1989.

But if all of this is true today, does that mean that nothing has been done during these 70 years? Obviously not. It is one of the noble features of our human condition that we invariably face up to the vicissitudes of history and take up the challenges it throws down. As you know, the achievements of our Organisation are many. And what are they due to?

The impact of the Organisation derives first and foremost from its tripartite structure. All of you here are convinced that it is only through dialogue with employers' and workers' organisations that satisfactory responses can be found to the problems of employment and labour.

The ILO also derives its strength from the international standards it has created and the supervisory machinery it has devised. These principles, which were carefully formulated by the Conference, are increasingly incorporated into the legislation and practice of each of our countries. It is true that there are still battles to be won, particularly as regards freedom of association and the prevention of all forms of discrimination or forced labour; but there are so many battles that have already been won.

The Organisation owes its impact finally to its technical co-operation projects in favour of employment, vocational training and the improvement of working conditions and the working environment.

Every one of us can be legitimately proud of these achievements. But we still have challenges to take up, because the labour situation, which is the focus of the activities of our Organisation, changes along with the context in which it evolves. These changes raise new questions and require new responses from us.

First of all, the world of work has become internationalised, as has been mentioned several times this morning. The problems that we face today are no longer just those of industrialised Europe and North America but of all regions. All the countries of the world should today feel that the ILO is responding to their concerns. That is the first challenge that faces us.

The content of work has changed. Technological change has radically altered methods of production. Industry requires fewer workers, while the service industries are in full expansion. More men and women today are working in the public service and education, whereas we are facing tremendous labour problems in the rural sector, particularly in the developing countries. Do the workers in all these branches of activity really have the feeling that the ILO is meeting their expectations? That is another challenge.

The forms of work are multiplying. Traditional full-time, permanent employment is being often replaced by atypical or precarious types of work. Does everyone have the feeling that the ILO has the answer to these new forms of employment? This is a third challenge.

The ILO, its constituents and its secretariat should ensure that everyone, whether employer or worker, finds in the ILO an answer to the questions of today.

The very context of labour has changed. The world has evolved and continues to evolve, and this is bound to have an impact on work.

The result may be either positive or negative. Allow me to cite a few instances.

We see negative outcome when we look at the economic crisis that the world has been undergoing and the continuing problems of development. Millions of men and women are unemployed. And how many others are living in fear of losing their employment? And no employment means no income, and often a loss of one's sense of dignity. The ILO has been rethinking its employment programme. For example, at a recent a High-level Conference on Employment and Structural Adjustment launched a world employment programme.

We must be even more concerned with seeing that employment creation is at the heart of development. This is an intellectual challenge for us insofar as the Organisation must devise its own strategy in this area. It is a challenge to our credibility insofar as we must convince the decision-makers in each of our countries. And it is a challenge to our determination to co-operate insofar as we must devise new forms of collaboration with other international organisations. President Delamuraz himself has just mentioned this.

Another still more critical development is the need to ensure that work is carried out in an acceptable environment.

In the future, the Organisation will certainly have to devote more energy and more effort to this ecological dimension. It must do so above all in order to improve the working environment, because on this will ultimately depend the safety, health and lives of workers and the happiness of their families. Besides, by ensuring a healthy environment are we not also creating employment?

The context of work has also changed – and here rather more positively – because there now appears to be a new international climate. Detente seems to be the order of the day. The willingness of States to understand each other better is manifest, and we are witnessing the gradual resolution of regional conflicts. New opportunities are appearing for disarmament. All this increases the prospects for international co-operation and for the International Labour Organisation.

The course we have set ourselves has not changed. Our objectives are still the same and will remain so because they are the very essence of the organisation. But though the Organisation must remain faithful to its vocation, it must also be able to find innovative solutions to the kind of problems that arise today. Fidelity and imagination, continuity and innovation – these, I am convinced Mr. President, are the qualities that will enable the International Labour Organisation to adapt to a world which is changing but which must be ever more welcoming and attractive to the entire world of work.

Fourth sitting

President: Mrs. Molkova

FIRST REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT (Mrs. MOLKOVA) – The first item on our agenda is the first report of the Selection Committee, I call on Mr. Hammond, Government delegate, Canada, Chairman of the Selection Committee, to submit the Committee's report to the Conference.

Mr HAMMOND (Government delegate, Canada; Chairman of the Selection Committee) – I have the honour to submit to the Conference the first report of the Selection Committee which is to be found in Provisional Record No. 4. This report refers to the election of the Officers of the Committee and contains proposals concerning the setting up and composition of committees of the Conference.

The Selection Committee has also considered the numerical composition of the committees which it recommends should be set up. The Committee has made proposals regarding the appointment of the Credentials Committee and has also made recommendations to the Conference concerning the composition of the Drafting Committee of the Conference.

As regards the discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General, the Committee has decided that it should begin today, Thursday, 8 June, and that the list of speakers should be closed on Thursday, 15 June, at 12 o'clock noon.

The Committee has also decided that the brief debate in plenary sitting on the programme and budget proposals should take place next Monday morning, 12 June. The Committee recommends that the Conference urge members of the Conference who take part in the discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General to abide strictly by the provision of the Standing orders of the Conference concerning the duration of speeches in plenary sitting, which may not exceed 15 minutes. It also proposes that the Conference urge delegates to concentrate their remarks on the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General and on the activities of the International Labour Organisation.

I should like to call the attention of the members of the Conference to the suggestions in the report concerning the quorum, punctuality and negotiations in committees, all of which are designed to ensure the smooth working of the Conference.

As regards participation in the Conference committees by members who have lost the right to vote, the Selection Committee took note of the Governing Body's recommendation that the practice followed last year by the Government members of not applying for regular membership of the committees if they were not at the time entitled to vote, should be continued. The Selection Committee itself recommends to the Conference that should this practice for any reason not be fully respected, the calculation of weighting coefficients for votes in committee should be based on the number of regular Government members entitled to vote.

In another recommendation the Committee proposes that certain non-governmental international organisations should be invited to be represented at the Conference and on some of the committees.

Finally, the Committee endorsed a general plan of work for the Conference committees which is appended to its report. Although not binding, it will enable the committees to organise their work so as to take the maximum possible account of the overall needs and possibilities of the Conference. In this connection, the Committee decided that a special sitting of the Conference should be held at 11 a.m. on Thursday, 15 June, to pay tribute to Mr. Francis Blanchard, former Director-General of the International Labour Office, for his many years of outstanding service to the Organisation.

I commend the report for adoption.

The PRESIDENT (Mrs. MOLKOVA) – The discussion of the report is now open.

Original-Spanish: Mr. MEZA SOZA (Government delegate, Nicaragua) – With all due respect, I wish to point out that I am speaking on behalf of the delegation of the Government of Nicaragua. I would like to refer briefly to the part of the first report of the Selection Committee concerning the make up of the committees for this Conference.

The delegation of the Government of Nicaragua does not want to open an untimely discussion on the competence of any particular body at the Conference or the Credentials Committee specifically. However, we would like to draw your attention to a fact that once again violates the Constitution of the ILO and the Standing Orders.

In the list of regular Employer members for the formation of committees, there was the deliberate omission of Mr. Juan Ramon Aragon, who is the Employer delegate of Nicaragua appointed by the Government which I represent in accordance with paragraph 5, article 3, of the ILO Constitution. Given the impossibility of achieving an agreement between the employers' organisations despite the efforts undertaken by our Government, this decision to exclude him, based on presumed arguments over representation, effectively makes him unable to function as a delegate, depriving him of a vote and a voice in the committees, in clear violation of paragraph 1, article 4, of the Constitution and paragraph 8, article 26, (section B, Part 2), of the Standing Orders.

I would further like to recall that under paragraph 3 of article 26, only the Credentials Committee has the authority to pronounce on the representativity of a delegate and only the Conference can strip him of his powers and rights by a vote of two-thirds of its members. In excluding him from all committees, one sector of the Employers' group, whose gratuitous hostility to all the actions of the Government of Nicaragua is widely recognised, is alleging a principle of autonomy for groups in order to violate a procedure clearly established in the Standing Orders and the Constitution.

Finally, I should point out that in these circumstances the Employers' delegate may or may not be able to make use of his right in accordance with his own interests, but as far as our Government is concerned we can only deplore the violation of legal provisions that all of us should respect.

We do not intend to delay further the decisions of the Conference and the beginning of the work of the committees, but we would like to call the attention of the honourable delegates to the points we have outlined and make clear our absolute reservations on this matter.

The PRESIDENT (Mrs. MOLKOVA) - I thank the distinguished Government delegate of Nicaragua. I have taken note of the complaint lodged against the composition of the committees. This complaint comes under the procedure adopted by the Conference on 8 June 1959. It must therefore be referred to the Appeals Board which will be convened without delay. I invite the author of the complaint, the Government delegate of Nicaragua, to be good enough to send to the President, in writing before tomorrow, Friday at midday, a brief note summarising his arguments so that it can be transmitted to the Appeals Board as soon as possible.

The Board will decide on the procedure it intends to follow, but bearing in mind earlier practice, I would request the complainant and all other persons concerned to place themselves at the disposal of the Board in case it wishes to hear them.

The hearings will take place as soon as possible, most likely on Monday 12 or Tuesday 13 June, 1989.

On this basis, the objection of the distinguished delegate of Nicaragua having been duly noted, if there are no other objections, I take it that the report is adopted.

(The report is adopted)

President: Mr. Nkomo

SUBMISSION OF THE ANNUAL REPORT OF THE GOVERNING BODY TO THE CONFERENCE BY THE CHAIRMAN OF THE GOVERNING BODY

The PRESIDENT – The first item on this afternoon's agenda is the presentation of the annual report of the Governing Body to the Conference. I call on Mr. Mensah, Chairman of the Governing Body of the ILO, to submit the report.

Original – French: Mr. MENSAH (Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office) – In my position as Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, it is incumbent upon me to introduce to you the report submitted each year by the Governing Body to the Conference. This report gives an account of the work carried out by the Governing Body upon resuming the 240th Session immediately following the Conference in June 1988, as well as at its 241st and 242nd Sessions held in November 1988 and in February-March 1989.

As the first part of the 243rd Session which preceded the current session of the Conference only concluded a few days ago, the printed report which you have before you in Provisional Record No. 3 does not reflect the very latest considerations of the Governing Body. I shall therefore complete this orally by telling you of the principal decisions which have been taken and the discussions which took place on this occasion. But before I go into the details of this work, I should like to mention briefly three major events which have left their mark on the period under review.

The first of these events concerns the regional dimension of the activities of the International Labour Organisation. For the life of our Organisation does not only go on in Geneva but also takes place on a very wide scale in the various regions of the world where the ILO must make every effort to come to the assistance of the workers and to overcome the problems of poverty, unemployment and violations of fundamental rights which they face. One of the main means enabling the ILO to remain attentive to the concerns and desires of its constituents in the various parts of the world is provided by its regional conferences. It was Africa's turn this year to organise the most recent conference of this type, which was held from 29 November to 7 December of the year under review, 1988, in Harare. As Chairman of the Governing Body and coming from an African country, I was greatly honoured and profoundly delighted to open the work of that Conference. In the unanimous opinion of all participants, that meeting was an outstanding success and in this respect, Mr. President, I should like to pay warm tribute to you for the brilliant manner in which you led the work of the Seventh African Regional Conference. I should also like, through you, to renew the Governing Body's expression of gratitude to the Government and to the employers' and workers' organisations of Zimbabwe for the resources which were generally made available to the Conference and for the warm hospitality which they offered to its participants. In addition to the conclusions and resolutions adopted by the Conference on a number of technical subjects, providing valuable guide-lines for the future action of the ILO to promote economic development and social progress in Africa, the Conference also dealt, of course, with the harrowing problem of apartheid, a challenge to the whole of Africa, whose negative consequences particularly affect the front-line States such as your own, Mr. President. The struggle against apartheid, moreover, is one of the subjects which was dealt with during the sittings of the Governing Body which have just been completed; I shall return in a moment to the decisions which it took in this respect.

The second major subject which I should like to address relates to the financial situation of our Organisation. The adoption of the ILO's programme and budget every two years constitutes a vital stage in the programming and financing of the activities of our institution. The Programme and Budget Proposals for 1990-91 submitted to you this year for final adoption represent the fruits of a considerable effort of planning, consultation, fixing of priorities, examination of resources and estimates of costs accomplished by the Director-General and his staff. These proposals, as usual, were then subjected to a detailed examination by the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee before being approved by the Governing Body. In this respect I should like to highlight the encouraging fact, quite exceptional in the recent experience of our Organisation, that these Programme and Budget Proposals were adopted unanimously by the Governing Body. I am convinced that I speak for the entire Governing Body in expressing the wish that they might find equally unanimous support in the International Labour Conference.

Finally, the third outstanding event which I should like to highlight is the election of the new Director-General of the International Labour Office. An instrument for consideration, for study and for action at the service of the tripartite constituents of the Organisation, with the task of carrying out the decisions taken by the Conference and the Governing Body, the International Labour Office has always been fortunate in having been headed by a series of exceptional Directors-General, the successors of Albert Thomas, the first Director-General of the ILO. In electing, at its 242nd Session last February, Mr. Michel Hansenne to head the Office for a five-year term the Governing Body showed its confidence that the new Director-General will continue along the path laid down by his illustrious predecessors. The Governing Body also wished to pay tribute, exactly one week ago, to the outgoing Director-General, Mr. Francis Blanchard, for the remarkably skilful and effective manner in which he has headed the Office over a period of 15 years and the Conference will no doubt wish to endorse this tribute in turn a few days from now.

I shall now give an account of the first part of the 243rd Session of the Governing Body which took place last week, and in particular, of the principal decisions taken as a result.

First of all, the Governing Body gave preliminary consideration to proposals relating to the agenda of the 78th Session of the International Conference which will be held in 1991. The final decision will be taken next November. Proposals submitted to the Governing Body by the Director-General covered the following six topics:

1. the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer;
2. revision of the Appendix of the Merchant Shipping (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 147);
3. working and employment conditions of part-time workers;
4. recording and notification of occupational accidents and diseases
5. equality of treatment for men and women in relation to social security;
6. drug and alcohol abuse.

Following a short debate the Governing Body decided to request the Director-General to provide to it, in November 1989, reports on legislation and practice or more detailed proposals relating to the six topics which I have just listed. In addition, at the request of the Employers' group, the Director-General undertook to examine the possibility of submitting proposals next November on the application of modern agricultural technologies which was the subject of a specific request in the conclusions on the promotion of rural employment adopted by the Conference in June 1988 if this is technically feasible.

In regard to the application of international labour standards the Governing Body took note of the report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations. According to usual practice this report is submitted to the Conference so that it should be examined in depth within the framework of the Committee on the Application of Standards. The Committee on Freedom of Association has also continued its patient and in-depth examination of complaints relating to the violation of union rights. During the three sessions of the Governing Body during the last period the Committee has examined about 200 cases which corresponds, more or less, to the number of cases before it the previous year. This tireless work remains vital in order to ensure the respect of freedom of association without which it would not be possible to have true tripartism, the very foundation of the structure and the activities of the ILO. Unfortunately, the Committee has had to note in certain cases the existence of flagrant violations of union rights. However, it is encouraging that the dialogue begun between governments and the Committee on Freedom of Association is continuing and that, thanks to this dialogue and procedure of direct contacts utilised in certain cases, problems relating to the application of the standards and principles of the ILO in this sphere have been able to be solved.

Regarding the finances of the Organisation, the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee of the Governing Body has noted a satisfactory improvement in the budgetary situation, manifested by a current surplus of income over expenditure for the period 1988-89. This state of affairs is due in particular to the increase in contributions in regard to last year and to the recent stabilisation of the US dollar, the reference currency of the budget. However, this situation may be precarious given the monetary uncertainties and the fact that too many member States are still late in the payment of part or the whole of their contributions to the ILO. I should thus like to repeat the appeal made by all of my predecessors on this tribune that all member States should promptly fulfil their financial obligations to our Organisation.

Moreover, the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee has examined, in its annual May review, the various activities of the Turin Centre discussed in the Centre's report. On personnel matters, the Committee had before it a certain number of questions relating to pensions. In this respect, the Governing Body has made recommendations to the Conference concerning the designation of titular and substitute members of the ILO and United Nations pensions funds as well as of members of the Administrative Board of the Special Payments Fund.

On the recommendation of its Industrial Activities Committee, it has established the composition and the agenda for the Tripartite Meeting on Employment and Working Conditions for Journalists, to be held in November 1990, as well as the agenda for the Meeting of Experts on Civil Aviation which is planned for the 1990-91 biennium. It has also taken a certain number of decisions in order to follow up the conclusions and resolutions adopted by the Tenth Session of the Chemical Industries Committee which met in Geneva in October 1989 and by the Fourth Session of the Joint Civil Service Committee which was held in Geneva in November and December 1988. Finally, the Industrial Activities Committee completed its examination of the structure of the Industrial Committee system which it had entrusted to a limited working group. The recommendations of this group, which were then adopted by the Committee and by the Governing Body, are aimed at increasing the effectiveness and flexibility of the system of the industrial meetings of the ILO and making it possible for the participation of a greater number of countries, while at the same time simplifying procedures and the agenda for these meetings so as to remain within the existing financial framework. It goes without saying that the reform envisaged will have as consequences the modification of the regulations for Industrial Committees and the renewal of their composition.

Through its Committee on Discrimination, the Governing Body has dealt with the information provided by governments and by employer and worker organisations in response to the questionnaire distributed by the Office on anti-apartheid measures. This information, which can be found in Chapter II of the Special Report of the Director-General on Apartheid submitted to the Conference, will be the subject of the annual in-depth examination by the Conference's Committee on Action against Apartheid. So far as the group of independent experts is concerned, whose task was the monitoring of the implementation of sanctions and other anti-apartheid action – and the Constitution called for in the conclusions of the Committee on Apartheid in June 1988 – the Governing Body has decided to set up this working group and has requested the Director-General to submit to the Governing Body when it reconvenes its 243rd Session following the present session of the Conference, proposals relating to the composition of this group. The Committee on Discrimination has also discussed the activities of the ILO relating to the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories. This debate will be taken up again at its next meeting in November 1989. Finally, the Committee decided to include the question of equality of opportunity and of treatment for women as a permanent item on its agenda starting from the next session.

The Governing Body took note of the report of the Meeting of Experts on Safety in the Use of Mineral and Synthetic Fibres which was held in Geneva in April this year. It has authorised distribution of the report and has requested the Director-General to take into consideration the recommendation of the experts when he develops proposals for future programmes.

Among the various ILO meetings the composition and the agenda of which were the subject of decisions by the Governing Body at its recent session, the Governing Body has approved the conduct, the agenda and the composition of a tripartite colloquium on structural adjustments and employment in Africa which is to be held in Nairobi in October 1989. This colloquium will constitute, at the regional level, a continuation of the important debate which took place at the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment which was held in Geneva in November 1987.

Moreover, the Governing Body has taken a certain number of decisions authorising the Director-General to invite two non-member States and 46 international non-governmental organisations to be represented at the present session of the International Labour Conference.

Before concluding, I should like to thank most sincerely my two colleagues from the bureau of the Governing Body, Mr. Jean-Jacques Oechslin, the Employer Vice-Chairman, and Mr. Gerd Muhr, the Worker Vice-Chairman, for their efficient and ever-cordial assistance which has greatly facilitated my task as Chairman. Thanks to the atmosphere of understanding within the Governing Body's bureau, as well as the kind co-operation of all the members of the Body, we have been able to cope with the considerable workload in the best possible time frame. I should also like to thank the two successive Directors-General, Mr. Francis Blanchard and Mr. Michel Hansenne and their staff for the support they have given to the Governing Body as a whole and to its Bureau during the term of my mandate.

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION

The PRESIDENT – Before we proceed to the discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General, I would like to make the following statement on behalf of the officers of the Conference.

Before initiating the discussion on the Report of the Director-General, I should like, first of all, to make the following statement on behalf of the Conference and the Conference officers. This statement refers to the way in which we intend to discharge our duties and I am making it on behalf of all the officers of the Conference in order to remind you of the principles which we propose to apply in guiding this discussion. These principles will be applied with the greatest possible uniformity to all speeches made by any speaker in the Conference. The principles by which we shall be guided were first established by the Working Party on the Programme and Structure of the ILO and approved by the Governing Body and communicated to the Conference in 1967. They are set out in paragraphs 54 to 58 of its report which are reproduced in the Memorandum on the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference, a copy of which you should all now have. It is incumbent upon the officers of the Conference to draw the attention of all delegates to the contents of paragraph 58, which reads as follows: "In periods of acute political tension the ILO has a twofold responsibility – to uphold the values of human freedom and dignity enshrined in its Constitution, and to circumscribe rather than extend the area of international tension by ensuring the fullest possible degree of continued co-operation in pursuit of the objectives of the ILO. Every delegate to the International Labour Conference therefore has an obligation to the Conference to keep these considerations constantly in mind, and the President has an obligation to ensure that the Conference does not lose sight of them."

In the discharge of my duty, I draw the Conference's attention to these principles. In full agreement with my fellow officers and on behalf of all of you, I urge all delegates to collaborate with us in applying these principles. In particular, we hope that every delegate will recognise that the officers of the Conference are responsible for ensuring that these principles are observed. My colleagues and I are determined to carry out this responsibility.

Freedom of expression is a vital feature of the International Labour Organisation. However, in order to exercise this right in a spirit of mutual respect, we all have to accept a certain amount of discipline if we want our work to be carried on in an appropriate way and be crowned with success. It is the duty of the President of the sitting to ensure that these principles are respected, and the officers of the Conference will not hesitate to intervene in this connection. In particular, if there are offensive or insulting remarks made about any Head of State or Government or if personal insults are directed at any other delegate, the President will intervene immediately.

At the Conference, all delegates should use parliamentary language and respect the accepted procedure, refer only to the items under discussion and avoid raising any question alien to these matters.

It is important that every delegate who wishes to make a reply to a statement should refrain from asking for the floor by raising a point of order. What a delegate should do is to inform the President of the sitting before that sitting finishes that he or she wishes to exercise his or her right to reply. A request for a right of reply should be addressed to the officers during the sitting in which the government or delegation considers that it should exercise its right to reply. These requests should be transmitted to the President through the Clerk and not by asking for the floor at the meeting.

I wish to refer to the practice with regard to the exercise of the right to reply. The reply should refer only to the point under debate. It should be brief, not exceed two or three minutes, and should not give rise to any further remarks. Lastly, it should be couched in correct and parliamentary language. Furthermore, I wish to point out that, in order to avoid endless debates, it has been a practice of the Presidents to refuse to allow replies to a reply.

I wish furthermore to refer to the recommendation made in the first report of the Selection Committee, according to which the Conference invites all delegates participating in the discussion on the Report of the Director-General to abide strictly by the provisions of the Standing Orders relating to the maximum length of speeches and to concentrate their remarks on the report and on the activities of the International Labour Conference. I recall that under terms of article 14, paragraph 6, of the Standing Orders of the Conference it is stated that "Except with the special consent of the Conference, no speech, whether by a delegate, a visiting minister, an observer or a representative of an international organisation, shall exceed 15 minutes". The time available to the Conference for the examination of its agenda is very short and we have an exceptionally large number of speakers who have already registered on the list. It is therefore imperative that these provisions be strictly respected and I intend to enforce the 15-minute rule very strictly in order to avoid too many night sittings. All delegates and ministers attending the Conference will no doubt wish to take into account, in preparing their remarks, this limit of 15 minutes laid down in the Standing Orders, so that the President will not be obliged to withdraw the right to speak from a speaker before he has finished his speech.

May I remind you that in accordance with practice, the officers and President organise the general discussion. In particular, it is up to the President to ensure respect for the principles and provisions of the Standing Orders to which I have just referred.

Therefore, in order to fulfil the mandate which you have entrusted to us, we shall fully discharge all the responsibilities conferred upon us. We thank you in advance for your help and collaboration with a view to ensuring the proper conduct and the success of this 76th Session.

Having made those remarks, I shall now give the floor to the Honourable P.H. Okondo, Minister for Labour of Kenya, our first speaker in the discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General.

Mr. OKONDO (Minister for Labour, Kenya) – Mr. President, allow me to take this opportunity, and also on behalf of my delegation, to congratulate you and the members of your Bureau on your merited election to guide the deliberations of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. I would also like to take this opportunity to extend my delegations's utmost congratulations to the new ILO Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, following his recent and well deserved election to that post. My delegation would like to assure Mr. Hansenne of Kenya's continued co-operation with, and support for, him and the ILO, in all areas of our common endeavour.

My Delegation has noted that the Director-General's Report for this session of the Conference is presented in two parts. In Part I, the Director-General highlights the subjects of global economic recession and subsequent economic recovery leading to employment as a prerequisite for the creation of increasing employment. Part II of the Report gives an excellent account of the various ILO activities for the year 1988.

My delegation recalls that after the long period of economic growth of the late 1970s and the early 1980s, there followed a downturn in developed economies caused by inflation and high interest rates which led to critical weaknesses in the global economic system. The impact of that phenomena on poorer countries was catastrophic, coinciding as it did, in many countries, including Kenya, with drought conditions. As if that were not enough, rapid economic changes in the developed countries led to dramatic shifts in the demand patterns which adversely affected demand for the products of developing countries. The growing crisis was also accentuated in some cases by mistaken or inadequate policies adopted by some of the Third World countries. The crisis manifested itself in deteriorating balance of payments, falling receipts from exports due to international market pressures, which in turn led to repeated budget deficits and in some case defaults in repayments. This is, in the main, the brew of the debt crisis. The World Bank and the IMF reacted with structural adjustment programmes for the economies of those countries. The aims of the programmes are to re-organise the existing and sometimes quite rigid economic and social structures of the communities in an effort to overcome internal and external constraints in the economic field.

The World Bank is normally concerned with extending high conditionality loans, while the International Monetary Fund aims at stabilisation programmes using high conditionality credits accompanied by stringent fiscal and monetary policy conditions for the recipient country. Since 1975, Kenya has had at least seven stabilisation programmes in the form of credits from the IMF and three structural adjustment loan from the World Bank. Our experience is that structural adjustment and stabilisation policies cannot be administered without posing problems to human resource planning, development and utilisation. There is a need, therefore, to base prescriptions for the role of the State on a thorough empirical analysis of country-specific situations and to avoid rigidly applying simplistic solutions indiscriminately, to often intricate socio-economic systems.

Allow me now to refer to the current sad political situation in both South Africa and Namibia. Africa's greatest concern continues to be the elimination of the neo-Nazi system of apartheid practised in South Africa and imposed upon Namibia. My delegation is appalled to note that those minority regimes continue to deny millions of innocent Black people their God-given right to fundamental human rights simply because of their race. This situation is totally unacceptable and Kenya once again strongly urges the international community to move in concert and greater vigour to halt this open abuse of humanity. We appeal to all peace loving people of the world to unite against apartheid and to rid South Africa of that odious practice. However, the Kenyan Government notes with keen interest, the milder tones employed by the new leadership in South Africa of late. It would appear to give some hope, no matter how faint, that some planning is under consideration for improved inter-racial relationships there. We need to encourage this trend of thought in the light of the changes in Namibia and in the hope that it might mature into the eventual abolition of apartheid. Yet, in the absence of tangible signs that a negotiated abolition of apartheid is in the offing, we in Kenya feel that it is our sacred duty to support the ongoing armed struggle in South Africa until the evil practice of apartheid is completely dismantled.

On the current political situation in Namibia, my delegation notes with pleasure that certain positive developments are taking place there now. It is in this respect that the Kenyan delegation would like to express our deep appreciation to the United States Government for its vital mediation role which helped to secure, in December 1988, a trilateral agreement between Angola and Cuba, on the one hand, and South Africa on the other, on a peaceful settlement in Namibia. The above agreement set 1 April 1989 as the starting date for the long awaited United Nations Independence Plan for Namibia, contained in the United Nations Security Council resolution 435 of 1978. The above United Nations Plan for Namibia commenced on 1 April this year and is expected to lead to United Nations supervised elections on 1 November of this year and to usher in the independence of the Namibian people as a free people, under their right to self-determination.

As I speak here, the United Nations peace-keeping force that is to oversee Namibia's transition to independence has already registered its presence in the territory. Let us hope that all will go well as planned, and that Namibia will be independent following the 1 November supervised election.

In order to facilitate Namibia's transition to independence, the United Nations has created what is commonly referred to as the United Nations Transition Assistance Group (UNTAG) comprising 4,650 troops, 500 civilian police and 2,000 civilian officials. Kenya, at the request of the United Nations, has already sent a full contingent of 850 infantry battalion as part of the UNTAG troops to Namibia. The Kenya contingent commander is also the overall deputy commander of the UNTAG troops. It is this UNTAG group that will ensure that free and fair elections are held in Namibia. Furthermore, Kenya has agreed to send a contingent of Kenya police to assist in policing duties in Namibia under the United Nations programme.

My delegation is also pleased to note the latest efforts made to defuse the South African brewed crisis which is surrounding the United Nations Plan to give Namibia independence from South Africa.

On the situation in the Gulf region, Kenya has noted with appreciation the quiet and persistent diplomacy by the United Nations Secretary-General which has helped to silence the guns in the eight year long Iran-Iraq war following the August 1988 ceasefire. The United Nations peace-keeping force between the two countries has so far done a commendable job and the workers there can now enjoy peace at last. It should again be noted that Kenya, at the request of the United Nations, has also sent several of our senior army officers to the Gulf as part of the United Nations peacekeeping force in the area.

My delegation notes with appreciation that you have included in the agenda for this year's session of the Conference, three major technical items for our discussion, namely the issues relating to the partial revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107); the issue relating to safety in the use of chemicals at work; and the issue on night work, with particular reference to women.

On the issues of the proposed revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107), my delegation is of the unanimous view that the various governments of independent countries truly have the responsibility for developing, with the participation of the peoples concerned, co-ordinated and systematic action to protect the rights of those peoples, and to guarantee respect for their integrity while according them full opportunity and means to attain equality with the rest of the population. In my delegation's view, such action should include the taking of measures for enabling members of these peoples to benefit, on an equal footing, from the rights and opportunities which national laws and regulations, etc., grant to other members of the population.

My delegation has again noted that the ILO has decided to place the question of night work on the agenda of this year's session of the Conference. The subject of the prohibition of night work for women in industry, once a widely accepted element of labour legislation, has today become increasingly controversial. My delegation fully understands and appreciates that it is the debate on whether to maintain this prohibition that has led to calls for the need to revise, in particular, the most recent of these Conventions, the Night Work for Women Convention, 1948 (No. 89), in order to make it more flexible. In my delegation's view, the proposed partial revision of this Convention No 89 aims primarily at adding the much needed flexibility to the standards laid on night work for women.

The third technical item on our agenda is the "Safety in the Use of Chemicals at Work". The increasing production and the use of chemicals sometimes resulting in major accidents (e.g. the world's worst industrial disaster which took place in the Bhopal pesticide plant in India in 1984 and which killed about 3,300 people and left thousands with mental and physical scars) have given rise to growing concern about health protection and to widespread demands for comprehensive international safety and health standards to regulate the use of chemicals at the workplace.

In Kenya safety in the use and handling of chemicals and the control of their potential hazards, is a subject of primary concern to our Government.

The increasing importation and use of obsolete drugs and chemicals in Africa present hazards to human health and the environment and have become a matter of growing concern for most governments and the community at large.

In today's world chemicals are used in manifold applications. We are aware that over the past few decades, revolutionary developments have taken place in the fields of chemical management and control. However, the battle is far from being won.

It is our hope that this world labour parliament will at the end spell out the responsibilities of the manufacturer, the importer, the exporter and the distributor of such chemicals, if we have to protect lives and the environment adequately against potential harm.

In addition to our concern for safety with chemicals, we are deeply perturbed by the current wave of dumping of highly dangerous industrial toxic waste in Africa from Western countries. It has been argued, and of course not without truth, that the choice of Africa as the destination of such industrial chemical waste, which expert handlers in Europe would not even dare to touch, is only a modern expression of the old-age contempt for the African people which has persisted through so many centuries. If not, why should anyone in his right mind bring to our continent any product he thinks would be a danger to life in the country from which that waste originated? As was the case with the slave trade, the dumping of toxic waste in African countries, which have neither the skills nor the means to dispose of them, can only be thwarted by the concerted action of the entire international community. In any event let it be known here and now that Africa will no longer accept any subjugation no matter what source it takes or where it comes from.

Finally, I would like to remark here that the fundamental purpose of the ILO is to continue with this policy.

Mr. BORG CARDONA (Government delegate, Malta) – Your Excellency, may I first of all congratulate you on your election as President of the Conference.

In the Preface to his Report, the Director-General has highlighted the paradox existing at this time. While the rate of growth of the world economy is encouraging, most of the Third World sinks deeper into poverty. Further development of the industrialised centres of the North continues to widen the gap between them and ever larger areas of the South. In his conclusions, he emphasises that in developing countries the situation is critical; in some, it is even desperate.

It is being claimed that we are on the threshold of a new era of prosperity. We may well ask for whom! Should the prosperous become even richer while the poor become more destitute? Bad times mean for the prosperous some sacrifice and the lowering of high standards attained; for too many of the poor it means the ultimate sacrifice – death as a result of the total lack of even the most basic needs for survival.

We are reminded periodically of the extreme poverty that still exists; nevertheless, this is allowed to get progressively worse. How much longer can we disregard the 1,000 million who live in abject poverty and overlook the fact that 100 million children live and sleep on the streets and millions die each year of hunger; that we consume too much for our own good and probably discard enough to feed most, if not all, of those suffering from starvation. Must so many millions continue to die from lack of food in a world of plenty? And yet in so many forums we blithely talk of a more equitable distribution of wealth, of a new economic order, of a new era of social justice. We mention them so often that we have come to believe that they exist while the chasm between rich and poor yawns ever wider and is less bridgeable than ever.

Do we really believe that human beings, all of them, are as much the means for, as the end of, economic and social development? Must we continue to expend so much wealth on what is harmful and destructive and so little on what sustain life and improve its quality? Should we not dispense with further declarations of good intentions and do something tangible and effective to ensure the most basic of human right – the right to live, or at least to survive?

Each country seeks to increase the prosperity of its citizens, but what is basically a highly moral concept can become totally immoral. When increased prosperity is attained at the expense of the weak, when the achievement of higher standards for those which have most results in further deprivation for those which have least, it becomes immoral and anti-social. In the long term it is not even justifiable economically.

The development of Third World countries is inhibited by many factors among which: lack of capital for investment; inadequate infrastructure; lack of educational and economic institutions; poorly developed markets; and lack of technology.

If one adds to these the enormous debt burden which many of the least developed countries have to carry, and the increasing degree of protectionism in world trade, it is no wonder that they are sinking deeper into poverty. In a situation where capital is required for investment to develop, many have become net exporters of capital to industrialised countries. Where exports are the only means of acquiring sorely needed foreign exchange, market limitations are imposed by protectionism or demand and prices manipulated by artificial arrangements.

There has not been enough concern shown on a global basis or enough done to effectively narrow the gap between rich and poor to start redressing the imbalance. And yet, the highly industrialised countries have shown a great awareness of common destiny in response to major natural and ecological disasters and the uncertainties created by the deterioration of the environment. They are the major culprits, having, in the process of industrialisation, done untold harm to the natural environment in their own region and in that of others. They continue to produce items and materials which cause serious damage to the ecology of our planet. Their expectation is that what is left in other regions be preserved for the common good even if utilisation of such natural resources is the sole remaining means of Third World countries to survive or register some advancement.

This awareness of common destiny is genuine only if it is applied generally, in all matters, on a global basis, and not only in matters of self-interest. If in the past more prosperity was sought through industrialisation without heeding the damage being caused to Mother Earth, it is still in the interests of all to take remedial measures. But those who, through lack of opportunity or means to develop, are still blessed with some natural resources or environmental aspects which they can utilise to advantage, cannot be expected to forego the opportunity of survival or advancement only in the interests of others. If they are to be induced to act in the common interest, the world community must help them to survive and advance in other ways than by despoiling what is left, as others did in the past.

Despite the necessity to promote economic and social development on a global basis, several countries have chosen or been driven to form themselves into regional groupings to protect their interests, despite original reluctance to do so. This makes it progressively more difficult to achieve collective development on a global basis.

With the acceleration of technological advancement, there is a progressive increase of the capability to produce more and more, better and faster. In order to dispose of what is produced, a larger market is required – and this is only possible in the countries of the Third World. Unless they are helped to develop, they can never acquire the means to obtain what they sorely need and which others will need to supply.

The world community has to accept the fact that if it wants to retain what has been achieved and to progress further it must also accept the concept of, and effectively strive for, a more equitable distribution of wealth. It must create a new order in which every human being can contribute to development and participate in its benefits. For many centuries human and natural resources from countries in the Third World have contributed handsomely to the accumulation of wealth that we witness today. Economic necessity and social justice require a reverse contribution as much for the benefit of the Third World as in the general interest.

There is need for a concerted effort to eliminate constraints on development in the Third World and to provide the means for advancement. Meanwhile ways have to be found to alleviate the current burden.

If this is not done, pressures will continue to build up to a state where a political, economic and social upheaval of major proportions will be inevitable. Further deterioration of an already desperate situation in the Third World will have a severe negative effect world-wide, and we shall all pay dearly for ignoring the ominous signs.

I turn now to the local scene; to what has happened in my country during the past year that is of interest to the ILO. Last June my Minister spoke about aspects of the policy adopted with regard to the implementation of work-related human rights.

The Auxiliary Workers and Training Scheme, managed by a tripartite board of directors, has made substantial progress. Over 20 per cent of the unemployed and around 25 per cent of those surplus to requirements in the public sector have already been absorbed in the scheme. A good number of these are being trained or retrained in skills for which there is a demand.

The number placed in productive jobs during the nine months since the inception of the scheme is very encouraging. A comprehensive training scheme for adults is being set up. This year's budget provides for incentive schemes under which grants, soft loans and technical assistance are made available to the unemployed and to workers in the Training Scheme, as well as to surplus employees in the public sector as an inducement for them to seek self-employment. Cash and other incentives are given to those willing to move from the public sector to productive jobs in the private sector where there is a demand for skilled and semi-skilled workers.

The Labour Corps, set up over 16 years ago, whose members were precluded from joining trade unions, is being disbanded. These have the option of joining the Auxiliary Workers and Training Scheme which does not preclude trade union membership or of availing themselves of benefits under the incentive schemes.

A further step was taken with regard to recognition of the contribution made by unpaid family workers. In addition to the allowance payable to mothers who have the care of young children, introduced last year, a further allowance was introduced this year payable to all those mothers in receipt of children's allowances.

Legislation has been finalised for the setting-up of an Occupational Health and Safety Authority as recommended by a tripartite commission. It is anticipated that this new authority will be set up this year as the Government accords high priority to safeguarding workers' health and safety.

The National Commission for the Handicapped, set up last year, has done sterling work and through its efforts a number of handicapped persons have been placed in suitable jobs where they can participate fully, though in a special manner, in the world of work.

Another commission doing good work is that set up by the Government to combat and prevent drug abuse, and to rehabilitate drug users, in co-operation with church and lay organisations. This commission provides treatment, care, counselling and rehabilitation. Those who complete treatment and are certified as fit for work are placed in suitable jobs in a selective environment under adequate supervision to ensure that the rehabilitation process continues and they do not succumb once again to drugs.

A national commission was set up in March this year to promote the advancement of women in all spheres of society. It is to recommend what changes are required in legislation to ensure real equality between the sexes and to draft new legislation concerning the family. To complement this commission, a Secretariat for the Equality of Women is being established within the Ministry for Social Policy to assure the implementation in practice of the principles of equality and the elimination of any form of discrimination which may still exist.

My Government has promoted initiatives with regard to the environment and the ageing. The United Nations Institute for Ageing, inaugurated last year in Malta, is now fully operational and taking initiatives in this area. The initiative on climate and the environment has been accepted and is now being actively pursued by the international community. Last October the Government ratified the European Social Charter. We will be hosting this year the European Conference on Integrating Social and Family Policy for the 1990s. This is being organised in collaboration with the Centre for Social Development and Humanitarian Affairs of the United Nations and the Secretariat of the Council of Europe. 1990 is a double anniversary – the 20th anniversary of the United Nations Declaration on Social Progress and Development and the 40th anniversary of the Council of Europe. To celebrate these two events we seek to provide a forum for the sharing of information and experience by as many of you as possible. We shall explore the possibilities for development of social security systems more efficiently for the benefit of those whom we serve. We invite you all and welcome you to Malta.

Finally, and most important of all, through my Government's efforts over the past two years, the progressive erosion of pluralism in trade unions as a result of policies adopted by the previous administration has been halted and reversed. Today, all trade unions, without exception, enjoy the fullest rights as defined by the ILO. Such rights are guaranteed by law and enjoyed in fact.

On the international plane, my Government is fully committed and backs without reservation all United Nations and ILO initiatives concerning human rights. It welcomes the positive developments in Poland, as also the advances made in many other countries with regard to human rights. It condemns the violation of human rights in South Africa and in the occupied lands of the Palestinians. It condemns also all violations wherever they occur and under whatever form of government they take place. My Government is determined to work closely with all those who seek a genuine world peace through social justice and the full enjoyment of all human rights.

Original - Japanese: Mr. SUZUKI (Employers' delegate, Japan) - This morning, we celebrated the 70th anniversary of the ILO. It is a great honor for me to speak here today. Mr. President, as the delegate for Japanese employers, I would like to offer my congratulations, on your election to the post of President of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. I am confident that the Conference will be conducted smoothly under your able leadership and fair administration.

The ILO has a unique tripartite structure among international organisations, being composed of governments, employers and workers. By adopting international labour standards and providing technical co-operation, the noble aim of the ILO is to establish the human rights of workers and improve their living standards, thus ultimately contributing to world peace. This Organisation has made sincere efforts toward this goal and we are proud that its activities and contributions were honoured with the Nobel Peace Prize in 1969.

The theme of the Director-General's Report to the Conference this year is economic recovery and employment. This theme is timely because economic development and social progress must proceed simultaneously so that human well-being and world peace, the goals of the ILO, can be achieved. It is economic development that actually brings a stable livelihood and improved conditions to each individual. Man does not live by bread alone, but neither can man live without bread. Without jobs, many people are unable to earn their daily bread.

The ILO has dealt with this issue in various ways over the years. The process of economic development ebbs and flows and may not reach all areas evenly. Therefore, it does not necessarily guarantee absolute or average living standards.

Because this is so, economic recovery and employment are the most urgent socio-economic issues facing the world today. The Director-General's Report states that while overall the world economy is recovering and expanding, economic progress in developing countries still lags and can even bring on lowered living standards.

The report discusses how to stimulate economic development in those areas and carry out social reforms concurrently. One of the major elements in solving the economic problems of developing nations is how to handle the debt question. Measures are being discussed by the IMF, the World Bank and other international financial institutions and the countries involved. The industrialised nations are also increasingly taking constructive steps in this direction.

The ILO has been active in undertaking extensive technical co-operation in order to supplement its standard-setting activities and to promote its universality. Technical co-operation is meaningless unless it is implemented effectively, in terms of both funds and know-how, to produce actual results. Technical co-operation activities should not result with people in the assisted countries, those who are directly involved in assistance activities, as well as the governments and non-governmental organisations supporting them, feeling that their efforts are in vain.

The Director-General's Report points out that a global approach is needed to rectify today's imbalances in the world economy and, in particular, overcome and resolve the issue of accumulated debt. It is important for the industrialised nations of the North to co-operate in helping the developing countries of the South, but at the same time, the South must use all available resources more efficiently and move from short-term measures to medium- and long-term policies. In addition, stringent cost-benefit criteria must be accorded the highest priority to ensure the efficient use of funds. This is the crucial point, the core of the issue.

Today, many industrialised Northern countries are seriously considering the question of aid to developing countries. The Japanese Government is very active in international co-operation, including assistance to debtor countries. As you know, Japan is today one of the world's largest donors of official development assistance. Because of its geographical location, it is giving priority to Asia and the Pacific region, where 3 billion people, or 60 per cent of the world's population, live, the majority on low incomes. It is also extending assistance to Africa and to Central and South American countries.

This year, Nikkeiren, the Japan Federation of Employers' Associations, established an International Co-operation Centre. This Centre will be involved mainly in providing technical assistance to strengthen the operation of employers' associations in developing countries. It will be gratifying if our small effort can contribute in some way to economic and social development in those countries.

It is my fervent hope that through international co-operation and truly effective use of the assistance provided to developing countries by numerous public and private organisations, steady progress can be made in eliminating unemployment and poverty.

The world faces many serious political, economic and social problems. The problems are countless, even in the social and labour areas, the ILO's special field. We must address each of these problems appropriately and work toward solutions. There is no time to discuss each issue individually here, but I would like to talk about the requisites for solving these problems. They are the establishment of favourable interpersonal and labour-management relations and of co-operation between workers and employers.

Speaking realistically, establishing industries and creating thriving economies is the starting-point and an essential element to improving living standard and social welfare. Industries must be vigorous so that they can provide opportunities for earning a living.

As the driving force in industry, employers and workers must work together to produce and to conduct business activities. Co-operation between labour and management, fostering social stability and economic development, achieves very important results. The ideas dating from the industrial revolution that workers and employers are antagonists and that management exploits labour are outdated. Today, in many industrialised nations, at least, it has been proved that labour-management co-operation in industry contributes to national prosperity and the well-being of all people.

In my position as Nikkeiren's president, one area in which I have made a special effort is exchanging views and opinions with both employers' and workers' representatives in industrialised and developing countries alike. Domestically, Nikkeiren discusses important social and economic issues, as well as labour questions, with Japanese labour organisations to foster better communication between our two sides.

I would also like to enlarge on the idea of respect for human beings, which is at the base of labour-management co-operation. The tradition behind this is Nikkeiren's belief that industry exists for the benefit of people. We have long advocated people-oriented management that values employees and is based on a high standard of business ethics and that, in its turn, contributes to the country and to society.

People-centred management begins with employment creation. It encompasses training workers, motivating them to participate in production, providing appropriate wages and benefits and making each employee truly feel some purpose in life.

The economic development and social stability of Japan today are due in large part to appropriate management based on respect for others and a people-centred approach, which has fostered positive relations between management and labour. I believe that taking good care of people is the most important aspect of operating a company. This universal principle is an indispensable element to stable labour relations and a stable society, as has been proved in other countries as well.

In his Report the Director-General points out the importance of discussions among governments, employers and workers. I cannot agree more. Even allowing for three different perspectives on the issues, I believe that the starting-point is co-operation and a people-oriented approach. The idea of wider social dialogue generated by this tripartite co-operation has already been adopted in many countries, and I hope that it will spread even more, in particular among the developing nations.

This would, as the Director-General states, bring about participation by all in steering the course of development, equitable distribution of the fruits of development and the spread of appropriate social welfare measures. It would also help cut down on regulation and government intervention in economic activities and contribute to more vigorous economic activity. This is truly a valuable way of achieving the ILO's goal of the common advance of economic growth and social progress.

Present today at this 76th Session of the International Labour Conference, 70 years after its founding, I am convinced that the beliefs and actions of Japanese employers until now have not been mistaken. At the same time, I am again deeply impressed by the seriousness of an esteemed international body, such as the ILO, brings to making its ideals a reality. As president of Nikkeiren, I pledge our continued efforts in the areas of international and technical co-operation.

In closing, I would like to express deep appreciation for the hard work and the achievements of Mr. Blanchard, who retired in March this year after 15 years as Director-General. I would also like to congratulate the new Director-General, Mr. Hansenne. His wide-ranging knowledge and extensive experience in the fields of social and labor administration will stand him in good stead in successfully carrying out the duties of the ILO Director-General.

Original – Italian: Mr. MULARONI (Minister of Labour, Republic of San Marino) – On behalf of the Government of San Marino and on behalf of my delegation, allow me to take this opportunity to congratulate you and your colleagues for having been elected to preside over the deliberations of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference.

I should also like, on this occasion, to reiterate my congratulations and best wishes to the Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, and to the delegates and Ministers here present.

I feel deeply honoured for having been given the opportunity to present my thoughts before this international gathering in the name of a small country which, in the course of its history, has made democracy and freedom one of its hallmarks and essential purposes.

Our presence here testifies to our determination to create a more just society, with full employment offering many forms of participation, and where power is distributed on an equal basis, where people – who are our main concern – may find an environment propitious for growth and enabling them to become useful to humanity as a whole.

Modern democratic societies increasingly manage labour through collective bargaining since they comprise many small groups which compete against each other and must be brought in line with the common good through appropriate policies.

In democratic societies, as in the International Labour Organisation, political decisions do not result from the enforcement of a superior will, such as that of the State, but from negotiation and agreement. The social contract is therefore no longer a static element, but one which is constantly being reviewed and corrected in order to govern. While society's organisations can balance the action of the State, there are nevertheless areas which fall outside of the scope of general policies, even in the more advanced societies. The principle of the individual's freedom persists.

It is in this sense that this assembly has adopted many Conventions. However, there are ever more forms of poverty and it is therefore necessary to increasingly sharpen awareness within the many international and national organisations so as to deploy greater efforts on behalf of human beings, who must be given access to a life of dignity.

Work for all people is one of the prerequisites for the attainment of freedom and full human development.

Therefore, it is essential for all organisations to look at the various problems which create obstacles to full employment and investment. Nevertheless, we must not ignore, as has been the case in past, environmental problems because it would be pointless to attain a very high employment rate in an environment which is unlivable or even dangerous for humanity.

In fact, the environment is becoming an increasingly international problem for it constitutes a wealth which belongs to the whole of humanity.

I am convinced that we must act ever more at the international level to implement policies aimed not only at defending but also at heightening appreciation of this precious good of humanity.

The International Labour Organisation itself must join in these efforts for it is upon their success that the very quality of our lives depends.

The problems facing people and society in general are numerous and sometimes insurmountable, but if we arm ourselves with good will and strive to attain our ideals, both as individuals and as organisations, we shall not only create conditions favourable to development, but we shall also succeed in bringing about the end of societies which harbour conflicts, apartheid and oppression.

We must also increase the number of occasions where peoples can meet each other in order to foster co-operation and solidarity. In this way, we shall be able to conciliate differences and increase the standard of living for all.

The Europeans are living through a historical time. Everywhere they are working to ensure that the whole of Europe can benefit from the innovations undertaken and the contributions which every community, large or small, can make to the process of unification.

A small society, such as San Marino, in order to participate in these major transformations, has only a limited population on which to rely and it must therefore involve all of its citizens.

Bearing that in mind, we are trying to increase the level of education of all our young people since knowledge and professional skills are the key to a secure position and options in the employment market and are therefore a crucial investment.

Our youth usually go on to higher education after compulsory schooling. This creates a sound basis for our future development.

In order to build the future, we cannot simply recreate the past, since in many OECD countries unemployment, which is on the rise, is using up important public resources and arousing concern, while the objective of full employment remains out of reach.

Therefore, we must strive for a future society which is more human and shows greater solidarity.

In order to solve the problems of large-scale poverty and unemployment with which we are concerned, it would suffice to rechannel a modest proportion of national armament budgets towards economic and social development.

We should set aside obsolete values and turn our attention to promoting respect for and harmony with nature, instead of attempting to dominate it. We should foster greater appreciation of what we have rather than consume it to excess. We should learn to find satisfaction in pursuits other than economic ones and, faced with the frenzied competition which has been the driving force of economic progress, we must encourage a new sense of solidarity and search for what unites us rather than what divides us.

If we manage to curb the exasperating consumer logic, we shall be able to give greater importance to creativity. Modern economies and technological innovations offer great opportunities for production and growth which we must use to serve man, to make the system serve man.

If, as I have said already, we unite our efforts to make full use of these opportunities, we shall be able to build a more human and freer society. I have spoken about various problems connected with a future centring on man. I should like to emphasise that continued joint reflection on human needs and human dignity can form a basis for co-operation among peoples. This has already happened in Europe with the final Helsinki Act which placed man at its centre, making him a unifying element.

Allow me, in conclusion, to express the wish that this session will be successful.

Original - Spanish: Mr. MALDONADO RUIZ
(Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, Guatemala)

- On behalf of the Government of Guatemala, and in my capacity as Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, I am happy to express my sincerest congratulations to Mr. Nkomo on his election to the presidency of this session. His great capacity and his experience are a guarantee of the successful conduct of the work of this 76th Session of the International Labour Conference.

I should also like to congratulate the Director-General of the ILO for his Report, particularly for the first part which, under the title Recovery and employment, tackles an essential problem for all the countries of the world. This subject is of great interest to my Government. For Guatemala, the first part of the report constitutes a valuable contribution which will undoubtedly be frequently quoted as a source in future discussions which, on the subject of economic recovery and employment, we hope to encourage with the participation of the most representative organisations of workers and employers.

From another viewpoint, I should like to express my agreement with some essential views contained in the Director-General's Report and at the same time to emphasise my concern at the fact that some ideas have not been considered. With all due respect: I believe that in the report the subject of "social debt" has not been sufficiently developed. In Part II of the Director-General's Report, where he speaks about the activities of the International Labour Organisation, reference is made to a meeting, the Sixth Regional Conference on Employment Planning in Latin America and the Caribbean, which was held in the capital of my country in December 1988. Unfortunately, it is not stated that that event was also convened as the First Conference on Social Debt.

In the course of that meeting, the opinion of the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare of Guatemala, for which I am responsible, differed from the views taken by a number of ministers of finance, economics and planning as concerns the category of social debt. Unfortunately, there was no time for an in-depth discussion but some conceptual groundwork was nevertheless carried out.

Subsequently, the Declaration of the First Meeting of Ministers of Labour of Central America and Panama, held in the city of Antigua, Guatemala, from 6 to 8 April this year, when referring to this subject, emphasised that social debt had its origins in a historical reality which promoted an unjust economic structure which led to a state of social injustice which is now chronic, aggravated by inequitable international economic relations imposed on our countries, in turn resulting in worsening backwardness and deepening poverty. Our Declaration adds: "These ideas furnish a series of qualitative realities as a framework for the concept of social debt, it being clear that its solution lies not only in curing financial ills and in promoting growth policies but rather in being more radical, and recognising the need to change the conditions of inequality, injustice in the workplace, inequitable distribution of wealth and the lack of opportunity that face the worker as he seeks to improve his standard of living."

As far as the Central American countries are concerned, the discussion of the subject which was first raised by the President of Brazil, Tancredo Neves, began in the course of the meeting that was convened by PREALC, the Regional Employment Programme for Latin America and the Caribbean, and was continued and expanded upon during the first meeting of labour ministers to which I have referred. As far as my own country is concerned, PREALC is now organising a forthcoming mission for the purpose of establishing a national diagnosis on this question of social debt. I believe that this initiative deserves support not only in Central America but also on a regional basis and, hopefully, world-wide with a view to enriching the ideas on the central topic of the Director-General's Report. In other words, the diagnosis of the social debt needs to be an integral part of the analysis of those problems. In my view, if that component is lacking, the design of strategies and actions will suffer from serious limitations.

I should like to express the political determination of the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare of Guatemala, for which I am responsible, to undertake whatever actions may be necessary to organise as many events and meetings as may be required for the purpose of analysing, with the leaders of the most representative organisations of workers and employers, the complex problems of the inter-relationship between economic development and employment, which implies the discussion of social debt.

Recent experience in my present office has shown me that traditionally, in many countries which are euphemistically known as developing countries, ministers of labour have been excluded from discussion and from decision-making on essential matters like economic growth and macro and micro-economic policies. In my judgement, this is a serious error which must be corrected. This subject and these policies are closely linked with employment and hence with the problem of employment which is the sine qua non function of ministries of labour. This decisive participation must, at the same time, lead to another one, concertation.

The new democratising process of my country has adopted as its strategic and tactical method, dialogue and concertation with workers and with employers, acting as interlocutor between the representatives of capital and labour. We have made real progress in the use of this method which we seek to make our practice not only in international relations but also in our daily work at home, particularly in relations between workers and employees and between them jointly and the Government. This conception was endorsed by the Declaration of Ministers of Labour of Central America and Panama who expressed their agreement with the view of the President of Guatemala, as expressed in his inaugural address of that meeting, on the need to rethink the role of ministers of labour in order to turn them into entities of social concertation.

I should like to say that it is precisely in the practice of social concertation that we have made progress. Guatemala is a country with serious economic and social problems and, if to this we add the lack of historical experience of democratic life, it is clear that making dialogue and concertation a general daily practice is not something that can be achieved in a matter of months. Nevertheless, I repeat that in this very strategy we have already made progress and an example of this can be seen in the solution to many disputes between workers and employers without having to resort to the courts or to direct action.

In my country nowadays we can say that we have the capacity to take some crucial decisions in the theory and practice of the Ministry of Labour. Independently of the fact that from day to day we are gaining experience in the promotion of dialogue and concertation, we shall soon be in a position to initiate discussions with the most representative organisations of workers and employers of the all-important standard-setting functions of the Ministry of Labour on the one hand, and of substantive and necessary labour relations on the other. We shall soon reach our goal in the achievement of which we have enjoyed the valuable co-operation of the International Labour Organisation in what has been a major national concern as well as a historic commitment to our people.

This example of co-operation with the ILO is one of the utmost historical importance. It sets a precedent and points the way to the future, and on the basis of that experience I would like to emphasise that co-operation on the part of any international organisation must be based on national needs and national requirements.

I avail myself of this opportunity to repeat that while maintaining the policy of active neutrality pursued by my Government in the Central American conflict, we reiterate our condemnation of apartheid in all its manifestations and our full respect for the right of the self-determination of peoples.

Mr. UMAR (Minister of Employment, Labour and Productivity, Nigeria) – Permit me, Mr. President, to join the previous speakers in congratulating you on your well deserved and unanimous election to the exalted presidency of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. You are presiding over the Conference at a unique period in the life of this global Organisation and at a time when most economies of the world are facing serious survival strategies. Despite that and the heavy agenda of the Conference, I have no doubt in my mind that with your wealth of experience you will steer the deliberations of the Conference to a successful conclusion.

On behalf of myself and my colleagues in the Nigerian delegation, I wish to welcome the new Director-

General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, to the post vacated by Mr. Francis Blanchard. It is fair, and indeed necessary, to pay tribute to Mr. Blanchard for the exemplary leadership, co-operation, mutual respect and understanding which characterised his administration and which are largely responsible for his successful tenure of office. I would also like to offer you, Mr. Hansenne, our hands of friendship, co-operation, mutual respect for your person and your office, so that you can improve on the record of your predecessor.

As we celebrate the 70th anniversary of the founding of the International Labour Organisation, we can justifiably look back and be proud of the achievements of the Organisation. In spite of the fact that the world has been passing through a debilitating economic recession, which has led to massive unemployment and its attendant social costs, the Organisation has nevertheless recorded considerable achievements in several areas of its activities. For example, through its standard-setting activities it has promoted better conditions of life and work for myriads of workers all over the world; its technical co-operation activities have brought relief to many developing countries; its adherence to its tripartite principle has assisted in solving many difficult problems; and the contribution of the World Employment Programme is highly appreciated by member States.

The Director-General's report, Recovery and employment, has focused on a very important and topical subject. He has done an impressive job of covering in a lucid and comprehensive manner the key issues relevant to the problems of economic recovery and the employment experience of the 1980s. My delegation identifies itself with most of the issues raised in the report. We note that many developing countries, especially those in Africa, are yet to experience the recovery which is already in place in the developed world. Most developing countries are still plagued by the debt problem, poor terms of trade, protectionism, high interest rates, drought, desertification, famine and malnutrition. Worse still, developing countries are forced to spend anything up to 50 per cent of their income on external debt servicing. This has led to a drop in real wages, and consequently to poor health, poor education, inadequate housing and a regrettable fall in the productivity of the average worker. This whole concept needs a thorough reappraisal and has to change in favour of the developing countries.

Nigeria, like most developing countries, embarked upon a structural adjustment programme to cure its economic difficulties and, in the process, to revive the hitherto dwindling employment opportunities. The import licence system was abolished and the allocation of scarce foreign exchange was left to be determined by the interaction of market forces; the currency was devalued to promote exports; and industries were required to source their raw materials locally to ease the demand on scarce foreign exchange. Measures dealing with trade liberalisation were introduced, inefficient public sector parastatals which hitherto consumed lots of public money are right now being privatised or commercialised to reduce government expenditure, while the economy is being deregulated by the removal of bureaucratic bottle-necks. Although we have made some gains in the implementation of the structural adjustment programme, it must be admitted that this was not without some social costs.

The road to recovery has not been smooth because of the difficulties imposed by some developed countries. Although we have largely succeeded in re-scheduling our debts, the repayment of these debts has been taking a heavy economic toll on our development plans, thus stifling our economic growth. As though this were not enough, some countries have mounted high tariff barriers against primary products from developing countries and the prices of our commodities are subjected to the vagaries of the international market. Oil, our principal foreign exchange earner, has been buffeted by the instability of the international market, thus disrupting our budgets and plans. Given the interdependence of nations, and the fact that no nation can go it alone, we support the Director-General's view that there has to be a global approach to the problem. Only a concerted, well intentioned and global approach could effectively address these fundamental and inter-related issues.

Despite these draw-backs, we have in Nigeria put in place some policies designed to improve the welfare of Nigerians generally and the employment situation of both rural and urban dwellers. Realising that one major factor that has aggravated the unemployment situation is the sheer size of the population and its growth rate, Government has introduced a population policy which will in the interim slow down its rate of growth and eventually help to control its size. The kernel of the policy is that no couple should have more than four children, since it is well known that the rate of growth of the labour force depends on the rate of growth of the population. The rapid rate of growth of the population has serious implications for a large labour force at a time when job opportunities are not expanding correspondingly.

The educational system is being reorganised to remove the problems posed by school-leavers who have no marketable skills. The new education policy which espouses the 6-3-3-4 system is expected to correct that deficiency. Universities and other tertiary institutions of learning will similarly tailor their courses to meet the manpower requirements of the country.

The Government has also embarked on some fiscal and monetary policies designed to correct the imbalance in external payments. The fiscal policy will ensure that the tax system allows adequate incentives for productivity and that personal disposable incomes are equitably distributed across groups and regions. Efforts have been made to moderate price inflations, to check the growth of money supply and to raise interest rates in order to attract savings which would be available for investment. The Central Bank of Nigeria credit guidelines specifically lay down the interest rate structure. My President made it abundantly clear in the 1989 budget that the ultimate solution to the unemployment problem could only come through increased capital investment in appropriate industries and enterprises.

The Government has also established a Directorate of Food, Road and Rural Infrastructure charged with the responsibility of mobilising the rural communities, developing the rural areas and improving the quality of life through the provision of roads, basic infrastructures and the stimulation of agricultural productivity, thereby generating employment. Since it was unrealistic to expect that all, or even most, of the new entrants into the labour market would be absorbed in the urban-based industrial sector, it became necessary to promote employment opportunities in the rural areas. Thus, rural employment is central to the Directorate of Food, Road and Rural Infrastructure. It is gratifying to note that the Directorate has succeeded in stemming rural-urban migration which was largely responsible for the high level of unemployment in the urban areas.

To combat unemployment in all its forms, another Directorate, the National Directorate of Employment, was set up specifically to generate employment. This is a bold step by the present Nigerian Government to arrest the menacing problem of mass unemployment in the country. The National Directorate of Employment is also expected to achieve short-term employment relief as well as long-term structural change in employment expectations. The long-term goals are to be achieved through the National Directorate of Employment's catalytic rôle.

To achieve its short-term and long-term goals, the National Directorate of Employment has developed its activities around four core programmes, namely: the Youth Employment and Vocational Skills Development Programme, the Special Public Works Programme, the Agricultural Programme and the Small-Scale Industries and Graduate Employment Programme.

The Youth Employment and Vocational Skills Development Programme is aimed at providing school-leavers with skills in specified trades that are in demand in the economy. Currently, there are two schemes in the programme namely, the National Open Apprenticeship Scheme, and the Waste to Wealth Scheme. The objective of the National Open Apprenticeship Scheme is to place unemployed youth as apprentices in private enterprises and government establishments for periods of one to three years to acquire marketable skills. On completion of their training, they are provided with loans and tool-kits relevant to their trade so that they can go into self-employment. The second scheme under the National Youth Employment and Vocational Skills Development Programme is the Waste to Wealth Scheme which aims at training people to turn discarded objects into valuable products such as jewellery, etc. This is already proving a big success as the products have turned out to be popular as items of export.

Employment is also generated through the special Public Works Programme. This allows unemployed youth to identify and execute labour-intensive projects. It provides relief from social distress and has helped many to bridge the unemployment gap. Those who participate in the programme are engaged in the construction and maintenance of buildings, public roads, irrigation, soil conservation, reafforestation, etc.

Under the Agricultural Programme, unemployed agricultural graduates and other persons with an aptitude for agriculture are encouraged to take to farming as a means of promoting self-employment and self-sufficiency in food production. Each participant is provided with suitable land, necessary agricultural inputs and a substantial easy-term loan for the purchase of agricultural equipment.

Under the Small-Scale Industries and Graduate Employment Programme, unemployed graduates and other young entrepreneurs are encouraged to set up small-scale enterprises, thereby providing employment for themselves and for others. They are taught the rudiments of how to run a small business and thereafter provided with bank loans.

Over and above all these, a new scheme called the Mature People's Programme has been introduced. It is intended to provide self-employment opportunities to adults who have remained unemployed through redundancy or premature retirement following the implementation of our structural adjustment.

The Government has stepped up its training and retraining schemes to ensure that displaced workers acquire new skills needed for alternative employment. The various vocational training centres have been provided with the necessary funds and equipment to ensure the success of this policy. The Government realises that improvement in training can contribute significantly in increased productivity, efficiency in the use of resources and improvement in economic growth.

Furthermore, the Government has recently put in place a new industrial policy aimed at increasing the rate of economic growth and improving the general employment situation. A major plank of this policy is the creation of a one-step agency, called the Industrial Development Co-ordinating Committee, for the timely consideration and approval of applications for the establishment of new industries by investors. Unlike in the past, when such applications had to pass through about five different ministries for approval, thereby occasioning long delays and the eventual frustration of potential investors, the new policy has now made it possible for all these considerations to be completed in one month by concentrating all powers within the committee.

In periods of economic crisis such as we are now facing, it has been realised that dialogue with our social partners is an absolute necessity in order to ensure industrial peace and harmony. Consequently, we have through the National Labour Advisory Council, a tripartite consultative body, broadened the base of our consultations to include matters relating to wage policies, labour market policies, revision of labour legislation, method of increasing productivity and measures for reducing the level of unemployment etc. This is in the realisation that both workers and employers have a direct interest in maintaining appropriate wage levels and avoiding high levels of unemployment.

I cannot end this address without referring to the obnoxious regime of apartheid in South-Africa, where the Blacks have suffered untold hardships and are the victims of exploitation, as recently exemplified by the ban on trade union activities. We urge the international community not to relent in its efforts to impose mandatory sanctions on South Africa. In addition, we appeal to all men of goodwill to support the arrangements for the independence of Namibia.

The PRESIDENT – I would like to remind all speakers to respect the 15-minute time limit for speeches.

Original – Polish: Mr. CZARSKI (Minister of Labour and Social Policy, Poland) – Mr. President, I have great pleasure to congratulate you on behalf of the Polish Government delegation on the occasion of your election to the eminent post of President of the present session of the International Labour Conference, the 76th in the history of the International Labour Organisation. I should like to convey particular congratulations to Mr. Michel Hansenne, the newly elected Director-General of the ILO. Let me assure you that my Government shall grant full support to you, Mr. Director-General, and to the Office headed by you. I should like to express my appreciation to Mr. Francis Blanchard, who for the past 15 years has guided the work of the International Labour Office with the utmost commitment and devotion. He has achieved in that field numerous meaningful successes, no doubt gaining the respect of governments and working people throughout the world.

The 70th anniversary of the founding of this international parliament of labour confers particular meaning and dimension on the present session of the Conference. Moments like this always furnish an occasion for taking stock of successes and defeats, of what has already been done and what is still to be achieved.

The actions taken up to now in favour of progress, social justice and the improvement of the conditions of life and work clearly mark the Organisation's prestigious mission throughout its 70-year-long history and its immense contribution to the improvement of the progress of civilisation in the world.

Poland, I should like to stress with pride and satisfaction, is a founder member of the ILO and has played a considerable part in the activities of the Organisation over the past 70 years. We belong to the group of countries which have ratified the greatest number of ILO Conventions. We are glad of common achievements and yet are aware of the scale and level of the difficulties that still mark our path.

It is our deep conviction that with joint efforts of all member States and of the Organisation itself we are able to make the world better and more just.

Only a year has passed since the last session of the Conference. A number of positive changes in the international situation have taken place in that time. Political and economic transformations in Europe and in other regions of the world have become more apparent and consistent.

In my country in April this year the round-table discussions came to an end after two months of negotiations. That debate, involving the representatives of all social and political forces, was the culmination of a certain stage of extreme importance to the Polish State and nation, to national reconciliation, to social, political and economic reforms.

The round-table discussions were an events of historical validity and dimension. They have paved the way to accelerated development, to meeting the expectations of society as a whole, of implementing a vision of our country as a State with an efficient economy, abiding by the principles of social justice and of the identity of social groups and organisations, a State open to pluralistic aspirations of the nation. A vision of public life is being created in which there is space for all law-abiding forces and for those who are guided by the Polish raison d'Etat.

In April the Parliament of the Polish People's Republic adopted three Acts: on associations, on trade unions of individual farmers, and on the amendment of the Trade Union Act. These three Acts are marked by a particular feature which, from the viewpoint of human, worker's and citizen's rights, gives them an extremely important dimension. These documents unequivocally underline the conditions for the implementation of democratic freedoms in Poland and widen the rights of citizens to free association in civic and trade union organisations.

Therefore, they constitute an important part of the reform programme being carried out in Poland. In this way, institutional forms have been created in which different state interests and views of society can be manifested, and in which participation in the decision-making process becomes possible. The new text of the Trade Union Act provides – in accordance with international standards – for an unrestricted principle of trade union pluralism at the enterprise level and leaves trade unions the freedom to adopt their organisational structures.

The Report of the Director-General has been studied in Poland with keen interest. The problems discussed in that report in the context of the current economic and social world situation, concern to a considerable extent the issues we are confronted with in my own country. Proposals aimed at their solution are similar to those implemented in social and economic life in Poland with full observance of the principle that economic growth and social progress must go hand in hand.

In the country I represent, many difficulties have accumulated. The level of inflation is big, the market is unbalanced and the foreign debt huge. The Polish Government is aware of the fact that in overcoming those difficulties we can no longer rely on traditional approaches. Therefore, the main motive of our economic policy now is to develop entrepreneurship, to provide conditions for the increased professional participation of working people and to spread the conviction of the social and individual value of work.

In order to implement this policy, not only consistency, not even social acceptance, but also co-operation are needed. An understanding of the need for a pluralistic structure of joint action and of common responsibility was the guiding principle of the round table and of the discussions held there, which culminated in the agreement of a wide reform-orientated coalition uniting the representatives of different ideological and political orientations.

At this juncture I wish to stress that on 1 June, there was a sitting of the Preparatory Commission of the Polish Tripartite Committee for Co-operation with the ILO. The foundation and activities of such a body will, in our view, be crucial for the establishment of a mechanism of tripartite consultations providing for more efficient co-operation of my country with the ILO.

Our economic philosophy at present consists of introducing the market mechanism in the right to economic freedom, equality of economic subjects of all economic sectors, in autonomy and self-financing. Conditions have recently been created in my country to promote the growth of initiative, entrepreneurship and efficient economic performance.

This new economic policy is expressed in the Programme of the Consolidation of National Economy for the years 1989-90 which is a kind of adjustment programme creating conditions for a consistent and complete switch to new relationships in all major components of the economy. The Programme clearly defines objectives, priorities and economic strategy.

The analysis of the condition of the economy, of social expectations and of the possibilities of meeting them has determined the need to specify the priorities in economic policy, which are agriculture and food economy, housing and environmental protection. All these priorities are decisive for the living standards of our people. They are an expression of objective needs and, as such, will remain the prime concern of the authorities.

The inadequate functioning of the food market, the rapidly rising cost of living, poor prospects for private housing and deterioration in the natural environment determine the social climate and often provoke social and political conflicts.

A priority in economic policy means a concentration of attention, energies and resources on a specific objective, but also increased efficiency in the utilisation of resources. It also means restructuring and demopolising the economy, allowing inefficient enterprises to go bankrupt, as outlined in the Report of the Director-General, and transferring resources, including manpower.

Conditions must be created to enable the flow of labour to those enterprises that are more effective and economically more promising, thus increasing the mobility of labour and hence the optimisation of the use of labour resources. That means that all sectors of the national economy should be equal in terms of labour supply and that the principles and methods of labour exchange and of the system of vocational guidance and orientation should be improved.

The phenomenon of unemployment has been unknown in Poland in practical terms since after the war. The present surplus of available jobs seems to indicate that no one should be in any fear of unemployment, but nevertheless we see problems resulting from the need to change jobs, to undergo professional retraining or from temporary unemployment in local labour markets.

We are tackling these problems in both their institutional and material aspects. We have devoted appropriate financial means to providing temporary social security to persons losing jobs in inefficient enterprises and to financing the process of requalification for those who will have to change their profession. We look forward to solutions which will not only motivate people to work, but also provide assistance to those in need.

The Report of the Director-General stresses the need to solve the international debt crisis and to improve and develop international economic relations. This line of thinking has the full support of Poland. We know from our own experience how great and difficult to overcome are the barriers of foreign debt and restrictions in international economic co-operation. That is why our doors are wide open to this kind of co-operation and to foreign investment. We have introduced solid and lasting changes in the principles governing the activities of foreign companies in Poland in the hope that together with domestic capital they will trigger new economic and social initiatives.

I have already quoted the statement contained in the Report of the Director-General that economic growth and social progress must go hand and hand. Returning to that quotation, I would like to add that in our country, notwithstanding considerable economic difficulties, we have never assumed or implemented a policy of limiting social achievement or allowing the real income of the population to decline.

In determining the guidelines of our incomes policy, we consider it an indispensable obligation of the socialist state to provide for the social security of its citizens; to protect the living standards of work veterans and to provide assistance to those who, through no fault of their own, face material difficulties.

Existing economic and financial regulations enable enterprises to provide funds for higher wages to compensate for increasing prices. The distribution of such resources among the workforce is a matter for the enterprises themselves, though it was recommended by the Round Table that the principle of indexing individual wages should be applied. We trust that the system of indexation will ease the spontaneous pressure on wage increases not related to better economic performance.

Regulations enacted this year have also introduced a system of wage fixing in the budgetary sphere which we hope should eliminate a justified dissatisfaction with the wage level of those employed in this sphere.

The catalogue of cash benefits currently in force in Poland basically covers all the risks to which the individual and his family are liable and in practice meets the most important social needs. Yet some of the criteria and principles for granting these benefits, their amount or the machinery for fixing their value may arouse criticism. Therefore, efforts are being undertaken to introduce far-reaching changes in this field. This does not mean, however, that before these changes are introduced we shall cease protecting the real value of the benefits. Pensions and old-age pensions, as well as other social cash benefits, are being increased and will rise in future at a rate not lower than prices.

Today's civilisation has brought about major dangers to the development of mankind, such as famine and poverty raging over vast areas of our planet, the deterioration of the natural environment, the exhaustion of natural resources, unemployment or debt exceeding the economic capacity of many countries. All these problems are discussed in the Report of the Director-General in a very accurate way. They constitute a challenge to the international society to stimulate and intensify action to solve them. Because of their scale, however, any action to limit those dangers and any attempt to overcome them may be successful only through international or inter-regional co-operation. The Director-General has formulated in his Report proposals on ways and means of achieving these objectives both on the macro-economic scale and on the scale of individual States and regions.

The implementation of these important goals, accompanied by the continuation of the process of disarmament and growing trust among States and political and military blocks, provides an opportunity to achieve considerable economic and social progress in the world. Achieving political and economic stabilisation, safety and social welfare for all nations and working people should be the aim of all our activities.

Original - Italian: Mr. FORMICA (Minister of Labour, Italy) - First and foremost I should like to express my congratulations on your election and to wish you the greatest success for the outcome of the 76th International Labour Conference.

The occasion is an agreeable one for me to renew my congratulations from the Italian Government to the Director-General, Mr. Hansenne, on his election to the head of the International Labour Office. The experience which he has acquired over a number of years within the Government of Belgium will be valuable for the whole Organisation.

The report which is the basis of our debate deals with the main problem of the current international situation at the beginning of the decade which will conclude the twentieth century. The situation is such as to demand considerable economic and social readjustment not only by countries which have long been industrialised, but still more – sometimes considerably more – by those which have undertaken the development process during recent years. Within this century, over the last 40 years, since the end of the Second World War, an important political process has begun, namely the end of colonisation. This represents a basic stage in the history of humanity, and a political result to which the peoples of the various continents have made a contribution in the form of sacrifice and commitment; but this is not sufficient to make our consciences easy. All of those amongst us who have social or governmental responsibility and have thus the possibility of enjoying contacts outside the limited reality of their own country feel particularly that they have more to offer and could indeed guarantee real possibilities for development for everybody.

We should begin to change the situation by means of new principles, setting in train concrete, realistic and effective initiatives. We have to understand that the sharp line still dividing the North and the South, the rich and the poor, is against the interests of the whole world and if we look closely at the social phenomena which result from this, we can see that it is in the interests of the countries of the North above all to reduce and progressively close the gap. A cynic might even say that these are the only countries with something to lose at the economic level, but a great deal to gain from the point of view of social peace.

Given that none of us is interested in following a line of conduct orientated towards conflict, we should make use of every international forum such as the ILO to develop policies of re-equilibrium. I want to speak of the ILO as an institution and as a specific forum now and in the future, because it is here that we can find a solution to the conflict seen elsewhere as well, for example in GATT, where we are confronted by economic interest pure and simple.

On the other hand, the International Labour Organisation, by its make-up and its internal social components, is an institution which makes it possible to bear in mind other factors to verify the utility of applying economic data to social factors translating arid figures to the problems of peoples and the values of international solidarity to which we all subscribe.

I would not wish to be taken for an idealist. In my country, I am considered a difficult politician, one who is in the habit of being very frank. There is no reason why I should change my style in this place or on this occasion.

A cursory reading of the news we get each day from every corner of the world, an elementary analysis of day-to-day events or an effort to understand social and political phenomena is sufficient to evaluate the scope of the situation forming the subject of our analysis, the difficult situation whereby each country or region is seen as having its own position and space, even if each is linked to and to some extent dependent on the other.

We could say that the problems of our country or region are closely connected. We could even describe them as being functions of each other.

Thus we can draw the first conclusions: nobody should have the illusion that he can act alone.

The Report of the Director-General notes several isolationist trends, systematically underlines the questions which are suggested to us by reality and indicates a working method to define a systematic approach to the economic and social problems of our times.

This is good work. On this basis we can construct good international relations.

Quantitative growth on the one hand, and a better quality of life on the other, represent the ambitions and factors providing the impetus to progress. However, these are objectives which cannot be reached in a fragmentary autonomous manner. On the contrary, we must have an organised approach and an effective basis for co-operation.

There is no shortcut and so far nobody has given any evidence of having any miracle solutions. Economic and social readjustment calls for policies of joint effort towards internal and international co-operation which should be in a position to guide resources towards the desired objectives.

When these objectives consist of overcoming structural imbalances in the world economy, in particular those which exist between the North and the South of the planet, we have to begin with such factors as determine the persistence of these imbalances.

The developing countries have insufficient resources at their disposal for development. How can we increase these resources?

A first reply, perhaps the most sensible is based on the possibility of extending world trade and reserving for these countries a more important section of it than they enjoy at present.

This is not the time to give lessons in economics, which we all know well, having studied it at university and in economic text book. Let us leave the economists to their own work and give to ministries and international economic organisations the task of establishing the various monetary, fiscal, credit, external trade, balance of payments, consumption and investment policies to be adopted in accordance with any given situation.

Here we are going to limit ourselves to putting a problem before you and determining the political conditions for its solution.

The problem is to guarantee the development of the world economy over a sufficiently long period, while trying to close the gap between the two regions.

We have to bear in mind two considerations: the considerable external debt of the developing countries and the situation of the rich countries where development is no longer automatically accompanied by an increase in employment.

The burden of external debt is a constraint which is not negligible for developing countries and it hinders the implementation of any plan aimed at recovery and growth. Debt servicing draws on the limited resources produced in these countries and channels part of the international contributions that they receive towards the major banks.

External debt is thus an issue of vital importance in the analysis of effective development policies. Italy has made its contribution in this sphere, but its initiative is still far too isolated.

Over the past decades the international banking system has made its fortune from the financing of developing countries. At present, it is in an impasse.

It would like to continue to increase its profits by means of interest on loans but it only receives valueless slips of paper and promises of payment which will obviously be difficult to keep.

The major bankers, governments and the countries which govern them, must be aware that this policy can no longer be applied and they must themselves encourage the implementation of an equitable plan for credit mobilisation. It is not by pulling the rug out from under their feet that we can save those who are at risk of being sacrificed. If debtors were to declare themselves bankrupt, the first to suffer the consequences would be the bankers and their problems would in turn affect the economic and financial systems of the countries where they carry out their activities.

A large-scale international initiative is absolutely imperative. I consider that the ILO, by way of its composition and its role at the social and political level, can support such an initiative.

Employment represents the other side of the dilemma, which is all the more serious in the developing countries, where demographic growth rates are generally high. The work done by international organisations, and the ILO in particular to compare, consider and stimulate, has brought forward certain consolidated elements of consensus with a view to defining strategies for world economic recovery.

The first of these is an awareness of the need for, but also the inadequacy of macro-economic stabilisation policies.

The second is the need to combine macro-economic measures with structural adjustment policies, at both the micro-economic and institutional levels.

The importance of social aspects and labour market aspects in structural adjustment policies has not yet been fully comprehended.

I should like to explain this by citing an example drawn from the Director-General's Report: we must take into consideration the social costs of stabilisation and structural adjustment, which do not represent an independent variable. Experience in restructuring, which the various industrialised countries have had to cope with at the beginning of the eighties, indicates that they have all succeeded in holding down inflation and continuing the inversion of the economic cycle, although their economic and social costs were radically different; this is what is called the "sacrifice rates".

As a result, when restructuring and adjustment are necessary, it is also necessary to bear in mind the social costs of policies of economic recovery so as to minimise them, thus contributing, inter alia, to longer-lasting and more stable economic growth.

This is applicable in all cases, especially when we speak about the development of countries of the southern hemisphere, where social conditions and the needs for social growth are much higher.

I would like to emphasise once more that this is not a problem which concerns these countries alone, nor is it a priority for these countries.

It concerns the whole world, because it refers to the need to involve large sectors of the population in productive activity, and at the same time the possibility of creating an "active society" in ever widening regions, thus overcoming conditions of degradation, dependence and mere assistance.

We must promote labour mobility which meets the peoples' expectations.

We must deal with the problem of existing migratory flows and those which will exist in the future.

We must examine the role which is played and that which should be played by workers, their organisations, their professional approach, their families and their culture in the process of international integration.

Each of us will then try to solve his own problems in relation to this context, which it would be all too simple to overlook.

In Italy, we have our own problems. I can assure you that they are difficult ones. We also have a considerable imbalance between north and south within our country, a problem which our economic and political specialists have faced for years.

We have also, no doubt, committed errors. The most serious was that of pushing workers towards job opportunities instead of creating job opportunities where the workers were living.

We have made the mistake of searching for solutions by means of public intervention and giving very little attention to the professional approach and entrepreneurial spirit of individuals.

We are now going to correct the errors of the past, for example by implementing a work and vocational training programme for young people, based on a financial contribution to their integration in production activities.

In any event, it would not be wrong to regard Italy as a case in point, a good laboratory. For this reason, we full our experience enables us to make suggestions in all modesty.

The only means of solving these serious problems is to step up co-operation amongst regions which have achieved different levels of development so as to provide tangible encouragement of internal and international progress of the weakest countries, while stimulating appropriate readjustment policies as highlighted in the Report of the Director-General Report.

I should also like to emphasise our financial commitment within the ILO, for I am firmly convinced that such a readjustment of the world economy calls for an effective strengthening of international co-operation, which occurs largely through the activity of international organisations such as the ILO, which do everything within their power to bring peoples closer together.

It is in this spirit, and as a token of our confidence in the ILO, that we have recently ratified the amendments of the Constitution adopted by the General Conference in 1986.

We intend to promote the technical co-operation programme of the ILO. I would emphasise here that Italy claims, in terms of its presence in the structure of the Organisation, a position corresponding to the important contribution of a highly developed country.

I should like to recall Italy's major contribution to the Turin Centre, a contribution which is the more positive since we recognise the priority of programmes aimed at utilising human resources and training to the full as part of policies to curb the recession.

While there are still many positive signs of a more peaceful and fruitful cohabitation in relations between different countries, once again I must strongly condemn the apartheid regime in South Africa and denounce the deplorable situation of the population in the occupied Arab territories.

Italy is in the process of doing its best to help the Black population of the Front-Line States to reduce their dependence on Pretoria.

New progress in the action of protest and revolt of the Palestinians has recently aggravated an already delicate situation in the occupied Arab territories. In this respect, we must act with determination so that the rights of the Palestinian people are ensured within the framework of human rights recognised throughout the world, an economic and social development bearing in mind the real needs and aspirations represented by the fundamental principles of the International Labour Organisation.

For some years now, in China, the gradual implementation of economic and social reforms have made us think about a peaceful and progressive transition toward more and more important and free forms of economic and social renewal. Chinese workers were beginning to benefit from the results of more numerous and diversified job possibilities thanks, inter alia, to the new structure in the production of goods and services.

At the present time the Chinese people are living through a truly tragic Spring. It is our duty to stand by them. The International Labour Organisation must make its voice heard and take appropriate initiatives.

The PRESIDENT – Again, I wish to remind the speakers to respect the 15-minute limit on speeches, otherwise I shall be compelled to invoke the powers invested in me by the Constitution and the Standing Rules of the Conference.

Original – Korean: Mr. CHANG (Minister of Labour, Observer, Republic of Korea) – It is a great honour and pleasure for me to speak on behalf of the Government and people of Korea at the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference.

At the outset, I should like to extend my heartfelt congratulations to you, Mr. John Nkomo, on your unanimous election to the presidency of this session. I am confident that this Conference will bring about, under your distinguished leadership, the most productive conclusion.

Upon examining the Report of the Director-General, I was impressed by the outstanding performance and progress achieved by the ILO during the last year. I should like to express my respect and appreciation to the Director-General and his staff for their excellent preparation for this session.

I also wish to pay my special tribute to Mr. Francis Blanchard, who has successfully completed his important duties as Director-General.

In his report entitled Recovery and employment, Mr. Blanchard carefully analysed the environmental and socio-economic situation in relation to technological and demographic patterns. He emphasised the importance of expanding environmental conservation and restoration projects, as well as developing infrastructure, including roads, railways, housing and hospitals.

I agree with him in the sense that these projects will enhance living environment and that such labour-intensive projects create many employment opportunities.

In addition, he suggested that the International Labour Conference call on member States of the United Nations and its specialised agencies to finance a series of operations at the regional level to create or refurbish essential infrastructure from funds saved as a result of settlement of regional conflicts and disarmament by major powers.

Believing that such regional co-operation among countries will contribute to promotion of employment and world peace, I welcome his suggestion as very valuable advice.

The Republic of Korea has made sustained efforts in pursuit of economic and social development since the early 1960s. Today Korea, which hosted the Olympic Games last year, is recognised as one of the successful newly industrialised economies in the world.

In the course of continued socio-economic development, working conditions, income distribution and the living standards of workers in Korea have steadily improved.

Even so, in every respect – political, economic and social – a new democratic order has been established under the banner of democratisation guided by the leadership of President Roh Tae Woo.

The labour field is no exception in this regard, and every effort has been made to guarantee the rights and interests of workers which were neglected in pursuit of growth-oriented economic strategies. Various labour laws have been revised. With the changes in the labour environment, trade union activities in Korea have been greatly strengthened recently, which has brought about a substantial increase in the establishment of trade unions. The number of trade unions increased to 6,141 in 1988 from 2,725 in the previous year, and some 1,800 labour disputes occurred in 1988, though this was much lower than in the previous year, which registered a record of 3,700 disputes as workers' demands suddenly erupted with the new democracy.

These developments can be regarded as an unavoidable transitional phase in Korea's industrialisation process towards economic advancement.

The Government of the Republic of Korea has made every effort to guide labour and management to peacefully settle disputes through negotiations in the principle of autonomy and equality. Thanks to such effort by the Government and the accumulated experience of negotiation, radical labour movement is disappearing; and I am sure that labour-management relations in Korea will be normal in the near future.

I believe that the true protection of workers can be realised through the guarantee not only of the three basic labour rights but also of the ability of the workers to lead a decent life both economically and culturally.

Such goals cannot be achieved in a short period of time but every country can make progress in a manner commensurate with its development stage.

On the basis of Korea's recent experience, I would like to emphasise that it is very important for countries undergoing industrialisation to recognise labour issues not only as a problem concerning workers and their employers but also as a national issue affecting every citizen of the country. I would also like to emphasise that a government must adopt appropriate policies to ensure that workers do not feel neglected.

On the other hand, the fruits of development should be fairly distributed among all people, including workers.

I firmly believe that only by doing so will the factors causing social discord be removed. Meanwhile, mistakes made in the course of economic development should be rectified and conflicts between labour and management overcome so that, eventually, national development can be achieved in a relatively short period of time.

I strongly believe that the wisdom and experience of the ILO will be of great value in these efforts, and I have no doubt that the ILO will continue to support and co-operate with developing countries in these matters.

I should like to make a brief observation on the agenda of this session.

As for the agenda item concerning the revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107), as the Korean population is very homogeneous, the treatment of indigenous groups is not an issue in Korea. However, I firmly believe that every human being should be treated equally based on humanism, the basic spirit underlying the United Nations and the ILO.

Now, I would like to speak briefly on the issue of night work, which is designed to protect women workers from heavy work and other hazards. The Labour Standard Law in my country stipulates that women workers should not be assigned any work from 10 p.m. to 6 a.m. without permission from the Ministry of Labour.

I have no objection to the principle that women or children should be protected. However, it should also be noted that prohibition of night work may inevitably reduce employment opportunities for women in the labour market.

In this respect, regulations on prohibition of night work for women may have an undesirable effect on the employment of women workers. Furthermore, as diet patterns and the physical condition of women improve and as industrial development will create various types of jobs which can be performed equally by men and women, regulations on night work, Convention No. 89, should thus be revised in an appropriate way.

At the same time, revisions should be made with flexibility in consideration of each country's diverse physical conditions, food patterns and culture.

For example, instead of strictly prohibiting night work for women, it would be much more effective to allow night work when requested by women workers and when it is not detrimental to their health.

The third agenda item, "Safety in the use of chemicals at work", is very timely and appropriate.

It is true that industrial accidents have so far been generally thought of as accidental disasters and that occupational diseases caused by the handling of harmful substances or explosive chemicals have not been given much attention.

As the production and use of chemicals is now on the increase in industry, I believe it will be an epoch-making project to adopt international standards concerning the use of chemicals.

At the same time, medical technology should be developed to more effectively detect symptoms of occupational diseases caused by handling of chemicals.

In Korea an increasing number of people now believe that industrial safety will eventually result in lower costs and increased productivity. Recognition of the importance of industrial safety has deepened, and workers now give high priority to safety in the workplace in making labour demands.

To respond to such a changing environment, the Korean Government in January 1980 established the Industrial Safety Bureau within the Ministry of Labour. In addition, the Korean Industrial Safety Corporation was established as an independent organisation where expert technicians conduct research on industrial accidents and evaluate working environments.

With the successful hosting of the Seoul Olympics in 1988, the Republic of Korea demonstrated its willingness to participate more actively in the promotion of world peace and the development of human society.

It will spare no effort to help cope with low economic growth, low employment and poverty facing the world; and in pursuing these goals, Korea will establish closer co-operation with member countries of the ILO seeking technological co-operation in various fields.

Also, the Republic of Korea wishes to play a more active part in the ILO activities and to share with member countries the experience and the know-how it has acquired in the course of economic development. In doing so, Korea will continue to make an effort to contribute to the prosperity of all mankind.

May I take this opportunity to extend to the respectful member countries my deep appreciation for their kind support and co-operation shown to my country in its desire to become a full member of the International Labour Organisation.

I sincerely hope that with your continued support and encouragement, the Republic of Korea will be able to achieve full membership in the near future. Korea will continue to maintain its relationship of close co-operation with the ILO and its member countries.

Before closing, I would like to express my sincere hope that this Conference will be a valuable occasion for seeking ways to improve human rights and the safety of workers, and that the ILO continue to make a substantial contribution to the common prosperity of all mankind.

I pray for the everlasting prosperity of the ILO and its members, and wish success and happiness to all the distinguished delegates.

Original - Arabic: Mr. SAID (Government delegate, Iraq) - In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I take great pleasure and pride in conveying you greetings from Bagdad, the city of peace and victory, from President Saddam Hussein (may God protect him), President of the Republic, and from the Government and People of Iraq, and in wishing your Conference every success in its work. I hope that the Conference will attain its goals and consolidate the principles of human justice, so that security and stability might reign throughout the world and that man may aspire to a state of wellbeing and creativity which benefits mankind as a whole.

I should also like to congratulate the President most warmly on his election to steer the deliberations of this Conference. His considerable ability and his vast experience will help him to conduct the work of this Conference and to achieve positive and fruitful results and recommendations; these will, in turn, help towards achieving economic and social progress throughout the world.

I should also like to congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne on his election to the post of Director-General of the ILO. His experience and competence will stand him in good stead in running the affairs of this Organisation, so that it can play its vital role of improving the world of work and the situation of workers. I should also like to pay my respects to the outstanding work carried out by Mr. Francis Blanchard, former Director-General of the ILO, and to the considerable role he played at the Head of this Organisation, when he achieved many successes. I wish him a long and happy life.

The 76th Session of our Conference is being held at a time when many developing countries are having to cope with a vast number of economic and social problems, which are bringing a permanent drop in the living standards of many of their inhabitants in their wake. The phenomenon is accompanied by the chaotic situation in the world economic system, the repercussions of which are felt throughout the world. In addition, many countries are having to face serious climatic problems, such as desertification, drought and natural disasters, which go hand-in-hand with famine, malnutrition and wide-scale migrations to find means of subsistence. On the other side of the coin, we are faced with the spectacle of the waste of funds and considerable wealth; this not only applies to construction and development but also to the arms race and military expenditure which, in addition to economic and political problems, causes a permanent deficit in the budget of these countries. Whilst hoping that attempts at disarmament will bear fruit and result in an objective and practical policy, we hope that this policy will extend to other areas of the world, especially those which are the scene of widespread military conflicts and regional problems and which need the help and effective action of the international organisations and the international community as a whole. In particular, the area of the Middle East is considered at present to be one of the regions representing the greatest danger to the future of mankind. A cursory glance at what has been happening in this region for many years is enough to prove that these problems should be dealt with at the international level. The first measures in this respect should be taken by the United Nations and their specialised agencies to create a situation of stability, peace and well-being in this region.

Furthermore, the burden of the foreign debt of many countries and its negative repercussions on their economies in creating an obstacle to development and affecting the living standards of their inhabitants; at the same time it is undermining social security and increasing the seriousness of problems in these countries. All this is having an impact on the overall situation of several countries, whose sovereignty is embedded in democratic foundations and which apply principles of freedom and security in these regions.

I take pleasure in referring to the report of the Director-General, which is entitled Recovery and employment. This is one of the most vital issues, affecting the future of millions of people, that must be tackled in order to find practical and objective solutions to the problems of the world economy, to increase work opportunities and to step up co-operation in international trade.

The Director-General's Report describes the negative developments experienced by the world economy during the past decade and their repercussions on social progress – especially on the economies of developing countries, on account of the social expenditure they have had to shoulder. In spite of this, the Director-General is somewhat optimistic as to the possibility of increasing economic growth rates, thereby creating jobs. However, we must adopt strategies to attain this goal, whilst stepping up our efforts to put an end to economic and social crises and to usher in the principles of social justice and progress – that the ILO is always trying to strengthen. In spite of this optimistic note in the Director-General's Report because of the positive growth rates in a number of countries, poverty and want continue to be the norm in vast areas of our contemporary world and total or partial unemployment continues to prevail in many countries of Asia, Africa and Latin America: other countries in the North, however, have not yet succeeded in shaking off the negative repercussions of the international economic imbalance. As the Director-General pointed out in his Report, preparations for the United Nations Fourth Development Decade offer an excellent opportunity to proceed with the necessary modernisation. We are convinced that the ILO will have a leading role to play, in co-operation with the other United Nations agencies, in guaranteeing the success of this strategy, especially in the field of employment development and unemployment policies; in so doing, it will contribute towards increasing production and development rates, ensuring a fair distribution of income and bringing about the well-being of everyone.

My country has attached great importance to development, guaranteeing employment to all Iraqis of working age and providing job opportunities for thousands of Arab workers and foreign workers who have come to work in Iraq and participate in its vast development projects, thus benefiting from high wages and excellent working conditions. But this economic revival and development have not pleased the enemies of Iraq who have sought by all means to put a spoke in the wheel of development and social progress. These means took the form of an eight-year war, to put an end to the conflict by peaceful means. It responded positively to international appeals and to Security Council resolutions, the last of which was resolution 598, whilst the other party persisted in its determination to continue this war. However, Iraq's tenacity and its glorious victories in 1988 forced the other party to accept the resolution. Since the war ended in August 1988...

The PRESIDENT — I give the floor to Mr. Nabian, Government adviser of the Islamic Republic of Iran, on a point of order.

Mr. NABIAN (Government adviser, Islamic Republic of Iran) — In the Name of Allah, the Merciful, the Compassionate. I did not wish at this stage to take the floor, but I feel obliged, on behalf of the delegation of the Islamic Republic of Iran, to raise a point of order according to the Standing Orders of the Conference, under article 14, paragraph 5. I hope, Mr. President, that you will do your best – in accordance with the promise and commitments you made at the beginning of the Conference – to ensure the smooth running of the Conference, with the full co-operation of all the participating member States. We, too, assure you and the august Conference of our full co-operation – by which we mean co-operation between both parties. Any implied or explicit reference to subjects beyond the subject of recovery and employment – that is to say the Director-General's Report – is outside the scope of the discussions of this august assembly, and, despite our willingness, the Iranian delegation will see fit to raise a point of order requesting the President to firmly request the speaker to keep to the items under discussion and not go beyond what is supposed to be discussed here. Any implied or specific reference to a particular member State requires a right of reply, which will be requested if necessary.

The PRESIDENT – Before I allow the speaker to finish, may I once again appeal to the delegates to avoid issues that may cause unnecessary friction, issues that are extraneous to the matters discussed in the Director-General's Report.

It is my understanding that the issue referred to by the Iranian delegation is being handled in other forums. I request the speaker's co-operation for the sake of the smooth running of this Conference.

Original – Arabic: Mr. SAID – Since the war ended in August 1988, my country has sought to take all the necessary arrangements to implement all the operative paragraphs contained in Security Council resolution No. 598, under the auspices of the Secretary-General of the United Nations and through direct negotiations between the two countries – known as the Geneva Negotiations. It is for this reason that we state at this Conference today that the only way forward possible is to strive to establish total and lasting peace between the two parties, and that any attempt to take another course and to turn these negotiations into a game of manoeuvres can only destabilise the region. In adopting this stand, we must understand the true significance of resolution 598; i.e., that it stands for the establishment of a lasting, fair and honourable peace between the two parties. My country firmly believes...

The PRESIDENT – Would you please address your remarks to the Director-General's Report and avoid this friction. Please avoid references to the Security Council's resolution.

Original – Arabic: Mr. SAID – My country firmly believes that the setting up of a sound basis of economic co-operation between peoples is vital to consolidate international political relations and that a situation of economic and social stability in the world may be achieved by setting up regional economic groups of co-operation. It was bearing in mind this premise that, at the beginning of the present year, the Council of Arab Co-operation laid the foundations for economic co-operation between the Republic of Iraq, the Arab Republic of Egypt, the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan and the Yemen Arab Republic. This Council is attempting to establish strong links with the Co-operation Council for the Arab States of the Gulf, the Union of Arab Maghreb and the international and regional organisations of economic co-operation, in order to attain the well-being, prosperity and happiness of mankind.

The large popular uprising ("intifadah") which is being led by the Palestinian people in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories against the Zionist occupation is striving to attain its lawful rights and the establishment of its independent State. This uprising is being put down by the Israeli occupation authorities, using methods of barbarous repression and arbitrary measures, which violate the principles of the United Nations, international charta and labour standards promulgated by the ILO in the field of human rights. All this is happening at a time when the Director-General has submitted his Report on the situation of Arab Workers to the Conference. This tragedy can only come to an end with the establishment of an independent State of Palestine on Palestinian soil, which embodies the aspirations of the Palestinian people and its hopes for a free and dignified life. The international community represented at our Conference most certainly supports the principles of peace and freedom. The fact that many countries supported and recognised the proclamation of the State of Palestine bears witness to the fact that the international community wants to establish an independent State of Palestine on Palestinian soil, led by the Palestine Liberation Organisation which is the only lawful representative of the Palestinian People, thereby ushering in lasting peace in the Middle East.

The events which have been disrupting Lebanon since 1975 up until this day and the suffering inflicted on this country, are due to foreign intervention into domestic affairs. If security and stability are to be returned to this country, all foreign forces must withdraw and there must be an end to foreign intervention, so that the Lebanese people might deal with their national problems themselves.

We have examined Part II of the Director-General's Report on the activities of the ILO which deals with the work of the Governing Body and of the ILO to try and apply the resolutions adopted at previous sessions of the International Labour Conference. We have also taken note of ILO's activities in the field of technical co-operation and the application of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa. The Director-General's Report reflects the ILO's praiseworthy efforts and commendable activities to try and implement previous resolutions. In this context, I should like to state that we hope that the share of the Arab people in technical co-operation will be increased in the future. As regards the Director-General's Report on Apartheid, I am particularly proud to state that my country supports and backs all resolutions taken to put an end to the policy of racial discrimination in South Africa and Namibia and calls upon the international community to apply sanctions against racist regimes and those that co-operate with them.

The agenda of our Conference contains a number of items that particularly concern the world of work and workers. It contains three vital technical items; the first deals with the partial revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107), which will lead up to the adoption of a new instrument covering the needs of the categories concerned by this Convention. The second item concerns night work, which has been placed on the agenda of the Conference after several years of planning, research and the collection of information, with a view to establishing a legal basis to deal with this problem which gives rise to many disagreements in international labour legislation. We hope that the Conference will succeed in drawing up an international document that takes into account developments in this field, especially the night work of women. The Conference is also going to examine safety in the use of chemicals at work. The Conference is asked to update data in this important field, which concerns the protection of millions of workers affected by the use of chemicals, while taking into account technological development of products used at the workplace and the development of occupational safety standards required by various branches of activity of industries.

At this point I should also like to stress that Iraq attaches, in its national legislation, great importance to protective methods and conditions of occupational safety at the workplace; indeed, several laws and regulations deal with this subject.

In concluding, I should like to say once again that I hope that our Conference has successful results that will contribute towards bringing about peace, well-being, progress and prosperity of mankind as a whole. May peace, mercy and the grace of God be with your.

The PRESIDENT – Again, I wish to request that delegates confine their remarks to the Director-General's Report.

Mr. LEE (Minister for Labour, Singapore) – On behalf of the Singapore delegation, I wish to congratulate you, Mr. President, on your election to chair this 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. Under your able leadership, I am confident this Conference will be a success.

1988 has been a good year for many of us. World economic growth has continued through 1987 and into 1988. Barring any unforeseen circumstances, we are likely to end this decade with further growth this year.

However, the global economy remains fragile although most economists do not expect a recession this year. The question is how long the present state of affairs can carry on.

The 1987 stock market crash did not bring about the depression that many feared it would. Massive injection of liquidity into the world financial system kept it afloat, at the risk of inflation later on. Stock markets are booming once more and vast profits are made selling script instead of goods.

It remains to be seen whether countries have the political will to overcome the structural problems of the world economy. Even if they do, it will not be a painless process. If they do not, the problem will continue to fester and grow.

The currency realignment has significantly altered the comparative advantage and purchasing power of different countries. It has made American products more competitive but many customers continue to buy Japanese products despite their higher prices.

Some progress has been made at least in recognising the reality of the huge LDC foreign debt, part of which may never be repaid. Meanwhile many developing countries are staggering under the weight of their external debt, high birth rates, high unemployment and social instability. To their citizens, the issue is not whether their employment standards are comparable to those of developed countries but whether there is sufficient income to feed and clothe their families.

The underlying economic difficulties provide a fertile ground for the protectionist lobby in various countries. Uncompetitive industries clamour for protection at the expense of the consumers. The trend is towards more managed trade rather than free trade. We can expect more trade disputes and trade friction.

Domestically, the pressure to restrict markets is great. But the most serious consequence of more restrictions will be more conflicts. Nations will be forced to integrate themselves into trading blocs. Increased integration will bring about greater exclusion of the developing countries.

There is some concern that the Economic Community, when it becomes a common integrated internal market by 1992, would withdraw itself into a "fortress Europe". It is our hope that this will not materialise. Europe must remain the champion of free trade. More than 40 per cent of EC exports are now shipped to countries outside the EC. To withdraw into a fortress mentality would only negate the advantages that an integrated market can bring.

A protectionist America and Europe will set back world economic gains. It was the West that set the rules for free and fair exchange of goods and services through the GATT. With rising protectionism, everybody will be the loser. The poor countries will fall deeper into the clutches of poverty.

As a small nation which is extremely dependent on world trade, Singaporeans watch this protectionist tide with grave concern. It affects not only us but also our ASEAN partners, with whom we have increasing economic links.

The Singapore economy is perhaps the most open economy in the world. Almost any raw material or finished product can enter or pass through Singapore duty-free. Excise duties are collected on only a few items such as liquor, cigarettes, petrol and cars for revenue reasons or for special purposes such as to reduce traffic congestion. With our manpower and resource constraints, our entrepreneurs and industrialists have to upgrade themselves to compete internationally. Otherwise, they may be assisted to relocate to neighbouring countries so that our resources can be released for more productive uses.

This process of restructuring is difficult and often painful but our circumstances leave us with little choice. Larger economies can protect their inefficient sectors for longer periods but the day of reckoning will come.

Just when protectionist pressures are rising, the world is getting more interdependent. A multilateral and co-operative approach is essential to resolve the problems confronting the world today, whether it is trade, the environment or drugs. Countries should not expect others to uphold free trade whilst they themselves hide behind protectionist barriers.

The opening up of some socialist countries presents us with new opportunities and challenges. They can be good partners in trade and development as well as formidable competitors.

The ILO is an important forum for international co-operation. The ILO has done much to raise the standard of living of workers in both the industrial and the developing countries. In the past, the ILO's task was made easier by the last 30 years of unprecedented growth in international trade which has generated economic prosperity for many countries. Job opportunities also grew as a result.

However, the future outlook is clouded with uncertainties, many structural economic problems remain unresolved and protectionism is on the rise. The ILO should take a serious view of the increasing trend of protectionism. It has an important role in helping to ensure that the world trading system remains open.

Like many other international organisations, the ILO is saddled with a burgeoning budget. To tackle problems more effectively into the 1990s, the ILO has to ensure that it remains trim and supple. One way would be for it to cut down on the frequencies and the duration of its meetings. Another would be to cut down on the number of committees at the annual International Labour Conference. More emphasis would have to be given to employment promotion rather than standards-related activities. Activities should be regional-based on the basis of needs.

We are also pleased to note that the ILO has been adopting a more flexible approach in its supervisory function. It should continue to do so and be more sensitive to the domestic circumstances of its Members.

This is a period of change and transition. The challenge before the ILO is how to ensure that it continues to remain relevant in such turbulent times.

SECOND REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT – The first item on the agenda is the second report of the Selection Committee. I give the floor to the Clerk of the Conference.

Original – French: The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE – On page 4A/1 the last country under the Government members of the Committee on Apartheid should be USSR, not Ukrainian SSR.

The PRESIDENT – I call on Mr. Hammond, Government adviser, Canada, Chairman of the Selection Committee, to submit the report to the Conference.

Mr. HAMMOND (Government delegate, Canada; Chairman of the Selection Committee) – I have the honour to submit to the Conference the second report of the Selection Committee, found in Provisional Record No. 4A.

The report deals first with the composition of the Committee on Apartheid. The Selection Committee recommends that the Committee on Apartheid be composed of 20 Government members, 15 Employers' members and 20 Workers' members. The list of the members of the Committee on Apartheid is appended to the report, and you have just heard of a correction to its Appendix.

The Committee recommends that Palestine, as a liberation movement, be invited to be represented at the 76th Session in the Committee on Apartheid and the Resolutions Committee, in accordance with article 56, paragraph 10, of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

Finally, the Committee also recommends that the Conference approve a number of changes in the composition of Committees.

I commend the report to the Conference for adoption.

The PRESIDENT – The discussion on the report is now open. I give the floor to Mr. Georget, Employers' delegate, Niger.

Original – French: Mr. GEORGET (Employers' delegate, Niger; Vice-Chairman of the Selection Committee) – Mr. President, this may be a good opportunity for me to congratulate you on your election. I am sure that with your wide experience you will conduct our work very successfully. Through you I should also like to congratulate all the Vice-Presidents who will contribute to our work.

The reason for my statement this morning is the fact that yesterday the distinguished delegate of the Government of Nicaragua protested against the procedure followed by the Employers' group on 7 June. The report of that sitting will show that the Employers' group gave every opportunity to the Employers' delegation of Nicaragua to register as a candidate for committees of their choice. The decision of the group as to proposals to be put before the Conference was taken subsequently without any question or objection being raised. As the Government delegate of Nicaragua was reminded yesterday, there is an appeals procedure, which is objected to year by year but which exists, and it is up to the Appeals Committee, if it has before it a complaint, to act upon it. I regret having to make this statement today. I wished to do so at yesterday's sitting, as the Chairman of our group did in identical circumstances in 1987, but for reasons which my group does not accept, and which I will not now describe in detail, I was prevented from doing so. My group hopes that such incidents will not recur, that in future the Standing Orders will be used in good faith and that freedom of speech, which perhaps does not exist in all countries, will be respected in our Organisation.

The PRESIDENT – I have taken note of the remarks made by Mr. Georget. I would like to assure Mr. Georget that we will do our best to ensure that there is freedom of speech.

If there are no objections, I take it that the report is adopted?

(The report is adopted.)

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

The PRESIDENT – We now move on to the next item on the agenda: the discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Original – Arabic: Mr. AL-BDOUR (Minister of Labour and Social Development, Jordan) – It gives me great pleasure to associate myself on behalf of the Jordanian delegation and in my own name with those who have preceded me in congratulating you, Sir, on your election to the presidency of our Conference. It is a testimony of our confidence in your person and in your skills, and is an honour not only to your country but also to the continent of Africa. We wish you every success in guiding our deliberations.

I would also like to offer warm congratulations to Mr. Michel Hansenne on the occasion of his election as Director-General of the International Labour Office. I am confident that Mr. Hansenne will enjoy the same trust as his predecessors and will guide our Organisation with great skill. We know all his qualities, his experience and his capabilities which qualify him for this important task. It also gives me pleasure to extend my thanks and appreciation to Mr. Francis Blanchard, the former Director-General of the International Labour Organisation, who has rendered much important services to this Organisation throughout his three terms of office and who has been exemplary in his dedication and devotion. Once again, we extend to him our thanks and very best wishes.

This session coincides with the 70th anniversary of the founding of the International Labour Organisation in 1919 and the Report of the Director-General on economic recovery and employment consequently assumes special significance.

This Report addresses a most important international issue of great complexity which affects the entire world. The Report affirms the necessity for industrialised countries and developing countries alike to meet the basic challenge of finding employment opportunities that will enable us to cope with the rising level of unemployment. We in Jordan, one of the developing countries, are faced with this challenge and our Government has set up a senior ministerial committee to deal with unemployment and, in particular, the local labour market. Our aim is to provide employment opportunities for citizens looking for work and as much, reflects our constant concern for the problem of unemployment as well as for the economic and financial problems that beset us.

Our Government also devotes special attention to the environment and the protection of natural resources. This attention is reflected in the introduction of environmental considerations into our national development plan. Jordan also participates in international efforts to protect the environment, and this even at the highest level. His Majesty King Hussain attended the recent international conference held in the Hague and has signed the international declaration on the protection of the ozone layer it adopted.

We also share the opinion of the Director-General that the world labour and social situation is a cause of grave disquiet. Still we do not despair that the world will live up to its responsibilities through concerted and joint efforts and that it will be able to put an end to our present degradation and resolve all the problems that confront us. This can be done thanks to the profound changes that are taking place in the world and to new ways of thinking which give us hope that new solutions will be found to serve the best interests of mankind in a spirit of co-operation and dialogue.

This is why we endorse the conclusions reached by the Director-General in his Report, especially where he called upon the major industrialised countries to shoulder their responsibilities in order to alleviate the burden of the Third World countries which are suffering from stagnation and even regression. These countries certainly are in urgent need of solidarity from the industrialised States. The developing countries, especially those with a heavy burden of debt, badly need a breathing space in order to recover, to start introducing reforms and to develop their exports without the poorer countries having to bear the brunt of structural adjustment. Perhaps the initiative recently put forward by France, which expressed her intention to cancel unconditionally the debts owed by 35 of the least developed countries may be considered as one of the most important and positive initiatives; it should be introduced more widely and should be taken as an example by the other industrialised States in order to find a solution to the insurmountable problems facing the world. This is an appeal to these countries to show solidarity with the developing countries.

This Conference coincides with the continuing struggle of the "intifadah", in the occupied Arab territories. This uprising has entered its nineteenth month and has come up against the most brutal forms of racism and repression. It embodies the will of the Palestinian people to liberate itself from the yoke of the Israeli occupation and to regain its legitimate rights to self-determination on its national soil.

We do not need to reaffirm here what already has been stated in the Report of the Director-General. The tragic situation in the occupied Arab territories and the policies of destruction and of uprooting of the Palestinian people and the damages suffered by all its economic, social and cultural institutions since 1967 are well known to all of the sessions of the International Labour Conference to the international community.

However, we would like emphasise the following: firstly, the suffering of this people can only end with the cessation of the Israeli occupation and Israel's compliance with the will of the international community which has condemned this occupation policy, and with Israel's application of all the resolutions adopted by the United Nations and its specialised agencies. Israel must recognise the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people, including its right to self-determination on its national soil, which is the basis for the establishment of just, comprehensive and lasting peace in the region.

Secondly, in the light of the escalation of severe policies and measures being adopted by the occupation authorities, we have submitted a draft resolution concerning protection of the rights and freedom of Arab workers and employers in Palestine and all other occupied Arab territories. In the name of justice, therefore, we call on all members of this distinguished international conference to support this draft resolution and thereby rekindle hope in the people of Palestine sincerely struggling toward real peace based on justice and equality.

Thirdly, so long as Israel ignores the call of reason and will of the international community and the international resolutions concerning peace in the region with their guarantee of a just solution to the Palestinian problem, we call upon the International Labour Organisation to implement the provisions of the resolutions adopted by our distinguished Conference in 1974 and 1980 calling for technical assistance programmes for the Palestinian people and to its labour force under occupation to enable them to cope with Israeli practices and policies.

We call upon the International Labour Organisation to implement the recommendations contained in the report of the Director-General's mission, recommendations which we believe, as does the mission itself, remain valid, since assistance provided for the occupied territories is not commensurate with the degree of suffering and the tragedy to which the inhabitants and the workers in the occupied Arab territories are being subjected.

I should like to make some comments on parts of the Report of the Director-General, especially paragraphs 18 and 22 of Appendix 3, where reference is made to my country, directly or indirectly.

Firstly, until the decision regarding the dissolution of legal and administrative links with the West Bank, Jordan took upon itself the responsibility of supporting and assisting the inhabitants of the occupied Arab territories, as attested by the allocation of a special item in our 1987 budget to fund the various economic and social development programmes in the occupied territories, in support of their resistance to Israeli policies and measures relating to productive and agricultural enterprises. Even after this decision Jordan never refrained from providing all possible financial assistance. For example, the Jordanian Government decided to reopen the branch of the Cairo-Amman Bank on the West Bank and to continue payment of salaries to some categories of workers.

Secondly, concerning what the Report has called restrictions, or even temporary bans, on agricultural products coming from the West Bank, the neutral observer may know that Jordan used to absorb a considerable quantity of such products and if there are some organisational measures they have been taken in view of food and agricultural shortages in the occupied Arab territories as a result of the restrictive and repressive policies of the occupation authorities against Arab agricultural and industrial enterprises. Israel had aimed to cause bankruptcy to these institutions in order to jeopardise the economy of the occupied Arab territories and to make it dependent upon the Israeli economy. There are numerous examples cited in the Report in this respect, unfortunately, however, we do not have sufficient time to quote them.

Thirdly, we must express our regret and our surprise at the contents of the mission's report in this respect, for it often relied upon Israeli sources of information, or sources of information partial to Israel. We hope that the mission of the Director-General will strive to be more precise and more objective in the future. In this respect, my delegation would like to express its thanks to the Director-General for his keen interest and his follow-up on the situation of Arab workers and employers in Palestine and in the other occupied Arab territories, by means of the missions the Director-General sends to these territories.

Fourthly, in Annex 3 of Appendix III to the Report of the Director-General, we have noticed some repeated mistakes which aim at raising certain side issues to divert attention from the core of the question of Palestine and the suffering of the people of Palestine, the core of the problem being the occupation itself and the practices of the occupying forces. Due to the errors it contains, this Annex may be considered a propaganda leaflet distributed by the Israeli occupation authorities in a desperate attempt to affect international public opinion concerned with the occupied Arab territories. Israel has been trying thereby to present this atrocious occupation in a more positive light, by trying to make it pass for a civilised undertaking...

The PRESIDENT – Mr. Minister, I must ask you to conclude your remarks.

Mr. HOSSAIN (Deputy Prime Minister in charge of the Ministry of Labour and Manpower, Bangladesh) – It is a great pleasure for me, as Deputy Prime Minister and leader of the Bangladesh delegation, to address this 76th Session of the International Labour Conference, I recollect with a sense of satisfaction that I addressed this august forum in 1984.

On behalf of my delegation and on my own, I congratulate you, Sir, on your election as President of this Session. I also congratulate the Vice-Presidents from the Government, Employers' and Workers' sides on their well-deserved election. I am confident that your abilities, experience and leadership will enable you to steer this Conference to a successful end.

I take this opportunity to congratulate Mr. Hansenne on his election to the high office of Director-General of the ILO. He brings with him rich experience, strength and vision in the discharge of his duties as the chief executive of the ILO and work for the promotion of international solidarity and co-operation. In this connection, may I express our appreciation to the outgoing Director-General, Mr. Blanchard, for steering this tripartite organisation for nearly the past two decades.

The subject of recovery and employment has been chosen as the theme of the report of the Director-General for the current session of the International Labour Conference and the ILO secretariat deserves our appreciation for preparing the Report on the subject which is both appropriate and timely. The Report points out that "poverty has increased" and the proportion of the population living below the poverty line rose from 33 per cent in 1980 to 39 per cent in 1985. It is also asserted in the Report that growing poverty and an increasing by unequal distribution of income will not only pose a challenge to policy-makers but also create social imbalances.

Against this backdrop, economic growth, productivity and employment could only be achieved with a global approach. Shortfalls in the quality and quantity of financial resource transfers, protectionism by way of tariff and non-tariff barriers, depressed commodity prices and the unbearably large outflows on debt service have been the key factors hampering the growth and recovery of developing countries, particularly the least developed countries. The least developed countries are particularly handicapped and ill-equipped to develop their economies and to ensure employment opportunities for their workforce. Their economic and social development represents a major challenge for these countries and for their development partners. Therefore, what we need is concessional assistance, massive transfer of resources, quota- and duty-free market access and transfer of technology as well as sustained economic growth so that unemployment and underemployment are contained.

The unemployment problem in countries like Bangladesh is acute. In addition to the ordinary jobseekers, Bangladesh has a large mass of educated youth who are on the look-out for jobs; while in the developed countries they get social security benefits, jobseekers in developing countries do not get any such benefit. About one-third of the workforce in Bangladesh is unemployed. However, the present Government, under the dynamic leadership of President Hussain Muhammad Ershad, has undertaken various pragmatic programmes to create job opportunities and reduce the level of unemployment. The rural public works programme, the food-for-work programme, the self-employment programme and the like have been set up in rural areas. Electricity has been taken to the doorsteps of both the farmers and the rural entrepreneurs. Irrigation facilities and a seed and fertiliser distribution network have been taken to rural areas so as to enable farmers to engage in multiple cropping and dry-season cultivation. All these measures have turned rural areas into productive growth centres. Facilities have been created not only to promote and diversify traditional and non-traditional products but also to help innovators develop new products, prototypes, designs and forms. As a result, rural employment – for both men and women – has increased.

The Government has also taken bold steps to protect the initiators of farming and small industry from the baneful effects of rural money-lending. The Rin Shalishi Board (Debt Settlement Board) has been established to save the indebted poor from the claws of money-lenders and big landowners. It is intended to increase productivity in the rural areas with more off-farm job opportunities.

Several important development-oriented administrative reforms of far-reaching significance have also been carried out in Bangladesh. The Government has introduced a number of fiscal incentives for augmenting investment in the private sector to boost exports and to encourage efficient import-substitution industries. All these measures have created employment opportunities. The Government established the Investment Board, with powers and functions to sanction an investment plan on a priority basis. As a result, an encouraging response has been received from both domestic and foreign investors.

We are faced with the challenge of recovering colossal losses, caused by the worst floods and cyclones in our history. These disasters have constituted an insurmountable burden for the economy and development plans of the country, causing a setback in employment opportunities. The causes of devastating floods are both natural and man-made. They need a global approach and solution. It is gratifying to acknowledge that we have received a positive and understanding response from the world community. The Government, under the inspiring leadership of President Ershad, is not only trying its utmost to recuperate from the devastations caused by these calamities, but has also embarked upon measures leading to both short-term and long-term solutions to the menace of floods.

During the lifetime of the ILO, the world has witnessed phenomenal technological progress in the industrialised world, the trickle-down effect of which has also reached the Third World. Extensive automation and computerisation has not only caused massive displacement of workforces but has also adversely affected the competitiveness of the developing countries. In the context of such technological change, training and retraining requirements have changed both in the developed and in the developing countries. It is imperative, therefore, that in designing its future programme of training, the ILO takes careful account of this fact.

May I suggest that migration for employment be considered as one of the remedies to contain the problem of acute unemployment in the least developed countries? For this, the ILO might conduct a survey to find out the types of jobs that are available in various sectors in workforce deficit countries, as well as to suggest remedies to remove existing restrictions on a very important factor of production, i.e. labour. The ILO might also extend its technical co-operation programme to non-formal tertiary sectors of production, with a view to expanding employment opportunities.

Let me recall that the current session of the International Labour Conference coincides with the celebration of the 70th anniversary of the ILO. This gives us a welcome opportunity to reflect on the ways and means of making this oldest organisation of the United Nations family more effective and tuned to the changing needs of the hour. In this context, I would like to stress the importance of the following few points: (i) concentration on the ILO's standard-setting exercise alone cannot guarantee the best interests of the working masses. Equally important is to provide stepped-up assistance to developing countries, in order to enhance their capability of implementing provisions of various ILO Conventions and thereby encouraging them to ratify and implement ILO Conventions in a greater number; (ii) in the interests of universal acceptability, the ILO Conventions must take into account the socio-economic realities of the developing world where the vast majority of the labour force is located; (iii) the technical co-operation programme of the ILO needs to be so devised or reoriented as to enable the developing world to mitigate the pangs of the labour substitution effect introduced by the phenomenal technological progress characterised by extensive automation and computerisation leading to a massive displacement of the workforce; (iv) the ILO needs to play a more forceful role in assisting developing countries in their struggle to tackle the shrinkage of employment opportunities, due to their initiating a process of structural adjustments in their economies. The conclusions of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment, held in 1987, could serve as a valuable guide in this regard.

We feel that there is good will in this assembly and there is an historic sense of purpose on the occasion of the 70th anniversary of the ILO. The real test of faith and commitment will be whether we can advance on the basis of globality. I am hopeful and optimistic that we will be able to move ahead.

Mr. BATUBARA (Minister of Manpower, Indonesia) It is a great privilege for me to associate myself with the other distinguished speakers in congratulating His Excellency Mr. J.L. Nkomo on his election as the Chairman of this Conference. I am confident that under his wise leadership this Conference will be successful in attaining its objectives. My delegation extends its full co-operation to you, Sir, towards the fulfilment of these goals. I would also like to convey my delegation's congratulations to the three Vice-Presidents and to the other officers of the Conference on their respective elections.

I extend my sincere gratitude to Mr. Francis Blanchard, the former Director-General of the ILO, who has made a great contribution to the development of this Organisation. I also offer my best wishes to the new Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne.

I appreciate the Report of the Director-General which focuses on the crucial link between the economic and social spheres and the role of the ILO in the area of employment. We have learned from history and experience that economic growth does not automatically resolve problems related to human resources.

Since 1969 in Indonesia we have implemented our Five-Year National Development Plans (PELITA). Through the First and Second Plans, we achieved success in economic development with growth of 8 per cent per annum. In this period, the human resources programme was explicitly designed and constituted an integral part of the national development programmes. Our rural development programmes, labour intensive projects, loan programmes supporting small and insufficiently financed business groups were able to improve the economic structure and income of Indonesian society. These programmes also reduced the number of unemployed and underemployed, especially in rural areas. In general, significant progress was made in combating human resource problems during the First and Second Five-Year National Development Plans.

Unfortunately, the prolonged world economic recession has also affected the Indonesian economy. During the Third Five-Year Plan, 1979-84 (PELITA III), our economic growth reached 6.5 per cent per annum, whereas during the Fourth Five-Year Plan, 1985-89 (PELITA IV), the growth rate decreased to 4 per cent per annum. Although human resources issues were given special treatment in the National Development Programmes, the situation deteriorated as a result of slow economic growth. The number and levels of unemployment have increased ever since.

The Indonesian economic structure is heavily agrarian. Only 30 per cent of our workforce is in paid employment and the remaining percentage is considered as unpaid workers. Thus, even though we will successfully reach a 10 per cent growth rate in manufacturing and other modern sectors during the next Plan, its impact on the economic development for the next ten to 15 years, in terms of both GDP generation and employment absorption, is estimated to be still less than 50 per cent.

It is envisaged that in our next Five-Year National Plan, the size of our workforce will increase by 11.9 million. In considering our economic structure, only 30 to 35 per cent of this number are in paid employment and the remaining 8.5 million of the labour force must enter the informal and traditional sectors as self-employed or family workers. Although most of them will have a job, the majority are likely to be underemployed with constant low earnings.

To overcome this human resources problem, one of the breakthrough strategies is to prepare our workforce to become self-employed and entrepreneurs, especially in the informal sector. They are encouraged to work in the areas of home industries and small or medium-sized businesses. To support this strategy, training programmes are provided and directed partly to respond to industrial demand and partly to prepare the workforce for self-employment and entrepreneurship. We believe this strategy will help stabilise our economy. In order to develop it further however, we need co-operation from other countries in the world.

Mutual understanding and co-operation among countries will not only improve the economic conditions of these countries but will also speed up the process of world economic recovery. For this reason, we appreciate the genuine co-operation of industrial countries. To this end, we, inter alia: firstly, invite foreign investors and multinational corporations to open businesses in our country which can intensify our economic activities. In this way, we hope foreign investors will not merely focus on businesses producing quick profits but will also consider long-term businesses which have backward and forward linkages. Furthermore, foreign investors and multinational businesses must also be concerned with the preservation of national resources.

Secondly, industrial countries need to support the economic development of developing countries by providing technical assistance especially in the areas of human resources development, research and development and technological advancement and maintenance.

Thirdly, industrial countries are expected to help ease the implementation of exchange programmes among developing countries which can enrich the life experience of the people. For the last ten years developing countries have seriously executed the "technical co-operation among developing countries" programme. Although progress has been made in this area, there are still constraints, especially in financing the planned projects and transportation from one country to another.

Fourthly, our businesses are often hindered by marketing obstacles created by the protective behaviour of industrial countries. While industrial countries encourage free enterprise, their applied conventional economic theory suggests that to obtain efficiency and maximum use of resources there must be free movement between all sources and ready-produced goods within the international, national and regional markets. In the long run, the recourse to protectionism in industrialised countries will make it more difficult for developing countries to recover from their recession.

The world economic recovery is itself still in question as it depends on the willingness of all countries to take serious and co-operative action to resolve our common concerns. We must agree on our initial action such as developing mutual understanding and international co-operation to overcome the world economic recession. These efforts must then be continued with action for the anticipated world economic recovery. Mutual understanding and international co-operation are also a key to our success in solving human resources problems and development at the national, regional and international levels.

The Report of the Director-General addresses issues on human rights, freedom to affiliate and freedom of speech. These are principles which are highly respected by every nation which has its foundations laid on democratic principles. I am proud to acknowledge that since our independence in 1945 the Indonesian Constitution and other laws succinctly state these principles of freedom. We have developed regulations that protect our workers including women, night workers and unpaid workers.

We are aware that the practice of these principles does not only depend on the creation of regulation, but also on society's consciousness and an individual's ability to understand and exercise his rights and responsibilities. The development of the people's consciousness essentially depends upon various factors, including education in general, vocational training, workers' education and institutional development. Success in this area is also determined by the educational level of the society and economic conditions in general. In order to realise these principles, we need to establish sound international understanding and co-operation.

The above suggestion encourages the establishment of human relations and the elimination of distrust and accusative attitudes which create conflicts within an organisation. We direct our mission to the creation of peaceful and secured working environments in all nations and at all organisational levels. It is through the ILO therefore that we develop and create this working relationship of mutual understanding and international co-operation.

I am confident that under the leadership of the President of this Conference and the new Director-General of the ILO, together with support of the member countries of our Organisation, we can create a new world where workers can work productively and where society can live in prosperity and in peace. Let us devote all our energies to the tasks before us and pledge our commitment to the realisation of this noble goal.

Mr. RODGER (Minister for Labour, New Zealand) – Mr. President, my congratulations and good wishes to you on your election as President of our Conference in this, our 70th anniversary year. Once again, the Conference is charged with a weighty agenda, the contents of which are all worthy of their place. The New Zealand delegation proposed to play a full and supportive role in the Conference activities, and we are sure you will guide the Conference successfully through its work.

I must also welcome the new Director-General, Mr. Hansenne, and assure him of New Zealand's support. He knows the Organisation well and I have confidence in his ability to further develop its relevance for workers and employers throughout the world. I shall be effectively throwing out a challenge to him in this regard later in this contribution.

This year's Director-General's Report, which was produced by the outgoing Director-General, Mr. Blanchard, is yet again a worthy focal point for discussion in this plenary session. Its discussion of the relationship between economic recovery and employment levels is one that has much relevance for New Zealand at this time.

My Government's time in office has essentially been devoted to achieving economic recovery in New Zealand. Our basic thrust involved disinflationary policies and major structural reform. Already in a cyclical downturn our economy was necessarily placed under further pressure by these policies.

Virtually no sector of the economy has escaped structural adjustment – the financial sector, the tax system, our agricultural and manufacturing sectors, the state sector, the waterfront, health, education, to name but the major areas that have appeared on our reform agenda.

Regrettably, but not unexpectedly, the impact of the downturn and the restructuring has fallen disproportionately on our workforce. Employment has fallen in all sectors during this time. The primary and manufacturing sectors have generally been harder hit than the service industries. The effects have been more acutely felt in rural areas.

The unemployment rate grew rapidly from around 4 per cent during most of 1986 and 1987 to over 7 per cent early this year. However, there are some signs that we can anticipate some improvement.

Although in this respect it seems that the cost of reform has been high, we can point to considerable improvements in productivity and efficiency. We can also now look back on inflation that got close to 18 per cent from now a new low inflation rate of 4 per cent.

The gains we have made in terms of low inflation and increased efficiency will, we believe, provide a strong base for economic growth. Indications are that this growth is already happening. The export sector, for instance, is enjoying both an improvement in our terms of trade and an increase in export volume.

Our basic strategy accords with the views in the Director-General's Report – without economic growth there can be no improvement in the employment situation. We accept, as the Director-General finds, that economic growth by itself does not solve the problem of unemployment.

We have not simply focused or relied on economic recovery as being the saviour of our employment situation. We have taken steps, aside from those of a purely financial or economic nature, to address the possibility that the hoped-for decline in unemployment will not automatically result from the projected economic growth.

Specifically, we have addressed the labour market and remodelled our labour relations environment. The 1987 Labour Relations Act provided a permissive framework within which labour market reform can take place.

That this new environment is already having an effect has even at this early stage become apparent. The parties are taking more responsibility for their own actions and decisions. In the state sector, now effectively operating in the same environment as the private sector, negotiations have shown significant flexibility. The private sector has been a little bit slower to respond, but the most recent set of wage settlements at about 4 per cent indicates a significant improvement in the responsiveness of wages to macro-economic trends.

As well, there has been restructuring of consequence in our union movement. As a result of minimum membership provisions in the Labour Relations Act the number of unions has fallen significantly. Our aim of stronger more effective unions is being achieved.

We have also moved to allow for a smooth and fast adjustment to increased employment opportunities. An integrated range of policy options is available to facilitate adjustment to change and to achieve a speedy, productive, and fairer match between people and jobs. These options include enhanced information and referral services, measures to facilitate skill acquisition, geographical mobility, and incentives and assistance towards new employment and business opportunities.

In particular I would mention the area of education and training. It has been reorganised to remove barriers that have affected its level, quality and distribution. Well-focused training, closely linked to the market demand for skills, is an essential part of the adjustment and growth process.

Past experience suggests that when improvements in employment growth do occur they tend to by-pass many of the long-term unemployed. Such persons exert little competitive pressure on the labour market.

To counter this evident problem we have targeted assistance and training to those with a long history of unemployment and to those with disadvantages in the labour market.

You will see therefore that our experience, painful though it has been in some respects, does bear out the observations of the Director-General in his thoughtful Report. We have faith that the mix of policies we have brought to bear on the problem is beginning to show signs of success.

I wish to now turn to a topic that will have inherent interests for all those at this Conference. In celebrating the 70th anniversary we have all been reminded of what the ILO has achieved during its first 70 years. It has helped to bring about fundamental improvements in work and living conditions, and in worker health and safety. Its technical co-operation programmes and research have helped many countries to improve their own labour infrastructure. The recognition of the work of the ILO through the award of the Nobel Peace Prize after the Organisation's first 50 years is a source of justifiable pride for all its members.

Our new Director-General yesterday exhorted us to be imaginative in finding new solutions to our joint problems. He noted that our Organisation must adapt to a changing world. I agree.

So that we can be equally proud of what the ILO achieves in the years ahead, I believe that we need to look now at the state of the Organisation itself and where reform is called for. I suspect the views on this issue will be quite diverse.

Let me be quite clear – I am a firm believer in the concept of the ILO and I espouse its aims. That does not prevent me, however, from asking whether there is room for improvement in the Organisation and in the way it operates. I consider there is significant room for improvement and I know there are many among you who share that view.

Our Organisation is 70 years old. How can we expect an organisation with that much history, and with little significant organisational change in those 70 years, to be responsive to the needs of the closing decade of the twentieth century?

The issue, to my mind, is not whether the ILO should be reformed – rather, it is what sort of reform process should be initiated to determine the extent of reform needed.

In no way do I seek to belittle changes that have been achieved over the years. But they must be seen in context for what they are – ad hoc tinkering! No attempt has been made to take a broader view, to stand back and look at the Organisation's raison d'être and determine the most effective and efficient means of achieving that goal. Instead we have tried to effect change because of, and amidst, the pressures of budgetary deliberations. At another level the pace of constitutional reform has given new meaning to the word "ongoing".

What is needed in my belief is a fundamental review of the Organisation. It must be comprehensive, systematic, and, above all, to a large extent independent. Nothing, save the central tenet of the Organisation – peace through social justice through humane conditions of labour – should be sacred in such an exercise.

The Organisation's current functions must be identified and scrutinised in detail to determine whether they contribute to our basic objectives or whether they are superfluous. Can those objectives be better achieved by the introduction of any additional functions? Having identified the appropriate functions, what is the most efficient and effective method of performing them and of funding them?

That exercise necessarily involves looking at the structure of the Office itself and its resource levels. It means addressing the way the Office reaches out to member States. It requires a close look at the Constitution.

Naturally, this yearly Conference would come under scrutiny. I know there have been criticisms of the format, and, certainly, its cost is not an insignificant factor in the budget. Several aspects of the Conference come readily to mind as inviting examination – its duration, its frequency, its size, its location, the voting procedures, the working hours, the extent of the translation service.

The publishing and dissemination side of the Office's operation also stands out as a candidate for reassessment. I know that some minor cost saving measures have been introduced in that area. Really, what is needed though is for the service to be placed on a commercial footing so that, at the end of the day, what is produced is what the member States need.

I have digressed into detail, into just two of the minor areas of the organisation that clamour for reform. My belief is that they are just symptomatic of the wider malaise throughout the whole Organisation.

The medicine must be dramatic and, I reiterate, fundamental.

My model for a reform process requires commitment and a disinterested honesty from member States. It calls for a rejection of self-serving agendas both at the state level and at the individual level. It demands adherence to our basic common purpose.

I appreciate that this may be difficult for some who see the ILO as a home away from home: familiarity may have bred contempt for, or prompted some to forget, our original objectives. Political courage born of ethical motives will be called for. Vested interests must be put aside.

For this reason I chose to describe the reform process as needing to be largely independent. By that I mean that the review must take the form of an external audit, albeit augmented by relevant internal expertise. The outcome of the exercise should be an organisation that is true to its original objectives, that is efficient and effective, and that provides its Members and its beneficiaries with value for money.

If we are to embark on such a reform process we must decide whether the ILO is to be just another international forum to pursue broad political objectives or whether it is to be a truly "labour" organisation. I believe it must be the latter, and I invite you to think long and hard over the next year about the issue I have raised. I suggest that we face the challenge of the nineties with a commitment to meaningful reform of our important Organisation.

Original – German: Mr. THIEL (representative of the International Social Security Association) – I am honoured to represent ISSA here in a year of such great historical significance. Two hundred years ago the ideas of freedom, equality and fraternity, born in the confusion of a bloody revolution, began their triumphant progress throughout the world.

A hundred years ago we in Austria saw the birth of social insurance brought into being by the distress of workers and the perils of the machine age.

Seventy years ago the League of Nations set up the International Labour Office.

We must think in these dimensions if we wish to improve the health and safety of future generations throughout the world.

Considerable progress has been made since there beginnings but very many difficult problems still have to be tackled.

We all live without constantly worrying about sickness and accident; indeed, it would not be healthy so to do. But all of us know the problems arising from the repression of these thoughts.

We know that workers live particularly dangerous lives. We know that workers in agriculture and forestry live especially unhealthy lives. We know that motor traffic has become the worst of the scourges decimating the human race. Are we really ready to sacrifice our health, our children and finally our world to the greed of an affluent society? Are there not higher values and a different style of life?

This leads us to an entirely new scenario. The man and the woman of the next century is now making his or her appearance on the stage in a more leisurely fashion than before since hurry leads to deadly stress and fatal accidents. The man and woman of the next century have learnt to distinguish between what is superfluous and essential. He or she adapts to natural processes and follows the wiser rhythms of nature. Such persons can no longer go back to a lost paradise. There are too many people, too much interference with nature, too many contingencies to allow this; there can be no going back.

But who is stopping us from making use of the millions now being spent on armaments to make this planet, this shrunken world village, into a blossoming garden in which cleaner industries produce useful products for all without destroying our air, our water, the earth, people, plants, animals, and finally the world itself?

We, on a small scale, have shown that something can be done to protect against accidents and occupational disease. Throughout the world we have found persons who have joined in our cause. These have long ago realised that, in view of the common threat, ideological divergencies are of minor importance.

ISSA, with its 330 members from 125 countries, is making an essential contribution to producing a stable foundation for a blossoming economy; namely by helping to improve social security where it already exists and by setting it up when the time is ripe.

Furthermore, all ISSA activities, which are designed to ensure a wider application of legal provisions in the field of social insurance, consolidate and complement the activities of the ILO itself.

In the same way that ISSA experts contribute to the discussions of technical committees which convene during the International Labour Conference or in ad hoc meetings based on the work of the International Labour Office, the ILO itself can also make use of this network of experts as a source of expert knowledge for technical co-operation projects.

The ISSA complements the work of the ILO by the fact that its member organisations have joint activities, as for example training seminars which are organised in Africa and Asia by ISSA.

The most important contribution that ISSA makes to the ILO, however, is in the field of research. With its annual study on developments and trends in social security, ISSA offers the ILO an important work of reference. This is also the case in other fields.

For instance, ISSA's studies on equality between men and women or between employment and social security frequently represent a useful addition to or basis for ILO research.

Since most ISSA research projects are drawn up in the form of reports, this material is available to all who, within the International Labour Office, are involved in these matters and interested in questions of social security.

In his Report to this 76th Session of the International Labour Conference, the Director-General of the ILO states that any economic recovery is dependent upon the respect of the basic human rights of labour protection and fair remuneration because an increase in productivity and jobs gives hand-in-hand with an increase in well-being. It is in the interest of all of us to insure against the dangers of life: to provide against incapacity, maternity, sickness or accident or through physical handicap or old age. It is in the interest of all of us to ensure that people can live healthy and secure lives, so that social security systems do not break down under excessive cost or indeed never see the light of day.

The grounds for increasing costs are clear. As a result of social welfare, especially as a result of better medical care and technical progress, there are many more old people than before. We now live longer! On account of this, we need more hospitals, more doctors and more medicine.

But the proportion of those in active life is lower. In other words, there are less contributors to social security!

In most countries throughout the world, social benefits are deducted from the wage packet. Social welfare expenditure is considered as part of the gross national product. This system, in the long run, cannot continue, and there are two very good reasons for this.

First, the expenditure incurred in treating the sick, rehabilitating victims of occupational accidents and eliminating environmental damage and disasters is enormous and swells the gross national product. Consequently politicians and economists have no obvious incentive to take protective measures. Two to three per cent of the gross national product is earmarked for compensating occupational injuries and diseases. As long as calculations on the productivity of enterprises are based only on capital and labour, social security expenditure will continue to rise because the system will pay out for damages suffered and not make those who have caused the accidents responsible.

Second, the social insurance contribution system must be entirely revised. A social security system in a country is dependent upon the value-added, created by the various branches of production. Similarly, an affluent society is dependent upon the purchasing power of its families. He who underpays his workers cannot sell them his products. As a result of technological developments in highly industrialised countries, workers are being replaced by computers and robots. Neither buy anything or make any contribution. Unemployment in industrial countries is the consequence of this. Many countries suffer from low wage levels and from the burden of the international debt.

It would therefore be more appropriate to deduct social expenditure from the GNP. This would give a far more accurate basis for calculation; the productivity of a country would be the yardstick of a social security system, which it is possible to finance.

But there are also secondary incentives to reduce the deficit: these can, for example, take the form of training, the enactment of laws and standards, and organisational, technical and personal action.

Only if we are successful in organising private insurance in such a way that it helps to bring about a healthy and safe way of life, will social security be financially feasible and remain so.

Finally, we must all be clear about one thing: if we live longer and have shorter working hours; if we have more children and more old people; if in every respect, we have a longer and more eventful life, then the cost will be higher too.

We can only cope with these higher costs by stepping up productive processes and by reducing harmful processes. If we do not opt for this course social conflicts will increase in intensity.

To sum up, one thing is clear from the joint experiences of ISSA and the ILO at the international level: there must be a comprehensive social policy and protection in all branches of social insurance to preserve health and produce safety. Prevention is always cheaper than compensation. These actions will most certainly increase the gross national product in the long run.

Every investment we make in the health of our children, in the health of the environment and international co-operation will be paid for a thousandfold. The basis for such social policy protection is international solidarity which has led to organisations such as the ILO and ISSA.

I would like to mention finally that the 23rd General Assembly of ISSA will take place this year from 5 to 13 September in Vienna in Austria, at a time when Austria is celebrating the hundredth anniversary of the foundation of social security in this country. The preparations for this General Assembly are already far advanced, and we shall have a very comprehensive agenda before us. We must pay special consideration to one particular problem: the gulf between social insurance problems in developing countries and in industrial countries is becoming even wider.

In this and in the twenty-first century, people will have greater access to information and communication than their forbearers. These possibilities must be preserved and extended by international contacts and by common action.

If we advance with good will and have confidence in reason, our common labours will ensure the attainment of our ends for the greater good of humanity as a whole.

This is worth any amount of effort and expenditure.

Mr. MALVIYA (Deputy Minister for Labour, India) – At the outset, I extend to you, on behalf of my country, my delegation, and on my own behalf, our heartiest congratulations on your election as the President of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. We also extend to the Vice-Presidents and other office bearers of the Conference our warmest congratulations on their election. I am sure that under your able stewardship the Conference will reach valuable conclusions. I also take this opportunity to extend our good wishes to the new Director-General, Mr. Hansenne.

We have read with great attention the Report of the Director General on recovery and employment and share most of the concerns expressed therein. We are particularly in agreement with the view that the best approach to economic recovery must be the one that combines growth equity and participation. In the Third World, growth in the 1980s has been faltering or slow. There exist major elements responsible for a lack of equity, both internally in many developing countries, and in the trade and financial relations between the developed and developing world. Not all countries participate equally in the world-wide strategy for restoring growth and achieving social goals, since most of them lack the resources to overcome the major disparities that exist today.

As pointed out in the Director-General's Report, Asia's GDP per capita, in the period 1960-86, after being almost stagnant at a little over 3.5 per cent per annum in the 1960s and the 1970s, has dropped to 1.5 per cent per annum in the period 1980-86. The terms of trade have also moved severely against the South and South-East Asian countries. Perfectionism, and unilateral action in trade-related matters, are growing. Thus, the two major engines of economic development, i.e. economic growth and trade, both moved negatively, leading to less employment generation, reduction in the quality of jobs or remuneration or both, and to severe economic distress for those in the informal and the unorganised sectors. However, in my country, we have been able to achieve a 5 per cent rate of economic growth as projected in our Seventh Plan covering 1985-90. This was achieved by prudent management of our economy, in spite of the century's worst drought in 1987-88. Yet some developing countries have not been able to pick up to that extent. The recession, the recovery, and the adjustments in the 1980s have imposed severe costs in terms of rising unemployment, lower wages, and reduction in outlays in the social sectors. As noted in the report, the world is in a more precarious social situation at the end of the 1980s than at the start of the decade, particularly as the economic situation of the masses has not improved to the desired extent.

It is against this background that we have to view the preparations for the United Nations Fourth Development Decade covering the 1990s and the role of the ILO in the 1990s as perceived by the member countries and the Office. I would like to stress that there is a need for the Office to reorient its viewpoint, its programmes and its instruments of action in order to be more effective in the future than in the past. For example, while initiatives were taken to organise a High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment in 1987, the absence of any discernible follow-up to that meeting, and the only marginal impact of the efforts made by the ILO subsequent to the High-Level Meeting indicate that there is a need to devote greater attention to developing an effective strategy if the ILO is to make a perceptible impact during the Fourth Development Decade. We are conscious of the situation as also of the inertial forces seeking to perpetuate the status quo; but the ILO must fulfil its assigned role in terms of its Constitution and the high principles enshrined in the Declaration of Philadelphia.

Economic growth, increased employment, reduction in debt and the debt-servicing burdens, and the promotion of an international trade regime which is fair and non-discriminatory against developing countries are the four essential features that must underlie development in the 1990s. My country has kept these aims constantly before it and, as I have mentioned earlier, we have been successful in maintaining the momentum of growth over the last five years or so. We propose, furthermore, to step up the rate of growth in our Eighth Five-Year Plan covering the period 1990-95, to 6 per cent per annum in real terms. Moreover, this plan will have as its prime focus the creation of productive employment, reduction in poverty, decentralisation of power to local village level bodies, continued attention to and investment in the social sectors of education, health, housing, safe drinking water, immunisation, and improvement of the lot of informal and unorganised sector workers. Even without waiting formally for commencement of the Eighth Plan, my Government has undertaken a massive employment generation project during the current year, in which Rs21,600 million, equivalent to US$1,350 million, will be invested. This massive programme for employment has been named after Pt. Jawaharlal Nehru, the first Prime Minister of free India, to commemorate in the centenary year of his birth, his overwhelming concern for economic growth and uplifting the masses. This initiative alone confirms our commitment to giving the highest priority to employment creation. There is a further initiative in the field of vocational training where my Government has launched, with the help of the World Bank, a major project to modernise, upgrade and expand vocational training institutions in India.

Considering that 90 per cent of our labour force works in the unorganised sector, and that two-thirds of the labour force is concentrated in the rural areas, the problems of rural labour are of prime importance to us. A National Commission of Rural Labour was set up in August 1987. Its report will cover all aspects of the problems of rural labour. We expect it to help us in tackling the problems of the informal and the unorganised sectors.

The United Nations system is the expression of a spirit of multilateralism and global democracy. A great deal has been achieved within its multilateral framework. We believe in the future of global co-operation and the prospects for development which rest on the further strengthening of multilateralism. Unilateral efforts to force changes will undermine the broad trend towards greater co-operation between North and South and between East and West, which has emerged in a multilateral framework. We would urge that all countries use this framework for articulating their views rather than resorting to unilateral action.

I would now like to refer to the three technical items on the agenda of the Conference. Regarding the partial revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107), we have made our stand clear at the 75th Session of the Conference. Basically, we have reservations about some of the fundamental points arising from the proposed draft changes in Convention No. 107.

My Government feels that with one-fifth of the total tribal population of the world living in India and the success achieved by us in promoting their welfare, the views expressed by us need to be carefully taken into account in revising the Convention. We feel that there has been inadequate appreciation of the complexities, particularly with respect to replacing the term "population" by "peoples" as also to land, water and subsoil rights.

As regards the agenda item on safety in the use of chemicals at work, I would like to state that India, and for that matter the world, cannot and should not forget the Bhopal gas tragedy. We have since comprehensively amended our Factories Act in 1987 to include elaborate safety provisions. In association with the ILO and with generous funding extended by the Federal Republic of Germany, we are engaged in the implementation of a Major Accident Hazards Control Project. This will go a long way towards ensuring safety at the working place and also towards protecting the environment. We have recently introduced legislation for safety in the building and construction industry, which is one of the largest employers of labour. We have under consideration other legislative measures to further the objective of safe working conditions and to ensure the occupational health of our working population.

As regards the agenda item on night work, while we recognise that such work is itself hazardous, it may not be totally dispensable for social, economic and technological reasons. However, we are of the view that until fully adequate safeguards are available, night work for women may be avoided. Therefore, it is necessary that adequate safeguards should be adopted to protect all workers, including women workers.

India has always been at the forefront of the international campaign against apartheid. It has been our privilege to play a special role in support of the struggle of the majority in South Africa for freedom and dignity. We firmly condemn the system of apartheid and regard all modifications of it, cosmetic or otherwise, as unacceptable. Apartheid has to go, and go in its entirety. Towards this end we call upon all governments, employers' and workers' organisations, to join in imposing comprehensive and mandatory sanctions in South Africa. We are also deeply concerned by the attempts of the Pretoria regime to manipulate the independence process in Namibia with the intention of establishing a puppet government there.

The Report of the Director-General on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories, including Palestine, clearly shows that the situation there will become much worse if the occupation is not ended, and ended quickly. A just and durable solution to the Palestinian issue has to be found and can only come about with Israel's total and unconditional withdrawal from all Palestinian and Arab territories occupied by it since 1967, including Jerusalem, and with the Palestinian people being allowed to exercise their inalienable rights. These would include the right of the Palestinian people to return to self-determination without external interference, the right to national independence and sovereignty, and the right to establish an independent Palestinian State in their homeland Palestine.

Lastly, I would like to recall the words of our late Prime Minister Pt. Jawaharlal Nehru in his address to the Asian Relations Conference held in New Delhi in 1947, which remain relevant today, and I quote: "Nevertheless, the essential basis of world peace must be, as I think the Declaration of Philadelphia states, social security, liberty, social justice for all in every country. Lasting peace can only be based on social justice. Poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to people everywhere”.

Original – Arabic: Mr. AL-SABAH (Minister of Social Affairs and Labour, Kuwait) – It gives me pleasure to greet you and to extend to you my best wishes for the success of your Conference. May I extend my congratulations to the President and to the Vice-Presidents on their election to chair the work of this Conference, which is convened at a time of changing international and regional conditions affecting the international community at the economic and political levels. I also extend my best congratulations to our Organisation on the occasion of the 70th year of its establishment, with my best wishes for its success and progress. I would also like to congratulate Mr. Hansenne personally on his election to the post of Director-General and wish him success. And I would like to thank Mr. Blanchard, the outgoing Director-General.

The choice of the theme, recovery and employment, for discussion at this session was appropriate in view of the economic challenges faced by our contemporary world if it is to achieve economic recovery and development as a priority matter. These are no less important than some of the traditional issues, such as international peace and security. Economic recovery is all the more important in view of the fact that the economic crisis has destabilised many developing countries and uprooted their social structures.

The Director-General presented us with a very accurate and realistic description of the world economy and wished us success in our efforts, despite a feeling of regret which we read between the lines of his speech. His description focused on three points. First, the rising growth rates in the industrialised countries and the increase in the balance-of-payment deficits in both developing and industrialised countries due to the fact that the developing countries are facing very harsh economic crises associated with poverty and the reduction of the standard of living.

Second, the developing countries suffer from the burden of foreign debts and are becoming exporters of capital, despite their dire need for recovery. These countries allocate a large portion of their revenues to servicing their debts. Negotiations between the developing countries and their creditors have not reached a fair conclusion.

Third, the 1980s were characterised by a decline in international trade, especially among developing countries, which suffer from an increase in the interest on loans and the slow-down of growth, and hence a reduction in employment and production.

Fourth, a 20-to-30-per-cent drop in wages with a parallel decline in government expenditures on social services such as health, education, housing, food subsidies and social welfare.

Fifth, the decline of the price of exporting commodities from developing countries as alternative products were developed or as a result of a drop in demand, and because the developed industrial countries manage to substitute some agricultural products which they imported in the past. In consequence, the South was further submerged in debt, unemployment, poverty and food shortage.

Sixth, we may expect that in the future it will be increasingly difficult to absorb newcomers to the labour market, due to the fact that the increase in the workforce in the next ten years is predicted to be 40 million, of whom 36 million will come from developing countries.

Seventh, we have to admit that the developing countries committed many errors in the past which must be rectified in the future, such as an acute increase in indebtedness, wasting resources and unequal distribution of expenditures in the absence of adequate planning for the future, and failure to define priorities in public expenditures.

The 1989 report of UNICEF on the situation of children in the world enriched us with further information on the acuteness of this situation, and the following facts in particular: (a) 40 million children die in the Third World each year due to poverty, (b) 3 million children die annually due to the lack of adequate vaccination policies which are accessible only to half of the child population of the Third World; (c) half a million children died in 1988 due to forced economic austerity and recovery measures imposed by rich countries and the International Monetary Fund (IMF) for the repayment of foreign debts and economic adjustment; (d) the economic measures imposed by the IMF usually led to the political destabilisation of developing countries by lowering the standard of living of the population; (e) the decline in the price of raw materials and in investments by rich countries in developing countries and the loss of revenues of developing countries amounted to $20 thousand million in the last decade, to be paid in loans and interests on loans to developed countries.

We should all know that until very recently rich countries forced the farmers in their dependent regions to grow only special crops to feed the rich countries' factories, without any concern for promoting the agriculture of the developing countries, so that the latter remain perpetual markets incapable of industrialising themselves and forced to buy industrial goods at a very high price.

If this is the picture as we have just described it, we can propose certain solutions to rectify the world economy on the basis of the following: to find a just and practical solution to the problem of the debt which is draining the developing countries and depleting their resources. May we draw your attention to the solution proposed by His Highness, Sheikh Jaber Al-Ahmad Al-Jaber Al-Sabah, the Emir of the State of Kuwait, on 28 September 1988, when he addressed the United Nations with a view to solving the problem of the debt and the interest on the debts and the increasing prices of industrial commodities: to cancel the interest on the debts; to review the terms imposed by the World Bank and by the IMF, making them more humane and more flexible; to increase technical assistance in the form of technology transfer from the North to the South.

The importance of this Kuwaiti proposal stems from the fact that it was presented by creditor States which expressed their willingness to participate in the meeting of creditors to examine the possibility of cancelling the interests on loans to the developing countries and in order to establish a new economic and social order based on justice and co-operation.

We also propose the adoption of a set of measures as mentioned in the Report, such as the following: establishing an economic dialogue between the social partners in the process of decision-making in order to increase productivity, savings, investment and equitable distribution of income; developing a growth strategy aimed at building infrastructure and advanced markets and adjusting prices policies, increasing income, proper distribution of subsidies, limitation of government interference in the economy by increasing the importance of the private sector; reducing the importation of luxury goods in order to increase opportunities for productive investment, the development of farming, small-scale industries and rural activities to increase employment and income of the poorest sector of the community; the adoption of training and retraining policies to help workers to find jobs and alternative work, and the training of new jobseekers with a view to increasing production and utilising more effectively resources; the adoption of policies and legislation to achieve minimum protection for workers, to ensure higher participation of workers in the economy and to protect human freedoms from violation and to include the social cost of production such as food subsidies, transport, health and housing. The International Labour Organisation should play an active role in the World Employment Programme which it has adopted for the last 20 years in order to increase, employment opportunities and redistribute income among the poor, allowing them to play an active role in the growth and development policies. The International Labour Organisation should also play a substantial role in the dialogue between North and South to solve the problems of lack of investment, the decline in commodity prices and the need for job creation.

We should all support the proposal of the Director-General in his Report, that the International Labour Conference should launch an appeal for concrete action by the member States of the United Nations and its specialised agencies to finance a series of operations at the regional or subregional levels to create or refurbish essential infrastructure and to conserve the environment. Such activities could draw for their financing on the savings achieved through disarmament.

As we continue discussing the deterioration of the economy in many parts of the world, we cannot pass in silence over the atrocities committed by the Israeli authorities in the occupied territories which result in increased unemployment and a decline in standard of living of the population. As we know, the Israeli authorities confiscate land and water resources, blow up houses, detain youths and force them to work for extremely low wages. These authorities have deprived the population of basic rights, including the right of association. Day by day for the last 19 months the world has witnessed the breaking of bones of children and youths, attacks on women and elderly people, the murdering of people, the destruction of houses and the use of poison gas, all in order to crush the Palestinian "intifadah", which is claiming the basic rights of the Palestinian people and the right to self-determination, rejecting foreign occupation and the abuse of human rights. The crack-down on the Palestinian "intifadah" occurs despite the atmosphere of detente to solve the Middle-East crisis which was initiated by His Excellency, President Yasser Arafat, President of the State of Palestine and the National Council, who has presented a set of very positive proposals, which were welcomed by all peace-loving countries.

We are convinced that the International Labour Organisation, which is a firm believer in human and social justice, prosperity and peace, will do its best to defend the rights of the oppressed people who struggle for an honourable and free existence in their homeland, away from military conflict. Such conflicts bleed these people and drain their resources, especially that most valuable of resources: the human being, which cannot be measured in capital or in raw materials.

We are confident in the support of the International Labour Organisation for the efforts to solve the Lebanese crisis. The International Labour Organisation should appeal to all Lebanese parties to collaborate together to achieve a national consensus and to put an end to the Lebanese tragedy.

We hope that a proper solution to the Lebanese conflict will be found under the auspices of the Higher Tripartite Committee formed by the Arab Summit to achieve peace in Lebanon.

God bless you all and may He bring peace, mercy and grace upon all of you.

Original - Spanish: Mr. ESCANDELL ROME-RO (Workers' delegate, Cuba) - I should like to begin by congratulating Mr. Nkomo of the sister Republic of Zimbabwe on his election as President of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference, which coincides with the 70th anniversary of the International Labour Organisation.

Our delegation regards the topics addressed by the Director-General of the International Labour Organisation as very important, particularly the reference to economic recovery and employment. The weakness of the Report lies in trying to maintain a balance between contradictory and sometimes mutually exclusive extremes. The attempt to apply neo-colonial adjustment to underdeveloped economies which are indebted and stagnating and at the same time trying to do so without creating greater unemployment and poverty is itself a contradiction in terms. As representative of a workers' organisation I should like to stress that this topic is of great interest to workers in general, and in particular to the masses in the Third World countries who are the main victims of the present unjust international economic system, which condemns them to poverty and unemployment, while the national resources necessary for productive investment are removed by transnational enterprises. With regard to employment, my delegation proposes that the ILO take new initiatives to promote the reconversion of military industries to civilian production generating new and increasing employment.

The seriousness of the world socio-economic situation reflected in the Report of the Director-General, requires greater mobilisation and action by progressive forces, and in particular by workers and trade unions, whatever their professed political or ideological tendencies.

Workers and their trade unions are faced with the decisive task of acting to contribute to the prevention of nuclear war as well as to the class struggle through their legitimate economic and social demands, which are constantly threatened by imperialism and its voracious monopolies. Alongside the problems of armaments and the threat of nuclear war stands the terrible problem of underdevelopment and the consequent poverty, hunger and damage to education and health which affects thousands of millions of people.

Hence the importance – for us trade unionists above all – of the Soviet Union's peace policy, linking disarmament with conversion and development.

We salute the steadfast efforts of the Soviet Union in taking new steps towards detente, and we know that the North American people and the best of its workers' movement also reject the petty interests of the United States military/industrial complex.

For us, the workers of the world, the call for peace must mean a genuine peace with equality of conditions for all nations, both large and small.

The President of Cuba, Commander-in-Chief Fidel Castro, has said that every day around 40,000 children in the Third World die as a result of malnutrition and curable disease: 40,000 children every day who could have been saved. If 120,000 children die every three days it is as if every day an atomic bomb such as those dropped on Hiroshima and Nagasaki fell on the children of the Third World. This means that peace alone is not enough, there must also be an end to the war of hunger which is a ruthless and unjust as any war.

The International Monetary Fund and the World Bank, agencies in the service of imperialism, play a harmful role in the crisis and the phenomenon of indebtedness by applying programmes and cuts that make the lives of millions of workers unbearable and bring about serious social consequences. The United States has not given a valid reply to the need to find solutions to the crisis and to external debt. There was the Baker Plan, the so-called Caribbean Basin Initiative and other cosmetic remedies. In addition we now have the so-called Brady Plan, but because it is grossly inadequate it will undoubtedly be yet another failure by the United States and will mean a worsening of the crisis for Third World countries.

Aware of the need for unity of action to face with courage and intelligence the challenges that lie before us, the trade unions and workers of Latin America and the Caribbean are making new efforts in the struggle for development.

Trade unionists of various tendencies in Latin America and the Caribbean, together with the Organisation of African Trade Union Unity (OATUU) are currently preparing an international trade union initiative to deal with the problem of external debt. This will take place this August in São Paulo.

This year the Cuban revolution has reached its 30th anniversary. During these years, the revolution has brought about major achievements, as shown by the following figures. The illiteracy rate is now at zero. One hundred per cent of the country's children in both the city and the rural areas are attending school. Secondary education has reached the level of around 87 per cent, although there is a guaranteed 100 per cent opportunity at this level; 350,000 people out of a population of 10 million are pursuing university studies; 100,000 children are attending nurseries; infant mortality fell to a rate of 11 per 1,000 live births.

In 1988, while there were 2.6 deaths in childbirth per 10,000 births, which is among the lowest rates in the world. We have 34,000 doctors providing medical care coverage for the entire country, both rural and urban areas. Unemployment is virtually non-existent in our country. Social security covers 100 per cent of the country's workers. Despite the Yankee blockade, which has lasted for 30 years, the economy of the country has grown at a rate of 4 per cent annually during that period. The generation of electrical energy has increased by a factor of 8, steel by 16, cement by 5, fertiliser by 17, egg production by 8 and nickel production has doubled. Six thousand cane harvesters have been manufactured, thereby mechanising 65 per cent of the sugar-cane harvest, and fisheries production has grown tenfold.

The defence of the revolution is in the hands of the workers, who have both the arms and the training necessary to repulse enemy aggression. Can there be any democracy better than that in which industrial and rural workers and students are armed? To those who could question our democracy and human rights, we would reply: let them give weapons to the workers and the students and we will see if they can fire tear-gas against popular movements and if they can set dogs on the masses. These are irrefutable facts showing that the highest proof of democracy is to arm the workers, the students, the rural workers and entire population.

Clear evidence of the support, confidence and backing of the Cuban people for the revolution may be seen in the participation by 98.3 per cent of registered voters on 30 April in the election of delegates to the Municipal People's Assemblies.

Cuban workers and trade unions are now involved in preparations for the XVI Workers' Congress to be held on 24 to 28 January, 1990.

The XVI Congress and all the preparatory work is part of the tremendous efforts being made to move forward the process of rectification under way in our country in order to achieve greater efficiency in all areas of national life and the elevation of the activities of the trade unions to qualitatively higher level in the construction of socialism.

We condemn the manoeuvres of the United States in continuing to supply economic resources to the counter-revolution in Nicaragua, in violation of the agreements reached by the Central American presidents to achieve a negotiated settlement to the conflict in the region. We give our total support to the valiant Sandinista revolution.

We also give our support to the combatants of the FMLN of El Salvador, who are fighting for a better future for their country.

We also support the resistance of the people, trade unions and Government of Panama in their legitimate defence of their national sovereignty against the aggression and interference by United States imperialism in its attempt to fail to comply with the Panama Canal treaties.

We give our unconditional support to the courageous Palestinian people and their legitimate struggle for their national rights.

We call on the workers of the world, the trade unions and all progressive forces to support the application of resolution 435 on the independence of Namibia and we urge the ILO to send a delegation to Namibia to help in monitoring the achievement of democratic, just and clean elections.

We support the struggles for the freedom and trade union rights of the workers and trade unions of Chile, Paraguay and Haiti and other countries of the world faced with exploitation and oppression. We give our firm support to South African workers and combatants in their struggle against the obscenity of apartheid.

Before concluding these remarks, we would once again like to call on the Director-General to intercede to accelerate the implementation of structural changes to put an end to the discrimination in the ILO against representative tendencies of the trade union movement on the part of anti-democratic organisations and forces which are looked upon favourably by some elements of the ILO.

Finally, we assure the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference that Cuban workers and trade unionists will do everything in our power to contribute to the united struggle of the world trade union movement in the advance toward our common objectives and aspirations.

Original – French: Mr. MADOUGOU (Minister of the Civil Service, Labour and Vocational Training, Niger) – Mr. President, it is both a pleasure and a pleasant duty to associate myself with all those who spoke before me in extending to you on behalf of my delegation and myself our warmest congratulations on your brilliant election.

I have witnessed your competence and skill in conducting deliberations, (in other forums) so I am sure that your moral, intellectual and professional qualities will be a very definite asset to the success of our work.

As regards the changes which have taken place within the ILO administration, please transmit to Mr. Hansenne our congratulations and assure him of the readiness of my country, Niger, in supporting him in fulfilling his difficult task.

I should also like to pay a well-deserved tribute to that apostle of peace and social justice, Mr. Blanchard, the out-going Director who devoted a large part of his life to the cause of the ideals of our Organisation which he served with competence and devotion.

However, I should like to pay tribute most warmly to Mr. Mensah, the Chairman of the Governing Body, on his courage and selflessness.

We have read the reports submitted to us (very carefully), and we should like to thank and congratulate the members of the Governing Body, the Director-General of the ILO and all his colleagues, not only for the relevance of the topics which they have chosen for this session, but also for the excellent quality of the documents they have provided us with.

We are particularly happy to see that in spite of the enormous financial difficulties encountered by our Organisation, the technical co-operation programme has been allocated high priority in the next budget. This increases our hope that there will be further development of activities favouring the least developed countries, in particular in the following areas: the promotion of women; job creation; support for co-operatives; training in rural areas.

In actual fact, the Women's Association of Niger, the National Union of Co-operatives and the Youth Organisation (SAMARIA), are the main pillars of the National Movement for the Development Society of Niger.

The Director-General's Report devoted to economic recovery and employment has raised the very important question of the economic future of our States, and it clearly reflects the constant preoccupations of our Organisation with international solidarity, justice and social welfare.

The upheavals caused by the economic crisis at the international level have seriously affected the climate of co-operation between the rich and the poor States, thus causing extensive changes in our socio-economic structures.

Faced with a multitude of problems created by the increased deterioration in terms of trade, the worsening debt servicing situation and the imbalance in the balance of payments, many developing countries have become forced to adopt structural adjustment programmes.

In this connection, I should like to extend my warmest gratitude to all the countries that have cancelled part of Africa's debt. In particular, we welcome the decision taken by France to cancel the debt of the 35 least developed countries. We very much hope that this attitude will inspire other creditors of Africa.

It is important to consider the impact of these measures on the economy of developing countries, and this is why we think it is advisable for our Organisation to emphasise: the role of international solidarity to help our countries to adapt to economic realities which are in constant state of flux; the need for an objective assessment of the social impact of structural adjustment programmes on employment; and the complementarity between the social and economic objectives of development. This entails not only incentives to economic recovery but also mobilisation, by means of dialogue and consultation, of all the human resource potential available in our States. This is all the more necessary because there can be no development if the populations directly concerned are not taken into consideration.

This is why the improvement of living standards of populations in rural areas is a subject of constant concern in our State, as shown by the work done, in particular, in the following areas: establishing hydraulic and communications infrastructures; increasing the number of agricultural irrigation projects and out-of-season cultivation; stepping up labour-intensive projects to gain better results from public investment; investing labour in the protection of the environment; increasing the popularity of technologies giving higher labour productivity; supporting co-operatives of craftsmen and rural workers.

These measures to strengthen a vital sector of our economy have been carried out in order to ensure food self-sufficiency and productive employment in the rural environment.

We are currently drawing up a Rural Code designed to optimise the use of resources in this sector by creating a more efficient system which would be better adapted to modernisation.

To promote activities in the modern sector of employment, my country is committed to creating an economic and fiscal environment favourable to healthy competition among private initiatives and also to industrial ventures. In this context, a programme of support for private initiatives and job creation has been set up (PAIPCE). Its purpose is to encourage the appearance of a new type of economic agent by converting public sector workers into self-employed workers and managers responsible for small and medium sized enterprises. Current reforms are intended to amend and improve the code on investments, to draw up a code on trade and to simplify tax regulations.

As for our Labour Code, there are innovations, to promote employment for the young and their preparation for work through solid vocational training; greater flexibility of the labour market with greater freedom for enterprises to recruit; and, finally, promotion within employment and protection against unemployment.

However, although these measures are extremely necessary, they cannot bring the expected benefits unless the populations concerned are involved in them.

In this connection, I would like to express our faith in the usefulness of a dialogue between the social partners. I should also like to reiterate the determination of the President of the Council of National Orientation, the Head of State, General Ali Saibou, to promote concertation and participation of all the people of Niger in the building of a united and prosperous nation.

Recent political events in my country have led to the completion of structures designed to ensure effective participation in the development process. We have returned to a constitutional system within the framework of a Second Republic. Thus, we are establishing a State governed by the rule of law, committed to democratic principles and to the respect of individual and collective rights and freedoms.

The inhuman and degrading system of apartheid, which has been recognised as a crime against humanity, constitutes a grave threat to international peace and security. That is why the Government of Niger has always denounced any form of economic, cultural or military co-operation with South Africa, and we reiterate our Government's commitment to observe all the United Nations decisions aimed at eliminating the odious system of apartheid.

We are convinced that only concerted action on the part of the international community can bring apartheid to an end. My country has always strictly applied and supported the resolutions taken by the international bodies concerning compulsory global sanctions against South Africa.

We welcome the United Nations peace plan for Namibia and we encourage efforts made by the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity (OAU) to pursue and accelerate the independence process for that territory. Measures must be taken so that the current manoeuvres of the South African regime do not hamper the holding of free and regular elections.

With respect to the situation in the occupied Arab territories, I would like to say that my Government attributes great importance to respect of the right to self-determination and therefore continues to support the just struggle of the Palestinian people for the recognition of their rights.

In conclusion, I should like to stress my Government's faith in international dialogue and international solidarity which it is confident will bring remedies to the great ills suffered by humanity, namely, armed conflict, unemployment, famine, deterioration of the environment, underdevelopment, etc.

I should also like to reiterate my delegation's will to contribute fully to the smooth progress of our deliberations and to wish our Conference every success.

Original - Chinese: Mr. LI (Government delegate, China) - Mr. President, please allow me to begin by warmly congratulating you on your election as President of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. I am confident that you will guide the current session to a successful conclusion. I also wish to express my warm congratulations to our new Director-General, Mr. Hansenne, and hope that he will be able to display his talent and wisdom in his new post and further advance the cause of international labour. My sincere thanks go to our outgoing Director-General, Mr. Blanchard, who has made outstanding contributions to the ILO with his conscientious work for nearly 40 years.

I also wish to take this opportunity to offer warm congratulations to the ILO on its 70th birthday. The ILO has traversed an unusual path over the past 70 years. It has won the trust and praise of governments and peoples of all countries for its untiring efforts in formulating and implementing international labour standards, protecting the rights and interests of workers throughout the world, developing technical co-operation and promoting development and employment. As a founding member of this Organisation, the Chinese Government and people heartily rejoice over these achievements.

However, the current situation in the world labour and social fields remains severe and the tasks facing us are arduous. The Chinese delegation holds that the Director-General's Report has made an adequate analysis of the present situation of the world economy and labour and the proposals he has put forward have a universal significance.

The Chinese delegation believes that, with the general trend towards relaxation of tension in the world, it remains a major pressing issue in to-day's world to promote a balanced development of the world economy and effectively ensure, while maintaining a fairly high economic growth rate, social progress including, among other things, promoting the solution of the problems of unemployment and poverty. To realise this objective, I wish to share with you my views on the following points.

First, to persist in economic structural readjustment and reform and promote long-term steady economic development. Fundamentally speaking, in the present world of increased interdependence, mutual co-operation and competition and the rapid development of the new technological revolution, economic structural readjustment or reform is an inevitable trend of our era. Only by removing the shackles on the productive forces through readjustment and reform, and establishing a relatively rational economic set-up or structure, can ways be found to bring about a rapid recovery and development of the economy. Of course, given the different conditions of various countries, the content and form of their readjustment and reform will naturally be different. Proceeding from its own conditions, China initiated its economic restructuring and an open policy in 1978, broke the closed and rigid economic mode and unfettered the productive forces. However, readjustment and reform are not plain sailing and all sorts of difficulties and problems have to be overcome on the way. Despite some temporary difficulties in China's reform process, the orientation of our reform and the open policy will not change.

Secondly, to develop agriculture on a great scale and small- and medium-sized enterprises and to promote a co-ordinated development of the national economy. At present, agriculture is a noticeably weak link in the economy of many developing countries. To alleviate rural poverty and achieve all-round economic recovery, it is particularly important to strengthen agriculture's position as the foundation of national economy, work for good harvests of major agricultural products and, at the same time, develop diversified farming. Countries have a different course to pursue with regard to the development of agriculture. According to our experience, the development of agriculture depends first of all on the implementation of a stable agricultural policy and the deepening of reform; secondly, on the spread and development of advanced agricultural science and technology and thirdly, on increased investment in agriculture and more sustained agricultural development. The question of developing small- and medium-sized enterprises is now attracting more and more attention in various countries. Alongside the development of big and backbone enterprises, the efforts to support and develop small- and medium-sized enterprises can help to supplement the major enterprises and also absorb a massive labour force. It will especially meet the need of those developing countries which lack capital but boast abundant labour resources. The rapid development of small- and medium-sized enterprises in China over the past ten years has played an important role in enlivening the urban and rural economy, adding convenience to people's lives and creating more job opportunities.

Thirdly, to integrate economic development with social progress and to ensure that people can enjoy the fruits of development. We share the view of the Director-General and maintain that, while economic development is the prerequisite of social progress, and social problems are hard to solve in the absence of economic growth, economic development should go hand in hand with social progress. We deem it all the more necessary to stress this point in the present world, where serious problems of unemployment and poverty have reached unprecedented proportions. The Chinese Government has consistently advocated that the needs of economic and social development should be considered in all perspectives and plans of economic and social development, integrated so as to guarantee their co-ordinated development.

Fourthly, to adopt an adequate employment policy and measures and to make sure that economic growth really generates more job opportunities. Economic growth makes expanded employment possible but to translate this possibility into reality still requires massive work, including the formulation of the employment policy and measures suited to the actual conditions of each country.

China's situation regarding employment remains quite grim, as it is faced with a new boom of jobseekers. In the light of this situation, the Chinese Government will continue its employment policies which have proved effective and further expand the scale of employment organised by groups of like-minded people and created on an individual basis, and make huge efforts to develop the collective and private economy so as to open up more channels of employment. We have placed vocational education and training in a strategic position in our employment policy and have gradually put together a multi-tier, multi-channel vocational education and training network in various forms, in an effort to enhance the qualities of the labour force and their ability to create jobs by themselves.

Fifthly, to strengthen tripartite consultation and enable employers and workers to fully participate in the development process. We are of the view that employers and workers must be enabled to participate in the process, be it of economic development or of social progress. On such questions as employment planning, wage readjustment, social security programmes and personnel policy, it is all the more important to canvass extensively the views of workers and their organisations and seek their support and supervision. This is also the fundamental guarantee of the success of these policies and plans. In the future, we shall further improve the system of tripartite consultation on the basis of China's actual circumstances.

The present world economy is increasingly moving towards an integrated whole. The development of one country cannot be separated from the development of the world; rather it should contribute to world development. The developed countries should shoulder more responsibility in order to promote the balanced development of the world economy and especially the early recovery of the economy of the Third World. In the future, China will continue actively to pursue South-South co-operation, support the promotion of South-North co-operation through dialogue and stand for the establishment of a new international economic order on the basis of equality and mutual benefit for the prosperity of all countries.

You are all concerned about what is happening in Beijing, for which I wish to express our thanks. However, we maintain that this is China's internal affair and not related to the subject of the current Conference. What is more, the view of my Government on this matter is clear. Any unwarranted argument arising from it is the last thing we hope to see at this Conference because that would affect the smooth progress of the Conference and the friendly relations and co-operation which have existed between us for so many years.

Mrs. SIGURDARDOTTIR (Minister of Social Affairs, Iceland) – Mr. President, I should like to begin my address by congratulating you on your election as President of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference.

This year the Director-General's Report deals with recovery and employment. It contains a survey of economic developments and matters relating to employment over the past decade and suggests various ways of bringing about international economic stability and, with it, greater employment opportunities.

The Report emphasises the fact that, in order to introduce or stimulate economic growth and improve social conditions, both the industrialised nations and the developing nations must adapt to a changing world. A revision of policy is called for, not only in the economy of each nation but also in international economic relations.

How then can we lay the foundations for economic development for the coming decade in such a way as to promote increased employment and higher standards of living?

The ways the Director-General mentions in his Report are, as he points out, not easy. Devaluations fail to achieve their aim unless they are backed up by strict measures of some sort, for example, price controls. Otherwise, the outcome is runaway inflation in which the owners of unmortgaged property and means of production become richer while those without assets become poorer.

Few other Director-General's Reports in recent years have spoken as directly to the Icelandic people as the one we are now considering. The reason for this is that, even though the standard of living in Iceland is comparable with that in the most advanced industrial countries, the nation's economy is founded on a very narrow export base. In this respect, Iceland has more in common with the developing nations.

Because its success has been based on a small export range, Iceland has extensive experience in applying the measures which the Director-General refers to in his Report. Great care is called for in applying them, and it often proves necessary to take action which is not popular in the short term with the social partners.

To illustrate this, I should like to state that, in 1987, the export of goods and services from Iceland accounted for about 36 per cent of gross domestic product, with seafood accounting for three-quarters of the export of goods. The country's dependence on fisheries has resulted in greater fluctuations in economy than in most other countries. One of the results of this is that inflation has been far higher in Iceland than in other European countries, and the sudden and large-scale fluctuation in the basic production sector have made economic planning much more difficult than would otherwise have been the case. It was proved necessary to bring national expenditure into line with declining production levels so as to avoid an unmanageable trade deficit and operational losses in the private sector and to guarantee employment.

In 1988 considerable changes were predicted in Iceland's economy, among other reasons because of reduction in earnings for seafood exports. The Government had various economic measures prepared with the aim of preventing an increase in the trade deficit and operational difficulties for fishing and fish-processing companies which might have led to unemployment. The Government also appealed for restraint in wage and price increases.

Early in 1988 all the largest workers' organisations made wages and terms agreements with employers which were within the guide-lines that the Government had set. Some high-income groups and industrial trade unions whose wages and terms agreements were then up for review were preparing strike action in order to force through greater wage increases than other workers' organisations had agreed to. If they had gone ahead with this, other organisations would have demanded the same increases and inflation would have escalated.

This presented the Government with a dilemma. On the one hand, it was important to bring the economy of the country into line with changing circumstances in the way discussed in the Director-General's Report, and so prevent increased accumulation of debt and a great increase in unemployment. But, on the other hand, it had to be borne in mind that Iceland had ratified the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98).

Under the circumstances, the Government took the step in May 1988 of giving legal sanction to the provisions of the wages and terms agreements which the vast majority of workers had already concluded, thereby preventing the possibility that those who still had to make agreements, including various high-income groups, would resort to strike action in order to force through greater wage increases than the others had already agreed to.

A complaint against these measures was made to the ILO. A conclusion in the matter was reached last February. In its conclusion, the Committee on Freedom of Association observed that the Provisory Act of May 1988 restricted the right of the social partners to engage in free collective bargaining. The Committee also expressed concern at the fact that this was the ninth instance of such intervention in ten years, the last being in 1983. Nevertheless, the Committee considered that, on balance, the restrictions imposed were warranted by reasons of compelling national interest, were imposed only to the extent necessary, operated only for a reasonable period and were accompanied by adequate safeguards to protect workers' living standards.

This case is an actual example of the topic of the Director General's Report this year. In my opinion it is a good illustration of the sorts of problems which have to be faced by the governments of countries with a narrow export base.

I should like to stress how important it is that the social partners think in terms of economic realities when they negotiate wages and terms agreements. Care must be taken that the agreements result in real gains for workers, and not simply higher wage rates which are eroded by increased inflation. In Iceland, the social partners have negotiated wage increases totalling 2,593 per cent since 1979, while prices have risen over the same period by 2,345 per cent, resulting in a net increase in the purchasing power of earnings of only just under 10 per cent. What matters here is the purchasing power and the cost of living and not the extent of wage increases. It is important, for example, that housing costs should not constitute an unmanageable proportion of overall living costs. I should also like to point out that much has been achieved in the way of improved standards of living for workers in Iceland because the labour movement has been prepared to negotiate for social concessions instead of mere wage increases, which would certainly have been brought to nothing by inflation.

I would like to state that the Government of Iceland is not dissatisfied with the conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association in this particular case. It wishes to emphasise, however, that the Committee and the ILO should look realistically at the scope which each nation has for fulfilling international Conventions. Too narrow an interpretation of the provision of the Conventions can have an unfortunate influence on developments and cause hardships to those least able to bear them. It should also be stated that Provisory Act I have referred to expired on 15 February this year, and that the main organisations representing the social partners have recently concluded wage agreements based on free collective bargaining.

This year sees the 70th anniversary of the founding of the ILO. I believe that such milestones are suitable occasions for taking stock of what has been achieved and making plans for the future.

I should like to emphasise that the Nordic countries are highly aware of their obligations towards the ILO and take a close interest in its work. The Nordic governments agree that the work of the ILO is of great importance in the spheres of employment and economic life both in the industrial and the developing nations. However, the Nordic governments consider it important that the Organisation should first and foremost concern itself with the matters defined in its Constitution.

Among the projects which should take priority in the decade ahead are the promotion of social progress and justice, a renewal of standard-setting work and of technical co-operation, equal opportunities for both sexes on the labour market and advice on vocational retraining to accompany technical innovations. It should be pointed out that the Nordic governments have recently agreed upon a joint programme in the sphere of equal opportunities which is to run from 1989 to 1993. The ILO might make use of this programme in planning its own efforts to improve the position of women, particularly as regards employment.

Mr. Francis Blanchard retired from the ILO this year after almost 40 years of service to its member countries, including 15 years as its Director-General. I should like to take this opportunity to extend to Mr. Blanchard and his wife the particular thanks of the Government of Iceland for his contribution and the good relations that we have enjoyed with the ILO through him. I should also like, on behalf of the Government of Iceland, to welcome the new Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, to the post, and to express our hope that we will establish the same close relationship with him that we enjoyed with his predecessor. I wish him every success in the post.

Mr. GARONG (Minister for Labour and Employment, Papua New Guinea) – As leader of the Papua New Guinea delegation, I have great pleasure in conveying to you on behalf of the Government and people of my country our warmest congratulations on your election as President of this session of the Conference. Given your wealth of experience, we are confident that under your guidance and wisdom this session of the Conference will achieve its objectives and provide a forum for fruitful discussion.

May I also take this opportunity to congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne on his election as Director-General of this unique Organisation. I should at the same time like to pay tribute to Mr. Francis Blanchard for his invaluable contribution to the work of this Organisation during his time as Director-General.

Furthermore, I also wish to extend my sincere greetings to the delegations from other countries who have come to this international forum to discuss problems and issues, many of which are common to us all.

With these remarks I shall now turn to the theme of this Conference, namely a recovery and employment. I should like to thank the former Director-General and his staff for addressing this important theme as outlined in his comprehensive report.

My country is a young developing nation with a population of 3.5 million which is estimated to be growing at 2.5 per cent each year. The majority of this population is living in the rural areas and about 15 per cent is actively engaged in wage employment. Hence, the main objective of my Government is to further expand the country's existing economic base to accommodate this increasing population, more particularly in the rural sector.

It is also my Government's objective that the income generated from the country's abundant mineral and other natural resources should be properly expanded to further boost economic growth and also to meet the demands of the growing labour force.

I wish to state also that, as the Minister responsible for employment matters in my country, I intend to ensure that my area of responsibility receives increased government priority. In this regard, my Government will continue to pursue the task of promoting and creating employment opportunities in line with the principles of the International Labour Organisation.

In the public sector, my Government has now embarked on a scheme recently introduced into public administration based on the "resource management system". Under this scheme my Government intends to make a drastic review of its existing resources, re-organise and re-distribute them in such a way as to achieve its national objectives. Thus employment promotion and creation will receive greater attention.

In the private sector, my Government places great emphasis on the development of the country's industrial base. The exploitation of our vast mineral resources is vital to the further expansion of economic growth. Intense mining of mineral resources, particularly copper and gold production, serve to counter-balance the country's dependence on imports.

The growth of employment resulting from this intense economic activity has brought about the need to expand also the services associated with maintaining industrial harmony. My Government in this instance is now in the process of negotiating with all the key representatives of the employers, employees and the Government to establish a national tripartite consultative council.

When this council is fully established, the Government and the respective social partners will, with closer co-operation and better understanding, continue to promote and strengthen our existing industrial relations and practices.

Papua New Guinea still relies heavily on foreign technology, manpower and capital to properly utilise its economy.

However, my Government is ensuring that economic development is not pursued in isolation, that is, our economic activity is geared towards social development as well. This means that my Government has a balanced approach to social and economic prosperity, equality and to furthering the growth of the employment sector, in line with the ILO principles.

The Government of Papua New Guinea is vigorously pursuing its objectives to minimise the problems associated with the growing unemployment and external.

A combined effort by other key service departments, including my Department of Labour and Employment, is required by the Government, with the co-operation of the private sector, to manage fiscal, monetary, foreign exchange and trade policies to contain inflation and sustain the buoyancy of the economy, with due regard to the impact of these policies on employment income, especially of the lowest income groups.

In conclusion, my Government has placed more emphasis on the development of our industrial base. The private sector takes a leading role, with Government support, in processing our primary products. This serves as an effective means of creating and promoting employment opportunities, thus reducing our dependence on imports.

In this respect, we have high expectations of this Conference in that it will not only enlighten us as to the methods we may adopt in solving the issues and problems in our country, but also in making known to the developed nations our efforts in addressing the issues under discussion.

Last, but not least, agenda items concerning indigenous tribal population, night work and safety in the use of chemical at work are important issues that reflect the ILO's continuous endeavours to promote safety and harmony in the work place and also to protect and maintain human rights and freedom throughout the world.

Seventh sitting

President: Mr. Gazarin

RATIFICATION OF THE INSTRUMENT FOR THE AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANISATION, 1986

Original – Arabic: The PRESIDENT (Mr. GAZARIN) – I would like to give the floor to the Clerk of the Conference for an announcement.

The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE – I have pleasure in announcing that the Director-General of the International Labour Office has registered the ratification by Sierra Leone of the Instrument for the Amendment of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation, 1986. This brings the total number of ratifications and acceptances of the Instrument to 59.

COMMUNICATION TO THE CONFERENCE

Original – Arabic: The PRESIDENT (Mr. GAZARIN) – I give the floor again to the Clerk of the Conference for a communication to the Conference.

The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE – I have a communication which I will read in Spanish. This is a letter sent by the Nicaraguan Employers' delegate, which has been addressed to the President.

(The speaker continues in Spanish.)

Honourable Appeals Board of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference.

As Employer delegate from Nicaragua, designated by the Government in accordance with article 3, paragraph 5, of the Constitution of the ILO, I appear before you to inform you of the following. In the exercise of the powers and rights which I am entitled to exercise as an Employers' delegate, I asked that I be included as an Employers' member in the Committee on the Application of Standards, in line with the procedures and practices of the Conference, and requested that Mr. Mario Garache be made a deputy member of the Resolutions Committee, and Mr. Antonio Leiva appointed to the Committee on the Use of Chemicals.

The Employer's group of the Conference, basing itself on unfounded criteria and applying unilaterally the principle of the autonomy of the groups, has deliberately excluded me from membership in any Conference Committee.

They have thus stripped me of my rights and privileges as a delegate. I should like to point out to the Appeals Board that, under article 26, paragraph 3, (Part 2, section B), of the Standing Orders of the Conference, it is only for the Credentials Committee to decide on any matter concerning the nomination of the members of any delegation, and no group can take unilateral action counter to this provision. At the same time I should like to draw the attention of the Appeals Board to the provisions of article 26, paragraph 8 (Part 2, section B), of the Standing Orders, which establishes clearly that until such time as the Credentials Committee has reached a final decision on the admission of a delegate, the delegate shall have the same rights as other delegates and advisers. Thus on the basis of these provisions and the precedents established by the Appeals Board, I ask that I be included as a member of the Committee on the Application of Standards.

I remain at your disposal for any further information you may need. I would like to take this opportunity to reiterate the expression of my highest consideration.

(Signed) Juan Ramón ARAGÓN,
Employers' delegate, Nicaragua,
76th Session of the International Labour Conference.

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND THE DIRECTOR- GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

Original – Arabic: The PRESIDENT (Mr. GAZARIN) – We shall now continue our discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Original – Russian: Mr. GACIC (Federal Secretary of Labour, Health, Veterans and Social Welfare, Yugoslavia) – Permit me to congratulate the President on his election and to wish him success in carrying out his extremely important and responsible task.

I would like to take this opportunity to endorse the congratulations addressed to Mr. Nkomo and also to address sincere thanks to Mr. Francis Blanchard for his diligent efforts and the results he has achieved at the head of the International Labour Organisation over a period of 15 years. At the same time I wish Mr. Michel Hansenne, who has just been elected Director-General, every success in the exercise of his extremely responsible and important duties.

We have read with particular attention the Reports of the Director-General and the Governing Body and in this connection I should like to emphasise that they present basically an objective analysis of the activities of the Organisation in the period between this Conference and the last, as well as of the substantive problems with which it has been faced in this period. Doubtless, the serious problems of a political and particularly economic and social nature which the contemporary world is facing, to a great extent influence the basic trends of the activity of the International Labour Organisation, as well as the results achieved by it in carrying out its activities. I consider that on the whole the International Labour Organisation is successfully adopting itself to meet the current situation.

This basically positive endorsement of the activities of the International Labour Organisation is complemented by a generally positive endorsement of the proposed two-year programme and budget.

I have already mentioned the serious economic and social problems which the contemporary world is facing and I have in mind in particular the fact that the world economy and overall international economic relations once again are going through an extremely grave crisis. It is precisely at a time when the economies of developed countries are enjoying a new impetus and technological development is progressing on all sides, that the chasm and stagnation in economic relations between developed and developing countries is deepening, with a clear trend towards a worsening of the situation of the developing countries. First and foremost, I have in mind the exacerbation of the debt problem, probably the most acute problem currently facing the world and which threatens serious consequences for the developing countries. This problem also affects my country, which at the present time is going through a period of extremely serious economic difficulties, together with all the social and political problems which appear under such conditions. We recognise the full complexity of the situation and the great historic and political responsibility, and thus in our country we are making organised efforts to pull ourselves out of the crisis. In this context, we have decided to implement integrated economic reforms which are aimed first and foremost at effecting radical major changes in the economic and political system and the whole philosophy of development, and on these bases, modify our development and economic policies. The basic object of the reform is the gradual adaptation of outmoded and backward economic structures and the construction of a contemporary and dynamic economy based on economic criteria and open-market principles, able to respond rapidly to market demands and changes which are brought about by contemporary technical and technological processes and on these bases to guarantee an effective economy and more concrete and effective participation in the international division of labour.

We fully understand that this process will also have negative consequences in the social sphere and to avert these and to find timely solutions to them, it will be necessary, first and foremost, to review the existing system of social security for the population as a whole, to improve the system and to adopt it to the forthcoming changes. Basing ourselves on the precepts of the Yugoslav Constitution, the social policy must be an integral part of development policy, a condition and a prerequisite for the implementation of economic and overall social development, since the aims of social policy are the basic components of a more dynamic and effective economy overall. Consequently, in the process of implementing economic reforms and the transition to market economy conditions, social policy has to become, in practice as well, an integral part of total social and economic development. We are aware, and we are already meeting the situation in practice, that under conditions of a market economy, the less efficient enterprises will have to be wound up and new, more promising and economically viable ones created. As an accompanying phenomenon, it is inevitable that we will also have major fluctuations in the sphere of employment, and here I mainly have in mind the fact that a considerable number of workers will be out of work and this will have serious negative consequences as we are all already aware. In the past, and again at the beginning of this year after a number of years, we have had stagnation in the number of the employed in the public sector and the number of persons looking for jobs is on the rise again. The particular problem is that here we are talking primarily about young and educated people. In the framework of economic policy this problem is at the centre of attention and we are hoping to find a successful solution. With this aim in view, in the immediate future, our primary activity will be directed towards stimulating new capital investment, domestic and foreign, public or private, in small enterprises, transport, services and also in the highly productive enterprises and those with export possibilities.

Referring to the basic elements of the Yugoslav economy and social reform, there is also the extremely important problem of employment and here I have to emphasise especially the extremely important reform of the labour legislation which, naturally, is proceeding on the basis of the decisions that have been adopted governing Yugoslav social and economic reform, namely, the concept of a single labour market in the Yugoslav federal community, and a law, currently in its final stages, on the basic rights of workers in labour relations which establishes the basic rights of workers throughout Yugoslav territory. We are convinced that the proposed solutions will help bring about a better attitude of the workers to labour and will contribute to the creation of possibilities for fuller employment to stimulating the geographical mobility of workers in accordance with the employment possibilities and the requirements of the labour process as well as to guaranteeing the rights of the workers to material and social security.

Permit me to draw your attention to a question which in my opinion is very important and which is to be studied at this session as well as next year. This is the question of night work. In Yugoslavia this has been the subject of extensive discussion in the Yugoslav trade unions, in the social and political organisations and in the union parliament. The general position resulting from this debate in very broad terms is the following: the existing Yugoslav regulations ensure protection of all workers working at night as well as a high level of protection for working women in connection with pregnancy, childbirth and maternity; there is also a ban on overtime and night work for parents who have responsibility for looking after their children; a step has been taken forward to the application of the principle of equality of the sexes and equal treatment of men and women in the sphere of labour relations.

At the international level and in many countries, conditions are already ripe for a more modern approach to the question of night work for women, first and foremost from the point of view of the elimination of all forms of discrimination and the creation of fuller conditions for their integration in social and economic life.

Bearing in mind the above-mentioned factors, we feel it necessary to insist upon the revision of the Night Work (Women) Convention, (Revised), 1948 (No. 89), or the adoption of a new standard-setting instrument by the International Labour Organisation, for here the protection of women should be regulated basically in the same way and following the same principles as govern the protection of men, bearing in mind women's reproductive social functions. Consequently in the question of the limitation of night work for women, the approach should be more complex and flexible so that this form of protection of women workers should not represent any kind of limiting factor in the exercise of their right to work.

Permit me, in conclusion, to express my certainty that this 76th Session of the Conference of the International Labour Organisation will yield positive results, particularly since in finding solutions to the individual substantive questions there is a political readiness on the part of the whole structure of our Organisation, which this year marks the 70th anniversary of its creation and its successful activity.

Original – French: Mr. BAHR (representative of the World Confederation of Teachers) – First of all let me congratulate the President on his election.

I also congratulate the officers of the Conference. On behalf of the World Confederation of Teachers, affiliated to the World Confederation of Labour, which I have the honour of representing here, I wish this session of the Conference every success.

The WCT welcomes and approves the emphasis in the Report of the Director-General on the fact that tripartism is an essential element of economic growth. The participation of the social partners in decisions presents a twofold advantage: first, it increases the political effectiveness of these decisions and, second, it guarantees a more equitable distribution of their effects.

Clearly much more emphasis must be placed on the social aspects of adjustment policies and the ultimate goal of development: the well-being of mankind. The ILO must ensure, more than it has in the past, that these social concerns are not lost sight of in the interests of re-establishing balances on a wider scale. The WCT supports such specific action by the ILO, going beyond mere words.

Interdependence, a topic which is dealt with frequently at conferences and summit meetings, also seems to have been understood more clearly. Yet even so the countries of the South are not only stagnating but are also becoming dramatically poorer: the problems of debt, unemployment, underemployment and therefore increasing poverty mean that poorly organised low-income groups cannot protect themselves. The WCT has always endeavoured to speak on behalf of those who can no longer make their voices heard.

During a pan-African conference organised by the WCT in Lomé in July 1988 for the teachers' trade union organisations of 16 sub-Saharan countries, representatives underscored the obstacles to the development of the African continent: insufficient mastery of economic matters, political instability and the lack of a reliable development policy. In most cases indeed, development strategies are not realistic, taking no account of the real potentials and needs of States.

Economic recovery must, in the opinion of the WCT, be pursued by granting resources to health, education and training, with true co-operation at national and international level. Disarmament measures are needed to ensure the channelling of expenditure to investment. Underdevelopment, malnourishment and poverty are incompatible with respect for human rights. Economic recovery is a vital need.

The trade union movement thus has a vital role to play, in particular the trade union movement of teaching staffs.

The WCT feels that it is urgent to include human rights instruction in school programmes, and also freedom of association, speech, press and religion, the free exchange of ideas and social, economic and cultural rights which affect the very existence of the trade union movement and can promote an international outlook. The WCT stresses the crucial role of international solidarity in strengthening trade union rights, even in those countries which have not yet recognised such rights or which hinder the free exercise of them. In these cases, only international solidarity is able to raise the barriers on the road towards the universality of these rights, even in countries where this universality is still despised.

The WCT believes that the ILO is increasingly important for labour organisation which can satisfy international conditions country by country specifically by ensuring compliance with ILO Conventions, in the sphere of teaching as in others.

The WCT would also highlight the great importance of the trade union movement as an institution seeking and proposing solutions to often bloody conflicts which tear the world apart. These conflicts not only swallow the funds from teaching budgets, but also bring about conflicts and conjure up images of an enemy which are incompatible with the universal objectives of teaching and with the action of the trade union movement in favour of justice and peace.

The WCT is in favour of closer co-operation between trade union movements and regional and international trade union organisations which are often very different, but realise that only such co-operation can offer a sufficiently broad platform to bring about the solidarity which all teachers feel is vitally necessary.

The WCT supports the integration of teachers' unions in the world trade union movement, bearing in mind that only the solidarity of all workers will enable us to tackle the essence of the problems and suggest solutions at national, regional and international levels which no authority can ignore.

The WCT is developing action by the trade union movement in general, and teachers' unions in particular, towards a new form of co-operation for development aimed at the well-being of the entire planet. This can be achieved with the solidarity of all workers (and, therefore, all teachers) and with durable development models, thus doing away with the existing conflicts in development rather than reinforcing them.

The WCT welcomes the ILO's growing interest in the problems of teachers and education.

The fifth session of the Joint ILO/UNESCO Committee of Experts on the Application of the Recommendation concerning the Status of Teachers stressed in its report the close interdependence between the condition of teachers and the condition of education.

Although we have full confidence in the skills of independent experts sitting on that Committee, we deeply regret the fact that neither teachers themselves, who are, after all, at the centre of the debate, nor their representative international organisations were invited to participate in the work of that Committee.

This is even more important bearing in mind that the implementation of the Recommendation has been brought into question by the policies of budgetary restriction in a growing number of countries, both developed and developing. Working conditions are getting worse because of an increase in working hours and standards, restrictions on teachers' income and extensions of their tasks and responsibilities.

We see among the fields that must be looked at in detail in the immediate future the need for ongoing training of teachers, particularly on the basis of national planning; the various aspects of participation, consultation and negotiation; teachers' working hours; and stress, instability of employment and the difficulties that teachers meet in their profession.

As in the past, the WCT endeavours to ensure that the Recommendation is circulated as widely as possible amongst its member organisations.

The fourth session of the Joint Committee on the Public Service included in its activity programme the establishment of a joint committee on the working and employment conditions of teachers. We welcome the fact that this request, which has been reiterated by the Common Front of the Public Service (PTTI, PSI, IFFTU, INFEDOP and WCT) at every opportunity and in particular at this assembly, has found a favourable echo in that the Administrative Council decided last week to set up a permanent tripartite technical committee. A general survey of the working conditions of teachers, of employment and of rights to negotiation is vitally necessary.

The strongly felt feeling of a common destiny, which is underscored in the Report of the Director-General, is the guiding light of the teachers represented in the World Confederation of Teachers and in other international teachers' bodies. Co-operation between all teaching staff should enable us to ensure that this takes root in the daily life of men and women.

The International Labour Organisation must offer them every possibility to ensure that they can do their job, namely to ensure a serene future of justice and peace for young people.

Original - Russian: Mr. TCHECHENKO (Vice-Chairman of the USSR State Committee for Labour and Social Affairs, USSR) - I would like to congratulate the President on his election to the responsible office of President of the International Labour Conference.

As you are aware, June this year marks the 70th anniversary of the creation of the International Labour Organisation. In this context it is my honour and my pleasure to transmit to you the following message from the Head of the Government of the USSR to the President of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference:

Esteemed Mr. President,

On behalf of the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, I would like to greet the participants of the 76th Session of the general Conference of the International Labour Conference which celebrates its 70th anniversary this year.

The Soviet Union fully shares and supports the aims and principles of the International Labour Organisation, laid down in its Constitution and in the Declaration of Philadelphia, which affirm social justice by securing basic rights of workers. In the context of the growing recognition of the priority of values common to all mankind and of the increasing interdependence of States, the differences between social systems should not stand in the way of broad and equitable co-operation within the framework of the International Labour Organisation.

The Soviet Union duly appreciates the ILO's contribution to establishing and maintaining the economic stability of the world community. An important achievement of the ILO has been the elaboration of Conventions and Recommendations covering virtually all aspects of labour activity and protection of workers' social interests.

The highly responsive approach of the Organisation to social and economic changes brought about, in particular, by scientific and technological progress, enables the ILO to improve its activity, ensuring that it corresponds more adequately to present-day social and political realities.

I wish the International Labour Organisation success in achieving the tasks facing it, and wish participants of the Conference fruitful work in the interests of social progress and lasting peace.

(Signed) Nikolai RYZHKOV,
Chairman of the Council of Ministers of the USSR.

The Report of the Director-General, entitled Recovery and employment raises important problems of the contemporary social and economic situation in the world and contains an analysis of the contradictory processes which work to the detriment of the strengthening of the economic sovereignty of various groups of countries, particularly the developing countries.

In a situation of a growing global interdependence of the world community, there is a great deal of potential for co-operation, for mutual advantage and for increasing the prosperity of peoples. Everything depends on the extent to which members of the world community can, properly and jointly, on the basis of the laws of the world economy and without encroaching on national priorities, learn to manage collectively the interdependent world economy in all of its spheres.

It is broadly recognised and noted in the Report of the Director-General, that the foreign debt problem constitutes a serious hindrance to social and economic development. Its size is continually increasing. Growing debt service payments are bleeding the economy of debtor countries. The situation is abnormal: developing countries have become net exporters of financial resources.

The problem of debt has grown beyond the monetary and financial framework. It calls for a political solution and the uniting of international efforts in order to settle it.

The Soviet Union has stated its willingness to declare a long-term moratorium for a period of up to 100 years on the servicing of debt by the least developed countries and to cancel it entirely for a number of countries. In relation to other developing countries, we are willing to participate in multilateral forums to discuss methods to solve the debt crisis. In doing this, we proceed on the basis that the accumulated debt can neither be repaid nor recovered under the original terms under which the loan was granted.

Amongst the priority problems facing the world community which call for urgent action, ecological problems are of particular importance. The relationship between man and nature has taken on a menacing character. The International Labour Organisation, like other organisations of the United Nations system, is involved in the consideration of environmental issues and carrying out useful work in the field of protection of the working environment and of the link between the environment and employment. The adoption of resolutions on this theme at this year's session of the Conference would assist the further development of the ILO's activity along these lines.

Moreover, the ILO can play an active part in the implementation of programmes developed by other agencies of the United Nations system, including support for the idea of setting up a world centre for urgent ecological assistance as part of the measures to preserve workers from occupational hazards.

Amongst the most important external factors defining the content and conclusions of the report are the following: increasing interdependence, the growing trend to engage in dialogue within the United Nations framework, to seek compromise solutions to regional conflicts, and the process of disarmament which has begun.

The reality and the potential of the principle "disarmament for development" is demonstrated by concrete international agreements and by unilateral steps on the part of the Soviet Union, which has declared that in the coming two years, the numerical strength of its troops would be reduced by 500,000. It also intends to reduce the military budget for 1990-91 by 14 per cent.

Specific measures to reduce military production raise the problem of the conversion of manpower employed in enterprises in the defence industry. We co-operate with the ILO and intend to work in close collaboration with it in this sphere. We hope that the International Labour Organisation will play an active part in matters relating to conversion. For our part, the Soviet Union envisages an internal plan for the conversion of military production, which will serve as the basis for studies on its impact on employment, retraining, etc. A great deal of attention is now being given in our country to this trend in the package of measures to improve the economy.

The transformation which is taking place in the USSR covers practically all spheres of political, economic and social life of our people and a new economic mechanism is developing.

The implementation of social programmes is a priority aspect of the restructuring of Soviet society. It is precisely these programmes which have attracted particular attention in the Congress of Peoples' Deputies of the USSR now taking place in Moscow. We can rightly say that a genuine process to reorient our economy has begun to meet the social needs of the people, to raise their standard of living and, first and foremost, for the disadvantaged sector of the population.

The radical restructuring of the economy which is taking place in our country on the basis of self-financing and self-management of enterprises gives rise to the need to close down unprofitable works, to cut back the administrative apparatus, and to release a number of workers. In this connection, work is being done to create new jobs and measures are being taken for retraining and a broad local network of employment centres has been set up throughout the country. Other economic and social measures are also planned and are being implemented.

We realise that success in achieving social objectives depends directly on the solution of economic problems and in this respect we endorse the conclusions of the Report of the Director-General, to the effect that economic progress must go hand in hand with social progress. Programmes involving investment in what is termed the "human factor" are of particular significance in this case. These are of the highest priority and cannot "in principle" be evaluated in terms of the current economic effect.

It is in the priority of long-term social objectives that economic, scientific and technological progress take on their significance. It is thus that the truly humanitarian nature of a social system is revealed.

We support the idea expressed in the Report of the Director-General as to the need for more active influence of the ILO on the recommendations of the International Monetary Fund and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development relating to structural adjustment in the economies of countries with a view to taking the social aspects sufficiently into account.

Actively supporting the activities of the ILO, we consistently favour its further profound democratisation, so that our Organisation should adapt itself sufficiently rapidly to the realities of the contemporary world, in order to create the necessary conditions for an equitable co-operation of representatives of all countries and parties. The prestige and viability of the ILO depends on this ability to adapt. In this context, the Soviet Union has adopted the amendments to the ILO Constitution approved by the 1986 Session of the Conference, so that, in the interests of all of the member States of the ILO, we shall be able to realise the possibilities for equitable co-operation laid down in the amended Constitution.

In conclusion, I should like to express the hope that the debate on the Report of the Director-General will make it possible for our Organisation to take concrete steps to implement the measures proposed in the Report to improve the economies of the member States of the ILO, to combat poverty and to achieve social justice.

Mr. SIMMONS (Government delegate, Barbados) – I should like to join the preceding speakers in congratulating Mr. Nkomo on his election as President of this session of the Conference. I am sure this reflects not only his rich and varied experience but also demonstrates the confidence that delegations have in his capacity to guide ably these meetings to a successful outcome. I wish him every success in his term, and, while I am on this subject, let me also congratulate the new Director-General on his recent appointment to a job which is perhaps one of the most challenging there is and which requires the widest-ranging abilities to manage successfully the global operations of the International Labour Organisation – at a time when the horizon seems probably more uncharted than at any other moment in recent history. Again, we wish you well and hope that you can bring your good offices to bear on global problems in a distinctively positive manner.

Let me reaffirm that the Government of Barbados continues to share in the ideals and principles of the International Labour Organisation and pledges our commitment to its work and philosophic tenets. Our commitment to social justice, democratic constitutions, human rights and freedoms were recently reiterated in a speech by our Prime Minister in Bridgetown when he said: "My Government supports the fundamental rights and freedoms of persons within this society, irrespective of race, colour, creed or national origin, as enshrined in our Constitution, subject only to respect for the rights and freedoms of others and for the public interests."

Last year, Barbados took the opportunity to state its concerns on the inter-relationships between work, the right to work and human dignity, as expressed in the idea of democratic socialism. The concept of democratic socialism continues to underpin the policies and programmes of our domestic and international relations and it is in this regard that we find a responsive chord in the work before us on the agenda of this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. The burning issues of the impact of unemployment and economic dislocation find full expression in the concerns regarding recovery and employment, as analysed in the Director-General's Report. Essentially, in this epoch, we are all on the threshold of what may be euphemistically be referred to as life in a global village. Therefore, even though Barbados has tried to minimise some of the shock measures that have had to be taken by other countries and societies – for example impacts on public service employment and a share in the uneven burden of structural adjustment – we are not and cannot be exempt from the global effects.

We are still struggling with the undesirable effects of unemployment, particularly among our youth and women, and we are taking every measure we can, which includes attempts to develop and foster serious avenues of self-employment and small-scale enterprises. We recognise the problems of night work and encourage all efforts to generate standards on the subject. We in Barbados have long tried to safeguard the more difficult aspects of this situation by setting certain minimum standards on night work in our legislation.

We also recognise and welcome the proposals and preparatory work on safety in the use of chemicals. Here we are particularly aware of the need to have up-to-date information on some of the hazards associated with products that have been on the market for some time – let alone the new and yet undisclosed effects of products being constantly churned out by the chemical industry.

Given the transfer of technology, the rapid rate of scientific output, the need for profits combined with the need for growth and underdevelopment, we welcome any attempt to establish networks of information which can minimise the hazards of uninformed workers.

We in Barbados are seeking to update our own resources in these areas by trying to expand our institutional capabilities to deal with these matters. We are an open society and therefore subject to all the vagaries of openness – including threats to our social and physical environment.

The painful condition of apartheid in southern Africa is clearly a blot on the conscience of mankind. Barbados felt its first effects in the late 1940s, with the death of one of its citizens in racist South Africa. We have taken all measures within our power since then to make our contribution to the dissolution of such a system. We therefore propose to continue assisting and maintaining whatever pressures we can until liberation for the Black race is realised.

This situation in Namibia would seem to point to the fact that a solution is at hand. However, we are cautious that there might be reversals in the history of that troubled land. We urge that the major players in this scenario continue to work for the ultimate liberation of that still unhappy territory. We cannot but remember that the course of history has sometimes changed in the past, without appropriate sanctions being taken.

Turning to our own region and particularly the activities of the International Labour Organisation there, we urge continued support for the Caribbean Labour Administration Centre (CLAC) under its present guidance and we are indeed pleased with the work it currently does. Indeed, we urge that particular programmes be expanded, especially those at the University of the West Indies at Cave Hill, which are now almost a sine qua non of our own development in labour and industrial relation; for instance, the one-year certificate course in labour administration could be extended for a further three years. We reiterate our support for the chair in industrial relations and hope that the ILO would continue to honour its commitment in this area.

I am sure that the deliberations of the meeting of Caribbean Labour Ministers, held in May in Nassau, have not escaped your attention, and again we urge that those regional concerns be supported by your office.

We must welcome the useful initiative by the International Labour Organisation's Office in Port-of-Spain to sponsor the meeting of labour officials, held every other year, to back up the biannual labour ministers' meeting, and we sincerely hope that those areas of technical assistance which we have identified are given full recognition and satisfaction.

Again, this year, we restate our position that we look forward to your establishing the necessary know-how in the region, paying due regard to the filling of posts with capable nationals from within the region, so that your financial and budgetary provisions will be satisfied on a regional basis.

Original – Arabic: Mr. ABBADI (Minister of Employment, Morocco) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. In the name of the delegation of the Kingdom of Morocco and in my own name, I should like to present my congratulations to the President on his election to the head of this session of the Conference. I am sure that his great experience and skill in leading the debate will allow us to obtain the results that we are hoping for.

I should also like to avail myself of this opportunity to reiterate the congratulations of the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco to Mr. Michel Hansenne on his nomination to the post of Director-General of the International Labour Office. I am confident that he will place his vast competence in the service of our Organisation in order to pursue the implementation of the projects and programmes, particularly those related to employment, which were the concern of his predecessor, Mr. Francis Blanchard. I should also like to address to Mr. Francis Blanchard our thanks and our best wishes for success in his future activities.

The Director-General, in the first part of his annual Report, has dealt with a subject of great importance, namely, recovery and employment. The choice of this subject reflects his great interest in our Organisation's objectives.

The International Labour Organisation, conscious of the important role which the problem of employment plays in economic policies, convened a High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment, which brought representatives of governments, employers and workers together with representatives of international organisations such as the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank and UNCTAD.

The objective of that meeting was a search for a compromise between international economic development and the need for the promotion of employment policies.

I should like to thank the Director-General for having given such importance to the conclusions of the High-Level Meeting. This is shown by the inclusion in the draft programme and budget for the years 1990-91 of activities that take into account the recommendations of the High-Level Meeting aimed at promoting social progress and economic development.

Developing countries are aware of the need to take the necessary measures to bring about their economic development. In making their efforts, however, they encounter major difficulties, namely: the servicing of foreign debt which uses up a large part of their resources that might otherwise be invested in lucrative projects; the substantial decrease in export prices; the protectionist measures which are imposed on their exports to the industrialised countries.

Under these conditions, it is very difficult for developing countries to achieve a rapid and continuous development without effective international co-operation. The industrialised countries have to be aware of the interdependence of all countries and act in the spirit of international solidarity by helping the developing countries to solve their problems.

We agree with the Director-General when he says that the developing countries must pursue economic policies which are based on the rational use of resources and the introduction of necessary reforms, while taking into account the need to ensure and guarantee harmonious development in all areas.

With these principles in mind, the Kingdom of Morocco is making major efforts in its development plans, both economic and social, in order to guarantee a balanced growth. These efforts are directed towards trade liberalisation, production diversification, continuing fiscal reforms, revision of investment codes, simplification of administrative procedures with regard to investment and encouragement of private initiative.

While undertaking these reforms, the Government of His Majesty, King Hassan II, may God bless him, is conscious of the need to promote the employment sector. He is therefore following with interest developments in this sector through regular meetings and specialised commissions which have been set up at the national and regional levels to study the promotion of employment through the local groups, in particular.

These commissions, which include civil servants from the various departments concerned, local authorities, elected councils and professional organisations, have examined the situation of employment in our country and the necessary means to ensure the promotion of this sector by making full use of all the possibilities offered by the public, semi-public and private sectors.

A programme of action comprising measures designed to adapt vocational training to employment has been approved recently by the Government Council. These measures include: Improvement of the employment strategy within the framework of the national employment plan and encouragement of investment in order to boost the national economy; Priority attention to employment generating sectors such as agriculture, public works, construction, crafts and deep-sea fishing; Implementation of major labour-intensive projects such as forestry projects, dams, the electrification of villages and the construction of roads.

The measures of encouragement taken in favour of young business entrepreneurs, graduates of universities, institutes of higher education and vocational training centres, have contributed in a positive manner to the promotion of private initiative. These young entrepreneurs have been granted access to investments and have been able to create, in the framework of a national subsidy provided by His Majesty's Government, small and medium-sized enterprises in the various sectors of the national economy.

The development of co-operation between the southern countries has become an absolute necessity to ensure the growth of their level of development.

In this respect, the creation of the Arab Maghreb Union will open new perspectives to the five countries involved, namely Mauritania, Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia and the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, to ensure economic success, prosperity and the well-being of their peoples.

The agenda of our session includes major questions such as night work and safety in the use of chemicals at work.

With regard to the first issue, namely night work, it is one that enters into the group of various Conventions that have to be revised. These Conventions no longer correspond to the evolution which the various industrial sectors are now undergoing, neither with regard to production processes nor to conditions and methods of work.

It seems to us that the revision of these Conventions should bring about effective protection to all workers, especially the most vulnerable ones, namely women, old people and the disabled.

We hope that the preliminary study of this question will lead to conclusions which take into account the specific characteristics and the possibilities of all the member States, whatever their level of economic and social development.

With regard to the question of safety in the use of chemicals at work, it is an issue which the Kingdom of Morocco has been very interested in examining. Morocco thinks that our Organisation should adopt Conventions in areas which are undergoing extensive transformation due to scientific and technological progress.

We hope that the work of this session of the Conference will have positive results in ensuring effective protection against professional risks brought about by the use of dangerous products such as chemical substances.

I would like to take this occasion to remind you of the deplorable situation of workers and employers in Palestine and in the other occupied Arab territories.

The Arab employers and workers in these territories continue to be victims of various forms of repression which are perpetrated by the occupying authorities. These authorities deny them the most fundamental rights. The Kingdom of Morocco, which has had the honour of hosting recently the Extraordinary Arab Summit under the presidency of His Majesty King Hassan II, expresses its solidarity with the Palestinian people in its heroic struggle to bring about just and lasting peace and hope that our Organisation will pursue its efforts so that the Arab employers and workers in Palestine and in the other occupied Arab territories will be able to exercise their full and legitimate rights.

The Kingdom of Morocco commends the efforts for peace which have been made towards the national independence of Namibia and expresses its deep concern for the situation of the people of South Africa. We are certain that our Organisation will increase its efforts to fight against apartheid in all its guises together with all the member States, governments, employers and workers by applying the various resolutions adopted by our Conference in this respect.

Before concluding I would like to reiterate my congratulations to the Director-General and express the wish of the Government of His Majesty King Hassan II, may God bless him, to further reinforce and develop the co-operation between the Kingdom of Morocco and the International Labour Office.

Original - Spanish: Mr. JIMENEZ AGUILAR (Employers' delegate, Spain) - Mr. President, on behalf of the Spanish Employers, I should like to express our most sincere congratulations on your election and, at the same time, wish you success in guiding the debates and activities of this 76th International Labour Conference.

I should like to express my most sincere congratulations to the new Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Hansenne, and assure him of our complete co-operation. He has come to our Organisation at a key time in our history, a time at which dialogue and social co-operation, the best example of which is the ILO, must be the necessary equalising factor in carrying out the economic and social changes in today's society. I should also like to take this opportunity to express our great thanks to Mr. Blanchard, who, for the last 15 years, has very effectively directed the International Labour Office.

The ILO has at this Conference taken as its basic reference recovery and employment. These are basic topics which are dealt with in detail in the Report of the Director-General, and the Spanish Confederation of Employers' Organisations has been paying very great attention to them for some time.

Although these are very complex phenomena with multiple variables, factors and interests, the implied challenge cannot be avoided nor should it be irresponsibly postponed since we are faced with questions which affect millions of persons and all countries to a greater or lesser extent.

However, in the face of these problems, a vision of pessimism and despair is of little use except to fuel pessimism and despair.

We prefer to share with the Director-General of the ILO the opinion that the remaining years of this century afford the opportunity to begin a new stage of progress in the history of humanity. We must grasp this opportunity and see how the technical advances which occur daily and at an ever faster pace can serve to satisfy the aspirations of economic growth without which social well-being becomes merely a Utopia.

As the Director-General says in his Report, and this is the principal lesson to be learnt from the current decade, "It is very difficult to solve social problems if there is no economic growth".

But economic growth cannot occur spontaneously. It requires the implementation of policies which make it possible to have growth for its development. "Social dialogue is vital" and one of the keys if we are to increase the possibilities of success.

In referring to these aspects of the Director-General's Report I wish to express our full agreement with the statement therein that each and every one of us must work very hard to increase productivity, savings and investment and to reduce the fundamental task of establishing monetary and fiscal policies.

It is on this basis that we must establish our justified hopes for jobs creation, particularly for young people who in countries such as ours are suffering difficulty due to insufficient training or too rigid an organisation of the labour market which poses an obstacle to job access.

As I have said in previous Conferences at the same podium, speaking on behalf of the Spanish Employers, the ideas of co-operation, social dialogue, economic growth and employment are, for us, as Spanish employers, constant reference points, bearing in mind the fact that the problem of unemployment in the last few years has become a serious concern in Spain.

Thus, when the Spanish Government convened a tripartite meeting on employment we went without preconditions and determined to support realistic and effective measures, duly structured in a broad-based document leaving no room for arbitrary decisions which could disrupt the labour market because whether such decisions are of a legislative, bureaucratic, fiscal or financial nature they have led in Spain and other countries to a reduction in employment, paralysis of economic growth and many, many difficulties in terms of social well-being.

We feel that effective progress must be based on a greater openness of markets, a healthy policy of wage moderation, top quality on-the-job training and the elimination of obstacles and disincentives to employers' initiatives by giving decisive support to saving and investment which create wealth and employment.

An effective job policy, as we indicated to the Government and the trade unions, must be one which includes financial and fiscal aspects, public investment and infrastructure and major public work using more resources, being more effective and working faster. It must include moreover a reform of the labour market and the recovery of the previous balance in terms of budget, prices and foreign trade.

All of this must be set up within a plan of promotion and stimulation of competition combined with a new policy for social protection, bearing in mind the situation of marginal groups of workers and defining social protection realistically, eradicating fraud by bringing in systematic control measures, improving management and using adequate resources for this in line with economic growth and employment.

At the same time, one must eliminate passive policies which prejudice job creation, as is the case with the unlimited extension of subsidies, measures which, instead of creating employment are based solely on the distribution of labour, or the adoption of decisions which result in higher costs for the employers, thus reducing the competitiveness and viability of Spanish companies.

These measures must, however, be adopted within the global objectives and those of the ILO for economic recovery and job creation and must not lead us to pass over in silence some very important successes that have occurred in Spain and which have been highlighted not only by employers' organisations but also by independent experts.

Between the second half of 1985 and the end of 1988 we succeeded in creating jobs which have benefited over a million workers in Spain and this trend has been maintained throughout 1989.

At the same time and with specific reference to young people faced with the attempts of trade unions to block contracts for training and experience, these new contractual methods have been widely used by young people and by companies giving young people the possibility of perfecting their professional knowledge and, in many cases, of obtaining stable employment.

This can be seen from some figures. In 1988 there were 433,608 job contracts for apprenticeship and training, compared to 164,496 in 1985. This has enabled us to overcome difficulties arising out of an inadequate education system currently being reformed and which will considerably increase possibilities within the labour market.

We should also point out that 370,000 young people under 26 years of age have seen their contracts converted into full-time contracts with no time limit because of the possibilities opened up by the legislation in force up to last year and which should be brought into force once again in order to promote this type of process.

I do not wish to conclude without denouncing those who have made certain prejudicial statements in reference to the duration of contracts in Spain and who have deliberately ignored the conversion of part-time contracts into full-time contracts (50 to 60 per cent of the total) this despite the fact that there has been no solution to the problems of the lack of mobility and flexibility in the legislation.

The same is true for those who claim there is greater precariousness in contracts since they confuse the contracts carried out by private companies and those given for a very short duration by public bodies carrying out programmes of social interest.

Finally, the very concept of unlimited contracts which is defended by trade unions has very little to do with the broader concept of stable employment which is more realistic and which exists in other countries, particularly within the framework of the European Economic Community, whose strategy to combat unemployment is referred to and shared in the broad lines in the document that I have referred to throughout my speech.

It is important to overcome negative attitudes and to return to a tripartite dialogue without preconditions.

Before concluding I should also like to refer briefly to a couple of agenda items of this Conference, particularly to the safe use of chemicals and night work. With reference to the first, our Confederation has been dealing for a long time with the various aspects of safety and health policy in the workplace, accentuating the need to promote training programmes which we feel should be shared by trade unions and employers instead of being a point of dialectic division. With respect to night work, I am convinced that this first discussion this year will enable us to clarify the objectives and the best way of dealing with this matter in the ILO so that we can reach a balanced result between the employers' needs which require more flexible solutions than in the past and the particularities which work of this type brings with it.

These are the concerns which the Spanish employers wish to bring to the attention of the ILO, this forum of social dialogue, and which we hope to share with governments, trade unions and employers of the entire world in our search for greater well-being in our country.

Original - French: Mr. RUPHIN (Government delegate, Madagascar) - The delegation of the Democratic Republic of Madagascar, which it is my honour to lead at this 76th Session of the International Labour Conference, joins its voice with those who have spoken before to congratulate most sincerely Mr. John Landa Nkomo, Minister of Labour, Manpower Planning and Social Welfare of Zimbabwe, upon his unanimous election to the presidency of this session. We also congratulate all the members of the Bureau of the Conference. Being aware of their experience, their openness and their readiness for dialogue, I am firmly convinced that our work will have positive results which will be up to the level of our expectations.

Our thanks also go to the Director-General of our Organisation for his excellent Report on recovery and employment, which is the basis for our discussion. We should also like to take this opportunity to congratulate our new Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, a personality well known throughout the labour and public service world. He is well known for his organisational abilities, linked to a deep feeling for the general interest and a perfect knowledge of the problems of the labour world. Mr. Hansenne can be assured of our total support in the accomplishment of his new duties and we would like to express all our wishes for his success.

The ILO is currently celebrating its 70 years of existence. This is an anniversary which is deserving of our consideration, so that we may prepare a better future for humanity as a whole. Through the vagaries of history and the numerous crises with which the world economy constantly confronts us, our Organisation has persisted, come what may, in serving the ideal which it has set for itself. Confident of its ability to adapt to the new facts of the contemporary world which are constantly changing, we reiterate our faith in the future of the ILO with the good will and the frank co-operation of each of its Members.

We are currently undergoing a crisis in development ideologies. Nobody any longer has any universal effective remedies. The Report informs us that the OECD countries have experienced sustained growth in the past six years resulting in job creation, whereas, for the countries of Africa and Latin America, the eighties will be a lost decade. This is a lamentable record, worthy of an apocalyptic epilogue which is being offered us by the Third World. What reply, what response, should we make to this infernal challenge of underdevelopment? The ills suffered by the Third World are well-known; only the actual solutions are lacking. At the moment, structural adjustment programmes are vital if there is to be any improvement in the economy before economic growth can be achieved; according to the forecasts, this is the only method of remedying social problems.

To be sure, the specificity of the countries which apply these adjustment programmes, according to the Report, the heterogeneous nature of the problems which, whether we like it or not, have taken on a universal dimension. Is it not antinomic to note that certain countries are moving towards positive growth, whereas others trail behind and make do with a policy of survival, which sacrifices in many respects all social and cultural aspects? In the long run, developing countries run the risk of being dehumanised because they have constantly been plunged into hunger, illiteracy and sickness. However, the aim of development should be none other than the improvement of the conditions of man's life and his social and cultural well-being.

In addition, structural adjustment involves economic deregulations, which can be foreseen but not controlled. These may be summed up as follows: a slow-down in growth; a reduction of net capital flows; a drop in salaries and the number of jobs; a reduction of expenditure in the social sphere; a trend towards the increase of long-term unemployment and part-time work, etc.

For a number of years, the so-called informal sector has been expanding without as such contributing to self-employment. It is merely an aspect of these low-productivity activities, which emerge as a result of the individual's policy to survive the individual who is already a victim of the precarious nature of employment or who is seeking his first job.

Faced with the implacable contingencies of the environment, inter alia excessive debt, how can we conceive the growth which is so eagerly sought by planners and so much desired by the population?

The interdependence of modern economies pleads in favour of an increased solidarity which, in the case of structural adjustment, can be nothing other than the integration into the world economy where the law of the market is still the norm. This choice thus guides the economy towards competition and competitiveness which make no bones about putting all economies on the same level, whether they are strong or weak. This is the law, even if it is a hard one. However, can we evaluate, a priori, the chance that each one has in this specific context at the economic level before we imagine the consequences at the social level? Whether we call it chance or favourable conditions for real growth, the term is not really important because there is a danger that the policy applied as a therapeutic measure – re-equilibrium of the balance of payments, contraction of internal demand, devaluation, exchange policy – will remain inoperative if this competition does not come to the aid of precarious and weak economies. To rethink the concept of competition would improve somewhat more the bases for economic recovery in developing countries which fully subscribe to the objectives laid down by structural adjustment policies.

The so far insoluble debt servicing problem, which places such demands on export earnings is an insurmountable constraint on Third World development. Extensive measures should be taken to deal with debt, in the face of the constant drop in the price of basic commodities originating from developing countries which have invested vast sums in increasing the volume of exports, including the cost of research for the improvement of varieties. The claim that the stabilisation of prices remains hampered by the egoism and rapacity of the major economic powers is a legitimate one. It is clear that the situation of the Third World countries which provide raw materials will not improve in any way without the concerted efforts of the international community whose needs are far from being satisfied.

In this respect we welcome the French decision made public at the last francophone Summit in Dakar which wrote off the debt of 35 African countries. With satisfaction and relief, we hope that this historical gesture is only the beginning of a realistic and objective policy aimed at solving the debt problem. We refuse to believe that this is an ad hoc option on the part of the French Government. However, may I emphasise here that all countries engaged in structural adjustment programmes conform to the clauses agreed with the international financial institutions, adopting new accompanying measures, and thus modifying the nature of all of their economic relations with their partners. We consider that the donors and the rich countries must exercise a greater understanding and must also take measures towards the developing countries. This reciprocity, which for the moment is non-existent, would be of benefit if the experts would take the time to study it.

As far as the ILO is concerned, we could not, however, pass over in silence the co-operation activities which it carries out throughout the world, thus making available to the countries involved high level experts and high performance equipment for a specific time period. The transmission of knowledge and know-how which follows, in our opinion, is a valuable contribution to the training of national officials who are competent and able to carry out profitable co-operation projects at the economic and social level, but there remain cases where, when the project comes to an end, that is to say when the financial and technical assistance come to an end, the countries which are signatories of the Convention experience problems which prevent them from ensuring the extension of the pilot project. Often, financial problems are at the origin of these unfortunate situations to which rapid and effective solutions must be found. Poor countries now understand, after painful and catastrophic experience, that investments in industry and in the agro-alimentary sphere alone, do not by any means create thousands of jobs, as was the promise of certain speculators who were more concerned in finding profitable investments. Thus, the North-South dialogue on the installation of a new world economic order will constitute a decisive step towards the normalisation of trade and the improvement of the world economy for the well-being of workers. On the other two items of the agenda; night work for women and the use of chemical substances, the Democratic Republic of Madagascar considers that the total equality of treatment would not prevent the regulation of night work for women. Several reasons plead in favour of this option: safety, health, the place of women in society as mothers and as workers. Trends which are too egalitarian, tending to consider the ability of women to carry out the same tasks as men, seem to ignore physiological differences. To be sure, for many it is important to stick word for word to the equation: equality of treatment equals equality of tasks.

Thus we propose basing our studies on the number of hours of night work carried out by women; transport from the workplace to the home at night, a listing of the tasks which are to be forbidden to them and, finally, the case of pregnant women.

Regarding safety in the use of chemicals at work, the current situation compels us to adopt an international instrument – a Convention or Recommendation – because chemical substances which are often dangerous, have an important place in the world economy, not to mention the risks of environmental pollution they involve. “Use of chemical substances” covers several basic concepts in our opinion: production, handling, utilisation, storage and transport. In any event, our aim is protection for the workers, information on preventive techniques, and, finally, the development of an effective control policy in the utilisation of chemical substances.

To revert to issues which are just as important, since we are talking about human rights, we cannot conclude this statement without having a sympathetic thought for the workers whose rights are ignored and trampled on: those of South Africa and Namibia – and here we would like to remind you of our solidarity in their daily struggle against the bloody and barbarous yoke of the apartheid system – and those of Palestine, whose rights are ignored in order to keep up this war psychosis in support of a warmongering policy of disguised genocide. Their work enjoys no rights, except that of profit, which deliberately ignores any social coverage, even the most elementary.

We should like to appeal once again to the international community to make every effort to bring to an end this manifest contradiction to the ideals of our Organisation.

(Mr. Nkomo takes the Chair.)

Original – Spanish: Mr. PENA RUEDA (Government delegate, Bolivia) – It is an honour for me to express on behalf of the Bolivian Government our most sincere congratulations to Mr. John Nkomo on his very deserved election to the presidency of this august body.

Part I of the Report presented by the Director-General to the Conference discusses masterfully and in detail the question of economic recovery and employment which is crucial for all States. It draws attention, on the one hand, to the revival of economic growth in industrialised countries and, on the other, to the ever-increasing impoverishment of the countries of the Third World, aggravated by the flight of capital, negative financial flows, unemployment, underemployment and their commitments vis-à-vis the external debt, all of which limit their development and the achievement of their own objectives.

Mr. Blanchard also says that “growth in the North does not necessarily pull the South along in its wake”, adding that “at the national level, growth in the GDP does not invariably extricate the ‘old’ or ‘newly’ poor from their misery, or provide jobs for those without one”. All these conflicting economic situations have disastrous implications for developing countries like mine, because they hamper even more the implementation of their development plans and strategies.

My Government tackled the economic crisis with determination and courage and has adopted the structural readjustment measures that were essential. It managed to contain and maintain at acceptable levels the monetary inflation which up until 1985 was destroying the basis of the economy and undermining the whole social sector. It undertook to implement its recovery plan in basic sectors such as mining, petroleum, the agro-industry, etc.

In Bolivia unemployment and wage problems are long-term structural problems and are in no way the result of the new economic policy. With respect to employment, in the past there was no significant new job creation programme to absorb the growth in the workforce.

Between 1979 and 1985, 285,000 people joined the economically active population, while over the same period of time only 10,000 jobs were created, most of them in the state bureaucracy.

Because of the shortage of external resources between 1980 and 1985, my country was forced to reduce imports of machinery and equipment and thus to curb growth in the GDP and in employment.

With respect to wage, it should be pointed out that past increases, financed by the unbacked issue of money were a very regrettable experience for my country and cheated and impoverished the people and the workers to an unprecedented degree. Between August 1984 and July 1985 prices increased by 12,312 per cent and wages by only 8,114 per cent. There was thus a real loss of the purchasing power of some 33 per cent. With the implementation of the new policy, however, it has been possible to contain this generalised impoverishment. The wage adjustments of 1987 have in fact improved real wages, since the nominal increase was 15 per cent per monthly while inflation was no more than 11 per cent per year.

In these circumstances the Government is creating the necessary conditions to eliminate the structural rigidity of the economy so as to absorb surplus manpower, by means of an active public investment policy and by introducing appropriate measures to stimulate private investment and training and to promote co-operatives and small and medium-sized enterprises.

However, in order to accelerate the reduction of our still high rate of unemployment, it is vital that we obtain investment from internal and especially external sources, as well as a transfer of technology in favour of our traditional agriculture in particular, so that we can implement rural infrastructure projects and projects for the production and marketing of foods. This is vital if we are to improve the health and working capacity of the population at every level and to increase our exports of surplus agricultural products so as to raise personal incomes and the earnings of the country as a whole.

As a result of the measures adopted by the current Government, the Bolivian economy since 1987 has been achieving moderate growth. If the present policy is pursued, then after having grown at a rate of 2.2 and 2.8 per cent in 1987 and 1988 the Bolivian economy should from 1989 on be able to sustain a rate of growth that is higher than the rate of growth of the population.

The Emergency Social Fund that was set up to create immediate employment is successfully financing projects for public works, for co-operatives in towns and rural areas, for micro-enterprises, etc. – all of which provide employment for a large section of the labour force.

The industrial peace in my country is due in large part to the Government's policy of creating and maintaining an atmosphere of democracy and dialogue in which political, social, religious, trade union and other organisations all participate actively and responsibly.

We are convinced that the new Government which will take power on 6 August next, following the elections of 7 May past, will continue this process of economic recovery that we have started.

The prevailing atmosphere of industrial peace and co-operation is based on dialogue which has made it possible to deal with many grievances, wage claims and other demands including the desirability of analysing and discussing with government representatives the various items and details of the national budget which have been formulated by various trade union organisations and by the Bolivian Workers' Confederation.

To implement the economic recovery plan, the Government has formulated an economic and social development strategy for 1989-2000 in which the following social objectives have been considered as priorities: the massive creation of productive and stable jobs; and the extension and improvement of public services such as education, health, the supply of drinking water, drainage and housing.

The members of the Bolivian delegation attending this Conference will as far as possible participate actively in the discussion of the items on the agenda, particularly the partial revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107) whose principles and provisions should benefit the large indigenous and tribal populations of Bolivian society.

We feel that the new approach of the Convention – which aims to maintain and strengthen the cultural identity and sovereignty of these populations within the States in which they live, in harmony with the rights and interests of the rest of the inhabitants – is of the utmost importance.

The Government of my country, during the last administration, has carried out a series of important activities in co-operation with the ILO.

With the technical co-operation of the ILO's Regional Office for the Americas based in Lima and with the financial support of the United Nations Development Programme, we have prepared the first version of a draft Labour Code to replace the current law which has been in force since 1939. In addition to consolidating and simplifying the substantive provisions of Bolivia's extensive labour legislation, the new draft incorporates the modern concepts of labour law and is in line with the international Conventions that my country has ratified. After its final revision the Bill will undergo an intense process of tripartite consultation.

With the support of an ILO team, we have undertaken a major effort in favour of the indigenous population of eastern Bolivia so as to complete the agrarian reform which Bolivia pioneered in 1952. The ultimate objective will be the determination and protection of the territories and lands on which the many ethnic groups of eastern Bolivia live and work.

In order to pursue and improve the task of training manpower, the National Training Institute (INFOCAL) was set up at the end of last year. This Institute, which is totally autonomous, is being organised and administered on a tripartite basis. INFOCAL will be responsible for basic training and for the continuous training of skilled workers and middle management personnel. It will be financed with a contribution from the employers to be determined by mutual agreement. At the same time the Ministry of Labour is carrying out a training programme that is designed to strengthen the labour inspectorate, with technical assistance from the Spanish Government. We are also providing assistance to agricultural co-operatives and associations through a recently created Rural Development Fund which will offer loans on easy terms to small producers so that they have a working capital and can finance social projects that are relevant to the agricultural sector.

The Rural Development Fund's resources will come from the national treasury and from bilateral financial assistance agreements concluded with friendly governments and international organisations.

A Social Investment Fund has also been established to back up the Emergency Social Fund through investments in health and education development projects.

Faced with the alarming situation of a massive influx of young people into the labour market at a particularly unfavourable juncture – because both national and international measures to protect them are totally inadequate to cope with our country's current social and economic crisis – the National Solidarity and Social Development Board, which is attached to the Office of the President of the Republic and the Ministry of Labour and Manpower Development, recently organised a workshop with the participation of governmental and non-governmental institutions to examine the problem.

The objectives of the workshop were to analyse the problems of young workers and to identify the kind of inter-institutional activities and agreements that can guarantee protective treatment for young people in the future.

I should like to take this opportunity to call on the States Members to adhere always to the basic principles laid down in the Constitution of the ILO, as a sign of their solidarity with the workers and employers of the world grouped together in this Organisation.

In concluding, I should like to express the firm commitment of the Bolivian people and Government to the fight against poverty, hunger and misery, which are the supreme social evils.

Mr. CHRISTOFIDES (Minister of Labour and Social Insurance, Cyprus) – On behalf of the Cyprus delegation, may I congratulate Mr. Nkomo on his election to the presidency of this Conference.

His long and varied experience and his qualities of leadership and patience will, we have no doubt, guide the Conference to constructive debates and a successful conclusion of its deliberations. I wish to congratulate the Director-General on his choice of theme for this year's Report to the Conference. For, indeed, we live in a time of paradox, where recovery of the world's economy goes hand in hand with increasing poverty in the Third World. We share his concern about this situation, as well as his view that the major industrialised countries have a responsibility to assist the regions which are experiencing stagnation and negative growth. His vision of the role of the ILO in the formulation of a strategy for recovery as being to ensure that social ideals are not sacrificed to structural adjustment or other needs and his call for a reaffirmation of the essential link between the economic and social spheres also find us in full agreement.

Therefore, we give our whole-hearted support to the proposal concerning the launching of an appeal by this session of the International Labour Conference aiming at the use of savings from disarmament "to finance a series of operations at the regional or subregional level to create or refurbish essential infrastructure within the framework of a major works programme, much of which would be devoted to the conservation of the environment". This proposal gives practical expression to the spirit of international solidarity which we believe is vital for the solution of the problems the world faces today. We in Cyprus, having suffered so much from the effects of war and the use of arms, would very much welcome any moves towards disarmament. Indeed, our President, as a firm gesture of good will, has proposed the full demilitarisation of the country and the use of all the funds saved for the development of the country and particularly of those regions and parts of the population that need it most.

The proposals concerning the development strategies for recovery and employment should be of immense value to any country facing problems in these areas. The analysis of the Director-General relating to the experience of the 1980s is particularly incisive with respect to developing countries. He is correct in emphasising the need for a global approach to common problems given the increasing interdependence of the world. Through this approach, policies at both the national and the international level will be adopted aiming at the solution of the thorny external debt problem and the other difficulties that developing countries are experiencing.

In his analysis of the prospects for the 1990s, the Director-General strikes a more optimistic note by referring to the indications for higher world growth and improved performance of the developing countries and the increasing political will to establish a dialogue between the social partners. Nevertheless, as the Director-General correctly identifies, there is a need to pay particular attention to the employment content of growth, as higher growth does not necessarily increase the level or quality of employment.

We fully endorse the proposed strategy for recovery. In particular, we feel that very rightly there is an emphasis on resource mobilisation, the combination of macro- and microeconomic policies and the equity aspects of development, as the key elements needed to overcome the current problems.

The increase in productive investments, particularly in activities that will increase employment opportunities, is correctly identified in the Report as "the most effective means of distributing incomes to the poor in developing countries", whilst the apt comments made on the need for increased flexibility in an economy and on the role of the State in economic activity add to the depth of the analysis of the requirements for growth.

While we find that greater labour market flexibility is required, we fully share the view of the Director-General that "this flexibility has to be subject to fundamental principles of human rights and the protection of minimum labour standards".

With regard to the recommendations on the active co-operation of the social partners, we can confirm by our own experience the value of the argument that tripartite dialogue enhances the political feasibility of economic decisions and ensures a more equitable distribution of the benefits. In Cyprus we have maintained a long-standing practice of a dialogue between the social partners on economic and social issues which has been found extremely useful in avoiding confrontation and contributing to good industrial relations.

The model for development Cyprus has adopted since independence in 1960 is one based on indicative planning. In this model, direct productive activity is in the most part left to the private sector, whereas the role of the public sector is to provide the necessary physical and institutional infrastructure, to administer social policy and to create an overall economic climate conducive to private-sector activity. Within this framework, the development policy followed was based on the fundamental objectives of growth, stability and equitable distribution of the benefits of growth of all sectors of the economy, utilising all available resources in the best possible way.

The emphasis placed at different times on each of the three objectives, of growth, stability and equity, has varied according to the specific problems and circumstances at each stage of development. However, the need that the Director-General has identified for a comprehensive approach, giving due attention to all three considerations, has been well recognised. In particular, the fundamental principle that the ultimate goal of government is to increase the welfare of the population was never overlooked.

As a result, Cyprus has a good record of sustained growth, full employment and improvement in the standard of living of the population as a whole, in conditions of relative stability. Progress has only been interrupted by the 1974 invasion of our country, after which Cyprus had to put up a tremendous struggle for survival and for social and economic reconstruction. The country, even during this period of dire need, never lost sight of the idea of indicative planning, balanced economic policies and the important role of the private sector. However, the Government undertook a much bigger role particularly in the social fields where mass unemployment and loss of incomes and property created conditions of poverty and dependence upon the State at a time when the resources of the country were cut off and government tax revenues were drastically reduced. A continuous dialogue with the social partners created an appropriate climate where labour unions (temporarily) accepted lower wages thus enabling the Government to promote labour-intensive policies.

I should not fail to mention that international solidarity, expressed by the provision of aid through the UNHCR, as well as through other organisations and States, provided much-needed relief and support in our efforts to deal with the serious problems of the refugees and the reactivation of the economy.

Although Cyprus was not unaffected by the world recession in the 1980s, we did not share the unfortunate experience of many developing countries and continued to achieve satisfactory growth rates and a constant improvement in the standard of living of the population. As a result of accelerated economic activity in the past two years, unemployment, which was already low during the early 1980s, has now fallen to 2.5 per cent whilst labour earnings continued to improve in real terms at a very satisfactory rate.

In spite of the generally positive experience during this period, Cyprus did face certain problems requiring both measures of short-term adjustment and longer term restructuring.

Even though the threat to the stability of the economy created by the 1974 invasion has been averted, the containment of the fiscal deficit and the external debt have proved more difficult, as they continued to rise, even after the requirements of the reconstruction programme subsided. The need for a radical restructuring of public finances has become apparent.

In the area of employment, although, as already stated, conditions of full employment have been generally maintained in the last ten years, unemployment among third-level education graduates has remained disproportionately high, whereas labour shortages for other categories, particularly for workers with technical skills, have been experienced. As a result, more and more such graduates are accepting jobs in occupations which do not demand a high level of education.

With the recent signing by Cyprus of the Customs Union Agreement with the EEC, which provides for the gradual reduction of tariff protection to a large part of our manufacturing industry and the increasing competition in the international market, there is an urgent need to restructure our economy in general and particularly manufacturing to meet the challenge of increased competition. Hence, the major themes of the current development plan, which covers the period 1989-93, are, the tackling of fiscal imbalances, the restructuring of the economy, more balanced growth sectorally and regionally, the technological upgrading of productive activities, the improvement of productivity, the increased efficiency of resource utilisation and the conservation of the environment.

Special emphasis is placed on the enhancement and best possible utilisation of our human resources. The policy in this area aims mainly at the alleviation of the current labour shortages and the expansion of the capacity of the economy to absorb third-level education graduates, not only in order to assist this group, but also because the use of more high-level manpower is considered to be a prerequisite to the realisation of the more general development objectives.

In concluding my address, I would like to reiterate our support for the proposals of the Director-General both with regard to the general framework and strategy for development and, more specifically, for the proposed appeal for the use of the savings from disarmament to finance the creation or refurbishing of essential infrastructure, with special emphasis on the conservation of the environment.

Original – French: Mrs. MUDUKA (State Commissioner for Labour and Social Welfare, Zaire) – Allow me first of all to discharge a very pleasant duty, namely that of transmitting to this august assembly the warm greetings of the President and Founder of the People's Revolutionary Movement and President of the Republic of Zaire, Marshal Mobutu Sese Seko, and of the whole people of Zaire.

I should then like, in the name of my delegation which I have the honour of leading, to join the speakers who preceded me in presenting to the President, as well as the Vice-Presidents of this session of the Conference, my congratulations on their election. I am firmly convinced that under their enlightened leadership, the deliberations of the present session will be successful.

I should also like to avail myself of this opportunity to express to Mr. Hansenne, the new Director-General of the International Labour Office, the satisfaction of the Zairian delegation with his brilliant election to this high post. His long experience and eminent qualities will help the ILO to concentrate its efforts on the promotion of social justice and the satisfaction of the essential needs of the underprivileged.

The Executive Council of the Republic of Zaire assures the Director-General of its support and co-operation in the fruitful accomplishment of his mandate.

The excellent Report of the Director-General deals with a very topical subject of great interest to us, namely Recovery and employment.

The delegation of the Republic of Zaire shares the Director-General's thoughts concerning the dire consequences of economic recession, the social cost of structural adjustment programmes, the prospects for economic recovery and social progress and the development strategies needed to promote equitable growth with room for the necessary structural adaptations.

As the Director-General rightly underscored, the major paradox of the closing decade is that, despite the economic growth which some regions of the world have known, a serious recession nevertheless afflicts most of the developing countries. These countries are confronted with the deterioration of the terms of trade, the major problem of their debt burden, the disequilibrium in the balance of payments and the constant worsening of the living conditions of their populations, all of which lead to increased poverty and unemployment.

Moreover, the excessive costs of structural adjustment programmes have had a deleterious impact on the well-being of Third World populations. This is evident in the slowdown in employment creation, the worsening quality of the jobs created, the drop in wages and salaries and the reduction of government spending in the social sector.

Faced with this situation, the international community must make a sustained effort to speed up growth and reduce poverty.

Nevertheless, the success of this growth will depend first and foremost on the efforts made by developing countries themselves, but also and especially of international development aid which plays an essential role in successful recovery.

This is why we should like to appeal to the countries concerned to double their aid to developing countries, especially in Africa, so as to enable them to reverse the trend towards stagnation and decline that we have witnessed in the present decade and to start on the path towards steady and lasting development.

The most important challenge which the ILO will have to meet in the coming decade will be to ensure that the fundamental standards concerning employment, human rights and tripartism are fully respected and become an integral part of adjustment policies.

The Organisation will also have a major role to play in making its members aware of the social and economic consequences of various economic policies and ensuring that structural adjustment programmes are designed and implemented in a way compatible with social progress.

Together with the other organisations in the United Nations system, the ILO will have to do everything in its power to ensure that the promotion of employment, the full use of human resources and the elimination of poverty are taken into consideration in the elaboration of policies and programmes for growth, stabilisation and structural adaptation.

Finally, the efforts of the ILO will have to be directed towards rural employment and income-generating programmes favouring labour-intensive employment.

In Zaire, the problem of development has always been one of the central concerns of our leaders who, in all events, always give priority to the human factor.

Since 1977, the Executive Council has set out to solve this problem by means of public stabilisation and investment programmes.

Experience has proved that it is vital to draw up methodical and concerted programme, taking into account all questions with an integrated approach – including development factors. In was in this context that we drafted the First Five-Year Plan for Economic and Social Development, 1986-1990, the main objectives of which are as follows: rehabilitation of economic and social infrastructure; promotion of social activities; improvement of management and an average growth in the gross national product of 4 per cent a year.

Sectoral programmes, which are included in this plan, are characterised by a careful choice of investments, the rehabilitation of infrastructure and production tools, structural adjustment and private sector activities – without forgetting improvements in economic management.

Zaire, my country, has adopted a structural adjustment programme characterised by the introduction of concerted liberalism designed to make the private sector the prime mover of the economy. This strategy has been accompanied by cuts in employment in the public sector, with a view to reducing the budget deficits.

However, the Executive Council intends to continue its tireless efforts to bring about the economic recovery of the country by means of rigorous management of public funds.

Moreover, to soften certain transitory social consequences linked to the process of structural adjustment and consequently to improve the effectiveness of certain social programmes, the Executive Council has initiated a “social sector adjustment project” together with the World Bank.

This project has the following objectives: to keep an eye on the standard-of-living indicators for the population in the context of macro-economic adjustments; contribute to the sectoral analysis of social problems; and assist the Executive Council in the elaboration of social development policies.

This project will help the most vulnerable groups of our society, namely poor women and children, to cover their immediate social needs and participate in the development process.

Moreover, in order to help the Executive Council readjust the development and economic recovery programmes, the President-Founder of the People's Revolutionary Movement, President of the Republic of Zaire, has created the Consultative Council for Development.

This Council constitutes a framework for planning and dialogue on national economic and social issues. Its mission is to harmonise the interests of the State and those of the social partners in order to arrive at a choice of national options designed to ensure the development of the country as well as the safeguarding and maintenance of social peace.

In Zaire the national labour market is characterised by an imbalance in supply and demand. This situation is mainly the result of the unfavourable economic situation which reduces the capacity to create remunerative jobs; the increase of the number of young people on the employment market; and the discrepancy between the educational system and the real needs of the employment market.

Here the main objective pursued by the Executive Council is to allow each Zairian to exercise, in conformity with his abilities, a trade which allows him to earn a sufficient income to satisfy the basic needs of his family.

Its action is mainly directed towards reducing the quantitative imbalance between supply and demand on the labour market and creating new jobs in the modern sector, the modernisation of agriculture, the promotion of the informal sector and a steady improvement in the standard of living of the working masses.

In collaboration with the occupational organisations, the National Association of Employers (ANEZA) and the National Union of Workers (UNTZA), the Executive Council has set up programmes for the promotion of small and medium-sized enterprises and the informal sector as well as an industrial promotion fund.

In order to allow the people involved in promoting informal sector projects to have easy access to bank loans, a guarantee fund has been set up for their benefit.

We also have to note that employment strategy must also try to achieve a better match between qualifications and employment possibilities at the level of the schools and of vocational training.

In the matter of human resources development, with the help of the International Labour Office, Zaire set up a National Institute for Vocational Training 25 years ago. A veritable fount of training, retraining and further training, this Institute enables workers to acquire new occupational skills in order to participate actively in the improvement of his company.

For the future, this Institute is prepared to put its experience at the disposal of the citizens of other African countries.

The part of the Director-General's Report which deals with the activities of the Organisation in 1988 shows an impressive picture of the work realised and the work still being done.

On the whole, the Zairian delegation is satisfied with the situation and sees that in spite of budgetary constraints the Organisation has been able to fulfil the expectations of our Members in carrying on the bulk of its activities.

Nevertheless, the changes in the economic and social situation in the world make it necessary for the ILO to improve not only the context of its programmes but also the use of its resources, to meet the challenge of the coming decade.

In this respect, the Zairian delegation is happy to announce that on 1 April this year it has ratified the instrument of amendment of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation.

Zaire, which attaches great importance to the activities of the ILO, endeavours to respect its obligations under the Organisation's Constitution.

The official instrument of ratification will be submitted during this present session.

In addition, despite the unfavourable economic situation, which particularly affects the developing countries, Zaire has been able to pay up all its dues to the ILO and the CRADAT, including those for this year.

At the moment an important meeting of the International Social Security Association comprising the countries of Central Africa is being held in Kinshasa, the capital of Zaire.

The other questions on our agenda will be discussed in detail in the specialised Conference Committees. Nevertheless I should like to go over them briefly here.

Concerning the partial revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107), the Zairian delegation thinks that the draft Convention offers a good basis for discussion. The Conference should be able to adopt a new instrument which will fully correspond to the needs of these peoples and will promote the full realisation of their social, economic and cultural rights, as well as help them preserve their identity and live according to their traditions, while benefiting of course from present technological advances.

In Zaire, we do not have a problem regarding aboriginal populations. The Constitution recognises the political, economic and social rights of all the different ethnic groups of the country.

With regard to night work, I think it is absolutely necessary to revise the Night Work (Women) Convention (Revised), 1948 (No. 89) in order to limit this type of work because of its arduous nature and the risks and disadvantages that it presents.

As far as the safe use of chemical substances at the workplace is concerned, it is necessary to adopt new standards, taking into account the evolution of technology and materials at the workplace. The establishment of a uniform international system of information would be useful as well.

In conclusion, I would like to stress that the Republic of Zaire, like other member States of the ILO, condemns the odious policy of apartheid. It is our strong hope that appropriate assistance as regards technical co-operation will be given to the national liberation movements, to the independent unions and to the front line States in order to develop their economic capacity and thereby reduce their dependence.

May the work of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference reaffirm the solidarity between peoples to bring about the construction of a fairer world in which social peace and human dignity will prevail.

Original - Russian: Mr. NEUBERT (Workers' delegate, Czechoslovakia) - Permit me, on behalf of the delegation of Czechoslovak trade unions, to congratulate Mr. Nkomo from Zimbabwe most sincerely on his election as President of the current session of the Conference. I should like to express my conviction that under his guidance the Conference will carry out effective work in a spirit of co-operation and constructive dialogue.

It is also doubtless a positive fact that, linked as it is this year with the celebration of the 70th anniversary of the creation of the ILO, the current session of the International Labour Conference is taking place against the backdrop of a continuing process of international détente and the gradual abating of dangerous conflicts in various regions of the world. This is accompanied by an increasingly evident rational approach to the elimination of the nuclear threat by cutting back the weapons and armed forces potential, as can already be seen in the concrete measures adopted by the USSR and the United States, as well as in measures put forward by the member States of the Warsaw Treaty. Also of significance is the continuing process of mutual understanding and co-operation in Europe which is clearly reflected in the conclusions of the recent meeting in Vienna of the member countries of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe, which will have a considerable influence in many spheres.

In this context, we attach considerable importance to the intensive co-operation on the environment, which today is suffering serious damage, particularly in Europe. It would be appropriate for the international scope of these problems to be reflected in future in increased attention on the part of the International Labour Organisation. The resolution on these issues submitted to the current session of the Conference, which enjoy our full support, were also framed in this spirit.

However, many unsolved problems in the economic and social spheres still face the workers and the peoples of the world. In this context, I should like to note that the Report of the Director-General, in our view, quite rightly concentrates on the important global issues relating to general economic recovery, as well as on employment. We fully support one of the basis ideas of this report, which emphasises the fact that the problems and difficulties faced by economies as well as the radical imbalances between the economies of the industrialised countries on the one hand and the developing countries on the other, can only be eliminated through effective and systematic co-operation at the international level.

Nevertheless, at the same time, one cannot but draw attention to the fact that the contemporary situation in the economies of many countries is accompanied by a stagnation or a decline in social achievements and measures in favour of workers, by social instability, threat of unemployment or underemployment and other anti-social phenomena by which workers in the different regions of the world are increasingly afflicted. We consider that the search for solutions making it possible to help the workers out of this unfavourable situation is an important task for international organisations in the United Nations system, including the ILO. It would also be appropriate for these urgent problems to be discussed more seriously by representatives of governments and employers. In fact, it is indisputable that cuts in or elimination of social programmes stand in the way of economic development.

I should like to take this opportunity to point out also that, although basically we agree with the contents of the Report of the Director-General submitted to the current session of the Conference, on the other hand it seems to us that this Report does not fully cover the important role of the trade unions as the most representative organisation defending the workers' interests, and one which is crucial to the economic and social development of society.

I should also like to express our agreement with the ILO's Programme and Budget proposals for 1990-91. In our view, this proposed budget is a balanced one, which concentrates on all the basic priorities of the future activity of the Organisation. We particularly appreciate the fact that the future programme also envisages the provision of support for the development of European co-operation.

As is the case in several other socialist countries, in Czechoslovakia a process of general restructuring is under way to speed up the economic and social development of society as a whole. We are aware that some mass media in certain countries dispute the significance of this process or give incomplete and inaccurate information on the way in which it is being realised. I should therefore like to touch upon certain problems and questions which have come up in the Czechoslovak SSR as a result of this restructuring process and which affect the work and life of workers and trade union members in our country.

First of all, I should like to emphasise that the changes at the economic level, which can be considered to be the most significant over the past 40 years, are being carried out with the full participation and agreement of the Czechoslovak trade unions. In accordance with the legislation adopted, considerable changes are taking place in the economy, new state enterprises enjoy far more independence than was hitherto the case. At the same time, workers have an increasing influence on management, by means of newly elected bodies for self-management and as a result of the enhanced role of trade union bodies in plants and enterprises.

At the present time, the role of the Czechoslovak unions has increased considerably especially in one of their main spheres of activity, which is the protection of the workers' legitimate interests and demands and the creation of favourable conditions for them at home and at work. The Trade Union Conference which took place in September last year in Prague put forward new objectives and requirements in the sphere of social and economic rights for our workers. These include requirements relating to wage salary policy, the standard of living, the environment, concern for health and safety at work, as well as issues relating to social justice.

In a fully open and critical spirit, the Trade Union Conference sent in its views and comments to the Government and to individual ministries, and the Government had to respond directly to these and take the appropriate measures.

Our unions have also participated in the drafting of a new Labour Code which, with the amendments made to it, takes account of the changing conditions of restructuring of the economic mechanism in our country. The text of this Code was adopted after wide-ranging public discussion, which gave rise to 124,000 comments sent in to the Central Council of Trade Unions of Czechoslovakia. It should be added that after discussion of these comments, together with the Government of the country, the majority of them were included in the new text of the Labour Code.

In spite of this, in the near future the members of the Czechoslovak unions will have to solve a large number of problems: a reduction in the activity of inefficient enterprises, a cut in the management and administrative apparatus, the accelerated introduction of new technologies, the provision of retraining and specialised forms of vocational training and other problems call for a series of measures which would mitigate the consequences of these serious changes for workers; such measures are already being prepared with the active participation of the unions.

At the same time, the structure of the Czechoslovak unions is being simplified and there is an enhancement and improvement of the effectiveness of the working style and methods of our union bodies at all levels. Our principal aim is to ensure that our union activists assert their rights more consistently with regard to state and economic bodies.

I shall conclude my statement, referring to the already mentioned 70th anniversary of the creation of the International Labour Organisation, by emphasising once again the important role of this Organisation in the sphere of development, social justice, and the strengthening of human and trade union rights. We have a high appreciation of the positive trends which can be observed in our mutual relations and we are convinced that the International Labour Organisation will continue in future to work to promote a broad international co-operation, with the aim of solving common problems. The Czechoslovak unions are willing, on the basis of constructive dialogue, equality and mutual respect, to continue in future to participate in intensifying the activity of the ILO and in a broad and effective exchange of knowledge and experience, for the benefit of workers and the working class throughout the world.

Mr. WHITE (representative of the International Federation of Journalists) – My name is Aidan White. I am the General Secretary of the International Federation of Journalists, which represents more than 150,000 journalists in membership of trade unions and associations of media workers in all parts of the world.

I am delighted to take the floor, first of all because it allows me to be an echo of many sentiments expressed today and that is to congratulate Mr. Nkomo on his election as President of this session of the Conference and also of course to congratulate the new Director-General.

But I am also delighted because it allows me to place on record the thanks of my Federation and the thanks of journalists from all parts of the world to the Governing Body for their inclusion of a meeting on the working conditions of journalists in the ILO programme for 1990-91. This will be a historic event – the first time that such a meeting has been held.

It is a wisely judged initiative, for it comes at a very important moment in the world of journalism. Dramatic changes are taking place in the field of news and information and throughout the mass media. These changes are having an impact on the lives of workers in the industry and, of course, on the readers, viewers and listeners in all parts of the world.

Journalists, you will all know, have a dual role; they are workers, of course, with the same economic relationship with employers as workers in all other industries. But they have another duty. They are in a sense public servants, with a wider responsibility to the public interest. We are small in number but every day we influence hundreds of millions of people. We inform, on the public's behalf, on the news, the events, the opinions, many and varied, which exist in our society.

In order to fulfil this duty to the public interest, my Federation believes journalists must have professional independence. Freedom of expression and freedom of the press are essential ingredients in democratic societies. And unless journalists can carry out their work free from undue pressure – whether from proprietors or from governments – we can never be certain that these freedoms are secure.

For us, therefore, the moral welfare of journalists is a matter of the highest importance. But we cannot divorce the moral welfare of journalism from the material realities of the conditions in which reporters, editors and photo-journalists – whether in print or broadcasting – have to work.

As I said earlier our industry is in a period of turbulence brought about by the rapid advance of communication technologies and by a world-wide process of economic restructuring throughout the media.

But some things don't change. Last year more than 40 journalists were killed while on duty. There were more than 1,000 incidents of arrest, of expulsion, of detention without trial or of acts of violence against journalists.

In many countries journalists are caught in the crossfire of political and civil disorder. In other countries where there may not be social disorder, there are more subtle attacks on journalistic work. We see, increasingly, journalists being used as political scapegoats or as pawns in diplomatic arguments between nations.

Everywhere, my Federation expresses concern at the lack of respect for the ethical and professional responsibility of journalists in society.

At the same time, journalists are facing new challenges. At the start of the 1980s we were promised the global village and it has finally arrived. The rapid development of highly integrated media systems by a small number of media transnational corporations is changing the face of journalism.

Such changes are not without some unpleasant side-effects. Problems of health and safety and of an increasing tendency towards freelance activity – the journalistic equivalent of homeworking – are matters of serious concern.

In the poorer regions reporters work in appalling conditions, often with totally inadequate equipment and often without basic social protections – pensions, medical assistance and life insurance – and that is an important matter in such a high-risk profession as journalism.

I hope very much that the ILO's initiative will be the start of a process in which these issues and their effects on the work of journalists can be examined and, after thoughtful and co-operative consideration, dealt with.

We very much need to create a framework in which journalists, employers and governments can work together. We need a common understanding on the need for independent journalism and on the valuable contribution that accurate and balanced information makes to society, but we need also to create satisfactory conditions for journalists to do their work.

I know that the ILO is already well-briefed on many of the issues I have raised. For many years the ILO has joined the international and regional organisations of journalists at our regular meetings held with the assistance of UNESCO. You have already contributed much to our deliberations, both in those meetings and in your publications.

The International Federation of Journalists wishes to thank the ILO for its wisdom in choosing journalism for a spot in the coming programme. It is a timely and astute step forward. It takes account of the momentous changes in our industry and, above all, it allows all of us to identify basic working needs which will set the pattern for the work of journalists in the years to come.

President: Mr. Delpino

Original – Spanish: The PRESIDENT (Mr. DELPINO) – We shall continue with the discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General.

Mr. ATAPATTU (Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, Sri Lanka) – On behalf of the Government of Sri Lanka I would like to congratulate Mr. John Nkomo on his election as President of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. Non-aligned Zimbabwe and Sri Lanka have very close relations. His own wide experience and capabilities have been widely demonstrated most recently at the meeting of Commonwealth Ministers of Labour here in Geneva. I also wish to congratulate the Vice-Presidents and others elected to office.

This is the first international conference that I have attended since assuming office as Minister of Labour and Social Welfare in the Government headed by His Excellency R. Premadasa, the President of Sri Lanka.

Earlier as Minister of Health, I attended several sessions of the General Assembly of the World Health Organisation here in Geneva, but I must say that June is a much better month than May. My experience as Minister of Health will stand me in good stead in my new assignment. It is relevant here to mention that for the first time in my country the two Ministries of Labour and of Social Welfare are combined so as to handle more effectively the activities of the workers and promote the welfare of the needy.

I would like to take this opportunity to thank the former Director-General Mr. Blanchard for his valuable service and contribution to the International Labour Organisation during his term of office. His efforts at safeguarding the rights of workers while promoting tripartism are greatly appreciated around the world. In congratulating the newly elected Director-General Mr. Hansenne on his election, Sri Lanka offers him complete co-operation.

The Report of the Director-General will be used as the basis of discussion. This report concentrates on recovery and employment.

It is rather misleading and illusory to measure the health of the world economy purely in terms of the developed world without taking into consideration the developing world. Two-thirds of the world's workforce live in the Third World. This labour force is our most valuable resource, though it is sometimes regrettably accused of being a threat to the environment, of being irresponsible cutters of forests and now of being a major contributor to the destruction of the ozone layer.

Unemployment in the West means more people on the dole. Unemployment in our part of the world means hunger and malnutrition – a state of human suffering which cannot be expressed adequately by statistical data. When our people are employed, the fruits of their labour are often forced to face barriers, tariffs and other forms of protectionism in unsympathetic markets.

In the sixties, the birth of UNCTAD gave us hope that our labour would be justly rewarded. Such ambitious hopes and aspirations have not, however, been fulfilled. Initiatives such as the Brandt Commission, efforts to promote a North/South dialogue and the new international economic order, have not borne fruit. The continued economic stagnation and growth of unemployment has created a sense of hopelessness, and disillusionment amongst youth. Youth unrest, leading to terrorism and anarchy, is the result of a poverty-stricken environment.

This kind of instability in the Third World has clear repercussions in all countries. The developed countries will not be able to isolate themselves from social and political upheavals in developing countries. We live in an interdependent world.

The slow growth recorded in early 1970s in industrial nations indirectly affected the developing countries as well.

With the deceleration of growth there is a reduction of labour income, particularly wages, as the Director-General has pointed out in his Report. He informed this Conference that the wages in most developing countries declined by 20 to 30 per cent. This indicates in real terms a lower purchasing power for workers in Third World countries.

These factors are very important when government expenditure patterns are analysed, especially in the social welfare sectors, over the last two decades. In the case of virtually all developing countries, expenditure on social welfare activities was reduced from 35 per cent of the national budget in 1972 to about 29 per cent in 1986. It was noted that, even in the industrialised countries, social welfare expenditure within their national budgets was reduced from 58 per cent to about 56 per cent during the same period. The figures clearly indicate that the lower growth affected the developing countries to a greater extent when compared with the industrialised countries.

I would also like to highlight the importance of fair distribution of income within a country as a development target. Fair distribution of income is a prerequisite to reduce the level of poverty. Growth does not necessarily mean reduction of poverty. Sometimes, increased growth leads only to increased income of the higher income earners. Such a situation occurs when policies are not geared to reduce the inequalities of income. We should make every effort to frame national policies to reduce the gap between the haves and have-nots.

Let me now touch briefly on how the South Asian countries have faced these problems during the last two decades. Many countries in my region recorded a very high rate of unemployment, even though some developing countries recovered from the recession during the 1970s. The unemployment rate has reached 30 per cent in some countries, indicating the massive scale of hardship, specially for the majority of poor families in these countries.

Sri Lanka is one of the countries in the SAARC group, i.e. the countries of South Asia, which registered a rapid recovery from 1977. In 1977 economic growth in Sri Lanka was only about 2 per cent in real terms. In 1980, due the positive steps taken by the Government, we were able to achieve, on average, a 6 per cent increase in the gross national product. We failed however to sustain the same level of growth after 1983, due to ethnic problems which affected economic activity.

The unemployment rate in 1977 of 24 per cent amongst the educated youth was the highest rate recorded after independence in 1948. This high unemployment rate was reduced to about 11 per cent in 1980. However, it has increased again since 1984, mainly due to ethnic problems which have led to lower economic growth. At present the unemployment rate is estimated to be around 17 per cent, which is considered to be very high in the region of South Asia.

Sri Lanka managed to increase her per capita income marginally during the years 1987-88. Per capita income increased by 1.5 per cent during that period. At present, it is estimated that, in Sri Lanka, per capita income is only about US$370.

The new Government, elected by the people of Sri Lanka, has given a clear mandate to His Excellency President R. Premadasa to continue the policies which were partially successful during the period of 1977-84. However, a new approach by the present Government is expected to introduce certain changes in existing policies, especially in regard to social welfare, to benefit the poorer segments of the population. It is in this context that my country has launched a unique programme of poverty alleviation.

We believe in the ability and strength of the masses. We believe that the poorest of our land have a wealth of untapped talent and ability, which, given the proper guidance and financial backing can be channelled into useful areas of production.

The Janasaviya (People's Strength) movement of His Excellency R. Premadasa is boldly innovative and based on deep faith in the ability of our people. We intend giving financial assistance to selected families of the poorest group who are now subsisting on a Food Stamp Scheme. This assistance will be given in two parts. The total package is a sum of Rs. 2,500, or US$80, monthly for two years. Of this, amount, Rs. 1,450 is for consumption, that is, provision of a basket of goods produced locally to improve nutrition and standards of living. The remaining money will accumulate to Rs. 25,000 over two years. During this period, members of the family will be trained in a trade or skill preparing them to make productive use of their savings. My Ministry, in association with several other Ministries, has a major role in this training programme. Under the dynamic leadership of the President, who galvanised the Sri Lanka Housing Programme into an international Shelter Programme supported and endorsed by the United Nations, the people of my country go forward with hope.

This year we also commemorate the 70th anniversary of the International Labour Organisation. The Organisation has had to respond to numerous challenges during this period, not least of which were the catastrophic years of the Second World War. It was during this dark time that the 26th Session of the International Labour Conference in Philadelphia in 1944 stated that "lasting peace can be established only if it is based on social justice". Since the end of the Second World War, we have been afforded a global peace of a tenuous and fragile nature, although we have gained some element of forward progress. I am thinking specifically of the decolonisation process, the struggle against racism and apartheid, the growing awareness of the need for a new international economic order including the removal of the barriers of protectionism and the increasing concern for a global strategy to preserve our environment. In all this, the ILO, in its quest for social justice, as manifested in its spirit of tripartism, has made an important contribution. However, if we are to reach the goal of a "lasting peace", let us, the member States of the ILO, use this occasion to renew our commitment to its ideals and guiding principles.

In conclusion, I would like to say that we are all agreed in our commonly held desire to strengthen the International Labour Organisation in its efforts to assist member countries in finding solutions to the problems of the workers, in improving their working conditions and improving income levels of worker families. The results of any development plan should be distributed on a fair basis so that their benefits are available to the majority of the people. To achieve these goals there is a need to involve international organisations like the ILO in various programmes, at country level and at the regional level, to advise the member countries on corrective measures to be taken in planning.

Secondly, the industrialised nations who are also members of the organisations have a key role in providing various forms of financial, technical and other required assistance and expertise. Certain trade practices and policies presently pursued by some industrialised countries to the detriment of the interests of developing countries should be removed or revised to genuinely liberalise international trade. The governments of developing countries should continue to make every effort to introduce equitable distribution as a means of enhancing social justice.

Original - French: Mr. GUERRIER (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Haiti) - Economic recovery and employment, which is the theme submitted this year for our consideration, is in our view of particular significance for the men and women of the developing countries. The Director-General's Report, which is devoted thereto, clearly analyses the effects of the international recession and the impact of other factors underlying the world-wide disequilibrium.

This disequilibrium has taken on considerable dimensions, as reflected in the deterioration of the terms of trade to the detriment of countries producing raw materials, the massive debt burden of Third World countries, the rise in protectionism banning access of our finished goods to industrialised country markets, the scarcity of external resources and the dearth of capital assets needed to stimulate economic growth.

To all this we must add the social cost of adjustment which is often imposed with the disastrous effect of slowing growth and reducing employment.

As a result, governmental resources devoted to the social area, inter alia to education, health care and housing, have been substantially pared down. This has been especially the case in Haiti since November 1987, when the country lost the better part of its foreign aid.

Poverty has been further aggravated by this situation, as noted by the Director-General in his Report, which emphasises that at the end of the 1980s the social situation throughout the world is more precarious than at the beginning of the decade. Moreover, the same Report stresses that the number of men and women living in absolute poverty has risen from approximately 820 million in 1980 to about 950 million in the late 1980s.

This world imbalance is creating destitute people throughout the Third World, especially in Latin America and in Africa.

In view of this world-wide dimension, only a three-pronged global strategy can enable us to find solutions to these problems. First, the creation of a more equitable new international economic order. Secondly, the development of regional strategies for South-South co-operation. And thirdly, a determined national effort.

At the international level, a world strategy of sustained growth aimed at promoting economic development and social progress is the most appropriate response if we rely on the Director-General's pertinent conclusion that the problems posed by foreign debt and the terms of trade cannot be solved on a national basis even if there is the political will for that. What is needed to resolve a problem of such scope is a world-wide approach.

In this respect, I should like to submit a proposal to this august assembly on behalf of the Haitian delegation, namely, the adoption as an agenda item of its next Conference the theme of poverty, with a view to arriving at an international strategy to combat that challenge. Such a strategy should facilitate the transfer of appropriate technologies, the fair settlement of foreign debt, the financing of economic development and more equitable trade relations between the North and the South.

Regional strategies of South-South co-operation should also be promoted to achieve a better understanding of the spread of poverty among peoples who share a similar history of struggle for emancipation. Thus the common search for solutions to poverty which was begun last year in Cartagena, Colombia, by the countries of the Latin America and Caribbean region, is a valuable experience within this overall perspective.

Lastly, it is essential that each country concerned by this scourge should establish a national strategy to combat poverty aiming first of all to carry out structural changes which, inter alia, would lead to a more effective use of international aid and promote regional co-operation.

A strategy of that kind should, first of all, take into account the aspirations and needs of the most vulnerable strata of the population, those which have been most affected by this crisis.

Allow me, in the minutes which remain, to present the particular situation of our country.

I am sure there is no need to repeat to you what you already know about Haiti. However, it may be useful to recall two major facts: first, the country is slowly and painfully recovering from more than a quarter of a century of vicious dictatorship which brought it to the verge of bankruptcy; second, poverty in Haiti is massive. Seventy-five per cent of the population is affected by poverty, unemployment, malnutrition, illiteracy, all types of common diseases. Furthermore, they do not have access to the most elementary basic services.

In spite of the tremendous difficulties facing the country, the Government has elaborated a national strategy to combat poverty in order to improve the conditions of life for the urban and rural populations which are deprived of resources to satisfy their essential human needs as regards housing and health care, drinking water, education, and access to vocational training.

This national strategy to combat poverty is based primarily on the mobilisation and organisation of the most underprivileged strata, which form the majority of the population, in such a way as to enable them to participate in the transformation of their living conditions and of economic and social development.

This mass poverty is the greatest challenge which has confronted the Haitian people since their heroic independence in 1804. They intend, therefore, to rely first of all on their own strength. Hence the mobilisation and participation of men and women who constitute the country's main resource.

The strategy to combat poverty includes long-term, medium-term and short-term stages, and requires major structural measures.

Until these measures are implemented, and in view of the urgency of the situation, the Government has prepared an emergency plan against poverty. A strategic stage in the national struggle against poverty, this plan – named Social Rehabilitation Programme – aims at satisfying the primary needs of the most underprivileged strata as regards health care, education, vocational training, low-cost housing and sanitation. This Programme stemmed from concern for the implementation of social justice and equity with respect to the most affected target groups, namely, women, especially single women, young people without training searching for their first job, adults victimised by endemic unemployment, young starving children without schooling. This plan for improved social conditions provides for the establishment and management of basic services centred on the need for education, primary health care, sanitation and infrastructures to benefit the local population.

From this point of view, aside from efforts made to ensure social protection and the promotion of new working relations, the Ministry for Social Affairs has begun a fruitful dialogue with the social partners which has recently led to the creation of a national tripartite commission authorised to make recommendations and proposals on the Government's social policy.

A social security reform is also planned in order to extend benefits to a strata of the population which is not yet covered.

The Government is planning, moreover, to revise the Labour Code so as to ensure better protection not only of the rights of wage earners, but also of those of independent workers in the informal sector and of agricultural labourers.

Social and economic promotion is the second part of this national strategy to combat poverty. Its purpose is to create new and lasting jobs, particularly in the informal and rural sectors, both of which have been designated as priority sectors for intervention. This promotion is aimed at giving minimum vocational training enabling the beneficiaries to better enter the labour market by encouraging them to create their own jobs. In this framework small business of the urban and rural sectors benefit from technical assistance from the International Labour Office and financial assistance from the United Nations Development Fund.

We would like particularly to thank those two specialised agencies of the United Nations for the assistance they have given to this programme.

We should like to take this opportunity to inform the Conference of our intention to organise, as soon as possible, a national Conference on poverty for which we would request technical support from the International Labour Office and the specialised agencies of the United Nations.

This appeal is also addressed to the international community, whose support we request in carrying out the national effort to take up the challenge of poverty, a challenge which, morally, concerns all of us.

I cannot conclude this statement without congratulating the President of the Conference, Mr. Nkomo, who, through his personal qualities and experience, has gained the confidence of all the delegations at this important session.

Let me also take this opportunity to pay tribute to the new Director-General, Mr. Hansenne, and to extend to him our wishes for success at the head of one of the most important specialised agencies of the United Nations.

On behalf of the Haitian delegation and on my own behalf, I should like to convey to all delegations present at this 76th Session of the International Labour Conference the fraternal greetings of the Haitian people and extend to you my thanks.

Original – Spanish: Mr. LEORO FRANCO (Government delegate, Ecuador) – Mr. President, first of all, I would like through you to congratulate the titular President for his election which will enable us to rely on his guidance in the discussions of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference which also coincides with the celebrations of the 70th anniversary of this Organisation. I would like to express my wishes for the success of this meeting and the fulfilment of the tasks entrusted to it. I would also like to congratulate the out-going Director-General for the eminent Report which he presented to us for consideration and discussion and the far-reaching work which he carried out for so many years and to express our congratulations, welcome and good wishes to the new Director-General with the wish that his term of office may be as brilliant as that of his illustrious predecessor. On behalf of my delegation, I would also like to congratulate all the officers.

The Report on economic development and employment which has been presented for analysis on this occasion of international tripartism is of great importance. Its diagnosis is tremendously realistic and unobjectionable and its conclusions are generally extremely valuable.

Nobody can deny the extent of the crisis that has shaken the world during the past ten years and that has affected precisely the most needy, the poorest and the least prepared to resist the effects of a disaster that came to them from outside and that they were virtually incapable of avoiding.

The most developed countries, those who have the best structures to adapt themselves flexibly to circumstances and to share the effects of their own misfortune, have been better able to cope and are now in a position to continue with their plans for economic expansion, whilst large sectors of the world's population are still suffering the consequences of deteriorating terms of trade, the sudden drop in international trade, and the unexpected and unilateral increase in interest rates on debts acquired through the illusory promotion of development and progress, the payment of which distracts from and absorbs a large part of their export earnings, which has made them real exporters of capital. Mr. Blanchard is not being pessimistic, but instead realistic, when he says that the 1980s have been a lost decade for Latin America and that future prospects are so negative for the Third World, that the situation will probably go on deteriorating.

The Report rightly says that developing countries have had to make tremendous sacrifices in their international position, reducing domestic demand, redirecting investment, relegating attention to the infrastructure, all of which has resulted in an unprecedented social crisis.

In the case of my country, Ecuador, we can say that in the four years preceding the present constitutional period, between 1984 and 1988, the number of unemployed rose to approximately 400,000 and the underemployed reached 1.7 million which is practically half of the active population. Consumption per head of population had fallen to the 1970 level; the cost of foodstuffs rose to 240 per cent; the costs of transport and education were close to 300 per cent. Productive investment fell by 26.6 per cent of domestic production in 1980 to less than 15 per cent in 1988; domestic savings, from 21 to 10 per cent. Monetary reserves had dropped to the equivalent of a week's imports. The exchange rate, which was 96.50 sucres per dollar in 1984, rose to over 520 sucres in mid-1988.

When the Government was taken over by President Borja, it was stated that stringent but effective measures would have to be adopted to save the nation from disaster, but these would be accompanied by very intensive employment policies, seeing that this is the worst problem afflicting the Ecuadorian people. All present economic policies are based on this priority.

The Government has had to adopt heroic measures which call for sacrifices from everyone in order to stabilise the economy. It postulates that economic growth must be achieved in the full respect of human rights in an atmosphere of dialogue and global co-operation. Under no circumstances would it be prepared to sacrifice social justice or freedom.

The present Government has set up a global policy of employment encompassing all possible activities. Each and every development policy will go under this heading.

A social plan has been established with the participation of the Ministries of Welfare, Employment, Education and Health to undertake joint and co-ordinated action for public welfare, and a fund for social development has been set up to finance this plan. They are attempting to improve the quality of life of the poorest sectors of the population seeking particularly to control the problem of unemployment.

The Government is aware of the fact that the global and specific strategy of employment, which has been put forward to deal with structural unemployment, requires the assistance of a social conscience that is prepared to assume the necessary measures, a government able to carry them through and the administrative capacity to make them actually happen. The political decisions have been made and it is now necessary to greatly increase the capacities of the staff who apply these policies and the receptivity of employers and trade union leaders. The country must understand that a deterioration in the social crisis would be the end of everything and that the solution lies in dedicating ourselves to serious work and co-ordinating ourselves to achieve our aim.

We do not shut our eyes to the link between employment and economic growth and investment or to the fact that the crisis which affects investment and growth also affects occupational policies. However, we are determined not to leave the problem of employment to shifts in the economy, but instead we are going to use all the means available in the State for its promotion. Linked to the aim of expanding employment, there are other aspects of life that could be improved such as health, integral rural development, education, the promotion of micro-firms and small firms. We have implemented a campaign of literacy which is without precedent in the history of our country due to its intensity and also due to its amplitude.

The strategy of facing up to unemployment does not only include the long-term global strategy based on the eradication of causes to eliminate effects. It is also based on specific programmes for immediate application, restricted to the attention of the sectors which require it. Examples of this are the programme of micro-firms and the programme of emerging employment.

The programme of micro-firms, which already existed, is being redirected and will henceforth receive greater support. Its aim is to find solutions for under-employment. It will receive ample funding from the social development fund.

The job-creation programme, aimed at creating temporary employment for the benefit of the depressed marginal urban and rural areas, promoting the work of productive and social infrastructures for the advancement of these same groups, which will then facilitate increased production, bringing about new possibilities of permanent employment. The State will support the implementation of such labour-intensive projects which are located in depressed areas and are of priority importance for development. The National Employment Institute will co-ordinate this programme.

Moreover, in order to promote the adjustment of employment to technological changes and those resulting from market fluctuations, the Government attaches the utmost importance to training programmes entrusted to the Ecuadorian Vocational Training Agency, SECAP, which is heavily supported by the Government.

I wish to stress also that Ecuador endorses many of the conclusions of the Report of the Director-General. We agree that all our efforts should be aimed at modernising our economies on the basis of industrial progress and that it would be unreasonable to confine growth to commodity exports or to the productive work of the poor, that State intervention is essential to stimulate economic and social development, that world economic recovery is essential in order to improve the quality of life in general, and that there can be no such recovery in the Third World without the solidarity of the industrialised world, without an effective solution to the problems of debt and protectionism on the part of the central States and the deterioration of terms of international trade.

There is another point and that is the problem of peace. Not only international peace but also internal peace. Countries must be able to enjoy internal peace as a prerequisite for their development, their independence and their ability to deal with their social problems.

Mr. President, I should like to reiterate my good wishes for success in the demanding office entrusted to you, in the hope that this session of the conference will be able, in all fairness to all of its members, to fulfil the expectations placed in it.

Original - Spanish: Mr. MOLANO (representative of the World Federation of Industry Workers) - In congratulating the President and the other officers of the Conference on being elected to conduct the business of this session, we should also like to express our appreciation for the work accomplished during his lengthy term of office by Mr. Francis Blanchard, at the same time extending our greetings to the new Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Michel Hansenne, and wishing him every success in discharging his high responsibility. May God guide his efforts in these times which are so dramatic for mankind.

The World Federation of Industry Workers stated a year ago from this same platform that the system of economic and social relations, even more unjust and more irrational, was directly affecting the fundamental rights of the workers, starting with the right to decent and remunerative employment.

It is therefore very satisfactory to us to find that the main topic of the Report put before this 76th Session of the International Labour Conference deals with these very problems of economic recovery, although from the point of view of generating employment as an essential basis of the fight against poverty and the glaring inequalities of modern society.

Although the Report lays stress on the situation in the developing countries, in particular those in the continents of Africa and Latin America, overwhelmed by their foreign debt, this is logical because it is in these countries that destitution and marginalisation have reached heart-rending and explosive proportions. In confirmation of this it is enough, simply for the sake of example, to recall recent events in Algeria, Venezuela and Argentina.

Nevertheless, things are not running smoothly elsewhere, either.

In the countries of the OECD, that is to say the rich countries of the Western world, the number of poor has not decreased, but is increasing day by day despite the sustained economic growth of the past few years, recorded in macroeconomic statistics by the experts who are plentiful in those parts. The studies produced by the OECD itself, very well documented, of course, bear witness to this paradoxical and alarming fact.

Why? How is it possible for economic growth to be accompanied by a growth in the number of poor? Is not the answer to be found in the restructuring, the closures of enterprises, redundancies, deregulation, precarious employment, flexibility, austerity policies and the mindless warfare of competition? But, in the final analysis, who stands to benefit from all this?

At the same time, the failing and difficulties of the socialist countries have long ceased to be an open secret. Many of these countries are seeking ways of opening up and integrating themselves in the world economy with a view to finding a satisfactory response to the largely unsatisfied demands of their populations; there is accordingly no reason to be surprised at the cries of protest and despair uttered by the workers on an increasingly frequent and massive scale.

A calm and objective assessment of economic and social relations world-wide cannot leave unmoved the representatives of governments, employers and workers from 150 countries in the world gathered together at this session.

The overriding theme running all through the Director-General's Report is that social progress is not opposed to economic progress but, on the contrary, goes hand in hand with it, facilitates it and furthers it; from which the conclusion to be drawn is that it is necessary to give to social matters as least as much importance as to economic matters in structural adjustment policies and plans for recovery and sustained growth.

Unfortunately, this idea and this conclusion tend to be overlooked in the policy-making and calculations of governments and employers in almost all parts of the world: in the industrialised market economy countries all that matters is the holy writ of competition at all costs; in the socialist countries, the fundamental preoccupation is to make up for technological backwardness and deficiencies in management; in the countries of the Third World, the inescapable priority has to be to maintain the flow of oxygen from the international financial institutions even though their people are dying of starvation.

This disregard and disdain for social matters cannot continue in this way or the whole of mankind will be going down a dead-end street; it is urgent to change outlooks, methods and machinery; economic recovery will be meaningless if it is not thought out, if it is not planned, if it is not geared to the needs of the people, of the great majorities, of the most needy.

The WFIW does not wish to conclude these brief remarks without making three special comments.

Firstly, the subject of industrialisation of the Third World dealt with in the last Appendix to the Director-General's Report is as important as any of the others. However, it leads us to ask ourselves some questions: What type of industrialisation and for whose benefit? Are not microelectronics and biotechnology, cited as examples, already subject to the limitations of protectionism and the domination of multinationals? Is there not a need here too for far-reaching change and greater solidarity in North-South relations and a new international economic order?

Secondly, with reference to the report on the ILO's activities, the WFIW expresses its appreciation for the tremendous and fruitful work accomplished by the ILO in the field of sectoral and workers' education activities in which it has had the opportunity to participate on a number of occasions.

Lastly, as concerns the defence of human and trade union rights, a constant concern of the ILO, the WFIW cannot fail to express its condemnation for the murder of trade union leaders in the Republic of Colombia and other countries of Latin America, nor its disgust, its indignation and its sadness at the massacre of the defenceless population of the People's Republic of China.

Original - Arab: Mr. AL-JASSEM (Employers' delegate, Kuwait) - I should like to start by conveying the best wishes and greetings of the employers in my country, Kuwait, which the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Kuwait has the honour of representing at this forum.

I should like to congratulate the President, on his election as President of this 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. I wish him every success in conducting the work of this Conference which, in view of his experience and wisdom, I am sure this will be the case.

I should also like to congratulate the Vice-Presidents of the three groups on their elections and wish them every success in their mission. I hope that they will be of valuable assistance to you in your work.

At this session of the Conference, when the new Director-General has assumed his functions, I cannot fail to pay tribute to Mr. Francis Blanchard who so successfully led this Organisation for many years; I wish him a long and happy life. I should also like to congratulate the new Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Michel Hansenne, and wish him every success in his duties so that he might be "the best successor to the best predecessor"; I am sure that he is worthy of his high position.

Year after year, conferences come and go, and every June we meet within these four walls; this year, our Conference coincides with the Seventieth Anniversary of the creation of the ILO. Every year we come to Geneva to respond to the call for the common good, love and social peace, for which your noble Organisation is the standard-bearer. We also come to Geneva to confirm our loyalty to the international community of work which reflects our vast world with all its contradictions and all its facets. Each and every one of us tries to reach beyond national and regional obstacles to rise above conflicting ideas and interests so that we might attain the values and objectives for which this Organisation was created.

Without a doubt, the Director-General made an excellent choice when he opted for Recovery and employment as the theme for the first part of his report for this session. At first sight, the subject might not seem very original, but its close links with the contemporary world and the future of mankind make it a subject always worthy of reflection. The Director-

General has, or so it seems, decided to deal with this theme in a cautious way, so that it might even be compared with a technical study which avoids establishing links between economic phenomena and contemporary international influences; he may have had to proceed in this way because of his delicate position and the need to steer a diplomatic course in the middle of conflicting currents. But we do not feel obliged to follow this same course. On the contrary we firmly believe that this subject should have been dealt with from an integrated overall standpoint, dealing with present economic phenomena and objective data in the present international situation, without being afraid of discussing politics or of stepping over its imaginary red lines. And it is for this reason that we believe it vital to raise such issues.

How can we straighten out the economy once again, achieve development and create employment opportunities in a world caught up in armed conflicts, an armaments race, civil wars, repression, discrimination and violations of human rights?

How can we achieve economic recovery; development and job creation when two-thirds of the countries in the world are staggering under the burden of their debts which hamper their actions, impede progress and turn their efforts at development into dust? These debts have become an effective way of exerting political and economic pressure on debtor countries – and their creditors derive great satisfaction in exerting this pressure.

Is this a propitious climate in which to promote development efforts and to step up job opportunities?

My country, Kuwait, has taken an initiative that might serve to find an exemplary solution to the debt crisis. Indeed, his Highness, the Emir of Kuwait, Sheikh Jaber El-Ahmad El-Jaber El-Sabbah suggested, in his speech to the Forty-third Session of the United Nations General Assembly last September, that the creditor countries should meet to examine whether they could not cancel the interests on their loans as well as a part of their loans to the poorest countries. His Highness confirmed that Kuwait, as a creditor country, was prepared to attend such a meeting and undertook in advance to implement any decisions that it reached.

This noble initiative received much coverage in the press. But most of the rich countries of the North have failed, until now, to make any efforts to examine practical ways in which this initiative might be applied. One exception to this rule is France, which has taken the worthy decision to cancel debts owed to it by the 35 poorest countries in the world.

When the rich countries of the North ask if they can help the developing countries in the South, they should realise that this is not charity but a recognition of a historic, economic and social right. History bears witness to the fact that the peoples of the South have given their wealth and their natural resources, as well as a large share of their spiritual and cultural heritage, to their brothers in the North. At the same time, their countries have become markets upon which the North flood their products and goods. The peoples of the South have provided all of this without payment or, in the best of cases, at ridiculously low prices. What have the peoples of the North given in return?

They have given the peoples of the South centuries of suffering, under the shadow of colonialism and slavery. They have created Zionism as a model of shameful colonialism. They have bequeathed racial discrimination, with its succession of tragedies and violations of human rights, to the countries of the South. They have drained the brains of their elite and sapped their driving force. These are truths which we are no longer too proud to proclaim so that we are fair when we ask countries of the North to give countries in the South much less than is their due, if the former truly believe that man is the object of development and that the concept of man is not only to serve the purposes of the peoples of the North – to the exclusion of all others. In all bitterness, we ask: is it fair, as we approach the end of the twentieth century, that we are living in a world in which one half is rich and the other half is poor?

The Kuwaiti economic community, represented by the Chamber of Commerce of Kuwait – on behalf of which I am speaking – believe that one of the prerequisites for economic recovery is to put an end to international and regional tension and to reduce armament budgets which account for a large proportion of the national product of many industrialised or developing countries; these funds could be invested in economic and social development projects and thus help to create job opportunities. Our dreams to achieve progress, peace, well-being and employment in our world are thwarted at the very beginning by unfair practices which set conflicts and wars ablaze in more than one area of the world.

As regards the section of the Director-General's Report concerning the situation of Arab workers in Palestine and in the other occupied Arab territories, we should like to make two important comments: the first concerns the lateness of the Report and the fact that it was sent at the last minute to the three groups in the member States so that members of the delegations did not have time to read it and formulate comments to make to the plenary sitting of the Conference. Although we are sure that this happened in good faith, we feel bound to point it out because it happens every year – and this of course helps the position of the accused. Second, the Report deals only with the victims amongst the workers, whereas employers are also victims of the same practices as their brother workers. Indeed, injustice, repression and oppression take the form of crippling taxation, the closing of enterprises, the destruction of enterprises and the imprisonment and forced exile of many employers. I wish to point out that already last year, when I spoke before this same Assembly, I asked that the Committee concerned should widen its scope to include the situation of Arab employers in Palestine and in the occupied Arab territories – in the same way as their brother workers.

Although, from past experience, we have become used to the fact that the Report is cautious and weighted, the international press refers daily to the Palestinian uprising and the repressive actions perpetrated against all the classes of the Palestinian people. You are aware of the suffering of these people who are your brothers, employers and workers, and you are aware that they are being subjected to injustice and aggression without any respect of human rights or international charter. These are a people who are defending their homeland and who have never left their country to aggress anybody else. These people – these men, women and children – became so incensed with the injustice of their situation that they left their homes to take up the cause; their only arms were their faith in God and in their homeland, their love of freedom and dignity, and the stones from their land which were the only means by which they could express their refusal of injustice, repression and aggression. Who can feel injustice more than a people who have lost their security and their hopes for tomorrow and who have been deprived of the most basic rights guaranteed to all peoples?

All the Palestinian people ask is to have their independent State on Palestinian soil, under the leadership of the Palestine Liberation Organisation, their only lawful representative.

It is for their reason that the Kuwaiti economic community, represented by the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Kuwait, urges the conference to support the draft resolution submitted to this session concerning the protection of the rights and freedoms of Arab workers and employers in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories, with a view to supporting principles of human rights and upholding the values of justice and peace.

Part II of the Director-General's Report deals with all the activities undertaken by the ILO during the past year, which have continued to be extremely varied. It is only fair to give credit to the ILO; thanks to its wisdom and rationalisation measures, it has been able to keep up the level of its services in spite of its lack of resources and its difficult financial situation. We should like to urge those who make the size of their budget contributions to the ILO and other specialised agencies a means of pressure to oblige these organisations to programme their action in accordance with their wishes and not in accordance with the democratic methods advocated by their constitutions and regulations to cease their practices and make a distinction between their financial commitments and democratic dialogue, thus proving that they are sincere in their calls for freedom, democracy and equality.

The Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Kuwait which firmly believes in the mission of the ILO and wishes to second it in the activities and services it provides to the three groups – services which have been adversely affected by the present financial difficulties – has stepped up its links with the ILO within the framework of a joint programme of training of managers in Arab enterprises for the third consecutive year. It thereby wishes to set an example, however modest, of the commitments we have to specialised international agencies that provide honourable services to the community of mankind.

In conclusion, I should like to thank you for your attention. May peace, mercy and the grace of God be with you.

Original – Arabic: Mr. GHARIB (Workers' delegate, Iraq) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. I should like to begin my statement by greeting all of you and bringing to you from Baghdad, the City of Victory, of civilisation, construction and peace, the greetings of the workers of Iraq and of their trade union organisation; I should like also, on their behalf, to congratulate the President of this session of the Conference on his election to this high office and to convey to him our highest esteem, in the conviction that he will lead our Session to success, enabling us to achieve positive results in the interests of social progress in the world.

We also congratulate the Director-General for his judicious choice of the subject of recovery and employment, an important issue, affecting as it does the future of millions of human beings.

We appreciate very much the commendable efforts and remarkable work done by the International Labour Office with a view to implementing the resolutions already adopted, as evidenced by the appendices of the Report of the Director-General. The work carried out by the Governing Body and the Office to give effect to the resolutions adopted at previous sessions of the International Labour Conference is coupled with technical co-operation activities and efforts aimed at applying the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia.

While we are on the subject of work and workers, I should like to highlight the enormous progress achieved for the benefit of the workers of Iraq since the glorious revolution of 17-30 July 1968. The workers enjoy a great many advantages enabling them to live in dignity and guaranteeing everyone who is able the right to work without any discrimination on the grounds of sex, race, language or religion.

The workers and their trade union organisations have been given pride of place in the process of struggle and production, from the revolution until today. This has enabled them to become a living and effective force working for the betterment of life and the development of society.

Thanks to the special interest which the President of the Republic, Saddam Hussein, takes in the workers and their trade union organisations, democratic traditions have been strengthened, and the trade unions carry out their activities within the general federation in full freedom, ensuring wide worker participation in every area.

Thanks to the labour legislation in force and Arab and international labour Conventions ratified by Iraq, our trade union organisation has been able to carry out its mission and comply strictly with the principles of the sanctity of labour and the protection of the rights and dignity of workers, and to use the abilities and skills of the workers to good effect.

The Arab resolution concerning the protection of Arab workers and employers' rights and freedoms in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories deserves your support. It is my pleasure to invite the Conference to adopt its provisions in compliance with the Preamble to the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation, which states that universal and lasting peace can be established only if it is based upon social justice and that working conditions involving injustice and privation imperil the peace and harmony of the world, especially since Israel is guilty of inhuman policies and practices against the Arab workers and people and treats them in a barbarous and racist manner.

Today, after the cessation of hostilities between Iran and Iraq in August 1988, we feel entirely justified in requesting you and, through you, the other organisations, to intervene to save the lives of thousands of Iraqi and Iranian workers held prisoners in both countries. As is well known, Iran rejects the principle of an exchange of all prisoners, while Iraq, in the words of its President, Saddam Hussein, has stated and continues to state its willingness to accept immediately, whatever the results of negotiations, the exchange of all prisoners.

This Conference, representing as it does the social conscience of mankind, must exert pressure to obtain the release of fettered human energies through the exchange of all prisoners, to ensure that the peace treaty provided for in Security Council resolution 598 is signed, and to put an end to the delaying tactics and the refusal to comply with the will of the international community.

Original – Spanish: The PRESIDENT (Mr. DEL PINO) – I give the floor to Mr. Nabian, Government adviser, Islamic Republic of Iran, who has raised a point of order.

Original – Arabic: Mr. NABIAN (Government adviser, Islamic Republic of Iran) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate: Mr. President, the Standing Orders of our Conference, and in particular paragraphs 4 and 5 of Article 14, stipulate that the President may require a speaker to resume his seat if his remarks are not relevant to the subject under discussion. The President of the Conference stated at the beginning of the sitting that all of the provisions of our Constitution must be complied with, but unfortunately, I see that this Article has not been complied with. I therefore demand that the right to speak be withdrawn from this speaker. He must be interrupted.

Original – Arabic: Mr. GHARIB – We also urge the International Labour Organisation to assume its proper role and to support Iraq, which fought to defend its territory and humanity for eight years, the more so since a vast campaign for the reconstruction of the buildings destroyed during the war is under way.

In the occupied Arab territories, the popular “intifadah” has risen against the Zionist occupation, which relies on a policy of expulsions, murders, land confiscation and suppression of freedoms. The elderly, women and children are rising up against this policy, despite the genocide and atrocities suffered by those who defend their rights.

The Arab workers in the occupied Arab territories are subjected by the racist Zionist regime to inhuman policies and practices, of which no one is unaware, as they are reported daily by the mass media.

Once cannot but reaffirm that Israel must be expelled from humanitarian organisations, and the International Labour Organisation in particular, for violating every humanitarian standard and principle, that every effort must be made to defend the trade union freedoms infringed by this racist regime and its twin, the South African regime, whose heinous racist policy continues to oppose everything humane and noble.

I should like to appeal to the Conference to uphold truth and justice in all spheres relating to freedom of association, peace, and the pursuit of a happy life.

We cannot but pay tribute to the choice of topics on our agenda, which are of major importance, relating as they do to numerous issues involving work and workers.

I shall conclude by greeting all of you and thanking you for your attention. May God grant you prosperity and guide us in the ways of truth, justice and peace.

Original – French: Mr. ABDI (Government delegate, Djibouti) – It is a great honour for me to speak here before this august assembly for the first time.

My first words must be congratulate the President on his brilliant election to head the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. I am convinced that his competence and sense of organisation will contribute to the achievement of positive results at our session. I would also like to take advantage of this opportunity to congratulate the Vice-Presidents who will undoubtedly contribute to the success of our Conference by assisting the Chairman.

I must address my compliments to the Secretary-General and to his co-workers for the excellent organisation of the Conference, which fully meets our expectations.

As regards the subject under discussion, with reference to the Report of the Director-General on economic recovery and employment in the world economy, I would like to say that my country's approach to international economic problems is intended to be appropriate to the efficient implementation of structural adjustment, the relaunching of growth and greater social justice.

The period of stagnation of the lost decade of the eighties stunted the growth and social progress of the developing countries. A global effort must be made to overcome problems of debt and disruption in international economic co-operation.

In that connection, I would like to mention the admirable initiative recently taken in Dakar by France in favour of the poorest countries. I wish to pay sincere homage to the French Government and its President, François Mitterrand, and express the hope that other prosperous countries will take the same action.

Solidarity of the industrialised countries is desirable in assisting the South, but it is also necessary for the developing countries to be more efficient in the utilisation of their own resources.

It would be possible for a large number of developing countries to emerge from the crisis situation by means of an appropriate choice of macro- and micro-economic solutions, institutional reforms in the economic sphere and strict monetary and budgetary discipline.

The first objective to attain is to relaunch economic and social development, which requires a global approach, in view of the interdependence between North and South.

The Report of the Director-General stresses that a first remedy is to place the accent on efficiency and the application of rigorous criteria with regard to cost and advantages in the utilisation of available capital for investment, including internal savings.

The second remedy is to marry a policy of structural adjustment with renewed balanced growth, rather than being limited to short-term stabilisation measures.

In countries where the level of development is low and production structures are rigid, the State has to play an important role in ensuring that essential investment takes place in the general social infrastructure in order to lighten constraints on the growth of production.

It is known that economic growth and social progress must advance hand in hand. That being the case, the action to be taken must aim at an investment strategy which, while giving priority to raising production, improving productivity and increasing the incomes of the poor, will also allow the reactivation of demand and stimulate recovery, at the same time alleviating the social cost and the adjustment which the least favoured have borne hitherto.

Specific measures should be taken to attain these objectives.

The Director-General proposes that recourse be had at the macro-economic level to a monetary and fiscal policy to remedy the imbalance of external payments and put an end to internal over-consumption, while safeguarding production capacity.

The State of Djibouti is inclined to reduce its intervention in the economy, except where its intervention is absolutely necessary to increase productive investment, maximise its yield and to concentrate it on activities with higher labour requirements.

At the micro-economic level, the State must encourage the development of small- and medium-sized enterprises to make them more efficient economically and, above all, in terms of employment.

In that context, whatever the services or the actions undertaken in favour of the less developed countries may be, we should not lose sight of the need to implement or establish a system to guarantee minimum protection to workers and to ensure that they share the fruits of development. Greater openness, too, will itself stimulate development, which can come about in a way that will satisfy their legitimate aspirations.

All the above is an essential element of economic growth and the development of employment, and must be the object of tripartite participation of the social partners which will contribute to the political efficacy of the decisions and ensure a more equitable distribution of their effects.

I should like to stress that specific measures, especially on the part of the ILO, should be taken to contribute to the reduction of unemployment, poverty and famine on the basis of projects built on the fruits of disarmament such as major public works and other labour-intensive schemes, to establish a basic infrastructures and protect the environment.

As concerns the Republic of Djibouti, a country which is both Arab and Islamic and which has very few natural resources, it has set its sights on the development of the service sector and is following a policy of economic and monetary liberalism.

Djibouti belongs to the Arab world; the special relations which we have with the markets of the preferential trade area and those of the countries of Africa, the Caribbean and the Pacific, the existence of a free zone and the geographical position of our country predisposes it to play the role of a crossroads between the Red Sea, the Indian Ocean and the Arabian Gulf.

To conclude, I should like to take this opportunity to go into three essential questions, to which Djibouti attaches the greatest possible importance:

The first is the fate of the workers in the occupied territories of the West Bank and Gaza, in view of the recrudescence of violence in those lands. We are aware of the work that has already been accomplished by the ILO in favour of the workers of these territories but we want new action to be undertaken with a view to maintaining decent living conditions ensuring the well-being of the workers and of their families, to preserving their employment and avoiding an aggravation of unemployment.

Secondly, the economic sanctions which certain countries have imposed on the apartheid regime of South Africa have apparently produced their effects, if we are to judge by the first signs of apparent flexibility in the attitude of the leaders of that country.

The question of concern to us is the negative effects which these measures – withdrawal of major industrial and commercial undertakings and non-delivery of raw materials – have had upon the employment situation of the population, without distinction as to origin, on behalf of whom we ask the Director-General to gather information, the result of which would be communicated to all Member governments of the ILO.

Thirdly, last April, the République of Djibouti was the victim of torrential rains which led to devastating floods involving many deaths and thousands of injured, homeless and sick led to the appearance of new illnesses – undernourishment and the destruction of a large part of the agrarian sector. The damage caused to thousands of dwellings in the popular quarters, to the road network, to the water system, to school buildings and to hospitals and clinics has been considerable.

The appeal for international assistance made by His Excellency Mr. El-Hadj Hassan Gouled Aptidon, President of the Republic of Djibouti, has met with a favourable response on the part of the international community, which provided considerable and varied emergency assistance with such commendable speed, enabling the most pressing needs to be met.

In the name of His Excellency the President of the Republic of Djibouti, and of his government and on behalf of the people of Djibouti, I should like to extend our sincere thanks to friendly and brother countries, to the international organisations, non-governmental organisations, to public and private enterprises and to individuals, who have been so generous with emergency aid.

I would also like to draw the attention of all the Members of our Organisation to the resolution adopted on 12 May 1989 by the United Nations Economic and Social Council inviting the member countries of the United Nations to support the economic recovery and construction efforts undertaken by the Government of Djibouti to repair the damage caused by the terrible floods of last April.

The Economic and Social Council noted that Djibouti, as one of the least developed countries, was unable to carry out all the necessary reconstruction work on its own. The resolution also mentions that the Republic of Djibouti is facing an exceptional situation insofar as it is already having to cope with the serious problems caused by the presence in the country of thousands of refugees and displaced persons.

The reconstruction work, which is mainly one of infrastructure, cannot all be carried out by Djibouti. It needs the assistance of the international financial institutions, of the organisations of the United Nations system and of donor countries.

The Republic of Djibouti trusts that the resolution of the United Nations Economic and Social Council will be swiftly implemented. It thanks in advance the entire international community for all that it might do to help Djibouti in the particularly difficult situation in which it finds itself.

Mr. SIDIQUE (Minister of Labour, Sierra Leone)
– On behalf of my delegation I extend hearty congratulations for the honour bestowed on the President to direct the affairs of this Conference. My delegation is confident that he will conduct the deliberations of this Conference to a successful conclusion.

Permit me also to extend my congratulations to the Director-General on his election to the high office and also for his excellent and lucid Report. Commenting on recession, recovery and adjustment in the 1980s the Director-General has pointed out that while many countries such as Eastern Europe have recovered from the recession of the 1980s and many Asian economies have maintained reasonable growth rates, economic conditions in Sub-Saharan Africa and Latin America have remained depressed throughout the decade. He lamented that while many industrialised countries enjoyed very high levels of employment since the last world war, the majority in the Sub-Saharan Africa and Latin American countries have experienced rising unemployment and underemployment as well as increased poverty.

We are aware that low economic growth in Sub-Saharan African countries is due largely to economic factors outside the control of the Governments of the sub-region. Factors such as the terms of trade losses which greatly exceed net resource transfers to Africa, debt burden and the adverse structural adjustment programmes for economic recovery and development have resulted in massive unemployment and the attendant low gross national productivity.

Although the issue of structural adjustment looms high in international discussions, yet the exercise is often purely academic as no serious attention is given to solving the adverse social conditions in the depressed regions that are largely the target of the economic recovery programmes. Unfortunately, all the so-called "structural adjustment programmes" are directed by international aid donors such as the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank which invariably ignore the human dimension to development. The report of the International Labour Conference held in Khartoum, Sudan, from 5 to 8 March, 1988 on the theme "Human Dimension of Africa's Economic Recovery and Development", which was a follow-up to the implementation of the United Nations Programme of Action for Africa's Economic Recovery and Development (UN-PAAERD) and Africa's Priority Programme for Economic Recovery (APPEAR), stated that: "Since the human being is the centre of all development, the human condition is the only final measure of development." The report expressed regret, however, that over the past decade the human condition has deteriorated considerably.

The Sierra Leone delegation therefore urges this Conference to put pressure on the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the World Bank to endeavour to ensure at all times that adequate safeguards for the protection of the human dimension are built into structural adjustment programmes. We believe that much more can be achieved without the adverse repercussions which the implementation of structural adjustment programmes have had on the human dimension, with particular reference to what the Khartoum Declaration refers to as "Vulnerable Group" – the vast majority of African peoples, women, children and the handicapped.

Notwithstanding the severe resource constraints which my country is experiencing as a result of current implementation of structural adjustment programmes, minimum levels of social services and access to food are made available to everyone (although sometimes at high cost to the government as well as the consumer). My delegation would like to record its thanks to ILO experts who have visited Sierra Leone on many occasions, conducting studies at the University of Sierra Leone and other places aimed at finding ways to resettle retrenched workers in the private sector as a strategy to create self-employment. The development of this sector of the economy will help to solve the present massive unemployment and, in future, lead to the development of indigenous entrepreneurship, making potential job seekers employers. The International Labour Organisation is therefore urged to initiate follow-up action on those studies.

In view of the aforementioned economic constraints of sub-Saharan African countries, the ILO is requested to help deserving countries such as Sierra Leone with transport and other facilities in order to enhance more effectively the implementation of national and international labour standards by the ministries responsible for wages, labour and factory inspection and for the effective collection of labour statistics.

My country also wishes to express its gratitude and appreciation to the ILO for its technical and financial contribution to training schemes organised sometimes on a tripartite basis with particular reference to ARLAC in Harare, Zimbabwe and other International Conferences, from which Sierra Leone has benefited. We would further appreciate the ILO continuing to render such significant assistance.

By 1 January 1988, Sierra Leone had ratified 33 Conventions. There are legislative provisions for the endorsement of Conventions not yet ratified, such as the Merchant Shipping (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 147). Provision also exists in our laws for the protection of this category of workers, in line with this Convention. We are in the final stages of formally ratifying the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155). Legislative provisions also exist under the Factories and Workmen's Compensation Acts protecting workers against occupational hazards.

Sierra Leone is obliged to ratify ILO Conventions, particularly those concerning freedom of association and protection of the right to organise, the right of employers and workers to organise collective bargaining, the abolition of forced labour and the tripartite consultation (International Labour Standards).

The freedom of workers to organise is a fundamental right incorporated into the Sierra Leone National Constitution of 1978. This right is exercised by both workers in the private and public sectors. Collective bargaining in Sierra Leone is free and liberal, without any government interference. The laws of Sierra Leone prohibit forced labour. Tripartism is the basis on which our industrial relations system is built. Our national labour policies for example are formulated at tripartite level in the National Joint Consultative Committee, comprising Government, Employers' Federation and Labour Congress. We have indeed taken every possible step to ensure the compliance of the principles involved both in law and in practice.

Regarding action taken against apartheid, the Government of Sierra Leone has no links whatsoever with the racist regime of South Africa, whether political, social or economic. Trade and commercial transactions of any form either directly or indirectly are prohibited by law.

In conclusion, as I am addressing this august body for the first time as Minister of Labour, I feel highly honoured to be able to dwell on issues of common interest and concern to all of us and I hope that our deliberations here will help us to find solutions to our problems.

(The Conference adjourned at 9.45 p.m.)

CREDENTIALS

First Report of the Credentials Committee

1. The Credentials Committee of the 76th Session of the Conference is composed of Mr. A. Califice, Government delegate, Belgium, Chairman; Mr. E. Hoff, Employers' delegate, Norway; and Mr. J. Svenningsen, Workers' delegate, Denmark.

Composition of the Conference

2. Since the signing of the brief report made by the Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, a number of modifications have occurred in the composition of the Conference.

3. The number of States Members of the International Labour Organisation represented at the Conference is at present 135. To date 15 States (Bahamas, Dominica, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Fiji, Grenada, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Democratic Kampuchea, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Paraguay, Saint Lucia, Sao Tome and Principe, Seychelles, Solomon Islands) have not sent a delegation.

Accredited delegates and advisers

4. The total number of accredited delegates is 534, comprising 268 Government delegates, 133 Employers' delegates and 133 Workers' delegates.

5. There are 1,311 accredited advisers, comprising 646 Government advisers, 308 Employers' advisers and 357 Workers' advisers.

6. The total number of accredited delegates and advisers is therefore 1,845.

7. With regard to the resolution concerning the participation of women in ILO meetings, adopted by the Conference at its 67th Session in June 1981, the Credentials Committee wishes to inform the Conference that there are 38 women among the 534 delegates accredited to the Conference and 175 women among the 1,311 accredited advisers. The total number of women accredited to the Conference is therefore 213 as against 182 last year.

Registered delegates and advisers

8. Since the present session of the Conference has decided to continue the practice adopted at its 49th Session of fixing the quorum on the basis of the number of delegates registered, the Committee considers it desirable to advise the Conference as to the situation concerning the registration of delegates.

9. At this time the number of registered delegates is 456, comprising 235 Government delegates, 112 Employers' delegates and 109 Workers' delegates.

10. In addition, the number of registered advisers is 1,100, comprising 579 Government advisers, 226 Employers' advisers and 295 Workers' advisers.

Quorum

11. Twenty-five advisers, who are substitutes to delegates who have not registered, are taken into account in calculating the voting strength of the Conference.

12. Since seven States¹ represented at the Conference are in arrears in the payment of their contributions to the Organisation, these States, under the terms of paragraph 4 of Article 13 of the Constitution, may not at present participate in the voting in the Conference or in its committees. The 19 registered delegates designated by these States are hence not taken into consideration in fixing the quorum.

13. In addition, two registered Employers' delegates are not taken into account in the calculation of the quorum because of the provisions of Article 4, paragraph 2, of the Constitution.

14. At the present time the quorum required to give a vote validity is 230.

15. The Committee notes that the quorum calculated on the basis of the number of accredited delegates would be 252. The difference between the quorum calculated on the basis of the number of delegates registered and that which could have been calculated on the basis of the number of accredited delegates is due to the fact that some accredited delegates have not yet registered. The Committee urgently appeals to delegates present at the Conference to register so that the quorum will be as nearly exact as possible and that their presence can be taken into account in its calculation. The Committee stresses, in this connection, the need for the registration of delegates and advisers to commence as early as possible on the morning preceding the opening of the Conference to enable the delegates and advisers concerned to attend their respective pre-Conference group meetings.

Incomplete delegations

16. The Committee notes that a certain number of delegations are so far incomplete. Two countries

(Benin and Cape Verde) have not accredited an Employers' delegate and two countries (Liberia and People's Democratic Republic of Yemen) have not accredited a Workers' delegate. The Committee wishes to affirm once again the necessity for governments to comply with the requirement of Article 3 of the Constitution that a complete tripartite delegation be sent to the Conference. The Committee recalls that pursuant to a decision of the Governing Body, the Director-General each year requests the governments of all member States which did not send complete tripartite delegations to the Conference to indicate the reasons for their failure to do so, and that the information received in reply to that request is duly communicated to the Governing Body.

17. The Committee also notes that there is some imbalance between the number of advisers to the delegates of each group and also between the number of Employers' and Workers' advisers. It once again urges governments to take greater account, when nominating delegations, of the proportions in the composition of the Conference envisaged by paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 3 of the Constitution. The Committee further recalls the request contained in the resolution concerning the strengthening of tripartism in the overall activities of the International Labour Organisation, adopted by the Conference in 1971, and expresses the hope that Governments will accord equal treatment to each of the groups when appointing advisers to their country's delegation to the International Labour Conference. The Committee recalls in this connection the obligation of Members under Article 13, paragraph 2(a), of the Constitution, to pay the travelling and subsistence expenses of their delegates and advisers and trusts that this obligation will be respected for the whole duration of the Conference.

Observers

18. In addition to the observer delegations mentioned in the Brief Report of the Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, the Democratic People's Republic of Korea has nominated an observer delegation to the Conference.

Organisations and liberation movements invited

19. The Conference is also being attended by:

- representatives of the United Nations and some of its organs invited by virtue of Article II, paragraph (1) - relating to reciprocal representation of the Agreement between the United Nations and the International Labour Organisation, which came into effect on 14 December 1946;
- representatives of specialised agencies and other official international organisations, invited in conformity with Article 2, paragraph 3(b), of the Standing Orders of the Conference;

- representatives of non-governmental international organisations with which consultative relations have been established, invited in conformity with Article 2, paragraph 3(j), of the Standing Orders of the Conference;
- representatives of other non-governmental international organisations also invited in conformity with Article 2, paragraph 3(j), of the Standing Orders of the Conference;
- representatives of liberation movements invited in conformity with Article 2, paragraph 3(k), of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

list of these representatives is appended to the List of Delegations published as a Supplement to the Provisional Record of the Conference.

Objections¹

20. To date, the Committee has before it a number of objections or communications concerning the credentials of certain delegates and advisers. It has forthwith commenced its examination. The Committee considers that its work would be facilitated if the credentials would reach the Office within the time limit provided for under Article 26, paragraph 1, of the Standing Orders and if all governments utilised the suggested form for credentials of delegates, appended to the Memorandum communicated to governments every year prior to the session of the Conference. It would be particularly helpful if governments would provide exact information on the employers' and workers' organisations consulted in nominating Employers' and Workers' delegates and advisers as well as on the organisations which have agreed to such nominations.

21. The Credentials Committee submits the present report to the Conference in order that the Conference may take note of it.

Geneva, 9 June 1989.

J. SVENNINGSSEN.

¹ In accordance with the usual practice, the texts of the objections which the Credentials Committee has before it, together with the replies of the delegates concerned (in cases where the Credentials Committee has requested such replies), can be consulted in the office of the secretariat of the Credentials Committee.

Provisional Record

Seventy-sixth Session, Geneva, 1989

Ninth sitting

Monday, 12 June 1989, 10 a.m.

President: Mr. Nkomo

THIRD REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT – The first item on our agenda is the third report of the Selection Committee. I call on Mr. Hammond, Government adviser, Canada, Chairman of the Selection Committee, to submit the Committee's report of the Conference.

Mr. HAMMOND (Government adviser, Canada; Chairman of the Selection Committee) – Mr. President, I have the honour to submit to the third report of the Selection Committee which is to be found in Provisional Record No. 4B. This report deals with a request submitted by a non-governmental international organisation, that it be represented in a Conference committee, and with changes in the composition of committees.

I recommend to the Conference that the report be adopted.

The PRESIDENT – I submit the third report of the Selection Committee to the Conference for discussion. If there are no objections, I take it that the report is adopted.

(The report is adopted.)

PROGRAMME AND BUDGET PROPOSALS AND OTHER FINANCIAL QUESTIONS: PRELIMINARY DISCUSSION

The PRESIDENT – We shall now take up the second item on our agenda. In accordance with article 11*bis* of the Standing Orders of the Conference, we shall begin our preliminary discussion on the programme and budget proposals for the period 1990-91, and other financial questions.

Mr. VON HOLTEN (Employers' delegate, Sweden) – Taking the floor for the first time, I would like to join with the Swedish Employers' delegation in congratulating you upon your election as President of this Session of the Conference. I am sure you will steer the deliberations with success.

Let me say first that the Employers' group as a whole, at least all those to whom I have spoken, support the proposals which are now before the Finance Committee and this session of the Conference. The total amount of expenditure involved – which is more of immediate concern to the governments than to employers and workers, although as taxpayers it is they who ultimately have to come up with the money – was accepted by the Governing Body without any reservation. Compared to the original 1988-89 budget, the programme and budget proposals for the next biennium contains a programme increase of only 0.32 per cent. If you discount the restored loan annuities on our building, for which the Swiss Government had generously granted a respite in respect of the current financial period, you arrive in fact at a decrease for all other items of Part I of 1.84 per cent. Evidently, we do not measure productivity and it is reasonable to expect that gains here will make up for this decrease or most of it.

Part III, that is the Working Capital Fund, is as you see budgeted at zero. We all remember the considerable financial difficulties experienced by the ILO in 1986, 1987 and 1988 which were caused by the fluctuation of the dollar, on the one hand, and the erratic behaviour of a number of our contributors including the largest contributor, on the other. The culmination came last year when the Conference had to vote extra assessments for 1989 of about $32.3 million. That the amount was not twice as high was due to some extraordinary measures taken including a 17 million cut of the expenditure approved for 1986-87, and a reduction by almost 50 per cent – 45.8 per cent to be exact – of the Working Capital Fund, into which you would otherwise have had to pay this year not $8,059,627 but $25,059,627.

In November last year, the Governing Body also applied a cut to the expenditure approved for the current biennium. This time the cut was $13 million. It may be wondered why in times such as this it was agreed to halve the Working Capital Fund. The Employers were certainly most reluctant to do so but we went along with this step because of two very important innovations in our financial mechanism.

The first innovation is the so-called incentive scheme adopted by the Conference last year; the second is the system of Swiss franc assessments combined with forward purchasing of dollar requirements which is proposed to you this year. Both innovations are intended on a trial basis. What we expect from them, and we fervently hope that this will be proved by the experience we gain, is that there will not be any need for extra assessments in the future in order to cope with negative effects of exchange rate fluctuations. We evidently also hope – but this may be optimistic – that the incentives scheme will cause member States, who in the past have not paid their contributions on time, to do so in the future. In one respect, however, the incentive scheme will without any doubt improve the present state of affairs. Before, whenever there was a budgetary deficit due to the late payment or non-payment of contributions by some member States, this deficit was assessed on all States, including those who had fulfilled their obligations. With the incentive scheme, those States who fulfil their constitutional obligations will receive some compensation for having to make up for the default of others.

The Swiss franc assessment system will, if adopted, start to operate as of 1990. There is still a risk that this year will end with a deficit to be assessed together with the contributions for 1991. What happens will depend entirely on the extent to which States, who have not yet paid their contributions for this year and earlier years, will do so before we enter into the next biennium. From Provisional Record No. 2 you will see that out of the $195.6 million which the ILO should have received on 1 January, $110.6 million (57 per cent) still remained outstanding on 26 May. Probably since then, more money has poured in. It would be very nice if it continues to do so and at a rapidly accelerating rate.

Turning away now from the financial aspects of the proposals before the Committee, I wish to add a few words about the Employers' view the programme proposed for 1990-91. With the constraints surrounding its elaboration, we think that the result is balanced and fair. We endorse the emphasis on the four priority areas as outlined by the Director-General in his preface to the budget document, in particular as regards the follow-up of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment of November 1987, where the ILO has a key role to play in smoothing the path of structural adjustment by overcoming vested interests and promoting consensus solutions. We find that the new ideas begin to be reflected in some of the activities and we also see some concentration of efforts. The 1990-91 programme makes the transition from Mr. Blanchard's administration to that of Mr. Hansenne, who we hope will continue and further develop what has thus been started.

Last Friday, the Labour Minister of New Zealand addressed the Conference on the need for a reform of the ILO. No doubt, other speakers in the general discussion will touch on the same subject. As regards the programme and budget, I should like to recall that over a number of years the Employers' members of the Governing Body have been advocating an overhaul of the Office structure, now about 25 years old, combined with a review of the Staff Regulations and personnel policies. I refer, inter alia, to paragraph 7 of Annex II to Report II. What we would like to see essentially is less compartmentalisation and more integration perhaps – but this is only a suggestion – by organising technical departments into large blocks, under a small number of top line managers reporting to the Director-General and with a lot of mobility and flexibility within its blocks. As we believe that Mr. Hansenne is already considering these matters, we hope that he would not mind the Employers taking an interest in them as well.

Original – German: Mr. MUHR (Workers' delegate, Federal Republic of Germany) – It is the task of this plenary meeting to discuss the draft programme and budget 1990-91 and to refer them to the Finance Committee of the Conference. The Finance Committee will then submit the proposals they consider relevant. I should like to make one or two remarks now on the assumption that this afternoon, during the discussions in the Finance Committee, the Workers will have a further opportunity to express their views.

Making an overall assessment of the draft programme and budget that has been submitted, I should just like to make one or two general comments on various items in the programme and also on the resulting level of the budget. I must say that these do not satisfy the Workers' group in any way. Even if we leave aside the Working Capital Fund, there is a drop, in real terms, compared with the previous budgetary period. If the budget is compared with the biennium budgets of say ten years ago, it will be seen that, over this long period, we now have a drop in real terms in the level of the programme and budget.

I hardly need to emphasise here that, in our opinion, this is simply not equal to the growing tasks before our Organisation.

Furthermore, the Workers' representatives, whether in the Finance Committee or on the Governing Body, have shown much understanding for the problems of many governments. It is for this reason that we are combining our approval of this budget with the hope that the governments that could have paid a larger contribution might take this into account when making their voluntary contributions. I am thinking in particular of technical co-operation; and I hardly have to emphasise how great the need is for such programmes in our Organisation and how necessary it is to do more in terms of technical co-operation than ever before.

This is the first time in years that the budget has been unanimously approved. This once again demonstrates the willingness of all the participants – including the government representatives – to consolidate the aims of our Organisation and to work together towards attaining the objectives set. May I express the hope that this unanimous approval in the Governing Body will be a good omen for the discussion of the Programme and Budget in the Finance Committee and later on in the plenary as well. This is also the first time in a number of years that the major contributors have approved the budget and have not raised too many problems in its discussion. It is my hope therefore that this will also have an impact upon the discussions here at this Conference.

Finally, I should like to make one or two comments on the proposal to establish the budget in Swiss francs and adopt a system of Swiss franc assessments combined with forward purchasing of the biennium's dollar requirements. The Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee approved this idea a number of years ago and we are delighted, therefore, that it has been proposed again at this session of the Conference. We hope that it will be approved by the Conference, especially in the light of previous positive discussions on this issue. Once and for all, then, we would be free of the burden we have shouldered in recent years. Although there have been surplus, in particular when the dollar was strong, there have also been deficits running as high as several million dollars, which governments have had to cover, even with a delay of one or two years. We could avoid this in the future if the Conference agrees to express the budget in Swiss francs.

I would like therefore to propose that you support this proposal in the Finance Committee and in plenary.

In conclusion, I wish like Mr. von Holten, to make an appeal for the timely payment of contributions.

This is an opportune moment for such an appeal since there are a number of ministers present who can be of assistance in such matters. At the end of May, the three major contributors were still some $100 million in arrears. No organisation can work satisfactorily in such circumstances. To be effective in medium- and long-term planning, the Organisation must know what funds it can expect, and have them available on time. My cordial request to you, therefore, is that you ensure that contributions are paid punctually. Indeed, a large number of countries have been very diligent in this regard. But we need the co-operation of all member States.

The PRESIDENT – The third item on our agenda is the discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General.

Original – Arabic: Shaikh K. AL-KHALIFA (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Bahrain) – In the Name of God, the Merciful and Compassionate! It is my pleasure on my own behalf and on behalf of the delegation of the State of Bahrain to express our most sincere congratulations on your election as President of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. I should like to wish you every success in the conduct of the work of this session and to hope that the Conference will achieve its objectives.

It is also my pleasure to congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne, who has just taken on his functions as Director-General of the International Labour Office, and wish him every success. On this occasion, I should also like to pay tribute to the praiseworthy and constructive efforts exerted by Mr. Francis Blanchard in the ILO over the period of his mandate.

The basic theme of the Report of the Director-General relates to the necessary and vital link between economic recovery and social development during the reconstruction of national economies, so as to cope with the needs of the decade of the nineties. On the basis of this reality, we should like to reaffirm a certain number of important questions relating to the developing countries.

First of all, the ILO has a major responsibility, in the preparations for the United Nations Fourth Development Decade covering the 1990s, to reaffirm the complementary of economic and social development and the principle that "human beings are both the means and the end of economic development."

Secondly, national development planning operations should aim to strengthen both the social content of economic projects and the economic content of social projects so that they should all contribute to the sum total of global development. There is no doubt that the possibilities for independent, sustained, national development will remain limited as long as they are not considered an essential element in the world development process. The interdependence of development operations at the international level therefore requires a common approach in solving the debt problem of the developing countries, with their worsening exchange rates, higher interest rates, new trade barriers and depletion of capital, as well as the other problems common to countries of North and South.

Thirdly, the introduction of essential changes in the economic structure of developing countries to cope with the needs of the nineties and bring about economic recovery should be linked to a search for the growth necessary for employment creation and the fight against poverty. These measures should be acceptable to the population as having the fairness required for improving the living conditions of workers. Although most developing countries have signed agreements with the IMF so as to bring about structural adjustment at the national level, experience has shown that there are countless differences between one country to another as regards the ability of each country to implement economic reforms. As a result, we must stress the importance of avoiding ready-made solutions or over-rigid guiding principles which make the poor poorer and increase their share of suffering. The improvement of the balance of payments should not be considered an aim in itself but as a means of helping to achieve development objectives at a more general level, while having recourse to the best possible alternative solutions at the production and human levels in order to improve the balance of payments through development.

Fourthly, investment in traditional agriculture, small enterprises and non-agricultural rural activities, along with an adequate price policy and the repeal of laws and regulations which hinder agricultural initiative, will contribute to reviving the economy and creating jobs in the developing countries. In most of these countries, industrialisation policy should concentrate on the processing industries, which are labour-intensive, and on local commodities industries, which aim at bringing about rapid growth in exports. National development programmes should also include projects of a job-creating nature, so as to strengthen the abilities of the developing countries to plan and implement their projects. These projects should, moreover, be pursued with clarity of purpose, taking into account the vital social needs of the disadvantaged strata of the population.

Fifthly, a proper salary policy should be established to motivate workers to participate in the economic recovery process by linking salaries with production. Suitable salary structures should also be retained, with differentials neither too great nor too small, which might have negative effects on the economic recovery policy. Training and retraining programmes should be a vital element in the re-allocation of manpower. There should be more attention paid to training those entering the labour market and workers should be retrained in the workplace in order to reduce the numbers of dismissals.

Sixthly, we support the proposal of the Director-General to appeal to member countries of the United Nations and the specialised agencies to deploy their efforts to set up a variety of projects aimed at creating or renewing infrastructures, particularly relating to the protection of the environment. The financing of this programme could be brought about by means of savings realised in disarmament measures.

The Director-General's Report includes an Appendix relating to the situation of Arab workers in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories. I am sure that the Conference will denounce the non-application by the Israeli occupation authorities of resolutions IX (1974) and II (1980) adopted by the International Labour Conference relating to the violation of the rights of freedom of association and the effects of Israeli settlements in Palestine and the other Arab occupied territories on the situation of Arab workers. I am also sure that the Conference will denounce the policies and practices of the Israeli occupation authorities with the exile of trade unionists, arbitrary arrests, destruction of houses and factories, dismissal of Arab workers and deprivation of their fundamental rights and freedoms, notably their right to work, as well as other economic and social rights. We hope the Conference will approve the setting up of a special committee at its next session, so as to study the annual reports submitted by the Director-General to the Conference, reports on the situation of workers and employers in Palestine and the other Arab occupied territories and programmes and technical assistance which could be provided for them. Such a committee could present a report on the result of its work to the Conference.

I hope that you will have full success in your work. May the peace, compassion and grace of God be with you.

Original - Spanish: Mr. REYES (Workers' delegate, Bolivia) - First of all, I would like to congratulate Mr. Nkomo on his election as President of the 76th Session of the Conference, wishing him full success in guiding this assembly. I cannot fail to mention the 70th anniversary of the inception of the ILO, which over the years has become the most representative institution as regards relations between workers, employers and governments of the world.

The main topic before this assembly is that set out in the Report of the Director-General; in this context it is extremely important to take up the problem of indigenous peoples, dealt with by the Indigenous and Tribal Population Convention, 1957 (No. 107). The fact that the ILO has decided to face this problem will touch governments to the core, including ours, when it comes to defending and preserving these peoples or ethnic groups, with full respect for their social and cultural life, since, in a manner of speaking, this means preserving humanity for these peoples live in the forests and jungles that are the lungs on which the life of mankind depends, and our ruthless plundering jeopardises the world ecology, seriously damaging flora and fauna. Governments will have to adopt protective measures in favour of indigenous peoples, which are now becoming extinct themselves because of the greedy advance of enterprises, largely financed by transnational capital which exploit natural resources; here the indigenous peoples are thwarted by uncontrolled development. Scientific progress brought with it risks, not only in the workplace but also in the environment. The use of chemical substances in industry has resulted in unhealthy and hazardous conditions. In backward countries such as ours, the competent authorities are not in a position to carry out studies that would make it possible to control all of the high risk situations to which workers are exposed with these contaminating materials; also, as a result of the dumping of chemical wastes into rivers and lakes, the level of contamination is increased, seriously endangering conservation of the ecology.

The Director-General's Report gives an account of the work that has been done in member States. We request understanding in the form of assistance for our country, particularly as regards professional training and workers' education, as well as technical advice, research and study or teaching materials. We would certainly highly appreciate such assistance, which will enable the workers to become involved in improving relations between employers and workers.

Another topic which we will be dealing with here is night work of women. We feel that new standards and amendments are necessary to protect women, not so much in order to make standards more flexible but rather to repair an error in their application to women, since it unbalances their social and family life as they become just another cog in the wheel of capitalist exploitation; therefore, the Workers' group has submitted specific proposals.

Throughout its existence ILO has pursued universally recognised objectives. However, in the last few decades the denunciation of violations or absence of freedom of association has received the attention of the machinery of the ILO. It will be mentioned again today. Pinochet's dictatorship, just as in its best days, completely ignores the existence of the Single Confederation of Workers (CUT) and its main leaders are in detention.

In Colombia state terrorism has become institutionalised and has cost thousands of lives among the workers, trade union leaders and politicians. Apartheid, the shame of humanity, remains in force in racist South Africa. Unfortunately, there are tolerant governments that refuse to bring effective pressure to bear on the Government of Pretoria. This assembly will have to take new measures aimed at eliminating apartheid.

From 1980 to 1982 we had to deal with a military dictatorship which deprived us of all our freedoms, but the people overcame it and we now have a constitutional Government. However, we cannot say that constitutional guarantees of freedom of association are fully respected. The principle of trade union immunity enshrined in the political Constitution of the State is infringed by proceedings in the ordinary courts which sometimes result in the worker's dismissal. In the last four years, the use of force was also resorted to by means of the state of emergency. Our Government continues to prohibit freedom of association for public officials, refusing to ratify the ILO instrument on this subject.

However, the greatest suffering inflicted on the workers and people of Bolivia is caused by the implementation of an aggressive social and economic policy inspired by utter liberalism with the advice of North American technicians. Unemployment has reached record figures - more than 20 per cent out of an active population of 2 million. As of August 1985 several mines and textile factories were closed. Last April, unemployed miners held a hunger strike, claiming unpaid social benefits, and finally crucified themselves on the masts of the University of La Paz. We have never in our history seen such dramatic and moving scenes which are an open condemnation of a genocidal character of the Government's social policy. Malnutrition in children and youth has grown as well as delinquency. More than a million children of school age do not attend school. In practice, wages have been frozen with the International Monetary Fund (IMF) strictly supervising this government policy. The national minimum wage which is 60 bolivianos, equivalent to $25, is supported by private employers because this means they do not have to raise salaries. Thus, there is no tripartite approach to wage matters.

Last May, presidential elections were held in Bolivia, and as you know the rightist candidates did obtain the relative majority. It is a complex process, hard to explain, but we cannot fail to mention the manipulation of public opinion through a very expensive advertising campaign. In addition, every argument was used to sow fear of returning inflation, so that the population was persuaded to vote for a deceptive and precarious economic stability. We are justified in saying that the Government finances its economic plans out of laundered dollars from the drug trade.

As a result of these elections, it is clear that the next four years of rightist government will continue to exacerbate the economic and social crisis; therefore, the workers grouped together in the Bolivian Confederation of Workers have only one option – to intensify their struggle in defence of their rights.

Foreign debt is the main problem facing all Third World countries. It is the principal factor hindering economic development and worsening our dependency. The IMF imposes policies of monetary stabilisation which inevitably lead to economic recession in favour of repayment of the foreign debt to international banks. The debt is endless. We will never be able to pay it off. We endorse the words of Mr. Nkomo, who said that “if the governments of the world do not now begin to seriously focus on these pressing socio-economic problems, then I am afraid that we have to brace ourselves for a disaster of untold proportions”. There are no more apt words than those of the President of our Conference. And if we add to this the fact that interest rates have been raised several times according to the needs of the creditors, we will continue becoming indebted in order to pay the old debt itself. The ILO is the best forum, because of its composition, to support the cause of millions of people affected by debt. The world trade union movement, over and above its international affiliations, should also unite in assuming responsibility for reaching a genuine solution.

No one doubts that drug traffic is a scourge of mankind. We have to fight in at the source but also where it is consumed. The United States Government uses this problem as an opportunity to increase its political and, in some cases, military interference aimed at forcibly eradicating coca cultivation, without taking into account the economic and social problems of thousands of peasant families.

The international situation is a serious concern. The case of Panama is one serious problem. The Bush Administration can no longer deny that it used millions of dollars to overthrow a legitimate government, and now that those plans have failed there is talk of direct intervention. To us this means disregarding the Torrijos-Carter Treaty on the final transference of the Canal sovereignty to Panama. Our solidarity is with Panama, as well as with Nicaragua and El Salvador, in supporting of political solutions to the conflict.

We also share the concern of workers in industrialised countries who are threatened by contamination of the environment. We know that new risks have emerged as regards safety at work. However, humanity has a common concern and that it world peace. It is essential that we destroy or eliminate nuclear arsenals to establish a lasting peace and that humanity's survival be secured. The ILO, with the moral and social strength available to it, must contribute to achieving this greatest wish of mankind.

The PRESIDENT – Before I give the floor to Mr. Ganjei, Senior Deputy Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Islamic Republic of Iran, I take this opportunity to convey to his Government our condolences over the death of Iman Khomeini.

Original – Farsi: Mr. GANJEI (Senior Deputy Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Islamic Republic of Iran) – In the name of Allah, the Merciful, the Compassionate, from whom we seek assistance “... Might belongeth to Allah and to His Messenger and to the believers; but the hypocrites know not” (Koran).

The 76th Session of the International Labour Conference is being held at a time when the great leader of the Islamic world, who had played the greatest role for man's liberation in contemporary history, has bade farewell to the world of mortals to join his holy forefathers.

Imam Khomeini, the unique herald of the liberation of mankind, rather than being merely the founder of the Islamic Republic of Iran, was the forerunner for the extrication of man from servitude to individuals and powers; the great leader of the contemporary world whose unbending beliefs and deeds set clear examples for the guidance of all peoples to expel from their mentality the thought of yielding to servitude, before fighting neo-slavery, with devotion and obedience only to the Creator, instead of giving up to the existing situation and bowing to the reign of domination ruling over the world.

I wish to extend my gratitude to all the countries who have declared public mournings and to those who have expressed their sympathy upon the irreparable loss of so great a man. I wish also to extend my reciprocal condolences to all those who respect the liberty of mankind.

The Director-General's Report puts forward an interesting discussion; namely, employment, recovery, grounds for the emergence of the existing situation, and ways of overcoming crisis. I should like to commend Mr. Francis Blanchard, and those who have assisted him in the preparation of his Report, for it seems an encouraging beginning to approach what the Islamic Republic of Iran has continually been making references to.

Comments contained in speeches made by the Islamic Republic of Iran's delegations at the International Labour Conference ever since the victory of the Islamic Revolution, have repeatedly emphasised that the present organism of the world order, both in economic and political spheres, is an inhumane structure that has to be changed.

The Director-General admits the existing deficiencies in his Report, but has failed to go beyond dispensing reformistic prescriptions the implementation of which is almost impossible. Nevertheless, the necessary changes we had proposed have still not been admitted.

Mr. Blanchard has reaffirmed in the last report of the long period of his directorship at the International Labour Organisation, that “the net flow of capital from South to North continues”, and that recovery in the industrialised countries has been gained at the price of intensified poverty in the held-back countries, often called the "developing" countries, by way of courtesy.

Discussing recovery and employment issues will not be conducive to positive consequences when the motives behind the measures adopted by the international decision-makers are not taken into consideration. Emphasis upon the Marshall Plan or the Bretton Woods Agreement as well as the consequent measures can be effective only when the nature of the subject is made known.

The Bretton Woods Conference had been propagated as a humane gathering but in reality it was not so. It was supposed to impose an order upon the world that would establish a new sovereignty over the world where rulers would stay behind the scenes but have their intentions, particularly their economic intentions, implemented as proportionate to the value of their possessions. Such an order, though masked with a benevolently humanistic face, was purported to remain as a device to guarantee the surplus commodities of the West to be purchased, and a serious hindrance in the way of the Third World countries to work out their genuine economic objectives.

Deadlocks, crises, imbalances for existing economic world order have, notwithstanding, been the indispensable outcome of the decisions adopted pursuant to the Second World War.

The panis of 1989, as a symptom of an imminent decay, could have alarmed the industrialised world into observing its gloomy destiny and trying to seek remedies. That death-fever, followed by a dollar game on the surface, was then reduced with the sedative provided by the US Federal Reserve, but the crisis itself still remains incurable. The economic demolition is creeping towards the West. The West is beginning to realise the certainty of a death which itself was caused through a plunderous life. The Third World has realised that it is being robbed and the industrialised world has become aware of such realisation.

The industrialised world has sensed that industry in the industrialised world would cease running if the Third World embarked on an uprising, thus think-tanks of the industrialised world are endeavouring to force the Third World nations to presume that it is they who shall suffer from a fatal jeopardy to the wealth of the industrialised world. The Third World is now at the stage of verifying that fallacy, but shall definitely come to the realisation that there is nothing more to lose as long as no prospects for common interest nor any grounds for co-operation with the West exist.

Discussion on recovery and employment cannot be limited to only reducing the rate of unemployment, night work, hazards of chemicals, minorities, associations, or increasing the value-added through exploitation.

The price of gold was $58.16 an ounce in 1972 and $444.50 in 1987. In contrast, the price of Caribbean sugar was $7.27 a pound in 1972 and $6.76 in 1987. This comparison shows that the dollar buys sugar at a price ten times less than what it should be, taking the 1972 price as a base. That is to say that the dollar has plundered the commodity-exporting countries and has thus brought them to the verge of bankruptcy just for the sake of preserving its own domination.

The Director-General has rightfully expressed concern about employment prospects but has gone astray where he still keeps in view the perpetuation of the corrupt existing rule of domination over the world.

There remains no alternative for the held-back nations who are at the same time the sellers of raw materials, but to decisively take a stand, no alternative either for the industrialised countries except to dispense with the presently self-ascribed prerogatives. The more the existing situation is prolonged, the more serious and harsher the confrontations will become. The only solution for the elimination of the economic difficulties of the held-back nations is to stop being subjected to the dominating world order. We take pride in that the Islamic Republic of Iran has proved successful in this challenge as a pioneer.

To alleviate the difficulties inherited from the ex-regime which was dependent upon world arrogance the Islamic Republic of Iran has, following comprehensive studies, taken great measures appropriate to national interests. To cite a few examples, the Islamic Republic of Iran has embarked on self-employment programmes as a reasonable solution to the unemployment problem; individual self-employment has been encouraged in the form of industrial trades, and collective self-employment in the form of co-operatives. Fortunately, both have met with popular acceptance, particularly the co-operative sector which is recognised also by the Constitution as a major economic sector.

Some 2,350 production and services co-operatives have been established during the past ten years from among the jobless, and have become operational with public support, with a range of membership of between seven to 500 people.

During the same period 2,489 consumption co-operatives have also been formed in various enterprises to preserve the purchasing power of their personnel. Such co-operatives have had a growth of 254 per cent in number, as compared to their number throughout the period before the revolution.

So far 1,200 Islamic Labour Councils have been established in large enterprises to encourage the participation of the workforce in production as well as in supervision over the good observance of labour laws.

Two thousand six hundred and forty six tripartite occupational safety and health committees have so far been formed in large industrial units, while 313 health centres have been formed for the workers in factories distant from larger cities.

To provide increased welfare to female workers, 196 crèches have been established and well equipped in large work centres.

During the same period, 2,081 housing co-operatives have also been formed for the workers, thus raising the number of the same co-operatives by 726 per cent as compared to the period before the victory of the Islamic Revolution. Public assistance given to these co-operatives such as provision of land, bank loans, design and materials, has made it possible for their members to become the owners of a minimum housing area of 120 square metres each.

These achievements have been made at a time when, following the victory of the Islamic Revolution, since the underlying principle for our foreign policy was aimed at repudiating the domination of both East and West, world arrogance was fully mobilised to obstruct all our ways.

Rulers of Washington blocked thousands of millions of dollars of our assets. Strict and extensive political and economic bans were imposed upon us.

International Imperialism imposed an all-out war against us along more than 1,000 kilometres of our borders.

As a result of plots and instigations of the West and lackeys of world arrogance, oil prices were cut down to a level even lower than the finished price.

Our people, farms and factories were bombarded with chemical and lethal gases.

In spite of all the hardships and obstructions that were put in the way of the internationalisation of the Islamic Revolution, we persist all the more decisively with our principles and aspirations.

We believe that the usurping Zionist regime must be uprooted, and the land of Palestine must be held by the Palestinians; that Africa must be governed by its indigenous peoples, and the advocates of apartheid must be expelled from Africa; that raw materials must be priced on the world markets by their producers; that an end must be made to the monopolisation of technology and to its being used by industrialised countries, for political purposes; that industrialised countries must restore the rights of the Third World countries before the emergence of a fatal economic crisis in the world would make it too late; that an international committee must control and supervise the dollar since it has become the instrument for international transactions.

We advise the arrogant rulers dominating the world, in this the 70th year since the beginning of work at the International Labour Organisation, that, if serious attention is not paid to the poverty, indebtedness, hunger, and oppression of the Third World countries, then the only way to liberation from the existing world tensions would be a determined and all-out confrontation against the structures of the order imposed upon the world through the Marshall Plan and the Bretton Woods Conference. Success in this path is also guaranteed, since the Third World is further fathoming out the truth and following the path of our great Imam.

Peace be upon us and the true followers of Allah.

Original – Spanish: Mr. REDONDO URBIETA (Workers' delegate, Spain) – Mr. President, I wish to congratulate you on your election to the post of President of the 76th Session of The International Labour Conference and I shall start by mentioning the Report of the Director-General, to whom I wish the greatest possible success in his work directing the International Labour office.

The Director-General mentions a question which is undoubtedly of the greatest importance and which we, the trade unions, have been insisting on for years – that economic growth is an essential prerequisite, although it is not sufficient in itself, to solve the serious problem of unemployment which affects, and in some cases very seriously, a great number of countries. In my country it is definitely the most pressing question before us.

I shall now turn to a quick description of the present economic and social situation in my country. I would like to start by saying that the capacity to respond shown by the men and women in the workers' world has been remarkable. It is how we have been able to carry out the greatest mobilisations in our recent history, over the last few months.

The negative side is our Government's lack of sensitivity in the social field. Our Government is acting under the impulse of principles of economic neo-liberalism and has turned a deaf ear to the clamour of the people, failing to take into account aspects like unemployment, which makes Spain, where more than 18 per cent of the active population is unemployed, the country with the highest rate of unemployment in the OECD. Our spending on social protection as a percentage of GNP, which has practically stagnated since 1982, is ten points below the average of the Economic Community. Only 30.5 per cent of all the unemployed receive any unemployment benefits, and the share of salary income in the overall distribution of income has dropped 3.3 points in the last six years. In 1988, with the growth of employment and certain growth in individual purchasing power, salary income lost several tenths of points in gross national product.

The visible imbalance between economic development and the social situation led to the general strike on 14 December 1988 in which eight million workers participated

There were many reasons for this spectacular social protest, which completely paralysed activity throughout the country.

First of all, the intense and dangerous concentration of wealth and income which has taken place during the last few years. The Commission itself has stated that Spain is the tenth country on the list of community members as regards the distribution of income.

Furthermore, we have a system of social protection which is not only notoriously less effective than those of most European countries, but which in fact, does not even offer the cover which a social State should offer particularly in periods of crisis. As has already been clearly stated in a very relevant fashion before this Conference, in 1985 legislative reforms took place which cut down initial payments and made access to benefits even more difficult. Even today, in spite of repeated promises over the past six years, we still do not have a law on emergency pensions to provide some income to people who are outside the general tax system.

Another fundamental aspect causing the mobilisation was the overall rejection of "social dumping" as a way of enhancing competition in our industry and services sectors. It is very striking that both the Government and the employers continue to encourage a greater precariousness in employment when a quarter of the salary workers in my country are already being hired under temporary contracts, in many cases financed by public funds.

The social dumping was most manifest in the case of the so-called "integration contract for young people" which resulted in a further distortion of the work market without creating any jobs, discriminating negatively against young people, who are not given any training, in conditions totally unfitting to modern society.

Among the demands of 14 December, there was the explicit rejection of policies to weaken the trade union movement such as the case of pensioners, for whom an agreement, which was totally damaging to them, was signed last year with an organisation which is not a trade union and which does not legally represent retired people at all. I wish to energetically protest these facts. Another aspect that I would like to highlight is the growing hostility which affects public undertakings these days, and in connection with which there has been a gross attempt at manipulation to imply the guilt of the trade unions. In this connection, we must say that there have been strikes in the public sector because authorities have set ceilings on salaries, in some cases explicitly and in others covertly, which can simply not be borne by workers who see the growth in other types of income, for example income arising from speculation over which there is no control.

However, the die-hard resistance of certain public undertakings which fail to raise salaries sufficiently to offset inflation, and which flatly refuse to accept other claims, lead us to believe that there is a deliberate attempt to create conflicts which will later serve as a pretext to impose further restrictions on the right to strike.

I said "further" restriction because the abusive reservations placed by decree on certain minimum services, and which limit the constitutional right to strike, has been an ongoing practice of the Spanish Government.

For all these reasons, in taking stock of the year's events in the world of labour in Spain, certain aspects must be highlighted which are closely linked to the essential principles guiding this international organisation.

In this respect, we should like to recall that the full right of public sector employees to bargain collectively has still not been recognised.

We must also refer to infringements on the negotiating autonomy of collective bargaining through interference by public powers in some private sector, where it was not possible to implement an agreement arrived at among all the parties, and particularly in the case of the public sector, where there is constant intervention to distort collective bargaining.

We are concerned that the policy of concertation is being destroyed through the government's and the employers' systematic rejection of trade union proposals since every time they come to the negotiation table it is more with the intention of obtaining the endorsement of previously established decision than with any intention of genuinely bargaining.

Furthermore, it is not right that civil servants, pensioners and those who collect unemployment benefits should be discriminated against simply because their level of income is established by the Government in a unilateral and unfair manner as compared with the private sector.

We believe that a feeling of social solidarity should lead to a reconsideration of the refusal to establish a minimum family salary to combat poverty, since such a salary exists in many European countries, and even in some autonomous communities in my own country.

We should also like to point out the deterioration of certain particularly relevant public services such as health, education and transport, as well as the absence of any genuine social housing and rent policy which leads to particularly dire consequences for the least advantaged sectors of the population.

Lastly, I would like to mention the principle of international solidarity, which is one of the ILO's cornerstones, with reference to two important issues in particular.

The first is the need for consistency between what is said here concerning the struggle against racism and what is later done in actual fact.

At its meeting last year, this Conference urged the Committee on Action against Apartheid to continue to monitor with renewed determination the action taken against apartheid. And yet some members of this international Organisation are not acting consistently when it comes to taking genuine measures to combat the scourge of racism.

We note that Spanish imports of coal from South Africa have grown spectacularly in the last few years, reaching in 1988 a level seven times that of 1982, as reported by the ICFTU. This is all the more serious in the light of the fact that the Spanish Government is importing coal on a massive scale while most members of the community are doing the opposite.

In the name of the Spanish trade unions, we wish to express our total repudiation of this practice and to urge drastic reductions of these imports.

The second issue concerns the foreign debt, which affects our brothers and sisters in many countries, particularly in Latin America, as highlighted most dramatically by the recent events in Caracas and Rosario, Argentina.

In addition to expressing once again Spanish trade union solidarity with the workers of those countries, who are the prime victims of a debt burden for which they bear no responsibility, I should like to call for urgent solutions under the slogan of the ICFTU, namely, "first the people, then the debt".

We welcome recent initiatives such as that of the President of France concerning IMF special drawing rights and the Japanese proposal to increase its contribution to that body and to the World Bank. A few days ago in Madrid, we heard that the European Community plans to adopt a joint position, which is most urgently needed, on this very serious question.

In the little time remaining, I should like to conclude by saying that, as the trade unions have repeatedly insisted, it is now time to put words into action, and the action required is a substantial reduction or total cancellation of a debt which clearly cannot be borne by these countries.

Original - Arabic: Mr. AL-ANSARI (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Qatar) - In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. It is my pleasure to address to you, Mr. President, on behalf of the delegation of Qatar and on my own behalf, my congratulations on your election to the presidency of this session of the International Labour Conference. We are convinced that your experience, your wisdom and your skill will make a great contribution to the success of our Conference and enable us to reach the desired results.

I should also like to take this opportunity to express my congratulations to Mr. Michel Hansenne, the new Director-General of the ILO, on his election to this high post and to wish him every success in discharging his important mandate. We hope that the ILO will gain even further momentum and we are confident that Mr. Hansenne will prove as skilful as his predecessor.

Mr. Francis Blanchard leaves us with an excellent track record owing to the dedicated efforts he has exerted to strengthen the role of the Organisation and to enhance its prestige. We should like to pay tribute to these efforts as well as to wish him every success and happiness in the future.

The Report of the Director-General is the first report submitted to the Conference. It generates optimism because it shows a will to overcome the economic crisis affecting most countries throughout the world and to work actively for the development and progress of all people. To reiterate our commitment to that objective is the best method of celebrating in a practical manner the ILO's 70th anniversary. This illustrious Organisation is a living example of international efforts to attain the objectives to which all peoples aspire, that is, development, security, progress and peace.

In the course of its long history, the ILO has made our peoples aware of the importance of its fruitful activities, such as technical co-operation programmes, regional projects and the elaboration of international labour standards.

The ILO has always been able to identify genuine changes and serious problems and to design scientific methods and pragmatic programmes to solve them. We are convinced that the Organisation, with the help of God, will be able to keep pace with the radical transformations taking place in the world, which is ever-changing, as so aptly pointed out by the Director-General. Technology is developing very quickly and it is extremely difficult for countries to keep up with this evolution. In developing countries in particular, conditions must improve, with the assistance of the ILO, so as to make it possible for them to contribute to and derive benefits from, the development of technology.

The central topic of the Director-General's Report is the means of promoting economic growth and social progress over the coming decade. Within that framework, and with a view to achieving those objectives, the Report asserts that, in today's context, development and progress cannot take place unless there is genuine co-operation amongst the developing and developed countries. It seems clear to us that the efforts exerted by the developing countries in order to promote development are hampered by the overwhelming debt burden, which also prevents them from participating in technological development and has vast and dire consequences on the economic relations among States. The Report of the Director-General quotes, for example, certain debt-servicing figures which go beyond 40 per cent of the export incomes of certain countries. The external debt is thus absorbing all the fruits of the efforts of these countries to improve their situation. This exacerbates poverty in these countries and exposes them to economic and social crises.

Given this dramatic and very dangerous situation, we have to bear in mind that many of these countries, which are staggering under the burden of their debt and struggling to promote progress for their peoples, have for many years lived under the system of colonisation. This system has exhausted their resources and depleted their riches, leaving them with a heritage of poverty and underdevelopment to cope with in addition to the economic crises.

The Report also highlights the social consequences of structural adjustment and proposes practical methods to achieve economic development, a fundamental prerequisite to solving social problems.

The true value of national resources should not be measured by their volume but rather by the extent to which they facilitate solutions to social problems and ensure the provision of basic services in the areas of health, housing and education.

The provision of these basic services is a fundamental responsibility of the State, which must ensure a certain standard of living, health, and so forth.

We have to mention here that misguided patterns of consumption followed by certain developing countries have further exacerbated social problems. Today, modern products, electronic appliances and telecommunication and transport methods have become commonplace. However, they absorb scarce income which could be put to better use in development projects. This is why States have to rationalise consumption, put an end to waste and strive to save and invest wisely.

Certain social problems related to food and health are very important in that they play a vital role with a direct impact on work, productivity and growth. You are undoubtedly aware that certain countries which had to curb food product subsidies were faced with exacerbated reactions, especially by low-income groups. Clearly, production and progress cannot be accomplished by a working population which is hungry or in poor health.

We agree with the Director-General's statement that agricultural production is not sufficient in itself to bring about needed development. We are, however, convinced that priority must be given to food security. Developing countries should strive to develop their abilities and their agricultural wealth so as to have better food security using their own means and resources or by favouring bilateral or regional co-operation projects.

It is clear that such an approach could not solve all the problems of development alone, for the possibilities of agricultural development are limited in certain countries. For example, problems of industrialisation and high technology, job creation and the provision of basic services, require extensive funding in addition to the technical and material support of the developed countries and the international institutions.

Poor countries should not have to rely on external solutions to their difficulties. However, it is neither logical nor ethical to allow them to be drowned in their problems, for world security should be a joint responsibility for all.

The situation in some of these countries should perhaps prompt us to review their economic and social policies in an attempt to achieve a real balance and to fill the vacuum between aims and realities, taking care not to shatter the hope of these countries, with all that that would entail.

For several years the international community has seen a progressive détente in international relations, positive efforts in view of limiting the arms race, and a tendency to settle regional conflicts peacefully. This is a cause for optimism, especially in developing countries, which have paid a high price for conflicts, both in human and in material terms.

The Middle East is a living example of the consequences of such conflicts. You are well aware that the Arab countries are from time to time victims of aggression, occupation and threats against their sovereignty and the security of their peoples. They can but mobilise their wealth and their resources to defend their territories and their peoples, whilst their greatest need is actually to mobilise all their forces for development purposes and to improve working and living conditions. How can they do this in the face of threats and aggression?

It is now clear that the so-called Middle East conflict could constitute a threat for international peace and could hamper efforts aimed at international understanding and the improvement of international relations. Everyone knows that this was basically brought about by a foreign invasion which uprooted the majority of the Arab population of Palestine and occupied it by force, seized its wealth and its resources and deprived the Palestinian people of its inherent right to independence and to the sovereignty of its homeland.

Since we are speaking in an international organisation whose mission is the defence of justice and of human rights, we must deal with the dramatic situation in Palestine, in the other occupied Arab territories and in South Africa, and with the flagrant violation of the rights of the citizens of these regions. Every morning for over a year and a half, the newspapers have quoted statistics concerning the number of Palestinians killed or wounded by the bullets of the Israeli occupying forces, the number of arrests, of bombed houses, of citizens deported to neighbouring countries and other information relating to the practices of these occupying forces who violate the most basic human principles without considering the age of children, the dignity of old people or the honour of women.

The report of the ILO mission in Palestine and in the occupied Arab territories, which is found in the Appendices of the Director-General's Report, gives us a general idea of Israeli practices in these territories and of the dramatic situation there. The report states, for example, that the Israeli authorities have already set up 243 people's camps, seized over 52 per cent of the lands of the West Bank and over 40 per cent of the Gaza Strip. There are also other examples of the detention of workers, journalists and doctors, the banishment of workers and teachers, the destruction of fruit trees and the confiscation of water sources and other oppressive practices. It is necessary to take urgent and effective measures to stop the deterioration of the economy, to free the Palestinian people from the occupier and to assure them the necessary support.

We should like to express our thanks to the ILO for the aid it intends to provide to the workers of the occupied Arab territories. However, we hope that the ILO will take a more serious and positive position with regard to the occupying authorities with a view to enabling the Arab Palestinian people to acquire the national rights as expressed by the Palestine Liberation Organisation, which is leading the combat and which is their sole legitimate representative.

We have to remember that there are other occupied Arab territories in the Syrian Golan Heights and in southern Lebanon, everybody is aware that the occupation forces in southern Lebanon are doing everything to increase the violence and force the Lebanese to kill one another in order to continue the human and material haemorrhage in these Arab country. We hope that the Arab and international efforts exerted will help our Lebanese brothers to free themselves from this dreadful situation which they have faced for over 15 years.

In conclusion, I should like to thank the Director-General for his extremely important Report which deals objectively with the basic problems of developing countries and which contains proposals and solutions to overcome these problems so as to achieve economic development and growth for member States. We would also like to express our support for the appeal made by the Director-General at the end of his Report, to organise international action for the creation or refurbishing of infrastructures and the protection of the environment, which would be carried out thanks to disarmament.

I should like to wish this session of the Conference every success and our peoples peace, progress and security.

Original – Arabic: Mr. ROUISSI (Minister of Social Affairs, Tunisia) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I should like, first of all, to extend my warmest congratulations to His Excellency, Mr. John Nkomo, on being elected President of this 76th Session of the International Labour Conference which also coincides with the 70th anniversary of our Organisation. I should also like to say what an honour it is not only for Africans but for all people throughout the Third World to see Mr. Nkomo elected. He represents a country which fought heroically against racial discrimination and for independence and human dignity.

We have great hope that the work at this Conference, under the guidance of Mr. Nkomo, will lead to resolutions and Recommendations that take into account the aspirations of the international community as a whole and the Third World countries in particular, so that there is more progress and justice on the basis of solidarity between all those striving for international peace.

One of the most vital aspects of the session is the discussion of the Director-General's Report which contains an analysis of and puts forward views on one of the most difficult problems confronting the world today: economic recovery and employment.

In choosing this theme, the Director-General made an apposite choice, as it complements the subject of human rights that we examined last year. Indeed, it enlarges upon this concept from its many standpoints, whether social, cultural, political or economic.

The Director-General's report is in line with the thoughts expressed at the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment held in November 1987. The guidelines established at this meeting, which linked conditions for development and the needs for social progress, correspond to the aspirations of our peoples and the young. We must take these aspirations into account because, otherwise, economic development not only becomes pointless but also difficult to attain.

The policies of reform that are proposed very often overlook the human dimension, as well as the social costs of economic growth; and this has created a huge divide between these policies and workers, young people and the working classes as a whole – a divide which threatens at any time to undermine social peace and political systems because there is no growth without a harnessing of energies to cope with the challenges inherent in this growth.

However, we must also realise that despite the positive aspect of these guidelines, much ground needs to be covered before we can translate them into specific policies. We must therefore pursue our thinking, carry out experiments, assess their impact and compare our experiences, so that any necessary changes in structures are in line with economic recovery and social development.

The ILO is called upon to participate fully in this effort by carrying out research and following closely experiences throughout the world and to participate in drawing up the strategy for the Fourth Development Decade whilst stressing the human and social dimension of this strategy. The Director-General's Report makes a considerable contribution to the formulation of some of the main aspects of this strategy.

Whilst paying tribute to what has been said in the Director-General's Report, I would also like to say that my country's policy as regards structural adjustment and economic development abides by the recommendations contained in this report.

Since the change on 7 November 1985, Tunisia has been striving to establish a sound political and economic structure capable of englobing the various tendencies within the political system, various development goals and economic reform programmes. With this in mind, President Zein El-Abedin Ben Ali adopted a national pact on 7 November 1988 which was drawn up by all representatives of political life, occupational organisations and associations, as well as various bodies advocating rights – such as the Tunisian League for Human Rights. This pact constitutes a sound basis for dialogue and joint work which is necessary to bring about real progress and pave the way for a pluralistic and democratic regime.

The President has also amended the basic regulations of the Social and Economic Council; its functions have been extended so that it can deal with all problems considered necessary and it now represents all the cultural and social tendencies in our country.

The President has also normalised the trade union situation. The Tunisian General Labour Union can now fulfil a role in keeping with its heritage and weighty organisation.

Last April, the extraordinary Conference of the Tunisian General Labour Union convened in a democratic atmosphere to elect its officers representing the rank and file of the Organisation.

But the Union's work of restructuration has not yet been completed. It is being carried out against a changed background, at a time when the Tunisian Confederation of Industry, Commerce and Handicrafts is also attempting to overhaul its structure, so that both organisations might be entirely independent in their work under a democratic regime based on dialogue.

Both these organisations will no doubt contribute greatly towards increasing the scope of the national pact, which is capable of covering a vast range of issues linked to economic and social development, such as strategic problems, or to programmes to improve the situation of workers: indeed we believe that development policy in general and structural problems in particular can only succeed if they are based upon a true dialogue between both sides of industry. As the Director-General has said, reform programmes must be long term and attempt to lay the foundations of a fluid economy capable of coping with domestic and external change because experience has shown that spasmodic measures taken to deal with urgent problems are only of limited usefulness if they are not part of a global economic and social development programme and take into consideration the social dimension in their attempts at reform – especially with respect to improvements in employment and the struggle against poverty.

In applying these principles, Tunisia has adopted an employment policy based on economic efficiency and the encouragement of private initiative. It has adopted legislation to promote investment in priority sectors such as agriculture, the manufacturing industry and the services sector. We have also taken steps to benefit employers which include tax relief, customs exemptions and incentives for investment in exports and employment. We have also taken measures to facilitate reabsorption of the labour force, improvements in production and the raising of occupational skills to master new technologies and increase competitiveness on international markets.

The difficulties we are all having to face, whether we are developing or industrialised countries, oblige us to strive for a propitious climate to avoid the political and social upheavals and crises threatening international peace.

If we have one comment to make on the Director-General's Report it is that, in spite of the repeated allusions to the interdependence of various factors and the various components of the world economy, as well as to the interdependence of interest between communities and countries, he did not lay enough emphasis on the need to reach solutions together, against a background of economic relations that have been totally revised.

The responsibility for development lies with each country; but we have to acknowledge that debts and protectionist measures thwart the restructuration of the economies of developing countries and put a spoke in the wheel of growth. If a solution were found to the international debt problem and the industrialised countries were to demonstrate greater comprehension, this might help to overcome the economic and social crises in developing countries and raise the growth rates in industrialised countries.

In June 1988 the President of the Tunisian Republic appealed to the leaders of the most highly industrialised countries meeting in Toronto to reduce the debt of developing countries, especially those countries attempting to introduce basic reforms into their economic structures, so that they could support the cause of development as a sign of international solidarity.

I have already mentioned the complementarity between human rights, which was a subject of the Director-General's Report at the last session of the Conference, and the subject we are examining this year, recovery and employment. At this point I am proud to mention that Tunisia has been chosen by the United Nations to house the headquarters of the Institute of Human Rights for the Arab region. And since I am on the subject of human rights I feel bound to recall the ILO's responsibility in applying resolutions concerning Palestine and the other occupied Arab countries and to refer to the suffering of the Palestinian people who are struggling for the exercise of their legitimate rights and basic freedoms, for their right to existence and to survival and to their legitimate rights and basic freedoms, for their right to existence and to survival and to their right to found an independent State.

Given the worsening situation in Palestine I should like to call upon the Conference to adopt the draft Arab resolution concerning the protection of Arab workers' and employers' rights and freedoms in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories in order to take new steps to put an end to the inhuman actions against the Palestinian people. I should also like to draw the Conference's attention to the need to apply the Declaration concerning action against apartheid and to invite the international community to take urgent steps to put an end to the suffering of the peoples of South Africa so that they may achieve self-determination.

I hope that through our discussions and our deliberations the work of this Organisation will become even more effective.

Original - German: Mr. ARBESSER-RASTBURG (Employers' delegate, Austria) - Distinguished President, first of all I should like to congratulate you most sincerely on your election and express my conviction that under your guidance it will be possible to find a solution to the difficult problems which face us at this year's session of the International Labour Conference.

Seventy years ago the dream of Albert Thomas came true and, with the Peace Treaty of Versailles, our Organisation came into existence.

It would be going beyond the confines of my statement to pay tribute to all the important stages in the development of the International Labour Organisation; but let me say a few words to express my pleasure that this Organisation is still going strong and showing evermore positive trends.

Since 1923, Austria has always attended sessions of the International Labour Conference with a full delegation and all three groups have in various spheres played a decisive role. The Austrian Employer delegate in the inter-war period was Dr. Theodor Schmidt. He belonged to the so-called Article 408 Committee which had the task of reporting to the Conference bureau whether and in what manner governments were giving effect to the provisions of Conventions they had ratified.

After the Second World War, Austria was accepted once again at the 30th Session of the International Labour Conference in 1947 and, from 24 June 1947, became a member of our Organisation. Thus, for more than 40 years, delegates of the Government, employers and workers of my country have been working in the ILO again and during this period have shown in many ways their strong commitment to our Organisation in industrial committees, at the International Labour Conference and in the Governing Body.

For instance, in 1980, Dr. Gerhard Weissenberg, Federal Minister for Social Affairs, was President of the International Labour Conference. Dr. Heribert Maier (Workers' delegate) was the Workers' Vice-President of the 73rd session of the Conference in 1987 and, in the same year, I was the Employers' Vice-President of the European Regional Conference. I am particularly pleased that, a few days ago, Dr. Heribert Maier was appointed Deputy Director-General of our Organisation. This is the first time that an Austrian has filled such an important position and I extend to him my heartiest congratulations, as well as my best wishes, for a successful term of office.

Thirty-one years ago, I took part for the first time as Austrian Employer delegate in an industrial committee and I can affirm, on the basis of my lengthy experience - in industrial committees, International Labour Conferences, and the Governing Body - that over the past few years, we have truly succeeded in concentrating our activities on the tasks for which the Organisation was first set up. I am convinced that our success could be even greater if we left all political questions to the United Nations and exclusively fulfilled our role - which is to be the world labour parliament.

The year 1989 brings not only the 70th anniversary of the oldest specialised agency of the United Nations but also a change at the top of our Organisation. At this point, I should like, on behalf of the Austrian employers, to express warm thanks to the outgoing Director-General, Francis Blanchard, for the work he carried out during the 15 years he was Director-General. He managed, even during particularly difficult years when the United States was not a member of the ILO, to ensure, with great wisdom, skill and commitment, that our Organisation kept the rank it deserved in the United Nations family. As a result, great successes were achieved in many spheres for the working population throughout the whole world.

At the same time, I take great pleasure in welcoming our new Director-General, the former Belgian Minister, Mr. Michel Hansenne. His far-sighted policies - and above all his long experience as Belgian Minister of Labour - have done much to contribute to the social development of his country. I am sure that, under his guidance, we shall, in the interest of the 150 member States and the three groups, achieve results which are equally successful.

I am therefore very optimistic about this eighth decade of our Organisation. Let us always remember that social peace is the foundation for world peace.

Original - Arabic: Mr. AL-JUMAIRY (Under-Secretary for Labour, Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs, United Arab Emirates) - In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. On behalf of the delegation of the United Arab Emirates and on my own behalf I should like to congratulate you, Sir, on being elected as President of this 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. We are convinced that with God's help and thanks to your efforts and to your wisdom the Conference will produce the best of results.

It is also my pleasure to congratulate the Vice-Presidents upon the trust that has been placed in them and wish you the best of success in your work.

I should also like to give my warm congratulations to the new Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Michel Hansenne, who has just been elected to this important post and I wish him the best of success in carrying out his important function and responsibilities.

We must recognise the very important role played by the ex-Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Francis Blanchard, throughout his terms of office. He has worked unceasingly for this Organisation and gained the esteem and respect of the international community. We wish him the very best for the future.

The Director-General, in choosing employment and economic recovery as the main topic of his Report, seeks to give a new stimulus to development and social progress over the next decade.

We applaud the fact that the Director-General bases his Report on the search for a balance between economic progress and social welfare, because any national structural adjustment policy today must highlight social welfare in view of our experience at the regional, national and international levels.

The Director-General has successfully stressed in his Report, in a very objective and scientific fashion, major problems confronting development and economic recovery throughout the world.

In order to structure an economy at the national level you have to adopt the most appropriate policies and measures to re-establish the equilibrium of the balance of payments, adjust the use of resources and devote investment to creating productive jobs while also ensuring a minimum level of social services. A number of developing countries are not able to adopt or adapt themselves to this kind of measure in view of the present trends in international economic co-operation. It is therefore essential to adopt an international policy to solve common problems which hamper economic recovery.

Such a policy should have the following objectives. First of all, we should eliminate the protectionism imposed by the industrialised countries to the detriment of products from the developing countries. Secondly, we must overcome the problem of foreign debt and in particular the interest rates on the debt, which are a threat to the Third World. The indebted countries labour to pay the interest, with no prospect of repaying the capital. This is a threat to their economies and endangers their efforts to bring about internal social and economic adjustments. Thirdly, the international terms of trade, which are always unfavourable to the developing countries, must be improved. This should reduce the burden on the countries of the South and bring about greater co-operation between the North and the South.

In the United Arab Emirates, as in other developing countries, we have suffered from the downturn in the world economy and also from the protectionist policies of the developed countries that draw on the natural resources of the developing countries. This has had a serious impact on our financial situation. We have, however, thanks to the Almighty, undertaken objective policies to face up to the recession and protect our economy, and managed to produce positive results, amongst them the following.

First of all, we have reduced public expenditure without affecting the level and quality of social services. Secondly, we have strengthened the balance of payments and guaranteed the banking system. Thirdly, we have supported national industries so that they could make a contribution to economic and social development. Fourthly, we have adopted development policies for the education and the training system and for harnessing the national energies. Fifthly, we have stabilised the population growth rate. We have also seen the emergence of productive areas of activity and high level provision of services.

Our national economy is characterised by highly developed and modern basic structures which have been of great assistance to us in our successful policy of economic adaptation.

Our national policy aims at finding a balance between social and economic development. Over the recent period, we have seen various achievements in the sphere of social development, for instance the social legislation that has been adopted, the institutions that have been established, the development plans and programmes that have been put into effect in the social field.

The State, in its wish to ensure the stability and psychological security of the individual, has created the necessary basis to extend the social security network so that all categories of the population can benefit from it. The State has also extended its protection to special categories, like the handicapped, senior citizens and young people. It has set up special homes and centres to help them adapt to and integrate with society.

As far as the main objectives of labour legislation are concerned, they are inspired by the principles of our Islamic religion and the values of our cultural heritage which respect and appreciate labour and human and social rights.

As it is embedded in these sound values, labour legislation in my country is of an integral nature. It fully guarantees the social protection of workers, assuring them against occupational hazards and diseases. It is also fully in line with principles inherent in labour relations – principles which conform, both in letter and spirit to international labour Conventions. They ensure full equality between foreign workers and those of our country and between men and women; they reflect the thinking of our day and age and are relevant to society and its social objectives.

Our economic and social policy has brought about enormous political, economic and social progress. Stability and improved living conditions are hallmarks of this success. Our labour market is today a large source of employment. Furthermore, it attracts many foreign workers from all over the world.

We take great pride in this situation because we believe we are furthering international co-operation, which is called for in the Director-General's Report and considered as an aspect that can help economic recovery.

Part II of the Director-General's Report deals with the ILO's activities in 1988. There is a large list of these. We should like to pay tribute to the efforts deployed by the International Labour Office but there is an increasing need for its services in view of the present economic situation, the recession, unemployment and poverty. Our appeal is that we should diversify and extend technical co-operation programmes and that their share in the ordinary budget of the Organisation should be increased; and that activities in the field should be geared to developing countries.

In addition to Report I the Director-General has also submitted a Special Report on the application of the Declaration concerning Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia and a report on the ILO mission to investigate the situation of the Arab workers of the Arab occupied territories.

Whilst thanking the Director-General for his commendable work and good offices, we should like to confirm our strong stand in support of the rights of workers in South Africa and their just struggle to attain self-determination and shake off the yoke of the racist policy of this country.

As far as the Arab occupied territories are concerned, it reveals the depth of the human drama being suffered by the workers and people of Palestine as a result of the practices of the Israeli authorities which run counter to basic human rights, the ILO Constitution and its basic objectives.

The press, radio and television are informing us day after day that the situation has been deteriorating since the beginning of the "intifadah". World public opinion is awakened to the horrors that are taking place; we learn that a disarmed nation is having to confront with terrorism, torture, prison, and murder. Pregnant women are forced to abort, children are strangled, buildings are blown up and Palestinians forced into exile.

The Palestinian people's only arms in their uprising against their Israeli enemies are stones, their faith in their homeland, their dignity and their legitimate rights to self-determination. The aspirations of the Palestinian people have recently been enshrined in the decision taken by the Palestine National Council to establish a Palestinian State with Jerusalem as its capital. We hope that we shall soon see it take its place in the international community.

The mission report mentions certain points that I would like to highlight. First, the situation in the occupied territories is mainly the result of the Israeli occupation. This abnormal situation will last as long as there is an occupation. It is for this reason that the international community should demand that an end be put to this occupation, which has subjected and uprooted a people for more than 40 years. Secondly, the recommendations contained in the previous mission reports have not been applied by the occupying authorities. This means that Israel has continued to refuse to comply with the resolutions adopted by the 1974 and 1980 sessions of the Conference. Thirdly, the mission reports show beyond the shadow of a doubt that the occupying authorities are continuing their policy of establishing settlements and of land and water confiscation, a policy which runs counter to the principles of international law, to United Nations resolutions and to the Resolution of this Conference, adopted at its session of 1980 concerning the Implications of Israeli Settlements in Palestine and Other Occupied Arab Territories in connection with the Situation of Arab Workers. Fourthly, in the economic and social spheres, the report refers to the restrictions imposed on Palestinian production and trade enterprises, the ban on Palestinian producers exporting their produce to foreign markets, and discrimination and inequality in employment, at work, in vocational training and social security and with respect to general freedoms.

These facts constitute an explicit condemnation of the occupation authorities and blatant defiance of human rights and international Conventions. This is why it is the duty of this Conference to adopt the necessary resolutions to suppress these practices and policies, which run counter to the principles and objectives of the ILO.

In view of the above, and in accordance with the noble objectives of the ILO, aimed at the establishment of world peace and social justice, the delegation of the United Arab Emirates invites all of the delegations who believe in the principles of the Organisation and love peace, freedom and justice, to support the draft Resolution submitted to this session of the Conference, concerning the protection of Arab workers' and employers' rights and freedoms in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories.

Thank you for your attention; I wish you every success in your work. May the peace, mercy and grace of God be with you.

Original - Arabic: Mr. BIN GHANEM (Government delegate, Democratic Yemen) - Mr. President, first of all permit me to express my most sincere congratulations on your election to the presidency of the current session of the International Labour Conference. We are convinced that under your guidance our work will be carried out in the best possible fashion. I should also like to express my congratulations to

Mr. Michel Hansenne, the new Director-General of our Organisation, and wish him every success.

Our Conference this year is being held in a delicate and complex international economic and social climate that reflects an unusual mixture of hope and frustration. After more than four decades of work in all spheres and at every level, we have achieved few of the objectives and aspirations that were set at the beginning of the 1940s. It seems to us that it is high time to reassess international co-operation and see how it can best be brought into line with the new international realities and so contribute to resolving the major problems facing mankind.

We need more justice and more reason if we are to use the vast material and human resources which are available in such a way as to ensure that the millions of human beings suffering from poverty, unemployment and oppression can enjoy the standard of living to which they are entitled.

Specifically, we must accord priority and greater efforts to resolving the development problems of the Third World countries, not just so that they can meet the demands and satisfy the legitimate aspirations of their peoples but, just as important, so as to further our mutual interests and achieve the harmonious development of the entire international community.

The most important lesson to be learned from recent decades is the total interdependence of nations. Nowadays, it is impossible to pretend that the development problems of the economically backward countries are purely the concern of their own peoples or that the protection of the environment is only a preoccupation of the more advanced countries. Similarly, the unemployment and economic crises affecting one country or region or another can only be identified and overcome in conjunction with the rest of the world.

The Director-General has made an excellent choice in basing his Report on the theme of recovery and development, a most important and vital theme which is quite clearly of the utmost relevance to the fundamental difficulties encountered by our countries. It is particularly urgent that we tackle this problem in the economic and social circumstances that prevail today. The Director-General's detailed and balanced examination of this issue is a source of inspiration for developing countries in their efforts to formulate strategies that are even more effective and even better adapted to the United Nations Fourth Development Decade.

The ILO is directly concerned by the reduction of unemployment, by poverty, by increasing labour productivity and by constantly improving labour standards and working conditions. As the Director-General has as rightly said, this can only be achieved in a healthy growth situation. That is why, in co-operation with others, this Organisation must promote policies, strategies and conditions that are conducive to equitable and harmonious development and progress. Obviously, there are bound to be all kinds of national and international obstacles to our achievement of this objective. The size of their external debt prevents the transfer of capital to developing countries and sometimes even results in a net outflow. The ferocious protectionism practised against their products, the instability of their currency and their difficulty of transferring technologies all seriously hamper the efforts of these countries to further their development. However, the countries of the Third World must assess their development experience objectively, increase the domestic share of savings devoted to development, ensure that their investments are more effective and implement policies that share the burden and the fruits of development more equitably and maintain a better balance between economic and social considerations, so as to alleviate the poverty endured by the large underprivileged segment of the population and permit them to make their own contribution to the development effort.

I should like to stress that it is extremely dangerous to seek short-term solutions to economic problems while ignoring the long-term objectives of development. In the same way, applying ready-made solutions to structural adjustment without taking into account the social context is bound to give rise to difficulties that are far too great for the political, economic and social structure concerned to cope with.

We fully appreciate the standard-setting activities of the ILO and trust that they will be expanded in order better to meet the requirements of the developing countries. The latter need assistance for their institutions and labour force to be in a position to implement these standards. As regards technical co-operation, programmes must be implemented and expanded with a view to transferring know-how, raising the level of skills of the labour force and combating poverty and unemployment. If the Organisation's programmes in these areas are to be more effective, we must increase the resources earmarked for technical assistance and encourage the other international and regional institutions to contribute their own financial resources and technical know-how.

As the Preamble of the ILO Constitution states, "conditions of labour exist involving such injustice, hardship and privation to large numbers of people as to produce unrest so great that the peace and harmony of the world are imperilled". One of the most painful manifestations of this situation is that which prevails in Palestine and in the other occupied Arab territories where the Israeli occupying authorities are practising every form of oppression and depriving the workers of their civil and trade union rights. They oblige them to work under conditions that run counter to international standards and violate the most elementary rights and dignity of human beings. The Palestinian problem is essentially one of a racist occupation. If any solution is to be found, then the Palestinian people must be given the opportunity of determining their own fate and establishing an independent State on their own territory. The International Labour Organisation has a role to play that is clearly set out in the Declaration of Philadelphia which proclaims the principle of non-discrimination and affirms that justice is a precondition of peace. This is why we appeal to this Conference to denounce firmly and clearly the methods employed in occupied Palestine.

We likewise call for an end to be put once and for all to the injustice and oppression suffered by the peoples of South Africa and Namibia and to the violation of the rights of workers, the rights of human beings and trade union rights.

Let us all strive together confidently to bring justice, progress and peace to the world.

Original - Spanish: Mrs. PADRON QUERO (Minister of Labour, Venezuela) - Mr. President, on behalf of the Government of Venezuela which I represent as Minister of Labour, please accept our expression of warm recognition and gratification on your election. We would also like to congratulate the distinguished Vice-Presidents for their well-deserved appointment. My Government is particularly gratified to see that the President of the Confederation of Workers of Venezuela, Mr. Juan José Delpino, is among them.

I would also like to extend special thanks to the Director-General and wish him every success as head of the Office, in the hope that the universal vocation of the Organisation will be increasingly strengthened, and I offer to him the full support of my Government.

I am highly honoured to address you and tell you briefly about some of the opinions and positions of my Government with respect to the interesting topics on our agenda, which are set out so brilliantly in the Report of the Director-General on recovery and employment, of which we essentially endorse the theoretical vision and proposals put forward.

The Government of President Carlos Andrés Pérez, who holds his mandate by decision of the people expressed through elections, took office in February of this year. At that point the economic and social situation in the country had reached a truly critical and worrying stage. As a result of the structural distortions that have been building up over the last years, Venezuela's economy was suffering severe imbalances at the macro-economic level in the main sectors of the production system.

The social counterpart of these imbalances was a rapid increase in the number of homes suffering from extreme poverty, as well as the virtual polarisation of Venezuelan society. This mass impoverishment, as well as the growing inequality which accompanied it, were dictated by a sharp downturn in real wages, which dropped by 40 per cent between 1983 and 1988, an increase in underemployment, a considerable drop in per capita consumption and an accelerated concentration of income. In addition, there was a significant drop in real social expenditure by the State.

This critical economic and social situation led the new Administration to recognise the need for designing an extensive adjustment programme to deal with these imbalances. This programme is undoubtedly an essential prerequisite to enhancing the use of the country's economic advantages diversifying the economy, modernising the production apparatus, securing the viability of the balance of payments and maintaining medium and long-term economic growth.

Such an economic programme requires the implementation of a package of important structural reforms in the fields of taxation, rates of exchange, trade and finance, which have in fact been implemented in the first months of the Government's existence and will be maintained throughout the next few years. These measures are accompanied by social policies designed to mitigate as far as possible the inevitable imbalances and temporary distortions caused by economic adjustment.

There are two facts closely linked to the implementation of this programme which we would like to emphasise at this point because of their importance in our view. Coinciding with the beginning of the implementation of the measures on 27 and 28 February, massive and spontaneous acts of public protest occurred in Caracas and other cities, with tragic and painful consequences in terms of deaths and injuries and considerable material damage. The most shocking and dramatic of these events were shown to the world almost simultaneously through the various media. Less known abroad, but just as important, were the efforts of the Confederation of Workers of Venezuela (CTV) and other trade union confederations in my country to channel criticism of the measures expressed by the sectors most affected by the adjustment policy through institutional procedures. These efforts culminated in a national strike of all activities on 18 May.

Both phenomena highlight the great social cost of attempting to correct the difficult and deeply rooted problems which beset our national economies. These are problems that have been shaped by long-term historical processes. The adjustment policy – and this has to be made clear – is not the main cause of the deterioration in living conditions or the social setbacks or the violence in the streets. In our view, the primary cause of the negative impact on living conditions has been the general economic situation in recent years, both at the international and at the national level, which has required adjustments with all their implications.

However, recognising the need to deal with serious imbalances in an economy is not the same as accepting that any adjustment policy will do to promote a style of development oriented towards growth, in which the needs of the most vulnerable groups are protected. For this reason, we fully share the assertion that appears in the Director-General's Report:

"There is a need to redouble our efforts to ensure that the way out of the most serious economic and social crisis faced by the world in recent times is attained without any sacrifice of the principles of social justice and the goals of social progress which the International Labour Organisation has stood for since its foundation's.

Agreeing as we do with this assessment, we must point out that in anticipation of the inevitable restructuring of the national labour market resulting from our adjustment policies, some of which may have critical repercussions on employment and the income of considerable sectors of the working population, the Government of President Pérez has designed a set of measures intended to mitigate their impact. The most comprehensive institutional form taken by these measures is the radical reform of the Ministry of Labour and its conversion into an agency that will direct the social policy of the State. In the opinion of my Government, this is an essential prerequisite for ensuring that policies to administer labour, social security, employment and vocational training of workers will have a real and significant impact.

These measures are coupled with measures of social policy designed essentially to halt and reverse the current process of growing impoverishment of the Venezuelan population.

To this end, we have adjusted the criteria and priorities which had guided the allocation of social expenditure by the State for many years. In doing so we are giving priority to channelling such expenditure towards the most vulnerable groups, increasing significantly the budget for those groups. Similarly, we are implementing an ambitious programme to directly create jobs in order to reduce the rate of labour lay-offs, and, at the same time, increase wages. This policy is being implemented through a broad process of co-ordination of the key sectors of Venezuelan society, and these measures will be implemented with absolute respect for freedom and basic trade union rights.

A further thought that we would like to express in this forum is that, in strict economic terms, government's responsibility in the restructurisation of national economies and the correction of fundamental imbalances is seriously hindered by the international economic situation and, particularly, by the attitude prevailing in international financial circles.

In the case of heavily indebted countries the situation is worsened by the weight of the service of external debt and the reduction in many cases, or disappearance in some, of financing from abroad. My country is a clear example of this situation. Although between 1984 and 1988 we paid $28,000 million dollars of interest and amortisation of our foreign debt, almost, in fact, more than half our export income, there was no reduction whatsoever in the total amount of our debt.

Situations of this type have clearly negative repercussions on any genuine recovery in the growth rate of developing countries or as regards the maintaining of high levels of economic activity in industrialised countries themselves. The latter should therefore promote a more favourable climate in which – and this I emphasise – developing countries may adjust to the stringent economic conditions imposed upon them.

Similarly, it would be wise to give special support to countries that implement policies called "adjustment with a human face", to use the expression that UNICEF has made famous world-wide. To this end the provision of additional funds and the substitution of project financing by programme financing would be of great value.

As our President Carlos Andrés Pérez has said, "The time is right for political definitions that provide permanent solutions to the debt crisis. The responsibility for promoting definitive solutions to this crisis rests equally on the United States, the other industrialised countries and Latin America. So far, the strategy in force, based on the individual treatment of each debtor country, has inflicted a severe economic and social cost on our continent." What our President has said about Latin America applies also, of course, for obvious reasons, to debtor countries in Africa and Asia.

This concept and, bearing in mind the real concern about the level of foreign debt in the recent past, Venezuela, along with all countries in the Latin American region, has submitted a draft resolution on the development of foreign debt and the social objectives of the Organisation. Our proposal is the follow-up to a Venezuelan initiative that resulted in resolution II of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference which led to the convening of a High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment.

This proposal coincides with fundamental statements appearing in the Director-General's Report and with what has become a priority for the Office in the next decade. This draft resolution on development, foreign debt and the social objectives of the International Labour Organisation, is aimed at convening a second meeting of high-level officials. Such a meeting would, we believe, be of great use in exploring further the situation of the world economy in the light of the social objectives of the ILO, particularly, in view of the repercussions of trade, financial and monetary practices on employment and poverty, as set out in the resolution itself. It would further make it possible to examine the implementation and realisation of the conclusions of the first High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment which was held in November 1987.

This proposal also fits within the context of initiatives supported by President Carlos Andrés Pérez in favour of an overall solution to the foreign debt problem, which should be brought about by international co-operation between the parties concerned. We trust that this draft resolution will elicit ample support from the delegations attending this Conference.

The PRESIDENT (Mrs. MOLKOVA) – We shall now continue our discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Mr. MORRIS (Minister for Industrial Relations, Australia) – Allow me to join previous speakers in congratulating the President and his fellow officers on their election to the most important offices of the Conference. I am sure that under their guidance the Conference will complete its work successfully.

This year is of particular significance to the International Labour Organisation. Created 70 years ago by the Treaty of Versailles, the ILO survived the Second World War to become the first specialised agency of the United Nations.

The past 70 years have witnessed great human turmoil, change and tragedy. For an international organisation to have endured in such difficult circumstances is a major feat in itself.

The principles on which the ILO is based play a central role in the Organisation's capacity to adapt to changing circumstances. These principles of tripartism and co-operation have withstood the test of time. They provide the strength to continue to promote the interests of working men and women throughout the world.

We have seen the membership of the ILO increase from its original 45 countries to 150 member States. This growth in membership has brought to the Organisation fresh ideas, approaches and priorities. This has assisted in dealing with increasingly complex global problems which require new and innovative solutions.

The ILO can look with justifiable pride at its achievements over the past 70 years. It has developed a comprehensive international Labour Code covering most aspects of working life. The ILO has also devoted considerable resources to the delivery of technical assistance to developing countries. These activities are invaluable and are strongly supported by the Government of Australia.

The Director-General's Report to the Conference on recovery and employment builds on the work of the November 1987 High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment. That Meeting raised international awareness of the need to pay attention to the employment and social aspects of the structural adjustment process.

It also stressed that we need to go beyond simple declarations of intention by firstly translating objectives into policies and then into realities.

The Director-General's Report correctly notes that there are both international and national dimensions to the adjustment task.

At the international level we are mindful that protectionism remains a growing menace to developing and developed countries alike. It is perverse that countries undergoing adjustment programmes are exhorted to liberalise trade by a group of rich nations which are themselves moving in the opposite direction.

Australia has actively campaigned for the promotion of a more open trading system, believing that this is in the interests of both industrialised and developing countries.

At the national level countries need to pursue vigorously a policy of structural adjustment, while giving due regard to the social aspects of adjustment.

If we are not able to pursue policies which restore sustainable economic growth in the 1990s, there can be no social progress.

We cannot afford to repeat the recession of the early 1980s or suffer the human costs of economic stagnation.

There is hope for the future. Economic growth and social progress can advance together if we have the will to implement the required policies.

But in implementing reform programmes, governments must be conscious of both social and political consequences. Tensions in these areas can be alleviated most effectively if the burden of adjustment is spread evenly throughout the community.

The Director-General's Report provides a valuable assessment of economic and social problems of the 1980s and proposes a range of solutions.

I am confident the ILO can contribute significantly to maintaining the social aspects of structural adjustment at the forefront of international concern.

I agree completely with the Director-General's observation that labour market flexibility must be subject to fundamental principles of human rights and protection of minimum labour standards. I also agree that it needs to be clearly recognised that labour standards cannot be evaluated solely from an economic standpoint which ignores their social consequences.

For its part, the Australian Government has faced major adjustment challenges over the past six years.

These challenges are not unique and I would like to take a few minutes to share with you the approach we have adopted. That approach is consistent with the emphasis on consensus in the Director-General's Report.

From the outset we tackled simultaneously the twin problems of inflation and unemployment.

The vehicle for this was a prices and incomes policy, based on an agreement, or "Accord", with the trade union movement.

Under this Accord the unions agreed to wage restraint in return for supportive government action in a range of areas including tax, social welfare, prices and non-wage incomes.

With wage restraint through the Accord it was possible for the Government to provide fiscal stimulus to the domestic economy without fuelling inflation.

Tripartite acceptance of this broad strategy was achieved through a national conference in 1983 at which the major interest groups in the country were represented.

The results show that over the past six years Australia has had a significant degree of success in promoting both economic recovery and social justice.

Since 1983 economic growth has averaged 4 per cent per annum; employment growth, at over 3 per cent per annum, has been the fastest of any OECD country; of the 1.5 million new jobs created around 90 per cent have been in the private sector and more than half have been for women; overall the unemployment rate has been reduced from over 10 per cent to 6.3 per cent; and the level of industrial dispute has been reduced by almost 60 per cent.

The policies of consensus, policies very much in tune with ILO principles, demonstrate what can be achieved. Notwithstanding these achievements, Australia's process of adjustment remains an ongoing difficult task.

Australia has relied heavily on commodity exports to underpin its economic development. Our manufacturing base has been relatively narrow and has concentrated on low value added products. The long term was a gradual decline in Australia's comparative national living standards.

However the full cost, as with a number of countries, was only exposed following the substantial fall in world commodity prices over the period 1985-86 which led to a collapse in Australia's terms of trade, and sharp increases in both the current account deficit and the level of foreign debt.

It again highlighted Australia's vulnerability to changes in the international economy.

The Government's response to the deterioration in the external account involved changes to wages policy and the wider macro-economic policy mix, as well as an increased emphasis on micro-economic reform.

Through the Accord negotiating process it was possible to contain the price effects of the Australian dollar depreciation in 1985 and 1986 and ensure that the resulting competitive gains to export and import competing industries were substantially maintained.

To enhance the competitiveness of local industry, measures were also taken to associate wage increases more closely with improvements in efficiency and productivity.

I will return to this issue later.

Once growth was firmly established it was possible to remove fiscal stimulus. In recent years Australia, by substantially tightening fiscal policy, has converted a large budget deficit into a large budget surplus.

At the same time we have protected low income earners, and programmes for low income families have been enhanced.

At the microeconomic level our objective is to build an economy which is better able to compete internationally. This requires, in particular, improving the competitiveness of the export and import competing sectors.

Already major initiatives have been taken and significant progress is being made: protection for industries is being reduced; in association with the relevant industries and unions, programmes have been implemented to revitalise the steel, motor vehicle, heavy engineering and textile, clothing and footwear sectors; action is being taken to improve the efficiency of the economic infrastructure; government business enterprises supplying services to industry generally are being reformed and streamlined; programmes to improve other key industry sectors, such as the waterfront and coastal shipping, have been announced; and policies have been introduced to improve Australia's education, training and skill formation arrangements.

Earlier I mentioned the initiatives to better relate wages growth to improvements in efficiency and productivity.

A major part of the task is to facilitate the development of a more highly skilled and flexible labour force and the introduction of more modern and adaptable forms of work organisation.

This restructuring has among its major priorities: the revision of job classification structures; major reforms to skill formation and training arrangements including multi-skilling; and the provision of career paths.

Lower paid workers, particularly women, will benefit from more equitable pay levels and greater access to career paths based on training and increased skills.

The result of these reforms will be a much more dynamic, equitable and efficient industry structure.

Again, major hurdles remain to be overcome.

We have a large current account deficit and a high level of foreign debt associated with strong economic growth.

These problems underline the urgency of the restructuring process and the need to maintain the pace of reform.

The consultative processes between the Government, unions and business organisations will continue to play a key role.

In particular, the prices and incomes accord between the Government and the trade union movement will provide the foundation for ongoing structural adjustment and labour market reform.

I believe that Australia's experience demonstrates the value of a consensus-based approach in achieving economic and social progress in what have been difficult circumstances.

I cannot close a discussion of this issue without making reference to Mr. Francis Blanchard.

Mr. Blanchard retired from the Director-General's position earlier this year, having led the Office for some 15 years.

In particular it was almost entirely due to Mr. Blanchard's initiatives and persistence that the 1987 High-Level Meeting was convened. That achievement in itself, along with the subsequent work under his direction to implement the themes of that meeting within the ILO and other international agencies, will provide a lasting testament to his personal commitment to this Organisation's basic objectives of economic progress allied with social justice.

The Australian Government places on record its appreciation of his contribution to the ILO and we wish him well in his retirement.

We welcome Mr. Michel Hansenne and look forward to working with him and supporting him in his role as our new Director-General. Australia is confident that the objectives and ideals of the ILO, and the aspirations of working people around the world, will be safe in his hands.

Mr. VANDERVEKEN (representative of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions) – In his last report to the Conference, Mr. Blanchard has covered issues at the heart of the mandate of the ILO. They must be of deep concern to those who share its objective of making the world more humane for all of the working people who share it.

The ICFTU and its nearly 90 million members has had to deplore the widespread tendency of recent years to lose sight of the ultimate objective of work. Let it be said once more. Our business is to meet human needs, to improve the quality of life and work for all. It is a simple truth to which the ILO has always adhered when others haven't. It has rejected the temptation to separate the social from the economic when others have succumbed, and to retreat from ground that must be occupied by enlightened policy-makers. The report before us is a restatement of that commitment, and the independent free trade union movement welcomes it.

I see no profit in understating the failures of the last decade. Today 950 million live in absolute poverty, compared to 820 million in 1980. Above all, that is an indictment of the international community's failure towards the growing millions in the developing world whose existence lacks the basics of human dignity. But this global Organisation should reflect too on the fact that in its richest member States, between 10 and 15 per cent of the population live in poverty. It is a shameful harvest of human misery.

Employment remains the key to the eradication of poverty and the locomotive of social progress. The concept of the right to work has been corrupted by union-busters and contaminated by the advocates of directed labour. But the ILO, like the ICFTU, has always recognised that full, freely chosen, productive employment must be the fundamental objective of policy-makers nationally and internationally.

Moreover, we share a recognition of the absolute necessity of a global approach to the promotion of jobs and recovery. In our interdependent world, no nation or region can climb towards prosperity at the expense of others. Truly, we share a common destiny.

Regrettably, as we underline the need for universal co-operation, we know that some, because of their contempt for the values of this Organisation, and for humanity itself, have to be excluded from our common struggle.

The racist apartheid regime which continues to hold the people of South Africa in subjugation has no role to play. Its continuing and intensified acts of repression against the independent Black trade unions spearheading the forces for democratic change only confirms, in tragic terms, the need to apply mandatory sanctions. The measures taken to date by the international community have been partial and inadequate, their effects undermined by those who are, even now, willing to profit from the crime of apartheid. This year has seen important steps forward towards the independence of Namibia. The international community has played an important role in that, and our efforts must be intensified until apartheid is no more than a nightmarish memory in our collective consciousness.

This year, as always, this Conference is confronted with appalling violations of trade union rights. They should remain foremost in our minds. Equally, though, we can note improvements in some countries whose denials of democratic rights have long been major causes of concern to this Organisation.

Developments in Poland this year are, perhaps, the most prominent example. They are a vivid tribute to the determination of working people to struggle for the rights which are legitimately theirs. They are also conclusive evidence, to those who still need convincing, of the futility of repression. It is, therefore, with profound sadness that we have watched the tragic events in China. There can be no sense in, and no justification for, the horrifying repression of those whose protests have been exemplary in their rejection of violence.

We in the ICFTU are encouraged to hope that the courageous example of Solidarność and of the Polish workers it represents is being heeded in the other countries of that part of the world. Positive signs do exist, but they are uncertain, fragile, and uneven. And in at least one State in Eastern Europe, movement seems to be in the opposite direction.

The list of repression extends to all regions. Yet for one group of working people disadvantage and discrimination are not simply widespread, but universal. They are the women who are present in ever increasing numbers at work and in our trade unions. We all have a role to play to enlist the committed support of our own constituents for the ideal and practice of equality.

The pursuit of social justice is an indispensable dimension of the fight for employment and recovery. The 40 million new jobs needed each year up to the end of the century simply to keep pace with expected growth of the world labour force cannot be created if that dimension is neglected.

In this regard, the ICFTU has consistently argued for the establishment of a system of international relations that meets at least the minimum requirements of equity. The Director-General has pointed out that it is the international trading system that is the mechanism that must transfer and magnify growth and prosperity between nations. That system stands in need of thorough repair, and the ICFTU is following closely the efforts being made in the Uruguay Round to introduce critically important reforms.

They are particularly urgent because of the extent of protectionist sentiment around the world, sometimes shared by working people, notably when they see unfair labour practices used as an instrument of trade policy. It can be combated only through eradicating the injustice in which it takes root. For these reasons, the ICFTU is continuing to work for a social clause in the GATT which would, with ILO involvement, establish respect for basic international labour standards as a precondition of trading privileges.

Global application of ILO instruments, and particularly those on freedom of association, whose universality we have always proclaimed, is the cement that can bind North and South together in a common quest for recovery and progress. It is also the yardstick against which we will ultimately measure the nature of change in the centrally planned economies, and hence the basis for the recasting of relations between East and West.

My organisation has called repeatedly for a radical reorientation of the approach of the international financial institutions and major governments to the debt crisis. On a number of occasions the ICFTU has set out the basic elements of new policies which offer hope of a just solution of the problem. They are based on the proposition that programmes of structural adjustment must be predicated on continued growth and meeting social goals.

We are encouraged to believe that, belatedly, these considerations are gaining support in the international community. The High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment marked an important step forward. We are pleased to find its conclusions reflected in the ILO Programme and Budget for the coming biennium.

Today, policy-makers are finally drifting in the right direction. But as policy drifts, people are dying. They are but the most visible victims. There are countless millions afflicted by disease, malnutrition and chronically inadequate living standards. It is a situation that we must never learn to tolerate. Today, debt payments are denominated in death as well as dollars – and we must act to ensure that tomorrow they will not be paid in democracy too.

The 1980s, sometimes called the lost decade, led some of our opponents to predict the death of trade unionism as an inadmissible luxury for the developing countries, and an irrelevance for the developed. Every day, as we reach the end of the decade, events are exposing the fallacy of these arguments. Recovery will take place only through democracy. And democracy exists only where strong, independent trade unions are there to make their indispensable contribution.

Mr. BORGES (Minister of Local Government and Labour, Norway) – On behalf of the Norwegian Government I should like to congratulate the President on his election and wish him every success in his task. I am confident that we shall all benefit from his great competence and experience.

I should also like to congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne on his election as the new Director-General of the International Labour Office. We look forward to a close and fruitful co-operation with him. In this connection, let me also thank his predecessor, Mr. Francis Blanchard, for the excellent way in which he has carried out his heavy responsibilities.

“Recovery and employment” has been chosen as a main theme for this session of the International Labour Conference. The unfavourable international economic situation and the economic crisis with which many countries are faced render the ILO’s work in this field even more important. Norway welcomes the Report of the Director-General as a positive contribution in this respect.

As stated in Chapter 3 of the Director-General’s Report, active labour market policies are an important means of supporting the structural adjustment process. In Norway we fully support this view. Labour market policies have always played an important role in the adjustment process in my country. And today, more than ever, the Norwegian labour market authorities give increasing priority to training and re-training measures. This is necessary if we are to succeed in the readjustment process. There is a special need for an upgrading of skills among those who have been recently hit by unemployment, but the employed also have a need for further training.

I agree that the conclusions of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment organised by the ILO in November 1987 are major inputs to the development strategies for recovery. It is essential to realise that the problems of recovery and employment are common to all countries.

In the Report it is also stressed that economic growth and social progress must advance together. In our view this is a necessity if we are to promote sufficient growth to bring about fuller employment and a reduction of poverty. Both the industrialised and the developing countries must adopt policies that enable adjustment to the changing conditions of an interdependent world economy.

Social programmes and social legislation must be stimulated to protect the poorest and most vulnerable groups against falling levels of income and social security. Workers must be given a minimum degree of social protection. This minimum protection is a cornerstone of the so-called Scandinavian Welfare States. The workers have, through their organisations, had a strong influence on social policy information and have also taken part in the development process in general. This has resulted in a kind of social legislation that guarantees a minimum level of protection for all. Without this type of social consensus we would not succeed in our economic and social development.

In this context we fully support the ILO strategy on structural adjustments and the functioning of labour markets. Flexibility has to be subject to fundamental human rights principles and the protection of minimum labour standards.

Necessary reforms in labour policy are best obtained through tripartite consultations and co-operation. Here, the ILO and other international organisations have a responsibility in assisting and advising governments, in co-operation with the social partners, to encourage the necessary structural adjustment process. But it is also important to be aware, as pointed out in the Director-General’s Report, that there can be no uniform prescription for reforms in all countries. However, all countries should adhere to the principle of minimum of social protection for all. Without social protection there can be no economic growth.

As underlined in the conclusions of the High-Level Meeting, the ILO has a special responsibility for labour and social matters, including the promotion of full, productive and freely chosen employment.

ILO programmes also play an important role in the process of direct employment creation. In co-operation with other international organisations and governments, the ILO should continue to develop ways to examine the relationship between employment and technological development.

The Report lists five different programmes of action that the Director-General urgently recommends. In our view, these are examples of active labour market policies which we support.

The international financial institutions – the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund – have a particular responsibility in assisting the developing countries in the planning and implementation of structural adjustment programmes. In order to tackle these problems effectively, it is important that these institutions should also co-operate with other relevant international organisations.

Particularly for Africa, structural adjustment policies need to pay increasing attention to the development of human resources and the transfer of technology, above all in the area of agriculture.

The ILO should co-operate with other organisations in building up data on labour market strategies and other indicators in order to follow the social and employment consequences of adjustment policies. The important role of women in the informal sector must be taken into account when data are collected and presented.

The ILO also has an important role to play in helping to design adjustment policies with a strong emphasis on making the poorer sections of society more productive.

The ILO should continue its standard-setting work and advisory assistance to governments in their efforts to carry out their obligations and strive for effective systems of supervision.

This year we welcome that both night and safety in the use of chemicals at work have been placed on the agenda of this session of the Conference. Our opinion is that conclusions with a view to both a Convention and a Recommendation should be prepared in these areas.

This session of the Conference will also conclude its work on the revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107). The Norwegian Government welcomes this important task and would like to stress that this Convention is the only existing international instrument for the protection of indigenous peoples. We hope that the revision will be concluded with a text which all parties concerned can support.

The Nordic countries have taken part in the work of the ILO ever since its foundation 70 years ago. Throughout the years we have been profoundly committed to the Organisation and its activities. In view of the fact that the ILO is now entering its eighth decade, the Nordic Governments have recently submitted to the new Director-General a memorandum in which some of the major challenges facing the Organisation are discussed. The purpose of their memorandum is to contribute to the discussion of the role and functions of the ILO during the coming decade.

We are standing on the brink of apartheid's defeat. The movement for democracy in South Africa is growing stronger. The many years of struggle for human rights and for free and fair elections in that country are bound to succeed. Our impatience for results in the fight against apartheid must be constructively channelled. The international community's commitment to support the struggle against apartheid and to introduce comprehensive and mandatory sanctions is more important than ever. Norway, together with the other Nordic countries, has introduced an economic boycott against South Africa. We appeal to other countries to follow us, particularly those with significant economic ties with South Africa.

The international community has also made an important commitment to ensure the independence of Namibia and to assist in the building of a free nation for its people. The tasks and challenges are many. I would like to take this opportunity to underscore the central role of the United Nations in this independence process. The United Nations Commissioner for Namibia and the United Nations Transition Assistance Group (UNTAG) have a broad and difficult mandate to fulfil. Our confidence in and support of their activities is of crucial importance.

The Report of the Director-General concludes by reminding us of the serious challenges presented to this Organisation and to all of us by threats to the environment. My Government has been very pleased to note that the ILO has taken this challenge seriously when planning the programme and budget for the Organisation for the coming years by making environment and development one of its priority areas. The list of proposed resolutions to this session of the Conference shows that this concern is shared by many groups in the ILO.

The Nordic Governments are among those which have put forward a resolution underlining the special and important role played by the ILO in promoting an environmentally sound and sustainable development. I hope that this session of the Conference will benefit from the improved international climate which we all are happy to see developing in many parts of the world and thus be able to adopt conclusions and resolutions on all the themes which the members feel are important and to which they wish to give priority.

Mr. SANDHU (Government delegate, Pakistan) – In the name of Allah, the Merciful, the Compassionate. It is a great privilege and honour for me to address this august gathering comprising the representatives of government, employers and workers who have come to attend this Conference.

First of all, I would like to extend my warmest congratulations to the President and Vice-Presidents on my own behalf, on behalf of the members of my delegation and on behalf of the Government and people of Pakistan on their unanimous election to the high offices of this Conference. I am sure that their knowledge and vast experience will promote fruitful discussions and will lead the Conference towards the achievement of positive results.

I also take this opportunity to extend the greetings of the Government, the people and the workers of Pakistan to all the distinguished delegations attending this Conference.

I would be failing in my duty if I did not avail myself of the opportunity to express our sincere appreciation to the ILO for the excellent services it has rendered to the cause of humanity ever since its establishment in 1919.

Remaining true to his reputation, Mr. Francis Blanchard, the former Director-General, deserves a tribute for presenting to this Conference a very comprehensive and precise analysis of the problems confronting the world today.

While I will discuss the subject of this year's Report later, permit me to say that the outgoing Director-General deserves our compliments and gratitude for stewarding the ship of the Organisation in rather troubled waters. We have no doubt that his successor, Mr. Michel Hansenne, the present Director-General, with also bring new laurels to this august Organisation which since its very inception is serving the cause of mankind.

As one of the solutions to the problems of an inequitable system of distribution of wealth and capital resources, the Report has stressed the need for adjustment within the national economic policy and also in international economic relations. In spite of the encouraging overall homogeneity in the rate of economic growth among the developed countries, the majority of the Third World is sinking deeper into poverty. To quote the Director-General: "Per capita GDP in many developing countries, low as it is, is falling further". The Director-General has, therefore, appropriately stressed the importance of linkages between the economic and social spheres by enlarging the base of employment and requisite adjustment policies.

It is not easy to overcome these issues unless there is commitment on the part of government, employers and workers, on the one hand, and the consumers, who in fact make up the real hard core of decision-makers, on the other.

Further, the prospects of exports are not bright because of many internal economic reasons and tariff controls, etc., imposed by the developed countries.

In the circumstances, one can easily judge the uphill task that lies ahead of developing countries like my own for attaining structural adjustments and economic recovery.

Conscious of improving resource allocation, which is possible through a number of fiscal and monetary measures including savings so that the new projects and existing enterprises may not suffer for lack of finance, the Government of Pakistan in the current year's budget proposes to include a viable programme of resource mobilisation and a strict drive for austerity with a view to lessening the dependence on foreign loans.

Further, a programme of implementation and monitoring of labour laws and inspection has been launched throughout the country which aims at enhancing the security of employment, increasing the health and safety of workers, their rights and privileges, so that the efficiency of industrial labour and productivity may increase. A number of facilities are being provided to the entrepreneurs in order to increase the efficiency of the private sector.

The Report recognises the need of direct intervention in the form of employment-generating schemes and targeted poverty relief programmes to deal with the social distress generated in the process of structural adjustment.

It is in keeping with these requirements and following a policy of structural adjustment that the elected Government of Pakistan has embarked upon a programme of development called the Peoples Works Programme, which is a programme of direct intervention, aiming at transforming rural as well as urban infrastructures and simultaneously providing employment for the unemployed. The Programme has been launched at a cost of $2 billion and its objectives include improvement in the social and economic conditions of the poor and underprivileged segments of the population through a set of planned and identified schemes. The Programme will concentrate on education, health and sanitation, water supply, rural roads and dissemination of appropriate technology in the rural areas and income/employment-generating schemes.

The budget which the elected Government has prepared for the fiscal year 1989-90 contains monetary fiscal measures of far-reaching importance which were needed to correct as far as possible the imbalance in the external payments and to plug excessive domestic consumption. The austerity campaign that Pakistan has begun to pursue is a step in that direction and we hope to follow a tighter monetary and fiscal policy and to check consumption to a manageable level.

In my country, despite its population planning programme, the overall rate of growth of the population is as high as 3 per cent per annum, with the result that the present population of 106 million would rise to about 150 million by the turn of the century. It is in this context that not only family planning programmes shall continue to receive still greater attention, as envisaged in the Seventh Five-Year Plan, but effective policies in the health, education and other related social sectors shall be geared towards slowing down the pace of population increase so that the thrust of the economic measures may not be allowed to go in vain.

The Director-General has rightly cautioned about the ill-effects of the removal of subsidies on essential commodities and cutbacks on social expenditure when he says that such measures "often result in a fall in incomes and welfare below the minimum levels required to sustain life. In such cases infant mortality rates and malnutrition rise and the life expectancy of the poor falls." We are concerned in the matter so far as withdrawal of subsidies from essential items like gas and electricity is concerned. Accordingly, adequate financial support through a review of wage structure and monetary returns for the poor is a high priority for us. The object is not to allow the wages to fall below the "efficiency levels".

The Report suggests measures to relieve unemployment and poverty though labour-intensive public works projects designed to mobilise surplus rural labour to construct basic infrastructure such as village roads, small irrigation works, low-cost housing, bridges and schools, including soil conservation and reforestation. Simultaneously, structural adjustments can be effected as an emergency mechanism for dealing with mounting unemployment and loss of earnings because of recession.

Apart from the Peoples Works Programme which is expected to contain to a large extent the menace of unemployment in the rural areas, special schemes for generating employment for the educated unemployed and which also cater to the target groups such as youth have been prepared by the Government. A Youth Investment Promotion Society (YIPS) has been set up to provide credit for setting up small businesses by the enterprising yet unemployed persons in the country.

Further, special emphasis is being laid on industrial and agricultural development so that adequate opportunities may be created for the unemployed.

The Pakistan People's Party has won the election held in 1988 on the basis of its economic programme as enshrined in its manifesto which, inter alia, declares that the Government would create stable conditions and an economic environment where investors feel secure about their investment and induce a large proportion of funds into the country.

It is my privilege to declare from this forum that Pakistan would provide all facilities for investment to foreign investors in Pakistan and that the Prime Minister of Pakistan has herself declared, in the Foreign Investors' Moot in May 1989, held in Islamabad, that her Government would provide all facilities and privileges to foreign investors in the country. We attach a very high priority to the setting up of basic chemical and petrochemical plants and will welcome investment in this new industry.

We propose to set up a high technology industry for electronic components, machinery and capital goods for the massive industrialisation programme during the next five years. A network of pipelines to connect oilfields with refineries is already under way.

Agriculture is the mainstay of Pakistan's economy, accounting for over 23 per cent of GDP, employing 50 per cent of the labour force and about 70 per cent of export earnings. It provides livelihood for over 70 per cent of the rural population. Accordingly, we propose to strike a sound balance between agriculture and the rest of the economy and shall make available all resources to create new cultivable land so that we do not have to import foodstuff from outside.

Entrepreneurs, workers and farmers in my country have joined hands to bring about a transformation of the economy so that each one may reap the fruits of his labour and help in raising the standard of living of the masses through industrial as well as agricultural development.

We are conscious that even these measures are too little compared to the volume and extent of unemployment. Accordingly, there is need for a systematic and continuous programme of multi-dimensional skill development in the country. There is no doubt that agencies like the World Bank have come forward to extend their co-operation in this gigantic task of skill formation in Pakistan. These efforts will have to be augmented considerably in order to meet the needs of industrial expansion, on the one hand, and generation of employment, on the other.

In summing up my comments on the Director-General's Report, I would submit that Pakistan fully shares the concern expressed by him that the model based on the "trickle-down" theory has completely failed and, instead of growth, there has been a phenomenon characterised by falling per capita income, expanded debt problems, widespread unemployment and underemployment. Such a situation has in a way destabilised many governments and has allowed external threats to bear upon them, particularly in the smaller States. In my own country, the people could not raise their voice against economic disparities and resultant irritants because they had no right to do so under the autocratic rule which kept them silent. As such, the most powerful enemy of the freedom of the people, i.e. the iniquitous economic and social system supported by the previous regime, did not allow the people to play their due role in the management of the State.

It is after a long struggle that the Pakistan People's Party under the leadership of Mohtarma Benazir Bhutto, the Prime Minister of Pakistan, came into power after a popular vote and the mandate of the poor masses of the country. The new democratic Government has decided to introduce far-reaching reforms to bring about fundamental changes aimed at raising the standard of living of the people.

I feel honoured to inform you that soon after taking the oath of office, the Prime Minister, Mohtarma Benazir Bhutto, in her very first address to the nation on 2 December 1988, declared that restrictions placed on trade union activities by the martial law regime would be removed and labour laws would be brought into conformity with ILO Conventions.

In accordance with the commitment of the Prime Minister, trade union activities have been fully restored and legislative measures to provide requisite backing of law to this decision are to be placed before the Parliament soon. Not only have trade union activities been restored in organisations like Pakistan International Airlines, Pakistan Broadcasting Corporation and Pakistan Television Corporation, etc., but a Review Board has also been set up to examine and decide on merit the cases of those employees who were victimised for their trade union activities purely on critical grounds.

Apart from the foregoing, the Government has revised the Workers' Children (Education) Ordinance, 1972, to cover the children of employees receiving wages up to Rs.3,000 per month. The Government has also raised the rate of pension of widows and survivors from 60 per cent to 100 per cent under the Employees' Old-Age-Social Security Scheme.

I would conclude with a quotation from Mohtarma Benazir Bhutto, the Prime Minister of Pakistan, who, while addressing foreign investors in Pakistan said, "If this globe has to witness an era of peace and tranquillity, the economic and social inequalities must be done away with through a deliberate and well-coordinated action and understanding between the countries of the North and the South. Continued friction and tensions are ruinous and would leave both sides 'broke' sooner or later. The sooner the realisation of this fact dawns on both, the better it is".

Original – French: Mrs. DIALLO (Minister of Employment and the Public Service, Mali) – In taking the floor before this august assembly, I should like, on behalf of my Government and the delegation of Mali, to congratulate the President on his brilliant election to the presidency of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. Our congratulations also go to our eminent colleagues who will help and support him during our work, which I am sure he will guide with the utmost skill.

This year, the 70th anniversary of our Organisation, is an opportunity for us to pay well-deserved tributes to the vision and unshakeable faith of the pioneers who brought into being this gem of co-operation and international solidarity.

The members of the Governing Body, the Director-General and his colleagues, whose work has contributed to the continuation of the lofty mission which was initiated 70 years ago, all deserve the warmest congratulations of my delegation which greatly appreciates the relevance of the topic of recovery and employment.

This is a subject which is relevant, a subject which gives cause for particular concern as we near the end of the century, and one which requires the involvement of peoples and governments.

The expertise and understanding brought to these problems render our Report a truly valuable reference document. The pertinence and clarity of the analysis, the correctness and the force of the arguments shed a new light upon the noble concept of solidarity – a concept which has often been debased, and one which our Organisation more than any other is responsible for rehabilitating.

Africa deeply believes in solidarity, and the best illustration of this deep faith is the Lagos Action Plan and the United Nations Programme of Action for Economic Recovery and Development in Africa. What a drama we witness, seeing the painful paradox of the continent, poor in its wealth, the great exporter of commodities, of capital and of human resources!

Taking the opportunity offered by its privileged position as holder of the executive presidency of the Organisation of African Unity, my country (through its President, General Moussa Traoré) alerted the Community of Nations to the need to integrate debt and the fall in commodity prices into a single globally-applicable strategy in the search for alternatives to the problem of development.

We also believe that, although the scope and complexity of development programmes today require an international solution, it is nevertheless true that a national effort is essential to ensure the success of our endeavours, a truism the Director-General has expressed most forcefully in his Report.

To this end, Mali has undertaken important economic reforms, the design and implementation of which are based on consensus which is the result of the broad co-operation and effective participation of all sectors of the population.

Promotion of rural employment through associations and co-operatives, rural schooling literacy programmes in the national languages and labour-intensive employment are some of the results of this measures.

We should like to pay tribute to the courageous position taken by our Organisation and to its unstinting efforts as described in Part II of the Director-General's Report, to devise and experiment with projects which best reflect a spirit of world-wide solidarity. Mali greatly appreciates the involvement of the International Labour Organisation in fields that are of particular relevance to the toiling masses.

To support these efforts and ensure their success, my Government would like a subregional seminar to be held on a problem which is assuming alarming proportions in the majority of Sahelian countries – unemployment among young graduates. Such a seminar, designed to define its exact nature, would make possible the valuable exchange of experience and information on strategies to combat this ill.

My Government takes note of the Plan of Action on equality of opportunity and treatment for working men and women. Moreover, we appreciate any initiative to promote greater co-operation between the major technical and regional departments and offices to enable better integration of the needs and concerns of women within the activities of the International Labour Organisation.

At a time when the insidious manoeuvres of supporters of apartheid are on the increase, everything combines to demonstrate the need for greater vigilance and unity in the fight to safeguard the hope awakened by the prospect of independence in Namibia.

The suffering imposed upon Black workers and the civilian populations in South Africa and southern Africa should not be tolerated any longer. Our Organisation must become more radical in its position and in its struggle to safeguard human dignity and decent working conditions.

In conclusion, I should like to invite the International Labour Organisation to mobilise all its resources for an effective contribution to a better understanding of the problems confronting the world of work, in order to meet the great challenges of the third millennium.

Mr. STEFANSSON (Workers' delegate, Iceland) – On behalf of the Icelandic Federation of Labour, I should like to begin my address by offering the President my congratulations on his election as President of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference.

The Director General's Report on recovery and employment presents a very clear review of recent developments and the outlook for the future. The picture that emerges is one of deepening imbalances in the world, with more and more people in the developing countries slipping into poverty. Their plight is aggravated even more by the immense foreign debts of many of the countries which have small national revenues, and their increasing inability to maintain adequate schooling, health care and social services.

There are also imbalances in the distribution of earnings in the industrialised nations, and in the economic fluctuations of recent years there has emerged a dangerous tendency to cut down on social services. This tendency has been reinforced by prevailing laissez-faire policies in favour of the free market and against any attempts towards equal sharing. In many countries, vigorous propaganda campaigns have also been conducted against trade unions. They have been accused of interfering with the market system, maintaining excessive wage levels and making unrealistic demands for social security. In many industrialised countries, the labour movement has been dangerously weakened by high-handed and arbitrary acts on the part of employers and governments alike.

In my country, Iceland, the labour movement is in good shape. The Icelandic labour movement has achieved real successes in its campaign for better conditions and increased rights for working people. In negotiations, both with employers and with the government, the labour movement has pressed for increased social services and so played the leading role in the development of the Icelandic welfare system. Through a wide range of activities, it has encouraged democratic discussion and democratic decision-making throughout society. In many parts of the world, organised labour has these same achievements to its credit, which indicates clearly how important it is to society everywhere to have a strong and active labour movement. The existence of such a movement ensures not only workers' wages and terms, but also civil rights, the security of the individual and democracy.

The International Labour Organisation understands the importance of the labour movement, and for the labour movement it is a matter of great importance to be able to look to the ILO, both as a forum for discussion and as the only international body which examines government violations of workers' freedom of association and the right to free collective bargaining.

Numerous such violations have taken place recently in many of the industrialised countries. This clearly reflects political opposition to the aims of the movement and the government view that the abridgement of the labour movement's right to collective bargaining is a useful measure to curb wage increases and enforce a reduction of purchasing power. Economic management of this type is a threat to the system of democracy in which we live, and it erodes the cohesion which is essential for every society, particularly when difficulties are to be faced. For this reason it is imperative that the ILO should defend the right of association and set forth the clear and unambiguous demand that governments everywhere should not encroach on the rights either of individuals or of their associations.

Exactly a year ago, the Icelandic Federation of Labour was compelled to appeal to the ILO. This was in connection with the Provisory Act which the Government of Iceland enacted on 20 May 1988, a few days after the Althingi (Icelandic Parliament) adjourned. This Act was an evident violation of ILO Conventions Nos. 87 and 98, both of which Iceland has ratified. The Act completely suspended the right to collective bargaining for 11 months, until 10 April 1989 (later changed to 15 February).

During this period, to quote directly from the Act, "lock-outs, strikes, including sympathy stoppage of work, or other acts intended to force an alternative order of wages and terms affairs to that stipulated in the present Act" were forbidden.

The Act also contained an unequivocal provision forbidding employers to raise the level of "wages, remuneration and any kind of payments in kind in excess of that which has been negotiated in agreements on wages and terms and stipulated in the present Act".

The Governing Body of the ILO stated in its conclusions last February that "the Act of 20th May 1988 clearly restricted the right of employers' and workers' organisations to engage in free collective bargaining during the term of the legislation". The Governing Body also endorsed the view that nine instances of legislative intervention in the bargaining process in Iceland in the space of ten years lent substance to the suggestion that there may be too ready a recourse to such intervention in the country.

The Governing Body endorsed our most serious assertion: that "the repeated use of legislation to amend existing collective agreements, or to control the content of future agreements, serves to undermine wage earners' belief in the value of trade union membership. Members or potential members may feel that there would be little point in supporting or joining an organisation, the principal purpose of which is to represent its members in collective negotiations with employers, if the outcomes of these negotiations are repeatedly set aside by legislative decree."

Although the Governing Body endorsed the main points of our complaint, expressing in its recommendations its concern at the Government of Iceland's legislative intervention in the bargaining process, it considered that the restrictions imposed last year were warranted by reasons of compelling national interest. Two factors clearly influenced this conclusion. On the one hand, Iceland had a clean record up to that time, and on the other, credence was given to the misrepresentations of the Government of Iceland regarding so-called consultation with the labour movement.

It is not unlikely that the Government's misrepresentations were more readily accepted in view of the fact that the political party which had been most outspoken in its criticism of the legislation when it was imposed was represented in the Government at the time of the Government's answer to our complaint. I should like to repeat, however, that while this acceptance on the part of the Governing Body tends to suggest that the Government's alleged consultation of the labour movement is an established fact, this is far from the truth, and I am confident that the Committee of Experts will come to the conclusion that the Government is guilty of misrepresentation.

It is not my intention to go further into this matter, since it is now under examination by the Committee of Experts. I should like to repeat, however, how important it is that workers' organisations should have the support of the ILO when they are under attack. In Iceland and in most of the developed industrialised countries, people enjoy prosperity and general democratic rights and freedoms. It is therefore understandable that such infringements of human rights as we experience may seem trifling to those elsewhere who live in poverty and under dictatorships. But even though temporary suspension of the right to collective bargaining is slight in comparison with the persecutions, imprisonments, tortures and murders which people suffer in oppressive regimes, it is dangerous to play down the significance of intervention by democratic governments.

The freedom of individuals to form trade unions to negotiate with employers and defend their members' interests without government interference is one of the cornerstones of the democratic system we enjoy in most of the industrialised countries. Politicians in these countries should not be allowed to apply double standards and make passionate declarations about the importance of free trade unions in South Africa and in other oppressive regimes while at the same time encroaching on the rights of trade unions in their own countries. Nor should governments be allowed to curtail the right to free collective bargaining.

Grass violations of human rights in other countries must never be used to excuse violations by democratic governments. Once again I draw attention to the importance of the ILO as the only body to which trade unions can turn. The ILO has earned respect for its concern over human rights' violations. It is therefore a matter of prime importance that it should set its aims high, maintain its vigilance and not slacken its demand that governments should respect freedoms.

Now, as we are discussing recovery and employment, we must remember the fundamental importance of a free labour movement for democratic decision-making, for ensuring that agreements will be honoured and for securing the unity which is necessary if society is to function successfully. Full respect for all human rights is a precondition for long-term economic progress.

Original - Spanish: Mr. CALVO GALINDO (Employers' delegate, Bolivia) - I have the honour to congratulate the President on behalf of the employers of Bolivia; I sincerely wish that the deliberations of this Conference, under his able leadership, will achieve every success.

I should like to extend this greeting to all the participants of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference.

This meeting is taking place at a time of radical change at the international level. The world economy is starting to show some encouraging trends, although there are still marked differences between the uncertain outlook of the developing countries and the more promising situation in the industrialised countries. There are also some positive signs at the international political level. A more open approach, which may prove to be greatly beneficial, has been adopted in some of the socialist countries, which have started to introduce practices and mechanisms in their economies which correspond to market forces, abandoning the dogmatic views which imposed rigid centralised planning, and freeing economic activities from a pervasive and negative control.

These signs of change are but the initial expression of radical transformations which will, beyond a doubt, be born of the urgent need to start the twenty-first century with new forms of co-operation and exchange between the members of the international community. An eminent Latin American writer recently pointed out that our epoch is a time of internationalisation of the economy and of culture. It is a time of a world market of ideas, technology, goods, capital and information. He went on to say that a country which closes itself off instead of opening itself to the world, condemns itself to stagnation and barbarism.

Thus, the major themes chosen as topics for consideration at this Conference should be discussed and analysed in this context, bearing in mind that the major problems of backwardness, unemployment and extreme poverty can only be solved by a co-ordinated effort of co-operation strengthening the close link which exists between economic progress and social progress.

The Director-General suggested recovery and employment as the central themes of this Conference. His diagnosis, as usual, is based on a sound scientific analysis. The profound analysis of both aspects in his Report provides a synthesis of the imperative of a structural readjustment based on the creation of labour-intensive industries which also make intensive use of the raw materials of the country concerned. This readjustment must also have an ethical dimension, that of full solidarity in bearing the enormous social cost which invariably accompanies such policies.

This implies a different approach of States to the acquirements and obligations of interdependency. As has already been said many times, an isolated effort to overcome a crisis in a country's economy is doomed to inadequacy and even futility unless it is backed by a receptive foreign sector and adopts a long-term view.

We know where the problems are and we know how to overcome them, but we have to stress that it is not enough to make a precise diagnosis, which may be reduced to a mere theoretical exercise if it is not backed by a firm political decision inspired by the conviction that an economically stable and socially just future can only be built if we admit that exclusive and selfish prosperity cannot last.

For example, the foreign debt causes the least developed countries to become chronic net exporters of capital, which reduces their productive investment and virtually brings to a standstill investment in health, housing, education and other basic services.

The Director-General of the ILO mentions in his Report that in Latin America the debt service ratio exceeds 40 per cent of exports. In a world context which is becoming increasingly interdependent, as I have said, we have to find common solutions. The increase in bank interest rates and new protectionist measures which have exacerbated the already very difficult situation of the developing countries have had very serious social consequences. We have to insist, therefore, on the need for common solutions if we really wish to build a future which is less unjust.

The major challenge in the years to come is the creation of jobs. For this, economic growth must go hand in hand with an improved distribution of income. In the Latin American region the population increases at a rate of almost 2½ per cent per year, calling for the creation of 5 million new jobs per year merely in order to prevent the present situation from deteriorating.

Various adjustment policies have been attempted, with varying results. Because it was an interesting experience, and one which personally I went through, I shall give you a brief account of the results of the programme carried out in Bolivia. I am also doing it because I feel it is a duty of member States of the ILO to share their experience and to contribute as much information as possible to the analysis of such a vast and important subject as that covered by the permanent mandate of this Organisation.

In August 1985 the Bolivian economy was in a state of collapse with an annual inflation rate of about 24,000 per cent. The gross national product was falling for the fourth consecutive year and we had a general shortage of basic consumer goods, a largely over-valued national currency and practically non-existent international reserves.

Among the causes for this situation were an inflated public sector with uncontrolled expenditure to finance the deficit with the unbacked issue of money. On the other hand tax revenues had dropped considerably because of the erosion of the taxable income. In order to deal with this situation it was necessary radically to change the conditions in which the economy had been operating, especially in the public sector. To do this, structural adjustment measures had to be adopted, such as the elimination of price controls and subsidies; free wage fixing in the private sector through direct negotiation; the establishment of free trade; fixing of a low customs duty; a floating exchange rate and the lifting of restrictions on the employment of labour, in strict compliance with our labour laws.

We reorganised some of the major public companies. A tax reform was introduced which simplified the system and reduced contact between the taxpayer and the tax administration, a new tax register was drawn up and a new tax system was also devised. We launched a reform of the systems of government administration and control.

This set of measures enabled us to achieve monetary stability and laid the groundwork for a resumption of growth despite unfavourable external conditions. This year Bolivia will have an inflation rate of 10 per cent per year, the lowest in Latin America, and its economy will have grown for the third consecutive year. This stability is based on the economic and structural reforms which I have just mentioned and strict tax discipline. These internal efforts of Bolivia earned us the respect of the international community, which restored normal relations with the financial community. This additional financing does not, however, solve the problem of Bolivia's foreign debt, which is still one of the major factors preventing further economic recovery.

Bolivia's foreign debt, though small in absolute terms, is very great in relation to the size of the economy. Thus, in 1986 our foreign debt was equivalent to 119 per cent of the gross national product, and the debt service is huge compared to our few exports.

Bolivia was one of the first countries to negotiate its debt with private banks, and we have already been able to redeem a reduction of 70 per cent with the help of friendly countries; part of this will be reinvested in the country.

Bilateral debt accounts for more than 50 per cent of the total, and Bolivia has succeeded fairly well in the negotiations which were carried out within the Club of Paris, the rules of which fail to take sufficient account of the real ability of countries to fulfil their obligations, especially the situations of low income such as is the case in Bolivia.

In conclusion, it is not sufficient to have internal discipline such as that exercised by Bolivia, nor is it enough to rely on limited foreign financing; it is necessary to find a radical solution to the debt crisis through far more receptive attitudes on the part of the creditors.

The economic crisis and the need to adopt adjustment measures have had repercussions on the employment situation and have aggravated unemployment and underemployment; thus the open unemployment rate, which was only 7 per cent at the beginning of this decade, was over 11 per cent last year; add to this the figure for open underemployment and we reach a total of about 20 per cent.

It should also be pointed out that public investment, according to estimates of the present Government, will only partly solve the unemployment problem.

In conclusion, I should like to point out that there are new ideas for economic integration along practical and dynamic lines and it is up to us to make a commitment to create a world for future generations, one of increasing harmony and solidarity. If we all pool our creative ability, with a vision which is as wide as possible, I am convinced that we will inaugurate a new age, one which will be free of the tensions and uncertainties looming over us today.

Mr. MAPURANGA (representative of the Organisation of African Unity) – I would like to associate myself with previous speakers in congratulating the President on his election.

Allow me also to convey, before this august assembly, on behalf of the Organisation of African Unity, sincere and hearty congratulations to Mr. Michel Hansenne, the new Director-General of the ILO on his well-deserved and merited election to the high office of Director-General of the ILO. While congratulating him on his worthy election, I wish to take this opportunity to pledge the OAU's continued support and co-operation to him and the ILO in areas of mutual interest and common concern. Let me also seize this opportunity to pay tribute to the former Director-General, Mr. Francis Blanchard, for his sterling service to the ILO. He was a long-tested friend and ardent collaborator of the African region of the ILO's sphere of operations.

This session of the Conference is being held at a very critical juncture in Africa's socio-economic history. The continent is in its eighth year of economic recession, and indeed for some countries it is even the tenth year, without any visible sign that the recession, and indeed the depression, is abating.

A combination of unfavourable factors has led to a growing impoverishment in the region to the point that it is currently estimated that over half of the African population live below the poverty datum-line, and the situation is steadily worsening in the social services areas, particularly in education, nutrition, public health and housing. The Director-General's Report on Recovery and employment has clearly highlighted the predicament of Africa as the one region most severely affected by the current world recession. On a national level, the Director-General's Report has laid emphasis on the need for structural adjustment policies to take into account the principles of social equity, and especially to cater for the protection of the most socially disadvantaged and therefore the most vulnerable sections of the population. The OAU would like to congratulate the Director-General for this very incisive and perceptive analysis of the situation now prevailing in national economies. The report has quite rightly recommended a global approach to the solution of the problems now confronting the world economy. The OAU would like to submit, that inasmuch as special attention should be given to the disadvantaged and vulnerable social groups in the national process of structural adjustment, similar treatment should be accorded to the most severely affected regions, particularly Africa, in the process of restructuring the world economy. It is my sincere hope that discussion on this vital issue will lead to the attainment of an efficient process of structural adjustment at both national and global levels, the revival of growth, greater social equity, as well as contribute to the elaboration of the International Development Strategy for the United Nations Fourth Development Decade, in which the reduction of poverty and unemployment should figure as important objectives.

The Director-General's Report has quite correctly identified the excruciating debt burden as the single major constraint to recovery and growth in the Third World countries. While the OAU would like to congratulate France for its generous and far-sighted action in writing off the debts of a substantial number of countries, we would like to insist that only a global approach to the debt question by creditor and debtor countries will provide a viable, lasting and equitable solution to this crucial issue. African Heads of State and Government met in an extraordinary session of a summit meeting on the question of the African debt. They spelt out a common African position on the matter, and called for an international conference on the African debt problem. I call on the ILO to support Africa's current efforts to convene such an international conference.

In the specific field of labour and employment, the OAU organised the Twelfth Ordinary Session of the OAU Labour Commission in Bujumbura, Burundi, in March/April this year. The theme of the Labour Commission was "The challenge of employment promotion and planning in Africa". That Conference's major theme as you can see, was germane to the Director-General's chosen theme for the present ILO Conference: recovery and employment.

I wish to apprise this Conference of the unpalatable fact that the deprived African labour force has reached the limits of its endurance, as evidenced by the numerous recent civil eruptions leading to loss of lives in a number of African countries as a result of unemployment, growing impoverishment and soaring food prices. Armed robberies, burglaries and all sorts of crimes and delinquency are on the increase in many African urban centres, and even in cities which were hitherto citadels of peace. It is therefore now crystal clear that the social fabric as well as the much needed political stability of African society stand in great jeopardy, as prospects for economic recovery remain exceedingly bleak.

The OAU is deeply preoccupied with the vital issues of recession, recovery and structural adjustment with a human face. To that end, we are of the considered opinion that given the gravity of the employment situation in Africa, a joint study entitled "The challenge of employment and structural adjustment measures in Africa" should be undertaken by the ILO/JASPA, in the ILO/SATEP, the ECA and the OAU, and a document be presented to the African Heads of State and Government through the OAU Labour Commission and the UNECA's Conference of African Ministers.

It is to be noted that the Conference will also consider the Special Report submitted by the Director-General in application of paragraph 5(a) of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia adopted by the Conference in 1988 as well as the report prepared by the Governing Body's Committee on Discrimination in pursuance of paragraph 5(b) of the Declaration. It will also be recalled that the 75th Session decided to urge the Conference's Committee on action against apartheid to continue to monitor with increased vigour action against apartheid.

In this connection, I wish to commend the ILO for the able and efficient manner with which it has followed up and monitored the developments in South Africa and in Namibia. I particularly wish to underscore the fact that the role of the ILO is commendable in the defence of human rights in general, and in particular, those of the underprivileged and expropriated in Southern Africa, as well as its role in technical assistance by way of technical, professional and vocational training.

It would indeed be remiss of me, while talking on apartheid in South Africa, not to talk about the denial of political, social, economic, legal and human rights to the large majority of the populace in that country. The continuation of the abhorrent system of apartheid – a crime against humanity – as well as South Africa's aggression against independent African States is heightening the state of mistrust and conflict and endangering regional peace and security. The black workers in that country particularly suffer from institutionalised racism and racial discrimination by the Pretoria regime.

In order to bring about any meaningful action against the Pretoria regime, I wish to appeal to the international Community to support the principled stand of the OAU of adopting comprehensive mandatory sanctions against that regime. We also declare that only the following conditions can lead to a conducive atmosphere for negotiation, namely: the unconditional release of all political prisoners including Nelson Mandela; the lifting of the ban on the ANC and PAC and all other anti-apartheid organisations; the lifting of the state of emergency, which was renewed only recently; the withdrawal of the army from the African townships; and the repeal of the notorious Labour Relations Act.

With regard to Namibia's independence, we pay special tribute to the People's Republic of Angola for its selfless sacrifice and invaluable contribution in defeating the forces of racist aggression and thus setting in motion the independence process in Namibia. We, in the Organisation of African Unity are watching with keen interest but guarded optimism. In that connection, we call for the immediate declaration of a general amnesty and the repeal of all discriminatory laws to facilitate the repatriation of Namibian refugees and their participation in the electoral process which was launched recently. The OAU wishes to express, as it has always done in the past, its abhorrence for the brutal treatment being meted out to the workers in occupied Palestine and other Arab lands which have been forcibly occupied by Israel. The Organisation of African Unity's sentiments of militant solidarity with the Palestinian workers are part of our Organisation's wider concern for human and people's rights, as well as the struggle against colonialism, racism and zionism.

We urge this session of the Conference to support the resolution on the condition of workers in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories.

Original – Spanish: – Mr. FAVELEVIC (Employers' delegate, Argentina) – Let me first congratulate Mr. Nkomo for his appointment as President of this assembly.

This is a welcome occasion for Argentine employers, who are confident that his enlightened leadership will ensure the success of this meeting.

As representative of the Industrial Union of Argentina and on behalf of the other employers' bodies making up this delegation, I should also like to welcome the new Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne.

In greeting the man who is assuming the leadership of the Office as of this year – and I wish him full success in his task – I should like to request him to pay particular attention to the concerns and needs of the developing countries so that their efforts to carry out economic change as the springboard of social progress and growth should take place within a framework of social dialogue.

The International Labour Organisation, which has already carried out an essential task, will in future have to play a role combining its international dimension with the delicate task of ensuring that social peace, human dignity and the development of all peoples should be compatible goals which are achieved through constructive contributions made by governments, trade unions and employers' organisations in an effort to overcome the serious crisis afflicting many of our countries with a crushing external debt combined with stagnation, lack of investment and underemployment. I should also like to welcome Mr. Francis Blanchard who for so many years has presided over the destiny of this Office and whose skilful, intelligent management is undeniably a source of satisfaction to the member countries of this Organisation.

The documents which are submitted to our meeting year after year, and which I have had the opportunity to comment in my capacity as delegate for several sessions, provides the reader with a combination of analysis and doctrine conducive to in-depth thought and containing useful guidance.

One may wonder how the Argentine employers can be attending this meeting when their country is without any doubt facing the worst economic crisis ever recorded in the history of this century.

One may also ponder the survival chances of a productive undertaking when the oppressive financial situation facing our enterprises is exacerbated by a lack of supplies, restrictions to free trade and a lack of measures to overcome the negative situations and the truly frightening inflationary pressure.

Furthermore, recent acts of violence have shocked public opinion, both nationally and internationally. Disturbances, plunder and vandalism have regrettably claimed a number of victims.

These events, precipitated by shortages and a lack of essential products, were made use of by activists who attempted, through disruption and a rumour and disinformation campaign, to upset the normal transfer of power between the two democratically elected Governments.

The Government reacted within the framework of the law to restore public order and to put into operation constitutional mechanisms which were supported by the majority of parties in the National Congress.

The measures adopted also received the consensus of the trade unions, the employers' organisations and the community in general.

Nevertheless, we have various points to raise in this forum.

First of all, we should like to recall that we predicted this delicate situation, although not in its present dimension and depth, many years ago in this same forum when we said that, both for circumstances beyond our control and because of mistakes made in our economic policy, Argentina had to face a considerable uphill battle to cope with its external debt whose annual interest represented more than 50 per cent of its exports. While we wished to comply with our international commitments, the restrictions imposed on the import of our products combined with the subsidies which certain countries afforded to their exports, seriously hampered all efforts to achieve that objective.

We also stated that free international trade and preferential treatment of countries with serious financial problems stood to promote their recovery without aggravating the delicate situation of internal recession in which they found themselves.

The external debt, we said, would have to be refinanced so that its staggering in time and the sum of annual interest should not endanger internal growth nor curb the imports necessary to maintain it.

We urged that inflation should be combated through the gradual elimination of other factors producing it, that is by tackling its causes and not its consequences, for any system of control would constitute an artificial remedy leading to repressed inflation accompanied by in-depth distortions in the productive system and in the operation of private enterprise.

Private enterprise and investment were defined as the stimulus of growth and profitability as the legitimate objective of any productive activity within the legal and ethical framework within which it should develop. Without this, there could be no investment and economic growth would be insubstantial.

That growth, we said, would make it possible to devise an in-depth solution to the employment problem on the basis of high productivity jobs affording greater income and access to a higher standard of living and social mobility. The financial system must be at the service of production. Rates of interest must be compatible with enterprise profitability.

Conditions must be created to channel savings towards investment rather than speculation. The action of the State in the economic field must be guiding, not dictating.

The State should not deploy productive activities which could be assumed by the private sector.

Public expenditure must be reduced to an extent which should enable the private sector to grow and should not be converted into disguised unemployment, but should be channelled towards the satisfaction of genuine needs and the rendering of services in line with the rate of growth of the remainder of the economy.

I also added that, even if the problem of the refinancing of our external debt was overcome in an effort to contain the galloping external debt, any policy designed to improve the distribution of income ran the risk of failure given the unbearable level of inflation. Circumstances unfortunately have confirmed this prediction.

Remain assured that our analysis, over and above its accuracy, is a source not of satisfaction but of great concern because the wrong course charted for the country's economy has seriously jeopardised our chances of development and the well-being of our population.

We have also come to this important international forum to convey the fact that, although the adversity of circumstances has impaired us, it has not destroyed our determination to be the starting point of a project for growth which combines the ideals of private initiative, productive investment, technological transformation and social progress.

Our nation has learnt through painful experience in the political field the lesson, which has today become a conviction, that only democratic mechanisms within a constitutional framework can ensure freedom – both individual freedom and economic and political freedom.

That is why economic freedom, so often postponed requires established and permanent rules of the game, which only democracy can accept and recognise.

This is undoubtedly our first commitment towards the national and international community. But our society has also realised that without a healthy administration, without efficient allocation of available resources in the public field and without a restimulation of the private productive apparatus to generate a wider and better labour market, we cannot achieve the miracle of prosperity.

Our second commitment is to make all due efforts to ensure the implementation of the measures necessary for growth in peace.

There can be no distribution without production and productivity. The fallacy of ongoing adjustments to nominal salaries must yield to the reality of genuine rising salaries and the illusion of an artificial level of formal employment, masking high rates of underemployment and hidden poverty, must give way to the reality of genuine productive employment with a multiplying effect.

That is why, as our third point, we should like to stress our belief in the truths emanating from our joint work within the International Labour Organisation.

We are here to bear witness to the fact that political freedom in the field of labour relations requires full respect for the autonomous and collective will, for freedom of workers' and employers' organisations and for negotiation even in times of crisis.

We are here also to support fully respect for the fundamental rights of workers, but also to recall that there can be no worker without an employer, there can be no fruitful work without efficient production and there can be no efficient production without a framework of stable economic rules, the best of which have been universally proven to be those which enable the widespread development of private initiative.

We maintain that labour relations should be established freely and adjusted to reciprocal needs, keeping in view the project of economic growth of which they are part, thus leading to a combination of protection with adaptation and victory with flexibility.

Finally, we have also pointed out that an unbalanced economy leads to unbalanced social security, and that by the same token inefficient allocation of resources and disorder which leads to the crisis of the economic system inexorably involve the subsystem of social security.

This means that in our case the latter will have to be restructured and turned into a proper mechanism to serve efficiently as a social security system, covering the basic risks to which workers are exposed, at a total cost which will neither endanger the competitiveness of our products, fall on the consumer or displace us from the external markets necessary to trigger the reactivation of production and increase our supply of foreign currency.

While applauding the efforts that have gone into the Report of the Director-General, we must express the hope that, despite the difficulties involved, its title, "Recovery and Employment", should not be merely a compendium of obstacles to its implementation, but should convey the conviction necessary to turn the wish, which is quite feasible, into a positive reality embodied in the well-being of our peoples.

Original - Russian: Mr. BULGAK (Workers' delegate, Byelorussian SSR). It is my pleasure to add my congratulations to those extended to the President on his election to a post of such great responsibility and to wish him every success in his work.

The report submitted to us by the Director-General raises topical issues of great relevance and of crucial importance to workers and their trade unions. This Report analyses the economic situation and mentions facts and trends which affect social and economic development. Particular importance is given to this topic because of the 70th anniversary of the establishment of the International Labour Organisation. This anniversary has given us an opportunity to take stock of what can be done within the framework of the ILO to resolve such vital issues as the right to work, job creation and the improvement of working conditions. I should like to stress the importance in this connection of support for those areas of ILO activity set forth in the letter of congratulation from the Chairman of the Soviet Ministers of the USSR, Comrade Richkov, on the occasion of the 70th anniversary of the ILO.

Over the past decade, the labour and social situation in the world, as stated in the Report, has given cause for serious concern. We are obliged to agree with this. Figures and facts which have been cited in the Report on the continuing high level of unemployment and underemployment, on the reduction of government spending on social services, and the deterioration in the quality of life, in particular the environmental conditions in many places, eloquently advocate the need for urgent measures to improve the existing situation. We are convinced that the World Employment Programme, adopted by the International Labour Organisation in 1969, requires fundamental changes. The introduction of new technology - on the one hand, the problem of unemployment and the deterioration of the situation of workers, on the other, require the adoption of appropriate standards on the part of the ILO with a view to developing and implementing national and international policies, to limit unemployment, to create employment and to guarantee the right to work. Trade unions see this as one of their principal tasks and await from the International Labour Organisation further effort toward the development of measures and recommendations for the achievement of positive changes in the field of labour and social policy.

A radical reform in the employment programme at this juncture could be furthered if all countries worked together to implement the concept of development through disarmament. This concept is based on a deep conviction that the material and financial resources released as a result of disarmament could be successfully used to solve existing social problems, including the problem of underdevelopment. In this light, activities in the productive sector are especially relevant and concern the trade unions particularly. I am referring to the conversion of the armaments economy into a disarmament economy - the conversion of military production. Of course this is difficult to do; it calls for structural changes in the economy, and the retraining of many workers. But all this is possible, and the International Labour Organisation and all its member States should make every effort along these lines and use every opportunities to achieve positive results in this sphere.

We fully support the provisions of the Report which call upon States to make every efforts to achieve economic recovery, and we feel that the ILO can make a significant contribution to assisting member States in creating jobs. For instance, it would be very useful to prepare a research study on the problems faced by countries attempting to achieve full employment; it would also be useful to carry out a study of the inter-relationship between environmental protection, economic development and employment, with a view to drawing up appropriate recommendations. When a programme is drawn up for economic growth and recovery of course social issues should not be pushed into the background.

We also fully share the concern expressed by many delegates during this discussion on the state of the environment. The repercussions of major ecological, natural and industrial disasters are felt not only by communities, but by each individual as well. We need urgent and vigorous measures to protect our habitat.

The Byelorussian SSR is this year also celebrated its 70th anniversary from the day of its foundation. For us this is a milestone where we are taking stock of what we have done, examining and analysing our achievements and failures, and deciding on priorities and long-term tasks to be undertaken in building up our socialist country.

In our Republic we now have a widespread process of restructuring – “perestroika” – and qualitative transformation of all aspects of the life of our society. Workers’ rights have been extended in all areas of activity; there is a large scale development of democracy, openness (“glasnost”), consolidation of legal and material rights and freedoms of citizens, and we are implementing economic reform. The trade unions of Byelorussia, with a membership of over 5 million people, are participating actively in carrying through a policy to speed up the social and economic development of our society. Our trade unions support the reform of labour and pension legislation and the reorientation of the national economy. We particularly favour the conversion of a number of heavy industrial enterprises to the production of consumer goods and a reorientation of the defence industry to the production of civilian goods. The trade unions are working to ensure that structural changes in the economy do not lead to unemployment and that the proposed reform of retail prices will be carried out only after nation-wide consultation and not lead to a drop in the living standards of the population.

Priority areas in our work are the protection of workers’ interests and an active social policy. The trade unions of our Republic participated directly in the planning and now the implementation of a housing construction programme. The conditions have been created for providing every family with its own apartment or house by the year 2000.

Our trade unions also consider ways of improving the environment in our Republic. Given today’s standards of environment-friendly technology, it has been recognised that it is not advisable in future to build new chemical, petro-chemical and micro-biological plants, or any metal-intensive plants for the engineering industry, on the territory of Byelorussia. Taking into account the demands of workers and the community in Byelorussia, work has stopped on building a nuclear power plant. Efforts are to eradicate the effects on the territory of our Republic of the accident at the Chernobyl nuclear power plant and to create safe living and working conditions for the population in the affected areas are continuing. Also, close medical monitoring systems have been established in that area.

Trade unions are working to extend worker participation in enterprise management. During this period of economic reform, we have the following task: the progress from participation to self-management at the workplace, to give workers’ collectives the broadest possible rights in forming self-management bodies. A collective may rent facilities and equipment from a state enterprise and then independently manage its production and income. Thus we achieve a situation where each member of the collective has direct access to management of the enterprise and distribution of the profits.

In a word, in our work we proceed on the principle that trade unions should be active participants in changes in all areas which affect workers’ interests.

This year, as you know, progressive peoples throughout the world have been celebrating the 100th anniversary of the day of international workers’ solidarity, 1 May. We feel that this anniversary deserves universal respect and recognition as a testimony to the international co-operation of workers, striving together to protect their rights and interests.

We are convinced that if we are to achieve the difficult goals of economic recovery and improvement of the lives of the workers, there has to be a favourable climate for the implementation of an effective social policy in every country. Such a favourable climate is greatly favoured by international détente, by an atmosphere of trust and stable peace, by the development of equitable economic co-operation and mutually beneficial trade, and by the implementation of measures guaranteeing the right to work and the observance of and respect for other human rights and freedoms. I should like to express my conviction that the International Labour Organisation will intensify its work and contribute to the solution of these and many other very important problems.

Original – Portuguese: Mr. MEIRELLES (Employers’ delegate, Brazil) – First of all, as Employers’ delegate of Brazil, I should like to congratulate Mr. Nkomo on his election to the post of the President of this session of the Conference. For me it is an honour and a double responsibility to represent Brazilian employers before the 76th session of the International Labour Conference.

The first responsibility is the interest all of us have in complying with the fundamental aims of the International Labour Organisation which contribute to social justice, to permanent peace and the right to all human beings, independent of race, religion or sex, to seek material well-being and spiritual development in conditions of freedom, dignity, economic security and equal opportunities.

My second responsibility, as a man employed in the production sector, is to work towards the attainment of effective conditions to produce resources to make it possible to achieve the ideals which are common to all men of good will.

We are living in a time of tremendous change, both in the international arena and in the domestic situation of all nations. In 1992 Europe will be united from the Atlantic Ocean to the Ural Mountains and will become the second world Power. This fact will cause other countries to unite, according to their respective continental situations and it will also guide them towards a series of domestic changes in order to adapt their production rhythms to the needs of a wider market and, furthermore, will bring domestic labour and consumption conditions more in line with those of more developed countries.

Over the last 30 years, Brazil has endeavoured to develop itself economically and to achieve a larger participation in the international trade market.

To assist it in attaining these goals, Brazil had, especially after 1960, the collaboration of enterprises from practically all the developed countries of the world. Being the result of a mixture of races, customs and religions, Brazilians have never had any difficulty in absorbing new technologies and teachings. Brazilian people have always shown a great interest in reaching higher levels of education, wealth and creativity.

At present, this endeavour has been contested by additional problems, basically derived from the very high commitments of foreign debt, protectionist measures, either hidden or open ones, which have been adopted by international trade leading to a drop in the prices of basic products, and the difficulties the Government has had in determining less floating exchange rates.

In the same way as all other nations, the Brazilian people are trying to find alternative uses for existing resources. It is no longer acceptable in this modern world, dominated by instant communication, to isolate considerable portions of the population with a low level of education and with a subsistence level of agriculture. In the farthest areas of the country there is the demand for opportunities to lead a useful life, and for the customs and possibilities of consumption available in the larger cities, just like in the United States and Europe.

For these reasons, roads, hydro-electric plants and telephone exchanges were built. Together with such marks of civilisation, we see the growth of small business entities such as store-houses and middle-men.

Brazil has now existed for almost five centuries and the marks of civilisation can be seen throughout virtually the whole of its territory. Brazil finds that the spread of civilisation is a very high investment with a slow return, which thus does not solve all its problems at a stroke.

Modernisation carries in itself the paradox of no possible retreat. It requires more and more investment, training of staff, education for the new generations, companies and enterprises capable of generating employment according to the demand of more specialised labour.

It is not sufficient for a country that is becoming modernised to give a piece of land to each unemployed person. What it should really do is to make present education requirements comply with what is necessary for full social integration. The benefits of general rights of citizenship without discrimination are very often unavailable due to the need to achieve a faster return on investments or due to the difficulty of promoting the integration of certain portions of the population which were isolated in the past.

It is not always easy to reconcile policies of economic development in a country where great attention is paid to the preservation of regional customs and uses. We have an example of this in the Amazon region where about three-quarters of the nation's potential hydroelectric power is concentrated. Another example is the ground firing, an old Indian custom adopted later by the colonists in order to accelerate new growth of grass just after the dry season and which became the fastest way of eliminating forests.

The truth is that the country cannot eliminate its development. It cannot prevent development, although we do acknowledge the fact that we should really endeavour to preserve the environment. However, preservation of the environment creates a need for new investment in the production of energy and for basic sanitation and public health.

Brazil is still very far from having rural areas such as those found in Europe, close to the amenities of urban areas, and the excessive growth of metropolitan areas creates endless problems related to water supply and sewage treatment.

At the same time, the country needs a period of economic and financial stability in order to become capable of programming its own full development by fighting the imbalances.

There is much to do in Brazil. From the macro division of the hydrographic basins and the agricultural possibilities of our soil to industrial planning, urban sanitation, protection of springs and protection of the soil against erosion and caking.

There is, of course, a place in such efforts for the participation of other countries, but we should not forget that many of these problems were imported together with the expectation of participation in the economic and cultural development of the whole world.

The lack of objective measures to determine the link between the countryside and the cities within the resources which society can really count on, over a relatively short period, may be due more to the lack of general economic planning than to ideological questions or to aggravations amongst social classes.

The high price the country is paying for not having an adequate distribution of its urban and rural populations should, of course, deserve more attention from Brazilian and international experts, because Brazil is still a country of large open spaces with considerable sectors of the population living outside the formal economy both in the countryside and in the cities.

In the past, it was thought that it would be easier to protect women from the inconveniences of night work although such a measure could also be seen as a restriction of free employment practices. There are several questions which should be taken into consideration, according to historical needs and economic requirements rather than just simple moral obligations.

Brazilian employers do not consider themselves as having better qualities or worse defects than any others but it is certain that as human beings they are interested in preserving the integrity of their country for full use by the future generation.

Mr. SHARMA (Government delegate, Guyana) – May I, first of all, convey on behalf of myself and other members of my delegation our warm and sincere congratulations to Mr. Nkomo on his unanimous election as President of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. Aware as we are of his wide experience and intimate knowledge of labour matters, we are confident that the Conference will achieve outstanding results under his able guidance and capable management.

We are meeting at a crucial moment in world development. There is a growing tendency to bring regional global conflicts around the negotiating table, rather than attempting to settle them through force of arms. As the cry for peace and social justice advances, military might recedes. There is a greater understanding and more sympathy for debtor nations struggling to achieve economic growth and to honour debt repayment obligations. With these changes in the landscape of world consciousness, the International Labour Organisation has a relevant and urgent role to play.

The ILO's fundamental principle of social justice and equality for all is even more relevant today. It is a fact that poverty anywhere constitutes a threat to peace and freedom everywhere. When the International Labour Organisation was conceived in 1919, its founders cherished what may be regarded as lofty ideals. But today those ideals have continued to be the mainstream of activity of the Organisation. As world crises develop and worsen, more attention is paid to the relieving benefits which flow from the operational functions of the International Labour Organisation. More programmes are required and one cannot help observing that already there are some 12 technical programmes and several field programmes in Africa, Asia, the Americas, Europe and the Arab States. Yet, budgetary proposals for the period 1990-91 have been estimated to be some, US$31 million less. The problem confronting the International Labour Organisation is how it can provide improved, expanded services of a consistently high standard to member States, with reduced financial resources.

The Director-General, in Part II of his Report, has succinctly stated the several programmes undertaken by the International Labour Organisation in the year 1988. It is heartening to note that some emphasis has been placed on improving the working and living conditions of women workers. It is in that light that my delegation welcomes the discussion on the technical subject of night work on this year's agenda. My country subscribes to the view that women workers are just as important as men workers to any structural adjustment programme, and therefore must of necessity be freed from their cultural stereotypes. It is important that they be ensured of equality of opportunity and treatment with men workers – all things being equal.

The Report shows that workers' activities have been increased. In my country, workers' education has been given special attention by the International Labour Organisation and the Government. However, there need to be more assistance to rural workers' organisations and other non-governmental organisations. There must be a sustained effort to expand educational activities in all its forms. The International Labour Organisation has been particularly concerned with employers' activities in the area of institutional support and small enterprise development. We welcome these forms of assistance and urge the International Labour Organisation to continue its work in these areas.

I note with interest the work done in the area of employment activities generally. We do agree that labour market flexibility can and does influence unemployment and, therefore, the question of more flexible labour systems for vulnerable groups, such as women, older workers and young people, need to be examined for their efficacy. More assistance is needed in the promotion of employment and incomes in the informal sector as a matter of urgency.

The International Labour Organisation must be commended for its work in management development. With the introduction of technology and the loss of skills to the industrialised nations of the world, there is an ongoing need for training and retraining of management workers to undertake the urgent task of economic recovery in many of the developing countries.

It is some source of satisfaction to note that, arising from our suggestion, discussions are being conducted with the Italians to finance the attachment of an adviser on this very important aspect of International Labour Organisation work – labour standards – at the Regional Office of the International Labour Organisation in the Caribbean. This, if materialised, will be of immense benefit to member States in the region as a whole.

The work of the Caribbean Labour Administration Centre (CLAC) as the focal point of technical assistance must be commended, but Guyana looks forward to more assistance through national projects and supports the International Labour Organisation's efforts to establish a world association of public employment services. As for its case studies, much interest is shown in its several research projects on technology and its effects in the socio-economic and employment spheres, and on its applications in food, export crops, plant oils, food processing, animal feed and dairy industries as a means of alleviating rural poverty.

Guyana is the recipient of technical assistance from the International Labour Organisation in the area of vocational and technical education and training. There is an urgent demand to meet the requirements of industries and to deal with the matter of the urban and rural unemployed. Hence, the International Labour Organisation needs to intensify its assistance, both quantitatively and qualitatively, particularly to deal with school leavers, young people and women. Appropriate skills for self-employment looms as the single major concern.

Mention must be made of the sectoral activities of the Organisation. My country is particularly mindful of the assistance rendered in the field of co-operativism and hotel and tourism. These areas have shown that they have considerable economic potential and can contribute towards growth and development in Guyana. While co-operativism is the bedrock of our nation's philosophy, there are still institutional and other problems which have an adverse impact on the sector. Many publicised efforts are being made to promote tourism with a view to reinvigorating a somewhat dormant economic activity with much potential for economic growth. The International Labour Organisation's inputs in these areas are timely and of invaluable assistance in enabling the country to achieve its economic goals and objectives.

In this regard, it is significant to note that the Caribbean Office of the International Labour Organisation has established the post of regional adviser on co-operatives and, to date, two subregional meetings for registrars of co-operatives have been successfully organised. My Government is pleased to say that the International Labour Organisation's contribution to co-operative development has gone further than simply providing an effective forum for those who have a responsibility to promote the sector. In response to a crying need, the Caribbean Office has been actively pursuing the establishment of a co-operatives management training project and the publication of a booklet on co-operatives in the Caribbean.

Let me now turn to the Director-General's Report on recovery and employment.

Guyana is no stranger to the global crises and the heavy social cost required for such global recovery. My country is a multi-racial, multi-party society, nestled on the north-east coast of South America, and made up of the descendants of mainly slaves and indentured labourers. It covers about 216,000 square kilometres, and has a population of some 786,000 people (1980 census). It has an equatorial climate, variable rainfall, high humidity and narrow variation of temperature. English is the official language and three main religions – Hinduism, Christianity and Islam – are practised. Parliamentary democracy and tripartism are the bedrock of our national life. Guyana is identified with Latin America geopolitically, but culturally with the English-speaking Caribbean. I make these observations because there is a tendency to identify Guyana with Africa, or still, as part of the historical experience of Latin America.

As mentioned before, the challenges of world economic problems have adversely affected the terms of trade and the balance of payments of Guyana. To overcome these difficulties, the Government has embarked on an economic recovery programme intended to reduce inflation, create employment opportunities, boost production, diversify the economic base and raise income levels, thereby reducing the cost of living and significantly improving the quality of life. To realise these objectives, the Government implemented a wide range of economic measures in consultation with the social partners. The government is aware that certain economic and social inconveniences will...

The PRESIDENT (Mrs. MOLKOVA) – ... I am sorry to say that you are exceeding your time-limit; would be so kind as to finish your speech as quickly as possible.

Mr. SHARMA – I wish at this point, to join previous speakers in wishing the Conference fruitful and successful deliberations.

The PRESIDENT (Mrs. MOLKOVA) – I give the floor to Mr. Wang, Worker's delegate, China, who wishes the exercise the right of reply in connection with the intervention of Mr. Vanderveken, representative of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

Original - Chinese: Mr. WANG (Worker's delegate, China) – The Chinese Workers' delegation regards what has happened recently in China as China's internal affair. The Chinese trade unions, which consistently uphold the fundamental interests of the Chinese working class, are entirely capable of handling their problems and do not need irresponsible remarks by others.

Earlier this afternoon, one speaker made a reference to recent events in China. We believe it is irrelevant to the theme of this Conference and is therefore inappropriate, and we cannot agree with it.

Seventy-sixth Session, Geneva, 1989

Eleventh sitting

Tuesday, 13 June 1989, 10 a.m.

President: Mr. Nkomo

FOURTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION:

The PRESIDENT – The first item on this morning's agenda is the adoption of the fourth report of the Selection Committee. I call upon Mr. Hammond, Government adviser, Canada, Chairman of the Selection Committee, to submit the report.

Mr. HAMMOND (Government adviser, Canada; Chairman of the Selection Committee) – I have the honour to submit to the Conference the fourth report of the Selection Committee which is to be found in Provisional Record No. 4C.

The report deals with a number of requests for representation at the Conference and in Conference committees submitted by non-governmental international organisations and with changes in the composition of committees.

I commend the report to the Conference for adoption.

The PRESIDENT – The fourth report of the Selection Committee is now before the Conference. If there are no objections, I take it that the report is adopted.

(The report is adopted.)

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

The PRESIDENT – We now move on to the next item on our agenda: the discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Mr. CASTRO (Government delegate, Philippines) – First of all, I would like to extend my congratulations to Mr. John Nkomo of Zimbabwe for having been elected President of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. I am confident that with his vast experience and knowledge, this session of the Conference will be guided to a fruitful conclusion.

Let me also congratulate once again the new Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Michel Hansenne.

This year marks the 70th anniversary of the ILO, an occasion that deserves to be celebrated globally. As with all anniversaries, this one presents itself as an opportunity for the Organisation and its individual member States to take objective stock of what has been achieved to date, as well as to renew their commitment to the ideals and objectives upon which the ILO was founded.

Since its formation in 1919, the ILO has had its share of challenges, most of which have been met successfully, others it is still continuing to strive for. In like manner, so too has my country, the Philippines, in the last three years since the Government of President Aquino took over, had to face seemingly insurmountable challenges of a democracy newly regained and an economy needing to recover.

In his Report, the Director-General of the ILO noted, and quite rightly, that although economic growth simplifies the task of reducing poverty and ensuring social progress, it does not ensure the attainment of social goals. This we recognise, because economic growth cannot be an end in itself. It is only a means for ensuring the enhancement of every person's life. It is for all, including and most especially for those who have contributed much to achieving growth but have not had the luxury of enjoying the fruits of their labour. What we therefore want to see in my country today is growth with equity – a target that is certainly more difficult to achieve.

Last year, the Philippine economy grew by 5.6 per cent, and there is little that will stop us from achieving our targeted rate of 6.5 per cent by the end of this year. But much still needs to be done. While official government statistics inform us that we have, as a result of the economic and social policies instituted, less families below the poverty line, poverty is admittedly still prevalent, particularly in the countryside. Our present policies and programmes are therefore geared towards directly addressing the rural poor. We have now set up a priority programme that is directed at the development of rural workers. By organising them into viable and self-reliant groups, by creating employment opportunities for them, as well as providing them with the economic means to generate income, the programme hopes to achieve its twin objectives of increasing their participation in economic and political decision-making and securing them an economic base from which to pursue their interests.

Reducing the incidence of poverty is, however, a responsibility that can and ideally should be shared by the sectors primarily responsible for generating growth and development. Workers, employers and government should stand side by side in this endeavour, and this can only be achieved if these sectors work together in an atmosphere of trust and confidence. No one sector can claim that it has a monopoly over ideas or resources, nor even a monopoly over sacrifice. Each has a distinct role to play within the social, political and economic milieu prevailing in the country today. That role I speak of revolves around employment generation, workers' protection and industrial harmony.

Poverty is largely traceable to unemployment and underemployment. It is with reason, therefore, that a large amount of government resources and policies have been geared towards employment creation, job facilitation and manpower development.

In 1988 our labour force stood at 23.5 million. It is expected to increase to 26.8 million by 1992. Last year, our unemployment rate was reduced to 9.7 per cent from the 11.2 per cent registered in 1987. This decrease was due to some 1.3 million jobs generated last year, absorbing most jobless Filipinos.

Our medium-term target is a 4.6 per cent unemployment rate by the year 1992. This would mean that between now and 1992, about 1.1 million jobs would have to be created annually, requiring for their generation investments of at least 1 billion dollars.

Of the 21.3 million employed in 1988, 65 per cent are employed in rural areas. We foresee an increase in this percentage in the medium term as the Government has started implementing programmes geared toward the generation of rural employment. As we brace ourselves for the next decade, we expect the agricultural sector to take the lead in absorbing an expanded labour force with a share of 45.9 per cent a year, the service sector with 37.7 per cent and the industrial sector with 16.4 per cent.

Underemployment, however, is a bigger problem. In 1987 some 33.6 per cent were underemployed. By the end of 1988 the underemployment rate went down to 29.1 per cent. This is hoped to be trimmed down to 25.2 per cent by 1992.

Underemployment rates in the rural sector are double those in the urban sector. The impact of this situation is reflected in the statistics showing poverty incidence to be highest in this sector. Many members of this sector continue to feel bereft of the benefits of the economic recovery that has been achieved in the last three years.

This is the very reason why our President has taken it upon herself to certify as urgent a bill that seeks to grant tax incentives and other benefits to countryside business enterprises. This is an attempt to bring about entrepreneurial spirit in our people and to allow our small- and medium-scale family-based business enterprises to grow with the least possible government intervention.

When passed, the bill is expected to give a major push to employment generation, investment promotion and income distribution in rural areas. It is a means by which the Government can allocate more resources directly into countryside development. It is one calculated move to bring growth and its benefits to our rural areas.

It would be foolhardy to claim or even expect immediate success in our development and recovery efforts. This will have to come slowly and painfully. But, if there must be sacrifices, let them be equitably shared, just as we hope to equitably share the benefits that we stand to gain in the future.

The need to generate employment must, however, be pursued without detraction from recognition of the need to ensure decent working conditions. For in the final analysis, slave labour or employment under undignified circumstances, is not worth having. Even in the midst of scarce job opportunities, workers must not be made to work in conditions that are inhumane and indecent. Protection of labour is thus of equally paramount concern to my Government.

As the ILO has so aptly stated: "Labour is not a commodity." The need to protect workers against sickness, disease and injury arising out of employment is a matter of universal concern. We have, in fact, two items on workers' protection before us. The item on night work is specially significant for us in view of our ratification of the Night Work (Women) Convention (Revised), 1948 (No. 89).

But we are equally concerned about the second item which deals with safety in the use of chemicals at work. This is undoubtedly an important matter that we keenly look forward to discussing. The need to evolve an international standard in the use of chemicals at work is long overdue.

At this point, let me address a matter that is of vital importance to all of us – the issue of human rights. This issue has occupied the centre stage in my country for quite a while now and continues to do so today. This is not so much because of a failure in this area but rather because we believe that vigilance is a prime prerequisite in successfully guaranteeing these rights.

The primacy of human rights as a policy of the State is enshrined in our Constitution. We have also established various mechanisms and institutions to ensure their observance. Two years ago, a permanent and independent Commission on Human Rights was created to investigate all forms of human rights' violations, involving civil and political rights, and to provide various other services to victims of human rights' violations.

This year, the Commission hopes to expand its regionally-based human rights promotion and protection programmes through the adoption of client-oriented strategies. It will also seek to establish local and international network development, as a means of forging alliances and commitment to human rights adherence.

Since its creation, the Commission has been successful in bringing a number of people, including military personnel, to court to answer for their alleged involvement in the violation of human rights. But vigilance in the field of human rights does not belong solely to this Commission. The entire Government is involved in this effort, and through the years various inter-agency committees have been created to assist the Commission in its work.

With respect to the rights of workers and trade unions, our Congress has recently passed a bill which originated from the work of a Tripartite Review Committee, created last year to propose amendments to our Labour Code. This new law undoubtedly assures more protection to workers and unions as it provides that: an order of reinstatement for a dismissed employee be immediately executory even pending appeal; it removes the three-year limit on the amount of back wages due to illegally dismissed employees; it allows employees to join unions even on their first day of employment; it democratizes the labour movement by requiring direct election of union officers; it limits the extraordinary powers of the President and of the Secretary of Labour to assume jurisdiction over labour disputes to "industries indispensable to the national interest". The law also provides for "improved offer balloting", whereby the Department of Labour and Employment, in the case of a strike or lock-out due to a deadlock in collective bargaining, shall conduct a referendum by secret balloting on the improved offer of the employer or the union, as the case may be.

The success of the Government in this area is, however, highly dependent on the co-operation of the people it seeks to protect. As our President aptly stated in her address to the Conference last year, "violations of human rights happen, even in democratic States most determined to protect them."

And while we shall not waver in our battle against this evil, our work will undoubtedly be made easier if we have the co-operation of the people. This is indispensable. Yet, there are some forces in my country today which persist in looking the other way, despite the Government's efforts to provide them with the protection they seek.

What they fail to understand is that the agenda of the Government with respect to human rights is enshrined in our Constitution – the very agenda set up by the Filipino people for their own government. Is it because these forces have another agenda in mind? Yet, the recognition of human rights is of paramount concern of the present Government, and it is with reason that we ask for their co-operation in this regard.

In closing, I would like to express my Government's satisfaction and appreciation of the work that the ILO has undertaken over the years. Allow me also to reaffirm once more my Government's support to the Organisation's mission – a programme that seeks to better the quality of life for the working man.

Original – Arabic: Mr. EL-HAK (Minister of Manpower and Training, Egypt) – In the name of God, the Merciful and the Compassionate: I have great pleasure in congratulating you on your election as President of this important session of the International Labour Conference, during which we shall discuss a great many topics which have considerable impact on economic and social development throughout the world. I am convinced that, thanks to your wisdom and experience, the work of our Conference will be crowned with success.

First of all, I should like to greet the new Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, wishing him every success in his mission, and that he will be "the best successor to the best predecessor".

I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate the International Labour Office and its former Director-General, Mr. Francis Blanchard, for the work done by the International Labour Organisation in 1988 despite the difficult financial situation. This is why I should like to express my appreciation for the services rendered by Mr. Blanchard to this Organisation.

We have noted with interest that half of the Organisation's technical co-operation budget last year was allocated to Africa and the least developed countries, and that efforts were focused on the promotion of labour-intensive programmes and projects, as well as programmes of structural adjustment, training and retraining.

We should also like to express our satisfaction with the increase in technical co-operation activities within the framework of the World Employment Programme to increase employment and incomes in the informal sector, to promote rural employment and to raise the productivity of small-scale enterprises. In this context, we should like to stress the importance of programmes relating to demographic activities, human resource planning, women's issues, economic development and demographic variations.

While we are on the subject of technical co-operation, I should like to pay tribute to the ILO for its co-operation and assistance in the organisation of the Symposium on National employment strategy in Egypt for the 1990s, held last December in Cairo, as part of the structural adjustment programme. This seminar enabled us to clarify our approach to macro-economic elements, state subsidies, the employment market, and the recovery of economic sectors capable of absorbing available manpower, such as the manufacturing industries, construction, the public sector and the informal sector.

In our evaluation of the ILO's technical co-operation programmes, we should like to draw your attention to the small amount of credits allocated to the Arab region, despite the particular situation which calls for an intensification of such programmes in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories. In addition, we should like to point out that not enough programmes are devoted to the study of emigration, despite the increasing importance of this issue.

In his choice of the subject of recovery and employment for his main report submitted to the Conference this year, the Director-General affords an opportunity for all of us to engage in an exchange of views on various crucial issues which have an considerable impact on workers, the life of peoples, and even on future generations.

We believe that any dialogue within this Organisation, the organisations of the United Nations and other international organisations must be aimed at achieving justice and equity in co-operation and exchanges between States and peoples, for the welfare of humanity as a whole.

If political and economic relations in today's world run counter to this idea, it is up to us to sound the alarm, warning of the danger of their consequences. The report of the Director-General gives dozens of examples of flagrant injustice in a world divided between North and South, rich and poor, and has also highlighted the fact that the international economic order and terms of trade only serve to make the rich richer and the poor poorer.

The High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment held in November 1987 in Geneva to consider the problem of foreign debt and its impact on employment showed that the industrialised countries bear the main responsibility for the current imbalance in the international economic order. What is therefore necessary is the political will to assist the developing countries in promoting their economies, failing which international economic and social stability will be subjected to severe tensions and the gap between the rich countries and the rest of the international community will widen.

In these circumstances, human rights, democracy and even peace will be jeopardised. Now that 20 months have passed since this Meeting, we should consider the picture given by the Director-General's Report; poverty is devouring vast areas of the Third World, where the per capita GDP, already very low, is dropping still further and there is an increasing drain of capital from South to North.

It is to be feared that this drain will continue to bleed the South until the debt problem is resolved. In fact, the per capita income in many African countries has fallen since 1980. The economic situation in this continent is such that, unless global reforms are carried out, the foreign debt will exceed 300,000 million dollars in 1995. This increase in indebtedness is due to past debts and interest payments in arrears. This economic situation has led to a deterioration of employment opportunities in the developing countries in general and in the African countries in particular.

The challenges facing the international community are perfectly clear, but one cannot expect debt-ridden countries to bear most of the cost of structural adjustment. It is not at all easy to distribute the costs fairly. There will be little hope of achieving any progress whatsoever as long as the costs are not distributed fairly.

The Director-General stated that a universal solution is a fundamental necessity and that the best means of achieving economic recovery is one which reconciles growth, justice and participation, and we agree with him.

We should like to appeal to the major industrialised countries to cancel at least half of the debts owed to them and to reschedule the payment of the remainder, and at the same time – and this is indispensable – to remove protectionist barriers and the obstacles to trade, or at least to reduce them as regards products from the developing countries. We also invite the developing countries to step up co-operation and foster an interdependent relationship in order to develop in harmony. This year, the Arab region has seen two pioneering efforts in this area: the Arab Co-operation Council was set up, grouping together Egypt, Iraq, Jordan and Yemen; the Union of Arab Maghreb was also established, comprising the North African Arab countries; these were preceded by the Co-operation Council for the Arab States of the Gulf. These efforts were aimed at achieving a high level of co-ordination, complementarity and solidarity among member States in order to pave the way for an Arab common market and achieve a higher degree of integration in the world's economy.

Egypt is making considerable efforts to implement structural adjustment policies in order to create job opportunities for the more than half a million young persons entering the job market each year. Our development efforts focus especially on the agricultural sector, recently improved land, the new districts, on which projects and investments are focused, as well as new industries. At the same time, we are working to maintain programmes in the field of health, education, housing and social welfare.

The Special Report of the Director-General on the application of the Declaration concerning action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia confirms the continuing deterioration of the conditions in which the Black majority live under the racist Pretoria regime. This has negative repercussions beyond the country's borders, endangering as it does the social and economic development and political stability of the front-line States and of southern Africa as a whole. The Report also shows that the policies applied by the Conservative Party prevent a negotiated agreement from being reached and in fact lead to an aggravation of violence, suffering and poverty in South Africa.

Egypt would like to appeal to the international community to act vigorously and rapidly to deter the South African regime and compel it to abandon its racist policies. Such action should take the form of economic and diplomatic sanctions. Egypt is convinced that there can be no peaceful settlement of this problem until a direct dialogue has been established with the legitimate representatives of the Black majority, the state of emergency is lifted and all political prisoners have been released.

The Director-General's Report also highlighted the continuing deterioration of the situation of Arab workers in the occupied Arab territories; this is due to Israeli practices and policies with regard to the Palestinian people, which claims the exercise of its just and legitimate human and national rights. What is even more cause for concern is the fact that employment problems are increasingly acquiring a political dimension in the occupied Arab territories. The reason for this lies in the occupation, which imposes conditions that stand in the way of any real improvement in employment, and living and working conditions. The Report stresses the need to adopt new firm and effective measures to achieve the objectives laid down in the recommendations of the fact-finding mission, whose account proves that there is discrimination between Israeli and Arab workers working in Israel as regards social security, health care and protection of employment and wages. Moreover, the deterioration of the economic situation in the occupied Arab territories has profoundly affected employment and development in these territories, where attempts are being made to link to the Israeli economy.

Egypt considers it necessary to promote these recommendations because for the last twelve years the Israeli occupation authorities have not even begun to apply them. We should also like to stress the need for a real development effort for the benefit of the occupied Arab territories, as the resources now channelled to assistance are inadequate. International organisations, including the ILO, should contribute heavily to drawing up and implementing a development plan designed to enable the inhabitants of these territories to preserve their identity and participate in the development process affecting them.

Egypt has often and on a great many occasions clearly stated its position, which is that peace cannot be founded on violence, terrorism, oppression and the extermination of the Palestinian people; in order to establish peace, international instruments must be complied with, Israeli occupation must end and the Palestinian people must enjoy its legitimate rights to self-determination and the creation of its own State.

Mrs. WERNECK (Minister of State for Labour, Brazil) – It gives me great pleasure, on behalf of the Brazilian Government, to congratulate, Mr. John Nkomo, Minister of Labour of Zimbabwe, on his unanimous election to chair the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference, which has before it highly important issues such as the partial revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention 1957, (No. 107), night work and safety in the use of chemicals in the workplace.

It is also a pleasure to greet the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Michel Hansenne, and wish him a rewarding mandate at the head of the Organisation. It is my sincere hope that the ILO will increasingly reaffirm its role of striving toward the defence of the world of work and of forging a new economic and social order based on the principles of freedom and democracy.

I address this Assembly, from the standpoint of the position I now have the honour to occupy in the Brazilian Government, as a privileged witness and participant of a unique historical moment in the destiny of my country, which is leading to great repercussions in the area of labour.

Throughout the 1970s, Brazil experienced an average annual GNP rate of growth of 8.5 per cent. Per capita income grew at 6 per cent a year and, although the levels of the concentration of income did increase, all segments of the population attained real gains in their living conditions.

The growth of the Brazilian economy, which seemed sustained at the beginning of this decade, was suddenly interrupted by a process of adjustment caused by the sudden reversal of the flow of financial resources between developed and developing countries. This was thought to be a temporary situation, a short pause along the way to development. The adjustment of the Brazilian economy to the new international reality, was, however, achieved at great cost.

First of all, the search for a solution to the external imbalance weakened the capacity of the State to promote development, without its replacement by a strong and vigorous private sector.

The most evident result was a slowing down in the rate of Brazilian economic growth which, far from being of a temporary nature, remained a dominant characteristic of the decade. The rate of investment also fell, a fact that structurally puts at risk the well-being of our future generations.

The other side of the economic downturn was the deterioration of the social conditions of the Brazilian population, which is clearly reflected in the main indicators of the labour market. Though unemployment rates at the end of this decade are not significantly greater than those of the end of the 1970s, this fact, unfortunately, does not give rise to optimism. Behind the unemployment statistics lie an increase in the number of wage earners unprotected by labour and welfare legislation and a progressive deterioration in the quality of jobs created by the formal economy. This is the result of the substitution of jobs in the dynamic sectors by others in small service enterprises and trade. Aggregate wages, in turn, have been constantly falling as a proportion of GNP, despite the increasing progress in union organisation and collective bargaining.

The difficulties experienced by the Brazilian economy throughout the 1980s, shared also by all Latin America, coincide with the historic moment of the return to democracy in our countries. The resurgence of freedom of speech, the regrouping of the currents of political representation, the emergence of social movements free from State tutelage, allowed for increased demands.

In Brazil, the social outcry for improved well-being were forged into the new Constitution, promulgated on 5 October 1988. The extensive chapter relating to social rights encompasses a whole range of aspirations for so long dormant.

In the field of labour relations, the protection against arbitrary or unfair dismissal was strengthened and now includes compensation. The Constituent Assembly hoped, in this manner, gradually to attain one of the most relevant goals of labour legislation, the guarantee of employment.

The Constitution also provides for the right to unemployment benefit which has been a concrete gain of the workers since March 1986. An ingenious formula for financing this unemployment benefit was created through the redirecting of para-fiscal resources in the workers' asset funds and transforming them into a collective work fund where the surplus receipts will be entirely employed in productive investments capable of generating new jobs.

The legitimate struggles of the workers, as seen in an arduous process of union reorganisation and strikes, the majority of which conflicted with the former legal framework, were rewarded by the introduction, in the constitutional text, of the right to strike, extended to the public sector. It will be left up to the workers to decide on the interests that should be defended in the strike. As in other modern societies, only the so-called essential activities are exempted.

The union organisation in Brazil has also been significantly modified. The fundamental international labour standards of the elimination of administrative intervention in unions are assured.

At the same time, going beyond the Maternity Protection Convention (Revised), 1952 (No. 103), which was recently ratified by Brazil, the Constitution includes, in the formula for determining the minimum wage, the cost of education, health and leisure as vital necessities of the worker and his or her family, in addition to the existing contributions to social welfare and those expenses already recognised - housing, food, clothing, hygiene and transport.

The Constituent Assembly also abolished a series of inequities, thus protecting existing working women from protectionist and discriminatory legal practices. We believe that the constitutional provisions have put an end to the controversy surrounding the Night Work (women) Convention (Revised), 1948 (No. 89). There is now no legal impediment to the attainment of this right.

Still within the context of the rights of the woman worker, the Brazilian Social Welfare department has extended maternity leave from 90 to 120 days. Maternity protection has gone a long way in guaranteeing employment during pregnancy and through to five months after the birth, as well as for specific social care afforded by state and private bodies.

The Constitution also addresses the question of minimum age. The Brazilian legislator has shown his modern awareness in giving a new treatment to the issue of the minimum age, increasing it from 12 to 14 years, while at the same time outlawing night, dangerous and unhealthy work for those under 18. We are thus on an equal footing with legislation in the majority of other countries. We were certainly inspired by the provisions laid down in the ILO Conventions Nos. 5, 10, 33, 59, 60 and 138.

These are not all the innovations in the sphere of labour law. I would also include limitation of normal work-shifts to eight hours a day and 44 hours a week; a maximum of six hours for continuous shifts; a minimum of 50 per cent above normal pay for overtime; and an additional vacation bonus of 30 per cent.

Apart from all these innovations in the labour field the Constitution also promotes advances in the area of social security. The range of benefits is increased, the rural social welfare regime is aligned to the urban system and new sources of finance are created in an effort to lighten the relative burden on wages.

The great challenge that my country faces in the coming decade is the difficult harmonisation of two legacies from the 1980s: the grave economic crisis caused by a vicious circle of disequilibria in the internal and external fronts, on the one hand, and, on the other, the social obligation – and not only the moral duty – to solve the so-called “social debt”.

Brazilian society will have to resort to all its resourcefulness to reconcile these apparently paradoxical objectives.

The State will necessarily have to reduce its role and size, if only as a result of the enormous restrictions that it will face in order to continue to finance the process of social and economic development. At the same time, social outlays will have to grow exponentially, in order to consolidate all the advances established by the Constitution.

Despite all these difficulties, we face this arduous task not with utopian optimism, but firmly based on the perception that new conditions are arising from the old order, both in the domestic and international spheres.

The Brazilian Government welcomes the position that is beginning to emerge in the treatment of the foreign debt issue from creditor countries and multilateral organisations. I refer to the recognition that it is no longer politically or economically possible for debtor countries to continue their adjustment efforts without the perspective of a long-lasting solution in the form of a reduction in the total and in the servicing of the debt. This represents substantial progress compared to the practices of the past.

It is important, at this juncture, to emphasise the role of the ILO in this change of outlook. It is worth mentioning in this connection the ILO resolution on development, foreign debt and the social objectives of the ILO, dated 24 June 1986 and the conclusions of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment, which took place in November 1987, as well as other initiatives mentioned in the Director-General's Report to this 76th Session of the Conference.

The new positions of the international community are, fortunately, complemented by a slow but constant evolution of Brazilian society, with a view to solving the natural conflict surrounding the allocation of scarce resources through negotiation, and not through resort to force. Workers and employers have increasingly utilised direct negotiations as a means of solving their disputes, without any form of state paternalism.

We are aware that the solving of Brazil's grave problems will only come about through the establishment of a new social relationship. This awareness has already produced, in the last three years, three attempts at implementing wide-reaching national agreements. The inconclusive negotiations in the short term have, however, highlighted the most important fact in this process: the strengthening of democratic practice and the willingness to discuss and negotiate.

It is with this renewed willingness that we will overcome the obstacles that, for many, are seen as insurmountable. We have no doubt: for Brazil, for the international community, the nineties will not be a lost decade, Original – Spanish: Mr. ROSAS LANDA (Government delegate, Mexico) – Mr. John L. Nkomo, President of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference, on behalf of the Mexican delegation and on my own behalf, allow me to congratulate you, Sir, on your election, wishing the greatest of success to you and the esteemed Vice-Presidents who are working with you for such a high objective.

We would especially like to congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne on his appointment as Director-General of the ILO, and express the wish that he will achieve his intention of keeping this Organisation fully prepared to fulfil its important mission in this period of change.

The document which the Director-General prepared on the topic of economic recovery and employment is a very valuable contribution for countries such as ours, which are trying to find their way back to economic growth through a serious effort of structural change so as to recover ground lost in the decade which is coming to a close.

In Mexico, from the mid-sixties onwards, signs began to appear that the development model based on self-sufficiency could not meet the needs of a rapidly growing population.

Despite the fact that at the beginning of the seventies it was thought appropriate to make structural changes in the country's production, distribution and financial apparatus, the development strategies adopted were seen as not suitable and open to improvement as the country evolved. The clearest example of this was to be found in the ambitious development programme initiated on the basis of very optimistic hopes for our natural resources and the oil market, which were shared by the country's creditors to the extent that large amounts of credit were put at our disposal.

The economic crisis that the country went through in the early eighties, however, was due not only to the drop in the export price of oil and high foreign interest rates, but also largely to the structural imbalances which had accumulated over at least the past 20 years, on top of which came the massive short-term external debt with the commercial banks and dependence on oil.

For this reason, at the end of 1982, the Government then in power adopted a strategy which sought to stabilise the economy and initiate the process of structural change, with the aim of re-establishing a basis for sustained growth.

Until practically its last year in office the Government managed to contain the inflationary process through unprecedented concerted action. Over previous years, the measures adopted were insufficient, although it is only fair to point out that on various occasions they were hampered by external events, such as falls in the oil price, the rise in interest rates and delays by creditors in renegotiating the foreign debt and supplying new materials.

However, in spite of these difficulties in stabilising the economy, significant advances were made towards correcting acute structural imbalances. Achievements included the improvement of public finances, the restructuring and reduction of the parastatal sector, a greater openness of the economy to the outside, the conversion of various industrial enterprises to exports, the restructuring of the financial system, a simplified administration of Government and decentralisation of economic activity.

It must be admitted that during these years of fighting inflation and structural change the employment problem worsened, despite the fact that throughout that period there were emergency programmes to assist workers severely affected by the crisis and the structural changes, to generate employment in depressed rural areas and marginal urban areas, to train unemployed workers and facilitate their retraining and to provide on-the-job training to workers to improve their qualifications and productivity, to mention the most important ones. It must also be pointed out that in terms of the official unemployment rate, the employment problem was not apparent because it was maintained at low and stable levels. There was also an increase in informal economic activities.

Another aspect to highlight was the way in which we were able to contain inflation. In 1987, various factors came into play to prevent us achieving the economic reactivation we were seeking. From the outset there was inertia in the movement of prices, causing various adjustments to the rise in minimum and contractual wages. At the same time, there was the unusual rise in the securities market, followed by the crash and the subsequent currency speculation, causing the devaluation of the peso and a general climate of uncertainty which threatened to disrupt the economy once again.

Under such circumstances and in the face of a general demand to increase salaries, the Government called on the organised sectors of society – farmers, workers and businessmen – to adhere to the economic solidarity pact so as to stop inflation and re-establish order in the economy. The pact was agreed in mid-December 1987 and, through its ratification, was extended to the whole of 1988.

To verify observance of the pact and to watch over the general evolution of the economy, and in particular commodity prices and supplies, a national committee was set up to assess and follow up the progress of the pact. It meets each week to examine the situation and recommend the relevant measures.

The success of this concerted action was evident; the monthly inflation rate, which in January 1988 stood at 15.5 per cent, dropped 0.6 per cent in September and ended up at 2.1 per cent in December, so that accumulated inflation dropped from 159 per cent in 1987 to 52 per cent in 1988. This is all the more significant if we take into account that it occurred in the last year of a six-year government.

The current Government, which came into power in December 1988, called on all sectors to maintain the Pact in the interests of stability and economic growth, and this remained in force from 1 January to 31 July 1989, with the object of consolidating price stability and bringing about more structural change so as to enter on a new stage of sustained growth with price stability. Thanks to this concerted action prices increased 6.5 per cent in the four first months of the year, which is equivalent to an average monthly rate of 1.6 per cent.

On 31 May, the President of the Republic put forward a national development plan for 1989-94, drawn up in consultation with various sectors of the federal republic administration, the governments of the states, the Union Congress and different social groups.

The Plan has four main aims towards which all policies, objectives, sectoral programmes and projects which should be jointly undertaken by society and the Government have been orientated. These are to maintain sovereignty and promote the interests of Mexico throughout the world, to extend democracy, to achieve economic recovery with price stability and to improve the material living conditions of the population.

The proposed strategy for these objectives is to modernise the basic structure of society through concerted action and responsible participation by all groups and social sectors.

The economic strategy of the Plan has two main objectives: to strengthen stability, reducing price increases to levels comparable with those of our trading partners, and to reach gradually a growth rate of approximately 6 per cent per annum.

The Plan indicates three basic paths to achieving growth: continuing stabilisation of the economy, increased resources for productive investments and modernisation of the economy.

The first path implies continuous attention to price stability once the control and reduction of inflation is consolidated. In this respect, we have already mentioned the results achieved this year.

The second path means that sustained growth will depend on strengthening domestic savings, while in the short and medium term it will be necessary to reduce significantly the net transfer of resources abroad, in order to generate the necessary impetus and reverse the adverse conditions which have prevailed over the past years. In this context, it must be pointed out that much progress has been made in the renegotiation of the foreign debt. The World Bank has committed resources for projects and priority sectors. Restructuring of bilateral official credits has been concluded and negotiation of the debt with the commercial banks is in full progress. Out of all this we hope to meet a responsive attitude, compatible with the internal effort which Mexico has made.

In pursuing the third path, what is essential is the efforts being made to extend and improve the infrastructure; to create a more efficient public sector; to bring about a better integrated productive sector to compete better abroad; to eliminate obstacles and regulations which reduce the potential of productive sectors; to make better use of the production, finance, business and technology options open to us; to seek new forms of labour organisation and association in the interests of production; and to recognise that development does not depend only on state activity, but requires the full and responsible participation of individuals.

Regarding this, it is sufficient to mention that in addition to the progress made in the field of structural change, measures have been taken recently to continue with this evolution, such as new regulations to the foreign investment law, the start of the process to revise the federal labour law and the application of systems for private individuals to participate in the financing of public works.

For growth and stability to be reflected in an improved standard of living for the population, the Plan suggests action to create well-paid employment; to increase the purchasing power of wages through economic progress; to increase labour requirements, improve productivity and make efficient use of the country's potential and a proper balance of production factors, as well as to eradicate extreme poverty and generally improve the distribution of incomes.

Since the Plan recognises that measures to stimulate growth are insufficient to satisfy the demands of justice and better living conditions for the people, it will be necessary to take measures aimed at directly improving their well-being such as providing basic public security services, housing, education, health, public services, supplies, food and so on.

As far as the creation of adequate, well-paid employment is concerned, for an economically active population which is estimated to grow at more than 3 per cent a year, the Plan lays down that growth should take place gradually in order to avoid a new round of problems. It therefore puts forward a package of measures to improve the conditions of the workers, as follows: to improve and extend education, increase training and productivity to promote an increase in real wages; to establish a tax policy to achieve a better distribution of income; to guarantee the status of labour policy so as to honour workers' rights; and to encourage greater participation by workers and farmers in working out a common economic and social policy.

Finally, the Mexican experience shows that to achieve equitable economic recovery it is necessary to maintain stability, reduce the net transfer of resources abroad, promote the modernisation of structures and see to it that concerted action is accepted as the prime mechanism governing the process of change.

Mr. McGUIRE (Minister of State for Labour, Grenada) – Mr President, permit me to express how happy and honoured I am to be able to address this august gathering, and allow me to extend warm and sincere congratulations to you, on behalf of the Government of Grenada; on your election to the presidency of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. Your professional competence, experience and human qualities will, I am sure, have a tremendously positive influence on the progression of work at this session. I join other delegates in wishing you every success in your activities, and look forward with great anticipation to the fruitful results of this session of the Conference.

My congratulations and thanks also go to Mr. Francis Blanchard and his co-workers for their unstinting efforts and tireless work in the service of the world of labour. They have achieved a considerable record in reinforcing certain patterns of thought with respect to labour and in building a global system with a strong capability of generating progress for those who work.

Grenada notes with concern that the world-wide situation today continues to be characterised by high levels of unemployment and underemployment. The prevailing view is that the current world economic situation has substantially worsened the overall employment statistics, and so today, all our feelings go to those workers, young and old, who unremittingly seek to avoid the frustrating pangs of being jobless, hopeless and dehumanised.

It is the view of our delegation that current economic problems the world over are inherently structural in nature, and that such problems cannot be effectively and successfully tackled by conventional policies and methods. Our concern for the jobless impels us to call today for global industrial harmony, for friendly and peaceful labour-management relations, for mutual respect and understanding, for tolerance and an environment which encourages excellence and rewards achievement. I strongly affirm that only in a stable environment can we set the stage for the mitigation of the vexing unemployment problem.

Grenada, like most small countries, faces many challenges. Even with a substantial growth beyond 5 per cent, it will be difficult for my country to cope with the backlog of heavy unemployment. But we are riding high on the tide of reform now, revitalising and diversifying our agriculture, broadening the industrial base of our country, and striving to reach our true potential in tourism development as we market our hospitality.

My country has continued to show a most impressive economic performance due to good planning and sound management. In fact, over the past four years, we can proudly boast of an annual growth rate of 6 per cent as compared with a global rate of 2.7 per cent. The majority of our citizens work together for the unification of our country, and our Government has pledged to support fully all those who work unswervingly for the consolidation of the rights and privileges of Grenadian workers. We are pleased to see a new consciousness developing in our country, one that respects knowledge and training, and one that gives full play to enthusiasm and creativity at the workplace.

A major factor affecting development has been the continuing imbalances between the developed economies and the developing ones. There has been a marked decline in development assistance in real terms, which, together with declining commodity prices of Third World products, indebtedness and recession, bring to a full stop the engines of progress in so many countries, swelling the rough seas of crisis and human misery.

Unemployment is the gravest challenge of our times, so we welcome the Director-General's studied analyses which led to his timely Report on the subject of recovery and employment. We, here, are all concerned about the increasingly difficult international environment which seems to have eroded the welfare of millions of workers. And I believe that the problem is more acute in developing countries, worst of all in small States, where the debt problem, declining commodity prices, fluctuating exchange rates and protectionism have led to a drastic decrease in export earnings. But I must admit that the solutions to the world's social and economic problems are not all simple. This Conference has a mandate to fulfil in examining how social and economic questions can be answered by raising real incomes and enlarging job opportunities. In the answer we seek, the one must not negate the other.

Our delegation is mindful of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and we firmly believe that "everyone has the right to work, to free choice of employment, to just and favourable conditions of work and to protection against unemployment." Our Government, in its action plans against unemployment, aims to create an economic environment in which business firms can innovate, expand and invest, in which market goods and services can be fully competitive, and in which workers can secure training, find jobs, be productive, and even shift between jobs and occupations with ease and with confidence. It is our view that the availability of jobs is an indicator of prosperity in our country and stability in our society.

I wish to make it clear that the Government of Grenada regards it as a social responsibility to provide jobs for its citizens, and to provide an attractive investment climate where new employment opportunities will abound. We boldly state that the fundamental rights of workers are not achievable simply by ratifying Conventions or passing laws. What is absolutely necessary is a strong will on the part of governments to adopt and implement effective forward-looking economic and employment policies, which give maximum priority to employment in new technologies and in the service industry. Capital, labour, technology and information define the modern world. Whatever employment policies are adopted by governments must take these factors into consideration.

The climate in Grenada is highly favourable to foreign investment. Our trade and commercial policies are based on a liberal, export-oriented, free-market philosophy. We welcome economic co-operation, joint ventures, and we now looking towards development zones which are self-supporting.

People are our greatest asset in the development process. And this asset is improved by education and training. The development process itself generates a demand for qualitative changes in human resources, and we have therefore moved from providing free education to a policy of providing quality education and education in employable skills.

We are happy to say that a wide range of quality programmes are accessible and significant proportion of the working population is benefiting from our new educational strategy.

As stated before, the present Government inherited a backlog of heavy unemployment along with a disoriented citizenry. Within four years, my Government has been able to reduce the unemployment rate to about 17 per cent. During the same period we have been able to create some 10,000 new jobs, in a population of approximately 100,000, in manufacturing, services, light industries, agriculture and tourism.

Grenada welcomes the decision of the 73rd Session of the International Labour Conference to discuss the possibility of drafting new standards on social security benefits in the event of involuntary unemployment and incorporating them into standards specifically relating to employment promotion. Grenada again draws the attention of the International Labour Organisation to the unacceptably high rate of youth unemployment in the world today. To combat this dreadful problem, we have begun to stress vocational training in our educational system, and to offer youth skills training programmes at training centres in every parish in our country. Much help is needed in order to sustain this effort.

In its recent past, Grenada experimented with an ideology completely foreign to its democratic traditions. The result of this error is well known for its tragic proportions. My Government is pleased with its record of reconstruction in our country, with the restoration of fundamental freedom and democracy, and with its efforts to create a prosperous future for our citizens.

My Government will honour and continue to honour the independence of the labour movement, and respect its integrity. The concept of labour integrity implies that workers are entitled to hold, have and express their own views on all matters, including political issues, and it will always be our position that no worker should be discriminated against by his employer on account of the political views held or expressed by him.

My Government will not introduce legislation that is anti-worker or that will put workers at a disadvantage. In this respect, it is not true to say that our proposed legislation on essential services deprives workers of the right to strike. Indeed, the objective of the act is simply to encourage quick settlement of disputes in certain categories of work.

Grenada fully supports the International Labour Organisation and its technical work. We are convinced that the doctrine of tripartism on which the International Labour Organisation operates is a solid foundation, perhaps the only real one on which to build a thriving economy, and a socially just society. Our firm commitment to tripartism is not confined to mere representations at the International Labour Conference. We promote at every opportunity the virtues of an unbreakable relationship between employers, labour and government. And we have strongly suggested that the enjoyment of a perfect relationship ultimately depends upon linking incomes to company profits, showing clearly that economic wealth depends on the motivated worker.

Once more we must turn our attention to the abhorrent situation which is daily being perpetuated in South Africa in the name of apartheid. All member States should unflinchingly seek to remove that scourge and hasten the end of apartheid. We also deeply deplore the recent events in China, in which hundreds of unarmed students lost their lives as they demonstrated their desire to live in peace, with dignity, and to enjoy the full benefits of a democratic environment.

I address you today with confidence that great strides will be made in strengthening the social structures to benefit all our peoples, and in promoting peace, dignity and more jobs for the workers of our countries.

Original - Japanese: Mr. SHIRAI (Vice-Minister of Labour, Japan) - First of all, on behalf of the Government of Japan, I should like to offer my warm congratulations to you, Mr. President, on your election to the presidency of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference.

I am confident that, under your able guidance based on your profound knowledge and rich experience, this session will surely come to a fruitful conclusion.

We are also happy to welcome Mr. Hansenne as the Director-General of the ILO this year, which marks the 70th anniversary of the founding of the ILO. I understand that Mr. Hansenne was the Minister of Employment and Labour in his own country, Belgium, in the 1980s, at a time when it was experiencing a severe economic set-back, and that he achieved success in many respects thanks to his profound knowledge of labour issues and respect for tripartism. I should like to take this opportunity to express my warm congratulations to Mr. Hansenne on his appointment as Director-General of the ILO, and wish him every success in his work.

Since the ILO was established in 1919, the world has experienced many crises caused by wars, economic recession and other factors, but the ILO has continued its activities to try to stabilise and improve the life of workers all over the world, to make a significant contribution to the establishment of social justice and eventually to bring about lasting world peace.

The world economy today is confronted with a number of serious problems and structural adjustment is now a burning issue both at the national and international level. This problem of structural adjustment is primarily one which ought to be tackled by other international organisations responsible for economic issues. However, it also has a major impact on the life of workers. Therefore, I consider that it is very opportune for us, who represent the governments, employers and workers, to avail ourselves of this session to gain a better understanding of this problem and to discuss labour matters related to it from a broad viewpoint.

If we cast a glance at trends in the world economy over the past 20 years, we can see that the 70s were characterised by high inflation, due, among others, to two major oil crises and a high rate of economic growth.

As we entered the 1980s, inflation was finally curbed and economic expansion has been maintained throughout the world economy since 1983. However, such serious problems as trade imbalances and the accumulation of the developing countries' foreign debts are a threat to the stability of the world economy. While trade imbalances are gradually being corrected as a result of policy co-ordination among the countries concerned, they still remain quite substantial. If countries take restrictive trade measures as a possible solution to such problems, there is a danger that the current of the world economy will take a full turn in the direction of contracted equilibrium. In addition, if the developing countries continue to accumulate foreign debts, it will be extremely difficult for them to achieve economic recovery by their own efforts and this will have an adverse effect on the world economy as a whole, and cause financial instability.

In order to carry out structural adjustment of the world economy which is now in such a serious situation, it is essential for countries of the world to co-ordinate their economic policies at the international level. It must be acknowledged by all countries that a free trade system is a prerequisite for the sustained growth of the world economy. The countries concerned, as well as international organisations concerned, are called upon to make efforts in their respective roles, bearing this prerequisite in mind, in order to overcome such problems as trade imbalances and the external debt accumulation incurred by developing countries.

Japan fully recognises its duty as one of the major industrialised countries of the world. It has been actively promoting the Uruguay Round of the GATT and taking positive action to expand imports and improve access to our domestic market from abroad. In addition, I wish to mention that our policy of shifting our economic structure from export-oriented to domestic demand-oriented is steadily taking effect.

Moreover, with a view to supporting developing countries' efforts for economic recovery, our country has set the target of our official development assistance budget for the five years from 1988 at more than US$50 billion, which more than doubles our ODA budget during the past five years. Our country has also taken measures for recycling surplus capital amounting to US$30 billion as a solution to the problem of external debt accumulation among developing countries.

The structural adjustment of the world economy under way at the moment is indispensable if we are to achieve sustained growth. I think all of us must take up the challenge with courage and in unity until we reach a solution. However, a structural adjustment might bring about undesirable repercussions upon people's lives. And it is wrong to ignore these repercussions, accepting them as a matter of course, because the ultimate objective of any economic policy should be to stabilise and improve the life of the people; unless we adopt this attitude it will be difficult to obtain the understanding and co-operation of people in achieving structural adjustment, which sometimes involves pain. I consider that, in the process of structural adjustment of the economy, it is necessary to give top priority to the employment security of workers.

The Japanese economy has been constantly developing, surviving the major oil crises and the recent appreciation of the yen. The success of our economy has only been possible because of our country's policy and labour management practice of attaching major importance to employment security. We must not also overlook another factor, namely, that we have made efforts to reach, through dialogue among the people concerned, a national consensus as to the direction in which our country's economy should proceed, and that our economic policy was implemented with the understanding of the people.

The significance of discussing the problem of structural adjustment of the world economy at this session of the Conference lies, I believe, in the fact that the representatives of the governments, employers and workers all over the world gain a better understanding of this problem, and exchange views frankly. The ILO is an international organisation in which governments, employers and workers from the member States participate under tripartism and this has produced many results in the solution of labour problems throughout the world. While the problem of structural adjustment of the world economy should, of course, be dealt with by other international organisations responsible for economic issues, the ILO assumes a unique responsibility for the labour matters related to it. I hope that, with close mutual co-operation between the international organisations concerned, structural adjustment of the world economy will be carried out, taking into due consideration its social aspects, such as the importance of the employment security of workers.

When we consider the role of the ILO in relation to the structural adjustment of the world economy, I think we ought to recall the concept that prompted the founding of the ILO. The ILO was founded after the First World War as it was recognised that there could be no lasting world peace without social justice; its objective was to establish various principles in the field of labour and to improve the working conditions of workers all over the world. Our history has proved that an economic crisis can threaten world peace. I believe that given the present economic situation, the ILO must endeavour to forestall social unrest – and ultimately a threat to world peace – by devoting itself to the fulfilment of its essential missions before anything else.

The ILO has been contributing towards improving the life of workers throughout the world by setting international labour standards and supervising their application, and by carrying out technical co-operation activities for the developing countries. International Labour Conventions are legally binding for the member States which ratify them; indeed, they constitute a body of international labour laws that protect workers from a decline in their standard of living due to fluctuations in the economy. What is more, the technical co-operation activities of the ILO have contributed to the strengthening of labour administration and human resources development and have created a basis for the stabilisation and improvement of the life of workers in developing countries. Today, now that international labour standards have covered almost all fields of labour, technical co-operation, which is intended to help developing countries implement these standards, is becoming increasingly significant.

I am confident that the active promotion of technical co-operation, geared to the specific economic and social needs of these countries, will gradually help to improve the living and working conditions of workers throughout the world. Acting on this premise, our country has been actively co-operating in the multi-bilateral programmes and the ILO Asian and Pacific Skill Development Programme (APSDEP) and will continue its efforts to expand these programmes.

In concluding my statement, I wish to express the hope that there will be fruitful discussions at this session and that the Office will, under the guidance of the Director-General, Mr. Hansenne, continue its activities in a more effective manner. I should like to confirm once again the intention of our country, Japan, to play its part as a member State of the ILO and to participate and co-operate actively in its activities.

Original – Nepalese: Mr. BISTA (Government delegate, Nepal) – It gives me great pleasure to be amongst you in this picturesque city of Geneva, and to have the opportunity to address this important Conference.

On behalf of the Nepalese delegation, I would like to extend our heartiest congratulations to you, Mr. President, on your election to the high office of President of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference.

Mr. President, my delegation is confident that under your able guidance, this Conference will proceed smoothly, and will generate pragmatic recommendations.

Nepal, as the birthplace of Lord Buddha, who is regarded as an apostle of world peace, has always strived to promote international brotherhood and peace since time immemorial. Peace and development are interdependent, and are in fact two sides of the same coin. But in spite of all the efforts made over the last four decades, lasting peace still seems to elude us. Apartheid continues to challenge world opinion. The overbearing attitude of the big and powerful nations towards small and poor nations is on the increase. The problem is further aggravated by the ever-widening income gap between the developed and developing countries. In such an international situation, Nepal has always pledged her support to the cause of furthering world peace by raising her voice against injustice and discrimination, which I believe is known to the world at large. In this context, the proposal put forward by His Majesty King Birendra Bir Bikram Shah Dev to declare Nepal as zone of peace is noteworthy. So far, 107 countries have pledged their support to this proposal. We are hopeful that this peace proposal will receive the support of the remaining countries in the near future.

Nepal is a landlocked country, and one of the least developed of the world. Our main concern has been to create, as envisaged by our partyless panchayat system, a society free from exploitation and to raise the living standard of the people by tackling the problems of poverty, backwardness, disease, hunger, illiteracy, unemployment and income disparities in the country through planned economic development.

The problem of unemployment and underemployment has assumed a serious proportion in many developing countries, including Nepal. The unemployment and underemployment problems facing Nepal are mainly the result of imbalances between population and economic growth rates. This is a matter of grave concern to His Majesty's Government of Nepal, and its solution, my delegation feels, requires vigorous national and international endeavours and action.

In order to meet the basic needs of the people by the year 2000 as directed by His Majesty the King, various measures have been taken to increase employment opportunities and purchasing power of the people. Special emphasis has been placed on the expansion of skill development and income-generating programmes, with a view to raising the income and living standard of people living below the poverty line. Appropriate programmes have been initiated to encourage the development of off-farm non-agricultural cottage and small industries, credit and marketing facilities, and management capabilities and skill. At the same time, due consideration has also been given to economic decentralisation, equitable distribution of resources, maximum utilisation of manpower and optimum use of labour-intensive technology. These programmes were aimed at achieving positive results for the nation's economy. However, as the distinguished assembly is well aware, the Nepalese economy suffered a setback owing to the devastating effects of the earthquake which hit 27 out of 75 districts of Nepal last August. While we were recovering from the devastation and our efforts to implement the huge rehabilitation programmes were well under way, the lapse of our trade and transit treaties with India and the consequent scarcity of supplies of essential goods so vital for the daily life of the people of a landlocked country represented another major setback to the nation's economy. Our national policy now is to surmount our difficulties through self-reliance and keeping the doors of friendly negotiation open. We have put forward constructive proposals in this regard.

The people of Nepal highly appreciate the ILO's untiring efforts to promote socio-economic development through technical assistance. We also attach great importance to the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General. These reports give a comprehensive and lucid account of major issues emerging in the context of an ever-changing world. The issues analysed in these reports, such as the world-wide recession of the 1980s, economic recovery and adjustment processes and possible development strategies for economic recovery for 1990s, are timely and immensely useful. As to the contents of Part II of the Report relating to ILO activities in 1988, my delegation is of the opinion that these activities will make positive contributions to the socio-economic development of developing countries such as Nepal. We would like to extend our sincere thanks to the former Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Francis Blanchard, and his associates for their laudable work. We have no doubt that under the present Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, the trend will continue.

We find that the failure to include in this Report issues with far-reaching consequences to the economies of landlocked countries is rather unwarranted. We would like to urge this session, on behalf of the landlocked countries, as we have been doing in the past on such occasions, that the forthcoming programmes of the ILO should place emphasis on the study of the problems specific to such countries.

We have always attached great significance to the ILO Conventions and Recommendations which have provided valuable guide-lines in formulating national labour laws and rules to safeguard the rights and interests of the workers.

My delegation is pleased to note the partial revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107). His Majesty's Government of Nepal and the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare have always shown ready concern for the support of disadvantaged, destitute and backward groups. Various programmes, in both the governmental and the non-governmental sectors, have been undertaken to assist these groups and to make them self-reliant. In the non-governmental sector, the Social Service Co-ordination Council (SSNCC) and its various affiliated organisations are actively involved in the all-round development of disadvantaged groups. I am happy to inform you that Her Majesty Queen Aishwarya Rajyalaxmi Devi Shah is Chairperson of the SSNCC.

My delegation feels that the Night Work (Women) Convention (Revised), 1948 (No. 89), which prohibits women from working at night, needs to be amended to protect the rights and interests of women. It is widely felt that this Convention hinders women from securing equal treatment in employment and encourages gender-biased discrimination.

As to the issue of safety in the use of chemicals at work, I feel that the life of a person is precious and therefore priority should be given to his safety at work. The tremendous increase in the production and use of chemicals has polluted the world environment. Increasing evidence also indicates that the lack of adequate safety measures in workplaces where chemicals are used has led to the premature death of millions of workers. My delegation feels the need for devising adequate safety measures to minimise environmental pollution and to avoid accidents in workplaces where chemicals are used.

A least developed and landlocked country like Nepal requires adequate resources if it is to accelerate its pace of development. May I re-emphasise that increased financial and technical assistance from developed countries and various international organisations are needed if we are to be able to step up our developmental efforts.

Finally, in the firm conviction that constructive and pragmatic recommendations relevant to all countries will emerge from the deliberations here, I wish the session every success.

Mr. BUCHANAN (Minister of State, Ministry of Labour, Welfare and Sports, Jamaica) – Mr. President, on behalf of the Jamaican delegation I wish to congratulate you most warmly on your election to preside over the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. We are confident that with your ability and wealth of experience our deliberations will be conducted in the best traditions of the past and set standards for the future. My congratulations also to the three distinguished Vice-Presidents who will be assisting you in steering the work of the session to a successful conclusion.

Let me take this opportunity to congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne on his recent election as Director-General. We wish to assure him of our fullest co-operation and support in carrying out the many and varied responsibilities of his high office. In the same breath, I wish to pay tribute to his predecessor, Mr. Francis Blanchard, for the outstanding contributions he made to this great Organisation and wish for him all the best in his future undertakings.

The Director-General's Report, Recovery and employment, invites us to consider the all-important question of employment in the context of economies struggling to recover from recessionary downturns. It builds upon the momentum generated by the conclusions of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment held in November 1987. Those conclusions, it may be recalled, dealt in part with measures for increasing job creation and with strategies to counter adverse short-term effects arising from the implementation of structural adjustment policies.

The report takes a broad view of the performance of the world's economies during the 1980s and concludes that generally there was some recovery from the economic stagnation of the 1970s, which as everyone knows continued over into the 1980s as a mild recession. The recovery from this pervasive economic sluggishness was not even, in that not all countries showed anything approaching the same state of economic buoyancy or growth as they passed the midpoint of the 1980s.

The structural adjustment policies implemented by some countries to induce growth or to accelerate growth caused, at the outset, a great deal of hardship to those workers, including the unemployed, who were least able to bear it. Many lost their jobs. For example, in Jamaica the 11,000 and more public sector workers who were laid off indefinitely were mainly from the lower ranks of employees; newcomers to the labour market had great difficulty finding employment. Even the quality of some available jobs deteriorated to the point where many who were considered employed were in fact underemployed.

The beginning of a gradual recovery could be discerned as a number of labour-intensive projects, such as 807 garment manufacturers, created new employment opportunities, primarily for women. I should pause here to observe that our experience in Jamaica is that some projects that provide employment opportunities in the free zone are a mixed blessing. For one thing, workers tend to develop the perception, rightly or wrongly, that there is some unexpressed impediment to the full exercise of their trade union rights particularly with respect to collective bargaining which they regard always as the basis for excellent relations and maximum efficiency at the workplace. I do hope that time will prove that there is no basis for these perceptions.

The prospects for recovery of developing countries would have been greater if they had not been weighed down by the crushing burden of debt. The debt crisis has deprived governments of opportunities to invest and to facilitate investments that would have created more productive employment. Indeed the debt problem grew to such critical proportions during the 1980s that some developing countries became, by virtue of their debt service obligations, net exporters of capital to developed countries.

Currently, in Jamaica over 40 per cent of the national budget is earmarked for, or to look at it from another angle, 50 per cent of our foreign exchange earnings are devoted to debt servicing. The result is that not only investment for job creation is at a lower level than it might otherwise be but that the social services of the country as a whole suffered and continue to suffer as we endeavour to meet our debt service obligations.

In these circumstances, the newly elected Government of Jamaica has resolved to regard the availability of basic social services as a priority to be effectively increased over the next few years.

My delegation finds it easy to agree with the Director-General when he says that where the poor have only limited access to basic social services, there is fertile ground for frustration – loss of skills and in general negative behavioural attitudes towards work. It is not too much to say that a combination of all of these will ultimately lead, and has already led, to social tensions and widespread social and political unrest.

Perhaps our real task here is to challenge ourselves – governments, workers and employers – each one of us, to make the next decade one in which social progress, in tandem with economic progress, becomes a national priority. We are confident that the International Labour Organisation, recognising as it does that the well-being of the working man and the working woman is the bottom-line of all our development activities, will stand ready to give all the technical assistance it can afford if it becomes necessary to do so.

To achieve the goals of major improvement in the delivery of social services in the next few years, the Government of Jamaica recognises the need for an increasingly productive economy to support these endeavours. In fact, there simply must be more production of goods and services. This is why one of the first acts of the new Government of Jamaica was to create a Ministry of Development, Planning and Production headed by the Deputy Prime Minister. The Ministry will have at its service a National Planning Council which will co-ordinate the work of all those sectors involved in employment-creating projects. The National Planning Council is made up of representatives of Government, of trade unions and of private sector organisations, thus ensuring that tripartite inputs are at the very heart of the Government's economic and employment-creation policies and programmes.

The emphasis we place on tripartism is further emphasised by the Government's decision to reactivate the Labour Advisory Council to make it a more effective instrument in the Ministry of Labour's dealing with industrial relations. The Council will have some very important tasks to undertake, including the gradual introduction of industrial democracy at the workplace. At this point, I wish to alert the ILO that we will be looking in its direction for technical assistance in this matter.

It would be remiss of anyone not to see and take into account the new spirit of respect for the right of workers that is abroad throughout the world. The right to organise, or freedom of association, the right to participate in decision-making and the opportunities to exercise rights of ownership. As I see it, workers everywhere are not content for anything to be held in trust for them by anyone. If something must be held in trust, they want to be trustees of equal standing. That is their right and it must be protected.

The notion of protecting the interests of workers and formalising their participatory role as partners in the process of economic development is one that is very important to my Government. Hence I find it easy to agree with the conclusions of the Director-General when he declares that the protection of the fundamental rights of workers contributes to economic development. That is one of the reasons why my delegation will be interested in the discussions which the Conference will be having on the technical subject of safety in the use of chemicals at work. I believe that the worker needs protection from the hazards associated with products of today's fast-moving technology.

Regrettably, it has to be acknowledged that there are some instances in which a great deal of concern is not shown for the protection of the worker against the hazards of chemical substances. A case in point is that some chemicals – the use of which is banned in the country of manufacture – are all too often exported to unsuspecting developing countries without any proper safeguards as to their storage and use. The result is that toxic poisons accumulate over wide areas and are ultimately ingested either directly or indirectly by workers who, without knowing it, have both their usefulness as workers and their life span considerably shortened.

As we enter the last decade of the twentieth century, we in Jamaica are preoccupied with finding solutions for a serious unemployment problem and the uncertainties brought about by the prevailing debt crisis, yet we are not insensitive to our international responsibilities, particularly to be in solidarity with all who work for the dawn of decency after the long night of apartheid in South Africa. We feel we have a responsibility to ask the International Labour Organisation to take stock of all the tools, all the instruments at its disposal, of the weight of its moral authority and influence, and to engage them full-time in the struggle until the world is rid of this outrage against humanity.

Original – Arabic: Mr. LUQMAN (Minister of Social Affairs and Labour, Yemen) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I am happy on behalf of the Arab Republic of Yemen to congratulate Mr. John Nkomo, Minister of Labour, Manpower Planning and Social Welfare of Zimbabwe, on his election to chair this session. I wish him and his colleagues, the Officers of the Conference, every success in leading our deliberations. I should also like to congratulate most warmly Mr. Michel Hansenne on his election as Director-General of the ILO. We wish him success in his endeavour and would like to assure him of our unreserved support in the realisation of the Organisation's objectives. We are certain that his wide experience will enable him to carry out his task in the best possible manner.

I must pay a special tribute to his predecessor, Mr. Francis Blanchard, who served this Organisation with dedication for long years both as an official of the Organisation and as Director-General for 15 years. These were 15 years of unceasing efforts to achieve the objectives of the Organisation, namely the defence of human dignity and the legitimate rights of people to freedom, work, well-being and peace. We would also like to express our appreciation here for his great efforts and his continued interest in the cause of the Palestinian people. This is borne out by the periodic reports he submitted to the International Labour Conference which have helped Members of the Organisation to understand what is going on in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories. His effective contribution to the struggle against apartheid in South Africa and in Namibia has had a positive impact, and the Organisation has played a very supportive role in helping these people to gain their freedom and self-determination. We thank him most sincerely.

The 76th Session of the International Labour Conference is being held 70 years after the founding of the Organisation. The founding Members should certainly feel rewarded and happy when they see the achievements of the Organisation over the years. Many of these achievements have been of a humanitarian nature. A great number of international labour standards have been adopted (168 Conventions and 176 Recommendations at the end of 1988), all aimed at improving working conditions, combating unemployment and protecting human rights. Supervisory machinery has been established to monitor compliance with these standards (Committee on Freedom of Association, Committee of Experts, etc.). Although the Organisation has passed through very difficult times since its inception, it has been able to overcome many obstacles, and this increases our confidence in the Organisation's ability, by dint of wise leadership and the co-operation of its Members, to meet the challenges of the future, to adapt to today's fast-changing world and to further the interests of humanity.

I would like through you, Mr. President, to commend the secretariat of the Organisation on the excellent documents which have been submitted to the Conference and which will greatly help us in our work. I agree with all those who have said that the Director-General's choice of subject for general discussion this year, recovery and employment, is particularly appropriate, as it coincides with the preparation of the strategy for the United Nations Fourth Development Decade which will require the participation of this and other international organisations concerned with economic and social development. One of the principal aims of this strategy is to conquer poverty, which cannot be brought about without creating employment.

The Report draws attention to the serious imbalances in the world economy and their adverse impact on developing countries: imbalances in the balance of payments, increased external indebtedness, rising unemployment, growing protectionism, the decline in real wages and in the price of developing countries' exports and the increase in the cost of their processed imports. Because of all these and other problems, it is difficult to be too optimistic about the recovery of the OECD countries at the end of the 1980s, for the gap is widening between rich and poor countries and creating a major obstacle to peace and social welfare in the world.

Here we should stress the importance of the rich countries striving together to redress the dangerous imbalance of the world economy and to reverse the current recession in developing countries, especially the poorest countries crippled by their external debt, so that millions of people in the world no longer live in abject poverty. Statistics show that their number has risen from 820 million in 1980 to roughly 920 million at the end of the 1980s. We would like to emphasise the importance of the social and humanitarian objectives of any development policy if it is to bring freedom, dignity, social justice and peace in the world.

Regarding the technical items, I should like to stress the importance of formulating new international labour standards and ensuring the adequate protection of night workers.

The Conference should discuss ways and means of fostering equality in employment and training and should give special attention to women in the workplace. We hope also that enough time will be devoted to discussing safety in the use of chemicals in the workplace and to the formulation of standards that adequately guarantee the health and safety of workers and the disposal of waste that is dangerous for the environment.

Over the past year my country, Yemen, has ratified 13 Conventions. With the ILO it has co-operated in the fields of human resources development, trade union activities, co-operatives (where the Yemen has embarked upon a unique experiment of its own), vocational training, labour legislation, the use of manpower and modern social insurance schemes. Our links with the Organisation have been improving continuously. Last October we presented the Organisation with eight reports showing that we are complying with international labour standards. The Government is also at present revising our labour legislation, and specifically Labour Code No. 5, to bring it in line with changes in international labour legislation. My country also recently approved the changes in the structure of the ILO because we truly believe that this will lead to improvements in future years.

As for the protection of the environment, my Government has set up a Council for the protection of the environment that co-ordinates the work of the relevant ministries and services. We have accordingly introduced appropriate legislation and laid down conditions for setting up certain factories. We are continuing to work with the Organisation on a project to enhance safety and health at the workplace.

The General Confederation of Trade Unions of my country and the General Federation of Chambers of Commerce and Industry, along with other trade union and people's organisations and institutions, are represented in the General People's Congress, which is the political framework for the people's participation in democracy, development and Yemeni unity and the expression of our people's commitment to recovery and overall development. This commitment was voiced at the Fourth General Conference in 1988, whose decisions reflect the ability of the People's Congress to achieve sustainable development, to respond to the preoccupations of the masses and to expand its ties with Arab and international trade unions and political organisations.

To show that man is the focal point of our Organisation, two reports have been presented by the Director-General on the situation of the workers of the occupied Arab territories and on the application of the Declaration concerning action against apartheid in South Africa and Namibia. The report of the Director-General on the situation of Arab workers in Palestine and in the other occupied Arab territories, which is based on international standards and principles such as the Constitution of the ILO and the Declaration of Philadelphia, cites countless instances of serious violations of human rights in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories that have been and are still being committed every day by the Israeli occupation authorities.

The report shows clearly that the continuation of the occupation is having very adverse effects on work, on industrial relations and on economic and social life in the occupied Arab territories. Every day women, children and elderly people are killed, children have their limbs amputated, thousands of citizens are arrested and many others exiled, houses are destroyed and schools, health institutions and trade unions are closed down. And there are other blatant violations of human rights, too. The entire Palestinian people has taken the initiative to undertake an "intifadah" in order to express its refusal of the Israeli occupation and its determination to gain its legitimate rights. It has restated its nationhood by declaring the State of Palestine based on natural, historic and legitimate grounds. The International Labour Organisation and the International Labour Conference and the international community as a whole must assume their responsibilities in the events currently taking place in Palestine and the occupied Arab territories, because the protection of human rights is the responsibility of all. We urge that the necessary steps be taken to protect the rights of the workers and employers in Palestine and that a committee be set up to discuss the issue of Arab workers and employers in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories and to condemn the repressive practices of the Israeli authorities.

I have to mention here my concern at the flagrant violation of the fundamental rights of the peoples of southern Africa by the South African authorities through the policy of apartheid which is considered a crime against humanity and a violation of the objectives and principles of the United Nations and its specialised agencies. It is impossible to reform the apartheid regime. It must be eliminated as an institutionalised and permanent violation of human rights. Since 1986 the state of emergency has been applied in full and the activities of all social and trade union associations have accordingly been restricted. In other words, there is no freedom of association. According to South African sources the state of emergency will continue for years. We would like to stress our solidarity with the peoples of southern Africa and look forward to the day when they will join the international community in exercising their legitimate rights to freedom and self-determination.

I wish the Conference every success in its work. Thank you and may God's peace be upon you.

Original – Portuguese: Mr. REAL MAZULA (Minister of Labour, Mozambique) – Mr. President, I should like to begin by congratulating you on your election as President of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. I am quite certain that under your competent direction it will be successful.

I should also like to greet the new Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Hansenne, and wish him every success in his new post as successor to Mr. Francis Blanchard, to whom the ILO and its Members owe their gratitude for his dedicated work during his mandate.

Part I of the Director-General's Report focuses this year on a typical and complex subject – recovery and employment.

To quote the Director-General, "We live in a time of paradox". On the one hand, there are predictions of the return to an era of economic prosperity, whereas, on the other, many Third World regions are growing poorer and falling farther into debt.

Internationally, growth in the North does not necessarily imply growth in the South. Nationally, increased GDP does not automatically lift the poor out of their poverty nor provide jobs for the unemployed.

There are no universally valid economic models with automatic solutions for the economic problems of all countries. It is true that the efforts of the international community to develop and implement realistic development policies give hope for the creation of a strategy to improve the human condition. Man is both the subject and the object of economic development, hence the close relationship between the economic and social facets of development.

I should like to make my contribution to our deliberations here based on the premises contained in the Director-General's Report.

As stated in the Director-General's Report, "While growth rates in the OECD countries have recovered from the recession of the 1980s and Eastern European and many Asian economies have maintained respectable growth rates, economic conditions in sub-Saharan Africa and Latin America have remained depressed throughout most of the decade".

The economy of Mozambique declined markedly during the first half of the 1980s. This was the consequence of a series of adverse external factors, of internal economic distortions and of insecurity produced by armed bandits in various regions of the country.

Between 1980 and 1986 total production fell by nearly 30 per cent, relative to 1980, and exports fell by 75 per cent, while imports declined by 1 per cent in 1985. There was some improvement in 1986. However, serious external imbalances made worse by ever-higher interest rates caused a rapid increase in the external debt. Growing scarcities led to the use of barter inflation and a parallel market for goods and foreign currency. Efforts were made to respond to growing internal and external imbalances with corrective policies during 1984 to 1986.

In January 1987 the Government of Mozambique launched a global economic rehabilitation programme to deal with the structural problems and economic distortions. From 1987 to 1988 the core of the programme was a series of measures designed to bring about the gradual liberalisation of prices and restoration of market mechanisms. At the same time, monetary and fiscal measures were adopted to reduce the external debt burden and resume debt repayments at sustainable levels.

The general objectives of the economic rehabilitation programme have basically remained unchanged from its introduction in January 1987. These objectives are as follows: to reverse the decline in production and guarantee a minimum level of income and consumption for the entire population and in particular for the rural areas; to substantially reduce internal imbalances and strengthen convertible currency reserves; to establish conditions for return to higher levels of economic growth; to unify the official and parallel market; to re-establish healthy financial relations with creditors and trade partners.

My country's Government will continue to apply its stated policies in order to achieve these objectives and to bring about adequate institutional reforms in the period 1989-91.

We are aware that, in addition to our national efforts, the success of the programme will also depend on continued support from the international community through the provision of financial assistance on concessional terms and effective assistance to lessen external debt service.

The Government is also concerned to define and implement measures stemming from the unequal impact of the structural adjustment burden on the population. Such measures should alleviate the weight of this economic burden on the poorest.

The adjustment strategy of Mozambique has come up against certain constraints, stemming from the emergency situation of which we are all surely aware. For this reason, the Government has had to guarantee that the basic needs of the population affected by a state of insecurity can be met. It must ensure that the country's needs are matched at the very time when essential goods are in short supply. It must promote rural production by sending goods to the rural areas as an incentive. This assumes the integration and compatibility of the short-term emergency programme with the medium-term economic rehabilitation programme.

As I mentioned above, the development of Mozambique has come up against various obstacles. Further obstacles could cause serious problems in the long term. Firstly, there is a shortage of skilled labour in key economic sectors. Secondly, the 2.6 annual population growth rate represents an increasing burden for the nation's social services principally because of the lack of resources. Thirdly, there is the impact of the lack of security and urban migration. Fourthly, the rebuilding of existing infrastructures may meet the country's needs in the short term, but the gradual growth of the agricultural sector will eventually exceed their capacity for adjustment.

Despite all these difficulties, there are some positive socio-economic finds resulting from the rehabilitation programme. Its initial impact reversed the marked trend towards lower per capita income seen prior to 1987. The greatest benefits have been felt in rural areas. However, in the short term the programme had some negative effects on the well-being of some sectors of the population, particularly in urban areas where employment and real wages dropped in 1987 and 1988. An increase in wage rates compensated only in part for the big jump in prices that resulted from measures designed to stimulate agricultural recovery and adjust exchange rates. These difficulties and particularly urban unemployment, worsened with the repatriation of Mozambiquean mineworkers from South Africa and with the influx of people uprooted from the areas of greatest insecurity; yet unemployment levels in 1988 remained unchanged relative to the previous year.

In 1988 the Government took significant steps to study the situation of the sectors of the population most effected by the adjustment programme, war and repatriation. These sectors have a very low standard of living, therefore a commission was established with the participation of United National agencies, to try to alleviate the impact of the economic rehabilitation programme and other factors on the poorest sectors of the population. The commission's recommendations will be useful in making decisions to aid these citizens. These and other measures are designed to integrate the economic and social aspects that the programme must consider if it is to be fully successful.

In my country both the Government and the workers' organisations are determined to meet this challenge and succeed in our development programmes. To this end we count on the experience and support of all the members of the international community as well as the customary assistance from the International Labour Organisation.

In relation to co-operation between the ILO and the Mozambique, I am pleased to mention the joint action taken in 1988. As mentioned in Part II of the Director-General's Report a project was instituted in the south of Mozambique for the reintegration of migrant workers repatriated from South Africa with joint financing by UNDP and the Norwegian Government. A project is also underway to set up a national social security system. There were meetings such as that of SALC and seminars with ILO participation and sponsorship, to mention only the most important projects and events.

I am quite certain that this co-operation will be strengthened and extended to such other fields of labour as the ILO may wish to explore in Mozambique.

I hope that by the conclusion of this session of the Conference, all of us will have benefited from the useful experiences that are always acquired here to enable us to respond ever more effectively to the challenges of the labour world.

The PRESIDENT – Before I ask Mr. Beyreuther, Secretary of State for Labour and Wages of the German Democratic Republic to take the floor, may I, on behalf of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference, extend a warm welcome to Mr. Beyreuther. We all recall the successful manner in which he conducted the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference, which was quite a success, and I personally feel honoured to have succeeded him.

Original – German: Mr. BEYREUTHER (Secretary of State for Labour and Wages, German Democratic Republic) – First of all, I should like to thank you very much indeed for the kind words you addressed to me with reference to my presidency of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference last year. On my own behalf, and also on behalf of the Government of the German Democratic Republic, I should like to congratulate you most cordially, Mr. President, upon your election as President of this 76th Session of the Conference. It is a particular pleasure for me since you are the representative of a country that is highly valued internationally and also a country with which the German Democratic Republic enjoys amicable relations.

This year the International Labour Organisation is celebrating its 70th anniversary. Certainly, there were many reasons that led up to its creation; but we believe that the most important aspect of its creation was that it took up the cause of the working masses' fight against war and exploitation, and set out to attain social progress.

With the shift in the balance of power after the Second World War, when the Organisation became a United Nations specialised agency, foundations were laid for a new phase in the ILO's development. Increasing emphasis was laid on securing the political, economic and social rights of workers, with all that that involved, and the Organisation attempted to make a greater contribution to resolving global problems.

My delegation welcomes the fact that the Director-General's Report this year discusses the extremely topical issue of economic recovery and employment. We consider this to be a logical follow-up to the discussions at the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference on human rights.

This discussion promoted awareness in our Organisation of the unity, the indivisibility and complementarity of human rights, as they were enshrined in the Declaration of Human Rights in 1948, and also as reaffirmed in the concluding document of the follow-up meeting of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe in Vienna. At the same time, it emerged from our talks that the right to work is a prerequisite for the attainment of other economic, social, cultural, civil and political human rights.

The Director-General's Report depicts a dramatic employment situation in vast areas of the world. The only conclusion that the ILO can draw from this is that it must step up its activities to overcome mass unemployment and underemployment.

We think that the measures provided for in the draft programme and budget for 1990-91 constitute steps in the right direction. We believe that we shall be better able to put these measures into practice if we also follow the new international trend away from confrontation towards co-operation in our own Organisation. Discriminatory practices, as they still exist today – above all in the Employers' group – are an obstacle in this respect. There can only be co-operation and trust if the partners' interests are taken into account.

In order to overcome such a vast problem as mass unemployment and underemployment, effective measures must first and foremost be taken by the countries concerned.

Experiences in the German Democratic Republic – which is celebrating its 40th anniversary this year – have shown that economic growth is a prerequisite for full employment and social progress. Admittedly, this does not happen by itself. Conscious efforts must be made to bring about unity in economic and social development. The point of departure of any economic endeavour must be to determine the ideals that are to be put into effect.

Our goal is not only to attain the greatest possible economic efficacy. We are far more concerned about creating an economy with a social dimension – an economy that serves the interests and the welfare of man. In the German Democratic Republic, full employment and social security are an integral part of socialism. One of our greatest achievements for decades now has been to provide our people with a steady job; and we are not prepared to change our approach in the future, even in the face of greater automation and rapid structural change.

One of the most important lessons we have learnt is that it is impossible to attain full employment if the State does not steer and plan the major processes in the national economy. No enterprise alone, however impressive its performance may be, is in a position to secure full employment on a national scale. This can only be achieved through long-term measures adopted by the State; and this also applies to other social objectives. For instance, in the German Democratic Republic, we would never have been able to embark upon such a comprehensive housing programme over the past 20 years, in order to solve housing problems as a social issue by 1990, if we had left this task to market forces.

What is really important is that workers should be largely involved in state plans and measures, on a democratic basis. We have observed that any social improvement triggers off new initiatives and releases new creative forces which, in their own turn, further stimulate economic recovery.

We are fully aware that, in order to attain unity in the economic and social policies of my country, new conditions have to be created. Today, the situation is different from that which existed ten or twenty years ago. In the decade that now lies ahead, there will be yet further requirements. This applies not only to the productivity of the economy – the material basis of this policy – but also to the human and spiritual aspect of society, especially as regards the education system.

If you look very carefully at developments in the German Democratic Republic, you will see that continuity and innovation are its hallmarks. Our policy is to maintain factors that have proved their worth and to draw the relevant timely conclusions from new requirements as they occur. This is the essence of our policy. In this way, we can guarantee that economic growth always leads to social progress.

In this context, I should like to stress that we shall have even more to do in the field of environmental protection in the nineties. My country has already invested many billions towards this in the past. We are aware that expenditure to protect the environment will inevitably grow in the future and therefore we attach particular importance to the adoption of a resolution concerning environmental protection and employment at this year's session of the Conference.

The Government of the German Democratic Republic shares the concern about the negative impact of the foreign debt of the developing countries on economic growth, employment and their ability to overcome underdevelopment, as reflected in the Director-General's Report.

As we know, the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment highlighted the fact that the majority of developing countries were in an even worse situation at the end of the 1980s than at the beginning of this decade. The foreign debt in developing countries has become one of the most serious problems in international relations.

Given this situation the German Democratic Republic supports all steps taken to reach a fair settlement of the developing countries' debt problems. It agrees with demands voiced at the international level that disadvantageous trade, monetary and financial conditions should be eradicated, since these are the main reasons for the foreign debt situation. Guided as it is by these thoughts, my delegation believes that the resolution before the Conference concerning development, foreign debt and the social objectives of the International Labour Organisation has come at the right moment.

The regional conflicts throughout the world are a serious scourge for the peoples in the regions concerned and their repercussions are becoming increasingly unbearable. The reports submitted by the Director-General on apartheid and on the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories have brought this fact forcefully home, and again the ILO must therefore do all within its power to bring about a political settlement to these conflicts. As in the past, the German Democratic Republic will support the broad democratic anti-apartheid movement including the ANC, in its struggle for a democratic, united and non-racist South Africa. We shall continue to express our solidarity with the people of Namibia. We believe that only if United Nations Security Council resolution 435 and related agreements are strictly applied, above all by South Africa, will the Namibian people be able to accede to independence and decide its own future in full sovereignty.

In the same way, I should like to assure the nations of the Middle East, and in particular the Palestinian people and their sole legitimate representative, the PLO, of the continuing solidarity of my country. My delegation supports the Arab draft resolution.

If there is to be any solution to the global problems confronting mankind – underdevelopment, poverty, the foreign debt or the destruction of the environment – there must be an immediate end to the arms race and a cut in military expenditure.

It is against all reason to go on spending gigantic sums on arms day by day and to reduce social development.

The Government of the German Democratic Republic therefore urges that there be no slackening in the disarmament process started by the INF treaty. The German Democratic Republic is making its own contribution to that end; it has unilaterally decided that, by the end of 1990, the National People's Army will be reduced by 10,000 men and that military expenditure will be cut by 10 per cent.

We believe that nations can be successful only if they redirect the immense resources used for arms production for social purposes.

The International Labour Organisation could render a great service by doing all within its power to promote this process.

Original – Spanish: Mr. MARIUS (representative of the Latin American Central of Workers) – I should like to begin by congratulating you, Mr. President, on your election. I should also like to congratulate and wish every success to Mr. Michel Hansenne, the new Director-General of the International Labour Office.

We should first like to comment on the Director-General's Report. This is an important legacy that Mr. Francis Blanchard has left to us as the culmination of his difficult and important work at the forefront of the ILO.

In his Report, Mr. Blanchard highlights, in a global view of humanity, the striking imbalance between the growth of the world economy last year and the senseless aggression to which the Third World has been subjected, especially its workers and underprivileged groups.

We are experiencing an international economic situation that reveals the stark reality of a basically unjust and unacceptable relationship between the sustained growth of the so-called developed countries and the steady anguishing growth of underdevelopment, poverty, marginality and hardship among the peoples of the Third World.

While the economies of the technologically advanced countries are being consolidated, in Latin America per capita GNP fell by 8 per cent during the last five years. In 1988 alone, consumer prices rose by 473 per cent. In some countries the figure was as high as 7,000 per cent. Half of the economically active population were subjected to the criminal system referred to by experts as the informal economy. For these people there is no fixed employment, no social security, no protective standards or conventions and, more serious still, no hope for a better future.

While we listen to resounding speeches on peace, mankind is investing 2,880 million dollars every day in weapons. In Latin America 1,917 children die every day of malnutrition, and this is certain to increase in coming years.

We are also compelled to go back to the thorny problem of the external debt that Latin American workers can no longer assimilate. That debt, valued in figures that surpass our imagination, can only be paid for through production. Today that would mean that each of us would have to labour for nearly five years without pay, working free of charge, not for the benefit of Latin America, but for transnational banks to palce new investments in the developed countries.

To reiterate our statement to the Latin American Economic Conference which took place in Quito in 1984, there is no longer any point in discussing whether or not the external debt should be paid. It cannot and should not be paid. Over and above the fact that it is illegitimate and often used to sustain totalitarian regimes or to swell personal accounts in United States or European banks, payment of the external debt would condemn all of Latin America to absolute destitution and deprive it of any hope, which is the most cruel and brutal form of subversion.

This topic is mandatory for any international conference. It is included in any reference to the economy and is a focal point for the international media, and yet, very few dare to mention the counterpart social debt which, like some inevitable accounting balance, has historically been contracted towards the Latin American workers and peoples.

According to the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), 165 million people in Latin America lived below the poverty line in 1988. For 1990 this figure is expected to be 240 million – that is 60 per cent of the Latin American population.

UNDP also reports that 40 per cent of families have members who suffer from malnutrition, 68 per cent of housing is inadequate, and 44 per cent of the Latin American population is unemployed. We are pleased that an ILO body, the Regional Employment Programme for Latin America and the Caribbean (PREALC) has courageously and competently undertaken to deal with the difficult and painful problem of the social debt. This debt, which historically has been assumed by the working class of Latin America, is basically structural and the consequence of a distribution system designed and operated to serve a development model representing interests contrary to those of the great majority of our region.

The most serious situation at present is the consequence of the application of adjustment policies that lower living standards. The cost of these policies has fallen mainly on the least privileged members of society who are suffering from a steady and increasingly rapid deterioration in their already precarious living and working conditions.

With respect to Conventions and Recommendations discussed and adopted here in this room, and endorsed for the most part by member States, there is a major contradiction between formal acceptance and the lack of political will for effective implementation which forces worker organisations to make enormous efforts to secure their observance. Moreover, such Recommendations and Conventions today have been confronted, neutralised and even violated by adjustment policies introduced to enable payment of the external debt imposed by another United Nations agency, the International Monetary Fund (IMF).

We recall that a few years ago the ILO Director-General made known his concerns to the IMF regarding the consequences of applying the so-called "recipes". In today's Latin American context these concerns have taken shape and the consequences have exceeded expectations. What is still more serious, the situation shows clear signs of growing worse.

We believe that the time has come for the ILO to clearly and emphatically denounce to the IMF the violation of ILO agreements and Conventions resulting from the application of IMF policies and recommendations.

In past decades, when we analysed the factors causing institutional collapse in connection with the application of the national security doctrine – the last vestiges of which will be eliminated in the next few months by the heroic political will of the people and workers of Chile represented here by my delegation, which has received by international support – we observed that the most determining of all factors was the serious economic and social deterioration suffered by the overwhelming majority of people as a result of inept policies that were incapable of alleviating their anguish and meeting their expectations. We are duty-bound today to denounce the adjustment policies which are generally and indiscriminately applied to all Latin American situations and which obviously undermine the stability of the democracies to which we aspire. These policies also infringe on basic human rights and on the freedom of workers, which are a sine qua non condition for the application of the Conventions and Recommendations advocated by this Organisation. Lastly, these policies lead directly to subversion and violence.

This subversion is brought about by those who promote development models designed and implemented to enrich an already wealthy minority and to subject the great majority to conditions of poverty and oppression. It is induced by those who believe that they exercise democracy by merely carrying out simple electoral exercises without responding to the concerns and needs of the workers and populations.

This subversion is provoked by certain international organisations which promote, condition and impose policies which are in contradiction with our people's aspirations to peace, freedom and work. This violence is expressed in the murder and disappearance of trade union and popular leaders in Colombia, in the denial of workers' fundamental right to organise and act freely in Nicaragua, in the denunciation of the legitimate aspiration of the workers and people of Panama to democracy and freedom, in the imposition of conditions on the aspirations of our indigenous brothers to full respect of their cultural heritage and their inalienable right to live and express themselves as an organised people, in the denial to our workers and peoples of the rights to which we are entitled to as human beings and the right to create a better future for our children.

With the legitimate concern of workers and fathers, we observe that more and more is invested daily in powdered milk with the result that children drink less and less fresh milk.

In five of our countries over 1 per cent of the population is part of the armed forces, in other countries close to 2.5 per cent and in one above 3 per cent. In some cases more than 40 per cent of the national budget is devoted to so-called defence expenditure while the portion pertaining to education, health and housing does not reach 10 per cent.

From whom do we need to defend ourselves when those who govern us do nothing but make speeches promising dialogue and peace? Are we condemned to continue accepting a submissive role as arms buyers to sustain economies in which the weapons industry is an undeniable factor of international domination and power?

With a mere 10 per cent reduction in defence expenditure and arms purchase, Latin America would save 13,500 million dollars per annum which could be set aside for the urgently needed solution of serious food problems.

The Latin Americans have realised, through painful experience, that whoever uses arms against the people, whatever the ideology put forward as an excuse, loses the moral right to speak of liberation, peace and justice.

It is in this context that we condemn the painful events which have occurred in the People's Republic of China and the use of repressive methods which deny any possibility for dialogue and for the creation of development based on peace and justice.

We are preparing to initiate the Fourth United Nations Development Decade in 1990 and in this respect there is one matter of serious concern to us: what is to be understood by development and who is to benefit from it?

For the first time in the history of mankind, under the heading of extending and giving an international dimension to the economy and the markets, so-called economic alternatives have been imposed, based on a single development model. Their consequences, well known to Latin Americans in their most brutal form, are opposed to the most heartfelt and dire needs for the subsistence of our workers and peoples.

The dreadful crisis which we are experiencing is predominantly a crisis of civilisation, of values, a crisis which tackles the very essence of a human being.

The creation of employment, the overcoming of painful economic and social injustices should not only call for the responsible use of our creativity materially speaking, but also we should assume it as a way of giving dignity to workers; of creating conditions which fully respect man's right to live as a human being ; of seeking new forms of solidarity and participation for those who share the common task of generating goods and services and transforming nature, which should be to the exclusive benefit of man as a whole and for all men.

If we accept that development is the new name for peace, we must be fully aware of and shoulder our responsibilities in rethinking and recreating an international order based on justice, which is the only way to attain peace and achieve the full liberation of mankind.

Original – Spanish: We shall now continue the discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Original – Japanese: Mr. MARUYAMA (Workers' delegate, Japan) – Mr. President, on behalf of the workers of Japan, allow me to express my congratulations to you on your election. I am convinced that under your able leadership this session of the Conference will be a great success.

This year the ILO is celebrating its 70th anniversary. At the last session of its Governing Body, Mr. Michel Hansenne was elected as the Organisation's new Director-General, succeeding Mr. Francis Blanchard, who had worked with dedication for 15 years at the head of the ILO.

Workers in Japan have a profound respect for Mr. Francis Blanchard, former Director-General of the ILO, an international organisation established for the protection and promotion of workers' interests. Over the difficult years experienced by the ILO, Mr. Blanchard showed great capacity for strong leadership, taking initiatives in various ILO activities, and he has succeeded in leaving a legacy of enormous achievements.

May I also present my congratulations to the newly elected Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, and express the hope that he, like his predecessor, will show great leadership skills and pave the way for a bright future for the ILO based on the principle of tripartism.

Workers today are faced with the challenge of major changes world-wide, both in industrialised and developing countries, irrespective of social and economic systems – be they capitalist or socialist. These changes have occurred firstly because economic recovery has been limited to certain parts of the world, namely industrialised and newly industrialised countries; secondly, because the process of economic and industrial restructuring is taking place on a global basis; thirdly, because of the development of new technology; and fourthly, because of a quantitative and qualitative change in consumption.

What concerns us in this process is that changes in work and employment patterns often have a negative impact on workers which takes the form of unemployment, job transitions and impaired working conditions. In most of the developing countries, in particular, economic recovery is failing to progress and the gap with respect to the industrialised countries is being further widened. As a consequence, workers in those countries continue to suffer from unemployment and poverty.

The ILO, in its 70 years of existence, has been most sensitive as an international organisation to these changes in the world of work and devoted itself to standard-setting activities for the defence of human rights and the protection of the rights of workers at the international level. It is high time for the ILO to prove its traditional ability once more.

In this context, I think that the theme chosen for the Report of the Director-General submitted to this session of the Conference namely "recovery and employment", is most timely and deserving of support.

The ILO has always availed itself of every opportunity to address the problems of employment, a goal which it again took up at the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment held in November 1987. I should like to pay tribute to this milestone initiative which was taken with a view to finding solutions to employment problems in the context of international economic relations. Today, employment problems in the world are not confined to any cyclical changes in economic activities. They can no longer be approached as merely domestic problems. Overcoming the imbalance of the world economy and preparing adequate infrastructures for growth, which are conditions necessary for the creation of employment and the elimination of poverty, are today's most urgent tasks.

By taking an interest in a new world economic order and by trying to solve employment problems in co-operation with other international organisations, particularly those specialising in the economic and social fields, the ILO proves that it has chosen the most fitting approach for today.

With respect to the conclusions adopted at the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment, and in support for the practical proposal presented in the Director-General's Report to this session of the Conference, I should like to put forward my opinions on the following points.

Firstly, I believe that in order to solve protracted unemployment and precarious employment throughout the world, steady well-balanced growth is a basic requirement. To achieve this goal, I believe that co-operation among countries is of the utmost importance, especially economic co-operation with developing countries whose economic activities are still embryonic. The world economy nowadays has become interdependent in all fields, particularly finance, trade, science and technology. Recovery in some industrialised countries does not necessarily ensure continuous growth of their economies unless it is accompanied by recovery in other countries, including the developing ones.

We should therefore strive for further co-operation and co-ordination among countries all over the world with a view to reducing the economic gap between North and South and to solving the accumulated debt and trade deficit problems and promoting further development.

Secondly, the most adequate means of overcoming the debt crisis, which hampers recovery and structural adjustment in the developing countries, is to create an economic system under which industries are encouraged to develop. As a result, living conditions could be improved and stable, continuous employment could be guaranteed. This would lead to still more employment, a higher GNP, improved living conditions and more investment.

However, the main thrust of current policies is to encourage a capital outflow from debtor countries and to saddle them with overly restrictive economic policies leading to new debts which have to be repaid. This approach, far from being conducive to radical solutions, stands to further undermine the basic conditions necessary for employment creation and investment for production.

In order to promote development in the developing countries, credit from industrialised countries is indispensable. What is important is that official development assistance (ODA) should not be used purely in servicing debt. Rather, these resources should be invested in production with a view to increasing employment. ODA offered by Japan in the 1989 fiscal year amounts to 1,300 billion yen, that is about 10 billion dollars. Trade unions in Japan are requesting the Japanese Government to increase the percentage of their untied ODA loans and to place more emphasis on investment for social objectives.

Thirdly, I should like to address the problem of the quality of employment. In OECD countries alone, apart from the 13 million unemployed, several million workers are given working opportunities which can hardly be called decent jobs. In developing countries far more deplorable conditions of employment, if any, prevail. We should demand that both employers and governments should provide employment opportunities of good quality so that decent levels of income can be continuously ensured and workers' basic rights in accordance with international standards can be guaranteed.

Furthermore, a positive labour policy should be established to provide workers with the qualifications necessary for employment. We are asking for basic education and vocational training of good quality, increased training and retraining opportunities, an improvement in the quality of this training and also equality between men and women.

In conclusion, with respect to the need for truly effective strategy for recovery and increased employment opportunities, I should like to add the two following points.

Firstly, a democratic system is a prerequisite for a well-balanced recovery of the economy and for social welfare. Democracy means that freedom of association should be guaranteed and that tripartism, including of course trade union organisations, should function in all countries. Trade unions should participate in and control the process of establishing and implementing strategies for recovery.

In practice, however, cases of infringement of basic labour rights are increasing alarmingly in the process of structural adjustment in many countries. Even in so-called industrialised countries the situation has worsened. Basic labour rights are not fully guaranteed, and a growing number of complaints have been lodged recently with the Committee on Freedom of Association. I deeply deplore this situation.

May I urge, on this occasion, all ILO member States to commit themselves to the principle of tripartism, which has strengthened over the years, and to ratify as early as possible and implement without discrimination the ILO Conventions adopted in the last 70 years of its history.

Secondly, the achievement of disarmament and détente on a global level are essential objectives to which we deeply aspire. The escalation of the arms race endangers world peace and impoverishes economic potential. I therefore hope that the Soviet Union and the United States will continue with their peace efforts.

The 76th Session of the International Labour Conference is an important landmark in the Organisation's 70 years of history and new leaps and challenges must be met at this juncture. Along with all the workers of the world, I do hope that the ILO will continue to exert efforts towards durable international peace and prosperity.

Original – French: Mr. SA N'DOUDJINANG (Workers' delegate, Chad) – It is the first time under the Third Republic of Chad that the Workers' representative of Chad in taking the floor in his personal capacity and on behalf of the workers of Chad to congratulate the President on his brilliant election to the presidency of this session and on the excellent manner in which he is conducting our work. Our congratulations also go to all of the officers of the Conference.

I would also like to offer my warm congratulations to Mr. Michel Hansenne on his election to the post of Director-General of our Organisation.

My congratulations go also to the Governing Body for their efficient assistance to the general running of our Organisation and, in particular, for the excellent organisation of this session.

Before dealing with some aspects of the problems before us I wish to inform you of an important event that has taken place in my country. I refer to the creation of a single central trade union organisation, the National Union of Trade Unions in Chad, the UNST, on whose behalf I have the pleasure of addressing you.

The workers of Chad, aware of their role in active working life, have pooled their resources to better defend their rights and also to better contribute to the development of our nation. They thus freely decided, at the Constituent Congress held in N'Djamena, our capital, on 15, 16 and 17 November, on the setting up of this central trade union organisation.

The UNST is an independent organisation. It is a member of the OUSA at Pan-African level and the OTAC at regional level. It works with all international trade union organisations with similar principles. As regards our co-operation with the Government, the UNST is among other objectives in favour of full and responsible participation aimed at making suggestions, formulating recommendations and obtaining trade union representation in joint economic and social bodies.

Since its inception, the UNST, which exercises its activities independently and in full compliance with international Conventions, in particular Conventions Nos. 87 and 98, has sent the constituent documents of its congress to the regional office of the ILO at Yaoundé and to the workers' expert in Geneva in order to obtain rapid assistance in the area of workers' education. Our letters have, however, remained unanswered for the last six months, at a time when the ILO is the most important social partner of our central trade union organisation and especially since the workers of Chad have not benefited from the assistance of this Organisation in these areas for the past ten years.

I would like to point out that, before the events which occurred in my country, the ILO financed major projects in favour of Chadian workers, in particular the Koukou Angarana market garden project, the vocational training centre and the accountancy training centre of the Consular Chamber in N'Djamena. All of these activities were co-ordinated by an ILO expert who had his office in the Chadian capital.

The development of such a project is one of the objectives of the UNST's programme of action. However, because of our limited means, it is difficult for us to reach these objectives.

That is why we would like to express our full gratitude to our fellow international trade unions which have spontaneously given us their support, no matter how modest, to relaunch the activities of our young central organisation. I would like to take this opportunity to launch an urgent appeal to other organisations for their support.

The trade union situation in Chad is significant in view of the painful events in my country which have shaken its social and economic foundations.

The result of this is that not all the companies previously operating in Chad have resumed their activities. A number of workers are unemployed because of the closing-down of the majority of these enterprises. To encourage creditors to bridge this gap through new investment, the Government of Chad has revised the National Investment Code to provide incentives in this area.

Allow me, one again to congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne, the Director-General of the ILO, for the excellent quality and clarity of his report.

The agenda adopted by this meeting includes a number of very important items, in particular those dealing with economic recovery and employment, the Report on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations and the Special Report on Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia.

The 76th Session of the International Labour Conference is taking place at a time when the whole world is undergoing a serious crisis, the end of which is not yet in sight.

In Africa, the countries south of the Sahara are feeling the effects of this crisis more severely than the northern industrialised countries. In view of this situation, these countries are obliged to accept the economic recovery plan advocated by the IMF and the World Bank. This subversive plan of the World Bank and the IMF has led to the closing of state-run enterprises and to privatisation resulting in large-scale dismissal of workers.

In a number of African countries, agreements between employers and workers are revised taking into consideration the requirements of the World Bank and the IMF. In other countries this procedure is simply ignored.

The situation cannot improve unless a solution is found to the problems of worsening trade terms and the public debt burden. On behalf of the UNST, I would like to express our gratitude to Mr. François Mitterrand, the President of the Republic of France, who during the Meeting of the Heads of States in Dakar announced the cancellation of the debt of the poorest African countries vis-à-vis France. I would be happy if other countries could follow this example.

In the face of this difficult economic situation, African trade union organisations should be more concerned to define a global strategy with trade union organisations in the industrialised countries.

According to the UNST, the strategy involves the settlement of individual or collective disputes with employers, the development of national and international policies for full employment and pressure on industrialised governments for the development of a global economic policy to support developing countries. This is necessary since in seeking a solution to the external debt problem of developing countries, one is also seeking a solution to the social and labour problems of the industrialised countries.

Since its creation in November 1988, the UNST has fought for the revision of collective agreements, the revision of the Labour Code and the social welfare system, the repeal of a number of laws which do not comply with the spirit of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 of the ILO ratified by Chad in 1960. It has also urged revision of Decree No. 001 of 8 January 1976 which bans public officials and assimilated employees from exercising trade union rights, Decree No. 30 of 26 November 1975 suspending all strikes throughout the country and the amendment of article 36 of the Labour Code prohibiting trade unions from exercising political activities.

All of these anti-union measures were taken by the military government in order to silence the unions.

The Government of the Third Republic has taken all necessary measures to cancel or amend these texts, and the new labour legislation will no doubt contain provisions in line with the spirit of the above-mentioned Conventions.

Furthermore, the National Union of Trade Unions in Chad is negotiating with the Government for the ratification of the Workers' Representatives Convention, 1971 (No. 135); the Paid Educational Leave Convention, 1974 (No. 140); Rural Workers' Organisations Convention, 1975 (No. 141).

The economy of my country will be severely affected by the efforts undertaken to develop the pastoral, agricultural and forestry sectors. The ratification, in particular, of Convention No. 141 will have a major impact on the economic and social policy of my country, since this standard is of tremendous importance for special public works programmes which have multisectoral and interdisciplinary objectives.

Furthermore, the activities of the ILO in the field of special public works programmes, manpower planning and employment, information systems on the labour market and appropriate technology, rural development and the situation of women workers and refugees have also been of tremendous interest to us.

The UNST very much appreciates these special programmes of the International Labour Organisation in the field of institutional support, the development and maintenance of infrastructures, participation of the population, technical co-operation projects related to vocational training, and the co-operative programme aimed at developing co-operative policies and strategies.

We also appreciate the programme of action for the informal sector which is aimed at encouraging employment and stimulating economic growth.

As far as co-operatives are concerned, we feel that they are an efficient and effective means for workers – both male and female – in our developing countries to achieve development, to further their own efforts and to improve their living and working conditions. My country's Government attaches great importance to the setting up of consumer and producer co-operatives.

The UNST launches an appeal to the ILO at this juncture therefore in support of the development of groups and co-operatives in Chad, within the framework of the special public works programmes.

I would like to conclude my remarks by emphasising the support of the UNST for the Director-General's Programme of Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia.

In addition to expressing the hope that the work of the 76th Session of our Conference will be a success, I reiterate my congratulations and the support of the workers of Chad for the Officers of the Conference, for the ILO and for its Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne.

Original – French: Mr. VAN DEN BRANDE (Minister of Employment and Labour, Belgium) – Allow me to congratulate Mr. Nkomo on his election as president of this 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. Although this Conference has a lengthy agenda, I am certain that his experience and wisdom will enable us to achieve good results.

This year, the Governing Body has appointed a new Director-General. He was my predecessor at the Department of Employment and Labour in Belgium, where he performed an excellent job. My Government is very moved by the ILO's confidence in our country's candidate, and I would like you to know how proud I am myself.

We would like to convey to Michel Hansenne our best wishes for success in his new mission.

I would also like to pay a warm tribute to Mr. Francis Blanchard, the former Director-General, who for 15 years has led the ILO with exceptional wisdom and determination.

While maintaining stability, Mr. Blanchard succeeded in overcoming many obstacles to the implementation of the Organisation's major projects or to its policy. He endeavoured, in a spirit of tolerance, of openmindedness and cordiality, to see to it that everyone felt at home in the ILO and that the ILO lived in each of our hearts.

It was with great deal of interest that I read the Report of the Director-General, which this year deals with recovery and employment.

I am very glad to see that the Report stresses the importance of tripartite dialogue and the fact that this dialogue can still be enhanced and developed in various directions which, though they may not be new, are not necessarily those traditionally taken by the social partners.

I think that Belgium's experience in tripartite dialogue is perhaps an interesting illustration of this procedure. I am referring, in particular, to the fact that such concertation has taken account of the issue of employment and the training efforts undertaken by enterprises in Belgium for the benefit of the unemployed.

However, it is admittedly not always easy to expand social dialogue into areas uncharted by traditional collective bargaining. The economic and social situation at the beginning of the 1980s compelled the Belgian Government to explore new alternatives. A new approach was called for. The Government's determination to guide concertation, without stifling it, was decisive. Concertation, as we have discovered over and over again, constitutes a flexible and realistic approach, enabling it to achieve specific goals. The Government left it to the employers and to the trade unions to decide how to attain them. This made the dialogue more effective, while the social partners became convinced of the crucial nature of the objectives.

The current economic and social situation impels us to continue in this direction, not only for new reasons which have arisen – which I will mention in a little while – but also because of the need for dialogue and negotiation, which are the indispensable instruments of a sound employment market policy.

The definition of an employment policy in the present context is based on an analysis of the employment market. Its aspects are characteristic for Belgium but may be valid for other countries as well.

On the one hand, we see a positive trend in employment. Historically speaking, this trend is not exceptional, but, if we compare it to the scores for the 1980s, there has undoubtedly been an improvement in the situation on the employment market. While unemployment rates remain very high they are nevertheless diminishing, to the extent that some regions and certain categories of workers are approaching full employment. Obviously, this is the most encouraging aspect of the current stage.

But, on the other hand, we must always continue to stress the high rate of unemployment and particularly the large proportion of those who are currently or who are likely to become long-term unemployed. This group is made up mainly of young people who have failed in school, older workers with obsolete skills, women and immigrant workers.

It is very difficult for them to break out of the unemployment pattern; they are not the ones chosen to fill the vacancies created by economic growth, for reasons for which we are now better able to understand. A large proportion of the jobs eliminated during the economic crisis were once offered first to the persons who are now in the disadvantaged category.

What conclusions can we draw from this diagnosis with a view to defining a new employment policy?

It must first be admitted that in previous years, in the industrialised countries where unemployment had grown into an obsession of policy-makers, the measures adopted to promote employment were essentially quantitative.

This means that, even if there was a desire to implement measures designed to better serve the beneficiaries of employment policy schemes, the urgency of the situation required quantitative results aimed at curbing unemployment growth which otherwise seemed inevitable.

As long as jobs were being eliminated in vast numbers, no major problems arose out of this drifting approach characteristic of the implementation of employment promotion programmes. Today, however, with resumed growth in employment coupled with a high unemployment rate, great care must be taken to offset the detrimental effects of this approach.

In the current employment market situation, there is little point in providing a job under an employment promotion scheme to a person whose profile will enable him to find a job quickly and easily in the private sector, since in some regions, in certain categories of skill, there are even shortages of manpower. By adopting this erroneous approach, the public authorities would be attracting labour to their own advantage, without economic justification.

The question which therefore arises is to define an employment policy which is appropriate in this new context, that is, one which is targeted at high-risk groups and therefore narrowly applied, but which can be expected to produce sufficient quantitative results in a situation where unemployment is still very high.

I do not wish to insist here on an employment policy targeted at high-risk groups. Enough publicity has been given to this issue. However, the recent experience of the policy carried out in Belgium is worth developing in the light of this concern to curb the attraction of labour mentioned above. I consider this policy to be extremely important and support it wholeheartedly.

If the Belgian Government intervened in collective bargaining, it was to urge the social partners to take employment problems into account. The Government called upon collective bargaining to mobilise resources for those persons who usually and of necessity were excluded from such bargaining, that is the unemployed.

During the last round of collective bargaining for the period 1989-1990, an agreement was concluded providing for particular efforts to be made for the benefit of young persons and job seekers for whom it was difficult to find jobs in order to offer them employment and training opportunities. It was agreed that if these measures failed to gain support at the sectoral and enterprise level, 0.18 per cent of the wage bill would have to be paid into a fund earmarked for assistance towards employment promotion schemes.

Although this approach has not yet reached the extent required by the unemployment rate, it has opened up a unique approach enabling the Government and the social partners to shoulder their responsibilities by offering job opportunities to workers threatened with long-term unemployment. On the one hand, this approach enhances the role of the social partners in employment promotion while on the other, it confirms the subsidiary role of the Government.

In this process, care should be taken to avoid any competition between employment promotion schemes in the public sector and the sustained demand for labour in the private sector.

This is not the only approach taken by my department and by the Government. However, it should gradually gain a foothold as a compromise solution in this contradictory situation of an employment market in which high unemployment is accompanied by an upswing of employment growth.

This approach would effectively back up other employment promotion measures in which an attempt is being made to set objectives which would benefit high-risk groups.

Admittedly, these concerns are specific to the industrialised countries. However, we would not be true to the objectives of the International Labour Organisation if we failed to provide active support to the economic and social development of the least developed countries.

The social aspect should never be disregarded when considering economic problems. In his Report, the Director-General reminds us that "economic and social issues are inextricably intertwined: just as social programmes and policies have economic implications, so all economic decisions necessarily have social consequences, and these should be taken into account from the outset".

The Director-General goes on to say that "the protection of fundamental rights of workers also contributes to economic development".

I should also like to express my firm support for the protection of fundamental social rights.

The Ministers of Labour of the European Community, who met in Council yesterday in Luxembourg, discussed these fundamental social rights. Nearly all of them, myself included, are of the view that the European Community should be able to vote on a set of fundamental social rights to be applicable in all of its twelve member States. The differences in working conditions among the States of the European Community cannot have a detrimental effect on the economic and social situation of the member States which are socially more advanced.

Fundamental social rights have never been called into question in Belgium in the debate on flexibility. Increased flexibility in the regulations governing the employment market and an improvement in flexibility have been and are considered as essential prerequisites for employment growth.

Flexibility within enterprises and the observance of fundamental rights is essential. However, while a great deal of attention has rightly been given to forms of flexibility for the benefit of the enterprise, other forms should also be developed which better meet the aspirations and interests of workers as members of family units and as citizens.

Given the diversity of family situations and the changing needs of each individual in the course of his or her life, a variety of solutions are called for.

To conclude, flexibility for the benefit of the family and the citizen is a subject likely to gain currency in coming years. This is why I shall attach a great deal of importance to any studies and proposals which the ILO, the quality of whose research I respect, might carry out in this field.

I should like to conclude by affirming my belief in the virtues of social peace and concertation between the social partners. These are elements which favour social and economic development both at the national and at the international level.

Original – Spanish: Mrs. FORERO DE SAADE (Government delegate, Colombia) – I am happy on behalf of the Government of Colombia, which I have the honour to represent here, to congratulate the President of the Conference, Mr. Nkomo, Minister of Labour in Zimbabwe, and the other Officers on their election.

I also take this opportunity of transmitting on behalf of my delegation congratulations to Mr. Hansenne on his election as Director-General of the ILO and to Mr. Blanchard on his services to the Organisation.

The Government of Colombia is once more present in this historic Organisation, the ILO, with the best intentions and with the conviction that in this universal forum wise new formulas will be found for the effective development of the world of labour.

Our country, like many others at the same economic and social stage, is, despite the obvious difficulties caused by the increasing internationalisation of economies and the extraordinary advances of science and technology, trying to achieve a model for social progress which will enable us to bring about balanced development and equality of opportunity in a climate of peace and progress.

Workers, employers and governments cannot continue to concentrate only on the desire to reconcile domestic differences over wages, the prices of particular products or an improved arrangement of the units of production if at the same time there are external economic factors hanging over us which disfigure social realities and invalidate all efforts to achieve acceptable levels of development.

If as a consequence of increasing foreign debt our countries become net exporters of capital by repaying and servicing their debt, while deficits in internal resources have become chronic, how can we finance more jobs in the future?

How can we reconcile policies which are being promoted throughout the world in the field of education and labour in order to close the gap between the classical education which we are offering to our children and the demands of the powerful technological development?

How can we ensure that the education and training of the present generation in our countries will keep pace to some extent with the world of technology offered us by the transnational companies if for our part we are unprepared or unaware of it? Such technology certainly generates more employment in the more industrialised countries and causes more unemployment in the poorer ones.

How can we assure that our future labour force, which we are supposed to be shaping, can contribute towards development, if it is made up of almost illiterate children which now appear in the statistics for truancy?

In short, will the labour force for which we are legislating continue to lag behind, in a state of underdevelopment, or, on the contrary, find new ways of progress for our countries and for mankind in general?

An attempt to find ways to adapt to and assimilate modern technology and to identify a system of rational research would be the best contribution a body such as the ILO could make to support our attempts at modernisation.

The present Government of Colombia has drawn up and implemented three priority plans to relate government policy with social development: the plan to overcome poverty, the rehabilitation plan and the plan of rural development. These plans set out to eradicate extreme poverty and strengthen democracy.

Furthermore, the economic social policy, as a component of the macroeconomic policy, is designed to promote savings, raise investment and economic efficiency and increase income derived from labour.

Specific policies have been adopted in an attempt to break down obstacles to the creation of employment in the informal sector, to contribute to the organisation of an independent labour force and to link it to social security systems. It is vital, in order to create jobs and raise income, that there should be a wide range of macroeconomic policies and sectoral policies designed to guide production with an eye to the labour force available and the development of productivity.

President Barco has undertaken to overcome unemployment. The target set was to reduce unemployment to 10 per cent in 1990, a level we reached two years before this date. During this Government's term of office, 420,000 new jobs have been created. Figures on unemployment at the first quarter of 1989 showed that unemployment in this period reached its lowest point in the last five years in Colombia.

Similarly, the quality of employment has improved. We now have less casual or temporary workers; in other words, we have great stability in employment. At the same time, the low productivity jobs in the informal sector have considerably declined. There is more employment in the big cities; alongside this trend, there is less unemployment in regional capital cities and small towns.

Colombia has embarked on a process of modernisation of its institutions, by a gradual transition from a representative democracy to a participative democracy. This is a major step forward which, because of its complexity, requires constant analysing and monitoring and frequent adjustments of a political nature; indeed, as part of our concept of decentralisation and local autonomy, we are trying to bring the State nearer to the citizen so that the citizen can take part more actively in transforming his country.

But if the State is being basically transformed in an attempt to achieve equality, justice and common progress, the labour sector cannot lag behind, keeping its institutions which have been outdated years ago by the emergence of such phenomena as: the new division of labour, industrialisation and urbanisation, new technologies and scientific change, the internationalisation of the economy and politics, the rise of new vulnerable groups amongst the population and new social forces which call for attention from the Government as regards employment and social security.

These attempts to rejuvenate the labour institutions of my country, on the basis of democratic tripartism, are certainly ambitious and based on modern criteria in the world of labour and the pertinent recommendations of the ILO.

Colombia realises that the working man, the producer of wealth and progress, is an irreplaceable ally in attaining development. We have borne witness to this belief by incorporating various ILO Conventions into our legislation and regulating labour activity by proper machinery, to give greater dignity to workers through programmes of technical co-operation and vocational training. At the same time, we have implemented social policies to benefit workers and their families.

Today, representatives of the trade unions have a seat – and right to vote – on the boards and governing bodies of numerous public organisations. This enables them to have a say in social security programmes, contribute towards the organisational development of the various entities make proposals and ensure respect for labour achievements. The workers therefore have a democratic control over the administration of their enterprises and the quality of services.

We have launched various initiatives of considerable social significance, covering such fields as: pensions, the physically handicapped, adoptive mothers, donations of shoes and clothes for poor workers. At the same time, domestic workers, members of religious communities and self-employed workers may benefit from social security. These vulnerable sectors, which have always been on the fringe of society, are now in a much better situation.

We have also made advances in the field of labour medicine, which incorporates occupational safety and health. Through labour legislation, we have initiated special programmes, so that enterprises prevent accidents and adapt their workplaces to occupational health criteria.

Freedom of association has been protected and guaranteed by our Government. Indeed, under the administration of President Barco, new workers' federations have emerged: the Central Union of Workers (CUT) and the Confederation of Democratic Workers (CTDC). These are important trade union organisations which cover a large number of Colombian workers.

Furthermore, the legal personality of 653 bodies has been recognised by the Government and there have been statutory reforms in grassroots workers' organisations and pensioners' associations.

2,185 labour agreements have been concluded, of which 1,638 are collective agreements and 547 ordinary agreements. In the period under discussion, there have been only five strikes for reasons other than those connected to labour. These figures are of great significance in analysing the climate of labour harmony which the country has been experiencing.

With the full participation of workers' representatives and making optimum use of budget resources, the Government has substantially increased social security benefits for workers and their dependants and for new groups of the population and new geographical areas; in addition, the services provided have become more effective.

The Government of President Barco has created a government body for the defence, protection and promotion of human rights. This body is responsible for co-ordinating state action to re-establish the full exercise of human rights in Colombia. This body has been in existence since November 1987 and sets out to ensure full respect for human rights, on the premise that they should be enjoined by all citizens and social groups.

This body has consolidated its structure and is working with two programmes for promotion and education at a national level. It is preparing projects to assist the families of victims of violation of human rights, co-ordinate institutional information and organise strict intervention in cases of infringements of human rights.

The work of this body has been directed basically to promoting an awareness of the fact that a constitutional state must watch over and ensure respect for human rights.

The state of violence prevailing in our country makes it very difficult to fulfil the objectives of this body; and indeed its field of action is reduced to the most direct expressions of breaches of human rights concerning persons, such as the right to personal integrity.

I wish to end this brief intervention by making an appeal to all peoples and governments of the world to uphold the principles of democracy, public freedoms and human rights, because without these there can be no common progress.

Original – French: Mr. BOULIN (representative of the Trade Unions International of Public and Allied Employees) – Allow me to say that I take great pleasure in congratulating Mr. Nkomo on behalf of our Organisation and its 39 million members, on his election as President of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference.

The great States, those who have left their stamp on their epoch, have always had powerful administrations. It is for this reason that trade union organisations of civil servants and officials feel a duty to defend and advance public services. They also feel that one factor in an effective civil service is the respect which officials enjoy because of their particular duties and in their freedom to defend their rights.

Most countries throughout the world are still in the process of development. Civil services which are already inadequate to allow a real economic takeoff and the establishment of true independence are threatened by the unacceptable weight of foreign debt. One essential reason for this indebtedness lies in the inequitable terms of trade between creditor and debtor countries. The IMF directives, those of the World Bank, are veritable orders given to governments, with which they must comply to receive credits. These always lead, first and foremost, to a cut in public services, which are nevertheless vital.

Our international union which from the outset has advocated a global renegotiation of the foreign debt question, is pleased to see the progress now being made in this respect.

Throughout the world, civil services are also the first to be affected by expenditure on arms. Any additional military expenditure automatically leads to a cut in public services, hence to stagnation and a worsening in the living standards of the general population.

The role of the public service in bringing about equality and caring for the poor and needy is irreplaceable. There are many areas for which a competent civil service should be responsible and which should not depend upon charity. These include: the provision of cheap housing; the right to education from pre-school age; the right to health-care when it is needed, which is not dependent upon a person's contributory service; opportunities for an individual to realise his intellectual and social aspirations. These services alone give true meaning to the concept of equality and go beyond mere condescension to solidarity.

To hold that those who strive for better public services, which are better adapted and respond more closely to the needs of citizens, are fanatical champions of a centralised state or enemies of private initiative, is to mix unruly liberalism with freedom.

It is precisely those who believe in this form of liberalism who restrict the State's role so that it only has to maintain law and order; those who abuse the notion of essential services to forbid freedom of association, before suddenly deciding that they are not so essential after all and handing them over to private enterprise and the law of profit.

Although our international union defends civil services on the basis of equality and social progress, we believe that a good civil service cannot be a cheap one, especially as regards the employment conditions of officials.

This year, the trade union movement throughout the world is celebrating the 100th anniversary of the commemoration of 1 May as the workers' day in their struggle for their rights and their dignity. Without painting too black a picture, we are forced to observe that the rights of public servants and civil servants, both as regards their trade union rights and their liberties as citizens, are often lagging far behind – both in law and practice.

We consider that despite their specific status, which calls for guarantees of independence from parties and governments, officials must enjoy rights as employees. This implies freedom of association and the right to bargain collectively.

Freedom of association and the right to organise are still far too often banned or curbed for public servants. Although the Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151) was adopted 11 years after Conventions No. 87 and 98, it has only been ratified by a handful of countries. The principle of state sovereignty is not challenged when state employees have the right to bargain collectively on their conditions of employment and put forward their views, even if they resort to strikes. However, we have once more to regret that many countries remain adamant in their views on this question; this is particularly the case amongst the richest countries of the world, which are inflexible both in their attitude towards their own civil servants and at international meetings such as meetings or joint committees organised by the ILO.

If public servants are mature employees, they must also have the rights of citizens. This implies that they must enjoy freedom of speech, the right to join trade unions and to engage in political action outside their jobs. To impose a ban on employees because they are civil servants is inadmissible and tantamount to placing a ban on grounds of sex, religion or membership of an ethnic group, as listed in the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111).

Only if there is freedom to bargain collectively, can there be a healthy climate in industrial relations, both in the public service as elsewhere.

To that end, wages, conditions of employment and social rights must be negotiable between governments and officials' unions before financial Bills go before Parliament. Failing this, the situation is distorted. It cannot be argued that officials should not have this right because of the respect of democratic procedures in adopting the budget or budgetary control in Parliament, because corrective procedures already exist everywhere.

Negotiations are not conceivable without reciprocal commitments by officials' unions and governments; in other words, governments must keep their word and no agreement reached can unilaterally be challenged later.

In its efforts to achieve satisfactory practice and legislation in the public service, our international federation wishes to congratulate the ILO for the active part it has played, especially in the meetings and joint committees in our sector. We hope that this concern with the public service will lead to permanent structural changes, more especially within the ILO itself.

We are stepping up co-operation with the ILO and we hope that this trend will be continued and intensified.

We think that the same should apply to all international trade union organisations dealing with the public service, whatever their ideological principles. We are collectively responsible to our civil servants. At the present time and in the new climate of international relations, new doors are opening for us and we should act together to cope with the problems confronting civil servants. We have the opportunity of surmounting the divisions undermining the workers' movement; we should take it.

Original – Spanish: Mr. RODRIGUEZ CAMPOS (Minister of Labour and Social Promotion, Peru) – My first words will be to greet ministers and delegates attending this assembly of the ILO on behalf of the Government and people of Peru.

My congratulations to Mr. Nkomo on his election as President of this session. I am convinced that under his skilful direction we will reach agreements which will contribute to the good works of our Organisation.

This year we are commemorating the 70th anniversary of the foundation of the ILO, at a moment in history when governments had to build the foundations of peace and new international relations after the First World War. The treaties which were then signed recognised the contributions and the sacrifices of the workers during the war and the work which had to be done to construct a future society in which universal peace would be based on social justice. The signatory countries of the treaties yearned to put behind them a lengthy period during which labour was considered a commodity, to ensure the development of labour law and administration, to guarantee the rights of workers to a dignified and just life. To guarantee the accomplishment of this commitment they created the International Labour Organisation.

Since 1919, many of the efforts made towards world peace have failed. Various international organisations that harmonised nations and strove for progress have disappeared, but the ILO has survived all the ups and downs of world politics. From the ruins of the Second World War in the 1940s it emerged rejuvenated, vigorous, with broader social principles and took up again its indefatigable standard-setting work and its work of technical co-operation.

On this important occasion, I should like to greet and congratulate the new Director-General, the technical and administrative officials of the ILO, who from the seat of the Office and in various parts of the world, are working for peace based on social justice.

The title and the contents of the Director-General's Report this year go beyond the specific treatment of labour matters, to present us with a picture of the general economic situation which is affecting peace and human development and, in particular, labour relations and working conditions. He is not content with a simple diagnosis, but instead makes concrete proposals for development strategies, thus reflecting the optimism of an organisation which has experienced many ups and downs and which is aware of the capacity of recovery inherent in all peoples.

The Director-General saw the end of 1988 as the beginning of a process of recovery for the world economy after such a lengthy crisis. He does however admit that the paradoxical situation of this process of recovery is by no means uniform nor uniform in its trends.

While certain countries have stabilised their economies and marched boldly ahead, many others are hampered by the obstacles which are imposed upon them by an unjust economic international order. This is the case more specifically of Latin America, the part of the world to which my country belongs.

Latin America is indeed one of the areas where the effects of the international crisis have been most acute. It has demonstrated the vulnerability of a model of dependent economic growth adapted to an uneven distribution of wealth and carried out to a great extent thanks to foreign investment and which therefore has been unable to solve the grave social problems which affect the area.

The policies of stabilisation undertaken by the financial bodies did not help to overcome the crisis – indeed they made it worse by increasing unemployment and underemployment, by leading to a decrease in real wages, by increasing the marginalisation of vast sectors of the population, and by the promotion of violence and terrorism.

In July 1985, when it took office, the present Peruvian Government encountered these brutal realities. A country weighed down with all sorts of complex structural problems and by a slump which it had to cope with using the very limited resources derived from an economy in crisis and of which a high proportion had to be set aside to cover the external debts. In the social sphere, these were extremely high levels of unemployment and underemployment; a wage level reduced by 40 per cent and the presence of subversion within the country.

In the speeches made by our delegation in the previous three sessions of the International Labour Conference, we have reported on this situation and on the emergency measures which the Government has been obliged to take to cope with it. We have emphasised the decision to exercise the Government's sovereign right to decide the fate of the country.

The Government recognised that it had a debt towards foreign banks, and that it also had a social debt towards the national population, affected by the age-long backwardness of the country and the effects of the crisis.

The Peruvian delegation which attended the 1986 Session of the International Labour Conference expressed our Government's concern about foreign debt and participated, with other countries from the same region, in a major debate on this issue.

By cutting down foreign debt servicing, our Government was able to reduce inflation, boost agriculture, increase consumption, revive the economy, develop emergency programmes in favour of the most poverty-stricken sectors.

Unfortunately, we were unable to gain the understanding of our creditors and once our foreign exchange reserves were exhausted, our country had to face up to a new outbreak of inflation, made much worse by the cost of combating terrorist groups active in the drug trade.

After a difficult year in 1988, we are taking the first steps to reviving our economy by means of a gradual, not a traumatic process.

It is important to emphasise that all the efforts made by the Government have been made without any breach of democratic principles, to the defence of which APRA, the governing party, has dedicated the 65 years of its existence. Now we are coming up to elections for the municipal councils, regional authorities and a few months later, for the Government itself.

The search for solutions to the economic crisis and the unfavourable conditions in the Third World is not within the exclusive realm of economic bodies. We support and call for the presence and participation of the International Labour Organisation in the debate on a new international economic order; in the dialogue between North and South; in the redirection of the behaviour of financial bodies; in specific debates on foreign debt.

The problems of foreign debt, of commercial protectionism in the industrialised countries, of terms of trade, are not exclusively economic and financial, but are irrevocably linked to social matters. There cannot be two types of policies as in the past: one economic and the other social, because this dichotomy resulted in my country, as in many other developing countries, in high levels of growth in the gross domestic product and, at the same time, in an increase in inequality of the distribution of wealth. It led to an increasingly lower use of the labour force, an increase in social marginality, all because of the importance given to economic surplus.

In the specific field of labour problems we are concerned about the present and future position in occupational relations in the modern sector of the economy, and the destiny of the so-called urban informal sector.

The economic crisis which has been so long and traumatic has tested the essence of the right to work and the right to social security; it is calling for answers to the serious problems generated by growing unemployment and underemployment, without prejudicing the rights which have already been acquired by the workers and in full respect of the political constitution and the law.

We disagree with those who think that labour and social policy are a determining factor in the economic crisis and who seek to reduce their benefits and bring back working conditions that are completely outdated.

In Peru, the political Constitution approved in 1979, that is during the period of crisis, includes institutions dealing with labour law and social security, and the present Government has passed a new law dealing with labour stability.

In view of the need to distribute income to marginal workers in the cities and the countryside, and to provide work for the unemployed, the Government has launched new emergency programmes to take on new workers. The fact that they are of a temporary nature does not destroy the principle of continuity in work as laid down in the Constitution.

The technicians of the Ministry of Labour have just finished drawing up a first draft of the general labour law which I spoke of in my speech last year. This unites the very incoherent and complicated Peruvian labour legislation and sets forth clearly all the labour rights contained in the Constitution.

In the informal urban sector the Government is carrying out programmes and projects to increase income, grant loans, and increase educational training for incorporation into the modern sector.

In agriculture, the Government is working hard to grant loans with low rates of interest and sometimes no interest at all, for irrigation projects to increase cultivable areas and for the defence of peasants against terrorist activities based on drug trafficking, which are destroying the infrastructure of the towns and the countryside.

To contribute to alleviating the problem of young people entering the labour market for the first time, the Ministry of Labour and Social Promotion has prepared a draft, which it hopes to give effect to with international help, to create employment and to provide professional training for young people.

Another consequence of the crisis, which for 16 years has been confronting my country, is the reduction of the real wages of workers. In view of this situation the Government policy is to avoid a state of affairs in which earnings fall below the 1985 level – the year in which it took office. With this intention, it has enacted various wage increases in favour of those workers whose wages are not regulated by collective bargaining, and also as regards minimum wages. The full respect of democracy in the country guarantees the right of workers to collective bargaining, and the rights of association and freedom to strike, and hence they are able to get together with the employers to determine wage increases and possible benefits.

The Government has always tried to ensure dialogue and concertation in all aspects of national life. It has done this especially in the field of labour. The Ministry of Labour has been very active in this respect trying to find solutions which would make it possible to meet workers' demands.

The Director-General in his Report considers the perspectives for the United Nations Fourth Development Decade. We think that the world has accumulated so many problems, there is so deep a gulf between the highly developed countries and the rest of humanity, there are growing indications of shortages of food, housing, education, of so many million human beings living in a state of absolute poverty, that it is not possible to make forecasts in the same way as in the last few decades. We think that nothing good can be expected of the next decade if we do not immediately lay the foundations of a new, fairer, international economic and social order, with pragmatic real and immediate action. We cannot limit ourselves, as in the past, to hoping for greater welfare in the future, at the end of the decade, as if progress would happen automatically. The experiences of the United Nations show that the behaviour of the nations and the organisations cannot be passive. We must take immediate steps, the most urgent of which is to find a solution to the urgent problem of foreign debt, which cannot be merely a technical solution, but an essentially political one. We have to find ways and means of giving fluidity to international trade and to improving terms of trade.

Such close interdependence as exists in the modern world prevents the highly industrialised countries from concentrating themselves exclusively on the solution of their own problems for the worsening social, economic and political problems facing most of mankind are also facing them.

The conquest of the next ten years cannot only be economic or material ones, but must also guarantee the basic freedoms of human beings and the integration of our peoples in continent-wide economic zones to overcome underdevelopment. We need to overcome poverty, hunger, housing shortages, underemployment; we need to increase wages, but at the same time we have to ensure that there is a free world in which all sectors can participate in this great battle for a life where human rights are respected, where democracy will reign supreme, where the dreadful problems of poverty will be solved. We are certain that the International Labour Organisation will continue in its traditional line, faithful to the principle that there will be no peace in the world without social justice or complete freedom.

Mr. HALMOS (Secretary of State, President of the State Office for Labour and Wages, Hungary) – First of all, I should like to congratulate the President on his election and to wish him every success in his highly responsible task of guiding this session of the Conference.

May I also extend greetings to the other Officers of our Conference, particularly to Mr. Michel Hansenne, who is performing for the first time the important function of Secretary-General. I trust that he and the other Officers will be able to contribute effectively to the successful outcome of our deliberations.

At the same time I take this opportunity to express my sincere appreciation to Mr. Blanchard for the excellent work he has accomplished as Director-General during the last 15 years in the best interest of the International Labour Organisation and for better understanding among the member States.

Our Conference is meeting at a time when responsible politicians of the world speak of the end of the cold war, of détente, and of possibilities for full-scale co-operation among nations and peoples. Unfortunately this does not yet mean that hotbeds of crisis no longer exist in the world, but it does mean that they can be slowly but gradually stilled through improved relations between the leading powers, growing willingness to negotiate on the part of political entities, and a larger role for the United Nations.

The launching of programmes for political and economic renewal in several Eastern European countries, including Hungary, is an important factor of change taking place in the world.

Political and economic reforms are already under-way in my country. The Hungarian Government considers it most important both to spur the economy, and to continue with profound economic restructuring. We want to create the conditions necessary for democratic elections and a multi-party system, while at the same time enjoying social peace and tranquillity. These are also essential conditions for solving labour problems. The Government must devise ways of releasing the country from the debt trap.

The focus of the Director-General's Report this year is clearly important and timely. The Report reviews the questions of structural adjustment and economic growth and analyses their effects on employment. It does not define the International Labour Organisation's tasks in the current world economy, but its discussion of theoretical interrelationships provides the ILO experts with a foundation on which to build elaborate programmes conducive, as the Report states, to growth – creating jobs and the elimination of poverty.

The International Labour Organisation, which is celebrating this year the 70th anniversary of its establishment, has from the outset taken the lead in pursuit of such noble goals.

Hungary attaches paramount importance to those ILO programmes which seek to ensure respect for basic human rights, to guarantee the freedom to organise, to secure employment free from discrimination, and to create the relevant guarantees. No less important are the Organisation's programmes which promote an effective struggle against unemployment and equal employment and training opportunities.

During the past 70 years, the International Labour Organisation has done a great deal to ensure that people everywhere should lead better lives in greater freedom. It is not the fault of our Organisation if this goal has not yet been fully achieved.

At the same time, over these 70 years, there has been no organisation or institution other than the ILO with such a vast body of experience in labour matters. Its wealth of knowledge is available to member States, and the extent to which they draw upon it depends on them alone.

The ILO's 70 years of history bear testimony to the fact that the Organisation has always been able to renew itself while upholding the lofty objectives set at its inception. This ability is still a hallmark of our Organisation, whose goals can safely be said to be invariably worthy of adoption by the world.

In the light of the foregoing, the Hungarian Government is constantly seeking to increase its co-operation with the ILO. We are searching for various ways of making good use of the knowledge and experience accumulated in the Organisation in order to meet the labour-related tasks facing us. We shall persist in this effort, in which the ILO has always proved to be a good partner. In our work with the Organisation and outside of it, we devote particular attention to co-operation in Europe, with a view to building relations both bilaterally and multilaterally. We think that it is crucial for the future of Europe to realise the importance of our joining together to solve our common problems.

With respect to the reforms in Eastern European countries, I agree with the emphasis placed by the Director-General's Report on the necessity of occupational retraining for re-entry into the working life. We have come to the same conclusion in Hungary. Therefore, relying also on international assistance, we shall gradually set up retraining centres in those parts of the country where they are most needed. A large role in directing those centres is reserved for local units, on both the management and labour sides, and the State. This is another way of facilitating rapid and stable employment after retraining.

People should be retrained for jobs in areas where there is a particular need, secure relatively long-lasting employment, and obtain the professional skills to work with new technologies. In this respect we are guided by the important principle that there should be no obstacle to restructuring in so far as professional skills are concerned.

In addition to retraining, we employ such other means as interest free loans for small businesses and public works opportunities.

In line with what is stated in the Director-General's Report, Hungary allows wide scope for co-operation, with respect to both wage and employment policies, among representative organisations of the State, management and labour. Discussions and agreements among equal partners may greatly facilitate the complicated process of economic restructuring. It is for these reasons that we set up a tripartite National Council for Reconciliation of Interests. The dialogue, which has long been missing, has begun among representatives of the organisations concerned. The first experiences have been positive.

The evolution of pluralism, which has also embraced the trade union movement, is another important factor of the political situation in Hungary today. Several trade unions have been formed which intend to function independently of the earlier ones.

The exercise of the right to strike is the last, but most important means of defending workers' interests. In Hungary, there was no legislation either prohibiting or spelling out workers' right to strike. This situation changed when Parliament passed the Strike Law last April. The adoption of that legislation was preceded by a broad social debate, leading to numerous modifications in the draft. It appears to us that the result constitutes a solution to this important human rights question that is in keeping with the interests of both workers and society as a whole.

I do not wish to dwell on the other agenda items of our Conference since the members of our delegation will do so in committee meetings. Nevertheless I deem it necessary to make two remarks. First, we attach great importance to the proposal submitted on environmental protection and employment. Investment projects with due regard for the environment serve not only the vital interests of society but also promote the creation of new jobs.

I consider it a great honour that the Governing Body has elected Hungary as a participant in the Tripartite Meeting of Experts on Employment and Training Implications of Environmental Policies in Europe. We fully agree with the aim of the meeting, namely to analyse the situation of the continent as a whole, because environmental problems have grown across national frontiers and acquired international scope.

My second remark concerns the work of the Committee on the Application of Standards. The Hungarian Government is concerned about the persistence of the policy of apartheid and about the fact that there has been no decrease in the number and gravity of human rights violations and infringements of the freedom of association. We are confident that the Committee's debate and resolutions will produce results in these important fields.

Mr. MAWANDE (Government delegate, Zimbabwe) – On behalf of the Zimbabwe delegation, may I congratulate the President of his unanimous election to preside over this Conference. His election clearly demonstrates the high esteem placed in him by the distinguished delegates present here, and I am confident that under his able guidance the deliberations of this Conference will be fruitful. My delegation wishes to assure him of its maximum co-operation during his exercise of the functions of President of this Conference.

I would also like to congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne on being appointed to the esteemed post of Director-General of the International Labour Office and wish him well in this challenging task.

Allow me to take this opportunity to express Zimbabwe's profound gratitude and appreciation for the outstanding support we received from the member States when we hosted two of the ILO's special conferences in 1988: the one on action against apartheid and the Seventh African Regional Conference. I should also like to extend our sincere thanks to the ILO Governing Body for honouring Zimbabwe by sending its distinguished representatives to these two conferences.

I should like to compliment the Director-General of the ILO for providing us with another thought-provoking and important Report which has clearly given us insights into the situation of the world economy and how this affects employment creation possibilities. The Report goes on to indicate possibilities for economic recovery and employment alternatives.

I believe it to be proper that at this time of worldwide economic distress we should focus our attention on this topical issue of economic recovery, which is central to the re-establishment of an acceptable quality of life for us all.

It is obvious that the international economic system is now very much in disarray, with international co-operation also at its lowest. Indeed, developing countries are finding it increasingly difficult to pursue viable economic policies that could eliminate poverty and enhance human capabilities for effective participation in development. While it is true that no country has been left unscathed by the present malaise in the world economy, it cannot be denied that the developing countries have been hardest hit. We believe that increased attention and emphasis should be given to strengthening co-operation amongst nations. Developed countries do need to listen more often and also more carefully to the views of the developing countries, which have been doing a great deal to help themselves.

To aggravate the situation, debt-related problems, protectionist policies and falling foreign exchange earnings have reduced the ability of the developing countries to import much-needed inputs to spur economic growth. Consequently, the developing nations have been compelled to adopt structural adjustment programmes that have focused almost exclusively on short-term solutions. This preoccupation with palliatives has consequently tended to divert attention away from pressing issues of a more fundamental nature.

Many countries realise the need for full employment, because provision of employment is a fundamental condition for implementing a whole range of social, economic and human rights. Full employment creates the material basis for the exercise of economic and social rights and for the enhancement of freedom, social protection and a dignified life. However, most unfortunately, full employment has ceased to be a major goal in many countries as they attempt to grapple with acute economic problems. Instead, massive unemployment now threatens to undo the steady progress we have been making towards promoting democracy, peace and stability throughout the world.

It is in the light of such a formidable challenge that the Director-General's Report has suggested the adoption of a strategy based on the conviction that it is possible to combine structural adjustment with the resumption of equitable growth, and this would lead to increased employment and the alleviation of poverty. The central feature of the proposed strategy is the need to adopt measures which will facilitate the revival of production so that structural adjustment may occur in a framework of growth rather than that of stagnation and contraction. The key features which need attention include the review of both micro- and macro-economic policies, as well as trade and resource allocation and utilisation.

The plight of vulnerable groups needs special attention. Particular mention has been made of the role women play in contributing to the development of our economies. It is now generally acknowledged that women participate actively in the labour market and contribute much more in production, especially in food production, than they have been given credit for all along. We in Zimbabwe are determined to continue improving the working conditions of all workers, not only in terms of remuneration but also in other areas such as social security, housing, health care and education.

It is in line with this awareness that we welcome the discussion on night work. Women are becoming more and more involved in night work and, although their numbers are still small, they are employed in factories and service industries such as hotels, hospitals, schools, public transport and even national security activities that require continuous operation. To alleviate their plight, certain incentives such as shorter working hours, extra leave days, night work allowances and guaranteed rotation of night duties need to be seriously considered. However, the incentives should not induce the workers to opt for continuous night work, which can have adverse effects on the health of the worker.

Allow me to turn to the issue of occupational safety and health. Matters of occupational safety are of concern to us all. Thus, the Government of Zimbabwe is fully committed to its policy of ensuring that safe and healthy workplaces are created and maintained. Indeed, we deeply appreciate the Governing Body's decision to include the item "Safety in the use of chemicals at work" on our agenda.

Zimbabwe is increasingly concerned about the risks involved in the use of chemicals and their products. Estimates of the volume of chemicals used have indicated that new chemicals in excess of one tonne placed on the market each year range from 200 to over 1,000 – most of which, until recently, had not been tested for possible deleterious effects.

The magnitude of exposure of the working populations to chemicals is not known with any certainty. In the field of agriculture alone, where a variety of chemicals are used, most of the workers are among the least protected. Reports of thousands of workers having been poisoned by chemicals in developing countries have been published in the past by the ILO.

Just as the scale of use of chemicals in the developing countries is increasing, so is the apparent trend in occupational diseases and illnesses. Most of the chemical hazards experienced in developing countries are those associated with formulation/mixing or blending processes and with production of the basic organic and inorganic chemicals.

Much of the developing world is now setting up systems for notification and testing of new chemicals. But these efforts are hampered by increasing costs and sophistication of testing methods, which means that many years often elapse before such tests can be extended to the majority of chemical substances in current use.

A particularly controversial issue is that of the export of hazardous substances from the developed to the developing countries, taking advantage of lower occupational protection standards. The effects of harmful chemical substances are exacerbated by poor economic and social standards. It is therefore of paramount importance that in transferring new technology to developing countries, the necessary safety and health measures should be incorporated. Developing countries should not be used as a dumping ground for chemicals that are banned or restricted for safety and health reasons in the developed countries. We hope that the tripartite spirit will prevail when we discuss this important issue, so that a sound and balanced solution may be found.

Special mention must be made of our long-suffering brothers and sisters in Namibia and South Africa. Empty promises of reform have done nothing to improve the working and living conditions of the majority of the population in those two countries. In particular, it is our contention that apartheid is the root cause of conflict and suffering in South Africa. It is saddening to observe that certain quarters are all too often willing to embrace cheap South African propaganda that apartheid can be abolished through reform. To us, these gimmicks and delaying tactics are transparent, and we continue to advocate full freedom and equal rights for all the citizens of South Africa. There will be no peace and stability in South Africa until the abominable system of apartheid is completely uprooted lock, stock, and barrel.

In Namibia, the occupying South African authorities have unleashed both their lethal administrative machinery and their war machine against an unarmed population in an attempt to derail the peace process. Since the beginning of the implementation of the United Nations Plan for Namibia, contained in Security Council resolution 435, on April 1 this year, numerous attempts have been made by the apartheid regime and its surrogates to frustrate the aspirations of the people of Namibia. These intimidating tactics and other devious means can only be stopped by collective vigilance on the part of the international community. We urge all the member States of the ILO to intensify their efforts in support of the rights of the people of Namibia to self-determination and genuine independence.

The Palestinian people face extreme difficulties and their living conditions have been deteriorating as a result of the Israeli occupation. Every day we learn of brutalities and atrocities perpetrated by the occupation forces against innocent and unarmed civilians, including women and children. We would like to see a just solution to this protracted problem, a solution that takes care of the legitimate rights and aspirations of the Palestinian people. The present situation continues to pose a serious threat to stability in the region and to international peace and security.

We also note with appreciation that Africa is the major beneficiary of the ILO's technical assistance. This indicates the seriousness with which the ILO views the immense problems faced by the African countries. It is our hope that more assistance will be made available to enable the continent to take bold initiatives aimed at promoting rapid economic development.

In conclusion, let me once again say that today no country can pursue its economic and social policies in isolation from the development of the world at large. International collaboration and solidarity are vital.

Original – Portuguese: Mr. GANANCIO (Workers' delegate, Mozambique) – On behalf of the workers of Mozambique I would like first of all to extend our warm congratulations to Mr. Nkomo, on his unanimous election to the presidency of this 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. We would also like to congratulate the ILO's Director-General on his Report to this Conference.

This 76th Session is being held at a time in which mankind and our world as a whole are going through a crucial moment of contrast between the capacity to eliminate the evils that have afflicted humanity for thousands of years and the use of the same capacity to make these evils even worse. There are now signs which give reasons for concern about the disappearance of life itself as we know it. It is a situation which affects mankind as a whole, materially, morally, psychologically, culturally and socially, even though the greater part of mankind is not fully aware of it because access to elementary knowledge is still being denied to the vast majority of the world's population.

While it is true that reason is asserting itself, it is also true that the forces of criminal and dissolute egoism are continuing to worsen the living conditions of the overwhelming majority of humanity. Famine, poverty and unemployment, together with monsters it generates – criminality and disease – are getting worse as well.

Therefore, it is not that we are from a region which has been hit especially hard by the effects to which we have just referred – if we were the only region suffering from these effects, it would be a good thing, because that would definitely mean we are approaching the end of this disastrous state of affairs.

We are all aware that there is only one cause of these evils, and we must vigorously combat it.

In fact, it is our conviction that as long as the immense productive capacity existing in the world today is not directed in favour of development and the production of useful commodities and meeting the basic needs of human life, we cannot eliminate unemployment, poverty, famine, ignorance, criminality and moral and psychological degradation which affect the greater part of humanity.

We see the present time as a decisive turning point: the time has come to ensure universal and complete disarmament. In reality, this step will mean a total and radical change of political, economic, social and cultural relations amongst peoples and countries and at the same time it will open the way for a proper solution of all the other problems which are on the agenda of this Conference.

When the law of brute forces is applied, it is in its essence anti-democratic and a crime on the part of the State.

A direct consequence of the application of the law of force is a continuous worsening of inequality in development between different parts of the world, its most dangerous expression being foreign debt. This state of affairs is not advantageous for the people, nor for the workers of any country.

It is true we are not competent in this Conference to solve this problem, but we are also aware that this victory will be won only by joining forces together in all fields.

We would like to reiterate what we said at the last session, namely that "the decisions and positions adopted by the ILO are of great importance to the labour world and may also influence decisions taken in other bodies with responsibilities in various complex areas of competence. For that reason decisions and positions in relation to the problems affecting us must not be removed from our own specific role, since we represent the world of labour, that is, a fundamental and active force in society." In this context, we are of the opinion that it would be important for this session to take a position, even if it is not in the form of resolutions or specific notions, but at least in a final resolution on the following: (a) to consider universal and complete disarmament as an indispensable condition in order to modify international relations from a situation of confrontation to one of co-operation, also as a fundamental prerequisite for placing all the existing productive capacity at the service of the vital interests of humanity, resulting in the elimination of unemployment, famine, poverty, disease and other evils resulting from social conditions; (b) the need to urgently set up a new international economic order which has as its first priority the elimination of existing injustices in international economic relations and the gradual creation of better conditions conducive to the elimination of inequality between the levels of development of different countries, thus creating full employment, bearing in mind that the level of production is linked to purchasing power and is indispensable for a sound economy and full employment with adequate wages; (c) considering that the foreign debt and the conditions for its repayment are in fact impeding the development of the debtor countries and in view of the dangerous friction and its effects on political and economic relations, we demand that effective action be taken as a matter of urgency in view of the gravity of this problem; (d) taking into account the fact that apartheid in South Africa is a challenge to the international community and continues to destabilise southern Africa, causing the death of innocent and peaceful people and inflicting psychological trauma on millions of children, with grave consequences for the future generation, leading to the destruction of economic and social infrastructure, and thus causing poverty, famine and unemployment, we demand the application of global and mandatory sanctions for connivance with the crimes of the regime and, in fact, any attitude which prolongs the existence of apartheid.

In conclusion, we would like to reaffirm, as we have done at the previous session, our conviction that at this 76th Session, which coincides with the 70th anniversary of the ILO and the 100th anniversary of May Day, we shall, with dignity, fulfil our obligations because it is in this way that the world of labour can carry out its mission: to produce for the well-being of all mankind.

Mr. ATASAYAR (Employers' delegate, Turkey) – I have great pleasure in extending to the President, on behalf of the delegation of Turkish employers and on my own behalf, sincere congratulations on his election as President of this session of the International Labour Conference.

I also wish to take this opportunity to congratulate Mr. Hansenne on his election as Director-General of the International Labour Office and wish him every success in performing his functions.

The importance of labour relations will no doubt increase in the world over the next few years. This will call for more activity on the part of the ILO. I hope that in this process, the new Director-General will enhance the efficiency of this Organisation by observing the balance between the level of economic development and social rights that should constitute the basis of industrial relations.

I have carefully examined Mr. Blanchard's report. As usual it is an invaluable document analysing the economic and social consequences of the prevailing circumstances, and especially of the paradox which we witness in many fields. As a basic reference document, this report encompasses many fundamental views and objectives that are relevant to each country.

In particular, the growing economic differences between the developed and developing countries give rise to many social problems including unemployment. In fact, unemployment is the basic problem of labour life. The fact that the solution to this problem lies in increasing investment expenditures is as undeniable as ever. In this context, we are convinced that the ILO may provide an effective contribution towards increasing the transfer of capital between the developed and developing countries. It hardly needs to be mentioned that, in influencing and motivating the international capital flows, social environment and working conditions are as important as economic potential. Therefore, in our opinion, the ILO may successfully disseminate information pertaining to these aspects of the problem and can even use them as encouraging factors.

We can only agree with the view that economic growth is the precondition for creating employment and fighting poverty. In this context, the responsibility of developed countries towards developing ones is unavoidable and undeniable. The idea that this responsibility should be embodied in a world-wide plan is a most valid argument. We hope that it quickly passes from conception to implementation.

I would like to take this occasion to dwell briefly on the situation in Turkey regarding the topics covered by the Director-General's Report.

First of all, I am glad to point out that at present Turkish political life has been progressing in a positive direction. It has been endowed with all the institutions of a Western democracy. The general and municipal elections which were held in due time and in orderly fashion are clear evidence of this.

It is hard to claim, however, that we have overcome all our economic problems. The intensive development efforts of the last three years and the effects of successive elections have made our problems all the more difficult to tackle. At present, the high rate of inflation remains the most important economic issue. It limits new investment, erodes working capital and slows down the pace of development. It can also be blamed as the main factor in the deterioration of labour relations.

Turkey has recently embarked upon a programme of privatisation. Some public enterprises are currently being either transferred to the private sector or sold to foreign investors in accordance with this programme. As employers, we fully support the idea of and the programme for privatisation. We believe that this will revitalise the economy and create new investment potential.

As employers, we adhere to the philosophy of a free market economy and fully support the policies based on it. In this respect, I would like to point out that special care is being accorded to the observance of the rules governing a free market.

As to our social problems, the law governing industrial relations in Turkey not only reflect the characteristics and past experiences of our country but also carry instructive properties.

It should be borne in mind that a stable and peaceful working life can be achieved only if the social partners acquire the essence of social rights and respect them mutually. Laws should contribute and lead to the enhancement of such an understanding.

The basic idea upon which the right of association is based stems from the objective of creating powerful unions. It is believed that powerful unions will be more effective in the design and implementation of social policies. I would like to assure you that this idea is also shared by the Turkish employers.

In the calendar year 1988, 2,454 collective labour agreements were signed. All these agreements are the product of the free will of the social partners. All together, they covered 629,303 workers. Also in 1988, 156 strikes were carried out by unions on 266 jobsites and 1,892,655 workdays were lost.

I would like to draw your attention to the fact that with this score Turkey is by no means ranked in a negligible position among OECD countries. On the other hand, it goes without saying that developing economies are much more vulnerable to such losses.

I must concede, however, that the strikes undertaken last year in Turkey were basically caused by economic headaches. In fact, the high rate of inflation and related difficulties not only increased wage claims on the part of labour but also seriously eroded the resources of employers.

It is our belief that the tripartite dialogue and co-operation which constitute the very basis of working life should be strictly adhered to and put into practice. Otherwise, I feel that a soi-disant co-operation will do more harm than good to the system. It is in the best interest of the society at large to take a tripartite approach, bringing government, labour and employers together to discuss a wide range of issues, from the preparation of draft legislation to the evaluation of its implementation. Government adherence to this idea will no doubt strengthen working life.

Before I end my speech, I take pleasure in expressing my support for the idea that the resources which are saved as a result of disarmament can best be used to solve social problems. I also share the view that funds used for the protection of the environment and the development of regional infrastructure will be conducive to social progress.

Hoping that the resolutions adopted at the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference will open up new horizons for labour life in the world, I express on behalf of the Turkish Employers' delegation my best wishes for a very successful session.

Original – Russian: Mr. KOVALESKI (Workers' delegate, Ukrainian SSR) – I would like first of all to congratulate the President on his election to his high office and wish him success in leading the Conference.

Since this 76th Session of the International Labour Conference is taking place in connection with the 70th anniversary of the founding of the ILO, I would like to touch upon the long and fruitful activity of this Organisation in developing and strengthening international co-operation in the social and labour fields. I would like to express the hope that this session of the International Labour Conference will take place in a spirit of mutual understanding and constructive dialogue, leading to positive decisions which will further the interests of working people throughout the world.

The anniversary of the ILO gives us an opportunity to recall another noteworthy page in the history of the world's labour movement. A hundred years ago, the first international socialist congress designated the 1st of May as a day of international solidarity among workers, in memory of the victims of the demonstrations in Chicago. This mass support by workers in defence of their basic rights was the first instance of unified efforts by workers of various countries in the fight for social progress. These efforts were further developed by the International Labour Organisation, which proclaimed its aim to be the strengthening of social justice by protecting the basic rights of the working people.

In our day and age, in spite of all differences and contradictions, the world economy is quickly becoming a single entity in which all governments have to participate. The International Labour Organisation is called upon to play an ever more important role in developing broad co-operation among nations and creating a new, truly equitable world economic order. For this reason, it is particularly important to use the ILO's influence and capabilities to concentrate national, regional and global efforts on creating a new machinery for the functioning of world economic relations and new structures for the international division of labour. This task is not easy and can be achieved only by considering the interests of all parties.

From this point of view, the Director-General's Report, Recovery and employment, represents a good basis for a constructive exchange of views and a definition of the future course of the Organisation's activities. The report presents a well-balanced and well-argued analysis of the negative tendencies in world economic development in the 1980s and correctly indicates the need to minimise their negative effects of the situation of the workers.

We can only support the thesis of the Report that the basic means of bringing about social progress and, therefore, economic growth is through structural changes in the economy. There is no denying that. However, it is also important to point out that structural changes in the economies of developing countries, many of which are caught in the vice of external debt, often lead to worsening conditions for workers. In our opinion, the external indebtedness of developing countries is one of the key problems of development as a whole, representing a threat to social stability everywhere. It must therefore be solved through a joint effort by the whole international community, including the leading international economic and financial organisations.

The International Labour Organisation must give greater attention to questions of the environment, an integral component of world economic development. As a result of the introduction of new technology and a consumerist attitude to nature, many regions of the world are subject to the threat of catastrophes with consequences which can cross national boundaries. The protection of the environment has become vital for mankind as a whole.

I believe that all who represent the interests of working people in the ILO will support its participation in developing new, environment-friendly, energy-saving plants and alternative sources of energy and in studying the viability of social, economic and technological projects on a human scale.

In the course of the radical economic reforms being carried out in our country, a social reorientation of the economy is taking place, with changes in social relations to be seen in the sphere of production, which give priority to the human factor both in the Ukrainian SSR and in the USSR as a whole. This is confirmed by the quantity of consumer goods produced by industry, the increased tempo of building houses and hospitals, children's pre-school premises and other socially useful projects.

As of this year, practically all enterprises in the USSR are operating on the basis of profit-and-loss accounting, self-financing and self-management. There are new economic mechanisms for the relationship between central organs and labour collectives based on the principle of self-management through labour collectives' councils. This has enabled trade union committees to concentrate wholly on social problems and the protection of workers' rights and interests, since questions of production – including the introduction of new technology – are decided by the workers themselves through these new social mechanisms.

The basic reorientation of the economy required an improvement in methods of managing socialist property at all levels, bearing in mind the variety of forms it takes and its capacity for efficient use. A large step in this direction was the extension of the rights of co-operatives and enterprises, in accordance with the new USSR legislation on government enterprises and co-operation, which has stimulated the introduction of progressive forms of labour organisation, making use of collectives, family members and other forms of organising contract work in rented accommodation. Trade unions are co-operating in every possible way in these developments, which not only increase the efficiency and vigour of an enterprise, but make the relations between people more human.

Out of the many functions carried out nowadays by trade unions in the field of labour, particular attention is now being given to those matters which most closely affect the standards and quality of life of workers. Trade unions, for instance, actively participate in developing plans for the economic and social development at the level of the enterprise, the plant or the region and introducing progressive systems of remuneration with new salary scales.

Among the issues that are a first priority for trade unions is the housing problem. We have participated in developing a comprehensive programme, called "Housing 2000", which provides for the construction of 338 million square metres of housing; this will give every family its own apartment or house.

The introduction of reforms in the economy and the introduction of new progressive technological methods have placed at the forefront of our concerns the problem of defending the rights of workers in connection with job reductions, job placement and the provision of maximum opportunity for freely chosen occupation. Almost 500,000 people have been released from their jobs in the last two years and been retrained and relocated with the assistance of the trade unions. Those taking on new professions continue to receive an average wage during the training period and work is provided at the same enterprise if possible. The majority of redundant workers are directed to the trade and service sectors. On the initiative of the Republic's trade union council, the Council of Ministers of the Republic, with our co-operation, has now begun to develop an all-Republic programme for long-term employment. Bearing in mind the fact that this problem is very acute in many countries, we would welcome the ILO taking further measures to carry out permanent consultations, seminars and new, more detailed studies in this field. This would be useful for everyone.

The Report touches only lightly on the question of the transition from the economy of the arms race to an economy of disarmament, in other words the economic aspect of disarmament. In our opinion, the attempt should have been made to determine the role the ILO can play in this very important question, given the realities of the new technology.

In the Ukrainian SSR, as in the USSR as a whole, the trade unions have, through their active participation, accumulated considerable experience in matters of reconversion and in developing reconversion programmes. There is no doubt that the industrialised countries of the West, with their constantly diversified production, have a great capacity for reconversion. In this connection, the ILO should devote greater attention to the various social aspects of disarmament, which promises to create the conditions favouring a more stable economic development and more intensive scientific and technical progress, thereby stimulating the solution of the numerous social and economic problems besetting every country.

These were a few of the observations which I wished to make regarding the Report of the Director-General.

Original – French: Mr. FREY – (representative of the International Confederation of Executive Staff) – It is a great pleasure to congratulate the President, on his brilliant election, as well as the members of the Office. I do so on behalf of the Management Committee, as well as the member organisations of the International Confederation of Executive Staff, the CIC, which I have the honour of representing here. His competence and his experience in dealing with our concerns guarantee the success of this 76th session of International Labour Conference.

Very briefly, I would like to point out that the CIC includes national executive staff considerations from the main European and Latin American countries, as well as the international federations of executive staff in the main economic sectors of these countries: mainly the chemical sector, the metal industry, mining, energy, transport, etc.

This year, the ILO is celebrating its 70th anniversary and this gives us great pleasure. Never have the social and economic positions of the CIC coincided so fully with the analysis in the of the Director-General's Report, Recovery and employment.

World-wide economic disruption has led to a situation where hundreds of millions of human beings live below the poverty line. Despite high growth rates in most industrialised countries, unemployment, underemployment and poverty have increased constantly in the South and at times also in the North.

The problem of debt more than cancels out the effects of growth, and social progress has slowed in a number of developing countries.

For this reason, we considered as fruitful the tripartite consultation, held in November 1987, enabling the ILO to organise the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment. The follow-up to this should make structural adjustment compatible with social progress in the course of the next decade. By putting an end to the global wasting of human and material energy, it should be possible to reintroduce dignified working conditions for all. The executive of the CIC supports this proposal and some members forced into early retirement are prepared to make their grey matter and experience available when it is needed.

It is both wise and necessary to recall, as the Director-General has done in his foreword to the draft Programme and Budget for 1990-91, that the activities of the ILO are constantly inspired by the defence of human rights and the implementation of international labour standards. Indeed, there can be no concessions in the field of freedom of association, forced labour or apartheid.

The CIC supports the four priority questions adopted by the Director-General for the next two-year period.

Co-ordinated monetary and financial policies, whilst reducing the major imbalances in the world economy, should stimulate employment and reduce poverty as described above.

As for the policy of equal opportunities and pay for both men and women, it is in line with the resolution adopted by the Conference in 1987 aimed at fully integrating women in development and technical co-operation.

Finally, the third topic dealing with environmental problems and technological change refers to the concept of sustained development that is favourable to the environment, as defined by the Brundtland Report entitled "Our common future". This is of direct concern to executive staff. Whether it is question of the use of chemical substances, of their transport, the handling of toxic wastes, questions of biotechnology, the occupational health and safety problems that they create for the staff and the dangers to the environment, all these are areas which fall within the responsibility of the executive staff. If they have the means required, training, decision-making power, they will not shun their responsibility. Therefore, we cannot but strongly support the early organising of a European tripartite meeting on the effects of technological development on work and training, which is a follow-up to the Fourth European Regional Conference.

The executive staff in our sectors are concerned by the effects of technological and economic change on their employment conditions and their social status.

To guide these changes the number of executive staff members has consistently increased, but their representation as a specific social and professional group has not yet been fully recognised in a number of countries, and even in the ILO.

Freedom of association and the exercise of trade union rights, job security, working conditions and working hours, occupational safety and health, pay and social security are concerns which executive staff certainly share with other workers.

In view of their tasks and responsibilities, however, they also have their own specific concerns.

Executive staff, the linchpins of research and development, are those who stimulate innovation and creativity. They are responsible for providing employment today and for reducing poverty tomorrow. The status of salaried inventor should be redefined in order to better motivate research workers without whom there would be insufficient innovation to ensure the survival of enterprises in the face of ruthless international competition.

With their advanced technological know-how, executive staff more than other employees should increase their knowledge through continuous training, a crucial investment.

International mobility, a new dimension to the labour market, involves mutual recognition of diplomas with regard to the initial training of executive staff.

In view of the length of their initial training, executive staff should have the possibility of choosing the time when they end their professional activities, hence the need to introduce the so-called "à la carte retirement".

Furthermore, the collective rights of executive staff call for fuller information and participation in the various decision-making centres of the enterprise.

Protection of the environment has also become an area which is the responsibility of executive staff. In a nutshell, the working and employment conditions of executive staff have changed. However, the last tripartite meeting organised by the Consultative Commission on Employees and Non-Manual Workers on this subject was held in 1977.

This situation leads us to ask the Direction-General of the ILO to include in his programme and budget proposals for 1992-93, in programme 100.4 relating to non-manual workers, a meeting to update their social status.

There is an urgent need for this now.

Night work, which is the fifth item on the agenda of the Conference, cannot be fully eliminated in view of the present stage of technology, and one should try to compensate the effects this has on workers' health by adjusting the time schedules and developing careers accordingly.

By way of example, I would like to mention some of the proposals that come from my organisation: a reduction in weekly working hours from 33 hours to 30 hours through the adoption of a fifth continuous shift; one day of rest to compensate for each three-month period of continuous service during the year; early retirement at the age of 55, with full benefits, after 20 years of shift work, whether continuous or semi-continuous, whether this be consecutive or not.

Although equality of opportunity between men and women cannot be questioned, we feel it is premature to change or eliminate the waivers for women's night work. Their family burdens alongside their professional responsibilities make night work even more harmful to the health and social lives of women workers.

As far as the CIC is concerned, safety in the use of chemical substances at work is an urgent international problem. Recent major accidents are still fresh in our memories, but no one is aware of the accidents and occupational diseases caused by chemical substances affecting hundreds of thousands of individual every year.

The Conference must adopt a Convention, supplemented by a Recommendation, covering the use and handling of chemical substances at work, including related occupational hazards. This is all the more desirable as the ILO does not have an instrument in this area.

The risks are numerous: health impairment, fires and explosions can all be traced to chemical products, either singly or combined.

Identification, classification, labelling, safety files, are necessary steps in a process aimed at improving safety in the use of chemical substances. The standardisation of pictograms and conventional colour labels should be of great assistance.

I would like to stress the need to educate and inform workers of the hazards they are exposed to and the precautions they should take.

It is up to the executive staff to provide this training. Workers should also be made aware of the dangers of some chemical products to the environment, and new chemical processes should not be made operational unless there is a guarantee that they are not harmful to the environment.

As we have just described, the concerns of executive staff are numerous, but the stimulation of employment is the main concern as it lays the foundation for social peace.

Although growth is necessary for employment, one should also invest in man by providing education and vocational training if one does not want unavoidable bottlenecks to reduce or cancel the effects of the former.

Finally we are convinced that the increased participation of employers and workers, including executive staff, in tripartism with a broadening of dialogue to include incentives such as wage policy and training and information should contribute to more equitable world growth at the end of the twentieth century.

Original - French: Mr. HINNEKENS (representative of the International Federation of Trade Unions of Transport Workers) - On behalf of the International Federation of Trade Unions of Transport Workers, affiliated to the World Confederation of Labour, I would like to congratulate the President on his election and express all my gratitude for this opportunity of addressing the Assembly. I would also like to congratulate Mr. Hansenne on his appointment by the Governing Body to the post of Director-General. We hope that his work will be fruitful in the struggle for peace and social justice.

We would also like to express the approval and great esteem we feel for all the action undertaken by the ILO to promote justice and social and economic welfare for all the peoples of the world.

Our organisation pursues the same objectives and we can assure you of our wish to collaborate actively in meetings and to give our support to the action you undertake.

We appreciate the Report by the Director-General which we have perused with great interest.

We particularly appreciated that in his Report Mr. Blanchard boldly tackled the problem of economic recovery and the creation of employment to reduce, as far as possible, unemployment, which is the cause of poverty and despair.

The Report shows that a prerequisite for any progress is, first and foremost, growth, but especially the kind of growth which creates employment and alleviates poverty.

The major industrialised countries, where the upturn is already quite marked, bear a heavy responsibility with regard to the Third World countries.

But dazzled by a visible economic upturn they must not fail to pay adequate attention to the fact that many parts of the world are stagnating or even slipping backwards.

These parts of the world desperately need the solidarity of richer countries.

Should the present economic recovery persist everybody everywhere must be able to enjoy its fruits.

Recently, with assistance from the ILO, my organisation held a seminar on the theme of "the role of transport in the development of Third World countries", which considered transport as a factor in development.

Development comes before recovery, of course, but in this particular case the two reinforce each other.

It became apparent at that seminar that the position in the developing countries is critical, indeed desperate for some of them. Existing infrastructure, already inadequate, has suffered considerably because of the slump which has lasted for almost 20 years and because maintenance has been inadequate or non-existent.

The fact is that transport is a factor of basic importance for the development of far-flung countries and regions.

In the development of a country the existence of an efficient transport network is of a basic importance.

Generally speaking, prosperity and transport go hand in hand, in that transport supports the national economy.

Transport helps to ensure the exchange of imported and exported produce, so the flow of currency back and forth is a factor in economic independence.

The economic slump has not spared transport, either. The evil social consequences of the crisis have sometimes been made worse by variations in the objectives pursued by governments, such as deregulation and privatisation.

We strongly urge that in all projects for assistance and recovery devised by inter-governmental organisations or any other body, this aspect of recovery should be given due consideration.

We warmly support the appeal of Mr. Blanchard for real action which is also a major symbolic act, namely that the member States of the United Nations and specialised agencies should jointly finance with money taken from armament budgets a series of regional and subregional operations to create or renovate the necessary infrastructures to facilitate economic recovery and to create employment.

With regard to alcohol and drugs, the ILO's Workers' Education Branch, among other initiatives, has undertaken extensive inquiries to identify the workers' educational needs as regards the abuse of alcohol and drugs.

Some transport workers are badly hit by these evils. Distance, absence from the family and boredom all lead to behaviour which may rapidly become a real illness calling for delicate medical and social action, especially for the benefit of travelling personnel.

We have always highly appreciated the support given and the services rendered to the workers by the ILO workers' education service. We support and intensively participate in the efforts made by this service on behalf of the workers in general and transport workers in particular.

As regards the application of Conventions and Recommendations, the report by the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations is an important, informative and instructive document.

But it also proves the need to maintain this instrument and to improve its procedures so that the report may be a support for those who are trying to improve conditions of life and work for all workers. The increase in the number of complaints dealt with in the report and the gravity of the breaches observed clearly shows the need for this action by the ILO.

The fact that the present procedure for monitoring the application of standards is in some ways defective is no reason to abandon it. Quite the contrary, we must try to improve the procedures concerned.

We have observed that in a great many countries the situation remains disturbing as regards the application of Conventions.

The paucity of ratifications in the transport industry in general, and in particular the Hours of Work and Rest Periods (Road Transport) Convention, 1979 (No. 153), clearly shows that their practical application in many countries remains uncertain. Indeed, a few years ago, despite repeated interventions by the trade union organisations in Europe, we saw the implementation of a set of regulations, valid for the 12 countries of the European Economic Community, which were far less advanced than Convention No. 153.

This being the case, can we take the governments which indulge in such practices seriously?

As regards the programme and the budget of the ILO, we have carefully studied the proposals for the programme and budget presented by the Director-General.

We have repeatedly called for a meeting of experts on civil aviation and I am happy to observe today that the new programme provides for a meeting sometime in 1990.

Similarly, as regards the maritime industries, the programme aims to promote social and economic progress in these industries – maritime transport, fishing, the port industry and water transport. We think that stress should be placed first and foremost on the training of port personnel and the consequences of technical developments for the conditions of employment in ports.

This subject is particularly topical in view of the labour cutbacks which have taken place in ports throughout the world.

As regards apartheid, the Special Report of the Director-General on the application of the Declaration concerning action against Apartheid shows once more the extensive efforts made to rapidly eliminate this kind of discrimination, amongst all the other types of intolerable discrimination, which we condemn.

At the same time as this struggle is going on, we think it is necessary to reach a positive and pragmatic solution to the unjust conditions experienced by various classes of workers and Black workers in particular. We support any type of combat which calls for equality between Black and White workers.

We think that practical action such as that specified in the code of conduct of these community enterprises in the European Economic Community having branches in South Africa, are steps in the right direction, which considerably improve the conditions of wage, social welfare benefits and certain material conditions of Black workers.

This policy can, in connection with other policies, have a multiplying effect.

Governments could be asked to exert greater pressure on undertaking with branches in South Africa to induce them to improve the conditions of employment of the Black worker.

In the limited time we have available we cannot take up all the interesting issues dealt with by the Director-General in his Report.

I hope that the debates of this Conference will mark a step forward towards the fulfilment of the noble mission which is that of the ILO, to create a society of justice, social progress and freedom.

My federation will pursue its work for social progress and for the creation of a world in which all workers, and transport workers in particular, can find fulfilment, in a spiritual and not just in a material sense, in accordance with the wishes and aspirations of each individual.

(The Conference adjourned at 6.00 p.m.)

Communication to the Conference

Report of the Appeals Board set up by the International Labour Conference's decision of 8 June 1959

1. By a letter of 9 June 1989, Mr. Juan Ramón Aragón, Employers' delegate, Nicaragua, objected to the fact that, as a result of a decision of the Conference of 8 June 1989 concerning the composition of its Committees, the position of titular member on the Committee on the Application of Standards which he had requested had not been assigned to him.

2. The President of the Conference referred this objection to the Appeals Board set up by the Conference on 8 June 1959 for the appointment of Conference committees. The Appeals Board, appointed by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office at its 242nd Session (February-March 1989), and selected from among the persons designated for that purpose by the Conference, was composed of Mr. G. Abi-Saab, Mr. L. Cottafavi and Mr. P. Gottret (replacing Mr. P. Laroque). It met at the International Labour Office on 12 and 13 June 1989, under the chairmanship of Mr. Cottafavi, to examine the above-mentioned objection in accordance with the terms of reference assigned to it by the Conference decision of 8 June 1959.

3. In discharging its responsibility, the Board considered, as all its predecessors had done, that it was essential, firstly, to guarantee the right of all parties concerned to appear before the Board and, secondly, to follow an expedition procedure so as to enable its decisions to become effective at as early a stage of the Conference as possible. In order to safeguard the right to a hearing, the President of the Conference invited the appellant to submit in writing to the Office of the Clerk of the Conference, for the attention of the Board, his observations on the facts and arguments submitted in support of his appeal. On communicating these observations to the Chairman of the Employers' group, the Board invited the latter similarly to submit a brief comment on the appeal, which was in fact made against his group. After taking note of the written communications submitted by each party, the Board then heard the appellant and the Chairman of the Employers' group on 12 June 1989. The Board wishes to thank both the appellant and the Chairman of the Employers' group for their prompt and full replies to these invitations. Thanks to their co-operation, the Board is of the opinion that the right of the parties to be heard on an equal footing has been fully safeguarded and that its task has been carried out in the shortest possible time.

STATEMENTS OF THE APPELLANT

4. The Employers' delegate of Nicaragua, Mr. Juan Ramón Aragón, duly accredited to the 76th Session of the Conference by his Government, had requested that he be assigned a position as titular member on the Committee on the Application of Standards.

5. In his letter, the appellant deplored the fact that the Employers' group, basing itself on mistaken arguments concerning his own representativity and applying the principle of group autonomy in an arbitrary and unilateral manner, had deliberately refused to allow him to take part in the work of the Conference committees as a titular member, thus depriving him of his rights as a delegate. He pointed out that, in accordance with article 26 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, it was the Credentials Committee that was competent to pronounce upon the representative character of a delegate. According to the same article, a delegate whose credentials were challenged kept his rights until a final decision was taken on the question of his admission. He therefore requested the Appeals Board to add him to the voting section of the Committee on the Application of Standards.

6. Addressing the Board, the appellant deplored that the decision of the Employers' group had obliged his organisation to have recourse once again to its right of appeal. This decision was unacceptable, since it amounted to ignoring the fact that the economic and social realities in his country had changed considerably over the past ten years and that his own organisation was widely representative not only of the agricultural sector but also of industry and the services sector. He regretted that the efforts made by his organisation to his country at the Conference, in particular through the establishment of a system of rotation, had not so far yielded any result. While expressing the hope that an agreement on the participation of the employers' organisations of Nicaragua could be reached in future, he requested the Appeals Board to rectify the decision of the Employers' group and to assign him the position of titular member on the Committee on the Application of Standards for which he had applied.

STATEMENTS BY THE CHAIRMAN OF THE EMPLOYERS' GROUP

7. In his written statement the Chairman of the Employers' group recalled, firstly, that the great majority of the members of the Employers' group were of the opinion that the system adopted, which empowered a board composed of persons from outside the Conference to take decisions not subject to appeal concerning the functioning of the Conference, was in contradiction with the right of all delegates to vote individually on all matters before the Conference, as laid down in article 4 of the Constitution.

8. As regards the substance of Mr. Aragón's appeal, and subject to the foregoing observation, the reason for which the Employers' group had not proposed Mr. Aragón as a titular member of the Committee on the Application of Standards was due to the fact that he did not genuinely represent the employers of Nicaragua. For the same reason, as in previous years, several Employers' delegate had challenged the credentials of the Employers' delegate of Nicaragua. In the previous year, the Credentials Committee had concluded that the Government should have nominated the Employers' delegate in agreement with the Higher Council of Private Enterprise (COSEP). The latter body, which was the most representative employers' organisation of Nicaragua, had opposed the appointment of Mr. Aragón as delegate.

9. The granting of voting rights to a certain number of Employers' representatives on Conference committees represented a delegation of power by the Employers' group, and not by an individual delegate. Persons who had thus been appointed as titular members of committees had the responsibility of representing the group in the event of a vote. The number of such representatives had necessarily to be limited in order enable the group at all times to vote at full strength, with the support of its other representatives appointed as deputies. The fact that the Conference, on the recommendation of the group, could decide which of the members of a committee were entitled to vote implied, conversely, that a certain number of members would not be granted that right.

10. The group considered that it had fully applied the principle of equality of treatment which the Conference had in mind when it adopted the "Procedure for the constitution of Conference committees". This procedure certainly did not give any delegate the right to be appointed as a voting member simply because he had expressed the wish to be granted this right. Such a right would render completely meaningless both the elections for membership of committees and the decisions of the groups as to the number of voting members to represent them in each committee.

11. The Employers' group pointed out that every member of the group had the opportunity to oppose, or propose changes to, the lists of voting and non-voting representatives on the committees, communicated to the group at a meeting held on 7 June 1989. If Mr. Aragón was not satisfied with the list proposed for membership of the Committee on the Application of Standards, he had the possibility of objecting to it or of proposing changes. However, he did not do so and the group thus did not have any possibility of considering his objection.

12. Addressing the Board, the Chairman of the Employers' group stated that the situation which had given rise to the present objection was very similar to that prevailing in 1988, and that therefore he would not repeat in detail the arguments put forward previously. The Employers' group, while being aware of the precedents set by the Board, nevertheless felt that it had to maintain its earlier position, which was based on the lack of representativity of the delegate appointed by the Government. That delegate came from an organisation which was composed mainly of owners of small agricultural undertakings, whereas an inter-occupational employers' organisation (COSEP), which represented the employers of all economic sectors including agriculture, had been in existence for a long time in Nicaragua. This had, moreover, been recognised by the Credentials Committee, which had considered on several occasions that the Government should have appointed the Employers' delegate in agreement with COSEP. As regards the composition of Conference committees, the Employers' group considered that the designation of its representatives should not be automatic, and that a selection factor had to come into play, since the group's representatives on the various committees had to enjoy the confidence of the group as a whole. From this standpoint, the majority of the group, which considered that Mr. Aragón did not validly represent the employers of Nicaragua, had been opposed to his taking part as a titular Employers' member in the work of the Committee on the Application of Standards.

RULING OF THE APPEALS BOARD

13. From the information available to the Appeals Board it appears that Mr. Aragón's candidature for the voting section of the Committee on the Application of Standards was dismissed for the sole reason that the employers' organisation in agreement with which he was appointed as delegate was alleged not to be the most representative employers' organisation in Nicaragua. Although at the 75th Session of the Conference the Credentials Committee had again taken the view that "in the absence of agreement[on the nomination of the Employers' delegate of Nicaragua]... the Government should have appointed the Employers' delegate in agreement with COSEP, which apparently continued to be the most representative employers' organisation", the Credentials Committee had nevertheless not proposed the invalidation of the credentials of the Employers' delegate of Nicaragua, who came from the same organisation as that to which Mr. Aragón belonged.

14. It is not for the Appeals Board to pronounce upon the representative character of delegates to the Conference, a question which relates to the validity of their credentials under article 3, paragraph 5, of the Constitution and is subject to another procedure, provided for in article 3, paragraph 9, of the Constitution and article 26 of the Standing Orders. According to article 26, paragraph 8, of the Standing Orders, pending final decision of the question of his admission, any delegate to whose nomination objection has been taken shall have the same rights as other delegates. Therefore, in the absence of such a decision, the Appeals Board can only conclude that the position of the Employers' group is based on grounds which cannot legally justify it. Mr. Aragón's appeal against his exclusion from the voting section of the Committee on the Application of Standards is therefore well founded.

15. The Appeals Board accordingly decides to add Mr. Aragón to the voting section of the Committee on the Application of Standards.

16. By the terms of Part III, paragraph 3, of the Conference decision of 8 June 1959, it is incumbent upon the Conference to make the necessary arrangements to preserve the equality of voting strength of the three groups where the composition of the voting sections is altered by decision of the Appeals Board. The vote-weighting system in operation will enable this requirement to be met.

The PRESIDENT – The next item on our agenda is the discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General.

Original – Spanish: Mr. UBALDINI (Workers' delegate, Argentina) – On behalf of the Argentinian organised workers in the General Confederation of Labour, we would like to congratulate the President on his election. We would also like to express our approval of the treatment given to the subjects in the Report, which confirms what we have repeatedly said about the importance of this institution for the consolidation and advancement of social and labour rights.

We would like to underline what we said in our previous contribution, namely that with the revival of the institutions of the collective right to work – that is, trade unions, collective bargaining and other mechanisms to solve labour conflicts through the action of the organised workers' movement, the General Confederation of Labour, which I represent, we have been able to achieve the approval of legislation which protects these institutions and we now exercise the rights which this law guarantees.

Having achieved the approval of a Trade Union Act, Argentinian workers can now say that trade union life is completely normalised in Argentina. The trade union structure we have achieved, sanctioned under the law, has not been subject to any criticisms from any worker, whatever his ideological commitment or his political militancy, from any trade union organisation. Only praise is to be heard for this new law, from every section of the community.

In our country we are allowed to set up freely any trade unions affiliated workers may wish, whatever their form or degree of organisation. The law also establishes reasonable requirements for union personnel to have the right of concluding collective agreements and administer social works. These requirements are all laid down in the standards of the ILO Committee on Freedom of Association, as well as earlier legal instruments.

We have achieved the approval of a law covering professional accidents and diseases, adopted from a previous text. It establishes a greater level of benefit, increases compensation, simplifies the procedures for obtaining easy access to the rights of wage-earners and provides adequate protection for younger workers. We are still struggling for the adoption of a law on working contracts because these basic rights are still subject to the law imposed during the military dictatorship.

In 1988, in this same assembly, when I also had the opportunity of putting forward our message, we gave an analysis of the social situation in Latin America, which is now growing worse. We said "In Latin American, there is a growing conflict between the privileged sectors and unemployed and marginalised people who live in poverty, without work. Our currency is unstable; we cannot get worthwhile prices for our commodities and we live with a terrifying foreign debt, the interest on which exceeds our income. The poverty in Latin America is a breeding ground for intolerance, impiety and violence. This socio-economic instability does not allow for a permanent consolidation of democracy because there is an essential element missing - social justice. As you well know, without justice there is no possibility of peace, or of an ethical dimension in man.

"Here in Argentina we fight with faith and optimism for the unity of Latin America, while respecting the natural and unavoidable characteristics of individual countries and the cultures of indigenous peoples. We are struggling so that our continent may offer hope for the future, and a place where the social well-being of all humanity is sought. We hope to form a South American union from the Rio Grande to the Antarctic, so that Latin America will overcome its dependence and contribute to all of humanity.

"The General Confederation of Labour knows that our home is Latin America. In the year 2000 there will be 535 million Latin Americans and we are prepared to offer social justice, equality of opportunity and freedom from external bonds."

Unfortunately, the persistence of disastrous living conditions among vast sectors of the population has had very serious consequences, which we deplore. We have seen how the people of Venezuela and our Argentinian people were shaken by episodes of violence caused principally by the fact that basic needs were not satisfied and above all that the poorest sectors of the populations were hungry.

The hopes for a new government in Argentina, which is committed to achieving a true revolution in production and social justice, and our faith in our people's efforts in the struggle for their rights from the basis which will help us to overcome the crisis. We have the support and backing of Mr. Carlos Menem, elected President of Argentina.

The General Confederation of Labour has denounced the situation of extreme poverty a thousand and one times. We have spoken of the possibility of a flowering of equal opportunities, but which shamefully our voice was not heard.

Our warnings, based on our analysis of living conditions in the most marginalised sectors of the population and our daily contact with this sad reality, should not go unrecorded, because recently plans were drawn up in order to provide food and meet the needs of the neediest sectors of the population.

The General Confederation of Labour in the Republic of Argentina implemented an assistance plan in solidarity, called the "Solidarity of Argentinian workers with the Argentinian people", whereby we are contributing to support for soup kitchens run by trade union, neighbourhood and church organisations.

As Argentinian workers, we are fully conscious that our Latin American peoples can determine their future; through unity we have the necessary instruments to forge our freedom.

Only a great fatherland, as dreamt of by San Martín, O'Higgins, Bolívar, Artigas, Perón and so many others, will be able to achieve happiness for its children, offering mankind a generous land and a people standing together, imbued with the nobility which can only come from work and the dignity of free people.

The challenge lies in changing conditions in as short a time as possible; for this reason the General Confederation of Labour is continuing to make effective proposals to change the situation, for action with unity and solidarity by continental trade unions and the development of common programmes which will give effective solutions to the crisis under which our people are suffering, when the financial sectors increase their profits and others see their real income decreasing.

Because of this common goal in each of our nations, the workers' movement has to intensify its actions in order to improve the situation of the sectors with the lowest incomes. We have placed special emphasis on the establishment of a minimum living wage and participated in a tripartite body which determines such a wage for a specified period of time. We have also achieved a modification in relevant law to enable it to come into force immediately. The minimum basic income of each worker is determined by the amount fixed and our action has enabled this to be an incentive for collective agreements, obtaining an amount higher than the level of inflation, although sometimes it cannot satisfy the basic necessities of the family shopping basket.

Another fundamental instrument for improving the situation in the lowest income groups is employment policy.

We must have immediate measures to increase the number of jobs and eliminate unemployment, which has risen to alarming levels where more than 20 per cent of the active population is unemployed or underemployed.

The General Confederation of Labour has proposed that the minimum living wage should extend to retired people and pensioners as well as all the other workers, whatever their status or job. We have already realised an old hope of ours, which was to achieve basic income for all retired workers whatever system they worked under, with no differentiation between retired people who were employed and those who were self-employed.

Our struggle for dignity and economic independence continues until we achieve for everybody a new economic and social order in the world, since work dignifies all who partake of this noble activity.

Our fundamental concern is for our young people, that they should have real possibilities of fulfilling themselves through their work. We believe that we must maintain the struggle for greater dignity for women, their right to enter the labour market without discrimination. Effective policies are needed to achieve these ends.

The international community has to take note of the situation we are denouncing and adopt measures of solidarity to overcome the crisis in our nations, breaking down protectionist barriers against our products, eliminating the foreign debt and realising only investments which are productive for our economy and not speculative. As workers, we do not recognise the legitimacy of the foreign debt, which originated in manoeuvres which in most cases were engineered by speculative interests or by genuine organisations in the grip of financial circles, whose policies were a basic factor in the crisis we are now undergoing.

We repeat our denunciation and will continue doing so until the practices of unjust governments which impose a system of apartheid, whether based on colour or on religions, ethnic or social reasons are finally eliminated.

A terrible reality has been brought to the attention of the international community: countries enjoying a high standard of material development have abdicated the human condition and descended to the barbarism of genocide, which must cease wherever it is taking place. It is not only a crime against international law, but attacks the very reason for man's existence. Power politics which sacrifice populations to extend their territories, those very places which carry on the shameful trade in drugs and arms contracts, must be stopped.

Another basic problem of our age is the lack of respect for human rights, so well recognised in the United Nations Charter, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the Inter-American Convention on Human Rights, known as the San José de Costa Rica Pact, violations of which take place in many countries.

Despite the importance of these instruments, which we have constantly affirmed and put on record, they are not respected in countries under the yoke of dictatorships. We wish to reaffirm in this international forum our determination to continue to protect mankind from the crimes which may be committed against it and to give our full support to specific democratic and social guarantee.

We have a constant commitment to democracy. Through the sacrifice and action of our people, led by the General Confederation of Labour, on 14 May 1989 the people successfully elected a new Government. This Government will shortly assume office, carrying hopes that it will improve the lot of the masses of the dignity for all Argentinian people.

We hope that this achievement by the workers and people of Argentina will become a reality in all countries and that we shall have a democratic Government which will effectively support individual rights and guarantees and social justice.

We salute from this rostrum all those who are fighting for their dignity and for the inalienable right of peoples to self-determination. Our commitment is with our people and with all the peoples of the world who are struggling for peace, dignity, freedom and justice.

Original – French: Mr. BENLAKHDAR (Workers' delegate, Algeria) – On behalf of the General Union of Algerian Workers. I should like first of all to congratulate Mr. Nkomo on his election as President of the 76th Session of the Conference.

I should also like to congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne on his election as Director-General of the International Labour Office, and at the same time pay tribute to Mr. Francis Blanchard for all his efforts in the service of social justice and progress in the world.

At the plenary of this 76th Session we shall try to give our comments and our point of view on certain subjects discussed in the Report of the Director-General.

Our attention was naturally focused on all of the questions of interest to workers in developing countries.

The central issue posed by the Report is that we must think about the conditions that have to be created, the path that has to be followed and the policy to be applied to ensure the re-establishment of growth and social progress in the so-called developing countries and in those which are also called poor, deprived and disinherited.

In fact, I am talking about the Third World. In most cases, we are talking about ex-colonies. These are countries which remain, whatever people say, the declared victims of an unjust international economic order, dominated by a very aggressive world capitalist system which is more oppressive and in which there is more exploitation than ever.

Returning to the Report, we have read that the deregulation of the world economy is a cause of unemployment, underemployment and poverty in the developing countries.

We would have hoped also to read that this deregulation is something that has never escaped the will of men, governments and the financial powers.

This deregulation, which is generally called a crisis, is in fact a normal stage, a controlled development and a well-perfected strategy of a world capitalism that is now in a phase of breakdown, change and redeployment.

We would also have liked to read that this qualitative advance – if one could call it such – of world capitalism presupposes a price to be paid, huge sacrifices to be made, tragedies to be organised.

We would like to have read that this price, these sacrifices and these tragedies are suffered – physically and in terms of human dignity, and living conditions – by the workers and the most destitute populations in the developing countries, and that the blame for this lies with those who take pleasure from an outdated view of the world and of events, from a narrow selfishness, and from actions which tend towards total irresponsibility.

Therefore, what has to be said, with courage and frankness, is that this tragedy experienced by peoples in the Third World is very often the result of actions by a minority of the well-off in the developing countries and, in all cases the result of an unfair international economic order and the often negative attitude of the governments of rich and industrialised countries.

Having said that, we agree with the Director-General's Report when it emphasises that re-establishing growth and social progress requires a considerable effort on the part of the industrialised and developing countries.

But what has to be added is that these efforts have to be made by those who control international trade and also the international money markets.

These efforts have to be agreed to by those who are behind the foreign debt of the developing countries, especially in Africa and Latin America.

As far as the remedies are concerned, for developing countries suffering from unemployment, poverty and foreign debt, there are a number of different concepts which are used and abused enthusiastically today.

Amongst these I will cite structural adjustment, a theory, an approach and a formula which seem to be favoured in the Report submitted to us.

For our organisation, which is the representative trade union association of Algerian workers as a whole, structural adjustment, of whichever type and however much it can be improved, is still a theory which contains a number of ulterior motives which are of considerable concern to workers.

In fact, up till now and for a very long time to come, structural adjustment is the law that has been imposed by the IMF and the World Bank on the poor countries in Africa and elsewhere.

The implementation of this strategy consists in making the developing countries pay for the world economic crisis.

As the Report clearly states, structural adjustment means progressively dismantling the public sector, privatisation means cutting down the workforce, and removing subsidies means reducing social expenditure.

In other words structural adjustment, even accompanied by certain social measures, means the imposed economic integration of the developing countries into the world capitalist system, a strategy which is opposed by Algerian workers because it is a policy directed against the poorest social categories.

The Algerian workers are well aware of the fact that the economies of developing countries have to adapt to the changes taking place in all fields at a national, regional and international level.

Economic efficiency, the ideas of profitability and the releasing of creative energy and innovation, all of these have to be the basis of real social progress.

It is from this perspective, therefore, that my organisation affirmed its support for the economic reforms taking place in our country, reforms that are intended to create or reinforce the conditions to ensure economic recovery, while respecting the principles of political independence and national economic independence.

To return again to the Director-General's Report, we would agree with him that the main concern is to re-establish growth in developing countries.

We would add that this policy can be conducted and applied only if it has the national will behind it.

The success of this task presupposes that we radically redefine the conduct, the mentalities and the policies of the industrialised countries.

We invite the rich countries, therefore, to engage in a positive dialogue with the developing countries, because the wealth of some nations cannot be built on the oppression, exploitation and humiliation of peoples and workers in the poor nations.

Economic recovery and social progress are a fight, and the only ones who can win are those who are able to maintain their dignity, their freedom and their country's independence.

This is why today, as in the past, we welcome the heroic struggle of the peoples and workers, for instance in Palestine and in the Arab occupied territories, in the western Sahara, in South Africa, in Namibia and throughout the world.

We reaffirm here our total solidarity with the peoples and workers fighting against fascist dictatorships and reactionary regimes, retrograde regimes throughout the world, imperialist, Zionist, colonialist, racist regimes; they are fighting for their own dignity and for their fundamental rights as workers and as people.

Thank you for your attention, and I wish this session of the Conference every success.

Miss AYKUT (Minister of Labour and Social Security, Turkey) – Mr. President, on behalf of my delegation and myself, I should like to congratulate you, as well as the other Officers of the Conference, on your well-deserved election which will enable you to guide the deliberations of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. I wish this session of the Conference every possible success.

I also wish to extend my congratulations to Mr. Hansenne on his election to the post of Director-General. At the same time, I should like to express my feelings of gratitude to the outgoing Director-General, Mr. Blanchard, who has directed the Office for the last 15 years with the highest competence. I extend to Mr. Blanchard my best wishes for happiness in his new life.

My delegation considers that the choice of "Recovery and employment" as the theme of this year's session of the Conference has been a most appropriate one. The Conference has thus been provided with an excellent opportunity to discuss economic and social progress in the world.

Indeed, the present decade ends in a paradoxical situation. Some countries have been able to maintain or recover their pace of economic growth. Some of them have even experienced rapid economic expansion. Others, however, have had to cope with serious problems such as sharp decreases in living standards and debt and balance-of-payments crises. Developments in opposite directions have brought about considerable imbalances in the world economy. Consequently, the growth of world trade has slowed down and social conditions in many countries have undergone a major decline as poverty and unemployment have increased. Thus the 1980s have also been a decade marked by growing international disparities.

The success of some countries in responding to economic difficulties in the 1980s must not be allowed to conceal the fact that all countries can be sooner or later become affected by negative trends in an increasingly interdependent world.

Universal economic disturbances greatly influence prospects for sustained growth in any country. To mention one example, the recourse to protectionism and the introduction of new barriers by industrialised countries runs counter to the outward-oriented growth strategy which has proved indispensable for some countries, including Turkey. These trade barriers also hamper the healthy process of liberalisation in the industrial world itself. Moreover, reduced international trade can lead to economic stagnation which could have serious implications for levels of employment and real wages in many countries. Therefore, my Government believes in the merits of a search for common solutions.

In this respect I should like to make a few observations based on the experience of my country.

By the end of 1979 Turkey was in the midst of severe economic problems, including widespread and increasing unemployment and inflation. In early 1980, Turkey launched a structural adjustment process with a view to responding to internal and external challenges. It departed from import substitution and interventionism and reverted to an open and market-oriented economy. Consequently, there has been a significant growth in exports and in the volume of trade with other countries, and increase in the level of investments and production and a decline in unemployment. As a result of these structural transformation policies, Turkey has entered into a phase of rapid development. My Government is committed to maintaining this momentum.

I believe that the ultimate goal of development is the well-being of man. An increased level of employment is essential for the attainment of this ideal, providing high employment is not instrumental only in ensuring a sound means of subsistence, but also in safeguarding human dignity. No doubt, employment is an aspect of economic growth which requires emphasis on the development of specific policies.

In this context, regarding policies followed by my Government, I should like to say that, in recent years, greater importance has been given to the creation of a skilled labour force. New regulations and educational activities have been introduced for this purpose. Programmes have been initiated with the aim of encouraging small and medium-sized enterprises so as to generate high employment and efforts have been made for the creation of an environment favourable to self-employment. In the transfer of advanced technology, care has been given to reduce its possible adverse effects on employment. The services sector has been encouraged, taking into consideration its employment-creating potential, and the effectiveness of employment services has been improved in order to better monitor labour market conditions.

Apart from the above-mentioned general national policies, our Government has taken the necessary action for the ratification of the Human Resources Development Convention, 1975 (No. 142), and the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144).

Furthermore, I should like to state with satisfaction that the European Social Charter, the Minimum Age (Underground Work) Convention, 1965 (No. 123), and the Minimum Age (Industry) Convention (Revised), 1937 (No. 59), are under consideration for ratification.

Finally, the bill for the ratification of the amendments to the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation has been approved by the Government and submitted to the Parliament.

I believe that relevant international organisations have an important role to play in assisting countries in their efforts to ensure further economic and social progress. I also believe that, in working out recommendations and policy proposals, the international organisations should take into account national conditions. Recovery plans prepared on the basis of theoretical schemes have in many cases resulted in social tension. Recent experience has shown that adjustment policies can be successful if they are designed and carried out in a manner consistent with the specific requirements and conditions of the country in question. Therefore, international organisations should make additional efforts to have a better understanding of national conditions and to develop plans corresponding to specific situations. The proposals of the international organisations would only serve a purpose if national economic and social conditions do not constitute a serious obstacle to their application.

Realism should be the main line of action to be followed by international organisations, not only in the economic field but also in formulating proposals with regard to labour life. In this connection, the ILO has an important role to play by setting and monitoring the implementation of standards in the world of work in addition to its technical co-operation and advisory activities.

To fulfil its role in an efficient manner, the ILO must ensure that its services are not exploited for purposes other than those covered by its mandate and that its standards remain relevant to the changing conditions so as to be widely applicable. To this effect, standards should not be only the reflection of abstract thinking and the supervisory function of the ILO should not be limited to simply applying theoretically desirable standards to cases whose origins might require deeper and more realistic assessment. In other words, standards must constitute a credible response to the emerging and changing needs of countries and supervisory activities of the ILO must be based on an understanding of the harsh realities of life. Applicability should therefore be the main criterion in developing and monitoring the implementation of labour standards. This is of the utmost importance for the credibility and consequently the authority of the monitoring system.

The ILO's action can be meaningful and positive providing it takes into account comprehensively every factor relevant to the cases with which it has to deal under its monitoring mission. No country would reasonably oppose the widest possible application of ILO standards. Development is a necessary condition to achieve such an end. In other words, action needed to guarantee the universal application of labour standards requires economic growth.

As underlined in the Director-General's Report "economic growth and social progress must advance together". Efforts to impose on countries prescriptions which cannot be translated into specific action may weaken the credibility of the international organisations and place those countries in a dilemma between the utility of international cooperation and the need to adopt measures corresponding to reality. ILO action must reconcile theory and fact.

In concluding, I should like to renew my best wishes for the success of this Session of the Conference and my hopes for the ILO's continued contributions to labour peace in the world.

Original – French: Mr. ROUTOUANG (Minister of Labour and Manpower, Chad) – After the brilliant and masterly statements made by the distinguished speakers who have preceded me, it will be difficult for me to hold the attention of the delegations present at the Conference.

We often say, however, that he who dares, conquers, so allow me, first to convey to you the warmest greetings of the delegation which it is my honour to head. On its behalf and on my own behalf, I should like to express well-deserved congratulations to the President and Vice-Presidents of the Conference on their election to the serious responsibilities of the 76th Session. I am convinced that their experience and their great personal qualities will make it possible successfully to conclude our work and that the results will be fruitful.

I should also like to take this opportunity to express the gratitude of the Government of Chad to the outgoing Director-General, Mr. Francis Blanchard, and thus to all of the administration for its total devotion to the cause of the ILO and for his personal valuable interventions on behalf of the member countries of the ILO.

Finally, I should like to express the congratulations of the delegation of Chad to the new Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, on his brilliant election to the head of the International Labour Office. His election to high office in the ILO is the result of a brilliant career and the unswerving devotion which he has shown in the serving of his country as well as the ILO. While hoping that the African policy of the ILO will be continued, maintained, strengthened and developed with vigour, I would like to express to him and his whole team, my warmest wishes for success. He may rest assured of the co-operation of the Government of Chad.

Like the eminent personalities who have already spoken from this tribune, the delegation of the Republic of Chad would like to make its contribution to the discussion of the Director-General's Report. From this Report it is clear that, though the economic recovery which has been observed for a number of years is continuing at a sustained rhythm in the countries of continental Europe and, to a lesser extent, in the Eastern countries and the countries of Latin America and Asia, this is by no means the case for Africa, particularly for Africa south of the Sahara.

While industrialised countries were experiencing economic recovery, Africa, south of the Sahara was entering a period of recession which, if not the most serious, is one of the most worrying that it has ever undergone.

Indeed numerous problems common to the countries of this zone explain this situation: their indebtedness, often at a very high interest rate, which forces them to devote a large amount of their export revenue to debt servicing, without, however, amortising the capital; their economies, based on the export of agricultural raw materials and commodities, with prices fixed to suit the industrialised countries, thus producing a worsening of the terms of trade and a deficit in balance of payments.

These countries are as a result also witnessing a continuing worsening of social conditions: unemployment, underemployment and poverty are endemic, and the drop in the standard of living and per capita income has taken on worrying proportions.

Without being alarming, the situation is no better in my country. Indeed, Chad, after 20 years of war imposed from the outside, has had its whole structure shaken, both economic and social. However, since the commencement of the Third Republic on 7 June 1982, major strategies have been implemented to improve the situation. Thus at the economic level we note a growth of GDP in 1988 of 4.9 per cent following two successive years of recession. Indeed, thanks to increased rainfall and with the valuable assistance of friendly countries and international organisations, food production has reached 700,000 tonnes, which is more or less the equivalent of the food needs of the country.

Cotton is the country's main export and energetic measures have been taken by the Government to cope with the drop of its price in the world market. In cattle farming, the second most important economic activity, sustained effort by the Government has made it possible after the years of drought which decimated it, to reconstitute the herd which has now reached more than 10 million head.

The infrastructure for transport and communication constitutes the second priority sector of the investment programme 1986-91. Expenditure in this sphere more than doubled between 1986 and 1987 and reached 43.9 per cent of the GDP in 1988. Major investment has thus made it possible to improve roads in 90 per cent of cases.

In the sphere of telecommunications, renovation of the land station for satellite telecommunication in N'Djamena is facilitating links with the outside. Projects for satellite links for the major cities in Chad have been studied and certain have already been adopted by the Government.

The airport in N'Djamena has been renovated and extended. Other international class airports are in the progress of being constructed with French aid in Abech and Faya-Largeau.

The economic importance of these projects will be clear to everyone since is a land-locked country.

At the economic level the return to peace and security has made it possible for an effective recovery of activity in enterprises. The new investment code with its favourable conditions for establishment in Chad has made it possible to set up new companies and to create new jobs.

In the subregion, Chad has reintegrated the customs and economic union of Central Africa and is a member of the economic community of the Central African State of the Lake Chad Basin Commission, the Niger Basin Authority as well as other economic and financial organisations at the social level.

Thanks to the technical assistance, and the enlightened advice of the International Labour Office, the Government has been able to proceed to the revision of the Labour Code and the adoption of a social security code. Let me take this opportunity to address to the ILO the thanks of the Government of Chad for its contribution in the preparation of these two instruments and for the remarkable effort exerted by the experts of the ILO to promote in Chad a dynamic and autonomous cooperative and pre-cooperative movement.

On the other hand, thanks to the mutual understanding of the two trade union federations, a single federation has been set up called the National Union of Chad Trade Unions, thus unity of workers in Chad has been brought about. The employers' organisation, the National Committee of Employers of Chad, will be definitively set up on 17 June 1989. In other words, tripartism is respected and healthy in Chad.

The public authorities are making serious effort to improve the standard of living and living conditions of the population.

You can see that Chad has made notable progress and you will easily understand also that no country in the world devoted to peace and social justice, particularly Chad, which has attained peace after so many sacrifices, would accept that these efforts should be sacrificed, or destroyed by any other power.

Unfortunately, Chad, which wants only a just and durable peace and to live in harmony with its neighbours and the rest of the countries of the world, is once again the victim of plots and aggression on the part of certain regimes with an anachronistic ideology toward countries which are brothers and neighbours. Indeed, the defection of the band of three traitors, blinded by overriding ambition, serves as a pretext for these barbarous regimes to take action and so return Chad to the chaos from which it emerged on 7 June 1982.

Chad is resolved to consolidate its unity and sovereignty, its national independence, and particularly the choices made to conduct its destiny, and it will continue to hew out its path.

Industrialised countries have a shared responsibility in the current crisis in the Third World. It is quite appropriate that we should ask for their help in dealing with this crisis. In so doing, we will be asking for relief in our servicing to make it possible for us to use part of our resources for the financing of our own development; just remuneration for our export products, the elimination of trade barriers, assistance in developing our human resources, and, finally, a new world economic order.

As at each year at this time, we call to mind the workers of South Africa, victims of racial repression. In spite of the injunctions of peace and social justice-loving countries, in spite of the often renewed appeals of the United Nations, South Africa continues its segregationist comportment.

The Government of the Republic of Chad encourages and calls upon the international community to strongly condemn South Africa by means of severe economic sanctions so as to bring them to a healthy concept of cohabitation in respect of the human person. A national committee to combat apartheid is being set up in my country.

Moreover, Chad is pleased to see that Namibia is finally beginning a process which is to lead it to total independence. We call upon the Secretary-General of the United Nations to make every effort so that this country, which is prey to the ambitions of South Africa, can freely follow its own destiny.

Original – Russian: Mr. NATCHEV (Government delegate, Bulgaria) – Mr. President, allow me to congratulate you and the Vice-Presidents upon being elected to these posts of responsibility at this 76th Session of the International Labour Conference, and wish you the best of success in your work.

First of all, I should like to congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne upon his highly merited election at the 242nd Session of the Governing Body as Director-General of the International Labour Office. His participation at the International Labour Conferences from 1981 to 1988 and the substantive achievements of his country in the economic and social spheres – to which he has made his own weighty contribution – give us reason to hope that in the future the ILO will be adhering to the humane tasks and goals set forth in its Constitution, namely, to contribute to the establishment of peace by promoting social justice, improving the working and living conditions of the workers by developing international co-operation and also to aid in establishing economic and social stability.

This 76th Session of the International Labour Conference is taking place under new conditions. A larger number of States are assimilating and putting into effect new ideas of international co-operation that are consonant with the new way of political thinking, one of the goals of which is to find ways of solving the radical problems of the present day. The positive results of the Soviet-US summits and other meetings, the adoption of a substantive and well-balanced document at the Vienna meeting of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe, the establishment of official relations between the CMEA and the European Economic Community and also with individual CMEA members, the talks that have started in Vienna on reductions of conventional arms and armaments and the negotiations on confidence-building measures, all of these will help in establishing an atmosphere of trust and creating more favourable conditions for developing mutually beneficial international co-operation and give a boost to the activities of the United Nations and its agencies, including in the social and economic spheres.

As we have emphasised, the 76th Session of the Conference is carrying out its work in a changing international situation. At the same time as we are seeing, positive changes in the sphere of international politics, it should be pointed out that the most serious world economic crisis, as observed in the Director-General's Report, has gravely affected a number of the world's countries and this is of considerable concern to us since it is in an interdependent world that the ILO has to pursue its activities in fulfilling the tasks enshrined in its Constitution. In our opinion, these basic points have been reflected in the Director-General's Report devoted to the problems of economic recovery and employment.

His Report, which we are discussing at this Conference, is a substantive and informative document in which we see coverage of some of the fundamental problems of the general economic situation throughout the world and its repercussions on general employment trends. At the same time, bearing in mind the tasks which ensue from the ILO Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia, it also touches upon problems that can be expected in the future and that the Members of the ILO have to act upon together, deploying their efforts against a backdrop of economic recovery and employment growth. The whole complex of problems in this field is examined systematically and precisely in the Report and, it seems to us, with the aim of strengthening and activating co-operation between countries on a multilateral basis. This is due to the fact that independently of the measures taken vis-à-vis employment in an number of different countries, we see that mass unemployment is still with us and, indeed, is even growing. What the international organisations and the ILO in particular have to do is to make assessments, carry out a comparative analysis of and come up with proposals for co-ordinated action on the part of the member States with a view to defining and developing a strategy of economic recovery and employment growth, bearing in mind the multi-faceted problems that exist in the social and economic spheres. It is no easy matter to accomplish all of this since the complexity of the situation is such that it we can only speak with certainty about a few of the most general trends that we would now like to dwell upon. First of all, there is no doubt that there is a continuing rapid reduction in the use made of unskilled labour; there is a reduction also in the proportion and numbers of semi-skilled labour; as for to skilled labour, this is becoming more and more stratified. The volume of skilled craftsmen is also continuing to drop. A large share of industrial skilled labour is now being downgraded and is losing its creativity. Complex modern highly-skilled work is still a privilege for the few. There is an acute problem of training the unemployed and also people who are in work, and here therefore particular demands are placed on the retraining system. An extremely important point will be its ability to adapt to the level of current public production, and flexibility in ensuring the workforce needed for the restructuring process. The vocational training system, is not yet able to meet the needs of all who are affected by technological restructuring and the reorganisation of production process. At the same time it has to be noted that one of the most important features of the general situation is the fact that technological restructuring is being carried out at a time when the economies of a number of countries are faced with very acute problems, such as foreign debt in the developing countries and also a reduction in solvent demand on the world markets, a reduction in growth rates in production, a weakening of the effectiveness of methods of regulating state monopolies and so on. As a result of this, there has been a reduction in employment brought about by the use of new, labour-saving technologies and exacerbated by the generally unfavourable economic situation.

Recently, the People's Republic of Bulgaria, on the basis of the results that have been attained in our economic development and careful analysis of the ground that has been covered, has been engaged upon a radical restructuring of all spheres of our nation's economic life. The essence of this new policy is to strengthen the economic interest of all of those involved in the production process in making the fullest and most effective use of the country's vast production potential that has been created over the years of building a social society. We are taking concrete steps to reorganise the management and territorial administration structures; we are eliminating outdated departmental compartmentalisation. Last year we adopted a special decree which set basic standards for organising production on the basis of individual firms, which ensures an equal development of state, co-operative and private firms and enterprises. At the same time, we are creating more favourable conditions for the activities of national and foreign enterprises inside Bulgaria, expanding international economic co-operation, creating joint ventures, and so on.

At the beginning of this year, particular attention was given also to agriculture. Measures are planned to introduce new forms of management, to strengthen the piece-work system in agricultural production and also to ensure the correct use of land to ensure better ecological conditions. Evidence of the increased attention that we are giving to protecting the environment is the coming International Economic Forum which is to be held in Sofia this autumn and which will be looking at the most urgent problems for co-operation between European countries in this field.

Looking in general at the different processes that are taking place in our country, we should say that the accelerate modernisation of production and the introduction of new technologies, the concentration on innovation and the need to adapt to changing social and economic conditions, all of these are having a very complex and multi-faceted – sometimes even a contradictory – influence upon labour resources and the use of manpower. Here the People's Republic of Bulgaria has great respect for international experience and the achievements of other countries in the matter of vocational training and retraining of manpower, in connection with the introduction of new technologies and in line with the demands of scientific and technological progress. That is why we welcome the initiative taken by the UNDP and the ILO to implement a European regional project on vocational training systems and new technologies. We would like to take this opportunity, as the co-ordinator country, to express our thanks to the UNDP and to the ILO and all of the 21 European countries participating in this project for their constructive contributions. We think that the other European projects that we have participated in have produced positive results.

The course that we are following to speed up social and economic development in Bulgaria is closely linked to radical transformations in the social sphere. Efforts have been concentrated above all on eliminating the way we used to underestimated acute problems in the material base of social and cultural life. As a result of which only a residual share of resources was allocated to the development of these fields. The social policy which we are now following is based on the understanding that it will cover all the different groups, the relations of society as a whole and the individual, conditions of work and day-to-day life, health and leisure. At the centre of the social sphere we have to remember that there is always man himself, his living conditions, his standard of living, the way in which he can satisfy his vital requirements and also enjoy the social rights and freedoms that are guaranteed by the Constitution and the legislation of our country.

As already pointed out, at this moment in time we are seeing very clear signs of co-operation developing between countries with different social and economic systems. Over the last few years we have also seen that it is possible, where there is a political will, for nations to come together to ensure respect for and compliance with fundamental human rights and freedoms, justice and peace, in the interest of humanity. In this connection our delegation vigorously condemns the regime of apartheid in South Africa and also the situation of the population in the occupied Arab territories. The "intifadah" that has been going on for more than a year is evidence of the working situation in these territories.

The ILO and its member States must take decisive action to ensure that the rights of the Palestinian population are guaranteed in the general framework of human rights formulated in the United Nations Declaration of Human Rights, so that these people can pursue their economic and social development in accordance with their aspirations and real needs.

In conclusion, I should like to say that we hope that this International Labour Conference, which is carrying out its work during the 70th anniversary of the ILO, will provide a valuable opportunity to open up new possibilities for the Organisation to ensure effective action in favour of one of the fundamental human rights, the right to work, and to step up international co-operation in the social and economic fields so that the ILO can increase its contribution to the general well-being of mankind.

Original – German: Mr. GEPPERT (Federal Minister for Labour and Social Affairs, Austria) – First of all, I should like to congratulate you, Mr. President, and the Vice-Presidents, most sincerely on your election to these responsible posts.

I am sure that you will fulfil the tasks entrusted to you with a high degree of mastery to the benefit and success of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference.

Like my predecessors – Rudolf Häuser, Gerhard Weissenberg and Alfred Dallinger – I should like, as Minister for Labour and Social Affairs of the Republic of Austria, to express how much I value the work of the International Labour Organisation and its objectives.

The recent developments in certain European countries towards greater democracy and improved protection of human rights may – and I am quite sure of this – be attributed, and in no small measure, to the strong action of the International Labour Organisation for these objectives. It is up to our Organisation and ourselves to maintain and further develop these positive developments.

Austria has basically approved the ILO draft Programme and Budget for 1990-91. Although my country's budget contribution is considerable, I fully understand the need for sufficient budget resources to implement the important programmes of the International Labour Organisation.

The Director-General, whom I should like to congratulate most heartedly on his election, has chosen recovery and employment as the theme of his report this year.

In Austria, too, we can note a perceptible economic recovery. Never before in our country have there been so many persons employed. At present, more than 2.82 million persons in Austria have a job.

This sound economic situation also has an effect on unemployment figures. However, we are still far from a situation of full employment.

At the end of May this year, less than 129,000 persons in Austria were without work. In comparison with the preceding year, that is some 8,000 fewer jobless workers. The unemployment rate at the end of May was 4.3 per cent; a year ago it was 4.7 per cent.

Economists are predicting that unemployment rates will drop to below 5 per cent in 1989 and 1990. Last year, the growth rate in my country was 4.2 per cent – a European record – and is also a reflection of Austria's economic and labour market policy.

The favourable economic situation has many positive effects: less expenditure for support of the unemployed, a higher tax revenue and more resources for social security. As a result there is a considerable lessening of the burden on our overall system of social security, which, as we are aware, is sustained by remunerated employment.

But these pleasing developments must not conceal the fact that all is not rosy in Austria. There is no perceptible drop in unemployment – rather there is a sharp increase before the pensionable age – and no reduction in long-term unemployment.

This means that, in comparison with earlier phases of a good economic situation, there are still problems in the labour market; and for certain groups of persons, these are even becoming more acute.

The problem groups in the labour market, to whom we should give priority, are mostly made up of young persons, women, the disabled, persons with educational problems and foreign workers.

In the case of a fast-growing group made up about 20,000 persons in Austria at the present time – unemployment means long-term unemployment. In spite of our efforts and the sound economic situation it is impossible to help them in an effective manner. The longer somebody is unemployed the more difficult it becomes for him or her to find work again.

Long-term unemployment has, for those affected, become a social stigma. Even if, as the example of my country shows, economic recovery over the past years has brought perceptible relief, it has not fulfilled a basic aspiration, perhaps the highest – i.e. to end mass unemployment in many countries of Europe.

According to the Kreisky Commission report on a programme of full employment in the 1990s, 20 million people in Western Europe are looking for work. It puts forward the view that the high level of unemployment is not a pure economic problem; unemployment does not arise because of reasons of force majeure and it is possible to eliminate it by political means. Consequently unemployment even so-called basic or natural unemployment – is totally unacceptable.

The effect of the worsening of the labour market is felt, above all, by certain groups which, as I have said before, include young people, women and the elderly. Unemployment endangers, moreover, the equal treatment of women. It is more difficult for them to find a job, they earn less than and they run a greater risk of losing their job.

As well as unemployment in the sense of the term, there is also the group of the so-called "working poor", who do have a job but are not able to live on what they earn. The figures here as we know reach millions. Many others have to accept part-time work because they cannot find any other, they cannot find full-time work. This is particularly the case for women. Others are forced to carry out several jobs at the same time because it is impossible for them to live from one of them. The work of many persons is often empty, unsatisfactory and poorly remunerated.

The most important message of the Kreisky Commission is that unemployment could, in Europe, be halved by the middle of the 1990s. However, if this is to be achieved, governments, both sides of industry – i.e. the trade unions and employers – must co-operate in order to fight unemployment.

Moreover, according to the Kreisky Commission, European governments must better co-ordinate their economic policy so that economic growth should be maintained at 3.5 to 4 per cent in the medium term. This would increase employment yearly by 1.5 per cent and cut the unemployment rate by 1 per cent.

Unemployment must be combated with a package of measures. As well as unconventional employment initiatives, there must also be, in my opinion, a reduction in working time. We should consider all possible methods to attain this goal. For instance, not only could the normal working week be shortened but restrictions could be placed on overtime. However, experience has shown that an appeal to reduce overtime is not sufficient.

Environmental protection also provides an opportunity for increasing work. Its contribution to job creation is indeed, being, increasingly recognised. The Kreisky Commission also mentioned this recently referring to many positive examples in certain EEC countries such as Denmark, France, the Federal Republic of Germany and the Netherlands.

Let us join together and pool our economic and social resources to create jobs in those areas where they are urgently needed; whether in the environmental sphere, the social sphere, or in the services sector.

I believe that we can find a solution to the employment problem of the industrialised nations by taking common economic policy initiatives to ensure economic growth, by redistributing work to all of those who are able and willing to work and by creating jobs in socially necessary and new spheres.

The problems of the developing countries are multi-faceted. These countries need, above all, investment capital in order to build up a solid economy. Today, they are utilising this capital to a large extent for the production of export goods. They do this above all to service their foreign debt.

Ideally, we should help the developing countries so that they are in a position to continue helping themselves. They should be assisted in building up an infrastructure and establishing enterprises to produce goods for domestic requirements. Investments should also be directed towards training manpower so as to have a solid basis for long-term development. By means of state social and infrastructure programmes, labour and income could be created which would, in turn, boost demand.

Assistance programmes up to the present time have hardly improved the situation in developing countries. A striking example of this is the international debt policy. Given the lack of success achieved with development aid up to now, it is my view that there can be no solution of Third World problems using traditional concepts.

We have to consider new concepts – but also old ideas which have not so far been put into practice. For example, the former Austrian Chancellor, Doctor Kreisky, proposed a “Marshall Plan” for the developing countries.

I note with great interest the discussion on the question of night work. Whereas all regulations up now were only valid for women, the objective is to develop standards which should be valid for all workers, irrespective of their sex.

The view that night work for men has to be limited, on account of the same social and political considerations, is pertinent. A ban on night work for workers of both sexes is something worth striving for – even if is scarcely feasible at the present time. Nevertheless, we should try to limit night work to as great an extent as possible.

In no way should we accept a further development of night work on the grounds that there should be a better utilisation of machinery and an increase in productivity.

Any new regulations on night work as incorporated in international standards should have as broad a scope of application as possible. At the same time, however, individual member States of the International Labour Organisation should have the necessary flexibility to adapt them to their national legislation.

Irrespective of this, the justification of night work should be constantly assessed and possible alternatives sought. In the case of night work which is absolutely necessary, however, those workers concerned must be granted compensation to lighten their burden.

In conclusion, I should like to express the sincere wish of my Government that the International Labour Organisation should continue in the future, as always, to be the platform of international social policies.

Moreover, I should also like to express my personal will and that of the Federal Government of Austria to do everything in my power in order to fulfil our common objectives.

Mr. TIHELI (Minister of Employment, Social Welfare and Pensions, Lesotho) – Permit me, Sir, on behalf of my delegation and on my own behalf, to congratulate you on your unanimous election to the presidency of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference, a session which marks the 70th anniversary of our Organisation. Your election is also a source of pride to our subregion.

May I also take this opportunity to congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne on his assumption of the duties of Director-General in these taxing times. We wish also to thank Mr. Francis Blanchard for his long service in the ILO and to wish him a happy and fruitful retirement.

We meet here at a time when most of our countries, especially the developing ones, are experiencing worsening economic conditions which are characterised by, amongst others, external debt, unemployment, decreasing agricultural productivity and heavy reliance on external financial resources. Coupled with these problems is the introduction by international financial institutions of structural adjustment programmes. Such programmes, which are meant to help our countries gain a sound financial footing, make a mockery of our manpower needs with respect to the problems of underemployment and unemployment. It is our conviction that these programmes should be redesigned to have a more human face so that they should cease to bring destitution to the vulnerable groups.

Structural adjustment programmes with a human face can help us achieve economic growth through better management of our economy. The argument here is that development should be by the people and for the people and development programmes should thus elevate the human condition.

Economic recovery and growth have not been the same in the developed and developing countries. The recovery of our economies is a necessary condition for the creation of employment in our countries. The road to recovery is a long and difficult one. It is made more difficult in the case of Lesotho by the recent downward trend in the price of gold on international markets. This trend is having a negative effect on job security for our migrant labourers. Marginal mines are closing down and this compounds our unemployment problem.

It is projected that about 30,000 miners stand to lose their jobs due to the falling price of gold. The evils of the migratory labour system are well known. We are making a concerted effort, and this is reflected in our current Five-Year Development Plan, to expand the productive sectors of our economy with a view to creating more employment opportunities. In addition to this effort, the Lesotho Government has embarked upon complementary programmes whereby new entrants into the labour market, the unemployed and repatriated miners will be trained and retrained in various skills in order to prepare them for employment of self-employment. We are confident that, with appropriate and effective assistance from our partners in development, we will be able to achieve our objectives.

My delegation fully commends the Director-General for the agenda which he has placed before this session of the Conference. My country attaches great importance to the revision of the Night Work (Women) Convention (Revised), 1948 (No. 89), some of whose provisions can best be described as outdated. In Lesotho, both in the public and private sectors, employed women by far outnumber men. The main reason for that is the system of migrant labour whereby most of our able-bodied men work in mines outside the country. We feel it advisable that women should play a major role in the development of their country and should not be hindered by outdated laws and conventions. It is also our hope that this revision will go a long way towards addressing the question of equality of opportunity for women.

We welcome discussions on the use of chemicals and we will continue to support the ILO's endeavours in the improvement of the working environment. It is common knowledge that, despite the ILO's efforts, the developing countries are victims of the industrialised world. They are used as dumping places for condemned and untested medicinal chemicals and for outdated and hazardous chemicals and equipment. It is our hope that the ILO's action, through its international instruments, will be geared towards curbing this trend. Multinational co-operation should not be allowed to lead to the application of inferior standards in developing countries as compared with those in force in industrialised countries.

The Director-General has ably dealt with protection of the environment, a topic on which my Government places high priority. My Government, with the assistance of the World Bank, hosted in 1987 a high-level international symposium on environmental issues. With the implementation of the Lesotho Highlands Water Project, my Government has, as a priority, come to address the sad state of affairs of our environment. Thanks to the symposium, my Government now has a plan for environmental protection, a plan which it sees as another way of creating employment.

The inalienable right of peoples to self-determination is one of the cornerstones of public international law. We should wish again to register our abhorrence of the system of apartheid, a system which has been declared a crime against humanity. As a country, we stand for equal opportunity and remuneration, for equal work and freedom of association. We are, however, encouraged by the positive trend of events in Namibia and we are looking forward to welcoming Namibia as an independent State in the international community. It is our fervent hope and belief that the ILO and other donors will come to the aid of the employers and workers of an independent Namibia.

My delegation is appreciative of the activities of the ILO in the occupied Arab territories and feels that such activities should be sustained. We believe that Arab workers should be guaranteed their rights through a process of dialogue.

Let me express our gratitude to the Office of the Director-General that, given the austerity measures and non-payment in full of contributions by some member States, there is a zero growth in the 1990-91 budget as compared with the 1988-89 one. We take this opportunity to once more encourage those member States which have not paid in full their contributions to do so in order to sustain the technical co-operation programmes.

Finally, in my statement to the Conference last year, from this same podium, I referred to the problems in my country caused by the rivalry between our two trade union federations, which had led to the failure of the workers to agree on their delegate to the 75th Session of the Conference. I am happy to report that the two trade union federations, in co-operation with my Ministry, have been holding talks aimed at bringing about unity between them. It is my honest belief that the current negotiations will bring about reconciliation between the two federations.

Original - German: Mr. NAGY (Workers' delegate, Hungary) - I should like, first and foremost, Mr. President, on behalf of my delegation, to congratulate you on your unanimous election as President of this session of the Conference. I am convinced that under your guidance our Conference will successfully tackle the tasks before it.

Allow me to express, on behalf of the Central Council of Hungarian Trade Unions rallying over 4 million organised workers, and on my behalf, best wishes to Mr. Michel Hansenne on his election as Director-General of the International Labour Organisation. May his activities continue to promote the ILO's beneficial influence over the world of labour. I can assure him that he can count on the support of Hungary's trade unions in his endeavours in pursuit of the interests of wage and salary earners.

I consider this a good opportunity for me to participate, for the first time as a Workers' delegate, in the work of this particular session. The issues covered in the Director-General's Report to the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference strongly concern our country, including the Hungarian workers as well.

The first of these issues is the extremely heavy debt burden of some of the world's countries and also whether and how these countries will be able to meet their financial obligations, while simultaneously introducing the unavoidable structural changes in such a way that the resulting social costs may still be acceptable to society.

There are few more important questions than this today. By now, not only the debtor countries feel distressed by the over 11 hundred billion dollar debt which has accumulated in the world. This amount carries with it the possibility of an unforeseeable and incalculable financial crash, which would seriously affect the creditor countries as well as the indebted ones. A sign of recognition of this is the attempt of the national governments concerned, the international financial organisations and other international forums to elaborate ideas for tackling the debt problem.

Hungary, too, has been caught in the debt trap for years now. Our convertible debt is considerable.

We must spend $1.3 to $1.5 billion for the repayment of interests alone, which would represent the export of 5 to 6 per cent of the GDP if we were to make the payment without borrowing additional net credits. However, even through the greatest possible efforts, we are unable to achieve such a surplus in the balance of payments. Therefore, the size of the debt and its burdens continue to grow inevitable. Such is the situation, and under the pressure of our external financial obligations the real remuneration of wage and salary earners has been constantly declining, workers' living conditions have been deteriorating for already a decade now and, after long decades, we are once again threatened with unemployment.

Although it was not the workers who brought about the current situation, which was caused by wrong decisions, mistakes, and deep-rooted structural economic and political reasons, it is they who have to bear the burdens. The exceedingly great size of the debt is due rather to attempts to counteract worsening exchange rates, erroneous development policy, failure to make structural changes, depreciation, and debt financing, than to the protection of living standards and employment. At the same time, for the sake of maintaining our viability, wage and salary earners and pensioners are forced to make sacrifices that gradually strain tolerance within the country and undermine our credibility abroad.

The experiences of our country also confirm the conclusions made by the Director-General's Report: debtor countries are unable to find a solution to the debt problem out of their own resources!

In saying this I do not mean to diminish the responsibility of national governments. Obviously, the main responsibility for the situation lies with the national economic policy which has led to indebtedness and, similarly, decisive steps to solve the problem must also be taken at the national level. Yet, it cannot be denied either that the process of incurring debts was encouraged by the seemingly favourable offers of credit of the international money market and the fact that creditors are interested in investing their excess capital profitably.

The spirit of the report is suggestive of the collective responsibility as well, and urges that the debt problem be tackled at the international level. In addition to this, of course, it also puts forward suggestions falling within the scope of the ILO's activities. These recommendations, I believe, will be very useful for the Hungarian trade unions in their discussions with the government and the employers, as well, as our partners very often endeavour to solve the pressing problems at the expense of social expenditure and, in a broader sense, at the expense of the workers.

In view of all of this, the current session of the International Labour Conference represents a considerable contribution to the endeavour of the Hungarian unions. We do need this help urgently, as our country is going through a historic period and turbulent social changes. And perhaps one of the most important prerequisites for these changes to continue in the right direction, without social unrest, is the maintenance of economic stability.

We have embarked upon building a democratic law-governed State, guided by European standards. A law-governed State where creative work, freedom, justice and solidarity are prevailing values, and one which is built on the principle of self-reliance and free development of the individual. The system of political institutions which is now being formed allows a constitutional multi-party system and a coalition government.

The Hungarian trade unions support endeavours aimed at establishing a democratic law-governed State, as in our view the exercise of human and trade union rights is essential in every country, irrespective of its social system.

The Hungarian trade union movement is not unaffected by all these changes. In conditions of union pluralism, by now a reality, the trade unions grouped together in the Central Council of Hungarian Trade Unions have to compete for the confidence of their members.

These organisations are no longer the same as they used to be. They are autonomous organisations safeguarding the workers' interests, independently of the Hungarian Socialist Workers' Party of all other parties. We have started along a road which can lead to the workers taking possession of their own trade unions once again. The steps we have taken so far, the trade union elections now under way, the preparation of the new by-laws the establishment of a structure in which the autonomous will be grouped together in federations, all serve this purpose. We want to become a trade union movement which is a real organisation safeguarding the workers' interests and one which operates independently from parties guided exclusively by its members' interests; one which carries out its activities in a responsible manner and which behaves reliably to its partners too; one whose elected leaders work with the members' control; which is built from the grass-roots and whose activities, by its members determined, are pursued openly.

All of this also means that we support the development of political pluralism while, like many West European unions, we also aim to preserve trade union unity. In other words, we do not intend to dissolve or dismantle the already existing alternative unions. We consider their presence to be a reality in the social and political system. Our endeavours are aimed at ensuring that the unions grouped together in the SZOT, which are being renewed and have a large membership, provide the support and protection to their members through which they may earn the workers' confidence.

It is only through its own efforts and with the support of the world and especially of Europe, that Hungary will be able to overcome its difficult situation. This support, however, cannot be conceived without the solidarity of the trade unions of other countries. Therefore, the Hungarian trade unions intend to strengthen their ties with the trade unions of the world, primarily with those in Europe, and their international organisations. True to our traditions, the Hungarian unions would like to continue to be active participants in the united and successful intervention of the ILO Workers' group, and in promoting the prestige of our Organisation which has a rich past.

I am confident that this session will also well contribute to a better understanding among nations. In the hope of this, I plead for your understanding, support and help for the endeavours of the Hungarian trade unions.

Original - Spanish: Mr. MARTINEZ BRITO (Government delegate, Cuba) - Mr. President, allow me to congratulate you on your election to the presidency of this session of the Conference. We know that you are going to lead these deliberations in a very able manner.

We are particularly pleased to see that you have been elected to this high post because of the great friendship which exists between our two respective leaders, governments and peoples, and because Zimbabwe is a true example of the fight for freedom and independence in Africa, and is a significant representative of the Non-Aligned Movement.

We have examined the Report of the Director-General of the ILO, entitled Recovery and employment, and it serves as a basis for our discussions in this 76th Session of the annual Conference of the International Labour Organisation.

We consider realistic and objective some of the statements in the Report; for example, the evaluation of the enormous potential of resources resulting from disarmament which could be used for development and the reference to the failure of the policies in force up until now, by considering case by case the financial problems of the developing countries.

Nevertheless, the Report in itself is contradictory and it contains nothing more than good intentions and the superficial sugarcoating of a bitter pill, in an attempt to find in the "magic of the market" the universal panacea for the solution of the unknown aspects of economic development.

It is not necessary to go on at length about the situation of poverty, unemployment, indebtedness and economic, technological and social backwardness which afflict Third World countries, and especially Africa and Latin America. A lot has already been said, and many plans have already been presented, supposedly in an attempt to find solutions, but the sad reality is that the results did not concord with the supposed goals. The euphoria which was awakened by the economic growth of some countries is merely an illusion of world recovery.

However, the situation of developing countries as exporters of capital to wealthy countries is both continuing and worsening and it does not appear probable that they will accept indefinitely that the economic recovery of some countries be based on the growing crisis in their own. It is obvious that, without the solution the problems of the Third World, there can be no sustained nor stable development of the world economy. There are numerous examples of this in Latin America and one could say that they apply to almost all of the countries in the region, in which eight consecutive years of economic crisis associated with foreign debt and adjustment policies have resulted in nothing other than greater economic and social recession and even violent social outbursts.

For a number of years now Cuba has developed a widespread movement for the purpose of raising awareness, in the progressive sectors of Latin America, about the serious consequences of debt on the future of our peoples, and Cuba has drawn attention to the need that there is for unity of action in the debtor countries in order to change the distressing present situation. We are pleased to see that the Director-General in his Report makes reference to the failure of the policies applied by considering case by case the financial problems of the developing countries.

Cuba has also stated that the resources for the development of the Third World have to come first and foremost from the huge transfers of capital which are being made to the developed capitalist world through the service of foreign debt and the brutal deterioration of terms of trade which they have imposed upon us.

Not only must the debt disappear, but also its pillars and its fundamental causes which consist of the unequal trade, protectionism, dumping and financial and monetary manipulations of which we are constant victims.

In the same way as it has been possible to find solutions for the strengthening of the struggle for world peace and for an end to military confrontation, it is now time to discover ways and means to put an end to this other confrontation, as a result of which hundreds of millions of people are living in misery and backwardness. It is absolutely imperative that the right to development becomes a reality for all peoples.

From our point of view, neither the suggestions contained in the Report nor any others, such as the Brady Plan, which is also known as the plan of the unknowns and insufficiencies, are useful in dealing with the true essence of the debt problem, and thus the Cuban analysis of the impossibility of repaying the debt, the need to cancel it and to establish a new international economic order, remains fully valid.

Other important subjects are the object of attention of this session of the International Labour Conference, and the Government delegation of Cuba is participating with great interest and constructive spirit in its analysis and discussion.

Referring to the programme and budget for the next two years, my delegation thinks that this has been elaborated on the basis of elements which are more appropriate than in previous years, but we must point out that it is still possible to make greater savings, that the activities and meetings could be more productive and less expensive and that finally we should go on improving our programmes and budgets in order to make them more effective and more appropriate to the needs of the member countries.

Different resolutions concerning aspects of special interest for our countries were presented for the consideration of this session of the Conference. Cuba values many of them very highly. However, in view of the formalities established with respect to priorities, and considering the political importance of the problems, my country would like to support first and foremost the resolution related to the protection of the rights and freedom of Arab workers and employers in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories and the resolution which refers to development, foreign debt and the social objectives of the ILO.

The Committee on Apartheid meets this year at a crucial time when this shameful regime is approaching its end, and this moment also coincides with the process which is bringing us closer to the independence of Namibia, and we see that the South African racists have had to accept their defeat thanks to the heroic struggle of the freedom-fighters of SWAPO and the complete defeat which they suffered in the south of Angola, confronted with the Angolan army and the internationalist Cuban fighters.

The efforts and the blood which has been spilt must lead to a process of democratic election, a free process and one with all the guarantees which are necessary to ensure the true independence of Namibia. My country considers that the ILO has to make its opinion known in this respect in the conclusions of the Committee on Apartheid and that if possible a delegation from our Organisation should be able to participate as an observer in these elections.

Cuba, down there in the Caribbean, is consolidating its economic and social development. Our people is showing achievements in the fields of education, health, the economy and culture which are the results of 30 years of revolutionary efforts. We are confronting our errors, resolving then and going forward. We are trying to find all the possible potential of socialism, and we are convinced that socialism is the only way.

We are building our new society under difficult conditions, located as we are only 90 miles from the brutal empire, the empire which is still manipulating Latin America as if it were its own backyard and which is trying to transgress on the national sovereignties of many of our countries with aggressions that are sometimes disguised and sometimes overt, but always filthy, like, for example, the cases of Nicaragua and Panama.

The Cuban people has opted once and for all for socialism, for Marxism, Leninism, and in order to preserve our freedom and our socialism we are all of us, millions of Cubans, prepared to do anything; the Yankee imperialists should be aware that "socialism or death" is not only emblazoned on our coat of arms, but in our hearts, as well.

Mr. SUNMONU (representative of the Organisation of African Trade Union Unity) – Mr. President, please allow me to join those who spoke before me to congratulate you on your well-deserved election. Permit me also to again congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne, the newly elected Director-General of the ILO, and to wish him, on behalf of African workers, a successful tenure of office.

The work of the ILO in the vital areas of international labour standards has been of tremendous assistance to trade unions and employers' organisations throughout the world, especially in African and other Third World countries. The recent Organisation of African Trade Union Unity/ILO Seminar on International Labour Standards held in Accra from 20 to 22 April 1989 for top trade union leaders from over 20 countries in Africa is one of the good examples of ILO's work in this field.

Many more such seminars should be organised by the ILO to improve the knowledge of workers and trade union leaders. It is in the field of workers' education that the impact of the ILO is most felt by African workers and trade unions.

We are therefore very happy with the joint educational activities carried out during the year under review between the OATUU and the Workers' Education Branch of the ILO.

The OATUU/ILO Jobs and Skills Programme for Africa (JASPA) Seminar on the "Role of African workers on employment creation" held in Harare, Zimbabwe, in November 1988, has been so useful and successful that we would like similar seminars to be carried out in each of the five subregional zones of Africa within the next two years. It would, however, be necessary, as a result of the experience gained at the Harare seminar, to have concrete proposals for small and medium-scale enterprises in which trade union funds can be invested at future seminars.

The assistance of the ILO Women and Equality Sections and Workers' Education Department in organising with us in Accra, Ghana, in September 1988, a seminar for African working women for English-speaking African countries on development has been of great assistance to our working women. We are happy that a similar seminar for working women from French-speaking African countries will be held in Dakar in September this year.

An elaborate programme for trade union co-operatives has been worked upon for African trade unions by the Co-operative Branch of the ILO in collaboration with the Organisation of African Trade Union Unity. It is our hope that necessary funds will be secured for the effective take-off of this important project.

Our appreciation, therefore, goes to the Director-General, the Assistant Director-General for Africa and their able officers who have contributed to the success of the above-named programme. To these programmes should be added the intensive educational programme for the treasurers and finance officers of African trade unions from English and French-speaking African countries, held in Geneva in January 1988 and January 1989, respectively.

The Director-General's Report entitled Recovery and employment is an excellent one. Most of the observations made in the Report confirmed what the Organisation of African Trade Union Unity has been saying over the past three years; that the structural adjustment programmes forced on Third World debtor countries, including almost all the African countries, by the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank have worsened the economic, political and social conditions of African countries and peoples. They have not only made the debtor countries the exporters of capital to the developed creditor countries, but they have also destroyed the infant industries and social infrastructures like schools, hospitals, roads, housing, etc., of the debtor countries. The structural adjustment programmes have been selfishly fashioned to swell the vaults of the transnational banks at the expense of the lives of hundreds of millions of peoples of the Third World debtor countries. Recent UNESCO publications on the effect of structural adjustment on education also confirm the failure of these programmes.

The most condemnatory remarks on the failure of structural adjustment programmes in Africa came from the report of a Staff Study Mission to Great Britain, Ghana, Senegal, Côte d'Ivoire and France from 29 November to 20 December 1988, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, United States House of Representatives, entitled "Structural Adjustment in Africa: Insights from the Experiences of Ghana and Senegal".

In its summary conclusions, the report stated, inter alia, "In rural Ghana, adjustment has benefited the minority of cocoa farmers, but these gains have mainly gone to a relatively small and privileged group. Real per capita income of the overwhelming majority of food farmers has stagnated, with especially unfavourable consequences for women and children. Certain adjustment policies, such as dramatic devaluation and tight credit, have had a negative impact on the poor. Mainly, structural adjustment has ignored the key constraints to equitable development in the rural food economy”.

On Senegal, the report said, among other things, “In rural Senegal, adjustment policies helped alleviate poverty in the short run, but a downward trend is developing due to falling world groundnut prices and urban protests. ‘Privatisation’ has not fulfilled its promise due to precipitate and ill-phased implementation. Among urban Senegalese, poverty has clearly been aggravated by such adjustment policies as wage restraint and import liberalisation. The application of certain policies has been harsh and poorly planned”.

The United Nations Economic Commission for Africa published in April 1989 “African Alternative to Structural Adjustment Programmes: A Framework for Transformation and Recovery in Africa”, and it has ably diagnosed and suggested solutions that differ in content but are more relevant in application to the needs and interests of Africa and her peoples.

Please permit me to reiterate from this rostrum, the position of African workers that the International Monetary Fund/World Bank imposed structural adjustment programmes are incompatible with the development, social progress and peace of African countries and peoples. The solution to the current economic crises of the Third World debtor countries, including African countries, lies in: the total cancellation of the debts; a people-oriented development strategy that will lead to the progressive satisfaction of their basic needs; the development of agriculture through protection, assistance and pricing policy to ensure food self-sufficiency; equitable terms of trade; and, finally, economic integration of Africa. We reject any economic policy that leads to the economic enslavement of our continent and the impoverishment of our peoples.

This year marks the 100th anniversary of May Day and the 70th anniversary of the ILO. While we congratulate ourselves and our fellow workers throughout the world, we call for mutual understanding, co-operation and a joint struggle for a more humane, just, egalitarian and peaceful world. The common denominator of unemployment, social injustice, threat to environment and peace, make the unity of the trade union movement of the world an urgent necessity. The cold war within the trade union movement is over.

We congratulate the ILO on its 70 years of dedicated service to mankind. The constituents of the ILO should continue to work for the ideals upon which this Organisation was founded.

I cannot conclude this address without condemning the apartheid regime of South Africa for its crime against humanity. In spite of the regime’s recent declarations of its desire to abolish apartheid, its refusal to release Nelson Mandela and other detained political and trade union leaders, the maintenance of apartheid laws, the repressive trade union amendment act passed last year, its abhorrence of democracy and majority rule, its economic and political suppression of the majority black population, make it imperative for the international community to isolate the apartheid South African regime economically, politically and socially through the only peaceful means available – that is, economic sanctions.

On behalf of all African workers, I call on the Governments of Great Britain, France, the Federal Republic of Germany, Japan, Taiwan, South Korea and Switzerland to legislate economic sanctions against the racist South African Government.

The General Council of the Organisation of African Trade Union Unity, at its 11th and 12th General Council meetings in Tripoli and Accra in April 1988 and May 1989 respectively, asked all its affiliates, subregional organisation and specialised agencies to suspend all dealings with the Hanns Seidel Foundation of the Federal Republic of Germany because of its support for apartheid, especially in Namibia. We therefore also call upon the ILO and all its regional offices to stop all dealings with the Hanns Seidel Foundation. We welcome the process to Namibian independence. However, we call for vigilance to ensure the strict implementation of the United Nations programme to ensure the independence of Namibia by 1 April 1990. Our solidarity and support also go to the oppressed Palestinian people in the occupied Arab territories. We call for an end to the daily slaughter, maiming, jailing and oppression of the defenceless Palestinian people in the occupied West Bank and Gaza Strip by the Israeli authorities. Justice demands the recognition of the rights of Palestinians to their homeland. Without justice there can be no peace.

Original – French: Mr. MULLOR GARCIA (Apostolic Nuncio, Permanent Observer of the Holy See in Geneva) – Mr. President, first of all I should like to express the most sincere congratulations from the delegation of the Holy See on your election to the presidency of this Conference. You bring with you a measure of the African wisdom which is dear to all of those who, like myself, have had the privilege of spending a long time on your continent.

“We live in a time of paradox.”

This incisive phrase commences the last report submitted by Mr. Francis Blanchard to the International Labour Conference after almost 40 years of service to the Organisation, the last 15 marked by exceptional devotion and intelligent service as Director-General.

This affirmation sums up today’s complex world of labour and production, of economy and finance, in an increasingly interdependent environment, and of social extremes which range from shocking personal or national wealth to the even more shocking condition of 950 million human beings who live in poverty.

The delegation of the Holy See congratulates the outgoing Director-General on his Report, which, at the same time, is a message. In greeting his successor, Mr. Michel Hansenne, whose sense of human and social responsibility is equally well known, my delegation expresses the hope that he will continue to guide the ILO in its efforts to find a response to the broad questions raised by this lucid and concrete analysis.

This Report is optimistic in intent. Far from dwelling on the darker sides of the current social situation, it suggests a series of possible solutions to the major problems of the North – the consequences of persistent unemployment – and of the South – the harmful consequences of debt which affect a number of countries in the Third World, and which are so often described from this rostrum.

To choose optimism instead of pessimism creates a favourable climate for continuing to make the ILO an instrument for concertation and social creativity. To be aware of the need to check the current trend of limited economic recovery in the North and growing impoverishment in the South shows clear-sightedness and daring, inspired by compelling moral, technical and political reasons.

We are indeed morally bound to reverse the current situation. Like individual selfishness, class and regional or national selfishness also have a limit. Nations, no more than individuals, can consider themselves rich and developed, if they are surrounded by others living in misery. Indeed, poverty eventually erodes the solidity of development based on the detriment of those who belong to a society which claims to be autonomous, rich, prosperous, solid and open to the future. This is a fact which is confirmed by history. All empires, old or modern (yes, the modern ones, as well), which are based on an unequal prosperity of their citizens – are ultimately destroyed from the inside.

We could say that the gangrene of selfishness weakens social structures by denying the worth of any member. Sooner or later, the oppressed will revolt, evidencing the moral requirement to recognise the personal value of each individual before taking stock of the contributions they may make through their work or social activity.

This is an ethical lesson which cannot be ignored in our day, as the world grows richer and more interdependent. The stock market crash of October 1987 has proved this in an outstanding fashion. Whereas the rich countries easily coped with its harmful effects, the developing countries have sunk deeper into poverty. Today, more than ever before, it is clear that at least part of the wealth of certain countries is accumulated to the detriment of other human communities, often more numerous and always more disadvantaged.

It is revealing, for example, that the growth of the GDP of sub-Saharan African countries, where I myself have lived, has fallen from 4.6 per cent in the 1960s to less than -0.5 per cent in the 1980s. Common sense, let alone morality, requires that the serious consequences of this situation, which can be traced largely to the massive indebtedness of the least developed countries, be shouldered by all.

The responsibility for this truly novel situation has to be shared by those who lent large capital sums without enough forethought, and those who accepted the same to meet short-term needs, in spite of their technical inability to envisage all of the consequences of their indebtedness.

My delegation would like to express the most sincere wish that dialogue and concertation will serve to bring about a solution to this vital problem, without any country being humiliated. We cannot wait until the idea arises of a revolt of the debtor countries which would result in world-wide economic and financial paralysis.

In this area, morality can be backed up by technical measures inspired by a confident and wise social spirit. This leads my delegation to support the Report of the outgoing Director-General when he suggests a series of measures to promote recovery and adjustment so as to enter the final decade of this century with the prospect of recovery and prosperity for all.

Technical measures and morality meet, for example, in the suggestion of job creation, especially in the tertiary sector; the allocation of foreign loans to truly productive activities; the "conversion" of debts negotiated at the market rate and their reduction if necessary; the mobilisation of domestic savings in various countries, especially the developing countries; a wiser selectivity and a more careful setting of priorities for state expenditure; the adoption of macro- and micro-economic measures to encourage investments to improve productivity and income for the poor; in some countries, the setting up of machinery to curb domestic over-consumption and, in other countries, to encourage a desirable increase of consumption of the poorest groups; the encouragement of workers' savings, particularly in the form of shareholding; investment in traditional agriculture; and finally, the continuing promotion of tripartism, which does credit to the ILO, in all spheres of government action likely to affect the standard of living, such as social security, health care or education.

To reverse certain current economic and financial trends is also an act of political lucidity. The idea of universal brotherhood, shared by all of the major religions, which adds its basic force to that of human rights and rights of peoples, requires that every nation recognise the other human communities as equals in dignity and political worth. This equality cannot be ignored at the time when we are laying the foundations for turning international trade into a meeting of human beings and not an attempt to despoil the weakest, and transforming the planetary economy into a world-wide instrument of peace and the international organisations, of which the ILO is the oldest, into forms for dialogue and the pursuit of the common weal.

It was with this in mind that Pope John Paul II wrote his Encyclical Sollicitudo rei socialis. I should conclude by sharing with you this thought of the Pope, which, I feel, is also a tribute to the work done for multilateral diplomacy and an encouragement to all of those who contributed to it. I quote: "The existing Institutions and Organisations have worked well for the benefit of peoples. Nevertheless, humanity today is in a new and more difficult phase of its genuine development. It needs a greater degree of international ordering, at the service of the societies, economies and culture of the whole world." This doctrine was confirmed by John Paul II a few days ago on his arrival in Copenhagen where he advocated the coming of a new world. "Humanity," he said, "is between a future of hope and promise and a future of violence and poverty: it is up to each of us to contribute to the coming of this new world."

Original – French: Mr. NDOYE (Minister for the Public Service and Labour, Senegal) – I am very pleased Mr. President, to join those who have already spoken here in congratulating you on your brilliant election to the presidency of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference.

I should also like to congratulate the other Officers whose contribution I trust will be considerable in the accomplishment of your high functions.

On behalf of the Government of Senegal and on behalf of my delegation, as well as on my own behalf, I should like to take this opportunity to address my congratulations to Mr. Michel Hansenne for his election to the post of Director-General of the International Labour Office and to present him with my best wishes for success in his new functions.

I should also like to pay a highly deserved tribute to Mr. Francis Blanchard, the retiring Director-General, for the competence and devotion with which he has served the cause of our Organisation in the last 15 years.

On the occasion of the 70th anniversary of our Organisation, and at a time when the social situation in the world gives rise to the greatest concern, the Report of the Director-General takes on special significance in that it addresses a problem confronting our States with the utmost urgency, that of recovery and employment.

It is now over 40 years since the right to work was proclaimed by the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and nevertheless, despite real efforts that have been made, the objective still seems very far away. It is a problem of our society as a whole.

The question is to know whether there is hope. This is the least that we can expect of these assemblies, which in the past have provided so many opportunities to make high quality contributions on this subject and on many others requiring solidarity in the common search for solutions. It is the least one can expect of an Organisation which says it is concerned with equality and social justice because, while the egalitarian ideal of satisfactory work for all might not be achievable, a just society nevertheless must aspire to no less than this.

If we have proclaimed that all men are born equal and are equal before the law, is it not about time that this should become a reality?

We are here in order to show that we believe this as well as we believe that development is a fundamental mission for all men and all peoples who are responsible and concerned about the destiny of their planet.

The time has perhaps come now to reflect on economic recovery and employment, at a time where we are living through many changes.

The Director-General, in his Report, reminds us very rightly that "the resumption of growth is trumpeted everywhere... and yet, what is the evidence before us? In spite of the encouraging rate of growth of the world economy, much of the Third World is sinking deeper into poverty... There is little reason to believe that this haemorrhage will end so long as the debt problem persists... Unemployment rates in many industrialised countries have been at their highest levels... and a majority of developing countries have experienced rising unemployment and underemployment as well as increased poverty."

If the question of structural adjustment and the debt has become a prime subject of international debate, it is because in our countries the threshold of poverty has reached the limit of what is bearable. Debt is one of the consequences of the impoverishment of countries which have had no opportunity to recover.

Thus, despite the subsidies, considered to be substantial, by the rich countries, economic and monetary flows between the countries of the North and the South remain to the advantage of the North. This is a paradox which can be explained by what President François Mitterrand termed "neocolonialism in trade" and which must be ended.

This is a sine qua non condition of any development strategies that our States adopt in order to promote the necessary structural adjustments, growth and greater social justice.

It is about time that the rich countries become aware of the need to improve the conditions in the terms of trade, an improvement which is, in fact, in the mutual interests and to the reciprocal advantage of all partners.

A just solution at the world scale is an absolute necessity because the problems posed by the debt and the terms of trade cannot be solved on a national basis, whatever the political will of a State or of a group of States.

If our countries are unable to free themselves from this vicious circle of debt in order to ensure equitable growth, it is because the indispensable resources needed for such a process are drained by the servicing of their debt. After several years of negotiations on a case by case basis, the problem of foreign debt which burdens the poor countries continues to elicit great concern. This is the reason why we have to search for a solution through a global approach, a better co-ordination of economic policies through more open markets, higher prices for commodities and a strategy at the world level to overcome the problem of external debt, in order to stimulate recovery.

In this respect recent measures taken by certain rich countries to cancel public debts held by the poorest countries in an effort to stimulate recovery need to be commended as acts of solidarity.

These measures prove that North-South dialogue is not yet dead. The countries of the South are thus still partners of those of the North in the construction of the world economy on the eve of the twenty-first century.

It is therefore clear that if we want to avoid overly simplistic adjustment models which have so far overlooked the micro-economic dimension, and therefore the specific social cost for each country, we must recognise that, on the one hand, the greater the initial debt burden, the more difficult it will be to achieve recovery. On the other hand, the lower the export perspectives, the more difficult it will be to bring about an adjustment by relaunching growth on an autonomous and durable basis.

Similarly, a long-term perspective is necessary for identifying the elements of an optimistic scenario, because we firmly believe in the possibility of an economic recovery which will allow the African countries to participate in the common effort of economic, social and cultural development for mankind at threshold of the third millennium.

Thus confidence is based on an act of faith which drives and moves the most precious and most vital characteristics of man, namely the force of the spirit and the interdependence of nations.

Our governments have in fact the will to pursue the process of unavoidable reform but nevertheless, we are launching an appeal for a negotiated refocusing of structural adjustment which will necessarily involve a reactivation of local markets and the organisation of viable economic spaces making full use of the production factors and resources available.

This approach has become indispensable in a world where the international environment is in constant change and where we hope the qualities and comparative advantages of the African economy will be able to involve steadily and surely. But in order to do this it is essential that the objectives and methods be frequently reviewed and adopted to the imperatives of change.

At present, the future of the African economy is based on the hope of an immediate and sustained upturn in agricultural production, which will have a multiplier effect on the other sectors of the economy. However, the employment question demands that we be prudent in our approach to an agricultural development strategy based on modernisation and industrialisation.

While such growth may be favourable to development of services, the informal sector and small enterprises, its effect on job creation may be limited because until now major industrial investments have only had a relative effect on jobs.

In fact, as the Report of the Director-General confirms, in the trilogy comprising growth, employment, and satisfaction of basic needs, jobs are an essential element. The jobs for which our young people are waiting so anxiously.

Our young people, we are told, are the future of the country, the hope of a nation. I am tempted to say that the young are rather more the present of the country because it is through the force of youth that we are measuring the greatness of a nation, because a nation owes its continued existence to youth.

We may say that a nation without well-trained, well-educated, responsible and free young people is a nation without a soul. In the same way, young people without employment and without hope are tempted to lose their human dignity and, at the same time, they will doubt the virtues of society.

Unfortunately, a large number of men and women today have had to join the growing army of unemployed, who – victims of workforce reductions, closures of companies often caused by the alarming indebtedness of national or multinational companies, or victims of industrial relocation – are at the end of their hope and looking at the future in a very dispirited fashion since they are condemned to inactivity and, despite themselves, are dependent on social assistance and social security.

The social security system has also had to undergo the negative effects of the economic crisis. Its resources have fallen and payments have grown considerably, leading to a serious financial imbalance. Moreover, the economic crisis has also led to the development of the informal sector, whose unorganised nature has had disastrous effects on the social security system as well.

Therefore, we need to think about the threat facing a system which is based on solidarity. In a word, structural adjustment should, in taking account of the social dimension, be better able to understand the effects of the economic crisis on social security systems.

Social security, given its influence on the economy by the sheer size of the payment it makes, could contribute to development if it was appropriately planned.

The essential thing is to go beyond emergency assistance and to mobilise surplus labour, which is all the more precious because capital is rare. Sound solutions are suggested by our Director-General, especially in the field of public works programmes as well as the innovatory savings systems on the part of the workers in order to contribute to the efforts to mobilise resources.

From this point of view, the industrialised countries have a responsibility not only towards themselves but also towards the developing countries because they have need of their solidarity; they need to work together with common responsibility and in a spirit of solidarity in order to solve the serious problem of the debt crisis in order to revitalise global growth and development.

But how can we speak of solidarity without thinking of our brothers and sisters in South Africa who are victims of apartheid, the racist institution which is the most odious and the barbarous that humanity has ever known? In fact, the timid reforms which were undertaken by the Pretoria Government have come to a standstill. The chances to arrive at a negotiated settlement seem to have vanished completely. Repression and oppression, suffering and the impoverishment of Black populations is increasing. The only encouraging facts in this sombre year, as this is underlined by the Director-General in his Special Report, are the hopes for a negotiated settlement in Namibia, involving the withdrawal of foreign troops from Angola and the application of resolution 435 of the Security Council of the United Nations on the independence of Namibia. In the Middle East, too, the situation is equally critical for the Palestinian people who are the victims of injustice and violence in the territories occupied by Israel. Senegal is supporting favourably the possibility of an international conference on peace in the Middle East in order to find a just, global and durable solution which respects the dignity of all peoples involved.

We are awaiting with hope that the spirit of confrontation which has marked these situations for too long is replaced by a search for common ground, which will put a rapid end to the drama, the victims of which are the Palestinian and South African peoples.

In this regard, we should consider some words from Hegel: Because men and women, unlike animals, do not limit their aspirations to mere survival, but to that of recognising each other as individuals, their own conception of life rises above life itself. This leads to a struggle for recognition.

I will conclude by insisting on the interdependence of human rights and to say that there can be no freedom or political stability in the world without economic security and without development and without social well-being.

From this viewpoint, we are launching an appeal for solidarity between States and between peoples so that in our Organisation we can create a "world social space" thanks to the virtues of dialogue and negotiation shown by tripartism.

It is because we believe in human solidarity in the service of international co-operation and development that we want to reaffirm here our will to do everything we can to further the concepts on which our Organisation is based, against the countercurrents, for the future of all the peoples of the world.

Original – German: Mr. VERZETNITSCH (Workers' delegate, Austria) – The 76th Session of the International Labour Conference is taking place almost 70 years after its first session, in October 1919, in Washington. I should therefore like to wish the Bureau of this year's Conference every success in their work on this occasion. I am convinced that under your guidance, Mr. President, and under that of the Vice-Presidents, our joint efforts will bear positive fruit.

I would also extend my congratulations to the new Director-General of the International Labour Office, Mr. Michel Hansenne, and naturally also to the new Deputy Director-General, Mr. Heribert Maier. Heribert Maier comes from the Austria trade union movement and I am particularly pleased to see him being elected to his important office. It is a great distinction for him and a recognition of his years of successful work in the International Labour Organisation. His appointment is also a great honour for our country. I wish the new Directors-General of the International Labour Office the best of success in their difficult and highly responsible jobs.

At the beginning of my statement, I would like to emphasise that the trade unions have always attached great importance to the International Labour Organisation. The idea of adopting international instruments to improve working conditions might have seemed, seventy years ago, to be either too optimistic or even utopian. Meanwhile, however, 168 Conventions have been incorporated into the legislation of more than 150 member States and proved the use and necessity of such an approach.

Today it can indeed be said that the International Labour Organisation has proved its worth in a magnificent fashion. Not only has it constantly striven for improvements in working conditions throughout the world, but it has championed human rights and always pointed out that economic progress has to go hand in hand with social welfare.

At the beginning of this decade, criticism was being voiced about other international organisations and about the United Nations as a whole. We are fully aware, of course, that it is unjust to make such generalisations; for instance, multilateral co-operation in the field of labour is just as important today as, let us say, the protection of the environment. The previous speaker from Senegal made this very clear. He gave a number of examples to show exactly how important this international co-operation is. The series of successes achieved under the auspices of the United Nations recently has demonstrated yet again the necessity for a global approach to attain peace.

The Director-General chose a very topical theme for his report this year: Recovery and employment. In my country, as well, we are experiencing a marked economic recovery. In 1988, the economy grew at over 4 per cent. Equally strong growth rates have also been predicted for this year and next year. What is of particular importance to us as workers' representatives is that this economic recovery has a positive impact upon employment.

In Austria we succeeded, in an extremely difficult economic period between 1983 and 1989, in creating 90,000 extra jobs. Last year, we achieved our highest record in total employment terms since the Second World War, with 2.8 million salaried workers. These recent positive trends have contributed to the fact that unemployment, after a rather rapid growth in the eighties, has, for the first time, started receding.

Economists also predict that unemployment rates will be under 5 per cent in 1989 and 1990. In May of this year in Austria, they dropped to 4.3 per cent. This development demonstrates that also a small country can be successful in its employment policy if there is strong political will and the objective of full employment is taken seriously.

Nevertheless, there is still an annual average of 150,000 unemployed in Austria and this must serve as a warning that we cannot – even in Austria with its sound economic situation – turn our sights away from labour market policy problems. All those who bear political responsibility must concentrate their efforts on the so-called problem groups in the labour market – women, the handicapped and the long-term unemployed. Unemployment, and ways to overcome it, is still the most important aspect of domestic policy – and must remain so.

The problem of mass unemployment throughout the world and in Europe has still not been solved. In Europe, at the moment, 20 million people have no jobs, i.e. 11 per cent of the whole of the working population. If you were to take together all of the unemployed and put them into one nation, they would constitute the fifth largest nation in Western Europe; and I think that this figure, demonstrates very clearly that we cannot give up the struggle.

The moderate cyclical recovery of the eighties has not changed the high unemployment levels. Only the market economic growth of last year has brought about a reduction in unemployment levels in some countries.

We need new initiatives against this unemployment which is partly structural in nature. Until there is a more uncompromising and vigorous struggle to combat the scourge of unemployment, it will remain too high.

Over the last few years some prestigious reports on global problems have appeared. The report of the Brandt Commission was concerned with the North-South problem; the Brundtland report commented on environmental problems. The recent report of the Kreisky Commission on employment issues in Europe also deserves attention, since its relevance goes beyond the confines of our continent.

Under the chairmanship of the former Austrian Chancellor, internationally renowned scientists and eminent politicians belonging to different parties, as well as employers and trade unionists, analysed the causes of unemployment and discussed proposals with a view to eliminating it.

The objective of the report is to make the politicians and the people of Europe aware, of unemployment problems and to propose solutions. The report says clearly that unemployment can be changed, that it does not simply have to be accepted. It can be eliminated by means of purposeful and firm policies.

Specific proposals for such a policy were made, covering the following six areas: protection of the environment, infrastructure improvement, technological and innovative policies, culture and education, and a policy for the information and communications sector as well as for East-West and North-South co-operation. This programme should also be supplemented by an policy concerning the labour market and working time.

The Kreisky report's relevance outside Europe is shown by two demands made concerning the future of the so-called developing countries and for our relationship with the Third World. First of all, the developing countries need more expert and economic assistance for their development, and not only on a bilateral basis. Secondly, the solution of the foreign debt problem, debt relief and reduction is a prerequisite site for an improvement in North-South trade and in world trade as a whole.

These two main issues are certainly the points of departure for solving the most serious problems of the so-called developing countries, which are different from those of the industrialised countries. Following publication of the Brady Plan, these proposed solutions to the debt problem have finally come into their own. These two concerns of the Kreisky Commission were also clearly brought forward, I believe in the Director-General's Report.

I am firmly convinced that the work of the Kreisky Commission can also enrich the activities of the International Labour Organisation, because it, too, addressed the question of recovery and employment.

For the right to work is one of the fundamental special rights of human beings. Work has to be available to everybody. Everybody has the right to his or her share. To the advocates of a society of leisure I would like to say: "No, you are wrong, because your view of things is too one-sided and not a global one." The identity of human beings – and by that I mean the individual as well – will go on being determined by their work and this will remain so, in view of the fluctuating development of the economy.

As a trade unionist I would also like to take a position, here on international soil, as regards working time policy. Mass unemployment cannot be eradicated without a reduction in working time. We must move towards a reduction in working time and speed up the process.

The trade unions have never looked upon a reduction in working time as a panacea, but, in view of mass unemployment, to forgo using this instrument would be irresponsible.

The workers in my country this year are looking forward to the ILO discussion on night work with great interest. The fact that continuous or regular night work can lead to impaired health and impaired family and social environments is generally well known. The verdict given by the International Labour Office, based upon experience, reports and scientific studies on night work, is something that can be fully confirmed by the Austrian trade union federation.

The fundamental social political objective can only be to restrict night work as much as possible. In areas where night work is, for practical reasons, still necessary, measures must be introduced to prevent impaired health and disruption to the individual's social environment.

In Austria, altogether 9.2 per cent of men and 3.4 per cent of women work at night. Evening work is done by 3.3 per cent of men and 2.9 of women. In absolute figures it is about 165,000 men and 36,000 women that are salaried workers, that work in the hours between 8 or 10 p.m. and 6 a.m.

At the weekend there are about 228,000 men (13.3 per cent) and 134,000 women (12.5 per cent) who work on their main job on a regular basis. The figures are particularly high in the service industries. Here we have 20.6 per cent of men, in other words every fifth man, and 16.1 per cent of women working on Saturdays and Sundays. The discussion that repeatedly flares up on the working week adapted to production capacity, we call it kapovaz, shows how urgent it is to take measures to protect workers that have to work at different times and ensure also that they obtain regular meals.

Equally as important as the question of night work is another important topic – the new regulations on the safe use of chemicals – being discussed here at the Conference. The protection of workers also implies constant updating of regulations to be in step with technical developments.

I hope that the International Labour Organisation will, in this field too, do justice to its high position by setting better standards.

In conclusion, this is the 70th anniversary of the International Labour Organisation so let us associate ourselves on this anniversary with the words of Mr. Francis Blanchard.

I would like to thank him for his many years of activity. He said: "We need not hesitate to celebrate the 70th anniversary of the foundation of the International Labour Organisation with great satisfaction about what has already been achieved, and also with great hope and an abundance of confidence so that this Organisation, over the coming years, can achieve even more."

Even more in improving working conditions, fostering human rights and even more, also, in supporting social well-being that must go hand in hand with economic progress.

At the end of the Vienna CSCE Conference, the outgoing United States Secretary of State, George Shultz, quoted a verse from Robert Frost that may also serve as the motto for our joint work:

The woods are lovely, dark and deep,
But we have promises to keep,
And miles to go before we sleep,
And miles to go before we sleep.

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

Original - Arabic: The PRESIDENT (Mr. GAZARIN) - We shall now continue the discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Mr. ZAKARIA (representative of the World Federation of Trade Unions) - This session of the International Labour Conference takes place in the year of the 70th anniversary of the ILO. The occasion provides us all with the possibility to reflect on the seven decades of the ILO and the efforts to promote international co-operation and collective action to uphold labour standards and social justice.

The Report of the Director-General on recovery and employment has made an earnest effort to analyse the social situation in the decade of the 1980s. This decade was designated as the Third United Nations Development Decade but it is already considered as a "lost decade" as regards social development, especially in the developing countries.

We do find confirmation in the report of what the Workers' side has time and again warned in the previous Conferences on the social costs of the structural adjustment policies imposed in an arbitrary and one-sided manner in many countries and heavily tilted against the working people and the trade unions.

As the report points out, unemployment rates in many industrialised countries have been at their highest levels since the last world war and a majority of developing countries have experienced rising unemployment and underemployment as well as increased poverty. The number of people living in absolute poverty has risen from about 820 million in 1980 to around 950 million in the late 1980s. Wages in most developing countries declined by 20 to 30 per cent in real terms. We must examine these facts in the background of the great potential opened up by the scientific and technological revolution and look for the real reasons why the whole decade was lost in terms of social development. We must deeply discuss why the whole decade, meant for economic and social development, has created, as the report says, "a new layer of poverty" to the "structural poverty" which previous development had failed to eradicate.

Perhaps the current corruption scandals involving high-placed persons rocking some of the world's financial capitals, linking top decision-making with the powerful groups of big business and big finance, should teach us of the unholy collusion which tilted policies in favour of maximising profits at the cost of social development and social justice.

It is now recognised that the excessive reliance on market forces and the feverish drive towards privatisation has only given away greater power to those who consider it normal to throw overboard all international labour standards and massacre all social priorities.

It is tragic that in this 70th year of the International Labour Organisation this Conference has to record, as the Report states, that "The share of income from labour in total income is today smaller than at the beginning of the decade. The decrease in real wages and the fewer well-remunerated jobs created during this recent period have meant in many countries that income from work has declined faster than per capita GDP." And it is anticipated that "growing poverty and an increasingly unequal distribution of income will pose a further challenge for policy-makers in the future".

The Report has correctly stressed that there is "a need to rebuild the human capacity for growth and to correct the social imbalances resulting from the unequal distribution of the cost of adjustment", and that "This should receive priority attention not only to compensate for the past but to give a new meaning to the future."

The World Federation of Trade Unions considers that there are alternative policies for real recovery and for full employment if the outflow of the resources engineered by policies of profiteering and speculation is eliminated. The working people of developing countries who have suffered cuts of 20 to 30 per cent in wages in real terms had to sacrifice their jobs, wages and living standards to finance the colossal costs of debt service which this year has reached a sum of $168 billion.

These are the very issues highlighted by the growing number of strikes and other protest actions by the working people in their efforts to defend jobs, wages and working conditions. The question of trade union rights is boldly raised in these protest actions demanding the urgent attention of the ILO as well, since there are many cases of repressive actions by governments against the legitimate struggles of the working people.

That is why the defence and further expansion of trade union rights should be seen as a constituent part of the measures to promote social development, giving the working people the right to participate in economic development.

The trade unions have always stated from this rostrum that there is no real shortage of resources for economic and social development and for a stable recovery from the present crisis.

The INF Treaty stipulates the elimination of a whole class of nuclear armaments and negotiations are going on for further reductions. The Soviet Union and other members of the Warsaw Treaty have already taken unilateral measures to cut arms expenditures by 10 to 15 per cent. Important proposals are before the Vienna talks from all sides for serious troop reductions in Europe. It is therefore time to seriously implement policies of "disarmament for development", and here the ILO has the task to provide the expertise for the conversion of industries and jobs from arms production to civilian production. And it can be seen that if the developing countries did not have to make net exports of capital – and this was some $43 billion last year – these sums could have been invested for real development creating millions of jobs.

We think that the ILO can make an important contribution to the educational and training aspects of disarmament, conversion and development, in order to create the expertise to deal with these complex problems.

We also believe that the ILO could do much more to promote international labour standards on the introduction of new technologies and to promote the idea of using these new possibilities to enhance the skills and productivity of working people rather than displace them wholesale. By whatever term it is called, either as "restructuring" or "structural adjustment", positive results can come only by involving the working people and trade unions. Perhaps the Governing Body could take steps to adopt a tripartite declaration on structural adjustment and social policy, summing up the experiences in various countries and social systems and proposing steps for action by member States.

Greater attention must be paid to the problems of the working people in rural areas where unemployment and underemployment continue to cause havoc. There should be a better exchange of successful experiences in dealing with rural employment, especially through land reforms and schemes of rural development.

Questions of protecting the environment have come to the fore in the recent period, and greater international action must be promoted in this field. It is recognised that more investment in the protection of the environment could also help create more jobs and the ILO could develop training projects to help with these tasks.

We feel that the Report has not paid sufficient attention to the roots of the present crisis of jobs, continuing underdevelopment and increasing poverty, and especially the impact of the policies of the transnational business and finance groups. As the Report to the 73rd Session has pointed out, wages are no longer the dominant element in the comparison of costs, and exchange rates have become a crucial element, as have interest rates. Trade and capital flows have parted company. Monetary transactions now far exceed trade flows. There is a need to study deeply these mechanisms and their influence on policy-making relating to jobs and living standards.

There is therefore a need to update the Tripartite Declaration on Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy, taking into account new developments. The monitoring of the implementation of the principles of this Declaration also demands much more attention.

Trade unions should be better involved in this monitoring.

The World Federation of Trade Unions strongly supports the peoples and nations struggling for their inalienable right to self-determination. The ILO is to decide this year about its principled stand on the continuing ruthless repression in Palestine and the occupied Arab territories. It is evident that there should be a stronger response by the ILO to the barbaric acts of aggression and blatant violation of trade union rights and human rights. We fully support the draft resolution tabled before this Conference in this respect.

The situation in South Africa continues to be extremely serious and the question of mandatory sanctions needs to be given urgent consideration in order to end the inhuman system of apartheid. The Pretoria regime must be prevented from its attempts to block the processes leading to the national independence of Namibia. The ILO is called upon to provide the needed assistance to the workers and trade unions in Namibia in the new situation.

Finally, may I recall that next year will mark the 100th anniversary of May Day. For us, the workers, and in fact it should be for the whole of humanity, the 1st of May represents a landmark in the drive for world peace based on justice. Let us celebrate this important occasion by insisting that all the gigantic achievements in science and technology be turned in a decisive manner to serve man, his dignity and prosperity, in a world of peace and security.

Mr. AHMED (Workers' delegate, Pakistan) – It is a great privilege to associate myself with the other distinguished speakers in offering sincere felicitations to the President as well as the Vice-Presidents, including you, Mr. Vice-President, representing the Employers, and Brother Delpino, my old friend, representing the Workers' group, on their well-deserved election.

I also take this opportunity to convey fraternal greetings on behalf of the Workers' delegation of Pakistan and myself to all the participants and in particular, the Workers' group of this Conference.

I feel it my great privilege to convey, on behalf of the working class of Pakistan and for myself, our deep appreciation of the great services rendered by Mr. Francis Blanchard, the outgoing Director-General, and to welcome Mr. Michel Hansenne, the new Director-General of the ILO, and assure him of our full support for the promotion of the objectives of the ILO in this important period of its history.

We also welcome the appointment of Mr. Heribert Maier, our old trade unionist colleague, as Deputy Director-General of the ILO.

We appreciate the work of the members of the Governing Body of the ILO, headed by Mr. Mensah, in particular the part played by the Workers' group under the leadership of Mr. Muhr, ably assisted by Mr. de Vries Reilingh, the then Secretary of the group, and his good successor, Mr. Laurijssen. The report of the Governing Body has been outlined in Provisional Record No. 3.

The Director-General of the ILO has chosen an important subject for his Report, namely, "Recovery and employment" on the eve of the 70th anniversary of the establishment of the ILO, which proclaims that labour is not a commodity, that the war against want requires to be carried on with unrelenting vigour within each nation by concerted efforts of the representatives of workers, employers and governments through a democratic process, and proclaiming that poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere, that lasting peace can be established only if it is based upon social justice recognising the need for removal of conditions of labour involving injustices and hardship to the workers and for acknowledging the dignity of their work and for the provision of economic and social security.

This session is being held on the eve of 100 years of 1 May celebrations and the demands of the workers that were outlined and echoed in the International Labour Congress of 1889 in Paris for elimination of their sufferings and achieving a better life are still valid today.

I submit that employment is a basic right of the workers which not only enables them to contribute to the welfare of society and to that of mankind as a whole, but also provides their main source of economic and social security.

The great intellectual, Voltaire, stated many decades ago that work keeps at bay three great evils: boredom, vice, and need. The Holy Prophet Muhammed (peace be upon him) declared that work is like prayer, and a blessing for mankind. On the other hand, unemployment, when a working man and woman willing to work is unable to find work, is perhaps the saddest sight portraying inequality that exists under the sun.

In the present world, there are an estimated 950 million people in the late 1980s, a rise from 820 million in the early eighties, living in absolute poverty, according to the Director-General's Report, the majority of them are living in developing countries – in Asia, Africa and Latin America. They are mostly people who have no adequate access to freely chosen and productive employment, which results in hunger, disease, ignorance and malnutrition.

According to the Director-General's Report, the proportion below the poverty line is increasing, for example, from 33 per cent in 1980 to about 39 per cent in 1985 on one continent of the Third World alone. The Report also highlights that there has been a reduction of labour incomes, particularly of wages of the workers in most of the developing countries from 20 to 30 per cent in real terms. According to him, the developing countries will have to find new jobs, 36 million a year only for the young entrants in the labour market.

On the other hand, the Report points out that "the main factors in the economic crisis of the 1980s were universal in nature: the slow-down of the world economy as a whole, the deteriorating terms of trade of the developing countries, the general rise in interest rates, the introduction of new trade barriers and the decline in capital availability".

In such a situation, the working class believes that there is a need to work with great political will to remedy the grave situation and fight against poverty and unemployment at the national level through evolving dynamic policies of human resources development: access of the poor, including women, to meaningful education and vocational training; abolishing the privileged educational system for the rich whereby the bulk of the poor were kept without access to education and denied the principle of equal opportunity from their birth; the need to observe austerity in all walks of life; the utilisation of national resources for productive purposes wisely; and the utilisation of manpower for higher skilled, enlightened and competent management for raising productivity, its fruits to be shared through social dialogue by the social partners, namely, the workers and employers as well as consumers at large through respect for the principle of freedom of association. There is also a need to enlarge the industrial base through acquisition of technology, as well as raise rural development through agrarian reform and granting the rural poor access to land, credit, markets and appropriate facilities for the acquisition of skills.

The Director-General's Report also highlights the need for institutional reforms such as land and tenancy reforms, the breaking up of cartels and the promotion of equal opportunity in labour market.

On one continent alone, about 2.5 per cent of landowners own 70 per cent of the land resources, yet in the world as a whole 550 million people in the rural labour force are landless, while more than 450 million have only very little and not enough to maintain themselves at a subsistence level.

It speaks for itself – the agonies of the suffering of the rural poor in the world.

It also requires international action, which should enable the developing countries to have better trade terms, relief of their heavy debt burden, paying almost 30-40 per cent of their export earnings to service the debts every year and transfers of technology to the developing countries to build their appropriate economic infrastructures for provision of basic needs of the people, as well as the conversion of heavy armaments expenditure for the provision of basic needs to the poor of the world, apart from saving the world from the nuclear holocaust and establishing a healthy environment upon our common heritage of earth.

I am stressing this because we live in an interdependent world which requires also the establishment of an international division of labour. If agricultural subsidies extended by the developed world to their own agriculture are diverted to allowing free access to the agriculture products of the Third World to their market, this alone could transfer almost US$177 billion per annum from one continent of the North to the South, which could lead to the creation of a better climate of recovery and improve employment prospects in the Third World, because the real prices of the commodities exported by the Third World in 1980 have even fallen below the real terms of trade of the depression of 1932 due to such unfavourable trade restrictions according to an UNCTAD report.

We hope that the ILO will continue to provide more assistance to the developing countries under technical co-operation programmes to tackle these grave issues.

We are glad to inform you that the newly elected democratic Government in Pakistan, under the leadership of Mohtarma Mrs. Benazir Bhutto, Prime Minister of Pakistan, has committed itself to pursuing a labour policy in conformity with ILO Conventions, promoting social justice and democracy in our country and also tackling unemployment issues on an urgent basis. The Prime Minister also reiterated her support for the working class on the eve of Labour Day on 1 May and also to the 36th Annual Congress of the All-Pakistan Federation of Trade Unions. In a message proclaiming that the ban imposed by the previous regime on the trade unions will be lifted and the trade unions will be able to function in full independence and autonomy in accordance with the ILO Conventions. The Prime Minister has also established a tripartite committee on labour issues to make concrete recommendations on the promotion of harmonious industrial relations and labour welfare.

In order to promote the development of human resources, the Government has expanded vocational education and training facilities for the young, including women. This is supervised by the National Tripartite Training Board, to ensure that the demand for skilled manpower is adequately met. The working class is co-operating with the Government in order to further the cause of democratic and social justice. However, there are problems, such as high unemployment among youth; the need for meaningful education and vocational training for young rural workers, including women; the need to combat the high inflation rate, which affects the poor and wage earners, reducing their real income every day; the need to bridge the irrational gap between rich and poor, to observe the principle of austerity in the utilisation of national resources for wisely chosen productive purpose; and the need for an agrarian reform to abolish the outdated feudalistic system and strengthen the participation of workers' and rural organisations in policy-making bodies in order to achieve self-reliance. The working class is endeavouring to achieve these objectives and therefore appeals to the ILO to increase its technical co-operation assistance to our country, in line with the recommendation of the ILO multidisciplinary mission to Pakistan, in order to strengthen democracy and further the cause of social justice.

We welcome the important technical items on the agenda of the Conference, including safety in the use of chemicals and night work. We hope that positive conclusions will be reached on these subjects.

The Conference Committee on the Application of Standards has before it the useful report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, as well as the General Survey on social security protection in old age.

In our country, the workers are entitled to old-age benefits to which employers and the government contribute, as well as the provision of medical, maternity, sickness, accident and survivors' benefits, under different legislation, financed out of employers' contributions.

The present democratic Government has improved benefits, including full pensions for widows, and free education at all levels for one son and one daughter, this scheme being supervised by the tripartite bodies.

We take this opportunity of expressing our appreciation for the host countries welcoming migrant workers which provide old-age benefits under social security schemes, and appeal to other such countries to follow their example, since these workers contribute their labour and energy to build their societies and serve mankind.

On the eve of the 70th anniversary of the ILO, we organised and financed out of our own funds a national seminar on labour welfare and harmonious industrial relations and productivity in the light of ILO Conventions and Recommendations. This seminar was inaugurated by the speaker of our newly elected National Assembly and addressed by the Labour Minister and was given wide coverage on the national media, highlighting the important contribution of the ILO in this important field and for mankind as a whole.

We also take this opportunity of assuring you of our full support for the heroic struggle of the people of South Africa and Namibia for their right of independence, and express our abhorrence for the atrocities being committed against the people of those countries and against the people of Palestine and the occupied Arab territories. We demand that these atrocities cease, and we fully support the right of self-determination of the Palestinian people.

May I also take the opportunity to convey our deepest appreciation for the good work being done by the ILO and in particular the Employment, Working Conditions, Workers' Education, International Labour Standards, Workers' Relations and Industrial Relations Branches, the International Labour Institute and the Turin Centre, as well as by the ILO Office in Islamabad.

We hope that the deliberations of this important session of the Conference will prove to be another milestone in the improvement of the working and living conditions of working men and women all over the world, in order to build a better tomorrow.

Original - Polish: Mr. MIODOWICZ (Workers' delegate, Poland) - It is my privilege and pleasure to congratulate the President, on behalf of my Polish trade union organisation, on his election to this post of great eminence and responsibility. We are deeply convinced that his valuable experience, acquired over many years, and his talents will greatly contribute to the success of the present session of the Conference.

In my speech at the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference last year I stated that the then Polish model of trade union pluralism required further development. It is my pleasure to inform the distinguished delegates today that this development has in fact taken place over the past year, which is a relatively short period of time. As a result, the Polish trade union delegation attending this Conference does indeed represent the present pluralistic organisational model of our national movement. It includes the representatives of the All-Poland Trade Union Alliance, "Solidarity", as well as two rural organisations, the National Union of Rural Organisations and Rural Solidarity.

The time is not yet ripe to properly assess and draw appropriate conclusions from the long-term social and political process set in motion as a result of a series of radical reforms in Poland which reached their climax during the last six months. Nevertheless, there is every reason to believe that, thanks to a number of bold moves and initiatives, a qualitatively new social and political situation has been created in Poland.

It is characterised mainly by modern democratic and pluralistic solutions. In this way the Polish nation, and all the working people of Poland, have acquired better possibilities and conditions for solving their difficult problems and bringing a more valuable contribution to the development of the whole international community, as well as to the improvement of international trade union co-operation.

We are aware that the latest transformations in Poland have met with a relatively wide response and interest throughout the world. It is not our intention to overestimate or absolutise our experiences. Our attitude to them is full of realism and modesty. For we consider that we will be judged best by national and international practice and history.

From our trade union point of view a matter of utmost importance is how to maintain and consolidate, under the conditions of diversity, the required level of unity and harmony of action in the defence of the vital interests of the working people. This is why, as never before, so much depends on all the partners and participants in the round-table process now under way in Poland. At the same time, we are doing all in our power to ensure a better tomorrow and defend the interests of all Poles and the whole nation, as well as to increase the efficiency of its co-operation with other nations and countries. It is with realistic optimism that we envisage the prospects for common action by the trade unions nationally under conditions of co-operation, not confrontation.

The All-Poland Alliance of Trade Unions has made its own contribution to the latest transformations in our country. The facts are well known and speak for themselves. Let me emphasise, however, that in our undertakings we were guided not by the particular interests of given social groups, but by the overall interests of all working people and the whole nation.

Also, it is worth while to stress that under the present difficult economic conditions the main social and trade union forces of Poland demonstrate a high level of experience, responsibility and willingness to reach agreements and reasonable compromises. Needless to say, this coincides happily with the present worldwide process of passing from confrontation to co-operation in global relations.

The All-Poland Trade Union Alliance continues to stand resolutely and consistently for radical pluralistic transformations in our country. It is in this spirit that we contributed to the dismissal of the previous Polish Government, whose policies were incompatible, in our view, with the interests of the working people of Poland. It is precisely in this spirit that I took part in a nationally televised interview with my colleague Lech Walesa a couple of months ago. It may be considered as an essential turning point, qualitatively and psychologically, in our common endeavours to seek appropriate pluralistic solutions for Poland, including the Polish trade union movement.

And, last but not least, the All-Poland Trade Union Alliance is acting resolutely and consistently in favour of the interests and rights of all working people of Poland, particularly of workers, retired working people, women and young workers, in short all those for whom the burden of crisis is particularly heavy and painful. It is precisely for them that we resolutely demand that the ideals of social justice be implemented and the doings of those who speculate and take advantage of the present crisis be discontinued. Undoubtedly it is not an easy struggle but we will never give it up.

In terms of trade union pluralism the All-Poland Trade Union Alliance and its affiliated organisations remain a considerable social force and intend to continue to be so, taking on their shoulders new and ever more difficult tasks and duties. We declare that we are prepared to co-operate in a constructive manner with the Government and that we will never give up our trade union prerogatives if the government policies put in jeopardy the interests of the working people of Poland. This stand of ours applies also to workers employed in various enterprises which it is intended to dissolve or wind up for economic reasons.

It is in this context that we focus our particular attention on the matter of efficiency in the field of overcoming the present economic crisis and solving the food, housing and ecological problems, as well as the slowing down of the inflation spiral. We take a resolute stand in many other matters of importance to the Polish people, such as wage and price policies, as well as in the particular case of indexation of wages, as we call it, which means in practice the demand for a proportionate increase in wages as prices systematically go up. By doing so we want to avoid further pauperisation of the poorest blue and white collar workers and retired workers as a result of inflation. Similarly, we focus our attention on the relationship between the high external debt of Poland and the prospects for economic recovery and development.

While we have recently concentrated our efforts on dealing with domestic issues, as is natural, at the same time we do not forget, even for a single moment, our international relations and obligations. On the contrary, we are doing all we can to considerably intensify our contacts with trade union organisations from other countries and increase their efficiency. We want to take this opportunity to thank most wholeheartedly the numerous trade union organisations and individual unionists from all over the world for their understanding, support and international trade union solidarity.

We attach tremendous importance to the contemporary and future role and efficiency of actions undertaken by the ILO. There is not the slightest doubt in the light of contemporary developments and forecasts for the future that the place of the ILO within the international community will continue to be ever more important and indispensable. Therefore, we consider that this Organisation, whose merit in the workers' cause is so valuable and indisputable, should seek new bold solutions able to meet the requirements and challenges on the threshold of the twenty-first century.

Such a need stems, above all, from the consequences and impact of the scientific and technological revolution, new aspects of the contemporary and future relationships between labour and capital, nationally, regionally and globally, between employers and employees as well as from the process of internationalisation and globalisation of ever more numerous aspects of social and economic life on Earth.

It is with due attention that we analysed the reports submitted for consideration by the Governing Body and the Director-General. We are of the opinion that the subject of employment and jobs was correctly selected as a main topic for debate at the present session, the more so as we are now celebrating the 20th anniversary of the adoption of the World Employment Programme.

We are pleased to express our support for the overwhelming majority of the assessments and conclusions contained in the said reports, concerning, in particular, the role of the ILO in easing various social and economic effects of the global crisis. For our part we are prepared to fruitfully co-operate with the Organisation in this field.

Let me also point out that in the light of some Polish experiences it emerges clearly that social renewal and economic growth are of tremendous importance for overcoming the crisis, creating new jobs and ensuring decent living standards for working people. Similarly, we fully support the global efforts now being undertaken by the ILO to reach such goals. At the same time we deem it necessary to stress the importance of new disarmament measures as well as of those aimed at conversion for creating more jobs and curbing unemployment.

The recent practical examples of conversion may be hopefully considered as "first swallows" heralding the coming of springtime in this particular sector. They inescapably bring us to the conclusion that only through radical, universal and complete disarmament, through allocating the skyrocketing military expenditure to civilian needs, it would prove to be possible to solve major and burning global problems, above all economic, social and ecological ones, in the interests of all people.

With this in mind we would like to emphasise strongly the importance of the problem of conversion in the deliberations of the present 76th Session of the Conference and we would like to encourage the ILO to undertake more resolute steps in this direction. It goes without saying that better co-operation between various trade unions would have a particularly important role to play in the domain of conversion.

We are glad to say that the ILO programme for 1990-91 proves that the Organisation attaches great importance to the protection of the environment. There exist also in this field new and unexplored possibilities for more efficient trade union co-operation globally.

Shortly, on 1 September 1989, we are sadly to commemorate the 50th anniversary of aggression by Hitlerite Germany against Poland, which began the Second World War. The whole of mankind has paid an extremely high and unnecessary price for that most tragic, so far, "mistake of history". The Polish nation and State are among those who lost and suffered most as a result of the war. Up to this day we have to recover from that heavy blow.

This coming anniversary makes us think, quite naturally, of the past, but it is much more important to direct our eyes to the present and future. It is of the utmost importance to think what should be done by the world of labour and its allies to avoid a repetition of a similar tragedy in the future. To give a positive answer to this crucial question by deeds, not words, should be considered as one of our most important tasks. I believe that we will be able to fulfil it with dignity and a sense of responsibility.

It seems that today we have much better than ever conditions for implementing the trade union mission of peace and justice. A new spirit is advancing, with numerous difficulties but step by step. This is also true of the international trade union movement at large. Now it is high time to remove from it the heavy burden of the past, to eliminate dogmatic, neo-conservative, sectarian, "cold war" prejudices, manners and approaches. A better tomorrow for the world would be unthinkable without a radical renewal of the international trade union movement as a whole. This is why we resolutely stand in favour of increasing the efficiency of international trade union co-operation, while fully respecting pluralism and the diversity of the contemporary trade union movement and seeking new ways and means of joint action between the main world trade union centres. We are certainly prepared to bring our original Polish contribution to this noble cause.

Firmly believing in a prosperous future for the ILO, I solemnly declare that the Polish trade union delegation will do all in its power to ensure that the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference is crowned with success and will bear the best possible fruits for the benefit of all its participants.

Original - French: Mr. DIAKENGO SERAO (Government delegate, Namibia) - It is a great privilege and a very great honour for me to represent the United Nations Council for Namibia in this Conference. The Council is the legal administrative authority of Namibia until it becomes independent. On behalf of the Council, I wish to congratulate Mr. Nkomo on his well-deserved election to direct the labours of this 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. I am confident that his experience as a statesman and commitment to the cause of justice will enable this Conference to attain excellent results. I should also like to take this opportunity to congratulate the new Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, on his nomination and I wish him every success in his new post.

The United Nations Council has observed with particular satisfaction that the Director-General in his Report gives particular attention to the commitment of the ILO to the total eradication of apartheid in Namibia and South Africa. However, we are sure that this aim can never be attained without appropriate action and unreserved observance by all members and their component groups of the principles involved and in a respect for justice.

As everybody knows, the international territory of Namibia is moving towards independence. The United Nations plan for the independence of Namibia took effect last April, and there is every reason to believe that the present process now to be observed in Namibia is irreversible and will culminate, at the beginning of next year, in the birth of a new nation.

These developments, of course, are a source of profound satisfaction and joy for the people of Namibia and indeed for the whole international community. Hence, the world community has many reasons for satisfaction in contemplating developments connected with the efforts made to implement United Nations Security Council resolution 435 of 1978.

The negotiations which enable us now to hope to see a free Namibia, however, are not the result of diplomatic negotiations alone. The initiatives taken at the political and diplomatic levels by the countries involved in the negotiations leading to the solution of conflicts in South-West Africa, including Namibia, which led in December 1988 to the signing of the agreements in New York, were rendered possible only thanks to the heroism of the Namibians, Angolans and the Cubans who shed their blood for this cause, thus laying a foundation for the liberation of another part of the African continent. Throughout the world, the forces of progress have constantly supported the struggles of the Namibian people, and in this way rendered possible a settlement of the Namibian question.

Although the setting up of the United Nations Transition Assistance Group (UNTAG) in Namibia is a matter for satisfaction and hope, since it marks the opening of a process of transition which will finally lead to independence, the Council for Namibia is however very worried about certain topical developments within Namibia. The information we are getting from Namibia is exceedingly worrying because it does not reflect the progress made on the diplomatic level.

Reports from independent sources in Namibia reveal that the Pretoria Government, in a desperate attempt to deny the South-West Africa People's Organisation (SWAPO) its inevitable victory, is trying to accord Namibian nationality to non-Namibians. A campaign of defamation has also been launched by this Government against SWAPO, and the local population in northern Namibia is being frightened into not voting for SWAPO. The registration of several thousand Angolans belonging to the bandit group of UNITA as Namibians, ordered to vote against SWAPO, the massacre of innocent civilians by armed individuals, former members of the so-called Territorial Forces of South-West Africa, and the absorption into the police of members of the Koevoet forces – who have gained notoriety for their actions against the liberation of Namibia – all these occurrences give rise to justified doubts as to the real intentions of South Africa as regards the process of transition. We in the Council believe that such action is a gross breach by South Africa of the letter and of the spirit of the agreements it has signed.

Hence the United Nations Council for Namibia, which will represent Namibia until such a time as it becomes independent, cannot but express its indignation and disgust at the tortures and premeditated massacres that have been inflicted on the people of Namibia. The Council would be gravely remiss were it to remain silent in the face of these alarming developments. The hopes and aspirations of the Namibian people must not again be disappointed. The United Nations Council for Namibia will leave no stone unturned to ensure the full and effective application of the United Nations plan for Namibia. Moreover, it is for this reason that we are planning to set up an office in Namibia.

As you will remember, under the United Nations General Assembly resolution 2248 of 19 May 1967 the United Nations Council for Namibia is the legal administrative authority of this territory until it becomes independent. Although prevented by South Africa from establishing itself in the territory, the Council has nevertheless undertaken a whole series of actions which show its commitment to the defence and protection of the vital interests of Namibia, while providing assistance to Namibians as regards training and material assistance. It is on the basis of resolutions and decisions adopted by the General Assembly that the Council has been able to develop fruitful co-operation within the intergovernmental agencies, the United Nations specialised agencies and other bodies with a view to providing support and assistance to the people of Namibia.

Although the Council for Namibia is not a signatory of the agreements relating to Namibia which have been concluded during the past few months, and hence is not bound by them, it does take an account of developments during the move towards independence. That is why, in the light of recent events, the Council for Namibia has decided to adapt its working programme and some of its activities to the present state of affairs, on the understanding, of course, that it will always be able to reaffirm its political role and to apply its programmes in their original form if the need should arise.

In drawing up its working programme for the current years, the Council for Namibia has endeavoured to stress two important factors: first, the need to develop programmes for urgent technical assistance to independent Namibia and to mobilise resources to ensure their realisation at the right time, so as to prepare Namibians to meet the challenges they will have to confront in the reconstruction and development of their country; and, secondly, the need to keep a close watch on events within the territory and to mobilise international public opinion to support the Secretary-General in his attempt to implement the process of transition towards independence.

Namibia will remain under the responsibility of the United Nations until it becomes truly independent. The United Nations are therefore under an obligation to offer Namibia all necessary assistance in the fields of humanitarian aid, development and other forms of material assistance, including education, so that Namibians may be equal to the task of laying a solid foundation for the future reconstruction and development of the territory. The dreadful abuses of colonisation and apartheid, especially in education and vocational training, mean that independent Namibia will inherit a generation of workers who were deprived of their inalienable right to education and training which would have enabled them to take up a technical trade, earn a decent wage and have decent housing.

Hence we must lay down guide-lines for concerted action in favour of the Namibians.

First, the international community must exert extreme vigilance in ensuring that the transition towards independence by means of free and just elections under the supervision of the United Nations, is carried out in strict accordance with Security Council Resolution 435. We must allow no exceptions to be made to this resolution, which are not strictly necessary under the basic plan relative to the settlement of the Namibian question.

Second, the international community must mobilise social, economic and humanitarian resources to provide emergency assistance to Namibians who are returning home after displacement and a life in exile. We are aware that thousands of Namibians were forced to leave their country in the past few decades and that thousands of others have been displaced because of military conflict and have suffered from insecurity. They need the firm support of the international community to put down roots again.

Third, independent Namibia will need financial and material support and assistance in vocational training for its reconstruction and long-term development. Independent Namibia will need the maximum support and co-operation from the countries of the region and from elsewhere to reduce its economic dependence on South Africa and to ensure its rapid integration into regional and international co-operation organisations.

The Council thanks the International Labour Organisation for the efforts it has made to assist the people of Namibia; of course these efforts mark merely a beginning and we hope that such assistance will increase substantially to keep pace with the increasing needs of the people. Finally, we think it would be a good idea to send an ILO supervisory mission to Namibia during the transitional period.

Original – Arabic: Mr. JILANI (Employers' delegate, Tunisia) – First of all I would like to associate myself with the preceding speakers and congratulate the President, on behalf of the Tunisian Employers and on my own behalf, on his election. I wish him every success in his task.

I would like to take this opportunity to express my best wishes to the outgoing Director-General and to thank him for all he has done for our Organisation throughout his long term of office.

I would also like to congratulate the new Director-General, and I wish him every success in his difficult task. I am certain that, with his experience and his knowledge of the problems of the various countries, in particular the developing countries, he will be able to give us all the support we need.

I congratulate the Director-General on the choice of topics for discussion. The report on the activities of the ILO illustrates the importance and variety of the work carried out by the Office, as well as the problems it has had to tackle in order to achieve its broad objectives.

I would like to congratulate the Bureau for Employers' Activities for their unfailing assistance to employers' associations to enable them to promote small and medium-sized enterprises, which contribute in no small way towards job creation and improvements in living conditions, and to allow them to train their own executive staff and play an increasing role in all the economic and social sectors which fall within the competence of the International Labour Organisation.

Amongst the most important issues dealt with in the Director-General's Report is economic recovery and employment. I would like to say that economic recovery is only possible through long-term economic measures designed to step up production, allow optimal use of available productive potential and introduce new projects to satisfy new needs, whilst ensuring the promotion of employment and job creation at all levels.

The economic approach adopted by the Tunisian Government is the best way of guaranteeing more employment and dealing efficiently with the problem of unemployment; it is based on integrated development, combining social and economic action, in a balanced and coherent context with sets out to achieve restructuration, while ensuring that economic measures have a human element.

In Tunisia, employment is number one priority and efforts to provide work for jobseekers and to overcome finally the problem of unemployment have borne fruit.

Tunisia has opted for an open-door economic policy, believing that it speeds up development, improves production and creates opportunities for initiatives and jobs. Since the change on 7 November 1987, this policy, under the leadership of President Ben Ali, has set out to attain three major objectives: to create a social and political climate which guarantees stability and gives confidence to investors; to recognise the capacity of the private sector which corresponds with the Government's concept of the economy; and to promulgate a body of legislation and measures to encourage investment and attract national and foreign capital.

Since the changeover on 7 November 1987, Tunisia has been pursuing a policy that consolidates the democratic process and encourages initiative, because there can be no economic development unless there is democracy, freedom and a climate of confidence, initiative and readiness to take risks – a climate which creates conditions for investment and encourages individuals to carry out projects and develop capital.

As a result of Tunisia's economic stability, there has been an upsurge in the economic activities of small and medium-sized enterprises and the private sector has played a vital role in promoting production.

This economic recovery may also be attributed to the fact that the Government has relied more on the business sector and has gradually handed state enterprises over to it; indeed, in the past, these enterprises weighed the Government down and prevented it from carrying out its basic task which is to establish major guide-lines in economic policy and not to assume the role of producer, tradesman, exporter or industrialist.

The Tunisian Government has concentrated its efforts on encouraging businessmen to set up enterprises and promote production and productivity. Measures have been taken and laws and regulations adopted to encourage initiatives and contribute towards industrial transformation and new technologies required in the present economic climate. The Government has adopted three freedoms: freedom of financing, freedom of production prices and freedom of foreign trade.

At the national level the Government has simplified administrative procedures to eliminate red tape and decided to ease taxation, to facilitate services and formalities. The Government has adopted a law establishing value-added tax (VAT) in Tunisia in order to simplify tax collection. Its most outstanding reforms have undoubtedly been the laws adopted with regard to investment in order to improve the quality of Tunisian products – not only to cover the needs of the domestic market but also to promote Tunisian exports and help them to penetrate foreign markets. Various sectors have experienced a marked expansion and provide opportunities to carry out joint ventures. These include: the textile and leather industries, the metal trades, the food industries, the building material sector and tourism.

In the services sector, the Government is at present examining a Bill that would offer advantages and give tax relief in order to encourage the setting up of enterprises. This Bill, if it is adopted, would aim at encouraging foreign investment to promote export services and offshore industries. In spite of the fact that Tunisia has a relatively small domestic market, it is nevertheless important because of Tunisia's close relations with a number of industrialised countries and Arab or African developing countries, with whom it has concluded preferential and customs agreements. In addition, it is close to the markets of the European Community and there are many possibilities at the present within the Arab Maghreb; indeed these markets are of considerable interest and very attractive both for Europeans and non-Europeans.

Today, conditions are ripe in the private sector for national, Arab and foreign capital to be invested through joint companies and enterprises because there are many possibilities for investment, trade and benefits for all parties in Tunisia.

One of the items on the agenda concerns the revision of the Night Work (Women) Convention (Revised), 1948 (No. 89), especially concerning the provisions dealing with night work by women.

It is extremely important to revise this Convention in our day and age because the Convention as it now stands is no longer adapted to our century; we must, at all costs step up production and this requires hard work – both during the night and during the day. It is therefore no longer logical to ban the night work of women; indeed, the female labour force bears considerable weight in the national economic structure. We must not prevent women from taking an active part in national economic development and, as a consequence, from creating expert jobs to avoid unemployment.

The occupied Palestinian territories are still undergoing the throes of a heroic uprising and extreme repression, which make a farce of moral rules and standards and international laws.

Millions of people throughout the world are made aware, every day, of the realities of this "intifadah" and the horrors of repression; people everywhere, through the press, hear the voice of Palestine and its message. This uprising reflects the determination of a noble people, with an ancient civilisation, to live free in the same way as other peoples, to decide upon their own destiny and to regain their territories and the homes of their children and forebearers. They are a secular people who wish to make a full contribution to human civilisation and progress so that men and women throughout the world co-operate, comprehend and respect each other, so that life is not devalued by religious discrimination and fanaticism; on the contrary, they believe that tolerance should prevail.

We should therefore like to call upon the international community to take prompt action to put an end to the repression and terrorism that a State is inflicting on unarmed civilians.

Original – Spanish: Mr. AGRAMONTE (Government delegate, Dominican Republic) – I am addressing this 76th Session of the International labour Conference firmly convinced that international collaboration and a spirit of understanding which embodies your presidency of this international gathering will be the main elements in the search for technical advice and just solutions acceptable to all of us so that all members of this community will be able to play their part without grievance and without conflict in this powerful tripartite organisation.

The delegation which I have the honour to head is genuinely representative of a very small country in the Caribbean with a big collective heart which, in this world forum, wishes to express its enthusiastic solidarity for the defence of the rights and social justice, so needed by all those to whom they are denied.

First of all, however, I wish to take the opportunity of congratulating Mr. Nkomo on his well-deserved election to the presidency of this Conference. We are fully convinced that he will conduct our debate skillfully and objectively, mindful of the individual needs of each country concerned and with a view to securing the application of all the necessary standards to ensure peaceful co-existence of the international community as represented in the International Labour Organisation. We also wish to extend a sincere and enthusiastic welcome on behalf of the Government and people of the Dominican Republic to all delegates, advisers and others present, joining with them in their desire for the success of these deliberations and for a satisfactory solution to the discussions of the items on the agenda of this Conference.

I wish to applaud the Director-General for his wise, clear and concise Report on the activities of the ILO for the period 1988-89.

At the same time I wish to acknowledge the hard work carried out by Mr. Francis Blanchard in his years of service to the ILO, especially during his term as Director-General, and the valuable contribution he has made towards helping the Dominican Republic. We express our deepest gratitude to Mr. Francis Blanchard and congratulate him sincerely on the efforts he has made.

We cannot claim, in the time available, to give a detailed account of all the achievements we have accomplished, and of all the social problems affecting the Dominican Republic nor of the practical, equitable, legislative or administrative measures taken by the Government of the Republic to give effect to the Conventions we have ratified. I would like to point out that after more than eight years of continual economic decline and marked social demoralisation, since 16 August 1986 economic recovery and a more positive outlook in society have made possible the creation of hundreds of thousands of jobs which have improved the social and economic situation of more than half a million people and led to a return of the confidence of our citizens in the present leaders of the Dominican Republic, headed by His Excellency, the President of the Republic, Dr. Joaquín Balaguer, who have unswervingly maintained and assured the full exercise of public freedoms and human rights.

In the labour field, the constitutional Government, during the period 1988-89, has implemented significant and opportune measures with a view to harmonising national labour law and practice with the provisions of the Conventions and Recommendations adopted by the ILO and ratified by my country, especially as concerns the application of the following Conventions – the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Protection of Wages Convention, 1949 (No. 95), the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) and the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105).

The right to organise has been fully and strictly maintained through the granting of the right of association as proclaimed in the Constitution of the Republic and the Labour Code. Throughout the nation, many trade unions and associations have been recognised and registered, and they in turn have become affiliated to the major trade union federations within the country, and are registered validly and respected by the Government.

There is no restriction of any kind on the forming or joining by workers or employers of employers' and workers' organisations.

The Government, together with employers and workers, and in association with the Catholic Church, are seeking solutions to the serious economic and social problems affecting industrial relations in our country, accentuated by the serious economic crisis which is at present afflicting the world community.

As positive facts, resulting from this dialogue, I must mention the fixing of a national minimum wage, a general increase in the wages of workers in the private sector and the public sector and the agreement to extend social security coverage to the members of workers' families and to introduce significant amendments to the law with a view to improving the living conditions of workers.

The Secretary of State, through his inspectorate, has found that in the country's sugar refineries wages are paid directly to the workers and entirely in cash, thus putting an end once and for all to the system of paying wages in dribs and drabs, which was neither in keeping with the law or with the international standards ratified by the country.

The Government is being careful to ensure that this practice does not occur again and that there is full compliance with section 187 of the Labour Code which says that "wages must be stipulated and paid entirely in legal tender on the date agreed to between the parties".

There is no discrimination of any kind between Dominican and foreign workers; they may join any trade union they wish. The Government does not exercise any type of interference whatsoever where trade unions are concerned, either in the Constitution or in the actual functioning of the trade unions.

In my capacity as the Senior Labour Officer of the Dominican Republic, I have deposited with the legal advisory service of the presidency of the Republic, various preliminary drafts of Bills to be studied and submitted to the National Congress. One in particular aims to eliminate once and for all the distribution of vouchers to workers as advances on their salaries. I wish to point out that this is a legal provision, but one which has been discontinued due to the force of circumstance for some time now.

Under our Constitution and our law there are proper regulations for the way in which citizens may acquire housing as well as acquire Dominican nationality.

The national authorities do not force any foreigner to do any type of work against his will.

There are approximately just over 1 million Haitian nationals residing unlawfully in the country. It appears that the natural right which guarantees human existence has made us realise that we need to be understanding and show solidarity towards our closest neighbours and share with them, as far as we can, the material wealth of our country, with the necessary prudence to prevent harm to national interests.

As regards the problems in connection with the recruitment of Haitian workers for the sugar-cane harvest and the conclusion of bilateral intergovernmental agreements between Haiti and the Dominican Republic, the Government has taken positive steps to provide adequate living and working conditions together with full guarantees of social justice. Such an agreement is highly favourable to both these neighbouring States, benefiting their respective nationals.

A committee has been set up by decree, chaired by Mgr. Hugo Eduardo Polanco Brito, Bishop of Higüey, to study the situation of Haitian workers in the Dominican Republic.

In the state sugar industry, various decisions have been taken which have brought about substantial improvements in the living and working conditions of agricultural workers. The inspectorate of the Ministry of Labour, of which I have the honour to be head, has ensured that they have been put into practice.

In addition, the Government of the Dominican Republic has requested technical advice from the ILO for the drafting of an agreement between the two countries. Preliminary contacts have been made by a Dominican delegation led by Dr. Atilio Guzmán Fernández, the Dominican Ambassador responsible for Haitian affairs. Following his talks in Puerto Principe with the Secretary for Social Affairs, Mr. Carrier, he was able to inform the national authorities of his favourable impression of the contacts with the Haitian authorities over this matter.

I wish to inform the international community, and especially representatives of the developed countries of the world, that the problem of illegal immigration and clandestine work are not problems that are easy to solve. However well-intentioned and sincere the measures taken by States are, they cannot be as effective as they should be if they are not accompanied by collaboration and technical and economic assistance from the international community.

The Republic of Haiti and the Dominican Republic are small, underdeveloped States, situated on a single island with similar economic needs urgently requiring immediate collaboration from the international community. The economic and social problems we have to face affect not only Haiti and the Dominican Republic, but affect all the countries adjoining or near to ours, at various stages of economic development. The instinct for self-preservation leads human beings to seek a better life and that is the major problem shared throughout the world; it is a problem not only for the Dominican Republic and the Republic of Haiti, but for the whole international community. But I must stress that in my country there is no discriminatory treatment of any workers; they are all treated equally and we firmly hope that thanks to the technical assistance offered by the ILO, it will be possible to find a just and satisfactory solution to the problem of Haitian nationals employed as agricultural workers in the Dominican Republic.

We know well that the ILO was founded to meet the need of the international community for a tripartite forum where social and labour problems could be discussed and solutions sought in the short or long term. It has succeeded in alleviating and solving many international problems affecting many countries.

I express the hope, on behalf of the Government of the Dominican Republic, that you have heeded and understood my words in this great international forum.

Mr. DHAR (Employers' delegate, India) – Permit me to offer the felicitations of the Indian employers and my own to Mr. Nkomo on his unanimous election to the high position of the President of the Conference.

The world today is in the process of transformation. The recent thaw in geo-political relations is enabling the political leadership to focus attention on the important task of improving the lot of millions of people, who have been deprived of the fruits of development. The easing of tensions and conflicts in various parts of the world has unlocked tremendous resources, which can be utilised for accelerating the tempo of industrial development.

This pragmatic realisation reinforces the Declaration of Philadelphia that "poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere". President Kennedy said at his Inaugural Address that a rising tide lifts all boats, it is hoped that the trends, becoming apparent all over the world, will help the comity of nations in mounting an attack on the problems of poverty and hunger.

The Director-General has presented a brilliant report on recovery and employment for deliberation at this Conference, and I compliment him on his sagacity, wisdom and insight.

Before I proceed with my own thoughts on the theme, may I congratulate Mr Michel Hansenne, for his assuming the stewardship of the ILO. We look forward to him providing new directions and thrust to the activities of this unique body, which has survived many political vagaries and a major World War.

The developed and developing nations are passing through a critical period. While the Third World countries are caught in a debt trap, the developed ones are beset with their own problems and inner pressures for protecting domestic industries from imports. The free flow of international trade is thus being impeded by creating tariff and non-tariff barriers. They need to be removed.

In recent years, the economies of several developing countries, primarily dependent for their survival on export earnings from commodities, have received a serious setback on account of a steep fall in prices. It has been estimated that in real terms, commodity prices today are well below the 1932 level. There are many countries in the South which have borrowed heavily from multilateral and bilateral agencies and commercial banks. According to the latest estimates, the Third World owes about US$ 1.3 trillion to lending institutions. One can well imagine the servicing costs of this massive amount and the critical balance of payments situation, when juxtaposed with falling export earnings. These phenomena have naturally affected economic in the developing countries.

It is, therefore, not difficult to appreciate the serious situation the developing countries are facing in meeting the challenges of pervasive poverty, increasing unemployment, slower rate of economic growth and an acute resource crunch. I believe that these are the problems which each country has to grapple with in the perspective of domestic strategies and international economic imperatives.

In my view, and I am basing my observations on experience in India, the effective remedy for our economic malaise lies in improving the productivity of our resources. It is unfortunate, but true, that productivity in most of the developing countries is dismally low. Despite adopting the most modern technologies, the productivity levels have moved up only marginally. This has largely been due to a lack of positive response from the vast workforce. A recent study in India has revealed that total factor productivity from 1960-61 to 1982-83 was actually negative, a decline of 0.4 per cent per annum on average. A rise of 2 per cent per year in labour productivity is considered deceptive, because of a rise in capital intensity. As a result, incremental capital-output ratio has declined, insignificantly. There are, on the other hand, some sectors of our economy where technological obsolescence is widespread. In these areas, the high cost of modernisation acts as a deterrent in adopting the latest technologies.

It is very important to consider the ways and means of improving the efficiency of our factor endowments. I venture to suggest that mere induction of high technology may not yield desired results. The fact remains that the social and labour policies being pursued may not be in tune with the demands of economic development. In my opinion, while laying stress on rights, the labour policies could perhaps spell out corresponding obligations too. There is a compelling need to provide a new orientation for our legislative framework. The industrial relations system should be made a forceful instrument of growth for wider spread of the gains of economic development.

In this context, one should not forget that 90 per cent of the labour force in developing countries is in the unorganised and informal sector. I appeal to this world parliament of labour that in future programmes of action stress should be placed more on formulating plans for generating employment and social protection for the informal sector. This segment of the labour force has largely remained beyond the pale of ILO Conventions and Recommendations. This was, in fact, the centrepiece of the address of our Prime Minister, Mr Rajiv Gandhi, to the Conference in June 1985.

One of the biggest drawbacks of pursuing the soft-option policy is clearly visible in the emerging wage policies in the developing countries. The wages paid to labour have, at present, no relationship with their performance. The linkage of industrial wages to the movement of the consumer price index in several countries has introduced a number of distortions that have blurred the skill differentials. The burden of wage payments in conjunction with the fringe benefits has, over the years, grown phenomenally without achieving a commensurate increase in the levels of production. There is a need for adding an element of incentive to improve the workers' productivity.

I submit that pragmatic investment policies alone hold the key to the generation of productive employment opportunities. Developed countries must ensure the concessional flow of resources to the needy and developing countries. Such a policy would be in their own interest. We fully support the Brady Plan for the voluntary reduction of Third World indebtedness. However, I hasten to add that this facility should be available to every developing nation. Its selective application would be tantamount to putting a premium on mismanagement of the economy.

With increased aid, reduced debt-servicing liability and the right priorities, the developmental activities would get stimulus. The Third World could cross the barrier created by stagnation, a high rate of inflation, low productivity and an unacceptable cost structure. Large multinational corporations can play a constructive role by using the export promotion zones, which several low income countries have created for export production. These countries still have the advantage of comparatively low wages.

It is equally obvious that we shall have to restructure economic strategies and determine priorities in order to provide jobs to the growing army of unemployed. I do not believe that the answer lies in forcing the modern manufacturing sector to create more jobs or maintain the present levels of the job market. There is a striking contradiction here. For instance, between 1973 and 1985 manufacturing production in the United States rose by almost 40 per cent. Yet, manufacturing employment during that very period went down steadily. There are now 5 million fewer people employed in blue-collar work than there were in 1975. Interestingly, in this period, the total employment grew faster than at any time in the past, from 82 million to 110 million between 1963 and 1985.

The entire growth was in non-manufacturing and especially in non-blue-collar jobs.

The message, therefore, is clear. A country, an industry or a company that puts the preservation of blue-collar manufacturing jobs ahead of international competition will soon have neither production nor jobs. The attempt to preserve such blue-collar jobs is actually a prescription for unemployment. This is the stark reality which we must face and accept.

In my view, the real fountain-head of employment generation is located in agro-based industries in rural areas, growth in handicrafts and promotion of self-employment. In the handicraft sector, too, there is the need to inject imaginative and innovative techniques so that its products suit the taste of the new and younger generations. Furthermore, the ILO should address itself to assisting the developing countries in evolving viable social protection measures for the rural workforce in order to provide positive incentives for them to stay and work in the rural areas.

Equally important is the necessity to restructure our industries. Most of the industrial units in India are carrying a heavy complement of manpower that is not needed for efficient production. In recent years, a large number of establishments have gone "sick" or are in the process of joining this category. A realistic policy would be to readjust the labour component and shut down units which cannot be revived at all. In suggesting these measures, I am not ignorant of the human dimension of the restructuring process. The answer does not lie in cosmetic surgery, but in formulating measures to take care of surplus labour or of those who lose their jobs on account of closure of "sick" establishments.

The industrial scene in India is changing fast. With the liberalisation of import policy and the relaxation of controls on the private sector, our country is poised for a quantum leap in socio-economic development. The credit for accelerated industrial activities goes, in a large measure, to Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi. His policies of deregulation, capacity expansion, broad-banding, Jawahar Rojgar Yojna and revitalisation of Panchayat institutions have firmly set the nation on the road to mass prosperity.

A recent economic survey has brought out several positive gains – agriculture has achieved an increase of 17 per cent, the food grain output reaching a record 170 million tonnes; industry has recorded a growth of 9.8 per cent; and the overall growth in GDP has been estimated at 9 per cent. My country has done a better developmental job than many Third World countries.

There has been an emergence of a large, highly developed entrepreneurial middle class which, given proper incentives and impetus, can make the country economically prosperous in the true sense. Our problems, undoubtedly, are daunting. But our people have a strong urge to forge ahead in decades to come, so that the prosperity does not remain confined to only a select few. The message of the Philadelphia Declaration permeates our social and economic planning and the country is firmly on the road to progress.

Original – French: Mr. CAL (Workers' delegate, Italy) – On behalf of the Italian workers, I congratulate Mr. Nkomo on his election as President of this important session of the Conference and I take this opportunity to wish every success to Mr. Hansenne who has just shouldered the delicate task of being the Director-General of the ILO.

The Director-General's Report, which this year focuses on economic recovery and employment, faithfully reflects the contradictory situation affecting our planet. While, on the one hand, there has been important growth in the world economy, on the other hand, the Third World countries are getting poorer, as evidenced by a falling per capita income, and resources are being transferred from South to North, in the form either of capital movements or of crushing interests on the debt of the developing countries.

If this problem is not attacked at its root, it may lead to a general social and economic disaster which will inevitably affect the northern countries. In this connection, it is urgent to adjust national economic policies and to change international economic relations, inter alia, by shifting the terms of trade in favour of the developing countries, by opening up markets, in brief, by changing the economic, financial and monetary structures which have ruled the world for almost 50 years.

At a time when the international strategy of the United Nations Fourth Development Decade is being devised, we should like to offer a few ideas on the elaboration of this scheme which is to usher in the third millennium.

We propose that the ILO should launch a special appeal to all the members States of the United Nations, and especially to the northern countries, to finance a common fund, using in particular the money set free by disarmament measures, such as those recently taken by the United States and the Soviet Union, whose example should induce other countries to follow suit. This fund should be used to reduce the debt of the developing countries of African and Latin America. It should serve to boost growth through investment geared to improving the living conditions in the poorer countries, to promote means of stimulating production so that structural adjustments can be made to benefit the underprivileged. All of this should be achieved in the context of development that preserves the environment rather than in a situation of stagnation or economic slump and to the detriment of the environment. This initiative might be called the "Brandt Plan" for the development of the South, in the light of the fact that it was Willy Brandt who, about ten years ago in his report, envisaged, amongst other things, a reduction in the arms budget in favour of development. Today, after 40 years of a mad race towards self-destruction, the major Powers seem to have understood that it is better for all of us – the North and South – to live in a richer and more secure world than in a poor and uncertain one. If there were a political will to do this, the creation of a structure giving effect to such a plan could be envisaged. We propose that it should be an international authority, under the direction of the United Nations Secretary-General and supported by the Directors-General of the United Nations agencies for social and economic matters, such as the ILO, with tripartite representation including workers and employers on an equal footing, UNDP, UNCTAD, FAO, etc., and a representative from each continent. We invite the new Director-General of the ILO to take the initiative in this direction.

As regards Italy, it has to be said that macro-economic indicators are not entirely negative, but while it is true that the rate of growth is increasing, it is also true that inflation is spiralling upwards, unemployment is holding its ground and southern Italy is still awaiting development.

As to tripartite relations, they have hitherto played a part only in social and economic questions connected with the construction of an internal market within the European Economic Community in anticipation of 1992.

However, relations between the social partners have developed significantly. Employers are changing the attitude they held in the 1980s, when they tried to govern labour relations independently of trade unions, by attempting to replace collective agreements with a series of individual contracts. Their plans were thwarted by the resistance put up by workers and trade unions. Today, it is obvious that collective agreements negotiated by trade unions have taken firm hold.

The agreements signed a short time ago in the public sector – the protocol with the Institute for Industrial Reconstruction – and more recently in the most important private sector, bear witness to this change of strategy, which is bound to become more marked. The Italian trade unions in general are following ever more a strategy which could be called one of “participatory bargaining”. In other words, they are trying to follow a responsible wage policy to reduce unemployment while maintaining purchasing power, bearing in mind the general rate of growth of the country's economy and other indicators such as the economic health of the enterprise or the enterprises of a same group.

Italian trade unions are paying increasing attention to tax-free wages. In this connection, they have recently entered into bilateral negotiations with the Government, whose fiscal policy sometimes runs the risk of cancelling out wage increases negotiated with enterprises. The trade unions have, during 1988 and the beginning of 1989, taken part in decisive negotiations with the Government to obtain, through the State budget, a reduction in direct taxation and tax rebates in favour of families and, especially of retired workers.

In these last few months the trade unions and the Government have clashed over the issue of welfare. The Government has reduced the welfare benefits of workers and other citizens with respect to health. Trade unions retorted by staging a strike which led the Government to backpedal to some extent.

In the coming months, negotiations between the Government and trade unions will focus on wage and standard-setting policies concerning public service employers. The objective is to raise the level of efficiency in the administration and in public services. The trade unions are ready to discuss a new harmonisation between wages and working conditions. The Government appreciates the attitude of trade unions, but it is incapable of producing a short- and long-term plan for restructuring in order to increase mobility in the public services and to acquire independent officials capable of putting such changes into effect.

Lastly, in reference to the situation in Italy, allow me to mention the serious problem of occupational accidents which according to statistics caused the death of more than 3,000 workers in 1988 – a shocking average of eight people a day. Here is another field in which employers, trade unions and governments must work together each within the limits of their own responsibility to put an end to this frightening state of affairs in the world of labour.

As regards the ILO, and more particularly international co-operation, we are very anxious that the Turin Centre should become even more an instrument of co-operation and an integral part of the ILO with respect to its policies and its training initiatives.

Although in the last two years peace has made important strides throughout the world and detente and co-operation have gained ground in the relations among States, we are unfortunately still witnessing tragic events which upset those of us who believe in peace stemming from democracy, social justice and freedom.

We have not forgotten the terrible pictures we have seen of the events which have stained the Square of Heavenly Peace in Beijing with the blood of so many youthful students. We wish to reiterate our firm condemnation of the terrifying military intervention against unarmed students ordered by the Chinese authorities. That intervention has stifled not only the hopes of the students but also a whole people's aspirations to freedom, democracy and social justice. However, the Chinese Government must know – and recent examples of history are there to recall this fact – that it has never been possible, any where and at any time, to deny mankind's basic values and fundamental rights indefinitely.

This is equally true of South Africa, where the apartheid regime continues to deny all civic rights to the majority population, basing itself solely on the colour of the skin of its peoples.

We support the struggle of the Black people of South Africa and ask all countries of the EEC and the international community, including our own, to apply mandatory sanctions demanded by the Black Liberation movements, the democratic trade unions of South Africa and the international organisations, including the ILO.

The very detailed Report by the Director-General on the position of workers in the occupied Israeli Arab territories puts its finger on an open wound. It describes the appallingly serious situation in these territories, with the arrest of trade unionists, the expulsions, the closing down of trade union premises, the discrimination and inequality of treatment and the drop in the standard of living by 50 per cent since 9 December 1987, the start of the “intifadah” which has led to several hundred people losing their lives.

The trade unions in the Italy wish to express their vigorous condemnation of the policy of repression by the Government of Israel in the occupied Arab territories. We call on our brothers in the Israeli trade union movement to collaborate in seeking to guarantee again all trade union freedoms as well as the release of imprisoned Palestinian trade unionists.

We appeal to the wisdom of the State of Israel and the PLO to ensure reciprocal simultaneous recognition to enable them together to establish future co-operation and peace. To that end, any initiative on either side would be welcome. In particular, an international conference on peace in the Middle East must be convened as soon as possible under United Nations auspices, providing for the participation around the same table of all the parties concerned, including, of course, the PLO, the legitimate representative of the people of Palestine.

We appeal to the two parties concerned in this conflict to show good will, at this session of the Conference as well.

Most unhappily, there are too many occasions and too many countries where human rights and freedoms are trodden under foot. This situation seems to us the more intolerable in the year when the whole world is celebrating the 200th anniversary of the French Revolution, which led to the first Universal Declaration of Human Rights. No country can stand aside from this, no matter where it is or what the ideological inclinations of its authorities.

In this connection, I should like to appeal to the authorities of Chile and to ask the Director-General and the Conference to intervene to obtain the release of two important Chilean trade union leaders, Manuel Bustos and Arturo Martínez, who are exiles within their own country, while at the same time general elections are planned in an attempt at democracy which, for this reason, may be seriously reduced in significance.

Nor can we forget the sufferings of the populations and workers of Centra America as a whole. These peoples are looking for peace stemming from social justice, democracy, freedom and independence.

The international community must leave no stone unturned in giving political and economic assistance to allow the full success of the 2 Peace Plan.

Finally, allow me to observe with great satisfaction certain events which we have been witnessing in certain eastern European countries, such as Poland, the Soviet Union and Hungary. While numerous grave problems remain and the position is still stagnant in other Eastern countries, we cannot only applaud the process of democratisation in the three countries I have mentioned. This is an excellent sign for the whole of Europe, for our future and for peace and development in the world as a whole.

Original – Arabic: Mr. EL-TAYEB (Minister of Labour and Social Security, Sudan) – In the name of God, the Merciful and the Compassionate! Allow me first of all to congratulate Mr. Nkomo on his election to the presidency, for which his widely recognised experience and abilities well qualify him. This choice is certainly an honour, not only for him personally and for his country, Zimbabwe, but also for our entire African continent. We are convinced that under his wise guidance, this Conference will achieve the objectives to which we all aspire.

I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne on his election to the office of Director-General of the ILO. He is not new to the world of labour, for he maintained close links with this Organisation as Minister of Labour of his country. This is why we hope that the Organisation will benefit from his experience and dynamism at this time, as it embarks on its eighth decade. We cannot fail here to pay tribute to the considerable efforts made by his predecessor, Mr. Francis Blanchard, which culminated in a great many achievements to the benefit of this Organisation and its members in all of the regions of the world.

Through you, I should like to congratulate the three sides throughout the world and in the International Labour Office on the 70th anniversary of the inception of the ILO. Now, as it begins its eighth decade, the ILO is proud of what it has already achieved, and many challenges lie ahead, which we hope that it will succeed in meetings, thanks to the commitment and solidarity of its members.

I shall begin my comments on the Report of the Director-General by thanking him for his judicious choice of the subject of recovery and employment, which is certainly of particular importance for all of the countries of the Third World, and especially for the least developed countries, including my own. Economic growth and progress can only be achieved if the advanced countries and the developing countries join in a genuine effort to adapt to new conditions. Such adjustments are not only necessary in national economic policies, but also in international relationships, given the close interdependence between nations. The Report of the Director-General stresses the importance of linking economic recovery to development, in order to ensure that wider sectors of society can enjoy the fruits of development. In our view, this is an essential point for the countries of the Third World in view of the poverty, hunger and disease afflicting their populations.

Like the other developing countries, my country is suffering the consequences of the economic crisis of the early 1980s, the most important effects of which were a deterioration in the terms of trade, a general increase in interest rates, the setting up of trade barriers and a decrease in the available capital. To this one must add the burden of the foreign debt borne by the developing countries which has increased over the years, curtailing the possibilities for development of debtor countries by compelling them to channel a large proportion of their resources to servicing debts, without, however, being able to repay the debt itself.

I should like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to the Government of France for its laudable initiative in cancelling the debts owed to it by 35 of the least developed countries. We hope that other creditor countries will follow this example, for it is a positive step towards the solution of a major problem which is a cause for concern in both the North and the South.

In addition to the consequences of difficult economic and social conditions, Sudan must also face a great many problems which are a drain on its resources. The civil war imposed on Sudan is one of these problems, for it has resulted in instability, preventing a return to conditions favourable to production and growth.

In this respect, I have pleasure to inform you that the way of peace is the unanimous wish of the Sudanese people. The many efforts made in the past have culminated in an agreement between all of the parties to cease fighting and embark on negotiations with a view to preparing the Constitutional Conference, which will discuss all of the controversial issues in order to reach a nation-wide agreement which will put an end to the conflict. In this connection, Sudan wishes to receive the assistance of all of its brothers and friends in the international community in order to achieve this objective.

The war has led to an exodus from the combat areas in the south towards the north, proving that Sudan is a country for everyone. As you know, this exodus has economic and social repercussions, making it necessary for the State to house the displaced persons and to provide them with essential services such as health care, education, etc., placing an additional burden on the already meagre resources of the State. As you also know, Sudan also welcomes refugees, who currently account for about 10 per cent of its total population, and despite the assistance provided by the United Nations system, these refugees place an additional burden on its economic resources.

Natural conditions have played an important part in the deterioration of the economic situation in my country. While we were still endeavouring to mitigate the negative consequences of the drought and desertification afflicting my country, as others in the Sahel region, we were struck by the disastrous floods which occurred last year, causing enormous damage to agricultural and livestock production, not to mention the destruction of the infrastructure. In this regard, I should like to thank all of the countries which assisted Sudan in alleviating the difficulties it has had to face as a result of the problems I have outlined. We hope to receive additional support, since our needs for reform, recovery and development are considerable.

In Sudan, we have realised that reform, recovery and development can only be founded on sound planning and a clear vision of the situation with a view to achieving growth, justice and well-being for the various sectors of the population, and in particular those directly affected by the deterioration of the economy and natural disasters. In this respect, the Government, in collaboration with the social partners and political and sectoral organisations, has drawn up a four-year plan for recovery, reform and development which will come to an end in 1991. This programme should ensure the flow of staple goods and essential services by improving the performances of the production and service sectors. As regards employment, the programme has fixed indicators to achieve a more effective utilisation of human resources by drawing up policies for deploying these resources and rationalising their use in the various sectors. The programme is also designed to step up labour-intensive public works projects, not to mention the particular importance which it attaches to projects for the establishment of small-scale enterprises.

In this context, Sudan pays tribute to the ILO and to the donor Governments which finance and implement these programmes. It hopes that the technical assistance of the ILO and the funding by donor countries will be stepped up in order to afford increased opportunities for productive employment and to encourage the population to settle in rural areas through integrated rural development which takes into account the social and human dimension of economic recovery and development.

In its economic recovery and development planning, Sudan has adopted the tripartite approach taken within the ILO. This year consultations between the social partners have continued with a view to reaching appropriate and acceptable solutions as regards the minimum wage, in order to deal with the consequences of inflation and the rising cost of living. These consultations have culminated in the conclusion of a collective agreement between employers and workers, through the latter's trade union organisations. This collective agreement regulates the minimum wage and provides for a significant increase in the wage brackets above the minimum wage. The agreement was the result of negotiations which took place in a climate of industrial peace. This practice reflects a traditional approach of the Sudanese trade union movement which was adopted by both sides of industry, with the participation of the Government which seeks to reach a permanent common understanding in the form of a collective agreement containing the main points of interest to the three sides and outlining appropriate means and measures to set out obligations and secure the rights of all of the interested parties.

It should be pointed out in this connection that the new forces represented in the federations and the trade unions have shared in the power within the Government of the National United Front, which has drawn up a programme of action centered on achieving peace and improving the well-being of the broad masses. The new forces have honoured me by asking me, together with another trade union colleague, to represent them in the Council of Ministers.

The ILO mission report this year on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories highlights the dramatic situation of the Arab workers in Palestine and the occupied Arab territories, and the refusal of the Israeli occupation authorities to apply the resolutions and recommendations of the ILO. As everyone knows, the practices of the Israeli occupational forces are characterised by inhuman acts of terrorism, torture, murder, the destruction of homes and expulsion. As regards labour, the report states that the practices of the Israeli occupation authorities are aimed at prohibiting Palestinian producers from exporting their produce on foreign markets and creating discrimination in vocational training, social security and public freedoms, while as regards employment, the Israeli authorities have introduced magnetic cards only for Palestinian workers in an attempt to suppress the "intifadah" by depriving those who take part in the uprising of their right to work.

In our view, this situation is due to the continuing occupation which has led to the uprising of the Palestinian people aimed at putting an end to repression, arbitrary practices and the violation of human rights. This is why we urge delegations to support the Arab resolution submitted to this Conference in order to put an end to the deterioration of the situation of the workers in Palestine and the occupied Arab territories, and to restore the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people.

Since the causes of freedom are indivisible, the cause of southern Africa continues to haunt the conscience of the world community because of the oppression inflicted by the racist regime on citizens and workers in South Africa. These are practices which embody the most horrendous forms of racism and discrimination, which we reject and which call for our solidarity in order to put an end to this regime and its practices. In this regard, we pay tribute to the efforts made by the Committee on Action against Apartheid of this Conference and trust that it will continue its work with the same enthusiasm and objectivity until the objective of the entire world to put an end to this regime has been achieved.

Along the same lines, we also reject the obstacles placed by the apartheid regime in South Africa in the way of the application of Security Council resolution 435 on the independence of Namibia. We salute the struggle of the peoples of South Africa and Namibia for the recovery of their legitimate rights and the granting of national independence.

I should like to conclude by assuring you of the support of my country's delegation in your guidance of the work of this important conference, in the hope that it will be a total success.

OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANISATION, 1986:
RATIFICATIONS AND ACCEPTANCE

Original – Arabic: The PRESIDENT (Mr. GAZARIN) – I would like to give the floor to the Clerk of the Conference for an announcement concerning the ratification and acceptance of the Instrument for the Amendment of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation, 1986.

Original – French: The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE – I have pleasure in announcing that the Director-General of the International Labour Office has registered the ratification by Austria and by Zaire, as well as acceptance by the Ukrainian SSR, of the Instrument for the Amendment of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation, 1986.

This brings the total number of ratifications and acceptances of the Instrument to 62.

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

Original – Arabic: The PRESIDENT (Mr. GAZARIN) – We shall now continue our discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Original – Turkish: Mr. YILMAZ (Workers' delegate, Turkey) – I should like first of all to extend to Mr. Nkomo on behalf of the Confederation of Turkish Trade Unions, TURK-IS, and on my own behalf, our heartiest congratulations on his election to the presidency of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference.

I would also like to take this opportunity to congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne on his election as the new Director-General. I am convinced that, like his predecessor, Mr. Francis Blanchard, he will ensure that the ILO fulfils its highly important mandate. I wish him every success in his work, and assure him of our continuous co-operation and support.

Finally, I should also like to extend my compliments to Mr. Francis Blanchard for his thought-provoking Report submitted to the Conference.

Part I of the Director-General's Report entitled Recovery and employment outlines an approach to international economic problems which is likely to provide for effective implementation of structural adjustment, a resumption of growth and a greater degree of social justice.

The Report rightly stresses the fact that the social cost of partial adjustment in most developing countries has been heavy. The Director-General states "... it was precisely those segments of the population that were less well equipped to bear the cost, however, that were most severely affected". The outcome, according to the Report, is the following: an increase in open unemployment almost everywhere; a deterioration in the quality of jobs created; a reduction in labour income, particularly wages; a fall in government social spending; a situation a vast majority of Turkish people has experienced throughout the 1980s.

The Report asserts that it is possible to combine adjustment with the resumption of equitable growth. It proposes an investment strategy focusing on the revival of production and improvement of the productivity and income of the poor, which, together, will boost demand and further stimulate economic recovery while at the same time moderating the social cost of adjustment which have been borne by the poor.

The Report examines specific measures to achieve these objectives and emphasises, in particular, the importance of labour market policies shaped to guarantee for workers a minimum level of protection, that is, protection against oppression, freedom of association, prohibition of forced labour, equal treatment, etc., a share in the fruits of development, greater public accountability and participation in the course of development. In short, the Director-General's Report invites us once again to emphasise the social and human purposes of any economic policy.

In my delegation's opinion, any development policy will be meaningless if it does not have as its end purpose the well-being of the people as a whole, and, ultimately, the well-being of each individual within the national community. The question is how we should contribute to putting the human being at the centre of development. This requires sound thinking in the right direction and, foremost, full respect for fundamental rights and liberties of workers. A development effort which neglects the human factor and the rights and liberties tied to it has no chance whatsoever.

Representatives of trade unions are devoted to supporting an economic policy which gives the highest priority to full employment. Full employment may not be a realistic short-term objective. We cannot, however, turn away from our long-term objective of full employment which must remain our principle goal. Such a policy requires the all-out efforts of governments, employers and workers, through negotiations, to achieve mutually acceptable programmes, the objective of which must be job creation. In such a tripartite effort none of us must be wedded to fixed or doctrinaire ideas of economic theory. Even if it is believed that the solution of the problem is through the free forces of the market and the private sector, we must realise that this has been insufficient and inadequate in the light of the history of the last decade.

We have to overcome the existing social imbalances. This can only be achieved by seriously considering the expectations and demands of the workers. Workers' demands must be listened to. Our viewpoints are clear. We are for the establishment of full, freely chosen employment; for the improvements in the protection of workers in the workplace from hazards to health and safety; for an increasing share in the fruits of productivity to the workers who make gains possible. We favour widening scope of social security provisions for workpeople and their families. What we want is a balanced economic policy, designed to contribute to improving the conditions of the poor and oppressed wherever they are.

But, as trade unionists we want something more. We want workers to have the right to organise and to negotiate freely, without restrictions imposed by governments or employers the terms under which they work and live. I do not think there are many delegates present today who would argue against these principles. The ILO itself is built on them. At the same time, it is no secret that there are a number of countries where the principles of freedom of association and tripartism are not recognised, where lip service only is paid to basic trade union rights and liberties.

Turkey, for instance, must show progress in this field and fast! We must do all in our power to put things right. The challenges ahead of us are not insurmountable so long as co-operation among nations and peoples is strengthened. Our commitment to the ideals of the ILO will be called into question if we fail to meet these challenges. It is my hope that we will not fail.

Before concluding, I wish to draw your attention to the most inhuman treatment in progress against the Turkish population in Bulgaria. Tens of thousands of Turks – men, women and children – are tortured, their names changed, their pensions cut, their properties seized, and they are forced to leave the lands they have been living on over many centuries. Forced migration is taking place. On behalf of Turkish workers and the Confederation of Turkish Trade Unions (TURK-IS), and on my own behalf, I strongly protest against these inhuman acts and appeal to world public opinion to do all in their power to put an end to these crimes.

I wish the Conference every success in its deliberations.

Mr. FREELAND (Government delegate, Antigua and Barbuda) – My delegation and I wish, like the others who spoke before me, to extend to the President and his three deputies our congratulations on their unanimous elections to the highest offices in this Conference. Under their capable leadership, we should arrive at a successful conclusion.

The tripartite delegation from Antigua and Barbuda wishes to express its profound appreciation for the sterling service rendered to the International Labour Organisation by Mr. Francis Blanchard, recently retired Director-General. The ILO benefited greatly from the rich experience that has been amassed by Mr. Blanchard over the years. So rich has been that experience, however, it is difficult for me to perceive that Mr. Blanchard's retirement means spending the rest of his day in a comfortable rocking chair in a conducive atmosphere. We wish him good health and long life. In like manner, my delegation offers sincerest congratulations to the newly elected Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Michel Hansenne. Antigua and Barbuda, which is currently serving on the Governing Body of the ILO, heartily endorses Mr. Hansenne's election and hereby offers its support to Mr. Hansenne during his five-year term as Director-General.

Part I of the Director-General's Report depicts a transition from pessimism to optimism, as the title Recovery and employment seems to suggest. The problem of unemployment is one that faces every member State of the ILO, and no government, be it of developing or industrialised designation, can ignore the problem. Any government that seeks to justify its position must stretch every effort to ensure that employment of appreciable magnitude guarantees the path to recovery.

The economies of many rich and poor countries alike have been shaken to the point of impending collapse, and recovery of these economies has been the acid test by which one government seeks to overthrow another, even without any real or imagined prospect of recovery between predecessor and successor governments. We need to be wary about our being "on the threshold of a new era of prosperity", suggestive of recovery consequential upon better employment prospects, and especially so as certain regional conflicts continue to undermine world peace. But we can find hope in the Director-General's optimism that "greater efforts are being made to reduce the threat and find lasting solutions".

The Antigua and Barbuda delegation is heartened by the Director-General's commitment, as expressed in his statement that the "ILO has a central role to play in the area of employment", as well as by his observation that "Contributing at once to production, to the distribution of wealth and to the self-fulfilment of the individual, employment is the expression of an often mentioned but too often neglected fact of life – namely that "human beings are both the means and the ends of economic development".

The ILO's commitment in the area of employment has been evident by the many activities undertaken by the ILO in 1988, which have been highlighted in Part II of the Director-General's Report. Employment should not be perceived merely as the capability of a government to provide jobs for its citizens and for others, but by the ability of all parties at the workplace to work harmoniously and to be concerned each for the others. The ILO's activities, therefore, in fostering good relationships between employers and workers, in the education of workers and employers through seminars and workshops, in improving working conditions of all workers and in particular those of vulnerable groups, in emphasising equal opportunities for all regardless of sex, race or religion, in providing technical assistance by way of regional advisers and strengthening tripartism – all these will determine the kind of recovery and employment that is envisaged by the Director-General.

Antigua and Barbuda is not blessed with mineral resources. Its topography does not induce rainfall which would bolster agriculture production. But its balmy climate with sun, sea and sky has proved a haven to sunseekers from the North. While some attempt was made at manufacturing, this could not keep pace with employment demands and, with emphasis placed on service industry, leaving employment in manufacturing to be undertaken mainly by "guest workers".

As would be expected with a balmy climate, a deep-water harbour, a strategically placed international airport and a manageable land area mostly owned by the Government, tourism has become the nation's number one revenue-earner, occasioned by the construction of hotels. Almost every sector of the community has been affected by the tourist industry. The development of our human resources then must be accorded priority treatment in such areas as training, provision of health services and in cordial relationships between employers and workers.

It has been noted that one of the agenda items for the 76th and 77th Sessions of the International Labour Conference is "working conditions in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments." Through the ratification and implementation of ILO standards which relate to freedom of association and free collective bargaining, the hotels in Antigua and Barbuda are allowed to form themselves into an association which bargains collectively with a registered trade union, bargaining on behalf of hotel workers. The bargaining union of the workers polices the terms and conditions of employment as specified in the collective agreement.

Of special interest is the fact that in December 1983 a number of workers took strike action in the hotel industry resulting in 150 hotel workers being dismissed for failing to report for duty by a given deadline. Upon failure to resolve the dispute through the conciliatory process, the matter was referred to the Industrial Court which in May 1989 ruled that the workers were wrongfully dismissed and should be adequately compensated. The matter was referred to the ILO Committee on Freedom of Association which has been awaiting the Industrial Court's decision. The right to strike is allowed under the Antigua and Barbuda Labour Code.

The Director-General has commented repeatedly on the severe debt burden that faces developing and industrialised countries alike. We agree with the Director-General that developing countries "are devoting a large share of their export earnings to interest payments without being able to reduce the capital of the debt." We in Antigua and Barbuda subscribe to the view that national indebtedness is a necessary evil to "recovery and employment." We borrow money to invest in projects that are geared to generate employment, as for example, money used to construct hotels which generate employment directly and indirectly. The value of such assets increases over time and by the sale of some assets, funds can be channelled into repayment of the national debt. A country must decide whether to borrow, even at high interest rates, the funds necessary to generate employment or not to borrow and allow unemployment to increase with its attendant evils. As long, therefore, as my country and its people exist, so will the debt burden remain despite efforts to reduce it.

The Director-General attaches great importance to the protection of the fundamental right of workers as a contributing factor to economic development. He further emphasises that in no better way can this be achieved than by dialogue between the parties within a climate of mutual respect. Every worker in Antigua and Barbuda is guaranteed the protection of his fundamental rights through the Constitution and the Labour Code. The population has been made aware of this by the media and any departure therefrom is tested through a machinery that ensures this protection. It is this factor that is responsible for reducing the number of industrial disputes to zero within the past years. Hence employment in secure and conducive atmosphere is sure to lead to meaningful recovery.

However sound the economic base of a country may be, and however bright are its employment prospects, if the health of the country's citizens is in jeopardy that economic base and those employment prospects become worthless. The Director-General reports that the state of health of the population is itself a source of productivity. The Antigua and Barbuda Government has had that conviction for a very long time and has put its conviction into positive action, as it seeks to upgrade its lone hospital with modern service. The ten-year old medical benefits scheme and the 15-year old social security scheme buttress each other in providing medical services to our nationals. Health centres are located within easy reach of each citizen with free service. The productivity level of each employed person is therefore bound to rise in relation to the level of each person's health.

The Antigua and Barbuda delegation heartily endorses the issues raised in the Director-General's Report and commends the Director-General for raising such pertinent issues that can be adopted as policy guide-lines of member States of the ILO.

Mr. NSIBANDZE (Government delegate, Swaziland) – It is for me a great honour and indeed a privilege to be accorded the opportunity of addressing this august assembly, and on my behalf, and on behalf of my delegation, I wish to convey to this 76th Session of the International Labour Conference warm and fraternal greetings from my Head of State, King Mswati III, the Government and the people of the Kingdom of Swaziland.

I also wish to seize this opportunity to join other distinguished delegates that have spoken before me and congratulate Mr. Nkomo on his election to the seat of President of this international Conference. I have no doubt that under his wise guidance, this Conference will make valuable contributions to the lofty ideals of the International Labour Organisation, in particular to the search for solutions to the economic and social problems confronting the international community.

May I also congratulate the new Director-General whose appointment to this important and challenging position heralds yet another important chapter in the history of the International Labour Organisation. My delegation has confidence that Mr. Hansenne will lead this body to even greater heights of achievement as he follows in the footsteps of another illustrious man, Mr. Francis Blanchard.

The Government of the Kingdom of Swaziland has studied with great interest the Director-General's Report on the activities of the International Labour Organisation during the year 1988, and on the all-pervasive subject of recovery and employment. Swaziland attaches considerable importance to the need for global recovery, the challenge of employment creation and the participation of the social partners in all the strategies and in the decision-making processes.

It is in this respect that my delegation fully endorses the concerns expressed in the Director-General's Report, hoping of course that positive action, beyond a simple declaration of intent, will be taken by the international community.

Swaziland became a member of this United Nations agency some 15 years ago and has, during this period of time, ratified 30 ILO Conventions. To implement and give positive effect to the spirit behind these Conventions, and in accordance with the principles of tripartism, Swaziland, with assistance of ILO experts, drafted and passed through Parliament legislation governing industrial relations, environmental protection, as well as the economic welfare of the social partners. It is therefore gratifying to report to this august assembly that as a consequence thereof, Swaziland enjoys a comparatively healthy industrial climate.

Our Industrial Court, formed some eight years ago, has already made a steady increase in the number of cases brought before it. This is partly due to the increasing awareness on the part of workers' organisations of their legal rights as well as the fact that workers have gained considerable confidence in the impartiality of the Industrial Court. The operation of the Court as an instrument of industrial peace and harmony have made a significant contribution in the sensitive area of industrial relations.

It is my pleasure to report further that Swaziland has recently ratified the Vocational Rehabilitation and Employment (Disabled Persons) Convention, 1983 (No. 159), the Labour Statistics Convention, 1985 (No. 160), the Occupational Health Services Convention, 1985 (No. 161) and the Asbestos Convention 1986, (No. 162). Towards the effective implementation of these Conventions, Swaziland has once again requested the services of an ILO expert to assist in drafting the appropriate legislation.

The Conventions ratified by Swaziland revolve around the observance of human rights, a subject which was the central theme of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference and to which my country is committed. Every conceivable effort is being undertaken to enhance the observance of human rights which is a panacea to world peace and security.

With regard to the problem of unemployment, my country has embarked on programmes designed to enhance employment opportunities as well as to improve labour relations in response to a call by his Majesty our King, who has on numerous occasions expressed concern over the daunting unemployment problem, urging the nation to find ways and means of creating job opportunities to absorb the growing numbers of unemployed citizens joining the ranks of jobseekers.

In an attempt to quantify the problem and assist in the planning process, my Government has plans aimed at obtaining accurate statistics concerning our unemployed citizens. The Departement of Labour is in the process of computerisation and in this regard assistance is sought from relevant institutions to train the department's staff in the compilation, maintenance, reproduction and assessment of information and data retrieved from the computer. This exercise is also in accordance with our overall manpower training programme. My Government will therefore be grateful for any assistance that the International Labour Organisation can provide towards the attainment of this objective.

Swaziland, like many Third World countries, has a pyramid age structure with the youth forming the base of that pyramid. About 65 per cent of the country's population is under 18 years of age and is therefore economically unproductive and dependent on the smaller percentage of wage earners. Another 20 per cent represents the old, the crippled and the unemployed, who are equally economically unproductive, thus leaving a productive labour force of some 15 per cent that are gainfully employed.

The subject of manpower training continues to enjoy priority attention. To implement effectively our development programmes, we need trained manpower on all levels, whether it be in the field of factories' inspection, the prevention of occupational hazards, the use of chemicals, etc. Every effort is being made to equip our citizens with the relevant skills to ultimately enhance their productive capacity. My Government would like to convey our sincere gratitude to the many countries and international organisations that have, in a variety of ways, contributed immensely to our manpower training programme, which to us is the very basis of our socio-economic development.

On the economic front, it is both encouraging and reassuring to note that during the past year our economy has been relatively buoyant. The overall tempo of our national development has generally been satisfactory. This steady progress can be ascribed to the relationship between the social partners and the quality of our labour relations' system, as well as the general impact of our training programmes. Credit must also go to our employers, as well as to the labour force, for their collective and sustained efforts in creating a climate of industrial peace and harmony, a climate that is conducive to further investment.

For the foreseeable future, Swaziland will continue to depend on its agricultural sector which is basically the backbone of the economy, providing a livelihood to some 80 per cent of the population engaged in both subsistence as well as semi-commercial farming. In addition, the agricultural sector employs some 30 per cent of the country's labour force.

My Government hopes that this vital sector will continue to expand and create jobs for an increasing number of our unemployed citizens. On the other hand, the Government is equally committed to the promotion of the concept of self-employment and the development of local entrepreneurship.

Commercial farming in the big estates is our biggest foreign exchange earner. This sector is characterised by the varying degrees of mechanisation, high production inputs, etc. Among others, it covers the forestry, sugar-cane, citrus and cotton industries. It is also characterised by a wide range of machinery and equipment, chemicals such as fertilisers, pesticides, insecticides, herbicides, etc. These industries employ large numbers of workers who are sometimes exposed to adverse climatic and weather conditions as well as to the rigours of the transportation system used to transport the labour force and the farm produce. All these factors contribute in a variety of ways to occupational hazards.

In the industrial and commercial sectors, Swaziland has continued to achieve steady growth. The country has over a thousand registered enterprises ranging from backyard outfits, employing less than five workers to large-scale enterprises employing well over 3,000 employees. The major industries other than the agricultural industry are: the mining industry, consisting of asbestos, coal, quarry and diamonds; the processing and manufacturing industry, consisting of ginning, textiles, food canning, beverages, etc.; social services; transport; the building industry and others.

As in many developing countries in the world, our legislation does not adequately cope with the rapid growth of industrialisation and can therefore not effectively safeguard the occupational health and safety of our population. Some of our workers have received injuries of varying degrees of seriousness as a result of the nature of their work. We have had cases of skin disease due to the handling of chemicals; deafness, due to excessive noise; pneumoconiosis, due to organic and inorganic fibrogenic dust.

To safeguard the health and the lives of our workforce, every precaution is taken to ensure that those companies that deal with a wide range of chemical substances, either in transporting, handling, storage or disposal of various dangerous chemical compounds, implement protective measures in accordance with the occupational safety standards and avoid such hazards as environmental pollution of either the air, the soil or the water.

Other precautionary measures include mounting intensive training programmes to arouse the awareness of the workforce towards the important subject of occupational health. There are, nevertheless, certain preventive and control measures, which as a developing country we cannot afford, particularly the replacement of outdated systems and operations with the introduction of sophisticated technology and automation capable of completely safeguarding the health and the safety of our workforce. However, being conscious of our obligation to protect the lives of our people, attention is being paid to the revision and formulation of appropriate legislation designed to enhance occupational health and safety standards within our industrial sector.

The concerns and programmes highlighted above underscore the importance that my Government attaches to the implementation of the ILO Conventions and Recommendations to enhance our social and economic development, while at the same time improving the capacity and quality of health, safety and environmental programmes. As mentioned earlier on, on the subject of industrial relations, it is noteworthy and reassuring to see that confrontations between the social partners have been considerably minimised. Another reason for this welcome development is the fact that several major industries have entered into meaningful negotiations with labour unions, aimed at the attainment of formal recognition agreements. It is my Government's hope that the cumulative effect of all these factors will ultimately secure lasting industrial peace and harmony between the social partners.

In conclusion permit me to congratulate the Director-General for preparing and submitting to our governments in good time, his comprehensive and thought-provoking Report that will inspire this august assembly in its search for practical and lasting solutions to the diverse social and economic problems confronting mankind. We live in and belong to a changing world, a world of interdependence where all nations, large and small, need each other. Therefore, it is my delegation's hope that this body, in its pursuit of the fundamental principles of human dignity, freedom of association and social justice, will make its contribution to the creation of a better world for all.

Original - French: Mr. SEHOULIA (Minister of the Public Service, Labour, Social Security and Vocational Training, Central African Republic) - I should like, on behalf of my delegation and on my own account, to express to the President my warmest congratulations on his election to the presidency of the 76th Session of our Conference. I also address my compliments to the Vice-Presidents elected by the Conference to second him in his task.

I also wish to convey to Mr. Michel Hansenne, our new Director-General, the congratulations of the Central African Government on his election as head of the International Labour Office for a five-year term of office. His competence, his experience and his brilliant career in the administration of his own country constitute precious assets which the International Labour Office may be proud to have at its disposal in the pursuit of its lofty and exalting mission of ensuring the well-being of man in his social and work environment with a view to ensuring lasting peace in the world.

I should be failing in my duty if I did not pay a warm tribute to Mr. Francis Blanchard who has left his post at the head of the International Labour Office to which he had devoted himself body and soul with such dedication, skill and selflessness. My country will always be grateful to him for his wide-ranging achievements during his years of office.

We regret the loss of an eminent member of the directorate of the International Labour Office, Mr. Elimane Kane, whom death snatched away from us in the prime of life. This distinguished senior official, whose enthusiasm was contagious, was a leading African figure. He was always available to listen to those who wished to speak to him and knew how to take the right decisions to meet their expectations.

While welcoming the efforts made in the political sphere to guarantee world peace as manifested by the principle of peaceful coexistence between different social regimes and by the extinction of some of the fires of conflict all over the world, we cannot fail to feel anxiety about the economic crisis which afflicts all the countries of the globe.

It is accordingly quite appropriate that the Director-General has once again focused the attention of the world on a subject of burning topicality: Recovery and employment.

The selection of economic recovery and employment as the main theme of the Director-General's Report offers further evidence of his pragmatism and determination to attack the most topical and crucial problems of the day with a view to resolving them.

It is a fact that the creation of productive jobs and the relief of poverty still constitute the main challenge taken up by the Organisation in the quest of its ideal of ensuring the quality of life all over the world.

I should have liked to share the Director-General's optimism as expressed in the generous ideas set out in his exhaustive and detailed Report, but the worldwide situation resulting from world economic resurgence may conceal inequalities in ill-equipped countries like mine, resulting from the little solidarity shown us by other countries.

The Central African Republic, a land-locked enclave, suffers from this situation which hampers the import and export of its products.

The efforts made by the Government of my country are balked by a series of negative factors which hold back the pace of its development.

Unemployment is one of the most serious problems that the Central African Republic has had to face since independence and we have finally realised that the best solution to this problem lies in the success of our development strategy.

The Government of my country has taken measures to this effect, including the setting up of a Central Council for Training and Employment to ensure that training is adjusted to employment. Other measures relate to the organisation of training periods in public enterprises, mixed-economy companies and private firms for young university graduates to enable them to acquire the experience they need to facilitate their integration in productive work.

This strategy is based on one of the fundamental ideas of His Excellency, General André Kolingba, President of the Republic and Head of State, who stated: "The first and by far the most important form of equality is employment for all. In this connection, the integration of young people in work and permanent retraining facilities for workers must remain a constant preoccupation".

This remark bears witness to a constant preoccupation on the part of the Head of State for social policy in the Central African Republic. It is in this context that one should view the importance attached to education and training for citizens of all ages and of both sexes.

Furthermore, in order to promote rural development, small and medium-sized enterprises and small and medium-sized industries, the Government has instituted a programme of technical counselling assistance and training for young people. This does not relate directly to employment as such, but is designed to develop a sense of discipline and responsibility and a willingness to work hard.

At the village level, there is encouragement for the setting up of rural and pastoral groups for community development; these groups assist peasants and stock-breeders with the marketing of their produce and help with the installation of collective amenities such as village pharmacies, wells, schools and dispensaries.

This determination to create jobs and improve living conditions in rural areas is clearly expressed in the Five-Year Plan for 1986-90, in conformity with our desire to become self-reliant as regards food supplies.

The Government of my country appreciates to the full the assistance granted to us in this respect by the International Labour Organisation and the friendly countries which have offered their support. It is in full confidence that it hopes this support will not only be continued but increased.

It is obvious that we must do what we can for ourselves before turning to others for help. We have accordingly established areas of priority and seek assistance only if it is indispensable.

At the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference in 1988, on this very rostrum, I had to reply to unfounded accusations, accompanied by threats, levelled at the Central African Government by certain countries and international trade union organisations alleging violation of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

It is with great regret that we have to inform you that despite our political will, as clearly expressed in this respect through the adoption of an Act relating to freedom of association and protection of the right to organise, these threats have been put into practice.

My country has thus just had economic sanctions imposed upon it by a major Power. We should like to attribute this to a misunderstanding, a misinterpretation or a lack of information.

I should in fact like to take this opportunity to inform this distinguished assembly that the primary concerns which have always guided the Government, presided over by His Excellency, General André Kolingba, President of the Republic, Head of State, Chairman and Founder of our single great party, the Central African United Democratic Party, is the establishment of national, democratic institutions.

Patience, concerted effort and dialogue are the ideals which shape our decisions. We have always avoided precipitous action, which often leads to failure.

Thus, the voting into force of the Constitution in 1986, the election of Members of Parliament in 1987 and the municipal elections in 1988 were carried out successfully thanks to the policy of patience, prudence and concord pursued by the Central African Government.

This new policy for conducting the affairs of the State quickly enabled us to put behind us the distressing events which, prior to the coming to office of His Excellency, General André Kolingba as Head of the Central African nation on 1 September 1981, had brought us to the threshold of civil war before a truce could be agreed upon the trade unions.

It was accordingly vital for first of all of us to take a certain number of measures such as the restoration and consolidation of national unity, before allowing the resumption of trade union activities.

Our patience has been rewarded and we can forcefully proclaim that today in the Central African Republic, while the workers were hesitant at first, the restoration of trade union activities has taken place as a result of the promulgation of the Act respecting freedom of association and the protection of the right to organise; and this has now become a reality since both in the public and the private sectors the primary unions have now been set up.

It should be recalled that my country is one of the least developed in the world. It has its own constraints to contend with which have to be taken into account when undertaking any form of action. Our desire has always been to have responsible trade unionists who are respectful of the institutions and laws of the State and can really contribute toward the economic and social development efforts of our country. This attitude should not be interpreted as a rejection of the trade union movement because we are a country of dialogue and co-operation with a view to the consolidation and success of our democracy.

The Central African Republic aspires to lasting peace both within its borders and in the world at large. It supports the tripartite agreement concluded with respect to Namibia, appreciates and encourages the efforts currently being made to enable a lasting and satisfactory solution to be reached within the set time-limit. However, it deplores the perpetuation of the regime of apartheid in South Africa.

In 1988, the International Labour Organisation carried out encouraging activities in the field of human rights, the promotion of equality, labour administration and legislation, as well as industrial relations. The items on the agenda of the present Conference are important and will certainly be receiving close attention from delegates.

The revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107), night work, and safety in the use of chemicals at work are all problems whose solution will contribute to improving the conditions of work and life of the workers.

Thank you once again for giving me the opportunity to bring to the Conference the contribution of the Central African Republic and I wish the Conference every success.

(The Conference adjourned at 6.15 p.m.)

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

The PRESIDENT (Mrs. MOLKOVA) – We shall resume our discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General.

Sir Frank WALCOTT (Workers' delegate, Barbados) – I should like to join the other speakers in congratulating Mr. Nkomo on his election to preside over this 76th Session of the Conference. I am confident that under his able and experienced guidance we will be able to reach successful conclusions on the matters before us.

The meeting provides us with the opportunity to publicly welcome our new Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, who comes to this august position with all the appurtenances which mark him for success in his future endeavours. The Director-General, by training and experience, is obviously well-qualified to lead this Organisation into the last decade of the twentieth century and to meet the myriad problems which cry out for solution and assistance from this eminent tripartite Organisation. We therefore publicly wish to congratulate the Director-General on his election and to wish him a happy and successful tour of duty.

At the same time, we must indicate the pleasure it has been to be associated with the former Director-General, the distinguished Mr. Francis Blanchard, over the past years, as he meticulously and efficiently executed the duties of his high office. Over a span of almost 15 years, many of which were characterised by international problems and difficulties, Mr. Blanchard managed to steer the course of the Office with deft precision, so that at the end of the course, the Organisation has maintained its buoyancy and rides on an even keel.

Mr. Blanchard came to his office in the mid-1970s at a time when the international recession was reaching a critical peak, and at a stage when the problem of unemployment was a matter of pressing international concern. His period also saw the second crisis of the early 1980s. Throughout his tenure he has used his office as Director-General to suggest methods of encouraging economic growth while paying attention to equity, fair play and justice.

Let me take this opportunity to congratulate Mr. Blanchard on his successful tour of duty, and to wish him a long and happy life.

As a representative of the labour movement in the Caribbean, I continue to be concerned at the slow pace at which the apparent wave of prosperity in the developed world is impacting on the poorer nations of the developing world, and particularly, the small nation states of the Caribbean.

Unemployment remains the major problem and has the potential of seriously disrupting the social peace of this area. In some countries, levels of unemployment reach as high as 30 per cent and in my own country, Barbados, it has reached the level of 18.6 per cent. As is the experience of other countries, the burden of unemployment falls hardest on young people and women. In the case of young people, the level of unemployment is double that of the national average. The labour movement has been constant in its call for action to control and reverse this virulent social problem.

We recognise that a mixture of macro- and micro-economic policies will be necessary to combat this social problem. Indeed, in an effort to recover from the crippling effects of recessions of the 1970s and 1980s, governments have introduced structural adjustment programmes, many of which have had unpalatable social consequences, sometimes leading to hostile and violent reactions from the workers. In our region, economies which have been considered strong and able to withstand economic shocks have experienced severe trauma with catastrophic results.

We are concerned that the efforts of most of the Caribbean governments to promote growth and development will be frustrated unless the developed world and the multilateral development agencies adopt a more relevant policy of assistance to this region. Unless these positive steps of assistance are taken, and soon, the standard of living of the worker in these areas will continue to deteriorate, with negative effects on the survival of democracy.

The crippling debt problem is a matter that must be addressed. Growing debt repayment obligations are seriously affecting the ability of Caribbean governments to maintain the real wages of their employees, and in many of these countries government is a major employer and will remain so in the foreseeable future. In some cases, massive redundancies have become the order of the day. In others, expenditures on social services have been seriously eroded.

Furthermore, access to the capital markets of the world, especially those where concessionary borrowing is possible, has been seriously reduced. This has had a severe negative impact, and infrastructural development over the past decade has been seriously neglected. The resulting cost in loss of productivity is likely to postpone future chances of growth and development for some time.

For those countries where governments have attempted to reduce the need for borrowing by attempting to create budgetary surpluses which are marked for capital development, the stimulation of taxation can prove to be politically unpopular and can lead to other destabilising elements.

Debt management and debt servicing remain the major problems of these small Caribbean countries. Debt is a major challenge to the ingenuity and discipline of the governments of the region. It is one that must receive responsive and sympathetic consideration from the more affluent creditor nations if we are to avoid further social and political unrest in these small democracies.

The efforts of small countries with open economies, lacking economic diversification, to overcome the problems facing them and move on to a path of structural transformation, must be encouraged.

More than ever before, these countries need assistance in improving their tradeable goods sectors, to participate in export trade. This is the only way they will be able to pay their way in the world and provide a reasonable standard of living for their members.

Efforts must be made to dismantle the trade restrictions and barriers that prevent access of the goods produced by these countries to the markets of the more affluent. We recognise that domestic arrangements affecting competitiveness and other matters must be addressed, but we see growth in the export sector as crucial for development in the Caribbean area, if the workers are to maintain their living standards, and if jobs are to be created for future workers.

In closing, let me express my satisfaction at three important international developments: the progress made towards a resolution of the problems of Namibia; the positive moves towards nuclear disarmament; and the movement toward democratic systems of government world-wide. These developments all augur well for the future of mankind.

Original – French: Mr. KARIKURUBU (Minister of Labour and Vocational Training, Burundi) – First of all, on behalf of the Government of the Republic of Burundi, on behalf of my delegation and on my own behalf, I would like to congratulate Mr. Nkomo, the Minister of Labour and Social Affairs of Zimbabwe, on his highly merited election to preside over the work of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference.

Although my Government has already done this in the past, I should like to congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne yet again on being elected Director-General of the International Labour Office. His visit to my country a few months after he took up his duties on the occasion of the Twelfth Regular Session of the Organisation of African Unity's Labour Committee, bears witness to his interest in solving the problems of the African continent.

The congratulations and tributes of the Government of Burundi are also addressed to Mr. Francis Blanchard, the outgoing Director-General of the ILO.

I should like to comment briefly on Part I of the Report, dealing with recovery and employment, with particular reference to the social and economic situation of the African continent and the possibilities for recovery advocated by Burundi.

Economic recovery and employment is a subject of concern to our countries and governments at the highest level because it affects the life and existence of a large part of the world's population, which at the moment is facing the heavy burdens of economic recession. In other words, the subject is a timely one and my delegation thanks those responsible within the ILO for having programmed this.

The economic crisis that is shaking the world, its reasons, its negative consequences on the employment and living conditions of our populations and, on the other hand, the possibilities for recovery have been presented with great clarity, objectivity and discernment in the Report.

In sub-Saharan Africa, poverty is increasing and becoming more widespread. The Secretariat-General of the Organisation of African Unity estimates that half of the population of this region lives below the absolute poverty threshold. This situation is essentially due to the problems of employment, including unemployment, underemployment and the drop in the real value of wages and income in both the modern and the informal sectors. This crisis in employment has negative repercussions on several other areas such as health, education, nutrition, housing, etc.

The solutions that have been put forward up till now to bring the economic and employment crisis to an end have consisted of economic stabilisation and structural adjustment. More than 30 countries in sub-Saharan Africa have already undertaking such programmes. Despite the efforts made, these countries have not yet recorded any tangible results and what is more worrying is that there is considerable evidence to show that such programmes, as they are normally designed, cannot produce impressive results. There is, therefore, controversy in Africa as to how such recovery programmes should be designed.

My country, Burundi, recognises itself in the Director-General's Report as being amongst the poor countries that are experiencing more than others the difficulties that bar the way to development.

The economic crisis and its negative effects on employment have not spared Burundi. There has been no significant growth in employment in the modern sector, particularly in the civil service.

The private sector, although encouraged by an economic liberalisation policy, remains timid in its development.

The informal sector has seen considerable underemployment and unemployment among unskilled young people is spreading. On top of all these problems, servicing the foreign debt is a heavy burden on the meagre resources of Burundi, derived essentially from the exports of such agricultural products as coffee, tea and cotton, which are not bought at a just price, as everyone knows.

To deal with the situation, Burundi has for a number of years now followed the example of other developing countries in undertaking economic stabilisation programmes and structural adjustment programmes covering many sectors of the country's economic life.

These programmes include, inter alia, the rigorous application of monetary and financial measures designed to reduce the budget deficit and improve the balance of payments; the introduction of a number of incentive measures to promote the private sector, domestic savings and exports; and increased credit in the economy.

Since 3 September 1987, the date when the Third Republic presided over by His Excellency, Major Pierre Buyoya, was established, the Government of Burundi has, in addition to the measures previously mentioned, brought about a political environment at home and abroad favourable to improvements in the economic and social situation throughout the country.

At home, social justice, peace and tranquillity for the whole population, necessary for development, have all been reinforced. The fundamental question of national unity, which has often been brushed aside by previous regimes, has been settled by agreement in a manner which all citizens of Burundi hope will remain. Social dialogue and open co-operation are taking place at all levels of national life. Permanent concertation between both sides of industry on all aspects of the employment problem has become a reality.

As regards foreign affairs, the Third Republic has improved and reinforced its relations of friendship and co-operation with all the countries and international bodies which have been its partners in development.

In this connection, it has made the efforts necessary to organise, together with the Secretariat General of the OAU, the Twelfth Regular Session of the Labour Committee of the OAU, which was held in Bujumbura from 29 March to 4 April of this year.

Despite all these efforts, the Burundi Government is realising more and more that growth in the economy and employment are an uphill task which has to be looked at in both the medium and the long term, as stated in the Director-General's Report.

As it told the Round Table of development partners, held in Bujumbura from 26 to 29 April of this year, my Government is convinced that economic stabilisation programmes, and structural adjustment programmes in Burundi, and probably also in other developing countries, should be designed to lead to an improvement in the living conditions of populations, not forgetting the poorest or most vulnerable sectors of the population.

Conventional shortterm recovery programmes aimed at bringing about a macro-economic balance pay little attention to the social imbalances due to the economic crisis and structural adjustment. Social projects and programmes dealing with employment, health, education and nutrition should be an integral part of structural adjustment programmes.

The Government of Burundi agrees with the Director-General that economic growth and social progress must develop together and that the economy and social factors can clearly not be separated. Economic programmes have social implications and vice versa. My Government also understands that the positive effect of social measures on economic development should never be underestimated. For these reasons the social sphere is given due importance in our five-year economic and social plan for 1988-92.

The structural adjustment programmes will not have any positive satisfactory results for the developing countries unless they are carried out in a favourable international economic environment. Indeed, the efforts made by the developing countries are annihilated by servicing foreign debt. The interest rates are constantly growing, while foreign currency income is being whittled away owing to the deterioration in raw material prices and the reduction in public aid and foreign investment.

All countries are now interdependent, as stressed at the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment organised by the ILO in November 1987, so structural adjustment problems are relevant to the whole world, both the developing and the industrialised countries.

An adjustment effort at international level has therefore to be taken. The price should be equitably borne by all countries, according to their individual means.

The Director-General's Report and the conclusions of the High-Level Meeting that I have mentioned demonstrate sufficiently that improvement in the social and economic situation in developing countries is also a benefit to industrialised countries. They should therefore take the necessary measures to increase development aid.

Urgent measures are necessary to give tangible form to the many promises that have been made at international gatherings to write off the foreign debt of poor countries and alleviate debt-repayment conditions for those that can afford it. We welcome here the propitious action taken by the French President to write off the debt of the most indebted African countries.

Burundi hopes that other developed countries will follow this excellent example, which provides oxygen to exhausted economies.

Before finishing, the Burundi Government would like to denounce the inhuman conditions experienced by workers and the Black populations of South Africa and Namibia and also by the people of Palestine. For these millions of human beings economic growth and employment will be vain words unless they recover their liberty and their right to life.

The wish of my delegation is that the Conference, over the present session, might propose action which could contribute to speeding up the process of independence in Namibia and intensify assistance to the liberation movements of South Africa and the frontline nations.

In this way, the International Labour Organisation will yet again have helped to enhance respect for the fundamental human rights in order to build a more just and prosperous world.

Original - Portuguese: Mr. DE JESUS (Government delegate, Angola) - I would like first of all to congratulate His Excellency Mr. John Nkomo, Minister of Labour, Planning and Social Affairs of Zimbabwe, on his election to the post of President of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. We are convinced that the work of this session will have positive results, thanks to his experience and political qualities.

We warmly congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne on his appointment to the post of Director-General of the ILO. Our best wishes go to him for a smooth path in the management of the ILO's affairs.

I also have the pleasure of expressing our gratitude to Mr. Francis Blanchard for all the work he has undertaken throughout his mandate to promote and consolidate the aims of the ILO.

The 76th Session set itself an agenda in which we give special emphasis to the contents of the Director-General's Report.

The topics of the Report reflect to the concerns of a large majority of members from developing countries and indicate close follow-up on matters that have a bearing on our developing economies.

The Angolan delegation which, this time, also includes representatives of the Chamber of Commerce and Industry, is gratified by the Director-General's contribution to the debate on a topic as controversial as this one. We share his opinion and his concern, as expressed in the Report.

The topic and the scope of economic recovery and employment represent for a great number of us one of the best solutions to the economic crisis which besets us. In the Third World, and particularly in Africa, the grave consequences of the economic crisis are visible, extremely visible, in material, social and cultural aspects of life, especially for the workers.

This disastrous situation has been analysed in detail by earlier speakers and requires a broadly-based and comprehensive restructuring of our economies.

The Government of Angola, faced with this situation, is now aware of the imbalances in the world economy and which are worsened by imbalances between savings and investment, by the huge gap between supply and demand of goods and services. For this reason it has undertaken the following: financial measures to restore the financial equilibrium, economic measures to harmonize supply and demand with the overall wage fund; in other words, to find solutions for insolvent sectors of the economy and for those lacking resources to make them profitable, balancing the budget and giving banks the capacity to make their capital viable while enabling the country to fulfil its foreign debt obligations.

This is our economic and financial improvement programme.

In doing this we have had to devise the means of carrying out this action, particularly in the biennial Plan for Economic Recovery.

The concerns about social policy appear in the Plan for Economic Recovery and we are trying to ensure a balance between trade and salaries and to resolve the unemployment situation caused by our attempt to restructure enterprises and by our administrative reforms. We must set up the system of social security to reduce the pressure of young people on the labour markets.

Through this programme our Government has obviously recognised the inherent relationship and the harmony that should exist between activities and economic policy and social policy, as was so aptly stated by the Director-General in his Report.

In order to take measures to carry out these tasks in the field of social policy the Government of Angola maintains a very useful level of technical co-operation with the ILO. We now have a social security programme, and a project for a national system of professional training is underway.

Other projects that are presently suspended are projects on professional retraining and social economic integration of the handicapped, a national safety and occupational health programme, an employment and market information programme and a national labour statistics system.

Certain activities between the ILO and the Government will be necessary in order to start managing these important and sensitive areas of the administration of labour in Angola.

We are living through a very interesting experience in considering certain problems of administering labour in African countries of Portuguese language.

The need for institutional thinking came from our awareness of certain affinities among us and certain results that we have achieved have shown us the importance and the opportunities of developing as a group of States Members of ILO.

We have informed the Director-General of the ILO of our existence and we cannot, I feel, pass over in silence our preoccupation about not yet having heard any reply to our petitions. I am referring to the fact that the Portuguese-speaking African countries have not yet been recognised as a subregion in the African regional distribution of the ILO.

Characteristics of the administration of labour in Portuguese-speaking African countries make our requirements legitimate, and I am convinced that our request will be satisfied. The creation of an ILO office for the Portuguese-speaking African countries would be useful. Some of our countries have a great burden to bear as a result of war and other similar situations which have made the social and labour-related programmes even more complex and delicate, which is why we think it would be justified for the ILO to set up an emergency aid programme for our countries. We have been experiencing an effective technical co-operation exercise on a triangular basis in which we recognise the efforts deployed by the ILO to ensure its success and development. This is why we propose that other member States speaking Portuguese, Spanish or other languages be associated in it.

While we are holding this 76th Session important events are occurring throughout the world, among which are the peace process in southern Africa and the independence of Namibia, the struggle to improve the conditions of life and work of the Palestinian population in the occupied Arab territories and the struggle to eradicate apartheid.

These events are well known, as is the important and indispensable part played by the Government of Angola in the peace process in southern Africa and in the independence of Namibia.

I feel that the noble objectives pursued by the ILO will lead this session to adopt a motion of support for every effort undertaken to promote social justice, peace and dialogue.

This year the ILO is celebrating its 70th anniversary. Throughout these 70 years a great deal of work has been done to mobilise and consolidate national social policies in different international economic situations despite different political attitudes and we feel the results have been positive and encouraging.

Today, the ideals pursued by the ILO are of constant concern to all member States and, although the emphases may vary, the objectives of social justice, social concertation, stable employment, safety at work and social protection are an integral part of the programmes of action of the labour administrations of member States.

To conclude therefore, we hope the Director-General will pursue with vigour the mission of the ILO so that today as well as tomorrow the voice of humanity's social conscience will reach every corner of the world with the same intensity and carry the same message.

Mr. KHAN (Workers' delegate, Bangladesh) – It is a privilege and honour to represent my country's workers and to address the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. The Government of Bangladesh is proud that its country has been a member of the ILO since 1972 and I am proud to be able to attend this august gathering. It is a great pleasure for me, on behalf of my country and of the millions of workers of Bangladesh, to congratulate Mr. Nkomo on his election as President of this session of the Conference and to congratulate the Vice-Presidents, who were elected from three groups, and wish them every success. I am confident that, given the able guidance, wisdom, ability and experience of the President and Vice-Presidents, the Conference will come to a successful conclusion.

Permit me also to congratulate the Director-General of the ILO on the admirable Report he has placed before this Conference. This Report contains a comparative review of the ILO's activities during the year 1988 and sets out what the Organisation proposes to do in the year 1989. The Report's wise proposals will certainly lead to better conditions for the workers of the world at large.

I belong to the Jatiya Sramik Party, which is the largest workers' federation in Bangladesh, representing almost all sectors of labour. This party was formed by the merging of five major national workers' federations in 1986. Since that time, the party has become affiliated with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) with which it has been working hand in hand for the betterment of the world's labour force.

Democracy was established in Bangladesh following the parliamentary election held in 1986. The present Government, under the dynamic leadership of President Hossain Mohammed Ershad, has undertaken tremendous development work. It has adopted a pragmatic programme for the systematic development of both private and public sector industries with a view to lessening the burden of subsidy on the treasury and placing these industries under efficient private control and management. The Government also promulgated the Bangladesh Industrial Enterprises Ordinance in 1987 which provides for the creation of holding companies for each of the enterprises incorporated under the public sector. While the Government retains 51 per cent of the share capital, 34 per cent has been offered to the general public and 15 per cent to workers of the industries concerned. This step has been taken to ensure participation of private individuals and workers in the management of enterprises and to reach the ultimate goal of increasing productivity for the overall growth of economy.

Steps have also been taken to create a favourable rate of development among financial institutions. The present Government has adopted legal and administrative measures for safeguarding workers' rights and interests and the share of workers in the company's profit has been increased from 2 to 5 per cent. The compensation rates for injuries and disabilities have been increased under the amended provision of the Workmen's Compensation Act. The Government has also taken steps to upgrade the skills and efficiency of workers by introducing various courses in vocational training institutes, technical training centres and industrial relations institutes. In addition, the existing tripartite machinery has been enhanced, with a view to associating the Government, management and the workers in the formulation of development policies and programmes, in the amendment and adoption of laws and in the maintenance of peaceful industrial relations. A favourable climate has thus been created for foreign investment and the results have been encouraging.

Bangladesh has been repeatedly stricken by devastating cyclones, floods and tidal bores since 1987. Loss of life and property is a common occurrence. Nearly half of the population was affected by the flood in 1988. Thousands of people have been flooded by high tides in the past. I extend my gratitude to the friendly countries and international community who helped us in our time of distress and need. However, emergency assistance is not a permanent solution. The effort of a single nation is not adequate to solve such problems, which require international attention. I therefore appeal to the ILO and to the other international organisations and the communities of the world to come forward with assistance for a permanent solution to these recurring problems so as to prevent the disruption of economic activities.

The trade unions in Bangladesh are now working well, enjoying full freedom of association, benefiting from the right to organise and engaging in collective bargaining. Workers are now free to join any union of their choice without prior consent. There are at present 19 registered federations and 3,436 registered trade unions working in the country.

The majority of the workers in developing countries, including Bangladesh, are not getting proper training facilities in and outside of their countries. Proper training is essential for increased efficiency and production. The existing training arrangement in Bangladesh is not at all adequate to train the country's millions of workers. A proposal was made to introduce a workers' education programme in Bangladesh with ILO assistance. But the Organisation has not implemented such a programme in spite of long waiting. I again appeal to the ILO to arrange early implementation of a workers' education programme in my country. The developing countries, including Bangladesh, need increased ILO technical assistance, now more than ever before. Such assistance is needed to overcome food shortages, unemployment and sluggish production.

The garment industry in Bangladesh is now experiencing growth. This sector provides a good number of jobs to the unemployed rural poor, widows and the unemployed youths. The barriers to garments exports should be eased to help further improve the employment situation in our country.

Our Government's labour policy is based mainly on tripartism. The Tripartite Consultative Committee of Bangladesh is now working well. Government, employers and workers are equally represented among the 45 members of the Committee, which is chaired by the Minister of Labour and Manpower. Many problems are solved amicably in this Committee through discussion and negotiation. The Committee met twice in the last year.

We are most concerned about the safety and health of workers. All enterprises, whether public, private or multinational, should strictly follow the provisions of the 1965 Factories Act and of other labour laws. All enterprises should strictly observe health and safety provisions not only in the workplace but also in its vicinity. They must provide every information concerning risks and hazards to the workers engaged in their operations.

The evil apartheid system prevailing in South Africa must be eliminated. The ILO and other international organisations should join forces to effectively end this regime. We consider that every measure must be taken against this racist regime and full support should be extended to the liberation movement in South Africa and to the South West Africa People's Organisation (SWAPO).

I should undoubtedly be failing in my duty if I did not thank the present ILO personnel working at headquarters and in the Area Office at Dhaka, Bangladesh. It would certainly be an act of ingratitude if I failed to thank my Government, my co-workers and my associates in Bangladesh whose constant assistance, co-operation, guidance and advice has really helped us to fulfil the ILO commitment to standard-setting in our country.

Mr. ADUGNA (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Ethiopia) – On behalf of the delegation of the Government of the People's Democratic Republic of Ethiopia and myself, I would like to congratulate Mr. Nkomo and the other Officers on their election to preside over this august assembly. May I also seize this opportunity to congratulate the new Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, on his appointment. Let me further thank the former Director-General, Mr. Francis Blanchard, for his comprehensive Report and his long years of service to the ILO.

I have read this informative Report with interest and have been able to observe that, in spite of the encouraging rate of growth of the economy of the developed countries, much of the Third World, to which my country belongs, is sinking deeper into debt and are net exporters of capital, a situation which has to be reversed if a continuing crisis is to be averted. The main factors in the economic crisis of the 1980s, as stated in the Report, were the slowdown of the world economy as a whole, the deterioration of trade of the developing countries, the general rise in interest rates, the introduction of new trade barriers even by those countries which advance free trade proposals, and the decline in capital availability.

It is rightly stated that the 1980s for most of the developing countries, and particularly sub-Saharan Africa, was a lost decade. The severe debt burden and balance-of-payment crises are assuming unbearable proportions. And although there is a lot of talk about restructuring with a human face and a round of meetings of the various United Nations bodies, we have yet to feel the refreshing effect of the lightening of the social cost burden. Many are those who are sacrificed on the altar of ill-conceived restructuring, have sunk further below the poverty line, with all the political and social consequences that has entailed.

It is quite befitting that the International Labour Organisation, which has always advocated the cause of social progress and justice, organised the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment, which was an excellent forum where ideas that would assist in regaining what was lost in the last decade were presented. The new socio-economic realities require adjustments not only in national economic policies but also in international economic relations since the two are interdependent and complementary. May I reaffirm the assurances of my Government in supporting this renewed awareness in finding a global approach to the solution of the prevailing socio-economic crises.

I will, however, hasten to add that prescriptions of the role of a State will have to be based on thorough empirical analysis of country-specific situations, and that applying blanket solutions indiscriminately will have to be avoided.

Considering the African realities, particularly in the sub-Saharan region, the economic stagnation during this period has further been compounded by natural calamities and adverse external developments. In addition to the slow growth in the world economy, the perverse development in the commodity markets and the financial problems including debt and debt-servicing burdens, poor weather conditions have continued to plague the sub-continent.

The drought that swept through the continent has caused immense damage, to such an extent that many of the countries engulfed by the crises were incapacitated to attain genuine economic development and to generate employment. For the sub-Saharan African countries to get the economy moving once again and improve the socio-economic conditions is an honourable task.

African agriculture is still dependent on the weather conditions and traditional subsistence agriculture remains vulnerable to the vagaries of nature. In order to rectify this phenomenon and develop the rural areas into havens that can sustain a comfortable and stable way of life, we have to conserve water and work hard at protecting the environment and evolve countervailing measures to drought and desertification.

Another chronic problem that deserves serious attention in Africa today is the sharp deterioration of the employment situation and the high population growth rate swelling the demographic tide in labour supply. Youth, the major sector of society, bears the brunt of the problem of unemployment, in spite of numerous measures taken to reverse this trend. In this regard, special consideration must also be given to policies and programmes geared towards improving employment-creation prospects that include both the formal and informal sectors.

The overall direction and major emphasis of development in Ethiopia is the improvement and elevation of the material, social and cultural life of our people through the provision of the basic necessities of life, decent housing, basic health care, free education, employment and other social services and promoting the concept of the dignity of labour and the principle of self-reliance.

For the achievement of the above measures and strategies we have adopted the multisectoral approach, with the agricultural sector, which is the backbone of our economy, being allotted the highest priority in terms of investment. Radical measures have been taken to restructure the agricultural sector. Besides making land available to the tiller, farmers have been organised into peasant associations which have become focal points for the economic, political and social transformation of the rural sector. People's participation in all aspects of their livelihood has brought about better performance in agricultural production. Farmers are now being provided as far as is possible with new techniques of farming, better seeds and fertilisers to improve their production still further. The strengthening and invigorating of the rural economy, we believe, will generate massive employment opportunities and check the tide of rural-urban migration.

In view of the rapid growth of the unemployment problem in Ethiopia the Government has taken steps to ensure the strengthening of the co-operatives and has encouraged the productivity of the informal sector.

Realising the importance of the urban and rural informal sectors in generating employment as well as in the production of basic goods and services, the Party and Government of the People's Democratic Republic of Ethiopia have taken concrete steps in strengthening the small-scale industries sector, and creating an appropriate atmosphere for joint venture investment in the country.

The third phase of the Ten-Year Perspective Plan has given serious consideration to manpower development, assessment of the employment situation and measures to enhance productivity. Objectives proposed in the Plan cover ways and means of generating employment opportunities, raising the level of productivity and developing the rural areas to be attractive for youth by offering a vibrant economic activity.

Regarding measures to improve youth employment opportunities the Government of socialist Ethiopia has tried to enhance youth employability through the development of skill and vocational training facilities, and by creating opportunities for continuing education.

With regard to the problem of school drop-outs, and also the sections of our society who have never had the opportunity to attend the formal school system, informal education programmes are provided. Realising the high cost of expanding the formal education with a heavy polytechnic content we recognise the need for a different educational orientation directly related to the daily life of rural communities. It is also the policy of the Government to implement non-formal education programmes for the out-of-school population of all age groups. The approach is based on correspondence courses and evening classes and programmes providing literacy training and imparting useful knowledge, attitudes and skills to enhance their employment opportunities and offer them a fuller and more productive life.

The Government of Ethiopia has made considerable efforts to realign the educational structure in order to achieve rapid socio-economic changes through improved quality of education at all levels. The ongoing literacy campaign aimed at waging war against illiteracy is currently in its 21st round, and the literacy rate in 1988 has reached 71 per cent. The considerable increase in the number of polytechnic and vocational schools bear witness to our serious concern about the ever-growing problem of youth unemployment.

Let me now turn to the problem of apartheid, the sore from which all humanity is suffering. The South African Government still inflicts injustice on the Black people of South Africa by denying political, social, economic, legal and human rights to the large majority. Its destabilisation policy of the front-line States and neighbouring independent African States, particularly Mozambique and Angola, endangering regional peace and security, has continued. Black workers suffer from institutionalised racism and trade union leaders suffer harassment, torture and even death. Illegal and unwarranted interference with the activities of trade unions, declining real wages of workers, failure of welfare benefit systems, a life below the poverty line in the midst of plenty, and unemployment characterise the situation in South Africa. We have to rededicate our efforts and to act effectively for the removal of this heinous practice of apartheid.

I would like to take this opportunity to commend the ILO for its assistance to the front-line States in their efforts to reintegrate migrant workers expelled from South Africa and also for the technical co-operation programmes for the front-line States and national liberation movements. The situation in South Africa today calls for decisive and urgent action by all States devoted to peace and the high ideals enshrined in the Charter of the United Nations. My delegation considers that all members of the ILO must go beyond expressions of solidarity with the oppressed peoples of South Africa and Namibia and deliver the content of our declarations – for a start, at least impose total and mandatory economic sanctions to loosen the stranglehold of apartheid on our brothers and sisters in South Africa. There are still unfulfilled promises, unattained goals and unmet challenges which await our concerted and united efforts. We have to convert our idealism into practical realities, otherwise our own utterances will judge us.

Mr. JEŠIĆ (Employers' delegate, Yugoslavia) – I would like to congratulate the President on his election and express confidence that his highly responsible duty at this session of the International Labour Conference will be performed with full success.

I would like also to express thanks to Mr. Francis Blanchard, who for 15 years greatly contributed to ILO's growing role and reputation in the world. At the same time, my best wishes are addressed to Mr. Michel Hansenne, the newly elected Director-General of the ILO.

At the Yugoslav Chamber of Economy, which represents the employers here, the materials prepared for this gathering have been studied with utmost care. The documents prepared give a realistic and objective assessment of the state and the development of the world economy, a detailed presentation of the ILO work so far, that the future work has to be planned in compliance with the objectives formulated before and the positive experiences gained from ILO work and actions in the past. From the debate at the Conference we can see that the positive assessments predominate and we are glad that the Conference will turn to its future tasks with vigour.

The basis for identifying these tasks and for singling out those of major importance for the International Labour Organisation has been provided in our view by the high-quality Report of the Director-General, particularly its Part I concerning economic recovery and employment.

We are pleased that in the past period, progress was made in the reduction of overall tension in the world. The general international climate is characterised by increased confidence, the big Powers are taking new initiatives for disarmament, and so on.

However, the economic picture of the world has hardly shown any improvement. The developing countries have had a net capital outflow for a number of years, their GNP per capita is declining, their share in global trade is diminishing, unemployment in the world is growing. Particularly unfavourable are the indicators of economic development and of the overall situation in countries with a high level of debt. No new, fully elaborated and applicable proposals for the solution of the debt crisis exist. The creditors' strategy is not changing. Inflation is highest in countries with a heavy debt burden and this fact makes structural adjustment, on which both creditors and governments of debtor countries insist, still more difficult.

As you know, my country, Yugoslavia, is among the countries which have a heavy debt burden. In recent years its development has been showing all the main characteristics noted in other countries in a similar economic position including the so-called social costs of structural changes the ILO Director-General speaks about, that is reduced investments for all social needs, decline in personal income of the employed, etc.

After serious preparations in preceding years, significant changes were introduced in the economic system in Yugoslavia in 1988 with a view to activating to the maximum the internal forces for economic development and to carrying out further changes in the economic structure. The changes in the economic system and in economic policy continued in early 1989. By the end of 1988 amendments to the federal Constitution were made and new laws on enterprises, banks, foreign investments, foreign exchange operations, etc. were adopted. The most significant change introduced by this legislation is the substantial reduction in the administrative regulation of the economy, that is the enterprise or bank has become the basic, authentic market entity which implies clearly defined rights and responsibilities and full independence. Conditions have been created for very varied business initiatives of enterprises on the basis of social as well as private sector resources and for founding mixed enterprises with resources from the social and private sector. The doors are wide open for foreign investment, which means the conditions for business operations are fulfilled for foreign and domestic investment. As for taxes, it is the right of republican and local bodies to accord more favourable terms in the initial years to foreign investment, and this is also done, as a rule.

All foreign partners have expressed their great appreciation of the new course taken by the economic policy of our country and significant results were achieved last year, primarily reflected in Yugoslavia's external liquidity and in the rise in its foreign exchange reserves. What is our partner's concern is our major concern as well. It is high inflation. Relevant measures of the new economic policy are at present under discussion at the Yugoslav Assembly. We hope that a solution will be reached which will help maintain the results achieved so far and will first help to curb inflation and then to bring it down by the end of this year.

In this way conditions would be created for increased domestic capital formation and for its more rational investment, while foreign investors would show increased tangible interest in investments in Yugoslavia jointly with our social sector enterprises or private enterprises and persons, or independently on their own. Foreign investments can be made in all types of activity, banking included.

Under the new conditions favouring the establishment of new socially owned enterprises as well as private and mixed ones (on the basis of domestic and foreign investment), we expect – and our expectations have already been confirmed – that a large number of new firms will be set up. In addition, the Yugoslav market is completely open to foreign companies' fair competition.

The Yugoslav Chamber of Economy encompasses all enterprises, irrespective of the type of ownership. More influence than before in its activities is already being exerted by private and mixed enterprises. In socially owned enterprises the management is also facing the task of making as much profit as possible – and using this basis as the measure of success the decision will be taken whether the management will be replaced or not. These new conditions have placed the changes in the system of taxation and labour legislation on the agenda of the most responsible bodies in the country. These changes are in agreement with the interests of potential foreign investors. As active participants in defining and concluding collective agreements and as a group with influence on the elaboration of the taxation policy, our economic chambers are very interested in the experience of the work of employers' organisations in this area in countries with a developed market economy. We will ask the ILO for co-operation to make it possible for us to fulfil our role under the new conditions in the most effective way. The specific Yugoslav type of tripartism in this sphere will be realised with a new concrete content.

I will conclude my presentation with the statement that every country has to do its best to solve its own problems, to improve the living conditions of its citizens. This is obviously not possible without creating conditions for every citizen to do as much as he can for himself, in fair competition with others. However, interdependence in our present world is increasing and it does so continuously. The countries which can contribute most to the solution of issues of a global character, and these are the developed ones, bear particularly great responsibilities. This point has also been emphasised in the Report of the Director-General. I am of the opinion that the International Labour Organisation should continue, within the framework of the United Nations system and in other ways, to point to the current development-related problems of our modern world and contribute as much as possible to their solution. I feel that saying so is appropriate because the 70 years of ILO activities confirm the efficacy of such an orientation.

Mr. HYDER (Employers' delegate, Bangladesh) – I am indeed very pleased to have this opportunity to address the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference.

Let me begin by congratulating Mr. Nkomo on his election to the esteemed office of the President of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. I have also much pleasure in offering congratulations to the Vice-Presidents.

The 76th Session is taking place at a very critical juncture in time. The climate of high hopes and rapid growth which permeated the global economy in the fifties and sixties faced shattering shocks in the seventies. The debt crisis surfaced in the early eighties and further complicated international economic problems. In the process, apart from a few exceptions in Asia, the deceleration of growth rates in countries in both the North and the South continued unabated. What is worse and what should be borne in mind, is the fact that the fragile economies of the developing countries, particularly those of the least developed countries (LDCs), suffered serious set-backs in the process of structural adjustment, which was undertaken, it now appears, neglecting its cost in terms of growth and social progress.

In his Report, the Director-General has admirably summed up past experiences and identified the lessons that can be learnt from them, and has also charted a possible course of action to be followed during the 1990s.

An analysis of the experience of the 1980s is most interesting. As the Report stresses, the decade ends in a paradoxical situation. The main paradox concerns all the signs of dynamic activity present in most of the OECD countries and in some South-East Asian countries. On the other hand, the 1980s have, for most developing countries, been a lost decade and, consequently, in many of them per capita income is lower today than it was in the 1970s. The implications of this disquietening situation have been suitably treated in the Report. However, the Report, in Table 1, depicts international disparity in growth performance in a rather stereotyped fashion in the sense that countries are classified as industrial market economies, centrally planned economies and developing economies, the last one being sub-classified regionally. The LDCs of the developing economies should be treated separately both in an analytical framework and in a solution-oriented policy programme at the international level. The development experience of the last few decades had demonstrated convincingly that the trickle-down theory of the impact of growth is neither effective at the national level nor at the international level, in the sense that growth of the global economy does not mean growth for all countries. International economic relations have to be specifically geared and designed to ensure that the benefit of global growth is also shared by the LDCs. Target-oriented programmes should be designed for the LDCs at an international level during the Fourth Development Decade, otherwise global growth may continue to bypass LDCs. This strategy should be explicitly accepted by all the relevant international development agencies. The ILO, being more concerned with the human aspect of development, may place emphasis in this direction with the aim of creating a more equitable world economy. In this connection, I would like to draw attention to another paradox not mentioned in the Report, which I think vitiates international economic relations, particularly between the countries of the South and those of the North. The world is getting more interdependent with every passing day. The growing interdependence of the world economy is also witnessing what may be termed as a balkanisation of the global economy through the creation of economic blocks; along with the rising application of tariff and non-tariff barriers. A reversal of this trend is necessary for the healthy and equitable growth of the global economy. A change in the present trend is possible if public opinion about international economic relations changes, particularly in developed countries.

Political leaders, particularly in democratic societies, cannot ignore public opinion. The ILO being interested to see more equitable and stable societies at both the national and the international level may, perhaps, take some imaginative approach for moulding public opinion to ensure the adoption of policies for equitable as well as more stable world economies. The ILO's concern in this direction has already been reflected in its World Employment Programme of the 1960s and in the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment in November, 1987. Some initiatives in this regard, I feel, should be taken by the ILO on the eve of the Fourth Development Decade.

The Director-General's Report has rightly pointed out that "preoccupation with pressing short-term problems had the unfortunate effect of diverting much attention from the need to generate employment and alleviate poverty". Many developing countries at the beginning of the 1980s pursued monetary and fiscal policies which resulted in a reduction of GDP growth and in some cases, the absolute contraction of per capita GDP. In international economic relations, it entailed the curtailment of imports, which rose by only 0.5 per cent annually during 1980-86 compared to 5.5 per cent during 1975-80. If China and India are excluded, the absolute volume of imports in all developing countries was lower than during the 1980s. While this adversely affected consumption levels and hindered production capacities in these countries, the exports of the industrialised market-economy countries (IMECs) to the developing countries declined by 3.7 per cent annually during 1981-86, compared to an expansion of around 18 per cent annually during 1975-80. The above figures demonstrate unmistakably the common economic destiny of the interdependent global economy. As the Report has shown very aptly, the short-term oriented strategy of so-called structural adjustment also entailed a huge social cost at the national level. The deceleration of growth meant less employment creation whilst the unemployment and the underemployment problem was already staggering. It also resulted in the decline of real wages, the deterioration of the quality of jobs created and, most importantly, the reduction of government expenditure in the social sector, for example, in education, health, housing and welfare.

In the light of the experience of the 1980s, the strategy proposed in the Director-General's Report, that structural adjustment has to occur in a context of growth rather than stagnation or contraction, is well thought out. This will, however, require attention to be paid to a set of wider-ranging issues than just adjustment by means of macro-economic policy.

It is unfortunate that the framework for structural adjustment and equitable growth as enunciated in the Report does not explicitly identify any role for the developed countries, nor for international development agencies. They, being major actors in the global economy, I think, have crucial roles to play in any scheme of structural adjustment in the developing countries. Obviously, structural adjustment in the developing countries is contingent upon the necessary structural adjustment in the developed countries, based on a new pattern of comparative advantage for the production of various types of commodities and services.

The framework suggested in the Report for structural adjustment is, thus, less specific about the role of the developed economies and that of the international development agencies in the process of structural adjustment for attaining more equitable growth of the interdependent global economy.

The Report contains an interesting and balanced analysis of labour market policies. Its approach to the issues concerned, particularly to labour legislation and labour market deregulation is interesting. I quite agree with the assertion in the Report "that the positive effects of labour legislation are rarely balanced against their alleged negative effects". It is true that concepts like minimum wages, protection of labour, freedom of association and trade union rights, etc., have been conceived partly for social and partly for economic reasons. Unfortunately trade union movements in many of the developing countries, particularly in countries like ours, are vitiated by larger political considerations which are in most cases not very relevant nor congenial for development of healthy labour relations. In fact, the politicisation of labour movements aggravates what was referred to above as the negative effects of labour legislation without caring to enhance their positive effects.

I agree with the point made in the report to the effect that "labour market deregulation will be needed to different extents and will have different effects in countries with different labour market structures. As in the case of structural adjustment policies in general, there can be no uniform, doctrinaire prescription which is applicable to all countries". I wonder whether specific areas of deregulation can be sorted out by ILO for the LDCs, where unemployment and underemployment are widespread and yet the small organised sector is, in most cases, faced with politically motivated organised labour unions. Needless to say the continuation of such situations will not only be economically ruinous for the worker but will also affect long-term structural changes in the LDCs.

Original - Spanish: Mr. GARRIDO SOTO (Employers' delegate, Venezuela) - I am addressing you in my capacity as Employers' delegate of Venezuela because Mr. Villalobos had to return to Venezuela for personal reasons related to his duties, without having registered or participated in this Conference or in any of the committees. However, he did request me to give you this message:

First of all I should like to congratulate this assembly and its President, and the Conference for having rightly appointed him, and the President, for the well-deserved honour of having been appointed to this office, in which he will no doubt display his many talents, not least of which are his intelligence, his capability and his experience, which are more than sufficient to guarantee the success of this Conference, as he has shown up to now.

Allow me to congratulate the Vice-Presidents, who will assist him in his external and internal duties and to make special mention of our compatriot and friend, Mr. Delpino, Workers' Vice-Chairman, and President of the Venezuelan Confederation of Workers, our trade union organisation representing the greatest number of workers.

I should also like to congratulate the new Director-General of the Office for his well-deserved appointment by the Governing Body last March, and to wish him every success in his important and difficult duties, among which, we feel, one of the most urgent is to remind all member States in writing to comply with their obligation, repeatedly neglected by quite a few of them, as laid down in Article 13(2)(a) of the ILO Constitution, according to which Members will pay the travelling and subsistence expenses of their delegates and their advisers.

May I also extend my best wishes to the recently appointed Deputy Director-General, Mr. Maier, who is an excellent trade unionist and a long-standing active member of the Committee on Freedom of Association. We are convinced that his ample experience and knowledge in this field will contribute to further improving the organisation and functioning of this very important body of the ILO.

As we have already pointed out to this Committee, there is a growing need to update the very principle adopted by the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations regarding strikes and their legitimacy, scope and limitations because, on the one hand, alongside this most violent and ancient instruments of asserting workers' claims, others have arisen which are less confrontational and less severe, such as negotiations, conciliation, mediation, concertation and arbitration, the effectiveness, scope and priority which should not be underestimated by the social partners; and neither can the crucial importance of one or more economic activities for certain countries, such as education and training in the developing countries; interrelationship of increasingly numerous economic activities and the repercussions of a strike on those who are not involved in the conflict. Thus, for example, in a crowded city, which has its own topography and characteristic features, an urban public transport or taxi strike can paralyse most of the city activities. Lastly, there are many services whose interruption could endanger the life, safety or health of all or part of the population. For example, today more than ever before, people have become aware of the concepts of safety and health, which cannot be compared with those which prevailed four decades or longer ago.

As we all know, the Report of the Director-General on the many important activities of the Organisation in 1988 is the last one submitted by Mr. Francis Blanchard, the outgoing Director-General, who virtually devoted his life to the exclusive, efficient and transcendental service of this Organisation in different posts until reaching this office, in which he completed the term begun by Mr. Jenks, who had met with an untimely death, and finally left his post of his own accord after three consecutive terms. As quite rightly noted by the Workers' Vice-President of the Governing Body, Francis Blanchard imbued this Organisation with the indelible stamp of his extraordinary personality, not only because of his lengthy career within the Organisation but also because of the firmness of his nature, his character and his skill as a seasoned sea captain in braving danger and riding the storms, bringing the ILO to its firm and prestigious position in the international vanguard of social justice.

Personally, we Venezuelans have been fortunate enough to enjoy the friendship of Francis Blanchard; institutionally, we know that he is and will continue to be a friend of our country and therefore we wish him, with our right hand on our hearts as he usually greeted us together with his charming wife, a pleasant life without, however, ruling out the possibility of serving this Organisation and the world in missions commensurate with his personal and professional capacity.

Recovery and employment is the title of the excellent report referred to, containing data and figures, an analysis of the economic situation in different regions, forecasts and their probable influence on the urgent need to generate productive employment. All of these call for in-depth reflection, particularly since, as a result of unemployment, the informal sector in our country, and in other Latin American countries, is growing to an unprecedented extent. One of these reflections could be to increase flexibility on the labour market, whose rigidity is due to excessive regulation, since by maintaining or even raising the standard of living of employed workers, it should be possible to open up access to employment for jobless workers. This is the only way of ensuring that the social economy of the market remains consistent with itself.

We confirm our opposition to the revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107), as expressed in this assembly in 1988. (Please see Provisional Record No. 10 of the 75th Session of the Conference, pages 35 to 36).

Today, having been informed of the serious differences of views existing on the draft on such delicate matters, which are foreign to the activities and objectives of the ILO, as the definition and scope of the concepts of peoples, territory, discrimination in favour of ethnic minorities, and the impossible conferral upon them of powers proper to the State and which cannot be delegated, such as legislating, judging, classifying offences and applying penalties and subordinating its administrative activities to the approval or consultation of such minorities; we must state, with full responsibility, that the approval of such a draft would constitute a historical error by our Organisation.

The saddest and most deplorable thing is that all this absurdity claims to be based on two gross errors: firstly, that Convention No. 107 is paternalistic; and that it is wrong to offer a people which has been backward for centuries the opportunity to accede to progress, if they so wish, in the field of health, education, training, vocational qualifications, standard of living, employment, leisure, culture, etc., achieved by the rest of the population, while strengthening the invaluable substratum of national unity, without their having to relinquish their own beliefs, practices, culture, or even the land they occupy.

Paternalism is an attitude and an attribute of a father consisting of the authority and affection he has towards his children. Therefore, it is inconceivable that a State should not exercise authority over its citizens or afford them the greatest possible well-being, which is a token of affection.

A relevant example of this "rejected paternalism" is the labour legislation of the world, which constantly strives to raise the standard of living of workers, and the very raison d'être, concerns, activities and achievements of this Organisation. Therefore, to denounce paternalism is like mentioning the noose in the house of a hanged man; it is likewise inadmissible that the beneficiaries of the essential paternalism of the State repeatedly level reproaches at it during discussions of the draft.

To object to voluntary integration as a right would mean overlooking the increased intermingling of the races which, with nature's blessing, is improving the human stock; legislative improvements such as bills of exchange, cheques, credit cards, limited companies; the existence and progress of the European Economic Community, the Andean Pact, the Latin-American Economic System and other international communities; the ever increasing closeness of the inhabitants of the planet as it shrinks of that earth owing to the environmental conditions, social communications and the increasing universalisation of religions, economic and political orders, ideologies, scientific knowledge, ways of living, etc.

We therefore do not understand the arguments for diverting this conquering and powerful trend towards integration away from the indigenous minorities, thereby condemning them to perpetual marginalisation and isolation.

If this plan is approved, our country will be unable to ratify it, because it is contrary to the Preamble and a number of the fundamental provisions of the Venezuelan national Constitution.

Finally, I wish the greatest success in this Conference to all the members of delegations represented here, particularly to our brothers from Latin America.

Original - Portuguese: Mr. VAL D'ALMEIDA (Minister of Labour and Social Security, Sao Tome and Principe) - In taking the floor at this important assembly and taking account of the amount of time available to me, I should like first of all, before referring to the Director-General's Report, to express our great satisfaction on the President's election to the chair of this great meeting. We would also like to congratulate the other Officers of the Conference.

We resolutely supported his candidacy because we firmly believe that his qualities, his personal talents and his experience will enable him to guide our work wisely.

From this podium, I should also like to congratulate most warmly, speaking for myself and on behalf of my delegation, the new Director-General of this Organisation, Mr. Michel Hansenne. We hope that during his term of office, relations between Sao Tome and Principe and the ILO will improve steadily and that joint projects will be undertaken in the interests of both parties. I should like to assure you that the Government of my country gives you full and unconditional support in your responsible position and your quest for a solution to the serious and complex problems encountered by mankind today.

The Director-General's Report, a document of admirable clarity containing a wealth of information, provides a particularly valuable in-depth analysis for the Democratic Republic of Sao Tome and Principe which, as we said here at the last session, is currently setting up an economic readjustment programme with the participation of some of our development partners.

We the developing countries, considered to be the least developed countries, are currently experiencing in our everyday lives the reality of the main points discussed in the first part of the Director-General's Report.

After independence on 12 July 1975, the Democratic Republic of Sao Tome and Principe inherited from the Portuguese colonial system an agricultural system geared almost exclusively to cocoa exportation but lacking skilled staff in both national administration and economic management.

Cocoa production, supplemented to some extent by coffee and copra production, constituted and still constitutes the main economic activity generating foreign currency for our country. The colonial production system based on immigrant workers started to become less efficient as the immigrants returned home.

The people's consistent distaste for the conditions of work on the plantations and the growing shortage of food products and goods for workers, which started when the country entered this difficult period, resulted in agriculture and animal husbandry being abandoned as people turned to other sectors for their livelihood particularly to the urban areas.

This situation led to a very substantial drop in labour productivity and production, resulting in a catastrophic situation for enterprises which fell into arrears in payment of salaries. The production system was left in disarray, which resulted in a succession of deficits in our balance of payments.

Faced with this situation, the Democratic Republic of Sao Tome and Principe is steadily improving its development strategy, attempting to guarantee consistency in the implementation of government action programmes. A liberalisation policy has been started. A pilot food production project, which had already been set up with assistance from international co-operation, has been further developed by involving small-scale farmers and distributing small plots of land for agriculture.

In this connection, I should like to mention once again the assistance we have received from the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund and the African Development Bank, which have all helped us to develop a macroeconomic adjustment strategy for our country, creating the conditions for self-sufficient growth based on the expansion of the cocoa sector and diversification of economic activity on a gradual basis.

The various means of information made available to the least developed countries include a consultation process of round-table meetings. Our country has given its full commitment to this process. Thus, in the context of the social and economic transformations under way we have attended our second international conference of development partners, held here from 6 to 8 March 1989. During this conference, we officially stated before the international community that we were liberalising our country's economic policy.

In recognising the work done by the ILO throughout the past year, I should like to express my particular satisfaction at the technical co-operation activities undertaken. I should like to express the gratitude of my Government for the technical assistance which has already been provided and that which has been scheduled in helping us to formulate our general labour law and new draft legislation on labour inspection as well as in elaborating a family education project, for which we hope to obtain financing from the UNFPA and Swedish co-operation agencies.

I am very happy to be able to mention here the important role played by the ILO in the development of a certain number of activities in Africa, which have had a positive impact on the social and economic conditions of member States. Here, I am thinking in particular of the special labour-intensive public works programme.

In the specific case of our country, this programme is of fundamental importance and provides one response to the innumerable social problems which crop up as we implement our economic policy.

So we would ask the ILO to continue and intensify work under way to make this programme a success because of the effect it has on the whole of our community. It would also be very useful if the ILO, through its competent bodies, could do everything it can to help the countries engaged in structural adjustment to find ways of alleviating the rigours of applying these programmes. Finally, I should like to extend my warmest congratulations to the secretariat and other officials of the ILO for the excellent annual report which has been submitted to us.

I have the honour to inform you that, thanks to the work done by the few qualified officials we have in our country, we have been able to organise our services properly, and in particular those services working in fields related to the ILO, so that now we are able to write and submit reports on the application of Conventions we have ratified and to submit to the competent legislative body all the instruments adopted by the 68th, 69th, 70th, 71st and 74th Sessions of our Conference.

This demonstrates that my country's Government is committed to respecting its obligations as a Member of this great family, the ILO.

In conclusion, I should like to wish this 76th Session of our Conference every success.

Original – Spanish: Mr. BERGES (Employers' delegate, Dominican Republic) – It is a great pleasure for me to be able to participate as an Employers' delegate from the Dominican Republic at this 76th Session of the International Labour Conference which is taking place in this fine City of Geneva.

First of all, I would like to extend my warmest congratulations to the Director-General of the International Labour Organisation for the interesting ideas that he put forward in his Report on the activities of this Organisation during the years 1988-89.

The Director-General's Report, which covers such important aspects as human rights, labour administration, social security and the world employment programme is, as usual, an interesting reference tool and source of information not only to delegates at this important meeting but also to all people who are interested in labour law and relations between employers and workers throughout the world.

The main aspect that deserves our comment at this Conference is the firm decision of the three social partners last year in my country to start a social dialogue on a tripartite basis under the auspices of the Catholic Church.

Those participating in this "social dialogue" decided that their immediate objectives should be: to take measures to cope with the problems ensuing from the high cost of living; to maintain the purchasing power of workers; and to protect the national currency. They also envisaged the adoption of measures which would lead to a stabilisation of the Dominican economy and contribute to the country's economic and social development.

The most important agreement adopted as a result of this social dialogue, which has already been implemented by the Government of the Dominican Republic, related to the wages of workers.

Workers' wages were fixed by agreement by the National Wages Committee, on the basis of recommendations put forward during the tripartite discussions at 500 pesos a month; in addition, it was agreed to increase employee's wages from 350 pesos to 1,500 pesos a month. In enterprises that have installations and/or capital valued at less than 100,000 pesos, a minimum wage of 350 pesos a month has been fixed.

The daily rate for agricultural workers was set at 12 pesos a day. Furthermore, it was decided to set up a tripartite committee which would present to the National Congress a draft Bill to the effect that all workers should receive a month's salary in December every year as a Christmas bonus.

As a result of these negotiations, it was also recommended that pensions and social security benefits be increased by the Dominican Institute for Social Security. We would reiterate in this international forum our firm interest in pursuing these tripartite discussions in our country, because we consider that they contribute greatly towards ensuring peace and security.

In the bulletin of our Employers' Federation, Archbishop Francisco José Arnaiz has written that: "Social dialogue is imperative for us today".

We are facing serious problems in different areas which require a broad social dialogue in order to obtain consensus and support, at least of the majority.

In the view of Father Arnaiz, we have to take measures to counter: inhuman and unjust poverty; the increasing cost of living; the reduction in purchasing power; the excessive gap between the rich and the poor; low production – on account of the low productivity index and lack of incentives; the absence of economic planning; erratic legislation and lack of attention to agricultural development.

As regards the contracting of workers for sugarcane cutting in our country, I should like to point out that Dominican and foreign workers enjoy all the rights established under labour laws, without any distinction, and that the Government of our country guarantees these rights.

We have noted that the question of night work has been included in the agenda of this Conference. In our labour legislation, night work is banned for women and for minors. Our Labour Code is in accordance with international Conventions in this respect.

As regards the updated Declaration concerning action against Apartheid, our Employers' delegation at this 76th Session of this International Labour Conference wishes to put on record that the employers' associations in our country have, on many occasions, expressed their full support for the recommendations contained in the updated version of the Declaration on the Apartheid Policy in South Africa, adopted at the International Labour Conference in 1981.

We should point out that our Government has ratified 26 international Conventions adopted by the ILO, the last one being the Guarding of Machinery Convention, 1963 (No. 119).

Our labour legislation has been brought into line with the international Conventions our Government has ratified in a process whereby draft laws to that effect are submitted to the National Congress for approval.

Furthermore, we should like to mention that during the year which has passed since the last International Labour Conference, 88 trade union organisations have been registered and 26 new collective agreements on working conditions have been signed.

All of this provides an idea of the labour policy implemented by our Government with a view to guaranteeing stable and lasting labour peace in the Dominican Republic.

The private sector plays a significant role in the Dominican Republic by creating jobs in two important areas which have given a spur to the national economy. These are tourism and the exporting free trade zones. Although both areas of development are considered among the most dynamic world-wide, it is particularly in the free trade zones that most jobs have been created in the last four years.

From an initial low level of growth in 1969, free trade zones expanded to include 22,000 workers in 1985. In May 1989, 110,000 people were working directly in the industrial estates in those zones. If the same rate of growth continues, by the year 2000 more than a quarter of a million jobs will have been created. In order to understand the significance of these figures, which give an indication of the importance of the free trade zones, one must compare them with the quantity of jobs offered by the national sugar industry, which has been the backbone of the national economy in the last few decades. This agro-industrial sector has about 30,000 workers.

Free-trade zones in the Dominican Republic, until four years ago, were state property or operated by non-profit-making companies. However, in the last four years, private initiative has entered this sector and has increasingly begun to play a key role in the development and operation of industrial estates geared towards export production. Companies such as the Itabo Industrial Estate, the Americas Free Trade Zone, and the Villa Mella Free Trade Zone are trail-blazers in the promotion and operation of these estates and in the ensuing creation of new jobs.

Therefore, we can affirm at this International Labour Conference that in our country, the Dominican Republic, we enjoy social and labour peace to the greatest extent possible. This is owing to the good relations which exist between the three forces which are instrumental in obtaining this peace, namely, the State, the employers and the workers.

We can therefore declare, without hesitation, that we are a country dedicated to law and justice and that, as a member State of the ILO, which it has been our honour to be since 1924, we feel that we are part of the effort which is made daily by that Organisation to ensure that in all corners of the Earth the banner of social justice will fly free, fine and proud.

Original – French: Mr. BOBAK (representative of the Trade Unions International of Workers in Energy) – The delegation of the Trades Union International of Workers in Energy are very interested and happy to be attending as observers this session which is also a celebration of the 70th anniversary of the establishment of the ILO.

I should like to tell the President that my delegation fully shares the unanimous feelings of the delegates to this Conference who entrusted the conduct of the work of the session to Mr. Nkomo and to send best wishes from our international union to Mr. Michel Hansenne on his recent election to the post of Director-General of the ILO.

We should also like to pay tribute to his predecessor, Mr. Francis Blanchard, who, we firmly believe, contributed to the ILO and all its bodies in a very constructive and a remarkable contribution during his long years of work at the ILO.

Our delegation greatly appreciates the Reports submitted to the 76th Session. We are following the work of the session very closely and are very happy to have this opportunity to learn from the very rich experience which the ILO has gained during the 70 years of its work in the labour, human and socio-economic fields which are always complex and complicated and need urgent solution.

It is because of this interest in the work of the ILO that we have now come for the third time, since our creation in 1986, as an observer to the annual meetings of the ILO. We are very interested in the work of the ILO because this is very relevant to our own work, which takes account of what this world tripartite parliament has done, is doing and will do. I should like now to tell you briefly about our comments and opinions concerning the Director-General's Report.

First of all, as regards the state of ratification of Conventions on fundamental human rights and tripartism, the Director-General's Report on ILO activities in 1988 mentions 12 Conventions on these subjects of fundamental human rights and tripartism and we see that many of these Conventions are still very far from having been ratified by all the member States of the ILO. Our delegation feels that it is alarming that Conventions which are so important for workers have not yet been ratified by everybody. I am thinking in particular of the Workers' Representatives Convention, 1971 (No. 135), which has been ratified by only 44 States, and the Collective Bargaining Convention, 1981 (No. 154), which has been ratified by only nine States. We also feel that non-ratification by given States of one or several Conventions on workers' rights automatically leads to a weakening in the effective application of other Conventions on the same subject which they have ratified. Indeed the same effect appears to occur in general for all ratifications recorded, and does not encourage the States to ensure respect for and effective application of these instruments which promote economic and social progress in their countries and throughout the world.

On the other hand, the elaboration of a Convention or a Recommendation is an expensive matter for the ILO and for member States. They are more expensive still when these instruments are not ratified. The ratification of all Conventions and their strict application by all ILO member States would be an effective contribution to promoting the good cause for present generations. Our union is working to this end and we are constantly striving to demonstrate the logic and good sense of the strategy which is intended to eradicate the causes of the evil, the pathology of racism and the social scourges which humanity faces.

Our delegation fully agrees with the analysis of the world economy for the decade submitted in the Report of the Director-General entitled Recovery and employment. We feel that this is an objective analysis which faithfully reflects the various positive and negative aspects of life in the modern world. The only objection we have to this analysis is that it does not speak in today's terms, in the context of the topic which is dealt with, of the fundamental cause of the affliction which strikes the majority of mankind. The affliction is very clearly described in the Report, and the prospects which the Report sketches out for the next decade and the means it advocates for recovery at world level contain, in our opinion, more uncertainty and question marks than assurances that indeed the future will turn out well, in view of the sad balance-sheet of what has happened in this decade which the Report discusses.

The Report states, however, that "there is cause for hope, and therefore cause to act". We fully agree with this and our union will act to transform the hope into reality. We declare our will to support and promote through our own work the activity of the ILO to promote economic and social recovery, in particular in developing countries, and also to promote progress and social justice throughout the world.

We feel that, now that we are coming to the end of the twentieth century, mankind has to rise to the challenge constituted by the growing demand for energy for development and we have to solve to our own advantage the dilemma inherent in production of energy for pacific and destructive purposes. Energy is a determining factor for economic and social progress.

The problems besetting this sector and those working in this sector are of crucial importance to mankind now and in the future. And if, in this nuclear age when man is conquering space, the majority of people are still deprived of electric energy, it is clear that economic and social development also suffers from the repercussions of this deplorable situation.

We are sorry that the ILO does not put more emphasis on this sector of economic activity which, since the discovery of the light bulb, has enabled one part of mankind to make great strides in its development.

It is also a shame that the Director-General's Reports does not make any reference – or hardly any – to this sector of economic activity. We feel that the ILO cannot really fulfil its mission fully without taking into account world energy policy and the importance of the energy industry and those working in it to world economic development.

It is for this reason that I would like to take the liberty of mentioning the idea of establishing a permanent energy committee within the ILO and I appeal to your collective wisdom to support this idea which, in our view, corresponds to the interests of the ILO and its member States.

I hope that the comments and suggestions which the delegation of my federation has submitted to this session in the context of its deliberations will be taken into consideration by all the representatives of the ILO member States, and it is with these words that I would like to end by wishing you every success in the work of the 76th Session of the Conference.

Original – French: Mr. LE BESCOND (representative of the Trade Unions International of Workers in the Metal Industry) – On behalf of the Trade Unions International of Workers in the Metal Industry I thank you for giving me the floor. I should like to express our congratulations to Mr. Michel Hansenne, the new Director-General of the ILO, and wish him every success in his important functions.

This year is the 70th anniversary of the foundation of the ILO and coincides with the 40th anniversary of our own organisation which is affiliated to the WFTU. 40 years during which we have fought for social guarantees, collective agreements, freedom of association and trade union rights, democracy, international solidarity and the strengthening of peace on our continent.

Part I of the Report of the Director-General deals with economic recovery and employment.

This is a question of vital importance for the immediate future and, in the long run, for the future of mankind.

How has our organisation analysed the situation? What are the solutions and the means of contributing to this objective?

First of all, we must view the situation without fatalism; we must not be lured along the primrose path of renunciation.

Millions of workers and their families are deeply concerned at the thought of what tomorrow will bring.

Thirty-five per cent of the unemployed throughout the world are metalworkers.

On the other hand, the capitalists, those who have large fortunes, have never made as much profit as in the past years. Moreover, the same people, those whose profits know no frontiers, are attempting to lull the workers by telling them that the single market of Europe in 1992 will open up new vistas.

The question is worth putting before this Conference. When there are 17 million unemployed in the EEC, one wonders how the employers and the governments concerned who have not eradicated unemployment or brought about economic recovery in their own countries, can suddenly settle these matters through the single market. In fact, if we allow them to do as they wish, the situation of the workers will deteriorate still further. Flexibility and mobility of workers and their families lead to their exploitation; uprooted from their regions and their countries, they wander, suitcase in hand, at the disposal of big capital.

We cannot agree with such capitalistic objectives of European integration. On the other hand, we can be in favour of a Europe of social, economic, technological and peaceful progress.

The single market as the capitalists would like to see it runs counter to economic recovery and employment, as witness the automobile industry which employs 20 million workers throughout the world and where profits have never been as enormous as in 1988. The ten biggest automobile companies in the world made a profit of 120,000 million francs in 1988 and the ten most important multinational automobile manufacturers have made 278,500 million francs' profit in the last few years. But, apart from the Federal Republic of Germany, in this decisive sector employment has dropped by 17 to 39 per cent and purchasing power by 25 per cent. The main response with respect to economic recovery, fighting unemployment and developing employment, both quantitatively and qualitatively is to ensure the livelihood of workers.

Industrialisation and modernisation of production methods must first be based on national requirements which are closely linked to the purchasing power of the masses. The needs of the workers, the needs of the people, the needs of equitable co-operation are all determined by the extent to which people can earn a decent living.

Anarchical restructuring must cease. The introduction of new technologies or retraining of workers must not be synonymous with insecurity of employment, underemployment or loss of employment.

So what must be done? In our opinion we take the money where we find it and demand that governments and employers should invest first in the economies of their own countries, that state credits should serve that priority and not privatisation or financial speculation. The strict control of multinational companies is required because they still tend to flout the constitutional principles of States. From the social viewpoint, a drastic reduction of working time without loss of pay, over the week, the year and or the whole of working life is a dynamic and positive way of boosting both the economy and employment. The social conquests of the workers, which are inseparable from economic recovery and employment, must be preserved and enhanced. Consequently, substituting peaceful co-operation for economic warfare has become a very decisive stake indeed.

Many of the means for economic recovery and employment must come from disarmament, the destruction of stockpiles and the peaceful use of financial investments.

Our organisation decisively supports the USSR and the socialist countries, which with the weight of the pacifist movement throughout the world have started a process of disarmament with the United States. The USSR and the socialist countries have taken unilateral decisions along these lines to reduce armed forces and armements.

These decisions are moving in the right direction. One per cent of yearly expenditure on arms would give 500 million families food. The unpayable external debt is crushing economies of the developing countries. This is a matter which calls for an urgent settlement, but not by means of blackmail or subject to prior conditions which are unacceptable on the basis of maintenance of partial repayment.

The socialist countries possess large markets. Current reforms are directed at overcoming economic, industrial and financial difficulties and making democracy function more dynamically. Whether one agrees or not with the systems in these countries, their existence is a fact. It is possible to develop loyal co-operation by both parties without either seeking to dominate the other. The metalworkers in these countries have a wealth of experience and deep humanitarian traditions. They have contributed with understanding to détente and disarmament and shown with great devotion that co-operation with countries that have won their independence is part of their spirit of solidarity. The future now lies with détente, dialogue and co-operation.

In this battle for democracy the workers rely on their strength and will continue to do so in future. Imbued with a spirit of solidarity, they will work to increase their strength still further.

Our union will work tenaciously towards this end and to bring together as many metalworkers as possible, from workers to engineers, seeking the support of public opinion for their concrete objectives. For this purpose the fighting spirit and the union of the workers makes a decisive contribution to concerted trade union action with trade unions not having the same international affiliations. The 100th anniversary of 1 May should, we feel, enable headway to be made along these lines. Progress is being achieved around the world, and we are in favour of it. That is our role as a trade union organisation and we are fighting with all our strength to achieve this purpose, since what unites the workers is stronger than what divides them. The world has indeed changed. It is only through collective efforts that we shall solve our problems and overcome our difficulties.

In order to promote economic improvement and employment, I should like to emphasise the fact that freedom of association and human rights cannot be separated. In this connection we must condemn any violations of it – witch-hunts, repression, violence against trade union activists or those who have the honour to belong to the workers' movements around the world.

May I pay tribute to all the victims of repression, and in particular to our comrade, Nelson Mandela, the oldest political prisoner in the world (25 years of imprisonment), who refuses to yield to the pressures of imperialism and the apartheid government; to our militant brothers in the metal trades of Colombia who have died at the hands of paramilitary groups, including Jaime Alberto Angel, member of the executive of the union of workers of Sofasa-Renault, who was recently attacked and is in a very serious condition; to our brothers in France from Renault-Billancourt, the ten CGT militants who were dismissed three years ago for having respected the mandate laid upon them by the workers by protecting them from dismissal and the closing of the company and preventing this great French enterprise from being denationalised. Our organisation demands, with others of like convictions, the liberation of Nelson Mandela, the award to him of the Nobel Peace Prize, the dissolution of paramilitary groups and an end to the state of siege in Colombia, respect for the right to life, and reintegration of our ten CGT brothers from Billancourt.

We call upon all those who love freedom to match words with deeds and put an end to these violations.

(The Conference adjourned at 10.30 p.m.)

President: Mr. Nkomo

TRIBUTE TO MR. FRANCIS BLANCHARD, FORMER DIRECTOR-GENERAL OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR OFFICE

The PRESIDENT – At its 242nd Session in February-March 1989, when making arrangements for the assumption of office by the Director-General, the Governing Body decided that, during the 76th Session of the Conference, a solemn ceremony should be held in honour of Mr. Francis Blanchard to pay tribute to him for the many and loyal services he has rendered to the International Labour Organisation and the International Labour Office.

It is our honour and privilege this morning to pay tribute to Mr. Blanchard for his invaluable contribution to the ILO. We will have a number of speakers who are going to speak on that issue following the President's speech.

It is a great honour and a personal pleasure for me to be the first speaker today to pay tribute to the outgoing Director-General of the ILO, my friend Mr. Francis Blanchard. It is on the one hand a pleasant task to pay tribute to Mr. Francis Blanchard, who has dedicated the largest part of his professional life to the ILO and its ideals. He was a worthy successor of our previous great Directors-General and like his predecessors he has left his mark on the Organisation. It is on the other hand difficult to pay tribute to him because I would need more than a session to recount his work during his long career with the ILO and in particular the 15 years which he spent at the head of the International Labour Office. And I am sure that you will agree with me that I would need even more time to mention some of the personal qualities of Mr. Blanchard.

As you know, the preparation of a speech needs to be preceded by some research, which of course I undertook. This is how I came across two secrets which, with your permission, Mr. Blanchard, I shall reveal to the Conference. One of them is how Mr. Blanchard was recruited to the ILO. My in-depth research indicates that at a conference held in Geneva, which was not as interesting as the International Labour Conference and in which you were representing the International Refugee Organisation, you happened to be seated beside the ILO representative. It appears that the ILO representative was also not very enthusiastic about what was going on in that conference, so the two of you had a long chat and the ILO representative was very impressed by your knowledge and personality. He therefore proposed to you to join the ILO, and after giving it some thought, you accepted. You may wish to deny this. This representative was none other than David Morse, then the Director-General of the ILO. I am sure now that David Morse made this offer because he already sensed that one day you would be the Director-General of the ILO. I believe Mr. David Morse would confirm that.

The second secret has something to do with Mr. Blanchard's visit to Zimbabwe on the occasion of the Seventh African Regional Conference. In a meeting with Mr. Mugabe, the President of Zimbabwe, the President asked him whether he had scars anywhere on his body which would prove that he had fought many battles for the ILO and its goals. Mr. Blanchard replied that he had indeed incurred many wounds which he had either been able to heal or to conceal, but that after each fight he felt that he had succeeded. Maybe Mr. Blanchard may wish to deny that.

When Mr. Blanchard was first elected as Director-General in 1974 many people thought they knew which policy and programme direction he would choose for the ILO. All those who knew you, Mr. Blanchard, were almost sure the manpower and technical co-operation would be the thrust of your policy and programmes. These were, after all, two of your major concerns throughout your career in the ILO. However, those who thought they knew your thinking were surprised by the global view you had and, I would like to emphasise, you still have, of this Organisation and the services it can provide to mankind in general and to the workers of the world in particular. As Director-General of the ILO you always tried to be ahead of your time, responding to the problems which our world had to face. Was it not you who spared no effort in introducing a social dimension to the economic reform policies which were prescribed for developing countries? Was it not you who felt that the creation of employment had to be coupled with the improvement with the conditions of work and life of millions of workers all over the world? Was it not you who therefore initiated the international programme for the improvement of working conditions and environment? Was it not you who, following the report of the World Commission on Environment and Development, insisted that ILO programmes should also include environment issues? These are only a few examples of Mr. Blanchard's far-sightedness and his comprehensive knowledge and global view of the world.

Mr. Blanchard took over as Director-General of the International Labour Office in a very difficult world environment. The United Nations system was under fire and the ILO was one of the first victims. The world economic situation was deteriorating and instability in the foreign exchange market was, and still is, a serious problem. Not only was the universality of our Organisation in danger when the largest contributor withdrew from the ILO, but it also faced, during the last 15 years, several financial crises which could have seriously damaged the Organisation and its programmes. However, with his deep faith in the Organisation and its goals, with patience, quiet diplomacy and dedication, Mr. Blanchard managed to preserve both the universality of the ILO and the vigour of its activities.

Human rights were always at the forefront of this Organisation's concerns. For Mr. Blanchard, however, violation of human rights was not just a matter of Recommendations to be adopted by the Governing Body, nor was it sufficient for him to send a Committee of Inquiry to a particular country or for the International Labour Conference to adopt standards to prevent such violations. He was personally shocked each time a violation occurred. What bothered him most was the sufferings of people who were tortured, imprisoned, or whose lives were in danger. He also shared the agony which their families had to endure. Here we can observe Francis Blanchard, the man of principles and the human being who personally intervened, taking enormous personal risks to prevent bloodshed, to free a prisoner or to help a bewildered family.

I have had the privilege of knowing Mr. Blanchard for some years. A knowledgeable person with sound judgement, a patient listener, a courteous and upright man, he was able to capture the respect and friendship of many people, whether Heads of State, ministers, employers, workers or his colleagues, who all admired him. For all of them he always found the time to listen, to consult or to advise. His capacity to persuade was remarkable and this was mainly due to the fact that Francis Blanchard is both a man of compromise and of determination. He never yielded on a matter of principle, but he was also capable of finding solutions to intricate problems and had a special talent of narrowing the gap between divergent views. These exceptional qualities have enabled him to bring to a successful end the protracted negotiations on the structure of the ILO which have lasted for more than two decades.

We are today paying tribute to a man who has been a great Director of the ILO, a man who has dedicated his life to the ILO and its ideals, a man who has handed over to his successor, in the true traditions of the ILO, a vigorous Organisation and a truly loyal staff. For this, and I am sure I am speaking on behalf of all delegates to this Conference, I would like to express to you, Mr. Blanchard, our thanks and deepest gratitude.

Before concluding my remarks, I would like to remind you, Mr. Blanchard, that you still owe, since your visit to Harare last December, the orchestra of frogs at the Pamuzinda Lodge a thanks for the long sleepless night you and some members of the Governing Body spent whilst listening to their wonderful cacophony. I therefore would like to invite you and Mrs. Blanchard to return to Zimbabwe once more, this time for a quiet vacation.

I wish you and Mrs. Blanchard a happy and very active retirement. I am stressing the word "active" because we would all like to continue making use of your experience and insights for the furtherance of the ILO and its ideals.

Original - French: Mr. MENSAH (Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office) – In a decision taken on Thursday, 23 February 1989, the Governing Body of the International Labour Office scheduled for the month of June 1989 a ceremony to honour Mr. Francis Blanchard. During this ceremony the Organisation's highest body, the International Labour Conference, will officially take leave of the man who guided the International Labour Office for 15 years. The time has now come for the ceremony and I should like to place it under the emblem of gratitude. I thank Mr. Francis Blanchard for having devoted himself and for having contributed and achieved so much for our Organisation.

Before I address Francis Blanchard, please allow me first to say a few words about Mr. Blanchard.

I should like to state plainly that if he was able to devote himself, to contribute unstintingly and to accomplish so much while occupying his functions as Director-General of the ILO, it is because of the sort of man he is. As I have already had the opportunity to say in the past, Mr. Francis Blanchard is a personality, a remarkable personality, a personality who has left a deep impression and been an inspiration for all those who have had the privilege of coming close to him. It is through a special charisma that he reaches those who come close to him, a charisma which radiates from his entire personality and creates around him what I would refer to as a positive aura, dispelling antagonisms and generating a wish to co-operate. This charisma is not in the least superficial; it reflects the deep qualities of the man. In Mr. Blanchard the predominant quality is his humanity. He has a very great sense of what is human so that I can state without fear of denial that Mr. Blanchard was predestined to place all his talents at the service of our Organisation, whose actions centre on assistance to human beings in distress, whether they suffer from having been divested of their fundamental rights or are the victims of dehumanisation, thrown into despair by poverty and destitution. It is this keen sense of what is human that explains the other traits of character which have enabled Francis Blanchard to win, perhaps even force, not only the respect of others but also their friendship.

Mr. Blanchard frequently has had to cope with difficult situations, both of open and covert crises. Frequently, the qualities of his strong character have enabled him to act successfully. His winsome charisma stems from his deep faith in the mission of our Organisation, a faith which is based on his deep belief in the immense dignity of the human being and the worker, the intangible nature of human rights, and crucial importance of social justice – three aspects of a single fundamental truth, that is, the sacred character of the human being.

It is this sacred character and the mission of promoting it that has been the moving force of all the actions undertaken by Francis Blanchard.

In the social sciences, taking action means solving equations to produce concrete results. As you know, the social disciplines are governed by the rules of relative determinism, and yet Mr. Blanchard behaves as if, like the exact sciences, they were governed by the rules of absolute determinism, because as far as he is concerned everything that is undertaken must succeed. His profound faith in the Organisation and his fervent desire to further the workers' cause have guided him and inspired him with a will to act such that he has become an indefatigable fighter to the bitter end. Once he starts something, he is determined and does everything to reach the aim, sometimes against wind and high waters. Mr. Blanchard is the unperturbed captain who sails through the tempest and leads his boat to port. This, in short, is the man! Now, he may also be defined through the various actions he has undertaken and intrepidly led to success. For this purpose, please allow me to list a few examples which have occurred to me.

In my mind's eye, I see myself sitting at the back of the room of the Finance Committee of the 74th Session of the International Labour Conference. I also see Mr. Francis Blanchard before the committee, speaking calmly but firmly to defend the draft programme and budget after an extremely critical and stormy debate which almost led to a crisis. In spite of everything, he was able to take the necessary steps to obtain the adoption of the draft he was defending.

Obsessed by the need to release man from poverty and misery, he managed to create and to promote a special system of technical co-operation within the ILO. Through his co-operation programmes, our Organisation has contributed to the improvement of the conditions of life of the poorest sectors of the population, by means of development projects in Asia, in the Pacific, in the Americas, in Africa and in the Indian Ocean.

It has been said of Mr. Blanchard, that he has the necessary charisma to reduce conflicts by bringing about concertation; this statement proves all the more true if we realise that in the face of the crises which have shaken this Organisation, he has been able to reconcile, firmly and with dexterity, the requirements of the ILO and those of the States concerned by these crises, thus safeguarding an essential principle of the Organisation – the principle of universality.

Mr. Blanchard was able to undertake and lead to a successful conclusion, the debates leading to the adoption of the amendments of the Constitution in connection with the structure of the Organisation.

He made unceasing efforts to solve labour problems, constantly defending the World Employment Programme. These constant efforts culminated in the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment in Geneva in November 1987.

Throughout his terms of office, Mr. Blanchard undertook pertinent action for the promotion of trade union rights in the parts of the world where they were being ignored or violated. Many trade unionists throughout the world can bear witness to this. It is thanks to the action of the ILO, and very often thanks to the personal firm interventions of Mr. Blanchard, that serious problems for the trade union movements, for their members and for their leaders, were peacefully resolved.

His loathing for all discriminatory systems violating the fundamental rights of workers caused Mr. Blanchard to reinforce, during the course of the last few years, the action of the ILO for the elimination of apartheid in South Africa and Namibia.

Concerned with the working and living conditions of the workers in the occupied Arab territories, Mr. Blanchard has been able to establish necessary contacts with the aim of improving the living and working conditions of the populations concerned, by applying international labour standards.

This is all that I can say about Mr. Blanchard in the time available to me. I would be grateful if you would give me a few more minutes, during which I would like to address myself directly to our former Director-General.

Mr. Francis Blanchard, at this solemn juncture where all the States present at this Conference, with their employer, worker and government members, officially take leave of you, allow me to say to you: "Au revoir, Mr. Director-General!" As I have said before, I refuse to consider you as a man who is retiring and who is going to settle down or isolate himself into a well-deserved rest. I refuse to consider you as the fighter and the long-distance runner who has come to say to us: "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course." No, you are not a man to remain inactive. I am convinced that your knowledge of the activities at the service of the world of labour and of workers, acquired in a post where action and observation are of equal importance, have made of you a wise man who will often be consulted.

It is for all these reasons that in saying farewell to you I will not resort to the usual formula of wishing you a long and happy retirement. Instead I prefer to leave you with the following wish:

"On the path of your new active life, may good health, much success and great happiness be your day-to-day companions."

Original – French: Mr. OECHSLIN (Chairman of the Employers' group of the Conference) I am happy on behalf of all the Employers' delegates at this Conference to have the opportunity to express our gratitude to Francis Blanchard who, after a long career in responsible posts within our Organisation, has for 15 years occupied the post of Director-General of the ILO and Secretary-General of the Conference.

Our Directors-General have always been outstanding men. It is difficult in just a few words to describe the specific contributions made by each one. To try to find a theme for this brief speech, I would like to refer to the reports submitted to this Conference in the last three years on subjects chosen by the Director-General, which reflected his main preoccupations.

In 1987 the Director-General's Report invited us to consider the future of the United Nations system and the specific role of the ILO.

In 1988 the Report was on human rights.

This year, the Report – which was prepared under the authority of Francis Blanchard and for which he wrote the preface – deals with employment.

I do not think that these three subjects were chosen at random, but I think rather that they were proposed by Francis Blanchard as a synthesis of his work. In any case, he has provided me with the convenient plan for my speech.

I would like therefore to pay tribute, first of all, to Francis Blanchard as a great international civil servant. Heading a specialised agency of the United Nations like the ILO over the last decades has been a task demanding expertise, adroitness and sang froid. The illusions we entertained in immediate post-war period with regard to the peaceful organisation of the world have been dispelled. The very foundations of the United Nations system and its working methods have been called into question. The ILO itself has undergone profound structural changes. One very large country left and then rejoined us. It needed all the strength of conviction and the diplomatic skill of our Director-General to conserve our essential task, to refocus our programmes continuously on the priorities of the modern world as they emerge from tripartite dialogue, and to confirm the unique character of the ILO within the family of international organisations.

But these merits, however striking, are not the sum total of Francis Blanchard's personality. This is far from being the case, and I should now like to mention the zeal with which he led the battle for the observance of human rights. It is easy to talk about human rights in the abstract and to draft or to recite slogans as sonorous as they are ineffective if not accompanied by precise and impartial procedures to watch over their application – for it is application to individual situations which gives rise to problems, above all, when the State in question is powerful or has influential allies. It is true that our Organisation has well-trying procedures; but it is the duty of the Director-General to ensure the effectiveness of these procedures and, above all, without waiting for their results which are by their very nature slow and complex, and to be able to act promptly at his own discretion as soon as he has been informed of the violation of fundamental rights guaranteed by the ILO.

In this, Francis Blanchard has never disappointed us.

Finally, the subject of employment in its widest sense is inseparable from Francis Blanchard's achievements. One can say that it inspired his first years as an international official and his role over the years, with others, in developing a programme of technical co-operation orientated in particular toward training, manpower development, the promotion of small- and medium-sized enterprises and rural development. Outstanding moments have been for example, the Tripartite World Conference on Employment, Income Distribution and Social Progress and the International Division of Labour or, more recently, the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment, which are only the most visible signs of continuous activities which could hardly have been envisaged by the founders of the ILO.

I would not like to conclude without also thanking Francis Blanchard for the support which he has given to programmes which are of direct concern to employers, in particular the technical co-operation programme which was launched by his predecessor but which was broadly developed under his authority. He did not support it to please us – well, not only for this reason, let us say – but because he understood that it constituted an essential tool in the strengthening of the parties in the tripartite process.

For all these reasons, Francis Blanchard will always be held in high esteem by employers and others.

In bidding farewell to a great Director-General, we are only saying "au revoir" to a man who will continue to serve the cause of social progress.

Original – German: Mr. MUHR (Chairman of the Workers' group of the Conference) – As spokesman for the Workers' group in this Organisation, I have often had to face difficult tasks. However, the one before me now is perhaps the most difficult with which I have had to cope. How is it possible, in a few minutes, to pay tribute to a man who has made his mark on this Organisation, like practically no other, and who has headed it for 15 years?

Indeed, Francis Blanchard has made such a mark on the ILO that many of us can hardly imagine this Organisation without him at its head.

After playing an important role in the foundation and the work of the International Refugee Organisation, he entered the International Labour Organisation in 1951. His abilities, which all of us here have seen for ourselves, were rapidly recognised.

In 1956 he became Assistant Director-General, when he was given special responsibility for technical co-operation; this was a field which always claimed his special attention, even after he had been elected Director-General.

And it is precisely in this field that there have been changes in ILO activities; at least, in the direction they have taken. It is to the credit of our outgoing Director-General that the transition from an organisation, which was once limited to industrialised countries, to these new activities, was achieved smoothly.

Francis Blanchard had an ability and readiness to act which I, in my many years of union activity, have seldom encountered in other cases. But what is still more important is that he was consistently able to link these qualities with the specific values and ideals of tripartism, which is the cornerstone of our Organisation. And he has remained true to them, even when sometimes it would have been simpler to go against them.

We should all be grateful to him, that he never chose the simple way, even when the path of principles was a stony one and beset with difficulties.

The past 15 years have been marked by political conflict, but also by conflicts which had their origin in the world of labour. It was almost natural that these years should also have been extremely stormy for the ILO; it was then clearly apparent that the Organisation, under the leadership of Francis Blanchard, never deviated from its task of looking after the concerns and problems of working people.

We might well say that the ILO, during his three terms of office, had to overcome perhaps the most serious crises since its foundation. Inevitably, it was also not spared the general crisis of confidence which affected the whole United Nations system.

It is also to the credit of our former Director-General if this situation is now slowly being reversed. And the need for concerted international action by nations co-operating harmoniously together is becoming ever more widely recognised.

The Members of this Organisation are ready to go along this path, as witnessed by the recent discussions on the programme and budget for 1990-91. As far as I recall, this is the first time over a long period of time that here, in the Governing Body, we have arrived at a unanimous decision.

Francis Blanchard would be justified in considering this as a personal achievement. Thus, he has smoothed the way for his successor and paved the way for a better future for this Organisation.

Following the considerable conflicts over the past 15 years, the Organisation also faced serious financial difficulties, which compelled it to take drastic economy measures. In this situation, Francis Blanchard made wise proposals which we were able to follow.

It was thanks to his decisive and courageous leadership that the ILO not only overcame these moments of danger but was then able to welcome into its ranks the nation with the largest population in the world, so that its mission and ideal of universality became a reality.

Those of us who have lived through these times and have admired the way in which Francis Blanchard has taken up the challenge, and who were called upon to support him in his endeavours, will never forget these efforts.

Even at a time of such significant events, the ILO persevered in its work. This is true not only of technical co-operation and the revision of international labour standards and supervision of their application, but also of research and all the other services which, taken together, make up the continuing contribution of the ILO to the world of labour.

Naturally, many difficult decisions had to be taken and there were times when our Director-General had to disappoint certain groups among us. If however, we responded negatively to this, it was always in recognition of the fact that his proposals were made for good reasons and with honourable intent.

There was never a shadow of doubt as to his commitment to the ideals of the ILO.

I believe that our former Director-General has never doubted that he enjoyed the full support of the Workers' group. This was our thanks and our recognition for his unswerving adherence to the fundamental principles of the ILO, even if contrary opinions were expressed in many quarters.

Not once did he put in doubt his commitment to fundamental trade union and human rights. He never called into question the universality of international labour standards and the need for supervision of their application. He never ceased to remind us that the elimination of poverty and unemployment is our most important task.

At the time of his departure from the Organisation, none of its tasks has been accomplished; its work has not yet been completed. It would be unrealistic to suppose that it ever could be. This should not be regarded as a failure. On the contrary, Francis Blanchard's success lies in the fact that he is leaving behind an Organisation which today is better equipped to pursue its aims than in many years in the past.

I have no doubt that he will continue to observe how well we continue to discharge this responsibility in the future. I am sure that his interest in this Organisation will never slacken. This work was never just a career to him, but rather an inner commitment.

As we express our warmest and most sincere thanks to Francis Blanchard today, we should like to include his wife and family. He and his family have not been spared the heavy blows of fate. He has borne them with admirable strength, without allowing them to interfere with his work for us. We hope that he and his family will, in coming years, find some measures of recompense for this.

We also express our gratitude in our commitment to justice, in our work in this Organisation, to the example he set before us in his 38 years of activity.

Original - French: Mr. KARIKURUBU (Minister for Labour and Vocational Training, Burundi) - On behalf of the delegations of the African region, I should like to ask you to allow me to thank the Governing Body and the Selection Committee for having given us the opportunity, unique of its kind, to express our feelings of gratitude at the time when Mr.

Francis Blanchard, the former Director-General of the International Labour Office, is taking his well-deserved retirement.

The period during which Mr. Francis Blanchard headed the International Labour Office has seen many changes, in particular as far as social and economic areas are concerned. These changes have not been without consequences for the life of our Organisation. Mr. Francis Blanchard has constantly used all the means at his disposal to draw our attention to these changes and propose solutions when they were required.

Thanks to his dynamic nature and his humanitarian spirit and zeal for justice and peace, Mr. Francis Blanchard has been able to develop and crystallise the activities of the International Labour Organisation, focusing them on international solidarity, in order to combat unemployment and poverty and to build a fairer and more prosperous society.

The African group believes very firmly that Mr. Francis Blanchard is one of the Directors-General of this Organisation who have given of their very best to bring about the attainment of the objectives of this international Organisation. His activities have been especially important for the developing countries, in particular for those on the African continent, where many varied and useful programmes have been developed in various fields, such as training and retraining, the creation and promotion of employment, industrial relations, the fight against apartheid and against poverty and famine, the development of tripartism, to mention but a few.

All these programmes have been carried out despite the many financial difficulties which the ILO has experienced over the last few years. This bears witness once again, if there were any need to do this, to the dynamism shown by Mr. Francis Blanchard in assisting our respective Governments to accumulate the funds necessary to implement these projects.

The African Governments duly appreciate the share of the technical co-operation budget allocated to Africa during Mr. Francis Blanchard's term of office. This has made it possible for us to contribute significantly to the implementation of development projects. It was an oxygen supply, if you like, for the development of African countries.

In trying to provide ever better services to the African continent, Mr. Francis Blanchard has visited most of our countries himself in order to have discussions with government representatives, employers and workers on the possibilities for economic and social development in our region.

Mr. Francis Blanchard is now retiring. He has left his indelible mark, characterised by pragmatism and a spirit of dialogue, on this Organisation. This tradition must be maintained and improved, as we are sure it will, since his successor has made a solemn declaration to that effect. The African group will give him every support in this noble aim, in the belief that the International Labour Organisation will be what its Members want it to be. We hope that all the officials of the International Labour Organisation will take Mr. Francis Blanchard as a good example and a point of reference.

We also hope that as far as possible Mr. Francis Blanchard will continue to place at the disposal of the International Labour Office and the member countries of the International Labour Organisation his vast knowledge of the world of labour.

We know that all great men respect the same tradition, they write their memoirs and their autobiographies in retirement. We are sure that Mr. Francis Blanchard will do the same and this will be to the benefit of all mankind.

In conclusion, on behalf of the African delegations I would like to wish Mr. Francis Blanchard a great deal of luck in his new life, good health and a happy retirement because he has deserved it for himself and for all his family.

Original - Spanish: Mr. LAZO RODRIGUEZ (Government delegate, Chile) I am highly honoured to take the floor on behalf of the governments of the American region to add my voice to that of the distinguished speakers before me during this farewell tribute to the man who for 15 years guided the destinies of the International Labour Office, Mr. Francis Blanchard.

An opportunity such as this gives rise to many thoughts. The first of these is to look back upon these 15 years in the life of our Organisation and see how this important period is linked to the very fruitful management and the personality of the distinguished Director-General who leaves us this year.

By looking at the significance of this period we can see how a certain stage can fit fruitfully and harmoniously in to the total lifespan of the Organisation and also reach into the future. This is precisely the case of Mr. Blanchard's career in our Organisation since he joined the Office in 1951.

Thus, his work as Assistant Director-General and then Deputy Director-General from 1968 to 1974 and then as Director-General is highly appreciated by the Americas region.

Our countries contributed with great sacrifices and to the utmost of their abilities to enriching the work of the ILO, giving priority to efforts to improve the standard of living of their workers, strengthen social justice, promote tripartism, guarantee freedom of association and bring their legislation into conformity with the international labour standards issued by this leading Organisation.

This work must continue, because we understand that it is necessary for the progress and internal peace of each of our countries, in order to achieve regional understanding and world peace.

In this context, we have emphasised the need for all nations to offer their good will to solve the various problems which affect the social and economic conditions in which our peoples live, particularly those resulting from the scourge of foreign debt.

We greatly appreciate Mr. Blanchard's efforts to give effect to the High-Level Meeting on Structural Adjustment and Employment, which was a positive first step in the search for solutions, one of which is proposed in a draft resolution endorsed by many governments of our region.

In this context, we feel that the subject chosen by the Director-General for his report to this Conference, Recovery and employment, is highly appropriate. In the light of the present historical situation, and in a critical yet optimistic spirit, which is, however, basically constructive, the Director-General has made a very important contribution.

Following a thorough and serious analysis of the labour and social situation in the world in the last decade and considering the acute problems which afflict the problems affecting large parts of the world as a result of past crises, the Director-General goes on to point out that there is a new international political climate in which positive forecasts are made for a recovery of the world economy and the possibility for humanity to embark on a stage of great progress. One of the specific measures he proposes is for the savings which may be achieved through disarmament to be channelled to development activities through the United Nations and its specialised agencies.

Furthermore, we should like to point out that during the Director-General's fruitful term of office we have seen an increase in the activities of this Organisation. There have been real achievements, both in our region and in the rest of the world, in labour law, labour relations, labour administration, activities on behalf of workers and employers, concern for the improvement of the working environment, social security, employment and its attendant problems.

As regards the subregion of Latin America and the Caribbean, we would like to highlight the important technical assistance services offered by the Office, as well as the work done by its various local offices operating in our region.

In wishing Mr. Blanchard farewell today, we should like to convey to him our sincere gratitude for his very fruitful work to further the aims and principles of our Organisation, a task which we are certain will be continued with the same dedication and devotion by his distinguished successor.

Mr. Blanchard, you can leave with the satisfaction of having performed an invaluable task in the service of tripartism, justice, freedom and peace among mankind.

Original - Chinese: Mr. LI (Government delegate, China) It is my privilege to represent the Government group of the Asian and Pacific countries here, to pay a tribute to Mr. Francis Blanchard and to express our gratitude to him.

Mr. Francis Blanchard's involvement with the ILO dates back to 1951. Faithful to the ideals and the principles of the ILO, Mr. Blanchard has worked enthusiastically and conscientiously for the past 39 years, untiring and in defiance of all difficulties. He has devoted all his wisdom and talent to advancing the cause of international labour and promoting social justice. Especially in the past 15 years, in the capacity of the Director-General of the International Labour Office, Mr. Blanchard has braved political storms and steered the ship of the ILO unwaveringly to the shore of victory, thus winning wide acclaim from the governments and peoples of all countries.

Under the leadership of Mr. Blanchard, the universality of the ILO has been effectively defended and developed. The resumption of China's activities in the ILO is just one historical event associated with the name of Mr. Blanchard. We can still recall clearly that Mr. Blanchard, authorised by the Governing Body, shuttled between Geneva and Beijing on two occasions and, solving one thorny issue after another, eventually realised the historical goal of China's return to the ILO and thus erected a bridge of friendly co-operation between the ILO and China. The Chinese Government and people will never forget this accomplishment of his.

Under the leadership of Mr. Blanchard, important progress has been made in the activities involving international labour standards, which has played a useful role in protecting the rights and freedom of workers and improving their working and living conditions. He has commanded our admiration especially for his initiatives and unremitting efforts in promoting equality of opportunity, treatment of men and women in employment and combating apartheid.

Under the leadership of Mr. Blanchard, programmes of technical co-operation were initiated and rapidly developed, becoming another pillar of the activities of the ILO. They have played a positive role in promoting the economic development and social progress of the developing countries. Here, I wish to underscore in particular the contributions Mr. Blanchard has made to the development of technical co-operation in the Asia-Pacific region. Many countries in Asia are developing countries with backward economies and therefore need assistance from the international community for their development. Thanks to the personal attention of Mr. Blanchard, ILO branch offices have been set up one after another in such Asian countries as Pakistan, Sri Lanka, Indonesia, Fiji, and China. These branch offices have taken on the extensive task of developing technical co-operation. I wish to point out emphatically, in the name of the Chinese Government, that we are satisfied with the work of the ILO's branch offices in Bangkok and Beijing during this last period. Spurred by the technical co-operation of the ILO, the friendly relations among Asian countries have also flourished. The Conference of the Labour Ministers of Asian Countries also benefitted from the assistance and warm support of Mr. Blanchard. For these reasons, we the countries in the Asia-Pacific region wish to express our sincere thanks to him.

Under the leadership of Mr. Blanchard, one of the biggest questions of the present world – development and employment – has been made a central concern of the ILO. The close integration of economic development with social progress, as proposed by Mr. Blanchard, is of great significance for promoting the co-ordinated development of economy and society and for safeguarding world peace and stability. The convening of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment was a very important milestone in the history of the ILO.

I would also like to highlight the special role played by Mr. Blanchard in the implementation of the two resolutions adopted by the International Labour Conference in 1974 and 1980 on the situation of Arab workers in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories. This role took effect through the sending, from 1978 onwards, of an ILO fact-finding mission to these territories, which enabled the Conference to be better informed on the prevailing situation in these territories. Mr. Blanchard has ensured that the reports presented by the mission reflect his own sense of responsibility, his tactfulness and his international vision. He has been able successfully to increase the standing of the ILO, by virtue of the fact that these reports are at present an inestimable source of information on the actual situation of the rights and freedoms of Palestinian workers and employers.

Mr. Blanchard is a very warm person full of courtesy and with a broad vision. With an open mind and views of all sides, he can work through the arguments and difficulties and still come up with ways and means acceptable to all. In a display of his inexhaustible energy he has visited the majority of ILO member States, come to know the labour ministers of all the members and is a close friend of us all. Each and every country in the Asia-Pacific region would welcome a visit by Mr. Blanchard and his wife at any time.

At the time when Mr. Blanchard assumed the leadership of the ILO, it was beset with difficulties and potential crises. Today, he is leaving the ILO sounder and more vigorous than he found it. We shall forever remember his outstanding contributions.

In conclusion, we wish Mr. and Mrs. Blanchard a happy and a long life.

Mr. SANKEY (Government adviser, United Kingdom) – On behalf of the member States of Western Europe, I should like to join those who have already spoken in tribute to our former Director-General, Francis Blanchard. Mr. Blanchard will be remembered for the outstanding contribution he has made to the work of our Organisation throughout his distinguished career, and particularly for the qualities of leadership he demonstrated during the 15 years he served as our Director-General. We member States were fortunate indeed to have at our helm during some of the most difficult years of the Organisation's development, a person so steadfast in his support of the basic principles of our Organisation – someone with the sensitivity, the vision and the gift for diplomacy which has enabled the ILO to emerge united and strengthened from what I am sure will go down in our history as "the Blanchard era". The Blanchard era, although over in one sense, will live on in a very real way. It will continue to provide us with the inspiration, with the strength of purpose and with the firm commitment which have characterised the work of the ILO over the past 15 years. Mr. Blanchard can rest assured that he leaves our Organisation in good shape with the firmest of foundations on which our new leadership can build and progress. Just as Mr. Blanchard's dedication and vast experience in the field of labour affairs has left an indelible mark on the history of the ILO, so his personal qualities, his warmth, his humour, his openness, his humanity have left an equally indelible mark on all those who have had the privilege to be associated with the Organisation under his leadership. I know that countless members of our delegations have, over the years, come to regard Mr. Blanchard not just as a statesmanlike leader but also as a valued friend. His readiness to share his knowledge and to offer advice and encouragement to those new to the intricacies of this complex and unique Organisation have proved invaluable. Many of us in this hall today, diplomats, employers, trade unionists, have benefited in this way.

I have focused almost entirely on what our former Director-General has given to our Organisation and to us individually. But I hope that Francis Blanchard himself, has much to remember from his association with the ILO, the satisfaction which come from a job well done, the universal recognition for the outstanding contribution he has made in the field of labour, and the knowledge that the cause to which he has dedicated his life, has brought many improvements and benefits, and the hope of a better future for workers of all races and creeds throughout the world.

(The speaker continues in French.)

No speech relating to our outgoing Director-General would be complete without a mention of his charming, warm-hearted wife, who has given him her support throughout his career.

I will conclude, thus, by adding the voice of Western European countries to those who have already expressed their best wishes for good health and happiness to Francis and Marie-Claire in the years to come.

Original - German: Mr. NOACK (Government delegate, German Democratic Republic) - I am speaking here on behalf of the Government representatives of the European socialist countries. This honour was bestowed upon me because I have been able to follow Mr. Blanchard's work throughout the many years I have been attending the International Labour Conference - since 1974 - and during the many years in which I have been a member of the Governing Body.

During the 15 years in which Mr. Blanchard occupied the high office of Director-General of the International Labour Office, he has proven himself to be an outstanding personality in the history of our Organisation. A great deal has been said on this by the distinguished delegates who spoke before me. But please allow me just to quote a few striking examples which we think are particularly noteworthy.

Mr. Blanchard has made a significant personal contribution to making sure that the International Labour Organisation has addressed itself increasingly to the solution of the global problems facing mankind. He was committed to the implementation of human rights and particular to employment problems. This was demonstrated by his reports which he submitted to the International Labour Conference last year and this year for discussion.

The High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment is a clear example of how he awakened the social conscience of the ILO to concern itself with overcoming underemployment, poverty and hunger.

Mr. Blanchard has also been a strong opponent of apartheid and it is partly thanks to him that, today, the ILO occupies a place of honour in the struggle against the policy of apartheid. I am also thinking of the fact that on several occasions he headed missions to the Middle East.

Mr. Blanchard has vigilantly followed the developments which have taken place in the world, and has tried to draw the necessary conclusions from these developments for the activities of the Organisation. In his 15-year term of office, the ILO, influenced by international events, has lived through good years and less good years. Mr. Blanchard took advantage of the lessening of tension to promote co-operation to overcome existing problems. In this connection, we would particularly like to comment on his contribution to the development of European co-operation. The way is open now for a more intensive form of co-operation in the social field in Europe, which we feel is an important measure to supplement the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe (CSCE).

Mr. Blanchard has distinguished himself by his dynamism, his flexibility and his great diplomatic skills. These qualities were particularly necessary when exceptional difficulties had to be overcome in the Organisation.

I think that even in the context of this special sitting, it would be incorrect to pass over in silence the fact that the representatives of the countries, on whose behalf I am speaking, were not always in agreement with Mr. Blanchard, but, and this is something I would particularly like to stress, our discussions with him were always characterised by personal respect.

Mr. Blanchard, can look back on a successful and highly valued period of office as Director-General of the International Labour Office. We would like to thank Mr. Blanchard very warmly for his self-sacrificing work and we would also like to say that we are determined to work in the future to make sure that the Organisation will always be able to rise to meet the demands made on it.

Please allow me now to address a personal message to Mr. Blanchard at this stage.

Mr. Blanchard, we wish all the very best, good health and personal well-being for the future. At the same time, we are sure that you, with your restless nature, are not going to remain idle. We could easily imagine you handing down to future generations your thoughts, feelings and experiences which you acquired during your eventful career as Director-General of the International Labour Office. We, in any case, would look forward to reading your memoirs. We wish you and your wife many more years of happiness and fulfilment.

Original - French: Mr. HANSENNE (Secretary-General of the Conference) - The young man seated to the left of the President is today attending his forty-second session of the International Labour Conference. During 15 years you have been able to see his familiar silhouette at the same place, observing in a nonchalant, but extremely attentive way, the progress of the Conference's work. Given his long experience, I really have nothing to explain to him concerning the life of the Organisation, or the Assembly, or his own work.

You may object that I am not supposed to make a speech to him - I am supposed to make a speech to you about him, and indeed, that is what I did try to do, and I did draft such a speech. The problem is that I am the tenth speaker and, as time has gone by, the themes that I chose to illustrate his personality, one after the other, have been exhausted. I passed my time, as perhaps you have been able to see, with pen in my hand thinking "well I can't say that anymore", so that finally I had nothing left to say.

But I can't remain without saying anything at all, so I have decided to turn my speech over and perhaps say two or three things off the cuff. My dear Mr. Blanchard, I don't wish to add any further compliments to those which have been showered on you today. I should simply like to play the role, modest but nevertheless vital, of tying those compliments together in a summary of what has been said today. Who is Francis Blanchard? What, ultimately, should we remember of him? It seems to me, from all that has been said today, we should bear in mind four things.

The first is that Francis Blanchard is a committed man of action, somebody who believes fundamentally in the objectives and major values of the International Labour Organisation and who has committed himself up to the point, and even beyond, where life itself is inseparable from this commitment. We all remember how he has committed himself towards a certain number of workers or persons whose very life was threatened.

Secondly, he is also a man, I would say, whose approach is very complete, somebody who has been able to adapt himself and adapt our Organisation as it has had to cope with increasingly complex situations and the growing interconnectedness of the international community. He is a man who, through his long career, has been able to manage and to deal with the problems faced by the Organisation in a global fashion. We have already mentioned, among his achievements, not only their development, respect and of international labour standards, but also the monitoring of all the problems of technical co-operation and the very difficult problems of employment. This is a very complete approach.

As a third point, I would qualify Francis Blanchard as a steeplechase champion. Let's not forget how much his career has been studded with incidents. There has not been a period where he has had peace, he has had to face many difficulties, which have been very awkward to overcome, and he has managed to do this. We have spoken about the withdrawals, the economic crisis, the structural crisis. If our Organisation as it is today is in a good state in in good health, it's thanks to our steeplechase champion here.

Finally, he is a good navigator, a great manager, as we call it nowadays, a man who has been able to link his vision of the future with great decisiveness and a sense of diplomacy that many have referred to here today. This great manager is passing on to me an Organisation admired by many, and which I receive with somewhat trembling hands and in the hope that I will be worthy of the team he has united around him in the course of the years.

These are perhaps four of the most salient attitudes of Francis Blanchard's but, Mr. Blanchard, no matter how complete a man may be, he cannot do all of this alone – not that I suspect you of taking amphetamines or any other kind of drugs but my impression, indeed, my certainty, is that such an undertaking over this long period would be impossible without the support of a certain person. That "certain person", your wife, has been the one who has helped smooth the way. Madame Blanchard, I would like to thank you very warmly for ensuring with love and attention that your husband continued over all these years to be what he is today – a true gentleman.

The PRESIDENT – It is now my honour and privilege to invite Mr. Blanchard to respond to the speeches given this morning.

Original – French: Mr. BLANCHARD – Need I say that I listened to each speaker here with attention, of course, as you can well imagine, but also with a growing sense of humility? They spoke in terms where friendship spilled over into indulgence. I thank each of them very warmly, as I thank the Secretary-General for what he said, and I also thank him for having spared you a long speech. I looked at him to see how many pages there were and I was slightly apprehensive, but it turns out that he decided to address you directly and in terms which greatly moved me.

I thank you, Mr. President, who spoke first this morning and did so with a warmth which went straight to my heart. I endorse everything you said as regards the visit which I had the great honour and the great pleasure of paying two or three times to your beautiful country, and in particular my visit last December.

I am deeply touched by the honour you and the Conference are paying to me by devoting a few minutes of a very heavy schedule this session to this meeting and giving me the opportunity to take leave of the ministers attending the Conference and the Government, Employers' and Workers' delegates participating in this session, which is particularly symbolic because it celebrates the 70th anniversary of the founding of the International Labour Organisation.

The International Labour Conference is sometimes described as the world parliament of labour. This name may not have any strictly legal force, but it does, I believe, correspond to the very essence of this Assembly, one of whose major functions is to draw up legislation every year on social policy topics submitted for your appreciation or for debate. In scrupulously preparing and adopting international labour Conventions and their corresponding Recommendations, the Conference, I believe you will all agree, has inspired laws and practices in each of the 150 member States of our institution without exception. So from that point of view, the name world labour parliament is not too ambitious, to my mind. It will be the more justified in the future as the International Labour Organisation extends its activities to all categories of workers in the working world.

That, indeed, has always been the policy of the ILO, prompting it to devote its attention initially to the workers of industry and then to extend its concern in turn to rural workers, to the service sector and, finally, over the last few years, to address fully the problems of poverty and the informal sector.

I hope that the efforts undertaken to tackle the problems of the informal sector and the poverty will be pursued and expanded. The High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment, to which several speakers referred this morning, had, apart from its technical conclusions, the result – a fundamental one, in my view – of confirming the terms of reference of the ILO as laid down in its Constitution and in the Declaration of Philadelphia. There was a risk that these terms of reference would be forgotten or that they would be interpreted restrictively. Albert Thomas, my illustrious compatriot and the first Director of the ILO (at that time we said Director, now we say Director-General, or DG) pleaded, perhaps not from this same rostrum, but in any case at a session of the International Labour Conference, that the ILO should be an instrument of action, not merely a machine for the collection and distribution of information. I share that conviction and I have no doubt that you, and the Governing Body, also share it. I am sure that you have the will to see to it that our Organisation plays its full part in this immense task of economic and employment recovery, which, as you know, constitutes the theme of the last Report I had the privilege of submitting to you this year.

This recovery, including the solutions to the problem of debt, will require increased public and private aid probably with conditions attached which are currently the subject of much debate and, I may say, much dispute. It is up to the ILO to make sure that the policies of structural adjustment take into account the problems and needs of all categories and, in particular, the category of the least advantaged, who are the most deeply affected by the crisis, the debt, the drop in the prices of raw materials, the unemployment and the poverty.

Thus, in my opinion, our Organisation will have a greater role to play among industrialised countries, mainly in the northern hemisphere, and among developing countries. Let us prevent the gap from widening between the North and the South. Let us not give in to the temptation of believing that the growth and progress achieved by the industrialised countries, separated less and less by ideology, will have repercussions powerful enough to cure many Third World countries of their anaemia or, in some cases, their extreme poverty. The objective, whenever it may come about – and, alas it may be a long time – is not to reduce protection of some in order to increase those of others, but to seek, through a concerted effort of disarmament and international co-operation, the answers to the problems which weigh upon so many men, women and children who are incapable of obtaining the essential requirements of life such as income, housing, health, education and, of course, access to culture.

That, I believe, has been the philosophy of our Organisation, its intimate conviction forcefully expressed by so many representatives of your countries from this rostrum; but the turmoil of the world and the deep economic crisis have created a considerable distance between declarations and realities. Too many good intentions proclaimed by the voices of those in the highest authority have not been followed up.

This may be the first time that the international community has, or will have, the opportunity of turning their words into actions. A disarmament process, still timid of course, seems to be under way. Serious regional conflicts still exist, it is true, but increasing efforts are being made to settle them. Furthermore, if it is true – as the famous statement has it – that development is a new name for peace, it must be said that disarmament may make it possible to tackle the tasks of development with less fear and more means. Satisfaction of essential requirements, protection of the environment, development of infrastructures and, in particular, means of communication to release from captivity the regions of the world which are deprived of the tools for their progress: these are the tasks which it should be possible to undertake at last through a dual effort at the international and national levels. At both levels, a greater role should be played by the international organisations, all of them, including the Bretton Woods institutions, in a much more coherent system of relationship. I have to say that that has not been the case hitherto. But economic agents and the social partners must also be come more closely involved in the aims of development.

I see two reasons for this. The first, which is being understood better and better each day, is that the State cannot be responsible for everything. It is by means of appropriately guided concertation between the public authorities and the social partners, that the macro- and micro-economic policies responding to the needs of developing societies may best be chosen and applied.

Another reason is that tripartism is the guarantee of freedom in all those fields where it must be recognised and applied: freedom of association, collective bargaining, the struggle against discrimination in all its forms and, in particular, the struggle against apartheid.

The ILO must persevere in its efforts to strive to give meaning to what I might be tempted to call economic and social citizenship as opposed to civil and political citizenship. Freedom was the choice of our Organisation in 1919. The ILO has never betrayed it but painful experience has shown that although this battle may never be totally lost, it is never completely won. Thus the defence of human rights must remain an absolute requirement of our Organisation.

I know that such is your conviction, but Mr. President, an international organisation requires constant care. We must constantly work to strengthen it. I should like to take the liberty now, at the time of my departure, to express two wishes.

The first wish concerns staff matters, matters which, I must confess, have from time to time been the most arduous amongst the very difficult, even dramatic, situations I have had to cope with over the past 15 years. It is true, as I reiterated to the Governing Body, that I had to manage staff problems within a very narrow budgetary allowance and in a precarious treasury situation.

I have no doubt, Mr. President, that next week your Conference will unanimously and enthusiastically, and I wish this for my successor, adopt the Programme and Budget for 1990-91. This is an appeal, which I have no scruples in addressing to you from this rostrum to adopt the budget unanimously, without a single abstention. If this vote goes according to my wishes, it will contribute to improving the financial situation, hopefully once and for all. This should enable the Office to return to its normal recruitment procedures, benefiting in particular young officials and women, a larger percentage of women. However, whilst the Office, under the supervision of the Governing Body, has a great responsibility towards its staff, it can only fulfil its responsibilities if your countries, all your countries, governments, employers and workers together, support with their efforts the selection of highly qualified staff. This is the wish I make if the International Labour Office, is to continue to deserve the reputation of an exemplary international public service.

My second wish is also an appeal. I hope that before 31 December of this year, the number of ratifications of the instrument of amendment of the Constitution exceeds two-thirds of the member States and that five of the ten countries of chief industrial importance will have ratified them. May I recall that three countries of chief industrial importance have already done so, these are India, Italy and the Soviet Union. I consider it essential for these constitutional amendments to come into force before the advent of the new year. This would be, for the member States of all of your countries, for all of you, the clearest proof of your attachment to this Organisation and of your wish to adapt it to the conditions of our times.

Coming to the end of these few words and aware of the passage of time, I would like to present before the Conference, my warmest wishes to Michel Hansenne, Secretary-General of this Conference, Director-General of the International Labour Office, for his complete success in the difficult task – as he well knows – but the exalting one, which will be his from now on.

To you, Mr. President, again, publicly from this rostrum, I would like to say how much my colleagues and myself were moved by the reception you gave us last December at the Seventh African Regional Conference in Harare, which was a great success.

Looking around this room, and I have been looking right and left ever since the meeting began this morning, I have seen many familiar faces once again, faces of personalities, of ministers and delegates, and I believe I may say, of friends. To these faces, to these personalities, to these ministers who have welcomed me in their countries, to the employers', workers' and government delegates, I would like in concluding, to express to each and every one of them, my best wishes for their personal happiness and for the success of their undertakings.

Mr. President, before I close, I would once again like to express to you my very sincere gratitude for this moment, which I must confess has deeply moved me, when, for the last time, I have the honour of addressing your Conference and of taking leave of it.

The PRESIDENT – May I once more thank Mr. Blanchard, for finding the time to come and be with us this morning and for his wise words, and also thank him for the service he has rendered to the ILO.

(The Conference adjourned at 1 p.m.)

Provisional Record

Seventy-sixth Session, Geneva, 1989

Sixteenth sitting

Thursday, 15 June 1989, 10.15 a.m.

President: Mr. Nkomo

COMMUNICATION TO THE CONFERENCE OF THE REPORT OF THE APPEALS BOARD

The PRESIDENT – The conference has before it a report by the Appeals Board with respect to the objection made on 8 June 1989 by the Nicaragua delegation. The report will be found in Provisional Record No. 11. By decision of the Conference taken on 8 June 1959, the decisions of the Appeals Board in such cases are final and have to be brought to the attention of the Conference immediately, to be noted without debate.

Consequently, the Conference takes note of these decisions, which are not open to debate.

(The decisions are noted.)

SIXTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION, DISCUSSION AND ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT – The first item on our agenda is the sixth report of the Selection Committee. I give the floor to Mr. Hammond, Government adviser, Canada, Chairman of the Selection Committee, to submit the report.

Mr. HAMMOND (Government adviser, Canada; Chairman of the Selection Committee) – I have the honour to submit to the Conference the sixth report of the Selection Committee which is to be found in Provisional Record No. 4E.

The report deals with a number of requests for representation at the Conference and in Conference committees submitted by non-governmental international organisations, and with changes in the composition of committees.

I commend the report to the Conference for adoption.

The PRESIDENT – The discussion of the report is now open. I give the floor to Mr. Tizmaagh, Government delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran.

Original – Arabic: Mr. TIZMAAGHZ (Government delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I would like to raise an objection to the invitation extended to an atheist and turncoat group to attend this Conference.

You are aware that the Organisation of Islamic States and the Council for the Muslim Community published a special document in 1988 on this atheist group. This document, No. 88/8/4/9, has been approved by all the Islamic States. I would also like to inform you, as recalled in the above-mentioned document submitted to the Selection Committee, that this group was set up under the auspices of the Zionist enemy in the occupied territories; and this group receives moral and material assistance from the Zionist enemy.

This group is spreading heresy throughout the Islamic countries. You also know that it is a dissident and military group which, according to reliable sources, aided the Zionist enemy in the war the Arab brothers waged against Zionism. According to the press in Jerusalem, pilots from this sect carried out bombing raids against the Arab countries. This group co-operated with the Shah and helped to imprison thousands of workers and free citizens who were tortured in Iran and all the Muslim countries. This group aided and abetted SAVAK during the cursed Pahlavi regime.

Why has such a barbarous political and military sect been invited to this Conference? Why should we invite a sect which has committed such atrocities against workers? Why welcome a sect which was set up with the assistance of the Zionist enemy? Why invite a sect which is supported by the Zionist enemy and fights by its side against the Palestinian people? This is a sect which has been constituted and helped by the imperialist and English world forces.

On behalf of my Government, I would like to ask this august assembly, this Conference, to object to the presence of this sect. I hope that the proposal is not adopted and that the ILO and the Conference do not deviate from the ILO Constitution.

In accordance with the Declaration of Philadelphia, and in accordance with the Constitution, we must not countenance any organisations created for political, military or spying purposes. This invitation is contrary to social justice and peace, which are the main objectives of our Organisation.

We would ask you to reject this proposal and would like this statement to be included in the record of this meeting.

Mr. HOOBAKHT (Employers' delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! On behalf of the Association of Islamic Heads of Enterprises and other employers in my country, I would like to state that we agree totally with the statement made by the delegate of the Government of Iran on this spy organisation called Baha'i. This organisation was set up by colonial powers and is now based in the occupied Palestinian territories. It is a dangerous organisation which is carrying out actions and crimes against Muslims.

Organisations of this kind should be prevented from using international organisations for propaganda purposes. I should therefore like to have my strong objections reflected in the record.

Mr. MOSHIRIAN (Workers' delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! Until the victory of the Islamic Revolution in Iran, this spy organisation Baha'i was very active.

It set out to attain the objectives of international Zionism. As pointed out in the report of the Selection Committee, its main body has its headquarters in occupied Palestine. Four years ago, we submitted many documents to the Committee on the Application of Standards proving that this organisation was involved in spying. Unfortunately there was no reaction whatsoever to this.

The workers of the Islamic Republic of Iran unreservedly support the views of the Government delegate of the Islamic Republic of Iran and raise strong objections to the fact that this matter should have been brought before the Conference.

Original – Arabic: Mr. AL-JUMAIRY (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, United Arab Emirates) – In the name of God, the Merciful and the Compassionate! The main objectives of the International Labour Organisation, as laid down in the Declaration of Philadelphia, are to achieve peace through social justice. The State of the United Arab Emirates, which I have the honour of representing here, believes in principles of freedom and justice and in the noble objectives of this Organisation. We therefore believe that the international community should welcome liberation movements throughout the world and all non-governmental organisations which have clear and precise objectives which correspond with those of the ILO, to attain conditions of peace and social justice in the world.

We nevertheless regret that the movement called Baha'i is asking to be admitted as an observer to our Conference. Given that the practices of this movement are contrary to the principles of the ILO to attain world peace and that it is a movement that has been declared renegade by the Islamic Figh Council which voices the views of the Muslim world as a whole, and given that the objectives of the movement are not clear to many participants at this Conference, we strongly oppose that it should attend this Conference as an observer. It is for this reason that I believe that the Conference should reject this demand.

Original – Arabic: Mr. DERBY (Government adviser, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya) – In the name of God, the Merciful and the Compassionate! The delegation of the Jamahiriya fully supports what has just been said by previous speakers as regards the request of the Baha'i International Community to attend the 76th Session of the Conference as an observer.

My delegation objects to this request, in accordance with the resolution of the Islamic Figh Council, attached to the Organisation of the Islamic Conference, which groups together all Muslim States. This resolution was adopted at the end of 1988 and condemns the activities of this movement, which is unfaithful to the spirit of Islam, in view of its deviations which bear no relation to Islam.

The religion of Islam was inspired by God (may He be praised) and delivered to the Prophet Mohammed (may the prayers and peace of God be upon him) in a holy book, the Koran, a book of brilliant clarity as regards all of the provisions of the Islamic Shari'a. However, certain dissidents claiming allegiance to Islam have hidden behind the veil of religion in order to set up ostensibly religious movements, which are in fact political and military, supported by the enemies of Islam embodied in Zionism and the colonialist and racist States, for they seek to propagate such dissident movements in many Muslim countries in order to seize power and set up regimes which are obedient to colonialist, Zionist and racist policy.

This is why I do not think that, in accordance with the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation, we can admit such movements, which have caused many tragedies. They are against children, against women and against workers. We cannot allow such a movement to attend our Conference and to participate in our discussions which are aimed at promoting human rights and workers' rights throughout the world.

Original – Arabic: Mr. AL-YAHYA (Government delegate, Saudi Arabia) – In the name of the God, the Merciful and the Compassionate! May the peace, mercy and grace of God be with you!

The Government delegation of the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia has taken note of the sixth report of the Selection Committee, in particular as regards the proposal to invite a delegation of the Baha'i International Community to attend this Conference.

The delegation of the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia strongly supports the rejection of this request. You must all know that this Conference, which is specialised in labour matters, is not a forum open to such associations or movements, either now or in the future. Any request of this kind addressed to our Conference will be vigorously rejected.

Original – Arabic: Mr. SAID (Government delegate, Iraq) – In the name of God, the Merciful and the Compassionate! My delegation has taken note of the request for the Baha'i International Community to be invited to attend the International Labour Conference as an observer. My country's delegation considers that this is a political movement opposed to religion, and one which has nothing to do with the activities of the ILO.

This is why my country's delegation vehemently opposes the admission of this movement and rejects the admission of this movement to the ILO.

Original – Arabic: Mr. SHAHATIT (Government adviser, Jordan) – Thank you for giving me the floor. The delegation of the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan would like to support what has just been said by the delegations of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia and Iraq. The Jordanian delegation considers that the Wahabite movement is a political movement opposed to religion. This is why the Jordanian delegation vehemently objects to the admission of this movement to this Conference.

Original – Arabic: Mr. JAGHMAN (Government delegate, Yemen) – On behalf of the delegation of the Arab Republic of Yemen, we support the previous speakers in their objection to the Baha'i movement and refusal to admit it to this Conference as an observer. We are opposed to the presence of this movement within the family of the International Labour Organisation. We are vehemently opposed to this request.

Original – Arabic: Mr. SHAHATIT (Government adviser, Jordan) – I would just like to correct my statement made a few moments ago. I spoke of the Wahabite movement. I meant the Baha'i movement. I must ask you to excuse this mistake. I repeat, I did mean the Baha'i movement.

Original – Arabic: Mr. HATEM (Government delegate, Syrian Arab Republic) – We support the speakers who rejected the Baha'i movement and ask that this movement be denied admission for the reasons given by the speakers.

Original – Arabic: Mr. GAMAH (Workers' adviser, Sudan) – On behalf of the Sudanese delegation, I support the previous speakers, and we fully support the rejection of the request of the Baha'i community.

Mr. AHMED (Government delegate, Pakistan) – My delegation also joins the other Islamic countries in opposing the entry of the Baha'i into this Organisation.

The PRESIDENT – I believe we have now exhausted the list of delegates who wish to speak on this matter. I understand that there is a proposal aiming at rejecting the recommendation made by the Selection Committee. Such a decision would require us to hold a vote. Is there any formal proposal?

Mr. TIZMAAGHZ (Government delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! On behalf of the delegation of the Islamic Republic of Iran, I should like to propose the following: in view of the fact that the question contained in the report of the Selection Committee is irrelevant to the functions, constitutional responsibilities and aims of the International Labour Organisation and in view of the fact that it would seem, from the discussions held, that the work of the International Labour is being directed towards functions and issues that have nothing to do with the Organisation's objectives, we do not believe that this Conference can run smoothly if we deal with such sensitive issues. We do not feel that the Conference is competent to accept such an invitation, as it would shake the very foundations of the Organisation and the Conference. We strongly propose that the issue be deleted from the agenda of the Conference.

The PRESIDENT – I have taken due note of the reservations and objections expressed by the various speakers and the remarks made by the Iranian delegate who has just spoken. These objections will be duly noted in the record. With those reservations and objections, I take it that the report of the Selection Committee is adopted.

Original – Arabic: Mr. OMAR (Government delegate, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya) – Given the strong objections of most of the delegations attending this Conference, it would be difficult for the Conference to decide to accept this request, even if this is reflected in the record of this meeting.

I maintain once again that this request should be rejected, as it is unacceptable. My delegation could not possibly accept this demand, even if our views and reservations are contained in the record of the meeting.

Once again I should like to request officially that the request submitted by the Baha'i movement be rejected.

The PRESIDENT – There is a point of order. I give the floor to Mr. Muhr.

Original – German: Mr. MUHR (Worker's delegate, Federal Republic of Germany) – The criteria for the admission of non-governmental organisations to the Conference are, unfortunately, extremely vague and in principle hardly make it possible for us to examine their admissibility. That is why to date, proposals made by the Governing Body or by the Selection Committee have always merely been noted. If we have to vote in connection with this proposal, I would like to propose, on behalf of the Workers' group, that we should receive sufficient information on the nature and the aims and purposes of this Organisation so that we may participate in the vote in a responsible fashion; I would also like to announce that, on behalf of the Worker's group, in case there is a vote, under article 19 of the Standing Orders, I am going to request a secret ballot because the group has asked me to ask for this whenever there is a danger that in an open vote the delegates would not be able to express their views freely. I should therefore like to request a secret ballot under article 19 of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

Mr. NABIAN (Government adviser, Islamic Republic of Iran) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! On behalf of the delegation of the Islamic Republic of Iran, and acting as the spokesman for more than one billion Muslims throughout the world – whose views have to a certain extent already been discussed at this forum – we should like to stress once again that the question raised in the report of the Selection Committee is totally irrelevant to the activities of the ILO and the International Labour Conference. The International Labour Conference does not have the competence to consider this issue. It is for this reason that we do not believe that, at this stage, a secret ballot or vote by show of hands would have any significance whatsoever, because the issue at stake is outside the competence of the Conference. Once again I should like to ask you that this question be withdrawn from the agenda of the Conference.

Original – French: Mr. OECHSLIN (Employers' delegate, France) – Taking into account Mr. Muhr's intervention, the time and the fact that we are holding a special sitting at 11 a.m., I believe that your decision to defer the vote to a later session is the only one possible. However, I should like to say that I believe that 3 p.m. this afternoon is too early because many delegations have not been informed of this decision and may have made other arrangements. I wonder whether another date could not be envisaged.

Original – Arabic: Mr. AL-YAHYA (Government delegate, Saudi Arabia) – Your proposal to put this matter to the vote greatly surprised the delegation of my country since all those who have taken the floor and spoken on this subject have totally rejected it. How could we possibly put something to the vote when the results are well known in advance. We do not wish to lose the Conference's time by putting it to a vote every time such a trivial subject is raised. As you know voting takes at least one hour. It is for this reason that the delegation of my country supports the proposal requesting that this paragraph of the report of the Selection Committee should be deleted. The delegate of my country does not therefore favour a vote as the matter has been unanimously rejected and not received the support of any speaker.

The PRESIDENT – Let me just make the situation clear. The issue we have discussed arose from the report submitted by the Selection Committee. I have listened to all the interventions and I therefore propose that, if the Conference does not want to vote on it, then the matter be referred back to the Selection Committee, so that the objections raised here may be in the Committee. One of the speakers, Mr. Muhr, indicated that the Workers' Group would like to receive more information before they can decide on how to proceed. I therefore decide that the matter be referred back to the Selection Committee. As far as the changes in the composition of Committee are concerned, may I take it that the report of the Selection Committee is adopted.

(The report is adopted.)

FIRST REPORT OF THE CREDENTIALS COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND NOTING

The PRESIDENT – The next item on our agenda is the first report of the Credentials Committee, which is found in Provisional Record No. 8. I give the floor to the Clerk of the Conference who will announce a correction to the report.

The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE – I want to indicate that on page 8/52 of Provisional Record No. 8, which contains the first report of the Credentials Committee, there is a slight correction to be made. The title of the table should read "List of registered delegates and advisers" instead of "List of accredited delegates and advisers".

The PRESIDENT – I now call on Mr. Califice, Government delegate, Belgium, Chairman of the Credentials Committee, to submit the Committee's first report.

Original – French: Mr. CALIFICE (Government delegate, Belgium; Chairman of the Credentials Committee) – I have the honour to present the first report of the Credentials Committee which you will find in Provisional Record No. 8 of Monday, 12 June:

The report sets out the position with regard to the composition of the Conference, as well as the quorum, as it was on 9 June 1989 when the Committee adopted the report. In the meantime, a number of additional delegates and advisers have been accredited and registered, and the delegations of El Salvador, Grenada, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau and Sao Tome and Principe have been accredited.

This brings the number of member States present to 140. The report also sets out the position with regard to incomplete delegations and the results as regards the right of vote.

Two countries had not accredited a Workers' delegate and I am happy to be able to tell you that one of these, Liberia, has now appointed a Workers' delegate. At present, only Democratic Yemen has not appointed a Workers' delegate.

Three countries – Benin, Cape Verde and Sao Tome and Principe – have not accredited an Employers' delegate

The Committee wishes to remind governments of their obligation to comply with the requirements of article 3 of the Constitution that a complete tripartite delegation be sent to the Conference.

The Committee also noted that there is some imbalance between the numbers of advisers to the delegates of each group, and in particular between the number of Employers' and Workers' advisers. Once again, it urges governments, when nominating delegations, to have due regard for the proportion in the composition of the Conference as envisaged in paragraphs 1 and 2 of article 3 of the Constitution.

Moreover, it reiterates the request contained in the resolution concerning the strengthening of tripartism in the overall activities of the International Labour Organisation, adopted by the Conference at its 56th Session in 1971.

In this connection, the Committee reminds member States of their obligation under article 13, paragraph 2(a), of the Constitution to pay the travelling and subsistence expenses of their delegates and advisers, and trusts that this obligation will be respected for the whole duration of the session of the Conference. We shall have the opportunity to come back to this point in other reports.

I should like to draw your attention to the information contained in paragraph 7 of the report concerning the number of women among accredited delegates and advisers. This information was included in the report so as to take account of the resolution concerning the participation of women in ILO meeting, adopted by the Conference at its 67th Session in 1981.

The Committee would like to emphasise that its work and that of the Conference would be made easier if credentials could be sent to the Office within the time limit laid down in article 26, paragraph, of the Standing Orders and if all governments would use the appropriate form attached to the Memorandum sent to governments before the session of the Conference.

It would be particularly useful if governments would provide precise information on the employers' and workers' organisations consulted on the appointment of Employers' and Workers' delegates and advisers, as well as on the organisations which have agreed to such appointments.

Since this report was adopted unanimously by the Credentials Committee, the Conference is required only to take note of it.

The PRESIDENT – I invite the Conference to take note of the first report of the Credentials Committee.

(The report is noted.)

(The Conference adjourned at 1.15 p.m.)

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

Original – Spanish: The PRESIDENT (Mr. DELPINO) – We shall now resume our discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General.

Original – French: Mr. DEGIMBE (Member of the Commission of the European Communities) – I wish to apologise on behalf of Mrs. Papandreou, member of the Commission of the European Communities in charge of social affairs, for her absence, which is due to the fact that she has had to take a plane back home this afternoon.

May I first congratulate Mr. Nkomo on his election to the presidency of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference.

I should also like to take advantage of the ILO's 70th anniversary to congratulate the Organisation on the great contribution it has made to social progress in the world and to express my best wishes for its future.

I believe that the Director-General's Report, this year focusing on economic recovery and employment, is a very valuable one. It sets out with great clarity the problems encountered by the countries of sub-Saharan Africa and Latin America whilst also referring to the still very high levels of unemployment in the industrial countries.

These two aspects of the Report are of particular interest to the Commission of the European Communities because it is currently preparing for the renewal of the Lomé Convention, on the one hand, and stepping up its work relating to the economic and social cohesion of the European Community, on the other.

In more general terms, I should also like to emphasise the value of the analyses in this Report and especially the conclusion in which the Director-General states that "growth – and more particularly, growth which creates employment and fights poverty – is a precondition for progress."

The Commission of the European Communities attaches great importance to a policy of job creation and the combat against unemployment, particularly given the situation of the Community employment market, where we are witnessing large-scale creation of employment but as of yet no significant decrease in unemployment.

The struggle against poverty is also a major concern of the Commission since the Community still numbers some 40 million people living on inadequate resources.

The Commission's concern about unemployment and poverty must be viewed in the broader context of the social dimension of the European internal market.

This large market, which the Commission is striving to achieve, is to be not only a market for financiers, businessmen and industrialists, but also an internal market responsive to the problems and aspirations of workers.

The Commission considers that the economic and social dimensions of the internal market must imperatively make progress in parallel. In this connection, at a time when the internal market is gradually consolidating the free movement of goods, capital and services, I should like to recall certain initiatives taken by the Commission to ensure the free movement of persons.

Our aim, first and foremost, is to ensure that all those who wish to move within the Community in pursuit of their occupation should enjoy the same conditions of access to employment and social protection as those enjoyed by the nationals of the country in which they wish to perform their work.

All administrative obstacles to the effective free movement of the citizens of the Community must therefore be removed, and adequate social security systems must be developed everywhere. I might add here that we are also closely examining the situation of non-Community migrant workers, who are exceedingly numerous in the Community, with a view to improving their living, working and residency conditions.

Given the huge population of non-Community migrant workers in some member States, this is to my mind a very important problem.

We must also arrive at a greater equivalency of diplomas and qualifications within the Community. In fact, we should strive for full mutual recognition of professional qualifications throughout the Community so as to ensure real mobility for all workers.

We must also see to it that the free circulation of goods should go hand in hand with the best security and health conditions at the working place and in the working environment.

To this end, the Community has drawn up a number of draft guidelines concerning the health and safety of workers in the workplace, in particular an important main directive which was just adopted last Monday by the Council of Ministers.

These various guidelines, which concern, in particular, the place of work, individual protective gear, the handling of heavy loads and protection of workers from carcinogenic substances and from the risks associated with lead and asbestos, aim to lay down minimum standards throughout the Community which will be obligatory for all undertakings.

But before a tripartite assembly, such as yours, I should like to emphasise one more important point concerning the social dimension of the internal market, namely, social dialogue.

The establishment of a single market – with economic and social dimensions – can only have real value if those who are mainly responsible for the economic and social life of the various member States are closely involved with the decision-making process, in general, and in the social field, in particular.

This is the reason why, since the beginning of the year, the Commission has been stepping up its contacts with the two sides of industry, both at the level of the Presidents and Secretaries-General of the national organisations, and at the level of specialised working groups currently tackling labour market, training and education problems.

These are not academic gatherings, but meetings where the two sides of industry try to arrive at joint approaches to the main problems with which they have to contend in connection with the completion of the single market.

Co-operation and communication between the two sides of industry and the public authorities is, in my view, one of the essential components of the policy which we have to develop in the social field, and I take pleasure in stating this before a tripartite assembly such as this one.

I should not like to end this brief address without mentioning the preliminary draft Community Charter of fundamental social rights which the Commission has just adopted, and which is to be seen in the context of the completion of the internal market and its social dimension. Various rights are enshrined in this new document, relating amongst other things to social protection, the improvement of living and working conditions and vocational training. Some of these rights are already covered by various ILO Conventions, from which our preliminary draft has drawn much of its inspiration.

Finally – and this is something which Mrs. Papanreou would like to have said – I wish to stress the importance which the Commission attaches to close co-operation between the ILO and itself. Mrs. Papanreou has also asked me to assure the new Director-General, Mr. Hansenne, of the Commission's will and her own desire to promote such co-operation.

Original – Finnish: Mr. PUHAKKA (Minister of Labour, Finland) – Allow me first of all to congratulate the President, and the Vice-Presidents of the Conference on their election. I wish them success in their high offices.

I wish to commend the Director-General on his excellent Report entitled Recovery and employment, which draws our attention to the problems caused by economic inequalities leading to internal and external tensions threatening our future.

The Report highlights clearly and at the same time objectively the deep division between the industrialised countries and the developing countries, and also the increasing social inequalities within the countries. It strives to seek solutions to these growing problems. Once again, the importance of the ILO and its tripartite structure comes to the fore; it is what we need, and the ILO must assume fully its responsibilities in furthering social justice.

The encouraging growth of the world economy in the past few years has unfortunately not led to diminishing economic imbalances, as was hoped. On the contrary, the developing countries have to cope with greater debt and balance-of-payments problems, with unemployment and other social problems. Similar development imbalances occur also within the countries, in spite of economic growth.

Quite rightly, the Director-General describes the situation as a paradox. This state of affairs obliges all of us to seek new solutions of economic and social security within the social dimension of adjustment policies. Here, the ILO has a major role in fostering an awareness of these problems and initiating discussion and action.

The political decision-makers in the member States hold the keys to reversing this adverse national and international development.

We all live on the same planet, where the major problems – whether we like it or not – are increasingly interdependent. Solutions to these problems have to be found through a combined effort. Thus, the message of the Declaration of Philadelphia: "Poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere" is as valid today as it ever was. Viable solutions call for solidarity in favour of more stable, sustainable and equitable development.

The favourable world political situation today gives us hope for fruitful co-operation between the nations and, hopefully, enough common will to diminish the inequalities in the future and to secure a just and sustainable development all over the world.

Economic growth is an important factor for creating and promoting social development. The reverse side of economic growth reveals threats like environmental pollution problems and exploitation of natural resources. Concerns about pollution and environmental catastrophes are preoccupying the minds of citizens in many countries. In the future, every effort must be made to ensure that economic growth takes into considerations the protection of the environment. Further, growth should be monitored bearing in mind economic and social conditions and those where the needs are the greatest.

Ecological matters in particular call for international co-operation. Several draft resolutions on environmental matters have been presented to this Conference, including the one by the Government delegates of the Nordic countries. This draft resolution addresses the issue of the working environment and that of the relationship between the working environment and the general environment. It also calls for the ILO programmes to take into account the causal linkage between poverty and environmental degradation and to give increased attention to the relationships between the environment and employment.

Increased use of chemicals is a potential danger to the environmental balance. They may also affect the health and well-being of the workers at the workplace.

The rapid global increase in the use of chemicals gives cause for concern and fear of chemical accidents, toxic effects, cancer, reproductive hazards and allergies, etc.

Several international programmes have been established to identify and prevent chemical hazards. The Joint Programme of the ILO, WHO, UNEP and the International Programme on Chemical Safety produces valuable risk evaluation documents for use in the working place. The UNEP instrument and guide-lines control the trade and transport of dangerous chemicals and hazardous wastes. The ILO/CIS Information Centre operates very effectively in about 55 countries.

The Government of Finland highly appreciates these international activities and deems their continuity and further development very desirable. Finland has also made effective use of the results of such programmes in the regulation and control of chemical hazards at a national level.

The Government of Finland has supported these international measures to improve chemical safety, placing both financial resources and experts at the disposal of these programmes. We recognise the need for independent international information and for measures which effectively protect our environment and the health and safety of all workers dealing with chemicals, be it in the industrialised countries, the newly industrialised countries or in the developing countries.

The intention of this Conference to draw up an international Convention for safety in the use of chemicals at work is a very timely action and complements previous measures to protect the worker from chemical hazards.

The second new technical item – night work – chosen as the subject for a Convention and Recommendation demonstrates that the ILO standard-setting activities are up to date. So far, no comprehensive international instrument on night work exists, so I find it especially opportune that the Labour Conference now sees fit to deal with the physical and social problems related to night work.

In this connection, the standards concerning night work of women are also to be renewed. This I find to be extremely timely as the furthering of equal treatment of men and women in working life is a high priority in the ILO programme of work as well as in member States. Finland has repealed the statutes on prohibition of night work of women.

Finland has always taken a positive stand on the international standard-setting work of the ILO and has fully supported the ILO activities on implementation of the standards.

Unfortunately, the number of ratifications of the Conventions is not as high as one would hope. It is important to exercise firm and resolute judgment when drafting the Conventions and then see to it that as many Members as possible, regardless of their political system or stage of development, ratify them. Only thus can we ensure high esteem for the ILO and the improvement of the situation of workers as uniformly as possible all over the world.

A first priority for the ILO is to protect workers' rights and to improve working conditions and promote social justice. The working life and economic life change rapidly nowadays. These changes as well as economic integration processes pose great challenges to the ILO in the 1990s. In order to respond to these challenges, great efforts are called for within the Organisation, from member States, from the employers and the workers. New concerns but also new possibilities face us.

Capital movement has increased with expanding internationalisation and in this new situation bargaining mechanisms are no longer adequate. The equilibrium between the labour market parties may be disturbed and the functioning of the labour market hampered. The internationalisation of working life calls for improved methods of responding to the new challenges facing us.

The knowledge accumulated in the ILO on the realities of working life deserves to be more widely utilised.

This very month we have constituted in Finland a new extensive Ministry of Labour. In working out the reform of labour administration we have found the ILO experts' report of 1973 very useful.

All matters concerning labour policy are now concentrated in the Ministry of Labour, which is charged with the duty to serve the labour market and to develop working life. The priorities of Finnish labour policy are: full employment; economic democracy; improved working conditions; and arrangement of working time in the 1990s.

I hope the 70-year-old ILO and its members will embark on the next decade with the will to solve future problems, fully utilising the possibilities that the Organisation's expertise and tripartite structure offers.

The Director-General has made a challenging appeal for this Conference to call upon the United Nations and its specialised agencies to use the savings, realised thanks to disarmament, in a joint effort to finance operations at the regional or subregional level in order to create essential infrastructure within the framework of a major works programme devoted to the conservation of the environment.

This courageous and encouraging action on the part of both Mr. Blanchard and Mr. Hansenne, is not only a proposal that merits our support but also one which demonstrates that the active leadership we have been used to in the ILO will continue and will ensure that the Organisation remains the Organisation of labour, freedom and peace for which it was founded.

Mr. KGABO (Minister of Labour and Home Affairs, Botswana) – On behalf of my delegation and indeed on my own behalf, it is a great pleasure to have this opportunity to add my congratulations to those which have already been addressed to Mr. Nkomo for his election to the presidency of the 76th Session of the Conference.

In view of his remarkable capability, fully evidenced by his distinguished record of ably chairing both the Conference Committee on Apartheid and the Seventh African Regional Conference held in Harare in 1988, I have no doubt that he will guide the proceedings of this Conference to a successful conclusion. I also wish to extend my congratulations to the Vice-Presidents of the Conference.

The 76th Session of the International Labour Conference takes place under the guidance of a new Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, whom we warmly welcome.

Our message and plea to the Director-General is very brief: Africa needs the ILO's special attention in view of her economic and social problems.

I wish further to point out that the Report which this Conference will consider was authored by the outgoing Director-General. There is no doubt that through his past Report, and in particular the present Report on recovery and employment, he has left his own personal and valuable imprint on the ILO.

Some programmes of economic and financial reform drawn up the developing countries have, in most cases, only helped to worsen the living conditions of the poor citizens of those countries. This Report takes a positive lead in recognising that the social dimensions of structural adjustment equally need to be taken into consideration. Recently there has been intensive debate on the issue of structural adjustment, and these debates have paid little or no attention to the social dimensions of the problems that go with structural adjustment.

The ILO's concern for redressing social conditions was exemplified by the holding of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment in November 1987. Developing countries appreciate the ILO's initiatives in urging the international financial institutions and the international community to fully take into account their social and employment objectives.

Furthermore, the least developed countries do recognise that some slight progress has been achieved, which brings relief to the debt-ridden countries, and can only hope these achievements will not be short-lived.

As the Report indicates, the external debt problem, the bleak economic situation for developing countries, the ever-rising unemployment problems, among others, are no longer problems that need regional solutions, but ones in which a global solution is an absolute requirement.

The ILO continues to assist in technical co-operation activities aimed at assisting constituent members. In the main, assistance continues to be provided in the field of employment, manpower planning, labour market information studies, technical advisory services, to mention but a few. The Africa region also recognises and appreciates the ILO's programme of assistance towards workers' education and promotion of women's participation in development, as well as the programme of assistance to employers' organisations.

The different Conference Committees will discuss and present to this Conference different technical items which are worthy of our attention. My delegation looks forward to the finalisation of the discussions on partial revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107). This is because in 1987 the Government of Botswana issued a statement setting out the procedures to be followed in the land question, which assured the inhabitants of remote areas of their rightful share of the communal land resource. The revision of the Convention which, it is hoped, will culminate in a new instrument, will be studied with the intention to improve, where necessary, our existing policy.

The Conference is called upon to examine an issue of serious concern to all, and more importantly, to developing countries, namely, safety in the use of chemicals at work. While we continue to pursue economic activities, our priority being economic growth and job creation, let us not lose sight of the fact that these should be compatible with workers' health. We note with deep concern that hazardous substances that are industry-produced and based, have tended to have potential effects beyond the workplace and have become a threat to the nearby communities and the environment in general.

Recently, some countries, unable to handle the waste from their chemical industries, have made developing countries their dumping ground. It behoves mankind to eliminate the scope of such evil deeds, for the consequences of dumping such toxic waste on the waters and land of countries without facilities, technical knowledge and finance to handle the after-effects of dumping, are extremely heavy to bear. We therefore welcome the ILO's efforts in pressing for, and actively promoting, international action to ensure that the export and dumping of such hazardous waste is strictly eliminated.

The peace process towards the achievement of independence by Namibia preoccupies southern Africa and in particular the front-line States and the neighbouring countries. A continued review of the situation which has come about since 1 April 1989, and the subsequent steps taken by the governments concerned to resolve any arising difficulties to work towards the uninterrupted peace process and to full implementation of United Nations resolution 435, is an absolute requirement. We urge all the parties to genuinely fulfil their obligations and responsibilities towards such a peace process. The people of Namibia have waited for many years to achieve freedom and independence. It is now the responsibility of the whole of the international community to see to it that their hopes are realised. Despite the setbacks that might have occurred, the peace process is back on the rails and this is what is important. We in Botswana look towards Namibia's independence with great hope as we share borders with that country and have a cultural affinity with the people of Namibia.

It is in this light that Botswana has seen fit to support the appointment of our United Nations representative, Mr. Joseph Lewhela, to the very important post of Assistant to the United Nations Special Representative in Namibia.

While we have guarded hopes about Namibia's independence, we are totally dismayed about the situation inside South Africa. The Pretoria regime still refuses to see reason in dialogue with all parties inside and outside South Africa that can lead to the resolution of the situation inside that country.

We are disappointed that the regime still believes that it can contain and resolve the situation by declarations of a state of emergency or banning certain organisations, be they either political or labour-inclined. The continued arrest and detention of individuals without trials is a complete negation of that which is human and civil.

It is the responsibility of us all to continue to give impetus towards a complete dismantling of the apartheid system in South Africa by, amongst others, securing the effective implementation of the provisions and recommendations contained in the updated ILO Declaration Concerning Action against Apartheid.

Original - French: Mr. SOISSON (Minister for Labour, Employment and Vocational Training, France) - Firstly, on behalf of France, may I express satisfaction at the election as President of this Conference of the representative of a country which plays so active a part on the international stage and which, as was mentioned this morning, hosted with such efficiency and warmth the last ILO African Regional Conference.

I would also like to associate myself fully with the tribute paid this morning to Mr. Francis Blanchard. I have always had a very friendly personal relationship with Mr. Blanchard and I would like to express to him, on behalf of France – his country as well as mine – our gratitude for all he has done as Director-General of the International Labour Office. He is being replaced by a man we think a great deal of, who comes from a country which is a neighbour and a friend of France.

The European Community will recall that Mr. Michel Hansenne was the very first to speak of the Charter of fundamental social rights which we are advocating and which is designed to provide the European Community, as from this year, with the instrument for its social development. This charter will owe a great deal to the ILO Conventions and will embody their major principles.

Harmonising the requirements of national law, of European law and of a universal law, is without a doubt one of the most important missions of the Organisation over the next few years and I know that under Mr. Hansenne's leadership, the ILO will continue on the right path.

The present session of the Conference is an important one. It comprises, amongst other things, a preliminary discussion on "night work" and on "safety in the use of chemicals at work." These are highly complex subjects with regard to which we must establish guidelines in accordance with both the interests of the wage earners and the requirements of economic activity. Let us leave the technical committees and the Organisation to their work on these difficult matters and when the time comes, let us give our views, being careful to distinguish between what is desirable and what is possible.

At a time when France is celebrating the 200th anniversary of the declaration of human rights, I would like to also point out that 1989 is the 70th anniversary of our Organisation. Who would have believed, 200 years ago, that the individualistic principles of the Revolution would one day be strengthened by the social values which we are all defending here in Geneva?

Obviously, neither tripartism, by the prominent place it offers to trade unions and employers' organisations, alongside governments, nor the conviction, which has been very strong since 1919, that for world peace there has to be an improvement in social relations, were part of the tradition of freedom in 1789. Nevertheless, how can we not be aware of the similarities between the ideal of freedom which fired the French Revolution, and the message of hope and emancipation which the ILO is continually transmitting to the workers of the world by means of the Conventions and Recommendations which it elaborates.

The standard-setting work of the Organisation should be loyally supported by the member States. Of course, the observance of Conventions may sometimes be difficult. I am thinking, for instance, of instruments concerning the public services, a field where contractual systems are opposed to statutory ones. But member States must leave no stone unturned in reinforcing social rights by adhering to new Conventions. My country is trying to do so, and it has just ratified three Conventions and is preparing – I would like to announce this today – to approve the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138).

Member States must also keep their word. In approving your texts, they voluntarily agree to a limitation of their sovereignty. Accordingly, they must submit with good grace to the ILO's monitoring system which is neither a kind of police tribunal nor a university board but the concrete, the tangible guarantee, of freedom and of workers' rights. This monitoring system is essential, and we are confident that our new Director-General, like his predecessors, will allow it to play its full part.

I should like today to look more closely at the role played by the ILO in development.

I am convinced that the ILO, by contributing to raise the level of the guarantees available to the wage earners of the whole world, is contributing to the development of the least developed economies, by ensuring a better use of labour.

Allow me to insist on this point. Any effort to bring about modernisation will fail if the social dimension of modernisation is not properly considered; there can be no technical or economic modernisation without social and human modernisation.

Every worker must participate fully in modernisation. Subject to this condition, and to this condition alone, can technical changes be felt not as a demoralising threat, but instead as an opportunity for shared development. This is a matter for the managers of undertakings, for trade associations and trade unions for the wage earners themselves. There can be no successful modernisation without bargaining among all those concerned. Nor is any further development possible if there is a levelling of social rights on the lowest level.

Social cohesion has become the main factor in economic recovery, and it would be wrong to base the competitiveness of economies on the excessive cutting of labour costs.

The Organisation is also taking part in development efforts by calling on States to show more solidarity.

How could we not, in this connection, pay tribute to one of the last of Mr. Blanchard's projects, referred to several times this morning, which was the organisation, with the collaboration of other United Nations organisations, of a High Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment in Geneva in November 1987, to draw attention to the social consequences of the policies of austerity imposed on the debtor countries.

In this connection, the President of the French Republic has just, as you know, announced the decision taken by France to cancel the debt of a number of particularly poor countries.

There is no question of denying the need for the developing countries to adapt their industrial structures and their economies to technological change and to international competition. But France must recognise that the reforms, however justified they may be, cannot be undertaken at the expense of the very poorest peoples, and so it is for us to help the developing countries to assure their social development. We have just done this by cancelling the debt which was a great burden on these countries in their development.

Another aspect of our solidarity finds its expression in technical co-operation, and here I would like to pay tribute to the work done throughout the world by ILO experts. Standard-setting activities must be ever more closely linked to technical co-operation activities, especially in the fields of training, hygiene and job security. Incidentally, my country has just announced a series of measures to intensify our relations with the Turin Centre and I wish to pay tribute here to this Centre for its work. These efforts will be pursued by France during the next few years.

This means that for France it is a matter of eminent satisfaction to observe that the Organisation is doing well.

The unanimous vote for which Mr. Blanchard appealed this morning, of the next budget by the Governing Body, reflects this. France hopes that the Conference, in turn, will make the same gesture. If the budget is voted in unanimously, the Organisation will finally achieve a balance in its budget, which has been in great difficulties over the last few years because of a series of monetary, technical and sometimes political factors.

The contributions of the member States pay for a project and a programme designed to meet the immense needs of the world's workers. This programme calls for very difficult choices to be made. A search for the largest possible degree of agreement or unanimity, which is the strength of the ILO, will enable us to undertake these tasks.

I conclude by saying that the International Labour Organisation is the contemporary representative of the first major international effort towards peace. May this sturdy 70-year old lead us, for many years to come, along the path to social progress and justice! This is the message of my country on the occasion of this Conference.

Original – French: Mrs. SASSO-MAZZUFFERI (Employers' delegate, Italy) – 1989 is an important year, a genuine turning point for the ILO. During the events of this year, which are known to everyone present, we have all acted as instruments of changes that will undoubtedly have a strong impact on the life of this Organisation.

The Director-General, Mr. Hansenne, and the President of this Session of the Conference, are involved in this process of renewal. I should like to warmly congratulate Mr. Hansenne on his election and extend to him my best wishes for his future work. As to the President, I am fully confident that he will effectively conduct our work to a successful conclusion.

To both of these gentlemen I have the honour to extend the support of the Italian employers. We should also like to express our sincere best wishes to Mr. Blanchard for a future full of moral satisfaction and professional commitment.

The Report of the Director-General submitted for our consideration this year combines excellent comments and suggestions with the common sense that characterises men in the field who have learned, through their daily encounters with the extremely varied reality of the industrialised and the developing countries, the art of giving and proposing subtle and profound solutions to problems that may appear to be simple, but which in fact never are.

The Report clearly states that "there can be no uniform, doctrinaire prescription which is applicable to all countries." This is a leitmotif throughout the Report, and we fully support it. Although one may disagree with some of the statements contained in certain parts of the Report, one cannot fail to acknowledge the basic intellectual honesty of its authors, who stress the relativity of each solution envisaged and the difficulties of adapting those solutions to local situations and to the complex relationships that exist between institutions, infrastructures, legal systems, economic contexts and social needs.

This rigid connection between elements of equal importance, but frequently characterised by contradictions and conflict, is often at the origin of resistance to change, to structural adjustment, to a flexible labour market and to the allocation of financial and human resources to new requirements.

Those requirements are the result of debt problems, which still affect too many countries, and of the problems of infrastructure and service modernisation, which concern many other of the most industrialised countries. A balance which is fair – an adjective often mentioned in the Report – between contradictions at the international and national levels seems to be the ideal solution, but the means of accomplishing it have eluded the best analyses.

The Report quite correctly begins by stating that "we live in a time of paradox" and of contradiction. In its conclusion, it asserts that the policies to be applied require a global approach.

This is true at the international level, but also at the national level.

Despite the creation of more industrial sector jobs in 1988 – which was a reversal of the trend of previous years – our country is continuing to experience high unemployment.

Moreover, although there is persistent and quite serious unemployment among young people in our southern areas, there is a shortage of skilled and specialised manpower in the northern areas, while at the same time there is increased employment of immigrant workers. Such contradictions characterised other European countries as well.

Recent studies and surveys, carried out in various parts of the world, have shown that employment figures alone don't tell the whole truth: the fact that there is no longer a single market of job supply and demand, but rather several markets, has led to completely new behavioural patterns. A typical attitude is that of young people who can allow themselves the luxury of expecting not just any job but the very job they desire and for which they are qualified.

Another contradictory example: the introduction of new technology provides certain advantages for various sectors in user countries but at the same time involves costs which are well illustrated in the Director-General's Report. And yet no sector, no country can do without technology.

Other examples can be seen in various chapters of the Report. We can summarise these by saying that optimistic growth predictions do not necessarily imply improvement of the situation in the poorest regions of the Third World. Hence, a global approach is today essential. Thus, in international trade, globalisation of markets is already a fact.

One thing is certain, adjustment policies are necessary. But we must not underestimate the social aspects of these policies. At the same time, we must reject subsidies and aid, and choose the path of effectiveness and competition through "far greater selectivity and careful prioritising of government expenditures", as stated in the Director-General's Report.

While we can only share the concerns of the ILO for economic recovery in the poorest countries and for a higher standard of living among populations affected by unemployment and underemployment, it is not always correct to follow the old model of labour-intensive investment, which has once again been proposed in the Report. Investment, whether public or private, should be productive and should respond to international and national market challenges so that it will not become a burden to the community. Excellence in all areas depends on this.

Deregulation is another sensitive issue. It is never desirable to carry out deregulation at all costs everywhere. There are areas where clear and modern regulation is demanded above all by those concerned. However, in many countries difficulties are created in the area of employment by excessive regulation which hinders new hiring, particularly of young people, rather than balancing labour supply and demand.

Collective bargaining can be used by the social partners to cut through the barriers of regulation. This is the case in our country where bilateral agreements have overcome legislative obstacles and confirmed the validity of job-training contracts which constitute the most appropriate model, in our era, with respect to the aspirations of young workers and the needs of enterprises.

In Italy, in the field of industrial relations, the social partners are using agreements in order to remodel the existing system by establishing new rules of negotiation, based on the overall compatibility of economic and social needs, to achieve a balance between individual and collective components of contracts and a more rational relationship between the various levels of negotiation. The problem of labour costs remains at the heart of our concerns.

At the enterprise level, the most recent agreements contain innovative provisions, particularly with respect to wages. Definitions in international literature vary. Some speak of wages linked to a company's financial success, others of competitive bonuses. These innovations in wages emphasise enterprise performance and production target improvement. All of this assumes and confirms a very mature trade union environment promoting the cultural development of workers. The exaggerated egalitarianism of the last decade is giving way to more sophisticated forms of the workers' professional qualities and personal commitment.

Italian employers remain convinced that it is impossible to turn our backs on the challenge of change and that industrial relations can truly be improved if we are ready to adopt an attitude favourable to an environment in which enterprises can emerge live and prosper without too many difficulties. What is needed is a realistic base for the creation and maintenance of more widespread well-being. This concept is repeatedly mentioned in the Director-General's Report.

To conclude, we reiterate our conviction that stable and global economic growth and long-term employment opportunities depend on the adoption of effective structural reforms, which should be introduced in order of priority. Time allows us to list only the examples provided by the ILO, namely, education and vocational training for multi-disciplinary skills, the establishment of links between environment and economy, co-operation to resolve the debt crisis, the creation and modernisation of infrastructures and more rigorous and courageous budgetary discipline.

But over and above the efforts of each member of society to achieve these objectives, there is the need, at the root of any development, for a social and economic culture that is increasingly open to and integrated with other cultures. There is also the need for wider and deeper respect for international labour standards in close connection with technical co-operation. Standard-setting and operational activities are equally vital for promoting genuine steady development. The Centre in Turin may also make a contribution in this area.

The ILO's tripartite forum, characterised by its dynamic and unique structure, is in our view the best possible way to disseminate these principles, to facilitate and monitor their effective application and to increase their beneficial impact throughout the world.

Original – Russian: Mr. BOZHINOV (Employers' delegate, Bulgaria) – Allow me to greet the President and his deputies and to wish them every success in their work in these responsible posts, to which they were elected at the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference.

I would also like to take this opportunity of expressing our best wishes to Mr. Michel Hansenne on the occasion of his election to the post of Director-General of the ILO and I would assure him that our country will continue as in the past to support and contribute to the solution of the problems with which the Organisation is confronted by the march of time.

We are honoured to associate ourselves with the congratulations and words of praise of the other speakers on the occasion of the 70th anniversary of the ILO.

This anniversary and the present session are taking place in new circumstances. For the first time since the war, we are on the brink of really being able to pass from the clash of differing political systems to mutual understanding and economic co-operation. There are strong grounds for optimism in view of recent Soviet/American and other high-level meetings, the outcome of the Vienna meetings of countries participating in the Conference on European Security and Co-operation, the establishment of official contacts between the Council for Economic Co-operation and individual countries of this Organisation and the European Community. We also welcome action to increase confidence and, last but not least, the unilateral decisions on real disarmament measures taken by the members of the Warsaw Pact; all this contributes to an ever more tangible atmosphere of trust. Another helpful step in this direction is the statement made by the President of the United States about a possible cut in American forces in Europe.

This change of atmosphere is favourable to further progress in settling the most important basic problems of our Organisation. But a change in atmosphere is not in itself enough if the spirit of international understanding and a new approach to political problems through joint effort is not reflected in our discussions, working parties and ruling bodies.

The managers of socialist undertakings in Bulgaria feel that the question of economic recovery and employment discussed by the Director-General in his Report is most timely and relevant to current and future international development. We consider that the economic recovery of all countries would be helped by action for unilateral cuts in certain types of conventional armaments and corresponding practical measures to turn factories over from production of arms to civilian production.

This is one prerequisite for economic improvement and faster growth, with consequently better prospects for workers' living standards. We applaud ILO attempts to study ways and means whereby the change-over may be made from production for war to civilian production. Our country has already taken definite action in this direction.

I would like to observe that in the economy of my country, the People's Republic of Bulgaria, profound changes have taken place since the last session. New laws and regulations have been enacted with the principal aim of encouraging the financial and currency independence of individual undertakings (firms, farms and so on), the integration of our economy into the international market, the elimination of state monopolies on foreign trade, as well as stimulating competition, releasing economic initiatives, ensuring that co-operatives, private and foreign companies and Bulgarian state enterprises are equal before the law and cutting out economic red tape and bureaucracy.

All this will help to increase the standing of managers and the part they play. A good manager is very valuable, since the efficiency of his undertaking depends on him. We are currently concentrating on further training for managerial staff and preparing the ground for improving the training of future managers. In this connection, we are especially interested in the measures and programmes undertaken by the ILO in the interests of increased managerial efficiency.

I should like to address a problem bound up with one of these fundamental aims and functions of the ILO, namely conditions of work and employment. In this connection, we have always supported the idea put forward by the Director-General in his Report that production should not be increased at the cost of the workers' welfare. We share his belief that concern for the workers has a beneficial effect on productivity.
