The measures proposed in the Report for achieving economic growth as a prerequisite for more employment are too heterogeneous; their effect may vary according to the circumstances in which such action is taken. The enormous range of such possibilities means that there is still no chance of a harmonious system of measures and recommendations for future social development being evolved.

I hope that through our common efforts the ILO will propose and implement specific action to assist countries cruelly affected by the fall in economic growth.

We in Bulgaria are particularly exercised over the question of safety in the use of chemicals at work. In the Director-General's Report this matter is dealt with as one factor making for the impoverishment of the developing countries as a result of replacing natural substances by synthetic ones. Today, chemicals are widely used, some of them highly dangerous, as various tragic incidents in recent years have shown. All countries must therefore give this question very serious attention. Moreover, attention must be given to every phase in the use of chemicals, beginning with their production, then their transportation, their use in industry and finally the elimination of toxic waste. The standards proposed must offer the maximum degree of safety so that in future chemicals may continue to serve the cause of progress; we therefore favour adoption of the Convention and the Recommendation as the best way of protecting workers involved with chemicals.

As regards item V of the agenda, concerning night work, we share the view that such work is equally harmful for all workers.

Night work which proves to be harmful should be resorted to only when vital public interest or the nature of the production process demands. But hours should be shorter for night work than for day work and should not only be better paid, but the workers concerned should enjoy better conditions and health care.

With regard to the Director-General's Special Report on apartheid in southern Africa, I would once more observe that we shall carefully ensure that business circles in the People's Republic of Bulgaria maintain no relations with firms and individuals from that country and will boycott any economic ties with it until apartheid has been abolished. At the same time we welcome the definite steps taken to give independence to Namibia and feel that this opens new perspectives for its development and the improvement of the position of its workers. I wish to emphasise that Bulgarian business circles, as far as they are able, intend to offer assistance and co-operation in the development of an independent Namibia.

We are happy to note that there is an atmosphere of mutual understanding in the Employers' group. Undoubtedly, an important part has been played by the factors already mentioned, the new spirit of political thinking. Anxious to promote co-operation with the employers of all countries, the managers of undertakings in my country are keen to achieve an improvement in managerial processes and would be glad to take part in exchanges on managerial experience, vocational training, and so on.

We think that the changes made in the ILO Constitution, reinforcing democratic principles in the Organisation, are a good beginning. We support the view that they should be ratified by our country. We hope that there will be a similar favourable reaction in the Employers' group now that they are better represented in the new reorganised Governing Body. Experience shows that confrontation only makes it harder to achieve the constitutional aims of the ILO to improve the position of workers throughout the world. It is essential that confrontation be left behind, while relations within the organisation grow in equality and co-operation.

I take this opportunity to express to Mr. Blanchard, the outgoing Director-General of the ILO, our gratitude for his activity over many years and also to express the hope that in future his valuable experience will be available to ensure progress in the fight for peace and progress.

We support the activities of the ILO and I wish to assure you that the managers of undertakings in the People's Republic of Bulgaria will continue to make their contribution to the work of the Employers' group to ensure that democratisation should become irreversible in the ILO in the interests of the great humanitarian aims of our organisation.

Original – Russian: Mr. CIGANIK (Employers' delegate, Czechoslovakia) – Allow me sincerely to congratulate the President and his colleagues, the Vice-Presidents, on their election to the responsible offices of the Conference.

The 70th anniversary of the foundation of the ILO is a suitable time to reflect briefly on the work already done and on the future prospects for the activities of the ILO; we hope that the ILO will offer its modest contribution to improving the lot of the workers and helping to make their dreams come true. If we consider the work of the ILO from this point of view, we see that its efforts are proceeding along the right lines. The fact that this Organisation has survived for 70 years in a world full of upheavals and excitement testifies to the fact that its work has been useful and still enjoys the widest support today. The system of international labour standards enjoys world-wide prestige. The broad system of additional programmes will further the achievement of our important mission, namely, to strengthen the social aspects of world development.

We face huge problems. Economic growth in every field is taking place rapidly but, at the same time, the population is also increasing resulting in a polarisation of poverty and wealth throughout the world and within many countries.

The Director-General's Report, analysing these relationships, devotes relatively little attention to the specific problems of the socialist countries. I do not wish to reproach the Director-General, but only to give the reason behind some of the things I would like to tell this Conference.

The socialist countries have gone through a complicated process in their economic development. The strategy which they followed in this development was largely dictated by the world political situation, as well as certain concepts of economic theory. In all our countries heavy industry was developed as a priority. We strove to meet most of our needs out of our own resources. This made it harder to achieve effective integration. A broad and extensive planned development was served by a system of prices based on the cost principle contract. We succeeded in mobilising resources and quickly developing productive forces. However, such a model of expansion made it difficult to make comparisons with the rest of the world and maintain contacts with it. It made it difficult to utilise our comparative advantage and resources of intensive development. In our country and in other socialist countries, major social programmes were implemented and domestic demand increased very fast. After extensive resources were exhausted however, it became clear that the economies of our countries, whether taken together or individually, would be unable in the long run to develop independently of the world market and of the world-wide scientific progress.

Employers in Czechoslovakia realised long ago what the results of such development would be and foresaw its consequences. The practical problems we are encountering in managing our undertakings show how difficult it is to achieve a desirable level of technological development and quality of output, given the available range of goods. In many cases, however, we should be able to make up for our shortcomings in technical equipment by traditional good sense and by the high level of skill of our workers. This is why we have insisted on introducing changes in the model of economic management.

Such changes are now under way in Czechoslovakia. The aim is to combine planning and market approaches to a greater extent and therefore we are also decentralising economic decision-making and enhancing the autonomy of enterprises. We would like to increase our interaction within the world market and to make the necessary structural changes. We intend to stimulate a rational export policy of our economy with regard to the developed market economy countries and also in relation to the developing countries. We note with satisfaction that the present political situation, which is characterised by the search for mutual understanding and constructive co-operation, is laying a firm foundation for the attainment of all these ends.

We should like to increase considerably the share of the developing countries in our foreign trade. Existing facilities and the planned structural changes will help in satisfying the demand of these countries for certain kinds of machinery and technological equipment and hence will contribute to their industrial development.

On the other hand, we are prepared to respond positively to the efforts of developing countries and the diversification of their foreign economic relations and to sell finished products on more distant markets.

We also intend to step up considerably co-operation with our partners in developing countries, especially with our traditional partners in Europe. The existing model, under which we exchange raw materials, semi-finished products and consumer goods for manufacturing plant, however, makes it difficult for us to expand co-operation. Like other smaller countries, we shall strive to achieve rational links with the implementation of production and scientific and technological programmes of the major economies and the groups of which they are members. We are also trying to conclude bilateral agreements on the basis of production co-operatives and joint enterprises. We are creating the necessary conditions to achieve this. In this connection, two new important Acts have entered into force in my country: firstly, the Act respecting economic contacts with foreign countries. This will enable us to make direct contacts between our enterprises and their foreign counterparts in the field of production co-operatives and specialisation, as well as in scientific and technical co-operation.

Secondly, the Act respecting enterprises with foreign stock participation took effect on 1 January this year; it regulates the setting up of such undertakings within Czechoslovakia with nationals of socialist and non-socialist countries.

Employers in my country also intend to make a constructive contribution to the process of renewal referred to in the Director-General's Report. On the one hand, they are willing to support the ILO's efforts in this field and, on the other hand, they intend to make use primarily of the programmes of the European co-operation and both regional projects concerning consultative activities and vocational training.

Allow me to say a very few words now concerning important internal problem of the Organisation. Obviously, I am referring to the representation of directors from the socialist countries on ILO bodies. The fact that it exists is quite clear. In the past, we emphasised the right of all our delegates to equitable and proportional representation on all bodies with a limited membership. This is the principle on which government representation is based. It would be desirable to continue discussions, and we believe that we are proceeding along the right lines. The ratification of the amended article 7 of our Constitution as regards the Employers' group should be a signal for the full application of principle which applies for the apportionment of all posts within the Governing Body. This means that it must help us to find means of satisfying the interests of all employers in accordance with geographical, economic and social criteria. On the other hand, the new problems facing employers in the socialist countries and the task of improving the political climate and creating an atmosphere of mutual trust must help us to reach a consensus and understanding among employers. The fact that these problems exist undermines the ILO's ability to act and its credibility, for an Organisation which urges observance of humanitarian principles in its member States must apply one of the fundamental principles, that of equality of opportunity and treatment, in its own bodies.

Allow me finally to return to the opening words of my statement. I should like to note that the mission of the ILO fully coincides with the aspirations of mankind to achieve better living conditions. This is clear, not only from many of the statements we have heard here, but also from the broad support of governments, employers and trade unions for the draft programme and budget for the next biennium. This is a prerequisite for the successful work of the Organisation.

Original - French: Mr. MAYILA (Minister for Labour, Employment, Human Resources and Vocational Training, Gabon) - It gives me great pleasure on behalf of the Government of the Republic of Gabon, of my delegation and in my own personal capacity to express our sincere congratulations to the President on his brilliant election to the presidency of the 76th Session of our Conference. No doubt this election is a sign of his international stature. The competence and authority which he showed first of all at the International Conference on Apartheid and then at the Seventh African Regional Conference, held in his beautiful country, made him the ideal African candidate for the presidency of this Conference. The unanimous support which was given to your candidacy on behalf of all the delegations here testifies to this. I am convinced that under your excellent leadership our work will be a brilliant success. My congratulations go also to the other officers. I can assure them of the willing co-operation of the delegation of Gabon.

I would like to take this opportunity to express once again our sincere congratulations to the new Director-General of the International Labour Organisation, Mr. Michel Hansenne. Our sincere congratulations were already addressed to him by my Government at the time of his election last February. We are convinced that he will follow the path set out by his illustrious predecessors, including Mr. Francis Blanchard, to whom I wish to pay tribute for his tremendous achievements as the head of the ILO for 15 years. The entire Organisation is grateful to him, and Africa in particular appreciates the attention he has given to its problems.

The Report of the Director-General entitled Recovery and employment, constitutes a challenge for the international community and calls on us to find the means of cancelling the negative effects of structural adjustment policies imposed on us by a climate of austerity.

Since the beginning of the seventies, the world economy has undergone one of the most serious crises of the century. This has taken the form of rapid slowing down of world trade and the deterioration of the terms of trade for the countries in the Third World; an increase in real interest rates that had a harsh effect on debtor countries.

Some policies pursued here and there to overcome the crisis have given rise to hope. This applies, in particular, to the industrialised countries of the Western world and to a number of South-east Asian countries, whereas for a large number of countries in the Third World the situation at the end of this decade gives us little reason to hope. Indeed, all the indicators have shown that the increase in unemployment and poverty, in a situation of chronic debt in which the main exporting products have not fetched a fair price, is likely to continue. This, in a nutshell, is the economic and social situation in the two regions of the world most severely hit by the crisis at the end of the eighties - Africa and Latin America. It is therefore quite right that the Report notes that it was a wasted decade for these two regions.

This state of affairs is likely to deteriorate further in the near future if no clear-cut measures are taken. It is in these regions that we have the highest population growth. A recent study carried out by JASPA on employment in Africa shows that the labour force doubles in this region every 25 years, whereas economic growth doubles only every 65 years. If one adds to this the natural difficulties this continent is constantly faced with, it is hardly surprising that Africa is the most deprived region as it approaches the next decade.

Structural adjustment policies are no doubt the road we must take towards future growth. However, they have negative social effects which make the economic and social situation of our countries deteriorate further. It is a question of seeing how we can reduce these negative effects on the most vulnerable sectors of the population.

Indeed, as you know, Africa's true wealth lies in its human resources. Therefore this wealth should be protected, particularly in this difficult period.

On the whole, our States have accepted the need for stabilisation and structural adjustment policies for their economies. However, can we agree - that is the financial institutions concerned and the governments - on the ways of implementing these policies? It would be desirable for their implementation to be preceded by careful study of the programmes, the pace and the succession of reforms, as well as the costs which these policies impose on the population. In this way, they would be appropriate to each State. This is where, I think, we shall find the overall solution so badly needed.

A kind of concertation is necessary, therefore, since our economic structures not yet have the desirable flexibility to adapt to sudden policy changes. Furthermore, we should avoid stereotyped solutions being imposed on us, simply because they have proved to be successful elsewhere. This approach would inevitably lead to social disaster.

By way of example, strong state involvement in the majority of our economies was justified in view of the national situation. After independence, everything had to be done in almost all of the sectors: communications, public construction, hospitals, schools, etc. They were real needs felt by the country as a whole and often in regions which were of no interest whatsoever to private investment. There have been over-reactions. However, the main aim of state involvement was to improve the welfare of the populations in the remotest areas and thus try to curb the rural exodus. Structural adjustment policies should take the situation into account.

So far as the crucial debt problem is concerned, the Director-General's Report rightly points out that most of the export earnings of debtor countries go to the servicing of debt without it being possible to pay back the capital.

A solution to this problem would make it possible to release considerable resources which would be allocated to priority areas, such as training for young persons, retraining for workers affected by plant closures, investment in labour-intensive enterprises and the maintenance of basic social services.

We are in favour of the measures adopted by Canada and France at the Second and Third Conferences of French-speaking countries with regard to the cancellation of their loans in favour of certain Third World countries. This is an example which should inspire the other industrialised countries.

We have placed a great deal of hope in the summit meeting of the seven most industrialised countries which will be held in Paris in July. We are convinced that it will provide us with positive solutions in favour of countries with so-called intermediate income. We do not just expect the bicentenary of the French Revolution to be a mere anniversary to commemorate the Declaration of Human Rights. The bicentenary of the French Revolution should be an opportunity to express the economic liberation of peoples in developing countries. We expect even more understanding from the Clubs of Paris and London. The present problems in our economies should make them aware of the specific situation which prevails in all our countries. It is our hope to render the debt-servicing conditions more flexible.

The fact that our economies depend so heavily on export earnings from raw materials and commodities is one of the main causes of our difficulties today. Can we hope to find a solution one day if we recall the controversy caused by the integrated commodity programme of UNCTAD which developing countries had considered to be the most effective instrument for the implementation of a new international economic order?

One solution, for example, would be to diversify our production by extending it to semi-finished and finished products. Once again, international consensus would be required in order to give our manufactured products access to markets in industrialised countries. At the same time, the developing countries should also extend South-South co-operation in the economic sector. This would mean the gradual elimination of customs barriers on both sides which restrict the world market.

My country would like to pay tribute to the ILO for its activities in favour of welfare and peace. We would like to encourage the Organisation to continue in this direction.

Gabon has always advocated dialogue – dialogue between all sectors of a nation – dialogue between workers and employers – dialogue between nations. The willingness to engage in dialogue was seen in the ratification of the number of ILO Conventions, in particular, Convention No. 87 concerning Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise, 1948, Convention No. 98 Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining, 1949. Furthermore, there is a Law which has set up economic and social consultation committees in our enterprises. These bodies are called upon to give an opinion on all questions related to the economic life of the enterprise and to working conditions. The existence and the freedom of action of these bodies in our enterprises meets the concerns of the Director-General, when he states in his Report, and I quote: "... participation of the social partners in the decision-making process... will enhance the political feasibility of economic decisions and ensure a more equitable distribution of the benefits..."

I do not intend to conclude my remarks, without expressing my satisfaction that the objectives of the external programme for Africa for 1990-91 meet the needs and wishes of the region, in accordance with the ILO Programme of Action for Africa and the conclusions and resolutions of all regional conferences.

Indeed, we feel that the implementation of these programmes, in particular as far as the creation of employment and the struggle against poverty are concerned, the development of human resources, the promotion of small- and medium-sized enterprises and crafts, the promotion of tripartism – will provide Africa with the basic conditions it needs in order to be able to pursue in dignity and equality the structural adjustment policies which are imposed on it by a difficult economic situation that it has been undergoing for over a decade.

U AUNG THANT (Government delegate, Burma) – It is indeed a privilege for me to join other speakers in congratulating the Honourable Mr. Nkomo on his election as President of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. His well-deserved election to this high office fully reflects the high esteem and regard he enjoys at this Conference. We are confident that under his able guidance and wise counsel we can look forward to a successful conclusion to our deliberations.

Our felicitations go likewise to the other Officers of the Conference.

As this session coincides with the 70th anniversary of the International Labour Organisation, I would like to seize this opportunity also to offer my delegation's heartiest congratulations and good wishes to the Organisation. The noble principles enshrined in the Philadelphia Declaration and the tripartite system, based on co-operation, co-ordination and collaboration among governments, employers and workers, serving most importantly as the "life blood" of the Organisation, will no doubt contribute to the continued flourishing of the ideals and strengthening of the Organisation for aeons to come.

I am particularly pleased to take this opportunity to express my delegation's profound regards and best wishes to the former Director-General, Mr. Francis Blanchard, who has retired recently. The wisdom, dignity and good sense which he brought to the Organisation for three consecutive terms will long be remembered. My delegation sincerely pays a warm tribute to him for his enormous achievement which has won this Organisation great renown.

Furthermore, I am greatly honoured to have this opportunity to extend my delegation's heartiest congratulations and warm welcome to our newly elected Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, of Belgium. We are well aware of his philosophical beliefs, his views on global socio-economic issues, and also on matters relating to the ILO. It is very encouraging to note that Mr. Hansenne is a resolute partisan of social dialogue, and a dedicated defender of tripartism. I am confident that with his special outlook, wisdom and wide experience, he will be able to guide the Organisation along constructive channels in order to achieve its goals.

Our presence here clearly signifies our continued support for the International Labour Organisation. We are here also to clarify our positions on labour-related matters.

Before turning our attention to the Report of the Director-General, I wish to express our unwavering dedication to the lofty ideals of the International Labour Organisation and our fervent hope for fuller co-operation with the Organisation. We are indeed honoured to be a member of this family of nations, where social dialogues flourish.

In the recent past, Burmese people have shown their aspirations for democratic and political reforms. There is no reason whatsoever either to ignore or to forget the rightful wishes of the people. Accordingly, as the situation became favourable and peaceful, plans were adopted and the timetable drawn up for the holding of multi-party general elections, and in a few months' time we shall witness historic political changes in Burma. This important political objective of the nation is to be accomplished in a peaceful, systematic and orderly manner, observing the true values of democracy. The spirit of national reconciliation and unity is therefore required to help carry out the elections as scheduled.

At a time when unprecedented changes are taking place, the existing labour laws do afford protection to the workers of their basic rights in my country. Just recently, the Government of the Union of Burma took an unprecedented step in substantially increasing the wages and salaries of all strata of government servants and workers employed in the public sector. The Ministry of Labour and its administrative organs, too, are keeping a very close watch on all matters concerning the welfare of the workers. In times of national emergency and rapid political change there may be some instances which may not be in perfect and absolute conformity with the basic norms and standards of the ILO. We sincerely believe that such shortcomings, if there be any, are few and far between, and that they shall be eliminated altogether once the process for political change has been completed.

Permit me to extend my compliments to the former Director-General, Mr. Blanchard, for the comprehensive Report which he has submitted to this Conference for consideration and discussion. I would like to deal briefly with some of the major issues presented in the Report.

We are all well aware that economic progress alone is not sufficient for national development. There must be harmony and economic and social achievements. In this regard, I would like to recall what the late ILO Director-General, Mr. Wilfred Jenks, once said, and I quote: "To carry out social objectives without regard to economic context is to lose contact with reality; and to disregard social objectives is to be devoid of any purpose."

Bearing this in mind, I feel that employment creation is one of the most important social objectives which has to be concomitant with the improved performance of the economy.

Today we are witnessing a significant easing of world tensions. The developing trend, we believe, is conducive to a dynamic recovery of the world economy. However, as for the developing nations, which are shouldering the crippling debt burden, there appears to be little hope to better their lot. The economic recovery of these nations requires a concerted international effort to find answers to complex problems. My delegation sees the need for economically strong industrialised countries to assist in establishing fair, open and equitable relationships, to increase the flow of development aid, to approach the Third World debt problem with greater foresight, and we would urge strongly for their co-operation to resolve the common problems we all are facing today. We believe that all the countries in this world, including the developing nations, should enjoy their fair share of the fruits of the improving world economy.

Would it not be better if more generous thoughts and practical measures prevailed to overcome effectively the enormous debt burden we in the Third World are shouldering? We believe the solution to the enormous and crippling debt burden of the Third World countries lies not only in increasing the amount of loans but through positive and effective steps taken by the economically developed countries to aid in the economic development of the less-developed ones. The economic development achieved would not only improve the lot of the people but would certainly improve the availability of resources to increase the benefits of the workers in these countries.

May I now revert back to the topic of the need for creating increased employment opportunities? We are now approaching almost the end of the United Nations Third Development Decade. The development strategy during this Development Decade is to fulfil the basic needs of the people of the world and included therein, as one of the basic needs, is the right to employment.

We have already started preliminary discussions on matters concerning the United Nations Fourth Development Decade and we understand that the development strategy from the year 1990 to the year 2000 will seek, as its objective, the reduction of poverty and unemployment. This indicates to us that, until the desired full employment objectives are achieved, this aim will be kept at the forefront. Certainly, a majority of us, we believe, are of one mind in this regard. As in the case of rendering economic co-operation for economic development, we feel there is a need for international co-operation in our common efforts to achieve the objective of having full employment opportunities for everyone and eliminating the problem of unemployment.

The right to employment is a natural right for every individual not only for his subsistence alone but also for his human dignity. Therefore, the opportunity to work must exist for each and every person who is willing to work, and they must be able to take up employment in accordance with their experience and skill. I do not imply, of course, that the public sector alone should be the guarantor for employment for everyone. If I am to describe the current situation of my country, every effort is being made to encourage private and co-operative enterprises to develop side by side. Also, arrangements are being made and implemented for the participation of foreign investments in our development efforts. We are optimistic that these efforts will certainly provide relief for job-seekers in the very near future.

On the other hand, employment alone cannot fulfil their job satisfaction. Job satisfaction, we believe, is attained by increased efficiency through step-by-step training to enhance their skills throughout their working lives, and at the same time arrangements must be made and implemented for the improvement of their morale as well. Only then can job satisfaction be achieved and their attitude towards their work would be positive, which certainly will lead to better work performance.

The ILO has been contributing untiringly to solve the social problems of the developing world in a number of fields, in close co-operation and collaboration with its member countries. With the expertise of the ILO and with the fuller co-operation of its member countries, we believe, there is much more to be done, and a lot to be improved upon, in our endeavours to accomplish the ultimate social objectives. With this objective in view, the technical assistance programmes of the Organisation should be reviewed and revived, on a regular basis, so as to make them more effective and beneficial to the recipient countries.

As in the previous sessions, this session of the Conference has been actively engaged in dealing with the agenda before us. The discussions cover subjects which usually come up for such discussions. In addition, there are important standards-related matters. The matter concerning the partial revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107), is already in its second discussion and the proposed standards for night work and safety in the use of chemicals at work are also being put forward for discussion for the first time.

Discussions on, and decisions arrived at, for certain labour standards do (indeed) constitute the most crucial and important task for this Organisation. This is why the ILO, we believe, has never faltered in its quest to adopt international labour standards, which now constitute a total of 168 Conventions and 176 Recommendations. However, in terms of ratification of these instruments, we find it less encouraging. We find that only nine of them have been ratified by two-thirds of ILO member States, four of them by one-third of its members and 21 of them by barely half of its members.

This situation certainly needs to be improved, and the Organisation, I suggest, should direct its efforts more towards encouraging universal acceptance of these important instruments. The labour standards in these instruments are, to us, like precious jewels donning a veil. Only when they are unveiled can we see them in their full glitter and splendour. With this metaphor as food for thought, may we wish and hope for the realisation of universal acceptance of these important instruments.

Before I conclude, may I wish this session of the Conference every success. We do look forward to a better and brighter future for the Organisation under the leadership and guidance of the new Director-General. And may I, in conclusion, reiterate our assurance that, as we have always done in the past, we continue our unfailing support and co-operation with the Organisation.

Original – Arabic: Mr. GAZARIN (Employers' delegate, Egypt) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. On behalf of the Federation of Egyptian Industries representing the employers of Egypt and on my own behalf, I should like to congratulate the President on his election to the presidency of this Conference. I had the opportunity in November last to take part in the ILO African Regional Conference in Harare, which he presided over so ably, and so I am certain that under his leadership the work of this session will be altogether fruitful.

I should also like to congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne on his election to the post of Director-General of the ILO. I wish him every success in his work at the head of the Office. And may I voice our respect and gratitude to Mr. Francis Blanchard for his praiseworthy efforts and his positive achievements during his term of office? He always supported the development efforts of the Third World countries and showed great interest in the problems of African countries. We wish him good health and every success in the future.

The Director-General's Report discusses development and social progress in the forthcoming decade. It focuses in particular on the developing States, most of which are confronted with growing economic problems, rising unemployment which is posing a direct threat to social stability, galloping inflation and a corresponding reduction in purchasing power.

The Report draws attention to the need for economic dialogue to resolve these problems. Experience shows that it is impossible to impose policies on workers and employers without their support and that the chances of such policies being successful are much greater if the social partners are involved in their formulation. Everybody has to feel committed if we are to increase productivity, savings and investment.

It is clear from the Report that the International Labour Organisation considers tripartite dialogue as a vital feature of economic development and that both employers' and workers' organisations have a role to play as democratic institutions committed to development.

Inspired by the spirit of tripartism of the International Labour Organisation, the Federation of Egyptian Industries, with the other associations representing employers in Egypt, has taken what is probably an unprecedented initiative in the contemporary history of our country. It has invited the Federation of Egyptian Trade Unions to take part in a broad dialogue to define Egypt's current economic problems and to seek agreement on the best way of tackling them, finding practical solutions and formulating general recommendations that could form the basis of a development strategy for the forthcoming decade. These recommendations are to be submitted to the Government – the third partner in development – so as to provide it with clear guide-lines for its future development policies.

The Federation of Egyptian Trade Unions immediately responded to our appeal, and employers and workers are now striving together to plan the country's future general development and resolve its economic problems.

The studies conducted by joint working groups of workers and employers lasted several months and ended with the adoption of a joint declaration dealing with all aspects of the economy and with the meaasures that ought to be taken. The draft declaration was discussed at several large meetings at which both parties engaged in a democratic dialogue and were very conscious of their mutual interests. Thus, they reached agreement on a definitive declaration signed on 28 May last at a meeting attended by the Press and other media that was a major event.

I will not pretend that it has always been easy. Inevitably, some of the points raised by the employers were strongly opposed by certain trade unions and vice versa. But a sense of mutual interest has resulted in our agreeing, for the most part, on solutions that are satisfactory to both parties. A joint declaration will be officially submitted to the Egyptian Government.

The salient points of the declaration are as follows. The management of the public sector must be liberalised and kept totally separate from ownership. Government interference in the management of the public sector must be stopped and every company must be allowed to draw up its own regulations. The public sector budget must be separated from the state budget. The private sector must be encouraged and the obstacles to its development removed so that it can play its proper role in development and give priority to new private sector projects. Arab and other foreign investment must be encouraged and more incentives devised to attract such investment and to create an atmosphere of economic security and confidence. Public expenditure must be cut and the red tape which reigns supreme in all government services must be done away with. The wage policy must be revised to bring wages in line with the cost of living and to link bonuses to productivity and quality. Special importance must be attached to quality. Labour legislation must be amended to make management more efficient and to create a more effective system of rewards and sanctions. Banks and other financial establishments must be encouraged to play a more positive role in credit operations and to participate in economic projects. Consideration must also be given to raising interest rates so as to encourage savings. Education systems must be re-examined, technical and vocational training developed and access to free university education restricted to those who have done particularly well in their previous studies. More importance must be attached to small enterprises, which must be encouraged because of the important role they can play in the creation of employment. Desert land must be made fertile and scientific research, especially applied research, promoted.

The declaration insists on the importance of the Government consulting workers and employers before adopting legislation having a bearing on the economic life of the country.

For us this declaration is a turning point in our economic history and we are quite confident that the Egyptian Government will give it its full attention. We intend to continue our constructive dialogue with the Federation of Egyptian Trade Unions so that, together, we can help the Government to overcome the current economic crisis and, God willing, to advance towards brighter horizons, towards economic recovery.

I would not like to conclude my remarks without expressing the concern of the Egyptian employers at the deteriorating situation in occupied Palestine, the barbarous repressive measures applied by the Israeli occupation authorities and the violation of the human rights of Arab workers, who have been stripped of their basic legitimate rights to life and to work. We appeal to the delegations to the Conference to adopt the Arab resolution on this subject so that the ILO can make a positive contribution to putting a stop to these inhuman practices.

I should also like to express our serious concern at the racial discrimination and persecution practiced by the South African Government on the country's indigenous people. The Committee on Apartheid will, we hope, make every effort to put an end to this situation, which is an affront to the conscience of the world.

Finally, I should like to mention the deteriorating economic situation in many African countries, particularly those that have suffered natural disasters such as drought and regional wars which have further aggravated their economic situation. I appeal to the ILO and to the developed countries to make an extra effort and to provide additional assistance to these countries so that they can overcome their crises and progress towards economic recovery.

Original – Russian: Mr. LIPATOV (Government delegate, Ukrainian SSR) – Allow me first of all to associate myself with previous speakers in sincerely congratulating Mr. Nkomo and the Officers of the Conference on their election to their high posts and wishing them every success in their work in directing the debates of this Conference. I also have pleasure in greeting Mr. Hansenne, the new Director-General, and I wish him fruitful results in his activities.

As has already been said from this rostrum, the present session of the Conference is taking place at an unusual time in the life of our Organisation and the world community as a whole.

Throughout the world we are witnessing a serious reassessment of international co-operation and fresh political thinking. A basis is being laid for new inter-governmental relations. There is an intensive joint search going on to settle the problems of the day. An appeal for an international approach to the solution of the overall problems of mankind and a description of the major initiatives taken to this end appeared in a statement made by Mr. Gorbachev, the leader of the Soviet Government, on 7 December 1988 at the United Nations General Assembly. One important way in which the international atmosphere can be improved is by stepping up the activities of the specialised agencies of the United Nations.

The time which has elapsed since the 75th Session of this Conference has been marked by major international events. This has been a year which has seen a beginning to real nuclear disarmament, a successful conclusion of the Vienna meeting of representatives of the countries participating in the meeting on European security and co-operation and practical action to regulate a number of regional conflicts. Agreements of historical significance have been reached and have begun to be implemented.

We attach special significance to the fact that the ILO is celebrating its 70th anniversary this year. In tribute to all its useful activity in the past and its valuable experience in the field of social welfare problems, our delegation congratulates the Organisation, the representatives of all its Members and the officials of its Secretariat on this anniversary, wishing them every success in their efforts to attain the noble aims enshrined in the Constitution in developing international co-operation and achieving respect for the principles of social justice for the workers of the world.

We read with interest the Director-General's Report on economic recovery and employment.

I should particularly like to say that this Report contains a considerable number of statements in line with recent thinking which we fully share, including such topics as the indivisibility and interdependence of the world today, the link between development and disarmament, the priority of social development as an aim of economic growth, the need for a just settlement of the problem of foreign debt, the structural reorganisation of international economic relations and the elimination of barriers to world trade. These aspects of the Report are certainly a valuable contribution and deserve all possible support.

At the same time, it is useful to point to those statements which we think were not adequately developed or substantiated in the Report. They clearly require further and more serious research, with due consideration for the best experience world-wide and the practical results of implementation in countries with differing social and economic systems.

We consider that the Report does not contain a sufficiently searching analysis of the structural changes which have taken place or the means used, the problems and the consequences in various countries. A more detailed investigation is required as regards measures to preserve employment under differing conditions and ways of overcoming the debt crisis.

As is well known, our country is fully engaged in a complex plan of reorganisation – "perestroika" – and we are going through a radical economic reform. A systematic campaign is under way to render all aspects of our national life more democratic.

As a result of the action taken in the last few months, we are making encouraging progress in certain areas of our economy. Negative economic trends have been checked and the indices of production are looking up. The gross domestic product in 1988 increased by 3.9 per cent over the previous year, which was entirely due to a productivity growth of 4.1 per cent.

We pay special attention to the social aspects of economic activity. We have given priority to the production of consumer goods over the production of means of production. We have set aside larger sums than before for public health, housing and services.

All this, of course, by no means signifies that there are no difficulties or problems in the way of the reorganisation of our economy. Despite the progress made, we are running up against complications in reorganising and developing the economy. We are realistically assessing the way in which "perestroika" is going and learning to overcome the obstacles to economic reform. We are also, above all, showing the utmost vigilance in ensuring that in these circumstances the social rights and guarantees of the workers should not only suffer no decline, but should be systematically extended and reinforced.

This particularly applies to the problem of ensuring full employment under conditions of "perestroika" and the problem of releasing workers in various branches of the economy. To this end, we have developed and set up an overall system of labour exchanges, vocational guidance and further training systems covering the whole country. This has ensured that we get an effective distribution of the labour force and full employment.

Of course, all these processes do not take place without problems. They call for considerable sums to be set aside, effective use of existing scientific and technical potential, along with the development of new systems, and considerable amount of organisational effort on the part of governmental and social institutions. We attach great importance to drawing on the best of accumulated world experience, first and foremost by the ILO.

The reorganisation now proceeding in our country opens new doors for co-operation with the rest of the world. If I may quote a message by the deputies of the USSR to the peoples of the world, "perestroika is an internal affair of the peoples of the Soviet Union, born of the essential requirements of our country; but as part of the world community and the processes which shape our common civilisation, we consider freedom, democracy and social justice to be the basic values on which the life of our society must be constructed."

The Government delegation of my country supports in its entirety the draft programme of the ILO for 1990-91, in the belief that in its revised form, this document is more balanced than before.

We express particular support for the ecological projects in the programme. We appeal to the Conference to support the resolution submitted by the Government delegates of several countries, including the Ukrainian SSR, on the role of the ILO in protecting the environment and employment.

We also support the proposal to study, within the ILO, the social aspects of the conversion of the arms industry.

As regards the budget for 1990-91, we are prepared to support it, provided zero growth is really maintained.

And finally, I would like to refer briefly to a series of concrete ways in which useful co-operation is being developed between the ILO and corresponding organisations in the Ukrainian SSR. In particular, co-operation is being developed in the field of the training of managers and technical staff and management consultation.

Concrete measures are being undertaken jointly with the ILO on the exchange of information, the organisation of programmes for the exchange of specialists, experts and consultants to study innovative methods and practice in regard to these questions.

We have concluded agreements with the ILO regarding publication in the Ukrainian SSR of fundamental ILO studies on productivity management and modular systems of management training.

This year, the Ukrainian SSR was one of the organisers and participants of the European regional project devised by the ILO and the United Nations Development Programme on new technologies and vocational training, under which it is planned to hold an international seminar in the Ukrainian SSR on vocational training issues, and to adopt a series of other measures on the exchange of experience, information and specialists, especially amongst the countries taking part in this project.

Specialists of the Kiev scientific research institute of occupational health and diseases took part in discussions on co-operation with the heads of the Working Conditions and Environment Department of the ILO. They suggested topics for the agenda of this international seminar in Kiev, and proposed guidelines for joint research.

We feel that all this is only a first step in the development of our co-operation with the ILO. We think that there are other spheres in which an extension of our joint efforts would be possible. We are willing to help to strengthen this very useful co-operation and we hope to meet with the understanding of the ILO and its bodies in these matters.

Finally, I would like to emphasise that by maintaining its high responsiveness to social and economic changes due in particular to scientific and technological progress, the ILO will be able to improve and extend its activities, ensuring that they correspond increasingly to the social and political realities of our day.

Original – German: Mr. BOCHOW (Workers' delegate, German Democratic Republic) – First of all, I would like to congratulate the President on his election and express the hope that the Conference will be a useful and fruitful one. At the same time, I would like to wish the newly elected Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Michel Hansenne, a great deal of success in his activities.

The International Labour Organisation can look back to over 70 years of activity. In this period of time it has dealt with a number of acute problems in the labour world and has contributed to the fact that hundreds of millions of workers enjoy more favourable material working conditions today and are better protected against the risks of salaried employment, against illness, occupational accidents, disability and old age.

History, and our respect for the 100-year-old tradition of the commemoration of 1 May as the International Day of Struggle of the Working Parties, lead us to observe that all our social achievements had to be wrested from the capitalist enterprises. The more unity and determination the working people showed in defending their justified claims, the stronger the unions became and the more favourable the results were for the workers.

We welcome the fact that Part I of the Director-General's Report entitled Recovery and employment gives a discriminating and realistic picture of the problems of our time. And we share its deep concern about developments in the labour and social field that are leading to growing unemployment, underemployment and poverty in the majority of developing countries.

In this connection, the Report talks about a severe setback in the efforts of the ILO towards the achievement of full employment and social progress. This is true, and it is very regrettable. However, he does not indicate why economic recovery has not always been conducive to employment but has frequently had the opposite effect. We do not deny the fact that scientific and technical progress bring structural adjustment problems in their wake – to which our Report devotes much attention – but we feel that the goals of production, which are determined by considerations of ownership, dictate whether production is primarily profit-oriented or whether it serves the welfare of the producers.

One cannot seriously claim that transnational enterprises care for the concerns of workers in developing countries when they move their production facilities there to use the cheap labour poverty has produced and raw material reserves in order to transfer high profits to the mother country or to countries with favourable interest rates. Although the Report provides us with a great deal of enlightening and alarming facts about the debt problem, in particular in Africa and Latin America, it does not say anything about those who are responsible. This might have been expected in view of the efforts made for a number of years now in favour of a code of conduct for transnational corporations.

We noted with satisfaction that the Report establishes a direct link between the fact that disarmament creates favourable conditions for a new long-term approach to development and the problem before us and therefore advocates the reduction of defence budgets and similar spending in favour of measures to promote employment in the civilian sector. Such an approach cannot but facilitate the solution of problems mentioned in the Report, the promotion of employment, structural adjustment and economic growth. This is in keeping with our times, characterised by disarmament and the search for peace. I am sure that they will be unanimously welcomed by trade union representatives in all countries regardless of their political, economic and social orientation and that they will increase the prestige of the ILO.

I would like to point out, in this connection, that the countries of the Warsaw Pact have set an excellent example with their determined unilateral disarmament measures that have already been implemented to a large extent and with their defence budget cuts; indeed they are solving the material and labour problems related to the conversion of enterprises in the defence industry in the interests of furthering economic growth and in the interests of each individual worker.

The German Democratic Republic is one of the countries mentioned in the Report that has managed to maintain the pace of economic growth and full employment.

National income has been growing at a rate of roughly 4 per cent in the German Democratic Republic for a fairly long period of time. This increase has extended to all sections of the population, in particular to workers, employees and their families, in a number of ways. No one has been excluded from this increase, either through temporary or long-term unemployment. Everyone has a secure job. Labour regulations worked out with the help of trade unions and constantly monitored ensure that this is the case even in the event of rationalisation measures that may be necessary or in the event of transfers for technological reasons or structural change.

The citizens of our country who have reached working age in the forty years of existence of our socialist State do not know what it means to fear for their existence and there are no marginalised groups which have been deprived of hope by scientific and technological progress. Consequently there is no breeding ground for a drug problem.

Because of our experience and our basic outlook we feel that the introduction of new technologies and the ensuring structural change should be measured in terms of its usefulness for man, nature and society. It should not be aimed against the workers and trade unions. Here we agree with the statements made by the Director-General in his Report that human beings are both the means and the end of economic development. At the same time, we welcome the fact that the ILO, in working out the new international development strategy for the Fourth Development Decade of the United Nations in the nineties, clearly supports the principle that development ultimately must serve man. The ground that still needs to be covered to implement this principle is described in the Report, which gives shattering examples in the developing countries. They show that predominantly profit-oriented economic growth and scientific and technological progress which is only geared to the utilisation of capital not only fails to improve the situation but on the contrary, could make it worse. In this way a large share of the world population would never have an opportunity of earning its own living through its own work and leading their lives in peace and dignity, in economic security and with equal opportunities; in other words, they would be deprived of their basic human rights.

We know from our own international activities that the views of trade unions in the East and West converge to a large extent on this. The possibilities that unions have of bringing influence to bear and their views on measures that should be taken vary considerably depending on the respective social conditions and national characteristics. However, it has become increasingly clear that trade unions must commit themselves more and co-ordinate more fully at the international level. This will become even more vital with the creation of the new West European Common Market after 1993 because this will have a great influence in economic growth and employment.

We are, as ever, prepared to share our experiences acquired through the practical application of our right to co-determination, at all levels of society especially in solving problems caused by technological and scientific progress. It is obvious that such problems cannot be solved smoothly. They often begin at the planning and design phase, both in the case of projects that are of national economic importance and in the case of projects concerning individual enterprises. It is not only the economic decision-making bodies but also experts in the field of science and technology who have a difficult task, because decisions have to be taken on a whole range of questions related to such matters as: production processes, occupational medicine, safety techniques, social and political aspects and protection of the environment. Much competence is required to put forward a reasoned trade union standpoint and then defend it; not infrequently, this involves defending compromise solutions.

In concluding I would like to mention a few facts which illustrate the 40 years of development of my country and show the links that exist between economic recovery, employment and improvements in working and living conditions.

Our housing programme, which was set up in 1971, aims at providing every family and every independent household with their own suitable home of adequate size by 1990, in return for a low rent both now and in the future. Last October the three millionth home was made available: this means that roughly nine million citizens out of a population of 16.6 million in the German Democratic Republic have received a new home. The programme is expected to be finished in time so that the housing problem has, to all intents and purposes, been solved from a social standpoint.

A clear sign that economic growth has had a direct social effect on the working population is that there has been an increase in pensions, the highest to date; this took effect on 1 December 1988 and effects more than 3 million old-age pensioners, disabled persons, and victims of accidents.

As representative of the workers and employees, I am proud to note that the annual Gross National Product has increased tenfold since 1949; at the same time, the number of occupational accidents per 1,000 actively employed persons has decreased from 59.0 in 1949 to 22.63 in 1988. This also illustrates the effectiveness and the need of trade union monitoring activities.

The question of economic recovery and employment, which is the theme of our Conference, places us before a number of difficult problems, which have cast their shadow over the past decade and must be solved if social injustice, poverty and despair are not going to increase throughout the world. We believe that first and foremost we must eliminate the nuclear evil which still threatens the whole of mankind and give a new impetus to the disarmament process which has begun despite difficult beginnings. The States of the Warsaw Pact have made considerable preliminary efforts which has only been followed in a very hesitant manner by the other side. We believe that in order to achieve economic recovery and employment, disarmament and peace are a top priority. As no valid counter-arguments may be raised at this session, the ILO should clearly affirm this in its documents and declarations.

This also applies to the need for a clear statement to support the struggle of the Arab people of Palestine, as well as their proclaimed sovereignty, which is now being recognised by many countries in the world; it also continues to apply to the just struggle against apartheid in South Africa.

At the beginning of its eighth decade, this would considerably increase the prestige of our world Organisation.

Mr. HENDY (representative of the International Centre for Trade Union Rights) – 350 years ago the statement of rights contained in the Accord of the People emerged from the English Revolutionary Civil War. This year also celebrates the 200th anniversary of the French Declaration of the Rights of Man and the Citizen. And this is also the 70th anniversary of the ILO

It is a great honour for me to address the ILO on behalf of the International Centre for Trade Union Rights on such an auspicious occasion and to welcome the Report of the Director-General and to congratulate the President on his election.

It is a time to reflect on the unique and vital achievements of the ILO and the profound influence it has had on the maintenance and extension of civilised standards in that most important aspect of human activity: employment

The International Centre for Trade Union Rights pays this Organisation, the ILO, its deepest respects.

As we look to the future we see the ILO paying an even greater role, not merely in setting and enforcing the standards by which every country in the world shall be judged in its labour law and practice, but also by providing an institutional framework for international co-operation.

Since you met last year it seems to us, as others here have remarked, that the two most striking developments are, on the one hand, the further relaxation of international tensions and increasing international dialogue and, on the other, the growing international declaration of commitment to human rights.

Of course, neither of these two developments are uniform and there have been serious set-backs to their advancement in some countries. But overall, we believe that progress is being made and that the ILO has played an important part in this progress.

The International Centre for Trade Union Rights, established in November 1987, sees trade union rights as an integral part of human rights. The United Nations Charter, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the other international covenants and charters make important provisions for trade unions. But the ILO Conventions and Recommendations are of the most profound importance.

The International Centre for Trade Union Rights is open to all international, regional and national trade union organisations without distinction and without regard to international affiliations. It is a prime objective of the Centre to promote international dialogue and joint action between trade unions, trade union centres and legal and human rights organisations. The Centre provides assistance and education and carries out research into trade union rights and abuses of them. In co-operation with the International Association of Democratic Lawyers and the Arab Lawyers Union, it has arranged for lawyers to defend trade unionists in Egypt, Morocco, France and the occupied territories. It has sent fact-finding missions to Chile, South Africa, the occupied territories and Turkey. It arranged an International Colloquium on the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights in Lisbon last year, to which the ILO sent a delegate. Last week it ran a training seminar for the Scottish Trade Union Congress on the ILO Conventions and their application.

The Centre has regular publications and is now undertaking a major research project into "Trade union rights in the 1990s and beyond" to consider the nature of the trade union rights and freedoms needed for the years ahead. The Centre invites the ILO and the organisations represented here to participate. The first stage is a seminar to take place in September.

The concern of the International Centre is with trade union rights. We note with satisfaction the increasing number of ratifications to ILO Conventions recorded in the Director-General's Report. But we are deeply troubled by the gap between ratification and application.

In relation to my own country, Great Britain, you have before you the Report of the ILO Committee of Experts which in effect condemns recent labour legislation on no less than eight separate counts. Yet far from correcting their breaches of Conventions, the British Government continues to deratify ILO Conventions as well as articles of the 1961 Social Charter of the Council of Europe. It prepares yet further anti-union legislation in breach of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) and, this very week, it has declared its total opposition to the modest proposals of the European Economic Community for basic workers' and trade union rights.

The removal of workers' individual and collective rights in Britain is in stark contrast to the words used by the British Government's representative at the opening of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe which continues in Paris. He said this: "No British Government needs to grant the British people their rights and freedoms. Those rights and freedoms are too deeply rooted in our history and our traditions. They – quite simply – cannot be taken away. With all due modesty we seek to offer a reasonable model for others to follow."

In South Africa that model has been heeded. For in the Labour Relations Amendment Act passed on 1 September 1988, a number of British legislative devices have been added to the repressive armoury of the apartheid regime for use against trade unionists. The Government there too, whilst not party to the ILO, has claimed those laws are defensible against ILO standards.

I have prepared for the International Centre a report on a recent visit I made to the occupied territories. Here again I found the Israelis, though signatories to and declared supporters of international standards, flouted them in practice. The treatment, in accordance with local military law, of trade unionists was I found a flagrant breach not only of ILO Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 but also of rights enshrined in the Geneva Convention, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the International Conventions on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, and Civil and Political Rights.

I shall not weary you by adding to this catalogue those countries where direct violent state repression of trade unionism occurs without their troubling to pay even lip service to international or even national laws. Examples abound – Chile, Colombia, Peru, the Philippines and so on.

The International Centre observes with great interest the developments within the socialist countries. It sees unions there adapting their structures and even their objectives to the demands of the workers. It takes satisfaction in legislative changes which extend trade union rights and freedoms, but the Centre notes that progress is slow and not uniform across these countries. The International Centre in particular expresses its profound concern at the events in China and, in particular, breaches of the ILO and other international standards there.

The International Centre believes that the ILO should now be looking at ways to achieve enforcement of its Conventions. Of course, the Conventions themselves should be increased in range and extent. Ambiguous interpretations should be made clear. The number of countries ratifying the Convention should be increased, but it is also vital that those who publicly declare themselves bound by these Conventions should comply with them.

Compliance is a crucial issue. The International Centre believes that trade union rights are of the most vital significance in a fast-changing world, whose manifestations are having a profound impact on workers.

I refer to the impact of new technology and its effects on the form, content, safety, extent and location of work and employment relationships.

I refer to the organisation, effects and policies of transnational corporations and the development of a world economy, and, in particular, a world labour market, and I note in this regard the significance of 1992 in Europe.

I refer to the growing need for ecological and environmental protection, the effects of demilitarisation and the changing objectives and strategies of the world's powers.

I refer to the particular problems of the Third World, and notably Third World debt. Here too, we see the effect on workers of "structural adjustment programmes" imposed by the IMF and other bodies.

In addition we should be watchful of the tendency toward incorporation of individual rights in national law at the expense of collective rights. The purpose of this is often not to extend rights and freedoms but, in effect, to diminish them, with one goal – the reduction of labour costs.

In conclusion, the international Centre believes in the universality of trade union rights. Whatever the economic system, the interests of those who produce are in potential conflict with those who consume. Trade unions are, at the end of the day, the only way that the interests of the workers can be protected. In the task of ensuring that trade unions everywhere have the rights and freedoms necessary to allow them to achieve this task, the International Centre is committed to the ILO.

Provisional Record

Seventy-sixth Session, Geneva, 1989

Second item on the agenda: Programme and budget proposals and other financial questions

Report of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives

1. The Finance Committee of Government Representatives met on 9, 12, 13 and 16 June 1989 with Mr. V.I. Peshkov (Byelorussian SSR) as Chairman and Reporter, and Mr. J.-L. Chea Urruela (Guatemala) as Vice-Chairman.

I. COMPOSITION OF THE ADMINISTRATIVE TRIBUNAL OF THE ILO

2. The Committee had before it Report II: Programme and Budget for 1990-91 and Other Financial Questions, containing a resolution submitted by the Governing Body concerning the extension of terms of office of two members of the Administrative Tribunal of the ILO.

3. The Committee recommends that the Conference adopt this resolution, the text of which appears at the end of this report.

II. APPOINTMENTS TO THE ADMINISTRATIVE BOARD (ILO STAFF PENSIONS FUND) AND STAFF PENSION COMMITTEE (UNITED NATIONS JOINT STAFF PENSION FUND)

4. The Committee had before it Provisional Record No. 2, containing a resolution submitted by the Governing Body concerning appointments to the Administrative Board (ILO Staff Pensions Fund) and Staff Pension Committee (United Nations Joint Staff Pension Fund).

5. The Committee recommends that the Conference adopt this resolution, the text of which appears at the end of this report.

III. LONG-TERM STRATEGY ON BUDGET EXCHANGE RATES

6. The Committee had before it Report II: Draft Programme and Budget for 1990-91 and Other Financial Questions, containing a resolution submitted by the Governing Body concerning a long-term strategy on budget exchange rates.

7. The representative of Italy reiterated that his Government had no objection to the payment of assessed contributions in Swiss francs, but did have some reservations concerning the forward purchase of the Organisation's dollar requirements for the full biennium. This operation, besides being costly in itself, appeared to contain a number of imponderables, among them the fluctuations in the value of the dollar and also, just recently, the effect of inflation upon the Swiss franc. Although he did not intend to vote against the proposal, he was not completely happy with it.

8. In reply to a query, the representative of the Secretary-General (the Treasurer and Financial Comptroller) explained that for comparative purposes the 1990-91 Programme and Budget proposals were initially costed at the same budget exchange rate as that for 1988-89, that is, 1.60 Swiss francs to the dollar. The actual rate for 1990-91 would be fixed by the Committee only at the end of the discussion on the Programme and Budget proposals.

9. The representative of Cuba thought that the long-term strategy being proposed would improve the financial stability of the Organisation. However she did have some reservations about the proposal to apply 50 per cent of the net premium earned to the incentive scheme for early payment of member States' contributions. This scheme might benefit those member States which, although not in financial difficulty, delayed their payments for political or other reasons. On the other hand, the scheme did not take into account the real difficulties of developing countries, which delayed their payments for reasons beyond their control. Despite these reservations she would support the proposal before the Committee.

10. The representative of Venezuela, while similarly expressing reservations about the proposal to apply 50 per cent of the net premium to the incentive scheme, indicated that she would support the proposal before the Committee.

11. The representative of Argentina associated himself with the views expressed by the previous speaker.

12. The representative of India recalled that his Government's views had been expressed in the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee at the November 1988 Session of the Governing Body. Although he still had reservations he would not oppose the proposal before the Committee.

13. Noting the reservations expressed during the course of discussion, the Committee recommends that the Conference adopt this resolution, the text of which appears at the end of this report.

IV. PROGRAMME AND BUDGET PROPOSALS FOR 1990-91

14. The Committee had before it the Director-General's Programme and Budget proposals for 1990-91 as submitted to the Governing Body at its 242nd Session (February-March). The Committee also had before it Report II: Draft Programme and Budget for 1990-91 and Other Financial Questions, containing a report on the consideration of the Director-General's original proposals by the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee of the Governing Body; the Governing Body's discussion of this report was set out in an extract from the minutes of the 242nd Session of the Governing Body which had been circulated in document FCD.2. In addition, the Committee had before it Provisional Record No. 2 which contained information relating to the net premium which would be earned on the forward purchase of the 1990-91 dollar requirements.

15. The Director-General, introducing the Programme and Budget proposals for 1990-91, pointed out that they had been prepared by his predecessor, Mr. Francis Blanchard. It was a concrete tribute to his leadership that the proposals had commanded unanimous support in the Governing Body at its February-March Session, and in fact the discussion in the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee and in the Governing Body itself had been the most positive and the most substantive that anyone could remember. He was confident that they would attract equally strong support in the Finance Committee of Government Representatives.

16. The programme of activities set forth in the Draft Programme and Budget proposals emphasised the continuing commitment of the ILO to the principle of tripartism and to the promotion of international labour standards and human rights. To further reinforce ILO action in these vital fields, the proposals called for both the strengthening of existing activities and the introduction of new approaches.

17. Thus, to complement the essential work of ensuring adequate technical support for the ILO's machinery to supervise the application of standards, extensive activities were envisaged to assist governments and employers' and workers' organisations in the practical implementation of standards. Regular budget technical co-operation credits for this purpose had been substantially increased and resources had been provided, for the first time, specifically to promote co-ordination between standards and technical co-operation.

18. On one of the most crucial human rights issues of the time, the fight against apartheid, the proposals called for intensified activities and, in particular, included provision for the establishment of a new special monitoring group of three independent experts as recommended by the Conference Committee on Apartheid in 1988.

19. The other priorities identified in the proposals fell under four broad themes: follow-up to the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment; equality of opportunity and treatment for women; environmental concerns and technological change; and improving the conditions of workers outside the conventional organised sector of the economy. Activities under each of these priority themes would be further broken down in the major programmes by which the Programme and Budget document was structured.

20. Without going into details of the individual activities, he wished to mention some of the novel features in the programme. They included the publication of a loose-leaf edition of International Labour Convention and Recommendations; the launching of work to prepare a new edition of the ILO Encyclopaedia of Occupational Health and Safety; a new scheme for more effective ILO regional meetings; and a significant increase in the resources for technical advisory services in all of the developing regions.

21. The proposals also included provision for support to the growing volume of ILO technical co-operation which for 1989 alone could well exceed $125 million. As the late Elimane Kane had rightly emphasised, ILO technical co-operation served to promote the philosophy of this Organisation and the achievement of the social objectives for which it stood. The growing volume of technical co-operation financed by the UNDP and by multi-bilateral agencies testified to the continuing, and indeed increasing, relevance of this Organisation to developing countries.

22. The budgetary proposals before the Committee revealed a decrease in resources for ILO activities under the Regular Budget amounting to 1.3 per cent compared with the approved Programme and Budget for the 1988-89 biennium. This decrease fulfilled a commitment made by the Director-General in February 1988, when the Medium-Term Plan for 1990-95 was discussed, to try to restrain the level of assessment of member States as much as possible. Through a rigorous determination of priorities and through a special effort to reduce expenditure on administrative and other non-technical activities, it had been possible, despite the overall decrease, to provide small but real increases for such major programmes as international labour standards, employment and development, training, working conditions and environment, and field programmes in Africa, the Americas, Asia and the Pacific, and the Arab states. It was nevertheless regrettable that the ILO's substantive activities as a whole had been reduced when it was so evident that the volume of the services which the ILO was thus capable of providing to member States was far below the need for such services.

23. The Director-General then turned to the question of the long-term strategy on budget exchange rates. The fluctuation in exchange rates was a serious problem that had been plaguing the budgets of the Organisation in recent years. In the 1986-87 biennium alone, for example, over $60 million had been added to the original budget to cover the cost of the drop in value of the dollar against the Swiss franc.

24. The Governing Body and the Conference were, of course, fully aware of this very difficult problem and for many years the Governing Body had been exploring various ways of reaching a viable solution. In May 1988 the Governing Body had endorsed in principle the proposal put forward by the Director-General to assess Regular Budget contributions in Swiss francs and to cover the dollar requirements by forward purchasing. A year ago this Committee, in reducing the level of the Working Capital

Fund by some $17 million, had noted the Governing Body's endorsement of this proposal and had expressed the hope that firm proposals in respect of this problem would be made by the Governing Body within the framework of the Programme and Budget proposals for 1990-91.

25. The Governing Body had confirmed in November 1988 this long-term strategy on exchange rate fluctuations which it had previously endorsed in principle. This recommendation was now before the Finance Committee for approval.

26. The Director-General emphasised the need to introduce this long-term solution to currency fluctuations so that the Office could put behind it a major element of financial uncertainty that it had had to face for many years. In recent years the currency markets had been particularly volatile, underlining yet again the unpredictability of exchange rates and the need to find a solution to this problem. He urged the Committee to adopt the proposals on the long-term strategy on exchange rate fluctuations that had been submitted by the Governing Body after a very long and thorough examination of various alternatives.

27. In conclusion, the Director-General pointed out that the nominal level of the 1990-91 Programme and Budget proposals was $349.9 million as compared with $357 million for 1988-89. These present proposals, however, had been provisionally costed at an exchange rate of 1.60 Swiss francs to the dollar. In accordance with the new system being proposed, the final exchange rate would be established by the Finance Committee after the conclusion of its discussion on the Programme and Budget proposals on the basis of the market rate prevailing at that time. At the present rate of exchange of 1.78 Swiss francs to the dollar, the nominal level of the Budget would be $326.9 million which would translate into an assessment of 581.9 million Swiss francs for 1990-91.

28. The Director-General commended both the Programme and Budget proposals for 1990-91 and the long-term strategy on budget exchange rates to the Committee for adoption, and urged all member States to give them their solid support.

29. The Chairman of the Governing Body said that the Draft Programme and Budget for 1990-91 was the result of a very detailed budgetary process carried out by the Office and had been subjected to careful examination by both the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee of the Governing Body and the Governing Body itself.

30. One of the most notable features of the discussions of the 1990-91 Programme and Budget proposals by the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee and the Governing Body in February this year was that for the first time in many years the size of the Budget had not been a major point of debate. This had no doubt been due largely to the new process of prior consultation on the Programme and Budget which had taken place during the Governing Body's consideration last year of the Medium-Term Plan for 1990-95. The Programme and Budget discussion had concentrated on the substantive work carried out by the Organisation, and it was interesting to look back at the very strong support that had been expressed for all of the technical programmes. Indeed, there had even been calls for the addition of new technical activities, although in view of the constraints on the overall budget level there was little scope for expansion in the technical programmes of the Organisation, especially as it was almost impossible to compress administrative costs any further.

31. Excluding the loan annuities on the ILO building, there was a decrease in programme activities in real terms of 1.3 per cent compared with 1988-89. It was true that many developing countries in particular would have welcomed an element of positive programme growth, but in a spirit of compromise last February they had been willing to accept the consensus view which had emerged during the discussions.

32. The difficulties that the Organisation had faced in recent years because of the phenomenon of wide, adverse fluctuations in the Swiss franc/dollar exchange rate hardly needed to be pointed out to this Finance Committee. The Governing Body had recognised that any long-term strategy to deal with this problem had to satisfy two essential criteria: firstly, an assurance that the Organisation's approved biennial programme could be carried out without disruption and, secondly, the stabilisation of the approved biennial budget in order to shield member States from unforeseeable and often heavy increases in their assessed contributions.

33. The Governing Body had had this matter under careful review since 1986. At its May-June 1988 Session, it had considered a proposal to change to a system in which the Budget would continue to be maintained in dollars, member States assessed in Swiss francs, and the biennium's dollar requirements purchased forward. At the Conference last year the Finance Committee itself had expressed support for such a scheme and had agreed that a final recommendation should be made by the Governing Body at its 241st Session last November. The Governing Body's positive recommendation was now before the Committee for approval. This phenomenon of adverse exchange rate fluctuations would not simply disappear: it could again undermine the activities of the ILO unless action was taken now.

34. In concluding, the Chairman of the Governing Body expressed the hope that the Finance Committee and later the plenary of the Conference would give unanimous support for both the proposed long-term strategy on exchange rates and the Draft Programme and Budget for 1990-91.

35. Mr. von Holten, speaking in his capacity as Employers' spokesman in the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee of the Governing Body, said that the draft Programme and Budget proposals for 1990-91 had the full support of the Employers' group of the Conference, and he associated himself with the remarks of the two previous speakers. He expressed particular support for the long-term strategy on budget exchange rates; the Office had had a hard time in making ends meet in recent years and this new strategy should usher in a new era of financial stability. His group also supported all of the 1990-91 draft Programme and Budget proposals, especially the follow-up to the conclusions of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment. He hoped that the Committee would give unanimous approval to both the long-term strategy on exchange rates and the Programme and Budget proposals for 1990-91.

36. Mr. Muhr, the Worker Vice-Chairman of the Governing Body, endorsed the general sentiments expressed by the three previous speakers. Although it was true to say that for the first time in many years the size of the budget had been readily accepted, it had not been easy for the Workers to give their consent because their own ideas had been more far-reaching. The 1990-91 Programme and Budget was in real terms more than 1 per cent below that of 1988-89, which itself was below those of recent biennia. Nevertheless, in the February-March 1989 Session of the Governing Body the discussions of the programme and budget proposals met with a measure of agreement not seen for many years. The Workers could add nothing now to the views they expressed then in the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee. They would support the long-term strategy on exchange rates and the Programme and Budget proposals for 1990-91, both in this Committee and in the plenary of the Conference.

General discussion

37. The representative of Italy said that his Government had carefully examined the draft Programme and Budget for 1990-91 proposed by the Director-General and approved by the Governing Body. They had noted with approval the effort to reduce expenditure so as to match income without affecting the implementation of programmes. He acknowledged that the policy of financial austerity was caused by a shortfall in conditions, one in particular. The payment of these contributions would enable the Organisation to give even more impetus to its activities, in conformity with the guide-lines already indicated by the Director-General in his Report to the Conference.

38. It was well known that his country had always been particularly interested in the technical co-operation activities of the ILO, and it contributed substantially as a multi-bilateral donor. It also supported the activities of the Turin Centre and warmly approved the activities under major programme 75 of the 1990-91 Programme and Budget proposals. He was sure that the activities of the Centre would be further enhanced as they were integrated with the technical co-operation programmes of the ILO.

39. In relation to major programme 30, Major Regional Meetings, he noted that direct costs totalled just over $958,032 to which was added indirect costs amounting to $1,410,000, giving total estimated costs under this head of $2,368,000. The proportion for indirect costs seemed rather high and he wondered whether there was any scope for further savings. Similarly, in major programme 120, Labour Information and Statistics, the total costs for the subprogramme dealing with information systems totalled $8,046,181, of which $3,011,442 was for administrative and management systems. Perhaps this proportion could also be revised.

40. He was pleased to see also that the Office had begun to rationalise activities in some areas, such as legislative information and documentation, for example, and he hoped that this practice could be extended.

41. The representative of the Ukrainian SSR observed that the discussion on the draft Programme and Budget for 1990-91 was clearly one of the highlights of this Conference, given the direct impact that it had on the activities of the Organisation. The Office was to be commended for the quality of the Programme and Budget proposals, which reflected not only the discussion at the 242nd Session (February-March 1989) of the Governing Body, but also the discussion of a Medium-Term Plan a year earlier. As a result the proposals were well balanced, realistic, and reflected the priorities that emerged from these discussions. He supported the activities in the areas of improvement of working conditions, equal opportunity for women, and particularly the Organisation's activities concerning environmental matters, including the consequences of technical change on the environment. There had been a series of initiatives in this area which perhaps could be better focused if the Office could set up a special meeting of experts to advise the Organisation on environmental activities. Particular attention should be paid to the resolution of the Fourth European Regional Conference concerning environmental protection and employment, and to the experience gained by other organisations in the United Nations system. He was gratified at what had been done to reduce administrative costs and hoped that these efforts would continue. Although the Organisation was constrained by a zero-growth budget, many of its main programmes could be enhanced by taking greater account of the work experience in existing programmes. Another possible refinement in the budgetary process would be the fixing of limits on allocations for budgetary proposals. Such a procedure would tend not only to increase efficiently but also to improve the budget planning process.

42. The representative of France expressed his full support for the Director-General's Programme and Budget proposals for 1990-91. He noted with satisfaction that highest priority was accorded in the proposals to the follow-up on the conclusions of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment. The action proposed by the ILO emphasised the problems of employment and training. These problems were clearly set out in paragraph 18 of the conclusions, yet even more important was paragraph 19, which stressed that respect for freedom of association should form an integral part of adjustment policies. The reactions of workers were often swift, and certain States responded by putting trade unionists in prison or other repressive measures. More emphasis was therefore needed on the role of the ILO in ensuring that, where adjustment policies were required, respect for freedom of association and international labour standards was maintained. Many departments of the ILO were involved in these activities and there was no contradiction in their objectives.

43. The representative of Cuba felt that for many years the Programme and Budget proposals submitted had not been in touch with reality, but noted that for the 1990-91 biennium a budget with less than zero growth in real terms was now proposed. It was important to continue with this approach, so as to attain equilibrium and ensure the best use of resources. Field programmes for employment and training were especially important. Priority areas for the Programme and Budget, which her country supported, included the follow-up to the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment. Technical co-operation activities were also an important way of implementing the objectives of the Organisation. In respect of another priority area, international labour standards, a greater link between standards and technical co-operation was evident in the Programme. The proposal for establishment of a new special monitoring group of experts was welcomed as part of the effort to intensify ILO activities aimed at the elimination of apartheid. Although the Programme and Budget proposals were generally satisfactory, greater savings were still needed in order to keep in step with the times. This could be done, for example, by shortening the duration of meetings including the International Labour Conference and the Governing Body, simplifying the structure of the Governing Body, and co-ordinating activities between departments so as to avoid duplication of research which did not produce concrete results. Nevertheless the draft Programme and Budget for 1990-91 would be approved as it stood.

44. The representative of Argentina reiterated his appreciation of the Programme and Budget document which, as he had stated at the February-March Session of the Governing Body, demonstrated the efforts made by the Office to effect necessary cuts. He hoped that the Office would continue its efforts to absorb increased costs, and felt that these efforts should be more closely related to the efforts of member States, many of whom were facing real and continuing difficulties.

45. The representative of Finland recalled that his Government had long emphasised the need for a sound financial basis to the Organisation, and therefore regularly supported the Director-General's Programme and Budget proposals and duly paid its contribution in full. This year was the same; the Programme and Budget had been carefully prepared, and his Government would give it full support.

46. The representative of Czechoslovakia recalled that his views on the Programme and Budget proposals for 1990-91 were already a matter of record and need not be repeated. He reaffirmed his general satisfaction with the draft Programme and Budget, which he felt was well balanced and took account of the positions and opinions expressed at various meetings and also at the last Conference during discussion of the Medium-Term Plan for 1990-95. Especially gratifying was the emphasis on the implementation of the conclusions of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment. The emphasis on measures for employment and training was particularly important for developing countries; the problem was correctly viewed in the full context of the world financial situation and the relationships between social and economic factors. The Organisation was contributing to the solution of major global problems such as the environment, and it was being realistic in its consideration of how the money released through disarmament could be used to solve other problems in the world. Structural changes in developed countries would continue to have an impact on developing countries. The European region itself also had special problems, such as the environment and the consequences of accelerated technical progress.

He fully supported the Programme and Budget proposals which reflected zero growth in real terms, but reiterated his apprehension concerning fluctuating exchange rates which led to an increase in contributions. His own country, for example, had little trade in Swiss francs and would therefore have to purchase them on the financial markets, which would probably mean a continual increase in its contribution.

47. The representative of India recalled that his Government's views had already been expressed at the meetings of the Programme, Financial and Administrative committee of the Governing Body at its November 1988 and February-March 1989 Sessions. The Programme and Budget proposals for 1990-91 reflected the concern of the ILO in critical areas and appeared to mark the beginning of efforts by the Organisation to rectify imbalances which were becoming a source of social and economic tensions the world over. His Government supported the reduction of expenditure in some areas of the Programme and Budget proposals and in fact had pressed for such reductions for some time.

48. Four specific areas could be identified for special attention. First, the protection and generation of employment. This was a natural sequel to the recommendations of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment in 1987. The programmes and activities proposed would provide opportunities to member States to respond to the problems of falling employment opportunities and shortages in skilled manpower which affected their response to anti-poverty programmes and low productivity in various sectors of economic activity. These in turn resulted in low wages and poor working conditions. His Government firmly supported these activities and programmes, which were consistent with the philosophy contained in Part I of the Director-General's Report entitled Recovery and employment, which laid great emphasis on economic growth and social justice. The link and complementarity between economic development and growth, and social conditions and justice, had been recognised and even emphasised. Thus the Director-General's proposals in Part II were in fact an action programme for the report contained in Part I. The Government of India not only supported but also recommended stepping up resource allocation to the programmes and activities outlined.

49. A second area of priority was the equality of opportunity and treatment of women. The Director-General was to be congratulated for recommending in his proposals the post of a special adviser on the development of all activities in the technical department relating to women workers, coupled with the appointment of full-time regional advisers in all four developing regions. In addition a new post was envisaged in the Department of Technical Co-operation to ensure that issues concerning women were taken care of during the preparation of technical co-operation projects. India accorded highest priority to development schemes and programmes concerning women. The 1990-91 Programme and Budget proposals had provided for these activities under six major programmes. In this way, activities involving research, information dissemination and technical co-operation related to women had been integrated into the overall programme of the ILO.

50. A third area of priority related to the social implications of technological change and environmental issues. Resources for this priority area had also been earmarked under a number of major programmes. These programmes and activities, if properly implemented, would go a long way in improving working conditions and generating employment.

51. The fourth area related to activities and programmes in the rural and informal sectors. India had always accorded highest priority to the economic development of the rural workforce. The programmes and activities set out in the 1990-91 Programme and Budget included research, training and skill development, dissemination and proper application of technology suited to the rural environment, and singled out several sectors for special attention. The strengthening and development of organisation of workers in the rural sector was also to be given more attention. He fully supported these proposals, as well as the draft Programme and Budget for 1990-91 as a whole.

52. The representative of the United States of America appreciated the well crafted and systematic process, which included prior consultation with the Governing Body, through which the proposals had been formulated, and was pleased to express full support for the draft Programme and Budget for 1990-91, both in terms of the substance of the programme and the level of the budget, namely zero real growth.

53. The representative of Uruguay concurred in his approval of the Budget, and also referred the Committee to the Director-General's statement at the February-March 1989 Session of the Governing Body concerning the maintaining of the professional posts in the Buenos Aires and the Brasilia offices, his understanding being that in any case, both posts would be maintained at the same level.

54. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics also firmly supported the Programme and Budget proposals and noted that the details of his position were to be found in the report of the 242nd Session of the Governing Body. However, he wanted to draw attention to several features of the Programme: in particular, the more concerted effort of the Director-General to forecast new trends in areas such as the effects of macro-and micro-economic policies, economic development, and implications of manpower development. It seemed, however, that efforts had been dispersed and that some programmes were overloaded with secondary issues; there should not be too many priorities. The zero growth budget was welcome but financial considerations should not be divorced from programme priorities. The Organisation needed to make a realistic assessment of what it could do and its structure needed to be adapted further to financial realities; overlap between programmes had to be avoided.

55. Regarding social and economic problems and the need for zero growth it was for the Director-General to determine appropriate national, regional and subregional action. There was a need for the priorities and activities of the ILO to be made known to a wider circle of specialists in countries, and it was being envisaged in this country to set up a national association in support of the ILO; perhaps even an international association could also be considered. It would also be useful if the Governing Body could review how priorities were being achieved and which programmes were being effective because there was not enough detailed information at the moment to provide a picture of the full spread of the Budget. For each programme, for example, it would be informative to have a breakdown of the amount spent in the biennium on each activity. Apart from these suggestions, however, he was pleased to reaffirm his full support for the Programme and Budget proposals for 1990-91.

56. The representative of the German Democratic Republic stated that a detailed account of his Government's view had been given at the 242nd Session of the Governing Body and were recorded in the relevant report. On the whole, the proposed Programme and Budget was well balanced. It was gratifying to see that priority had been given to the promotion of employment and the alleviation of poverty, and also to the relationship of the work environment to the environment at large. It was also satisfying to see more recognition being given to the ILO's competence in social and labour questions resulting from disarmament.

57. Turning to the long-term strategy on the Budget exchange rate he agreed that something now needed to be done, given the past difficulties which had been caused by the large fluctuations between the Swiss franc and the United States dollar. Although he had preferred a split assesment scheme which used both Swiss francs and US dollars and reflected the actual expenditure pattern of the Organisation, the proposal to use a system of Swiss franc assesments was acceptable. However, a realistic approach to the exchange rate should be taken and the market rate of exchange should be used.

58. The representative of the United Kingdom said that her Government's views on the proposed Programme and Budget for 1990-91 were fully recorded in the records of previous discussions and she wished only to reiterate her Government's full support for the proposals. She was impressed by the level of consensus that had been reached, and despite any reservations which might be held on particular items, it was clear that the member States were prepared to accept the draft Programme and Budget as a whole. The willingness to compromise and to find the right balance between the wishes of the various groups and the financial resources available to the Organisation was commendable and the Office's success in doing so was due to sound financial management, hard work and above all common sense.

59. The representative of Brazil echoed the previous speakers' support for the proposed Programme and Budget for 1990-91. His Government's views had been given at the 242nd Session of the Governing Body, and were adequately reflected in the relevant report. He stressed once again his Government's concern that the posts of Deputy-Director at the Brasilia and Buenos Aires offices be maintained.

60. The representative of Nigeria expressed support for the proposed Programme and Budget for 1990-91 but hoped that the ILO could provide more assistance to member States' efforts to reduce unemployment. This was especially important for developing countries who had embarked upon structural adjustment programmes and who were consequently experiencing worsening unemployment.

61. In regard to the payment of contributions he asked the ILO to adopt a flexible attitude to developing countries who were troubled by external debt and now found themselves becoming exporters of capital. While not wishing to oppose the proposal to assess the Budget in Swiss francs, he pointed out that this scheme had been registered by some developing countries who feared that such a proposal would leave them worse off than before.

62. The representative of the Byelorussian SSR approved the focus which had been given in the draft Programme and Budget for 1990-91 to human rights, and especially to the rights of workers, labour standards, workers' participation in decision-making, social security and to the strengthening of workers' organisations. The increased attention that had been given to environmental problems was also welcome. This latter issue provided many opportunities for co-operation which the ILO should encourage through regional and national programmes. Discussions on the draft Programme and Budget had shown that member States wanted the ILO to tackle such key issues because they were closely inter-related. Structural adjustment would remain topical and he recalled the relevancy of the resolution adopted by the Fourth European Regional Conference in 1987 on this issue.

63. While appreciating that a zero growth budget had been achieved, he wondered whether administrative costs could be further reduced. On the whole, though, the draft Programme and Budget for 1990-91 was well balanced; it set priorities and goals for the Organisation, and suggested ways in which these could be achieved.

64. The representative of Japan expressed support for the draft Programme and Budget for 1990-91, which was well balanced and reflected the principle of zero real growth, and for the choice of the four priority themes. Although the new system of Swiss franc assessments and forward buying of US dollars was designed to minimise the effects of adverse exchange rate fluctuations, it was clear that they could not be ruled out entirely. If deficits in the Budget should arise, these should be dealt with by adjustments to the Budget by way of savings and not through a reassessment of contributions.

65. The representative of Hungary expressed full support for the draft Programme and Budget which, in both size and content, took into account the economic situation of member States. However, there was a continuing need for the rationalisation of programmes, and he assigned particular importance to two objectives of the draft Programme and Budget. The first concerned the promotion of employment and the prevention of unemployment. Activities concerned with achieving this objective should centre on encouraging training which was related to structural change and the promotion of small-scale entrepreneurship. Where unemployment was already a problem, the creation of employment opportunities, especially for young workers, was a priority. The second issue to which his Government attached importance was the application of ILO labour standards. Many countries were experiencing serious economic difficulties and the continued application of labour standards was crucial to stop any decline in the working and living conditions of employees. He emphasised that the application of those Conventions dealing with human rights, such as the freedom of association and the right to work, was indispensable.

66. The representative of Canada accepted the proposed Programme and Budget for 1990-91. He believed that the consensus which the Governing Body had achieved was due to two factors: firstly, the proposed Budget reflected the themes which had been decided upon for the Medium-Term Plan; and secondly, the Budget respected the member States' target of a zero real growth budget. Heeding these two factors was surely a prescription for success in the future.

67. The representative of Austria welcomed the balanced nature of the draft Programme and Budget for 1990-91 and gave unreserved support to the proposals. Discussion had revealed a diversity of wishes on the part of member States, and although obviously not all of these wishes could be met, the Programme finally formulated would contribute to the future stability of the ILO. He congratulated the Office on its work in putting together these proposals.

68. The representative of Belgium, noting that zero real growth had been achieved in the Programme and Budget proposals, and that they closely reflected the objectives chosen by the member States, gave his approval to the draft Programme and Budget. He recalled that past discussions had often been lively, and sometimes heated, and he was happy to see that for this biennium reaching a consensus had not been a problem.

Item-by-item discussion

69. After completing its general debate of the draft Programme and Budget proposals, the Committee proceeded to an item-by-item discussion.

Items 10 to 20

70. No discussion.

Item 30: Major Regional Meetings

71. The representative of Italy stated that his Government's views on this item had been made during the general discussion.

Items 40 to 295

72. No discussion.

Item 296: Working Capital Fund

73. The representative of the Secretary-General (the Treasurer and Financial Comptroller), in reply to a query from the representative of the Government of Belgium on the status of the Working Capital Fund, said that in 1988 the nominal level had been $37 million. However, the Conference reduced the reimbursement that was due to the Working Capital Fund in respect to the 1986-87 budgetary deficit under article 21 of the Financial Regulations from $25 million to $8 million, thus reducing the nominal level of the Working Capital Fund to $20 million. At present the cash level of the Working Capital Fund was also $20 million.

74. No discussion.

Item 298: Undistributed Reserve

75. The representative of the Secretary-General, in reply to a query from the representative of the Government of Italy, confirmed that the Committee would be required to make a recommendation concerning the resolution on the suppression of this Budget item. The inclusion of figures for the 1988-89 biennium was purely for comparative purpose.

V. SCALE OF ASSESSMENT OF CONTRIBUTIONS FOR 1990-91

76. The Committee had before it Report II; Draft Programme and Budget for 1990-91 and Other Financial Questions, containing a draft scale of assessments of member States' contributions for 1990-91 as recommended by the Allocations Committee of the Committee of the Governing Body and endorsed by the Governing Body itself.

77. The representative of Brazil drew attention to paragraph 4 of the report of the Allocations Committee¹ at the February-March 1989 Session of the Governing Body, which still reflected the views of the Brazilian Government on this matter.

78. In reply to a query from the representative of Italy, the representative of the Secretary-General (the Treasurer and Financial Comptroller) confirmed that the resolution to be recommended to the plenary of the Conference would include a complete scale of assessment for member States' contributions which was based on the United Nations scale of assessments and which would be subject to any revision of the scale which might be approved by the United Nations General Assembly at its forthcoming (1989) session.

79. The Committee then adopted for submission to the Conference the draft scale of assessment of contributions for 1990-91 as proposed by the Governing Body.

VI. RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE ABOLITION OF PART V (UNDISTRIBUTED RESERVE) OF THE BUDGET AND CONCERNING THE ADOPTION OF THE PROGRAMME AND BUDGET FOR 1990-91 AND THE ALLOCATION OF EXPENSES

80. The representative of the Secretary-General (the Treasurer and Financial Comptroller) announced that the Swiss franc/US dollar exchange rate had weakened slightly from 1.78 to below 1.77 Swiss francs to the dollar since the Director-General's statement the previous day. As each centime of variation affected the total of assessments by over 1 million Swiss francs, he suggested that the Committee allow the Office to execute the forward exchange contracts immediately, and reconvene so that the actual exchange rate and budget totals could be formally authorised and included in the resolutions to be submitted to the Conference. The Committee agreed.

81. Upon reconvening, the Treasurer and Financial Comptroller announced that the forward exchange contracts had been formally executed at a rate of 1.75 Swiss francs to the dollar. The appropriate figures to be inserted in the resolution would therefore be:

Budget of expenditure

Budget of income

$330,440,000

Budget rate of exchange

1.75 Swiss francs to the US dollar

Equivalent budget total in Swiss francs

SF 578,270,000.

82. The Committee recommends that the Conference adopt these resolutions, the texts of which appear at the end of this report.

83. A table showing the summarised budget of expenditure and income for 1990-91 is appended to this report (Appendix I), and a summary of the proposed expenditure budget for 1990-91 by major programme is also appended (Appendix II). A statement showing the contributions due from each member State in 1990 is also appended (Appendix III), as is a statement showing the amendments to the Financial Regulations consequent upon the adoption of the resolution concerning the long-term strategy on budget exchange rates (Appendix IV).

Geneva, 16 June 1989

(Signed) V. I. PESHKOV,
Chairman and Reporter.

Resolution concerning the composition of the Administrative Tribunal of the International Labour Organisation

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

In accordance with Article III of the Statute of the Administrative Tribunal of the International Labour Organisation, Extends the terms of office of Tun Mohamed Suffian (Malaysia) as judge and Mr. Pierre Pescatore (Luxembourg) as deputy judge for a further period of three years.

Resolution concerning appointments to the Administrative Board (ILO Staff Pensions Fund) and Staff Pension Committee (United Nations Joint Staff Pension Fund)

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Appoints to the Administrative Board of the ILO Staff Pensions Fund and the ILO Staff Pension Committee (United Nations Joint Staff Pension Fund), for a period of three years until 8 October 1992, the following members and substitute members of these bodies, namely:

Members:

Resolution concerning the long-term strategy on Budget exchange rates

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Recalling that adverse wide fluctuations in the Swiss franc/US dollar rate of exchange have had disruptive effects on the implementation of the Organisation's approved Programme and Budget and have resulted in unforeseeable and often major increases in member States' assessed contributions,

Noting the past consideration of possible solutions to this problem by the Governing Body and its Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee,

Recalling the decision of the Governing Body at its 240th Session (May-June 1988) to endorse in principle the introduction in 1990-91 of a system of Swiss franc assessments combined with forward purchasing of the biennium's dollar requirements, and its agreement to take a final decision at its 241st Session (November 1988) based on a more detailed proposal by the Director-General, together with consequential changes in the Financial Regulations and the Financial Rules,

Noting the decision of the Governing Body at its 241st Session (November 1988) to propose to the General Conference at its 76th Session (June 1989) the adoption of such a scheme;

1. Decides to introduce in 1990-91 a system of Swiss franc assessments combined with forward purchasing of the biennium's dollar requirements and to approve, effective 1 January 1990, the consequential changes in the Financial Regulations contained in Appendix IV;

2. Decides that the net premium earned from forward purchasing of the dollar requirements for the biennium be distributed in the ratio of one-half to member States and one-half to the incentive scheme for early payment of member States' contributions, the net premium being arrived at by adding to, or subtracting from the premium earned, any residual gain or loss on exchange from the operation of the Swiss franc assessment system and any gain or loss on exchange resulting from any supplementary forward purchasing contracts that might have to be concluded in order to reduce or increase the approved level of spending in US dollars;

3. Decides additionally that the one-half share of the net premium to be distributed to eligible member States shall be apportioned among the member States on the basis of the proportion of the total of each member State's assessed contributions during the biennium in which the net premium was earned to the total of the assessed contributions for the biennium of all member States; the amounts so established shall be used to reduce the contributions of member States in the following way: member States which have paid their assessed contributions in full during the biennium in which the net premium was earned shall have their share of the net premium deducted from their contributions assessed for the second year of the succeeding biennium; other member States shall not be credited with their share of the net premium until they have paid in full their assessed contributions for the biennium in which the net premium was earned; when they have done so, their share of the net premium shall be deducted from their contributions assessed for the first year of the next biennium for which a budget is adopted after such payment.

4. Decides further to adopt the following transitional measures:

- (a) the conversion of all arrears of contributions and undistributed surpluses from previous biennia at 1 January 1990 from United States dollars to Swiss francs at the budget rate of exchange for 1990-91;
- (b) the conversion of any cash surpluses for 1988-89 from United States dollars to Swiss francs at the budget rate of exchange for 1990-91 for the purpose of reducing the assessed contributions of qualifying member States, under article 18 of the Financial Regulations;
- (c) the conversion of any cash deficit for 1988 and 1989 or for the 1988-89 biennium from United States dollars to Swiss francs at the budget rate of exchange for 1990-91 for the purpose of making an additional assessment on member States in accordance with article 21.2 of the Financial Regulations; and
- (d) the conversion of the balance of the Working Capital Fund at 1 January 1990 from United States dollars to Swiss francs at the United Nations accounting rate of exchange for January 1990.

Resolutions concerning the abolition of Part V (Undistributed Reserve) of the Budget and concerning the adoption of the Programme and Budget for the 62nd financial period (1990-91) and the allocation of expenses among member States

A. The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Recalling the circumstances which led it to decide in respect of the budgets for the 1978-79 biennium onwards to include provision in the Budget for an Undistributed Reserve (Part V) equal to the net assessment on certain member States which, based on certain criteria, are deemed not to participate actively in the work of the Organisation,

Noting that the criteria adopted have, in recent years, applied to only one member State and that the amount provided in Part V of the Budget has not been significant, representing only 0.01 per cent of the Budget, Decides to abolish Part V (Undistributed Reserve) of the Budget with effect from 1 January 1990.

B. The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

In virtue of the Financial Regulations, passes for the 62nd financial period, ending 31 December 1991, the budget of expenditure for the International Labour Organisation amounting to US$330,440,000 and the budget of income amounting to US$330,440,000, which, at the budget rate of exchange of Swiss francs 1.75 to the US dollar, amounts to Swiss francs 578,270,000, and resolves that the budget of income, denominated in Swiss francs, shall be allocated among member States in accordance with the scale of contributions recommended by the Finance Committee of Government Representatives.

APPENDIX IV

AMENDMENTS TO FINANCIAL REGULATIONS (AMENDMENTS AND ADDITIONS ARE IN ITALICS. DELETIONS ARE SHOWN IN PARENTHESES)

Article 2

- (1) For every financial period, the Director-General shall prepare programme and budget proposals containing estimates of the income and expenditure of the Organisation and the proposed budget rate of exchange between the United States dollar and the Swiss franc;
- (2) the estimates of expenditure shall be expressed in United States dollars. The estimates of income shall be expressed in United States dollars and in Swiss francs converted at the budget rate of exchange.

Article 9.3 (New)

- The assessed contributions shall be payable in Swiss francs.

Article 10.2

- As soon as possible after the Conference has adopted the budget and the total amount appropriated has been apportioned among the Members of the Organisation in the manner prescribed by the Conference, the Director-General shall transmit all relevant documents to the Members of the Organisation, indicating that the contributions for the financial period are due and payable in Swiss francs on 1 January of each of the years to which they relate and requesting each Member to remit its contribution on or as soon as possible after the due date. (The Director-General shall, at the same time, request each Member of the Organisation to state the methods it desires to employ for cash remittance.)

Article 10.5 (New)

- All contributions received in a financial period shall be accounted for in United States dollars at the budget rate of exchange for that financial period.

Article 18

- If the difference between budgetary income and expenditure in any complete financial period expressed in United States dollars constitutes a credit balance, the Swiss franc equivalent of the corresponding cash surplus, calculated at the budget rate of exchange for that financial period, shall be used to reduce the contributions of Members in the following way: Members which paid their ordinary contributions in the financial period in which the cash surplus accrued shall have their share of the cash surplus deducted from their contributions assessed for the second year of the succeeding financial period; other Members shall not be credited with their share until they have paid the contributions due from them for the financial period in which the cash surplus accrued. When they have done so their share of such cash surplus shall be deducted from their contributions assessed for the first year of the next financial period for which a budget is adopted after such payment.

- If in any calendar year sums withdrawn from the Working Capital Fund or borrowed to finance budgetary expenditure pending receipt of contributions or other income and/or expenditure incurred in the financing of contingencies and emergencies under prior authorisation of the Governing Body cannot be reimbursed in the course of the same year owing to the fact that the total budgetary income for that year falls short of total authorised expenditure incurred during the year, the sums so borrowed or withdrawn shall be reimbursed to the lender or lenders and to the Fund in the second year following the year of such withdrawal by adding to the contributions assessed on member States for that year an additional assessment in Swiss francs, equivalent to the amount so borrowed or withdrawn; provided that temporary surpluses of budgetary income over expenditure occurring at any time shall be utilised to the extent possible to reduce the amount of outstanding loans or advances.

Article 26

- The final accounts of the Organisation shall be prepared in United States dollars. The accounting records may, however, be kept in such currency or currencies as the Director-General may deem necessary. Details of contributions assessed, received and outstanding shall be presented in Swiss francs in supporting schedules.

Seventy-sixth Session, Geneva, 1989

Nineteenth sitting

Friday, 16 June 1989, 10 a.m.

President: Mr. Nkomo

COMPOSITION OF THE GOVERNING BODY OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR OFFICE

The PRESIDENT – I give the floor to the Clerk of the Conference who has an announcement to make.

The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE – The Employers' Electoral college of this 76th Session of the International Labour Conference met on 15 June 1989, in accordance with article 54, paragraph 4, of the Standing Orders of the Conference. Mr. Oechslin, France, was elected as Chairman; Mr. Hammar attended the meeting as representative of the President of the Conference.

The Electoral College unanimously elected the following Employers' members of the Governing Body:

For Asia: In replacement of Mr. Naval Tata (India), as regular member: Mr. Rowe (New Zealand); in replacement of Mr. Rowe, as deputy member: Mr. Pande (India), Secretary of the All India Organisation of Employers; in replacement of Mr. Mah (Singapore), as substitute member: Mr. Harjono (Indonesia), General Secretary of the Employers' Association of Indonesia.

For the Americas: In replacement of Mr. Brillinger (Canada), as deputy member: Mr. Villalobos (Venezuela); in replacement of Mr. Villalobos, as substitute member: Mr. de la Grenade (Trinidad and Tobago), President of the Caribbean Employers' Confederation.

This communication is signed by J.-J. Oechslin, Chairman of the Employers' Electoral College, and H. Hammar, representative of the President of the Conference.

SEVENTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT – We now move on to the first item on our agenda which is the seventh report of the Selection Committee. I invite Mr. Hammond, Government adviser, Canada, Chairman of the Selection Committee, to submit the reports to the Conference.

Mr. HAMMOND (Government adviser, Canada, Chairman of the Selection Committee) – I have the honour to submit to the Conference the seventh report of the Selection Committee which is to be found in Provisional Record No. 4F. The report deals solely with changes in the composition of committees.

I commend the report to the Conference for adoption.

The PRESIDENT – I submit the seventh report of the Selection Committee to the Conference for discussion. If there are no objections, I take it that the report is adopted.

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

The PRESIDENT – We shall now resume our discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Original – Spanish: Mr. CARRILLO ROJAS (Workers' delegate, Colombia) – This year the entire world is celebrating the bicentennial of the French Revolution, one of the memorable acts of which was to proclaim the Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen. This Declaration, which was very fruitful from the political point of view, though incomplete socially, served as an inspiration to a great majority of countries that have enshrined in their constitutions the basic rights of man. The Universal Declaration of Human Rights adopted by the United Nations General Assembly in Paris in December 1948, exalted the dignity of the human being and proclaimed equality of rights for all human beings without any discrimination whatsoever.

Historically, the ILO has the merit of having signed in Philadelphia several years before the Universal Declaration of the United Nations, the Declaration of Philadelphia which stated that "All human beings without distinction of race, creed or sex, have the right to pursue their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, economic security and equality of opportunity." Since its inception in 1919 the ILO has been in the forefront in the protection human rights and in 70 years of intense activity has adopted a good number of instruments concerning the protection of the workers' fundamental rights.

Deplorably, we forget the bitter lessons of the past and continue to ignore human rights and act in barbarous ways which are unworthy of rational beings. Methods of dialogue, consultation and co-ordination in a search for peaceful solutions as set out in the Charter of the United Nations seem to lose all value before the impulse of violence. Faith in the fundamental human rights, in man's dignity, his high destiny, are pushed into the background, and the life of a human being is worth nothing. Unfortunately my country, Colombia, is one of the places in which violence and inequitable conditions of development have produced one of the most serious situations as regards violations of human rights. Last year an ILO mission went to Colombia and could not but express consternation before the extremely high number of assassinations and disappearances, particularly, of trade unionists linked to the CUT, the trade union that is the most representative in my country. Two hundred and seventy-six trade unionists have been assassinated, more than 300 threatened with death, almost 100 having had to leave their homes – this is the tragedy that besets the trade union movement in my country. We must recognise that our Government, headed by Dr. Virgilio Barco, the President, has taken courageous steps to protect the life of citizens, but we need the solidarity of the international trade union movement and the countries and governments of the democratic world so that these efforts will lead to finding those guilty of the murders and dealing with these under the law.

In September 1976 Colombia ratified the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87). In accordance with Article 15 of the Convention, it came into force in my country towards the end of 1977. However, 12 years later the Government has still not submitted to the Parliament the changes that have to be made to the Labour Code to adjust it and bring it into line with the provisions of the Convention. Although the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations has pointed out to the Colombian Government that the articles of the Code are contrary to the Convention, neither my Government nor the members of the National Congress have done anything to change the situation. The Government continues to suspend trade unions' legal staff through administrative means, although Convention No. 87 prohibits this. The result is a catastrophe. Last year, in October, there was a strike by the CUT, CTC and CGT, so the Ministry of Labour decided to suspend the legal sections of various trade unions thus removing legal recognition of 40,000 workers and leaving them with no protection from the arbitrary actions of employers.

International trade unionism last year celebrated the 40th anniversary of its adoption of Convention No. 87 in San Francisco on 9 July 1948. That was the outcome of more than a century of heroic struggle during which trade unions were considered "organs of conspiracy" and strikes were a "crime". However, in these last years of the twentieth century there are countries that have still not yet ratified this Convention; and nations that have ratified it but do not comply with it. This is a Convention that promotes recognition of one of the fundamental rights proclaimed in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, it is worth continuing to fight without any break therefore until trade union freedom of association is respected and protected throughout the world. Referring to human rights, I would now like to turn to the Convention on Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) 1958, (No. 111), ratified by Colombia in 1967. In my country, there has always been extremely odious discrimination, in both private and public undertakings, between permanent workers and workers supplied by employment agencies. Last year I had an opportunity of referring to this serious problem and I told you that, according to a National Planning Department study, 40 per cent of industrial labour is provided to factories by employment agencies. This proportion, instead of dropping, has increased, since it means a very high saving to employers. The worker is bound to a temporary contract, generally of six months or one year, for work of permanent nature. He is paid the minimum salary, despite his professional capacity, he has no right to promotion, he cannot belong to the trade union, or to any of the collective bargaining agreements and he cannot strike. His position is lower than those of his neighbours who are doing the same work. It is a clear violation also of the Convention on Equal Remuneration, (1951 (No. 100) ratified by Colombia in 1962. This is why, in the trade union movement, and, most particularly, in the CUT over which I preside, we insist that the Colombian Government eliminate all intermediaries in employment and that Convention No. 111 prohibiting all kinds of discrimination in work be reflected in its legislation.

The revision by this Conference of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107) is of extreme importance to us in Colombia. There is an indigenous population of about 400,000 people, belonging to more than 700 different ethnic groups, situated in isolated areas far from highly developed urban and rural centres. Nevertheless, they are literally under siege by newcomers invading their lands and destroying their social organisation and their culture. Huge indigenous reservations were established by the Colombian State, but this is no guarantee of respect for the legitimate claim that "land, autonomy and culture" should be protected. This Conference must adopt the revision of the Convention as proposed and then take the necessary action for its genuine application and implementation.

The Director-General's Report talks about recession, recovery and economic readjustment in the 1980's. This obviously refers to foreign debt in developing countries.

Since the Latin American countries began to carry out the readjustment programmes dictated by the International Monetary Fund, in conjunction with private international banks, unemployment has grown. In 1980, officially recognised unemployment, according to the ILO, was 4.7 per cent; in 1985, after several years of "adjustment", unemployment reached 10.6 per cent. There has also been an increase in underemployment and uncontrolled growth in self-employment and service employment, which, in fact, is a way of hiding unemployment.

The high rates of interest have also destroyed productive sectors in our underdeveloped countries as well as in developed countries. For instance, if the Latin American countries had paid only the rate of interest they were paying in 1977, they would have saved 150,000 million dollars. In other words if, in 1978, the banks had not unilaterally raised their rates of interest on the loans they had signed earlier, we would not have had to pay 150,000 million dollars; 150,000 million dollars of our present debt are just the increases, the surcharges, in the rates of interest.

The industrialised countries will have to explain the effect of these high rates of interest in their own countries. How many farms, how many productive companies, small and large, have had to close their doors because they cannot pay these high interest rates? How many jobs have been lost in advanced sectors because of these high rates of interest? How much capital which used to be invested in productive activities generating work has just had to be used to repay this interest?

Paradoxically, the International Monetary Fund that is pressuring industrialised countries to lower their rates of interest is carrying out a campaign for our governments to raise theirs.

Deplorably, the International Monetary Fund has become the executive body of a supranational economic dictatorship. With great reason the document of the Pontifical Commission Iustitia et Pax on "an ethical approach to international debt" says that the IMF exercises an abusive pressure on debtors and that, in many cases, the IMF's decisions have not been well received by the leaders and by public opinion in the countries in difficulty. The same document recommends that we examine openly the loan conditions imposed by the IMF. It recommends that we lower the rates of interest and mobilise all available national resources, material and human, in order to promote sustainable economic growth and secure development in these countries.

This year, the ILO is celebrating 70 years of untiring, fruitful work. Seventy years devoted to study and investigation of labour problems as well as adoption of international standards – Conventions and Recommendations – that, since 1919, have been protecting the rights of workers and orienting the social policy of governments. Undoubtedly, the fundamental key to the ILO's survival is its tripartite approach which enables governments, employers and workers to talk on an equal footing, identify their problems and pinpoint reasonable solutions that will enable them to work in an atmosphere of understanding and reciprocal trust.

May I take this opportunity on behalf of the workers of Colombia to thank the Director-General, the Governing Body and the Committee on Trade Union Freedom, for their co-operation in this difficult era in my country. We are convinced that the future of the ILO will be bright because it has remained faithful to its objective of promoting the cause of social justice and so contributing to bringing about a universal and lasting peace.

Original – Chinese: Mr. SHA (Employers' delegate, China) – Mr. President, I should like to begin by warmly congratulating you on your election to the presidency of this session of the Conference. I am confident that under your guidance it will surely be entirely successful. I also warmly congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne, who was elected in February as the Director-General of the International Labour Office. On behalf of the Chinese business circle, I wish moreover to express our thanks to the former Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Blanchard, who gave a creditable performance during his 15 years of service in that post.

In his Report to the current session, the Director-General reviewed global economic development in the 1980s, from recession to recovery and adjustment, outlined a future perspective of economic development and employment problems in the 1990s and set forth macro- and micro-economic policies aimed at stimulating economic recovery. The Chinese business community is of the view that the principles suggested by the Director-General to encourage employment and ensure social justice along with economic progress are in keeping with the needs of global economic development in the next decade.

These principles are valued in China, too, as we can draw on them when we sum up the experience of the past ten years and formulate development strategies for the next decade.

With respect to economic development, enterprise adjustment and social equity in China in the 1980s, the Director-General noted in his Report that China was the only country in the world which had registered faster economic growth in the 1980s than in the 1960s and 1970s. In my view, it was our Government's persistent efforts in adhering to correct reform policies and opening up that enabled China to maintain a high level of economic growth for the past ten years. Here, I wish to emphasise that enterprise restructuring has also given positive impetus to structural adjustment and rapid economic growth.

However, the restructuring of Chinese enterprises in the 1980s fell short of the needs of economic development as serious imbalance still exists, particularly in the industrial internal structure. This has been reflected mainly in the relatively slow progress in the development of certain sectors, where bottlenecks are taking shape, namely, energy, mining, raw and processed materials, transport, power and communications. In addition, improvement is also called for in social welfare, culture, education, environmental protection and public health installations, which have failed to keep pace with the rapid economic growth.

In the course of economic development and structural adjustment over the past decade, the Chinese business community, the Government and the trade unions have worked hand in hand to maintain social equity, with priority consideration given to creating employment opportunities. In spite of the pressure of a huge population, the unemployment rate in China fell from 4.19 per cent in 1980 to 2.1 per cent in 1988. The credit should go, to a great extent, to the medium- and small-sized enterprises in China. For example, medium- and small-sized enterprises with a workforce of under 500 account for 99.5 per cent of total employment and the workers they employ make up 81.39 per cent of the national total. It should also be mentioned here that the rural, medium- and small-sized enterprises have absorbed about 80 million surplus labourers in the country over the past ten years. Furthermore, no polarisation has been seen in terms of distribution among the workers in the enterprises in China.

It is evident that, during the past decade, China has had no problem maintaining high employment rates and fair distribution. However, the price China pays for a low unemployment rate is, as acknowledged by the Chinese business community, to keep a large number of surplus workers in the enterprises. As shown by statistics, the total number of superfluous people in the State-run enterprises amounts to 15 million. At the same time, the directors and managers of State-run and collectively owned enterprises are under pressure from their workers who complain about the excessively high income of some private and individual business owners. It should be admitted too that serious problems have cropped up during the speedy economic surge over the past decade, i.e. enterprises seeking short-term economic results at the expense of environmental protection, excessively large-scale capital construction and the swelling of consumption. These problems have already captured the attention of the Chinese Government, business community and the trade unions and China has al-trative means to improve the economic environment and restore economic order.

With respect to China's enterprise development strategy for the 1990s, the Director-General said in his Report that the most effective way for the developing countries to resolve economic and social crises is to implement structural adjustment while attaining economic growth; and that we should constantly strive to integrate structural adjustment with balanced growth, while focusing our attention on expanding employment and reducing poverty. This, I believe, is a correct development strategy. China, a developing country, is engaged in the adjustment of the 1980s' economic pattern in its current biennium and intends to build its economic development in the next decade on the basis of such adjustment. I wish to stress that the adjustment under way in China now is not intended to halt or reverse reform, to the contrary, it runs parallel with measures for deepening reform. It is aimed at eliminating the imbalance in economic development and inequality in the society so as to make it possible for us to successfully continue with the reform and opening up programme and to maintain a balance in economic development, structural adjustment and social equity. We, in the Chinese business circle, therefore support the Government's improvement and adjustment programme and have formulated, on this basis, the development strategy for Chinese enterprises in the 1990s. The main points of this strategy are outlined below. While progress in the tertiary industry is being promoted, energetic efforts will be made to develop the sectors of energy, mining, raw and processed materials, power, transport and communications, to appropriately curb the manufacturing industries, and to further encourage defence enterprises to turn to the production of civilian commodities. Emphasis will be placed on the continued development of diverse economic factors, with public ownership playing a dominant role. Efforts will be made to reform the State-owned enterprises, to build more export-oriented enterprises, to encourage Sino-foreign joint equity or co-operative ventures, to strengthen technological co-operation and trade between Chinese enterprises and business communities abroad and to actively attract foreign funds and spend them on production with high economic returns.

While supporting government and trade union efforts to establish and improve a social protection scheme, an employment system based on labour contracts will be introduced, which should give both enterprises and workers greater choice regarding employment, thus facilitating a rational use of workers and stimulating enterprise productivity and market competitiveness.

Efforts will be made to improve further the reformed wage system which links the enterprise payroll with its economic returns, to continue to follow the principle of keeping workers' actual wage increase below the labour productivity growth rate, and to contain soaring consumer expenditure. In the meantime, the Government's tax policies must be implemented so as to adjust individual income distribution and ease inequality in this regard.

Emphasis will be placed on the wide implementation of training programmes, first for directors and managers, especially of small enterprises, so that they can keep pace with economic development and workers and staff, especially those temporarily out of a job, enabling them to adapt to vocational changes and to learn skills which may become necessary when new technologies are introduced into the enterprises.

Another objective will be to try to maintain a balance between the development of production in enterprises and the protection of the rights and interests of the workers and staff by promoting democratic management of enterprises, bringing into full play the role of the Workers' Conference, and encouraging dialogue between the business community and the social partners of the trade unions.

Great attention will be paid to the problem of industrial pollution and the preservation of the ecological environment in the course of economic development.

It is the view of the business circle in China that the improvement and adjustment programme being implemented in our country in the current biennium will effectively curtail investment and consumption demand, cool off the over-heated economy and curb inflation, thus facilitating the implementation of the enterprise development strategy for the 1990s.

From a global perspective, it is hoped by the Chinese business community that the 1990s will be a decade of relaxation and dialogue, of peace and co-operation and of balanced progress in economic development and social equity. This calls for concerted efforts on the part of the East and West and the North and South. In this connection, the major industrialised countries should, as suggested by the Director-General in his Report, assume greater responsibility and make increased contributions to the balanced development of the world economy. With the aim of sharing more significantly in a future economic upswing, the Chinese business community is ready to work together with the ILO and business circles in other countries for the further strengthening of technological co-operation and friendly exchanges.

Original – Arabic: Mr. SAHBANI (Workers' delegate, Tunisia) – In the name of Allah, the Merciful, the Compassionate! May I begin by congratulating you most warmly, Mr. President, on your election to the presidency of this session. I am sure that thanks to your experience, wisdom and clear mind, your election will lead us toward the successful conclusion of our work.

I would also like to congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne on my own behalf and on behalf of the workers of Tunisia, for his election to the post of Director-General of the ILO. Mr. Hansenne's skill and his experience in industrial relations give us every confidence in the future and fate of this important international organisation, which always has and continues most effectively to consolidate policies to further the cause of social justice and promote the development and prosperity of mankind.

I would also like, on behalf of the workers of Tunisia, to present to Mr. Francis Blanchard our warmest thanks for his steadfast defence of humanitarian principles, and for his assistance to our national organisation, the Tunisian General Workers' Union.

We have read the Director-General's Report which contains a courageous and objective assessment of the problem of development in the course of this decade. While we agree with the contents of the Report and with the analysis of economic imbalance throughout the world, as regards its causes and its effects on workers and other social groups, especially in the developing countries, we must recall that the consequent negative growth, unemployment and poverty directly touch the lives of millions in the poorer countries. This major obstacle calls for immediate action so that millions of young people may hope for a better life.

A world in which one half lives in affluence whilst the other half is afflicted by hunger, unemployment and illness is precarious, for it holds the seeds of war and disruption. The spectacular progress made by man in science and technology must be considered as incomplete as long as millions continue to die of hunger, and as long as millions of children are deprived of the right to knowledge and education.

On the eve of the twenty-first century, we are distressed by the fact that in Africa, Asia and Latin America there are still hundreds of millions of people who live in inhuman conditions.

The solution to this problem, as we see it, can only lie in the gradual transfer of resources which today are used to produce means of destruction, for the promotion of development in the Third World. This is not utopia; this is a very realistic solution to our problems, and the most appropriate in the present state of affairs. We feel that solving the problem of the external debt, which weighs so heavily on poor countries and middle-income countries, forcing them to forego growth and development, is a major obligation of the international community. Vast sums of money flow every year from the poor countries to the rich countries simply to service their debts. This merely impoverishes the developing countries while lining the pockets of the developed countries. We must put an end to this phenomenon, which is the source of many crises in the world today. The rich countries must show a greater readiness to sacrifice and greater generosity. We also appeal for the re-scheduling of the debt, and the cancellation of a large part of the debt of the poorest countries. We are convinced that it would be wrong to expect the poorest countries to suffer the consequences of a major economic crisis which has left its mark in several regions of the world. I would like to take this opportunity to appeal to the representatives of the affluent countries to provide assistance to countries still suffering from the economic crisis. Let us do what we can to make this a better world, where men live in peace and security.

Millions of workers throughout the world have to leave their countries in search of living. These migratory trends have grown since the Second World War. It has especially affected African countries, which export labour to the industrialised countries of Europe. As a result of this phenomenon there are hundreds of thousands of migrant workers who live in circumstances which are anything but natural, and who are moreover the victims of shameful racist campaigns. We demand that the basic rights of these workers be respected, and that they may exercise the same rights as those enjoyed by the citizens of the European communities. Many of these migrant workers live in uncertainty and fear as 1992 approaches. We only ask that these migrant workers be treated in a civilised manner, and sheltered from narrow-minded nationalism and short-term economic considerations. We believe that the first duty of the European countries is to pursue a policy which will accord to migrant workers a civilised treatment by today's standards. I therefore urge the ILO to undertake a major effort on behalf of migrant workers, and in particular on behalf of their children.

Democracy and human rights are gaining support throughout the world. The winds of freedom are beginning to be felt in parts of this world which previously were considered impervious to freedom. My country has taken an initiative in improving the political climate. A number of political reforms have brought Tunisia to the forefront of Third World countries which have sought to institutionalise democracy in government and society. The credit for this goes to Mr. Zein El-Abedine Ben Ali, President of the Tunisian Republic, and to all the democratic forces which support him in this transitional period and which seek to make democracy a reality for everyone. After working on the problem for a year, we have also managed to solve the trade union crisis facing the Tunisian General Workers' Union and the country as a whole since 1985. We have reorganised the entire basic trade union structure and last April held an extraordinary assembly which, as the international and regional trade union organisations themselves recognise, elected democratic and representative trade union leaders.

For tens of years now, my organisation has played an important role in Tunisian life and within the International Labour Organisation. The Tunisian General Workers' Union is determined to continue along this path and to defend the material and moral rights of the Tunisian workers in the cause of freedom and justice throughout the world.

The progress that has been made in the furtherance of democracy and peace, the end numerous regional conflicts and the détente in East-West relations should not make us forget that there are many nations and minorities that are still living under the yoke of occupation, who are the victims of racial discrimination and oppression.

Our thoughts turn to the Palestinian people in the Arab occupied territories and in Palestine who every day are the victims of arbitrary practices. The "intifadah", this popular uprising led by the workers and all the people of Palestine, has now been going on for over a year in an attempt to defend the trade union and political rights of the Palestinian people and their right to freedom and dignity. They need the assistance and support of free men all over the world in their effort to get rid of the tyranny under which they are living. It is the duty of our Organisation to stand by them in their legitimate struggle. The resolution which many governments and organisations have tabled, including my own organisation, might be the best way for us to come out strongly on the side of legality, justice and human rights and to express our rejection of arbitrary practices wherever they are to be found. I therefore invite all delegations to vote for this resolution before this 76th Session which condemns the arbitrary Israeli practices against the Palestinian people.

While I am on the subject of freedom, I have to mention a problem which has been with us for all too long. I am talking about the system of apartheid inflicted on the Black majority in South Africa. What is happening there is a disgrace for us all. It is our duty to put the thumbscrews on this racist regime and to impose an economic boycott on it so as to create a situation that can put an end to apartheid.

In conclusion, I repeat my wishes for the success of this session and trust that it will adopt resolutions that serve the cause of social justice and peace in the world.

Mr. MARTOS (Employers' delegate, Hungary) – Mr. President, let me express my congratulations first of all to you and all the Vice-Presidents of the Conference on the occasion of your election and wish you much success in your responsible activity.

I consider the current issue chosen by the Director-General, namely the relationship between recovery and employment, both highly important and timely. We in Hungary are also keeping this issue on the agenda, owing to the extremely rapid transformation of the economy. Nevertheless, first we have to take steps and measures to ensure that the market economy gains ground, at the same time dealing with the positive and negative effects it involves. The activity in this direction has started already last year. Parliament has adopted a new company law and passed an Act for greater facilitation and protection of foreign investments in Hungary.

The isolated regulation of wages was gradually terminated, making it possible for enterprises to take efficiency into consideration in manpower management. Negative factors still exist too, however. Restrictive economic policy, high taxes and other curtailments are narrowing the home market and decreasing enterprises' opportunities to increase production. Structural problems in the economy restrict exports as well. Thus, tension is forming on the labour market, which requires greater attention than would have been necessary without an objective shortage of manpower.

In this situation, the Hungarian employers and their most representative organisation, the Hungarian Chamber of Commerce, supports some of the measures taken by the Government while opposing others.

We are fostering the development of the market, the involvement of foreign capital and the lifting of legal restrictions hindering management and are demanding from the Government an economic policy to promote initiative and activate the economy, at the same time decreasing direct taxes and budget deposits, which add to business costs. In this way, the market, and therefore the employment necessary for increased production can be expanded. We oppose the continuation of bureaucratic budgetary policy, which holds back the economy, but we are also against unbridled monetarism.

Hungary's economic recovery has to combine considerably greater economic openness with the necessary improvement of micro- and macro-economic conditions. On the one hand, we have to adapt to world economic trends – for which the further liberalisation of imports, a correct exchange policy and the acceleration of the necessary structural adjustment is needed – while, on the other hand, we have to solve the economic and accounting problems of our traditional trade relations with our Eastern neighbours. Should we achieve all these targets, we can expect a considerable modification of enterprise requirements in the field of manpower. Professional knowledge, quality and creativity are becoming more important and the demand for retraining and further education is also growing. To this end, a Government programme is necessary, along with the positive attitude of enterprises, to create new jobs, develop the service sector and organise public works if necessary.

In Hungary, a vigorous democratisation process is taking place with a view to establishing political pluralism and a multi-sectoral economy. This process is affecting the political and economic institutions too. The law on associations, in conformity with the United Nations Declaration of Human Rights and the ILO instruments, has abolished the remaining obstacles to freedom of movement and organisation of both employers and employees. In this context, the National Association of Entrepreneurs – gathering small entrepreneurs and individual businessmen – has been set up and we sincerely hope that it will participate in the future work of the ILO.

In recent months several hundred different organisations have exercised their right of association, demonstrating the change that has taken place in this field. A vital factor of reform has been the transformation of the wage policy and system and the end of State intervention. The differences between micro- and macro-level interests has to be overcome through the development of a bargaining process, as already carried out in practice by various countries.

A major step in recent years has been the establishment of the first institutions representing a real tripartite system. The Government has set up a National Interest Conciliation Council in order to provide a forum for settling disputes concerning the working and living conditions of workers and employees. Its members are representatives of the State, employers and employees. Decision-making takes place in the Council essentially by consensus. In the long run, the Council's aim is to co-ordinate interests on the macro-level, on the one hand, and to settle medium-level conflicts on the other. Its first decisions have been taken with respect to wage regulation for 1989. A minimum wage and minimum wage increase have been set by Government approved legislation. The Council's activity is supplemented by the medium-level co-ordination of interests and the system of collective bargaining, which is based on the modified Labour Code. The Council's main task for this year is to monitor the elaboration and implementation of an up-to-date wage scale system.

As in previous years, I should like to say a few words about the activity of the Hungarian Chamber of Commerce with respect to the current political and economic reform process in our country; the Chamber is clearly the appropriate body to represent the interests of economic organisations. The Government and the trade unions are increasingly aware of this, which has facilitated the development of a more balanced relationship.

This new co-operation has led to meetings between Government members and the Chamber's leaders, which facilitate the exchange of views on major economic issues. A similar process is under way in the relations between the Council and the trade unions, both on macro and medium levels.

The Chamber is also steadily modernising its own structure in order to achieve equal representation of employers in all sectors of the economy. In this framework, it has become possible for companies with a foreign capital share and even 100 per cent private ventures to become full members of the Chamber, contrary to the past.

The Chamber, as before, is entitled to participate alongside the Government in the drafting of economic measures and thereby to represent the interests of the employers. In this context, a new feature of our work is that we can forward our opinion, criticism and proposals not only to individual members of the Government, but through the press we can reach public opinion too. Today there is no doubt, as already underlined above, that the Hungarian Chamber of Commerce is indeed an employers' organisation.

In the course of the 1987 session of Conference, the participants discussed and accepted the new Constitution of the ILO which, by increasing the number of the Governing Body members, and by further modifications, widened democracy within the Organisation. Thanks to these modifications, the Employers' representatives of the socialist countries may be able to play a full role in the management of the Organisation. We therefore back the modification of the Constitution and express our concern about the long process of ratification which stands to hinder the 1990 elections due to take place in conformity with the new regulations.

We consider as an important step and a new stage in co-operation, both for the Hungarian Chamber of Commerce and for the Employers' group, the visit by the Chairman of the ILO Employers' group to Hungary this spring at our invitation.

On the basis of this visit and the multilateral programme, we think that Mr. Oechsli's personal impressions will also confirm the changes going on in our country – the ever-increasing role of the Chamber as the representative of employers and the freedom of organisation among various groups of employers.

The Chamber, as before, continues to issue a publication, together with the State Office for Labour and Wages and the Trade Union Centre, introducing the ILO and its activities, listing the international labour agreements and reproducing the integral text of the treaties ratified by Hungary. We believe that the availability of this publication to the general public will further strengthen the process of democratisation.

The activity of the Hungarian Chamber of Commerce that I have just outlined above clearly shows our intention to co-operate in a constructive spirit with all organisations, among them first and foremost the ILO which, on the basis of mutual interests, promotes the achievements of our targets and forwards the interests of the Hungarian employers.

Original – Arabic: Mr. MOUBARAK (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Iraq) – In the Name of God, the Merciful and Compassionate! I am pleased to speak before your distinguished Conference in the name of all the Arab delegations, representing the Governments, Employers and Workers, in order to express their views on Appendix III of the Report of the Director-General on the situation of Arab workers in Palestine and in the other occupied Arab territories.

At the outset, I should like to commend the efforts made by Mr. Francis Blanchard, the former Director-General of the International Labour Office, and his dispatch of fact-finding missions which for 12 years have prepared regular reports on the situation of Arab workers in Palestine and in the other occupied Arab territories, in fulfilment of the Organisation's international responsibility and in pursuance of the 1974 and 1980 resolutions of the International Labour Conference on that subject.

The new Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, will undoubtedly devote particular attention to this issue so that the ILO, which embodies international social awareness, will contribute to alleviating the oppression and discrimination to which Arab workers and employers in Palestine and in the other occupied Arab territories are subjected. I should like also to thank members of the fact-finding mission for their preparation of this truthful and fact-filled report and to underscore its conclusions which point to continued violation by Israel of workers' rights, trade union rights, international labour standards, the Constitution of the Organisation and the resolutions of the Conference. We believe that it is appropriate to recall here the most important facts underlined by the mission's report, which confirm the correctness of our point of view and our repeated demands.

The mission emphasised that the recommendations contained in the previous report are still on the whole valid. This means that these recommendations have not been implemented owing to the arrogance of the Israeli occupying authorities and their continued practice of racial discrimination and inequality in labour relations and social security matters. Those authorities have continued their policies of colonisation, of confiscation of Arab land and water resources and imposition of restrictions on Palestinian firms and trade, of detention and expulsion of trade unionists, of police raids on trade union premises, many of which were forcibly closed down, of prohibition of trade union activities and of imposition of severe restrictions on Palestinian citizens' freedom of movement. This led the mission to reiterate its call on the Israeli authorities to take new and effective measures in order to put an end to these many forms of inequality and discrimination in practices and employment conditions which have existed for a long time in many sectors.

The mission underscored the discrimination to which the national enterprises and Palestinian employers are subjected, namely, exorbitant taxes, the freezing of bank accounts and prohibition against receiving any financial assistance from other countries, all as a means of ensuring that the Palestinian territories shall continue to provide a market for Israeli goods and products. This has led to a 30 per cent drop in economic activity and a 50 per cent decline in living standards.

The mission has paid special attention this year to the question of social insurance deductions. Paragraphs 51 and 52 of the report show that these deductions exceed 18.5 per cent in industry and services and 41 per cent in construction. They are used in financing and insurance system from which these workers are not allowed to benefit, including, namely, insurance with respect to old-age, disability, occupational diseases, dismissal, unemployment, illness and convalescence. The mission emphasised also that this situation is unacceptable and has not evolved, along the lines recommended in the preceding reports, towards the elimination of unequal treatment between the Palestinian workers in the occupied territories and the Israeli workers. The mission emphasised also that the existing system constitutes a fundamental and disturbing problem for which solutions must be found in order to put an end to this discrimination, particularly as it affects between 105,000 and 109,000 Palestinian workers. The mission called also for the establishment of a fair system which would provide for Palestinian workers and their families adequate and effective social protection.

As for trade union rights and freedoms, the mission expressed its grave concern over the deterioration of the trade union situation in occupied Palestine, which constitutes a flagrant violation of the principles of trade union freedoms. This violation has taken the following forms: measures of oppression, administrative detention and expulsion of trade union leaders; police raids of trade union premises and the closure of those premises after the destruction of furniture and confiscation of documents; interference by the Israeli army in trade union activities; prohibition of meetings, restrictions of the freedom of movement of trade union members, their house arrest and expulsion.

The report has confirmed the determination of the Israeli occupying authorities to increase the number of settlements, which now stands at 243. The confiscated land now represents 52 per cent of the total area of the West Bank, and 40 per cent of the total area of the Gaza Strip.

The mission also underscored that the situation had deteriorated in the occupied Syrian Golan territory as a result of the practices of the Israeli occupying authorities, compounded by the methods of repression and terrorism they use. Those practices include confiscation of land, expansion of colonisation, appropriation of water sources and land necessary to agriculture, restrictions on the marketing of agricultural products, and dismissal of teachers who have not signed a document of loyalty to the Israeli Government. The mission demanded an immediate end to the economic and administrative measures taken against Syrian citizens. This honourable Conference is aware that the resolutions of the United Nations do not recognise annexation of the Golan and Jerusalem. This is something which we ask the mission to take into account in the future.

Technical co-operation projects set up for Arab workers in Palestine and in the other occupied Arab territories are fewer than the minimum required in view of the difficult situation which the Palestinians are facing under Israeli occupation and do not meet their true needs. We therefore call on the Governing Body and on the ILO to undertake their full responsibility in providing the Palestinian population with the technical and material support needed in the areas of vocational training, trade union formation, social insurance and rehabilitation of handicapped persons, whose numbers have increased owing to the measures taken by the Israeli authorities to put an end to Palestinian resistance.

The report drawn up by this year's mission elicits a number of comments which, we hope, will be taken into consideration by the Director-General in the future, in order to ensure that future reports will better reflect the situation in Palestine and world-wide as a result of the "intifadah" and the declaration of the Palestinian State.

It is important and necessary to respect the terminology used in the resolutions adopted by the Conference in 1974 and 1980. This terminology conforms in general to the practices established by the United Nations, especially since the United Nations General Assembly, in its Resolution No. 43/177, decided to use the word "Palestine", after hearing the speech given by the Palestinian leader and President of the State of Palestine, Yassir Arafat, in this very room.

The recommendations included in the previous reports, which have not even begun to be implemented by the Israeli occupying authorities, should now be supplemented and strengthened with new proposals that take into account the present situation created by the Israeli Government's efforts to repress the heroic and popular uprising of the Palestinian people. That situation is characterised by the problems of people who have been mutilated and become handicapped as a result of action by the Israeli army, abortion and malformed babies as a result of the exposure of Palestinian women to toxic gases, imprisoned young people and workers who have been left without shelter after the destruction of their homes, administrative detention, etc. We call on the ILO to give special attention to these problems and to contribute to devising appropriate solutions in order to alleviate the suffering of the Palestinian people.

In view of the importance of the problems of social security deductions and to put an end to unfair treatment and discrimination, we call on the Director-General of the ILO to closely follow the situation in the course of this year. In so doing, we urge him to: (a) calculate the total sums which have been systematically deducted from the earnings of Palestinian workers since 1967, to calculate the amount of those sums which has been spent, and to prepare proposals for investing those sums for the benefit of Palestine workers and their families; (b) propose a programme establishing a special fund for Palestinian workers in which those sums and the interest earned on them will be placed, and then invest that amount in order to provide Palestinian workers with services and social protection and to eradicate the conditions which deprive them of their right to insurance.

With those observations, I should like to conclude my statement on behalf of the Arab group. But before I give up the floor, I should like to stress that the image of the Israeli military occupation, which is detested by all peoples, cannot be improved or embellished by claims made by the Israeli authorities that they are introducing reforms designed to improve the living conditions of the Palestinian people. Under the occupation and the policy of racial colonisation, there can be no development or progress in Palestine or in South Africa. For this reason, the end of the Israeli occupation and the granting of the legitimate and inalienable rights of the Palestinian people, including the establishment of an independent Palestinian State with its capital in Jerusalem, under the leadership of the Palestinian Liberation Organisation (PLO), its sole legitimate representative, is the key to peace, stability, development and progress in Palestine. These objectives should be achieved through an international peace conference held under the auspices of the United Nations, with the participation of the PLO on an equal footing with all the parties concerned.

To enable the Palestinian people to attain this goal, we call on the United Nations and their specialised agencies, first and foremost the International Labour Organisation, to follow closely the Palestinian situation, to defend the rights of the Palestinian people and to provide them with every form of support and protection, in conformity with the noble principles and objectives for which the ILO has been established and for which the Charter of the United Nations and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights have been written.

Original – Russian: Mr. ANDREEV (Workers' delegate, Bulgaria) – I would like to associate myself with the congratulations conveyed to you on your election to this responsible office, and I wish you and your Vice-Presidents every success in your work.

The International Labour Organisation is now 70 years old. This is a respectable age. We have come a long way, which itself is confirmation of the vital force of the ideas on which our Organisation was founded. During these seven decades the International Labour Organisation has given a great deal to the world, in particular to the world of labour, for which it deserves recognition. We are convinced that, increasingly, the ILO will come into its own as an instrument and a centre of social dialogue and will make a growing contribution to the solution of world-wide problems of vital importance for humanity and individuals.

This year's session of the Conference is taking place at a time of great hopes. The new political way of thinking, which is now gaining ground in spite of difficulties, is changing the international climate. For the first time in the history of mankind, a real step has been taken towards disarmament by eliminating one class of nuclear missile. Confrontation is giving way to constructive dialogue. Regional centres of military tension are being defused one after the other. The creation of a European home is an idea which is increasingly capturing the minds of the old continent. The positive changes in Europe were also reflected in the Final Act of the Vienna Conference, which we all welcome. Each new day gives us new evidence of the fact that the world is inter-related and interdependent, that today no State can solve its problems at the expense of another, that confrontation, with all its consequences, is fatal for human civilisation, and that each nation has the right to social choice and this right is the basis of security and progress.

Of course, not everything is running smoothly. Some quarters are still counting on nuclear force, interfering in the affairs of other countries, assuming the right to judge and claiming to be sole possessors of the truth, all of which goes to show that we are still on shaky ground, which needs to be actively defended and strengthening in order to achieve social justice and lasting peace.

This is why we condemn apartheid in South Africa, and support the "intifadah" and the natural right of the Palestinian people to their own State.

The Report of the Director-General to this session of the Conference is a serious attempt to find answers to the most acute problems of social and economic development in the world, and this is creditable. I feel that the picture given by the Report is a correct one, although not entirely optimistic. We must agree that the social cost of world economic recovery gives reason for concern. However, we cannot accept the reasons given for the economic decline and the burden of foreign debt of the developing countries.

It seems to me that the main reason for growing poverty and the paradoxical fact that the developing countries today are net exporters of capital is a social one related to social inequality and exploitation, to protectionism and inequitable trade and to the economic diktat imposed on these countries. Is it not alarming that the measures for economic recovery of the developing countries which are prescribed by the International Monetary Fund most often lead to the ruin of these countries, that their debts today exceed 1.3 trillion dollars, and that one after the other, these countries are being crushed by this burden of debt?

This is why, throughout the world, a powerful movement is growing against the anti-popular and anti-social nature of foreign indebtedness. We support the just demands of the workers and peoples of the world, which show that today, more than ever, we need a new economic order. Such an order, however, can be created only if we put an end to the domination of the transnational corporations and to inequitable economic relations, and eliminate all forms of discrimination and exploitation.

There is no doubt that, as a result of a just social policy, we would find better solutions to the problems of employment in the developed capitalist countries, where in recent years unemployment has become a real nightmare for millions of people, whose fundamental right to work is flouted. We share the concern of the trade unions of these countries and support their demands that measures of economic recovery should go hand in hand with social progress. The god of the economy needs sacrifices, of course, but social progress is not the kind of sacrifice we should make to gain his mercy.

The Report of the Director-General states that the socialist countries are carrying out economic and social reforms aimed at strengthening long-term growth and achieving their stable integration in the world economy. Such a transformation is also being carried out in Bulgaria. In recent years, we have designed a new model for building socialism. It is radically different from the concept we had up to now of the development of the economy, economic management, forms ownership and the exercise of power. The core of this in-depth restructuring is the democratisation of the whole social system. Firstly, democratisation of ownership: In the future, together with state ownership and under the same conditions and in mutual competition, we will also develop co-operative, individual and mixed forms of ownership, as well as companies with foreign capital participation. Secondly, we will have a democratisation of power: companies, enterprises and their work collectives will fix their own growth objectives, organise production and distribute profits. Thus, real power will move downwards to the producers, and the State will gradually withdraw from management of the economy and will solve strategic development issues by enacting laws and regulations. Thus, on the one hand, we will strengthen the economic independence of enterprises in conditions of complete self-sufficiency and self-financing. On the other hand, there will be increased competition amongst them, which will give a new impetus to economic growth on the basis of interests.

We can definitely say that these changes have already breathed new life into the economy. Investment policy is aimed at renewal and restructuring of the economy. New technologies are being introduced very rapidly. Industrial, trade and agricultural enterprises operating on a privatised, lease-holding basis and joint-stock companies financed out of individual capital are especially active.

This progressive and democratic process, however, is by no means one-sided. It is completely overturning the centralised administration system of the economy, doing away with wage-levelling and creating conditions for the full application of a fundamental principle of socialism – to each according to his work. It is well-known that we have not had unemployment for decades in Bulgaria. However, we realise that the current reforms could lead to a certain destabilisation of employment. There are many reasons for this; I will just mention a few of them.

First of all, this is due, of course, to the introduction of new technologies in the national economy. It is well known that new technologies not only generate, but eliminate many jobs. While introducing new technologies we must take account of their social impact and neutralise their negative repercussions.

The second reason is the incentive of higher labour productivity. This factor stimulates economic growth, but it also reduces employment, since fewer jobs means higher profits.

The third reason is conversion. It is well-known that Bulgaria has carried out a significant unilateral reduction of its armed forces and military expenditure, and this also involves releasing and retraining many people.

These and other problems require greater attention to employment problems. There is no room for complacency here. Socialism's ability to guarantee full employment will happen by itself. The manpower shortage in the services, construction and agriculture is no guarantee that we will not have temporary unemployment. This is why the Government and the trade unions are designing special measures to ensure a flexible response, aimed at redirecting investment and retraining released workers and providing new jobs for them. This is an important social task, all the costs of which are borne by society. Of course, there are difficulties. We do not have enough experience. However, we in Bulgaria feel that economic growth will be all the more successful if the social problems of working people are properly solved.

The social needs are a priority in the activities of the Bulgarian trade unions. The latter exercise their right to initiate legislation and to propose and defend alternative programmes and solutions, and to carry out public supervision as regards issues relating to work, social security and the standard of living. In accordance with the Labour Code, in our country no one can take a decision or enact laws or regulations without the participation and agreement of the trade unions. Of course, the Bulgarian trade unions have never confined themselves to making demands. Their concern for production is equal to their concern for an equitable distribution of wealth.

We are on the eve of the hundredth anniversary of May Day, a day of solidarity among workers. During this century the world has changed, largely as a result of the struggle of working people to defend their interests. The international workers' movement has become the initiator of new social ideas, the driving force of social progress. This is certainly also due to the ILO. No one can imagine human society now without the positive role of the workers' movement and the trade unions.

Today, more than ever, we are justified in saying that the time is near when the natural state of the world will be peace, and its only ruler will be labour.

Mr. MALLIA MILANES (Employers' delegate, Malta) – Mr. President, I would like to add my congratulations to you on your election to the important position of President of this international Conference. I have no doubt that you will ably steer its proceedings to a successful conclusion.

The theme of this year's Report by the Director-General is "recovery and employment". While describing the net flow of capital from South to North as a "haemorrhage" which would only stop with a solution of the debt problem, he rightly reiterated that the ultimate goal of development is "the well-being of man". All the efforts of this Organisation and of its Members, whether governments, employers or workers, have to be directed towards this goal.

The Director-General felt the need to draw the attention of the Conference to the fundamental truth that "human beings are both the means and the end of economic development". Whenever and wherever this is forgotten, humanity is diminished. Our task is to see that this does not happen. We are helped in this by recent successes in the reduction of conflicts and the causes for them. Whilst peace is not breaking out all over, we do seem to be moving consistently towards the finding of lasting solutions. The world community should, in consequence, be able to concentrate on development and devote more of its resources to improving the human condition.

Progress in the political areas has not seen corresponding improvements in the economic and social fields. Indeed, the Director-General has painted a sombre picture of economic and social developments during the eighties. He stressed that "the resumption of growth and social progress cannot be attained without a serious effort of adjustment to new realities on the part of both industrialised and developing countries". Economic growth, employment creation and social progress are the mountains we have to climb during the nineties. Recent development give rise to the belief that the mountain crests are within our reach.

The attainment of these targets will require a great and conscious effort. The Director-General has reminded us that "the emphasis in the 1980s on macro-economic problems of adjustment, external balance and fiscal deficits has distracted attention from the social dimensions of development, including poverty alleviation strategies". In part, this may have been due to national policies, some of which, however, may have been devised because of the lack of global policies or of extraneous pressures. We must seek to avoid repeating the mistakes of the past and start thinking and acting in more global terms.

We support the Director-General's view that the right prescriptions call for an awareness of "the factors which influence need for structural adjustment and the differential capacity of countries to adjust". Not only does each continent have different problems, but there are even substantial differences within each continent. The emphasis everywhere must be on the attainment of achievable targets from which all sectors of the population benefit. Only if, at the end of the nineties, the divide between North and South lessens and the lot of all mankind improves, would we be able to show that we have learnt from past mistakes and, equally important, that we have thought and acted in global terms.

The importance of training and retraining policies is highlighted in the Director-General's Report. This is an area to which a small country like Malta, whose only resource is its manpower, has to devote particular attention. The past year or so has seen the creation of an auxiliary workers' training scheme which provides training and retraining to unemployed persons, whether skilled or unskilled. Under this scheme unemployed persons start receiving the national minimum wage, instead of unemployment benefit, and are given a skill which they actually put into practice. The running of the scheme is supervised by a nationally representative board of an essentially tripartite nature. Incentives have also been offered by the State to workers and to those signing up for work to set up their own businesses or to move from public sector to private sector employment. These are steps in the right direction which have already started to produce results.

Employers feel that the problem goes deeper. We need to know the likely requirements of the labour market over a certain period and to train and retrain men and women to cope with the more sophisticated jobs which the market is likely to produce. This need has been recognised by the Government, which is using technical assistance to conduct a manpower survey, to identify job requirements and then to provide training to people to take up these jobs. This is an approach which we feel would be suitable for other countries with similar levels of development to ours. None of us can afford underemployment or low productivity. Where structures exist, surveys of this nature are always useful, if only to establish a manpower base for development.

We, as employers, believe that employers and unions need to be associated with training at all levels. This reflects the value we put on social dialogue. We believe that economic growth and social progress can be advanced through such dialogue. We are in full agreement with the Director-General that "the more the social partners are involved in decision-making, the greater the chance of success". The chances of recovery and employment can only be improved through dialogue.

We believe in the value of social dialogue and are in favour of working hand-in-hand with government and unions in improving the lot of our country, ourselves and our workers. We seek to practise dialogue, while recognising that the existence of mostly small-sized predominantly family-owned enterprises may give rise to problems. In whatever we do, we seek to avoid the creation of obstacles in the way of the transfer of new and sophisticated technologies to our country. Such transfer is even more important in the light of the Government's declared intention of seeking membership of the European Community by the end of next year.

During the past 12 months, it has become clear to employers that industry required the freedom to employ female operatives on night work. This requirement is pressing for advanced technology industries and we have sought to convince the other social partners of the need for deregulation in this area. The Conference, this year, is currently reviewing the Night Work (Women) Convention (Revised), 1948 (No. 89). We favour its abolition. Night work, whether by males or females, is a condition of work which is as amenable to collective bargaining as any other condition of work.

Malta's lack of resources, other than its manpower, is partly offset by the existence of a cohesive society and basic structures which serve as a platform for growth and by the absence of an external debt-servicing problem.

Other countries are not as fortunate. Not only do they lack social and administrative structures but they are in thrall to heavy debt-servicing. Yet if the condition of their people is to improve, they have to break out of this limiting circle.

While such countries need material help, both bilateral and multilateral, what they require even more is the avoidance of policies which, while attractive at first sight, can be counterproductive where cohesive back-up structures do not exist. The writing on the wall is clear to all – each country must construct its own particular road to recovery and employment.

Mr. BAYART (Government delegate, Mongolia) – Mr. President, allow me to congratulate you on your unanimous election to the presidency of this session of the International Labour Conference. We are confident that under your experienced leadership and able guidance this session will reach effective and substantive conclusions. I should also like to extend our congratulations to the vice-presidents and other Officers on their well-deserved election.

May I take this opportunity to extend my delegation's warm welcome to Mr. Hansenne, who has been elected as the Director-General of the ILO, and assure him of our support in discharging his responsible duties. It also gives me pleasure to express our sincere thanks to Mr. Blanchard for the worthy contribution he has made as the head of this Organisation over the past 15 years.

This Conference is taking place in the year of the 70th anniversary of the International Labour Organisation. On this occasion, the Head of the Government of the Mongolian People's Republic has conveyed a message to this august assembly. With your permission, Mr. President, I will read it out.

To the participants of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference, Geneva:

On behalf of the Government of the Mongolian People's Republic and in my own name may I extend to the participants in this Conference sincere congratulations on the occasion of the 70th anniversary of the International Labour Organisation and best wishes for greater success in the work of the session.

I am pleased to recall that the International Labour Organisation, whose 70th anniversary is being observed, has played an important role in the effective development of international co-operation in social and labour spheres. The ILO over the past years has adopted numerous Conventions and Recommendations on fundamental rights in the field of labour, and has rendered technical assistance and counselled the member States in conducting their social and labour policy. The Government and working collective of the Mongolian People's Republic commend the contribution made by the Organisation to the improvement of the living standards of the working people around the world.

The improvement of the political climate in the world and the new thinking evolving in international relations positively influence the ILO activities and create favourable conditions for further enhancement of its effectiveness. Mongolia consistently favours the intensification of the Organisation's activities in conformity with the interests of all the groups concerned.

The Mongolian People's Republic supports the noble objectives of the ILO Constitution and, as a developing socialist country, will actively co-operate in expanding the Organisation's activities, especially in the field of technical co-operation.

I am convinced that this session, which is taking place in the year of the 70th anniversary of the ILO, will make its own contribution to strengthening universal peace and social justice.

(Signed) D. SODNOM,
*Chairman,
Council of Ministers, Mongolian People's Republic.*

The Report of the Director-General on recovery and employment deserves our appreciation. It gives a thorough analysis of the most acute socio-economic problems of the contemporary world and proposes a wide range of measures to overcome the present imbalances and dangerous social tensions in the world economy, while highlighting the creation of employment as a priority objective in development and adjustment policy.

The Report rightly emphasises the fundamental link between economic development and social progress and their complementarity. Indeed, without growth it is difficult to tackle the social problems. Therefore, the priority task is to re-establish a capacity for growth which can combat poverty and expand employment.

In this context my delegation shares the view of the Director-General that "growth – and more particularly, growth which creates employment and fights poverty – is a precondition for progress". In spite of the encouraging rate of growth of the world economy, many of the developing countries are still facing severe problems of famine and poverty, underdevelopment, unemployment, external indebtedness, pollution and environmental degradation.

My delegation fully supports the view that economic growth, the creation of employment, the solution of the debt problem, the promotion of international trade can be achieved only on the basis of a global approach. Adjustments will be required not only in national economic policies, but also in international economic relations, since the two are interdependent. Thus, the ever-increasing external indebtedness which constitutes one of the most urgent problems for developing countries can be settled only through united efforts at the global level. In this context, may I express our appreciation to those countries which have declared their willingness to decree a moratorium on the servicing of the debt or to cancel it entirely for some developing countries.

My delegation favours the proposal that the ideas contained in the Report should be seen as a part of the ILO's contribution to the process of elaboration of the Strategy for the United Nations Fourth Development Decade. The ILO has an important role to play in ensuring that social ideals are placed on an equal footing with economic and other ideals, in placing the human being at the centre of development.

Among other programmes referred to in the Report, I wish to single out the issues of conservation and restoration of the environment as an immense task that must be undertaken without delay. We are convinced that the ILO can contribute to the efforts being made by the international community to ensure environmental protection and that the current session will make its contribution in this direction by adopting an appropriate resolution.

The Mongolian delegation welcomes the idea of launching an appeal to use the savings realised from disarmament in financing concrete activities at the regional or sub-regional level, many of which could be devoted to the conservation of the environment.

Taking this opportunity, I would like to inform this Conference that my Government has recently taken the decision to reduce the numerical strength of our country's armed forces by 13,000 in 1989-90 and to convert 1,000 transport vehicles and 90 tracked and armoured vehicles for civilian use.

It is gratifying to note that the programme and budget proposals for 1990-91 were adopted unanimously by the Governing Body. The Government of my country appreciates this fact and fully endorses the programme proposals and budget estimates.

The point which I would like to highlight here is the skill and competence with which the Director-General and his staff have managed to reflect the major concerns of our time and the interests of all groups of member States and to take our discussions on the Medium-Term Plan held here a year ago fully into account.

At present one of the important aspects of the ILO's activities is the strengthening of its regional dimension. I am pleased to express our support for the priority objectives outlined in paragraph 270(1) for strengthening the link between technical co-operation and international standards. My Government is keenly interested in expanding its co-operation with the countries of the region and in participating fully in the activities of the ILO's Asian regional office.

In the light of our discussions I would like to say a few words about the measures which have been undertaken in the field of socio-economic development in my country.

Today, in Mongolia, an intensive process of socio-economic renewal is underway. One of its main objectives is to increase the efficiency of production by making fundamental changes in the field of economic management, planning and distribution, expanding the rights and financial independence of enterprises and developing the initiatives of self-reliance of working collectives. The Law on State Enterprises which was adopted last year envisages the wide application of various new methods of economic management.

The draft law on co-operatives which has been elaborated is now being submitted for nation-wide consideration. I am pleased to note that the ILO has provided us with valuable assistance by sending a consultant to Mongolia. We hope that our co-operation will be further developed, in particular in the field of co-operative education, vocational training, skills development and occupational safety and health.

The right to self-determination for all people is an inalienable right which is enshrined in the United Nations Charter and the International Bill of Human Rights. Yet despite its general acceptance millions of people are deprived of this right, particularly the peoples of Palestine, South Africa and Namibia. I would like to reiterate my Government's strong condemnation of the apartheid regime in South Africa and denunciation of the deplorable situation of the population in the occupied Arab territories.

Original – French: Mr. JOUEN (representative of the International Federation of Free Teachers' Unions) – Mr. President, on behalf of the International Federation of Free Teachers' Unions I would like to congratulate you on your election to the presidency of this general Conference.

This year, the Director-General's Report is devoted to economic recovery and employment. A relevant theme, if ever there was one, and a report of a very high standard.

A majority of countries, be they industrialised or developing countries, are facing serious economic problem with obvious social consequences.

A report of a high standard because it tackles the problems in a positive manner and devotes a large section to possible strategies to be implemented for the promotion of the sort of economic recovery which would bring about job creation.

The proposals made in the Report are a step in the right direction. They encourage governments, employers and workers to favour the adoption of macro and microeconomic provisions to bring about economic recovery; in other words, employment. For these reasons, my international organisation supports the conclusions of the Report.

The economic situation of many countries throughout the world today is, of course, having serious social consequences which are particularly apparent in the professional sector we deal with: education, vocational training, research and culture.

For our colleagues in the indebted developing countries the situation is much more serious. It is not an exaggeration to say that what we are seeing today is in fact a pauperisation of the teaching profession, at the very moment when the representatives of this profession are expected to be making exceptional efforts to innovate and to participate more in education and vocational training programmes for young people with a view to contributing to the economic recovery effort which is of focal concern in the Report of the Director-General.

There can be no economic recovery without appropriate trade liberalisation, exchange rate and investment policies. But it is also going to require an outstanding effort at injecting vitality into the workforce.

Yet it is precisely those who are in charge of revitalising the workforce, our colleagues, members of the teaching and training profession, who are seeing their social and professional status going steadily downhill. There is a very large gap between what our societies expect of the members of the teaching and training professions and what these same societies are prepared to give them.

The recent decision taken by the Governing Body of the ILO, following a proposal made by our organisation, the ICFTU, and the Workers' group, to organise, in 1991, a joint meeting on the status of teachers and to establish the principle of regular tripartite technical meetings, appears to be a response, a little late in the day perhaps, but none the less a realistic response, intended to restore dignity to a professional sector which could play a decisive role in the economic recovery of our countries.

This session of the Conference also has before it a report from the Fifth Session of the Joint ILO-UNESCO Committee of Experts on the Application of the Recommendation concerning the Status of Teachers.

The information contained in this report is of the greatest interest. But it is still not a realistic reflection of circumstances since the work is based only on the responses of governments. We would like to reiterate our wish for the ILO to find an original means, based on the principles of tripartism, of allowing the Committee of Experts to carry out direct consultations, in particular with international trade union organisations representing members of the teaching profession.

The report of the Joint ILO-UNESCO Committee of Experts suggested a number of specific measures to be taken (translating the Recommendation into the various national languages, organising seminars, and so forth) with a view to promoting the implementation of the Recommendation. These are all useful measures and will indeed contribute to a more widespread implementation of the Recommendation. But this must not hide the fact that the difficulties encountered in bringing about a wider implementation of the Recommendation are also relative to the fact that all too often teachers' unions are denied full enjoyment of trade union rights and the right to strike in particular, and the practice of collective bargaining as provided for in the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) and the Labour Relations (Public Services) Convention, 1978 (No. 151) of the ILO.

Thus, before there can be a better implementation of this Recommendation, we must ensure the full implementation of these Conventions to the members of the teaching profession.

What is provided for within the framework of this ILO-UNESCO Recommendation is useful and helpful and should be pursued, but what is being done at the moment does not provide maximum safeguards in terms of protecting and promoting appropriate employment and working conditions for teachers. The Joint ILO-UNESCO Committee of Experts is aware of the fact that this Recommendation is not legally binding upon governments and as such can only be an instrument of a promotional nature.

This is the reason why, considering that our professional sector today represents over 40 million workers throughout the world, considering that improved status for teachers is likely to promote greater teaching efficiency and consequently allow for better integration of young people into economic and social life, we think that the time has come to give serious thought to an ILO Convention to supplement the Recommendation which already exists. As part of this exercise, the ILO would be well advised to agree here and now on the idea of a global review of already existing standards which apply to teachers or which could be made to apply to teachers.

On the subject of trade union rights, although the situation is still worrying and at times a cause for serious concern in many countries, and that includes the industrialised countries such as Great Britain where collective bargaining rights are ridiculed, such as the Federal Republic of Germany where Berufs Verbote is still applied and where teachers are ill at ease if they go on strike, such as Japan where teachers are still denied the right to strike. Positive developments have taken place over the last few months in Poland and Hungary, developments which will need to grow and consolidate themselves to be credible.

All too often there is a tendency to forget that economic development can only really properly get off the ground in a general context of political and trade union freedom.

Before I close, I would like to thank the Director-General and his staff for the very open and interested attitude he has shown with regard to the issues affecting public sector employees in general, and people working in the education and vocational training sector in particular. The meeting we had with him on 2 June, together with the other ICFTU international trade secretariats, augurs well for further fruitful co-operation.

I would also like to thank the Workers' Education Department in particular for the understanding they have always shown us and for their contribution towards improving the trade union training of a number of the leaders of our affiliated trade union organisations.

Original - Russian: Mr. YANAIEV (Workers' delegate, USSR) - The Report of the Director-General of the ILO, which is before us for consideration, is of exceptional interest, deserving our closest attention. Not only does the subject of the Report show that the International Labour Organisation has really placed the burning issue of employment at the forefront of its efforts, but the content of the Report, the analysis of the world economic situation, shows the realism and objectivity of the ILO's approach to this question and the search for solutions to structural and unemployment problems, foreign debt and poverty, which weigh so heavily on much of humanity today.

We are also pleased to note that central to the Report is the notion that questions of structural change must go hand in hand with social justice, that economic and social progress are closely linked. In this connection there can be no quarrel with the Report's conclusion that priority in the allocation of government resources must be carefully determined and social funds must be targeted on the needs of the poorest sector and provide for systematic financing of social institutions.

The problems of poverty, unemployment and foreign debt in developing countries, addressed in the Report, are vitally important. On their solution depends much, if not all, of normal economic development, wellbeing of workers and provision of social justice in the future. However, merely to define the problems is not enough. We must find specific means of solving them and develop constructive programmes to find a way out of the current situation.

For example, much attention is paid in the Report to the foreign debt of developing countries, with the admirable observation that while the current problem of indebtedness remains unsolved, there will be a constant and growing danger of world collapse leading to internal and external tension, with serious consequences now and in the future. On the other hand, we find no mention in the Report of the reasons for such an alarming situation. Reference is made only to the protectionist policies of certain industrialised countries. Surely the ILO could roundly denounce the disastrous policies of such major international financial institutions as the International Monetary Fund and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, among others? The heavy conditions that they dictate have made, and will continue to make, the debt problem far more acute, increasing the disproportion and worsening of social conditions in most developing countries.

The Report gives similar treatment to the means of solving the debt problem. It takes refuge in generalisations about solidarity on the part of the richest countries or about indebted countries needing a breathing space in order to improve their economic position. There is even the suggestion of a modern version of the Marshall Plan.

We see here a recurrence of the ILO's old disease, namely a tendency to go for half measures, taking into account the experience of only one of the world's social systems.

I should like to recall the constructive proposals made by the Soviet leader Mr. Gorbachev at the last session of the United Nations General Assembly, which shows a realistic, practical approach to a radical solution of the problem. A lengthy moratorium, up to 100 years if necessary, should be imposed on debt repayment by the least developed countries. In some cases it should be completely written off. The appeal of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development concerning reducing indebtedness to commercial banks should be upheld; and a specialised international institution should be established to buy up debts at reduced rates, etc.

The Report is also far too timid in discussing the possibility of solving the problem by cutting down expenditure on arms and solving regional conflicts. Yet there is no good reason why the ILO should not carefully study and implement proposals drawn up by various international and regional trade union bodies. According to calculations carried out by UNICEF, a mere 10 per cent reduction in world armaments expenditure would suffice to wipe out completely the burden of foreign debt for over 20 Latin American countries. The trade unions have held a number of major conferences on this theme, providing the ILO with a wide range of conclusions for study and implementation. It would be particularly appropriate for an organisation like the ILO to lend its full support to the idea of convening a world trade union conference on this important topic in the near future.

The second matter of global application dealt with extensively in the Report is the question of employment, unemployment and poverty.

It has to be said that the unemployment situation in the world is becoming catastrophic. While developed countries with market economies have over 30 million unemployed, Western economists estimate that developing countries are suffering a rate of 40-50 per cent unemployment or underemployment.

The Report rightly points out that the unemployment level in many industrialised countries is the highest since the Second World War. We have no hesitation in agreeing with the Director-General's conclusion that we must redouble our efforts to find a way out of this, the gravest economic and social crisis confronting the world in recent years, without jeopardising the principles of social justice and the aims of social progress.

It is particularly characteristic of unemployment nowadays that it is growing more and more international. The blame for this lies with the transnational corporations, which effectively monopolise all scientific and technological achievements. By developing production in countries or regions which can provide the cheapest workforce, they bring about mass migrations of workers, make the problem of exporting unemployment more acute and intensify the different levels of unemployment in various countries.

It is this policy of the transnational corporations, though they are hardly mentioned in the Report, which leads to division among workers and the emergence of an elite, leading to highly paid, well-qualified specialists, on the one hand, and the broad mass of workers engaged in unskilled labour, or so-called "social" and temporary employment, on the other.

It should be said that, in contrast with previous years, when ILO documents dealing with employment often tended to disperse resources and efforts on second-rate, unimportant projects with no serious bearing on resolving this burning issue, the present Report contains a realistic, objective assessment of national and international factors affecting the problem and indicates a wide range of directions in the search for an equitable solution of unemployment and poverty.

It is regrettable, however, that while it gives a correct assessment of the role of economic and social organisation in the USSR and other socialist countries, and its influence on world economic development, the Report draws very little on the accumulated experience of these countries in achieving full employment.

In my view, a fundamental document such as this, which aims to find a solution to the problem, should not restrict itself to stating that the economic and social reforms in the Eastern European countries "will probably enhance their longer-run capacity to grow but is at present affecting labour stability and working conditions".

The crisis in the world of labour requires that the ILO should analyse and take into account the experience of countries with varying social systems in order to develop objective, wide-ranging action and take specific measures towards working out a global policy of full employment.

The experience of our country and others of the socialist partnership indicates that the essential element in solving the employment problem is to create the requisite jobs on the basis of a balanced development of the economy and modernising and reorganising undertakings with an eye to the manpower available. We are convinced that the right to work, to choose one's profession or occupation, guaranteed by the USSR Constitution, together with the right to professional training, will always remain unaltered. These rights are guaranteed by the socialist economic system, by the steady planned growth of the economy, by free education in any chosen field or speciality and by the fullest opportunities for further qualifications.

The best guarantee of employment lies in active participation by workers themselves, work collectives, and trade union bodies in discussing and shaping economic and social development plans, as well as the right to direct participation and control in matters of engaging and dismissing workers, planning and distributing the incomes of the undertakings and all savings, production and social development funds.

At the same time Soviet trade unions are fully aware that such guarantees must be underpinned by specific measures. Reorganisation – perestroika – is under way in our country, economic growth is speeding up through a reorganisation and reconstruction of production, the introduction of new technology and the growth of productivity.

All this brings in its wake new problems for the trade unions, who are called upon to play an important role in social re-education in society. The XVIII Trade Union Congress concluded that the prime task of the trade unions would be to tackle social problems directly. This is a new departure in our activity and in this connection we are currently considering the whole future course of our work.

The employment problem is naturally a matter of concern to trade unions throughout the world, as they become an increasingly powerful and authoritative force in carrying out socially oriented policies and protecting the basic interests of the workers. We can confidently say that only with the active participation of trade unions can a truly equitable situation of this "contemporary challenge" be worked out.

It was a hundred years ago that working people first made themselves felt as a powerful organisation force. The day of international solidarity, 1 May, declared by the First International Socialist Congress, is still the symbol of unity among working people throughout the world in their struggle for their essential needs, social progress and peace. Now that the International Labour Organisation is celebrating its own 70th anniversary it must acknowledge and understand that trade unions express the fundamental interests of working people and help them to unite all sectors of workers in solving the major problems facing the world: to attain full employment, wellbeing and peace.

There can be no doubt that many major programmes in the social sphere can only be carried out in an atmosphere of peace and a slowing down of the arms race. The ILO, working within its frame of reference, should make its own weighty contribution to the development of international co-operation in this area.

The Report rightly points out that measures taken over the recent period with regard to solving regional conflicts give every ground for hope that the process will continue and gather speed, with the result that large, medium or small Powers will refuse to waste resources on the often over-estimated requirements of their defence.

We can, indeed, go along with the author of the Report when he says that the time has come for member States of the United Nations and its specialised agencies to come together in joint financing from the resources saved through disarmament to introduce wide-ranging measures to combat unemployment, poverty and the other ills of contemporary society which weigh heavily on the shoulders of working people.

Original – Arabic: Mr. ELAMAWY (Workers' delegate, Egypt) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! On my own behalf and that of the workers of Egypt, I should like to congratulate you, Mr. President, on your brilliant election to high office at the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. As Africans, this election fills us with pride and it is a clear demonstration of the extent to which the African continent supports peace, social justice and freedom throughout the world, those noble objectives which the ILO pursues. Your experience and wisdom augur well for the future of our work and the achievement of our objectives.

I should also like to congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne, the new Director-General of the International Labour Office, on his election to this responsible position at the head of the executive body of this Organisation; we wish him every success in accomplishing his new task.

The Organisation has many serious responsibilities because of its specific structure and also because of the hopes which are vested in it, particularly by the developing countries. I should like to assure the Director-General of the full co-operation of the Egyptian workers and all those who share the ILO's objectives with a view to their realisation.

I should also like to pay tribute to the positive co-operation between the ILO and the Egyptian Trade Union Federation, in particular in the field of workers' education, as well as in the collection and distribution of information and statistics on workers. We hope that this co-operation will continue and grow in various fields of common interest.

We feel that it is a good omen that the mandate of the new Director-General coincides with the 70th anniversary of the International Labour Organisation. Ever since its inception, in 1919, this Organisation has demonstrated that it can effectively work to strengthen human rights and ensure social well-being based on economic progress. We cannot but note the continued increase in economic problems and crises throughout the world, particularly in developing countries. It is going to require more imagination and effort to mobilise all our resources to increase the contribution our Organisation can make towards a solution of these problems.

I belong to a developing country, which for 25 years now has been calling for reform in the structure of the International Labour Organisation, a reform which would make it possible for the ILO better to represent various social and economic interests, to be more democratic in its activities and decision-making and to cope with the developments and challenges confronting countries throughout the world today.

I would like to appeal to all member States, particularly the major industrial Powers, and above all those who have not yet ratified the Instrument of Amendment to the Constitution of the Organisation adopted by the General Conference in 1986, to do so without delay, in order that these amendments may become effective.

We read the Report of the Director-General, Recovery and employment, with the greatest interest. The theme is highly relevant and topical. The Report contains a realistic and objective analysis of the world economic situation, its developments and their social consequences. It also suggests a number of effective policies which will help to promote development and social progress in the Third World.

We fully support the view of the factual situation and the essential points set forth in the Report, in particular the following: progress and development in the world demand concerted action by both advanced and developing countries, all the more so as most developing countries are still labouring under a heavy burden of external debt and have become net exporters of capital despite the fact that they are poor and in dire need of liquid assets to promote their development. Economic development cannot be carried out to the detriment of the working classes and the low-income groups. Although reconciling economic and social requirements is not easy, it is not impossible if there is sincere and constructive dialogue between the social partners. Rational use of resources is the only means of ensuring development in the Third World countries. Protection of basic human rights also contributes substantially to economic progress.

The Report sets out a number of effective and positive measures to promote economic progress, under what it refers to as the "adjustment programme". Although we approve of the general measures proposed, we do not agree with the arrangements for the implementation of some of them. The Report calls for "trade liberalisation" and "the phasing out or privatisation of loss-making state enterprises". In our opinion this policy cannot be applied across the board because of the social and economic differences between the developing countries. In Egypt, for example, we resort to a number of protectionist measures to limit imports of luxury goods and to protect infant domestic industries. Public enterprises are a pillar of development and have a very specific role to perform in the social context. Therefore we cannot eliminate them just because they happen to be in difficulties. On the contrary, we try to take remedial measures to address the causes of these losses and to enable these public enterprises to continue to survive and contribute as they should to the socio-economic equilibrium of society. Secondly, the Report calls for policies which will reduce consumption so as to reduce internal demand, by means of "credit restriction" and "tighter monetary and fiscal policy". As we see it, the only objective which such policies can achieve is recession and further stagflation and still higher levels of unemployment. Thirdly, the Director-General's Report claims that "theoretically, the free interplay between supply and demand should pave the way to optimal economic development". Therefore the Report recommends that "there should be minimal interference with the functioning of economic forces". We are convinced that the free interplay of market forces can promote the economic progress of the developed countries, but that in the developing countries, economic progress can come about only by means of government measures and policies aimed at modifying the structures of production and creating the necessary basic infrastructure. Appropriate state policies can reconcile economic and social considerations, which is one of the ILO's principal objectives.

Notwithstanding what I have just said, we feel that this Report is very positive in many respects and that it is an excellent way of reminding the international community of the need to attach priority importance to "the social aspects of adjustment policies". It also reflects the important role which our Organisation is to play in the United Nations Fourth Development Decade.

We read with regret Appendix III of the Director-General's Report which is devoted to the findings of the ILO mission to Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories. The mission has been going into the field for the past ten years to take stock of the situation, and we thank the Office for its work.

The report shows that the economic and social conditions of Arab workers in the occupied territories have deteriorated since the beginning of the "intifadah", the heroic uprising of the Palestinian people against the occupying forces in an attempt to end the Israeli occupation and to ensure that the Palestinian people can exercise their legitimate right to self-determination and control over their own territory.

The findings of this mission sent by the ILO confirm what we read every day in the media about the tragic fate of the Palestinian workers and people in the occupied territories.

This report and the information it contains have strengthened our conviction and I suspect the conviction of all thinking people that the fundamental rights and freedoms of man in the labour field – as the Conference has been able to witness over many years – cannot be respected in a context of occupation and repression. And these rights are part and parcel of civil liberties.

We therefore believe that it is not enough for the ILO to adopt reports and resolutions and try to improve the working and living conditions of the Arab workers in the occupied territories of the West Bank, Gaza and the Golan. It is absolutely vital now that international pressure be exerted to relieve Israeli pressure in the occupied territories and to allow the Palestinian people to exercise their legitimate right to set up a Palestinian State on their territory, a State which would have for its capital Jerusalem. The Palestinian people must be allowed to live in freedom and dignity.

Recent developments on the international scene, which have demonstrated the intention of the PLO to work for peace based on dialogue, justice and right, must sooner or later meet with a favourable response within the International Labour Organisation and prompt the ILO to step up its activities in favour of peace so that the peoples in the region can at last devote themselves to construction, development and stability after so many years of war and destruction.

It goes without saying that we lend our full support to the efforts made by the ILO to condemn the flagrant violations of human rights and the apartheid policy perpetrated by racist South Africa, whereby a White minority is imposing itself on a Black majority in South Africa and Namibia.

We would also like to say how pleased we are that an agreement has been reached in the United Nations on the need to implement Security Council resolution 435 on the independence of Namibia. We must continue to give our unrestricted support to the struggle of the people and workers of South Africa and Namibia. We must maintain international pressure on the racist regime and eliminate apartheid, which is a slur on humanity, in order that Namibia can accede to independence.

Original – Spanish: Mr. MENESES FONSECA (Minister of Labour, Nicaragua) – I would like, first of all, to congratulate you on your election as President of this 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. I wish to endorse the words of previous speakers who have praised your qualities and have reaffirmed their trust in our success under your guidance.

I would also like to avail myself of this opportunity to welcome Mr. Michel Hansenne, the new Director-

General, who was appointed to this lofty post by the Governing Body in February of this year. Aware as we are of his sterling qualities and of his successful career, we know that he will confront energetically the vast and arduous tasks that await him.

The work carried out by Mr. Francis Blanchard deserves special mention. He devoted many years of his life to this Organisation and over the past 15 years, as Director-General, he overcame many obstacles and difficulties in a masterly fashion and secured the smooth operation of this body. We would like to express our recognition of his efforts.

We are celebrating the 70th anniversary of the founding of our Organisation, at a period in history when there are great upheavals in the world of labour, when peoples are struggling against an acute economic crisis and are confronting forces and interests that do not recognise their just aspirations.

Thanks to their sacrifices and efforts, the polarisation of the world, as it was in the past, has now given way to a new perspective. We have finally come to understand that the earth is the home of man and must therefore be protected at all costs.

The first great challenge facing us at the end of this decade is to ensure that there is peace, so that we can confront all the social, political and economic problems that now beset us.

Undoubtedly, there are still very powerful forces and interests that try to put a spoke in the wheel of our advances towards a firm and lasting world peace. However, initiatives in the field of disarmament and attempts at dialogue to reduce sources of tension at the regional level are an encouraging sign and truly represent the wishes and legitimate aspirations of all peoples.

In addition to these efforts, we must tackle with equal energy the economic problem and the still unbalanced relationships in international trade. Even if we only glance at the figures in the Director-General's Report, we can see that the situation in the Third World countries has not improved in this decade; in fact, it has considerably worsened.

Our countries have had to confront a further deterioration in terms of trade, with the obvious repercussions this has had on our economies; consequently, the depressed prices of our products has wiped out any additional resources we might have gained from the increase in our expansion of exports in some areas.

The foreign debt has reached such a level that we must take firm steps to redress the situation because, as every day goes by, it becomes more impossible to discharge this debt; as a result the social debt is growing in our countries.

From 1960 to 1980, the number of inhabitants in Africa and Latin America living in poverty dropped from 51 per cent to 31 per cent; however, in the middle of this decade it had grown to 39 per cent according to the official figures of the World Bank.

There has been a dramatic increase in the real interest rates in our indebted countries. They increased sixfold between 1979-1981 and 1980-1983, and this tendency has prevailed throughout the decade. Thus, with reference particularly to Latin American countries, we have become net exporters of capital – and this has disastrous implications on the domestic front.

We are experiencing higher global unemployment and extended urban underemployment, along with a dramatic drop in the real salaries of millions of workers. Our rate of investment, and thus the productive capacity of our national economies, has shrunk considerably, alongside a flagrant deterioration in our level of overall growth. To this we must add an acceleration of inflation and a regressive tendency in the distribution of income.

However, there is another side to the coin; the developed countries that benefit directly from our disadvantages in trade have managed to reverse the trend towards recession which prevailed in the first years of the decade. They have even reached positions of self-sufficiency which, every year, increase the gap between them and the developing countries, as protectionist trends have brought benefits to their economies with deplorable repercussions for the Third World.

In addition to these external factors, there are also internal inequalities; incomes are unfairly distributed and minorities appropriate most of the social wealth, thus denying the rest of society any right to well-being and economic stability.

Consequently, structural readjustment policies which have failed to take social costs into consideration have resulted in a resurgence of the crisis and brought an even greater deterioration in the living standards of our populations in Latin America and in the rest of the Third World. When we talk about dialogue and the participation of the less advantaged sectors within the context of our adjustment policies, this should not be impelled exclusively by a desire to have the workers moderate their claims and put up with a social system and a national and international economic order that has historically denied them their rights and aspirations. The workers in Latin America and in the Third World are not prepared to undergo any more sacrifices to prop up a structural situation in which they have always had the worst share.

The Ministers of Labour of Central America and Panama, who met in Antigua, Guatemala, in April of this year, drew up a statement on the social debt, in which they asserted that the increase in this debt could not be checked with more economic theories but that we had to address directly the structural causes that gave rise to it in the first place.

This perspective is intimately linked to the problem of economic growth and employment and requires a set of conditions and substantial changes, without which neither will be possible.

There cannot be any economic growth unless: there is a radical change in the present conditions of trade; the basic aspects of the international economic order are transformed; our countries are given a genuine opportunity to develop; and there is not a drastically new approach towards the transfer of technology which has turned the Third World into a sort of garbage can for obsolete technology. The use of new technology should not merely be designed to increase capital, denying basic rights such as the right to participate in the development of society and the right to work. Technological development shows, once and for all, that it is not the privilege of minorities but rather the heritage of mankind.

Logically, structural modifications of the international economy should be accompanied by profound changes within our societies, putting an end to the inequalities and social injustice and breaking the continuity of historical patterns of domination and exploitation which bring only misery and social tension.

The time has come to review the standards of economic relations. We do not share the opinion that the solution of the crisis lies in fully exploiting the potential of free trade and competitiveness. We believe that we must promote relationships between States and among men on the basis of solidarity and co-operation. The solution to the crisis cannot be a further extension of the conditions that have caused it.

Nicaragua has not been spared by the effects of the world economic situation. In our case, unfortunately, other factors have made it even worse.

The conditions prevailing before June 1979, characterised by a profound social inequality and much injustice, sharpened our people's awareness of a need for change in the structural situation. This resulted in a revolution which is now ten years old, and which, from the very moment it came to power, had to confront regressive forces which object, in an intransigent fashion, to any new relationships between men anywhere in the world.

In the pursuit of our objectives, we have not only had to confront problems arising out of international economic imbalances, the deterioration of the terms of trade, technological backwardness and foreign indebtedness, but also to withstand aggression at every level. Military aggression, through mercenary forces, economic and financial blockade, attempts to isolate us in international fora through pressure on regional governments and the permanent threat of direct intervention – are all expressions of this will to block at any cost the construction and consolidation of a new society in Nicaragua.

This aggression began in the 1960s in Latin America, against the heroic people of Cuba whose successful resistance has been an example to humanity.

Despite all these obstacles, we in Nicaragua have managed to advance and succeed in an unprecedented fashion.

We have installed an agrarian reform that has directly benefited 123,000 peasant families.

We have created conditions for the development of labour claims and freedom of association to such an extent that there were more than 1,300 trade unions in 1989. There is trade union pluralism in our country, evidenced by the fact that there are trade union federations with clearly distinct political and ideological options. As regards collective bargaining, 1,400 collective conventions have been signed in the ten years since the revolution, as opposed to 122 in 40 years of dictatorship.

We have also scored successes in the field of health, education and housing. However, these victories of our people have been seriously affected over the last few years, on account of two reasons: the economic and material consequences of the war of resistance against the aggressor and the international economic crisis.

To avoid a further deterioration of our economy, we have been carrying out a set of measures of economic reform since February 1988 to bring our levels of national production back to earlier levels, reduce public costs, orient labour towards priority sectors in the economy and to maintain a vital minimum in basic services.

Although we have to suppress some subsidies, the Government has taken compensatory measures.

Our Government's response to the war options before it has been to combat this option by trying to find concerted solutions. We continue to hold out the olive branch of peace and political negotiations as a civilised alternative, as a civilised way for a nation to solve its problems, with the convictions of our people remain unchanged and that this form of struggle is a purification; if we were able to defend freedom with a gun in our hands, we are able to do so with civic voting.

We condemn and reject any attempt to interfere in the internal affairs of the Panamanian people. Consistent with the elementary principles of the revolution, we are, and remain, in solidarity with the cause of the Palestinian people whose courage and heroism have surprised the world in the last few months as they have struggled in difficult conditions.

We support the struggle against apartheid only which survives because of the covert complicity of the great Powers.

We join with the cause of indigenous peoples to obtain a clear recognition of their legitimate claims to cultural identity and absolute human respect. We wish to convey to them, through our indigenous representative, member of the Government delegation of Nicaragua and spokesman of our country in the Committee on Convention No. 107, our total support for the revision of this Convention and the total suppression of the colonial residues which contaminate it.

Ten years after the triumph of the revolution, the Government of Nicaragua wishes to ratify the aspirations to peace of our people and the use of dialogue as a civilised instrument to resolve differences between men and States. We hope that the last decade of the 20th century will witness the realisation of the fondest dreams and hopes of man: peaceful coexistence, solidarity, harmony and social well-being.

Original - Russian: Mr. ALENCHUK (Employers' delegate, Byelorussian SSR) - Mr. President, first of all I would like to associate myself with the congratulations addressed to you and to the Vice-Presidents on your election to these high offices at our Conference. I am convinced that under your guidance we will succeed, in a spirit of mutual understanding and constructive dialogue, in achieving practical results in the interests of developing extensive international co-operation in the social and labour field.

This 76th Session of the International Labour Conference not only coincides with an important anniversary, but also takes place at a crucial time, a time of developing and extending political dialogue, during which a common search has begun for solutions to contemporary problems and the foundations are being laid for new inter-State relations.

I believe that against this political background, now that the need for change is strongly felt in the world, the time is ripe to give a new impetus to the development of international co-operation, including those areas which fall directly within the competence of our organisation.

Realising that today's world, although made up of contradictions, is nevertheless a single interdependent organism in many respects, we must face the fact that it is only by joint efforts that the countries of the world will succeed in overcoming negative trends in the development of the world economy, characterised by the aggravation of social and economic problems, a high unemployment rate, poverty, an unbalanced trade and monetary system, the debt crisis and other negative phenomena eloquently depicted in the Report of the Director-General, Recovery and employment.

Viewing the Report in a positive light, I should like to point out that employment issues are analysed in relation to the numerous contemporary problems, laying a firm foundation for constructive dialogue and setting out guide-lines for the future activities of the Organisation.

In our view, an important aspect of the Report touches on the role of new technologies as a means of raising productivity, which can ensure that profits are achieved and increased while enabling new capital investment to be made and jobs to be created in other sectors.

It is well-known that major changes are under way in our country, with a view to achieving a complete renewal of our society. A radical economic reform is being carried out, a process of democratisation has begun, and workers and all sectors of the population are taking a more active role in society.

As the director of a major production association, I should like to give an account of how some of these issues are being addressed under the new conditions in our country. Our production association has begun to introduce cost-accounting, and to convert to self-financing and self-sufficiency. This will provide an incentive for workers to utilise resources effectively, while involving them more closely in management.

One of the major social problems in our production association, and one which calls for an urgent solution, is the housing problem. In the exercise of the new rights granted to us by the Act on the state enterprise (association), and together with the trade unions and the work collective council, we have examined the social development plans for the association, and have significantly increased allocations to housing construction, with the aim of solving the housing problem by the end of 1995. In this connection, I should like to point out that we already have no shortage of places in kindergartens, out-patient clinics and holiday homes.

In the context of rapid scientific and technological progress, the introduction of advanced technologies, and the operation of a new system of management, the number of workers who are released and offered new jobs is increasing. If a worker needs to acquire a new occupational skill, once the contract of employment has been concluded he may undergo vocational retraining, either full-time or while continuing to work.

Equally important are the systematic measures carried out, which includes training and further training for managerial personnel, manual workers and engineering and technical personnel.

The main forms of further training for manual workers are special-purpose courses, instruction in advanced working methods and processes, courses for brigade leaders which they may attend while continuing to work, and instruction provided in industrial training facilities and scientific and technological information centres.

Matters relating to the improvement of cost-accounting, work organisation, occupational safety and health, and staff training are discussed at the production association level with the participation of all the interested parties.

These, briefly speaking, are the activities of an industrial enterprise under the economic reform now under way in our country.

We attach a great deal of importance to participation in international co-operation in the social, economic, scientific and technological fields, as the Soviet leader, Mr. M.S. Gorbachov said in his address to the United Nations on 7 December 1988. In the Byelorussian SSR, the restructuring of the system of management of the economy also includes the development of foreign economic relations by the following means: the setting up of foreign trade organisations and companies; the development of direct contacts between domestic and foreign enterprises; the setting up of joint ventures with foreign companies; participation in international programmes for conservation of the environment; the development of tourism, and the organisation of international exhibitions and symposiums on a commercial basis.

In describing the progress achieved in this area, I shall confine myself to pointing out that our Republic currently sells its products to over 100 countries; ninety enterprises have established direct contacts with foreign companies in 50 different countries; and the Byelorusintorg foreign trade association established contacts with 150 foreign companies in 40 countries in the past year. Trade with these companies amounts to over 1,000 different items.

In addition, joint ventures with the participation of foreign companies have recently begun to operate in the Byelorussian SSR in the fields of powder metallurgy, research and design and footwear manufacturing. New negotiations are now under way.

I should like to conclude my statement by expressing the hope that the current session of the Conference will inaugurate a new era in the activities of the ILO, with the aim of establishing stable and extensive economic relations in the interests of all States, which is one of the purposes of our Organisation.

Original – Arabic: The PRESIDENT (Mr. GAZARIN) – We shall now continue our discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Original – Portuguese: Mr. BRITO GOMEZ (Minister of Health, Labour and Social Affairs, Cape Verde) – Allow me first of all to express, on behalf of my delegation and on my own behalf, very warm congratulations to the President upon his election to the presidency of this 76th Session of the International Labour Conference.

I should like to take this opportunity to pay a well-deserved tribute to Mr. Blanchard for his enormous accomplishments within our Organisation and to welcome Mr. Hansenne, reiterating his hope that he will do “as well as his predecessor”.

The Director-General could not use a better term than “recovery and employment” in the case of Cape Verde, where since November 1988, if we have seen great changes following the adoption at the Third Congress of our Party of a resolution on reorientation of the economic system.

Indeed, considering the characteristics of our national economy which prohibit any development other than that of an autarchic nature within an international context of fast and in-depth changes, described so well elsewhere in the Director General's Report, the main features of which are internationalisation of the productive apparatus and systems and greater independence, it became necessary, for the viability of the country, to explore new ways and means of facing the future challenges in a more autonomous and dynamic manner.

For this, it was necessary to reorientate our economic system and move systematically from dependent to independent mechanisms based on an integrated and coherent strategy aimed at opening up our economy to the outsider and thus enabling its integration into wider economic systems.

In the present economic situation in Cape Verde, this means that we must reorientate the economic system in the following manner: a more systematic exploitation of our national resources; the broadening of the productive base; a closer domestic economic network; better use of the domestic market; the conquest of external markets; and, finally, increased and improved production in order to maintain high levels of growth.

This orientation is translated particularly in terms of development of sectors of industry where priority will be given to exports, fisheries, tourism and international services by exploitation of our geo-economic base. Consequently, we shall be open to other formulae and mechanisms capable of contributing to the country's effective integration into more international labour activities such as offshore undertakings, free zones, warehouses, teleports and so on.

In order to implement this resolution of our Party, the National Assembly has partially revised our Constitution in respect of state monopoly, and last week, at one of its ordinary sessions, the Assembly voted in a law defining property sectors and the economic activities which, in its Article 1, stipulates that “the existence of public, co-operative and private property sectors and economic activity shall be recognised and guaranteed”.

At the same time, this Assembly also voted in a fundamental law on industrial development and the investment code.

As you can easily guess, the problem of employment, one of the focal points of our economic policy, is of serious, coherent intent, aimed at the well-being of man, the basis of our political change.

This new employment policy should favour the production sectors and lead to more jobs in independent enterprises.

The activities thus generated by the opening up of the economy should enable the creation directly or indirectly of a significant number of jobs particularly in the main areas of development through economic expansion and the setting up of related enterprises.

The problem of employment continues to be a source of concern for my Government and a focal point of the main problems to be solved.

According to the latest figures unemployment was 15 per cent in 1980, 16 per cent in 1985, and next year (1990) is expected to reach a figure of 27 per cent, affecting young people in particular.

In the rural areas we note a slight improvement of income per inhabitant. In the urban areas, the average income per inhabitant of family is stagnating and decreasing due to increasing unemployment.

The undoubted and considerable progress achieved since independence in the satisfaction of the basic needs of our population is closely linked to the level of foreign aid received. However, the firm will of our Government to solve social problems through massive state intervention has resulted in a welfare state mentality which is incompatible with our Party's principles of participation and with the country's financial, budgetary and economic realities.

It is now a question of breaking with the dynamics of “assistance” welfare in order to stimulate private initiative so that the population may assume some responsibility for itself, the costs for essential needs being in accordance with the social strata concerned – costs the State can no longer bear from its own resources or from funds placed at its disposal by the international community.

It is within this context that we must situate new decisions with respect to the reorientation of our economic system, where foreign investment is considered as an essential vector for a viability strategy of opening up our national economy.

The Government has just launched a campaign to mobilise the population in general, and management in particular, around national development. It will exploit our human resources to the maximum and create conditions for the active and dynamic participation of all sectors of the economy in this hard struggle for development.

In other words, it is a question of stimulating the creation of a veritable development culture in our society, and, more specifically, as the economic sphere in Cape Verde.

In his Report, the Director-General reminds us that tripartism as conceived by the ILO is an essential element of economic growth. The participation of social partners in decision-making represents a twofold advantage: it increases political efficiency of the decisions and ensures a more equitable distribution of its effects.

The Government of Cape Verde fully shares the view that participation is one of the fundamental requirements of the process we have begun.

For this purpose, we will be setting up national, regional and local machinery to enable all areas of the economic to participate in decision-making and in development policies, be they sectoral, regional or global.

Within the framework of the 3rd Party Congress to which I have referred, it was considered the opportune time for the establishment of permanent machinery for social coordination which would involve the various social partners in the major national political, economic and social decisions.

The action of the ILO is highly appreciated in Cape Verde. Permit me, therefore, to pay tribute to our Organisation on its 70th birthday, congratulate it for the immense contribution it is continuing to make, especially in the poorest countries where we note with satisfaction that the technical co-operation budget has been slightly increased.

I do not wish to conclude without reiterating our solidarity with all the peoples who condemn the degrading and inhuman situation facing the Black workers in South Africa and praising the efforts of all the forces involved in the process of peace in Namibia, so that the latter may effectively recover its international sovereignty next November.

Original – Spanish: Mr. MARTANS (Minister for Labour and Social Welfare, Panama) – First of all, allow me to express my warmest and most sincere congratulations to Mr. Nkomo on his appointment to chair the discussions of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. I would like to join those who have taken the floor before me in expressing my complete faith in his vast experience and in his considerable personal qualities which, I am sure, will be a guarantee of the wise guidance which we will receive in our debates.

We are celebrating on this occasion the 70th anniversary of this Organisation, one of the longest-standing in the United Nations system, and no doubt one of the organisations that has made the most efforts towards ensuring man's dignity and the respect of justice in a century of tremendous advances and violent social upheavals. I would like to take this opportunity to extend a warm welcome to the new Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, wishing him much success in his very delicate tasks.

It is with great interest that we have read and analysed the Report of the former Director-General, Mr. Francis Blanchard, devoted to analysing the enormous problem of economic recovery and employment. We agree wholeheartedly that this is the most important issue facing developing countries today, following a decade during which the problems of employment were dealt with, to a great extent, on the basis of the efforts of the public sector; however, the international crisis of the present decade, the increase in foreign debt and the adjustment policy introduced by the recommendations of the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund, have put an end to this strategy.

The inevitable reduction of investment by the State, which entailed a reduction of expenditure in the fields of education, health, housing and the well-being of the population, combined with the increase in global unemployment, gave rise to socially explosive situations in Latin America which, unfortunately, have taken the lives of thousands of innocent victims.

Obviously, Panama has not escaped the effects of the current economic recession, one of the worst ever experienced in the Western world, since it has caused great financial problems in the countries of those regions to which the Panamanian economy traditionally provides services.

However, its effects were felt quite late in Panama because, up until 1983, the country was able to overcome the crisis, thanks to the expansion of the Canal activities, the construction of the coast-to-coast pipeline, and the investment and public expenditure policy which it was still possible to carry out on the basis of this new income, as a way of helping to revitalise the economy. Thus, the gross domestic product, which had experienced hardly any growth between 1982 and 1984, (-0.4 per cent), increased by 4.7 per cent in 1985 and 2.9 per cent in 1986.

However, a large part of the income generated by this growth began to be exported to service the debt and, therefore, from 1983 onwards, when the adjustment process began, the Government had to cut down its expenditure. As of that date, public investments began to be drastically cut back, and were reduced to half the 1980 level. Private sector investment was also reduced.

All of the above has had very serious and negative repercussions on the labour market. Whilst the open unemployment rate was fairly stable during the late 1970s and the early 1980s, at a level of approximately 8.5 per cent, it rose above the 10 per cent level from 1984 onwards, a level which we have so far been unable to regain.

To this situation of open unemployment we had to add the problem of underemployment which affected about one-third of those actively employed: independent farmers in rural areas and unskilled workers in urban areas.

In 1986 and 1987, although we were obliged to allocate a large part of our earnings to servicing the foreign debt, the Government introduced programmes to try to compensate for the reduction of investments in the poorest sectors. One of the most important of these programmes was aimed at coordinating and promoting activities in marginal areas which, with the support of the United Nations Development Programme, sought to establish an anti-poverty strategy which, although it did not provide definite solutions, did introduce factors which checked the effects of social decline in the areas where it was implemented.

However, the problem which Panama is facing today is of a much more serious nature. It is not only linked to the problem of foreign debt. As we have already mentioned, despite the whole adverse situation, in 1986 the Panamanian economy recorded a 2.9 per cent growth rate, but as of the following year, the problem of destabilisation of the national Government began, which was abetted by a foreign government with the local support of the most anti-national and reactionary sectors.

This violent foreign aggression has meant a great deterioration in the Panamanian economy and in the situation of the poorest sectors, whose overall number has increased, and whose quality of life has further deteriorated. In 1988 GDP fell by an average of 15 to 20 per cent, which meant the greatest economic recession ever witnessed by a generation of Panamanians since Panama became a Republic.

There is probably no point in us outlining one by one all the violent measures of economic aggression which have been taken against our small country. However, it is absolutely essential that this forum recognise the very negative impacts that these measures have had on our working population.

In 1988, when attacks on our economy became more severe, concentrating on the banking system and public finance, the country experienced a 17.1 per cent reduction in the value of the production of goods and services. We should highlight the reductions of 60.75 per cent in the building industry, 28.3 per cent in the trade sector and 25.4 per cent in the manufacturing industry. In 1988 these figures represented a decrease of 19.3 per cent in the per capita GDP, which is equivalent to the level recorded ten years ago.

The slump in economic activity, the lack of credit, the weakening of public finance and the negative expectations created by foreign aggression created a reduction of total investment, estimated to be only 2 per cent of GDP in 1988, which will have negative repercussions on the economic activity of the coming years.

In 1988, the financial year recorded a decrease of 44 per cent in the current income of the central Government, which forced us to make substantial slashes in public sector expenditure. Despite this, we granted priority to the payment of wages and pensions so as not to worsen the fall in demand, which would provoke an even greater recession. Obviously, this situation caused a growing deterioration in basic services such, roads as hospitals and health systems, aqueducts, schools, housing, etc.

The decline in economic activity had repercussions on the labour market situation where there was an increase in the rate of open unemployment from 11.8 to 16 per cent in 1988, with the additional setback that in the metropolitan area this rate varied from 14.1 to 20.8 per cent.

As a consequence of the above, in 1988 more than 60,000 workers were dismissed from the labour market. Our Government had to create legal instruments to restrict these lay-offs. But in spite of this step, the Ministry of Labour has recorded a total of 4,782 new dismissals between 1 January and 31 May 1989, which means that the figure is probably even higher.

In 1988 one out of four employees of private companies had problems in the normal carrying out of their duties, either because of the reduction in working hours, the reduction of wages or a temporary suspension of contract.

The unemployment situation has had very serious repercussions on the coverage of the social security system since not only the workers who were laid off lost their rights, but also their dependents, which increased the pressure exerted on the service of the Health Ministry, which were already in a precarious state because of the same problem.

The drastic rise in the unemployment rate increased the number of workers in unskilled activities, increasing the presence of minors in these activities and also increasing the number of beggars and delinquents.

In 1988 according to the estimates of the Ministry of Planning and Economic Policy, 33 per cent of the Panamanian population was in a state of poverty; in other words, their income was not sufficient to cover the minimum requirements of food, housing and clothing. However, this figure has recently gone up to 40.2 per cent, which means that 151,000 new Panamanians have swelled the ranks of the poor.

As you can see, it is an obligation for me to mention the brutal economic aggression that my country is a victim of. With the myth that these sanctions, although they are illegal, have been designed to destroy a government, their serious consequences have had repercussions on the whole of the Panamanian population. There is no economic or social activity which has not been affected in one way or another by the consequences of this aggression. All Panamanians, without any distinction between social class or political creed, have felt the violent effects of this aggression and; obviously, the most affected are the workers.

How can we not denounce in this forum, before the workers of the world, the aggression that we, the people and Government of Panama, are victims of, by the sole fact of wanting to maintain our dignity as a free and sovereign nation?

How can we not remind our Latin American brothers in this forum, under the pressure of the tremendous burden of the foreign debt and therefore the victims of blackmail and other pressures, that the fight Panama is waging is not for Panama alone; it is to defend the freedom and the right to self-determination of each and every one of the Latin American peoples?

We cannot involve ourselves in economic recovery programmes when we are struggling for our own survival as a nation. With the force of reason we will continue doing our utmost to forge ahead with dignity and with integrity.

Original – Farsi: Mr. KAWESH (Government delegate, Afghanistan) – I would like to express, on behalf of the delegation of the Republic of Afghanistan, my sincere congratulations to Mr. Nkomo on his election as President of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. I am confident that under his guidance, this Conference will have a successful outcome.

Availing myself of this opportunity, I assure you of the full co-operation of the delegation of the Republic of Afghanistan in making the deliberations of the Conference successful. Also, on behalf of the delegation of the Republic of Afghanistan, I would like to express my deepest and sincere congratulations to Mr. Michel Hansenne, who has been elected as Director-General of the ILO, and I wish him every success in the fulfilment of the great task which he has before him.

The Report of the Director-General to the Conference this year comprises two parts: the theme of Part I is recovery and employment. This part of the Report will contribute to the discussions in the Governing Body Committee on Employment and to discussions concerning the elaboration of the International Development Strategy for the United Nations Fourth Development Decade, in which the reduction of poverty and unemployment will figure as important objectives.

Part II of the Report contains an account of the activities of the Organisation during 1988. Among the work achieved last year it is noteworthy to recall the Director-General's report on the occasion of the 40th anniversary of the Declaration of Human Rights – Human rights – a common responsibility – which received the support of the International Labour Organisation.

The subjects included in the agenda of this year's Conference are of special importance. I hope that with the full co-operation of the representatives of the member countries attending this Conference, positive steps will be taken towards solving these problems and that the activities of this international organisation will, as always, focus on the real improvement of the working and living conditions of the workers of the world.

The 76th Session of the International Labour Conference is taking place almost 70 years after the first session in Washington in October 1919. Looking back at the activities of the ILO, there can certainly be cause for satisfaction with what has been achieved in the last 70 years, despite the existence of numerous problems, particularly after the Declaration of Philadelphia in 1944.

By 1988, 168 Conventions and 176 Recommendations, which are used as a basis for legislation in over 150 member States, had been ratified. These instruments serve as a good guide in the enactment of labour legislation and their contribution towards the organisation and management of improved labour relations and conditions in the respective countries is to be praised. For example, in our country, maximum use has been made of the provisions of ILO Conventions and Recommendations to enact and enforce labour law and other legislative documents related to labour.

It has been pointed out that the Director-General has included interesting subjects in this Report in which he seeks to outline a feasible approach to reduce unemployment and to raise the level of employment of the world.

We share the view that despite the fact that economic development plays a significant role in the promotion of the level of employment, it should be stressed that it cannot solve the employment problem by itself and cannot play a decisive role in raising the level of employment. Therefore, the solution of this problem requires other efforts as well, which have been enumerated in the Report of the Director-General. We are confident that these constructive proposals which are being discussed at the Conference will prove to be effective in tackling this problem.

In recent years in our country multiple and serious measures have been taken to eliminate social and economic backwardness, as a result of which noticeable changes and developments have taken place in the socio-economic, political and cultural spheres. However, it should be pointed out that the extensive damage done to the economic structure of the country due to the imposed war amounting to billions of afghanis has slowed down the growth rate of the country.

Despite a number of successes scored in certain areas, there has been a marked backwardness in other areas as well; the major reasons for this are the intensification of outside armed interference and aggression, the ensuing destruction, the involvement of our country's forces in defence activities and unfavourable climatic conditions.

There have been many shortcomings due to the continuation of the war and bloodshed. These include: the shortage of raw materials, fuel, construction materials and electric energy; disruptions in the normal transport of goods arising from the lack of security on the highways and communication lines; lack of spare parts and equipment; and, in some respects, lack of effective management due to the shortage of experienced and educated managers.

These factors had an adverse affect on the Gross Domestic Product of our country for the year ending 21 March 1989; it amounted to 129.9 billion afghanis, which was down on the preceeding year. The unfavourable effects of the war are further felt in the sectors of agriculture, industry, transport, trade and social services.

It is noteworthy that, despite the above-mentioned barriers and difficulties, the Government has drawn up extensive plans and put them into effect by utilising domestic, financial and material resources and with the assistance of friendly countries and United Nations humanitarian assistance for the rehabilitation of Afghanistan. The socio-economic development plan for the current years has been drawn up in such a manner as to ensure the consolidation of the socio-economic order and the execution of the Government's economic policy, so as to achieve the policy of national reconciliation.

The socio-economic development plan sets out in the first place to solve urgent socio-economic problems and to continue development projects. Maximum use will be made of existing capacities and the reserves of the national economy will be maintained. The normal running of the process of production, exchange, distribution and rehabilitation of untapped capacities constitute the programme for the current year. In order to rehabilitate and provide technical equipment for projects destroyed during the war, about 18.6 per cent of the total development investment has been allocated to the basic aspects of economic and social growth.

After the proclamation of the policy of national reconciliation regarding private sector incentives in the national economy, measures have been adopted to stimulate the private sector. For instance, after the declaration of the policy of national reconciliation, 230 projects were approved in different fields, out of which 100 projects have started functioning with a working capital of about 2 billion afghanis. The Government has provided the private sector with the necessary facilities and grants. For instance, according to the new law on private investment, the private sector is exempted for a specified period from paying income tax and customs and excise taxes on exports. Private entrepreneurs also receive bank credits under easy terms. They also receive assistance for the construction of factories, commercial buildings, markets, warehouses and other facilities.

Wide-ranging measures have been taken to regulate water and land problems in the Republic of Afghanistan, to ensure a fair solution of the agrarian question through the enforcement of relative documents. The land policy reflects the interests of the country's peasants and farmers and the principles of the sacred religion of Islam; due respect is paid to people's rights and traditions.

The economic policy of the Government of Afghanistan encompasses the following areas: elevation of the level of plant and animal production; implementation of the land and water programme; rehabilitation of the development of irrigation systems and the construction of new establishments; the provision of chemical fertilisers to peasants' and agricultural co-operatives at subsidised prices; improving sowing seeds; extension of agricultural services and livestock; promotion of different types of rural workers' and agricultural co-operatives and the establishment of private and state farms.

In 1989 the major objective of the agricultural sector is to increase production and to provide it with banking facilities. During the current year beginning 20 March 1989, 145,000 tonnes of chemical fertilisers, 15,000 wheat seeds, pesticides and insecticides will be distributed to peasants and livestock holders. Serious attention will be devoted to irrigation systems and to the betterment of the sewage system. The Government plans to give the necessary assistance for the creation and normal activities of large agricultural networks, particularly in the private sector, in order to step up the production of people's requirements and to export agricultural products to the world markets.

As regards socio-economic programmes for the period 1986-1991, and up to the year 2000, the ways and means to tap the productive potential of social sectors have been determined. The expedient use of available and new resources, the development of the management of production affairs and effective administration in all spheres of the national economy have been envisaged.

The realisation of the above-mentioned objectives, besides the endeavour of the Government of the Republic of Afghanistan, call for the assistance of the United Nations and international organisations and all the countries which may help morally and materially in the reconstruction and rehabilitation of our country. On behalf of the delegation of the Republic of Afghanistan, I appreciate the initiative of Mr. Pérez de Cuéllar, Secretary-General of the United Nations, with respect to his appeal to the United Nations humanitarian assistance for the rehabilitation of Afghanistan. My sincere thanks also go to Prince Saddrudin Aga Khan, the co-ordinator of the above assistance, for his honest endeavours.

The Government of the Republic of Afghanistan attaches special importance to the improvement of workers' living conditions. The Constitution of the Republic of Afghanistan and the labour law of the Republic have made provisions for the setting up of trade unions and public organisations. The Government's assistance in the formation of these organisations has often been reiterated to promote their role in all spheres political, social, economic and cultural life. For instance, lawyers', writers', journalists' and artists' unions were earlier established and the union of craftsmen was formed last year.

The world community is aware that, based on the valuable initiative of the Government of Afghanistan in accordance with the will of the Afghan people, the policy of national reconciliation to end war, bloodshed and fratricide was proclaimed on 15 January 1987.

National reconciliation is indeed the only alternative to war and is a wish emanating from the heart of our people in clear and unmistakable terms. The main objectives of national reconciliation are: cessation of hostilities; a halt to armed conflict and bloodshed as a way of solving today's and tomorrow's issues; the guarantee of just representation in political and economic affairs; a general amnesty for past political activities; the preservation and strengthening of historical, national and cultural traditions; respect for and the observance of the sacred religion of Islam.

The policy of national reconciliation, announced over two years ago, demonstrates our new political orientation. The adoption of practical measures to implement this policy has further promoted the prestige and credibility of the Government of the Republic of Afghanistan and the PDPA. It holds brilliant and spectacular prospects on a world scale. Only a policy of national reconciliation can pave the way for the political settlement of the situation in Afghanistan, put an end to war and fratricide, ensure throughout the country and establish the coalition government with the participation of all segments of Afghan people, including the opposition, in a free, independent and non-aligned Afghanistan on a multi-party political and multi-structural economic basis. In today's Afghanistan, the sacred religion of Islam is fully and deeply being observed. All the sectors of Afghan society and all nationalities have equal political, economic and social rights; equal opportunities are open to all Afghans to work for the benefit of their country and participate in political life. The national reconciliation policy enables the settlement of problems in Afghanistan by Afghans themselves.

With the announcement of the humane policy of national reconciliation in our country, the ground will be further paved for the solution to problems in Afghanistan and the ensurance of peace and security in the country. As the world public understands, the peaceful policy of the Government of the Republic of Afghanistan contributed to the Geneva Agreements which were signed about a year ago. The Afghan and the Soviet sides have been strictly observing the provisions of the Geneva Agreements. It was in compliance with the Geneva Agreements that the Soviet troops withdrew completely from Afghanistan. However, over four months have already elapsed since the Soviet soldiers returned to their homeland, but war and fratricide have not only not been extinguished but further intensified as a result of the continued violation of the Geneva Agreements by the other party.

The Government of Afghanistan is continuing its untiring efforts by putting forward constructive and flexible proposals for the solution of the situation in Afghanistan and the observance of the provisions of the Geneva Agreements. It is noteworthy to point out that the President Najibullah of the Republic of Afghanistan, in his statement delivered at the Loya Jirgah (Grand Assembly) in May 1989 in Kabul, put forward proposals aimed at ensuring peace, ceasing fratricidal war and the rehabilitation and reconstruction of the country.

This proposal starts with a call on all armed opposition forces to observe a ceasefire and to start simultaneously holding talks and having dialogue. It was also proposed that an international conference on the implementation of the Geneva Agreements and the establishment of permanent neutrality status of Afghanistan and the demilitarisation of Afghanistan, guaranteeing all political rights, national sovereignty and the territorial integrity of Afghanistan, should be convened. A peace conference should be convened for the equal participation of all armed opposition forces and influential figures inside and outside the country for the formation of a leadership council. The leadership council should form a broad-based coalition government with the participation of all political forces. The coalition government, in addition to controlling the ceasefire, should work out a new Constitution. Of course, all opponents should have the rights to take an active part in the preparation of the Constitution. This Government will call the Loya Jirgah of Afghanistan with the participation of representatives of all opposition forces, nationalities and tribes of the country to endorse the new Constitution of the country. A nation-wide election should be held for the parliament and, after the formation of the parliament, the future government should be formed on the basis of the new Constitution. Based on the proposal of President Najibullah, the Loya Jirgah of the Republic of Afghanistan formed a mediatory commission for the purpose of establishing contacts with the representatives of the opposition groups inside and outside the country, including Mohammad Zaherm, former king of Afghanistan, and his supporters.

Mr. CALAMATTA (Workers' delegate, Malta) – On behalf of the workers of Malta, on behalf of my Union – the General Workers' Union – and also on behalf of the other Maltese unions grouped in the Confederation of Malta Trade Unions, I warmly congratulate the President on his prestigious appointment to lead this 76th Session of the International Labour Conference.

The main theme for general debate at this session is based on the Director-General's Report entitled Recovery and employment. This Report advances ILO policy proposals for restoring world economic growth in the 1990s. But this growth, in order to lead to a better world, must develop on an equitable basis and in parallel with social progress so as to lift the poorer developing regions out of the stagnation of the so-called "lost decade" of the 1980s.

At present there are many dangerous imbalances in the world economy and these should be redressed without delay. This urgent task is incumbent on all countries and to be effective its carrying out requires the full solidarity of the industrialised North in aiding the countries of the developing and underdeveloped South, who should at the same time show greater efficiency in the use of resources. Otherwise, greater poverty in many of the Third World countries will follow.

In order to have real and tangible international economic growth with all its ensuing benefits for all mankind, it is essential and vitally important to ensure security, stability, peace and harmony in all the regions and countries of the five continents.

Therefore all of us bear the responsibility of striving harder to curb all the factors which lie at the root of present tensions and conflicts in many parts of the world. These factors, which constitute an affront to all civilised humanity and democratic values, include domination of one country over another; dictatorships of both the right and the left; suppression and degrading treatment of workers and whole populations; intolerance between nations and within nations themselves in regard to political ideology, racial differences and religious beliefs; blatant violations of fundamental human and trade union rights that lead, in certain countries, to the arrest and in some cases the torture and even murder of workers' leaders.

In mentioning these forces of human evil, I have especially in mind the situation in some Latin American countries where there seems to be no respect for human dignity; the plight of the Black majority in South Africa who are still struggling against the oppression of the apartheid regime; the just cause of the Palestinians who are fighting so hard and with so much courage and determination to regain what is by right their homeland.

My country – Malta – is an island situated right in the very centre of the Mediterranean Sea, in the midst of a region which is very turbulent, volatile and explosive, particularly as a result of Israel's dispute with the Palestinians, the civil war in Lebanon and also the division of Cyprus. The existing tension is regrettably being further fuelled by the presence of naval fleets of the two super-powers in the Mediterranean which, after all, is a sea alien to both the United States and the Soviet Union.

We therefore insistently demand that the two super-powers withdraw from the Mediterranean Sea their naval fleets, which also comprise nuclear-armed warships. We want the Mediterranean to be not only free from foreign military dominance but also to be a nuclear-free zone. We seek this for the sake of security, stability, harmony and peace so that the working peoples of the Mediterranean countries can move steadily forward in a healthy environment towards more beneficial economic progress and social progress.

It was for this reason that in June last year that my union joined forces with the Social Democratic Labour Party in a big national protest against a so-called "courtesy visit" to Malta by nuclear-capable and nuclear-armed warships of the British Royal Navy.

During that national protest the shipyard and port workers staged strikes directed by my union and also succeeded to block with tankers, freighters, tugboats, barges and anything that could float, the entrance to the country's Grand Harbour and the Port of Marsaxlokk where the warships were scheduled to berth.

The Malta anti-nuclear blockade – as it has become known – was a big success. The warships with all their nuclear might were defeated by the workers and had to lay anchor in open sea outside a small remote bay in the north of Malta.

Our actions in the anti-nuclear protest aimed, in particular, to arouse greater world-wide consciousness of the need for total nuclear disarmament and for the attainment of peace. But peace is not just the absence of conflicts and wars. To have real peace there must be other factors – foremost of which are respect for fundamental rights and freedoms not only in regard to individuals but also in regard to trade unions.

And here I must express my regret that in Malta, since the present Government took office two years ago, we have had to witness flagrant violations of basic trade union rights. For example, in July last year during a strike at a state-controlled bank, officials and activists of the General Workers' Union who were forming a peaceful and legal picket line were brutally attacked with tear gas bombs and mercilessly beaten with truncheons by the police riot squad. During that onslaught I myself was seriously threatened by a riot squad policeman who told me: "Now is my chance to kill you!"

On another occasion the police riot squad was deployed (although it did not go into action) near one of Malta's big and prominent hotels during a strike there by another union which had the full backing of the General Workers' Union. Naturally the presence of the riot squad was intended to instil fear in the striking workers and demoralise them in the fight for their rights.

Apart from infringing on trade union rights by instilling violence and fear, the Maltese Government is in certain instances not respecting my union's right to be consulted and given the opportunity to put forward and discuss its views on important matters of great relevance to workers. To prove this I shall give some examples.

This year, the Government submitted to Parliament a Bill amending the Industrial Relations Act. In spite of the fact that this legislation affects to a large extent the trade union movement in Malta, the Government did not hold any consultations with my union.

Last year the Government set up a commission to carry out a general and wide-ranging reform in the public services, a reform which concerns many thousands of state-employed workers. Pursuant to the terms of reference given to it by the Government, the Public Service Reform Commission is carrying out its work without any consultations and negotiations with the unions in spite of the fact that this reform stands to also affect the conditions and wages of the workers involved. My union protested against this and pointed out that the lack of consultations and negotiations goes against the letter and spirit of ILO Conventions.

A matter of immense importance is the Government's intention to apply for Malta's full membership in the European Community, and it appears that the application is to be made by the end of 1990. In April last year – that is more than a year ago – my union submitted to the Government a memorandum expressing its initial views on Malta-EEC relations and, while not committing itself in favour or against membership, it raised a lot of searching questions to which, by right, as the representative of the majority of unionised workers, it should be given answers.

The Foreign Minister described my union's memorandum as an extremely positive and objective one that raised very valid points. Meanwhile we repeatedly requested discussions with the Government, but until now the Government has not found time to hold such discussions with my union on this vital issue upon which there must be national consensus.

There is another case of lack of government consultations and discussions which I am duty-bound to expose at this Conference during which I am participating in the Committee on the Use of Chemicals.

In the introduction to the ILO Report on this subject it is stated that the Government of Malta was among 47 member States who said that they replied to an ILO questionnaire on chemicals at work after consultations with organisations of employers and workers. I have to state and emphasise strongly that my union was never consulted by the Government on this matter.

As regards the broader issue of occupational safety and health, I wish to point out that in 1987 my union suggested to the Government the setting up of a Workers' Health and Safety Authority in Malta on a tripartite basis. Eventually the Minister of Social Policy acted very positively and appointed a national commission composed of representatives from the Government, trade unions and employers' associations.

The commission studied the matter further, surveyed the existing services relating to occupational safety and health and even proposed draft legislation for the establishment of the Workers' Health and Safety Authority. This was in early 1988. When the Minister of Social Policy addressed last year's session of the International Labour Conference, he announced that the authority was to be set up shortly. But with much regret I have to state that until now the draft legislation has not even been submitted to Parliament for its enactment.

My union is proud that, together with the Labour Party which was in government for 16 years between 1971 and 1987, it has pioneered workers' participation in the management of state-owned or state-controlled enterprises in Malta. The present Government says that it wants to strengthen the concept of workers' participation whereby, under existing systems, the workers elect from amongst themselves representatives to sit as workers-directors on the boards of directors. My union also wants to give more effectiveness to this concept and even wishes to see it spread to companies in the private sector.

However we have serious doubts about how good the Government's intentions are – and I say this because the Government has permitted and is still permitting reactionary forces to hinder the existing democratically elected worker-directors in their work as representatives of the workforce with the aim of rendering workers' participation ineffective and bringing about a situation where the workers lose interest in the concept and it thereby gradually ceases to exist.

Earlier I referred to several instances in which the Government of Malta failed to carry out consultations with my union. Such situations would never have arisen had the Government accepted to set up a permanent tripartite committee to ensure continuous dialogue on all matters relating to the world of work and also – and this is very important – to seek ways and means of implementing recommendations made by the International Labour Conference and to follow up the work of the Maltese delegation at this Conference from one session to another.

On behalf of my union – and I believe that the other trade unions and employers' associations in Malta would agree with me – I appeal to the Minister of Social Policy to consider this matter with the seriousness it deserves and appoint without delay the proposed tripartite committee bringing together the three social partners.

Furthermore I propose that this permanent tripartite committee should be set up on a statutory basis – that is under a specific law and backed in its work by legal provisions so that the decisions it takes shall be legally binding on the Government, trade unions and employers.

I am far more than convinced of the need of such a committee and of the benefits which would certainly accrue from it. Such a committee would serve as a very effective instrument to create a much healthier industrial relations environment and foster closer co-operation and collaboration between the three social partners.

All these factors, and many others which it is impossible for me to cite here, would lead to greater harmony in the interests of one and all while establishing sounder foundations for more wide-ranging economic progress and social progress for the Maltese society at large.

Original – Russian: Mr. GAIDAIENKO (Employers' delegate, USSR) – Allow me to begin by congratulating the President on his election to such a high and responsible office, and to wish him every success in carrying out this honourable and difficult task.

I should like to take this opportunity to express our sincere gratitude to Mr. Francis Blanchard for his many years of efficient work as the Director-General of the International Labour Office.

I should also like to congratulate the new Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, and wish him success in further improving the many-sided activities of the International Labour Organisation.

It would be difficult to choose a more topical subject for discussion at this forum than the theme chosen for the Report of the Director-General this year. Recovery and employment are two key concepts which form the basis of the development strategy of every State and of the world community as a whole.

Irrespective of their social and economic system, States both in the East and in the West, both in the North and in the South, face the need for a restructuring of their economies, which is gradually becoming a world-wide process.

Every State and every social system responds in its own way to this historical challenge and seeks its own ways of overcoming the difficulties and solving the problems involved in restructuring and adjustment to new conditions.

At the same time, the logic of development suggests that there are some common starting-points from which we should proceed in analysing the situation and in framing well-founded recommendations at this session of the Conference.

In this context the thesis of the Director-General concerning the need to seek common solutions and to devise an integrated approach and constant dialogue with the participation of all interested parties is of crucial importance for the International Labour Organisation.

It is through the prism of these realities that we view the recommendations contained in the Director-General's Report. One can entirely agree with the Report's conclusion that in the course of recovery and structural change, there is need for social dialogue, for a combination of economic growth with social progress and the participation of all population groups in the development process.

To sum up, I should like to express our high appreciation of the Director-General's Report which, in accordance with the best traditions of our Organisation, gives food for thought and analysis.

The theme of the Director-General's Report is of particular interest to us in the light of the transformations of the political system and the radical economic reform now under way in the Soviet Union. Radical transformations in the social and economic spheres constitute the basis of "perestroika" and are a key factor in its success. In recent decades, the economy of the Soviet Union has unfortunately become markedly resource- and production-oriented. Investment in the productive sphere has increased twice as fast as that in the social sphere. Together with other unfavourable trends, this factor has led today to an imbalance in the domestic market and to a state budget deficit.

The Congress of People's Deputies which has just ended in Moscow affirmed the need for a real social reorientation of the country's economy to meet people's needs and to solve human problems.

Actively supporting the urgent and decisive measures undertaken by the Government in the social sphere, Soviet employers and directors of industrial enterprises and associations take a keen interest in stepping up economic reform, for it is the only way to release the factors and sources of intensive economic growth.

As of 1 January 1989, we have embarked on a large-scale transition to a new system of management based upon the self-financing of enterprises and of entire branches of industry.

The main principle of the reform is the autonomy of the enterprise and its independence from the centre. Central planning in our country is gradually moving further away from dirigisme.

We are seeking the most rational forms of ownership and management: contracts, leasing and share-capital, not only in small and medium-sized enterprises but in large enterprises too.

The co-operative sector of the economy is being considerably expanded. Since the entry into force of the Act on co-operatives in the USSR two years ago, some 75,000 new co-operatives have been established, today employing one and a half million people. It is only fair to point out that in our country co-operatives now enjoy substantially more favourable terms than state enterprises: whereas the latter must pay 40 to 60 per cent of their profits in the form of taxes, co-operatives, on average, only pay 3 to 5 per cent. Such tax advantages for co-operatives are probably not to be found in any other country in the world. It is therefore no accident that at the Congress of People's Deputies some deputies who are directors of enterprises in the state sector called for identical tax conditions to be applied to state enterprises and co-operatives.

The Act on individual labour activity adopted in 1987 provided an impetus to the development of the self-employment sector of the Soviet economy. In the past two years, 700,000 people bought licenses to engage in individual activity, mainly in the small-scale service sector.

The state sector is the basis of our economy and accordingly, that of the Soviet enterprise. In appraising the state of affairs in our country's economy, our employers agree that today enterprises have acquired extensive rights and independence, but they are not yet able to make effective use of these, because there is as yet no developed domestic market in our country; wholesale trade is not properly organised. In other words, rights and opportunities have been proclaimed, but the economic situation does not allow them to be fully and effectively used.

Today our employers are most concerned about the financial situation in our country, and the state budget deficit in particular. In our view, it is caused mainly by the structural and investment imbalances. I have mentioned, and faulty wage-fixing methods.

In 1988 the cash income of the population rose by 9 per cent as against the 4.5 per cent fixed by the plan, while the domestic trade turnover rose by only 6 per cent.

The discrepancy between the cash income of the population and the volume of trade in a context of stable state prices has exacerbated the problems of the consumer market and led to many shortages. The reform of the system of price formation, in which enterprises take the keenest interest, will be no easy matter and in any event will not proceed as quickly as we had hoped two or three years ago.

At the same time, I should like to tell you that in the year that has passed since the last session of the Conference, new factors have also emerged which encouraged the development of a spirit of enterprise in our industrial managers. Restructuring of the economy and the new political way of thinking call objectively for the creation of a flexible and open economy which forms an integral part of the international division of labour. The past year has been particularly productive in this regard.

Firstly, since 1 April this year all Soviet enterprises producing competitive goods have been given the right of direct access to foreign markets. A considerable portion of their foreign currency earnings now remains at the disposal of the enterprises themselves, which have been given the right to use these resources not only for the purchase of equipment and raw materials but also to meet the social needs of their workers.

Thus, Soviet enterprises have been given a real opportunity to become active participants not only of the domestic market, but also of the world market, with all its characteristic "rules of the economic game".

Secondly, we have stopped regulating the partners' percentage of the capital of joint ventures within the USSR. We have considerably simplified the procedure for their registration and created more flexible conditions for hiring and firing personnel and allowing a foreign national to be appointed manager of a joint venture. More flexible tax rules have been introduced with special tax breaks for joint ventures set up in the Far East.

The preparation of legislation for the creation of "joint venture zones" in the USSR has now entered the practical stage.

As a result of these measures, in the past year the number of joint ventures in the Soviet Union has increased more than fourfold and now exceeds 400.

The figure I have given you bears out the Director-General's conclusion in his Report, that the changes now under way in the socialist countries of Eastern Europe are facilitating their closer integration in the world economic system.

Thirdly, employers in our country welcome the process which has now begun, of reduction of military expenditures and conversion of military production.

On 30 May this year at the Congress of People's Deputies in Moscow, Mr. Gorbachev announced that the military expenditures of the Soviet Union in 1989 amounted to 77.3 thousand million roubles and proposed to reduce this figure by 14 per cent in 1990-91.

It is expected that by the end of 1989 civilian production will already account for 40 per cent of the output of the defence industry in the Soviet Union.

The reduction in the military budget is accompanied by a decrease in the manufacture of armaments and military technology. The industrial potential thus released will be used to saturate the market and to meet social needs.

We do not rule out the possibility of international co-operation in enterprises undergoing conversion, in particular in the manufacture of new technology-intensive consumer goods.

It is perfectly obvious that the economic reform in the Soviet Union is entering a new and more intensive phase.

The main task facing it is the creation of a vigorous, dynamic domestic market, with a clear division between state regulation of the economy and operational independence at the regional and enterprise level.

Enterprises, concerns, joint-stock companies and co-operatives must become the principal agents in our economy. Their common economic interests will prompt them to set up associations, consortiums and other groupings.

Thus, Soviet employers are preparing for a difficult and pains-taking task, in which we shall have to tackle many new and unfamiliar economic problems.

We therefore intend to intensify our contacts with employers in other countries and to participate more extensively in the activity of the ILO, whose 70th anniversary we celebrate this year, and which we regard as a unique international machinery for tripartite co-operation. In this context, we look forward to a deeper mutual understanding within the Employers' group of the ILO and the development of constructive dialogue and mutual trust. We are convinced that adequate expression can and must be given to the interests of the employers of all groups of countries represented in the Organisation.

In conclusion, I should like to express the hope that the implementation of the development strategy for the economic recovery of our countries outlined in the Report will help to secure the well-being of our peoples in conditions of equality, freedom and human dignity.

Mr. TITIMUR (Workers' delegate, Papua New Guinea) – It is my pleasant task to congratulate

Mr. Nkomo on his election as President of this 76th Session of the International Labour conference, on the threshold of the last decade of the twentieth century.

At the same time, I wish to congratulate the Director-General for the usual excellence of the Report and other documents which have been submitted for the considerations of the conference.

The Director-General's Report on the ILO's activities also gives coverage of the widespread involvement of the ILO's many programmes in various countries.

We must, however, point out that Papua New Guinea is mentioned only once and this figure denotes the totality of ILO programmes conducted in our country.

We must also observe with regret that a workers' education project proposal developed by the ILO some two years ago has still not come into being. We are a young organisation and need this project to become operational as a matter of urgency and express the hope that the Office will pursue the matter.

Before proceeding further, I wish to place on record, on behalf of the workers of Papua New Guinea, our admiration of the epochal achievement of the Solidarity trade union movement and its leadership, who through their sustained struggle and their commitment to the cause of fundamental human rights, have finally obtained recognition that they are the legitimate representatives of the workers of Poland.

The Director-General has very appropriately titled his Report Recovery and employment and had proceeded to discuss the various factors that have come into play in relation to the problems that the world continues to face in relation to these aspects.

The Director-General has also outlined the endeavours made over the years to ease the problem of employment, particularly in the developing countries and the fact that, despite all efforts, success achieved had been highly limited.

This is particularly relevant to a small emerging country such as Papua New Guinea, where the bulk of the population work and live in the rural areas. A major factor that would affect Papua New Guinea's economic health would be world commodity prices for such agricultural products as cocoa, coffee, copra, oil palm and tea; these areas not only employ the largest number of workers, but also contain the potential to absorb the swelling numbers of jobseekers.

In reality, however, despite international structures that have been created to stabilise the prices of these commodities, we have continued to witness price spirals which have compelled the government to prop up these industries with financial resources which can only be siphoned off from other areas of development investment.

This position must hold true for all developing countries and underlines the need for industrially developed countries to ensure that the primary products from Third World countries fetch fair prices in order to promote employment and advance social and economic growth.

I am sure that I am not stating anything new, but the fact remains that as long as the affluent countries continue with their protectionist policies which result in depressing the prices of Third World commodities, whatever the strategies that are put in place, the current imbalances will continue.

This gloomy scenario cannot be dispelled unless those responsible for the convulsions of the world market make a genuine commitment to uplifting the living standards of the human race as an integrated global family. It is to be hoped that altruism will be the key element in the decade to come.

My country is caught in the throes of a dilemma due to the exploitation of its vast mineral resources. When making a comparison of the economic growth rate, we may see that investment is highly loaded in favour of the mining and petroleum industry which logically creates a lopsided growth pattern that requires careful balancing to avoid our society from becoming stratified.

Another important side effect of the mining industry in my country is its effect on the ecology and the environment. Mining pollutants, in addition to contaminating our river systems, have also given rise to a series of social problems which have reached explosive proportions. We therefore consider that safety in the use of chemicals at work is an important contribution that the ILO can make in providing relevant guide-lines on the usage of chemicals, not only at the place of work but also outside of the place of work.

The mere adoption of an international instrument is of little use to countries like mine unless structures are put in place under the auspices of the ILO to provide a pool of expertise to help developing countries who are faced with the problems I have just listed.

The Director-General has referred the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank in his Report; these bodies give advice to countries like mine as to how best they ought to make structural adjustments. I am afraid we have reservations with regard to the manner in which they have consultations and the type of advice that they give.

Firstly, consultations are confined to the state apparatus and do not allow the trade union movement to make any type of representation; secondly the stock remedies, such as devaluation, have neither expanded employment nor led to economic growth; thirdly, no emphasis is laid on the social content; fourthly, there is no evidence to suggest that devaluation has led to economic growth or effective structural adjustments.

On the contrary, devaluation, in addition to eroding the real wages of the workers, creates additional burdens in servicing the external debt and contracting employment therefrom.

Therefore, whilst devaluation by itself cannot stand alone, we venture to suggest that structural changes would be more appropriate if the Bretton Woods Institutions become more flexible in their consultative target groups.

We are in total agreement with the observations made by the Director-General, to the effect that tripartite dialogue between the social partners could play a crucial role in the overall spectrum of development strategy. In addition to macroeconomic issues, microeconomic issues and areas of government policy that can affect living standards such as social security, health and education, must encompass tripartite consultation.

It is with full awareness of the potential within a tripartite consultative system that the Papua New Guinea Trade Union Congress has submitted to the Government an agenda that also includes labour market policies, methods of increasing productivity, a system of consumer protection, the settlement of industrial conflicts and such other wider issues.

We also perceive in the structure that we have proposed, a platform to call for the ratification of international labour standards, which have remained in limbo since Papua New Guinea gained independence in 1975.

We are optimistic that, given the Government's already positive response, a broad and far-reaching tripartite consultative machinery will be put in place in the near future.

In concluding, I would like to make a reference to the opening sentence in the Director-General's Report which says that we are in a paradoxical situation.

Apart from anything else we see the paradox continuing into the next decade, where nations who are vociferous in the protection of individual and collective liberties sail against the wind in suppressing the legitimate aspirations of captive people for independence and self-determination. At the same time we see inflexible and authoritarian ideologies bending before the winds of change.

We also see the superpowers, not so much engaged in an arms race, but jousting as to who can dismantle armaments the fastest.

At the same time, it is depressing to note that whilst between 1980 and 1985 the expenditure and military spending in the western industrial countries grew by only an average of 5.7 per cent, Third World countries increased military spending. According to a study conducted for Worldwatch Institute, if Third World countries had bought no arms between 1972 and 1982 they would have debts that were 20 to 25 per cent smaller.

We also have the other phenomenon of a profusion of multilateral aid packages being offered by certain industrial and newly industrial countries to the developing nations of the Pacific, whilst the marine resources of these countries are being destroyed through the employment of drift-nets which have been described as the "wall of death."

These are some of the issues that we see continuing into the next decade, and we appeal to the nations that chart the course of the future of the world to ensure that the artificial barriers that separate the affluent and the poorest nations are broken down.

Original - Russian: Mr. BODA (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Czechoslovakia) - Allow me first of all to congratulate Mr. Nkomo on his election as President of this Session of the Conference and to wish him full success in this responsible task. My congratulations are also extended to his fellow officers.

We welcome the Report of the Director-General on recovery and employment, both for its subject matter and, more especially, for its approach. In my opinion this Report is an important contribution to the 70th anniversary of the ILO, reaffirming its commitments and the fundamental objectives which it set itself in the Constitution, particularly those enshrined in the Declaration of Philadelphia. We consider that its emphasis on the indivisible nature of global development and the mutual interdependence of its social and economic aspects, both nationally and internationally, makes a fundamental contribution to our meeting today. It draws our attention to the need to study and interpret the social consequences of all economic and financial policy measures, nationally and internationally.

It is not so long since the opinion prevailed, even within the Organisation itself, that it was not competent to assess the causes of social problems in a wider context; it had to restrict itself to concern for the unemployed, without, however, working to solve the fundamental causes of unemployment. It sought to reduce poverty in the developing world without applying itself to analysing the consequences of economic relations nationally and internationally. It concerned itself with the social protection of those who were deprived of it by neo-liberal economic policies, the resulting deregulation of labour relations and the increased flexibility of unilaterally applied working conditions, while at the same time no one recognised its right to intervene in this process, despite the fact that the responsibility and competence of the ILO in these matters have been clearly laid down since 1945 in articles 2 and 4 of the Philadelphia Declaration.

This kind of unilateral interpretation of social development and social protection, bearing no relation to economic systems and financial reports, was clearly the fundamental cause of the increased social bipolarisation in the world during the last decade. At the same time it reduced our Organisation's capacity to contribute effectively to solving the serious problems of workers throughout the world.

The development strategy in socialist Czechoslovakia, with its policy of international co-operation, has always been based on the conviction that the ultimate objective of development has to be the full development of each individual. This entails providing not only the legal conditions but, above all, the material and organisational conditions necessary to offer real scope to all citizens. The principle of social justice is of paramount importance in our development policy. This is another reason why we applaud the fact that the Report of the Director-General roundly defends these ideas, rejecting simplistic financial and monetary approaches to consolidation programmes for economic recovery and structural reforms imposed by creditor institutions on some debtor countries.

The relationship between the principles of social justice and performance is complicated and contradictory. However, all our countries have accumulated a wealth of national experiences, some of which have general validity and demonstrate the basic direction of the path we are following. We are glad that the Report reflects the far-reaching negative social consequences resulting from drastic reductions in domestic consumption and, therefore, national social development. However, the immediate result of the damage incurred is not final. Far from it. The slowing down of social development will make itself felt in the course of time in a potential reduction of qualifications within the workforce, less adaptability to global technological developments and inability to sustain competitiveness in international markets, in other words by a new and greater economic dependence for many years to come. Consolidation programmes have particularly serious consequences in developing countries with a heavy foreign debt, where such consequences cannot be dealt with at the national level. The differences in the global distribution of wealth, both between nations and within the national community, have increased immeasurably during the past ten to fifteen years, constituting an obstacle to world development as a whole. This is why we must work to reduce them.

At the same time, however, we are aware that unilateral overestimation of social aspects can slow down the increasing pace of economic performance, in particular when social criteria take precedence to the detriment of stimulating economic competitiveness and principles of universality and unity in distribution reduce the scope of individual initiative and creativity. Economic reform – that is, the reconstruction of the economic mechanism in our country and other socialist countries – has a primary objective of increasing the scope for people's initiative by substantially extending their participation in economic life and enterprise activity. The expansion of economic independence to pave the way to undertakings, a wide-ranging development of the functions of entrepreneurs, an increased autonomy for workers' collectives and further democratisation in both the economic and the public spheres of society provide the main foundations. In connection with the reconstruction of economic management, basic changes in the national economic structure are also under way so as to meet the needs of the population better and to achieve greater adaptability to international trade and co-operation conditions.

In order to achieve these objectives, we have adopted during the last months a number of important legislative measures, including laws on state enterprises, agricultural co-operatives, housing, consumption and production co-operatives, and joint domestic and foreign capital undertakings. The changes in the economic system brought about by these laws are having a profound effect on labour relations, requiring a number of changes to the Labour Code. This process is far from finished, since we are drawing up other important legal standards, particularly a complete rewriting of the law on national economic planning and employment regulations. There will also be new measures to extend individual economic activities, increase the number of small enterprises and provide scope for the development of joint ventures. Alongside the huge, high-performance sector of production and agricultural co-operatives, these measures will contribute to satisfying the requirements of the population as regards the quality of products and services. For all their effect in increasing economic efficiency, they are not being implemented at the cost of social protection. We are convinced that full employment will be assured – this is fundamental to social protection – even after the structural changes, and that all workers who have to leave their employment will be offered adequate employment.

This is another reason why we feel, again in agreement with the Report of the Director-General, that growth in economic efficiency is possible while still maintaining the fundamental rights of workers, particularly the right to their livelihood and to full employment. In our opinion, this should be the starting-point for the ILO's future activities. The question as to how and at what pace the problem of foreign debt is solved will be crucial to the solution of the world's most serious social problems. In this context, we should also note the adjustment to the international financial conditions, which are the fundamental causes of the net transfer abroad of the resources of developing countries towards creditor countries. Czechoslovakia has supported and will continue to support the legitimate demands of developing countries for equality in international economic and financial relations, which is basic to their economic recovery. We believe that the ILO can provide these countries with essential assistance by way of advice in formulating policies for economic and social recovery, on condition that the ILO can assemble and pass on the fruitful experiences of all its members, not restrict itself to selected social systems. We see promise, for example, in the new attitude adopted towards the State sector, as expressed in the Report.

We feel that a substantial improvement in the international atmosphere, particularly thanks to the initiatives of Soviet foreign policy, is creating for mankind as a whole an extraordinary chance to reach agreement and divert funds hitherto spent on arms on a world programme of general progress, thereby progressively reducing and eliminating the most serious social problems. We believe that this favourable climate internationally will also enable us to increase substantially co-operation in Europe, whose problems – I have in mind particularly the threats to the environment, as well as an overall increase in insecurity in many countries – are very serious.

The Report shows that it is high time to check, at least, the worsening economic contradictions as well as the deterioration of the overall social situation of the world. The current development in international relations, the growing mutual trust and a general awareness of interdependence are creating conditions under which agreement can be reached on co-operation, a potential turning-point for world development. The Czechoslovak Socialist Republic is working to that end, in which it is ready to take an active part.

Original – French: Mr. OECHSLIN (Employers' delegate, France) – Since this is the first time that I am speaking as a delegate of the employers of France, may I congratulate the President and Vice-Presidents of the conference on their election.

The title of the Director-General's Report, Recovery and employment, is somewhat ambiguous, which makes it all the more topical. It seems to me that its author or authors were prompted by an urge to follow the title with a question-mark or some other typographical device showing that the relationship between these two terms is not quite as simple as might have been thought a few years ago. It is true that economic recovery is a necessary precondition for an upturn in employment, but it is by no means sufficient, at least if one means by "upturn in employment" a lasting and generalised decrease of unemployment in all its aspects.

Today it is clear that economic recovery is an inevitable path to increased employment and that it must be accompanied by job creation; however, it is not always possible to find people who are able, or even willing, to fill the jobs offered; moreover, a lack of certain categories of workers may be a major obstacle to the recovery of an economy which is generally characterised by unemployment and underemployment. One may therefore wonder whether employment should be considered with reference to the level of economic activity or whether it would not be fair of the deal with it as a symptom of the incapacity of the distribution and human resources development systems to adapt to changing economic conditions.

In point of fact, this viewpoint is not contradicted by the approach of the Report's authors, who propose an appropriate national strategy characterised by a dual formula, namely structural adjustment and equitable growth. The first term is well known. It is fashionable and has become the leitmotiv of many international conferences. The second aims to be more original and claims to represent the specific contribution of the ILO to this debate. I must admit, however, that I do not quite understand how growth can be equitable. The word equitable implies a value judgement. This is an ethical concept which inadequately characterises a quantitative concept such as growth. What is meant, no doubt, is that the fruits of growth should be distributed equitably, that the means to be used should respect certain criteria, that the goal should remain a social one, and that the ILO, which likes to say that it is the "social conscience" of the United Nations system – has the responsibility for upholding these principles.

This does not worry me. In the past, one spoke of the "social market economy", the word "social" being used in a similar sense. It is true that the lack of social consensus costs a community dear and impairs its adaptability and economic progressiveness. When all is said and done, democracy and its apparent disorders, such as the exercise of individual or collective freedoms – and the resulting washing of dirty linen in public – remain the least obnoxious way of exercising and overcoming social tension. In this respect and others, regimes based on brute force are the least productive of social systems – as one great country how seems to be realising. Men and women try to excel for the sake of honours, profit, sacrifice or friendship, but never, in the long term, through fear.

It is obvious that a good social policy facilitates growth and adaptation by motivating the workers, by prompting a training efforts (which is always first and foremost an individual effort), by placing a premium on initiative and competence, by creating a feeling of security, by permitting development through demand for goods offered by enterprises.

However, it would be naïve and dangerous to believe or to claim that established machinery for wage fixing and the settlement of collective disputes, or systems of social protection, never have negative effects on adjustment capacities. Whether because of the rigidities they create on the labour market or the extra cost they imply for the labour factor, their effect must be assessed objectively and without bias. The debate is open. The ILO remains the main forum for that debate, on condition that each of us agrees to engage in it without ulterior motives – in other words, without seeking systematically to defend outworn ideas or to destroy the cohesion of the social world.

The ILO must beware of a nostalgic approach to labour problems. For example, we occasionally see in the Report a distinction being made between "good" and "bad" jobs. The former are by nature permanent – of indeterminate duration and tend to be in the industrial sector. The others are "precarious" in industrialised countries, "informal" in developing countries, and mainly in the tertiary sector. I do not deny that in the second group there is still much abuse and exploitation, but I believe this dichotomy is somewhat out of date and that the social evolution which is taking shape can point the other way.

The strategy proposed by the report is divided up into a combination of macro-economic and micro-economic interventions. I shall not emphasise the distinction between these two terms, which is the dearer to the economists in that it is hazy and offers them full leeway to give their demonstrations the meaning they consider most appropriate. But I was rather struck by the word "intervention", which seemed to me somewhat paradoxical, in that one of the main thrusts in the strategy – and quite so – might be the return of the market as a mechanism for regulating the economy. It is true that these interventions aim – we are told – at eliminating distortions, subsidies, restrictions and other crutches which transform markets into so many cripples incapable of moving without outside help. One wonders whether the cripple is not so weak, whether his muscles are not so atrophied that he will not be able to set one foot in front of the other without collapsing unless the helping hand of the State supports him on his tottering way.

But that would mean overlooking the fact that in most countries where the pressure of this hand is the strongest there exists a highly organised black market which operates well without, of course, being under the aegis of the State. This is, of course, a bad thing and should be condemned. However, it does exist and shows the infinite possibilities of human nature to get organised by itself. I believe, therefore, that the concerns voiced by the authors of the Report are exaggerated and that managers of enterprises, wage earners, trade unions and consumers are more capable of operating the markets they are concerned with than is generally thought by economists.

Except where there is imperative planning, a system whose inefficiency is unanimously recognised today, the "interventions" of the State, even when there is tripartite consultation, can only be incentive or prohibitive. The move from the potential to the actual depends on the enterprise and is by nature decentralised. Investment, hiring, purchasing of equipment, choice of technology, are all individual decisions of the enterprise. Regulations can prevent certain actions from being carried out, can make them subject to given procedures but, on the other hand, they can render certain decisions more attractive. It is, however, very difficult to actually force a company manager to do something definite. As we say colloquially, you can take a horse to the water but you can't make him drink. Similarly, a consumer cannot be forced to buy what does not suit him, apart from certain exceptional cases. In other words, the forces of the market, whether covert or overt, cannot be held in check for ever; they will always get their own back on the planners – if only by going underground.

The market is a formidable educator, far better than the wisest ILO expert. It is merciless to the improvident, the incompetent or the scatterbrained. My many travels throughout countries at all stages of development have taught me that really good heads of enterprises have been trained by the market: it was the market which led them, for example, to the choice of the most appropriate technology for the price and quality sought by the customer. It is the market which imposes productivity, not the wish to be congratulated or receive honours. It is the draconian law of the market which is the very source of innovation and the constant search for the best possible organisation of the factors of production.

This does not mean to say that a transition from a planned economy to a market economy will not pose problems for those involved, nor that the ILO cannot help in their solution. In the case of the employers, on whose behalf I am speaking, I note, on the contrary, a wish to benefit from the programmes organised by the ILO on condition that these programmes correspond to their true needs and are designed by people familiar with these needs and, if possible, with the help of other employers.

I would add that the employers' organisations and perhaps also the workers' organisations are not always prepared for tripartite dialogue in a system where the market is predominant. In this field, too, the ILO – upon the request of interested parties – could draw up programmes which would enable them to benefit from the experience of countries with a similar past.

In conclusion, I should like to place the questions dealt with by this Report among the priorities of the ILO.

I have always been struck by the fact that the main themes underlying our activities are presented in isolation: you have standards, the fight against discrimination, improvement of working conditions, training and employment. The link between them is missing. Structural adjustment, or some other more expressive term for this phenomenon, might help us to have a more coherent view of our activities. The Report before us is a first step along this path, but it still seems too cluttered up with dubious dogmatism and unjustified hesitations. However, it has the merit of making us more aware of the relationships existing between our programmes. Although some of our activities seem to have effects other than those intended, we must keep calm and try to find out how to solve and overcome these contradictions. The structure of our services must also be more flexible, thus permitting a more multi-disciplinary approach.

Despite its shortcomings, or perhaps because of them – since they give food for thought and matter for debate – the Report will remain a useful milestone in our search for solutions.

Mr. MULIMBA (Minister of Labour, Social Development and Culture, Zambia) – The Zambian delegation, on behalf of the Zambian people, Party and its Government, congratulates the President on his election to the Presidency of this 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. His election is a great honour not just to Zimbabwe but to the African region and to the front-line States in particular. It is an election which will cheer the struggling and oppressed workers of South Africa and Namibia. We also congratulate each and every member of his cabinet on their election to various offices and committees, servicing this Conference.

We welcome the new Director-General, Michel Hansenne, to the International Labour Office and pledge to give him the same loyalty and support that we gave his predecessor, Francis Blanchard, to the over a-decade-and-a-half period which has been already described as a militant humanism for the rights of workers and a healthy concern for the unemployed and the handicapped, which gained the world's attention during his term of office.

We pay tribute to the Chairman of the Governing Body, Mr. Mensah, another distinguished African and his team, for the excellent work reflected in the Governing Body's annual report to this Conference. The Governing Body's report and that of the Director-General raise many challenging issues requiring serious analysis, debate and decision by this Conference.

The theme chosen for our 76th Session, "Recovery and employment" could not have been more appropriate for Zambia and for the African region. This theme can be traced to the Lagos Plan of Action and the Final Act of Lagos of 1985, which was followed up by the African Plan for Rapid Economic Recovery (APRER) adopted by the OAU at Addis Ababa in 1986 as a recovery strategy. The culmination of this approach as a development strategy was the adoption by a special session of the United Nations of the United Nations African Economic Recovery and Development Programme (UNPAERD).

Zambia, in line with this theme and strategy, decided on 1 May 1987 to break away from the IMF and World Bank-linked Structural Adjustment Programme which had been religiously pursued for over a decade, in favour of its own New Economic Recovery Programme based on the theme "Recovery from own resources", with emphasis placed on the utilisation of local human resources and raw materials for future sustainable socio-economic development. For the 15 years or so that Zambia pursued and persisted with the IMF-linked Structural Adjustment Programme, its economic growth rate averaged 0.5 per cent per annum; its population growth rate rose to 3.4 per cent by 1987; unemployment continued to rise; social services deteriorated; and social unrest began to be a source of political concern.

The Conference may be interested to know that, under the First National Development Plan, launched in accordance with this new development strategy, the Interim National Development Plan from 1 July 1987 to 31 December 1988, the economic growth rate rose from 0.5 to 2.7 per cent over the plan period. We decided to restrict debt service repayments to 10 per cent of our budgeted annual export earnings. We are keeping our fingers crossed that we can maintain and hopefully increase our economic growth rate to 3 per cent per annum during the Fourth National Development Plan which was launched on 1 January 1989.

As a result of our decision taken to depart from the IMF-linked Structural Adjustment Programme, some of our friends in the West decided to cut off aid to our development programme, thereby adding a man-made financial drought to the natural climate droughts which for three successive years had crippled our efforts at achieving a faster economic recovery. It is worth mentioning here that most African countries have responded to the call for structural adjustment programmes – or, as they are sometimes referred to, austerity programmes.

The adoption of the APPER strategy was in response to these calls by our friends in the West. We were encouraged to believe, when the UN unanimously adopted the UNPAERD, that the additional resources which African countries would need to implement a new development strategy would be forthcoming. We were wrong. What we have witnessed by some Western countries is the most dramatic about-turn since the road to Damascus!

Allow me to emphasise what President Kaunda has often stated at other fora on this issue. The prosperity of the West is, to a great extent, dependent on the capacity of the South as a market, to continue purchasing its finished goods and services. It should concern the West, therefore, to ensure that the purchasing power of the South can be relied upon to sustain the prosperity of the North. We are, in the final analysis, each other's brother's keeper. For Zambia for instance, one tonne of copper in 1973 bought five tractors for agriculture. Today the same tonne produced at higher costs will not purchase a third even of a tractor.

This brings me to the subject of debt. Many seemingly helpful solutions have been suggested to bring relief to debt-ridden developing countries. Zambia is grateful to her partners in development who have decided to write off part of her debt and rescheduling the payment period for the remaining debt. We want to state, however, that this is not a lasting solution to the problem of debt. It is like informing a prisoner sentenced to death of the postponement of his execution.

Let me perhaps put it another way. When a tap is leaking, it is futile to start mopping up the water on the floor. The tap must first be firmly shut, and mopping up can then follow. The answer to debt is to improve the purchasing power of countries selling raw materials to the industrialised countries. Secondly, protectionist walls banning developing countries from gaining access to markets in what we are made to believe are free-market economies must be pulled down. Thirdly, developing countries must have the courage to accept the fact that unless they first add some value to their raw exports, they will continue to earn a pittance for their labour and they will get deeper and deeper into the quagmire of irredeemable debt. To add value to raw materials before export requires the stepping up of the application of science and technology to development which is one of the leading strategies of APPER and UNPAERD. For the majority of us in the South, the more we export the less we earn. The rich get richer and the poor in the end get more children, an expanded labour force without jobs, increasing acute poverty, social instability, fermenting serious threats to peace and democracy.

That is why Zambia attaches great importance to the ILO's technical assistance programme to developing countries in general and to our own country in particular. We remain determined to continue our programme of co-operation in the various fields of development and seek to orient these to our new strategy of development, and priorities outlined in our Fourth National Development Plan, which include the creation of some 400,000 new jobs in the formal sector during the plan period. We are painfully aware that even when this target is achieved, 400,000 jobs are a drop in the ocean of the unemployed in Zambia.

It is for this reason that we hope to improve our technical capacity to expand opportunities in small-scale farming and small-scale industry activities which have a bigger potential to absorb most if not all of the unemployed labour in Zambia.

On apartheid, we want to say this: We do not as yet share with the South African leadership the use of a common democratic dictionary. South Africa is a master in double-talk, surpassing even Humpty-Dumpty of English literature. It appears that George Orwell's 1984 is compulsory reading for all South African leaders. Mr. De Clerk, the new South African leader has announced that apartheid will be abolished in South Africa. The Western press appears to have been hoodwinked by this. De Clerk also announced in the same breath that group rights for various racial groups in South Africa are not negotiable. Group rights is another term for apartheid. Humpty-Dumpty again. The ILO should exercise caution with those who advise that an age of reasonableness has been born in South Africa.

Let us not forget or ignore the fact that South Africa did not volunteer to let go its stranglehold over Namibia. It was forced to the negotiating table by the victory scored on the battle ground by the heroic fighting forces of Angola, assisted by the great freedom-loving people of revolutionary Cuba, at Quito Canavale. ILO's call for the enforcement of comprehensive mandatory economic sanctions against the apartheid regime must be intensified, and ILO's assistance programme to workers' organisations in South Africa and Namibia, expanded.

We equally reaffirm our support to the fighting workers of Palestine and the occupied Arab territories. Their cause is our cause.

The agenda item on night work for women gives me the opportunity to report to this Conference of the very active and lively debate currently taking place in Zambia on the role and status of women in development. Our population statistics reveal that women constitute more than half of Zambia's population. Zambia's success in its development efforts will depend on what Zambia does to release the energy and potential of its woman-power to participate effectively in the development of the country in all spheres of human activity. The militant women's League of the United National Independence Party is demanding not only the women's right to night work, but to all other work hitherto reserved by law to men only, including underground work as miners.

Preliminary studies reveal that night work distorts the system of wages and the conditions of economic competition. There is no denying the fact that the present regulations governing night work are a blatant discrimination against women in their choice of employment and the development of their working life. The need for special protection of women in relation to certain conditions of work is often explained by reason of the woman's role as a mother; and yet the harmful effects and resultant problems of adapting the rhythms and cycles of production to the biological, psychological and social rhythms and cycles of human beings do not affect the woman alone, but both men and women. Regulations governing night work should be the same therefore for women and men. We fully agree with the call for further multi-disciplinary and internationally co-ordinated studies to establish whether there is medical evidence confirming unequal entrainment of biological rhythms of the long-term effects of night work on men differently from women, and the particular problems raised by different types of employment and climate in various geographical regions.

In concluding my delegation's remarks, I join other delegations in congratulating the ILO in the celebration of its 70th birthday. A lot has been achieved in the 70 years for which we can justly be proud. More work still lies ahead of us. Zambia takes this opportunity to renew its commitment to the ideals and objectives of the ILO. We pledge to strengthen the application in Zambia of the ILO's tripartite approach to industrial relations both in spirit and in practice. We will continue to favourably consider the early ratification of ILO Conventions and Recommendations not already ratified, consistent with our domestic legislation. We wish the President and the 76th session of our Conference, a resounding success.

Original - French: Mr. TEODORESCU (Employers' delegate, Romania) - It is a signal honour for me to congratulate the President, on behalf of the managers of enterprises in Romania, on his election as President of this session of the Conference, and to express my conviction that, thanks to his skills, this session will be crowned with success.

I also take this opportunity of extending my congratulations and best wishes to the new Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, and of wishing him every success in the discharge of his important responsibilities at the head of the ILO.

I should like briefly to address a number of elements bearing on the context in which the employers in Romania carry on their work.

The first of these is growth. This growth has continued despite the unfavourable international economic climate and the pressures on our resources in recent years stemming from the servicing of our foreign debt, which was fully paid off at the end of March last.

In recent years, 2,000 industrial units have been set up in Romania, both in old centres and in over 180 new industrial parks which, together with the new agro-industrial centres and tourist centres, constitute new growth poles.

This August, 45 years will have elapsed since our national and social, anti-fascist and anti-imperialist liberation revolution. During this period, Romania, once a poorly developed country, has advanced remarkably, and is now undergoing full progress. Industrial production is now 135 times what it was in 1945, and agricultural production has increased tenfold, while the national income has grown fortyfold. The Romanian economy today can produce goods of a high technical standard in virtually every sphere.

For the five-year period beginning in 1991, the intention is to continue the intensive development of industry, agriculture and other branches of activity on the basis of new achievements in science and technology. This will make it possible to maintain and intensify the participation of our economy in international trade with all regions of the world.

The second element that I should like to address is that of the economic machinery set up following the economic reforms undertaken over 20 years ago and which, in the framework of the integrated economic and social development plan, guarantees extensive autonomy to enterprises. The plan itself is based on an analysis of the possibilities and prospects for the development of enterprises. Under the system of self-management and self-financing, the enterprise organises its activity according to economic criteria, establishing its own income and expenditure budget. Its relations with other state enterprises or co-operatives are commercial relations based on contracts, both for the procurement of supplies needed for production and for the domestic or foreign market. The control centre of the enterprise features quantitative and qualitative economic indicators. While endeavouring to reach the plan targets, the enterprises set themselves the objective of raising efficiency and profitability by various means. It is in this context that enterprise directors attempt to solve the problem of utilising production capacity to the full, of using raw materials more effectively and, above all, of increasing productivity.

At present, in all enterprises, the aim is to maximise production and output, using existing capacities, by implementing measures prescribed in organisation and modernisation programmes designed by technical and management personnel, together with all the workers, with a view to making better use of modern management and work organisation methods.

In the present economic system, which has been gradually been adapted to new conditions, the production unit is still the focus of dialogue and co-operation between representatives of the Government, workers and enterprise director. While activities as a whole follow the guidelines contained in the state plan and major decisions concerning operations of the unit will be taken by the collective management bodies, namely the general assembly and the workers' council, day-to-day initiative and management are exercised by the management, by the directors of enterprises.

Their role and their status are by no means inferior to those of their colleagues in the market economy countries. It would be only fair to establish equality within the ILO among all employers of every kind, eliminating the discrimination which continues to be practised against managers from certain countries, including my own. Such an act of recognition of the diverse situations which exist in the world enterprise could only serve to strengthen the ILO, which itself is characterised by tripartism.

I should also like to point out that the employers in our enterprises receive a very thorough professional training at universities and polytechnics, and during regular further training courses. A growing number among them are women who display a high standard of competence.

One last element to which I should like to draw your attention concerns the desire of enterprise directors to contribute to providing training for workers and to improving working conditions and occupational safety in enterprises. Of course, the main role in training is played by schools. In Romania, where a ten-year education is compulsory, by the end of this year we will have extended this to 12 years of education. University education has largely been democratised, providing a supply of senior technical and managerial personnel to all branches of the national economy. The role of the enterprises in training workers is still important. It continues to provide qualifications on the job, maintains regular and contractual relations with the world of education and research, and is responsible for upgrading the skills and qualifications of all workers and technical personnel.

We appreciate the inclusion in the agenda of the item concerning the use of chemicals at work with a view to improving workers' protection and occupational safety at a time when advanced technologies are being introduced in productive processes in all areas of activity, including the chemical industry. We cannot emphasise enough the importance of this issue, both for enterprise and for the environment at the local, national and international levels.

Employers in Romania are concerned to ensure safe working conditions, particularly for those handling and directing manufacturing processes, production installations and users.

This concern focuses chiefly on the prevention of accidents at work.

Here legislation, supplemented by specific measures tailored to particular areas, helps to ensure that chemical industrial processes take place in environmental and safety conditions aimed at protecting the workers' health workers and the environment of the country.

It only remains for me to express the hope that the Conference will adopt appropriate instruments in this area.

Mr. DELEZA (Minister of Labour, Malawi) – It gives me great pleasure to be given the privilege of addressing this august assembly on behalf of the Government and the people of the Republic of Malawi.

First allow me to convey to you the warm and fraternal greetings from His Excellency, the Life President of the Republic of Malawi, Ngwazi Dr. H. Kamuzu Banda and the people of Malawi. I wish on behalf of my delegation and indeed on my own behalf to congratulate the President on his election to the high office of presidency of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. I would like to assure him of the high confidence we have in him and his competence to bring this Conference to its successful conclusion.

I would also like to endorse Malawi's acceptance of the appointment of Mr. Michel Hansenne as Director-General of the International Labour Office. On behalf of the Malawi Government I humbly seek the President's good offices to convey to the new Director-General our best wishes to him and heartfelt congratulations on his appointment to his high office. His appointment has come at a time when the world, especially the Third World, is faced with problems of unemployment, indebtedness and social injustice. I have no doubt, however, that his most valued and vast knowledge and experience in the field of labour and other social issues will help a lot in the proper and effective discharge of the activities of the International Labour Organisation and thereby contribute towards finding remedial solutions for the political and socio-economic problems besetting the human community all over the world today.

Malawi would thus once again like to associate itself with the basic founding principles and ideas of the International Labour Organisation 70 years ago to promote social justice, progress and fundamental human freedom. The unique tripartite constitution of the ILO itself gives the best possible structural forum to develop better and meaningful understanding among the social partners in development; namely, Governments, Employers and Workers, who have a collective responsibility in a collaborative spirit to address themselves to the emerging labour and social problems which form the central focus of our discussions.

On a very sympathetic note, please allow me to express to the Director-General of the ILO, on behalf of the Malawi Government, my delegation and indeed on my own behalf, our deepest sorrow and regret on the untimely death of Mr. Elimane Kane, a faithful and very dedicated servant of the ILO and in particular of Africa. The loss of his valued services and his absence at this session will indeed be felt for ever.

With reference to the Director-General's reports on the world economic recovery and employment activities of the ILO during 1988, my delegation considers both reports to be an outcome of excellent work. The Reports deal with very important and pertinent issues, first and foremost among them being the question of economic growth and employment, a subject of utmost importance for developing countries such as Malawi where the creation of productive employment and sustainable economic growth are some of the major challenges to development.

Malawi is in this respect one of those countries which had to take hard decisions on economic management as required by the World Bank and the IMF. The adoption of economic stabilisation and structural adjustment programmes by the Government were considered to be in the best interests of the economy in the long run. As rightly detailed in the Director-General's Report, the economic plight of sub-Saharan Africa, of which Malawi forms a part, is being aggravated by the debt service problem as well as the continued deterioration in the terms of trade. In the case of Malawi, however, due to the austerity programmes instituted earlier on, the economy registered a positive 4.2 per cent economic growth rate in 1988 and this economic recovery has spread to almost all sectors of the economy, including agriculture and the manufacturing sector.

The Director-General's Report also gives an account of the activities of the ILO in 1988 in various fields, including human rights, international labour standards, promotion of equality, industrial relations, social security and vocational training, among others. I would, in this connection, like to comment on the very valuable work being rendered by the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, which provides the basic points of reference to the activities of the International Labour Organisation such as in the development of harmonious labour relations, enactment of national legislation, improved opportunities for training and employment, just to mention a few. As stated in various parts of the Report, Malawi has greatly benefited from ILO programmes through the provision of both financial and technical assistance in areas of human resources development, industrial relations, vocational rehabilitation, social security and occupational safety and health, for which we are most grateful. In addition to our own national efforts of mobilising local resources for national development, it is indeed necessary to emphasise the need for substantial supplementary support from the international community particularly in the flow of capital and other types of assistance from the developed to the developing countries.

Malawi's economy is essentially agricultural. Over 80 per cent of the population reside and earn their living in rural areas through agriculture. Under the wise and dynamic leadership of His Excellency the Life President, Ngwazi Dr. H. Kamuzu Banda, the Government continues to develop this peaceful and prosperous country for all races to live in harmony and participate fully in the development process. The Government has embarked on a rural development programme to improve the general welfare of the people and generate employment, more especially in rural areas. The programme includes raising agricultural production, development of rural infrastructure, provision of social services and giving all possible support to small- and medium-scale enterprises for self-employment in both rural and urban areas.

Finally, I note that the Conference will consider some technical issues, such as the revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107), the issue of night work and safety in the use of chemicals at work, with a view to adopting Conventions or Recommendations. Malawi is one of the countries which has already ratified Convention No. 107 and when agreeing to the final version of this instrument consideration should be paid to the social and cultural differences that obtain in member countries so that those Members who have already ratified this instrument will be able to implement the new provisions that may be incorporated in the revised Convention. As for the other two subjects, on night work and safety in the use of chemicals at work, consideration should also be paid to the differences in the level of development of member States, for indeed it is not such a simple task to come up with provisions in the adopted instruments that would be universally applicable to all member States of this Organisation. This, in our view, is a very important point for delegates to bear in mind when adopting international instruments for possible ratification or adoption by member States.

With these few remarks, I wish the Conference every success.

Mr. ARBUCKLE (Employers' delegate, New Zealand) – On behalf of the New Zealand Employers' Federation, I would like to join my voice with those of other speakers in congratulating Mr. Nkomo on his election as President of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference.

In commenting on the Report of the Director-General, I would also like to pay tribute to Mr. Blanchard's outstanding record as chief executive of the Organisation and also to welcome the appointment of his successor and to wish him well in his difficult task.

The Director-General's Report, Recovery and employment, is of great interest to New Zealand. Our country has in the last five years switched its economy from one which was subject to a considerable degree of central control and direction to one in which most, but not all, controls have been removed. The centralised regime which existed up until 1984 had resulted in an economy which contained serious distortions. Our farming industries, for example, are exceptionally efficient by world standards but over the years their markets were restricted by protectionist devices employed in Europe and elsewhere and by dumping of subsidised products on world markets. The result was that by 1984 our farmers were being subsidised through product price support programmes. These programmes were in turn supporting inefficiencies in our processing and transport industries.

The financial system was also subject to centralised control which led to rigidities. Within these rigidities there was a lack of financial discipline so that producers other than exporters could operate on a cost-plus pricing of goods and services. The overall structure appeared to provide full employment but that appearance was under strain with unemployment levels increasing. It also marked decreasing standards of living arising from low productivity in many sectors.

The Labour government elected in 1984 dismantled the previous structure and the dismantling went further, and took place more quickly than in most other countries where subsidies and protection have been removed.

The radical changes were intended to create a so-called level playing field where no sector or group was favoured over the others. The theory was that market signals would trigger profitable change and freedom of competition would lead to lower prices and better services.

While there are critics of the timing and the pace of change, the overall thrust is one which has met with general approval. The effects of deregulation should, in the long run, improve our trading opportunities and ultimately improve prospects for employment.

However, the first and most noticeable effect of deregulation of both the financial and trading sectors has been an unprecedented rise in the level of unemployment in our small nation.

About 10 per cent of our workforce is unemployed. Back in the days before the oil crisis, New Zealand could boast of virtually zero unemployment with only a few hundred people out of work.

Farm production, particularly of meat, has dropped dramatically following the removal of subsidies which protected farm incomes for many years. This has led to large redundancies in the meat industry, one of our largest employers, and to a serious recession in provincial areas as farmers close their cheque books. Despite this, our farming industries can remain internationally competitive, and provided we can obtain the same free access to overseas markets for our most important products, that we as a nation accord to goods imported from other countries, the long-term prospects for our country are bright.

The face of New Zealand has changed in ways which are welcomed by many citizens. Consumer subsidies have disappeared and traditional manufacturing industries are no longer protected from imports. This means that consumers are now treated to a much wider range of cheaper goods. Producers too, can now obtain services and equipment at internationally competitive prices.

Adverse effects have been obvious, as the recession which started in provincial areas has now spread to towns and cities.

This recessionary phase has affected all strata of our society, but there are signs of an upturn. Our balance of trade figures has recovered, our inflation rate is lower than that of many of our trading partners and many industries have been restructured.

The Director-General of the ILO, in his Report on recovery and employment, deals directly with the issue of deregulation of the labour market. He points to three objectives of labour legislation: to guarantee a minimum level of protection for workers; to guarantee that workers will share in the fruits of development; and to allow the participation of workers in steering the course of developments to ensure that it will satisfy their aspirations.

These objectives will be very widely accepted. However, a substantial group of New Zealanders would suggest that they can only be attained in an economy which has been deregulated in an even-handed manner. They consider that in New Zealand progress is inhibited by various restrictions.

Most importantly there needs to be reform of the labour market in two areas: the restructuring of bargaining arrangements; and the removal of barriers to employment.

The most important legislation impinging on conditions of employment is the New Zealand Labour Relations Act. Some aspects of the legislation trouble New Zealand employers.

The philosophy behind the Act was to free the way for change to take place on the industrial scene, rather than to impose such change. There is a good argument for such an approach in matters which affect the working lives of most of the workforce. People and institutions do not find it easy to respond quickly to change. Evolution is preferable to revolution.

We see two difficulties, however. The first is that employers and workers need to have equal opportunities to control or influence the evolutionary process. In New Zealand, the Labour Relations Act gives special rights to unions, which are not available to other parties.

The second difficulty is that the slow change in labour market conditions has meant that different parts of the economy have moved at different speeds. Farmers and manufacturers in particular are operating in a partially deregulated environment. They have to sell their goods on deregulated markets and they have to pay high transport and other costs due to regulated labour practices. This has a depressing effect on profitability and an adverse effect on employment.

Other areas creating difficulties are taxation and non-wage labour costs which have increased substantially in recent years.

In earlier times, New Zealand was known as the social laboratory of the world. What I am saying is that the experiments are still going on, but that the present mixture of ingredients is not producing the required result quickly enough.

My suggestion is that changes need to be managed so that the various parts of the economy remain in harmony. This means taking into account not only financial and labour markets, but also areas of tax and welfare systems.

Having looked at some specifics about deregulation and what the employers would like to see, let us now go back to the guiding principles set down by the Director-General of the ILO.

The first was to guarantee a minimum level of protection to workers. In New Zealand, the Government sets minimum wages and conditions by various legislative provisions. However, in our country as elsewhere, if the minima are too high, they will have the reverse effect from that intended. If minimum conditions are inappropriately generous, there will be fewer jobs and this will disadvantage those least well-equipped to look after themselves.

The second of the Director-General's objectives was to guarantee that workers would share in the fruits of development. We believe that a study of market economies shows that no guarantees are necessary. The system automatically passes on a share of increased productivity to workers. Guarantees impose rigidities, and rigidities can prevent an adequate share of this year's fruits being reinvested to increase next year's crop.

The Director-General's final objective is to allow the participation of workers in steering the course of development to ensure that it will satisfy their aspirations. This question is being addressed to New Zealand by a Committee of Inquiry into industrial democracy.

Employers generally agree that programmes of employee involvement in the workplace are to the advantage of everyone in society. They result in greater productivity and the main beneficiaries of the wealth created are ordinary working people.

I would now like to turn from reform of the New Zealand economy and labour market to say a few words about reform in the ILO.

The New Zealand Employers' Federation has a long history of participation in, and support for, the International Labour Office. That record of support provides me with a firm base from which to voice support for the views expressed by the New Zealand Minister of Labour, the Honourable Stan Rodger, in his address to this Conference on 9 June.

I must say that people like myself, who see the Organisation and the way it operates for the first time, feel that there is a need for change. Large complex organisations are by their very nature slow to change and resistant, and they often have great difficulty in keeping focused on their true objectives.

Everyone knows that it is more comfortable to stick to the old ways than to change. Employers have had change forced on them by competition, by governments. They must change to survive.

The ILO has not yet been exposed to pressures which will force it to develop, at a reasonable pace, to meet new circumstances. It will require strong and purposeful direction to initiate and to carry through such a process of transformation. The suggestion made by our Minister, Mr. Stan Rodger, that there be an outside audit and a review as a starting point for a programme of reform is to my mind an imaginative initiative, worthy of the support of all delegations.

Mr. HARRIS (representative of the World Confederation of Organisations of the Teaching Profession) – Our Confederation has a key role to play in achieving the goals set forth in this year's theme, namely, recovery and employment, for teachers find themselves at the crossroads of the vast changes sweeping across modern society – changes in economics, technology and values.

Our members are workers who develop the most important of all resources – human resources – by providing basic primary and secondary education, the best investment of all in a society's future as well as the best hope for equity for the sons and daughters of workers. Our members provide the vocational training and adult education which will enable workers to respond to the changing demands of our time. And our members are playing an increasingly important role in the national trade union movements.

The theme of recovery and employment strikes an optimistic note. But the harsh reality for many millions of workers is unemployment or, at best, sporadic partial employment. For our members and many other workers in the Third World economic recovery is a distant mirage. The immediate concern today is survival.

Two weeks ago the leaders of teacher organisations from 45 countries met with senior officials of the ILO, other United Nations agencies, the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD), the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund (IMF). The profound difference of approach between the Bretton Woods institutions and the specialised agencies of the United Nations system, such as the ILO, could not have been more apparent. The ILO has led the way in highlighting the social consequences of adjustment. The Director-General's Report to this Conference demonstrates that over-harsh adjustment measures add up not only to bad social policy, but also to bad economics.

The time has come to challenge the shaky intellectual basis for the econometric models which are being used in the name of adjustment to inflict misery and suffering on millions of human beings.

The economists of the World Bank and the IMF speak with certainty. They are sure they are right. But when we looked at the models they used to justify repressive policies in the education field, we found that the parameters were based on questionable assumptions. Those parameters influenced the outcomes far more than the variables which they fed into their computers.

These pessimistic parameters produce results which are said to prove that the only way to find funds for education is to charge user fees for workers' children or to hire untrained teachers with minimal education who will learn on the job. The World Bank and the IMF say that the urban and rural workers of the Third World have no alternative but to accept a third-rate education. More of the elites of the Third World will then opt out by sending their children overseas to study, thereby further weakening support for national education. And the unemployed will have little hope of education at all.

This is a scandal. The trade union movements of the world must unite their forces and rise up in protest. As the representatives of workers, we must insist on what the Bretton Woods institutions dare not advocate, the reallocation of national resources from destruction to construction. We must have the courage to seek a reduction of national expenditures on armaments, which are used all too often against the citizens they are supposed to protect, and a reallocation of those resources to areas of social need, particularly health and education, which make up the social wage of workers.

At the international level, we urge the International Labour Conference to endorse the concept of a Marshall Plan for the Third World. A plan which will display the vision to reach beyond the bankers' obsession with servicing of debts created by factors which the ILO has demonstrated are largely external to the countries concerned. A plan for sustainable development, compatible with the environment. A plan designed with the full participation and support of the trade union movements, national, regional, such as the Organisation of African Trade Union Unity (OATUU) and the European Trade Union Confederation (ETUC), and international, as well as employers and governments.

Only such a plan will enable the Third World to break out of the vicious circle of poverty. Only such a plan will redress the growing imbalance, the polarisation between those who benefit from technological change and those who are victims of change. Such a plan will benefit the workers and peoples both of the industrialised countries and of the Third World. And only such a plan will create the conditions for recovery and the extension of employment opportunities in all regions.

The Director-General's Report, recovery and employment, demonstrates that trade unions today face new challenges of unprecedented scope and magnitude.

Trade unions must maintain their traditional action on behalf of employees vis-à-vis employers – whether private or public – while recognising that the economic and social factors in question are often external to the enterprise, or even to the country as a whole. The previous speaker gave good examples of that.

In the public sector, where many of our members work, negotiations are increasingly conducted at the local community level, but are circumscribed by trends which are international. This is true for the OECD and the CMEA countries as well as for the Third World.

Technological change has major implications for trade union membership as does feminisation of the workforce. In response to these challenges, we see the emergence throughout the world of a new trade unionism to which the Confederation I represent has an important contribution to make.

This new trade unionism has its basic unit at the level of the local community but is capable of identifying and acting upon international trends. It represents the entire range of wage earners and salaried occupations in the public and private sectors, including increasing numbers of employees with professional skills and training. It deals with questions which affect not only the income but also the quality of work and the quality of life of the members, including social wage concerns such as education, health and the environment. It backs up its advocacy and representation with sound research and effective strategies.

Our teachers' Confederation is well placed to contribute to this new trade unionism. We are working together with our fellow unionists on the implications of technological change, which invariably include questions of education and training. More and more, our members are forming powerful alliances with fellow unionists – miners, automobile and chemical workers, agricultural workers, public service workers and many others, working together for social justice.

Let me add that our Confederation with 12 million members in 111 countries has three principles which we believe must also underpin the new trade unionism, especially at the international level, so that we can respond effectively to the great challenges of our time. Those principles can be summarised as representativity, democratic participation, and political independence.

Democratic participation in trade union life is the natural requirement and consequence of reaching out to the local community. We are a non-aligned organisation. We see political independence at the international level as being a necessary condition for effective action on the economic forces which disrupt national societies. Representativity is linked to the other two. It means searching for unity, respecting diversity of opinion, rejecting the concept of exclusion. It also means, and this is important, representivity for women, for ethnic minorities, for migrant workers.

We share these principles with friends throughout the trade union movement, with brother and sister unionists who want to see the international trade union movement overcome splits, which reflect the ideological cleavages between nation states, and who want international trade unionism to be reinvigorated as a powerful force for social justice, peace and progress.

We salute the vision and courage of the many unionists who are working in all political systems to achieve the reallocation of resources from military to social purposes. In a word, we are saying that the battle ahead is so difficult, the consequences for workers throughout the world so dramatic, that trade unionism must unite all its forces.

These are not mere words. As I speak, our members are engaged with fellow workers in struggles for justice, for decency and dignity and a better quality of life for ordinary people. Teacher unionists are often singled out as targets for repression. Some pay with their lives or their liberty.

We currently have complaints before the Committee on Freedom of Association Committee on serious situations in Colombia, El Salvador, Brazil, Chile, Paraguay and Nepal.

In South Africa, teachers are working with the Congress of South African Trade Unions (COSATU) to form a single non-racial organisation whose very existence will pose a direct challenge to apartheid schooling, indeed to the very system of apartheid.

Meanwhile in countries such as Canada, Netherlands, Norway, Trinidad and Tobago and the United Kingdom, economic arguments have been used to justify the abrogation of standards established in international law. The standards set in ILO Conventions constitute an enormous contribution to the rule of law at the international level. But the last decade has seen a retreat from law. Economics has become all! This is a dangerous trend.

In our field of work we have a particular standard – the ILO/UNESCO Recommendation on the Status of Teachers. The excellent 196-page report of the Committee of Experts presented to this Conference gives detailed evidence of a general retreat from standards which were approved unanimously by government in 1966. This week we have reported in the Commission on specific cases but the general point is that labour standards are under attack everywhere.

In the face of the continuous assault on standards in our field, we welcome the decision of the Director-General to convene a joint meeting of governments and unions on conditions of work for teachers. We confidently expect that the ILO's Governing Body will ensure broad teacher union representation which reflects the reality in member States because realistic, broad representation is clearly in the interests of all parties.

One of the best defences against attacks on standards is for the workers to know their own rights. We place the greatest importance on co-operation with the ILO to disseminate information about labour standards and to develop workers' education activities at the regional level. We do not hesitate to co-operate with other international trade union secretariats in further promoting workers' education throughout the world, for this is a task of the highest priority.

As we strive to turn back the tide which has eroded standards in recent years, I come back to the point that our members and other workers in the developing countries are struggling to survive and we strongly support the ILO's work to develop workers' co-operatives.

I wish to go on record as paying tribute to the professional expertise and competence of the ILO secretariat, whether in the handling of specific complaints, the monitoring of standards for salaried and professional workers, the extension of workers' education or the development of co-operatives. The ILO has the well-deserved reputation of having one of the most effective secretariats of the entire United Nations system, and as a Confederation which believes in effective unionism aimed at getting the best results with solid backing for every case we put forward we appreciate that expertise.

We believe that the effectiveness of the new international trade unionism of which I have spoken today must be carried forward by a vision.

That vision is perhaps best conveyed in the words of a great leader of the masses of his country, a great mobiliser, who had such a vision.

In 1967, 22 years ago, Martin Luther King spoke of:

"A prolonged struggle ... [to] ... change the shape of the world, as millions of deprived people shake and transform the earth in their quest for life, freedom and justice.

It is clear to me that the next stage of the movement is to become international. We have hardly begun to build the skills and the strategy, or even the commitment to planetise our movement for social justice."

From the time of the Tolpuddle Martyrs, trade unions have done more for social justice than any other institution in society. Now we are confronted by changes as profound and disruptive as the Industrial Revolution itself, combined with deepening poverty on a planetary scale.

And that is the challenge to which a new trade unionism must respond!

Mr. TSAGAAN (Workers' delegate, Mongolia) – To begin with, allow me to congratulate Mr. Nkomo on the occasion of his election to the presidency of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference and to wish him success in discharging his duties.

This session is being held at a time of great importance for the life of the International Labour Organisation – the commemoration of the 70th anniversary of its foundation.

The official ceremony observing the 70th anniversary of the foundation of the ILO, and the warm words and wishes addressed on this occasion, testify to the fact that the world community, and first and foremost, the workers, including those of my country, highly value the activities of this international body.

The Report of the Director-General, Recovery and employment, comes to grips with the acute social and economic problems, the settlement of which will undoubtedly be in the interests and aspirations of the working people of all countries, with no exception. The Report is based on a wide range of facts and statistics and is a cause for serious consideration. However, in our opinion, the Report could have been enriched by covering the specific aspects of the modern economic life of States with differing social systems.

It should be pointed out that we fully share the view of the Director-General that "economic growth and social progress must advance together".

Nowadays, when deep structural changes are taking place in the economies of a number of countries of the world, it is important to combine, in the best possible way, the solution of economic and social problems. Without the recovery of an economy and its rapid development, it will be hard to resolve questions of a social nature. Likewise, it is difficult to ensure economic progress with burning social problems, the solution of which lags behind that of the economy. Therefore, we fully subscribe to, and share the conclusions that social policy is an active factor in the development of economies.

Cardinal economic reforms and economic recovery, aimed at the introduction of new economic mechanisms based on the principles of self-management and self-financing, are currently being carried out in our country. New forms of labour organisation such as the creation of co-operatives, land leasing and family contracting are being introduced both in rural and urban areas.

The Mongolian trade unions are especially concerned with the question of how to protect the rights and interests of the co-operatives and their members. In this respect, we attach great importance to the law of the Mongolian People's Republic on co-operatives, the draft of which is now being discussed on a nation-wide scale. It should be mentioned that the representatives of the trade unions have actively taken part in its drafting."

In the meantime, we focus our attention on such urgent problems as the vocational orientation of the younger generation, the training and retraining of workers dismissed from state enterprises and establishments.

In accordance with the provisions of the Law on State Enterprises, which come into force in January this year, the enterprises and their workers' collectives now benefit from more rights and privileges than before. It has to be stated that in the course of the application of this law, trade unions frequently face new problems of a social nature, stemming from the settlement of economic, technical and ecological problems. The trade unions act against the technocratic attitude in the economy, favouring the reinforcement of a social orientation in all decisions taken. They unswervingly favour a bridging of the time gap between the implementation of economic objectives and the development of the socio-cultural environment.

In conformity with the decisions of the Fourth Plenary Meeting of the Central Council of the Mongolian Trade Unions, held this March, specific measures are under way, aimed at strengthening the primary and branch union organisations, at deepening internal trade union democracy and reinforcing activities aimed at their protection.

Recently, the Central Council of the Mongolian Trade Unions, exercising its constitutional right to initiate projects of law, forwarded a proposal to develop a law on trade union rights. I am entirely convinced that the elaboration and adoption of such a law will further enhance the role of trade unions and expand the possibilities of our action-orientated participation by dealing with social and economic problems for the benefit of workers.

I would like to take this opportunity to express our hope that the ILO will attach due attention to the development of technical co-operation with my country, particularly with its trade unions, which are an influential force in the life of our society.

Experience shows that the problems of economic recovery, employment and sustained improvement of the quality of life of workers at national, regional and global levels can only be surmounted in favourable international conditions based on dialogue, equal and mutually beneficial co-operation, and on the establishment of a just international economic order. In this connection, we appreciate the ILO initiative to launch a special programme on structural adjustment. At the same time, we express our hope that the results and conclusions of this important undertaking will become a useful guide in the activities of affiliated and independent trade union organisations, striving for peace and disarmament, for the fair allocation of the thus released resources to the improvement of the labour conditions and living standards of workers.

The Mongolian trade unions are in full solidarity with workers, and with trade unions fighting against apartheid and any other forms of racial discrimination for the achievement of economic independence and equality.

Next year, the centenary of 1 May will be celebrated by the world community. On that occasion the ILO could and should make its contribution to the commemoration of this great event in the history of workers' and trade union movements, since the ideals of the May Day celebration and the purpose of the ILO in many cases coincide and mutually complement each other, by promoting the interests of working people all over the world.

The statements made by the distinguished guests and delegates at this jubilee session, containing business-like proposals and a wide exchange of opinions on urgent topical issues, once again convince all of us that we shall succeed in the noble aims set forth in the ILO Constitution and the Philadelphia Declaration, exclusively through joint actions and efforts.

Mr. REINI (representative of the Nordic Confederation of Supervisors, Technicians and Other Managers) – May I first take this opportunity to congratulate Mr. Nkomo on his election to the presidency of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. I would also like to extend my congratulations to his Vice-Presidents.

This session of the International Labour Conference will deal with matters which are vital from the viewpoint of the trade union movement.

The development of the global economy and employment are of crucial importance to the trade union movement. Prosperity can only increase if there is continued economic growth. Technological inventiveness and the rational use of economic resources could bring increased prosperity to every member of the human race, even though the fruits are not fairly shared out in today's world.

Internationalisation is bringing about far-reaching changes in trade union activities. Internationalisation is a process which affects all aspects of society, particularly business, communications and leisure.

The effects of modern technology on working life constitute another central issue for the trade union movement. automation and robots are making themselves felt in virtually every field. Some traditional jobs and occupations will be lost and replaced by new information, service and research posts.

The trade union movements' views must be taken into account when new technology is designed and installed. Our voice must be stronger than it is today. We need bargaining and legislation to ensure that both employers and employees are able to avail themselves fully of the benefits of modern technology.

How much influence can the trade union movement exert in an era of structural change? Trade unions must make themselves heard and play an active role if structural change is not to take place exclusively on terms laid down by employers and capital. We stress that the work of preparing for structural change should involve three parties – employers, central government and trade unions – as equal partners.

This session will discuss the subject of the status of night work, shift work and related problems.

Improving the qualitative aspects of working life will be one of the most important challenges which the trade union movement will face in the 1990s.

Hours of work are a matter which should be approached from the perspective of individuals. We should talk of lifespan hours of work.

Individual-oriented lifespan hours of work would allow employees to harmonise their jobs and personal circumstances. Everyone would be able to make their own decisions about when to retire. Lifespan hours of work would also promote sabbatical years, parental leave and flexible employment and leisure in general.

We are moving towards more fluid hours of work which will give men and women the opportunity to adapt their work to their personal circumstances.

The International Labour Organisation's 70 years of existence has undeniably proved the wisdom of the tripartite principle. The philosophy will continue to be one of the ILO's chief tenets in the future. The International Labour Organisation is a unique global body in so far as spokesman for employers, employees and central government enjoy equal speaking rights and have the same right to make decisions.

European trade unions would like to apply the tripartite principle to the integration process. The key elements here are taxation policy, uniform education and the recognition of qualifications, training policies, participation systems and what is known as the social dimension.

If the tripartite principle were realised and trade unions were able to discuss the integration process with employers' spokesmen and central government, the trade union movement's views would be taken heed of.

The International Labour Organisation should work to safeguard employees' interests in the integration process. European directives will come to have a greater impact on the social sphere in the near future and the ILO may play a less central role in regulating working life. I believe that the Organisation is too internationally important to allow this to happen. We should compile a policy which will ensure that the ILO's recommendations remain important in the jungle of European directives; let us transfer the tripartite principle to Brussels where European decisions are made.

Allow me to congratulate the International Labour Organisation on the occasion of its 70th anniversary. I would also like to thank the former Director-General, Francis Blanchard, for visiting Finland. His stay was a marked success. I also wish his successor, Director-General Michel Hansenne, every success in his important work. And finally, I wish this Conference every success – the items you have on the agenda before you are crucial to all wage earners.

Original – Arabic: The PRESIDENT (Mr. GAZARIN) – I give the floor to Mr. Borg Cardona who wishes to exercise his right of reply.

Mr. BORG CARDONA (Government delegate, Malta) – The delegate of the General Workers' Union has made allegations regarding what he called flagrant violations of basic union rights and brutal attacks by the police on trade union officials. These allegations are so far removed from reality that other members of the Maltese delegation wonder whether they are living in the same country. I shall not waste your time by commenting on what is irrelevant to this Conference. The Government is happy to leave judgment of its actions to the courts of law, both local and international, to the ILO and to public opinion. The General Workers' Union has been represented here long enough to know that any valid complaint against the Government can be lodged with the ILO. The union has not done so because there is no basis to justify any of the accusations made. Unlike what has happened in the past, court sentences against the Government with regards to human rights or complaints to the ILO have been conspicuous only by their absence during the present administration.

This is not the proper place for partisan propaganda. We have much more important work to do.

(The Conference adjourned at 6.15 p.m.)

Credentials

Second Report of the Credentials Committee

Composition of the Conference

1. Since 9 June when the Committee adopted its First Report, credentials have been received from a further five member States: El Salvador, Grenada, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau and Sao Tome and Principe. Sao Tome and Principe has not accredited an Employers' delegate. On the other hand, one country (Liberia) has completed its delegation by designating a Workers' delegate.

Communication concerning the delegation of Afghanistan

2. The Committee received a communication from the delegation of Pakistan stating that it wished to place on record its reservations regarding the credentials of the delegation of Afghanistan. The Committee noted that apart from recording this reservation, the communication did not call for any action on its part.

Communication concerning the Workers' delegation of Brazil

3. The Committee received a telegram sent by the President of the "Associação dos fiscais do Trabalho aposentados" claiming that the Brazilian delegation did not represent 12 million retired workers. The Committee considered that this telegram did not constitute an objection as defined in article 26, paragraph 3, of the Standing Order of the Conference and called for no action on its part.

Communications concerning the Workers' delegate of the Central African Republic

4. On 13 June 1989 the Committee received a communication from the World Federation of Labour indicating that the Workers' delegate of the Central African Republic, Mr. Etienne Kangabet, appeared in the Delegation List as General Secretary of the "Confédération Nationale des Travailleurs Centrafricains" (CNTC), a post occupied by Mr. Jean-Richard Sandos. On the following day the Committee received a letter signed by Mr. Jean-Richard Sandos as General Secretary of CNTC affirming that Mr. Kangabet had no mandate to represent the Confederation.

5. The Committee considered that since the name of the Workers' delegate of Central African Republic had appeared in the Supplement "Addenda and modifications" to the Delegation List published on the morning of Friday 9 June 1989, these communications, in so far as they might constitute an objection, would be irreceivable as having been received after the expiry of the 72-hour time-limit established in article 26, paragraph 4(a), of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

6. At the same time, the Committee took note of a communication from the head of the government delegation of Central African Republic indicating that, when the credentials were drawn up, an error was made in attributing to Mr. Kangabet the title of General Secretary of CNTC, and that this person was in fact a member of the "Syndicat des Postes et des Télécommunications". The Committee instructed that the title of the Workers' delegate of Central African Republic, Mr. Kangabet, be corrected in the Final List of Delegates.

Communications concerning the Employers' delegation of Peru

7. On 12 June 1989 the Committee received two communications, one from the Employers' delegate of Peru, Mr. J.C. Barrenechea Calderón and the other, from the Secretary-General of the International Organisation of Employers, seeking invalidation of the credentials of two persons nominated to take part in the Peruvian Employers' delegation as technical advisers without the consent of the "Confederación Nacional de Instituciones Empresariales Privadas" (CONFIEP), the only organisation in Peru which could be characterised as most representative of Peruvian employers.

8. The communications also indicated that the Government had not fulfilled its obligation to bear the travelling and subsistence expenses of the Employers' delegation, as was clear from the official notification of the nomination.

9. With respect to the objection to the nomination of the two persons concerned, the Committee noted that the names of these persons having been published in a supplement to the Provisional Record on 7 June 1989, these communications had been received outside the time-limit of 72 hours established in article 26, paragraph 4(a) of the Standing Orders of the Conference on receivability of objections.

10. With respect to the question of travelling and subsistence expenses of the delegation, the Committee drew attention to paragraph 17 of its First Report (Provisional Record, No. 8, page 8/51) in which governments were reminded of their obligation to bear such expenses in accordance with article 13, paragraph 2(a) of the Constitution.

Communication from the Officers of the Employers' Group

11. The Committee had before it a communication signed by the Chairman and the four Vice-Chairmen of the Employers' group, expressing the Group's concern at the failure of the governments of several countries to fulfil their obligations under article 13, paragraph 2(a) of the ILO Constitution. The communication cited eleven cases of non-payment of travelling and subsistence expenses, and four cases of non-payment of subsistence costs, of Employers' delegates. Four of these Employers' delegates requested to be mentioned in the Committee's Report. These were the Employers' delegates of Brazil, Dominican Republic, Lebanon and Peru. The communication also claimed that in the case of thirty countries, governments had not borne the expenses of one or more advisers to the Employers' delegate.

12. The Committee drew attention to paragraph 17 of its first report (Provisional Record, No. 8, page 8/51) in which it reminded governments of their obligation to bear the travelling and subsistence expenses of their delegations in accordance with article 13, paragraph 2(a), of the Constitution.

13. The Credentials Committee submits the present report to the Conference in order that the Conference may take note of it.

President: Mr. Gazarin

EIGHTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

Original – Arabic: The PRESIDENT (Mr. GAZARIN) – The first item on our agenda is the eight report of the Selection Committee. I give the floor to Mr. Hammond, Government adviser, Canada, Chairman of the Selection Committee, to submit the report.

Mr. HAMMOND (Government adviser, Canada; Chairman of the Selection Committee) – I have the honour to submit to the Conference the eight report of the Selection Committee which is to be found in Provisional Record No. 4G.

The report deals with a request from the International Federation of Chemical, Energy and General Workers' Unions, which has already been invited to the Conference, to be represented in the Committee on the Use of Chemicals, and with changes in the composition of committees.

I commend the report to the Conference for adoption.

Original – Arabic: The PRESIDENT (Mr. GAZARIN) – I submit the eighth report of the Selection Committee to the Conference for discussion. If there are no objections, I take it that the report is adopted.

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

Original – Arabic: The PRESIDENT (Mr. GAZARIN) – The next item on our agenda is the discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General.

Original – French: Mr. CAMARA (Government delegate, Guinea) – On behalf of my delegation and my country I would first like to join in the warm congratulations that have already been addressed to the President from this rostrum. He deserves them as a tireless crusader for freedom and social justice, a theme which the 76th Session of our Conference has chosen to guide its work.

With the help of the President and on the basis of his vast, rich experience, the success of our work is guaranteed. My congratulations also go to the Vice-Presidents, who I am sure will share the heavy duties of his high office.

The regular staging of the sessions of our Conference ever since the ILO's creation in 1919, the forum it offers Government, Employers' and Workers' representatives for democratic discussion of various aspects of the overall economic and social situation and of living and working conditions, the continued enthusiasm and zeal shown by the delegations in the course of these deliberations all testify to the hope and belief of all nations, in particular those of the Third World, with respect to the ideals of the ILO.

The Governing Body and the Director-General of the ILO have once again shown their skill and their efficiency in presenting the annual progress report and the very interesting Report, Recovery and employment.

My delegation would briefly like to express its appreciation for the pragmatic approach of these reports and the rich contribution which they make, and it welcomes the other documents that have been designed to facilitate our discussions.

The subjects tackled illustrate the constant concern of our Organisation, which represents the social conscience of the international community, to meet the concerns of mankind and to fulfil its aspirations to freedom, dignity, justice and progress.

Our Conference is being held at a time when economic and social questions are becoming increasingly complex in the world.

In this context, addressing the subject of economic recovery involves a discussion of the present economic relations among States and should be seized as an opportunity to stress the importance of and the need for co-operation among all nations in an effort to orient our activities towards general prosperity.

The close interdependence amongst our countries stems from the fact that our economies are more and more interrelated. This shows the need for us to tackle together the economic challenge before us in a spirit of world-wide solidarity.

This approach appears to us as a guarantee for the creation and maintenance of lasting prosperity.

That is why we share the ideas expressed by the Director-General on the present situation concerning multilateral co-operation and the measures he advocates to stimulate it.

For our part, we feel that there is a need to improve aid and the way it is provided. We feel that there can be no development if there is no net transfer of financial resources in favour of our countries – over a long period of time – and if the debt burden is not significantly alleviated and debt servicing reduced to proportions which are bearable for developing country economies.

I would like to take this opportunity to draw the attention of this distinguished assembly to the fact that the launching in 1961 of the United Nations First Development Decade represented an effort undertaken at world level to consolidate this solemn commitment. Ever since, we have continued to adopt specific measures and to set up and use new international co-operation institutions for this purpose.

However, the living conditions of millions of human beings in the developing parts of the world remain desperately and appallingly low. Frequently, these persons are undernourished, illiterate, unemployed and deprived of the basic needs of existence. This applies to an extent where the disappointments of yesterday coupled with those of today have completely darkened the horizon of development, although we yearn to reach it still.

The next decade should, as we see it, mark a step forward in the direction of prosperity and well-being, not only for present generations but especially for future generations.

The progress of development in various countries will depend to a large extent on an improvement of the overall international economic situation, in particular on the specific progress made in promoting equality with respect to political, economic, social and cultural rights for all members of society. It will also depend on the progress made towards total disarmament and peace, a guaranteed way of releasing important additional resources to be devoted to economic and social development, in particular in developing countries.

We are convinced that the road towards peace and justice must involve development, and we therefore believe that governments must reaffirm their strong determination to jointly seek a better, more efficient system of international co-operation to end the disparities which presently exist in the world and to ensure prosperity for all.

The Report of the Director-General of the ILO echoes the measures taken by my country, the Republic of Guinea, since the Military Committee for National Recovery came to power on 3 April 1984.

Drawing a lesson from the disappointing results of collectivisation of Guinea's economy for a quarter of a century, the Committee has resolutely opted for a liberal course in connection with social and economic development, thus making private initiative the driving force of development.

In this spirit, with the assistance of friendly countries and international organisations, the Government has drawn up and implemented a national recovery programme which included structural adjustment and readjustment measures, government withdrawal from productive sectors, from banking, from business and from services, improvements in public sector employment and the provision of greater motivation in public service.

These measures have been consolidated through the adoption of new legislation and new procedures which have now begun to relaunch the previously stagnating economy.

Agricultural production has thus started to develop in a way which makes food self-sufficiency seem a likelihood within the next five years. Economic participants in all sectors have shown unsuspected dynamism, while aggregate economic figures have improved and inflation has fallen from 78 to 28 per cent. However, the achievement of this vast ambitious programme includes the management of a heavy, sensitive labour component through the compression of employees in the public sector, accompanied by support measures, the setting up training and further training institutions and activities, and increased efforts to improve teaching and education.

From this point of view, all sectors of activity are now open to both national and foreign private initiative against a background of full compliance with the principles of freedom and individual property.

The Republic of Guinea, which has become a constitutional State, endeavours to scrupulously respect human rights, the rights of parties, and to promote social dialogue based on partnership.

In connection with Part II of the Director-General's Report, dealing with the activities of our Organisation in 1988, one is obviously impressed by the extent and diversity of technical co-operation in which most resources are allocated to developing countries.

My country is proud to pay tribute to deserving efforts from which it has steadily benefited, in particular since 1984, in improved management of human resources, the introduction of better legal and social protection of workers and the furthering of tripartism and collective bargaining.

These technical co-operation and development concerns of ours serve as a basis for the draft programme and budget for the biennium 1990-91. My country actively participated in its discussion and approval in the Governing Body and warmly supports its adoption by our Conference, thus enabling the Office to carry out its world-wide activities in favour of freedom, dignity, improved living conditions and the protection of men and women at the workplace.

Our Conference is also tackling two major technical subjects which, due to their social implications, provide a constant challenge. The Bhopal disaster in India and the disaster at the nuclear power plant at Chernobyl, in the USSR, are still too fresh in our memories for us to fail to improve protection against occupational hazards, in the chemical sector in particular. In many respects night work calls for a different type of vigilance from that required during day work.

The Republic of Guinea, through its new labour legislation, already advocates greater protection. It would welcome any new provisions likely to strengthen its own standards in order to protect our most precious capital, men and women.

Finally apartheid, a crime against humanity, is a question which is of concern to us because it is a serious threat to international peace and security. As always, the Government of Guinea denounces with the utmost vigor this shameful, inhuman system in South Africa.

With regard to international organisations, the Government of Guinea has always strictly supported and implemented the resolutions of the United Nations and its agencies for the imposition of comprehensive mandatory sanctions on the South African Government.

Guinea is firmly convinced that only concerted action on the part of the international community can put an end to apartheid, this shame of our century. May our Organisation, with its 70 years of experience, and still very young, support this action in favour of justice and human dignity.

Original – French: Mr. ONDONDA (Workers' delegate, The Congo) – It is an honour for me to participate in the work of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference and to speak on behalf of the Trade Union Confederation of Congo to this august body.

Before I continue, I should like to carry out a pleasant duty, that of congratulating the President on his successful election to the presidency of this session and the manner in which he conducts our debates.

As we are aware, the International Labour Organisation is celebrating this year its 70th anniversary. Created in order to bring together governments, employers and unions to carry out joint action to promote social justice and better living and working conditions throughout the world, the International Labour Organisation over all these years has sought for appropriate solutions to the serious problems which affect the working world and has formulated the necessary policies and methods to bring about its objectives.

Workers and their national and international trade union organisations have always acted as a moving spirit in the adoption of ILO instruments and the application and monitoring of all international labour standards. Today, too, we are all full aware of the great responsibility which falls upon the International Labour Organisation in defining policies to safeguard human rights, viciously trampled on throughout the world.

The Trade Union Confederation of the Congo, which I represent here, endorses with pleasure the highly praiseworthy efforts which the International Labour Office continues to exert to bring about a world good to live in.

Unfortunately the economic and social crisis, which affects every country and particularly the African countries, is hindering the realisation of this aim.

The fundamental cause of the current crisis, which has been going on for many years, is for Africa the extreme fragility of the economic and social structures of the African countries and their great vulnerability to external shock.

Indeed the African countries today are the scene of disturbing events: they are the victims of U-turns in economic policy by the industrialised countries. To be frank, Africa is still the region most affected by the world economic recession, inflation, fluctuations in commodity prices, the terrible drop in operational income, the balance-of-payment deficit, the excessive debt burden, not to mention the phenomena of drought, desertification, famine, disease, illiteracy and unemployment, so many evils which affect the peoples of the African countries. A number of these countries are seeing a progressive deterioration in their economic structures, which hampers any development efforts that some of them may carry out.

The economic difficulties of our countries are, moreover, intensified by exploitation on the part of foreign monopolies and transnational companies. All of these accumulated evils have contributed to the deterioration in the economies of the African countries and left the majority of these countries in a state of economic ruin and permanent dependence on the outside world.

In the face of such a situation, the recovery of economic growth in African countries should inevitably come about by easing of the debt burden, stabilising commodity prices, removing protectionist barriers and increasing aid and investment.

Thus we consider that during these extremely difficult years, international co-operation has become a more pressing requirement than ever, since economic and social development in Africa depends on it. The international community should be more attentive to the problems of the African continent during this period of generalised crisis. It must bear in mind that African governments have already shown their strong determination and political will in having themselves proposed a priority programme of economic and institutional reform for the recovery of their economies and the accelerated implementation of the plan of action and the Final Act of Lagos.

It should be emphasised strongly here that all African economies are ravaged by the crisis. All are victims of the same ferocious exploitation. All the raw materials of these countries are similarly sold off at derisory prices. It would therefore be unjust to accord privileges to certain amongst these countries by describing them as the poorest.

We may also wonder with a pang what lies in wait for the so-called middle-income African countries. These countries are in reality as badly off as the others, because they undergo the same repression, the same exploitation and, like the others, have not yet passed the pre-industrial stage and do not deserve the treatment meted out to them, namely to be abandoned.

We are all aware that priority aid goes to the poorest countries, those called the least developed countries. But the drop in the price of oil and other commodities has also brought about a serious worsening of the economic and social situation in the middle-income countries like the People's Republic of the Congo. Doubtless, the donor countries will have thought that the middle-income African countries are not ill enough to be in danger of dying and that they must rush to the aid of those they consider to be in the death throes.

The selection carried out in settling the problem of debt for African countries is not such as to promote a general recovery of the African economy, as intended by the Programme of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development.

The Conference has once again included on its agenda the item dealing with information and reports as to the application of the Conventions and Recommendations of the International Labour Organisation.

We know what a delicate question this is and we recognise that one of the main functions of the International Labour Organisation is to adopt Conventions and Recommendations and to call upon States to respect their commitments by ratifying and applying them.

As regards the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), we consider that the trade union situation in the Congo is largely the result of historic and socio-economic conditions in our country and that the International Labour Office should take this into consideration.

The trade union movement of the Congo, like that of many other African countries, takes a leading role in the political life of the people of the Congo. Having played their historical part in triggering the revolution in the Congo, the workers, acting in the trade union framework, had to strengthen their unity, and this concern prompted them to set up a single trade union confederation, having realised, in the light of experience, that plurality of trade union confederations exacerbated division in the ranks of the members, while social, economic and political conditions remained the same. The aims and the methods of the Trade Union Confederation of the Congo adopted following the Constitutional Congress of November 1964 were welcomed enthusiastically by all of the workers of the Congo. This means that the working class of the Congo deliberately opted for trade union unity, and firmly opposed the plurality of trade union confederations in the Congo.

Moreover, from 1965 to 1973, the Trade Union Confederation of the Congo came up against difficulties in operation because members' contributions were low. The young organisation, which was duty-bound to participate in the development of the country, encountered tremendous financial problems. Obviously, such an organisation cannot claim to defend the basic interests of its members in the best manner without the resources necessary to implement its policies.

This is why during the Fourth Regular Congress of the Trade Union Confederation of the Congo, participants adopted the check-off method so as to enable all of our branch unions, of which there are now 13, to successfully assert the claims of the workers and their families.

As we can see, the development which our trade union movement has undergone manifests the will of the working masses, which cannot be challenged except by broad-based popular consultation.

My country, the Congo, pays a great deal of attention to the struggle of the peoples of southern Africa against the heinous system of apartheid. We are all aware that the Pretoria regime continues with diabolical obstinacy to massacre Black populations and to flout the relevant resolutions of the international community aimed at ending apartheid.

The strengthening of measures and sanctions against South Africa and the refusal of the industrialised capitalist countries to provide any support to the country of apartheid might force Peter Botha and his clique to listen to reason, which calls for a South Africa that is democratic, non-racial and freed from its attendant evils.

We are also convinced that the vigilance of the international community against the devious manoeuvres of Pretoria will make it possible to implement the process of independence for Namibia in accordance with Security Council resolution 435/78, the Brazzaville protocol and the New York agreements.

I would not wish to conclude my statement without congratulating Mr. Michel Hansenne from the bottom of my heart on his brilliant accession to the post of Director-General of the International Labour Office. I should like to convey here the respect and sympathy of the workers of the Congo, who wish him every success in carrying out his difficult but inspiring task.

To Mr. Francis Blanchard, his predecessor, we would like to renew the expression of our gratitude for the invaluable services he has rendered to our Organisation and for the special attention he has always given to the problems of the developing countries throughout his lengthy career at the head of the ILO.

Mr. TAN (Workers' delegate, Philippines) – Three years have passed since the celebrated People Power Revolution took place in my country, the Philippines, toppling a dictatorship and installing a new, democratic regime with a popular President.

The past three years have been a history of dramatic achievements and spectacular failures, the latter caused no less by bumbling mistakes and continuing graft and corruption in government bureaucracy than by the whiplash of the global crisis made politically volatile by an environment of homegrown or foreign-funded and internationally co-ordinated terrorism and wars of liberation.

To the lasting credit of our present Government, formal political democracy has been installed. The fearless exercise of freedoms is once more guaranteed. People's organisations and popular movements of varied ideological and political persuasions are flourishing and, in many instances, are putting effective pressure on governments to respond to their needs and problems. Such is the case, for example, of this year's trade union wage offensive, which netted a hefty 39 per cent increase in the minimum wage as a result of unified action over the wage issue. Peasant groups are also active in lobbying for more progressive land reform to improve on the law currently passed. All sorts of political parties and interest groups operate within a liberal legal framework and outside it to pursue their aims and push for their interests.

But human rights violations have also increased, especially those committed by unreformed police and military personnel as well as by terrorists and so-called armed "revolutionary" groups, the former for reasons of containing the insurgency, the latter in the guise of purging their ranks of anti-revolutionary elements or eliminating allegedly notorious "enemies of the people." Civilians are caught in the cross-fire. Trade unionists have not been spared and some labour leaders have lost their lives.

Substantial democracy still has to be attained, especially in the face of the challenge posed by insurgency. But however much our Government and people struggle to attain substantial democracy, our hands are tied by the impact of the global crisis and by the impositions of the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund on the directions, strategies and programmes of our economy recovery. In our case, adjustment policies neglect the poorest of the poor, shift the burden of recovery on the workers and result in the outward flow of foreign exchange by forcing our Government to spend 40 per cent of its annual budget simply to pay our foreign debt.

Forced to reckon with an inherited problem of indebtedness on the one hand and to confront an external problem of protectionism on the other, economic recovery moves as slow as a turtle, while unemployment, underemployment and oppressive employment practices rise and the incidence of poverty increases. These developments are fanning the fires of political discontent which is abetted by an increasingly foreign-funded, homegrown, and vicious insurgency fighting a foreign-aided and supported military counter-insurgency programme.

We are glad, therefore, that global recovery once more preoccupies our attention in this year's session of the Conference. And rightfully so. For global recovery, or our co-operative efforts to attain it, is the supreme test of our relevance as an international institution and perhaps the final gauge of our effectiveness in the field of labour and social policy formulation. Failure is unthinkable.

In most developing countries today, economic growth cannot be attained without the recovery of the world economy. For better or for worse, these countries have been hooked into the international economic order. In the throes of the crisis, unemployment, underemployment and exploitative employment practices remain the recurrent and socially destabilising problems that they have become. Governments are pinned between the devil and the deep blue sea in their efforts to provide decent jobs for their people.

We think that resolving global debt and protectionism in international trade – two manifestations of a raging international crisis – is the key to attaining sustainable growth that should go hand in hand with employment creation. But the resolution of these problems can no longer remain in the domain of economics; it calls for political solutions to be decided at the highest international levels, simply because their dimensions have transcended national boundaries. This is the meaning of global interdependence.

We want to believe that solutions are forthcoming. We see a reservoir of good will from whence springs our guarded hope. We applaud, therefore, the decision of the Government of France, announced by its President, to pardon the debt of several African countries and to ease the burden of some other countries indebted to it and to the Paris Club. This shows that where there is political will, economic obstacles can be easily surmounted. We proffer the hope that the other industrialised countries will see fit to follow the example of France. It is in everybody's national interest – save for the interest of the greedy – that the global debt problem be resolved soonest. Indebted countries should more readily take the bitter pill of adjustment now that good will has been established.

Yet still, protectionism remains the scourge of global recovery. Constricting the ability of developing countries to grow, protectionism at the same time denies the debtor countries the means to pay their debts or to ease the burden of servicing their debts. Unless protectionist barriers are broken down, debt repudiation perforce gains currency. An economic war of attrition inevitably follows – a war where there are no victors, only losers.

Nevertheless, should we not thank the global crisis for bringing mankind to its senses? Never before have the prospects for peace and coexistence been more enhanced than now. There is increasing tolerance everywhere for diversity and dissent, for mutual understanding and co-operation, for openness in government as well as greater democracy. We commend those governments whose policies of openness and democracy are making possible the reawakening of dormant potential of peoples and their movements, and their effective participation in the act of nation building and promotion of international peace and understanding. Without meaning to interfere in the affairs of these States, we project the confidence that, indeed, the homegrown democratic movements in these countries will grow and mature in responsibility and find it useful and rewarding to pursue the course they have set themselves for moderation and positive action.

These developments give us added cause to hope, even in the midst of an unresolved global crisis.

We must view the other items on the agenda of this Conference in the same light. The revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107), is not our best effort to practise democracy or to encourage diversity, but it is, none the less, the first stage in our recognition of their right to self-determination. Indeed, unless their right self-determination finds succour in morally upright international standards and national legislation to encourage them to struggle for their rights within the framework of the rule of law and democratic practices, there is very little space for them to wiggle out of the dead-end alley of terrorism or armed rebellion, the cost of which we know all too well.

It is our opinion that the proposed revised Convention is deficient in this important aspect, having stopped short of conferring on the indigenous and tribal populations the distinction of becoming separate nationalities, but, without meaning to deform the territorial integrity or diminish the inviolable sovereignty of concerned nation States, it is also our view that the Convention will provide the impetus for indigenous and tribal populations themselves to assert their rights and to exercise them responsibly and pragmatically in their respective societies.

The proposed revision of the Night Work (Women) Convention (Revised), 1948 (No. 89) is long overdue. New forms of work organisation and lifestyles have made some provisions of the Convention obsolete. The prohibition of night work for women in many industries is one example. Not only does it discriminate against women, but also it reduces their chances to increase their incomes, particularly in Third World countries. We propose, therefore, that except for reasons of health or social family life, both men and women should have the option of night work. Furthermore, it should not be the case that existing benefits and privileges derived from night work be diminished in any manner. That would be retrogressive. Instead, these should be improved. Facilities to protect health and counter the negative impact of night work on social and family life will have to be provided.

We must now address that other hazard in work – the use of chemicals. Accidents in the past few years involving workers and whole communities due to chemical leakages and explosions have served to dramatise the need for international standards and national legislation in this regard. But more than the literally explosive incidents is the realisation that the increasing use of chemicals in many forms of work has killed so many workers and led to permanent damage to the health and physical well-being of many others.

We think that prevention is the key to mitigating these hazards. The report and conclusions propose to establish both a Recommendation and a Convention containing standards that would provide vital information to users on the safe handling of chemicals. These emphasise the need for proper classification and labelling as well as for safety information and procedures as the most important steps towards a more comprehensive approach to the control of chemicals. We agree.

It is to the lasting credit of this institution, the International Labour Organisation, that in the midst of the global crisis, it can still find time to tackle the more "trivial" content of its work. Yet it is precisely the banal that often makes the difference in preserving the life and limb of workers whose life and activities turn the wheels of industry.

In closing, may I, in the name of the Filipino workers, congratulate the officers of this Conference, as well as the new Secretary-General and our colleagues in the labour movement who have taken their places in the ILO. We congratulate them and wish them all success.

Original - Spanish: Mr. RAMIREZ SALAS (Workers' delegate, Peru) - I should like to begin, on behalf of Peruvian workers, by greeting all of the participants at this important Conference. I should also like to congratulate the President on his election.

"Recovery and employment", the topic selected this year by the Director-General for his annual Report, is of great importance and of special interest to the developing countries. Peru is going through a difficult economic situation, with the obvious social costs that this entails. By its very nature it endangers the stability of the democratic system that the people recovered with such difficulty and which they are ready to defend.

In this context, it is important to mention the problem of foreign debt because of the undeniable correlation between economic and social factors. I believe that this forum, thanks to its tripartite nature, its way of examining issues and its methods of finding solutions, is the best setting in which to understand that correlation. At the present time, such an approach would be extremely valuable in our country in order to raise living standards, above all for the workers. This sector has been particularly affected by the crisis, which has resulted in a drop in the purchasing power of their wages, inability to find adequate employment and other burdens that an ailing economy inflicts on the most needy.

Peruvian workers therefore believe that the time has come to work together for the sole purpose of advancing our country. The Peruvian trade union organisations, which I represent, will spare no efforts to that end. If we join our efforts with those of the Government and the employers, we believe that we will obtain the desired objective of a worthy life for the workers.

To achieve this end, it is also important that international organisations and developed countries provide assistance, and understand our situation, and I am confident that this request will be fully understood.

So, joining with others who have made similar requests, I should like to request, before this session of the International Labour Conference, continued and more intensive technical assistance for better vocational training of workers, because we believe that Peruvian workers are quite capable of assimilating and performing high technology jobs so as to contribute to the progress of our country.

I should like to conclude by mentioning the problem of foreign debt, the full payment of which has, in previous years, meant the most needy being further impoverished, as it was no longer possible to meet the Peruvian people's basic needs of health and education; and in addition to this, further sacrifices were also required in other areas. As a result, the present Government limited these payments. The workers entirely support this decision because of the reasons behind it.

This situation has been further aggravated by the subversion and the drug trafficking which the Peruvian people has unfortunately had to face up to, and which has caused the loss of valuable lives, ignobly sacrificed. The working class and the people in general reject this situation and are confident that they will have the international understanding and solidarity that is displayed in this important forum.

REPORT OF THE FINANCE COMMITTEE OF GOVERNMENT REPRESENTATIVES: SUBMISSION, DISCUSSION AND ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT – The first item on our agenda this morning is the report of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives, which is contained in Provisional Record No. 15. I call upon Mr. Peshkov, Government adviser, Byelorussian SSR, Chairman and Reporter of the Finance Committee, to submit the report.

Original – Russian: Mr. PESHKOV (Government adviser, Byelorussian SSR; Chairman and Reporter of the Finance Committee) – I have the honour to submit to the Conference the report of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives.

This report, which has been circulated in Provisional Record, No. 15, contains the Committee's recommendations on the items of the agenda referred to it by the Conference. All items were unanimously adopted by the Committee, and the appropriate resolutions recommended for adoption by the Conference in respect of those items appear at the end of the report.

In introducing the Programme and Budget proposals for 1990-91 to the Committee, the Director-General, whose address is set out in paragraphs 15 to 28 of the document, explained that the programme and budget had been discussed thoroughly and in great detail in the tripartite Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee of the Governing Body and also in the Governing Body itself. He pointed out that compared to the present biennium it showed a reduction in programme activities of 1.3 per cent in real terms, which was especially regrettable when it was clear the Organisation's capacity to provide services to member States was well short of the need for those services.

The Director-General also traced briefly the difficulties that the Organisation had faced in recent years owing to fluctuations in the exchange rate between the Swiss franc and the US dollar, and expressed a hope that the Committee would support the proposed long-term strategy on budget exchange rates.

The Committee was also interested to hear statements expressing support for both the long-term strategy on budget exchange rates and the draft Programme and Budget for 1990-91 by Mr. Mensah, the Chairman for the Governing Body, Mr. von Holten, representing the Employers' Vice-Chairman of the Governing Body, and Mr. Muhr, the Workers' Vice-

Chairman of the Governing Body. These statements are summarised in paragraphs 29 to 36 of this report.

The general discussion of the programme and budget proposals revealed a strong measure of agreement in the Committee on the general content and level of the programmes and indeed for the first time in many years the budget total was not a major point for discussion. Although some member States would have preferred larger credits for technical programmes they were nevertheless prepared to accept and support the proposals as they stood.

Some speakers had expressed reservations during the discussion on the long-term strategy and budget exchange rates, relating in the main to the proposal to credit 50 per cent of the net premium earned on the forward purchase of dollars to the incentive scheme for early payment of contributions. Despite these reservations all speakers, without exception, were prepared to support the proposal.

The scale of assessments recommended by the Committee for approval by the Conference for 1990-91 and the contributions due from each member State in 1990 appear in Appendix III to the report.

A summarised budget of expenditure and income for 1990-91 is included in Appendix I to the report, and a summary of proposed expenditure by major programme for the same period is shown in Appendix II.

A statement showing the amendments to the Financial Regulations required upon the adoption of the resolution concerning the long-term strategy on budget exchange rates is shown in Appendix IV.

I would like to express my thanks to the Vice-Chairman, Mr. Chea Urruela, Government delegate, Guatemala, to all the members of the Committee for the serious and co-operative manner in which they discussed the proposals before them, and to the members of the secretariat, all of whom helped me greatly in my task as Chairman.

I would sincerely commend to the Conference for adoption the resolution concerning the adoption of the Programme and Budget for the 62nd financial period (1990-91) and the allocation of expenses among member States. The programme is aimed at furthering the work of the Organisation for its member States, with particular emphasis on developing countries. I would therefore appeal to all Government, Employers' and Workers' delegates to vote in favour of the budget, which clearly reflects the concerns of the tripartite partners and the ideals of our Organisation, which are so dear to us all.

The PRESIDENT – The report is now open for discussion.

Mr. JONZON (Government delegate, Sweden) – I am making this statement on behalf of the Government delegations of the five Nordic countries: Denmark, Finland, Iceland, Norway and Sweden.

The Nordic Government delegates would like to express their sincere satisfaction with the outcome of the discussions of the Governing Body and the Finance Committee of the Conference regarding the questions related to the programme and budget for the next biennium.

The budget of an international organisation like the ILO is a compromise and it would be an exaggeration to say that we are happy with every tiny detail in the proposed budget, but we are pleased to see that there are clear priorities stated in it and we can say that we are in full agreement with the main trends and priorities and that we do appreciate the level of consensus that has been reached in the Committee.

This is not the moment to reiterate all our specific views and opinions on the various parts of the budget, so I will limit myself to assuring you that the proposal as stated has the full support of the Nordic Governments.

But when the ink starts to dry on the budget we are now to adopt, the preparations for the next one begin, and the Nordic Government delegations would like to take this opportunity to place on record our thoughts about the future development of the International Labour Organisation and the direction of its work during the second phase of the Medium-Term Plan. Needless to say, we all want the Organisation to be responsive to the needs of the closing decade of this century. The question is how?

The first and most imperative questions we have to ask ourselves in that context are: are we prepared to make the hard priorities that it is our responsibility to make; and does the organisation of work offer optimal use of our resources? It goes without saying that the priorities should reflect global needs within the social and labour field. This has, in reality, led to a development where the spectrum of activities within the ILO has become wider and wider. This, of course, is a logical reflection of the fact that it is difficult to find aspects of life and society that are not connected to work and working life. The needs are endless. But does that necessarily mean that the ILO should deal with each and every one of these aspects or problems? We think that we have to look at all the activities of the ILO with the following questions and qualifications in mind: firstly, does our Organisation have a comparative advantage within a given field; secondly, and perhaps most importantly, are our efforts likely to have a substantial impact on a given problem?

The Nordic Governments think that the present trend of a continuous broadening of the ILO's activities does involve a risk – a risk which the ILO has to face regardless of whether or not it can attract more resources. The risk is that the increase in the number and variety of activities in which the ILO gets involved results in the decreased value of its work, and the outcome and the impact of its efforts. We might come to know less and less about more and more. Our knowledge and our results will become thinner and thinner. We run the risk that the impact of our work could be neglected because we have become too general.

I want to emphasise that the Nordic Governments are in no way claiming that in the ILO we have already reached that stage, but our concern is that we are afraid that the ILO might slowly move in that direction.

Time does not allow me to go into more detail on these matters. We have done so in the budgetary process within the Governing Body and the Nordic countries will continue to do so in the time available to us.

I would like to inform you that the Nordic Governments, in a memorandum submitted to the Director-General, dwelt upon the future challenges, opportunities and responsibilities of the ILO. Basically, we think that the ILO now has to try a more vertical approach in its work rather than a horizontal one. In our opinion, there should be a much stronger follow-up of, or link between, the various programmes and projects than there is today. Each new activity should, as far as possible, build upon, and be the result of, the experience from previous activities and each activity should be part and parcel of the agreed strategy to find solutions to the problems to which the highest priority has been attached. The aim should always be to gain deeper and more solid knowledge and experience of the problems, and I stress that solid is often contrary to broader. The ILO should always focus on work as the lever for development and as the key means of creating resources for improved living conditions, education, health, etc.

To say this is extremely easy; to realise it is extremely difficult. But we think it is necessary to strive for such a concentration if the work of the ILO is to continue to have a real impact on the problems in working life. It is necessary if the ILO is to be able to stay in the front line of international discussions concerning the interaction between economic, social and human conditions. By means of new initiatives, approaches and syntheses, the ILO can help to create fertile soil for new and deeper insights into the fundamentals of work and working life by way of development and progress. In the words of the Director-General in the speech he made for the commemoration of the 70th anniversary of the International Labour Organisation, it is an intellectual challenge, a challenge to our credibility and a challenge to our determination.

I would like to underline that our opinion is by no means a threat to the ILO's position as a universal organisation. The criteria for universality is not determined by the variety of activities, or that there are activities in every country of the world, but rather that all countries of the world, in one way or another, benefit from the work of the ILO. Given the dependence between all countries, the matter at stake is that we attack the right problems and not that we cover all countries.

These are some of our considerations. We are fully aware that the action called for requires from all of us political courage born out of ethical motives – our various vested interests must be put aside.

As I said in the beginning, the Nordic Government delegations support the report of the Finance Committee and recommend its adoption including the budget proposals for the biennium 1990-91, and we look forward to co-operating with Mr. Hansenne when it is implemented.

Original – German: Mr. MUHR (Workers' delegate, Federal Republic of Germany) – I asked for the floor this morning to express the pleasure of the Workers' group at the fact that the proposed programme and budget for 1990-91 was discussed and adopted unanimously by the Finance Committee of the Conference. We had appealed to the Conference, primarily of course to the Finance Committee, to recognise the necessities of the programme and budget as they had been proposed. We believe that the vote of the Finance Committee augurs well for the discussion of this question and the vote which will probably be held on this subject tomorrow in the plenary. In the report itself we find the comments made by several Government representatives who express their satisfaction with the fact that the budget proposals reflect zero growth in real terms. I should like to stress once again very clearly that we do not have zero growth in the budget but rather negative growth. It only seems as if there is zero growth because it does not include the loan annuities on the ILO building. In fact we had a decrease in programme activities in real terms of 1.3 per cent. I am stressing this to avoid any misunderstanding in the future; we should not consider this negative growth as zero growth because this will lead us into a downward spiral and our budget will lose the potential it has for helping the Organisation. I would just like to point this out and also assure you that the Worker's group, when we come to the vote on the programme and budget, will unanimously support it. I should like to ask the other groups to adopt the same attitude because it would be very helpful for our work over the next two years if we could have a unanimous vote at this Conference in favour of the programme and budget.

Original - Russian : Mr. TCHERNYCHOV (Government delegate, USSR) - Speaking on behalf of the Government representatives of the socialist countries in Europe, I should like first of all to say that the draft programme and budget for 1990-91 was drawn up on a fairly realistic basis, bearing in mind the acute social, economic and financial problems which face many member States of the Organisation and in view of the very difficult financial position of the ILO itself. We consider it appropriate to give priority in the next biennium to the activities of the Organisation which largely reflect emerging concerns in the world of labour. This is evidenced in the balanced approach towards taking into account the interests of all countries, and the developing ones in particular, for which the programme lays down certain prerequisites. We welcome the efforts made by the secretariat to give effect to the decisions of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment, and especially the fact that the implementation of these decisions is one of the priority objectives of the Organisation in the next biennium. We also approve of the fact that, for the first time in the history of the ILO, serious attention has begun to be given to conservation of the environment, which is closely linked to the development of new technologies and employment issues. We also consider that support should be given to the activities and research envisaged in the programme which concern the interrelationship between environmental measures and basic social and labour factors such as employment, managers' training, working conditions, occupational safety and health, and so on. We consider that the adoption of a resolution on this subject at this session of the Conference would further the development of the activities of the ILO in this area, which is so important to the international community. The discussion of this draft at the 242nd Session of the Governing Body and its results confirmed the importance of a reasonable approach by all countries and sides represented in the ILO to the elaboration of the draft, and to the priorities and the resources and means necessary to put them into effect. The basis for this is a constructive dialogue and a realisation of the need to work together to solve the increasingly acute problems of development of the world community. The outstanding feature of the discussion of the draft programme and budget is certainly the fact that for the first time in many years this document was adopted by the Governing Body and by the Finance Committee at the 76th Session of the Conference by consensus. The draft programme and budget, which is well balanced on the whole, clearly created a general atmosphere which is positive to this document, both in the Finance Committee and in this plenary sitting. We support the efforts made by the secretariat to achieve a closer co-ordination between ILO activities and technological change, its impact on managers' training, and occupational safety and health. We have noted positive trends to develop co-operation within the European region, as evidenced by the practical action provided for in the Programme to give effect to the decisions of the Fourth European Regional Conference concerning the priority of research into the social repercussions of structural adjustment in Europe, and the organisation of a Tripartite Meeting of Experts on Employment and Training Implications of Environmental Policies in Europe. We note with satisfaction that the secretariat has taken action to further step up research into the conversion of military production, which was reflected in the draft programme and budget, and this approach was broadly supported at the this session of the Conference; this constitutes a positive response to the many appeals and proposals made by the socialist countries.

We support the efforts of the ILO aimed at combating apartheid and providing effective assistance to the front-line States and to their workers and employers.

An outstanding feature of this document is the fact that the General-Director has succeeded in taking account of the basic wishes of member States, while at the same time achieving zero growth in real terms. The organisational measures taken by the secretariat at this stage have made it possible to stabilise the financial position of the ILO, but we feel that they are not sufficiently reliable in the long term and therefore require further improvement. It is already obvious that the increasing avalanche of social and economic problems and their urgency face us with two alternatives: either we must, within the existing budget, limit the ILO's activities, possibly even in priority areas, or we must devise organisational and financial measures based on the need for a real assessment by the Organisation of its possibilities. In this connection, we consider that it is essential to continue improving the organisational structure of the secretariat with a view to better adapting it to changing trends and requirements of the world of labour, and better matching financial conditions to the Organisation's potential. We should also continue the process of closer co-ordination and co-operation between the major programmes in order to increase efficiency in achieving the priorities and objectives of our Organisation, and to enable it to carry out its work in a more comprehensive and effective manner.

Finally, I should like to say that the Government representatives on behalf of whom I am speaking support the resolution of the Finance Committee.

The PRESIDENT – We shall now proceed to adopt the report of the Finance Committee. I draw attention to the fact that the adoption of the report includes not only the report as such (paragraphs 1-83 as well as Appendices I, II and III) but also the adoption of the resolution concerning the composition of the Administrative Tribunal of the International Labour Organisation; the resolution concerning appointments to the Administrative Board (ILO Staff Pensions Fund) and Staff Pension Committee (United Nations Joint Staff Pension Fund); the resolution concerning the long-term strategy on budget exchange rates; and the resolution concerning the abolition of Part V (Undistributed Reserve) of the budget (resolution A).

As regards the resolution concerning the adoption of the Programme and Budget for the 62nd financial period (1990-91) and the allocation of expenses among member States (resolution B) it will be the subject of a record vote which will probably take place tomorrow.

If there are no objections, I take it that the Conference adopts the report, with the four resolutions and Appendices I, II and III.

(The report, the four resolutions and Appendices I, II and III are adopted.)

The PRESIDENT – May I thank Mr. Peshkov, Chairman of the Committee, who is at the same time Reporter, and Mr. Chea Urruela, the Vice-Chairman, for their very valuable contribution to the drafting of the report which has just been adopted by the Conference.

The PRESIDENT – We now move on to the next item on our agenda, which is the discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Mrs. THALEN (Minister of Labour, Sweden) – Mr. President, let me first of all join the many speakers who have congratulated you and the Vice-Presidents on your election to your high posts at this session of our Conference.

Full employment should be the prime objective of economic policy.

The reason for my Government choosing such an ambitious objective is that we regard unemployment as a tremendous waste of human assets.

Unemployment causes human suffering, added to which it is uneconomical and the biggest cause of inequality. And it deprives many jobless individuals, young persons especially, of their faith in the ability of democracy to create employment and welfare.

A close interaction between economic policy, regional development and labour market policy is the essence of the strategy we have chosen in Sweden.

As the Director-General has underlined in his Report, one has little chance of influencing structural change without a properly developed infrastructure.

The Report outlines a growth-oriented strategy for solving global employment problems, above all in the developing countries. On the macro-economic plane, the importance is emphasised of a strict economic policy, various measures of exchange and trade policy and increased investments, especially in infrastructure, the aim of all this being to accelerate structural change. In order for this change to proceed efficiently and under socially acceptable conditions, it is emphasised that various selective measures are called for, labour market policy among them.

Our task is to reconcile the demands of production for flexibility with the demands of the individual for improved working conditions. Aided by a comprehensive social safety net and an active labour market policy, we are trying to make the transformation humane and socially acceptable.

Swedish labour market policy is founded on the employment strategy, which says that employment or education must take priority over passive measures such as cash handouts.

All experience shows that cash handouts are expensive solutions from the viewpoint of national economy and government finance alike. This opinion is supported by research and evaluations. In the majority of cases, active measures are less expensive. Measures of this kind are also to be seen as a kind of investment, paying dividends for many years ahead.

In terms of labour market policy, this means heavier emphasis on measures to facilitate the functioning of the labour market, above all as regards placement services and training. We are therefore putting added emphasis on supply-side measures.

I am happy to note that much of this philosophy is reflected in the Employment Promotion and Protection against Unemployment Convention, 1988 (No. 168), which my Government is about to submit to Parliament for approval.

Labour market policy has also acquired a stronger position as an instrument of economic policy, owing to the increasing intractability of unemployment. Today, rising unemployment is above all manifested by longer periods of unemployment and, accordingly, by a growth of long-term unemployment. People who remain out of work for a long time become increasingly apathetic and, eventually, more or less give up looking for work.

Once unemployment has been forced up to a higher level, it is less easily forced down again.

Unemployment tends to generate more unemployment. This makes it all the more important for general economic policy to try to prevent unemployment from rising at all.

As I mentioned earlier, unemployment has become increasingly intractable and there is a great deal to suggest that market failures have been accentuated at workplaces, resulting in mounting social problems. This is apparent, for example, from the increase in certain types of work injury connected with one-sided, heavily segregated jobs.

This is an international problem and, as mentioned in the report, work injuries are a cause of heavy expense. From both human and economic viewpoints, employees must be given a basic measure of protection. But above all we must try to prevent injuries of this kind from ever occurring.

An effort must be made, in concert with occupational policy, to influence work organisation and the occupational environment in such a way that employees will acquire more developmental and productive jobs and the elimination of disadvantaged groups will be counteracted.

Before I turn to some topical issues in Swedish working environment policy, I should like to inform the Conference that Nordic co-operation in this field has resulted in a Nordic Convention on the working environment, which is going to be signed shortly. As far as my own country is concerned, the working environment has again, in spite of the substantive progress made, come to the political forefront.

For this reason the Swedish Government has appointed a Work Environment Commission to review the practicalities of work environment policy and to suggest ways of reversing the growth of new types of injuries.

One important task for the Commission will be to analyse the way in which employers live up to their responsibility for the working environment and ways in which we are now achieving a holistic view of people at work.

If we are to utilise each individual's willingness and ability to work, we will have to deal carefully and deliberately with work environment issues at the individual workplace. The measures taken by the responsible authorities are of course important as regards the definition of certain minimum requirements, but the total working environment is shaped by day-to-day activities at workplace level.

A badly designed work organisation with monotonous, one-sided jobs is a cause of many work injuries.

It is hard for a rigid, bureaucratic work organisation to prevent work injuries and to rehabilitate people at work. Great efforts must therefore be made to alter the way in which work is organised.

Summing up, I regard the following points as necessary means of developing labour market policy for the 1990s: give general economic policy an active role in sustaining a high rate of transformation in the economy; invest in regional development policy to utilise available resources; invest in labour market policy, that is, in placement services, training and rehabilitation; follow through with a more active work environment policy; improve adjustment capacity by investing in human resources development.

Finally, I would also like to touch on the memorandum submitted by the Nordic governments setting out our common views regarding the future of the ILO. Given new initiatives, approaches and syntheses, the ILO can help to create fertile soil for new and deeper insights concerning the fundamental role of work and working life in development and progress.

In this connection, the ILO has the task of fulfilling and developing its efforts on behalf of the very poorest people and nations.

Its duties and its tripartite structure present the ILO with unique opportunities. This, at the same time, implies a great deal of responsibility and requires the Organisation to alter and improve its working procedures in a number of important respects.

In concluding, I should like to extend a word of welcome to the new Director-General of the International Labour Office, Mr. Hansenne, and assure him of my Government's full support in his difficult task.

Let me also thank the outgoing Director-General, Mr. Blanchard, for the outstanding services he has rendered our Organisation.

Mr. OKURUT (Minister of Labour, Uganda) – It is with great pleasure, on behalf of my country, my delegation and on my own behalf, that I take this opportunity to address this august assembly of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. Let me also take this opportunity to congratulate you Mr. President and the Officers of the Conference upon your election. The excellent manner in which you have so far guided the proceedings leaves me with no doubt that the Conference will come to a successful conclusion. I assure you of my delegation's unreserved support and co-operation.

May I also take this opportunity to congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne on his well-deserved election to the high office of Director-General of the ILO. We look forward to a close working relationship with him. We would also like to thank most sincerely his predecessor, Mr. Francis Blanchard, for his tireless and invaluable service rendered to the ILO. We wish him and his family the best in their future endeavours.

The theme of this year's Conference, "Recovery and employment", which the Director-General has appropriately chosen for our discussion, is not only relevant and timely but also one of the main preoccupations of developing nations, whose membership represents more than half of this Organisation. Allow me therefore to congratulate the Director-General for the excellent and able manner in which he has analysed the development crisis in the majority of the Third World countries.

The spiral of rising interest rates, imposed by industrialised countries, the IMF and the World Bank, has put many developing countries in a most difficult situation whereby there are more capital and financial resources flowing from the South to the North. This imbalance has meant that the Third World countries continue to be in a less advantageous situation vis-à-vis the industrialised countries.

The foregoing situation has been compounded by the debt crisis. Moreover, changes in the structure of the world economy have brought about major changes in the relationship between industrialised and developing countries, characterised by slower economic growth in the industrialised nations which has in turn reduced the demand for products from developing countries.

Since the majority of the developing countries continue to rely on their earnings from commodity sales, the worsening terms of trade have meant that, for example, you need to export almost twice as much as you did in 1980 in order to retain the same earnings in 1988. As a specific example, while Uganda required 205 bags of coffee to import a 7-ton Mercedes truck in 1980, we required 420 bags of coffee to import a similar truck in 1987. This clearly illustrates the present unfair international division of labour, whereby the advanced countries produce high-priced goods which are always going up in value while developing countries produce low-priced goods which are ever declining in value. It is on this score that I entirely agree with the Director-General's contention that the debt crisis in developing countries and the terms of trade problems need a global solution. In view of the gravity of the problem, we reiterate the appeal to the creditors to cancel some if not all of the debts of the poorest countries of the Third World.

Whereas the per capita income in industrial market economies is about US$ 13,000, that of sub-Saharan Africa is US$ 370. In Uganda it is US$ 230. The economy of Uganda is a typical dependent economy dominated by one main export crop, coffee, which contributes over 90 per cent of her foreign exchange earnings. The manufacturing sector contributes only 6 per cent of total GDP and employs only 6 per cent of the total labour force. Despite the broad resource base, the economy is distorted as it is heavily dependent on imported inputs which have no forward or backward linkages to the rest of the economy. As a result, more than 86 per cent of the rural population is engaged in peasant agriculture, with low levels of productivity. The above situation was worsened by the socio-political difficulties that the country went through from 1971 to 1985.

By 1985 average capacity utilisation in Uganda industries stood at 20 per cent of installed capacity, in spite of substantial credits offered to Uganda by the IMF and other donors.

It is against this background that, when the NRM Government came to power in 1986 it embarked on the huge task of rehabilitation by attending to the following key areas: security, agriculture and animal husbandry; roads, railways and water transport; commercial trucks; rehabilitation of the light-goods industries to save foreign exchange; utilities – especially electricity and water for industrial use; construction capacity; and storage.

The criteria of this prioritisation was dictated by the desire to restore production in agriculture and industry, and ensure that produce is conveyed to the market; inputs are conveyed to the farms; the farmer who sells his produce can buy goods with his earnings. The production units have electricity and water to service them, and produce is stored safely. The need for secure borders, and the ability to defend our democratic institutions and the fruits of our labour requires no elaboration. It is also the intention of the Government to increase and diversify the production and export of other primary products in addition to coffee.

In addition to exporting a wider range of the usual primary products it is the Government's policy to launch an aggressive programme of exporting finished industrial products, e.g. processed fruit products and foodstuffs, processed beef and dairy products, cables, machine tools, textiles and other natural fibre products, leather products, fresh-water fish products, electricity, wood products, fertilizers and industrial chemicals, metal products, etc.

It is noteworthy that, since the launching of our priority programme in 1986, substantial progress has been made, particularly in the agricultural, industrial and road construction sectors. Thus, the agricultural sector, which accounts for 44 per cent of GDP, grew at 6.2 per cent in 1987 with the monetary sector expanding at 5.5 per cent and the non-monetary sector at 6.8 per cent, while the industrial sector registered a growth of 30 per cent in 1988 and a number of industries which had closed down were able to resume production. Those which remained in production increased their capacity utilisation. The textile industry grew by about 70 per cent between January 1986 and June 1988. A number of new industries have also been developed.

A total of 1,850 kilometres of all-weather roads and 2,411 kilometres of gravel trunk roads have been repaired. In addition, 1,785 kilometres of feeder roads have been opened up using direct labour. The end result of the improvement of the infrastructure, industrial and agricultural production is the creation of gainful employment and provision of basic needs for our people.

In view of the seriousness my Government attaches to its recovery programme, my delegation would like to express its support for the Director-General's budget proposals for 1990-91 and to emphasise the great importance it attaches to the implementation that should be attached to the priority themes outlined in the document. As already explained, the issue of structural adjustment is central to the development process in Uganda. The Uganda Government regards the follow-up on the conclusions of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment in November 1987 as vital. The ILO has an important role in ensuring social justice and equality in assisting those below the poverty datum line.

My Government supports the emphasis the programme places on the rural and informal sectors, especially as the majority of workers in developing countries such as Uganda live in the rural areas. The promotion of effective co-operatives, the training of rural workers with regard to new technologies, the fostering of self-employment, and the availability of development funds for rural areas should go a long way towards creation of employment and, thereby, generally, toward raising the standard of living in the rural environment.

My delegation further welcomes the inclusion of equality of opportunity and treatment for women among the priority themes, especially as women are increasingly playing such a prominent role in the Ugandan economy. Emphasis, however, should also be placed on training and the creation of an awareness of women's rights in the interests of social justice as well as on job creation through self-employment and through the development of small-scale enterprises.

My delegation wishes to register its appreciation to the Director-General for the fact that despite the austerity measures in the budget proposal there is a slight overall increase of about 2 per cent in the budget for the field programme in Africa and a 3.5 per cent increase for technical co-operation activities, as compared to the figures for the 1988-89 biennium. It is our fervent hope that this will go a long way in responding to the needs and wishes of member States in our region as outlined in the ILO Programme of Action for Africa, adopted by the Conference in 1985, and the conclusions and resolutions of the successive regional conferences including those recently adopted by the Seventh African Regional Conference of the ILO, Nov./Dec. 1988, in Harare, Zimbabwe.

In this regard, my delegation appreciates the role of the ILO in its assistance to governments in our region in the following fields where my Government has also benefited: technical advisory missions in the strengthening of labour administration; workers' activities, particularly workers' education; assistance to employers' organisations; promotional work through the "Improve Your Business" (IYB) project; identification and formulation of projects in the field of occupational safety and health; small-scale enterprise development; population and labour policies; technical co-operation in the field of Hotel and Tourism development; and special public works programme.

While appreciating the commendable activities of the ILO in my country, I wish to place on record also our thanks to the Organisation for the recently conclude ILO national tripartite Seminar on Wages Regulations and Labour Relations in Kampala last month and the ILO advisory missions to review our labour legislation early this year.

My delegation further wishes to thank the ILO for its effort in implementing the the Programme of Action Against Apartheid. We equally appreciate the assistance extended by ILO to the workers in Namibia and in the front-line States.

We also encourage the ILO to intensify its co-operation with the UNHCR and ensure that Namibian refugees return to their homeland safely.

We hope the United Nations process to enable Namibia attain independence will be in accordance with the planned Programme.

Finally, my Government wishes to join the international community in calling upon Israel to stop the inhuman treatment of the Palestinian people and to grant them self-determination.

Original – Portuguese: Mr. PINTO CARDOSO (Employers' delegate, Portugal) – Mr. President, allow me, first of all, to congratulate you on your election to your important post. I hope that we shall achieve excellent results, thanks to your presence in the Chair.

I would also like to take this opportunity to present my sincere congratulations to Mr. Michel Hansenne, Director-General of the ILO. I am confident that, thanks to his balanced outlook and vast experience, especially in social matters, he will be fully equal to the exalted and difficult duties entrusted to him. The next few years portend major economic and social changes world-wide and these will certainly increase the ILO's responsibilities as a supra-national international organisation.

As in previous Reports by the Director-General, his Report this year to the International Labour Conference takes up a topical matter of exceptional importance, namely "Recovery and employment".

The Report states that "... at the end of the 1980s the world is in a more precarious social situation than at the start of the decade". The figures given in support of this statement are undoubtedly conclusive and therefore worrying. We read that "the number of people living in absolute poverty has risen from about 820 million in 1980 to an estimated 950 million in the late 1980s."

Clearly, the growing poverty throughout the world, especially striking in Latin America, Africa and in certain Asian countries, is to some extent bound up with political instability in these countries and their choice of political regimes and economic systems.

A prerequisite for improvement is to make structural adjustment to the economic position of the more poverty-stricken countries. Such economic adjustments call for the creation of political and economic adjustments call for the creation of political and economic conditions which, while reinforcing economic growth, will make more jobs available and establish a flexible and modern production system, by means of less rigid management, better vocational training and the introduction of new equipment and technology.

In this context, we totally support the Director-General's statement that the factors which might influence structural adjustment in countries where systems of production are too rigid, he proposes the adoption of such measures as the encouragement of private enterprise and competition, limits to state intervention in the regulation of economic activities and the privatisation of public undertakings, or, in short, the creation of conditions enabling economic activity to follow the normal, dynamic interplay of market forces.

Pursuing his analysis, the Director-General goes on to say that "in general, the greater the degree of flexibility in production structures and the higher the mobility of factors of production, the easier it is to implement structural adjustment programmes."

The example of Portugal eloquently demonstrates the difficulties that arise when an attempt is made to adjust the economic structure without first making the structure of production less rigid.

When the Government took over in mid-1987, the Portuguese employers were confident that the Government would honour its electoral promises and undertake a major reform of the economy. That would inevitably mean privatising most public undertakings, changing the tax system to bring about greater justice for the taxpayer and increased investment, greater flexibility in labour legislation, which is excessively rigid and uncondusive to efficient management, and, lastly, improvement in the structure of agriculture.

Two years later, the Government has still not embarked on any real structural reform.

Despite the urgent need to modernise the economy with all possible speed, with an eye to the common European market in 1992, the Government has shown disappointing lethargy and inefficiency over measures which are desperately required. Let me quote just two specific examples.

As regards the take-over of public undertakings by private interests, the Government began a process of semi-privatisation of certain nationalised undertakings in 1975, but is persistently postponing any solution of two preliminary questions.

First, shareholders deprived of their undertakings are still waiting, after nearly 15 years, to receive the compensation they are entitled to. Furthermore, this compensation is not equitably calculated and is always grotesquely inadequate.

And, lastly, although some undertakings are now being privatised the Government continues to postpone putting forward an overall plan covering all stages of the process. We do not even know which undertakings will be denationalised.

All this clearly shows an absence of vigour and openness on the part of the Government in a process of such importance for the reorganisation of the economy, with consequences which will inevitably be disastrous.

Another typical example concerns the matter of making labour legislation less rigid.

Managers of Portuguese undertakings are still subject to a legislation which is the most rigid and constrictive of all the member countries of the EEC, notably as regards dismissal and strikes.

This strait-jacket not only hampers efficient management, but also has obvious effects on employment and investment.

Since there is no legal definition of "strike", the right to strike is constantly being used to defend interests totally foreign to the interests which might normally justify the exercise of this right. The employers are powerless to prevent this. Furthermore, all forms of lock-out are forbidden in Portugal, lock-out being defined too broadly and judged as an offence punishable by up to two years' imprisonment.

As regard termination of labour contracts, over the past few weeks the Government has approved a new system which offers no improvement over the old one.

It must be said that the new law is the conclusion of a process of legislative change which clearly reveals a lack of firmness and coherence on the part of the Government. In the face of continual pressure from the trade unions, it was forced to put forward eight successive drafts, finally incorporating virtually all the trade unions' demands.

Between the first draft, which had several promising aspects, and the eighth and last drafts, the changes have been such that the final text is of no practical interest.

In this same spirit of support for the trade unions, the Government has also approved a new system of fixed-term labour contracts which is even more rigid than the present one, particularly in rigorously specifying the conditions under which such contracts can be given and limiting to two the permissible number of renewals.

We very much hope that the Director-General's Report may induce many of the governments here represented, and in particular the Government of Portugal, to think seriously about the perceived need for less state intervention and greater economic flexibility in the management of undertakings. These are essential if the economic agents are to play their full part in ensuring progress and improving the people's standard of living.

Original - Chinese: Mr. WANG (Workers' delegate, China) - Mr. President, please allow me to congratulate you on your election to the presidency of this session of the International Labour Conference. I also wish to extend my congratulations to the vice-Presidents who have been elected. I sincerely hope that under your wise guidance this session will be crowned with success.

Allow me to avail myself of this opportunity to express my warm congratulations to Mr. Michel Hansenne on his election to the high post of Director-General of the International Labour Office. I am sure that in this important capacity he will make positive contributions to the realisation of the aims and purpose of the ILO.

I would also like to express our sincere gratitude to Mr. Francis Blanchard on the moment of his departure from the ILO for his contributions to the cause of world labour for so many years.

It is both practical and significant that the theme of the Director-General's Report is "Recovery and employment". This choice reflects the reality of our present economic and social life and the new challenges people are facing. As the Director-General points out in his Report, the present decade ends in a paradoxical situation. In the past, after an economic recession, problems of unemployment and poverty would ease in the course of economic recovery, but the situation today is just the contrary. At present, although the world economy as a whole has recovered and developed to a certain extent, the unemployment rate remains high in many industrialised countries. In particular, the gap between the North and South is widening. Hundreds of millions of people in the developing countries are struggling in the face of unemployment, hunger and disease. The problem of social injustice is not easing but becoming more acute. The International Labour Organisation, which aims at the realisation of social justice as its goal, is confronted with new and arduous tasks. At present, when the international situation is moving from confrontation to dialogue, from tension to détente, and when economic readjustment and reform have become a world trend, people expect the ILO to overcome various obstacles, to ensure co-operation, win support for its cause and be more effective, given its challenges in discharging its responsibilities.

The Declaration of Philadelphia states: "The war against want requires to be carried on with unrelenting vigour within each nation, and by continuous and concerted international effort." With a view to facilitating economic progress, increasing employment, fighting against poverty and promoting social justice in the course of development, unremitting efforts need to be made in many fields. The Chinese trade unions hold that at present particular attention should be paid to the following points.

First, it is very important to promote and improve workers' participation in a bid to advance economic development and social justice. This is not only the case because workers are the most vigorous among the elements comprising the productive force, but also because they constitute important members of the modern society. Only by relying on a tripartite system and through consultations among workers, employers and government can economic and social problems facing us today be effectively solved. It is necessary to develop actively multi-level and multi-channel workers' participation. Workers should participate in the discussion and formulation of the strategy and policies of national, economic and social advancement, as well as in the policy-making of enterprise management and operation, so as to ensure that the development process promotes employment. In addition, workers should participate in formulating and implementing labour legislation and in drawing up policies to increase employment; they should also be involved in the whole process of introducing new technology in order to safeguard their vital rights and interests and enhance social progress. We are pleased to note that an increasing number of countries, in spite of their different levels of economic development and social systems, adopt workers' participation in different forms and to a different extent. Workers' participation has become a world-wide trend which constitutes an important link in ensuring co-ordinated economic and social development.

Second, an important task is to intensify workers' education and training so as to promote employment and economic development. This is of particular significance for developing countries where workers' educational and technological levels are comparatively low. At present the ever more acute commodity competition within nations and in the world is a kind of contest in the field of enterprise management and workers' educational and technological qualities. The structural readjustment of the economy, changing market trends and new technologies require that special emphasis be laid on workers' education and training: this should first and foremost meet the needs of market competition and technological revolution and help the workers to master new occupational skills and technology, so as to ensure and increase employment. At the same time, this training should improve their awareness of the necessity of participation in order to exercise more effectively their right of participation. To a certain extent, workers' education and training may be seen as a social investment to harness available human resources, which requires all three partners – the government, employers and workers – to make continuous and concerted efforts. The International Labour Organisation has accumulated rich experience in this field and can surely make even greater contributions.

Third, in today's world which is becoming increasingly interdependent in economic terms, the overcoming of employment and development problems requires not only the efforts of individual countries themselves but also an appropriate international economic environment. At present, many developing countries are faced with a grave economic situation, a heavy foreign debt burden, trade protectionism and irrational prices for their primary products – all of which seriously hinder their revival. These factors have not only aggravated unemployment and lowered the living standards of their people, but have also weakened their role in international trade and reduced the international market of the industrialised countries. Poverty in the developing countries is not just an economic issue peculiar to these countries alone, but is a global political problem bringing serious consequences in its wake.

It is necessary more than ever before to establish a new international economic order built on the basis of equality and mutual benefit. In this regard, the international community can do much through concerted efforts. For instance, the repayment of a country's foreign debt should be based on the level of its economic development; furthermore, attempts should be made to help developing countries repay their debt. The debt burden should be alleviated, interest rates reduced, the period of repayment extended and the prices of primary products raised and stabilised at a reasonable level. Trade protectionism in all its forms should be stopped and advanced technology transferred to the developing countries at favourable terms.

In the past year the national economy of our country has made continuous progress in ushering in reforms and opening up to the outside world. The gross national product at constant price increased by 11.2 per cent compared to the year before. However, there are major difficulties: an overheated economy and run-away inflation. At present, as part of our reforms, we are carrying out economic readjustment which has given rise to new problems and tasks with regard to employment. At the 11th National Congress held last October, the Chinese trade unions decided to mobilise and organise the workers and the employees all over the country to take an active part in the reform and socialist construction. At the same time it was decided to strengthen reform of trade union organisations themselves and give priority to their protective role so that they could carry out their work independently, consolidate the mass character and democratisation of their organisation and thus play an even more important part in the social life of our country. The Chinese trade unions pay serious attention to the new problems resulting from economic readjustment and the reform of the labour system which jeopardise employment. On the one hand, trade union organisations support all reforms which promote economic development but, on the other hand, they take various measures to safeguard workers' rights, including the right to work and the right to the social security. Trade unions help the enterprises expand their operations and develop their activities in the tertiary industries in order to find ways to cope with surplus manpower and avoid shifting the burden on to society. Together with the Government and enterprises, they provide these workers with opportunities of vocational training and retraining so as to facilitate their transfer to new posts. They also help improve the unemployment insurance schemes which provide the unemployed with allowances. Our trade unions have also contributed to economic development and social stability.

Allow me to reiterate, on behalf of the Chinese trade unions, our regrets that some trade union delegates have put forward to the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference the question of the recent event in China. These are entirely an internal matter and have nothing to do with the work of our Conference.

The relevant position of our Government is already clear to the world. Naturally it has also aroused much concern from the All-China Federation of Trade Unions. The Chinese trade unions will, as always, persist in safeguarding essential interests of the Chinese working class and are fully capable of handling their own problems themselves. We, Chinese trade unions, would like to express our thanks to all trade unions and colleagues who have shown their concern over recent events in our country. We shall strive for the further development of friendship and co-operation between our Federation and other trade union organisations.

The International Labour Organisation has been striving for 70 years to achieve the lofty goal of social justice and has hence won public recognition by the international community. Today it continues to play a unique and irreplaceable role. The ILO is faced with new, difficult and complicated tasks. The Chinese workers are prepared to join hands with all parties concerned to contribute their share in realising its aims and objectives.

Mr. TABANI (Employers' delegate, Pakistan) – I will begin by extending to you, Mr. President, my heartiest felicitations on your election as President this session of the International Labour Conference. We have on the agenda of this session of the Conference some important items of particular interest to the developing world and I am confident that, with your expert guidance, the Conference will be able to achieve some conclusive results. I also wish to extend my congratulations to the three Vice-Presidents on an election which truly reflects the confidence that their respective groups have placed in them.

Let me take this opportunity to pay a tribute to the former Director-General, Mr. Francis Blanchard, who led the secretariat of the International Labour Office ably and admirably. I also most heartily welcome Mr. Michel Hansenne on his unanimous election as the Director-General last February and assure him of our fullest co-operation.

As we prepared to come to this Conference we realised that the issues facing us included economic recovery and employment, minority rights, night work and industrial safety. But you have, Sir, set the theme of the Conference by your opening remarks that we have to brace ourselves for a disaster of untold proportions unless governments begin now to focus seriously on the pressing problems of the developing countries. You have rightly pointed out that the key to solving the employment problems lies in the creation of favourable climate for the efficient utilisation of human resources and the exercise of policies that encourage sustained growth.

The President of the Swiss Confederation also wisely emphasised the need to cement a partnership of countries aimed at ending the growing imbalances and dangerous social tensions in the world. This he has said was only possible if all national energies were directed towards the common goal with a rejection of egoism, including that at state level and allowing all States, however small, to take part in this effort.

The Report presented by the Director-General this year also touches upon certain fundamental challenges which, with the turn of the century approaching, are being faced by the developing countries in the area of economic recovery and employment. This is highlighted by the fact stated in the Report that "Almost 40 million people a year will have to find new jobs until the end of this century if the world as a whole is to keep up with the growth in the labour force", and that "More than 36 million jobs a year will have to be created in developing countries."

The Report starts with the happy strain that in the year 1988 "the world economy turned around" but then follows with the frank admission that that world did not include the Third World, much of which was sinking into poverty. It is precisely this paradox that creates frustration in the developing countries. That there should be so sharp an antithesis between the haves and the have-nots in the world, points to something woefully lacking in the formulation of a global strategy which would make the developed nations carry the developing nations along with them.

The economic, social and humanitarian ills of the less fortunate peoples of the world cannot be ameliorated if such a spirit does not prevail. However, we in Pakistan do realise that, as mentioned at a point in the Report, a more dynamic world unfortunately does not necessarily mean simultaneous growth of all the countries, developed and developing, put together.

The Report very rightly points out that, in order to improve the employment-generating capacity of economic growth – particularly the creation of remunerative jobs – a number of macro issues such as economic policy management, wage policy, the sectoral composition of growth, the size of key enterprises, etc., and a number of micro issues such as flexibility and job security, education, training and retraining, have to be tackled in most countries. The Report, however, has laid more emphasis on the study of the situation in the countries which have shown predominance of service activities over manufacturing but is silent on the question as to why, in the developing countries which have immense potential for the growth of their vast economic and human resources, manufacturing accounts for a smaller share of total employment.

Among other things, arrangements between developing countries and the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank have been suggested to bring about structural adjustments at the national level. On this point I wish to tell our friends in the developed countries that, as a class, the people of the developing countries are exceptionally sensitive about any conditionalities or such arrangements which seem to our respective peoples to be infringing upon a country's sovereignty. This is specially true of those countries of the Third World which have moved on to the democratic path and where the pride and the will of the common man matters. So, while the criteria adopted by the World Bank and the IMF may be perfectly placed so far as the compulsions of macroeconomics and microeconomics are concerned, a keen appreciation of the psyche and temperament of the developing country concerned is very essential. It is necessary to be ready to make what I can best describe as "temperamental adjustments" when it comes to dealing with a developing country.

In this context, I refer to the part of the Report where it emphasises the importance of exchange rate adjustments as a means of carrying out structural adjustment programmes. Our view of the matter is that devaluation of currencies would not achieve the desired results if such devaluation is made in the face of speculative activities on the part of the rich countries, which unfortunately more often than not is the case. Our own experience in Pakistan is that, every time we have devalued, it has added to our economic burdens and led to unrest among the people whose options are very marginal.

While referring to some of the past follies in our development strategies, the Director-General in his Report has mentioned irrational economic policies from which no one benefited. I would like to add that, in an attempt to seek structural adjustments and equitable growth, the developing countries in Asia and the Pacific were kept preoccupied with pressing short-term problems which were more political or quasipolitical in nature, and, as such, side by side with their economic policies, these countries pursued irrational socio-economic labour and industrial relations policies which had the unfortunate effect of diverting attention from the need to generate employment and alleviate poverty from the Third World.

As usual, "Information and reports on the application of Conventions and Recommendations" is on the agenda of this Conference. While the discontent of the developing countries on the minimum labour standards has been displayed on various occasions through different forums in the past, I would like to draw your attention to paragraph 80 of the report adopted in the ILO Round Table for Pan Asian and Pacific Employers' Organisations held at Kuala Lumpur from 19 to 23 October 1987, and I quote: "A number of participants expressed concern at the proliferation of labour standards, many of which tended to inhibit rather than encourage the employment of labour in the Asian region. It was proposed that existing standards be revised to ensure that, in future, standards are truly employment generating in their purpose". This expressed the voice of the employers drawn from 24 countries of Asia and the Pacific including the economic models of the East, that is Japan and Korea, and needs to be given very serious consideration.

While talking on this august floor regarding minimum labour standards, I must urge upon the Conference that, side by side with the international labour Conventions and Recommendations which had restrictive effects on employment, particularly in the developing countries, the ILO must consider revising or developing Recommendations and Conventions which can increase productivity and efficiency, which can link wages with productivity, which can promote an attitude of cohesion rather than confrontation in industrial relations, which can promote work ethics and which can define mutual rights as well as obligations of the employers and the workers based on justice and equity.

Coming to the promotion of agricultural growth as discussed in the Report, I wish to state that Pakistan is already conscious of the need to strengthen the rural infrastructure as an essential requirement of increasing production and facilitating the marketing of agricultural produce, and thus reducing poverty. In fact, agriculture occupies a high place in the Government's list of priorities as it constitutes the mainstay of the national economy, employing over 70 per cent of labour and producing 25 per cent of the country's GDP. The Government's agriculture policy provides credit facilities to farmers and encourages local manufacture and use of agricultural machinery and implements.

The Government and people of Pakistan continue to shoulder the burden of three million Afghan refugees with compassion and generosity. We have not wavered in our political will to keep the borders open and assist wave after wave of refugees.

In the South Asian region, Pakistan continues to maintain strong encouragement for the South Asian Association for Regional Co-operation, popularly known as SAARC. We believe in expanded co-operation along regional lines, and the seven-nation organisation is beginning to shape the policies of its individual members to promote regional growth and stability. We were all pleased to see the outcome of the highly successful SAARC Summit in Islamabad at the end of December 1988. SAARC has been a useful forum for expanding regional efforts in combating narcotics and also terrorism.

During the year under review, the Employers' Federation of Pakistan, with the active assistance and co-operation of the Bureau of Employers' Activities, plans to undertake the Swedish Mission of "Improve your Business". The English version of this programme has already been translated into Urdu by the Federation. We will soon be launching the programme nationwide with the objective of not only making the existing small- and medium-size enterprises more viable, but also to provide a boost to small business for playing an active role in our economic development and increasing employment. With the support of the Labour and Population Team for Asia and the Pacific, the Federation has established a population education unit with the object of motivating the managers and supervisors to inculcate among the industrial workers the idea of having small families. The assistance to this project, which was started for an initial period of two-and-a-half years, has been extended for one more year, and thereafter our Federation is likely to continue this project on its own.

With ILO assistance, our Federation has also established a research and analysis cell for industrial relations matters for a period of two years ending in June this year, and we hope to continue this project also with our own resources after the expiry of the initial period. During the current year, our Federation, with the help and generous assistance of the ILO, has conducted various courses in Pakistan on important subjects of interest such as labour inspection, occupational safety and health, development of entrepreneurship amongst women in order to attract them into the economic realities of the country. We look forward to the continued co-operation and technical assistance of the ILO through the Bureau for Employer Activities.

A very profound change has come over Pakistan since we last gathered here. Six months ago a popularly elected political government came into power. The common man has always formed the hard core of the political party in power. It is the vote of the common man, the labourer and the tiller of the soil, which has turned the tables and determined our destiny. The present Government is extremely mindful of their interests and is doing its best to ameliorate their condition despite considerable constraints.

I greet you on behalf of the employers of the newly emerging third largest democracy in the world. I take this opportunity to call upon the distinguished members of the Conference to rise to the challenge which the developing countries are facing in their efforts to fight unemployment and poverty, because if today we lose the opportunity of finding a balance between economic development and social justice, the generations to come will not forgive us. Let us together make the ILO an effective institution monitoring the economic fate of the poor countries of Asia and Africa by developing the employers and workers of the Third World an international Code of Conduct which may prove a cornerstone in the realisation of our dream for economic development.

Original - French: Mr. BLEUX (representative of the World Confederation of Labour) - This year marks the 70th anniversary of the Organisation. The World Confederation of Labour (WCL) would like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to the ILO and to congratulate it on the activities it has carried out up until now, the objectives of which are to ensure that all human beings, whatever their race, creed or sex, may be able to raise their living standards and pursue their intellectual development in freedom and dignity, with economic security and with equal opportunities.

In discussing the Report which the Director-General is presenting this year to the Conference, we are embarking on an overall diagnosis of the world economic and social situation. More and more inequality between rich countries and poor countries is increasing, famine is being exacerbated and the difficulties of the great majority of countries are growing.

Enormous economic, social, commercial and financial difficulties are hitting the countries of the Third World particularly hard. These include declining commodity prices, protectionism, deteriorating terms of trade, the heavy debt burden and considerable transfer of financial resources to developed countries in order to service the debt to the detriment of economic development and employment, rigorous adjustment measures which hinder social progress, satisfaction of the essential needs of populations, application of international conventions and observance of workers' freedoms and rights.

We can only observe and regret the failures in development over the past decade. The growing number of people who live in absolute poverty will soon reach the figure of 1,000 million. As many men, women and children suffer and live in inhuman conditions. The international community can only be ashamed of this situation.

The Director-General's Report shows the necessity of a general revision of the development strategy and makes an important contribution thereto focusing on three main points: a policy of macro-economic recovery oriented toward sustainable economic growth; a micro-economic policy aiming at more effective use of resources and raw materials; and direct means to promote employment and the struggle against poverty in conjunction with the recovery programmes.

The WCL would like to emphasise the fact that economic growth is necessary, but is not enough in itself to combat poverty and intolerable social conditions. Economic growth is not synonymous with development and requires structural reforms. A country suffering from imbalance is obliged to adapt itself and restructuring is always accompanied by a gradual loss of income. But the effects on those receiving low wages depend on the specific characteristics and the specific content of the adjustment programme. The protection of low wages against downward pressures and the direct measures aimed at combating poverty should not constitute an obstacle to structural recovery policies, rather they can accompany them and activate them because they can increase overall demand which in its turn will stimulate the recovery of the economy.

But no programme of economic recovery has any chance of succeeding unless a solution is found to two major problems: that is, the unfair imbalance in international trade, engendered by the low level of prices for raw materials, and the persistence of protectionism with the emergence of new measures detrimental to world trade.

The WCL is aware of the economic advantages of an open world system because participation in world trade maximises national production, whereas protectionism is detrimental to developing countries and constitutes one of the factors underlying the growth of foreign debt. This does not mean that we have to accept uncontrolled liberalism which would benefit the dominating economies or the penetration by multinational companies of all markets with no protection against exploitation of workers.

The other concern is that of debt. Formerly only an economic problem, debt today has become a political and social problem. Repayment obligations and adjustment policy measures impoverish populations and prevent new development initiatives.

Fortunately, voices are now being raised to emphasise the social and political aspects of debt and the need for debt cancellation.

The WCL, in order to seek fair solutions to the debt problems, has twice met with the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the World Bank in Washington. One of these meetings took place last month. We have always drawn attention to the unfair nature of the circumstances in which a large part of the debt was contracted. It has asked the IMF and the World Bank to: fully assume their responsibilities by establishing their programmes on the threefold basis of restructuring, economic growth and protection of low-income groups; and to establish specific and practical co-operation agreements with international organisations such as the United Nations, GATT and, in particular, the ILO.

The High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment, which was held in November 1987 at the ILO's initiative, shows once again our determination to assume the responsibilities which fall within the labour and social sectors.

The conclusions of this meeting remain undiminished in value and may appropriately be restated today. It should thus be reasserted that: a social consensus is of vital importance when an economic policy is being elaborated; we must seek more specific and more effective forms of co-operation amongst the international organisations; efforts to achieve a better knowledge and understanding of the various social aspects and social consequences of economic policies must be pursued.

Efforts which must be deployed for economic recovery and to eradicate mass poverty are numerous and wide-ranging. They will only be effective if in parallel real democracy is installed in all countries. However, in some regions and certain countries, the political and social systems reflect serious violations of fundamental human rights, the absence of freedom and trade union rights, discrimination with regard to race, religion and sex and denial of the right of self-determination.

The WCL remains concerned by the fact that the Black peoples and workers of South Africa continue to be the victims of daily discrimination, unacceptable living and working conditions, severe restrictions on their freedom and trade union rights and barbaric acts of repression.

The independence process in Namibia, which was achieved thanks to an untiring struggle and the support of the international community, marks an important step towards the liberation of Black peoples from colonial and racist domination. It should make us redouble our efforts to apply sanctions in order to force South Africa to abandon its policy of apartheid.

The just struggle for democracy and freedom always pays off. The recent and fortunate developments of the situation in Poland owing to the tenacity of the workers and their organisation, Solidarnosc, who continuously fought for democracy and to whom we pay tribute, constitute an example of courage and success.

However, although the development of profound societal reforms in some countries is a source of satisfaction, we cannot help but be concerned by the gratuitous acts of violence which are being perpetrated in China against students and workers whose peaceful demonstrations for more democracy and more freedom have been brutally put down. The mass arrests of young people, the denunciations and the hasty sentencing will not stop future manifestations of the just aspirations of the people.

The WCL would like to appeal to legendary oriental wisdom so that those that are sentenced will receive clemency and those who have been arrested will soon be released.

The Director-General's Report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories shows the absence of trade union freedom, the discrimination with regard to employment and social security, and the deterioration of the living conditions of the Arab people under domination, such as that of the economy, which is having serious effects on employment and development in these territories. The extension of the establishment of Jewish settlements the means which are used to violate the rights of Palestinians and the brutality of the Israeli armed forces are sources of incidents which are detrimental to the establishment of justice and peace. It is regrettable that measures have not been taken by the Israeli authorities following up the recommendations of the fact-finding mission. We hope that the resolution concerning the protection of the rights and freedoms of workers and employers in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories, which has been given priority, will generate a serious examination of the situation and lead to setting up adequate assistance programmes to enable the region's inhabitants to enjoy their legitimate rights and to progress towards development in peace.

The list of violations of human rights and trade union rights is long and sad. The Governing Body Committee on Freedom of Association is confronted at each session with about a hundred cases in which the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), have not been observed. There are also frequent cases of arbitrary arrests, torture, disappearances and murder by paramilitary groups with the connivance of the government.

The WCL once again would like to launch an appeal for the promotion and the application of ILO instruments concerning fundamental human rights and the improvement of working and living conditions of workers. Tendencies to denounce, to limit, or to revise standards to reduce their scope are retrograde steps that run counter to the aims and objectives of the Organisation, for man must not be a slave to the economy and to profit.

It is precisely because protection and promotion of human rights are closely linked with economic and social development that countries must include amongst their main priorities the elimination of all obstacles in the way of wider participation by populations, and in particular trade union organisations, in the elaboration and application of every development policy.

Mr. OSHIOMHOLE (Workers' delegate, Nigeria) – Kindly allow me on behalf of the organised workers in Nigeria and on my own behalf to congratulate you on your richly deserved election as the President of this Conference. I am convinced that the Conference could not have been blessed with a better leadership.

The Director-General's Report covers the all important issue of foreign debt and structural adjustment which has severely affected the economies of most of the less developed countries and resulted in debilitating effects on the lives of their peoples. The effect of structural adjustment imposed by the International Monetary Fund applied to most of the less developed countries groaning under the weight of foreign debt invariably undermine the social purpose of the ILO which includes human well-being, social justice and world peace.

The concept of social justice should have a universal application in economic and social relations, not only within nations but also between nations. Yet the paradox which the Director-General referred to in the Preface to Part I of his Report was probably not unintended and certainly not unforeseen. Given the inequities that have increasingly characterised the world economic order, it was quite predictable that countries of the South would continue to drift deeper into poverty while the fewer but certainly dominant countries of the North are on the threshold of yet another era of prosperity.

This unacceptable state of affairs is the logical outcome of a global economic arrangement in which the economically powerful nations of the North seek to advance their social-economic interest often at the expense of the legitimate social-economic interest of the less developed countries of the South through the combined manipulation of world trade and the instruments of international finance capital.

Today, foreign debt has become the most effective weapon both in the international politics of domination and control and also of expatriating investment capital from economies of less developed countries of the South. The problem of poverty in the less developed countries cannot be solved as long as the debt question is unresolved.

The Nigeria Labour Congress is in full agreement with the Organisation of African Trade Union Unity (OATUU) that these debts by their nature and scale are practically unpayable regardless of the determination of some national governments to the contrary. Yet we know, of course, that to talk of debt repudiation has not yet gained the deserved wide acceptability even from many a debtor nation. This does not however solve the problems. What it probably means is that many of these countries unable to contain the increasing stiff and widespread resistance against further impoverishment on the part of their people, would in the long run rather default where they lack the courage to repudiate. The net effect would probably be the same.

However, it would be preferred, and I would indeed call on countries of the North to forgive these debts as part of a formal reparation to the less developed countries for the damage done to their economies first under colonialism and their post-colonial disadvantaged position in the world economic structure.

Just as powerful nations tend to impose an unjust economic order on the weaker nations, so it seems that governments and ruling elite in many debtor countries impose an unfair share of the burden of economic adjustment on the weaker segments of the population. It seems to me that the statement quoted in the Director-General's Report, that "human beings are both the means and the end of economic development", is being replaced under the IMF-designed structural adjustment, which is a strategy which in effect seems to imply that human beings are both the means and the victims of economic adjustment. Yet as eminently submitted in the Director-General's Report "the fact that consumption is limited by production does not mean that economic growth must precede social progress... economic growth and social progress must advance together".

I therefore call on the ILO to continue as it has always done to persuade governments and the IMF in their design and application of structural adjustment, not "to ignore the obvious fact that economic and social issues are inextricably intertwined".

Allow me to touch on the unfortunate crises that engulfed the Nigeria Labour Congress (NLC) last year. I am pleased to say that the Nigeria trade unions have since resolved their differences democratically on their own and independent of the Government. The NLC is now on its feet and united.

As you are probably aware, Nigeria is currently in a transition to civil and democratic rule. The NLC has resolved to take an active role in the transition by sponsoring a political party. This does not of course mean that the NLC will transform itself into a political party.

I cannot end this intervention without expressing the solidarity of the Nigerian workers with the Palestinian workers of the occupied Arab territories. We condemn the maiming, slaughter and gaoling of Palestinian workers and people by the Israeli forces of occupation in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. We believe that human blood cannot possibly be a lubricant for world peace.

In the same vein, the NLC condemns in the strongest possible terms the apartheid régime of South Africa for its continued crime against humanity. The unfortunate fact of life today is that many now live on the sweat of others. Even so, no civilised man should live on the blood of others. Yet the profits from investment under apartheid is tantamount to profit made possible through the cold blood of African workers who are slaughtered daily under apartheid. We therefore call on the governments of the West to shun profits from apartheid and impose comprehensive economic sanctions against apartheid South Africa.

Mr. HARYONO (Employers' delegate, Indonesia) – Mr. President, on behalf of the Employers' Association of Indonesia (APINDO), allow me to express my sincere appreciation and congratulations on your unanimous election as President of this session of the International Labour Conference. I am confident that with your skilful guidance and wisdom, this 76th Session of the International Labour Conference will arrive at useful conclusions and the formulation of a strategy in shaping a new world economy leading to the eradication of poverty and hence raising the dignity of human beings.

It is also gratifying to note that the Director-General's Report, Recovery and employment, sets out the fundamentals of a global economic reform achieved through better co-operation between the developed and developing world.

I fully share the conclusion drawn by Mr. Francis Blanchard, to the effect that one of the reasons for the success of the ILO is the continuing commitment of its tripartite constituents.

The tripartite concept is also one of the basic principles of Indonesian philosophy, Pancasila, and our strength in establishing a democratic society led by the wisdom of deliberations and conciliation in arriving at a consensus between the Government and the social partners.

The existence of an independent labour union and the employers' organisation are respected in the spirit of our Pancasila industrial relations, since these social partners are clearly the communicating link between the Government and industrial society.

Despite the varied social and cultural conditions in Indonesia, the Indonesians have many characteristics in common: the traditional cohesiveness of social life, the universal sense of mutual belonging, the strong feeling of brotherhood and the spirit of mutual help are binding forces of our nation.

Discussion aimed at achieving a consensus is the basic principle applied in resolving problems, and affords positive support in our economic development.

Throughout such discussions, openness and candour prevail. We share views and exchange information openly, so that through mutual understanding agreement can be reached.

Joint consultative meetings through national and regional tripartite bodies discussing labour issues relating to employment, remuneration, labour protection, family planning and training have been envisaged.

The deliberations in the national tripartite body during the past six months covered topics including child labour, the prohibition of dismissal of pregnant workers, equal treatment of men and women as regards retirement age, family planning at enterprise level, levies for apprenticeship training and a recommendation to the Government to ratify the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144). Once the tripartite body has adopted a recommendation, it will be forwarded to the Minister of Manpower, who shall issue a ministerial decree.

We have recently agreed to set up a tripartite Standing Committee on ILO matters.

In addition to the national and regional tripartite bodies dealing with labour policies, technical committees have been established, such as the National and Regional Wages Council, the National Productivity Council, the National Council for Training and Development, and the National Council on Safety and Hygiene.

One unique tripartite arrangement is that when a collective labour agreement has been concluded at enterprise level, the signing of the agreement is witnessed by the Minister of Manpower, APINDO representing employers and the SPSI representing the labour union.

Bipartite labour management meetings have become common practice in most large- and medium-sized enterprises.

Since the adoption of our Pancasila industrial relations, we have succeeded in reducing industrial unrest and labour disputes. The spirit of brotherhood, shared responsibility and the creation of harmony and industrial peace are fundamental to the success of Indonesia's economic growth.

Indonesia has achieved substantial progress in the past two decades. There is social and political stability.

The country has become self-sufficient in rice and other basic commodities. The population growth rate has been greatly reduced, although we are still the fifth most populated country in the world.

At present, Indonesia's manufacturing sector contributes around 14 per cent of the GDP and is expected to reach 16 per cent in the final year of our current Five-Year Development Plan.

With the economic recovery of the industrialised countries it is hoped that international trade will be able to absorb our exports. Although the European Community (EC) has adopted a single market system, it is expected that this will not lead to trade barriers on the importation of goods from the developing countries, in particular to the countries of the EC.

Deregulatory measures have been pursued by the Government of Indonesia, providing better facilities to capital investment and resolving bureaucratic procedures.

However, one of our pressing problems is still the huge labour force, estimated at 75 million, with an estimated growth of 11.9 million by the year 1993.

The labour participation rate of women in Indonesia is currently 38 per cent and it is expected by the year 2000 to grow to around 44 per cent of the total labour force.

Emancipation and equal opportunities for work have historically been established.

Indonesian women have been recognised as playing a vital role in our economic development.

Since the adoption of compulsory education for children up to the age of 14, the number of school-going children between 6 and 12 years of age attending elementary education has come very close to 100 per cent by the end of the Fourth Five-Year Plan. Our problem is now to provide occupational training before they enter the labour market.

It is therefore imperative that training, retraining and entrepreneurial skill development be given top priority to further employment creation and the achievement of higher productivity.

A consultation meeting sponsored by the ILO-UNDP has recently been held by the tripartite constituents in my country, attended by the Government, employers, the labour union and other non-governmental institutions. Recommendations were drawn up on employment creation, human resource development, productivity and the protection of labour.

I should also like to take this opportunity to express our gratitude to the Bureau for Employers' Activities, the regional office of the ILO in Bangkok and the ILO representative in Jakarta for their assistance in helping our organisation to hold seminars at both national and regional levels.

I am also grateful for the invaluable co-operation of the Confederation of Australian Industry in helping to strengthen our organisation and for their continual technical assistance in the near future.

Mention should also be made of the Asia-Pacific High-Level Conference of employers' organisations successfully hosted by Nikkeiren of Japan, which has brought our organisation to closer co-operation and a better understanding.

I am sure that every single delegate at this International Labour Conference and those who had the opportunity to work together with Mr. Francis Blanchard, would share my sentiments and heartfelt appreciation for his continual and consistent efforts for the promotion and achievement of human rights and the betterment and upgrading of human dignity and well-being.

To Mr. Michel Hansenne, who has recently been appointed as Director-General of the ILO, I wish every success in facing the challenges of the next decade and beyond in an effort to close the gap between the developed and the developing world through closer co-operation and mutual help.

There is indeed an urgent need for positive action and continued dialogue between the developed and the developing world and for avoiding further economic crises.

Original - Spanish: Mr. BROWN YOUNG (Workers' delegate, Costa Rica) - I am extremely honoured to attend this session of the International Labour Conference, which is the most representative body of the social forces contributing to production in all countries, as representative of the workers of Costa Rica. I bring you their friendly greetings, together with their wishes for social progress and a request of solidarity in the fight we must wage under highly unequal conditions.

We are also pleased to see that the discussions at this session are centred on economic recovery; this suggests that in many parts of the world the end of the tunnel can be seen.

We are pleased furthermore to attend this assembly at a time when the International Labour Organisation is celebrating its 70 years of existence; 70 years of constant and untiring efforts in the defence of the interests of the productive sector of mankind. For this reason, we respectfully extend our greetings to the ILO and sincerely hope that it will continue its work into the next century for the benefit of human society.

Without wishing to take up too much of your time, I would like to start by referring to an article which appeared a few weeks ago in a weekly magazine in my country. This magazine reported that in the Bay of Santa Marta, in the Colombian Caribbean, 72 Spanish galleons had been found which had been sunk during the colonial period.

According to experts' calculations, the gold, silver, jewels and other valuable objects contained in those ships would enable Latin America to pay its foreign debt and sustain its development for the next ten years.

These thoughts have perhaps been formulated before, in other places and in other circumstances; but today, at a time of crisis, they assume a far greater significance than in normal times.

If we consider that our countries were under the colonial yoke for three centuries, it is impossible to calculate even the approximate value of the wealth that Latin America contributed to the world at that time.

And if we remember that this was happening at a time when the industrialised countries of today were starting their development process, we must think of the enormous wealth that Latin America contributed to this process of social and economic development.

I would like to say that it is not my intention now to try to recover past debts or open old wounds. I merely wish to raise a few matters of concern. First, it would seem that no country has been able to develop entirely on its own; all countries have needed the contribution of others.

Today, now that Latin America and the countries of the Third World in general are on the brink of development, we can only appeal to the understanding and solidarity of the productive sectors of those countries who embarked upon their own development process earlier.

We are aware, furthermore, that there can be no economic recovery without employment. We also know that there can be no recovery while our countries are burdened by the debt which we are obliged to reimburse with very high interest rates.

In this respect, we are hoping for understanding so that we can pay back this debt once we have sufficiently stepped up our production, satisfied the basic needs of our people and made available the necessary surplus for this payment.

The dilemma of whether to pay or eat cannot conceal the fact that, in order to pay, it is necessary to produce, and this involves eating. Otherwise not only to repay the debt but also to ensure social peace and life itself would be impossible.

Forty-two years ago, addressing a congressional committee of the United States, one of our most illustrious politicians, José Figueres, said that the Latin Americans were tired of pointing out the lack of interest in the prices of their commodities. Every time they suggested an equitable stabilisation plan they were answered with set phrases, with such novelties as the law of supply and demand, such original forms of words as the free enterprise system or such insults as "Aren't we already giving you enough money?" He went on to say that the Latin Americans were not asking for presents, but only wanted a fair price for the sweat of their people and the fruit of their soil when they provided products for the needs of other countries. That was all they needed to live, to raise our own capital and to develop, he said.

When the first UNCTAD Conference took place 35 years ago in this very city, José Figueres said that fair trading was the only viable way of bringing about the development of our peoples.

On the same occasion he insisted on the need for a system of parity prices within the framework of international trade, which would provide workers of all countries with equal wages.

This has been translated into the slogan which sums up the aims of UNCTAD - "We do not want aid, we want fair trade" - which is still the only effective solution because only if our countries are remunerated on an equal basis for their working day will markets open up for the products of the industrialised countries and we obtain the funds we must have for investment and growth.

Otherwise, every day our countries will fall further behind the industrialised countries, every day our populations' standard of living will be lower, every day dissatisfaction and social unrest will increase. In the long run, every new crisis will be more dangerous.

We know that to achieve our objective we need the solidarity of all the productive sectors of our nations, the co-operation of the workers of the developed countries and the understanding of the other sectors of these countries. Sensible men, as our leader Figueres said, must think in terms of defending the human species and civilisation, in terms of saving ourselves, all of us, or else the danger is that no one will be saved.

However, as has occurred in the other countries of the continent, in Costa Rica also the requirements imposed by the international lenders which are known under the term of structural readjustments are doing away with the remains of social reform in our countries which, thanks to the foresight of responsible leaders, were started in the 1940s.

We are aware that there can be no economic recovery with weak trade unions; and in our country, the trade union movement has been undermined to such an extent that it cannot defend and promote social welfare institutions. Indeed, the uncompromising attitude of certain employers' sectors has prevented full compliance with the provisions of the Constitution and International Labour Conventions guaranteeing freedom of association.

Likewise, as denounced before the ILO, the ICFTU in Costa Rica has promoted under the name of solidarity associations, a number of old "employer-sponsored" trade unions manipulated by employers devoted to weakening trade unions. They fail to understand that without trade unions there can be no social democracy and thus no political democracy.

These associations, which enjoy privileges denied to the trade unions, have undermined labour law because they have turned into offices that merely dismiss workers.

A few days ago the unitary workers' organisation, the Standing Workers' Council (CPT) signed an agreement with the Minister of Labour to implement freedom of association, in accordance with the Constitution and the Labour Code.

As a result of this agreement, the Ministry of Labour drafted the text of regulations on freedom of association, which will provide for the creation of a bipartite committee to further trade unionism and the appointment of an adviser to help workers set up trade unions. Provision is also made for the Ministry to intervene whenever there are abusive practices with, of course, the previous authorisation of the employer.

In spite of this small conquest in the labour movement, in line with provisions contained in the Constitution, the Labour Code and International Labour Conventions, there is no recognition of trade union immunity or legal strike action; as the Committee on Freedom of Association is aware, it has been impossible to obtain trade union immunity in Costa Rica and strikes are still governed by the Penal Code.

Although this agreement has not yet been signed by the President of the Republic it has been violently attacked by the most conservative employers' associations and the yellow pro-employer associations.

The latter, in the words of one of its leaders, even went so far as to say that these regulations were disguising the benefits provided by International Labour Conventions, as if the ILO constituted the worst threat for social security in Costa Rica. The major commercial media have started a violent campaign against these regulations, to such an extent that it is doubtful whether they will be approved by the Executive.

We, the workers, are therefore at a total disadvantage in our struggle, without means of communications and without trade union freedom.

It is for this reason we count upon the support of the ILO and the co-operation of all informed productive sectors in order to carry forward the struggle, which involves not only social justice but also the destiny of our people.

Only then can we advance with the principle that the fate of people must come before the debt, which is a guarantee for economic recovery on a fair and balanced basis.

I would also like to congratulate you, Mr. President, on your election to steer the deliberations of this Session of the International Labour Conference, as well as the other Officers of the Conference. I also extend my congratulations to Mr. Michel Hansenne on his election as Director-General of our Organisation.

Mr. NOWAK (Employers' delegate, Poland) - May I offer you, Mr. President, my best wishes of success in carrying out your duties as President of this Session of the International Labour Conference. I extend a similar wish to your deputies.

Recovery and employment, the subject selected by the Director-General for his report, constitutes in a way a continuation of last year's debates and is also closely related to the opportunities offered by the policy of détente set in motion by the dialogue between the two Great Powers. This is reflected in the report when it says that "The present Report can be seen as an attempt to build on the momentum generated by the High-Level Meeting". In his conclusions the Director-General launched an appeal that the means economised on armaments be earmarked for concrete common efforts, inter alia, "to finance a series of operations at the regional or subregional level to create or refurbish essential infrastructure within the framework of a major works programme, much of which would be devoted to the conservation of the environment."

Such a proposal, as well as others along the same lines deserves to be supported in every way possible.

Such actions are necessary, and that is well substantiated by the data presented in the three initial chapters of the Report, to reflect quite faithfully the growing differences in development between individual parts of the world as well as between individual countries.

There are not many countries which over the past ten years, have enjoyed a sustained quick pulse of economic activity – among them are the OECD countries, the socialist countries to some extent, and several Asian states. But an overwhelming majority of developing countries, including in particular those of Latin America and Africa, have even suffered a drop in their per capita GNP.

The Report identifies several reasons for the phenomenon. Among the principal reasons it pinpoints the extremely heavy debt burden weighing on those countries.

Efforts to service the debt frequently include efforts to increase exports and to limit imports. At the same time, however, these efforts are accompanied by a drop in investments and by mounting unemployment. Also, funding for social welfare is reduced.

According to the Report, in the 1990s, 36 million jobs should be added annually in the developing countries but such a target is unattainable under the present conditions in those countries. The most difficult will be the question on how to create new jobs for young people and for women. Another difficult problem will be how to provide security for older people.

The Report emphasises the after-effects of the deep recession in the countries of sub-Saharan Africa and in Latin America and does not visualise chances for the implementation of the strategy of growing out of debt, which is not working because the resources needed for such growth are drained away to service the debt. Similarly, the recommendations of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank do not stand the test everywhere and are thought to be insufficient in many Latin American countries. These and other arguments led the Director-General to propose global action based on the resources resulting from the restrictions on armaments.

I state with satisfaction that the meaningful changes in the socio-political and economic system of my country, signalled as they were for several years, have now become a fact. As a result of round-table debates, the system of parliamentary democracy has been substantially developed and the policy of safeguarding individual human rights enlarged. The Solidarity Trade Union has been legalised and it immediately moved into various actions, including that of the present electoral campaign. Also, the rural Solidarity Union has been legalised. Moreover, other trade unions are being set up. We hope that the new socio-political situation in our country will be beneficial in the increasing effectiveness of our economy.

On 10 January 1989 an Association of Employers in Poland was established. One of its tasks is to represent the interests of employers in Poland irrespective of type of property or capital, in matters of internal dimensions.

At the joint session of the praesidia held on 10 May there was a fusion of the Committee of Polish Employers for International Co-operation, after its 20 years of existence and operation connected with the Polish Chamber of International Trade, with the newly established Association of Employers. The Committee has now become an organ of the Association representing its international interests.

The talks initiated with the Government are being continued with a view to the take-over by the Association of certain negotiating and mediatory functions which have been performed up until now by government institutions. The talks are expected to conclude before the end of the year when the General Congress of the Association will take place, with an appropriate extension of its operations.

It is difficult to define at the present moment how popular this Association is going to be and whether it will be the only one, but the course of negotiations in which the Association is presently engaged with the representatives of the state and those of the private and co-operative sectors, indicate that many interlocutors feel the necessity of maintaining a single and strong employers' organisation. At present there are employers representing all types of ownership – state, co-operative and private, on the Board of the Association and on its individual committees.

Apart from the Association of Employers, other organisations grouping managers were also formed in 1989, for example the Association of Managers, the Council of Directors, the Industrial Association, the Economic Initiatives Association and others.

Regulations enacted in recent years enabling practically every individual citizen to engage in an economic activity of his own choice are, in my opinion, more liberal as compared with the regulations existing in certain Western countries.

In the private sector, including individual farmers, about 35 per cent of the active population is currently employed. In the Union of Craftsmen Chambers there were more than 408,000 craftsmen and small businessmen registered by the end of 1988, who employed about 1 million persons. These figures, which have continued to grow, represent an increase of over 12 per cent in only one year. Additionally, there are many hundreds of thousands individually employed without being registered with the Craftsmen's Chambers. Certain state-owned firms may now become the property of their director or start to sell shares. Thus, the ownership of a medium-sized OMIG electrical equipment manufacturing plant has been transferred to its directors, with the consent of the workforce. Many state-owned firms enter into joint venture arrangements with foreign enterprises based both in the Western and Eastern countries. At the moment, in Poland, there are over 1,000 privately owned medium-sized firms in operation, mostly with the participation of foreign capital. These firms employ around 280,000 persons and their number keeps growing.

In my opinion, the comment made by the Director-General correctly reflects the social situation in my country. I quote: "Eastern European countries are going through a process of economic and social reforms which will probably enhance their longer-run capacity to grow but is at present affecting labour stability and working conditions."

Unfortunately, the Report's observation on the negative effects of the debt also applies to Poland and, while there has so far been no unemployment or hunger and a small increase in production has been recorded, the economic and social situation in my country is difficult. Contributing to this state of affairs is Poland's enormous foreign debt, which is blocking the necessary restructuring of industry, including the modernisation and updating of obsolete equipment.

This situation may hamper the fulfilment of the expectations of Poland's working people who pin their hopes for the improvement of the economy on the democratisation of social and political life being implemented now.

On behalf of the Association of Employers in Poland, I would like to express words of gratitude and thanks to Mr. Francis Blanchard for his long-standing co-operation with Polish employers. I am very pleased that Mr. Michel Hansenne, the newly elected Director-General of the ILO, has accepted an invitation to visit my country on the occasion of the first session of the Polish Tripartite Committee for Co-operation with the ILO. We wish him much success while performing his important duties in the area of international co-operation and social justice.

Mr. TAPIOLA (Workers' delegate, Finland) – Mr. President, I should like to start by congratulating you and your colleagues upon your elections to responsible functions at this Conference. I should also like to express the appreciation of the Finnish trade unions for the work of Mr. Blanchard, and our conviction that Mr. Hansenne, as the new Director-General, will continue to strengthen the position of the ILO as the international forum for deliberations and concrete decisions on the ways in which economic and social factors should interact in the modern world.

I should like to limit my intervention in this general debate to two issues dealt with in the recommendations of the Director-General's Report, Recovery and employment.

First, I wish to take up the notion of our "common destiny", which is given prominence in the conclusions of the Report. In the international trade union movement, we have for many years talked about the interdependence of all of our countries and societies. We were then primarily dealing with the economic and social issues; that is, questions like the preconditions for mutually beneficial trade, the consequences of the internationalisation of enterprise activities, capital movements and exchange rates, and the social effects of different growth strategies. We have accepted that no country can solve its economic and social problems in a vacuum. We have consistently pleaded for solutions with do not merely shift the burdens to someone else, be it another country, another group of countries, or to more disadvantaged groups in our own societies.

Today, we are in a situation where, while still far from having reached the solution to these problems, we urgently have to introduce another element into this discussion: the ecological factor. We have become increasingly sensitive to it, due both to recent catastrophes and to an ever-growing awareness of the actual degree of deterioration of our present living surroundings.

Fortunately, the political tensions in the world have lessened and we have a real possibility of recognising that the more immediate threat to a great many of us is ecological rather than military catastrophe. I say this, fully recognising that war and oppression are still the reality of the day for many people, in particularly workers; and achieving negotiated and just solutions to the crises of this world in no way can or will be relegated to a secondary place among our concerns.

We can only hope however that the realisation of how vulnerable our planet ecologically is will lead to a new awareness of two things.

First, we have to co-operate to avoid problems and threats which, by their nature, transcend national borders.

Second, instead of just focusing our actions on what to do once damage and degradation have already taken place, we take to design our future methods of production, work and consumption so that they are in harmony with our environment. This will and must open up new employment opportunities, too.

As the Director-General's Report notes, it is a labour-intensive field. It will also call for an extensive use of our main resources, the human mind and the skills of people, principally of course from among the workers, together with new employment in occupations destined to conserve our surroundings and, ultimately, our life. We also have to see how best we can use existing structures and facilities for environmental purposes.

The resolution which appropriately received the highest priority and is now debated in the Resolutions Committee of this Conference, speaks among other things of the links between the working environment and the general environment.

If we look at some of the recent major accidents, Bhopal or Chernobyl, one can well see that the workplace is where we can efficiently and also relatively easily start with protecting the general environment as well. It is important to discuss and establish the role of workers and trade unions in the protection of the environment in a wide sense, for instance, by broadening the role of elected health and safety representatives so that they can assist in protecting not only the workers of a given plant but also the whole neighbourhood, country and, ultimately, this common world of ours.

The other item in the Director-General's recommendations which I particularly wanted to take up here today concerns infrastructures. The Report speaks of both economic and social infrastructures, and it quite rightly envisages that there is much work (and, thus, jobs) in either building, maintaining or strengthening them. I would like however to add one element to that. In my view, a well-functioning collective bargaining system, with workers' and em-employers' organisations which make it work, is an essential and indispensable part of the infrastructure of any democratic society. Infrastructure investments are usually considered expensive, partly because the more profit-orientated market forces assume that someone else, for instance, general or local government, should pay for them.

Without going into the debate of financing infrastructure investments any further, I just wish to point out that it is not too expensive to invest in, for instance, well-functioning collective bargaining systems. Often, it calls for a change in attitude only, and it calls for some courage to redistribute both power and responsibilities more evenly among those whose task it is to produce either goods or services.

To give only one example, in the debate on a social dimension in the European Communities, the President of the EC Commission, Mr. Delors, has repeatedly stressed the need for strong and representative trade unions. In the Nordic area, we have always assumed this. It is difficult to conceive the kind of decentralised, more flexible systems that economic efficiency presumably would call for, without representative organisations which can bargain for and defend the interests of the workers.

A developed society will have to have both formal and voluntary machinery for preventing and settling conflicts. One of the best ones is still free collective bargaining, the prerequisites for which are strong workers' and employers' organisations.

As the world is increasingly interdependent, imbalances in one area have an immediate impact on other areas. Our common destiny is also greatly dependent on how and where major economic decisions are made.

Technological progress which, to a great extent, has been due to the way in which major enterprises have utilised information and communications technology, has created a new situation also for the employees. Major decisions involving the quantity and quality of employment, and the economic future of a country or region, can be taken at an international level immediately, thanks to the way in which management is organised and the technological means available to it.

It is very important to realise that when we are talking of structural change, what really has taken place is a change in the structure of decision-making both at home and internationally.

To be efficient, collective bargaining has to assume that there are real decision-makers on both sides of the negotiating table.

With the way in which enterprises have been internationalising, and with the new kind of linkages they have built up with one another, we are confronted with a situation where our organisations and our rules and regulations can no longer cope.

I wish to stress that I do not see any reason to believe that national collective bargaining systems would become obsolete, on the contrary. But with the internationalisation of our economies, additional complementary structures have to be developed, so that the employees can have trade and fair information on the whole of the entity where they work. They have to be able to consult and negotiate with the responsible management on their future prospects and, of course, when management becomes international, there will have to be possibilities for the representatives of the employees to regularly meet with one another. The ILO Tripartite Declaration on Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy speaks clearly in favour of such arrangements.

I am convinced that, in the light of the challenges of both our immediate and longer-term future, we shall be coming back to that document and its principles, much more than we have done over the past 12 years of its existence.

The task of managing and internationalising an interdependent economy on the basis of negotiation and consultation, and in accordance with the ILO principles of tripartism, is not an easy one. But, if our work here and at home is to remain meaningful, this is a major challenge we have to be prepared to meet. We need the tools for it, we need the mental attitude for it, and we need the collective experience of our co-operation in the ILO which reaches back over a period of 70 years.

Twenty-third sitting

President: Mrs. Molkova

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

The PRESIDENT (Mrs. MOLKOVA) – We shall now continue with the discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Mr. ZAINAL RAMPAK (Workers' delegate, Malaysia) – I stand here today before you, representing the collective interests of Malaysian workers, who have asked me to convey their choicest regards and best wishes to one and all here. To begin with, I join all Malaysian workers and the previous speakers to congratulate Mr. Nkomo and the Vice-Presidents for their election at this session of the International Labour Conference. It is indeed a well-deserved honour bestowed upon them and we are confident that this singular credit will do all of us proud.

It is heartening to know that the International Labour Conference is holding its 76th session. It is also noteworthy that the ILO has successfully managed to concentrate the collective resources of its member nations all over the world on 75 consecutive occasions, and we are confident that this 76th Session will bring forth bigger and better opportunities for workers around the globe.

As rightly pointed out in the Director-General's Report, there exists a vast disparity in conditions of work, social security and wage structure between workers in developed countries and their counterparts in less developed nations.

This has been so not only because of the relative levels of national wealth but more due to the bargaining strength of the workers' movements in these countries.

This naturally brings into focus the need to review and identify the effectiveness and relevance of international conferences such as this in the context of bringing about a more equitable deal for workers toiling away their lives in every corner of the world.

Pardon me for conveying this, but I have to state categorically that universal labour rights are under a cloud, and shrouded in bureaucratic reticulum. The often rotary-natured labour legislation in several developing countries has at least given a semblance of comfort and security for workers. The ILO should ask itself honestly what it has done to alleviate the pain of exploitation experienced by unfortunate workers at the hands of their cruel employers. It would be of little use if we were to meet here every year, in cool and plush surroundings, merely attempting academic solutions to the ever-increasing problem confronting the workers. What we need to do is to first embark on a stocktaking exercise and try to identify the actual level of implementation or application of the decision vis-à-vis the resolutions taken at past Conferences.

Notwithstanding the concerted efforts of the international community, the world populace in general and the workers in particular are undergoing untold suffering and oppression as a direct result of blatant violation of human rights by the governments of their respective countries. Basic freedom and civil liberty have been shackled to the guardpost of autocracy, all in the name of "internal security". This Conference is also aware that sex discrimination and unfair labour practices are rampant everywhere, especially in the Third World, and we want to know what tangible and constructive measures have been taken by the ILO to set right this social insult.

The Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), have not even been ratified by many member nations, let alone given legal effect. Perhaps the time has already come for these Conventions themselves to be reviewed, given the fact that some of these were drafted more than 70 years ago, and that the socio-economic scenario of the world has changed so significantly that the contents of some of these Conventions may even sound rather outdated, if not incompatible. Such a state of affairs has actually set the clock backwards in terms of modernisation of human resources, and this will certainly not do any party any good whatsoever in the long run.

What irks us is that several multinational corporations from developed countries, which apparently lend support to universal liberty, have themselves encouraged exploitation and protectionism in developing countries. Many of these large companies have production facilities in the poorer countries, all in the name of "foreign investment", but what they actually do is unlawful profiteering in the name of investment. These "leaders of industry" even have the audacity to twist the arms of their host governments and compel them to enact the type of favourable labour legislation, preferably a union-free environment, which will enable these greedy employers to quickly multiply their profits with little or no consideration for their workers whose efforts have brought forth these opportunities for the managers.

This Conference should be aware of the plight of workers in the electronics industry in several developing nations. These manufacturing units are managed by big companies based in developed countries with a view to taking advantage of the employer-oriented labour laws and the low cost of labour available. They put excessive pressure on often helpless governments to bring about a non-union environment, or at the most a feeble or divided organised labour situation further guarded by often unilateral and arbitrary labour legislation, as this gives them the most fertile ground to practise their ill-conceived policies.

The ILO, in its representative capacity as a tripartite body, should strive hard to find an equitable formula for this recurring problem if it has any genuine intention at all to help the workers.

Let every individual present here today understand clearly that the term "investment" does not merely mean the injection of financial capital alone: it also means the input of skills and efforts, which management experts like to call "human capital", and this has to come from the workers. Every employer should understand and appreciate that monetary capital cannot be multiplied in the absence of human capital, and one complements the other.

Despite several years of organised resistance, apartheid continues to exist in South Africa. The "champions of international conscience" have yet to succeed in removing this social cancer, and the ILO cannot absolve itself of a fair measure of shared responsibility in this regard. Apartheid is certainly the worst form of discrimination ever known to Man, and it is a challenge to fundamental human liberty. We are all aware that, despite international political and economic pressure on South Africa to discontinue the practice of apartheid, there are still many nations, not excluding the "champions of world opinion", that have quietly violated the majority decision and have even given "oblique encouragement" to the sustenance of apartheid in South Africa. The very same developed countries that condemn human rights violations and apartheid on the one hand condone them on the other. If this is not organised deceit and institutionalised hypocrisy, then what else is?

We wish to inform the oppressed people of South Africa that Malaysian workers are all with you in your struggle for liberty and equality, and we shall join like-minded countries to put pressure on the South African Government towards the complete abolition of apartheid.

The workers of Palestine in the occupied Arab territories have been denied a fair and rightful place in their own land by the perpetrators of aggression. We are in full sympathy with these Palestinian workers in the face of the untold misery experienced by them all these years, and we call upon the "keepers of world principles" to concentrate their efforts towards the elimination of aggression and poverty, and ensure that the meek and the innocent do not suffer in the hands of the mighty and the guilty.

We urge the ILO to impress upon the governments of developing countries the need to enact sufficiently protective labour legislation to safeguard the interests of the workers. There are far too many lacunae in the labour laws of many a developing country, and uncouth employers have a field day exploiting their gullible employees. If we are thinking at all of attaining global peace in an aura of amity and unity, then we have to first get our priorities right by solving the problems at the grass-roots level before attempting to even analyse the difficulties at the upper levels.

I once again join my colleagues from developing nations present here today in urging the developed world to take the welfare of the less fortunate among us in mind before embarking on socio-economic or political pursuits.

In conclusion, it would be apt to say that every human being, no matter what race, colour or creed he or she belongs to, has the fundamental right to make an honest living in this world of ours, and nobody, immaterial how powerful or rich he or she may be, shall ever obstruct man from exercising this birth-right in an atmosphere of security and peace.

Mr. DE KONING (Minister for Social Affairs and Employment Netherlands) – I wish to congratulate the President and his officers on their election. Under their able guidance the Conference will doubtless be a success. For Director-General Michel Hansenne, this Conference is the first from his new vantage point. He has the difficult task of moving this Organisation forward from the point where it was left by his esteemed and illustrious predecessor, Francis Blanchard. Given his remarkable talents, I am confident Mr. Hansenne will succeed in his endeavours.

Today, the Conference has before it the Director-General's Report, a Report marking in a way the departure of Mr. Blanchard. It provides a useful frame of reference for the Organisation in its efforts to use its unique abilities and powers to assist in the process of restructuring the world's economy. Two areas of ILO activities in particular may profit from the Report.

As a first area, I recall the results of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural adjustment in November 1987. The ILO can make an important contribution in co-ordinating related activities among a number of international agencies, such as the IMF and the World Bank. The ILO can and should use its expertise in the social field to redirect and align the necessary structural adjustments. With all its influence, the ILO must make sure that social realities, too often neglected in short-term adjustment policies, are fully taken into account. In that way, sustainable growth and employment may be reached more effectively and social costs may be minimised.

As a second area of activity for which the Report is relevant, I refer to ILO's technical co-operation programme. I welcome the priority given in the presentation of the programme and budget to the link between standards and technical co-operation. ILO Conventions constitute a powerful vehicle in furthering social and economic development. Implementation of labour standards is a prerequisite for a development process that is sustained by and supportive of society as a whole. Linking standards and operational activities helps to strengthen the institutional framework, a necessary element of sound and lasting development.

From the very beginning, the Netherlands have been a staunch supporter of the ILO's role in the field of technical co-operation. Today, as the complexities of the development process are becoming increasingly evident, the need for a co-ordinated effort is becoming more and more urgent, an effort in which both bilateral and multilateral donors as well as recipient countries collaborate in the implementation of their programmes. My government believes that the ILO, specialised agencies and the UNDP, should work towards a more co-ordinated approach in developing and implementing their programmes.

During the past ten years, international economic and financial developments have had a negative effect on the development prospects of many countries. The Director-General's Report contains various illustrations of this, such as the worsening terms of trade, soaring national debt and stiff protectionist measures.

More recent events, however, indicate that these adverse trends may be reversed in the near future. Awareness is growing that debtor countries should be given greater financial room for manoeuvre.

Moreover, the Uruguay Round of GATT talks offers a useful framework for the further liberalisation of international trade. Gradual integration of Third World countries in the GATT system will open up new export opportunities for them. For its part, the European community is committed to providing an open and accessible market, especially to developing countries.

The policies I have touched upon, are not directly within the ILO's own competence. However, given their responsibilities for social policy, ministers for social affairs, employers' organisations and trade unions have an important role to play in this regards.

One of the strategic elements emphasised in the Director-General's Report is equitable distribution of income. In order to create financial scope for raising the level of participation of the poorest sections of society, it is essential that the more productive sectors of society should not use their proceeds exclusively for their own benefit. Scope should be left for the development of the public sector, in particular the infrastructure of the economy, and in some cases, also for the development of other economic sectors, for instance through market-oriented prices for domestic agricultural products.

Policies geared to income transfers, however, do not come about automatically. They require a nationally co-ordinated income policy with full co-operation of employers' organisations and trade unions.

Industrialised countries face the same type of problem: they have to prevent a widening of income differentials between economically strong sectors and sectors that are dependent on public funds, notably the public sector and the unemployed.

In the global process of economic recovery and development, the situation is not any different: incomes in industrialised countries should provide the scope for the transfer of resources, fair prices for primary commodities, increased imports from developing countries, help in alleviating paralysing debt burdens, preservation of the environment, and investment in new employment-creating activities, not only at home but also in developing countries.

The challenge for any government is to combine free collective bargaining without government intervention, with balanced economic growth and an equitable income distribution. The freedom of collective bargaining is a cornerstone of the International Labour Organisation. I highly value the system of free collective bargaining. I am pleased to say that I am preparing my Government's ratification of the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining, 1949, (No. 98), and the Collective Bargaining Convention, 1981 (No. 154). During my tenure as a Minister of Social Affairs, Netherlands legislation on wages has been amended to the effect that it now restricts the possibility of government intervention to exceptional circumstances, in accordance with ILO standards.

It would seem to me, that from a national viewpoint, the levels of income in different sectors of the economy should show a certain balance. Governments should encourage workers' and employers' organisations in these different sectors to arrive at solutions that benefit the country as a whole. Applying their own policy instruments, governments can play a catalytic role in stimulating responsible wage negotiations, wage negotiations that take into account the need for balanced economic growth and equitable distribution of income. This approach can, in my view, lead to a more equitable situation than that now prevailing in many countries. I refer especially to income of people working in the market sector as compared to those paid from public funds.

I fully endorse the Report entitled Recovery and employment. It will be evident from my comments that I applaud the contents of the Report. I especially commend Mr. Blanchard for the excellent choice of subject. Indeed, it seems not only opportune but in many ways characteristic that Mr. Blanchard has chosen to mark his departure by putting forward policy proposals that give priority to the right values: the fight against poverty and unemployment in the poorest parts of the world.

The containment of the debt problem, the management of the environment and natural resources, and the development of trade relations, are key issues in the debate on a development strategy for the United Nations Fourth Development Decade. These issues cannot be separated from the need for developing countries to create a more flexible, differentiated structure of production, both in industry and agriculture, a structure that is ready to adapt itself to the requirements of a rapidly changing and increasingly interdependent world economy. The Report of the Director-General clearly illustrates this, and therefore makes an important contribution to the debate on a new development strategy.

Mr. NIK AMIN (Government delegate, Malaysia) – I wish to join previous speakers in offering my congratulations to Mr. John Nkomo, the Minister of Labour, Manpower Planning and Social Welfare of Zimbabwe, on his well deserved appointment as the President of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. We are indeed fortunate to have a person of his experience and calibre to lead us in our deliberations at this Conference. I also wish to congratulate the Vice-Presidents of the Conference on their appointments.

Before proceeding further, I wish to take this opportunity to pay tribute to the former Director-General of the International Labour Office, Mr. Francis Blanchard, who had an illustrious career in the ILO. He is known to many in Government as well as employers' and workers' organisations in Malaysia. I wish to express our gratitude and appreciation for the assistance that the Government, employers and workers of Malaysia have received from the ILO during the tenure in office of Mr. Blanchard. I wish him and Mrs. Blanchard many years of happiness in retirement.

I also take this opportunity to congratulate the new Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne. He is a former Minister of Labour and Public Services in Belgium and is well experienced in employment-related issues which are of especially critical importance in developing countries. As he now grapples with these and other issues on a global front, I wish Mr. Hansenne every success in his new office and assure him of Malaysia's continued support and co-operation.

The Director-General in his Report to the Conference entitled Recovery and employment has vividly described the severe setbacks suffered by many States in their quest for full employment and social progress. Living standards have fallen drastically and poverty in the developing countries has increased. Against this background he has called for the adoption of sound economic policies and international co-operation in trade and development between the developed and developing countries.

From the experiences of developing countries such as Malaysia, I wish to emphasise that the social and economic problems with which we are confronted call for the adoption of policies and strategies that have greater pragmatism and less idealism. For example, in a multi-racial society like Malaysia, while we are occupied in efforts towards not only overall socio-economic development but more importantly in the difficult task of uniting Malaysians of different racial origin into a strong and independent nation, our capacity to engage in unduly protracted negotiations or discussions over matters such as industrial disputes and conflicts that tend to be divisive of racial unity of disruptive of established practices and systems, is necessarily limited. Clearly the modalities of dispute settlement, including participative action adopted by member States, vary according to the dictates of national conditions and practices. In situations such as those that I have just described it is not possible in my view to harmonise practices on a universal basis. Of utmost importance to us is the need to ensure the orderly development of social institutions in an environment of growth and expansion of the economy. The quest for social justice must ensure that it does not lead to social disorder or disruptions of our relatively young and yet maturing societies. This to my mind is crucial if we are to have any hope of progress and advancement and reducing economic and social imbalances among the member States of the ILO.

The Director-General's call for solidarity among the industrialised nations of the North in coming to the aid of the South is a well founded call and ought to be heeded. However, while aid is a very important element of development, even more important for the developing nations is a freer access to markets in the North for the products of the South. Today, however, we have the clearest evidence of developments, especially in Europe and North America, that are designed to further restrict free trade. While the Director-General has made a strong plea for the loss in terms of wasted output and human potential that has been exceptionally great over the past decade not be allowed to continue, it appears to me that the evidence before us points to the further fragmentation of the world and a greater disarray in international economic co-operation. The net flow of capital from South to North, notwithstanding the efforts of institutions of Bretton Woods for example, is a cause for serious concern to all of us.

One other matter which I feel I should mention at this time is the current détente between Western and Eastern Europe. This development is, of course, a most welcome one, as it greatly reduces global tensions and releases resources for more productive purposes – and especially for achieving the social objectives of the ILO. However, bearing in mind the circumstances in which this Organisation came to be founded, I am constrained to raise the question as to whether these developments are about to bring about a greater "Europeanness" of the ILO and whether the views and concerns of other States and regions are likely to be marginalised. I cannot help being concerned at this likelihood in the future. It is my Government's fervent hope that the International Labour Organisation will not lose sight of its international character and representativity. Perhaps the restructured Governing Body may be able to address this concern to some extent.

On the occasion of the 70th anniversary of the founding of this Organisation, I wish to take this opportunity to express my Government's views on what we think ought to be the future direction of action concerning international labour standards. I observe that the first session of the International Labour Conference in Washington in October 1919 adopted five Conventions. In the 70 years since then, some 168 Conventions and 176 Recommendations have been adopted. Those whose vision led to the founding of the ILO, in the conditions and situation of the time, were moved by sentiments of justice and humanity and with the desire to secure permanent peace throughout the world. They established the International Labour Organisation, with the idea that international instruments were the means to improve conditions at the workplace and protect the livelihood of working people. Since then, the ILO has been steadfast in its purpose and true to its international instruments and comply with their requirements. A particularly important aspect of the ILO's mandate is the promotion of human rights and social justice to ensure that social progress go hand in hand with economic growth. Looking back, the ILO has cause to be justifiably proud of its achievements, at times in difficult circumstances.

While there is cause for jubilation at past achievements, there is also cause for concern. This concern arises more from the present state of division of the world into "haves" and "have nots". In pursuit of universal and lasting peace, the founding fathers of the International Labour Organisation decreed the means of achieving social justice. The Preamble to the Constitution proclaims: "the failure of any nation to adopt humane conditions of labour is an obstacle in the way of other nations which desire to improve the conditions in their own countries". Yet, the economic division of the world into North and South, and into further subdivisions of least developed countries, clearly demonstrate the enormous inequalities and disparities that have developed over the years. The Director-General recognises that the future is one of increasing disparities. Developments in the industrialised centres of the North leave ever larger parts of the South adrift. But the mandate of this Organisation as envisaged by its founding fathers is universality. Therein lies the paradox!

Developing countries have often viewed the present procedure of the setting of international labour standards on a universal basis as being inconsistent with present-day global economic and social realities. These States have argued that they have little or no input into the formulation of standards. Indeed, many in the Third World consider international labour standards set in these conditions as impediments to national development and progress.

On the other hand, these countries view the International Labour Organisation as another specialised United Nations agency, not unlike the World Health Organisation or the Food and Agriculture Organisation, that is ready to provide technical assistance in economic and industrial development. The ILO covers such areas as skills development, job creation and the establishment of rural and cottage industries. Rarely do these nations see the ILO as an organisation to police them or poised to pounce on them for infringements and breaches of international labour standards. These differences in perceptions persist and continue to cause tensions. In the light of the bleak future prospects of economic growth of the countries of the South, my concern is that such tensions are likely to be further accentuated. This is indeed a great irony when it is realised that the founding fathers' objectives were quite the opposite; namely to reduce global tension. It is in this light that I wish to call on the Director-General to consider the subject of international labour standards most carefully.

The situation that I have just described calls, in my view, for consideration of the matter in two respects. First, there appears to be a need to examine, on account of the existing disparities among member States and which are expected to deteriorate, the rationale for the continued application of international labour standards on a universal basis. Second, in the light of what is expected of the International Labour Organisation by the member States of the developing countries, there is a need to upgrade development-oriented technical activities and make them independent of activities related to international labour standards rather than conditioning the former to the latter. Since the noble aim of the founding fathers was to eliminate world tension and establish permanent and universal peace, I believe that we should not today be oblivious to the present propensity, especially in multilateral negotiations, to create tension between the North and South. In so far as the ILO is concerned, there is evidence of irritants in the South on account of differences in their conception of international labour standards. I urge that these be not allowed to fester into more serious disputes. The time is opportune for these issues to be considered dispassionately and objectively. Steps taken now may well lead to a more equitable sharing of social responsibilities and obligations by all the member States of the International Labour Organisation.

My address to this plenary cannot conclude without reference to the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories. The conditions of employment of the Arab workers in the territories has further deteriorated. It appears that the occupying power has launched a programme, designed to destroy systematically any and every attempt at economic and social progress by the Arab workers of the occupied territories. It is clear that the past 11 annual ILO missions have done nothing to improve the situation of these unfortunate workers. In these circumstances, I call on the Director-General to give urgent consideration to any measures that might be taken in the future by the International Labour Organisation within its mandate to bring about real improvements in the working conditions and situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories.

Mrs. CARR (Workers' adviser, Canada) – I would like to congratulate Mr. Nkomo on his election as President of these proceedings. I would also like to indicate that I have talked to my good friends in the South Africa Trade Union Co-ordination Council who have told me how proud they are to support the President's election. I would like to add the Canadian Labour Congress voice in order for him to understand that we will work in full co-operation with him and support him in his task at this historical Session of the International Labour Conference, as the ILO marks its 70th anniversary.

I would also like to take this opportunity to congratulate the Director-General of the International Labour Office on his recent election and to congratulate the Governing Body of the ILO on their excellent choice. Leading the ILO into the next decade will not be an easy task. Michel Hansenne has already displayed his ample capabilities for the job, and the ILO is in very capable hands.

As we have all been reminded on the occasion of our 70th anniversary, the fundamental purpose of the ILO is to promote a universal and lasting peace through the promotion of social justice. Such a purpose requires the dedication of collective action to place humanity first. To place the cause of human dignity and freedom above all other considerations. The Report of the Director-General has provided this historical session of the International Labour Conference with a rededication to the basic tenets of our Organisation, and such a focus on basics is indeed timely given the international climate of uncertainty and worsening disparity between the rich and the poor.

The Report of the Director-General graphically calls the 1980s the "lost decade" of development. This description fits industrialised and developing countries alike. Social progress has been rolled back everywhere in the name of structural adjustment. A phrase which is too often a euphemism for old-fashioned profit maximisation. Social progress is now seen by some to be a kind of brake on the wheel of GNP growth. So-called free-play capitalism has formed the basis for one of the most ideological and doctrinaire approaches to international economic relations in this century. The gap between the rich and the poor, both within nations and between nations, has increased at an accelerated pace. Seemingly, governments have forgotten the principle of the ILO's Declaration of Philadelphia – poverty anywhere, constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere.

Fuelled by public disenchantment about some of the unquestionable inefficiencies of the welfare state, the doctrinaire approach to growth promotion through structural adjustment has called into question the role of the State in society. In some cases, it has even suggested that state intervention on behalf of people should be equated with forces which work against human freedom.

The social standards that the ILO has fought so hard to achieve everywhere, are threatened. This is indeed cause for concern. Social standards are not an abstract set of variables in some mode economy. They reflect the prevailing ethical norms and values of society and of humankind. They determine the minimum level of equality of distribution, material entitlements and fundamental human rights.

These standards are under universal attack. In the developing world the attack primarily takes the form of debt-payment conditions which compel restructuring away from social advancement. In my own country, Canada, the roll-back is occurring through misguided domestic policies. But there is also a transmission factor through the new trading relationship Canada has undertaken with our closest neighbour and trading partner, the United States.

The social impact of trade has long been recognised in the international community. The 1948 Havana Charter, which was to be the basis for the third pillar of post-war multilateral institutions, read in part, and I quote: "The members recognise that unfair labour conditions, particularly in production for export, create difficulties in international trade, and accordingly, each member shall take whatever action may be appropriate and feasible, to eliminate such conditions within the territory."

Unfortunately, the Havana Charter was never ratified and its successor, the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT), has never adequately dealt with the social dimension of trade.

Some years ago the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) took an important step in repairing this omission, by proposing a social clause to be included in GATT. The clause simply states that, and I quote: "The contracting parties agree to take steps to ensure the observance of the minimum labour standards specified by an advisory committee to be established by GATT and this Organisation, the ILO."

The widespread consensus for a new 1992 European Social Charter was reflected recently in a document of the Community's Economic and Social Council. This document urged, and again I quote: "Community action to secure the extension and application of citizens' rights, and to prevent competition from being distorted as a result of different social conditions." This important principle must be taken beyond Europe.

I wish I could tell you that a similar consensus on the social impact of trade exists in North America in the wake of the Canada-United States Free Trade Agreement. It does not. The Agreement contains no provision for the guarantee of social protection.

Incidentally, the Free Trade Agreement is much more than a free trade agreement between Canada and the United States in the usual sense of the term. It deals with non-tariff barriers to trade with services, with resources, with capital mobility and with labour mobility, and despite widespread opposition from Canadians from all walks of life, particularly from workers and the unemployed, there are a number of reasons why we oppose it outright. As negotiated, this Agreement left no room for even conditional approval. This incredibly complex and overly comprehensive Agreement was unfortunately implemented on 1 January 1989.

Given the asymmetries of social conditions and size between the United States and Canada, and their economies, concerns about Canada's survival as a sovereign nation looms large in the domestic debate about the Free Trade Agreement. However, I will leave these considerations aside here and focus instead on the social implications of the Agreement, as an example, albeit a negative example, of the social dimensions of an international trade agreement between two countries which many people consider to be very similar.

First, it should be noted that considerably weaker social conditions prevail in the United States in general and in the southern states in particular.

Secondly, it should be noted that the United States has several back doors, most notably the Mexican Maquiladora Zone, along the frontier with the United States, which boasts nineteenth-century conditions:

Thirdly, there has been a drastic disintegration of social standards in the United States in recent years. Real wages have been falling every year for the past 15 years, and income distribution in the United States is now the worst in the industrial world.

Fourthly, some other differences are: Canada has a universal publicly funded medicare system to which employers contribute. The American system is largely private and employer contributions are voluntary.

In Canada, 83 per cent of unemployed workers collect unemployment insurance during layoff or loss of jobs. In the United States, 25 per cent of the unemployed workers collect unemployment insurance with lower benefits. Our Government wants our plan to be lowered to the United States' standards.

Nine southern states of the United States have no minimum wage. Industries have relocated to the lower social strata. In Canada, corporations are already beginning to pack their bags while putting pressure on Canada to harmonise or face the consequences of corporate relocation.

In Canada we have already lost 30,000 jobs since January.

There are alarming signals that such harmonisation is on the way. In Canada, just since the deal was signed, our unemployment insurance programme has been savaged, a proposed national child-care programme has been shelved, education and medicare transfers to the regions in the country have been slashed and regional development assistance has been cut, and the list goes on.

So the issue for the Canadian labour movement is straightforward. How can we have a successful mutually beneficial economic integration arrangement with a nation of 250 million when we are a nation of 25 million, and it reflects our social consensus and attacks our social standards as unfair subsidies? How can we gain from an arrangement where the other party defines the rules of competition to permit open season on social exploitation.

The Report of the Director-General wisely warns states to avoid simplistic or doctrinaire approaches. It reminds us that the role of the State will be essential in any programme that includes equitable distribution and social justice. It calls upon States to moderate the social costs of adjustments on the poor, and it goes on to promote an approach which makes employment-intensive growth and the maintenance of social protection the key to structural adjustment in the long term.

As the ILO looks to the future, its role in promoting social standards in all international relationships, including trade, is a key consideration. The Report of the Director-General correctly stresses this crucial role. The proposed ICFTU social clause for GATT, and the prospect of social charters brings the ILO further into the process, and it is my hope that these ideas will receive widespread support among ILO member States, including my own.

Pursuing these policies in the 1990s will require a rededication of the "humanity first" principle.

In the Canadian labour movement, we will be renewing our efforts to work with others in the ILO and elsewhere to advance this goal.

I would like to join my brother Johnny Vanderveken, the General Secretary of the ICFTU, and others who have noted the tragic situation in China. Workers all over the world are deeply shocked by the brutal repression of unarmed workers and students and at the death sentences handed out to their leaders. I plead with the leaders not to murder anyone, not to murder anyone!

The wholesale repression of non-violent dissent is not the internal affair of a country; such activity offends the basic principles of the United Nations and, indeed, the International Labour Organisation itself.

I would hope that events in China will be monitored very closely by the ILO and the United Nations and other agencies and that appropriate actions will be undertaken.

In closing, I would just like to add my voice to those who have honoured Francis Blanchard during this Conference. He served us well. The record will show that he leaves us very much in his debt. Canadian workers have known Francis Blanchard as a friend, as well as an extremely competent international leader, and we will miss him in Geneva and I will miss him as a friend. We wish him well in his most deserved rest.

Original - Russian: Mr. TSEMBEL (Employers' delegate, Mongolia) - I should like to congratulate the President on his election to the high office of President of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference and wish him every success in his responsible work.

The Director-General's Report entitled Recovery and employment, which has been submitted to us for consideration at this session, addresses relevant issues and puts forward interesting ideas and proposals in connection with these issues.

We hope that the 76th Session of the Conference will make a constructive contribution to the quest for solutions to day-to-day problems in the world of work and will define a strategy for the many-sided involvement of the ILO in the struggle against unemployment and deterioration of the social and economic situation of workers.

Utilisation of the increase in the workforce will be an important factor in solving the problem of employment, both in the industrialised and in the developing countries. This problem is very serious in the developing countries, where decades of one-sided development have made it difficult for the urban and modern sectors of the economy to provide sufficient employment opportunities.

We fully agree with the Director-General, who stated in his Report that in our multipolar world, capital and growth do not flow in optimal patterns.

The creation of opportunities for productive and well-paid employment is not only the aim of economic policy, it is also seen as a source of personal satisfaction and social recognition. If you approach this problem from another angle, then you will see that productive employment for all those who wish to work is essential to achieve national production growth and self-sustained development.

In developing countries in particular, manpower is the most abundant and readily available resource enabling rapid social and economic progress to be achieved. That is why an inadequate or incorrect utilisation of manpower not only gives rise to a feeling of helplessness and creates poverty, but also results in a regrettable loss of production potential in a situation of a shortage of the goods and services necessary to meet the basic needs of the population.

It should be pointed out that issues relating to the promotion of employment have always been the focus of the ILO's attention, and for this purpose the ILO has used the means at its disposal, such as Conventions and Recommendations, technical co-operation and research.

In his Report, the Director-General stressed the fact that today, as never before, we must reaffirm the very close link between the economy and the social sphere and that the ILO has an essential role to play in the field of employment.

The Director-General's Report quite rightly points out that without economic growth it is very difficult to solve social problems. Bearing this in mind, the common priority should be to restore the economic development potential of every region which has suffered a decline until now and to maintain consistent growth in regions which have emerged from the crisis.

In our view, recovery can best be achieved by a combination of growth, justice and participation; here, of course, employment and labour market policy have an important part to play.

The tasks and problems facing the international community are obvious. To find solutions, we will need structural changes in the international systems and in our countries. International interdependence in trade, finance and production technology means that all countries are vulnerable to changes in the international economy.

Therefore, it goes without saying that only a global approach will ensure a better co-ordination of economic measures, broader access to markets, more favourable prices and the solution of debt problems. However, such an approach also calls for a genuine effort to implement structural adjustment at the national level.

This session of the Conference is being held on the 70th anniversary of the establishment of the ILO. Seventy years of the history of the ILO have shown that this Organisation is capable of a great deal to ensure that social welfare and economic progress go hand in hand.

Today we are implementing far-reaching reforms in our country, chiefly affecting the economy and how it is managed. These reforms are based on the use of economic methods of management, an improvement of planning and of the economic machinery and on independence for enterprises and economic units.

Under the Act of the People's Republic of Mongolia respecting the state enterprise, the rights and powers of enterprises have been considerably extended, in particular as regards external relations with foreign partners. These enterprises have the right independently to establish and develop relations with foreign partners.

I should add that the law contains many completely new provisions on matters of principle, dictated by our social development process itself, and lays down clear and largely new principles governing the activities of enterprises.

In this connection, it should be pointed out that equal treatment by the ILO of employers and directors of socialist enterprises would be fully in keeping with the spirit of the time.

In conclusion, I should like to stress that a correct re-orientation and further improvement of the activities of the ILO, which would be jointly defined, will create the right conditions for the successful accomplishment of the major tasks facing it.

Original – Russian: Mr. PONOMAREV (Employers' delegate, Ukrainian SSR) – First of all, I should like to congratulate the President and all the Officers on their election and wish them every success in their work.

This session of the International Labour Conference is being held in the favourable political conditions of wider international dialogue on many important problems of our time. This is a prerequisite for a more intensive development of co-operation between various countries, in the sphere of social affairs and labour among others.

The ILO, which is a universal and authoritative forum in the field of social and labour relations and has a great deal of influence and experience, is called upon to play an important role in developing such co-operation. In this context, the Director-General's Report is of great interest because it provides a comprehensive study of employment world-wide, forecasts the development of the main trends in the social and labour sphere and sets out a broad – though not, in our view, sufficiently specific – programme of measures the international community can take to guarantee one of the most important human rights – the right to work.

We fully endorse and support the humanitarian theme of the Report, that human beings are the reason for development. We profoundly believe that man's well-being should be the basic criterion of success and the aim of the entire development process, standing as the basic principle of progress today and the essential task for the United Nations international development strategy for the 1990s.

The economic reform under way in our Republic is directed towards this goal. The reform consists essentially in creating a system of economic incentives to encourage a steady increase in the volume of production through a more efficient use of labour resources, a greater involvement of the human factor, increased initiative and creativity, and a higher degree of people's interest in the end results of their work, reflected in greater well-being and higher living conditions.

The shortcomings of the previous management system, when the importance of economic methods and interests was underestimated and when administrators and planners worked on the basis of what had been achieved, among other shortcomings, greatly affected labour efficiency. Directly involving the interests of the workers in the economic process, in keeping with the reform, is giving a new boost to the process of making the workplace more humane.

We are improving labour standards, developing incentives for teams, using high-production equipment more intensively, improving technology and introducing scientific organisation of labour on the basis of cost accounting and self-financing for enterprises. These and other measures have been used to rationalise the production system, enabling workers' collectives to attain their own basic interests in resolving social problems. In its turn, the new economic policy in our Republic, which gives priority to developing the social sphere, has paved the way for improvements in manpower policy and, consequently, for the growth of labour productivity and efficiency.

Our policy of intensive economic growth is based on the following priorities: scientific and technological progress, quality, efficiency and the human factor. Our most pressing practical goal is to attain not only full employment, but also maximum efficiency of labour.

Our system of cost accounting, with enterprises paying their own way and being self-financing, the democratisation of our economic life, the development of the socialist market, all prompt us to seek for greater efficiency. As a first step we plan to streamline manpower, eliminate non-productive labour costs and reduce the number of workers in unskilled, low-productivity manual work. As we reform our economic system, the process of releasing manpower accelerates. In 1988 the number of manufacturing workers in the state sector in the Ukrainian SSR dropped by more than 200,000. With the acceleration of this process, more people change jobs and now we need to restructure our employment services.

As before, all workers of the Ukrainian SSR have a fully guaranteed right to work. In our situation today, efficient working practices mean that we maintain full employment by releasing workers from manufacture and involving them in other types of activity.

A special Government Decree sets our organisational, social, economic and legal measures to improve radically the use of labour resources and create an integrated nationwide employment service.

I myself am the Director-General of a large scientific production unit in the Ukraine and I would like to tell you about restructuring in my unit.

We are creating a new economic management mechanism, step by step, setting long-term economic goals. The basis of this system is our self-financing income, out of which we pay wages and provide for the production and social development of our collective. I should stress that it is the self-financing income system which ensures that there is a direct link between resources and income. We now independently manage and use our resources and our income.

Practice has proved that this self-financing system is viable; indeed, following a sharp increase in the volume of production, we have had an 18 per cent rise in income over the past year alone.

We have a wage fund created from the income of the enterprise as a whole and this is shared out amongst the various sub-units of our enterprises in proportion to their contribution to overall results. In our enterprise we already have ten co-operatives producing consumer goods and services.

Alongside these new approaches in our economy, we are working out a new self-management system. Thus, production has increased in efficiency for the first time for decades through greater democratisation, so that the workers themselves feel more involved and more responsible.

If am to give specific examples of democratisation in my enterprise, I should mention the election of works councils in our enterprises. It is the job of these councils to be bodies of socialist self-management, economically and socially. A new development is the election of leaders, including the director-general.

We are also introducing democratisation into our training policy. Even now, with the release of manpower growing apace, we have not reduced the number of our workers, thanks to the speed of growth in production.

Of course, the labour turnover will continue. We have a stable turnover percentage of 6.5 per cent. But even in these conditions there is no question of workers being dismissed on the initiative of the entrepreneur.

Within the self-financing system, we have been able to accelerate our social work from our own social development fund. Thus, social well-being is directly connected with the productive efficiency of the enterprise.

Over the past three years, our workers have been given 312 new apartments. By the end of 1990, we intend to build at least 200 further apartments.

At the moment, our enterprise has four leisure complexes of its own and we are allocating some resources to purpose building health centres in the country's leading health resorts.

Our development plan attaches priority to access to foreign markets and to increasing our competitiveness. On this we are guided by recently adopted legislation, its most important aspect being the right of access to foreign markets given to any unit, enterprise or organisation which provides food, work or services, or to any production co-operative. This overturns earlier restrictions on setting up joint ventures with foreign partners and extends the provision of tax breaks for them. Our own unit has already embarked on a joint venture. We began joint production with Siemens this year and would be happy to co-operate with other foreign partners.

The International Labour Organisation with its wealth of experience could, we are sure, give its own impetus to the recovery in relations between all countries in our complex but integrated and interdependent world.

Mr. BOGGS (representative of the International Federation of Chemical, Energy and General Workers' Unions) – I have the honour to represent the 7 million constituents of the ICEF, representing workers and technicians in chemical, pharmaceutical, energy, petroleum and petrochemical, pulp and paper, glass and ceramics, rubber and cement industries in 67 nations.

The congratulations of my organisation also go out to Mr. Nkomo on his election as President of this 76th Session of the International Labour Conference when we are commemorating the 70th anniversary of the ILO. We also take this opportunity to pledge our co-operation with Mr. Michel Hansenne and wish him well in his new and intricate endeavour as Director-General of this unique, venerable tripartite institution.

I take a moment, too, from the minutes allotted to my organisation, to bid an official farewell to Mr. Francis Blanchard who, I am honoured to say, worked so closely with myself and my organisation over the years. He devoted himself tirelessly to the humanitarian role of the ILO and, during his term of office, triumphed on behalf of the institution and the people he was representing in a very real sense. In spite of the fact that he has been touched by tragedy, he continues apace. We will continue to call upon his limitless resources in the future and wish him a full and happy retirement.

I should also like to extend my congratulations to our dear old friend and colleague, Heribert Maier, who, having been named Deputy Director-General of our ILO, will continue to work on behalf of working men and women everywhere in the institution which means so much to them.

This Conference sees the evolution of the work of two highly significant Committees: the Committee on Night Work and the Committee on the Use of Chemicals at Work. The issues examined by these Committees are of critical importance to working men and women and the time is ripe for the framing of standards in both these areas. The work of these Committees demonstrates for the 76th time the essence – and thus the importance – of the ILO to working people for, in its 70th year, the ILO is indeed a symbol of hope and justice for all workers.

Even though the gruelling annual work of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations demonstrates clearly the unequal nature of the adherence to international labour Conventions by governments the world over, at least the functioning of that application process signifies that the oppression of workers' rights and freedoms enshrined in International Labour Conventions and Recommendations does not go unheeded. It proves that ILO standards are not mere paper instruments, but that they constitute the cornerstone of workers' justice throughout the world, wherever there are basic infringements of workers' basic rights.

I would remind us all that this is the only universal institution in the world that has a machinery to supervise the application of workers' human rights. This fact alone has made the ILO the symbol of hope and justice for working men and women and their unions. As a human institution, the ILO is not perfect but it is the most profound guarantor of worker rights in the geopolitical fabric of this world.

The central and comprehensive theme of this Conference, as set by the Report of the Director-General entitled Recovery and employment, is integral to the planning of every institution represented here by delegates from governments, employers and labour unions. It is on this theme that I will concentrate my brief remarks, which have specific relevance.

A review of the work of the Committee on Freedom of Association, as well as that of the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, shows disturbing trends over the past few years. There is a growing tendency for employers and governments (often in league with one another) to encroach upon trade union rights around the globe. In the development of strategies aimed at economic growth to meet international financial commitments, governments often tend to forgo measures to improve fundamental social objectives. Social justice is, after all, the aim that justifies the drive for economic development. But in case after case, this objective has been supplanted with disastrous consequences for the people of the countries concerned. We find regrettable evidence, in rich and poor countries alike, of financial institutions and multinational companies which continue to wring the last drops of wealth from the poor through debt. Working men and women must not be the bearers of the intolerable weight of debt, grown monstrous through inefficient planning and the constant search for a short cut to rapid development.

In the United Kingdom and the United States, there has been a lamentable drift toward the authoritarian centre, symbolised by the newly Draconian anti-trade union laws and practices by government and vicious union-busting campaigns by employers, even in countries such as Malta.

Even at this session of the Conference, there is a rash of resolutions seeking to shift the burden of economic development onto the shoulders of the individual through the promotion of so-called self-employment programmes. Cottage industry is not the wave of the future, but of the repressive past. These resolutions reflect a tendency among a number of global institutions to attempt to undermine the organised structure of labour and, indeed, to deny the validity of tripartism.

Is it not ironic that, on this 70th anniversary of the ILO, we observe these callous attempts to deny the validity of tripartism, embodied in themes presented to this Conference aimed at lessening the representativeness of organised labour in the vital effort to plan and progress economic and social betterment?

As the representative of several hundred thousand Turkish workers among our far-flung global range of affiliations, I must bring a particularly lamentable fact before this body. The case of Turkey and its efforts to hamstring, to hobble labour unions within its boundaries has been before the ILO for nine years now, even though the Government has promised to institute changes in their Byzantine Labour Code that would bring them into line with ILO standards. Those promises have not been kept, and the very credibility of Turkey is at stake here. Save cosmetic changes in the labour law, no substantive modifications have been made in this legislation, as discussed in the ILO last year. That credibility affects not only Turkey's standing in the ILO, but has and will continue to have a negative impact on the possible entry of Turkey into the Common Market in the future.

We call upon the Government of Turkey to keep its promises to bring its labour legislations into line with ILO standards now. Failing this, we have no choice but to continue the critical discussion begun by the ICEF at its seminar held in Turkey a few months ago, where we stated clearly that the ICEF will work at the Community level to keep Turkey out of the Common Market until it becomes a responsible tripartite partner of other governments around the EC table. In community with kindred institutions in the EC, we will continue to monitor events in Turkey through our affiliates there in the hope that a dramatic forward movement occurs in the lifting of restrictive legislation aimed at keeping trade union effectiveness at a minimum. We agree with the Turkish Government's statements made to this body last week, in that the credibility of the Turkish Government is indeed at stake; the preservation of that credibility can be quickly restored by action in the place of words.

In the ILO, threats to the freedom of workers anywhere pose a threat to the freedom of workers everywhere: that is the universalist aim of this great institution. We regret the desperate events that have taken place in China in recent days, particularly in the killings and subsequent sentencing to death of other trade unionists and students who demonstrated their clear comprehension of the need for democratisation of institutions in that immense country. We join the international community in condemning the fierce repression of these spokesmen for democracy and urge the Chinese regime to reconsider its harsh tactics towards such freedom of expression.

In closing, I should like to underline the extraordinary competence of the staff of the ILO. Once again in 1988 and 1989, they have worked diligently and with sacrifice to make this tripartite institution work, and work well, even in the face of a very negative economic situation brought on by the reluctance of a few governments to discharge their financial obligations to the ILO. The ILO continues to be a bastion of knowledge and assistance to workers and employers around the world, thanks to the dedication of its staff. May it continue for another 70 years and beyond as the most practically oriented member of the United Nations family and therefore as the institution among them with the most to contribute to our societies.

Original – French: Mr. FLOREA (Workers' delegate, Romania) – I should like to address my warmest congratulations to the President on his election and also my best wishes for his success. I should also like to congratulate you Madam and your two colleagues on your elections to the posts of Vice-Presidents.

The Report of the Director-General, Recovery and employment, asks a number of topical and important questions, especially with regard to social matters, and we, the trade unions, are specially attentive to these questions, particularly from the point of view of the preparation of the United Nations Fourth Development Decade which will cover the 1990s. As is said in the Report, the ILO, in collaboration with the other organisations of the United Nations system, should participate actively in the elaboration of the strategy so that we may avoid, as has happened all too often in the past, the social ideas being sacrificed along the way, and re-establish the major balances with regard to all the measures to be undertaken in the next decade.

I would like to refer to a problem which is dealt with in the section entitled "Participation of the social partners" to which the General Union of Romanian Trade Unions has always been extremely attentive.

The conquest of power by the working class and the construction of the economic, technical and material bases of socialism in Romania have represented important primary objectives, the necessary – but not the sufficient – political and economic framework, for the setting up of the new socialist society. The democratic potential of socialism has only become a reality after a number of measures, extremely far-reaching and persevering measures, were taken which corresponded to the different stages our society went through, during the past two decades.

The system of democracy, which was created during this period, with its institutions constantly evolving and being perfected, is a complex process with various qualitative determinations, which expresses the very essence of the new society. We have measures that were taken at the political level – the workers are now the sovereign holders of power – as well as at the economic level where the workers can now fully exercise their position as owners, producers and as the beneficiaries of the results of their work.

In the social sphere, our democracy is reflected in the creation of such social relations and such relations between individuals and the State, between individuals and society, as largely open up the possibility of a true promotion of the fundamental values of the new society and give a guarantee of the necessary conditions for the development and the manifestation of the values and skills of all members of the society.

At the national level, the spirit of democracy can be seen in the guarantee of complete equality of rights for all workers without any distinction. I would like to underline the fact that this aspect is materialising, from an economic point of view, in the balanced development of all regions of the country.

We agree with the declaration made by the Director-General in his Report, according to which the participation of the social partners in the decision-making process has two advantages: first of all, it enhances the political feasibility of these decisions and, secondly, it ensures a more equitable distribution of the benefits of such policies. Why do we support this? Because by its very content, by its forms and by the way it works, democracy, as it has been instituted in my country, offers both the social framework as well as the necessary political means for the rapid and harmonious progress of society as a whole, as well as for the continuous improvement of social relations and the correct application of the principle of equal opportunities, which results in the affirmation of the human personality and allows its full potential to develop.

The participation in the decision-making process expresses in our minds and in practice the specific and real possibility for all citizens of the country, provided they are legally able and apt to do so, to participate in the management of society as a whole, including at the level of the undertakings, a management that is thought up and put into practice in the dialectical unity of the elements which it is made up of: the elaboration and the adoption of decisions, their practical implementation and the control on the way in which they are carried out. I would like to underline that especially at the level of the undertakings our trade unions play a particularly important role, since they are the basic framework within which these principles are realised and which are the very basis of the democratic system in our country.

We do not think that the system of democracy as it has been implemented in our country up until now is a perfect or unchanging system. As in other areas of activity, we think that everything can be perfected, adapted to the present conditions and that everything in society is in constant motion. This could also explain why one of the fundamental directions of development in Romanian society in the near future, is the continuous perfecting of the organisation and of the direction of the global social system, which will certainly reach a new stage in the development of democracy, a new opening towards the affirmation of the creativity and the social responsibility of our workers.

It is in this democratic system that the trade unions in Romania are deploying their full potential, as the biggest organisations of workers, since they were represented in all the democratic organisations and bodies, from the level of undertakings up to and including the Government.

It is in this democratic system that the trade unions in Romania are deploying their full potential, as the biggest organisations of workers, since they were represented in all the democratic organisations and bodies, from the level of undertakings up to and including the Government. I would like to mention that in Romania there is a permanent preoccupation with improving the legislation which ensures the necessary legal framework for the direct participation of the workers and their trade union organisations in the elaboration and the implementation of all economic and social policies. We have a legislative system which is adapted to the latest realities and which ensures the exercise of trade union rights, the participation of trade unions as professional organisations of workers and representatives of their economic and social interests. It is adapted to economic and financial management, to the control of the application of all the measures concerning the working and living conditions of workers of all categories. We have learnt from experience that stable social progress can only be ensured on the basis of economic development. This is why we think it is essential for all workers to be mobilised in the implementation of economic development plans, programmes for modernisation and for the organisation of production activities, for the continual improvement of the productivity of all areas of work.

In all economic and social development activities, in the forces of production, of science, of teaching and of culture, we, the trade unions, are basing ourselves on the need to ensure better working conditions for all citizens of our country and to ensure full employment for all of them. We are doing everything we can to ensure the general development of the entire country and of every sector of activity – industrial, agricultural and sectoral – so as to create jobs for all citizens, and especially for young people.

As regards young people, the trade unions are particularly concerned that they should find their social and occupational fulfilment as soon as possible. This in fact is part and parcel of our general preoccupation with ensuring that all the citizens of our country have a decent job.

At the same time we are doing everything we can to improve the wages system and to ensure equal pay for equal work, without losing sight of what I mentioned earlier, namely that individual prosperity is possible only in a society which is prosperous as a whole.

This is the spirit in which, as trade unions, we intend to defend the fundamental interests of the workers. The participation of the trade unions in the activities of the administrative bodies and their active collaboration with the State are for us a reflection of the permanent improvement in co-operation between trade unions and these various bodies. To put it another way, it is a reflection at a higher level of the community of interests between the trade unions and the State. It is a specific manifestation of the co-operation whereby the workers, through the trade unions, participate directly in the solution of the vital problems with which our socialist society is confronted.

These are a few of the questions raised by the Director-General's Report to the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference.

Original – Spanish: Mr. GARCIA (Workers' delegate, Nicaragua) – On behalf of the Nicaraguan delegates, whom I represent here, I wish first of all to express to the President our satisfaction upon his election to preside over the work of the 76th Session of our Conference. His competence, which has already become apparent during our time here, has confirmed our faith in appointing him to this high post.

It is a great honour for me to speak for the Nicaraguan Trade Union Movement with respect to aspects of "Recovery and employment", the theme of the Report of the Director-General of the ILO. These are subjects which are of great concern to the workers of my country and to the Third World.

The historical claims of the workers' movement have always been progress, social justice, the right to life, employment and improved well-being. These principles furthered and defended by the ILO are, nevertheless, deteriorating very seriously at the end of the twentieth century.

Almost a decade away from the year 2000, big changes have been taking place in the main economic and political focal points of the world.

Japan, the European Economic Community and other entities have emerged as great powers from the point of view of economic expansion, and great changes have taken place – economically and administratively – in the socialist countries with a view to strengthening their system and effectively exploiting their full potential by rendering them more flexible and consistent with today's realities.

In contrast to the progressive economic recovery of the highly industrialised countries, the countries of the Third World, particularly those of Africa and Latin America, are suffering a crisis today which threatens to further aggravate the unbearable burden of unfair terms of trade and the growth of external debt, the repayment of which is becoming ever more problematic and is entrenching a social system characterised by marginalisation and the poverty of millions of workers. This situation is resulting in built-up tension and social unrest which cannot be held in check, as was recently witnessed in Argentina and Venezuela, as a consequence of the brutal measures imposed by the International Monetary Fund which overlooks the social cost of the so-called structural readjustment.

In order to face such problems it became necessary to foster the concept of international harmonisation to enable the establishment of just balances between the countries of the North and the South. Workers have taken the first steps towards this. There are already concrete initiatives for co-ordination on our American continent, expressed through the creation of the Co-ordination Group on External Debt in the South Cone, and the Central American Workers' Co-ordination Group, which has on its agenda, contributions to peace in the region within the framework of the Esquipulas Agreement.

The Director-General's Report gives us details with emphasis and clarity of the most important features of the present economic crisis. Nicaragua is not exempt from its effects which obviously have been further aggravated by the aggression which the Nicaraguan workers have resisted not only by fighting in the battlefield but also by strengthening the productive sector.

The economic impact of the crisis and the costs of the war have necessitated the adoption of measures which, doubtless, represent a special effort on the part of the workers. Thus, since 1988, it has become necessary to relocate more than 10,000 workers, mostly into the productive sector, in an attempt to offset the fiscal deficit due to considerable contraction of the public sector. Economic adjustment measures have been applied without external resources from the IMF, with a view to social justice but without in realistic terms overlooking the present sacrifices, which has given a parallel impetus to measures for material and economic compensation for the weakest sectors of the working population where previous subsidies to the public services suppressed.

The shortfall in external resources in Nicaragua for this year amounted to $250 million. This shortfall and lack of resources mainly affects the normal economic activity of the enterprises and hence restricts the possibility for the Nicaraguan workers to raise their income. The high growth rate trend of our working population and the lack of structural adjustment in our national economy oblige us to seek and support any possible options and alternatives for economic aid, such as soft loans, contracting credits and so on. Without losing our political independence and our own dynamics of struggle, the trade union movement of Nicaragua has recognised its responsibilities in assuming active and militant participation in the national reconstruction within the effective framework of tripartism and a mixed economy. This legitimate participation gives moral force to our trade unions and workers' organisations enabling them to assume a militant role in pointing out the shortcomings and weaknesses inherent in the relatively new government apparatus with little experience in economic management.

The Nicaraguan working class realises that better results in economic management cannot be achieved now by those very sectors which yesterday forced it to endure exploitation and poverty. The experience gathered by capital in our country has been one of exploitation, repression and subjugation of the workers, of imprisoning and murdering them, of selling the country and pawning the motherland. We prefer the risks involved in seeking new options and alternatives in the face of current difficulties, without losing our independence, but in the knowledge that the new leading forces possess a moral strength and legitimacy consecrated by the blood shed by the best sons of Nicaragua.

Nevertheless, we must admit that there are also employers in our country who are genuinely interested in participating in economic reconstruction and contributing their experience of production towards building a just and well-balanced society with democracy and pluralistic participation. We acknowledge these efforts here.

In order to deal with the effects of the world crisis, it is essential to achieve peace; this is a premise which cannot be circumvented. The Nicaraguan workers share our people's desire for peaceful coexistence in Central America.

At time when relations between the two greatest world powers seem to be improving and when military conflicts in various regions are being resolved. Central America should not be an exception. If it is possible for the two superpowers to reach an understanding and raise the hopes for peace of all mankind, why should this not be possible between a powerful country and a small and poor country like Nicaragua, which has been devastated by the war of aggression?

It is not possible to have jobs or better living conditions without stable and lasting peace in the whole of Central America. You will agree with me that first of all we must guarantee the right to life and only then the other basic elements of well-being, such as employment and income.

On 14 February of this year, the Government of my country, with a political will which is characteristic of it, to secure peace for the workers and avoid a stalemate in negotiations, undertook in Costa del Sol, El Salvador, to free the more than 1,500 national guards who "served the Somoza regime," to amend the electoral law, to pass a law on the media and to hold free elections on 25 February 1990. Under this last agreement, we already have 24 registered political parties in Nicaragua and, under the amnesty, former members of the leadership of the self-styled Nicaraguan resistance have returned to the country. Nevertheless, although it was agreed to submit a plan for the demobilisation of the counter-revolutionary army, only Nicaragua has done so; now a sword of Damocles hangs over our country and the peace plan: on 24 March the Northern Power approved $60 million to keep alive in Honduras, until February 1990, its defeated mercenary army with the plan of destabilising our country, using the workers' basic needs. This is evidenced by the involvement of two officials of its foreign department who had fostered a teachers' strike in May and had to be expelled as an act of dignity and sovereignty.

Now we as workers aim to rebuild our country for a future with employment opportunities and better living conditions. We want, therefore, to vote for peace in the forthcoming free elections in Nicaragua in order to strengthen our democracy. However, as of now, we would like to inform you that the first citizen representing the Northern Government has said that our elections will be fraudulent and is carrying out a campaign along these lines, covertly supporting attempts to foment internal disorders and even disregarding the will of his country's congress.

From this rostrum, we greet the workers of the world waging their fight for freedom and lasting peace.

We declare our unshakable solidarity with the workers of South Africa who are fighting against criminal apartheid, with the workers and people of Palestine who are heroically resisting the onslaughts of Zionism, with the people and workers of Panama who are taking a standing against the imperial attempt to subdue it and subjugate it. Our cause is the cause of freedom. The day is near when mankind will witness its absolute triumph.

Original - Arabic: Mr. BENNANI (representative of the Arab Labour Organisation) - In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! At the outset of the statement of the Arab Labour Organisation, which I have the honour of representing at this forum, I wish to congratulate Mr. Nkomo on his election as President of this session of the International Labour Conference. I would also like to congratulate the other Officers of this Conference for the confidence placed in them by their respective groups to assume this noble task.

This session coincides with Mr. Michel Hansenne's assumption of the post as Director-General of the International Labour Office. I would like to extend my sincere congratulations for the confidence placed in him by the members of the Organisation and wish him every success in the fulfilment of his weighty responsibilities. At the same time, I should like to congratulate his predecessor, my friend, Francis Blanchard, for all he achieved during the long years of his term of office; he helped to promote and further relations between the ILO and the Arab Labour Organisation in all fields of co-operation, co-ordination and consultation, to attain the objectives for which we are all striving.

This session - and the subject it is examining - are a specific significance. It can truly be considered the most lively and important session in the history of the ILO, whose 70th anniversary we are celebrating this year. Seven decades have gone by, during which the ILO has had to grapple with the challenges of our century - with political, economic and social problems; it has emerged even more capable than before of attaining the objectives for which it was set up in 1919, namely the establishment of social justice, combating injustice, oppression and poverty and the consolidation and protecting basic of human rights and fundamental freedoms. On this occasion, we wish the ILO further success in defending these rights and freedoms, anywhere in the world where they are infringed.

This session assumes more significance because of the vitality of the social, labour and human issues under consideration. I am referring in particular to economic recovery and development which at present enjoys priority in all international forums. It also responds to the aspirations of those concerned by issues of labour, development and employment, both nationally and internationally, because achieving appropriate solutions for structural adjustment, stability, job creation and combating poverty constitutes the real challenge imposed by contemporary economic and social reality. The real test being put to the developing countries is whether they are able to move successfully into the twenty-first century, as the century of technological revolution has ushered in drastic changes in the organisation of work and production throughout the world.

The Director-General is right when he defines these economic and social problems, more particularly the problem of indebtedness and its repercussions on working conditions. He displays a deep vision when he describes the recession, economic recovery and the creation of job opportunities in the 1980s. This vision is not a mere theoretical exercise. It is based on evidence and actual facts; it is in line with the conclusions reached by the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment, held in Geneva in 1987.

We agree with the Director-General that there can be no real economic progress without social progress; development in itself does not automatically guarantee the attainment of social goals. Furthermore, we believe, as is the case within the Arab Labour Organisation, in the importance of dialogue between the social partners in increasing productivity and the necessity for these partners to take part in decision-making.

We also agree with the Director-General when he says that we should try to prevent the poorer sectors of society from suffering the social cost of structural adjustment policies. These policies should have a social and human aspect if they are to be successful.

I should like to add that, in spite of the priority given to development and the rational harnessing of human resources in developing countries, the social and human aspect of development does not always, regrettably, get the attention it deserves.

Multilateral international co-operation, based on trust and a general sense of responsibility at the international levels, is the most effective means whereby we can approach and consider common issues and cope with economic and social imbalances in the developing countries. Furthermore, it is vital to breathe new life into discussions on co-operation between the North and South which have lagged behind for the past twenty years – especially in view of the widening gap between the developing countries and the industrialised countries in all technical, economic, financial and social spheres. As long as this situation exists, it endangers the well-being of the international community as a whole; it particularly threatens the future of economic development and social progress in all the countries of the world.

The new atmosphere prevailing in international co-operation today makes it incumbent upon affluent countries to co-operate with and assist developing countries, especially since most of these developing countries suffered for long years under the yoke of colonisation when their material and human resources were drained; during these years their efforts to develop their social and economic potential were frustrated. The problem of indebtedness is basically nothing more than a reflection and continuation of the situation in which the developing countries found themselves when they attained independence. The initiative taken by some affluent countries to cancel the debts of the least developed countries is extremely praiseworthy and should serve as an example to be followed to alleviate the burden to the debt and its servicing.

There are two basic issues that are of interest to all peace loving countries that believe in justice, especially the Arab people, which are related to human rights and basic freedoms. These rights are the sine qua non for man to assume his role in development and progress. In southern Africa we are preparing for the victory of the Namibian people and the creation of their state after an honourable struggle. At the same time we call upon the ILO to exert more pressure on the minority Pretoria regime to put an end to its arbitrary practices towards the African peoples in South Africa and its abhorrent policy of apartheid.

We are convinced that the full application of collective mandatory sanctions would contribute towards hastening the end of this amoral and inhuman regime.

In Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories, the heroic uprising of the Palestinian people, which has been continuing for 19 months and covers all classes, bears witness to the fact that Israeli occupation and settlement cannot last long; the Palestinian people are subjected daily to the most abominable forms of oppression and terror as a result of Israeli practices. The murder of one Palestinian per day has become commonplace for the occupation authorities and the Israeli settlers. The number of injured and disabled are increasing every day, quite apart from the demolition of houses under any pretext, the application of economic sanctions and other practices condemned by all countries and organisations. Israeli practices, with all their violence, savagery and barbarism, cannot annihilate the will of a people. The will of these people will emerge triumphant, regardless of their sacrifices and sufferings. This is an inevitable historic fact.

The ILO, which was originally set up to protect and safeguard the rights and freedoms of man, is the best placed and most qualified international organisation to monitor closely the situation of Palestinian workers and people. By its very tripartite nature, which reflects the will of all international social strata, and because of its international prestige, the International Labour Conference constitutes a world parliament and represents the world's conscience in condemning infringements of political rights and freedoms within its terms of reference. If the Organisation is unfailing in its condemnation of practices and policies contrary to its principles and objectives, it will help to put an end to these violations.

The ILO is called upon to assume its full responsibilities towards the cause of Palestinian workers and people, alongside all the other international specialised agencies – especially since the issue reached a significant juncture last year with the proclamation of the State of Palestine and its recognition by more than 100 States. What is more, a Palestinian peace plan was submitted which enjoyed the support and sympathy of the majority of countries in the world. All these trends are coupled with an increasing interest, on the part of the United Nations and their specialised agencies, in the struggle of the Palestinian people and efforts to support the establishment of an independent State on their sacred soil.

We hope that all the ILO bodies, especially the International Labour Conference and the Governing Body, will assume their full responsibilities and lead the way in protecting the rights and freedoms of the Palestinian people as a whole; we also hope that these bodies will provide them the necessary assistance, so that they might cope with the consequences of oppression, occupation and the confiscation of their land – especially at this decisive stage of their legitimate struggle. The Palestinians are only a few years short of laying the foundations of an independent Palestinian State under the leadership of the PLO.

Nothing is impossible for our Creator. May the peace and grace of God be with you!

Original – Arabic: Mr. DJEMAM (Representative of the International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions) – I have great pleasure in presenting, on behalf of the International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions and on my own behalf, our sincere congratulations to Mr. Nkomo on his election as President of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. This choice testifies to the immense confidence which the three parties place in his Government, which is at the forefront of the struggle against racism. It also shows their trust in Mr. Nkomo's personal attributes and competence. I wish him full success in the accomplishment of his tasks at the head of this session of the Conference.

I should like to join the preceding speakers to congratulate Mr. Hansenne on his election to the post of Director-General. We hope that he will attach all due importance to the problems of workers in general and we are confident that his experience and competence will enable him to discharge his mandate at the head of the ILO with great wisdom and objectivity.

I should also like to pay tribute to Mr. Francis Blanchard, the retiring Director-General, for the considerable efforts he has exerted and the spirit of co-operation he has shown towards the International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions, despite the difficult circumstances which the ILO has experienced. I wish him a long life of health and happiness.

In his Report to the Conference, the Director-General chose to address a problem which is central to the interests of the parties concerned, namely "Recovery and employment". The Report also considers the impact of economic and social factors on the development process.

As a group of workers from the developing countries, we believe that the ILO has a responsibility to promote the idea that the welfare of mankind should be the end aim of all human endeavour. We are convinced that the process of development and economic and social progress within the framework of national independence, on the one hand, and multilateral co-operation, on the other hand, play a crucial role in development and progress at the international level. We believe that this process must aim above all to increase employment opportunities in the best of conditions, to solve the problem of debt in the developing countries and to introduce modern technology appropriate to each country in order to gradually transform traditional economic relations and strengthen economic potential. We hope that the member States of the United Nations will respond to the Director-General's appeal by making every necessary effort to establish productive and rational programmes designed to enhance infrastructures and to make best use of the current climate of détente and disarmament. The amount thus saved should enable them to launch economic programmes which promote security, peace and justice throughout the world.

With respect to Part II of the Director-General's Report, Activities of the ILO, 1988, I once again observe with regret that the Arab States have not been given the attention which they deserve. We need technical assistance, particularly in the field of vocational training, technical advice, help with research and education, and teaching materials to enable our workers to adapt to scientific methods and new technologies.

We should like to stress that this session of the Conference is called upon to deal with vital subjects, such as the revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107). We hope that the Conference will adopt amendments appropriate to the situation which we are living at the end of this century and that the amended Convention will take fully into account the rights of these populations, thereby enabling them to preserve their identity, their culture and their traditions, and to exercise their social, political, economic and ecological rights.

The second important matter for discussion by the Conference is night work. We hope that during one of its upcoming sessions the Conference will be able to examine the revision of the 1948 Conventions on night work, paying special attention to women at work and the traditions of the countries in which they live.

We also hope that discussions on safety in the use of chemicals at work will lead to recommendations in view of adopting international instruments limiting the harmful effects of these substances in the modern world and alleviating the concern aroused by the impact of increasing pollution and the large number of accidents which have occurred in recent years and which continue to haunt our memory.

This Conference also has before it the ILO fact-finding mission's Report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories.

The "intifadah" has shown the determination of the Palestinian workers and people to exercise their legitimate rights to the return of their land, to self determination and to the establishment of an independent State on their own soil under the leadership of the Palestinian Liberation Organisation (PLO). We should like to commend the ILO fact-finding mission for its Report, which addresses various aspects of the tragic situation affecting the workers and people of Palestine. However, the mission was in many cases timid and overly diplomatic. It failed to explicitly deal with the subject of implementation by the occupation authorities of the resolutions of the 1974 and 1980 sessions of the Conference. This may be due to its delicate position vis-à-vis the occupation authorities, who are relentlessly pursuing their aggressive and expansionist policies. We should like to underscore that the mission's Report confirms that occupation is the true source of the Palestinian people's suffering and clearly describes the material and human exploitation to which the Palestinian workers are subjected and the amount of discrimination and segregation with which they must contend. An example of this is the occupation authorities' practice of forcing Palestinians who wish to work in their own country to carry identification indicating their ethnic origin. Is there any need to recall the similar racist practice carried out in the 1930s?

The fact that the report concludes that the recommendations contained in the earlier reports continue to be valid only goes to show that the occupation authorities have not taken these recommendations into account.

Similarly, in underscoring the need to adopt efficient measures to put an end to inequality of opportunities and employment, the mission points to continued discrimination and segregation.

We should like to draw particular attention to the mission's recommendation that the Israeli occupation authorities should take the measures necessary to guarantee the labour rights of Arab workers, particularly the exercise of legitimate trade union activities.

The mission also considered the vocational training available to the Palestinians living in the occupied territories as neither sufficient nor appropriate to obtain skilled employment.

We share the mission's concern about the fact that large numbers of day workers and seasonal workers are deprived of all protection and guarantees. We therefore urge the ILO to take the necessary steps to reverse this situation.

While the mission considered that the deductions made to the social benefits of Palestinian workers as unacceptable, we stress that these deductions are contrary to the spirit of the relevant international conventions.

The mission also reported that freedom of association has been strongly curtailed by the occupation and described the trade union situation in the occupied territories as a source of great concern and one in which the violation of trade union rights, interference in trade union activities and military repression constituted serious breaches of the principle of freedom of association.

This sums up the situation as described by the ILO mission in the narrow framework in which the Israeli occupation authorities allowed it to operate. Reality, however, is far worse. The barbaric repression perpetrated by the occupation forces and the settlers, the destruction of homes, the murder of children, the incarceration, the expulsions and the acts of sabotage against the Palestinian social and health services continue unabated under the occupation. We therefore fervently hope that this Conference will be able to adopt a resolution in support of the rights of the workers and people of Palestine.

The International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions held its Eight General Conference in Algiers last month, an event which was crowned with success. The Conference elected a General Secretariat with the mandate to pursue further co-operation with the ILO and with all the national, regional and international trade union organisations for the benefit of the workers of the world.

The central themes addressed by that Conference were the problems of worker solidarity, peace, disarmament, the international economic crisis, the struggle against racism, the signature of a comprehensive peace treaty between Iraq and Iran and the exchange of prisoners of war between those two countries, trade union rights and freedoms of emigrant Arab workers and the measures needed to ensure observance of their rights.

On behalf of the Arab workers and their trade union organisations, I should like to express total solidarity with and support for the struggle of peoples and workers everywhere against exploitation, dependence, dictatorship and injustice and in favour of economic and political independence and freedom. We should like in particular to mention the struggle of the peoples of South Africa and Namibia, whom we hope will soon take their due place among us after the defeat of the odious regime of apartheid. We firmly condemn that regime and its abhorrent practices, including kidnapping, murder, incarceration, torture, terrorism and expulsion. The same practices are inflicted on the people and workers of occupied Palestine, southern Lebanon and the Syrian Golan by the Zionist policies supported by American imperialism. We also condemn all regimes and all forces which co-operate with these racist regimes.

(The Conference adjourned at 5.30 p.m.)

Twenty-fourth sitting

President: Mr. Nkomo

NINTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION, DISCUSSION AND ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT – The first item on our agenda is the ninth report of the Selection Committee. I give the floor to Mr. Hammond, Government adviser, Canada, Chairman of the Selection Committee, to submit the report.

Mr. HAMMOND (Government adviser, Canada; Chairman of the Selection Committee) – I have the honour to submit to the Conference the ninth report of the Selection Committee, which is to be found in Provisional Record No. 4H.

In addition to recommendations concerning the request for representation at the Conference by the European Union of Local Authority Staffs, and changes in the composition of committees, the report deals with a request for representation at the Conference submitted by the Baha'i International Community.

As you will recall, this request was examined by the Conference at its sixteenth sitting on Thursday, 15 June, on the basis of the sixth report of the Selection Committee, which is to be found in Provisional Record No. 4E. At that time, the President of the Conference decided to refer the matter back to the Committee.

At the sixth and seventh sittings of the Committee there was an exchange of divergent views which are summarised in the report.

The report contains the decision which was arrived at following this exchange of views. It will be noted that in the appendix to its report the Committee is forwarding to the Conference information provided by the organisation itself which is intended to meet the request made in the Conference by the Chairman of the Workers' group. As noted in the report, some members of the Committee challenged the validity of this information, including the accuracy of the terminology used in the last section of the appendix.

I should point out that under the Standing Orders of the Conference, as recognised by most members of the Committee, it is for the Conference to take a decision on the representation of this organisation at the Conference. Accordingly, the Committee invites the Conference to do so tomorrow, Wednesday, 21 June, at 3 p.m.

I commend the report to the Conference for adoption.

The PRESIDENT – The discussion of the report is now open.

Original – Farsi: Mr. TIZMAAGHZ (Government delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran) – In the name of God, the Merciful and Compassionate! The document contained in Provisional Record No. 4H which is submitted to us today does not really reflect what happened yesterday in the Selection Committee and we challenge the validity of the information provided by that Committee.

As you know, last Wednesday, 14 June, the Conference rejected this request and asked the Committee to re-examine the issue. Therefore the Conference has not yet closed the debate within the Committee and this discussion has unfortunately been ended with no legal grounds.

Pursuant to the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation and the Standing Orders of this Conference, it is not within the mandate of the Conference to take such a decision concerning this political faction, whose goal is to kill and eliminate all its enemies – a goal which is clearly stated in all of its rules and regulations, which have been distributed to the Secretariat.

Let us not forget that the information has been provided by one party only, that it has come from a single source. All this information has been submitted by the Baha'i group. There are more than 45 Islamic States and Islamic employers' and workers' organisations within the Conference, and we ask everybody present here to reject this illegal request. The Islamic States will today adopt a joint decision on this inhuman request.

We have no course but to reject this request. If a decision were to be taken to the contrary, then Mr. Hansenne, as the Director-General, along with the President of the Conference and the Chairman of the Committee, would have to bear the responsibility for that step.

While we do not wish to jeopardise the ILO's stability, we must stress that the Organisation would have to bear the full responsibility for such a decision if it were to be adopted. The ILO should not fear imperialist pressure brought to bear upon it, but rather should respect the decisions of the member States in spite of that pressure.

Ours is not a political organisation. It was established to promote the well-being of workers and employers and to assist the various governments. It should not depart from its basic principles – the presence of too great a number of observers and NGOs will only impede its work.

I wonder what the relevance of this organisation is to workers' and employers' questions. Should the Organisation really give preferential treatment to the Baha'i Community to the detriment of States which have been loyal to the ILO for so long? What link is there between this Community and the matters with which we deal here – vocational training, wages, social security, worker protection, etc. I appeal to all of you to ensure that this request is rejected.

Let us make sure that we do not depart from our established path nor from our legitimate goals.

May peace and the grace of God be with you!

Original – Arabic: Mr. AL-OMAR (Government adviser, Kuwait) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! In the name of the Islamic Government group and all its members and in conformity with article 15 of the Standing Orders, we would like to appeal to you to postpone any decision on this question. I would like to support the previous speaker who referred to Provisional Record No. 4H submitted by the Selection Committee. Let me, in my turn, urge you to postpone any decision on this matter, as set out in paragraphs (a) and (b) of the said Provision Record, thereby ensuring that the appeal of the Islamic group is duly taken into consideration.

Original – Arabic: Mr. ABDOON (Workers' delegate, Sudan) – When you decided that this matter should be referred back to the Selection Committee for more detailed examination, several delegations gave their opinions as to the representation of the Baha'i International Community at the Conference and the dangers that this could entail.

We must not forget the main aims of our Organisation, for this community is a religious movement and if we decide to accept it amongst us here, we would be opening the door to other religious movements who do not really belong here.

Thus, on behalf of the Sudanese workers, the Arab workers through the intermediary of the International Union of Arab Workers, I should like to support the appeal to postpone the decision on this question.

Original – Arabic: Mr. AL-JASSEM (Employers' delegate, Kuwait) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I hope that a spirit of fraternity and cordiality will reign during this Conference. I support the proposal put forward by the Government delegate of Kuwait who spoke on behalf of more than 45 member States representing the three sectors and requesting that the Conference should take into consideration the feelings of the Islamic community which groups together over a thousand million people. I would like to ask you not to insult the dignity of the Islamic community by accepting the integration of this heretical movement into the Conference, and I do mean heretical, for various supreme Islamic bodies have indeed judged this movement to be a heretical one, and said that it should be fought with every possible method. Moreover, there is no link between this heretical movement and the objectives of our Organisation. Thus, for all of these reasons, I urge all of our Christian and Jewish brothers to take the right decision which is to refuse the membership of this community into our Conference, even as an observer. I should also like to request that the decision on this question be postponed.

Original – Arabic: Mr. ZLITNI (Government adviser, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya) – The delegation of my country fully supports the statement of the Government delegate of the Islamic Republic of Iran and the speakers who spoke after him. We endorse the request for a deferral of the decision on this matter.

Original – English: Mr. TABANI (Employers' delegate, Pakistan) – I wish to add our support to the statement made by the Government delegate of the Islamic Republic of Iran and by the Government adviser and the Employers' delegate of Kuwait.

In Pakistan, we have a small community of Baha'is who live peacefully and are Pakistanis. I therefore cannot understand how the international Baha'i community, which seeks representation here as an observer, could ever represent the Baha'is of Pakistan, who are Pakistani citizens. What is the difference between an NGO and an international religious community? This is the first question to be decided: whether an international community which claims representation on the basis of religion can be given representation as an observer or whether it can be classified as an NGO. I believe this is the first question for the Conference to decide, and I should therefore like to add the support of Pakistan to the comments of the previous speakers.

Original – Arabic: Mr. AL-YAHYA (Government delegate, Saudi Arabia) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! My country's delegation regrets very much that the Selection Committee did not accept the indications given by the Conference, because when Provisional Record No. 4E came out, all speakers rejected and condemned the report. The final proposal was to reject the request by the Baha'i International Community and we fail to understand how the Selection Committee can now put forward yet another new proposal. The Selection Committee this year has failed to meet the Conference's expectations. If this Conference really is the supreme body of the Organisation, its instructions must be carefully heeded. In Provisional Record No. 4H, it is stated that some members – merely some members – had asked that this decision be taken into consideration. This is ludicrous. The Conference cannot function efficiently as long as such measures and procedures are adopted. Some members can apparently direct the proceedings of the Committee and subsequently impose their will on the Conference, even though the majority opposes the invitation to this movement to be represented. I think it would be futile to engage in a long discussion today, since our lengthiest and weightiest deliberations, which will be fully heeded, will certainly take place at a later stage.

My delegation also endorses the total rejection of the ninth report of the Selection Committee, relating to a discussion which we can only regret.

Original – Arabic: Mr. BASAID (Government adviser, Yemen) In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! This issue has absolutely nothing to do with the competence of this Conference. We decided at the preceding session categorically to reject this request, so why has the discussion on this point been reopened? Is it indeed the case that a small group is running the Committee, imposing its will on it and consequently on the Conference? This would be absurd.

We should go back to the Constitution and the Standing Orders, where the responsibilities of the Conference are clearly set out. I will therefore restrict myself to supporting the statements and position of the delegates of the Islamic Republic of Iran and Kuwait. We feel that this question should not be broached again.

The PRESIDENT – It seems that all those who wished to express themselves on the report have done so.

As I understand it, two positions have been advanced. The first position is in favour of the postponement of any decision on the matter, and the second in favour of the rejection of the report.

I would therefore like us to proceed in the following manner. Since the report of the Selection Committee concerns more than one matter, I am going to request this plenary to adopt the second part of the report which does not deal with the issue of the Baha'i International Community. We can then revert to the first part of the report. If there are no objections, therefore, may I take it that second part of the report is adopted?

(The second part of the report is adopted.)

The PRESIDENT – We shall now proceed to examine the first part of the report which deals with the request submitted by the Baha'i International Community for representation at the Conference. The understanding of the President is that the Committee itself has not taken a definitive position as to whether to reject the request or accept it. The Committee has referred the matter to the plenary so that the plenary itself can take a decision on whether to accept the request or to reject it.

The Committee has in fact gone further than this and has suggested that a vote be taken tomorrow. Having heard the objections that have been put forward here this morning, I do not find it necessary to defer adoption of the report any longer since a vote will be taken tomorrow on the substance of the issue at hand.

I believe that the negative views that have been expressed here this morning are accommodated in the procedure proposed by the Committee, which the President finds quite appropriate.

Unless there is an objection, I would therefore propose that we adopt the first part of the report so that the plenary can vote on whether or not to accede to the request submitted by the Baha'i International Community tomorrow afternoon at 3 p.m., as proposed by the Committee.

I repeat, this does not mean that the request has been acceded to. It is merely a decision to adopt the Committee's report so that the plenary can proceed to accept or reject the request tomorrow at 3 p.m.

I must also make the point that some delegations have implied that the Director-General, the President of the Conference and maybe some other people should take the responsibility for the situation we find ourselves in. But it is not the Director-General or is it the President of the Conference who takes decisions on behalf of the plenary. This plenary is perfectly competent to take a decision on the basis of representations or submissions that are made when delegations take the floor. The decision is that of the plenary, not of the Director-General or the President of the Conference.

I would therefore like us to make progress on this matter, first by adopting the report and then by proceeding tomorrow afternoon to vote on whether or not to accede to the request of the Baha'i International Community.

Original – Arabic: Mr. AL-OMAR (Government adviser, Kuwait) – I was particularly happy to hear your first statement dealing with the position expressed by a large number of delegates here present. I must admit, however, that I was somewhat disappointed when you discussed solving this problem in a manner which does not reflect the opinions expressed by the members of the Conference, or in a way which does not reflect what I said when I referred to the rules of the Conference and when I asked for a postponement of the decision on this subject. There is another proposal, and that is to reject this report, since the Conference is the supreme body and the Committee is not entitled to direct the work of the Conference or to take decisions on this subject.

Original – French: Mr. HALFAOUI (Government adviser, Morocco) – I should just like to say that my delegation could not approve the report and support your proposal concerning its adoption. I take this opportunity to reaffirm once more the opposition of my Government to the request by the Baha'i International Community.

The PRESIDENT – In connection with the points raised by the Government adviser of Kuwait, I now give the floor to the Legal Adviser of the Conference.

Original – French: The LEGAL ADVISER of the Conference – I would just like to give a few words of clarification to confirm and support what the President said. I should like to clarify the aim of the discussion we are having now, and particularly to emphasise that the Conference is not being asked today to deal with the request of the Baha'i Organisation to be represented at the Conference. The Conference has before it the report of the Selection Committee, which specifies the conditions under which this request will be dealt with at the Conference.

Under article 4(2) of the Standing Orders of the Conference, "It shall be the duty of the Selection Committee to arrange the programme of the Conference, to fix the time and agenda for the plenary sittings, to make proposals relating to the setting up and composition of other committees", etc. You will note that the Selection Committee has the power to fix the time of plenary sessions and their agenda, and not simply to make recommendations. However, the prerogative in no way prejudices the sovereignty of the Conference.

When the Conference has a matter before it, in accordance with the arrangements made by the Selection Committee, clearly it is free to pronounce on the question to postpone its examination of the question. It will therefore be tomorrow that the question of whether or not to agree to the invitation to the organisation under discussion will, in accordance with the decision of the Selection Committee, be dealt with by the Conference, and it will be at that time that it would be appropriate for those who do not wish this invitation to be decided on to call for a postponement.

The provision of the Standing Orders mentioned in this connection – article 15 – which deals with motions, resolutions and amendments, specifies in paragraph 2(2) that points of order include the following: a motion referring a matter back and a motion to postpone consideration of a question. This confirms that motions of this sort can be received when the question on which the Conference is called on to take a decision is formally before it. All that you are doing today is noting the fact that the question will be before the Conference tomorrow, and tomorrow it will be for the Conference, which is sovereign, to decide whether it wants to decide on the request at that time or postpone its examination to another time.

Original – Arabic: Mr. AL-YAHYA (Government delegate, Saudi Arabia) – We have heard the opinion of the Legal Adviser. According to him, the subject will be discussed on Wednesday afternoon, and it will be up to the Conference, as the sovereign body, to accept or reject the request.

I should like us to take into account all the discussions which have already taken place on this subject, and those of this morning. I am surprised that people, faced with the truth, decide to postpone a discussion on the truth.

Who is inciting people to accept this so-called religious movement within our Conference? I should like to know exactly what is behind this. Does the Conference want to disregard what is actually happening? We deplore the fact that a final decision is not to be taken in this sitting. The explanations of the President were not clear or explicit: excuse my frankness. We should refuse the request of the Baha'is for a great number of reasons, notably because this movement does not conform to the requirements of the Standing Orders of this Conference. It is neither a workers' organisation nor an employers' organisation, but a religious movement.

Are we therefore to ignore the true facts and the reality? I should like to know who proposed the vote and who objects to the opinion expressed by the majority of delegations who are opposed to it. The Conference should respect the wishes of this august assembly.

I hope that a definitive decision will be taken during this sitting.

The PRESIDENT – Let me try and make the position clear. The substance of the matter before us is the request submitted by the Baha'i International Community for representation at the Conference. But what we are dealing with at this moment is a question of procedure. The matter was first brought before the Selection Committee which deliberated on it and submitted a report to the plenary. This plenary then referred the matter back to the Committee, which is now reporting on its proceedings. The procedural point at issue here is that we are called upon to accept the report, whether it is a negative report or positive report, since the fact is that the report is going to be part of the record of this Conference; whether or not you agree with its contents here in plenary. All I am asking, therefore, is that the Conference receive the report which has been submitted by the Committee. The decision on the actual contents of the report – namely, the request submitted by the Baha'i International Community – will be taken tomorrow, as proposed by the Selection Committee.

Original – Arabic: Mr. ABDOON (Workers' delegate, Sudan) – I do not want to go into legal details here in order to answer the Legal Adviser, nor do I want to express an opinion which is completely opposed to that of the President. I would just like to say that there are certain habits and customs, which have always led us to follow a practical and objective path.

The fact is, there is a report that has been submitted by the Selection Committee. The second part of it has been adopted and the first part is being debated. I think it is a matter of principle. If, based on this principle, we say no to the Baha'i International Community, I think we should reject the first part of the report. We should follow the correct legal path, and besides, this is the procedure within the other international organisations, and in the International Labour Organisation.

Let us not forget that the Baha'i movement has nothing to do with the workers' movement. It is a matter of principle, and on the basis of this principle, I would ask you, urge you, to reject the first part of the report.

Mr. HOOBAKHT (Employers' delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran) – In the Name of God, the Merciful and Compassionate! We fully support what has been said by Muslim countries and we strongly urge the Conference to delete this issue from the agenda. We cannot support an incorrect report such as the one that has been submitted to us.

Original – Arabic: Mr. AL-THAMER (Government adviser, Kuwait) – In the Name of God, the Merciful and Compassionate! I do not wish to contradict the Legal Adviser nor embark on a lengthy discussion with the President of the Conference. However, as you are aware, and as the previous speakers have pointed out, part of this report has already been adopted and the other part has been defeated.

The Conference is a sovereign body free to decide its own course. I do not wish to take up time unnecessarily, but it seems to me that it falls to the Conference to discuss the matter at hand in a clear way. Some countries have rejected this request presented by the Baha'i. This should be duly recorded, as well as the statements made by various Islamic and Arab organisations.

Original – Arabic: Mr. DERBY (Government adviser, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya) – We all know that the International Labour Conference is the supreme and sovereign body within the framework of this Organisation. It is up to the Conference to take decisions as to a request put forward by a committee, particularly when it is a question of adopting reports which reach us from the various committees. The Selection Committee is one of the committees which make up this Conference.

We have heard the statements from the Legal Adviser, when he mentioned certain articles of the Standing Orders, but I would also like to say that he ignored other articles. Indeed, while fully respecting the Constitution of the Organisation and Standing Orders of the Conference (because these Standing Orders) were decided upon by the Conference itself, I personally cannot accept the summary provided by the President. Nor can I accept the explanations provided by the Legal Adviser, particularly when he states that the Conference will study this subject.

To start with, he said that the Conference could postpone this decision. Later, he added that the subject would be studied tomorrow. I should therefore like to know whether the Conference specifies dates in its Standing Orders. Indeed, this is a report which reflects what happened within the Selection Committee, and thus it reflects the debate there for information. But it is also a question of taking a decision on the proposals put forward by this Committee. Thus, the Conference is not in agreement as to the content of this request. We note that this request has been rejected by a large number of delegates here.

There is another request which has been supported by a certain number of delegations, and that is to postpone taking a decision. The Conference would not have to decide upon a specific date. The proposal was to postpone the discussion, and no date has yet been fixed for it. We should therefore give some thought to these considerations.

There was a further proposal which consisted of rejecting any discussion on this subject, given that the Baha'i movement is a religious one, which does not strictly have a role to play within the ILO.

In other words, there is a proposal to postpone the discussion, and there is a further proposal to refuse this request. I think that we should deal with this question straight away because all of these proposals to vote tomorrow (or to take other steps) are in contradiction with what we should be doing.

Original – Arabic: Mr. ABU KHORMAH (Workers' delegate, Jordan) – Mr. President, at the outset I would like to thank you for your patience. I thank the Conference also for its patience in having accepted to devote this much time to the discussion of the report of the Selection Committee.

I do not disagree with what the Legal Adviser has said. I agree with him completely because he has interpreted the provisions of the Standing Orders. However, I disagree completely, not with the Selection Committee, but with its report, because I attended its session yesterday and I did not find any divergence, any disagreement on this particular issue. But all those who spoke in front of the Committee took a position against a discussion of this issue, and I therefore do not understand why some people are trying to force the Conference to examine the question of the representation of the Baha'i movement.

I would like to raise a legal issue. The ILO Constitution defines those who have a right to be Members of the Organisation. The Constitution also defines those who are entitled to observer status, namely employers' or workers' organisations. I am therefore wondering what the Baha'i movement has to do with employers or workers. All that has been said about the Baha'i movement suggests that it has nothing to do with workers' or employers' affairs, so why should the Baha'i movement be recognised by the Organisation?

I would urge you to preserve the social character of the ILO. I would like to recall also that there are many religious movements in the world, and we do not wish our august Organisation become involved in different movements. Therefore, I propose to delete the section concerning the Baha'i movement from the report of the Selection Committee, because the Committee itself has violated the Constitution and did not ensure that the information presented by the Baha'i movement was correct, so that we could recognise it in terms of the Constitution.

Original – Arabic: Mr. AL-JUMAIRY (Under-Secretary for Labour, United Arab Emirates) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, Compassionate! The delegation of my country proposes to delete the first part of the report of the Selection Committee. We think that it is within the mandate of this Conference to reject the first part of the report in order to save time and proceed with our debates.

Original – Arabic: Mr. HAMZA (Workers' delegate, Iraq) – First of all, please excuse me for intervening at this point, even though I only wish to take a minute of your time. I would like to say the following. First, no one has supported the admission of the Baha'i movement into the International Labour Organisation. The International Labour Conference and the ILO have no links with this movement, neither close nor loose connections. Besides, I think that the rejection of this request for the admission of this movement, as representatives from the Sudan, Jordan and elsewhere have said, is a very valid position and I support it. I would also like to propose the deletion of the section related to the Baha'i movement from the report of the Selection Committee.

Original – Arabic: Mr. MOSHIRIAN (Workers' delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran) – In the Name of Allah, the Merciful, the Compassionate! We think that the subject of Baha'i and its discussion here has no relation with the International Labour Conference, and above all that this subject should not have been included in the agenda of the Conference. We have come together here to consider hundreds of problems of economic and labour relations; not to consider the supervision of a spying organisation for interfering in the affairs of the Conference. This has diverted the Conference from its main objective, which is the evaluation of economic conditions and preparations of labour relations on the basis of social justice. The evaluation of mysterious political problems which are not related to the ILO will not help us to carry out our national and international responsibilities. The subject of a spying organisation might be of interest to three or four countries and it should not be imposed as an obligation to this Organisation.

The PRESIDENT – Following these statements, I now suspend this sitting for 15 minutes in order to allow for consultation with the Officers of the Conference.

(The sitting was suspended at 11.15 a.m., and resumed at 12 noon.)

The PRESIDENT – Since we have but little time before the record vote on the budget, we will suspend consideration of the issue that was before us this morning. I have carried out consultations with the Officers of the Conference and representatives of the delegations and I wish to consult a little more, as I would like to see this matter resolved amicably, if possible. Therefore, discussion of this matter is suspended and we will come back to it at 3 o'clock this afternoon.

RECORD VOTE ON THE RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE ADOPTION OF THE PROGRAMME AND BUDGET FOR THE 62ND FINANCIAL PERIOD (1990-91) AND THE ALLOCATION OF EXPENSES AMONG MEMBER STATES

The PRESIDENT – As announced yesterday during our consideration of the report of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives, we will now proceed to a record vote on the Resolution concerning the adoption of the Programme and Budget for the 62nd financial period (1990-91) and the allocation of expenses among member States. The text of this resolution can be found in Provisional Record No. 15/10.

(A record vote is taken.)

(The detailed results of the vote will be found at the end of the record of this sitting.)

The PRESIDENT – The result of the vote is as follows: 394 in favour; three against; no abstentions. Since the quorum is 252 and a majority of two-thirds was obtained, the resolution concerning the adoption of the Programme and Budget for the 62nd financial period (1990-91) and the allocation of expenses among member States is adopted.

(The resolution is adopted)

(The Conference adjourned at 12.45 p.m.)

(Continuation of record vote.)

The PRESIDENT – When we interrupted business this morning, we had adopted one part of the report of the Selection Committee, the other part being still unresolved. Since then I have carried out consultations with the Officers and with other people, and this issue is going to be the first item for us to attend to this afternoon. I want to repeat, however, that we are dealing with a matter of procedure not substance.

Original – Arabic: Mr. AL-THAMER (Government adviser, Kuwait) – After having discussed the problem this morning, on behalf of my Government and the group of the Islamic countries, I officially move that we should not debate the request of the Baha'i movement mentioned in the report of the Selection Committee.

Original – Arabic: Mr. ABDOON (Workers' delegate, Sudan) – For the same reasons as those given by the Government adviser of Kuwait on behalf of the Islamic group, I too, on behalf of the Arab Workers, wish to support this proposal and ask that the question of the admission of the Baha'i group to this Conference not be discussed.

The PRESIDENT – May I ask if there are any views opposing the motion just proposed by the delegates of Kuwait and Sudan.

Ms. McCaffrey (Government delegate, United States) – We oppose that motion. With regard to the report of the Selection Committee before us, the United States delegation does not understand why the portion of the report dealing with the Baha'i issue has been raised today. Less than 24 hours ago, all members of the Selection Committee, including representatives here today, agreed to have a decision made by the plenary on the matter at 3 p.m. tomorrow, with all interested parties understanding that this decision would probably be by vote.

There is an important element of good faith involved here. A time and place of 3 p.m. tomorrow in the plenary was unanimously recommended by the Selection Committee, and several members of the Committee who joined in that recommendation have now attempted to change the terms that had been agreed to; but may I add that there should be no doubt as to where the United States delegation stands on the issue of whether the Baha'is should be represented.

Mr. HEWITT (Government adviser, United Kingdom) – I support the statement made by the United States Government delegate. This decision was discussed in the Selection Committee and it was agreed that the issue should properly be taken and discussed tomorrow afternoon here in plenary. I see no reason why that decision of the Selection Committee should be overturned. It was also agreed and recognised in the Selection Committee that it might have to be decided by vote. That is the proper time and place and that is the recommendation of the Selection Committee. I see no reason why we should move from that position. Equally, the United Kingdom's position on this issue is clearly also not in doubt. We see no reason why that organisation should not be given the status which it seeks.

Mr. NABIAN (Government adviser, Islamic Republic of Iran) – In the Name of Allah, the Merciful, the Compassionate! We would have preferred not to take the floor, but since the decision of the Conference is being challenged, we feel obliged to give a little clarification on the matter.

The Selection Committee is not a supra-conferential body; it is a body appointed by the Conference, and entrusted with some functions, including reporting to the Conference. It has made a recommendation to the Conference and it was the decision of the President, with the consensus of the Conference this morning, to follow up the issue, as appropriate. Once again, on behalf of the delegation of the Islamic Republic of Iran, we urge the Conference, in the prevailing circumstances, to delete the item in question from the agenda.

The PRESIDENT – Two positions have been put before you. The first, in the form of a motion proposed by the Government adviser of Kuwait and seconded by the Workers' delegate of Sudan, is that the Conference should not discuss the matter before it. The other viewpoint has been put forward by Government delegate of the United States, seconded by Government adviser of the United Kingdom, to the effect that the recommendation of the Selection Committee should be followed and the matter be voted on tomorrow.

In the circumstances, I am afraid we will have to put this matter to a vote. But there are two issues I would like to make clear: one is that the United States position as I understood it is that the matter should be left until 3 p.m. tomorrow for a decision. Since the delegate of the United States has not said anything about the adoption of the report, I assume that the adoption of the report is not the issue as far as the United States is concerned.

The Government adviser of Kuwait on the other hand, supported by the Workers' delegate of Sudan and the Government adviser of the Islamic Republic of Iran, has moved that the matter not be dealt with by the Conference at all.

Original – Arabic: Mr. AL-THAMER (Government adviser, Kuwait) – In accordance with the Standing Orders, we would like to have a record vote on the motion made on behalf of Kuwait and the Islamic group.

Original – German: Mr. MUHR (Workers' delegate, Federal Republic of Germany) – Let me point out that I personally do not mind at all how the motion concerning the Baha'i is decided here. However, I do care what procedural regulations we apply in this connection. In 20 years of practical experience I have learned that the precedents which we set here are just as important as our Constitution of our Standing Orders and I fear that at this moment we are setting another precedent. That is why I would like to draw your attention to the fact that the Selection Committee, according to paragraph 4, subparagraph 2, of the Standing Orders does not only have the right but it in fact has the duty to fix the agenda of the plenary sittings of the Conference. This is not the duty of the Officers of the Conference; it is the duty of the Selection Committee. If you do not wish to accept the proposals of the Selection Committee, you must vote against them. But the proposal of the Selection Committee is before us and it applies until such time as it is rejected by the majority of the Conference.

I cannot accept the idea that we should proceed differently from the method laid down in the Standing Orders, because this would be prejudicial for the future. I cannot accept the fact that we are about to adopt a method which we would bitterly regret in the future if it were invoked for other reasons. If the President cannot agree with me on this issue, I would insist that we ask the Legal Adviser whether I have properly interpreted the Standing Orders. As I see it we can only vote in the following way: we have to decide on the rejection or acceptance of the proposal of the Selection Committee. If this proposal is not rejected, the Selection Committee has complied with its obligation, fixing the agenda.

I repeat that with regard to the decision itself, I am rather indifferent about that.

Original – French: Mr. OECHSLIN (Employers' delegate, France) – The procedural situation seems to me to be clear, and I think that I can agree with Mr. Muhr. The situation is the following: a proposal was made by the Government adviser of Kuwait, and was seconded. It consists of asking the Conference not to take a decision on the proposal, made by the Selection Committee, that the Conference should take a decision tomorrow afternoon.

We have only one proposal: the Governments of the United States and of the United Kingdom stated their objection to it. Consequently, we must take a decision on this proposal, and we must do it now, or at some other date if the Conference or the President prefers.

As for the record vote, may I recall that according to article 19, paragraph 6, of the Standing Orders, a record vote can take place on any item if the request has been made by at least 90 delegates present at the meeting. In order to accede to the request of the Government adviser of Kuwait, Mr. President, you must ensure that there are indeed 90 delegates supporting this request.

Original – French: Mr. BHAGIRUTTI (Workers' delegate, Mauritius) – I would like to make sure that this Conference does not go beyond the Organisation's Constitution. No matter what happens, we should not engage in a power struggle. What should prevail today is the Constitution, and I urge the President to exercise his authority and ensure that the Constitution of the Organisation is respected.

Mr. MOSHIRIAN (Workers' delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran) – In the name of Allah, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I want to reject emphatically the statement which was made by Mr. Muhr, the Chairman of the Workers' group, as his personal opinion, rather than a position adopted by the Workers' group. The workers from different countries have declared from this rostrum that the spying organisation of Baha'i is in no respect a workers' organisation. We want to know why the International Labour Conference intends to invite this spying organisation and support it, when its main task is to endanger the solidarity and integrity of countries. While advocating the rejection of the application of this spying organisation, we ask how it can be expected that other political organisations would not also ask for membership?

The PRESIDENT – With all due respect, sir, you are out of order. A motion has been moved by the Government adviser of Kuwait and this is what I would like us to concentrate on – not on the merits or demerits of the Baha'i.

I think the position is clear. The Government adviser for Kuwait has moved that this Conference does not wish to examine the request of the organisation concerned. His motion was duly seconded. In accordance with article 19, paragraph 6, of the Standing Orders of the Conference, I would like now to ascertain that there are 90 titular delegates who support the request for a record vote on the motion.

(A vote was held by show of hands.)

The PRESIDENT – According to my count, 50 delegates have supported the request for a record vote made by the delegation of Kuwait. We shall now proceed to vote on the motion itself by show of hands.

I have a request for the floor on a point of order from the Government adviser of Kuwait.

Original – Arabic: Mr. AL-THAMER (Government adviser, Kuwait) – I submitted the motion as to the procedure on the basis of article 19(6). The vote should be a record vote if requested by 90 delegates present at the sitting, or by the Chairman of a group or his representative. Kuwait is the president of the Islamic group, and in this capacity it has the right to ask for a record vote. Moreover, paragraph 4 of the same article authorises the President to call for a record vote.

Original – Arabic: Mr. MOSHIRIAN (Workers' delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! In conformity with our Standing Orders, the secretariat must inform the participants of its intentions. Most of the members of the Workers' group and of the Employers' group have not understood the purpose of our vote. In view of the fact that there are 45 States Members of the Islamic Conference, 45 workers' groups and 45 employers' organisations, we have a majority. Therefore I would like to ask the President and the secretariat to clarify the question of how we are to vote, and request the President to apply article 19, paragraphs 4 and 6 of the Standing Orders.

The PRESIDENT – I do not think that anything was out of order. Under the terms of article 19, paragraph 6, there is a clear procedure that has to be followed. If there was any point of order to be made, it should have been raised before we voted on the request for a record vote. We were voting in order to ascertain if, in accordance with article 19, paragraph 6, there were 90 delegates in favour of a record vote. In response to the remarks of the Government adviser of Kuwait, I would observe that a group in ILO terms means the Government, Employers' or Workers' group. I assume that the Government adviser of Kuwait made his request on behalf of the Arab group, which does not constitute a group within the meaning of the Standing Orders. In order to make matters a little bit more explicit, I will give the floor to the Legal Adviser.

Original – French: The LEGAL ADVISER of the Conference – I can but confirm exactly what you have said, namely that, for a record vote to be held under article 19, paragraph 6, of the Standing Orders, it must be requested either by 90 delegates present at the sitting or by the Chairman of a duly mandated group. By "group" we mean the Workers', Employers or Government group, for the simple reason that by hypothesis each of these groups represents more than the minimum 90 delegates needed to request a record vote.

The PRESIDENT – I believe that everything is clear. We are now going to vote on a motion, presented by the Government adviser of Kuwait and supported by the Workers' delegate of Sudan and the Government adviser of the Islamic Republic of Iran, to the effect that the Conference does not wish to examine the request of the Baha'i International Community for representation at the Conference. We are voting on the motion as moved by the delegation of Kuwait. Those who support the motion will vote in the affirmative and those who oppose it will vote in the negative.

(A vote is taken by show of hands.)

THE PRESIDENT – The result of the vote is as follows: for the motion 69; against the motion 7; abstentions 99. The total of those who voted is 76 and the quorum is 252. Consequently the motion is not carried. The Conference will therefore proceed with the matter tomorrow afternoon at 3 p.m.

(Mr. Delpino takes the Chair.)

Original – Spanish: The PRESIDENT (Mr. DELPINO) – We will now continue with the discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General.

Mrs. BAPPOO (Government delegate, Mauritius) – Allow me to join the previous speakers in congratulating Mr. Nkomo on his election as President of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. I should also like to congratulate the Vice-Presidents on their election. Their wisdom and tact have already greatly contributed to the smooth running of this august assembly.

My country learned with sorrow of the retirement of Mr. Francis Blanchard from the post of Director-General. He has left an indelible mark on our Organisation and no tribute would ever be strong enough to record his incessant efforts for development, peace and social justice. The last Report he has submitted to us is simply illuminating. The population of Mauritius bows low to the unique achievement of an exceptional citizen of the world.

We were fortunate enough to find Mr. Michel Hansenne to replace him. He is proving a most capable Director-General, and has an impressive background. He has already clearly defined his will to serve our Organisation with enthusiasm and vigour. My tripartite delegation is unanimously confident that he will give a new dimension to our Organisation to the benefit of the whole world. My country welcomes him heartily at the helm of our Organisation and offers all its co-operation to him.

We must strongly welcome this new dimension, for the world geo-political and economic framework is evolving very quickly and areas of tension are contracting. The evolution is globally positive on all continents and should be encouraged. However, we must all of us adapt our way of life to this new scenario. After 70 years of existence, this unique Organisation must be given the opportunity to restructure its activities to meet the changing demands.

As pointed out in the Director-General's Report, all our countries have known the acute pangs of the recent recession and we are still struggling to emerge from it. In my country, a social explosion was avoided, thanks to an aggressive policy of export-oriented industrialisation. We managed to steer the economy out of the red by making massive investments in our infrastructure and productive areas, thus bringing down unemployment to below 4 per cent and inflation to less than 2 per cent. Simultaneously, we raised wage levels to satisfy a long-awaited expectation. Indeed, the government action has more than doubled the payroll over the past six years. Alas, this had the immediate effect of setting off again the spiral of inflation and resulted in an unfavourable balance of payments, both of which we are trying to combat.

Our export industry, concentrated on textiles and garments, is very fragile on account of the volatile market. We have to diversify into other areas but we are already facing an acute shortage of trained manpower. We have therefore launched an extensive national programme of vocational training and retraining at all levels and in all sectors. The funding is being met by the Government as well as the private sector, by means of a levy on the wage bill.

As in many other countries, our main agricultural sector, sugar production, has been ailing for years. Yet inevitably, for a long time to come, it will still remain the backbone of our economy. After an in-depth study, we have made this sector more efficient and productive, but this was not achieved at the expense of workers' interests. In fact, measures were taken at the same time to improve their conditions of employment.

Industrialisation and agricultural diversification have unfortunately brought serious threats to our environment in their wake. Thanks to the generous assistance of the international community, we are, at great cost, introducing severe measures of control. The workplace has not been overlooked; special legislation has recently been enacted to require enterprises to maintain a high level occupational safety and health measures.

As regards welfare, we are reaching out far beyond the workplace. Under present legislation, funds are available for organising the welfare of workers and their families in the two most important economic sectors: sugar production and export enterprises. Tripartite bodies are responsible for the management of the funds.

Tripartism is being further strengthened by the constitution of tripartite committees to look into labour legislation on safety, health and welfare, and workers' education.

We have not stopped there. We realise that the complexities of the world economy have made the earth a small place and, consequently, we must have closer links with all countries. We are participating actively in moves for regional co-operation with neighbouring countries, irrespective of our different political perceptions. We have also managed to obtain a breakthrough in South-South co-operation, thereby establishing economic and cultural links with many countries of Africa and Asia. At the same time, we are still consolidating our cordial ties with industrialised countries and our action, locally, regionally and world-wide has one single, ultimate aim: the happiness of our people.

If I have dealt somewhat with my own country, it was to indicate how the analysis made and the solutions proposed in the Director-General's Report are close to reality for my people. Economic recession, employment, industrialisation, agricultural development and pollution are problems which we have tackled aggressively since the early 1980s and there is hope now of further progress with the help of international organisations and the international community. Here, I should like to record the invaluable assistance which my country has received from the International Labour Office in several areas. The co-operative sector is taking off with renewed strength, thanks to the ILO. The Office is also becoming active in the upgrading of skills in our workforce, particularly for female workers in the export enterprises. Tremendous resources have been supplied by the ILO to improve safety and health in the workplace. The ILO is running a workers' education project to upgrade the technical knowledge of trade union leaders so that tripartism can become still more effective. In short, we are making maximum use of the wealth of resources of the Office to try to stand on our own feet and our gratitude goes to the Director-General and the heads of all the departments for their positive approach to our problems.

Because my country is multilingual, I would like to conclude in French. Our dearest wish remains happiness for all mankind. In the same way as we rely on other countries for our social and economic progress, we in turn are prepared to make our humble resources available to other countries because we are firmly convinced that there is one earth and that men are condemned to live together, in peace.

We have come here from all continents in the quest for a little more justice and a little more happiness for our peoples. Soon, we will be going back home with the tremendous satisfaction of having shared our experiences, having found compromises on a number of subjects and with the firm commitment to strive for the well-being of our societies. We also all take home a great feeling of satisfaction at seeing that the representatives of our peoples, from different origins and different backgrounds, can work together, hand in hand, in universal brotherhood, to reach our common goal in a spirit of tolerance, wisdom and mutual respect. This attitude can and must be transposed to other areas. Humanity will emerge even stronger.

Mr. HERNANDEZ (Employers' delegate, Philippines) – It is with extreme pleasure that I convey to Mr. Nkomo, on behalf of the Employers' Confederation of the Philippines (ECOP), and on my own behalf, our warm congratulations on his well-deserved election as President of this Conference. Having worked with him during the Tripartite Conference on Action against Apartheid held in May 1988 in his great country, Zimbabwe, and during the 75th Session of this Conference, I have no doubt that with his experience and expertise he will steer the Conference to a successful and fruitful conclusion.

The choice by the Director-General of the theme of his Report, Recovery and employment, illustrates the global interest in this topic which, to be sure, addresses the major challenge of our time: how to achieve high rates of economic growth and employment and a more equitable distribution of the fruits of progress. The year 1988 was viewed as a time when the world economy turned around, and we are now given optimistic forecasts. And yet, very ironically, poverty in the Third World continues to increase.

This crisis once again demonstrates the flaws of the "trickle-down" approach to development. Growth, at the international or national level, does not necessarily extricate the poor from their misery or provide jobs for the unemployed. World Bank forecasts notwithstanding, global stagnation is likely to prove harder to shake than most would like to believe. Aside from protectionist measures, a series of corporate developments have stunted demand world-wide, leaving increasing numbers of people at the margins of market activity. Prominent among these developments are the handling of the Third World debt crisis, corporate substitution for Third World raw materials and labour-saving technological innovations in the developed world.

The world economy has created a need to rethink the kinds of adjustments that will produce growth and development. At the very least, adjustment strategies must be built on realistic assumptions. Rather than increasing their reliance on a hostile world environment, developing countries should try to reduce their dependence and to diversify their trading partners and products. This approach implies a careful restructuring of trade and financial linkages to conform with a development logic that is driven by internal economic forces.

The domestic stagnation of the industrialised economies severely limits the exports they can absorb, a reality exacerbated by protectionism – the panoply of quantitative restrictions that has spread to encompass one-half of the global trade. The fact is that there is a new global economic environment working against would-be newly industrialising countries (NICs). This requires a major rethinking of development strategies. A few general principles for development in a hostile world economy can be sketched out. Most would-be NICs remain predominantly agricultural societies. Hence, the starting-point of internal demand-led development must be in agriculture.

Employment problems are closely linked to structural adjustments at global and national levels. In the Philippines, the pattern of growth in the past was highly capital-intensive due to policies which were generally biased against the employment-intensive, rural-based, small-scale and decentralised enterprises. The post-1986 policies have, therefore, attempted to reverse this trend through structural adjustment.

The growth achieved in 1988 by the Philippines proved the correctness of the course it had taken. The revitalisation of the economy and the gains in political stability have been translated into a 26 per cent growth rate in investments, coupled with greater private consumption expenditures last year. However, in spite of the robust 6.7 per cent growth of our economy and the political stability we have achieved, we have not yet left the hard times behind. We shall therefore work towards bringing the benefits of growth to the countryside. We shall not wait for the benefits to trickle down to the rural areas. Countryside development is a major solution to the problems of poverty and unemployment.

Admittedly, the majority of the underemployed are to be found in the rural areas. Given the nature of our economy, which remains predominantly agricultural, with 65 per cent of our total workforce in the rural areas, investors have two possibilities: first, they can initiate industrialisation of the rural areas through labour-supported technology or equipment; second, they can boost the agricultural economy through rural investments that are likely to generate farm and off-farm employment. In addition, if we are to enhance employment promotion in the rural areas and attract investors to the countryside, we must ensure that industrial peace exists. Preference for the friendly settling of disputes became manifest as early as last year when the number of strikes in the Philippines went down by 39 per cent from the figure registered in 1987.

The Employers' Confederation of the Philippines, having realised the magnitude and seriousness of the problems of unemployment and poverty, adopted the theme "Business and employment strategies in the 1990s" for the recently concluded Tenth National Conference of Employers. The thrust of the National Conference was to prime the business community to anticipate and meet the challenge of maintaining profitability and economic viability, on the one hand, and satisfying the demands of social development, on the other. To put it in more specific terms, business must expand and continue to generate profits. However, this expansion carries with it the necessary duty of providing the population with the means to support itself, and nowhere is this concern more evident than in the area of employment generation.

During the Conference of the Employers' Confederation of the Philippines, the following perspectives clearly stood out:

- Modernisation, with its related issues of technological change and automation, entails a hidden threat of unduly displacing human beings with electronic chips. Depending on how we respond to this challenge, modernisation can be either a boon or a bane to employment generation.
- The Government must motivate and lay the groundwork for the private sector to marshal its resources in providing employment to the mass of unemployed and underemployed.
- Promoting employment and business growth in the Philippines in the coming decade obviously boils down to promoting increased entrepreneurship. As no business generally starts big, the value of developing small and medium-sized enterprises stands out sharply as a focus of our development strategy.

Two pending Bills in the Philippines Congress, the "Kalakalan 20" and the "Magna Carta for Small Enterprises", speak highly of the current thrust and commitment to countryside development through small enterprises. Both Bills seek to provide a solid foundation for rural industrialisation. The "Kalakalan" Bill encourages the establishment of small-scale enterprises in the countryside through tax exemptions and other incentives for firms employing fewer than 20 workers. The "Magna Carta for Small Enterprises", on the other hand, stresses the need to establish a comprehensive credit and guarantee system that will help the financing of programmes for small-scale enterprises. If passed, the Bill will free small-scale entrepreneurs from traditional lending proclivities and from the practice of relying on collaterals for transactions. One of the features of the Bill is the provision that all lending institutions set aside 3 per cent of their total loan portfolio for small enterprise credit.

The ECOP has also taken a direct and active part in the promotion of small- and medium-sized enterprises, through an expanded "Improve your business" programme, which seeks to develop their entrepreneurial capabilities, as well as those of the informal sector in the metropolitan areas and the micro-entrepreneurs in the countryside. The Confederation has, in addition, pursued various social development projects. This expansion of concerns has transformed it from a group of employers seeking to promote its own interests to an organisation committed to a role in the overall social economic development of the country.

Our vision for the Philippines is to multiply businesses. Our responsibility is to increase employment. We are prepared to make a reality of our vision, through an intensive search for the type of strategies that will benefit our economy and the living standards of our people. But anxieties continue to temper our enthusiasm, and to restrain the vigour of the actions that our sense of patriotism demands us to unleash; for, as in the other Third World countries haunted by the debt burden, the letters "IMF" have become the focus of pain in the beleaguered Filipino psyche.

The IMF is imposing its standards and its will on the governments of developing countries, through the Letter of Intent which impose stiff and heavy conditionalities. Developing country governments force themselves to comply with these conditions, even if this means sacrificing the needs of their people, because IMF approval is not only necessary as a precondition for its stabilisation loans; it is also required by commercial banks as a precondition for additional loans.

Since it has a direct hand in preparing the economic and financial plans of debtor countries, since it reviews the performance of a country on a regular basis and since it requires the debtor country to report and submit detailed economic, financial and monetary data, the IMF is actually co-managing the economies of debtor countries. The costs of IMF conditions go far beyond the actual sums lent to developing countries. A major issue is the human costs of IMF-imposed policies, which directly affect the poor and exacerbate their sufferings. These include limits on government expenditures, increased taxes, withdrawal of subsidies, higher costs of government services, especially for utilities, and lifting of price controls.

An equally important issue is that of national sovereignty, wherein foreign lending institutions impose standards which may not be aligned to national aspirations, and dictate policies which in the end have proved harmful to the people of these countries. I submit that no outside institution should co-manage our economies, create our national visions, determine our policy directions and decide how we will attack the problems of poverty and inequitable distribution of wealth. I offer this idea to those whose beautiful statements on "development" and seemingly rational targets further wound the sensitivities of the affected countries of the Third World.

All countries are vulnerable to changes in the international economy. Nevertheless, it is possible to combine structural adjustment with the resumption of equitable growth which will eventually lead to increased employment and the alleviation of poverty. Priority must be given to investment directed at improving the incomes of the vulnerable groups to stimulate economic recovery further. However, only a global approach can ensure improved co-ordination of economic policies, more open markets, better prices and the solution to the debt problem. It is our hope that we shall all pass the test of this challenge.

Mr. DYREMOSE (Minister of Labour, Denmark)
— First I would like, on behalf of the Danish delegation, to congratulate the President on his election at this session of the International Labour Conference.

I would also like here at the Conference to congratulate the Director-General, Michel Hansenne, who took over this very important position only a couple of months ago. The Danish Government wishes to express its faith and confidence in the Director-General and his ability to perform the important functions he will be assuming.

I would like to express my compliments on the Reports from the Director-General, which form the basis of this debate in the plenary session of the Conference.

The theme of the main Report this year, Recovery and employment, is a very relevant one in the present situation. This applies both at the global level and also at the national level, for instance, in Denmark.

The Report stresses that there is a need for a number of economic policy decisions in order to restore growth in production and in employment. The Report gives some examples. I find it extremely useful to discuss such questions in an international forum, but of course the formulation and the implementation of the required economic policy take place in the individual countries.

There is, however, one factor which is essential for all governments who want to pursue an economic policy of growth generation, and that is co-operation with the social partners. In the Report, the Director-General also stresses that the tripartite dialogue is a key ingredient. A central issue in such a dialogue should of course be employment. Both workers and employers have a direct interest in ensuring that wage increases are set at a level which provide incentives for increasing productivity and avoiding higher unemployment.

The same ideas are central to the economic policy plan which the Danish Government presented a couple of weeks ago, in order to overcome our economic difficulties. This plan could have borrowed the name of the Director-General's Report, Recovery and employment.

The Government's new plan aims at creating a climate for a modest development in wages, which will result in improved competitiveness, increased investments and confidence that it will be worth while to work harder and make an extra effort. I am convinced that the effects of such a policy will be an increase in exports, growth in the private sector and a higher level of employment. The Government's plan has the following objectives: restoring economic growth and increasing employment; turning the balance-of-payments deficit into a surplus; increasing private savings; and keeping inflation at the lowest possible level.

It is my firm belief that economic growth without inflation creates the best basis for all groups of the Danish population, and it is therefore also important in order to preserve the qualities of the Danish welfare society. Otherwise, the main purpose of the Government's initiative will not be achieved. Social benefits and transfer incomes will remain at a high level, but it will be necessary to reverse the present trend, which is that more and more people are becoming dependent upon public support. In the 1990s, this development must be reversed. More and more people must be enabled to provide for themselves. This is the best recovery for the individual that can be imagined.

Denmark needs economic recovery and increased employment. And I fully endorse the views of the Director-General that good co-operation with the social partners will enhance the possibilities of implementing major economic initiatives.

The Danish Government is prepared to enter into such co-operation with both sides of industry and it is our hope that such a dialogue can be established. If not, it will be difficult to bring back optimism and to restore growth and employment in Danish society.

The ILO was founded in 1919 in connection with the conclusion of peace following the First World War and Denmark has in all these 70 years been strongly committed to the Organisation and its activities, namely its standard-setting work, the safeguarding of human rights, tripartite co-operation, technical co-operation and other questions with a vital bearing on the labour market and working life, at both the regional and the global levels. But the Organisation faces some major challenges in the years to come. As the only international tripartite Organisation, the ILO seems to have great opportunities for moving into the front line of international discussions concerning the interaction of economic, social and human conditions.

The tasks and tripartite structure of the ILO give the Organisation unique opportunities. At the same time, it places responsibilities on the Organisation, which must adapt to the changing requirements, not least in respect of its own working procedures.

Activities during the 1990s should emphasise the traditional role of the ILO in establishing the preconditions for fair distribution and fair competition. This means that the work should be concentrated on a reinforcement of the role of the ILO as a leader of social progress and justice, on a renewal of the standard-setting work and on a renewal of technical co-operation for the development of working life.

Such deliberations concerning the role of the ILO in the future are a central element of the discussions which take place among Nordic countries where we have for decades had excellent and close co-operation and co-ordination as regards our participation in the activities of the ILO.

Reports and other accounts from the ILO, from the Committee on Freedom of Association, for instance, give the impression that industrial relations in Denmark suffer. This is not true, of course.

The Danish Government has never hindered the employees' right to organise. In fact in Denmark, we have one of the highest rates of organisation in the world, one which has not been falling as has been the case in many other countries in recent years. In the private and public sectors as a whole, between 85 and 90 per cent of the wage earners are members of a trade union. I think this is the second highest out of nine countries. The Danish Government has never in any way tried to prevent trade unions from concluding collective agreements. But the Danish Government feels an overall responsibility for the national economy and employment. I think every responsible government does that. Unfortunately, in Denmark there have been situations where it has been necessary for the Government and the Parliament to intervene. This is quite a different situation though, and there is a wide gap between this and a violation of basic human rights.

I think, therefore, that there is a need for an in-depth discussion about the basic problem of incomes policy in relation to the way in which the right to free collective bargaining is interpreted by the supervisory bodies of the ILO.

At the Conference in 1986 and again in 1987 I pointed out that such a discussion would be useful. I noted that the Director-General's Report in 1988, Human rights: A common responsibility, contained ideas along the same lines. I quote from the Report: "The ILO supervisory bodies have also had to deal with a variety of restrictions imposed on the bargaining rights of trade unions. This is an area where conflicting interests need to be finely balanced and where the public authorities cannot remain indifferent to the wide effects of agreements reached." I consider that it is extremely important that the supervisory bodies, for instance, the Committee on Freedom of Association and the Committee of Experts, when dealing with complex cases, to bear in mind that it is governments which have the overall responsibility for general economic policy.

I would also like to say just a few words about the very important technical items on the agenda of this Conference.

The revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107), seems to be very important and it will affect a lot of people. At the same time, it demonstrates the wide range of the activities of the ILO.

From the Danish side we will, with great interest, participate in the discussions concerning the revision of the Night Work (Women) Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 89). Denmark has not ratified this Convention because it prohibits night work for women. We are convinced in Denmark that there is no need for special legislation to protect women. We find that such special protection of women reduces the employment opportunities and may have a negative impact on the efforts to obtain true equality between men and women on the labour market.

The third theme, safety in the use of chemicals at work, is extremely important and has far-reaching implications. The working environment plays an important role in Denmark and it is our firm conviction that improvements in safety and health at work and economic growth should go hand in hand. They are not opposites – on the contrary. A sound working environment is also sound business economy. The extra costs which improvements in the working environment entail in the short term will, in the longer term and in the longer perspective, result in increased productivity.

The Danish attitude to the apartheid policy in South Africa and Namibia is, as it has persistently been, clear and firm. We strongly support the views of the ILO on the consequences of apartheid with regard to labour market and social questions, and our view about this question is reflected in the Director-General's Report.

My final remarks are that Denmark's commitment to the ILO is still second to none. We would like to see this Organisation develop in such a way that it will, in the future as well, be able to live up to the changes which are taking place in the world. We are certainly ready to make out contribution.

Mr. SAICHEUA (Government delegate, Thailand) – First of all, I would like to extend, on behalf of the Government of Thailand and my delegation, the warmest congratulations to the President on his unanimous election to the high office of leading and guiding this 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. I would like also to congratulate all the other officers of the Conference. Allow me to congratulate the newly elected Director-General of the ILO and express my appreciation for his role in organising this Conference. I am confident that the President, with his wisdom and able guidance, will lead this session to a fruitful and successful conclusion. I wish to assure you of the full support and co-operation of my delegation.

This year is a significant one for the ILO, as the Organisation is now 70 years old. For an international organisation to have survived the Second World War and have endured difficult circumstances for such long periods is already a major success in itself. Thailand, as a founding member of the ILO, would like to join all other 150 member States in congratulating the ILO on its 70th anniversary.

The Director-General's Report to the Conference, Recovery and employment, is a very comprehensive and precise analysis of the problems confronting the world today. The unfavourable international economic situation and the economic crisis, which many countries are facing, render the ILO's work even more important. Thailand therefore welcomes the Report of the Director-General as a positive contribution in this respect.

We fully agree with the Director-General's Report that there are both international and national dimensions to the adjustment task. We believe that countries cannot fully control their own destinies, but are merely players in the world today. We in Thailand have been quite fortunate in overcoming economic problems in the past decade and now reaching the stage of recovery. In 1988, economic growth reached 11 per cent, the highest in 22 years. This growth was equally shared by all sectors, with agriculture expanding by 8.6 per cent, manufacturing by 12.8 per cent, services by 10.7 per cent and export by 34.2 per cent. This growth was due to an increased flow of foreign investment, closer co-operation between government and private sectors, our ability to diversify exports from a primarily agrarian-based one to one of manufactured products, and the promotion of tourism. Our success has, as a matter of fact, generated the need for what our planners have called "second-generation infrastructure facilities" which require more capital investment for greater facilities in telecommunications and related areas.

The recommendations in Chapter 3 of the Report concerning macro-economic policies, in particular structural adjustment and stabilisation policies, in the context of equitable growth have influenced and will influence macro-economic policies in Thailand. In practice the trend is already noticeable in our country.

It is mainly in the area of micro-economic policies that greater attention is needed, more specifically, for developing the ability of government agencies to deliver appropriate services and for formulating programmes for direct employment creation. The situation is similar as regards devising and delivering appropriate services for influencing labour-market behaviour. Such services are needed in order to maintain a favourable investment climate, which is fundamental to economic progress and equitable growth.

Part II of the Director-General's Report on the activities of the ILO during 1988, the allocation of resources to assist labour administration in playing an effective role in micro-economic policies was disproportionately low. We hope the situation will be remedied and that the 1990-91 ILO Asian labour administration programmes for micro-economic policies referred to in the Report will receive greater attention.

Successful implementation of these micro-economic policies has almost become a precondition for maintaining a favourable investment climate, as well as sustaining entry into external product markets. Efficiency in the delivery of labour administration services can be greatly enhanced in areas where the ILO can contribute through its labour administration centres. These services are vital for ensuring a favourable investment climate and a stable external market for its products, for attracting capital assistance needed for second-generation infrastructure facilities and for equitable distribution of benefits from higher Gross Domestic Product.

Another area where the ILO can assist is in bridging the gap in understanding the situation in developing countries by encouraging dialogue between Government, employers' and workers' organisations of developed and developing countries. Currently there are misconceptions and information gaps in areas such as child labour policies in developing countries. These gaps affect trade and investment relations adversely which, in turn, aggravate the national situation. I hope some consideration may be given to the matter.

With these words I would like to congratulate the ILO one again for producing thought-provoking Reports and hope that its programmes will be increasingly addressed to enhancing the efficiency of labour administration.

On the agenda item concerning night work, Thailand has no specific law on the matter, but it can be applied under the Labour Protection Law. However, most of the nightworkers are employed on shift work for eight hours, as specified by law.

My Government has always been giving great emphasis to activities to promote safety and health of workers at work, as may be seen from more than 50 governmental regulations already issued concerning labour protection aspects, working conditions, safety and health, as well as a workmen's compensation scheme. I would like to note that, with the assistance of the ILO, the National Institute for the Improvement of Working Conditions and Environment was established in Thailand in 1983. Three Regional Centres for the Improvement of Working Conditions and Environment are also being established during 1987-90. This Institute and these Centres will help promote activities concerning safety and health as well as conditions of work.

Thailand has experienced rapid expansion of both industrial and agricultural sectors. This includes the introduction of new technologies and the Eastern Seaboard Development Project. The Project is aiming at developing the petro-chemical industry where a number of downstream industries are to be established. Various agro-chemicals are also being introduced into the agricultural sector. Increasing production and use of chemicals sometimes result in major accidents and health problems. However, the Government has set a clear policy that job creation and economic growth must go hand in hand with labour protection. In this connection, I consider the discussion on safety in the use of chemicals at work to be one of the most important and appropriate issues. I wish you every success in this important endeavour.

I would like to close by making reference to Mr. Francis Blanchard, the former Director-General, who retired earlier this year after having led the Office for 15 years. The Government of Thailand expresses its heartfelt appreciation for his contribution to the ILO and we wish him well in his retirement.

In conclusion, I believe that within the relatively short time of the present session some meaningful progress in our search for effective solutions to the socio-economic problems of the world of work will be accomplished. And with this note, I wish the Conference continued success in its deliberations.

Mr. GOPAL (Workers' delegate, India) – It is indeed a great pleasure to have had this opportunity to participate in this momentous session of the International Labour Conference, which is commemorating the 70th anniversary of the founding of the International Labour Organisation, the unique tripartite agency of the United Nations.

On behalf of the Workers' delegation from India, I join with previous speakers in congratulating Mr. Nkomo on his election as President of this historic 76th Session of the Conference. We are confident that, with his deep understanding and vast experience, he will do an admirable job in fulfilling his responsibility of guiding the deliberations of this session.

I also extend to Mr. Francis Blanchard, who has retired as Director-General of the International Labour Office the best wishes of the working class of our country; I also congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne on being elected the new Director-General and Mr. Heribert Maier on being named Deputy Director-General of the ILO.

This august assembly is to consider the advisability of adopting an international instrument or instruments concerning safety in the use of chemicals at work. It augurs well for our work that the majority of the member States replied in the affirmative to the numerous issues raised in the questionnaire sent by the International Labour Office in this regard.

The 1984 disaster at Bhopal in India, perhaps the world's worst ever industrial tragedy that took a toll of 2,000 precious human lives while causing permanent harm to the health of nearly a quarter of the city's population, epitomised the contradictions, imbalances and inadequacies that have developed during the past two decades of rapid growth of the chemical industry.

The tragedy has rudely shaken the entire world and made it aware of the serious potential hazards inherent in an indiscriminate recourse to modern technology especially in the chemical industry.

Technological progress has no doubt resulted in a decrease of certain occupational hazards, but it has also created new ones or worsened existing hazards. This particularly holds true in industries with a large-scale use of chemicals. The number of chemical substances in use has been estimated at over 100,000, and this staggering number is increasing every day.

The employers, particularly in the private sector, have the least regard for occupational safety and health and are concerned only with maximum profit. Governments too are sometimes to blame. Despite the health hazards of asbestos, new asbestos industrial establishments are being allowed to be set up by the governments of the rapidly developing countries.

Another factor of serious concern is the application of double standards in the field of safety, practised by the transnational corporations; they have one set of standards for their own countries and altogether a different set of standards in the developing countries. Their only objective is to lower their costs, with no concern for the serious hazards to which the workers and the people are being exposed. The Bhopal disaster is a striking case in point and I am confident that this Conference will give the go-ahead to the International Labour Office to draw up the requisite draft instruments for the consideration of the governments.

The Night Work (Women) Convention (Revised), 1948 (No. 89), was adopted long ago and many of its provisions have since become outdated. I fully subscribe to the views of the Government of India that, considering the desirability of prohibiting night work for women, adequate measures are needed to protect women workers. The contention that the prohibition of night work by women is discriminatory should also be taken into account. However, the argument that a Convention would be difficult to implement considering the diversity in the existing law and practice is not convincing.

The Director-General has again presented a special report on the application of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia. Session after session we have been passing resolutions on action against the most barbaric apartheid policy of the White minority regime in South Africa. We have also adopted a declaration in this regard which is being periodically updated.

Thanks to a few advanced countries of the West with vested interests, the White minority regime is being encouraged to defy the entire world opinion against the most obnoxious policy of discrimination based on the colour of the skin of the people to deny to the sons of the soil – Black South Africans – their freedom and basic human rights. The South African Government is seeking to turn the agreement to implement the United Nations Security Council Resolution 435 on the independence of Namibia into a farce.

Not content with this policy of repression against the Blacks, the White authoritarian Government is preparing to embark upon an offensive against the front-line States in Africa who have been relentlessly campaigning for a global imposition of mandatory sanctions against South Africa.

The trade unions in the developing countries, and particularly in the non-aligned countries, have pledged their solidarity with the brave people of South Africa. In India, the Government has instituted the Prime Minister's South Africa Fund for the purpose of extending monetary and material help to the front-line States to face effectively the South African offensive. The workers of the coal industry, along with the management have contributed Rs. 10 million to this fund. Likewise, all the central trade union organisations have jointly collected a substantial amount for the assistance of the South African people who are engaged in a valiant struggle for freedom.

Two years ago this August tripartite assembly deliberated on the world of employment. To start with, I would like to say that there has been no significant improvement in this direction since then. This is particularly so in the developing countries. On the contrary, the world labour and social situation has grown into an issue of grave concern to us all. We have been witnessing rising unemployment, a slow-down in the rate of employment generation, a marked deterioration in the quality of jobs created and unabated growth of low productivity and underpaid jobs. All these have been contributing to the high increase in poverty in the Third World countries. Chances of recovery continue to elude the Third World. This alarming situation is the direct outcome of the refusal on the part of the developed countries to recognise that growth in the North does not result in growth in the South. The "trickle-down" concept has since been proved wrong. The rich nations refuse to acknowledge the interdependence and mutuality of interests between nations. They do not appreciate the need to usher in a new world economic order to ensure a balanced development of the world. We are being forced to helplessly witness the unending capital flight from the South to the North. Despite the much trumpeted rate of growth of the world economy during the eighties, the developing countries, to whom this growth has turned out to be meaningless, continue to be engulfed in poverty. It is in this context that I welcome the Director-General's choice of "Recovery and employment" as the theme of his Report for discussion in this session of the International Labour Conference. The Director-General has very rightly and forcefully emphasised the pivotal role of the ILO in the area of employment and has thus reaffirmed the essential socio-economic change. I congratulate him on this excellent Report.

The Director-General is fully justified in having described the 1980s as a lost decade for the developing countries. The growth of world trade decelerated sharply in the early years of the decade and the developing countries had to bear the brunt in the form of deteriorating terms of trade. The result was increased indebtedness, pushing most of the countries into an adjustment process geared towards restoring balance-of-payments at the expense of economic development.

I fully endorse the Director-General's assertion that in an increasingly interdependent world, all countries are sooner or later affected by a major change on the international scene and this heterogeneity must not be allowed to lead us to turn a blind eye to the universality of the economic crisis – the slow-down of the world economy as a whole, the deteriorating terms of trade of the developing countries, the general rise in interest rates, the introduction of fresh trade barriers and the rapidly shrinking availability of capital.

While on this subject, I have recently noticed the attempts of trade unions of some of the developed countries to get bilateral trade and financial agreements linked to the rigid observance of international labour standards. I do appreciate their concern but while there can be no compromise on the observance of standards on basic rights, such as human and trade union rights, the indirect enforcement of various other labour standards through their linkage to bilateral trade and financial agreements, will impose constraints on the recipient developing countries. The developed countries have to consider the needs of the developing countries and must not create impediments to their growth. Further, it is most disturbing that this demand is being raised at a time when the world economic system as a whole is being sought to be restructured on the basis of mutual co-operation, equity, interdependence and shared responsibility.

Industrialised market economy countries seem to be in no mood to vie up protectionist and distortive measures and policies. Barriers are being erected in the path of the exports from the developing world. As pointed out earlier, the debt burden has forced many developing countries to adopt adjustment programmes at enormous costs, necessitating severe curtailment of their own development efforts. The net transfer of resources is from the developing countries to the developed ones, instead of being the other way around. Trade imbalances existing among major economic powers have been on the increase with resultant tensions in the international trading system. The world economic crisis, which is basically structural, is being deepened by the macro-economic policies of the developed nations. Multinationalism is being increasingly sidelined and the resultant weakening of multilateral co-operation for development has brought about the growing inequity in the sharing of the burden, and adjustment efforts between the developed and developing countries. The industrially advanced nations are increasingly opting for bilateralism in foreign economic relations, often doing so for political reasons.

The need is for a global approach to common problems – trade, financing, technology, production and labour. Resource constraints should also be taken into account and so should the differing economic circumstances. It is heartening that there are presently serious efforts being made to reduce the threat to world peace. In a bid to reduce tension between the super powers, efforts are already afoot for finding lasting solutions. The steps taken towards disarmament can be made conducive to addressing ourselves to the issue of development in a new, long-term perspective. The funds saved from a halt to further development and production of destructive arms can be well utilised for coping with the problem of indebtedness. Recent changes taking place in the economic policies of some socialist countries in Europe should promote their integration in the world economy and their involvement in the efforts towards balanced world development.

While discussing the development strategies for recovery, the Director-General has very aptly pointed out that the extent of structural adjustment that is required, and how easily it can be brought about in a particular country, is influenced by past development strategies, the degree of flexibility in the structure of production and the mobility of factors of production. He has further stated that the adjustment programme will have to be extended significantly beyond macro-economic management to include trade liberalisation, reduced state regulation of economic activity, removal of subsidies and adjustments in relative prices and in some cases the phasing out or privatisation of loss-making state enterprises. On the issue of privatisation of state units, however, there are divergent opinions existing in my country. There is a powerful section which strongly believes that privatisation is no solution to the problem. This opposition to privatisation perhaps stems from the increasing incidence of ailments and the consequent closure of industrial units in the private sector.

We have a large number of private enterprises which have either been closed down or begun to fail. At the end of June 1987, the total number of failing units in the portfolio of scheduled commercial banks stood at 159,938, involving an outstanding bank credit of about Rs. 5,738 billion. It will be of interest to learn that according to the Reserve Bank of India report, labour has been responsible for barely 2 per cent of the sickness.

In employment generation, too, the performance of the private sector has been disappointing. For instance, employment in private sector industry came down from 7,373,000 in 1986 to 7,369,000 in 1987, whereas in public sector industry, there was growth in employment – from 17,863,000 in 1986 to 18,028,000 in 1987.

It is also true that in many situations state investment is complementary to private investment. This is particularly so in the case of India. For the creation of a conducive climate for increased private investment, both domestic and foreign, massive state investments in infrastructure and human resources have become necessary.

For the generation of internal resources for development, a number of savings schemes have been drawn up and implemented. The pattern of state investment and the channelling of private investment are aimed at the implementation of the strategy of structural adjustment with growth and equity. Fully aware of the necessity of reaching the major poverty group, special importance is being given to investments in traditional agriculture and the rural sector. A number of rural development programmes have been embarked upon. Some of them are: Small Farmers Development Programme, the Food for Work Programme, the Integrated Rural Development Programme, the National Rural Employment Programme, the Training of Youth Programme, etc. In August 1987, our Prime Minister, Mr. Rajiv Gandhi had enunciated a restructured 20-point programme with added thrust to the elimination of rural poverty.

In this anniversary of Jawaharlal Nehru's birth, India, with the second largest population in the world, is technologically an adolescent. The population is increasing at an alarming rate and the number of unemployed is also increasing at an equally alarming rate. Industrial development is not fast enough to absorb all this unemployment.

India, therefore, stands as a test case. The world's largest democracy is struggling to catch up with the advanced countries, while simultaneously tackling the immediate problem of unemployment. In this task, we look towards the wisdom of the international trade union movement and other world bodies like the ILO to guide us.

Original – French: Mr. DOLGU (Government delegate, Romania) – I am particularly pleased to join the previous speakers in addressing to Mr. Nkomo our sincerest congratulations on his election as President of this session of the Conference and in wishing him the best of success in the accomplishment of this important mission. My congratulations also go to the Secretary-General of the Conference, Mr. Michel Hanseenne, on his election as Director-General of the International Labour Office, and I should like to assure him of our support in the accomplishment of his noble mission at the head of this important international body.

In this anniversary year, following the example of other distinguished delegates who have spoken before me, I should like to congratulate our Organisation upon the results obtained over its 70 years of existence and to address to it our best wishes for success in its continuing efforts to foster social justice and contribute to improving the working and living conditions of workers.

As emphasised in the Director-General's Report, for which we thank Mr. Francis Blanchard, the ILO is celebrating its 70th anniversary at a time when the social situation throughout the world is giving rise to great concern. Indeed, the setbacks in the quest for full employment and social progress can only be described as grave. These setbacks have marked the decade that is now coming to an end because, according to the Report again, and here I quote: "Unemployment rates in many industrialised countries have been at their highest levels since the last world war and a majority of developing countries have experienced rising unemployment and underemployment as well as increased poverty". This situation reflects the world-wide imbalance of the economy, which is characterised by a "perverse situation in which poor countries have become net exporters of capital which is desperately needed to revive development".

With a per capita income still inferior in many countries to what it was in 1980 and social conditions which continue to seriously deteriorate, the eighties appear to us indeed as the lost decade of development.

The processes that have led to this situation, and which are presented in Chapter 1 of the Report, clearly show that the main burden of responsibility lies with uncontrolled market forces, the virtues of which nevertheless continue to be extolled by those who claim that a free rein ensures the best possible distribution of resources.

The effects of the international economic and financial crisis have not spared my country, and the servicing of the foreign debt has confronted my people with difficult options. However, the balance sheet of efforts deployed over the past few years has shown that, despite the difficulties and the pressure exerted upon our resources, growth has continued and is continuing. This balance sheet also shows that technical, scientific and human potential has considerably expanded in all sectors of activity. In the past 20 years, 2,000 industrial production units have been established both in old centres and in more than 180 new industrial zones which, together with the new agro-industrial and tourist centres, constitute a large number of new areas of growth.

The number of jobs has been increased on a continuous basis, thereby promoting the eradication of unemployment, job creation for the entire working population and also the systematic integration of young people. Over the past 20 years alone, more than 3.3 million new jobs have been created. The average wage is three times what it was in 1965, the number of those drawing old-age pensions has attained 3 million and the number of children whose parents receive special allowances has reached 5 million.

New hospitals, clinics and dispensaries have been built and medical care is free for all citizens. The number of medical staff with intermediate and higher level training has increased over the past 20 years more than threefold and there is currently one doctor for 472 inhabitants.

A compulsory ten-year period of education has been generalised and about 80 per cent of young people attend school for a minimum of twelve years. This will be the case with everybody from 1990 onwards. Education at all levels is free and the primary and secondary levels are obligatory.

Over the same period, about 3.4 million housing units have been built with state funds and hundreds of thousands of families have had private houses built in the rural and urban areas. At present, 80 per cent of country's population lives in new houses or accommodation.

Education, culture and scientific research have also gone through substantial development. Over this period, the number of teachers and of those employed in the sector of culture and arts has been doubled and the number of those working in research has increased by an even greater ratio.

To ensure that the whole population is involved in development and growth, however distant the area they live in, we have introduced administrative reforms with the objective of ensuring that all the resulting 40 departments are provided with economic growth poles and an appropriate social and cultural infrastructure. We have managed to reduce considerably the divergent levels of development of the various departments, and all areas of the country are now benefiting from growth and general development.

Over the past few years, we have also introduced new economic machinery which directs economic and social development planning but which is based both on self-management and self-financing of enterprises. Within these enterprises activity is solidly based upon economic criteria which stem both from the market and from modern methods of management. This allows us to pursue, more or less throughout all sectors of activity, intensive developments based upon quality, a quest for efficiency and profitability. We have not, however, diverged from what we have achieved in our socialist revolution, namely the values of justice, equity and social security which are inherent in it. These values, we believe, can only be guaranteed by the principle of socialist ownership – of the people as a whole and of co-operatives – and by the guiding role of the plan, excluding exploitation of man by man, and with an income distribution which while giving incentives to workers, also prevents the formation of new privileged classes.

The existing system can certainly be refined still further, but, in our opinion, there is no reason to back-peddle on the system of socialist ownership and to open up the forms of exploitation and the inequalities of earlier times. At the same time, we are firmly attached to the ideals of extending socialist democracy and of perfecting the democratic system that we have established over the past 20 years and which has aimed at the active participation of the people in decision-making and at their involvement, at micro and macro levels, in consolidating continuously the rule of law by promoting the economic, social, cultural, civil and political rights of workers. It is only in this way that it will be possible to maintain full employment and to involve all departments, all communities, all citizens in the economic and social progress of the country.

The situation in a large number of developed capitalist countries shows that the best choice for nations should not involve a growth in inequality. This can only give rise to unemployment, a shortage of housing and an accumulation of other social problems that are serious and complex.

The Report of the Director-General attaches great importance to the crucial problem of debt and to its consequences for a large number of countries. My country has also had to bear this burden, and it has had to pay a high price to rid itself of it. We first of all had to pay very high interest rates: between 1975 and March 1989, we paid twice the amount of the credit received; that is, US$21,000 million, of which more than $7,000 million were paid in interest. But we also have taken into account the interference of which a number of indebted countries are victims, since the rescheduling of new credit is always accompanied by economic and even political conditions.

Since the beginning, we have realised that this problem of foreign debt can only be solved by a new political approach within the framework of a global strategy. That is why, seven years ago, Romania presented such a strategy in another Geneva international body, and it has continued to give it more tangible shape and to promote it. However, the measures undertaken up until now to set up such a global strategy for foreign debt have not substantially changed the situation. Economic growth is being held back for a huge majority of developing countries, confronted, as the Director-General says in his Report, by the coexistence of inflation, unemployment and severe imbalances in their balance of payments. All of this has repercussions on the living and working conditions of workers.

This is why, in agreement with its stance of principle, Romania welcomes sympathetically and in solidarity the resolution on this matter presented by Latin American countries.

The Romanian delegation has noted with interest that the Director-General refers in his Report to disarmament and has launched the idea of financing, with the savings released from disarmament measures, a number of operations and major actions which to a large extent would preserve the environment. This also is in line with the ideas and proposals submitted by Romania over a number of years in international bodies, including the ILO.

To conclude, may I express the wish that the Organisation remain faithful to its vocation of co-operation in order to foster peace and social justice; that it may not become involved in action reflecting the political interests of certain States or groups of States; that an end may be put to confrontation and approaches based on ideological and political priorities; and that strong co-operation may be built on a foundation of equality and respect for diversity in institutions, systems and special characteristics ensuing from local traditions and the level of development.

Mr. von HOLTEN (Employers' delegate, Sweden)

– It is a pleasure for me to add the congratulations of the Employers' delegations of Denmark, Finland, Iceland, Norway and Sweden to those conveyed by preceding speakers to the President, and the Vice-Presidents on their election.

This morning the Conference adopted the ILO's budget for the next biennium. The programme envisages concentrated action on a few priority themes. Top priority is given to following up the conclusions of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment held at the initiative of Mr. Blanchard in November 1987. The Meeting, as we all know, concluded that structural adjustment is essential to achieve more growth without inflation, and it called upon the international institutions concerned to join forces in facilitating such adjustment. For the ILO this will mean not only that it will have to identify possible adverse social consequences and advise on how to keep these to a minimum but also that it will have to provide assistance, for example in the field of education, in overcoming such obstacles to adjustment as may exist in the form of outdated social patterns and attitudes.

The programme for 1990-91 constitutes the first concrete step in this new direction. In our opinion this step could have been bigger, because we believe that it is in this area that much of the future of our Organisation lies. On the other hand, Rome was not built in a day.

Recovery and employment is the title of Mr. Blanchard's last Report to the Conference. Drawing on the work of the Committee on Employment of the Governing Body, he further develops the analysis made by the High-Level Meeting, emphasising in particular those aspects that are of immediate interest to the ILO.

He speaks about the universal nature of the economic crisis of the past ten years, stressing the role of a motor played by the OECD countries and the very negative effects for developing countries when that motor slows down. While there is still high unemployment in every part of the world and a further decline in per capita GDP in many developing countries.

The lessons to be drawn from the past include the need for greater efficiency in resource use. The Report's description is worth quoting: "In some countries a contributing cause of the debt crisis was the use of borrowed foreign funds for low-productivity activities or unwise investments, or for sustaining an over-extended level of consumption. There also tended to be a relative lack of attention to the need to maintain a high degree of efficiency and productivity in state interventions in economic activities. Public sector activities in many countries expanded beyond the extent justified by economic and social considerations. There was a relative indifference in many cases to the micro-economic inefficiencies resulting from various forms of state intervention and regulation of economic activity. Indeed there were often examples of clearly irrational economic policies from which no one benefited".

In turning from the masterly analysis to the conclusions of the Report, we feel a bit disappointed; on the other hand, we remember that this is a trick which our former Director-General often played on us to provoke a good debate in the Conference.

He certainly argues strongly, as he has always done, against protectionism. He could have added, however, that free trade is only conceivable with a market economy and a market economy only conceivable with free enterprise.

Only last year the Conference adopted a new Convention (No. 168) concerning employment promotion and protection against unemployment. Its preamble states that "policies leading to stable, sustained, non-inflationary economic growth and a flexible response to change, as well as to creation and promotion of all forms of productive and freely chosen employment including small undertakings, co-operatives, self-employment and local initiatives for employment, even through the redistribution of resources currently devoted to the financing and purely assistance-oriented activities towards activities which promote employment, especially vocational guidance, training and rehabilitation, offer the best protection against the adverse effects of involuntary unemployment...". This was a unanimous statement by this Conference one year ago.

There are still a lot of legal and similar barriers to numerous forms of productive employment around the world and these should be removed. We had expected more suggestions for action in that direction and less traditional ones dealing with public works and such like. That many Western countries – including the Nordic ones, which were formerly very poor – are rich today is in fact due to the recognition in the last century of the freedom of property and the freedom of trade, by which the privileges of monopolies and oligopolies such as guilds were abolished.

Privatisation and deregulation are mentioned in the Report but in a manner which is more negative than positive. Privatisation is, of course, to some extent an ideological issue. Nobody can deny, however, that state medical care and welfare monopolies are becoming a more and more serious problem in Europe, in Eastern as well as Western Europe. Unable to identify the priorities which respond to real needs, these monopolies tend to grow perpetually and to put an increasing burden on the shrinking productive sector of the economy, with, as an ultimate result, a general lowering of living standards. Here, structural adjustment is indeed necessary and what the ILO should do is to provide models, etc., by which the vested interests standing in the way of this adjustment can be overcome.

One word finally about deregulation. Evidently here, and indeed in this whole context, the ILO must see to it that the baby is not thrown out with the bathwater. But equally important is to remove the bathwater so that the baby does not drown. Basic human rights must be respected and enhanced. Good relations between the social partners of a country are often the product of decades of searching, and they should not be made to suffer, even if organisations and agreements may have to be reshaped. On the other hand, there are many labour standards which need to be adjusted according to changing circumstances. This goes for international as well as national standards.

Without repeating all that the Nordic employers have said year after year about ILO Conventions, I will just refer to the night work issue before this year's Conference. There are in all three Conventions concerning the night work of women, which have been denounced by 12 member States. Also, the Underground Work (Women) Convention, 1935 (No. 45) has been denounced by 8 member States. And the Night Work (Bakeries) Convention, 1925 (No. 20) has been denounced by 6 member States.

The logical conclusion would point to some need for deregulation. It is true that the conference is now considering the adoption of a Protocol to the Night Work (Women) Convention, (Revised), 1948 (No. 89), with a view to rendering it more flexible. But the Conference is at the same time considering the adoption of a General Night Work Convention which is something the ILO has not had so far and which appears to be quite out of tune with present national trends, at least in highly industrialised countries, which use production processes for which night work is a condition sine qua non. And the Nordic employers are, I must say, not a little annoyed with the Office reports on the subject, according to which all night work is by nature hazardous. That is simply not true. What we risk is obviously having yet another Convention added to the so-called International Labour Code which at best only very few member States will ever ratify.

Something has to be done with a view to directing the future technical work of this great body into channels where it can bear better fruit. Several interesting suggestions to that effect are contained in the report of the Governing Body's Working Party on Standards which was published two years ago. These suggestions should not be forgotten.

Mr. VASURATNA (Employers' delegate, Thailand) – it is a pleasure for me to be among honourable delegates to the International Labour Conference today to witness the commemoration on of the 70th anniversary of the International Labour Organisation.

First of all, allow me to congratulate the President on his election to the presidency of this 76th Session of the Conference. On behalf of the Employers' Confederation of Thailand, of which I am President, I am more than confident that the President's skilful leadership will certainly bring success to the Conference.

May I begin with a review of the Director-General's Report, Recovery and employment. It calls for a global approach to set the pace for the world's economic and social development through structural adjustment for growth and equity; this is a natural consequence of the ILO's High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment, held in November 1987, dealing with the employment and social aspects of structural adjustment programmes for the next decade of development.

The ILO's major concern, to create a basis for economic co-operation in order to tackle the current international disparities, is most appreciated. What I am rather sceptical of is the efficacy of the structural adjustment strategy described in the Director-General's Report. I wonder whether it can be implemented successfully.

Some developing countries are still struggling to do away with the protectionism imposed by certain economically powerful countries of the West. Economic and trade protectionism may have been justified in the past. Today the scenario has changed to a great extent owing to technological advances, although there are still some small difficulties in the area of technology transfer. There is co-operation between rich and poor countries reaching towards a common goal of prosperity and social well-being. The remaining problems are due not so much to economic maladjustment among the countries of the world, but rather to malpractices on the part of certain economically powerful countries towards their trading partners.

Take Thailand in the 1980s as a case in point, if you will. We have in fact followed rather strictly most, if not all, the strategies recommended in the Director-General's Report. What a coincidence! For example, devaluation of the Thai baht was announced in the early 1980s. Our monetary and fiscal policies were introduced at the same period; to curb the imbalance in external payments and keep up with appropriate domestic consumption. This stabilisation policy has somehow managed to operate successfully until the present day. The Government has played a vital role in liberalising trade for export enterprises. More incentives are offered to attract external investment.

The result of our structural adjustment has borne fruit over the few years it has been in operation.

Thus, since 1988 Thailand has had the potential to become "Asia's Fifth Tiger", following the Republic of Korea, Taiwan (China), Hong Kong and Singapore.

However, not all is a matter for pride. Our labour market promotion is still poorly organised. Rural underdevelopment persists. Our educational system to prepare the labour force for the market is still in the course of improvement. Our distribution wealth-plan is not effective enough; in fact, ironically it has worsened owing to the growing predominance of Bangkok.

My point is that, despite our structural adjustment so far, the overall situation as regards employment and equity in Thailand remains unsatisfactory. Perhaps the implementation of structural adjustment will work best in the metropolitan area. Although the efficient use of resources never comes about soon enough in any given society, however, it is not necessary to cast doubt on capitalism as such. The Government must be alert and ready to take the responsibility.

In this coming decade, one of our viable alternative strategies is to encourage and promote the development of both physical and human resources. The tripartite system will be more closely co-ordinated to improve the employment situation. The Employers' Confederation of Thailand (ECOT) will work in conjunction with both the Government and the employee's institutions, and our common goal is to achieve economic stabilisation and social equality.

The principle of structural adjustment is by all means necessary. Each country has its limits, however. Nevertheless, the idea of a global approach to the problem is appropriate, particularly in regard to the elimination of international protectionism. The equity goal referred to in the report should also be on a global scale.

Last but not least, in the time remaining I would like to touch on the two important reports concerning night work and safety in the use of chemicals. We sincerely submit to the ILO's wisdom to regulate the standards of working conditions as the world moves inevitably toward industrialisation. As change in the world system varies from one country to another, any measures or standards required should be formulated flexibly to prevent complication of practices. We hope that industrialised and developing countries alike will find no difficulty in the application of such standards, thus avoiding any possibility of discrimination. The solution may not be simple, although every country must be alert to these emerging requirements.

Original – Spanish: Mr. ARTHUR ERRAZURIZ (Minister for Labour and Social Welfare, Chile) – At the outset of my statement, I should like to extend my sincere congratulations to Mr. Nkomo on his well-deserved election of the presidency of this session of the International Labour Conference. I should also like to extend my congratulations to the Director-General of the Office for the excellent preparations he has made to ensure the success of this Conference. I have no doubt that it will give us – who hold the responsibility for the political and social fate of our respective countries – much food for thought.

I have been participating in the ILO discussions for many years and I believe that I am speaking from this rostrum for the last time since the Government, which I have had the honour of representing, is ending a period of fruitful labour which started out rescuing Chile from the totalitarian threat; it introduced a series of profound reforms of our political, economic and social structures which have permitted our country to make great progress towards justice and freedom and is taking its bow with the establishment of a fully democratic process based upon elections which will take place next December.

We have not failed to inform this forum of any of these steps we have taken, which have led to the re-establishment of the democratic system, because we believe in co-operation which has always fired relations between my government and this organisation.

We have always fulfilled our constitutional commitments but, in spite of this and with few exceptions, we have encountered misunderstanding and sometimes violent opposition.

This attitude is understandable on the part of those who base their action and found their power on the constant crushing of freedoms but incomprehensive on the part of those who should be our allies in the great crusade of forging a destiny of freedom and well-being for Chile.

In spite of all this, we persevere in our task, defying all critics and responding to all attacks, confident that we are contributing to the future greatness of our country and the safety of our children.

We are coming to the end of this road, and I can see a look of disbelief on the faces of those who never failed to attack us; it is the same look of disbelief we see on the faces of those who come to our remote country and see that we are on the brink of overcoming underdevelopment and poverty.

Our road has not been easy but we cannot reconstruct democracy if first we do not eliminate the causes of its destruction: lack of freedom, injustice and poverty.

It is for this reason, that, in the political field, we must carry through a thorough process of institutional reform, thus creating free, stable and modern democracy in line with economic and social progress. The constitutional reforms are an important stage in this process; these will be submitted to a plebiscite next month and will ensure institutional stability, which is vital if our country is to move forward and achieve a climate of harmony between all Chileans.

The country lived through decades of a gradual, sometimes imperceptible erosion of individual liberties. Political liberty was not seen to keep pace with day-to-day liberties. Finally, the growing power of the state dragged the country down the dangerous slope of plans and ideologies alien to our national character and brought us to the brink of losing every vestige of liberty.

Our country is now going down the path of regaining our lost freedoms. Beyond taking on the mere task of administration, we have embarked on a historic drive for the freedom which is deeply embedded in our collective consciousness. Justice can only be based upon a prospect of deep foundation for the society for the good of our country. Along this road, we have been completing, one by one, each of these stages without being diverted by political pressures and without falling into immobilism. This has been a slow process adjusted to the requirements of the country and the interest of the Chilean people, which culminated in the plebiscite of 5 October last year.

In the economic sphere the task of our Government has been enormous in challenges as well as in results. When in 1973 the armed forces assumed the leadership of the country, Chile suffered a serious inflationary spiral which was estimated to be around one thousand per cent a year. Production was completely paralysed, the rural areas were abandoned, and shortages of supplies worsened daily, as a consequence at the complete destruction of the country's productive system.

Chile was becoming the object of an ideological experiment, but in reality it was a dramatic and perfectly conscious process of destruction of the economic and social structures in order to set up the conditions to bring about a totalitarian state.

Thus, over the past years, we had to reverse this process under the guidance of solid principles of subsidiarity, of respect for the right of property and free enterprise in the economic field. There have been important obstacles, such as the two international recessions which we had to face, but we came through successfully – and today our economy is emerging as one of the most prosperous ones on the continent and as an example of a nation which is rapidly moving across the thresholds of development.

Chile today is growing at an average rate of 6 per cent, with perfectly controlled inflation at levels of 15 per cent, with a sustained growth of real wages and a rate of unemployment of about 7 per cent.

The Government of Chile has constantly worked in the conviction that the economic development of a country has no meaning if it is not at the service of social progress. It is for this reason that throughout these years, we have given an impetus to a substantial network of subsidies and direct aids which have made it possible to decrease drastically the level of poverty of our country.

All these changes would have been impossible to bring into force if there had not been such noteworthy economic growth in recent years.

In this respect, I must refer to the importance my Government has given at all times to the task of promoting economic development without forgetting the employment potentialities of my country, or in fact enhancing them. We can affirm that the process of recovery, after the two international recessions which affected our economy, was characterised by a policy of structural readjustment, of stabilisation, guided towards investment and the creation of new jobs. During the past year alone, almost 300,000 new jobs have been created in my country.

All this has made it possible to reduce unemployment in the country in spite of the progressive increase of the labour force together with an improvement in real wages which, during the past few years, were increased to 6.5 per cent a year.

My Government has placed special emphasis on the creation of new jobs because we believe that the best kind of investment is one which is based on human capital. Unemployment causes serious ethical, social and psychological problems to those it affects, and it is also a huge obstacle in any strategy aimed to promote growth and higher productivity.

Furthermore, we have learnt from experience that it is only with high employment levels that it is possible to attain better working conditions and higher protection for workers, and it is only with high employment levels that it is possible to exert pressure for the improvement of wages. It is only in these conditions that there can be stability of employment and that the worker can enjoy true freedom in the choice of his job, and it is collective bargaining that allows him to achieve results that are just and appropriate to his interests.

We are not only interested in an increase in the employment level. My country, during the past few years, has also been constantly concerned with the improvement of the quality of working conditions.

The worker is much more than a mere factor of production and more than a simple link in the production chain. The worker does not only aspire to an appropriate wage, he also seeks to progress as a person, to improve his skills, and to integrate himself more into the firm as well as to be part of progress and social dynamism.

As a result of the above, my Government, by means of the national vocational training and employment services created in 1976, has implemented a series of vocational training policies for the various types of workers. As a result of the Company Programme alone, more than 1,200,000 workers have received vocational training to date. Furthermore, we have directed our interests mainly towards young people and we have successfully put into practice scholarship programmes and programmes to promote the hiring of apprentices by means of tax incentives.

In the field of labour legislation in general and trade union legislation in particular, the Chilean Government has taken significant steps to perfect labour laws and to bring them more into line with the international standards outlined in the ILO Conventions.

In May, we started the legislative procedures to make an important modification to the Labour Code by further broadening the concept of freedom of association, making it possible to create trade union centres as organisations of a higher level; we have also increased the scope of collective bargaining. In addition to the above, the Government has advanced in its study of whether to ratify the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), a subject that no other government was interested in considering.

We cannot fail to mention the numerous systems created to facilitate the acquisition of shares by the workers. This method, that we have called popular capitalism, has made it possible for 240,000 Chileans to participate in the economic development of the country and also in the firms in which they work, thus creating new incentives which, without a doubt, are fundamental for the attainment of increasingly harmonious labour relations.

During the past few years, the Government I represent has acted with the intention of creating an increasingly free and just society in our country, one where freedom is not confined to the exercise of political rights alone but extends to every other aspect of community life. Thus, we have overcome the numerous obstacles and arbitrary practices which violated freedom of association and freedom of recruitment, just as we have strengthened trade union and economic freedom.

We are aware of the risks involved in a society without justice. When in a community certain imperatives of justice are forgotten, society ends up seeking them in the wrong ways. Experience has shown us that justice is therefore not only an ethical imperative, but an essential prerequisite for the preservation of a free society.

Therefore my Government, far from being satisfied with promoting freedom and achieving high indices of economic development, has implemented many policies to ensure that these achievements bring about better social development and greater justice.

The action undertaken by my Government during these years has been silent but effective. Without grandiloquent promises, it has been a Government that has achieved results. Without indulging in populism, we have improved living conditions for workers; without boasting of our successes, we have undertaken an economic development process of vast scope; without demagoguery, we have strictly complied with our international obligations.

There has been a radical reform of our institutions and production systems. From a political system in a state of crisis, characterised by a formal democracy confined to meeting political concerns, we have built a genuinely democratic society, in which every aspect of daily life is pervaded by the inestimable value of liberty. This Government has been the first in our history which has given an impetus to a radical process of restoring individual freedoms.

However, despite the unfair accusations levelled against us during these years, we are helped by the certainty that we have now laid the groundwork for economic and social development in our country, in the framework of a stable modern democracy.

We are no longer concerned with the lack of understanding displayed or the attacks made against us on so many occasions. Our efforts have been amply rewarded, by a Chile which has fully recovered, with an economic, social and political basis solid enough to perform a task of unforeseeable dimensions in the coming years.

We are proud to announce that next year the Government which I represent will turn over the administration of the nation, with the satisfaction of having made huge strides towards an increasingly free, just and developed society in Chile. When passions and attacks subside, this will be recognised by history and gratefully acknowledged by our children.

Twenty-sixth sitting

President: Mr. Nkomo

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

The PRESIDENT – We shall now continue our discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General.

Ms. ISAK BIHI (Government delegate, Somalia) – On behalf of the Somali delegation to the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference and on my own behalf, I should like to congratulate Mr. John Nkomo most heartily and sincerely on his well-deserved and unanimous election to the presidency of this session of the Conference. My delegation is confident that under his experienced leadership and patient guidance our Conference will be crowned with success. Our congratulations and good wishes are also directed to the Vice-Presidents and other distinguished officers of the Conference.

I wish also to extend our heartfelt congratulations to Mr. Michel Hansenne on his appointment as Director-General of the ILO. I am convinced that Mr. Hansenne will, with the co-operation of the member States, contribute to our progress in the labour and social fields. I can assure Mr. Hansenne of my Government's full support and understanding.

I will not fail also to pay tribute to Mr. Francis Blanchard, whose 38 years of service in the ILO, including 15 years as Director-General have contributed to the effectiveness of our Organisation. I extend our thanks and appreciation to Mr. Blanchard for the masterly manner in which he managed the various activities of the ILO and the close attention he gave to African social problems. I wish Mr. Blanchard and his family good personal health and happiness.

It is now 70 years since the First Session of the International Labour Conference was convened in Washington in 1919. We mark this 70th anniversary with considerable satisfaction in what has been achieved so far. There is no denying that our Organisation, like other organisations in the United Nations system, has passed through difficult stage. However, because of its unique tripartite constituency and its committed mandate to improve the working conditions, the well-being and the standard of living of all mankind, the ILO has prevailed and has even advanced the principles embodied in the Constitution and in the Declaration of Philadelphia.

On the occasion of this 70th anniversary, the Director-General has presented a valuable Report which is under discussion in this Conference.

The world economy has experienced in the 1980s a prolonged and lingering recession and serious problems which continue to beset it. This economic recession hit Africa hardest during the 1980-84 period. The overall employment situation in the region worsened and labour market adjustments took on different forms. Austerity measures were put into practice as a means of achieving stabilisation and structural adjustment. I must emphasise that in many cases these measures resulted in severe setbacks with pronounced hardships for a sizeable proportion of the populations concerned. We should always keep in mind that development is not only characterised by the growth of production and income, but it also necessitates, and is closely linked with, the evolution and transformation of economic and social structures.

However, there have been some improvements since the early years of the 1980s, but even positive news generally tends to be qualified. It is the responsibility of the international community to work towards creating a predictable and supportive international economic environment. There is no question that global economic recovery is a necessary condition for solving employment problems everywhere.

We welcome the initiative taken by the ILO to establish a dialogue on the social aspects of adjustment with the international institutions involved in the programme with the aim of considering more carefully the consequences of international trade practices and financial and monetary policies on employment and poverty. We appreciate the efforts made by the ILO in convening the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment, which provided a forum for exchange of views on the issues and put forward a set of recommendations for both developing and industrialised countries. The ILO should be commended for taking such bold action to redress the negative impact of the adjustment programme.

One of the major problems facing Somalia is the provision of productive employment to its rapidly expanding labour force. The inability of the economy to generate adequate employment opportunities, coupled with the increasing number of persons seeking jobs, has led to a growing disparity between demand for and supply of, labour. Thus, extended unemployment is increasing despite efforts by the Government to reduce it. Significant shortages of skilled and trained manpower exist side by side with large pools of unemployed youths.

The Director-General has rightly proposed in this Report that growth should go hand in hand with job creation. This area has also received high priority from my Government. Two policy initiatives adopted in recent years have contributed to the country's economic recovery. The first is the privatisation policy. The Government has recently enacted a law which not only permits but also encourages the privatisation of the main branches of the national economy, most notably the banks and insurance companies. It also welcomes foreign investment in order to make proper use of the country's rich natural resources. The second is the establishment of self-employment promotion schemes in the agriculture and fisheries sectors as a means of generating employment and increasing production.

I should like to emphasise that the alarming problems relating to unemployment and poverty in developing countries in general, and in the least developed countries in particular, can only be resolved through the adoption of programmatic policies and action-oriented programmes by the countries concerned, with active and increased support from the ILO within the framework of international co-operation.

Turning now to the other items on the agenda this year, the International Labour Conference finalises the process of partially revising the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107), with a view to the adoption of a new Convention. In spite of being a single ethnic country, Somalia shares the views of the international community that the integrationist approach to these peoples should be reconsidered in order for them to achieve their legitimate aspirations of preserving their unique heritage and identity. My delegation also welcomes the inclusion by the Governing Body of the other two technical items on the agenda of the present session of the Conference, namely night work and safety in the use of chemicals at work. We hope that this world assembly of labour will examine broadly in its first discussion these two major issues, which are affecting the health and safety of millions of workers around the world.

We express our appreciation to the Director-General of the ILO for the efforts he has made in monitoring the situation of Arab workers in Palestine and other Arab territories occupied by Israel and submitting to the Conference a report on the subject in conformity with the resolutions adopted by the International Labour Conference in 1974 and 1980 concerning the violations of trade union freedoms and rights, and the implications of Israeli settlements in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories in connection with the situation of Arab workers. The Report clearly describes the violations of freedom of movement of trade unionists, as well as discrimination in access to vocational training and employment opportunities.

The occupation authorities are continuing to use force to suppress Arab workers and employers in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories, despite the fact that the International Labour conference has on many occasions, within the framework of the basic standards and principles set out in the preamble of the ILO Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia, condemned such inhumane practices and called on the occupation authorities to stop the establishment of Israeli settlements in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories.

The recent events, that is to say the heroic uprising of the Palestinian people in the occupied territories, have indicated how critically that situation dominates the entire life of the population in the territories. It is a fact well known to all of us that the socio-economic situation in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories continues to deteriorate and that the fundamental rights of workers and employers are openly and flagrantly violated. We therefore appeal to all countries throughout the world to take a positive stand in putting an end to these inhumane and brutal practices. The Somali Government energetically condemns the policies exercised by the occupation authorities and considers that the fundamental rights and freedoms of the Arab workers and employers in those territories can only be guaranteed by the liberation of the territories from the illegal occupation of the Zionist authorities. The Director-General has also underlined in the report that the various recommendations contained in his report to the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference were not implemented. It is evident that the occupation authorities are not prepared or willing to respect their obligations towards the basic standards and the principles and aims of our Organisations.

In accordance with article 17 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the Governments, Employers and Workers of the Arab Group have submitted to the present session of the International Labour Conference a resolution concerning the protection of the rights and freedoms of Arab workers and employers in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories. The sponsors of this draft resolution are fully confident that all those who respect human dignity and freedoms will, as in the past, support the adoption of the resolution as a minimum contribution to the elimination of social injustice and in solidarity with the employers and workers whose rights and freedoms are denied.

On the labour and social situation in South Africa and Namibia, my Government has carefully studied the Special Report of the Director-General on the application of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia. We have noted with great concern the deteriorating situation in South Africa and the various restrictions on Black workers and their trade unions resulting from the policy of apartheid adopted by the South African regime, which represents a system of institutionalised racism. The Somali Government continues to speak out resolutely against apartheid and to condemn its policies of racial discrimination. We also continue to advocate the strict and rigorous implementation of the mandatory sanctions adopted by the United Nations Security Council. Such sanctions are the most effective means available to the international community to dislodge the apartheid system by peaceful means.

The Somali Government strongly supports the implementation of Security Council resolution 435 which will bring about the independence of Namibia, whose people have suffered for a long time from the evils of apartheid and the illegal occupation by South Africa. The recent developments taking place in Namibia under the auspices of the United Nations are promising despite the attempts by the South African regime to jeopardise the whole process.

In conclusion, we hope that the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference will, through its discussions, arrive at conclusions that will be beneficial to us all.

Original – Farsi: Mr. HOOBAKHT (Employers' delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran) – In the Name of Allah, the Merciful, the Compassionate! "But ah! thou Soul at peace! Return unto thy Lord, content in His good pleasure! Enter thou among my bondmen! Enter thou my Garden!" The Holy Koran.

The 76th Session of the International Labour Conference is being held at a time when the Moslems of the world are mourning the loss of their staunchest supporter, the great man whose struggles, devout sacrifices and decisive leadership revived the true Islam of Mohammad – peace be with him – in contemporary history.

Although the world's Moslems have been deprived of their great supporter, his sacred soul has enabled the Islamic Revolution to transcend geographical boundaries and thus to spread to occupied Palestine, to flourish world-wide into the strongholds of blasphemy and to toll the bell for the eminent death of arrogance in the world as embodied in "the Great Satan" and in "the homeland of colonialism", while further strengthening the determination of the world's oppressed nations to seek their much-needed liberation.

I wish to express my sincere condolences to all the Moslems of the world for their great loss.

Recent sessions of the International Labour Conferences seem to have taken a new course in their discussion of the world's current fundamental socio-economic questions. This trend within the International Labour Office may well be attributable to the fact that a majority of peoples in the less-developed parts of the world face the consequences of ever-increasing poverty and deprivation. These problems require serious attention indeed.

According to formal international statistics, the world population in 1986 had reached 4,290 million, 82 per cent of which, namely 3,598 million, resided in the developing countries. If the rate of demographic growth remains constant, that is at 1.9 per cent, the population of the developing countries will reach 6,700 million by the year 2000.

In contrast, the annual per capita GDP in those countries has been rapidly declining from 3.9 per cent in the 1965-73 period to 3.1 per cent in 1986. According to tentative international estimates, it reached only 1.7 per cent in 1987.

Another look at the statistics provided by international agencies reveals that over the 16 year period between 1970 and 1986, the debt of the developing countries grew from 15.8 to 20.9 per cent. Such an increase in this debt further emphasises the need to introduce a new international economic order.

Thus demographic growth, along with the decline in annual per capita GDP and the escalation of the foreign debt, have given rise to further difficulties for the Third World peoples. The Director-General's Report reflects the new attitude taken by the international organisations, namely that the international community cannot, and should not, remain indifferent to the deteriorating situation in the Third World countries lest the existing difficulties become exacerbated, thereby thrusting larger numbers of oppressed nations deeper into poverty and further worsening their economies.

Employment admittedly is a major element of social, economic, financial and monetary development policies, whether short- or long-term, and employment policies and objectives, as stated in the Director-General's Report, do play a key role in ensuring a fairer distribution of income, securing social justice and establishing economic security. However, contrary to the quotation cited in the preface to the said Report, we believe that human beings should be the end of development over and above the means of development, and there is good evidence to that effect in many countries, too.

The world economy has emerged from a period of instability and insecurity in the 1980s. Major industrialised countries have deemed it legitimate to take advantage of, and utilise, all kinds of means to secure their own positions in the world economy. The monopolisers of the world's resources have thus found a path to their own recovery, but this will inevitably result in sharper contrasts in living standards even within the wealthier countries.

Raw material prices are fixed by Western countries in the world markets through trusts and cartels imposed upon the exporting countries to further rob them of their resources.

At the same time, major commodity prices are set by the industrialised countries through their own enterprises with no government control.

According to formal international statistics, the prices of developing country mineral and metal raw materials have dropped from + 2.5 per cent in 1973 to - 4.2 per cent in 1986, while in the same period the prices of industrialised country manufactured goods have increased from + 4.6 per cent to + 19.8 per cent.

Deliberate manipulation of exchange rate fluctuations is periodically carried out by the major industrialised countries to enhance their own positions. International monopolisers and exploiters calculate and take the measures required to expedite further abuse in international trade to their own benefit.

The country that issues the dollar controls formal international exchange rates through the arbitrary release of notes. Moreover, when the industrialised countries are not sufficiently satisfied with raw material prices, already reduced by their own price-fixing bodies, they simply resort to exchange rate manipulation or other profiteering action leading to a further deterioration of economic conditions in the raw material exporting countries.

Provision of international credit by the rich and industrialised countries to the developing ones with a view to making the latter purchase the industrial commodities and capital goods of the former, in addition to the monopolised purchase of raw materials and agricultural goods of the developing countries, have exacerbated the latter's foreign debt.

In consequence, and as it has been referred to by the Director-General in his Report, the debtor countries have become more and more unable to repay their debts in the face of their voluminous compilation, and are thus under increasing pressure to give in to the policies imposed upon them by the creditor countries.

I wish to reiterate here that finding a practicable solution to the debt crisis which would make it possible for the debtor countries to repay their debts, is all the more necessary for the restoration of human dignity and the eradication of neo-exploitation, particularly as a sign of hope for more stable prospects for future generations of the Third World countries.

As stated in the Director-General's Report, lower investment rates are another cause for economic recession in the Third World. It is noteworthy that investment rates in the African and Latin American countries were 20 per cent to 25 per cent lower in 1986 as compared to 1980.

In such circumstances, it could well be demonstrated that relative recovery may follow in the Third World countries, if the correlation among development, expansion of investment, and economic recovery in those countries were taken into account, along with a choice of appropriate economic policies that should accompany the promotion of self-determination as a development principle.

Over ten years have elapsed since the victory of the Islamic Revolution in Iran. Our Moslem people have experienced many ups and downs during that period. Neither the various hindrances and intrigues, nor the imposed war could infiltrate the resistance of the Moslem nation of Iran which has been determined to achieve the objectives of the Islamic Revolution, and which has overcome all these conspiracies.

The Islamic Republic of Iran has successfully adopted structural adjustment policies and taken positive measures to that end, relying upon domestic expertise and efficient managers. These policies were referred to in the Director-General's Report as new approaches.

Large industrial and agricultural projects become operational in our country at a time when an all-out war was imposed against our people by "the Great Satan" at the hands of its allied agents.

The PRESIDENT – I have appealed to the meeting to avoid using terms that are not appropriate to this meeting and I would like to request you to avoid using those terms. You may continue.

Original – Farsi: Mr. HOOBAKHT – Nevertheless, our Moslem nation achieved the highest level of political and spiritual growth under the guidance of a great leader; this growth brought with it new values for our Moslem people, and put an end to the political and economic influences of the enemies of Islam.

Managers in our country pursue socio-political development objectives with a view to improving living standards, creating employment, and securing sufficient income levels for their society.

Special economic priorities that have already been established appear in the Director-General's Report as reasonable and effective solutions that should be applied in the implementation of economic and structural adjustment policies, although the Director-General has dwelt on this matter a little too late, for those proposals have repeatedly been reiterated by the Islamic Republic of Iran's delegations at previous sessions of the International Labour Conference but have not, up until now, been heeded.

The increased production of hazardous chemicals has seriously jeopardized the life of mankind. Responsible international bodies alone will not be able to solve the problems of mankind and his difficulties of conscience merely by means of international conventions or generalistic provisions. It is the expansion of the more practical and supervisory functions of the international organisations that may set effective limitations for the countries manufacturing chemical and lethal weapons.

The establishment of an international research institute dealing with the production and application of hazardous chemicals to examine the harmful effects of the mass production of these materials, could, to some extent, prevent an unhealthy increase in their production and their application in the world. Nevertheless, what is more important, is a change in the attitude of managers, who, in the industrialised countries focus their attention only on positive figures on balance sheets, and ignore the fact that humanity cannot be quantified in dollars.

If the International Labour Organisation is to play a role in solving the future world economic crisis, it must be prepared to emphasise how very important it is for the managers of the industrialised world to be, above all else, human.

We are prepared to assist in the realisation of this important aim.

Peace be upon the True followers of Allah.

The PRESIDENT – Let me once more remind the distinguished delegates to use parliamentary language.

Original – Spanish: Mr. VALDES SAENZ (Employers' delegate, Chile) – I should like to begin by congratulating the President on behalf of the delegation of private employers of the Republic of Chile, and in particular the Confederation of Production and Commerce of my country, for his well-deserved election at this very important Conference, a Conference that will inspire us to make progress in the areas covered by the Report of the Director-General, for which we sincerely thank the Director-General.

To call the attention of the world, and in particular the competent economic agents – be these members of the United Nations family, the signatories of the original Bretton Woods treaties, or the governments of the developing countries – to the importance and transcendence of economic recovery for all countries and an increase in employment levels in these countries, in order to deal with a new decade of development and progress, with peace and economic growth in better conditions of justice and equitable distribution of the benefits of that development and growth, is an unavoidable responsibility.

The statement contained in the preface of Part I of the Report that "human beings are both the means and the end of economic development" is a self-evident truth that is often forgotten behind the dehumanising figures in employment statistics, reduction in growth, inequitable situations that affect the relative prices of export commodities of the developing countries and so many others; this leads us to repeat the Director-General's statement enthusiastically. It is true that it should be the crux, the permanent guide, the determining core of efforts to be made by this International Labour Organisation in shaping policies and programmes necessary to sustain equitable development in the next decade; and this central axis should be at the service of and dependent on human beings. It should be human beings who enjoy the results of this development, and they cannot be subordinated in true importance, nor should this development be valued above the human dimension, which is the reason for development.

As the representative of a developing country which suffered a very violent slump in its growth rate – a fall which in absolute terms of GNP was perhaps the greatest, or one of the greatest, suffered by any country in any particular period, which took place in 1982 in Chile as a consequence of the excessive indebtedness of the country and the violent deterioration in the terms of international trade, all of this due principally to the world recession – Chile has genuine experience with this problem.

The experience of Chile – which had to endure this fall and which has since implemented and applied policies of economic restructuring based on exchange rate policy promoting a growth development model directed towards external markets, strict control of public expenditure and government deficit, maintenance of official and real exchange rates for the development of economic activities, the end to tariff barriers which affect the correct allocation of economic resources within the country, the development of sectors in which the economy and the country present comparative advantages – is broadly positive. The concrete result was a major increase in employment and a significant reduction in national indebtedness.

As a representative of private enterprise in a country that has made a considerable and sustained effort over many years to overcome this crisis and to get back on to the road to economic development, consolidating six years of growth at satisfactory rates, we believe that we are in a position to make authoritative and original comments on the subjects which were covered by the Director-General's report.

The process experienced in Chile is unique in that private enterprise played a fundamental role in this, assuming its responsibility as a main agent of development. Employers in particular have accepted a commitment to the country, to its development, to its workers, and to its enterprises in order to move the country forward in order to achieve appreciable economic results.

It is true, as was said by the Director-General in his Report, that one of the main lessons learnt during this decade is that it is an illusion to try and resolve social problems without economic growth. The first common objective should therefore be the recovery of growth capacity in all those areas in the world where there is still recession, and maintaining sustained expansion where recovery has been achieved. In the case of Chile, the cost of the economic recovery achieved, which was very high, was borne and shared by the entire population of the country – the workers, the enterprises and the consumers. Real living standards in the country, for all Chileans, declined sharply in 1982 as a result of the fall in GNP.

This cost, which all Chileans have had to bear is reflected in very high levels of unemployment, for which the Government adopted short-term emergency measures which are no longer in force, and special programmes of minimum employment and employment of heads of households; these measures at one point involved a labour force in these programmes of 500,000 people at the height of the crisis from 1982 onwards. The normalisation of the economy enabled the productive sector, in particular the private productive sector, through the expansion of productive capacity in agriculture, fisheries, mining, and service and industrial export production to attain an increase of productive employment in better working conditions for 1,300,000 Chileans and a real improvement in their wages of 6 per cent in 1988. These figures speak for themselves, considering that the total working population is 4,850,000, in indicating the great efforts put in by Chilean private enterprise thanks to the devotion of employers. Employers, as we said, bore a major part of the cost of the readjustment, which resulted in the bankruptcy and closure of many enterprises lacking the capacity to adapt to the new conditions and economic requirements imposed on them as a result of the consequence of the crisis. The obligation for the majority of surviving enterprises to become more efficient meant that their higher management, their shareholders and their owners had to put in more resources and more effort by way of devotion, dedication, commitment and risk-taking.

Private enterprise in Chile has progressed as a direct result of the very serious crisis of 1982-83, which made it better prepared, more mature, fitter, with greater resources, capacity and confidence in itself, more determination to face and overcome the obstacles to economic development in the country.

I should also like to refer to the organised efforts made from the outset by the Confederation of Production and Trade in its role as a private enterprise union, to overcome or alleviate the serious unemployment problem affecting the national economy and particularly the labour sector. As this Organisation has been informed, the Confederation of Production and Trade set up an Employment Commission which put forward specific solutions and proposals to develop initiatives that would stimulate employment, generate new employment and raise the level of employment obtaining at the outset of its work.

The results achieved by the Commission, which co-operated closely with measures taken by the Government, including a National Employment Secretariat to tackle the problem head on, can be described as broadly satisfactory. A series of proposals put forward by the Commission were implemented, among the most noteworthy being the competition to think up ways of increasing employment. Over 1,300 entries were generated by the competition, which was open to anyone with new ideas on employment.

Many of the ideas were applied and are now being fully developed, providing a stream of productive work and development in our country. One example is the seaweed farms in the north of the country. It is also worth mentioning that a large number of these ideas, many of them entries in the national employment competition, have been published in a book.

We were anxious that the country should understand the great efforts that have been made. During 1988, therefore, the Confederation of Production and Trade ran a broad public relations campaign, sending its leaders, in particular its President, Don Manuel Felliú, to most of the major cities of the country, especially the regional capitals, explaining the commitments of private enterprise and private employers to work for the development of Chile, pledging continued efforts in this direction and future action by private enterprise to engineer progress.

This campaign increased the country's confidence in their productive economic agents, producing more involvement with the effort undertaken by enterprises and economic productive agents and greater stability and faith in the future development of Chile.

In order to continue on the path of development, once we have overcome the very high cost of structural readjustment, it is a basic prerequisite that realistic trade terms are maintained, which will not damage economies in the developing countries that have already suffered.

It is therefore essential to seek mechanisms to prevent the development of protectionist practices affecting the free flow of international trade. For this reason the developed countries must keep their markets open so that the developing countries can export and sell their products in these markets, free access to which is therefore imperative so that the efforts tending to new growth in countries affected by the crisis can lead to positive results.

It is also essential for sustained growth in economic development to maintain the greatest possible stability in economic and labour relations. For this reason a healthy labour policy should try to alter trade union conditions and the realities of the market as little as possible. State regulations should be kept to a minimum and not be abused, as often happened in the past.

To this end, appropriate legislation should be introduced for adjustment that may be necessary at any particular time in order to govern labour relations.

Accordingly, in a spirit of consensus and tripartism, the Confederation of Production and Trade has established labour commissions with technical representatives from two of the main trade union federations to work in conjunction with the Confederation on a series of matters of interest to both sectors. This involves labour regulations and other areas of mutual interest.

This initiative has already enabled us to reach specific agreement and a common approach on various matters of mutual interest to be implemented later – the results of action by the Federation of Production and Commerce over two years ago and reflected in the Declaration of Jahuel. The Declaration expressed the willingness of private Chilean employers to co-operate with the labour sector on those points of interest which would allow both sectors to move forward and to maintain and sustain our ongoing development. We look favourably therefore on all studies that would help us to achieve the ratification of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) which will contribute to greater stability and more harmonious development in national productivity.

These areas, as mentioned by the Director-General, should guide the work of this Organisation and that of the Conference.

We wish, however, to express our displeasure that certain international organisations continue to protest the so-called non-representation of the Workers' delegation of my country. As the Conference will know, this is a subject which has been exhausted over the past 15 years. The truth is that the procedure of appointing the Chilean Workers' delegation whatever its composition as the ILO itself has seen, has been the subject of continuing improvement.

Therefore, it is impossible to ignore the Workers' delegation, which has participated with great interest in the deliberations of this Organisation.

There are of course other sectors of workers in the country also representative of their trade unions who, from choice, decided against membership of the delegation; that is, they excluded themselves from participation therein, which is regrettable from the point of view of healthy coexistence and reconciliation among Chileans.

We think that it is an injustice to workers in Chile to continue to refer to this issue. Those who are objecting and protesting against the members of the Chilean Workers' delegation could have been members of the delegation if they had so wished. It was their own decision not to participate. They preferred to criticise and to disqualify those who did assume the responsibility.

The delegation of Employers of Chile, finally would like to stress the fact that our country has faithfully carried out all of its international commitments. In exchange for this we ask for the basic respect of the rest of the international community in the situations to be faced this year, in which we will be called upon to make an important decision – a decision will be taken with the seriousness and responsibility of that of the plebiscite on 5 October 1988.

At this time, the country has reached major agreements on the Constitution. The moderation, responsibility and maturity which has been demonstrated by all sectors in arriving at these fundamental agreements is the guarantee of the future stable development of Chile in conditions of independence, sovereignty and seriousness which has marked its entire 179 years of existence.

Proud of its history, aware of its responsibility and confident in its future, Chile is prepared to meet the challenges of the future.

Mr. KERKINOS (Government delegate, Greece) – Mr. President, on behalf of the Greek delegation and on my own behalf, allow me, Sir, to extend to you our warmest congratulations on your election to this high office of President of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. We are confident, that you will conduct our deliberations successfully and bring our work to a happy and fruitful conclusion. Our congratulations also go to all the other Officers of the Conference. And may I seize this opportunity to address to our new Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, our best wishes upon his election to head the International Labour Organisation. I wish to assure him of the unswerving support of the Greek Government and of my delegation.

The main theme of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference, "Recovery and employment", is surely one of the major and continuing concerns of both the international organisations and the governments of all countries, whatever their level of economic development.

Only when we are able to halt the impact of the present difficulties through international co-operation, and pave the way to the economic and social well-being and progress of our countries, will the question of economic recovery and employment no longer be a priority. The International Labour Organisation, this year celebrating its 70th anniversary, has made a major contribution in setting up this international co-operation.

During this session we are fortunate enough to have at our disposal an excellent working tool: the Report of the Director-General of the International Labour Office.

Participants will be most appreciative of the serious analysis and detailed information the Director-General has provided, by examining very different areas. We recognise his realistic outline of the prospects for coping with the existing perennial problems.

In the present circumstances and for most of our countries, irrespective of the level of their economic development, dealing with unemployment and achieving an increase in employment are the main aims and priorities of economic and social policies.

The existence of millions of unemployed in the world today is a challenge: a challenge because, at a time when the ideas of economic democracy and social participation are becoming more widespread, and the question is raised of how to work and produce better, a large sector of the population is deprived of the fundamental right to work.

For all societies, the cost of unemployment is extremely high. The fact that the full human potential cannot be achieved has a negative influence on the overall economic life of our countries.

High unemployment means a considerable reduction in the level of production, and at the same time a lowering in revenue from taxes and social service payments. Considerable resources which could be utilized productively are, on the contrary, devoted to helping the unemployed, to provide for their social security and their re-training, which in turn increases the deficit of the public sector and kindles inflation.

This vicious circle of inflation-unemployment could well result in a polarised society, one part being made up of people with stable and well-paid jobs, and another of people on the fringe of society – seasonal workers, the underemployed, or unemployed. Low performance levels of national economies in the field of employment render this risk very evident.

But in spite of these pessimistic observations, there is no doubt that major progress has been made in recent years in a good number of countries, and particularly in member States of the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) and of the European Community.

Reduction of the deficit in the public sector, improvement of the balance of payments, and control of inflation have greatly contributed to restoring more stable economic conditions and creating a new climate of confidence. The increase in the gross domestic product (GDP) in the above-mentioned areas more investments – particularly those related to a policy of restructuring and modernisation – and improvement in productivity, mean that we can expect more positive results in the area of employment, and thus a lowering in unemployment levels bequeathed to us by the last prolonged economic recession.

In spite of the positive trend of macro-economic indicators, the international economy cannot claim to have attained the necessary conditions for a permanent recovery, which must take place before we can achieve a satisfactory level of permanent and productive employment.

The international economic environment remains extremely delicate, and there is always the risk of another prolonged recession.

The perceptive analysis of the Director-General has already emphasised some of the elements which could bear a negative influence on efforts towards recovery and lead us to a new phase of stagnation. The report also underlines the elements which oblige us to establish new international co-operation with a view to setting up a common strategy of employment and development.

The need for a new competitive environment does not exclude, but on the contrary demands, that we work on strengthening multilateral co-operation and solidarity between countries.

The lowering of protectionist barriers and the movement towards the development of a world market should be accompanied by measures for reducing inter-regional inequalities and promoting equal participation in the benefits from the recovery of the world economy.

Today we are even more conscious of the fact that we all share the same problems and that we are interdependent. We realise that, from the economic point of view, there are no islands of protection, either for the strong or for the weak.

With energy and courage we have to face up to structural disparities such as, for example, the gap between North and South, the burden of the foreign debt on the developing countries, and overwhelming demographic, migratory and environmental problems. Otherwise, the hopeful perspectives and emerging tendencies for a recovery of the economic activity may well be halted.

In this common endeavour to overcome stagnation and poverty affecting a large segment of the population of our planet, and at bringing about economic and social modernisation, the European Community of 1992 is shaping a will and the means to participate in a crucial and decisive way.

It goes without saying that this common effort will not succeed if each country does not choose the methods and policies most suitable for reinforcing the development trend.

A stable and uninterrupted increase in economic activity is the only sound basis for the creation of constant and productive employment.

But the extent of the accumulated unemployment and the intense pressure on the supply side of labour – particularly in the developing countries which are faced with the serious problem of the population explosion – call for different macro- and micro-economic measures to be taken simultaneously.

With a view to realising the objectives of the macro-economic policy, the labour market needs to function better and be adapted to the needs both of supply and demand.

The effective equilibrium of supply and demand of labour and increased mobility of the workforce, in combination with incentives for the furthering of the professional training, have been recognised as factors which bear considerable influence on both the increase in productivity and the dynamics of business activity.

With regard to vocational training, it can never be overemphasised; the literature on the subject being extensive, I think that there is no need to elaborate in detail.

In today's conditions when technology is constantly changing, investment in the human factor should be considered at least as important as that in business capital.

The existence of a flexible and well-trained workforce is a prerequisite for a more functional and effective labour market and, at the same time, an essential labour market and, at the same time, an essential factor for the improvement of the competitiveness of our economies.

It is important to acknowledge that a new strategy for economic recovery and employment cannot succeed if social conditions and the social dimension of such a strategy are ignored.

The necessary changes – radical as far as structures and mentalities are concerned – must be carried out at the lowest economic and social cost, while, at the same time, special care is taken for the rights of the workers as far as their work, security and social protection are concerned.

Any kind of national economic policy necessitates a compromise if we are to achieve an equitable sharing in the cost of and benefits from development. Such a compromise between governments and social partners can only come about through dialogue and the consent of the interested parties.

To conclude, I would like to assure you that the Greek Government, in taking up this challenge for a new socio-economic order, will use all means at its disposal for achieving our common objective: social, economic and democratic modernisation.

I would also like to assure that Greece, as the other member States of the European Community, intends to work actively and take any initiative necessary for achieving the ideal of active solidarity between States, and for creating an international society of well-being and continual progress.

Mr. GLADE (Employers' delegate, United States) – Mr. President, the United States Employers' delegation congratulates you on your election to preside over the 76th International Labour Conference and the particularly efficient and just way in which you have guided our deliberations thus far.

The United States employers also send their greetings to Mr. Hansenne and warmly welcome him to his new post. We look forward to working closely with him as he directs the International Labour Office. We enjoyed a very good relationship with his predecessor, Mr. Blanchard, to whom we pay tribute for his many distinguished years of service to this Organisation.

I stand before you somewhat unexpectedly due to the absence of the venerable Mr. Charles Smith. As most of you know, Mr. Smith has served continuously and with distinction as the United States Employers' delegate over the past decade and it is only due to unfortunate circumstances at home that he is not at this rostrum as so many times before. His family and he are in our thoughts and I want to express on his behalf our appreciation of the supportive communications that we have received.

Mr. Smith encouraged me to discuss the reports of the Director-General and the Governing Body to the Conference, particularly because the Director-General has this year focused on the theme of economic recovery and employment, of special importance to the business community of the United States and one on which certainly Mr. Smith would have spoken loudly and clearly. In his spirit, I offer the following constructive remarks.

First, let me be clear. United State business would like to see nothing more than for the ILO to be charting a relevant course for itself as we approach the 21st century. And as the Director-General's Report states, the challenges to the ILO are great: unemployment and underemployment, the changing nature of work, economic transitions, and democratic movements around the world. We are simultaneously examining the past, indeed celebrating 70 years of the ILO, and anticipating the future. But is the ILO truly anticipating events to come, preparing for a new world of work? Or is it dwelling on past changes and bemoaning the reality that the world of work has evolved?

I link two sentences in the Director-General's Report as representative. First, it says the past decade has witnessed a "severe setback in the quest for full employment and social progress to which this organisation has been dedicated since its inception". Second, "a resumption of growth and social policy cannot be attained without a serious effort of adjustment to new realities on the part of both industrialised and developing countries" – and I would add international organisations, as well.

What are these new realities? Well, the litany is familiar: dramatic improvements in global communications, expanding international and regional trading relationships, tremendous international financial movements, technological breakthroughs, particularly at the workplace, and renewed interest in democratic political and economic freedoms.

In addressing these issues, the Report rightly builds on the momentum generated by the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment and the objective of maintaining the social aspects of structural adjustment at the forefront of international concerns.

My delegation offers its full support to this goal. Those whom I represent see an important role for the ILO in this area. However, inasmuch as we generally agree with the report's outline of the problem, we are concerned about some of the perspectives and recommendations of the Office paper which tend toward a prescription for state intervention. We question the realism of the ILO when it drifts toward this view.

For example, the Report refers to the external debt situation of the developing countries. Market-based schemes for debt reduction, successful in countries such as Chile, as we have just heard, are denigrated as "ad hoc efforts", where, it is said, what is needed is a more global solution to the problem. This is not consistent with the truth.

Much of the debt problem, in our view, is due to a lack of confidence in Third World governments by their own citizens, the root-cause of capital flight. Such exodus of the tools for productive, development-oriented investment, has a tremendous negative impact on adjustment. Deposits in overseas banks by citizens of the indebted countries are valued at slightly more than the entire Third World debt to commercial banks. The notion that only a global solution will work, no matter what the problem, be it debt, capital flight, or unemployment, is a recurring one throughout the report. In the case of debt, the global solution of the ILO's is some form of debt relief or rescheduling.

I respectfully suggest that it is precisely growth-oriented free market policies, pursued by national governments, that will prompt the return of these funds, which will provide the capital necessary for self-sustaining economic growth and prosperity.

My delegation believes strongly in structural adjustment policies designed to reduce the role of the State in the economy, to privatise and deregulate the economy, to encourage self-employment, entrepreneurship in the informal sector and to liberalise trade and capital movements. Unfortunately, the ILO's view is that most of these are the ingredients of conventional structural adjustment programmes. In every instance, the report warns against such a simplistic and doctrinaire approach. The implication, of course, is that this has been tried, therefore it is conventional, and does not work. Well, we say that in those cases where a simple, market-oriented approach to development and adjustment has been tried there has been a marked improvement in a country's growth and standard of living. Indeed, many speakers from east and west, north and south have come to this very spot before me, proclaiming economic reforms that aim to infuse into their systems aspects of the market and entrepreneurship. Indeed, the Russian word "perestroika" is now in the international vocabulary. But, it seems by our reading of the Director-General's Report, that the ILO refuses to recognise this reality and instead plods on, thereby reducing its credibility and relevance, claiming that the State must play an important role in such activities as directing the flow of investment and in reallocation of resources and factor mobility.

Well, let us be clear about these nefarious markets. In most cases the reason that a market is not developed is because of government restrictions on that market. A market exist where individuals, including small businessmen, corporations and other economic actors, own property, protected by the government, and trade that property based on a price determined freely by the actors involved. Where there is any impediment to these factors (such as limitation on private ownership, price or wage controls or hindrances on free trade, among other things), there will be inefficiencies and imperfections in the market. The argument that the free market cannot be allowed to operate because the market is poorly developed is circular and nonsensical.

Nearly all these countries have massive black markets or underground economies in everything, from retailing to construction to public transportation. Peruvian economist Hernando De Soto finds that black markets occur whenever governments restrict economic freedom of the individual. For example, to obtain a business licence in Peru took researchers 289 days of full-time activity. This is far too costly for any small businessman.

The claim that local entrepreneurship is weak in these countries is not only false, but borders on being a slur on the many highly motivated people of these less developed countries.

As an example from my country, and in reference to the discussion on the partial revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention 1957 (No 107) presently taking place, a study of the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation economy revealed that the reported median family income on that Reservation was $2,600, with unemployment running at 90 per cent. Fortunately, this is not a complete picture. Operating within the overall economic scheme, mostly hidden from view, exists an extensive informal sector of dynamic self-employed individuals and family units who produce goods and provide services for the benefit of the community and, of course, for their own benefit. The majority - 83 per cent - of reservation households are involved in informal, income-generating activity.

It is thus unfortunate that the ILO continues, unrealistically, to dismiss the potential for employment because, in its view, these jobs are precarious, of low quality and security and less protected.

I do not wish to belabour the critique of the Report of the Director-General. If my delegation were not well familiar with the activities of the Office, such unrealistic and old-fashioned ideas, as those I have noted, would give rise to serious concerns on our part.

Like a phoenix out of the ashes of a divisive resolution at the 1986 Conference has risen a strong programme on structural adjustment, its genesis due in large measure to the untiring efforts of Mr. Francis Blanchard. Considering the theme of the Director-General's Report, I am surprised that more speakers have not remarked on the report of the Governing Body. I would like to highlight the activities of the Governing Body Employment Committee. In our view, this Committee is firmly, and appropriately, on track in working toward improving the realism and relevance of the ILO.

It is in this Committee and its supporting activities in the Office that the debate about structural adjustment is proceeding in a constructive manner, far from labels of "doctrinaire" and "simplistic". The Committee is addressing the fundamental issues of how to mitigate the adverse social effects of structural adjustment where they exist. As necessary ingredients of adjustment, the Committee is examining labour market policies, including flexibility and mobility, education, training and retraining, and wages policy - that is the complete mix of macro and micro measures essential to successful adjustment. In passing, I would note that both the Director-General's Report and the conclusions of the High-Level Meeting highlight the importance of dialogue and social consensus in the formulation and implementation of these measures. Unfortunately, an Employers' resolution that addresses these issues directly continues to receive no support from certain quarters of this house.

As a follow-up to the High-Level Meeting, the Committee is exploring the role of the ILO in discussions with international financial institutions. We support an ILO involvement in the social aspects of these institutions' adjustment programmes.

To this end, we are also pleased to learn of the establishment in the Office of an interdepartmental task force on structural adjustment, which should lead to tangible and challenging results.

We also believe that the ILO should explore the possibility of convening a world conference on training.

In conclusion in our view the ILO should be optimising its potential in the global debate and international action on adjustment and employment creation. But my delegation respectfully suggests that, for the ILO to assert its relevant role on this issue, it must not be seen to be clinging to nor encouraging outmoded and unrealistic concepts of state intervention and an over-reliance on regulation. This trend continues even as we sit here, as we are witnessing in the Committee on Night Work, where we have the real prospect of seeing an ILO instrument that states absolutely that all night work is intrinsically hazardous and perturbs family life. Well, such language in our view is regressive and counter to the goals of development.

The working population of the world looks to the ILO for leadership and bold thinking about the future. Let us not be distracted from real progress on this front.

Mr. BHAGIRUTTI (Workers' delegate, Mauritius) - On behalf of the workers of Mauritius and on my own behalf, I wish to congratulate Mr. John Nkomo on his election as President of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. I am confident that his long experience in industrial relations will enable him to discharge his responsibilities to the satisfaction of all parties concerned. I take this opportunity to congratulate also the two Vice-Presidents.

At the very outset, I also wish to express our hearty congratulations to Mr. Michel Hansenne on his election as Director-General of the ILO. We trust that under his able leadership the ILO will continue to forge ahead on the path traced by the dynamic outgoing Director-General, Mr. Francis Blanchard. My congratulations are also extended to my friend Mr. Heribert Maier, who is well known to the trade union leaders throughout the world, on his appointment as Deputy Director-General of the ILO.

The Report of the Director-General, Recovery and employment, is an important and valuable document, which will help us in our endeavour to achieve full employment and growth in our respective countries.

The Director-General deserves our thanks and appreciation for highlighting the weaknesses and shortcomings in the present economic policies pursued by countries in the North. In spite of sustained growth during the past five years in OECD countries, the developing countries in the Third World are crippled by an increasing debt burden and are plagued by severe economic problems, such as deteriorating terms of trade, a rise in interest rates and protectionism. These are the major problems contributing to the decline in the growth rate of these countries, resulting in massive unemployment, widespread poverty and indebtedness.

In those countries which have had recourse to IMF and World Bank assistance, the workers have had to pay the heavy social cost of adjustment policies, and the most disturbing effect has been a reduction of labour incomes, particularly wages, which have declined by 20 to 30 per cent in real terms, as stated in the Director-General's Report.

The industrialised countries have a great role to play to relieve the Third World countries from the debt crisis. In this connection, I sincerely express my appreciation to the French Government for its bold decision to write off the debt of several African countries, as announced by President Mitterand at a meeting in Dakar, recently.

I hope that other countries in the North will follow suit. We have noted with interest the first steps of the major Powers on disarmament. These developments are encouraging and we fully subscribe to the conclusive Report of the Director-General that the savings which will accrue from military expenditures should be channelled to finance development programmes in the Third World.

I would fail in my duty if I did not give an account of the situation prevailing in my country on the issues mentioned in the Report. Mauritius is one of the rare developing countries which has been able to record sustained economic growth of about 5 per cent annually since 1983 – thanks to the farsightedness of our Government and the valuable contribution of the working class. For over a year, conditions of full employment have prevailed in our country: the rate of unemployment was as low as 4 per cent last year. That range of unemployment is well within the range commonly referred to by economists as frictional unemployment, which is a situation of full employment.

The report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations opens the eyes of all concerned by examining the information and reports submitted under articles 19, 22 and 35 of the Constitution by State Members of the International Labour Organisation on the action taken with regard to Conventions and Recommendations.

The ILO, by virtue of its mandate, its tripartite structure and its long history, is upholding all human rights which fall within its competence and whose enjoyment is still hampered by so many obstacles in the world today.

It is sad to note from the report that many countries are late (sometimes very late) in submitting to the competent authorities the instruments adopted by the Conference. I took note with pain of the observations made by the Committee in the case of my country (paragraph 113 of the report), but later I noticed with some satisfaction from document C.APP./D.4, circulated in the Committee, that in its reply to observations made by the Committee of Experts and other information supplied, the Government of Mauritius has indicated that the instruments adopted at the 60th, 65th and 69th Sessions of the Conference had been submitted to the competent authorities.

I hope that the instruments of the past four sessions will also be submitted to the competent authorities in the near future.

This year the ILO is celebrating its 70th anniversary. I wish to salute the ILO for its valuable achievements as regards the improvement of the conditions of life of the working class throughout the world. I trust that it will continue its standard-setting activities for the well-being of the working class in general.

As regards the item "Safety in the use of chemicals at work", we believe that the proposed standards will be designed to protect the safety and health of workers exposed to hazards resulting from the use of chemicals at work in various types of activities, such as production and processing. The implementation of fundamental control regulations at the international level would help to improve the protection of workers in the less developed countries, which are importers of chemical substances produced in the developed world.

At this stage, I would like to express my thanks and appreciation to the Government of Mauritius for having consolidated the Occupational, Safety, Health and Welfare Act, 1988, with the technical assistance of the ILO, to enable the more effective control of safety and health in all workplaces covering the private and public sectors.

On the second discussion on "Partial revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107)", I fully agree with the document that the ILO has prepared for the indigenous and tribal populations, which will of course touch some 300 million persons belonging to indigenous and tribal groups. This move will enable them to enjoy the full measure of human rights and fundamental freedoms, without hindrance of discrimination. My organisation fully supports the ILO in its move to protect further the indigenous and tribal populations.

We note with satisfaction that the subject of night work has been placed on the agenda of this Conference. In Mauritius, in the export processing zone (EPZ) sector, in December 1988, there were 591 enterprises operating with a workforce of some 89,100 workers, of whom nearly two-thirds, or 57,500, were females and 37,600 males. The EPZ Act permits a night shift for women in these zones, contrary to Convention No. 89, which prohibits night work for women in industry.

It is known to one and all that night work affects the health and welfare of workers. Since family responsibilities rest more on women, it is necessary to create a working environment and social conditions which enable the employment of women and the execution of family responsibilities to coexist. In Mauritius, one of our priorities remains the improvement of working conditions. We believe that night work should be restricted as far as possible for all workers, and that conditions for those undertaking night work should be improved.

Before I finish, I reiterate my organisation's unflinching support for our sisters and brothers in South Africa, who are still struggling for their basic human rights under the inhuman system of apartheid. We condemn the racist regime of South Africa and ask for the immediate release of Comrade Nelson Mandela and other trade unionists arrested and imprisoned for performing their trade union duties in the service of progress and the advancement of the interests of the working class.

Original - Arabic: Mr. HUSSAIN (Employers' delegate, Iraq) - In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! It is my pleasure to congratulate Mr. John Nkomo, Minister of Labour, Manpower Planning and Social Welfare of Zimbabwe, on his election as President of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. Mr. Nkomo's experience and competence as regards labour and workers will enable him to lead the work of this Conference wisely, in order to achieve positive results in pursuance of the aims of the ILO.

The Report of the Director-General, Recovery and employment, gives a clear diagnosis of the social and economic impact of the economic recession in various regions of the world and the resulting employment, which has brought immeasurable suffering to thousands of workers and their families. However, subsequent developments in the world economy have led to economic recovery in the industrialised and the developing countries, resulting in an increase in job opportunities and a reduction in unemployment. The elaboration of development plans and the implementation of projects in the developing countries, as well as co-operation among countries through a new international economic order, are conducive to the establishment of social justice and the improvement of living conditions in the developing countries.

The economic recovery now under way in many countries of the world is accompanied by détente in international relations, serious measures aimed at disarmament, and a certain optimism regarding the peaceful settlement of regional conflicts. There is no doubt that these are important measures capable of strengthening economic recovery and securing social and economic well-being in various regions of the world.

We agree with the Director-General that the industrialised countries bear a considerable responsibility vis-à-vis the Third World and must give special attention to the stagnation and recession prevailing in vast regions of the world, which are in great need of the solidarity of rich countries.

The developing countries, and in particular the debtor countries, need to develop in order to improve their living conditions, increase production and modernise their industries. Tripartite dialogue between the social partners is essential for economic growth in these countries and for the achievement of the common aims of the parties concerned.

The experience of my country in this respect is rich and varied. Development plans have been drawn up on the basis of available material and human resources, resulting in a vast economic recovery which has secured social and economic well-being in the country, while providing a job to every citizen who is able to work. What is more, we needed to appeal to our brothers and our friends for assistance in implementing development projects. This development progress has affected sectors such as industry, agriculture, health care, education and others. The enemies of Iraq have attempted to thwart this development process by every means available, including the war which was imposed on Iraq. Now that the war is over, my country is once again undergoing renewal, and the development process is making great strides. The workers have gone back to the factories after participating in the defence of the country during an eight-year war which devastated a great many houses, factories and economic facilities.

Now, under the leadership of Saddam Hussein, President of the Republic of Iraq, my country is undergoing a vast process of construction and industrialisation, which keeps pace with scientific and technological change in the world. My country's Government continues to support private businesses in order to enable them to become involved in various sectors of industry, trade and services, in view of the prominent role of private businesses in capital investment and development, and their effective contribution to economic growth.

A new Act has been issued on employers' organisations, which takes account of specialisation and flexibility at work, in the context of freedom of association. Thus, the Federation is accorded plenty of scope for its activities in the service of industry and industrialists in my country. The Federation endeavours to play its part in the promotion of relations with similar Arab and international occupational organisations.

Arab employers and workers in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories are subjected to violations of their trade union rights and freedoms by the Israeli occupation authorities, who apply a policy of racial discrimination against them in every respect. The ILO mission to Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories stated that the Israeli authorities impose restrictions on Palestinian economic enterprises and on trade. The same authorities arrest and expel trade unionists, close down trade union premises, prohibit trade union activities and impose stringent restrictions on the freedom of movement of Palestinian citizens.

The mission also pointed out that Palestinian enterprises and employers are subjected to discriminatory treatment, high taxes, the closure of trade enterprises, blocking of bank accounts and the prohibition on Palestinian employers from expanding their enterprises, in order to protect the interest of Israeli employers and enterprises. The International Labour Conference is called upon to attach due importance to this issue in order to put a stop to the injustice and discrimination against Arab employers and workers in Palestine and the other occupied territories. Pursuant to its humanitarian aims, the ILO must perform its role in this respect and provide material and moral support to the Arab workers and employers in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories, in order to back their resistance and enable them to continue to stand firm against Israeli occupation, until the day when this occupation is lifted and an independent Palestinian State is created, under the leadership of the Palestine Liberation Organisation, the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people.

The policy of apartheid practised by the South African regime against the majority in South Africa and Namibia is a flagrant violation of human rights, international charters and ILO declarations concerning action against apartheid in South Africa and Namibia. Governments, and workers' and employers' organisations are invited to take vigorous action against this regime and to adopt effective economic and political sanctions against it in order to eradicate it and its arbitrary racist policy.

The agenda of our Conference features many other points concerning work and workers which deserve close attention and scrutiny, including night work for women. Women account for a considerable proportion of the active labour force in the world, and the necessities of work involve the use of this labour force in night work, in accordance with the rules prescribing working conditions of the female contingent in these sectors, in the light of the current situation and subject to the exceptions provided for by the competent authorities.

The partial revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107) has become necessary in the light of economic and social developments in the world. Many countries whose situations come within the scope of this Convention have already taken a major step in dealing with the issues covered by the Convention, and the time is ripe to revise this Convention and draw up a new instrument which is appropriate to the current situation.

Safety in the use of chemicals at work is a topic which should receive the attention it deserves in view of the effects of the use of these substances on human beings and nature. This is why support the elaboration of a legal instrument taking account of scientific developments in this field.

As regards reports concerning the ratification and application of international labour Conventions, employers' organisations in Iraq take part in the study of these conventions and the submission of a report on this subject to the competent authorities with a view to their ratification. They also participate in the preparation of the reports sent by the Government to the ILO.

I should like to conclude by conveying once again my congratulations to the President on his election this session, and to wish him every success in leading its work in order to reach solutions to the benefit of the human community and for the achievement of social justice.

Mr. CHANTAWONG (Workers' delegate, Thailand) – It is indeed a great pleasure to stand here before this Conference to report upon the labour situation in Thailand.

Thailand is now developing into a newly industrialised country (NIC). This means more employment for Thai workers.

I must, however, point out that Thai workers are still being deprived of workers' fundamental rights. By using loopholes in the law, a number of employers exploit the workers disgracefully with short-term employment. The short-term employment situation needs to be addressed with urgency.

Short-term employment surfaced two to three years ago, manifesting itself in four forms. These are: trial employment, temporary employment, employment for a fixed period and employment by contractors. All four forms have one common characteristic – they deprive the employees of their lawful rights. Even the companies that enjoy the special privileges of the Board of Investment Promotion employ these types of employment contracts.

The short-term employment contract also prevents Thai workers joining the trade union movement. This type of employment is the most serious labour problem at present. I would like to appeal before this Conference for fraternal help. Thai workers should also enjoy the workers' fundamental rights as elsewhere in the world. Workers need job stability.

There are still a number of loopholes in Thai labour laws which result in the deterioration of workers' conditions of life; there are no provisions in the labour laws that provide for plantation and agricultural workers. Rural workers have been exploited for a long time and this exploitation still goes on. Millions of Thai workers have left their homes in rural areas to go to the cities to find jobs. This exodus has merely resulted in increasing the level of unemployment.

Workers who have to use chemical substances in their work are not adequately protected from the hazards inherent in the use of such substances. Women workers in electronics factories experience a deterioration in their eyesight within four to five years.

Finally, I would like to say that if the Thai Government wants the country to become the fifth tiger, it should pay more attention to the workers' basic needs. The Government should ratify more Conventions concerning the workers' basic rights.

Mr. ABDI (Workers' delegate, Somalia) – It is a great honour and pleasure for me to take this opportunity of addressing my speech to this august assembly of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference.

The General Federation of Somali Trade Unions (GFSTU) congratulates the President and Vice-Presidents of the Conference upon their election. We are sure that through their wise and energetic guidance the Conference will be crowned with success. We also congratulate the newly elected Director-General and wish him every success in accomplishing the historic task entrusted in him.

The former Director-General strove devotedly, without sparing any effort, to promote the noble ideals and aspirations of the ILO and his contributions will be remembered for ever.

As usual, the Conference has an important agenda before it, covering a wide range of items. The Report of the Director-General of the International Labour Office, of which Part I deals with economic recovery and employment, is an appropriate and timely tool, particularly at a time when the formulation of the strategy for the United Nations Fourth Development Decade is in process.

The Report underlines how growth and social progress can be restored in the coming decade and points out the required adjustments, both in national policies and international economic relations, since the two are interdependent.

Chapter 2 of the Report discusses the prospects of economic growth and employment creation in the 1990s. Chapter 3 tackles the central issue of the development strategies that will need to be adopted in developing countries.

As the Report indicates, in the 1980s there was a rapid economic expansion in several countries of the world – albeit with different characteristics including several Asian countries.

Despite all these signs of dynamic activities, the 1980s have, in most developing countries, particularly Africa and Latin America, been a lost decade. These countries, as emphasised in the Report, experienced major recession in 1982 and 1983 and have had to cope with severe debt and balance of payments crises for most of the decade. The result is that, in many of them, per capita income is lower today than in 1980 and that social conditions have been badly affected as poverty and unemployment have increased.

There is no denying that many of the developing countries are still facing serious economic difficulties; their economic growth rate is slowing down or remaining stagnant. Many countries are not self-supporting in food grain supply and factories are operating under capacity. Prices of the primary products on the world market keep falling and there have been sharp decreases in export earnings and increases in foreign trade deficits and external debts. The worsening situation has led to a decline in people's living standards and an increase in unemployment and underemployment and has affected the social and political stability of some countries. Therefore, it has become the central task of the developing countries to develop their national economy so as to prop up their political independence with economic independence.

For many years drought and famine have prevailed in many parts of Africa. Desertification, crop failure in the agricultural sector, the drop in small farmers' incomes to an unacceptable level, food shortages, increased unemployment and underemployment in the urban and rural communities, mounting inflation and an unbearable cost of living are common characteristics. The heavy burden of the foreign debt is another thorny issue which requires an appropriate and urgent solution.

The developing countries have submitted, on several occasions, their comprehensive plan of action and priority programmes to the international communities.

It is appropriate to refer to paragraph 8 of the New Delhi message of the Seventh Conference of Heads of State or Governments of the Non-Aligned Countries, which took place in New Delhi in March 1983. It may be summed up as follows: immediate measures must be taken to start a process of recovery and to bring the world economy back to the path of sustained growth; consequently, the activation and stimulation of the growth process in the developing countries must be a key objective of this endeavour. Immediate measures are needed in several areas; special emphasis must be placed on enabling the least developed countries to solve their acute balance of payments problems without interrupting their development process. At the same time, satisfaction of their basic needs of food and energy, enhanced access to markets and fair prices for commodities must be ensured. Protectionist trends must be reversed and immediate measures to dismantle trade barriers implemented. It is necessary to put an end to unequal exchange between developed and developing countries. Besides, many developing countries are in a tragic situation because of their inability to meet their debt obligations. This serious problem should be urgently addressed.

In 1980 the Organisation of Arab Unity summit adopted the Lagos Plan of Action; in addition, the African Programme of Action for Economic Recovery and Development was adopted. These programmes and plans have won the warm support of the African countries. The developing countries have bright prospects in their national development, with their vast territories rich in resources and powerful labour forces. Obviously, the achievement of rapid economic growth and integrated development requires: nation-wide commitment to national developments; the availability of sufficient infrastructure, institutional and production factors; maximum utilisation of human and material resources; rational production management and labour organisation; a high savings rate and capital formation; optimal allocation of scarce investment resources, particularly in the activities that create the demand for labour; and the adoption of a technological policy that corresponds to the actual needs and objective conditions of the country, which effectively helps to promote technical progress and develop labour-intensive industries – thus generating greater job opportunities. In view of the deteriorating situation of food and agricultural in developing countries, reflected in falling grain production and mounting imports which cause severe strains on their scarce foreign exchange resources, the developing countries should give special priority to increasing their food and agricultural production and to achieving self-reliance through national and collective action. Some developing countries have achieved a degree of self-reliance in food through the determined application of policies, resources and technology. Such efforts should be continued and the acquired experience made available to developing countries with a food shortage to support their efforts to attain self-reliance in the food sector.

Trade Unions in many developing countries are mobilising and organising their rank and file to strive for the development of their national economy. Only when the national economic basis is stronger can the living standards of the people, including those of the workers, be raised. Trade unions in many developing countries have put forward many valuable proposals based on their survey and study of economic and social problems, while participating in national development planning; in this way, they have actively influenced the attention of their governments.

To establish a new international economic order is not only the strong desire of workers and trade unions in the developing countries, but also conforms, in essence, to the interests of the workers and trade unions of the industrialised countries. Trade unions in various countries should develop international solidarity and co-operation so as to promote the establishment of a new type of economic relationship among all countries, on the principle of equality and mutual benefit. The General Federation of Somali Trade Unions is concentrating its efforts in mobilising and organising its rank and file to step up the productive capacity of their labour so as to increase the gross national product and ensure economic growth and social progress.

It is one of the major concerns of the GFSTU to upgrade the skills and technical know-how of the workers in order to implement effectively the national plans and development strategies aimed at eradicating poverty and backwardness and to embark on an advanced stage of development and self-sufficiency. The GFSTU resolutely supports the just causes of all oppressed peoples and workers of the world, struggling for their freedom and liberty; in particular, we strongly support the heroic struggle of the Palestinian peoples and workers for their legitimate rights to self-determination, for the liberation of their homeland and the recovery of their inalienable national rights.

We support the struggle of the peoples and workers of southern Africa against all forms of oppression, exploitation, domination, inequality and discrimination.

We support the struggle of the Namibian peoples and workers for the liberation of their territory and the establishment of an independent State based on the principles of equality, freedom and justice.

We hail the United Nations commitment to implement the transitional programme for the independence of that country.

Original – Spanish: Mr. BARRAGAN (Workers' delegate, Ecuador) – On behalf of all the workers' confederations of Ecuador, who represent a unified, pluralistic and democratic process, I should like to join in the congratulations expressed here, wishing every success, to the President and the other Officers of this 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. I must also convey the gratitude of the Ecuadorian workers to Mr. Francis Blanchard for his excellent work as Director-General during the last 15 years, and express our satisfaction with, and congratulations for the election of the new Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, who will have the full support of all the members of this noble Organisation, the ILO, which has completed 70 years of fruitful work on behalf of the most needy groups in the world, namely ourselves, the workers, and particularly those from the developing countries.

With respect to the Report of the outgoing Director-General, entitled Recovery and employment, we must emphasise the fact that this is a very topical subject, which dramatically and accurately reflects events in Latin America and other continents of the world at this time. In our country, Ecuador, the problem of unemployment is impressive, as the figures point to some 65 per cent of the economically active population which is stifled by unemployment or underemployment, which could result in consequences and social tensions similar to those we have observed with great distress in our brother countries, such as Venezuela and Argentina, in the past few weeks, unless radical and urgent steps are taken by the Ecuadorian Government to remedy the situation, with the assistance of international organisations such as ILO.

In this respect, we must denounce the fact that the Government of my country, elected only some ten months ago, has not been able to fulfil most of its campaign promises to create mass employment. It has confined itself to facile solutions such as micro-enterprise or emerging employment programmes and job-sharing, which is a disappointment for the workers and has been unanimously rejected by all the Ec-cuadorian trade union confederations. Finally, we agree with Mr. Blanchard when he says that daring global policies should be implemented, such as public works programmes on a large scale, medium-scale infrastructure problems, short-, medium- and long-term job creation, and the extension of social services such as health care, food, housing, education and so on. This calls for imagination, creativity and political decision, with full participation and consultation of the workers and grass-roots organisations in the urban and rural areas, the last of which has not been seriously considered by the Government of Ecuador.

We workers do not wish to dwell only on the gloomy negative aspects of our country and the crushing economic situation we are experiencing, because if we compare our situation to those of neighbouring countries, we must admit that we have made significant progress in the past few months as regards a greater respect for human rights and civil liberties, compliance with the political Constitution, the autonomy of state authorities, a dynamic, progressive international policy, and a mass literacy programme which is currently being implemented. However, these positive achievements are due to the fact that until August 1988 we were subject to an authoritarian, repressive dictatorship presided over by León Febres Cordero, who represented the most reactionary right-wing sector of the country, with the result that today every Ecuadorian is paying the price for his chaotic and immoral misgovernment and backwardness. In previous years we denounced violations from this very rostrum, and official documents of the ILO report violations of the Conventions and international instruments of this organisation. Today, thanks to democracy and the possibility of alternation it affords, the situation has changed as regards these aspects which we have described.

As regards workers who are wage-earners, we must inform you that the situation is not all that positive. Inflation has exceeded 100 per cent in the past few months, considerably eroding the purchasing power of Ecuadorian workers. The wage increases have been limited, only matching one-third of the inflation rate and the cost of living. This has led to profound discontent and permanent protest in the various economic sectors, particularly in the public services, whose rights and freedoms of negotiation have been curtailed, as the President of the Republic himself has restricted unionisation in the public sector, thus directly violating the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) and the Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151). These positions have been rejected publicly by the workers of Ecuador, and we would warn the ILO to put a stop to these anti-trade union attitudes.

Other policies directly affecting the workers have been economic ones, which roughly following the same neo-liberal instructions of the IMF, have given rise to a justified social reaction, as the drastic economy measures have been accompanied by new taxes and increases in the cost of public services such as telephone, electricity, drinking water, automobile taxes, and constantly rising prices of essential articles such as food, clothes, housing, medicine, education and so on, and the consequence has been popular dissatisfaction and the protests which naturally followed in the form of provincial strikes such as the recent transport strike, with its complicated effect, and national stoppages such as the one last November or the one planned for July on a platform of unified struggle in the demand for increased salaries, control of inflation and real participation by the working sectors.

The object of the forthcoming national solidarity strike is to call on the Government to accommodate the popular and trade union sectors and apply as soon as possible social programmes to compensate for their tough economic measures. We are not aiming to destabilize the democratic process as far right groups are or to challenge this or that high government official, but rather to question the Government's model for national development.

We wish to express our support for the process of revising and discussing the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107). In my country, and in the Andean region, there are indigenous people who have become fully aware of their culture and their role as organised groups with their own characteristics and personality.

A meeting recently took place in the city of Quito with other indigenous peoples of Latin America to draft a working document giving real expression to the criteria and contributions for the revision of Convention No. 107. An indigenous delegation is present at this Conference to defend its viewpoints. It should receive the full support of the relevant Committee and of this meeting.

In the Latin American field we reiterate our solidarity with the countries and peoples fighting to achieve democratic pluralistic systems; we regret and reject the killings which took place in China on the order of the Government against defenceless students whose only claim was a little more freedom and democracy; we acclaim the triumph of Solidarity and the Polish people, and we have high hopes for the new policies of Gorbachev, particularly the proposals on disarmament of the Great Powers, which will undoubtedly be for the benefit of all peoples of the world. Finally, as to the European countries who are systematically moving towards integration of an economic and political nature, Latin America is observing with mistrust the fact that, while the internal borders of the European countries are crumbling, frontiers for the products, trade and peoples of Latin America are being constructed and strengthened and no doubt this situation would have to be revised in the light of justice and international peace.

The Ecuadorian workers are part of Latin America with all its problems and complexities, but also with its feelings of humanism, emotion and hope for the future. Among the problems facing the Latin Americans, we stress the external debt which is due to the high degree of dependency of our countries on the great economic entities of the so-called "developed" world. Our dependency is not only economic, but also political, scientific, technical and cultural. In the last few weeks, a case in point of this degree of economic dependency of Ecuador was the theft of US$ 80 million by the financial transnational Citibank, which seized this money from the current account of the Central Bank of Ecuador, alleging that the negotiations of Ecuador's external debt with the loan banks were at a standstill. This has been radically rejected by all parties and social sectors of our country, and even by Latin American governments, and we would seize the opportunity of this 76th International Labour Conference to denounce the imperialistic and shameful attitude of the Citibank towards Ecuador. This is an alarming precedent of what could happen to other debtor countries. In other words, this indebtedness is becoming the "economic AIDS" of the modern era. The external debt is not only an economic and social problem, but also a political and global one. An urgent solution must be found among all governments and peoples in the developed countries. It is only thus that we will find the real practical solutions to unemployment, development, peace and true human justice.

Original - French: Mrs. RANDI (Representative, World Association of Women Entrepreneurs) - The problem under consideration at this session of the International Labour Conference is a key issue for the achievement of a better world balance in the economic and social sector.

Women entrepreneurs and managers in all continents, who the World Association of Women Entrepreneurs has the honour to represent through the national member organisations, are particularly aware that the problem of employment, especially in still badly underdeveloped regions, is a central problem for the general development of mankind, as it is the principle source of disequilibrium.

Governments, workers' and entrepreneurs' organisations and the United Nations have long focused attention on these problems.

However, despite this ample commitment, these problems do not seem to have been satisfactorily resolved. Our organisation, while emphasising how employment difficulties throughout the world hit women harder, with particular emphasis on the underdeveloped countries, wishes to make a contribution to this Conference by drawing attention to certain fundamental aspects which, in the experience of the entrepreneurs and managers associated with the WAW, can help to solve the problem even if population increase on the one hand, and job losses resulting from technological innovation on the other, continuously present us with the problem of ensuring work for all, in different terms.

First, there is a need to commit more energy and financial resources to vocational training, with special attention to training for possible entrepreneurial and self-employment activities, depending on the realities in each developed and/or underdeveloped country, so as to help strengthen and to encourage the emergence of initiative in the economic sector, and at the same time, through targeted support, to help to ensure equality of opportunity between men and women, beginning with legislation, rights access to credit and vocational training.

Second, training must be followed by a suitable system of financial support so that potential initiatives can take practical expression in economic projects through the availability of the necessary start-up capital. For this purpose, it is essential to introduce an articulated system of guarantee funds like the one now being developed for women, by the Association of Women's World Banking, with which my organisation collaborates, making possible access to bank financing which is not written off but which the newly established enterprise has to repay - because the enterprise must be enabled to work, but must also learn to be active.

In a Conference like ours, which is concerned above all with labour problems, it may seem superfluous to emphasize the importance of training and the updating of vocational skills at each occupational level, but we can never overstress the need for ever-larger investments to be devoted to that purpose, particularly in connection with technological advancement in the developed countries. We likewise think it useful to emphasize the need to intensify meetings and exchanges of experience among entrepreneurs and workers at the management level between developed and developing countries, with a view to possible co-operation in the economic and social sector.

In this respect, co-operation and assistance initiatives, like those that will be offered by the European Economic Community to small- and medium-sized firms and to autonomous vocational initiatives through legislation on the European economic interest groupings, can assume an important role.

Furthermore, it is essential to organise consultation and assistance agencies so that the new enterprises can consolidate themselves and assert themselves in the market.

We do not conceal from ourselves, for everyone is well aware of it, that the complexity of the problems we face can make them seem impossible to solve, particularly if we bear in mind that the difference between underdevelopment and development seems to be growing rather than shrinking. There is also the problem everyone faces of the migrating flows of young people in search of work between underdeveloped and developed regions.

While it is necessary to regulate such flows in order to avoid creating new social imbalances, it is also necessary to guarantee equal opportunities for all workers from developed countries and those who emigrate to those countries.

This is necessary not only for reasons of social and human solidarity, but for fundamental economic reasons having to do with costs and competition among firms.

For the entrepreneur, the updating of skills is essential to the survival of firms; this is equally true for old and young entrepreneurs, in developed and underdeveloped countries. It becomes of crucial importance for new firms, particularly in countries which do not have an industrial tradition behind them.

The solution to problems, which now seems to be a vague conviction but which has yet to be given practical expression, cannot come only from the external assistance of developed countries; it is essential to act in such a way that each local reality can express its own initiatives.

We must not forget that in the so-called developed countries, there are also underdeveloped areas and hence unemployment and partial unemployment, particularly among women, where the same solution is applicable as for countries in other areas.

In conclusion, I should like to refer to what the WAVE considers to be a key point: every social reality must be helped to express its own capacity for initiative, with special regard to the major reserve of energy represented by the female population.

When we look at the situation in the developing countries, we see the potential of women as of the utmost importance in overcoming the obstacles and in creating an economic reality marked by a more balanced social situation and more in keeping with modern requirements.

We believe that women should become the creators of jobs rather than the seekers of jobs.

We think that this is a particularly valuable and universal message, given that the experience of access to the activities of firms and to credit in the developed countries, shows that real imbalances still exist between men and women.

This is the contribution that my organisation offers this session of the International Labour Conference for the adoption of measures likely to solve the problems indicated.

Mr. President, I congratulate you on your election and I wish you, on the behalf of all women entrepreneurs, success in your work.

Original - Spanish: Mr. IBARRA (representative of the Permanent Congress of Trade Union Unity of the Workers of Latin America) - Mr. President, I should like to begin by thanking you for enabling my organisation to take the floor and to congratulate you on your well-deserved election as President of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference.

This very important session, which coincides with the ILO's 70th anniversary, has among its agenda items a matter of undeniable interest to the workers of the world, that of recovery and employment in the world economy. The other items, while also interesting, are clearly subordinate to the serious and basic problem of the world economic crisis accompanied by unemployment, unbridled exploitation by transnationals and above all tremendous underdevelopment of the Third World caused by indebtedness and unfair international economic relations.

The consequences of the economic crisis of capitalism have taken a particularly crude form in Latin America and the Caribbean. According to the 1988 report of the Economic Commission for Latin America (ECLA), per capita GDP fell that year to barely the level obtained in 1978. Inflation was more than twice as high, reaching the unprecedented level of 470 per cent.

In only five years of this decade, the debt in Latin America grew more than in the entire decade of the seventies. Each Latin America owes more than 1,000 dollars, an amount equivalent to the annual per capita income.

The evolution of the foreign debt problem in the past seven years indicates that the countries of Latin America and Caribbean paid more than $140,000 million and yet the debt now exceeds $420,000 million. Recent ECLA figures show that we have slid back ten years.

The erosion of workers real wages, the growth of unemployment and the continuing deterioration of food, health, education and housing conditions are consistent with the worsening of the quality of life in the region.

Financial agencies at the service of imperialism are practising restrictive policies contributing to the net transfer of resources abroad in excess of $174,000 million. This places us in the terrible and paradoxical situation of being a capital-exporting region despite the fact that we are economically underdeveloped.

The number of unemployed and underemployed in Latin America stands at 110 million. Real wages fail to cover the basic necessities of life.

The harsh statistical reality points to an average illiteracy rate of 55 per cent and a child mortality rate of 65 per thousand live births.

US imperialism, with its transnational enterprises, monopolies and financial agencies, has increased the exploitation and deepened the dependency of the region's economies.

The policies imposed by the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and imperialist greed favour capitalisation of the debt, which means shattering the sovereignty of our nations.

As a condition for new loans they ask that we turn over our enterprises, our land, our industries and our mines to swell foreign capital resources.

What has been the response of those most responsible for this poverty? A few years ago the so-called Baker Plan was put forward. It did nothing to resolve the debt problem. Now we have another caricature of a debt relief scheme known as the Brady Plan, but its ineffectiveness will also condemn it to failure.

Owing to these conditions more and more workers and their trade unions have banded together to reject and defeat the inhuman demands of imperialism and its instruments, the likes of the IMF, with their onerous conditions which are against the interests of the people, such as the notorious letters of intent. A recent example was that of the death of hundreds of Venezuelans as a result of the social explosion in that brother Republic in reaction to the anti-popular measures that were imposed by the IMF and its intent to protect at all costs the voracious interests of the foreign debt.

Despite the worsening of the crisis and all of the measures that have been taken by the enemies of the workers to divide them, they and their trade unions are moving forward in unity. An example of this is the actions taken against the payment of the foreign debt and against interest payment. These actions were supported by other important social sectors such as small farmers and agricultural workers, students, women, professionals and others who agree fully on a set of demands for work, for development, for peace and for the defence of sovereignty.

Part of this action to bring about unity has been the work of the ad hoc commission of campinas which, together with OATUU, is promoting contimental and world unity in the struggle against payment of the foreign debt and as a result, in August of this year in Brazil, there will be a meeting of the trade unionists from all over the world to work against this scourge.

The unity of the trade union movement could, sooner or later, provide a real alternative to the present crisis, but in order to achieve this, we would need to repair the damage of the past and get rid of sectarianism, and then to work honestly for dialogue and conciliation. This dialogue of all sectors should continue, putting first the sacred interests of workers and the dispossessed.

For purposes of solidarity, this congress will continue to renew its actions and support for the cause of workers and trade unions which, in Chile, Haiti and Paraguay, are fighting in difficult conditions in order to achieve their trade union and democratic rights.

Our congress calls for an end to the crimes against the trade union leaders in Colombia. We call for a mobilisation of trade unions and progressive organisations to defend the just cause of the Panamanian people and their national demands which the most aggressive circles in the United States are trying to trample on.

We also reiterate our solidarity with the Sandinistas of Nicaragua which is writing a glorious page in history – in spite of imperialist pressure – and is defending selflessly and courageously the construction of its free nation.

We also express our solidarity with the patriots of the FMLN in El Salvador, who are fighting for a better future for their country.

We support the trade union movement and patriotic forces of South Africa and their fight against apartheid, and we give our firm solidarity to the fight of the Arab peoples and particularly the heroic people of Palestine.

Finally, this Congress calls on the ILO to take new initiatives to increase employment, the reconversion of the arms industry for the production of useful goods and the establishment of a new international economic order.

(The Conference adjourned at 10.30 p.m.)

Provisional Record

Seventy-sixth Session, Geneva, 1989

Action Taken on the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa

Report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid

1. The Committee was established in accordance with paragraph 4 of the updated Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia which was adopted by the Conference at its 75th Session (1988). It was established, inter alia, for the purpose of monitoring action against apartheid.

2. The Committee was composed of 55 members with the right to vote (20 Government members, 15 Employers' members and 20 Workers' members). It also included one Government deputy member, 19 Employers' deputy members and 21 Workers' deputy members. In accordance with the usual procedure, equal voting for the three groups was assured by the appropriate system of weighted voting. The United Nations, the OAU, a number of organisations with consultative status (as well as the African National Congress of South Africa (ANC)) and the Pan-Africanist Congress of Azania (PAC) were represented by observers.

3. At its opening sitting the Committee elected its Officers as follows:

Chairman: The Hon. M. Ndoye (Senegal)

Vice-Chairmen: Mr. B. Hernandez, Employers' member (Philippines) and Mr. R. Mercier, Workers' member (Canada)

The Committee also elected as Reporter: Mr. K. Vollebaek, Government member (Norway).

4. The Committee held six sittings. Its mandate was to examine the Special Report of the Director-General on the Application of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia, which dealt, inter alia, with developments regarding the situation in South Africa in respect of labour and social matters, and contained an analysis of the information provided by governments, and employers' and workers' organisations on measures taken against apartheid as foreseen in paragraph 5 (b) of the Declaration as well as on international action against apartheid. A further document complemented the Special Report by providing a brief summary of (i) the principal events which had occurred in South Africa concerning labour matters; and (ii) information supplied by governments, and employers' and workers' organisations which was not included in the Special Report. The Committee also had before it a document containing the following documents relating to the Committee on Discrimination of the 243rd Session of the Governing Body, May 1989:

1. Information supplied by governments and employers' and workers' organisations on action taken against apartheid (GB.243/CD/1/2).
2. Group of independent experts to follow up and monitor the implementation of sanctions and other action against apartheid (GB.243/CD/2/1).
3. Those portions of the report of the Committee on Discrimination and its appendices that relate to the above-mentioned matters (GB.243/11/19).

5. In opening the proceedings of the Committee, the representative of the Secretary-General drew attention to the fact that the Committee had been in existence for eight years but was meeting for the first time under its new title of the Committee on Action against Apartheid, which was given to it in the updated Declaration adopted by the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. The new title reflected the new designation of the Declaration itself as the Declaration on Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia, and also the change of emphasis in the orientation of the Declaration and of the work to be undertaken by the Committee regarding its implementation. He stressed that action was what was required from the ILO and all its constituents to deal with the apartheid system which continued to have drastic negative effects on the lives and livelihoods of its victims. He drew attention to some of the developments highlighted in the Special Report of the Director-General on the Application of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia. They showed clearly the South African Government's continued use of force to stem the struggle by the Black majority and other South Africans against the apartheid system. He also drew attention to the severe repression of the trade unions, especially those affiliated to COSATU and NACTU, the arrests and detention of union leaders, the attacks on union property, and the increasing use of the police to deal with strikes. Despite this, the trade unions had continued to grow. COSATU and NACTU had mounted a vigorous joint campaign against the recent Labour Relations Amendment Act which they perceived to be a major threat to their existence and their right to strike. They had also condemned the punitive provisions of the Act which made it possible for employers to sue them and to cripple them by recovering large sums of money in respect of strikes or stayaways which were considered to be illegal. The Special Report had observed that the differing views of employers and the large trade union federations on the likely consequences of the Act could seriously worsen the industrial relations climate in South Africa. The Representative of the Secretary-General also pointed out that the South African Government's limited reform had ground to a halt. He emphasised that the present level of sanctions and disinvestment measures implemented had had an impact on the South African economy's ability to grow. He drew attention to the high cost of maintaining the apartheid system, its grave impact on the Black population who constituted the poorest section of the community, and the high level of unemployment in South Africa. He stressed that this situation should not be allowed to continue and that the ILO and its tripartite membership should do everything to eliminate the apartheid system. Regarding Namibia, he expressed optimism that it would attain its independence soon despite the initial setbacks. He hoped that the work of the Committee would demonstrate to the people of Namibia that the governments, and employers' and workers' organisations in the ILO were ready to work with them in the future as they had done in the past to ensure the complete eradication of the apartheid system in their country.

6. The Chairman expressed the hope that the Committee would demonstrate the same determination as it had in the past and would make a positive contribution to the international struggle against apartheid, which he described as the scourge of our time. He expressed the wish that the groups making up the Committee would work together in a spirit of co-operation, openness and courage to enable the Committee's work to be fruitful and that action taken would respond to the needs of the people being discriminated against by a system which violated human conscience. He stressed that no one could remain insensitive to the system of apartheid. The dramatic situation in South Africa continued to preoccupy the international community, and in particular the ILO, which had repeatedly denounced the injustices to which the Black workers were subjected. He reminded the Committee that under the chairmanship of Mr. Nkomo, the Minister of Labour of Zimbabwe to whom he paid tribute, the Declaration concerning the policy of apartheid in South Africa had been updated by the Committee and that it had been modified (at the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference) to become the Declaration concerning action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia. He specified that the updated Declaration and the Programme of Action against Apartheid annexed to it should form the basis of the Committee's work. He expressed satisfaction with the decision of the Governing Body to establish a group of independent experts charged with the responsibility of monitoring the application of sanctions and other action against apartheid. The establishment of the group was in accordance with the conclusions of the Committee which stressed that the imposition of mandatory economic sanctions represented the most effective peaceful means of forcing the apartheid regime to abolish its intolerable policy. The Chairman drew attention to the fact that there had always been African solidarity on the fundamental question of apartheid. The OAU, for its part, had adopted a number of resolutions denouncing the worsening situation in South Africa and had called for the support of the United Nations and its specialised agencies, as well as concerted action by sovereign States so that they could use their influence to ensure the elimination of apartheid. The General Council of the Organisation of African Trade Union Unity (OATUU) had, for its part, recently adopted resolutions in Accra, Ghana, against apartheid in South Africa and in Namibia. The Chairman indicated that this action should not be misinterpreted to mean that apartheid was only an African problem; it was also a concern for the international community and the world. It was the responsibility of the nations of the world to eradicate this aberration which raised racism to the level of a governmental policy.

7. The Workers' Vice-Chairman called for a frank evaluation of the programme of action against apartheid, which would require a great deal of courage and intellectual honesty on the part of the Committee. The situation had to be examined in relation to the ILO's aims while at the present time, the situation in South Africa was even more serious. The state of emergency had been extended and a complaint had been transmitted to the workers by COSATU indicating "a tangible increase in repression". The speaker quoted numerous examples of violations of trade union rights committed by the South African police: in the course of the last two weeks more than 70 trade unionists had been arrested, including leaders of COSATU. When they were released, after a hunger strike, for example, these trade unionists were subjected to restrictions worse than those of their previous detention. Moreover, the police took brutal action against the trade unions, their premises and the houses of their leaders. It could be said that there was collusion between the employers and the security forces. As the Director-General's Special Report pointed out, police took action 953 times during the course of the year in order to break up strikes. This negative record had led the speaker to believe that the dismantling of apartheid, the aim of the Committee, was far from being a reality. This failure placed in doubt the very credibility of ILO action. It was to be noted that only a very small number of governments were ready to increase pressure on the South African regime. The member States of the European Community had once again sent a collective reply which revealed complete cynicism since they merely noted the absence of progress towards the abolition of apartheid, without committing themselves to taking any measures against this regime. Moreover, the speaker pointed out that certain European Community countries, far from decreasing their relations with South Africa, had in fact increased them. In this respect he quoted the increase in trade between the Federal Republic of Germany and South Africa, which was of the order of 33.8 per cent during the first eight months of 1988. He expressed his disappointment at the complete absence of any mention in the Director-General's Report of measures concerning the application, or the non-application, by member States of the embargo on South African coal which had been the subject of conclusions in the Committee's report of last year. It would be useful for the Committee to have precise answers on this question. The speaker criticised declarations of intention which had not been put into effect and fallacious statements made by certain States, which did not correspond to the reality of their relations with South Africa. He declared that he knew that mandatory sanctions were not being applied, that embargoes on coal and arms were being violated and that States were taking advantage of the breaking-off of commercial ties with South Africa by certain countries to increase their own trade relations with that country. In support of this, he quoted the increase of 102 per cent shown in exports from South Africa to Switzerland in 1988 (not including gold). Besides, it had begun to seem as if certain relations might be developing between South Africa and the USSR. The Workers' group were hopeful that the work of the special group of independent experts would provide precise answers to all these questions and give a true picture of the situation. It was important also that precise information should be given to the workers on the subject of discussions within the European Community on any possibility that the embargo on uranium and nuclear technology with regard to South Africa might be lifted should that country sign the treaty on non-proliferation of nuclear arms. The Workers' members called on the Employers' group to explain the increased gap between salaries paid to Black workers and those paid to White workers, in all sectors of the South African economy, between June 1987 and June 1988. Lastly, the Workers' group regretted that the replies to the questionnaire included in the Director-General's Report had decreased in quantity and quality, thus depriving the Committee of elements which were essential to its work. For their part, the Workers had on many occasions demonstrated their unequivocal support for the workers of South Africa, not only morally but by action.

8. The Employers' Vice-Chairman observed that the Committee's task was to monitor and evaluate measures taken by the tripartite members of the international community to dismantle apartheid. Members of the Employers' group associated themselves with all freedom-loving peoples of the world in seeking effective and appropriate measures against a political system which drew its strength from racism and rejected the principles enshrined in the Declaration of Philadelphia and the objectives set forth in the Preamble of the ILO's Constitution. The Employers took note of the examination contained in the Report of recent developments in labour and social matters in South Africa and, in particular, in Namibia. The ILO had contributed towards the events and circumstances which had led to the implementation of Security Council Resolution 435 which defined and established the United Nations Peace Plan for Namibia. They also took note of the analysis in the Report of information supplied by the ILO's tripartite constituency on action taken on apartheid, especially on action taken in accordance with the updated Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia, and the conclusions contained in the report of the Committee to its report to the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference last year. They were, however, concerned that fewer replies had been received this year to the ILO questionnaire. This might not be an indication of waning commitment against apartheid or an indication of refusal to reply, but might be due to late receipt of the questionnaire. Difficulties in transmission to ILO constituents should be looked into. The Employers took special note of the recommendations of the Committee on Discrimination of the Governing Body, adopted during its 243rd Session, in respect of the establishment of a special group of three independent experts to monitor the information on sanctions and other action against apartheid in accordance with the conclusions of the report of this Committee to the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. These experts should be persons of the highest integrity, competence and expertise in whom all sectors could place their complete trust. Despite the emergence of encouraging events in southern Africa, particularly as regards Namibia, the road to freedom in South Africa for the great majority of the Black population was still a thorny one. Repression, violation of human rights, injustice and denial of basic human rights were still all too frequent. The eloquence of poverty and discrimination were still deafening. There was still debauchery of man's inherent right to live in peace and prosperity. The fight must go on until man's inhumanity to man had completely disappeared.

9. The Government member of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya commented on the three parts of the Director-General's Special Report, and raised the question of the evolution of the situation in Namibia, which was becoming increasingly serious with regard to anti-trade union pressure. In South Africa, the police intervened constantly to repress and censure; the Labour Relations Amendment Act involved an illegal violation of labour rights through its interference with the right to strike. This legislation caused enterprises to demand compensation from the trade unionists who had been on strike. The situation in South Africa was serious not only for the trade unions but also for working women who were deprived of their rights and for the numerous unemployed. In spite of appeals made by the United Nations, the apartheid system remained in force. The Special Report showed that apartheid had not been dismantled because the measures mentioned which could have been taken against apartheid in reality had not been taken. The measures taken by the organisations of the United Nations system had enabled the people of South Africa and Namibia to carry on their resistance, which had increased, and had given them hope in their struggle. In the speaker's opinion, any revolution opened the way for the people's future, since only through the struggle for liberty could they attain social peace and dignity. The existence of apartheid was a challenge to all religions and all moral principles. Liberty should exist in all countries. The Committee must be convinced of the necessity to fight against repression, exploitation and racism, and must do everything necessary to make its work equal its ambitions; to achieve this, it must adopt effective and courageous measures to strengthen its action. He stressed that his Government had taken a number of measures against apartheid. It did not maintain any diplomatic, economic or commercial relations with South Africa. It boycotted all South African goods. It provided all forms of assistance to the struggle of the South African people to eliminate apartheid. He pointed out that his country supported freedom in accordance with the Great Green Declaration of Human Rights which had been approved by the Libyan people in their People's Congress. Finally, he drew attention to the great similarity between the Director-General's Special Report on Action against Apartheid and his report on the position of Arab workers in the occupied Arab territories with regard to the situation of workers in South Africa and the occupied Arab territories.

10. The Government member of the German Democratic Republic observed that the Special Report of the Director-General clearly showed that anti-apartheid policies had not succeeded and that the situation of Black workers had worsened. Last year, the International Labour Conference had adopted an updated Declaration against Apartheid, together with conclusions. The Committee should be able to take stock of the implementation of measures against apartheid which had had some impact. The Peace Plan for Namibia was one concrete measure worth noting, but measures whose consequences were not effective enough needed to be expanded and examined. The Conference had adopted important conclusions regarding banks and agencies which would require detailed assessment of action taken; it had also requested that no more loans be made to South Africa. The Governing Body should be kept informed on these questions and the Director-General should bring pressure to bear on the banks. Additional information should be given to the Committee about the study on the gold market which the Director-General had been requested to submit to the next session of the Conference. Measures had not yet been put into effect for a special monitoring group on sanctions to report, through the Governing Body's Committee on Discrimination, to the Committee on Apartheid. This group should start its work as soon as possible and the Director-General must certainly make proposals concerning its composition at the June Session of the Governing Body. As regards his own country, he pointed out that the German Democratic Republic had no relations with South Africa and supported all ILO measures against apartheid.

11. The Workers' member of France complained that the information which the trade union organisation to which he belonged (CGT) had sent in October had not been taken into account in the writing of the Director-General's Special Report, but had only been included in an addendum distributed at the opening of the Committee's work. This fact had deprived the majority of the delegates of information on the initiatives taken and the action carried out against apartheid by this trade union organisation. He drew the attention of the Committee to the proposal made by the Secretary-General of the CGT, Mr. Krasuki, that the Nobel Peace Prize be awarded to Mr. Nelson Mandela. It would be an honour for the International Labour Conference to take a similar initiative. He suggested that the Committee adopt a resolution which could formulate a recommendation to the Conference in this respect. Such a resolution should also demand the immediate release of Nelson Mandela, who had been condemned to life imprisonment by the Supreme Court of Pretoria on 12 June 1964, that was to say exactly 25 years ago.

12. The Workers' member of Finland stated that the position of his organisation, like that of all Nordic trade unions and all on the Workers' benches, was very clear. In his country, a boycott of exports had led to the breaking off of trade with South Africa. Through the trade union solidarity centre, assistance had been given to training, organisational and other projects of COSATU, and there was also substantial involvement in assisting trade unionists in Namibia.

The new situation in Namibia was not without its dangers, but it was important to give to those engaged in independent nation-building the necessary support in setting up institutions for economic and social progress, including trade unions and collective bargaining systems which were part of the social infrastructure of all countries. The Director-General's Special Report to the Conference spoke of this social infrastructure, in which the role of the trade unions was a key point. It also stressed the issue of disinvestment, and references to this question were also found in the Report's section on action by the Commission on Transnational Corporations, which his organisation warmly supported. It was noted in the Report that disinvestment had been slowing down. It was also pointed out that there had been a recent trend for companies to withdraw formally but, through different arrangements (control of technology, licensing, trade, subcontracting and so on), to maintain their presence in reality. According to a recent OECD study, control of technology could be a much more important factor in the presence of a transnational corporation than the amount of capital or direct ownership. More detailed reports were needed on all aspects of the withdrawal process. Pressure should be maintained on the United Nations Commission on Transnational Corporations in this respect. As to the question of boycotts and who suffered most, an ICFTU poster contained the slogan "Sanctions don't hurt, apartheid does". The basic challenge remained that of how to fight apartheid in a way that would help to establish a just system when apartheid was dismantled. It was to be hoped that this would take place in Namibia, and in Finland ways of meeting the new needs were being sought.

13. The Workers' member of the Netherlands said that the Special Report of the Director-General did not give cause for self-congratulation on progress made either by employers or by governments. The workers also should intensify their activities against apartheid. The world as a whole was letting South Africa down. The Netherlands Government had not replied individually to the questionnaire but through the European Community, although it had been stressed that countries should reply individually. The Dutch Employers had not replied at all for many years and many employers' organisations had not responded to the Office questionnaire. Decisions had been taken last year on government action to deny the use of transport and other facilities which could be used to circumvent sanctions against South Africa. However, some airlines had advertised openly in South African papers, including KLM, after United States airlines had ceased operating South African routes. The Dutch Government had provided no information on this, and as it was not present in the Committee this gave rise to a situation which was unacceptable to his organisation. He noted too that there was no reply from the Dutch Government on the question of coal imports. Finally, he asked what had the employers really done to promote the liberty of workers in South Africa and to diminish the threat to their lives?

14. The Workers' member of Mozambique said that the apartheid regime had been condemned by the international community as a crime against humanity, yet it still prevailed owing to support from external forces. Current developments in southern Africa showed that the survival of South Africans and Namibians depended on a collective international and regional approach to eliminate the system of apartheid and on the implementation by all the social partners of the updated ILO Declaration against Apartheid. It was well known, he said, that Mozambique and Angola were the principal targets of atrocities, terrorism and economic destabilisation perpetrated by the apartheid regime. Recent statistics showed that because of war there were more than 800,000 displaced Mozambicans living under hard conditions in neighbouring countries; between 5 and 9 million displaced persons in the country were affected by famine, disease and lack of clothing. Two thousand and forty nine rural primary schools had been destroyed; 720 rural health centres and 44 enterprises had also been destroyed, leaving millions of people and workers without health care or employment. More than 1,300 units of transport had been burnt by apartheid forces. It was shocking and horrifying to see how some countries were still supporting the apartheid system which had been condemned by the international community. He therefore appealed strongly to the ILO and its social partners to implement fully and in good faith the Declaration on Action against Apartheid. This could be achieved through disinvestment from South Africa; investment in the front-line States, particularly Mozambique and Angola; financing the projects of the Southern African Co-ordinating Conference (SADCC); financing reintegration projects for the displaced persons in Mozambique and the Mozambique Workers' Organisation (OTM) project for the absorption of miners returning from South Africa. He commended the Director-General's Special Report and hoped that the Committee would produce concrete conclusions to hasten the end of the apartheid system in South Africa and Namibia.

15. The Workers' member of Switzerland, referring to the remarks of the Vice-Chairman of his group about the increase in trade between Switzerland and South Africa, stated that the Swiss Workers' delegation strongly denounced the support given to the apartheid regime by Swiss industrial, financial and commercial interests. He stressed that it was particularly shocking that the Union Bank of Switzerland, to which the Committee had already asked the Office to provide an alternative, was in evidence at the Conference while the relations which this bank maintained with South Africa – especially as regards the gold market – had been condemned by the Committee and by the Conference in plenary session. He requested that the Office should take steps so that next year a different bank would be at the disposal of delegates on the premises where the Conference was taking place. The speaker pointed out that the President of the Swiss Confederation, at the press conference which followed his speech to the Conference on 8 June, had told a journalist who was questioning him on the profit which the Swiss made from the boycotting of trade with South Africa by other States, that it would be deplorable if Switzerland were to benefit from the boycott maintained by others.

16. The Workers' member of the United States stated that the Committee had performed its work well since it was set up, but that the message had not gone home. For example, between 77 and 85 United States corporations had spent US$27 million on programmes for Black people in South Africa but during the same period US$8 billion in total taxes had been paid to the South African Government. The AFL-CIO had applauded the passage of the United States Comprehensive Anti-Apartheid Act but what they had hoped would be a temporary pressure tactic to force the South African Government to abandon its policy of Black disenfranchisement had disintegrated into a meaningless debate over the effectiveness of sanctions, especially as these were limited, were not vigilantly monitored, and were not adopted on a broad international scale where they were nullified over time by market forces. Unfortunately, sanctions had distracted the attention of many in the international community from the realities of apartheid. Regressive reform and repressive change were occurring. The answer to South Africa's plight could only be found internally, with the full participation of all people and organisations who professed to have the best interests of South Africa at heart. The nature of their support would continue to be dictated by the expressed needs, positions, and resolutions of the trade union movement. They would continue to call for the strongest sanction methods along with vigilant monitoring to ensure compliance. South African trade unions demanded negotiated disinvestment, and disinvestment without negotiations with the workers only resulted in a loss of hard-won gains. An analysis of United States Government trade data revealed that a blatant failure to monitor and enforce the Act has allowed the flow into the United States of more than US$130 million in embargoed goods from South Africa since the ban on imports was enacted. A ban on textile imports became effective on 31 December 1986. During the first six months of 1987, $1.3 million in wearing apparel and accessories, $1 million in raw textile fibres and $970,000 in yarns, fabric and textile articles entered the United States. Also during the first six months of this year $59.4 million worth of banned iron and steel entered the United States market in direct contravention of the law. These failures needed to be corrected. During the past year Black South Africa had continued to feel the weight and abuse of the apartheid system. Nowhere was this more evident than in the labour movement. During the past year, union officials and members had been arrested and detained, most often without charges, union officials had been denied permission to leave the country on legitimate trade union business; union newspapers had to clear government censorship before distribution; union publications had been confiscated and restricted from circulation; union offices had been bombed and officials subjected to constant harassment; union meetings had been banned, disrupted and bugged; legal strike activity had been subjected to government intervention and efforts at intimidation, union negotiations had been thwarted by government complicity with employers, union activity had been under constant legislative scrutiny in an effort to control, manipulate and minimise strong and independent trade union development. The White electorate continued to be controlled by a political machine intent on maintaining its power position. Apartheid must be totally dismantled by the Government of South Africa before reform could be achieved, because the Black population could not engage in a dialogue, thus opening the door to change, the enfranchisement of all people, and the creation of a non-racial society. The South African Government was the principal target of this pressure because of its absolute control of the political process and almost absolute control of the economic system. Most concern for the economies of South Africa had focused on foreign companies doing business there. Less attention had been given to the Government's almost total domination and/or control of certain vital sectors of the economy. While the political control by the Government over all aspects of the lives of the Black population had been well documented, the same Government's domination of the economy was less well known. It was precisely this economic dominance which needed to be attacked. By depriving the racist South African Government of markets, avenues of trade, sources of foreign exchange, media of promotion, doors of access, and loans and other financial survival mechanisms, it was possible to isolate and force the hands of that racist Government. The Anti-Apartheid Act of 1986 had been merely the first step in this process; it was clear that the Act had not been successful owing mainly to lack of enforcement, and as a result there was a great deal still to be done to remove the large-scale financial and trading assistance which continued to be used to the detriment of the Black population.

17. The Employers' member of India observed that despite the considerable criticisms levelled against the apartheid system over several years, the South African Government had not shown preparedness to do anything about its apartheid policy. He attributed this intransigence to the minority Government's fear that it would lose power if it gave equal rights to all its people. Furthermore, the great powers such as the United States and the United Kingdom did not want to adopt sanctions against South Africa. He urged that the Committee should develop more effective forms of collective action which would make it difficult for the South African Government to continue its apartheid policy, and reminded the Committee about the measures adopted by the Government, employers and workers of India over the years against apartheid, including the termination of trade and other links with South Africa. He observed that the situation would improve if the world community adopted stronger action.

18. The Government member of Cuba expressed satisfaction with the Special Report which clearly showed the suffering, violence, impoverishment, detention, unemployment, illiteracy, illness and death inflicted by the apartheid regime. He further stressed that when people were engaged in a just struggle nothing could hold them back, as had happened in Namibia. He referred to the battle of Cuito Cuana-vale, in the course of which Angolans and Cubans repulsed the South African military forces which had forced the South African Government to the negotiating table. He pointed out that the Government of Cuba was rigorously respecting the programme of withdrawal of its forces from Angola under the supervision of the United Nations. He stressed the need for the strict application of resolution 435 of the Security Council, and requested the ILO to send a delegation to Namibia to assist in monitoring the elections in order to ensure that they were conducted freely and fairly.

19. The Government member of Senegal indicated that the Special Report constituted a basis for meaningful discussions, as it provided a thorough analysis of the different features of apartheid, particularly as regards the economy. It detailed the worsening situation under apartheid and the suffering of the Black workers, though it also showed a greater trend towards participation in trade unions by Black workers. He drew attention to the fact that the Government of South Africa had systematically resorted to the use of police to deal with labour relations conflicts; attacks had also taken place in the townships. The struggle of Black South Africans had continued while the apartheid regime bore responsibility for the increase in violence. He noted that the state of emergency declared in South Africa had, inter alia, escalated and promoted the repression and detention of trade unionists and others. He indicated that there was a possible solution to the South African problem that could avoid a racial explosion. In this context, he mentioned that negotiations would have to be entered into between the Pretoria authorities and workers and the democratic movement in the country. Before such negotiations could begin, Nelson Mandela and other political prisoners would have to be released. He pointed to the support which the South African Government continued to enjoy from certain foreign powers which had allowed it to continue violating international law. Effective global sanctions had to be applied and many internal difficulties had to be overcome before the majority of South Africans could enjoy social and political rights. He referred to the Government's misinformation and distortion of the truth in order to create the false impression that reforms were taking place, but pointed to the increasing awareness about apartheid in the various regions of the world and the role of non-governmental organisations and churches in this regard. He observed that the process towards independence in Namibia could also hasten the eradication of apartheid in South Africa.

20. The Employers' member of Zimbabwe expressed satisfaction with the commitment to the struggle against apartheid articulated by the members of the Committee. He recommended that the struggle be intensified and observed that action could be undertaken on three different levels – by the ILO, the tripartite members, and individuals. In this context, he drew attention to the serious problem of refugees in southern Africa, in particular in Mozambique, in Malawi and in Zambia, and appealed for financial and other forms of assistance for these. Furthermore, he called for assistance to Namibia and its people in the process of reconstruction after independence. He challenged the trade unions to help their counterparts in Namibia without waiting for corresponding action by employers and governments. With regard to the South African situation, he reiterated the need for sanctions and urged the Director-General to speed up the establishment of the group of independent experts and the commencement of their work. He also urged members to intensify their pressure on governments, employers' organisations and the trade unions to declare their positions on economic sanctions and to implement and observe them with vigour. He was of the view that with current developments in Namibia, there was a greater possibility of change also occurring in South Africa.

21. The Workers' member of Bulgaria observed that little progress had been achieved in the struggle against apartheid despite the lengthy speeches made against it. He emphasised that in addition to the efforts made through the ILO, further action was required to speed up the eradication of apartheid, observing that sanctions could have an impact if they were fully implemented, and recommended that action at the international level should be better co-ordinated. He also proposed that one day of the year be declared and observed as an international day of action against apartheid. Furthermore, he suggested that ILO action against apartheid should be more widely publicised. He requested the tripartite members to make greater efforts to respond to the questionnaire seeking information on action taken against apartheid. He expressed satisfaction with the unanimity exhibited within the Workers' group. Regarding Namibia, he noted the progress towards independence and pointed out that this derived from the improvement in the political situation in the rest of the world, which had made the resolution of regional conflicts possible. He called upon the ILO to provide technical assistance to Namibia to help in its reconstruction efforts.

22. The Workers' Vice-Chairman pointed to the effect that their earlier interventions had had on Employers' and Government members of the Committee who had begun to turn their attention to finding solutions to some of the problems which had been exposed during the course of the discussions. However, these called not just for reflection but for concrete solutions to real problems like that which had emerged in a message just received from the Media Workers Association of South Africa, whose office had been attacked and whose publications had been seized by the police while some of its leaders had been put in detention. This was the dramatic reality of the situation and called for a direct response concerning action of the kind which had been noticeably absent from the replies to the questionnaire distributed by the Office.

23. The representative of the Organisation for African Unity congratulated the Director-General on the quality of his Special Report, which analysed and examined all aspects of the evolution of apartheid; it took into account factors which might be contributing to the maintenance of apartheid or even its strengthening, as well as those which were concerned with its weakening and its elimination. The very laudable evolution which it demonstrated was worthy of the Committee's encouragement. In conformity with the Declaration which had been updated last year, the Special Report contained a large section on Namibia. It brought out the enormity of the apartheid regime in South Africa as well as in Namibia. The OAU was grateful to the ILO for its action against the system of apartheid and for the multi-form assistance which it gave to the Black peoples of South Africa and Namibia, particularly in the fields of vocational training and rehabilitation of workers. As the Chairman had pointed out in his opening speech, each year that passed by without the elimination of apartheid was a year too many, a year of suffering, of shame and humiliation for the victims of this tragedy but also for the whole of the human race. That was why the international community considered apartheid to be a crime against humanity, to be fought by every possible means. The speaker mentioned the statistics contained in the Report: up to August 1988, 32,000 arrests had been made under the state of emergency which had been in force since 1986, while an estimated 18,000 people had been detained for more than 30 days without charge. Moreover, numerous trade unionists and workers had been dismissed and sent back to the Bantustans where they had no family ties and no hope of finding any employment. He recalled that apartheid was sustained by the collusion of certain powers who profited from this unhealthy, immoral and reprehensible alliance. The OAU appealed to these powers to yield to reason and use their privileged position in international circles to create conditions of peace and security which would allow the South African peoples of all races to live together in dignity, equality and harmony. The speaker was convinced that peace was possible in South Africa and that the parties concerned could reach agreement. The example of the situation in Zimbabwe was evidence of this. The speaker recalled the declaration made by the Assistant Secretary-General of the OAU, Dr. Mapuranga, at the plenary session of the Conference, according to which conditions favourable to peace must necessarily include the unconditional release of political prisoners including Nelson Mandela, the lifting of the ban on anti-apartheid movements, the withdrawal of South African troops from the Black townships and the cancellation of the state of emergency. The OAU was, for its part, prepared to examine the possibility of negotiation. It would continue to support the struggle for freedom of the Black people of South Africa until the unavoidable destruction of apartheid was achieved. With regard to Namibia, the speaker recalled the efforts made by the OAU to support SWAPO and indicated that a group of high-level OAU officials had been requested to participate with representatives of the United Nations in the monitoring of the elections in Namibia, so as to guarantee that they were carried out in a peaceful and orderly manner. He also mentioned that the leadership of the OAU had decided to co-ordinate the activities of anti-apartheid movements in Africa, and had in Brazzaville, Congo, last January, created an African anti-apartheid movement which had already demonstrated its dynamism. Finally, he expressed the wish that the Committee should adopt strong recommendations on the elimination of apartheid in South Africa and in favour of accelerating the independence process in Namibia. He felt that in this anniversary year of the ILO all recommendations adopted by the Committee against the greatest plague of our time should be adopted unanimously.

24. The Government member of the USSR stressed that international negotiations had permitted the liberation of Namibia, which was proof that when all parties show good will, it was possible to obtain results which would lead to peace. In this respect the efforts of the international community, the United Nations and also the ILO had been rewarded. The Special Report contained substantial information on apartheid but it had to be noted that the situation in South Africa had not changed in a favourable sense. On the contrary the state of emergency had been extended and the process, though modest, of increasing flexibility had slowed down and unemployment had increased. With regard to the impact of sanctions, the speaker recalled that COSATU and NACTU were in favour of the application of sanctions as shown in the Special Report, and that sanctions were the subject of a paragraph of the Conclusions drawn up by the Committee last year. They had not been put into practice and it was to be hoped that the group of independent experts would be capable of useful work in this respect. The speaker recalled that the Government of the USSR was in favour of the struggle against apartheid, whose very existence was a threat not only to peace but also for world security as well as being a crime against humanity. On the subject of the statement made by the Workers' Vice-Chairman according to which there was reportedly some trade between South Africa and the USSR, the speaker declared that the USSR applied the Security Council resolutions and supported the application of sanctions, with which it had always complied. No secret transaction had taken place between the two countries. The USSR gave unfailing support to the front-line States, by means of financial contributions to the AFRICA Fund. So long as peace and justice did not reign in South Africa, it was the responsibility of nations to do their utmost to contribute to that end. The USSR was in favour of a just settlement in this region and joined with the rest of the international community in speaking in favour of the release of political detainees, and in particular Nelson Mandela.

25. The Employers' member of Lebanon noted that, according to the Director-General's Special Report, the South African economy had not shown any positive development. Indeed, the increase in military and related expenditure had taken place at the expense of economic and social development. Moreover, the system was obliged by its own abuses to use the corruption of officials as a means to hide its guilty practices. It must be noted that any organised trade union pressure was violently repressed, something that could only be deplored. Nevertheless, one had to be conscious of the fact that the situation could be worse if the international community did not do everything in its power to combat the racism practised by the South African Government. Consequently, stronger and stronger condemnation of the regime and increased action towards positive results were required, not only in South Africa, but in any place where racism was practised. In supporting the decision to set up a group of independent experts, the speaker trusted that that group would be able to increase the pressure exerted on the apartheid regime.

26. The Workers' member of Zimbabwe underlined the importance attached by the front-line States to the deliberations of the ILO Committee on Apartheid. Expressions of good intention should not be interpreted, however, as helplessness. There were two dimensions to apartheid, internal and external. The Director-General's Special Report touched on some salient points: repression and suppression, wanton killing of children, the double suffering of the Black workers from racial domination and class exploitation. The regime commanded a formidable force in the region which allowed it to destabilise front-line States by direct attacks and threats. The root cause of the support and strength of this regime must be sought out. Apartheid survived because capital supported the regime, through transnational corporations which sustained the system. How else could employers support the amendment of the Labour Relations Act which would suppress trade union activity? Military and financial support by western governments was also sustaining apartheid, which was why there was a need for commitment to a minimum platform of proposals to avoid the armed struggle which some believed to be the only way to destroy apartheid. He proposed a number of concrete measures: first, the ILO should set up a team of experts to monitor those nations which committed themselves to a programme of action; secondly, efforts should be made to alleviate the immediate suffering of refugees through material aid; thirdly, trade union assistance should be increased to trade unions in South Africa and the front-line States to increase mobilisation of the workers, as the trade unions remained the only peaceful option for challenging the economy on which the regime and its supporters rely; fourthly, trade unionists must agitate in their own countries for increased investment in the front-line States; fifthly, in the advanced western States, trade unions must boycott banks and institutions giving financial relief to the regime. Here again constant monitoring and information were very important. On the question of sanctions, common ground could be found to rationalise different views. However, sanctions remained a very soft approach to the question of apartheid and would be of very limited effect, and that was why it was to be hoped that the Committee would be able to achieve such a focus. As the saying went, knowing something was not the same as watching and the front-line States were watching it happen.

27. The Workers' member of Japan stated that the Japanese trade unions, regretted deeply the relations existing between their country and South Africa, and that there was no tripartite representation from Japan in the Committee. Trade unions in Japan had appealed to their Government whenever necessary for it to take effective measures in favour of sanctions. Appeals had also been made to employers' organisations, naming firms and enterprises, a list of which had been supplied by the ICFTU. Unions had also appealed to the South African consulate in Japan - South Africa was not allowed to have an embassy in Japan. Personal contacts with South Africa were also being discouraged now as a result of the appeal made by the trade unions. He expressed concern over the situation in Namibia and expressed regret that the Government and the employers had not responded as the trade unions would have wished to the ILO questionnaire. Four major companies had agreed to cease trade with South Africa and, after the Conference, the trade unions would make a further appeal in this respect. At an ICFTU APRO conference held in Bangkok in August 1988, a resolution had been adopted on South Africa. A report from another source stated that Japan was one of four countries supplying military aid to the regime. This would also be the subject of a trade union protest. Apartheid should be eliminated as soon as possible.

28. The Workers' member of the Islamic Republic of Iran declared that in spite of many years of discussion, apartheid, this crime against humanity, still prevailed. Achievements relating to resolutions and the Declaration concerning Apartheid were clearly shown in the Director-General's Special Report, of which he quoted the first sentence: "The potential success of the negotiated settlement providing for the withdrawal of all foreign troops from Angola and the agreement to implement United Nations Security Council resolution 435 on the independence of Namibia were the only bright spots in an otherwise bleak year for the people of southern Africa". Unfortunately even this bright spot was clouded over. On the first day of transition to independence, conflict had broken out which, according to reports, was initiated and pre-planned by the racist regime. Early this year, more than 3,000 new conscripts were enlisted by the South African-financed South West African Territory Force (SWATF). SWAPO had brought this to the attention of the United Nations. Although the SWATF had been due to be dismantled in mid-May, South Africa had suspended its demobilisation process because of the outbreak of fighting. South Africa had outmanoeuvred all the parties involved in the Namibian conflict and had succeeded in sabotaging the United Nations peace plan. The report cited Namibia as an extreme example of colonial economy. Thirty-five per cent of its GDP left the country in the form of profits to foreign shareholders, whereas the majority of Black Namibians remained below the poverty line. The Black-White income ratio was drastic, being 1 : 25. Its imports covered 85 per cent of consumer goods, virtually all from South Africa. A similar situation existed in South Africa where unemployment ranged from 7.9 million to 9.8 million and it was estimated that 45 per cent of the economically active population were jobless. Ever since the declaration of the State of Emergency in June 1986, other developments that had occurred included an expression of guilt by the White Afrikaners' main church for its role in establishing and maintaining the system of racial segregation, and the staging of hunger strikes in protest against detention without charges. Fighting had taken place in Natal Province among the supporters of UDF, COSATU and Buthelezi's organisations resulting in over 2,000 casualties. The Black organisations must strengthen their solidarity since fighting amongst themselves would weaken the movement and delay the ultimate objective of a free South Africa. As Nelson Mandela said in a message to these groups: "South Africans should strive for peace among themselves and keep up their determination to bring about a new South Africa". David Webster, the human rights activist, was assassinated after completing a major report condemning the death squads which were stalking government opponents. Of the 61 anti-apartheid activists assassinated in South Africa since 1978, in only one instance had anyone been charged or convicted. The arms embargo on South Africa had been beaten by cheating, smuggling and taking advantage of legal loopholes. The United States, the United Kingdom, the Federal Republic of Germany, Japan, France, Israel and Italy were among those countries most helpful to South Africa. In view of the above facts, the speaker fully agreed with the Workers' Vice-Chairman when he said that all should do something because all were responsible, and he pointed out that the ILO had not even succeeded in preventing the UBS from financing and investing through loophole channels in South Africa. Last year he had proposed temporary suspension of membership of those countries who could but did not sever their co-operation with the apartheid regime. They supported their lucrative trade with the racist regime rather than the struggle of the oppressed people of South Africa. If their own interests were at stake, such countries sent thousands of troops to Vietnam, Afghanistan, Grenada, Argentina, Panama and Czechoslovakia or many warships to the Persian Gulf. Their intention was either to support or instal their puppet governments. These countries did not learn from history and, therefore, tended to repeat their action and faced the same consequences. The time had come for the oppressed people of South Africa to take action to reach their ultimate destination. They were free to choose their own means of struggle and their last resort was an arms struggle, in line with the United Nations General Assembly resolution of 5 December 1988. A group of church leaders had already warned that the world would see a blood bath if the international community did not take action against the South African racist regime. The world owed it to this courageous nation to stand by them and support them in their fight to erase the apartheid regime from the map of the world.

29. The Government member of Norway stated that the mere fact that the Committee on Action against Apartheid was a standing committee showed the importance the ILO attached to this issue. In addition to being a matter of human rights, the system of apartheid affected labour relations and the employment situation in South Africa – and up till now in Namibia – in a negative way. However, the Organisation had been seized with the question of apartheid since long before the establishment of the Committee, and this was the twenty-fifth Special Report on the application of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia. The speaker thanked the Director-General for a very interesting and elucidating report which had become a most valuable tool for the analysis of the situation in South Africa and Namibia, and for planning action to be taken for the eradication of apartheid. Last year a thorough examination had been made of the Declaration as it then was. The Committee had done some very good work and an updated and more powerful Declaration, this time including Namibia, had not only been presented to the Conference but had been adopted by the Conference without a vote, although this did not mean complete agreement by all the representatives from the whole tripartite system of the ILO. Even his own country had had to make a couple of reservations, but it was a powerful sign of the world's unified abhorrence of the system of apartheid, and of solidarity with those who suffered under that system of repression and commitment to the eradication of apartheid. There might be more or less strong disagreement on the ways and means to go about reaching that goal, but there was agreement on the goal of the Committee's work, i.e. the eradication of apartheid. This Committee, and specifically the Working Party, had an obligation to come up with specific recommendations which the plenary could then adopt and the Governing Body act upon. Norway – and the other Nordic countries – had adopted general economic boycott laws against South Africa and Namibia. They had, however, few illusions of the impact these measures might have on South Africa's Government. Therefore they called for mandatory and comprehensive sanctions by the Security Council as the most efficient means of eradicating apartheid. This would not be possible at the present time, however, and other areas had to be found which could gather maximum support, one such area being the supply of oil to South Africa. Indeed all five permanent members of the Security Council were in agreement that no oil from their territories should go to South Africa. A hearing held by the United Nations Intergovernmental Group to Monitor the Supply and Shipping of Oil and Petroleum Products to South Africa, held in New York last April, had dealt with this question and could also be followed up by this Organisation. The Workers' Vice-Chairman's criticism of the lack of seriousness in many of the replies to the ILO questionnaire was valid, and his delegation would support the idea of revising the questionnaire so that it became a more useful tool. There were several possibilities. As an example, it would be possible to have an annual theme regarding the particular sanction which should be pursued or to have specific questions to each country. This could be a possible task to be followed up by the group of independent experts for which the Committee had called last year. Norway had followed this matter with keen interest and hoped that the experts would be designated at the Governing Body's meeting immediately after this Conference. Last year's Conference also recommended several forms of action to be undertaken by the ILO, governments and employers' and workers' organisations. Areas for further study would be research into the gold market and the question of ILO banking relations. The speaker hoped that the Working Party would be able to identify specific areas to be followed up. Last year the Committee had also discussed the new South African Labour Relations Amendment Act. It would be of interest to this Committee to have some information from the Secretariat as to the position of the complaint by COSATU, which the Governing Body had referred to ECOSOC. Positive developments had taken place in Namibia, and the repatriation of Namibian refugees had now started, creating a new situation which presented another challenge to the Committee and to the ILO itself. The success of the Namibian independence process might be a greater blow to the apartheid system in South Africa than most sanctions, and constructive co-operation with the Government of an independent Namibia would undoubtedly be needed. Neither the front-line States nor the South African refugees should be forgotten. Bilateral support as well as support through the ILO's training programmes continued to be of fundamental importance for the construction of a southern African region that could develop in peace. The SARRED Conference that took place in Oslo last year on the plight of refugees, returnees and displaced persons in southern Africa bore witness to the grave situation in the region, and this Committee was one of the forums in which calls for help had to be answered, which was one reason why the Committee's responsibility had to be taken seriously.

30. The Workers' member of Italy commended the ILO for the production of the documentary film "Changing this country", which showed the life and working conditions of four Black workers in South Africa, and she requested that the film be publicised as widely as possible in member countries as it conveyed a powerful message. She informed the Committee on the various forms of action undertaken by the three Italian trade union confederations – CGIL, CISL and UIL – against the Pretoria regime. Although they had noted with satisfaction the Italian Government's acceptance of the principle of economic sanctions against South Africa, they had requested greater clarity and coherence. The three trade union confederations had demanded that the Government proceed independently to adopt mandatory economic sanctions against South Africa without waiting for a change of approach by those countries which continued to block such moves by the European and international communities. They had campaigned for a reduction in trade between Italy and South Africa, particularly in the principal areas of commercial activity covering investments by Italian banks, Italy's purchases of large quantities of South African coal and gold, and the illegal arms trade. With regard to Italy's imports of coal from South Africa, it was to be observed that the decrease was not sufficient to give grounds for satisfaction, as Italy remained the largest importer of South African coal in Europe and the second largest in the world, after Japan. The state-owned electricity generating board (ENEL) was the largest consumer of this coal. The trade union confederations had mounted protests against this trade in coal, and had approached Agip, Italy's state-participation oil company which was also a subsidiary of ENI, to clarify whether it owned shares in South African mining companies. If the reply was in the affirmative, they would demand that the company divest itself of the shares. Italy was a major importer of South African gold and, therefore, approaches had been made to the banks and the jewellery industry to stop trading in South African gold. In addition, there was the initiative taken by the Italian trade unions and anti-apartheid groups to collect 50,000 signatures in favour of new legislation that would prohibit all Italian imports from and exports to South Africa, and the granting of bank loans, and end all cultural, scientific, academic and sports co-operation with South Africa other than that involving aid to anti-apartheid organisations.

31. The Workers' member of China referred to recent changes in southern Africa, especially the agreement signed in December 1988 regarding peace in Angola and the independence of Namibia, as well as the commencement, on 1 April 1989, of the implementation of Security Council resolution 435. He attributed these positive developments to the 30-year struggle of the Namibian people under the leadership of SWAPO, and also to the support and solidarity of the international community, in particular the OAU, the front-line States and the ILO. He was disturbed to note the difficulties that still lay in the path to Namibian independence. He drew attention to the support and recognition SWAPO enjoyed, not only among Black people in Namibia, but also internationally, and therefore deplored the tricks being resorted to by the South African Government to avoid conducting free and fair elections in Namibia. He urged the Namibian workers and people, and the international community, to be vigilant, stressing that since the independence of Namibia was the desire of the people, it could never be reversed. He pointed to the worsening living and working conditions of the Black people in South Africa, the Government's repression of trade unions, and its acts of aggression against the front-line States which had led to strong resistance among the Black workers and people of South Africa and also pressure and sanctions by the international community. He drew attention to the current economic and political difficulties in South Africa which had forced the Government to seek the withdrawal of their troops from Angola and the announcement by the President that he would step down after the elections in September 1989. Reiterating the need for comprehensive and mandatory sanctions, he informed the Committee that the Chinese workers had always strongly supported the South African people in their struggle against apartheid and expressed appreciation of the tremendous efforts made by the front-line States and the ILO in support of the workers and other victims of apartheid.

32. The Workers' member of the United Kingdom pointed out that the Special Report showed that there had been both disappointments and successes in the struggle against apartheid. He commended the efforts made by the trade unions in this area. The British Trades Union Congress, for example, had monitored the events in southern Africa, given financial and other practical support to South African trade unions and their members, and brought pressure to bear on the British Government. The TUC had taken action to ensure that pension funds were not invested in South Africa and issued lists to their affiliates of British companies which did not pay living wages to their workers in South Africa. They also publicised in their journal the plight of trade unionists and other workers in South Africa. He urged the Employers' and Government members to make a greater contribution to the discussions in the Committee.

33. The Government member of France drew attention to the anniversaries this year of the French Revolution and the Declaration of the Rights of Man and indicated that this was the time to demonstrate more clearly that apartheid was unacceptable. Speeches were not enough, action was required. In this context he drew attention to the fact that France had stopped investments in South Africa from 1985 and the importation of South African iron and steel from 1986. Imports of South African coal had also been reduced recently. He reminded the Committee that France maintained no military co-operation with South Africa and did not sell it any arms or other military equipment. France had also been active in the anti-apartheid efforts of the European Economic Community. Regarding humanitarian aid to the victims of apartheid, he stressed that France had increased the level of cultural and technical co-operation with non-governmental organisations and anti-apartheid associations in South Africa. Such aid amounted to 18 million French francs. In addition, France contributed a further 2.2 million francs per year to the United Nations Fund for Action against Apartheid. He also expressed the commitment of his Government to Namibia's independence. In this context, it had appointed a permanent observer with the rank of ambassador to Namibia. He reiterated his Government's support for the setting up of the group of independent experts and urged that overlap between the work of the group and that of other international organisations should be avoided. He expressed his expectation that the Office would nominate the experts shortly after the Conference.

34. The Government member of Ghana expressed his country's appreciation of the efforts against apartheid outlined in the Special Report. The recent developments towards Namibian independence clearly indicated that apartheid could be eliminated in South Africa. He urged the international community to rally round the liberation movements fighting the apartheid regime and to provide them with the necessary material, financial and moral support, in addition to diplomatic and peaceful initiatives. Ghana supported the imposition of comprehensive and mandatory sanctions against South Africa, disinvestment, and assistance to trade unions and liberation movements in South Africa.

35. The Workers' member of the USSR drew attention to the fact that the current Special Report was the twenty-fifth. He observed that this year's report was weak in certain respects, and regretted omission from Chapter 2 of the response provided by the World Federation of Trade Unions, which had done a lot in the fight against apartheid. He added that the Report did not provide an objective assessment of sanctions against apartheid and tended to give the impression that selective, rather than global, sanctions would work. He regarded this as unacceptable, and reiterated the need for global sanctions. He expressed dissatisfaction with the low rate of response by governments and employers. He was, however, satisfied with the part of the Report dealing with Namibia and also with the ILO's technical co-operation assistance, but urged that more should be done. Expressing the hope that the group of independent experts would be constituted at the resumed session of the Governing Body and that other far-reaching and symbolic measures would be adopted, he urged the submission of Nelson Mandela's candidature for the Nobel Peace Prize and stressed the need for real action now, quoting a statement by Martin Luther King in support of this.

36. The Workers' member of Spain expressed full support for resolutions adopted by the ILO against apartheid. He informed the Committee that the Spanish workers had been complaining to their Government since 1986 about trade with South Africa. The Government's response had not been satisfactory and they had therefore decided to turn to the Committee. Spanish workers supported all measures against South Africa. He pointed to the important role played by the EEC in the action to isolate South Africa, but emphasised that they could do more to make the boycotts effective, as some EEC members still traded with South Africa. The volume of coal imported by members of the European Community from South Africa remained considerable. Spain, for example, had increased its imports of South African coal substantially, and might even be selling some to other European countries. He emphasised that the Government of Spain should respond more positively to the call for sanctions reiterated by the ILO Conference, especially as Spain occupied the presidency of the EEC.

37. The observer of the Pan-Africanist Congress of Azania (PAC) expressed satisfaction with the high quality and objectivity of the Special Report. He commended the unanimity exhibited in the Committee with regard to the proposals which had all been action-oriented. He referred to the deterioration of the situation in South Africa; the failure of the racist regime to review those clauses of the Labour Relations Amendment Act objectionable to the labour movement; the arrests and detention of trade unionists; the sentencing to death of 14 Black South Africans in the trial of 26 people in Upington for no more than being present at the scene of a crime, which in South Africa is known as "common purpose"; and the patrolling of African townships by racist troops. He also drew attention to the alarming rate of accidents and deaths in the mines, and expressed gratitude to the ILO for its technical assistance to the PAC in the fields of workers' education and vocational training.

38. The Workers' member of Yugoslavia, while expressing his satisfaction with the Special Report, observed that there was a need for an increase in the number of replies to the questionnaire and that the action against apartheid needed further consolidation this year, which marked the 70th anniversary of the ILO. In this connection, a number of significant measures should be deployed. He referred to the worsening situation in South Africa, including increased repression, violence, suffering and impoverishment, as indicated in the Special Report. He urged the international community to reinforce the measures taken with a view to intensifying the struggle against the racist regime. He called on the Committee to provide moral and material support to the workers and trade unions in South Africa and Namibia. He pointed out that the updated Declaration and Programme of Action had provided a further stimulus to the struggle against apartheid, and expressed support for the setting up of the group of independent experts to follow up and monitor the implementation of sanctions and other action against apartheid within the framework of the conclusions adopted by the Committee. Finally, he stated that the Confederation of Yugoslavian Trade Unions would follow keenly the actions adopted against apartheid, in addition to co-operating and showing solidarity with the South African and Namibian trade unions.

39. The Workers' Vice-Chairman recalled that the mandate of the group of independent experts had already been defined last year, in the conclusions of the report of the Committee. This mandate was to follow up and monitor the implementation of sanctions and other action against apartheid. This monitoring should particularly concentrate on the following tasks: to examine and evaluate the effects of present sanctions; to carry out feasibility studies and case studies concerning sanctions; to survey regularly and update the state of world trade with South Africa; to keep a register of investments and disinvestments in South Africa; and to publish, three times a year, the results of the research carried out. Moreover, the group of experts would supplement the ILO procedures already in existence. In so far as the nominations of the members of this group were concerned, it had been understood that before proposals were made to the Governing Body, consultations should take place. While it was true that no time should be lost in appointing the three experts, that should not be to the detriment of the quality of the persons chosen. The Workers' Vice-Chairman also recalled that at the beginning of the Committee's work he had requested an objective and sincere evaluation of the application or non-application of the Programme of Action. Unfortunately it had to be acknowledged that no progress had been made towards the abolition of apartheid, nor had there been any new initiatives, except on a very small scale, to increase pressure on Pretoria. Although the approaching independence of Namibia gave rise to satisfaction, that was only one aspect of the Committee's mandate. If the instruments already adopted by the Committee and the Conference concerning apartheid had been applied, and correctly applied, apartheid would now no longer exist. These instruments had, alas, remained a dead letter and it was scarcely possible to speak of sanctions. The speaker requested that the Conclusions of the Committee should report on this situation and he appealed for a renewed effort on the part of all constituent members. This effort should be measurable and quantifiable. He suggested that the ILO questionnaire should be modified in such a way that the constituent members would be forced to show what concrete actions they had taken to apply the Committee's recommendations. For example, the recommendation for government action in the field of tourism in South Africa should be followed up with concrete action. Certain countries should not be permitted to develop their airlines, as KLM and Lufthansa had done when other airlines, such as Pan Am, had withdrawn from South Africa following sanctions imposed by their countries. The speaker suggested that themes could be chosen for special campaigns in the context of the promotion of global sanctions, which would effectively activate concrete efforts; this could be included in the Conclusions of the Committee. He pointed out that the Workers relied on the co-operation of all the members present and in particular the Employers, to make the necessary commitment. Indeed, many measures were circumvented in order to enhance the financial interests of investors.

40. On behalf of the Employers' Vice-Chairman, the Employers' member of the United Kingdom declared that the Employers' group supported the position of the Workers' group concerning the mandate of the group of independent experts adopted by the Governing Body at its 243rd Session, held prior to the opening of the Conference. The group also noted the intention of the Workers' group to circulate proposals for possible conclusions. He stated that these would be examined with interest.

41. The Government member of Nicaragua expressed his total and unreserved condemnation of the apartheid regime. No other position could be taken in the face of this human drama. It was inexplicable that such a situation could occur in the twentieth century and it threatened to continue into the next century if a satisfactory solution was not found for its abolition. He noted that some governments, while verbally condemning the apartheid regime, in practice profited considerably from their trade relations with the same regime, thus contributing towards its consolidation. He called attention to the measures already mentioned which resulted from the racist policy of the South African regime. This regime was an affront to humanity and the civilised world of today and concerted efforts were necessary to eradicate it.

42. The Government member of India commended the Director-General of the ILO for the high quality of his Special Report. However, he expressed considerable concern over the further evidence it provided of the continuing deterioration of the situation of the Black majority in South Africa. He attributed the present turbulence in the labour field in South Africa to the perverse system of apartheid and to the Pretoria regime's continuing violation of trade union rights, harassment and imprisonment of trade union leaders, the ban on trade union organisations, and the general use of brute force by the regime to put down any kind of protest. Rigid press censorship in South Africa kept the world in the dark about the enormity of the crimes perpetrated by the racist regime against the majority population. He emphasised that the South African case was unique in the world since in South Africa racism and racial discrimination were the deliberate and acknowledged official policy of the State. No person and no country which believed in the United Nations Charter on Human Rights could ever compromise with such a policy. India had a long-standing commitment to the struggle against apartheid and had always been in the forefront of the international campaign against apartheid, being privileged to play a special and leading role in support of the long and valiant struggle of the majority in South Africa for human dignity and freedom. India had been the first country to impose sanctions against South Africa and it strongly condemned the evil of apartheid as entirely unacceptable. Apartheid had to be eliminated in its entirety. He called upon all governments, and on employers' and workers' organisations which had not so far done so, to join in imposing immediate, comprehensive and mandatory sanctions against South Africa. These, he emphasised, constituted the only peaceful means that could force the South African regime to dismantle apartheid. Any delay in ending apartheid would only lead to more bloodshed in South Africa, perhaps on an unprecedented scale. He added that trade union organisations, for example dockworkers' unions, could make their own contribution and deal a significant blow to apartheid by refusing to handle cargo from or to South Africa until such time as apartheid was dismantled. The speaker gave details of the AFRICA Fund which had been set up to channel urgently needed assistance to the front-line States and the liberation movements and to mobilise public opinion against apartheid. He informed the Committee that pledges and contributions to the AFRICA Fund had already exceeded US$422 million in cash and in kind, coming from 54 countries. This included a contribution from the Indian Government of approximately US$40 million. In addition, contributions by the Indian public, trade union organisations and others to the Fund had reached Rupees 23.6 million in cash. He appealed to governments, employers' and workers' organisations, non-governmental bodies and individuals to contribute to the AFRICA Fund and thus help in the struggle against apartheid. With respect to Namibia, he mentioned that the bloodshed which occurred at the beginning of April 1989 had been avoidable. Resolution 435 clearly needed to be implemented both in letter and in spirit. He regretted that difficulties were being created in the election process in Namibia and called for free and fair elections in Namibia so that a truly national and not a puppet government might emerge there. He pledged his country's full support to SWAPO in its struggle for Namibian independence and expressed the hope that all freedom loving people in the world would also afford it their support. As regards the group of independent experts to follow up and monitor the implementation of sanctions and other action against apartheid, he expressed deep regret that, despite the passage of one year, the group had not yet been set up. He called for the establishment of this group without further delay, adding that the independent experts appointed should necessarily have a clear commitment against apartheid.

43. The Workers' member of the United States said that for the past 30 years the AFL-CIO had consistently opposed the apartheid system of South Africa. In the struggle against apartheid, while the Committee was moving in the right direction, too many governments were side-stepping, or even worse stepping backwards. He emphasised that comprehensive and mandatory sanctions would work. It was clear that the even limited application of sanctions had had a profound effect on the South African regime. Since 1985, 330 American companies had withdrawn their interests from South Africa, leaving 140 companies. This was progress. Estimates showed that the net drain on the South African economy had been US$10 billion since 1985 out of a total of US$14.6 billion in foreign investment. In 1984, according to the United States Department of Justice, the South African Government spent US$54 million on the 37 representatives in the United States. Sanctions therefore worked. It was necessary, however, to remain vigilant, because there were still 1,267 foreign firms in South Africa, representing 20 countries of which five (the United Kingdom, the Federal Republic of Germany, the United States, Japan and France) represented 84 per cent of the total. During the period 1977-85, total tax of US$8 billion was paid to the South African Government by United States firms, while at the same time only US$200 million were contributed to programmes for Black people. In 1986, when the South African Government was most inclined to reform, it was desperate to reach financial accommodation with creditors who were hesitant on account of the immense political and economic pressure applied on the regime by the international community. But in 1987, when agreement had been reached with certain companies, the South African Government increased defence expenditure by 30 per cent and police expenditure by over 50 per cent. From the small number of employers represented in the Committee, it was clear that there was a lack of interest in change in South Africa. The AFL-CIO called on the present rulers of South Africa immediately to release political prisoners, to end bannings and restrictions, and to give full recognition to the exiled groups and other displaced South Africans who could not return to South Africa. It demanded the immediate abolition of all apartheid laws which prevented the growth of democratic organisations, restricted their movement or contact with the population, prohibited meetings and media coverage, and discriminated between population groups. It also demanded the immediate convening of a constitutional conference which would represent all groups to draft a constitution reflecting the needs of all people, and to eliminate the apartheid system.

44. The representative of the United Nations Special Committee against Apartheid drew attention to the fact that the South African Government had once again renewed the state of emergency, imposing the tightest censorship the country had ever known and extremely severe restrictions on hundreds of its opponents. Clearly, while the Government pursued its repressive reform programme the state of emergency would remain and violence would become institutionalised in South Africa. The Special Committee against Apartheid was convinced that the South African Government was unwilling to dismantle the apartheid system and grant the Black majority full political rights, and that its repressive reform policy was designed ultimately to give Black people limited political rights and preserve White minority rule. The Special Committee also believed that international pressure could be a catalyst to persuade Pretoria to create the conditions for a peaceful solution to the conflict in the country. International pressure must be targeted for maximum effectiveness in the most critical areas of the South African economy. The efforts of the Special Committee had recently been focused on the adoption of international measures to undermine apartheid while minimising the negative effects on the Black majority. During the last General Assembly, the resolution on the imposition, co-ordination and strict monitoring of selective sanctions had gained the support of the Nordic countries and of Australia, Canada and New Zealand. Another resolution, adopted by consensus, called for a Special Session of the General Assembly to discuss apartheid and its destructive consequences in southern Africa. The General Assembly had expressed concern at States that exploited the trade gaps created by the imposition of sanctions by other States; it had called on States that had increased their trade with South Africa to sever trade relations with that country. Those areas which had been targeted were trade in particular commodities, including coal and gold, as well as finance and transport. The arms and oil embargoes were subjects of particular concern for the Special Committee. In April of this year, the Inter-governmental Group to Monitor the Supply and Shipping of Oil and Petroleum Products to South Africa held hearings on the oil embargo in New York during which expert witnesses assessed the present oil embargo and made several important recommendations to strengthen it, including the adoption of legislation and/or comparable measures to impose an effective oil embargo, the enhancement of enforcement measures – particularly punitive measures against violators of the oil embargo – and the strict monitoring of the use of certificates of discharge. The Special Committee was following with close interest the Bundestag inquiry into possible violations of the arms embargo in the Federal Republic of Germany. It had also expressed its grave concern at the ongoing military collaboration between the governments of South Africa and Chile, in open defiance of the mandatory arms embargo. It was evident that measures adopted against South Africa had had an impact on the economy, in particular the sanctions on loans and credit and on new investment. The Special Committee agreed with the preliminary conclusions of the Commonwealth concerning the need to adopt effective measures against South Africa. The impact of such measures would be strengthened if they were co-ordinated and strictly monitored. In that sense, the Special Committee welcomed the decision to establish a special monitoring group of three independent experts to follow up the implementation of sanctions throughout the world. The group should, inter alia, look closely into the patterns of disinvestment by transnational corporations and consider seriously the specific demands of COSATU, in particular by its affiliates CWIU and NUMSA, regarding disinvestment by TNCs. Labour rights must be included in all sanctions or disinvestment actions as a prescribed method of complying with sanctions. The international labour movement had been crucial in generating public opinion that had exerted considerable pressure on governments to act against Pretoria, and the ICFTU decision to support a strong coal embargo was welcomed. The Special Committee agreed with the Commission on Transnational Corporations' report which concluded that international pressure may be applied through three ways: foreign trade, disinvestment and foreign finance. The report had gone on to suggest that the cessation of foreign trade and the cutting off of foreign finance would have a more immediate impact on South Africa's economy and, therefore, in terms of their effects, in forcing the Government of South Africa to abolish the system of apartheid. The report had, however, noted that the efforts of certain members of the international community could not be effective if they are counter-balanced by actions taken by other members of the community.

45. The Workers' member of the German Democratic Republic referred to the valuable suggestions which had been made for the improvement of the Committee's work. His organisation strongly supported the struggle against apartheid. As the Workers' Vice-Chairman had stated, the ILO should not relax measures to do away with apartheid. The discussion had shown that more effective sanctions could be adopted, which would correspond to the task of the ILO to impose measures against apartheid. In the past few years, there had not been much change in respect of apartheid. Systematic withholding of human rights had become commonplace. The apartheid regime was a threat to peace and to international security. Trade unionists were indignant at these measures. Labour laws deserved special attention, for they implied considerable restriction of employment and bargaining, and the ILO was the special standing organisation responsible for such rights. He expressed his organisation's commitment to giving further support in solidarity with the liberation movements in South Africa and Namibia.

46. The Government member of Bangladesh said that the work of this session of the Committee on Apartheid assumed particular importance, as it was the first meeting since the updating of the Declaration concerning Action Against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia. His delegation had carefully studied the Director-General's Special Report on the application of the Declaration and expressed its sincere appreciation to the Director-General for his detailed and informative report. The heinous system of apartheid had been universally condemned as an affront to human dignity and a crime against humanity. The South African Government stood isolated in the community of nations and was confronted with sustained and active resistance from the oppressed millions who had suffered too long as victims of the system of apartheid. An exasperated South African Government had been compelled to resort to more and more violent means of suppression. The Special Report of the Director-General had confirmed and established what had been predicted: socio-economic impoverishment and degradation of the South African people. According to the Special Report, the timid process of reform of the South African Government had come to a grinding halt. South Africa had continued to grow poorer year by year and the Black majority had remained the worst sufferers of the steady decline of the economy due to increasing isolation of the repressive Government in Pretoria. The Special Report also brought out the alarming continuation and institutionalisation of the apartheid system in the field of labour, employment and trade unionism. The time had come for the international community in general, and this Committee in particular, to reassess the present situation in South Africa, especially in labour and social matters. Bangladesh firmly believed that comprehensive and mandatory sanctions encompassing all forms of trade, financial transactions and technical, military, sports and cultural co-operation with South Africa was the sine qua non for success of international efforts to eliminate the evil of apartheid. Graduated action, selective embargoes or the provision of guide-lines for the operation of multinationals in South Africa would only help the racist regime to frustrate the impact of a comprehensive embargo, and would allow it to pursue its policy of apartheid, oppression and gross violation of basic human rights of the Black people of South Africa. Out of a sense of deep commitment to the cause of the oppressed people of South Africa, Bangladesh had, as a matter of priority, ratified the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination as well as the International Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid. Bangladesh did not entertain any sort of contact with the Pretoria regime. The total commitment of Bangladesh to the liberation of South Africa and Namibia, and the eradication of the curse of apartheid had repeatedly been demonstrated. Bangladesh had also actively supported all measures to assist the struggling people of South Africa, including their national liberation movements. Apartheid could not be corrected; it must be eliminated in all its manifestations. South Africa could not continue to ignore world opinion indefinitely, nor could it survive in isolation if international actions were devised with sincerity and applied with firmness. It was through international pressure that South Africa had finally accepted the United Nations Plan for the independence of Namibia more than ten years after its adoption by the United Nations Security Council. The same firmness needed to be demonstrated to the racist regime of Pretoria. In line with its general policy regarding apartheid and other forms of racial discrimination, and also in solidarity with Namibia, Bangladesh had decided to contribute to the United Nations Trust Fund for South Africa, the United Nations Educational and Training Programme for Southern Africa, the United Nations Fund for Namibia, the Nationhood Programme for Namibia and the United Nations Trust Fund for Publicity against Apartheid. Bangladesh had also contributed US$10,000 to the fund set up by the United Nations for the rehabilitation of Namibian refugees and exiles. As a member of the Council of Namibia since its inception, Bangladesh had been in the forefront of efforts to promote Namibia's independence. It had also contributed civilian and military contingents to UNTAG. Furthermore, it had decided to open an embassy in Namibia immediately after that country's attainment of independence.

47. The observer of Palestine made reference to the ILO's links with banks which maintained relations with South Africa and invested in that country. The speaker emphasised the importance of the ILO in enabling workers to enjoy their basic rights. Nevertheless, despite the meritorious efforts made by the Director-General in his Special Report, it was regrettable that certain enterprises refused to break off their relations with South Africa. Measures against apartheid were either too weak or even non-existent and South Africa should therefore be subjected to a total boycott. The speaker gave as examples the fact that certain Israeli municipalities co-operated with White municipalities in South Africa, the Israeli airline company had links with South Africa, and Israeli tourism in that country had increased by 11 per cent last year. Recently, it had been noted that South African experts were advising the Israeli army with a view to putting an end to the Palestinian people's "intifada". The same practices were carried out by Israel as those in force in South Africa and South African policy resembled Israeli policy in numerous respects. Both countries stood to be convicted on the same score. The speaker declared, moreover, that he hoped that the experts who would form the special group could soon be nominated.

48. The Employers' member of Kuwait attributed the worsening situation in South Africa to the non-application of sanctions and of resolutions adopted within the ILO. He pointed out that Kuwait had imposed comprehensive sanctions against South Africa since the early 1960s. He supported the proposal to establish an independent group of experts to monitor the implementation of sanctions and other action against apartheid throughout the world, and urged that the group should take into account all the suggestions expressed during the Committee's session. He expressed the wish that greater attention be paid within the ILO to economic relations between Israel and South Africa.

49. The Government member of Somalia regretted the lack of tangible progress made towards the elimination of apartheid since the updating of the Declaration in June 1988. This was clear from the contents of the Special Report. He urged the tripartite members of the ILO to take common and concerted action against the Pretoria regime to speed up the elimination of apartheid. He referred to the severe repression of the independent trade unions and their leaders in South Africa, the growing unemployment and poverty among the Black people, and the alarming number of industrial disputes reported in Chapter One of the Special Report. He reiterated his Government's support for comprehensive and mandatory sanctions. He deplored the assistance which some governments continued to provide to South Africa. He also regretted that no significant new sanctions measures had been adopted by South Africa's major trading partners and that the rate of disinvestment was slowing down. He reaffirmed the need for the international community to intensify its efforts and to impose comprehensive and mandatory sanctions as the most effective peaceful means of forcing the South African Government to change its apartheid policy. He expressed his Government's satisfaction with recent developments regarding Namibia and their support for the Namibian people in their struggle for independence under the leadership of SWAPO. He urged the international community to monitor closely the developments taking place in Namibia to ensure that the Pretoria regime did not thwart the process.

50. The Employers' member of Kenya expressed the view that many of the interventions made by members of the Committee had been short on action. He wondered what the individual members represented in the Committee had done outside the ILO and the United Nations system to eliminate apartheid. He urged the employers' and workers' organisations to put pressure on the governments which continued to oppose sanctions. He informed the Committee about efforts made in Kenya against the apartheid regime and to assist the victims of apartheid, and called on others to follow this example. Regarding Namibia, he drew the Committee's attention to the fact that Kenya had contributed part of the peace-keeping force and also continued to provide assistance to the people of Namibia through SWAPO.

51. The Workers' member of Angola corrected a mistaken impression contained in the Special Report regarding the reasons underlying his Government's invitation to Cuba to send forces to assist them in Angola. This would not have been necessary without the undeclared war waged by the racist regime in South Africa against Angola. He stressed that Angola's problems with UNITA were internal. He clarified that the Cuban and Angolan delegations involved in the negotiations which resulted in the signing of the Accords in New York always sought the agreement of SWAPO. He reminded the Committee that Angola had made enormous sacrifices in the war of liberation for Namibia and had no intention of interfering in the internal affairs of an independent Namibia. After the outbreak of fighting between SWAPO and South African forces at the start of the peace process, the Angolan Government had played a significant role in ensuring the return of the SWAPO combatants to Angola. Finally, he indicated that the abolition of apartheid laws and the declaration of an amnesty in Namibia constituted an important step in the process towards Namibia's independence and would certainly have repercussions in South Africa. He reaffirmed the Angolan Government's commitment to support SWAPO and the ANC until the total independence of Namibia and the abolition of apartheid in South Africa.

52. The Government member of the United States informed the Committee about the multi-faceted approach adopted by his Government to end apartheid. His Government embargoed the sale of military equipment to South Africa in 1963, and imposed further restrictions through the Comprehensive Anti-Apartheid Act of 1986. It had also provided US$26 million to assist the victims of apartheid. In defending his Government's continued diplomatic presence in South Africa, he emphasised that this had allowed them to monitor and intervene in support of anti-apartheid activities. Recent visits by leading activists from South Africa like Archbishop Tutu, Dr. Allan Boesak and Dr. Beyers Naude had led them to believe that they were onto the right course. Regarding the process towards Namibia's independence, he expressed the view that the implementation of the peace plan was progressing, and paid tribute, inter alia, to the role played by the Deputy Foreign Minister of the USSR in the negotiation of the peace plan.

53. The Workers' member of France made reference to the statement made by the Government member of France, especially with regard to the coal imports and military co-operation with South Africa. Concerning coal, he mentioned information provided by another worker member to the effect that it entered France through the port of Antwerp. It was as a result of the demands by French workers that the Government had taken measures to prevent the falsification of invoices that had allowed the illegal importation to occur without punishment. Regarding military co-operation, he recalled that the International Institute for Peace in Stockholm (SIPRI) had published a book in which examples of "covert" military co-operation with South Africa had been listed, including military aircraft and the armaments industry. Finally, he drew attention to the fact that the report on the code of conduct of French companies was the weakest among the 12 EEC countries. He indicated that the CNPF had not replied to the Office questionnaire.

54. The Government member of Spain, after briefly referring to Spain's position on the policy of apartheid in South Africa, pointed out that his Government had condemned, on several occasions before the United Nations Human Rights Commission, the system of racial discrimination. He drew attention to the recent worsening of the situation in South Africa, in particular since June 1986 when the state of emergency was declared. In this context, he observed that the international community needed to redouble its efforts in the struggle against apartheid. He referred inter alia to the recent communiqué by the meeting of the 12 EEC countries which had deplored the state of emergency imposed in South Africa as well as South Africa's lack of response to the demand that apartheid be ended. He drew attention, among other things, to the fact that, in practice, Spain had applied measures to change the situation in South Africa. In addition to the restrictive measures taken by the Community in 1985 and 1986, Spain had adopted a Legislative Decree in 1987 which regulated investments in South Africa. Finally, Spain had contributed to the United Nations' peacekeeping force in Namibia. He expressed his Government's readiness to adopt unilateral measures if South Africa persisted in its intransigent maintenance of the status quo.

55. The observer of the African National Congress (ANC) provided details about the intense repression being carried out by the racist regime in South Africa. These included a sharp increase in the number of people arrested, detained and on death row; press restrictions; denial of passports; banning of, and attacks on, the mass democratic movements and trade unions; the adoption of the Labour Relations Amendment Act to weaken the unions; a new Minerals Bill to undermine the health and safety measures the National Union of Mineworkers had been fighting for; and the South African Transport Services Labour Bill to break the bargaining power of the South African Railway and Harbour Workers Union (SARHWU); and the Post Office Services Act to limit the promotion prospects of Black workers. He highlighted the successful hunger strike, the joint campaign by COSATU and NACTU affiliates against the Labour Relations Act, and listed some of the gains made by the trade unions in wage negotiations and in consolidating industrial unions. Health and safety remained a major problem, especially on the mines. He stressed the need for mandatory and comprehensive sanctions and support for the front-line states and SADCC. He requested the ILO to mount a stronger campaign against the Labour Relations Act, and to support the alternative proposals being put forward by the trade unions. He called on the international trade union movement to refuse to handle South African goods, and on governments to close down South African missions, and for increased support to the ANC, SACTU, and COSATU. Other measures proposed included an end to loans and credits to the South African Government, emigration to South Africa, landing and airspace rights to South African airways, and sporting links, and the abolition of the death penalty in South Africa.

56. The Government member of the United Republic of Tanzania stated that his country attached great significance to the work of the Committee and the ILO's action against apartheid. He made mention of the support his Government had provided in the struggle against apartheid, pointing out that the frantic efforts being made by the South African Government were a clear indication that sanctions were having the desired impact. In this context, he referred to the information provided in the Special Report to the effect that South Africa had lost 7 per cent of its traditional exports and had been virtually excluded from the international loan market. He appealed to the tripartite members to intensify their sanctions drive and drew attention to the fact that the independent trade unions and other anti-apartheid groups in South Africa supported sanctions. He called on the Committee to direct its attention to the areas where more action was required, such as the trade in coal, oil, arms and military equipment, computers and technology transfer in general. He also urged the Committee to devise guide-lines for more effective initiatives in the campaign against South African coal exports. The market benefits to South Africa's competitors should be emphasised to strengthen the moral arguments in favour of sanctions. He reaffirmed the crucial role of an international monitoring mechanism to assist oil producing states in ensuring that their oil was not ultimately sold to South Africa, and called for an intensification of the campaign to persuade governments of countries used as centres for the circumvention of the oil and other embargoes to assume their responsibilities in the struggle against apartheid. Another possibility was the development of strategies directed at individual companies assisting South Africa in the energy field. He appealed to the Committee to call on South Africa's major trading partners to scale down their trade and to establish a data base on alternative sources of supply for key South African exports. This information should be disseminated in digestible form to importers of South African goods alongside recommendations to sever links with South Africa.

57. The Employers' Vice-Chairman emphasised that the Employers' group was in complete agreement with measures designed to destroy apartheid or any other system that rejected the principles and objectives of the ILO. The group expected all concerned to respect what they, in their own way, were doing to end apartheid, even where unavoidable constraints existed. He expressed sympathy with employers who, like workers, operated under trying conditions in South Africa. He emphasised that apartheid made it difficult not only for workers' groups, but also for employers to engage fully in their respective endeavours. The Employers' group would continue to co-operate in undertaking measures in accordance with the Programme of Action appended to the Declaration. He expressed the Employers' commitment to the dismantling of racism in South Africa, and in this connection he cited the positive role that members of the Confederation of British Industry (CBI) continued to play, inter alia, to improve the working conditions and career prospects of Black employees in South Africa. Conferences were being held at the CBI headquarters in London to examine ways through which British industry could assist in the development of trade relations with the front-line States. One such conference had already been held with Zimbabwe, and another was planned for Mozambique. Regarding Namibia, he proposed that the Committee recommend to the Conference and the Governing Body to amend the updated Declaration and Programme of Action to delete all reference to Namibia, once it became independent. The amendments could be discussed by the Governing Body and then submitted to the 77th Session of the Conference in June 1990 for approval. He called for technical assistance to Namibia on a tripartite basis and in such fields as education and training. He also requested an increase in ILO technical assistance to the SADCC countries covering, inter alia, small and medium scale enterprises and co-operatives. He reiterated the Employers' support for the formation of the group of independent experts. Finally, he emphasised the urgent need for continuous, comprehensive and decisive action by the international community against apartheid.

58. The representative of the Secretary-General, in responding to the various issues raised in the Committee, noted the important suggestions made to guide the future work of the ILO and its tripartite members in their action against apartheid. He confirmed that the Director-General had undertaken to try to submit to the Governing Body's resumed session proposals on the composition of the group of independent experts. In this connection, he assured the Committee that every effort would be made to nominate people of high calibre. He stated that the regrettable omissions from Chapter 2 of the Special Report had been rectified through the provision of additional papers to the Governing Body and the Committee, and expressed the hope that the governments and organisations concerned were satisfied. In response to a question which had been raised concerning banking facilities, he drew the attention of the Committee to the fact that the matter had been considered by the Programme, Finance and Administrative Committee of the Governing Body on several occasions, and that a special tripartite group had been set up by that committee to examine the matter and to keep it under continuous review. Concerning the study on the gold market, the Special Report indicated that preliminary consideration had been given to the matter by the Office. He suggested that the group of independent experts might give its guidance on this complex matter. He reported that the complaint made against South Africa by COSATU to the ILO concerning the infringement of trade union rights by the Labour Relations Amendment Act had been referred to the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations for referral of the question to the Fact Finding and Conciliation Commission of the ILO's Governing Body after the consent of the Government of South Africa had been sought. In response to the letters of the United Nations Secretary-General sent in July 1988 and January 1989, the South African Government had replied in February 1989 that the matter was "premature". In the light of this, the ECOSOC in May 1989 requested the Secretary-General to persist in his efforts to ensure that the complaint was referred to the Fact Finding and Conciliation Commission. COSATU had been informed of these developments.

59. The Chairman of the Committee noted that pertinent recommendations and ideas had been made in the course of the Committee's work by the different members, especially by the Workers' group. He expressed his wish that a consensus would emerge, and remarked that all the groups had noted with satisfaction that the group of independent experts whose mandate had been defined at the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference would be set up soon. He emphasised the importance of tripartism in the effective combating of apartheid at both the national and the international level, pointing to the positive developments in the situation in Namibia, and urged the ILO to maintain its vigilance in this regard. In that context, the technical assistance programmes, especially in the field of training, should be increased. He also noted the request for technical assistance to the front-line States, and the proposal to submit Nelson Mandela as a candidate for the Nobel Peace Prize. In addition, he suggested that a proposal should be made to the Conference to send a message to the South African President to free political prisoners, including Nelson Mandela.

60. The representative of the National Council of Trade Unions (NACTU) reminded the Committee that the gloomy predictions his federation had made the previous year had been fulfilled. In this connection, he made reference to the Labour Relations Amendment Act, continued violations of basic human rights, the renewal of the State of Emergency, harassment and arrests of trade unionists; and gave examples of the ways in which his organisation, officials and members had recently been affected. He expressed regret that there had been no progress on sanctions. He informed the Committee about NACTU's support for community action including its involvement in the campaigns to obtain clemency for the Sharpeville Six and the Upington 14. He reminded the Committee that the date, 16 June, was the thirteenth anniversary of the Soweto massacre. In this connection, he urged the Committee and the whole world to take drastic steps to avoid any recurrence of this massacre.

61. The Government member of Namibia, speaking with reference to the section on Namibia in the document complementing the Director-General's Special Report, expressed his delegation's reservation regarding the information provided therein. He was of the opinion that there were more appropriate reports on the labour situation than that produced by Mr. Wiehahn and regretted that these had not been cited. In addition, he observed that with the commencement of the peace plan for Namibia, considerable scope existed for the collection of data through the Office of the Special Representative of the United Nations Secretary-General in Windhoek, Namibia.

62. The Government member of Egypt said that, pending the imposition of comprehensive mandatory sanctions against South Africa, all States should adopt legislative, administrative and other measures in order effectively to isolate South Africa politically, economically, militarily and culturally, in accordance with the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly, and therefore supported the call for special target campaigns with the full participation of all constituent members of the International Labour Organisation to realise these objectives. Government members deemed it necessary that the recommendations regarding Namibia should not prejudice or interfere with the endeavours of the Secretary-General of the United Nations in implementing Security Council resolution 435, and appealed to all governments to give their full assistance and support to the Secretary-General with a view to achieving the full and unconditional independence of Namibia. Much concern had been expressed in the Committee over the continued financial and trade relations maintained by multinational enterprises with the South African regime which represented a negative impact on the international effort to combat apartheid. The work of the ILO in relation to apartheid would benefit from consideration of the relevant United Nations reports on South Africa. In this regard, the speaker drew particular attention to the report of the Special Rapporteur of the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities concerning the adverse consequences for the enjoyment of human rights of political, military, economic and other forms of assistance given to the colonial and racist regime in South Africa. The addendum of this report contained a comprehensive list of banks, insurance companies, firms and other enterprises giving directly or indirectly military, economic and other assistance to South Africa.

63. The Committee set up a Working Party to prepare the Conclusions of the Committee. The Working Party was composed as follows:

Government members: Cuba (Mr. Zamora); Egypt (Mr. Saadallah); India (Mr. Malhotra); Norway (Mr. Vollebaek); USSR (Ms. Alexandrova).

Employers' members: Mr. Banda (Zambia); Mr. Chanaiwa (Zimbabwe); Miss Hak (Netherlands); Mr. Healy (United Kingdom); Mr. Hernandez (Philippines).

Workers' members: Mr. Charlton (United States); Mr. Mabumo (Mozambique); Mr. Mercier (Canada); Mr. Tapiola (Finland); Mr. Yurgens (USSR).

Mr. Vollebaek, Reporter to the Committee, acted as Chairman of the Working Party, and subsequently introduced its conclusions.

64. The Workers' Vice-Chairman, while supporting the text of the conclusions, deplored the absence from the final version of the reference to capital punishment which had been in the draft originally submitted by the Workers' members. The Workers' group would continue to spare no effort to see capital punishment abolished in South Africa. He called on all members of the Committee to make every effort to obtain better replies to the ILO questionnaire and, above all, to ensure that all recipients reply. He appealed urgently to the EEC countries to reply individually. Action should be taken on the question of the UBS, since the publication by the ILO's bank of its investments in South Africa was a provocation. The Workers' group would have preferred a stronger formulation regarding the coal embargo, so as to avoid certain countries taking advantage of the embargo as had happened with the airlines, and to ensure full implementation of the embargo.

65. The Employers' Vice-Chairman stated that some members of his group (the members of the Federal Republic of Germany, the Netherlands, Canada and the United Kingdom) had reservations, especially as to those parts of the conclusions dealing with the Declaration and the Programme of Action in relation to which their organisations had some constitutional or corporate constraints or entrepreneurial policies that made it difficult for them to comply with the recommendations. He reiterated points made in the general discussion, in support of the proposal that the ILO should provide more technical co-operation to Namibia, particularly in the fields of education and training, and small-enterprise development in Front-Line states, so as to alleviate unemployment there, as well as the suggestion that the Declaration and Programme of Action should be amended when Namibia attained independence.

66. In the ensuing discussion on the draft conclusions of the Working Party, several Government and Employers' members expressed their support for the conclusions, and their hope that they would be adopted by consensus. The Government member of the German Democratic Republic stressed that the conclusions represented a compromise, but a good basis for action. With reference to the first paragraph of the conclusions, which made mention of the tripartite members who provided incomplete replies to the Office questionnaire, he proposed that reference should also be made to those members who submitted no replies at all. The Employers' member of India suggested that gold and other South African goods should be included in the paragraph of the Recommendations relating to embargoes. The trade unions should also refuse to handle South African cargo. Turning to the AFRICA fund, he suggested that an appeal be made to rich countries which had not yet made contributions. The Employers' member of Niger, in connection with the setting up of the group of independent experts to monitor and evaluate the application of sanctions and other action against apartheid, suggested that the Director-General nominate the experts as soon as possible. The observers of the ANC of South Africa and the PAC of Azania, expressing their general satisfaction with the conclusions, but regretting that the question of capital punishment had not been included, felt that the question of gold deserved more serious attention, and they pointed out that the national liberation movements had their own programmes against apartheid, and that sanctions were the minimum that they expected the international community to adopt. They strongly supported the proposal to submit Nelson Mandela's candidature for the Nobel Peace Prize.

67. The Government member of the United States indicated that, although his Government shared in the consensus on the conclusions, it also had some reservations. He observed that the Committee's deliberations had been reasonably free of vituperation and rancour. There had been a profound desire by delegates to see an end to apartheid. The deliberations of the Committee had been characterised by a spirit of collegiality. He noted that the Committee's conclusions had been free of potentially harmful rhetoric and that the discussion had centred on selective sanctions and the scaling down of diplomatic relations. The conclusions supported the role of the United Nations Secretary-General in Namibia. He explained that his Government's opposition to comprehensive mandatory sanctions and disinvestment was based on the belief that such actions would deprive it of its leverage, influence and ability to press for change. His Government believed that the dynamic interaction between the executive and legislative branches of government, as provided for in its Constitution, was the best means of formulating its policies towards South Africa. The severance, or the significant scaling down, of diplomatic relations would effectively deny his Government the ability to work for change in South Africa. In seeking peaceful change it was imperative to talk to the broadest possible cross-section of South Africans. In this regard, he referred to the recent meeting between President Bush, Archbishop Tutu, the Rev. Boesak and the Rev. Naude and to the invitations which had been extended to F. W. de Klerk, the leader of the National Party and to Mrs. Albertina Sisulu, co-president of the UDF. Furthermore, the United States Government intended to hold discussions with other individuals and organisations both inside and outside South Africa in an effort to encourage all parties towards dialogue, negotiations and compromise. He assured members of the Committee that, although his Government had a different approach, its aim was identical to theirs; namely, a peaceful end to apartheid and the creation of a non-racial and democratic society in South Africa.

68. The Committee adopted the following conclusions:

1. The Committee made a careful analysis of the Special Report of the Director-General on the application of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia, which constitutes a valuable source of information for the purpose of combatting apartheid. However, the Committee noted that not many measures had been adopted to comply with the recommendations contained in the Programme of Action appended to the Declaration. It further noted that the answers provided by a large number of constituent Members in response to the questionnaire sent out by the International Labour Office did not provide adequate information to allow for an objective and comprehensive evaluation of the implementation or non-implementation of the Declaration and its Programme of Action.

2. The Committee reconfirmed its conviction that the recommendations contained in the updated Declaration and its appended Programme of Action were most apt to bring about a speedy and non-violent demise of the apartheid system, if fully implemented by all constituent Members.
3. The Committee was nevertheless of the opinion that, in order to revitalise action against apartheid and send a strong message of indignation to the abhorrent South African regime, concerted targeted campaigns were needed within the overall framework of efforts in pursuance of comprehensive mandatory sanctions.
4. The Committee was concerned at the slowing down of the rate of disinvestment and, in particular, at the tendency of multinational enterprises to merely restructure their involvement so that they maintain their interests through non-equity linkages, such as control over technology, licensing agreements, management and technical assistance and distribution. It was also concerned at the increasing diversification of South African capital abroad and the lack of investments in Front Line States.
5. The Committee noted developments with regard to the long-awaited independence of Namibia, and discussed measures to promote the fullest implementation of both the letter and spirit of United Nations Security Council resolution 435.
6. In the light of the above, the Committee this year wishes to give special emphasis to the following recommendations:
 - (a) The Conference calls upon all governments, and employers' and workers' organisations and the International Labour Office to make a renewed effort to ensure that concrete measures are taken urgently to promote the progressive implementation of all the recommendations contained in the updated Declaration and its appended Programme of Action, as well as other action intended to end apartheid. For example, those governments which have so far not severed political and diplomatic relations with South Africa should begin implementation of this recommendation by downgrading their diplomatic missions in Pretoria and by insisting on numerical parity, in line with the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, for South Africa's foreign missions, which, in violation of that Convention, are spreading false information on the situation in South Africa and are also known to be the prime instigators of sanctions-busting.
 - (b) The Conference reiterates its appeal to governments to bring about:
 - an embargo on South African coal;
 - effective financial sanctions, aimed among other things at preventing the rolling over of existing loans; and banning all new loans and trade credits (i.e. foreign finance);
 - appropriate legislation to prevent the transport of oil to South Africa;

– an effective severance of air links so that certain companies cannot benefit from the withdrawal of others.

To this effect, the Conference calls for special target campaigns, with the fullest possible participation of all constituent members.

- (c) The Conference calls upon employers' organisations to urge multinational enterprises to disclose full information on the terms of disinvestment, including details of any links they intend to maintain with South African enterprises, and to negotiate the terms of disinvestment with the trade unions concerned.
- (d) The Conference calls upon employers' organisations to urge their members with subsidiaries in South Africa to refrain from utilising the anti-union provisions of the Labour Relations Amendment Act.
- (e) The Conference calls upon trade unions to launch campaigns in support of the demands made by the Workers' Summit, held in Johannesburg in March 1989, and to bring maximum pressure to bear on those employers that use the provisions of the Labour Relations Amendment Act against the unions.
- (f) The Conference calls upon trade unions to organise campaigns to prevent and/or expose attempts by South African multinational enterprises to take over enterprises outside South Africa.
- (g) The Conference calls for special concerted campaigns, by all constituent Members, to put pressure on the South African Government for the termination of the state of emergency and the release of political and trade union detainees as well as the lifting of all restrictions on those already released.
- (h) The Conference reiterates its call to governments, employers' and workers' organisations, non-governmental bodies and individuals to make every possible contribution to the AFRICA (Action for Resisting Invasion, Colonialism and Apartheid) Fund.
- (i) The Conference calls upon the International Labour Office to finalise as speedily as possible the report on the gold trade with South Africa, requested by the 75th Session of the Conference, identifying practical measures that could be adopted by constituent Members in this respect.
- (j) The Conference invites the Director-General to convey once again to the Union Bank of Switzerland its concern over the latter's continued support for the South African regime. In addition to the efforts of the special Working Party of the Programme, Finance and Administrative Committee of the Governing Body which has been keeping the situation of the UBS under review with regard to the possibility of finding alternative banking arrangements, the Director-General is also invited to explore alternative banking facilities in the Palais des Nations for delegates attending the International Labour Conference and to report thereon to the Conference Committee on Action against Apartheid.
- (k) The Conference notes with appreciation that, in compliance with the recommendation made at its 75th Session, a group of three independent experts will be constituted to monitor and evaluate progress made in relation to the application of the Declaration and of the recommendations of the Conference.

- (1) The Conference recommends that the format of the questionnaire on the implementation or non-implementation of the Declaration, its appended Programme of Action and the recommendations of the Conference be changed in the light of the comments made during the discussions in the Conference Committee on Action against Apartheid. In particular, a special section should be prepared on the basis of specific questions dealing with the special target campaigns decided by the Conference. To this effect, the International Labour Office should consult the group of independent experts.

Namibia

7. The Conference calls upon governments to support the Secretary-General of the United Nations in his efforts to ensure the implementation of resolution 435, including free and fair elections as well as a full and efficient deployment of the United Nations Transition Assistance Group (UNTAG).
8. The Conference calls upon constituent Members and the ILO to give the maximum support and assistance to the people of Namibia in order to promote the emergence of a strong democratic nation; and to support the formation and strengthening of independent workers' and employers' organisations, which are an essential part of the social infrastructure of an independent country. ILO programmes and projects for Namibia should be intensified for this purpose.

69. The Director-General of the ILO is requested to convey to the Government of the Republic of South Africa the deep concern of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference that no real progress has been made in the abolition of the apartheid system, and to strongly urge the South African Government to make a meaningful gesture of good will towards its own people as well as to the international community by lifting the state of emergency, releasing political and trade union detainees, and removing all restrictions on detainees who have been released. Such a gesture could eventually lay the basis for a dialogue which South Africa so badly needs.

70. The Committee welcomed the nomination of Nelson Mandela for the Nobel Peace Prize in recognition of the fact that violence is a feature of apartheid itself and not of those who stand for internationally recognised standards and principles that the International Labour Organisation upholds.

Report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid	1

Provisional Record

Seventy-sixth Session, Geneva, 1989

Twenty-seventh sitting

Wednesday, 21 June 1989, 10 a.m.

President: Mr. Delpino

RATIFICATION OF CONVENTIONS BY URUGUAY

Original – Spanish: The PRESIDENT (Mr. DELPINO) – Before we turn to the first item on our agenda, I would like to give the floor to the Clerk of the Conference for a communication concerning the ratification of Conventions by Uruguay.

Original – French: The CLERK of the CONFERENCE – I have pleasure in announcing to the Conference that the Director-General of the ILO has registered the ratification of the following international labour Conventions by Uruguay:

Rural Workers' Organisations Convention, 1975 (No. 141)

Labour Administration Convention, 1978 (No. 150)

Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151)

Hours of Work and Rest Periods (Road Transport) Convention, 1979 (No. 153)

Collective Bargaining Convention, 1981 (No. 154)

This brings the total number of acts of ratification of international labour Conventions to 5,437.

TENTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

Original – Spanish: The PRESIDENT (Mr. DELPINO) – I would like to give the floor now to Mr. Hammond, Government adviser, Canada, Chairman of the Selection Committee to present the Committee's tenth report.

Mr. HAMMOND (Government adviser, Canada; Chairman of the Selection Committee) – I have the honour to submit to the Conference the tenth report of the Selection Committee which is to be found in Provisional Record No. 41.

The report deals solely with changes in the composition of committees. I commend the report to the Conference for adoption.

Original – Spanish: The PRESIDENT (Mr. DELPINO) – I submit the tenth report of the Selection Committee to the Conference for discussion. If there are no objections, I take it that the report is adopted.

(The report is adopted.)

SECOND REPORT OF THE CREDENTIALS COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND NOTING

Original – Spanish: The PRESIDENT (Mr. DELPINO) – The next item on our agenda is the second report of the Credentials Committee. I give the floor to Mr. Califice, Government delegate, Belgium, Chairman of the Credentials Committee, to submit his report.

Original – French: Mr. CALIFICE (Government delegate, Belgium; Chairman of the Credentials Committee) – I have the honour of submitting the second report of the Credentials Committee, which you will find in Provisional Record No. 16.

This report deals first with the changes which have taken place in the composition of the Conference since the adoption of the first report.

The report then deals with a number of communications received by the Committee. As regards two of these communications there was no need for any action on the part of the Committee, which therefore merely took note. As regards the two other communications concerning the Workers' delegate of the Central African Republic and the Employers' delegation of Peru, which could have been considered as protests if they had been received on time, the Committee felt that they were irreceivable because they had been received after the expiry of 72-hour time-limit provided for in article 26, paragraph 4(a), of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

However, as regards the communication regarding the Workers' delegate of the Central African Republic, the Committee took note of the change of title of this person, which was subsequently communicated by the head of the delegation. As regards the communication concerning the Employers' delegation of Peru, the Committee drew attention to paragraph 17 of its first report where it was recalled that governments had the obligation to bear the travelling and subsistence expenses of their delegates and advisers, in accordance with article 13, paragraph 2(a), of the Constitution.

The Committee also dealt with a communication from the Officers of the Employers' group which set out numerous cases where the subsistence and travelling expenses of Employers' delegates and advisers had not been paid by their governments, and once again drew attention to paragraph 17 of its first report.

Since the decisions in this report were adopted unanimously by the members of the Committee, the Conference is requested to take note of the same.

Original – French: Mr OECHSLIN (Employers' delegate, France) – Speaking on behalf of the Employers' group, I would first of all like to thank the Credentials Committee, presided by Mr. Califice, for the work that it has done and which it will continue to do, and in particular for its response to the communication that we addressed to it.

We feel that the Credentials procedure is of capital importance to the ILO because, contrary to what happens in other organisations, it is not purely formal in nature but it is also a guarantee of tripartism. In order to be efficient, however, a certain number of procedures have to be respected and I fear that this has not quite been the case. I would like to give you some examples.

First of all, the procedure for the registration of delegations. We find, for instance, that a fortnight before the beginning of the Conference only 56 member States had submitted their credentials. We also found that the credentials of 26 Government delegates, 20 Employers' delegates and 16 Workers' delegates were filed only after the submission of the brief report of the Chairman of the Governing Body and that the brief report was only published 48 hours after the beginning of the session. This, we feel, is much too late for real monitoring to take place. It seems to us that the Standing Orders should be revised in this respect to ensure that this report is submitted much earlier.

Furthermore, at least 16 countries submitted lists including the names of Employers' representatives; however, these lists included no mention of the functions carried out by these Employers' delegates, so that it was impossible to exercise any control as to whether they had been nominated according to the relevant provisions of the Constitution.

We must also note that only 235 of the 278 Government delegates, 112 of the 142 Employers' delegates and 109 of the 144 Workers' delegates accredited to the Conference, had actually been registered. We wonder in fact whether in some cases registration had been carried out by someone else while these persons were absent from Geneva. This absence of accredited delegates is a problem that causes concern because it affects the balance of forces in plenary between the Government group and the non-government groups.

We think that many of these absences are to be explained by the fact that too many non-government delegates are absent because their travelling and subsistence expenses are not paid by their governments, in accordance with the Constitution. We have carried out a survey in our group and from the compilation of these replies we have found that 12 governments paid neither the travelling nor the subsistence expenses of the Employers' delegates. Among these, are Brazil, Colombia, the Dominican Republic, Lebanon, Madagascar and Peru. Five additional countries do pay travelling expenses but not subsistence expenses. Thirty-two countries, including the ones I have already mentioned, do not pay the travelling and subsistence expenses of certain advisers of the Employers' group. This affects 96 advisers in the Employers' group.

These are the results of the survey that we have sent to the Credentials Committee because that is the only body which is competent to examine this matter, in particular with a view to determining the quorum at the sessions of the Conference. We are satisfied with the report of the Committee as it is to be found in paragraphs 11 and 12 and we hope that this is only a beginning.

In the Employers' group there is a great feeling of concern about this situation which was reflected in the resolution which was well received by the Resolutions Committee and which has received high priority. This is a problem that is not only a question of justice but also a question of tripartism; if it is not resolved and if the situation continues to deteriorate, it would very seriously affect the balance of forces within this Organisation and therefore the smooth running of our institutions.

Once again, I would like to draw the attention of the Conference and of the Secretariat to this particular point and I would like to thank the Chairman and the members of the Credentials Committee for having assisted us and for having contributed to the solution of this problem this year.

Original – Spanish: The PRESIDENT (Mr. DEL PINO) – The second report of the Credentials Committee was adopted unanimously by the Committee. Therefore the Conference is invited to take note of the report.

(The report is noted.)

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

Original – Spanish: the PRESIDENT (Mr. DEL PINO) – We now move on to the discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Mrs. MOLKOVA (Government delegate, Czechoslovakia) – First of all, I should like to offer my sincere congratulations to Mr. Nkomo on his election to the responsible post of President of this Conference and to express the conviction that under his guidance all of us shall continue to work in a spirit of genuine and constructive dialogue which will help us to arrive at positive results.

In the year of the ILO's 70th anniversary the International Labour Conference has very important items on its agenda. The decisions to be adopted may affect the activities of the Organisation in many spheres for a number of years to come. The Director-General's Report not only summed up the experience gained in the field of social and economic development over the past decades, but it also outlined the philosophy of the Organisation's future activities.

The discussion on the subject of "Recovery and employment" can be understood as a continuation of last year's debate on human rights. For with economic growth a whole series of specific rights are connected: the right to work, to adequate earnings, to equitable working conditions, to social security. Economic growth can also provide the prerequisite for implementing civic and political rights. The indivisibility of both spheres emerged clearly already from last year's debate.

In several aspects, one might take a different view from that expressed by the Director-General in his Report. However, I feel that its main idea, that of the interconnection and interdependence of economic and social targets, should be definitely supported.

ed. We also share the view that the prospects of international co-operation, which in the world today form the basic premise of a harmonious development of the international community, will have a substantial effect on the climate in international relations. The ILO can contribute in no small measure towards the favourable trends which have been making themselves felt in recent years.

The Report emphasises the role of international labour standards on the national and international levels. Among the items where this Conference is to elaborate new standards, I should like to mention the one for which I, as a woman, feel a particular concern: the proposed revision of the Night Work (Women) Convention (Revised), 1948 (No. 89).

In Czechoslovakia, too, technological progress leads to pressures to extend night work to further industries, though, of course, its character changes and heavy physical labour is gradually eliminated. However, the essential difference in comparison with the majority of other countries is that in our conditions of full employment, the ban on women working night shifts does not constitute an obstacle to finding other suitable employment. All the same, we are in favour of supplementing the existing regulations in order to extend adequate protection against night work and its negative effects to all workers, regardless of gender, whilst respecting the needs arising from the maternity role of women. In particular, the protection of motherhood should be retained.

The problem of equality for women, of course, is not confined to night work alone. Hence we welcome the fact that equality is one of the priorities contained in the programme and budget of the ILO for the period 1990-91. Our Organisation has, among other things, an important role to play in assessing the first results of the implementation of the Forward-looking Strategy for Advancement of Women, adopted in 1985 by the Nairobi Conference. Also, great attention should be paid to the consistent application of the ILO Plan of Action in this sphere. We therefore welcome, for example, the intention to hold a tripartite symposium on equal opportunities and treatment of men and women in the industrial countries.

On this occasion, permit me to emphasise that the principle of equal rights for men and women has been incorporated in Czechoslovak legislation ever since the earliest years of Czechoslovakia's independence. The post-war establishment of a socialist social order provided the material conditions for implementing the principle of equality between the genders, and the status of women has substantially improved since that time. In spite of that, we still do not consider the contemporary state of matters to be fully satisfactory. Special attention will be paid to employed mothers and to their full realisation, even in professions requiring continuity over long periods. Our experience points to the fact that in countries with a high female participation in employment, efforts to give women equal opportunities can succeed only if favourable conditions are created for families with children. That means that family policy plays a marked and essential role in the equality programme for women, for a well-functioning family with good marital relations and equitable work-sharing can form the basis for women to play their full role in employment and in public life.

May I be permitted to announce that changes in our labour and social legislation made during recent months include a number of major amendments in favour of employed mothers and families with children, with the extension of paid maternity leave to 28 weeks, as well as the extension of leave to nurse a sick member of the family. In the latter case, the equality aspect is emphasised by the fact that this benefit applies to the father as well as to the mother.

Another salient item in the ILO programme for the forthcoming biennium is environmental protection. The validity of the Director-General's statement that "no one denies the urgent need to take strong measures to safeguard our environment" is confirmed by numerous resolutions submitted on this subject. Our delegation, which co-authored one of them, expects that the submitted texts will provide a sound basis for adopting a joint document guiding ILO activities towards these most burning issues. The environment knows no borders and hence forms a natural area for collaboration among countries with different social systems. In particular, this is true of Central Europe, where, from days of old, much industry and other influences are concentrated.

In emphasising that the protection of the environment objectively calls for closer European regional co-operation, I have to add that environment is by no means the only issue. Common demographic trends, the introduction of new technologies, similarities in legislation, in cultural traditions – all this affects to a greater or lesser extent the approach to economic and social matters and offers room for international co-operation. Also, the economic reforms carried out in the majority of socialist countries establish the need for wider exchange of knowledge in spheres connected with technological advance and structural changes such as training, retraining, management development, consulting services for enterprises, occupational safety, social security, etc. We welcome, therefore, the new arrangements concerning their convocation at regular four-year intervals. At the same time, I should like to point out that seven years will have elapsed since the Fourth European Regional Conference which, considering the speed of change on the European continent, is a very long time. This fact should be taken into account when planning the programme and budget of our Organisation for the years 1992 and 1993.

The 70th anniversary of the foundation of the ILO is an occasion for reflection, not only with regard to the history of the Organisation, but mainly concerning its future. However, the best answers to the questions which we asked in this connection will be given by practical action. The ILO is called upon to contribute to solving specific social problems, as well as to reinforcing a general climate favourable to international co-operation.

It is evident that developing international co-operation in economic and social matters will increase mutual respect, understanding and confidence among nations and thus exert a positive influence on the general international climate.

I take this opportunity to wish the new Director-General and all his staff every success in implementing the decisions of this Conference by future activities of the ILO. But simultaneously, I should like to stress that the main responsibility for the future of the ILO lies in the hands of all member countries, of each individual government, of each employers' organisation and trade union participating in the work of this Organisation.

Original – Spanish: Mr. GONZALEZ DUBON (Minister for Labour and Social Welfare, El Salvador) – In the name of the new Government of El Salvador, presided over by Mr. Alfredo Cristiani, and in the name of my delegation, allow me to express our greetings to Mr. Nkomo on his successful election as President of the 76th Session of the Conference. We wish him every success in conducting its business.

Likewise, I present warmest greetings to all the distinguished delegates, observers and invited guests who are participating in this session of the Conference.

I also congratulate the Director-General on his Report, which includes a very informed and detailed account of the noteworthy activities of our Organisation.

It is very interesting for my delegation to be able to participate in this international forum and exchange information and experiences on the struggle which all countries are facing in trying to overcome the complex problem of inter-relations between labour market supply and demand.

Therefore El Salvador, with its new administration, is attempting to implement, at the economic level, a plan of national recovery in order to achieve sustained growth and create an infrastructure which will allow us to implement a coherent national policy, in line with the character of our resources and our development objectives.

In this moment of special historical importance, when the President of our Republic, Mr. Alfredo Cristiani, is assuming power in the country in a legitimate manner, having been freely elected by the people of El Salvador, my country is facing with firmness serious political, social and economic problems. As our President said on 1 June in his inaugural address, we shall make every possible effort to achieve and maintain a vital rate of economic growth, based on four guiding principles: freedom, honesty, legality and security. These are the fundamental pillars of our new Government.

Freedom is characterised by the opportunity for all Salvadorians to express themselves, and to organise and participate freely at all levels of national life with the only restriction of respect for law, and the fundamental standards of our Constitution. As President Cristiani said: "We do not want to command, but to govern. We do not want to use force, but authority."

In order to eradicate the scourge of corruption of the former government, the Government of President Cristiani has imposed on itself the utmost integrity of conduct, which must be the rule in both personal and social life.

In the area of security, the Government intends to give the productive sector sufficient guarantees so that it may create opportunities for employment within a climate of confidence. To do this, the law will be applied with restraint, without hesitation or anger; we shall be firm in adversity. We are implementing a plan of national recovery within the framework of progressive liberalisation of economic activity in order to overcome the profound crisis which has led to levels of extreme poverty never before experienced in our country. This is due to the structural changes made by the former government, which ruined the nation's productive system by favouring disorder, corruption and poverty. All this was brought about by the violent actions of the terrorists against the economic infrastructure of the country. Our objective is to stabilise and readjust the economy, whose productive agents – the employers and workers – will act together within a climate of legal security to seek stable and just understandings. It shall be left to the Government to regulate relations between them so as to ensure the proper functioning of the economy and the restoration of social harmony.

The Government will also regulate the standards governing relations between capital and labour, thus stimulating economic and social forces within a framework of mutual respect.

Our economic policy will be one of progressive liberalisation so that the productive system may generate jobs, savings and investments. In fact, our main objective is the eradication of extreme poverty and the establishment of solid and peaceful bases in a society where everybody will have the opportunity of prospering and realising their full human potential.

The social programme of our country will be treated globally, but we shall start with a national emergency programme to generate productive employment and to unleash the creativity and energy of the Salvadorian people. Education is useless without health, health without food, food without work, and work without security.

We cannot accept that social harmony is based on violation of law and we are ready to work for all Salvadorians since the tasks that await us are enormous, and the responsibility must be shared by all.

Our Government has inherited an unprecedented climate of violence which has given rise to human and material losses. Our country, as I said, is trying to overcome the profound economic crisis which has led us to extreme levels of poverty never experienced before. The so-called "revolutionary movement" has unleashed its violence against the system of democratic freedom, nascent in our country, and it has notably attacked the economy defended by the people.

It is appropriate to denounce in this forum the violence of terrorists and to seek the condemnation of the international community for the dreadful murder last week, in cold blood and with impunity, of our Minister of State, Dr. José Antonio Rodríguez Porth, a man who gave his life in the defence of democratic principles and of freedom, and of a State which is ruled by law.

In reviewing our employment situation and the actions of the former government, we acknowledge that the tendency to seek the solution to conflicts at the margin of law and legal standards still exists. This situation has meant that our Government is concentrating its efforts, as we mentioned earlier, in the observance of, and respect for, the law – a position which we shall maintain with firmness. With force and efficiency we are seeking all types of solutions, through conciliation, mediation and arbitration, as means towards a social partnership.

Our Government has come to power at an extremely delicate moment in our crisis, and it has decided to take all the necessary steps demanded by our reality, without demagoguery, in order to safeguard democracy and ensure the basis for a new economic model which has as its objective the welfare of all people in our country.

Our country has now decided to extend the coverage of social security to governmental sectors, which have not yet benefited from its advantages. We have also implemented a programme to build regional centres for vocational training in the interior of the country, and these should serve as agents of change and should contribute to better levels of productive employment. At the same time, we are also co-operating with the Intergovernmental Committee for Migration (ICM), which is working together with the National Commission of Population, with the participation of the Ministry of Labour. We are also highly satisfied with the results achieved by the Regional Employment Programme for Latin America and the Caribbean which, through its regional office in San José, Costa Rica, is making enormous efforts to contribute to peace in Central America by developing measures of integration and horizontal technical co-operation. These are already bearing fruit at an international level as witnessed by the meetings of Ministers of Labour in Central America and Panama, with the aim of discussing employment problems and planning common policies for the region.

The programmes which will be carried out by my Government for the Salvadorian people require the co-operation of the international community, and particularly of this Organisation, in all that concerns the development of labour, co-operatives, labour administration, human rights and employment.

The terrorist organisations, which maintain a climate of unprecedented violence in our country, promote disinformation and distort its image, claiming to be bound by complex international links in the service of anti-democratic interest and appearing before international public opinion as victims of government repression which does not exist.

Within the democratic process, the Government seeks peace for our country. The Marxist war in El Salvador has no sense; we are obliged to put an end to it within the framework of democracy and according to the principles of Magna Carta. President Cristiani himself will set up a committee of dialogue with a view to establishing contact with the FMLN, in order to constitute a working body which will examine the incorporation of all people of the country in peaceful life, and in the mechanisms of representative democracy.

The dialogue between both parties must be permanent, without any possibility of suspension on a unilateral basis for any reason whatever, and this commission must come up with a global solution to the conflict.

We are not asking for anyone to give himself up, but we cannot accept that social harmony is broken by the violation of law. The good will of our Government must not be confused with weakness. We shall ensure the role of law in order to provide the people with lasting safety from destruction, disorder and anarchy.

The terrorist groups claim to cloak misery in totalitarian collectivism and to impede all progress by a complete paralysis of all the individual energies of Salvadorian society.

As you will understand, in my previous remarks I have been obliged to refer to the situation that my country is experiencing at the moment, and the efforts being made by my Government to meet the great challenges faced by a developing country such as ours, a situation aggravated by the extremist violence which I have already referred to.

In conclusion, I consider it particularly appropriate to take the opportunity to express before this assembly, in the name of my people and the Government of El Salvador, and especially of our Constitutional President, Mr. Alfredo Cristiani, and in my own name as a civil servant of my country, our recognition and our gratitude for the co-operation which this Organisation has always given us under the inspired leadership of the former Director-General, Mr. Francis Blanchard. We should also like to welcome Mr. Michel Hansenne, and to congratulate him on the 70th anniversary of the International Labour Organisation. Aware of the heavy burden of the past placed upon our shoulders, we wish to work – with realism, without rhetoric, and with a profound consciousness of the historic responsibility of our generation – for democracy, for harmony and for the well-being of all Salvadorians. We know that we are neither messiahs nor magicians, simply honest human beings making it our vocation, following the example of President Cristiani, to reconstruct and restore our dear country.

Original – Arabic: Mr. BOZO (Minister for Social Affairs and Labour, Syrian Arab Republic) – Allow me, first of all, on behalf of the Syrian Arab delegation and on my own behalf, to congratulate Mr. Nkomo on his election as President of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. We wish him every success in his task of furthering development, contributing towards the progress of civilisation, serving the cause of labour and workers and attaining the objectives of this Organisation.

I should also like to express our thanks to Mr. Francis Blanchard, the outgoing Director-General of the International Labour Office, for the efforts that he deployed during his three terms of office to consolidate the principles and achieve the objectives of the ILO, while providing considerable assistance to production forces – especially in countries that made the request.

I am also delighted to have this opportunity to congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne, the new Director-General of the ILO, upon his election and, on behalf of the Government of the Syrian Arab Republic and on my own behalf, I should like to extend my warmest congratulations to him for the confidence placed in him by the Governing Body. We are convinced that Mr. Hansenne will spare no efforts, with devotion and courage, to achieve the noble ideals of our Organisation.

I should also like to extend our thanks and state our appreciation to the Director-General and the Office in general for the activities carried out in 1988 which covered many regions in the world; these were described in the Report of the Director-General. It is vital that technical assistance programmes be geared to countries in the Third World which require considerable assistance in the following fields: vocational training in rural and urban areas; improvements in the technological level of peoples; problems linked to unemployment; participation in manpower planning; improvements in working conditions and the working environment; the provision of social security services; and occupational safety and health.

We should constantly bear in mind the Organisation's role to consolidate the bases of world economic and social development in order to attain world economic recovery through its participation in the strategy for the United Nations Fourth Development Decade; this will cover the last decade of the twentieth century and be carried out in co-operation with the other international organisations within the United Nations family. We hope that the ILO will play its central role to prove that "human beings are both the means and the end of economic development".

The labour force, which contributes towards production and the distribution of income, has the right to enjoy a share in the prosperity created – commensurate with its contribution – especially since it seems that there have been encouraging growth rates in the world economy in 1988. However, hunger, poverty and disease still prevail in vast areas of the Third World and the GNP per capita is constantly on the decline.

Given this situation, the ILO must realise the urgency of a restructuration of human and material resources; the social imbalance between the industrialised countries, which is the result of an unequal distribution of structural costs, must be smoothed out.

The ILO Constitution entrusts us with a valuable mission, namely to concern ourselves with labour problems and to protect workers; we, in our country, the Syrian Arab Republic, abide by this principle, as may be seen from the statement made by the President of the Republic, Mr. Hafez El-Assad. He declared that labour is an honourable human task and workers are the very pillar of life, progress and development. Workers enrich life and reap the benefits; there can be no life without work and there can be no progress in life without workers.

The general strategy of the national economy of our country is based on this noble concept of labour. It considers labour and workers as being the cornerstone of the economic structure; only they can unleash the energies needed to overcome the various obstacles and bring about the required and progressive changes in industrial relations; in so doing they contribute, with the forces of production, in establishing a sound national economic basis, providing sufficient guarantees of man's varied and growing needs – while bringing about economic, cultural and moral progress, of both the individual and society. We have therefore given the working class its true role in the consolidation of the economic and social structure – at both the political and cultural level – as well as in the field of development. Consequently the working class participates fully in economic and social decision-making and assumes its full responsibility in the production process – in its capacity as a vital class able to play a major role in the social and economic changes occurring in our country.

We are continuing to strive to consolidate the role of this class, in the same way that we are continuing to carry out social programmes designed to: strengthen vocational training programmes; extend social protection; improve general, technical and vocational teaching; reorganise employment and redistribute the labour force in the various economic sectors in accordance with development guide-lines, in order to reduce unemployment as much as possible; improve mother and child care; consolidate the family structure and improve the status of women at work, so that they may fulfil their role in building the homeland on the same level of equality as men.

As our Conference is taking place, people are struggling throughout the world to attain peace, put an end to aggression and terrorism, maintain their potential and their resources and promote economic and social development.

However, there can be no peace as long as people are deprived of their right of self-determination and as long as there are flagrant violations of human rights, as laid down in the ILO Constitution; these rights are considered as being the raison d'être of the ILO which has striven, since its creation, to protect them, irrespective of race, sex, religion and colour.

Contrary to all international charters and conventions, the policy of apartheid and infringements of human rights are on the increase – as testified by the situation in South Africa, Palestine, the Golan and the other occupied Arab territories.

The authorities of South Africa are perpetrating their racist and repressive practices and Israel is continuing to undermine and infringe international law and the United Nations Charter – as well as various resolutions adopted by the United Nations General Assembly and the Security Council and by the specialised agencies, including the two resolutions adopted by your Conference in 1974 (No. IX) and 1980 (No. II).

The practices of the Israeli entity, based on racism and the suppression of the general and legitimate freedoms of the Arab inhabitants, with all that this implies – including the seizure of agricultural land, confiscation of water resources, establishment of Jewish settlements, incorporation of the economy of the occupied regions into the Israeli economy, destruction of trade union premises, detention and expulsion of trade unionists, increase of taxation on Arab enterprises, closure of schools and universities – sparked off the revolution and, in December 1987, the popular "intifadah" which has commanded international attention, affirming the legitimacy of the cause and claims which it defends, and proving that only resistance to the occupation will open the way for liberation and that the policy of annexation, establishment of settlements, the "iron hand" policy, torture, expulsion and destruction constitute war crimes which will only bring defeat to the occupying forces.

According to the fact-finding mission sent by the Director-General to Palestine, the Golan and the other occupied Arab territories in 1988, the Israeli occupation authorities have stepped up their repressive practices against the Arab workers and inhabitants in order to oppose the popular "intifadah".

The mission also reported the severe consequences for the population of the Golan of the fact that the Israeli authorities maintain their policy of establishing settlements, and continue to confiscate land and livestock, to cut down trees, to seize water resources and to prohibit the inhabitants of the Golan from sinking wells, even to meet their need for drinking water, to forbid them from transporting and selling their produce, and to destroy their homes, all with the aim of forcing them to leave their land and emigrate in order to permanently change the demographic, economic, social and cultural structure of the region.

The facts ascertained, and the flagrant evidence of the violations and practices perpetrated by the Israeli forces and reported in the Appendix to the Director-General's Report, reflect one aspect of the day-to-day situation of the workers. We regret that the report fails to expose the situation in its entirety. We are surprised at the way in which the mission sets out and analyses the information presented by the Israeli authorities on the situation of the Arab workers in the occupied Arab territories, while the introduction itself to the report states that this information is trumped-up and falsified. We shall not give an exhaustive list of these errors here, but will confine ourselves to pointing out, by way of an example, that the Israeli forces state in the Annex to the report that Arab workers enjoy the same rights as Israelis, whereas the Director-General himself asserts at the beginning of the report that the trade union situation in these territories is a matter for extreme concern, that violations of trade union rights, interference in trade union activities and repression against trade unionists constitute infringements of the principle of freedom of association embodied in the Preamble to the ILO Constitution, and that he deplores such practices.

It must be pointed out that at the beginning of the report it is stated that the Israeli authorities continue to flout Security Council resolution 497 of 1981, as well as the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly. All of these resolutions declare that the Israeli decision to impose its laws, its sovereignty and its administration on the Golan constitutes an act of aggression and that all measures adopted by Israel with the aim of applying its decision concerning the occupied Syrian Arab Golan are illegal and void and should not be recognised.

Despite this, however, Israel informed the fact-finding mission that Israeli laws are applied in the Golan and that the latter is not therefore considered as an occupied territory.

If this is the real situation of Arab workers and citizens in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories under the yoke of Israeli occupation, can the responsibility of the ILO, whose mission it is to protect the rights and freedoms of workers and employers and to safeguard their interests, confine itself, in view of this distressing situation, to providing in 1988 and 1989, as the report of the Director-General states, technical assistance in the field of vocational training and trade union education amounting to 100,000 United States dollars?

This being so, we call today on our Organisation and on the Conference to assume their full responsibilities in view of the inhuman practices and acts of repression and terrorism of the Israeli authorities resulting in the unemployment, murder and imprisonment of tens of thousands of Arab workers and adolescents, the destruction of productive enterprises and prejudice to the workers' interests.

The Syrian Arab Republic, which wholeheartedly espouses the principles of freedom and peace, affirms once again that the Zionist plot calls for the convening of an international peace conference in which all of the parties to the conflict, as well as the permanent members of the Security Council, would participate with the aim of establishing a just peace, based on the principles of the United Nations Charter and the latter's resolutions concerning the Arab-Israeli conflict, on the complete Israeli withdrawal from all of the occupied territories, including Jerusalem, and on a guarantee of the national rights of the Palestinian Arab people.

We also demand the withdrawal of Israeli forces from southern Lebanon, denounce the acts of aggression, based on violence and murder, and demand the guarantee of the unity, freedom and independence of Lebanon, so that a democratic regime, founded on justice and equality for all, may be established.

We warmly support the struggle against racism in all of its forms, and stand beside the peoples of South Africa and Namibia and the SWAPO national liberation movement in their struggle to defend their rights. We demand that the efforts aimed at putting an end to the apartheid regime, which continues to perpetrate the most shameless oppression and repression against the indigenous inhabitants, be stepped up.

Lastly, we wish this session of the Conference every success and hope that its work and its decisions will make it possible to achieve our objectives.

(Mrs. MOLKOVA takes the Chair.)

Mr. JAMES (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour, Canada) – On behalf of the Government of Canada, I would like to extend my delegation's warm congratulations to Mr. Nkomo on his election as President of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference and to commend the able way in which he and the Vice-Presidents are conducting these proceedings.

May I also on my Government's behalf offer our very best wishes to Mr. Michel Hansenne, the new Director-General of the International Labour Office. I wish to assure Mr. Hansenne of Canada's support and co-operation in carrying out the duties of his high office.

I would like also to take this opportunity to reiterate my Government's profound appreciation for the vital contribution made to the ILO by the former Director-General, Mr. Francis Blanchard. Mr. Blanchard has led the ILO during a period in which the Organisation saw many changes and faced many difficult challenges. If the ILO has been able to adapt to these changes and successfully meet these challenges while remaining faithful to its principles, it is due, to a large extent, to Mr. Blanchard's skill, dedication and great competence. We thank him for this and we wish him all the best in his future plans.

The year 1989 marks the 70th anniversary of the founding of the ILO. As we look back upon these seven decades, we can be justly proud of the Organisation's many achievements. Through its unique tripartite structure, the ILO provides a forum where representatives of the three social partners – governments, employers and workers from all parts of the world – have been able to meet regularly to discuss and agree on standards, principles and guide-lines to improve the situation of men and women workers throughout the world.

Canada has been associated with this effort from the very beginning. We were a founding Member of the ILO in 1919 and remain firmly attached to the objectives and principles enshrined in the Declaration of Philadelphia, which is part of the ILO Constitution. The ILO has played a vital role in setting international labour standards and in advancing fundamental human rights.

Much progress has occurred, but many problems remain. In his last Report to the International Labour Conference, Mr. Blanchard has focused on one of the most pressing concerns of member States and a subject of discussion in a number of international bodies, namely the problems of economic recovery and growth and of the employment and social implications of adjustment programmes and measures at both the national and international levels. The Canadian delegation welcomes the opportunity given by this Conference to address this issue and is confident that the Conference deliberations will contribute to promoting a greater understanding of these problems and of possible avenues for solutions.

As noted in this Report, one of the main barriers to economic growth and development for many developing countries is the heavy debt burden, which is a particularly severe problem in Africa and Latin America. We share the Director-General's view that for this problem to be resolved both national and international efforts will be needed. Canada is encouraged by the recent progress achieved in the further development of international debt strategy. Special efforts for the least developed countries also remain urgent.

In this connection, Canada announced in 1987 its intention to forgo the aid-related debts owed to it by the developing nations of sub-Saharan Africa. Canada also supports developing countries in their desire for better access to markets. We are working actively in the GATT, and in the current round of multilateral trade negotiations, to build a fair and more open international trading system.

The Director-General's Report reminds us, and rightly so, that in considering the role of structural adjustment programmes it is essential that we should not lose sight of the most important factor in any recovery programme – people. There is a growing recognition that efforts must be made to minimise the potentially negative consequences of stabilisation and adjustment measures on employment and workers' incomes.

It is our firm belief that we must provide safeguards for the most disadvantaged groups. In this regard, Canada encouraged the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund to take account of human and social needs in adjustment programmes and to promote investments in education and health as a vital component of future growth prospects. We welcome the increased dialogue between the international agencies primarily concerned with social policy, such as the ILO, and agencies responsible for economic and monetary policies like the World Bank and the IMF.

Although developing countries face especially severe hardships, many industrialised countries, including my own, are undergoing a process of structural adjustment in order to adapt to the changing economic realities of the present. Driven by a desire to build a stronger economy, my Government is engaged in a process of economic renewal and deficit reduction. We believe that the outcome will enable us to play our part much more vigorously in sustaining the global recovery.

In keeping with this effort, the Canadian federal Government is redesigning and expanding its labour force programmes to encourage life-long upgrading of skills. While the Government will still play a major role, it believes that the primary responsibility for skills training rests with the employers and the workers. Accordingly, a key element of the Government's new labour force development strategy, which was announced in April of this year, consists of new measures aimed at promoting substantial increases in private sector training over the next five years.

The Canadian Government intends to seek broad public input on the design of its new training and other labour market programmes through a major public consultation process. The Canadian Labour Market and Productivity Centre, a national joint labour-management body, has agreed to play a key role in organising these consultations over the coming summer months, culminating in a series of symposia to be held in the fall on important programme design issues. These consultations will bring together all interested parties involved in training and skills development issues, namely labour, business, training institutions and interest groups.

One category of workers that is particularly sensitive to economic change and the need for skills development is that of older workers. In this regard, the new labour force development strategy includes legislative and active programme measures for training, assisted jobsearching, mobility assistance and income support, which are tailored to meet the needs and aspirations and potential of older workers.

Moreover, last fall my Government announced the implementation of a new federal-provincial programme for older-worker adjustment which will financially assist older workers who have no prospects for re-employment following major and permanent layoffs.

Labour force adjustment programmes in Canada are not new. Since 1963 the Federal Industrial Adjustment Service has assisted teams of workers and management staff to cope with the required workplace changes in thousands of establishments. Last year, the adjustment service helped 500 enterprises involving 300,000 workers.

In recent years, new models of labour-management co-operation have been developed in Canada to deal with the structural adjustment problems. In the steel industry, management and labour have formed a joint venture called the Canadian Steel Trade and Employment Congress, through which they can work together to strengthen the industry as a whole and to address major issues.

To date, the Steel Congress has focused its work on two matters of importance to that industry – trade and labour adjustment. One of its most notable successes has been a Labour Adjustment Programme specifically designed for their sector being operated by the Congress with funding assistance from the federal Government. More recently, labour and management have agreed to address environmental, safety and health issues to this co-operative body.

Following the example of the steel industry and with the support of the Government of Canada, management and trade unions in Canada's forest industry have commissioned a detailed study of labour adjustment in the forestry sector. Management and labour in Western Canada have since established a joint research and consultative body through which they will strive to address issues that affect the future of the forestry industry, such as access to markets, forestry land use and labour adjustment.

In both instances, these actions are a creative response to the challenge of change by the social partners themselves, supported by Government. They represent a new approach to co-operative decision-making in Canada. Through these new mechanisms, the Government hopes to learn from business and labour about the needs of industries and the adjustment policies required to provide for a smooth transition into the future.

These are concrete examples of the principles which the Director-General has identified in his Report as an essential element for success in recovery; that is, the active involvement of social partners in the formulation of microeconomic and labour market policies.

In yet another area, that of occupational safety and health, tripartite efforts in Canada have resulted in an information system that is among the most advanced of its kind in the world. The Workplace Hazardous Materials Information System provides a national standard for the communication of information about hazards in the workplace, hazards that can now be anticipated because of the information that is provided in advance to both the employers and the employees. This national system, which is a major accomplishment for Canada, is the result of collaboration between the Government of Canada and the government of each of the provinces and territories and between groups representing industry and groups representing trade unions.

Another successful example of joint efforts towards economic recovery is in the area of labour-sponsored venture capital funds. In the Province of Quebec the Quebec Solidarity Fund has been a major success. The Fund has accumulated more than $235 million in assets and has a shareholder membership of more than $72,000. Through investments in some 56 businesses, the Fund has created or maintained some 13,500 jobs. The creation of the Fund is itself a remarkable story, since it was a response in part by the trade union movement to a rash of layoffs and business failures during the 1981-82 recession. This unique contribution to economic activity and job creation is supported by a system of tax credits offered at both the federal and provincial levels. Similar initiatives are now being considered and developed by other labour organisations.

I have indicated today some of the measures taken in Canada to respond to the problem of structural adjustment and its impact on employment and economic growth. Each member country will of course develop its own approach, depending on its unique circumstances. It is to be hoped that the ILO will continue to make a vital contribution to achieving the goal of truly global recovery and narrowing of the gap between the rich and poor nations.

Mr. FOWLER (Secretary of State for Employment, United Kingdom) – First of all I would like to join previous speakers in congratulating the President and the Vice-Presidents on behalf of the United Kingdom on their election at this session of the International Labour Conference. It is also with pleasure that I express my appreciation to the former Director-General of the International Labour Office, Mr. Blanchard, for his very interesting Report, which is the subject of our discussion today. This will be Mr. Blanchard's final Report to Conference, and in my view the experience and ability that have provided the inspiration behind the wide-ranging and challenging Reports of the past years will be a considerable loss to this Organisation. I should also like to take the opportunity to congratulate Mr. Blanchard's successor to the post of Director-General, Mr. Hansen, on his recent appointment, and I am confident that he will maintain the high standards set by his predecessor in this field.

Let me pass to the general subject matter of the Director-General's Report. In his Report the Director-General seeks to outline an approach to the revival of growth, and I note the importance he places on the creation of employment. With this in mind I should like to offer some comments from the point of view of the United Kingdom.

Along with many industrialised countries, economic growth in Britain was depressed for much of the 1970s and the first part of the 1980s. When the Government in which I serve took office in 1979 we were faced with the need for urgent action. Unemployment was high, unit labour costs were poor, the rate of inflation was increasing, there was a lack of enterprise in the economy and the share of world markets had diminished. I am happy to say that ten years later it is clear that the course we embarked upon and the policies that we set in train have borne fruit.

The British economy is now a very strong one, with a record number of people in employment and a steadily falling level of unemployment. Our recovery has been achieved, not by short term "fire fighting" measures, but by pursuing instead a strategic approach aimed at a transformation of the British economy.

A number of measures have been introduced to improve the supply side of the United Kingdom economy. Legislation has been targeted at crucial areas of economic activity. A reform of corporate and personal taxation, deregulation and an emphasis on providing an environment of awareness about the importance of competition.

We have also made a number of reforms which directly impact upon the labour market, sweeping away regulations that we considered unnecessarily bureaucratic, and our reform of industrial relations legislation has helped change labour relations and has contributed to a significant improvement in our country's economic performance.

But of course we live in a changing world. The world of the 1990s will see the emergence of an increasingly competitive international environment. At the same time demographic changes, technological change, and changing skill requirements will all underline the importance of developing human resources. One of the key international developments on the horizon is, of course, the Single European Market of 1992. The Single European Market is primarily about challenges. It presents a wide range of opportunities to increase efficiency and productivity, to reduce costs and prices, and ultimately to create the wealth we need to maintain the rise in living standards. It seems to us that the real social dimension of 1992 is the opportunity to create new jobs and reduce unemployment. The completion of the Single European Market offers a real chance to increase employment opportunities and to reduce unemployment further. Companies will have access to a single market of over 320 million consumers, and there is every reason for business, trade and jobs to increase as a result. The Single Market, then, should bring employment gains which will improve working and living conditions.

But if we are serious about reducing unemployment, I think the last thing we should be thinking about is further and more detailed regulations. We must avoid the danger of Fortress Europe. Europe must not become inward-looking at a time when it needs to concentrate on ensuring that it can compete with the fast-growing economies of the Far East and the Pacific.

It is important to remember that new jobs are created by expanding business, not by imposing new regulation. It is, I think, seriously misleading to draw a distinction between what is in the interests of business and what is in the interests of citizens. The paramount social need is to create new jobs, and new jobs can be created only if business are allowed to grow. It cannot be done by declarations, however well-meaning they may be.

British experience shows that removing unnecessary regulations and barriers to employment is crucial to creating new jobs. Over the last six years, nearly 3 million new jobs have been created in the United Kingdom – more than in the rest of the European Community put together. We now have more people in work in jobs in the United Kingdom than ever before in our history. Unemployment in the United Kingdom has fallen for 34 successive months to the lowest level for eight years. At just over 6 per cent, it is now well below the Community average. Over the last two years, unemployment has fallen faster in the United Kingdom than in any other major industrialised country.

So the British Government firmly believes that there must be a social dimension but that that social dimension should be concerned with creating new jobs, reducing unemployment and improving the standards of living, and by any measure that is being achieved inside the United Kingdom.

It follows then that we oppose measures that increase costs, create barriers to employment and prevent jobs from being created. We want to see the creation of jobs and we want to see practical measures also of workers' participation. We are firmly committed to extending employee-involvement in their companies. The more workers are involved and committed to the success of the firm in which they work, the better that firm will perform. Many successful British companies believe employee involvement is a key factor in improving efficiency and productivity as well as creating a better industrial relations climate.

Effective worker involvement can lead to a better understanding of business decisions and strategy. It can lead to a better utilisation of the skills and knowledge available in the organisation and the smoother introduction of major changes such as new technology.

Worker involvement covers a whole range of practices, from good communication and consultation to profit sharing and employee share ownership. One of the most effective means of increasing worker commitment is to give workers a direct stake in the ownership and the prosperity of the business they work for, and we have introduced in nine of our last ten budgets tax reliefs to stimulate such share ownership, and a large and growing number of workers now hold shares in their firms. We have also increased the range of occupational and personal pension provision available both to employers and to employees.

So we are firmly committed to extending the involvement of employees in their companies, but to be successful this, we believe, must be on a voluntary basis. The imposition of a rigid statutory form of worker participation would damage established worker involvement practices.

We believe that imposing more regulation on enterprise and industry is the wrong approach. We welcome measures to combat unemployment. Getting Europe back to work, boosting employment growth – that must be the top priority. We welcome measures to promote training and the recognition of qualifications, and we certainly welcome standards of health and safety and improved employee involvement arrangements.

We need practical approaches which deal with real problems. That is the basis of all that we have done in the field of employment law reform since 1979. We must continue to remove barriers to employment, not to build new ones. That is the way to create new jobs and reduce unemployment, not just in our country but in fact right across the European Community and, in my view, way beyond that, not just in the 1980s but in the 1990s and beyond.

In the 1990s, industry and commerce must be increasingly alert to new opportunities and must adapt to changing technologies, changing markets and changing tastes. That means that there is a need for a more adaptable workforce, from top management to the office or shopfloor. In turn, this requires an investment in training and an appropriate training system which will ensure the provision of relevant skills.

The United Kingdom's commitment to global economic recovery is clear. Liberal trade policies and market-oriented economic structures have proved successful in the developed world. We believe they also offer the best prospect of renewal of growth and development momentum in the developing world as well.

The ILO has an important and vital role to play in the 1990s. It will certainly be a role in standard setting, but, also, the ILO will act as a vital forum in which the international exchange of advice and information takes place. The creation of jobs and the reduction of unemployment are two of the great challenges of the next decade. By sharing our knowledge, those challenges can be met, and in this process the ILO has a vital part to play.

Original – Arabic: Mr. AL-FAYEZ (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Saudi Arabia) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! God's peace and blessing be with you. At the outset I have great pleasure in expressing, on my own behalf and on behalf of the Saudi Arabian delegation, our heartfelt congratulations to the President on his election. With God's grace, his experience will undoubtedly ensure that the session achieves the aims we have set ourselves.

On this occasion I should also like to extend to Mr. Francis Blanchard, the Director-General whose term of office ended last February, our deep thanks for his outstanding efforts, the effective role he played and his great efficiency. We wish him every success and happiness.

I would also like to take this opportunity to extend to the new Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, our sincere congratulations on his election to this high post, wishing him all success in leading this Organisation to an even better future.

The Director-General's Report, Recovery and employment, is of great importance, especially at this stage in the history of the international community. Dealing with various aspects of this theme, the Report sets out the negative development of the world economy during the 1980s and its disastrous effects on social progress, particularly in the developing countries; it highlights the importance of economic recovery for a return to sustained social progress. It deals with development strategies leading to recovery, structural change and the revitalisation of development, while stressing the need to retain the social aspects of structural change at the forefront of international concern.

We agree with the view expressed in the Report that the challenges facing the international community are clear and that meeting them calls for structural adjustments at the international and national levels. Since all countries are now subject to the changes taking place in the international economy, what is required is a universal approach to solve common problems coupled with serious national efforts, in particular to ensure a more effective use of resources.

We agree also with the Director-General that protecting and restoring the environment and setting up infrastructures are matters which should be dealt with immediately, not only because they are of crucial importance, but also because contending with them requires manpower and will therefore contribute to reducing unemployment.

To be sure such a goal requires huge and ever increasing financial resources at a time when the developing countries are suffering from scant investment. However we hope, like the Director-General, that the cash savings which result from disarmament and the settling of regional conflicts will make it possible to finance the setting up and modernisation of basic infrastructures, many of which we also hope will be directed to the protection of the environment.

In connection with the Director-General's Report to the current session of the Conference, in which he deals with economic recovery and development, I should like to talk to you about the unique experience of the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia. What makes it distinctive is the importance and extent of the achievements and their record timing. What makes it unique also is that it combines the determination and resolution of an Islamic society to work towards development with its steadfast will to simultaneously preserve its 14 centuries of Islamic heritage.

In two decades Saudi society has been able, with God's grace, to narrow the gap between itself and other developed societies, especially in terms of building social and economic infrastructures. Thus the experience of the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia, with all the social and economic changes it has encompassed, constitutes by all standards a unique event in the world today.

Our country, with the grace of God, has been able to establish a firm foundation for development. This has helped us to progress in many sectors and to adapt with strength and determination to world economic conditions over recent years. The development process in our country has continued to progress and evolve, therefore, God be praised, there is every reason to believe that the Saudi economy will continue to grow and flourish.

Allow me to review briefly examples of economic and social development in the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia and the stages through which we have gone so far in trying to achieve progress, stability and the well-being of the Saudi citizen, which are the essential aims of development in our country.

Great emphasis has been placed in the sectors of education and vocational training on the optimal use of the labour force, an objective to which the Government attaches high priority in its successive development plans. As a result, free education has been generalised and the number of educational establishments increased. In 1988 the number of male and female students reached a total of 2.5 million as compared with only 600,000 in 1970. In the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia there are now seven universities, equipped with all faculties and teaching all subjects. As for vocational training and technical education, priority has been given to encouraging young people into the different sectors of industrial, commercial and agricultural production. Centres which specialise in this type of teaching and training have been set up in all parts of the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia and the number of trainees and graduates has multiplied. We are planning to extend these measures to all levels, especially to technical colleges.

In the health sector, the number of establishments increased from 74 hospitals and 950 health centres to 230 hospitals and more than 2,300 health centres. All these establishments provide both preventive care and treatment free of charge. The progress made in the health sector is reflected in the mortality rate which has dropped in the past two decades from 20 per thousand to eight per thousand.

In the social services sector, the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia bases its social policies on the principle of solidarity advocated by Islam, which encourages people to help the weak, the orphaned, the disabled, the handicapped and the elderly. Services are provided for all these categories of people in over 200 centres, institutions and offices spread through all parts of the Kingdom. To this should be added the moral and financial support given by local charity organisations which can cover 80 per cent of their expenses.

In the housing sector, the number of housing units built by the State for its citizens has now passed 600,000, without taking into account the long-term loans provided by the State to any citizen for housing requirements which are repayable over a period of 25 years, interest free. In addition, the State exempts the borrower from paying 20 per cent of the value of the loan. The number of housing units built using such loans now exceeds 450,000 and the total of loans is more than US$25,000 million.

The foregoing concerns only a few aspects of our social infrastructures. As for our country's economic infrastructures, the picture is no less rosy. The Kingdom of Saudi Arabia carried out structural adjustments in the national economy, paying particular attention to the productive sectors, such as agriculture, industry and mining, and encouraging the private sector to participate in a positive way in this process of economic and social development.

As far as agriculture is concerned, the Kingdom has achieved a high level of growth thanks to government expenditure on infrastructure and on equipment, thanks to considerable private sector investment in agricultural projects, and thanks to the incentives provided by the State, such as, in particular, the provision of uncultivated land to individuals and companies for cultivation and to set up agricultural projects there; and we have also provided loans and financial assistance. To give an example of agricultural progress, wheat, which is considered as a strategic crop, has now seen its input increase from 26,000 tonnes to 3 million tonnes. Thus Saudi Arabia has become self-sufficient and it can even export some of its production to other countries.

As far as water is concerned, the number of dams which we have built has reached 190. We have built a number of water treatment and desalination plants, the annual capacity of which has increased from 5 million cubic metres to 550 million cubic metres of drinkable water.

As regards industry, the number of factories currently in operation exceeds 2,000, and their sales amount to nearly US$4,000 million annually. Many factories export their surplus, which more than meets local demand. Numerous industrial districts have been set up, with the infrastructure necessary for industrial growth, in addition to two industrial cities, Jubail and Yanbo.

As regards transportation and communications, several projects have been carried out, including construction of railroads, airports, ports, telephone, telegraph and other telecommunication facilities. The vital impact of these projects and facilities is reflected in the overall development of the economy. For example, our asphalt roads now exceed 32,000 kilometres in length, and additional agricultural roads cover a total distance of 60,000 kilometres. In addition, the Kingdom is linked by a vast modern network of telephone lines exceeding 1,200,000 lines.

As regards subsidies and loans, the State grants long-term interest-free loans on easy terms for industrial, commercial, consultative and social purposes, through specialised funds. Loans granted by public credit institutions since 1970 total over US$70,000 million. In addition to these, mention should be made of state subsidies for staple foods, agriculture, social security and welfare, industrial, commercial and individual electricity consumption, etc.

The economic and social development plans and programmes of the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia have created a large number of jobs, enabling the graduates of educational and training institutions in the Kingdom to find work. In order to meet its manpower requirements, the Kingdom has had recourse to manpower from other Arab, Islamic and friendly countries. This aspect of co-operation has been of mutual benefit to the workers themselves, to the manpower-exporting countries and to the Kingdom.

The workers of the Kingdom enjoy working conditions of stability and satisfaction, given that these conditions are based on the principles of the Islamic Shariya. Moreover, labour legislation in the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia makes no distinction between national and foreign workers, who are all treated equally, without discrimination. The Kingdom's laws also permit the transfer of earnings by workers to their own countries without any restriction.

Besides their wages and other advantages, the workers have the benefit of the same government support for various public services, food products, etc., as citizens of the country, without incurring any additional charge.

While we are proud of the great achievements of the Kingdom in various spheres, we are aware that there is still a long way to go. The Government of Saudi Arabia, under the leadership of the Guardian of the Two Holy Places, is striving to achieve this objective, more especially as the area covered by the Kingdom is immense.

The Kingdom of Saudi Arabia, as a developing country, is aware from its own experience of the difficulties encountered by developing countries in attaining the standards of living to which they aspire. The Kingdom is fully conscious of its responsibilities as a member of the international community and is anxious to renew the bonds of co-operation and solidarity with peoples and to contribute effectively to the solution of the development problems facing most developing countries. With its material potential, it has taken the initiative in providing aid for efforts to promote the development process in a number of Arab, Islamic and friendly countries, making its commitment in this area a constant traditional policy.

The Kingdom believes that the financial resources necessary over the next decade to promote essential economic change and attain a reasonable level of overall development in the developing countries as a whole will only be available when the industrialised countries begin to assume their total responsibilities and remit the payment to which they are committed under the International Development Strategy and the aims of the official development aid fixed in accordance with that strategy.

We read with great interest the Director-General's Report on the results achieved by the ILO mission this year, in accordance with the mandate from your Conference in 1974 and 1980 regarding Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories.

While we appreciate the efforts of the mission in preparing this year's Report, particularly in view of the tragic situation in which the workers and people of Palestine have found themselves for over 19 months, we consider that the Report does not give a complete picture of the suffering of the workers and people of Palestine, which the whole world can see daily through various media, under the yoke of occupation, repression and terrorism practised by the Israeli authorities, whose actions include the demolition of houses, the destruction of production enterprises, arbitrary arrest, dismissal of Arab workers and deprivation of their basic rights.

The least your Conference can do at this session, therefore, is to support the Arab resolution denouncing and condemning the acts of repression against the Palestinian people and to support the formation of a Committee to study reports on this theme and technical assistance programmes devoted to the Palestinians.

In conclusion, I wish your Conference all success in its work. May the peace, compassion and grace of God be with you.

Mr. GOLDSON (Government delegate, Belize) – The five members of the tripartite delegation from Belize join with those distinguished delegates who have expressed their congratulations to Mr. Nkomo, our new President, to the Vice-Presidents and to the Director-General. We also express our appreciation to the outgoing Director-General concerning their election and of course for the sound foundation which he laid for our Organisation.

On behalf of our Government and people at home, and on our own behalf, we also wish to show our deep appreciation to the ILO for the services so freely offered to the Caribbean region through the offices in Barbados and Trinidad, especially in the fields of training, consultation and advice on legislation and Conventions, and in other areas. These kinds of services have made the ILO in Geneva, which for some of us appears so far away, remote and distant, a reality in our daily lives. We ask that these services be continued.

When the present Government of Belize entered office four-and-a-half years ago, it faced a very difficult financial and economic situation. The International Monetary Fund (IMF) was already in place with a standby agreement. The Government met IMF experts who advised that the payment of teachers from public funds be discontinued since Belize had traditionally had a Church-supported educational system and the Government therefore had no legal responsibility to pay teachers. The IMF experts also advised that government manual workers be dismissed in droves. They advised that regular civil servants be dismissed and that the balance should have their salaries drastically reduced.

All this, I have no doubt, might have been good technical and financial advice, but the social consequences would have been catastrophic. Fortunately, our Government, led by the right honourable Dr. Manuel Esquivel, our Prime Minister, was able to find more socially acceptable solutions and Belize was consequently able to free itself from the IMF programme within 18 months, and to continue to this day free from such a programme, because our country is now able to meet its debt commitments internationally. I can therefore understand the agony with which member States here face the burden of intolerable debt servicing problems.

The policies pursued by our Government during the past four-and-a-half years have aimed to maximise the use of Belize's human resources. We are a small nation, with barely 200 to 250 thousand citizens within the country and abroad. These policies have therefore been designed to rally the efforts of all Belizeans, whether resident in the homeland or abroad, for the benefit of Belize. Programmes have been established overseas to encourage Belizeans either to return to their homeland and assist in the development efforts, particularly at the community level, or to give advice and support from their current place of residence abroad. This programme has been very successful. The consortium of Belizean development is a very active programme, especially in North America.

Within Belize itself, there has been increasing employment utilising the services of Belizeans in the field of agriculture, tourism and light industries. Although it has been necessary to seek capital for large investments from abroad, Belizeans have been stimulated to invest their talents, their finances and their expertise wherever possible in the national development effort. Employment in the construction industry has become an ongoing process as more and more hotels are being built. Development is constantly progressing in the banana and sugar industries, and in other fields of agriculture, in which more and more Belizeans are becoming involved.

We are pleased that in Belize we have been able to avoid the confrontation between employers and workers which exists in so many other places. We have worked together and we should like, with the help of the ILO, to continue developing our enterprise programmes with both sides of industry working in partnership and with the Government playing a monitoring and co-ordinating role. We should also like to establish joint training and joint venture capital programmes, in which respect we look for guidance and help from the ILO.

We should like once again to emphasise that, as a small nation, we have been both a contributor to and a beneficiary of the ILO system and that we should like to continue this process. We see great benefits ahead and we wish to thank the ILO for the progress which it has helped to bring to our country. God bless this Organisation.

Mr. FELDMAN (Deputy Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Israel) – It is a pleasure and an honour for me to attend the International Labour Conference for the first time and to have the opportunity of addressing the plenary. May I join the other delegates in welcoming the President and the other Officers of the Conference. Many vital issues are on the agenda this year. ILO activities in the field of human rights, international standards, promotion of equality, labour law, social security and employment and training involve issues of major importance to us all. I trust that under your leadership we will make significant progress towards their solution. May I also convey our best wishes to Mr. Blanchard and our congratulations to Mr. Hansenne.

We particularly look forward to serious examination and exchanges of views and experience regarding the principal items on the agenda – night work and safety in the use of chemicals at work. These are important and complex issues with which our Ministry and society have been concerned. Night work raises dilemmas brought on by the need to utilise effectively very expensive and sophisticated equipment while taking into account its effects on worker health and family relations.

The problems of health and safety centring on the use of chemicals at work have been a major concern of the Ministry and we have attempted to address this problem through an interdisciplinary approach encompassing research, medical supervision and monitoring, workers' education and individual and group instruction. We would hope to be able to share our experience with other countries.

We were particularly impressed by the Director-General's Report Recovery and employment, covering one of the basic problems confronting our society in the coming decade: how to ensure non-inflationary growth and development based on knowledge-intensive and highly productive methods of output while lessening unemployment. We are wrestling with this problem and again we look forward to intensive discussions with the representatives of government, employers' and workers' organisations.

I should like to congratulate the Resolutions Committee for assigning priority to two truly important international problems, directly bearing on the welfare of the working population. The resolution concerning environment development and employment recognises both the universal nature and the urgency of this problem and the importance of adequate and satisfactory environmental conditions at work and in the broader social and ecological context. Clearly this subject deserves high national priority, but many aspects can only be satisfactorily engaged on a regional or international basis. Israel has recognised the importance of this issue to the welfare of its citizens and has set up a special ministry charged with primary responsibility in this area. Israel is also more than ready to co-operate with its neighbours in the Mediterranean region and actively participate in other international activities.

The need for accommodation on the problem of foreign debt is a concern not only of the countries and international financial institutions directly affected, but of the entire international community.

Unfortunately, we are once again confronted by a political resolution masquerading as a concern for human rights and social justice in Judea, Samaria and Gaza, submitted by a large number of Arab countries and organisations. I shall therefore be obliged to refer to these matters.

It is quite meaningless to study the social conditions of the population of these areas under Israel's administration since 1967 except by reference to the conditions prevailing previously.

The PRESIDENT (Mrs. MOLKOVA) – I give the floor to Mr. Hussami, Government adviser, Syrian Arab Republic, for a point of order.

Original – Arabic: Mr. HUSSAMI (Government adviser, Syrian Arab Republic) – I asked for the floor in order to make a point of order in conformity with article 14, paragraph 5, of the Standing Orders. I would ask the President to be so kind as to request the speaker to respect the international territorial designations that have been recognised and adopted by all, whether this is within the context of international co-operation or in international organisations such as the United Nations and its specialised agencies.

We have noticed that right from the beginning of his speech, the previous speaker spoke of Judea and Samaria. However, all of us know that these are Palestinian territories and other Arab occupied territories, territories that have been occupied since 1967, and that the occupying forces are only temporary forces that do not have the right to change the names of these territories.

We are not in the Israeli Knesset here where anybody can call the territories as they see fit. We are at an international Conference here, and it is up to each Member to respect the internationally recognised titles which have been adopted.

We would also request that reference should be made to Palestine and to the occupied Arab territories, so I would request the President to call upon the speaker to respect these titles, which were used in the resolutions of 1974 and 1980, and also in the Director-General's report concerning the mission that has visited the occupied Arab territories for a number of years.

The PRESIDENT (Mrs. MOLKOVA) – I would ask the speaker kindly to follow the request and respect internationally recognised titles.

Mr. FELDMAN – Yes. I do not know exactly what the very honourable gentlemen has said, since I do not understand Arabic. I will continue.

Under Arab administration in the years 1948 to 1967 the areas were characterised by a low level of development, slow growth, very limited capital stock, high unemployment, stagnation at very low income levels and the absence of social justice. Of equal importance is the fact that the human skills and institutional arrangements necessary for sustained economic and social development were lacking. Judea, Samaria and Gaza have never been independent, self-contained units, nor did these areas, before 1967, have institutions of their own to assist in guiding economic development. Thus, residents of these areas who were unable to maintain themselves through locally generated economic activity have long needed to seek outside employment.

Assessed against this background and against international experience in launching sustained economic growth in underdeveloped areas, Judea, Samaria and Gaza have achieved very considerable economic and social gains over the past 20 years, stimulated in no small measure by contacts established with the economy of Israel. Employment in Israel and the subsequent increase in real wages and other income has been the driving force behind significantly expanded local demand and has called forth sustained and substantial increases in local production, particularly in agriculture, to meet that demand.

Economic growth and development has encompassed broad sectors of the population and resulted in a marked improvement in standards of living as reflected both in qualitative and quantitative improvements in food consumption, in increased purchases of clothing and other household items, in much higher levels of investment in housing, in larger real capital expenditure on health and public education and in the growth in the number of families possessing consumer durable.

Area residents employed in an organised manner in Israel receive, under the terms of the collective bargaining agreements applying to Israeli and area residents alike, many social benefits, such as old-age pensions, invalidity and survivors' pensions, annual vacations, vacation expenses, sick pay, holiday pay, family allowance and severance pay. This wide range of social benefits stands in sharp contrast to the benefits they were entitled to before the advent of Israeli administration and to the level of social benefits offered to workers in neighbouring countries who criticise Israel on this score.

As to education, whereas in 1970 49 per cent of the working-age population had zero years of schooling, by 1987 the proportion of those without schooling had declined to 23 per cent. Similarly, 43 per cent of the working-age population in 1987 had nine years or more of schooling as against only 19 per cent in 1970. In addition, more than 70,000 men and women graduates have completed vocational training and upgrading courses during the past 20 years. One might also note that there were no universities in the areas before 1967.

The improvement in welfare in the areas that I have reviewed – the expansion of employment, the growth in private consumption, the rise in educational attainments, the improvement and expansion of social benefits available to workers – are all indicators of the progress achieved to date in meeting the basic needs of the population.

I should like to conclude this aspect of my presentation with two brief remarks about recent events in the areas that fall within the ILO's sphere of responsibility. One of the major goals of the so-called "intifadah", as declared by its instigators, is the destruction of economic relations between Israel and the areas, including prominently the obstruction of workers who want to go to their jobs in Israel. All means have been utilised to attain this goal: the intimidation of such workers and physical harm, burning the buses transporting them to Israel and setting fire to Israeli employment offices. This is in stark contradiction to the declared principles of the ILO.

The Arab resolution refers to the violation of trade union rights and freedoms. Israel supports legitimate trade union activity, but cannot and will not tolerate incitement, sabotage and terrorism in the guise of trade union activity.

Needless to say, Israel is deeply troubled by the growing tendency to exploit for political ends international organisations such as the ILO. Consuming the precious time and resources of these organisations with political debate endangers their usefulness when the need for their services is so great.

And, finally, may I appeal to the Arab States to accept the Israeli peace plan, an important element of which is free elections in the areas, and abandon the obstruction, abuse, hatred and violence which has continued over 40 years and led to so much suffering and bloodshed. Have courage, come sit down with us at one table. Let us make peace for the mutual benefit of our peoples and of all mankind. I am sure that the prophecies of our prophets from the Bible, in which God promised that the time will come when there will be no more war, no more cruelty, no more hatred, and all the peoples of the world will live together and work together in harmony and peace, will be realised. Come, let us join together in beginning the fulfilment of this prophecy.

Original - Portuguese: Mr. SILVA PENEDA (Minister of Employment and Social Security, Portugal) - On my own behalf and in the name of the Portuguese Government, I should like to present my congratulations to Mr. Nkomo, as well as to the Vice-Presidents, on their election as Officers of this 76th Session of the International Labour Conference.

The Report of the Director-General, Recovery and employment, which is the main theme of this session of the Conference, analyses in a concise but exhaustive manner all the issues which have been or may eventually be addressed by the work of the International Labour Organisation.

Therefore, Portugal cannot help being associated in a special way with the choice of the topic for debate at this session, because my country is going through a particularly important and crucial period of preparation to meet in due time the challenges imposed by our entry into the European Community.

In fact, the Director-General's Report presents not only an excellent assessment of the problems resulting from the recession, recovery and the measures of structural adjustment adopted all over the world, but also a detailed evaluation of the social costs of adjustment, pointing out the need for the development of the world economy.

With respect to the social costs of structural adjustment, the report still refers to the need to evaluate correctly the effects of such programmes on employment and social issues. In fact, with a deep political commitment, it is possible to carry out structural adjustment at a low social cost, provided that it is based on a social consensus and tripartite consultation.

Of the subjects for study proposed by the Report, my Government would like to stress especially those concerning employment and vocational training and their broader context.

We think that a desirable increase in the efficiency of the productive sector depends to a great extent on a series of efforts which either go beyond the economy or lie outside it altogether.

It is clear to us that macro-economic policies are important, but they are not the only condition for achieving structural adjustment objectives and economic recovery. It is necessary to take into account social and cultural realities in order to mobilise the latent energy of the social fabric. In this respect, policies relating to human resources development play a very important part.

While the development of modern technologies, which make communication and understanding of the world around us easier, is essential for the improvement of human resources, nevertheless a permanent willingness to accept flexibility and multi-skills approaches is a decisive factor in the formation of the society of the future. Therefore, employment and vocational training policies play a strategic part in this day and age.

With regard to this aspect, we have to face a number of changes which have been occurring in our societies and which obviously affect the way problems of vocational training are solved as well as the concept itself of the enterprise.

Thus, in the context of lifelong training, new concepts gain relevance, such as multi-skills profiles, adaptability and workforce mobility, and they will certainly determine the capacity to adapt to the changes which will occur at an unprecedented rate.

In this context, the enterprise will necessarily play a decisive role in coming years. One can foresee a number of changes in its philosophy, culture and organisation: the traditional vertical Taylorised structure will give way to an increasingly horizontal approach to information and training; a purely hierarchical logic in decision-making processes will be replaced by another, more functional logic; the tight compartmentalisation between job profiles will be followed by a dissolving of the lines of demarcation as regards job qualifications, with the acquisition of new skills dictated by technological change; greater importance will be attached in enterprises to functions of design, programming, quality control, maintenance and marketing, and therefore the matrix structure of enterprise organisation will be strengthened in order to reconcile productive functions and the "staff" functions of innovation and research.

Faced with this reality, vocational training must play the role of continuing education in a flexible society; in this sense, enterprises, which are also social communities, should emerge as true schools of continuing training.

In terms of policy design, the real issue is not only the attainment of higher levels of economic growth, but also higher efficiency and a better use of all available resources, both human and material, enabling the resulting benefits to be distributed fairly.

In taking this approach, my Government is mainly concerned with the creation of conditions leading to a greater convergence of measures carried out by the authorities and those taken by economic and social agents; the mobilisation of the potential of the social fabric in order to achieve development objectives and the progressive introduction of greater flexibility in operations.

It is obvious to us that there will be less and less room for a development model based on low wage levels and poorly qualified manpower. The scientific and technological component is becoming increasingly important and human resources play a strategic role.

We consider that only in this way it is possible to expect significant productivity increases in the productive apparatus, which is the only means of consolidating a truly sustained development process.

The Portuguese enterprise structure consists largely of small- and medium-sized establishments, most of which are family-based, where adjustment is obviously more complex and delicate.

In this respect, suffice it to say that according to data for 1988, 95.3 per cent of Portuguese enterprises employed fewer than 50 workers and only 0.9 per cent employed more than 200 workers.

In view of this, the Portuguese Government has decided to define a specific strategy for vocational training, which has taken the form of the following main principles: better co-ordination between initial training and further training in order to strengthen the link between the educational and training systems and the productive system; strengthening the supply and vocational nature of the formal education system; priority to middle-management training and to programmes for the integration of young graduates into the enterprise; special attention to training geared to small- and medium-sized enterprises, either for different levels of staff or for top management; to consider sandwich training schemes as the most effective, flexible and productive for preparing young persons for working life; development of training towards groups of occupations, rather than very selective training; information and qualification measures likely to stimulate the development of new functions and new occupations in enterprise; improving the qualification of adult workers by preparing them for modernisation or industry restructuring processes; investment in instructors' training in order to ensure continuity of training.

However, while it is true that an increase in overall productivity cannot be obtained at the cost of lowering wages, it is also true that it cannot be achieved systematically at the cost of cutting back employment.

If that were the case, we would be denying the very objectives which are inherent in the true concept of development.

It is therefore necessary to reconcile the strategy defined for vocational training with an increase in productive employment, based on economic and productivity growth.

In Portugal, as regards this aspect, many factors come into play, such as the scarcity of jobs; unsatisfied consumer demand; and resources which are not used or underused.

We believe that, considering these factors, positive results can be obtained in terms of growth without following a strategy of modernisation of production which is based solely on labour-intensive investments, involving the systematic use of advanced technologies and entailing very serious effects on employment and income distribution.

The adoption of a strategy such as that I have described should contain flexibility components in order to allow for the correction of certain trends which may turn out to be less appropriate to the objectives proposed. To make it possible, it is necessary to carry out a certain kind of analysis, which should not be confined to the macro-economic level. It is necessary to proceed to a more detailed analysis enabling a breakdown to be made of all the elements likely to provide relevant information in order to create an adequate framework for many of the measures to be carried out in the near future.

This is the reason why my Government, at the same time as implementing modernisation and adjustment policies, is also analysing the effects at the social level, and more precisely at the human resources level, of all the reforms which are being carried out, which are under way, or which are planned. It is doing this to find out when it would be most appropriate to adopt both general and specific policies in the areas of vocational training, employment, working conditions and at the level of social protection.

Technical co-operation has been given special importance by my Government and by the Ministry I am responsible for.

We have been carrying out an active policy of co-operation with those countries with which we maintain historical and affective ties, such as the Portuguese-speaking African countries.

These countries face the difficulties of the process of development, aggravated in some cases by regional conflicts whose consequences affect them seriously and unjustly.

It is my pleasure to announce that presently we are carrying out, with our counterparts in Angola, Cape Verde, Guinea-Bissau, Mozambique and Sao Tome and Principe, 147 co-operation projects in the areas of employment policies, vocational training, social security and services restructuring.

The evaluation made recently by all these countries is extremely positive and is an incentive to proceed.

I think that we have been able to reach a point of equilibrium in the relations we have been developing. This can only be improved in the scope of co-operation under the auspices of the ILO.

My final question is how to make these efforts as beneficial as possible. We believe that given the additional protocol which was signed between my country and the ILO in 1982, we intend to proceed with the efforts which we have been deploying in the areas which are the most essential to the development of these countries.

I would like to declare in the name of my Government that we are available and we are prepared to make our goal still more ambitious.

I am making this statement on the basis of true experience, and moreover, we are also convinced that this is the political will of all the people involved.

Once again, I would like to present our congratulations to the Director-General on his excellent report.

Mr. JENNINGS (representative of the International Federation of Commercial, Clerical, Professional and Technical Employees) – It gives me unusual satisfaction to congratulate the President on his election as well as the three Vice-Presidents and to address the Conference of the ILO at the time of its 70th anniversary. In doing so, I am speaking on behalf of FIET, the International Federation of Commercial, Clerical, Professional and Technical Employees.

Our organisation has for many years strongly supported the ILO and maintained as close a relationship with it as few non-governmental organisations can boast. And now our General Secretary for over 15 years, Mr. Heribert Maier, whom I have the honour of succeeding, has just been named Deputy Director-General of the International Labour Office and we wish him well in his work.

FIET is composed of over 300 independent and democratic trade unions in 100 countries. These unions represent some 9 million members – workers in banks and insurance, social insurance and health care, commerce employees, white-collar workers in industry, “hi-tech”, building services and professional and managerial staff.

As the Director-General's Report to this Conference entitled Recovery and employment notes: “Recent employment creation, particularly in the faster growing countries, shows the predominance of service activities over manufacturing.” The Report goes on to say that “employment creation during the period 1980-86 has been concentrated mainly in services”.

In most countries, white-collar and service employees already account for 40 to 50 per cent of all workers. Early in the 1990s in the United States, it is estimated that service industries will employ three-quarters of the labour force. In sheer numbers, this sector is already one of the largest in the world.

Therefore, I must repeat here today what FIET has been saying for some time at the ILO on every occasion possible, that the Organisation's budget for programmes in our sector is woefully under proportion. The tiny staff of the Salaried Employees and Professional Workers Branch has been doing exceptional work, considering their resources. But the ILO still has far to go in speaking to the needs of the sector. ILO activities should reflect today's labour market and we sincerely hope that the Director-General will act on this.

Finding themselves on the cutting edge of society in so many countries, service employees are rapidly attempting to organise themselves into trade unions. Yet they are confronted by many obstacles, some old, some new – obstacles which the ILO can help them to surmount.

Commerce workers, for instance, are encountering rigid resistance by employers when they try to form unions. Particularly shameful, multinational retail chains through aggressive mergers and acquisitions, are going into new markets and using all manner of manipulation to try to deprive local workers of rights they have traditionally enjoyed. The activities of the Belgian-based Delhaize chain, which operates under the name Food Lion in the United States, is just one of the more notorious examples I could name.

Social insurance and health-care personnel are finding their own jobs threatened as the callous and anti-social fad – of cutting back social programmes which have been the glue of society since the 1930s – is being pushed by the powerful in more and more countries.

In the fast-growing property services sector, the workers we call at FIET “the invisible people” who clean your offices after you leave for the day and the ones who make your buildings secure, labour long hours for low pay. In this connection, we fail to understand how an organisation like the World Bank stoops to hire out its building services to contractors who refuse to recognise trade unions.

Clerical and office workers of all types are forced to adapt to technological change with little or no consultation, even though this dramatically affects their work and life.

Due to sex discrimination in education and employment, a disproportionate share of clerical employees are women. It pleases me to note that much of the increase in FIET's membership in recent years has been due to the rising level of women joining our affiliates. However, the degradation of women clerical workers may be doubled: to their low pay and status is often added the ultimate insult of sexual harassment. Laws for their protection must be passed. But their real defence is trade union action at the local level.

In our sectors, employers are also attempting to individualise work contracts and pay structures, seeking to render the individual weak again and to escape negotiations with unions.

The particular need to integrate professional staff into trade unions has been well argued in the ILO compendium on the subject. We regret, however, that little has been done by the ILO to review the implementation of this compendium since its adoption in 1977. FIET is the authentic voice of trade unions in this field. In October this year we will hold in Madrid a second world conference on professional and managerial staff, entitled “Organising for Tomorrow,” to review union activities in the sector.

In our contemporary world it is only through full worker involvement that we can take advantage of the complex new technologies and opportunities.

Some might say, “OK, we accept your assertion that the service sectors are fundamental to the most modern areas of growth; and their organised, free and effective participation is necessary for their efficient operation. But in developing countries, where the majority of the world's people live in continuing poverty, and now especially with the immense weight of the debt crisis, much of what you say is irrelevant”.

Nothing could be farther from the truth. Are we to use nineteenth century methods to attack poverty just because it is an old curse? A very large part of FIET's membership is in the Third World. What our unions there are telling us is that they want to participate now in their countries' development and that they want to use the most modern social structures available.

As a number of leaders have discovered to their grief in recent times, it is only by involving free and democratic trade unions, not least those in the professional and services sectors, that workable economic plans could be drawn up and implemented. Such representation can only be effective in the context of full protection of rights, as assured by the basic ILO Conventions.

The Third World debt crisis is a major concern of FIET and its affiliates, which include over 2 million bank workers. We have been in the forefront of those seeking solutions and urging renegotiations, as demonstrated in the resolutions of our last World Congress, held in Lomé, Togo in 1987. We say that no more cynical and ultimately self-defeating policy could be devised than that of lender countries urging more guns on debtor governments as the primary means of implementing stabilisation programmes.

When we view the world today we see a number of encouraging trends. There are moves toward reducing tensions between the superpowers, possible real cuts in allocations wasted in arms expenditure, and the winding down of several regional conflicts. In a number of parts of the world there is a greater willingness to trust the people and to reject some old authoritarian formulas. For example, we welcome the role now being played by Solidarnosc in Poland following years of their suppression. However, we regret that some countries have yet to learn the lesson. We are particularly shocked by the recent atrocities in China where peaceful demonstrations for greater democracy, whose organisers included students and workers, were brutally massacred. For FIET, human rights in any country is never simply an internal matter. They are the concern of all. FIET strongly urges the Chinese government to lift the death sentences so far pronounced against the pro-democracy demonstrators.

China is by no means the only country where trade union rights are under attack. In Chile the CUT labour centre's leaders Bustos and Martinez continue to be prevented from performing their functions due to internal exile. In Turkey bank workers face arrest if they organise or participate in banned strike action. We regret that the Turkish Government has not lived up to its promises to the ILO to amend its labour laws. In South Africa "preventive repression" of labour leaders has become, with apartheid racism, another hallmark of the system.

There are some truly encouraging trends in the world today. But these trends will not usher in a better age in and of themselves. What is saved on guns must go to pay for bread, not just for luxuries for an elite. Greater freedom for workers must not mean greater opportunities to be exploited in a different way. And the interdependent world must not become simply the plaything of multinational corporations. The next big step toward integration in Europe, the Single Market of 1992, must be accompanied by an effective social dimension.

The best assurance I know of, that promising new trends will benefit the most people at the lowest levels, is through organised participation by free trade unions.

In conclusion I would like to commend the Conference for its important work this year on employment, the rights of minorities, nightwork and safety. We in FIET pledge our continued support for your initiatives in these important areas. We expect the ILO in the 1990s, as it has been in the past, to be a beacon for social justice. May it put forth the message ever more clearly throughout the world, to governments and employers, that basic human and trade union rights must be defended and expanded, that trade unions play a crucial role in democratic societies, that labour relations must be based on collective bargaining, and above all that the individual must not be left unprotected at the workplace.

Original - Farsi: Mr. MOSHIRIAN (Workers' delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran) - In the Name of Allah, the Merciful, the Compassionate! "We are from Allah, and to Him shall we return."

I feel it my duty, at the outset, on behalf of the workers of my country to express my appreciation to all the Workers' representatives who have extended to us their sympathies for the heart-burning demise of the great leader and guide of the world of Islam, the late Imam Khomeini (Allah's mercy and peace be upon him), who was, and will be, the most perfect supporter of the oppressed, the unbending enemy of the oppressors and the herald of the Islamic and humane aspirations of all the Muslims of the world.

I wish also to express my congratulations to Mr. Michel Hansenne on his election as the new Director-General of the International Labour Organisation, while acknowledging Mr. Blanchard's efforts through long years. We expect now, more than ever, that the International Labour Organisation will take more positive steps under the new Director-General towards the promotion of employment and elimination of the existing gap between industrialised and developing countries.

I am proud, as the representative of the workers of the Islamic Republic of Iran, to express my own views, as well as the views of the workers' organisation of my country, in relation to the Director-General's Report at this 76th Session of the International Labour Conference.

The International Labour Organisation steps into its 70th anniversary at a time when we have witnessed an increased aggravation of unemployment and of the labour market during the past decade.

Mr. Blanchard's Report also affirms that the world exploiters have raised their own growth rates by plundering the capital and resources of the developing countries. He has also stated explicitly that unemployment rates in the developing countries are increasing day by day. It should be added, too, that the plundering of the capital and resources of those countries coincides with the decrease in their prices, all to the benefit of the industrialised countries.

The Director-General has made reference to the fact that despite a positive growth in the world economy the developing countries are sinking deeper into poverty, and the world unemployment rate is further increasing. In our view, the established prices of raw materials of the exporting developing countries, as well as the sometimes excessively sharp falls in oil prices leading to the reduction of national incomes and the increase in rates of unemployment in those countries, are among the major causes of the said problems.

And yet the question remains as to whether the International Labour Organisation, claiming to be protecting the rights of the workers of the world, has taken any serious stand and measures in this respect. Has the International Labour Organisation taken any steps to condemn the plunderers of the natural wealth of the developing countries, which, as Mr. Blanchard implies, is still flowing from South to North?

The answer to that question is clear, rooted in the fact that the International Labour Organisation is too dependent on the contributions of the industrialised countries. Unless the International Labour Organisation be unchained from such captivity, any hope for genuine social justice to be secured remains futile.

While emphasising the necessary continuation of the work of the International Labour Organisation, we expect it to adopt such comprehensive approaches as eliminating the application of colonialistic policies, which usually cast their ominous shadow over the policy-making activities of the International Labour Organisation.

I wish to describe only some typical exploitationist manipulations by the industrialised countries in the Third World countries.

Since 1985 the world has witnessed the political games of the Western countries aimed at reducing oil prices. The oil-producing countries have seen the selling price of oil, rightly called "black gold", brought down to a level where even oil-extraction activities were no more economical. The fall in oil prices coincided with the slogans of the international organisations, including the International Labour Organisation, for the promotion of employment and development in the Third World countries.

Nevertheless, it caused not only a blockage in the development processes of those countries, but also a decline in growth rates, the unemployment of many workers and the stopping of much industrial production which should have otherwise played a significant role in the growth of GDP and per capita income in those countries and of many employment-creating development plans in those countries. That colonialistic attempt by the industrialised countries and the transnational enterprises has not stopped there. On the contrary, the floating value of the dollar and the arbitrary manipulation of exchange rates by them have always been to the detriment of the developing countries. Thus, even the low oil revenues of the Third World countries were somehow lopped off their national income.

It is such colonialistic policies with regard to which we expect the International Labour Organisation not to remain indifferent but to take the necessary measures instead.

Another factor contributing to the destruction of the economies of the held-back or so-called "developing countries" has been the problem of long-term loans created by the international monetary organisations that, with a view to their own interests, exert pressure upon the debtor countries, not only to pay back the principal loan but also to pay huge amounts of interest. In this manner they actually demand the output of the world, which is achieved by the wealth of the debtor countries.

Considering the trends in the world economy in the past ten years, such as the reduction of natural resources and the declining economies, particularly in the Third World, increased growth rates in the industrialised countries and the lack of effective programmes that would establish a balance in the world economy, how can one hope for a prosperous world economy based on social justice at the international level?

Unless the real prices for the raw materials exported by the developing countries are paid back to them and the unreal prices for the manufactured goods of the industrialised countries exported to the developing countries are reduced to genuinely realistic levels, there neither remains any hope for a balanced world economy nor shall we cease to witness the escalation of injustice, unemployment and massive dismissals of the workforce in the Third World countries as a result of the continued economic recession in those countries, and the deprived nations will never gain the opportunity to have access to large industries of their own, to achieve economic self-reliance.

For many years the International Labour Conference has been debating the policy of apartheid and has released numerous declarations and statements against racial discrimination.

While condemning the continuation of the policy of apartheid in South Africa, we should wish to ask: can racism be eradicated from the oppressed continent of Africa only by superficial condemnations on paper? Can we not put an end to apartheid by an all-out and genuine ban on economic and political relations with the Government of South Africa? Why is it that in a continent that is the owner of the largest and the most precious mines and other natural resources the workers should lack even sufficient daily subsistence in return for long overtime work?

For far too long we have seen Palestinian workers brutally tortured and suffering the most inhumane oppression exerted upon them in their own occupied homeland. They are considered as lower than second-grade citizens in their own homeland.

Why should the International Labour Organisation not take necessary steps towards the restoration of thousands of the oppressed Palestinian workers?

What practical protection have the workers of the occupied Moslem territories been given, after their many years of directly struggling against Zionism?

Can the mere preparation of some report or dispatching of some missions be sufficient?

I have the pleasure of declaring here that according to an Act passed recently by the Islamic Consultative Assembly, Iranian workers have become entitled to establish their own organisations, in the form of Islamic Labour Councils in productive as well as services sector in various regions of the country. Such councils are already operational in more than 1,200 medium and large undertakings and render their assistance to the workers in following up their trade problems and difficulties, contracting collective agreements and participating more in the work of the undertakings. These Labour Councils then assemble their local and regional organisations into overall congresses so that they can participate all the more effectively in following up their trade problems and difficulties and therefore in promoting the socio-economic conditions of the workers of the country. For the time being the workers' overall congress representatives participate both in the Higher Labour Council and in different labour dispute conciliation organs. As the result of the activities of the same workers' organisations they have succeeded on different occasions in preserving the purchasing power of the workers, adopting the Unemployment Insurance Act, promoting social security and other labour issues. It is also due to the co-operation of those workers' organisations that new labour laws are now undergoing the final stages of approval by the Islamic Consultative Assembly. Some provisions of the new labour laws are, in my opinion, superior even to the standards set in some of the ILO Conventions and Recommendations.

Among other basic achievements, mention should also be made of the formation of workers' housing co-operatives, known as "Eskan", the activities of which are mainly focused on the construction of new houses for the workers throughout the country.

With a view to further protecting workers who may lose their jobs for various reasons, in addition to the Unemployment Insurance Act a special protection fund has been formed by the workers themselves, the functions of which have been directed towards extending necessary protection to the employed as well as to retired workers. They are also active in the examination of labour and labour-related disputes in "labour courts".

The Workers' House of the Islamic Republic of Iran has paid great attention to training as one of the basic fields of its activities. Special contracts have been concluded with domestic universities so that a considerable number of workers can attend university, while preparatory measures have also been made for the formation of a labour university by the Workers' House.

Many workers have been trained in various technical and scientific fields at specialised training centres of the Workers' House.

These achievements were attained at a time when we were involved in an all-out war imposed on us by world imperialism and the workers of our country suffered great losses in resisting world arrogance. Nevertheless, they heroically defended their national integrity and sovereignty. The Iranian workers will never forget the bitter memory of the military attack of the US fleet against the Iranian workers in the neighbouring countries of the Persian Gulf. That untold crime must remain in international documents and be registered in history.

May I, in conclusion, wish success and prosperity for all the combatant and committed workers of the world and hope for the victory of the oppressed over the oppressors.

Original - French: Mr. ALLINI (Workers' delegate, Gabon) - Mr. President, I would like to associate myself with those who have preceded me in congratulating you on your well-deserved election to the presidency of the present session.

My delegation joins me also in congratulating Mr. Michel Hansenne who was so brilliantly elected on 13 February 1989 to the post of the eighth Director-General of the ILO. His statements from this very rostrum while he was Minister of Labour of his country, Belgium, have already more than adequately demonstrated that he is a fervent defender of social justice, a guarantee for lasting peace.

As regards the reports before us for discussion, the one entitled Recovery and employment, has attracted the attention of the workers of my country, Gabon, whose fate is linked with that of their comrades in the zone of Central Africa, on whose behalf I am speaking as President of a subregional organisation, the Labour Organisation of Central Africa.

Economic recovery and the creation of jobs implies a new development concept based on new terms of trade and marketing. I must emphasise here that all these good intentions or measures would have to come after the recognition of the rights of peoples and the sincere respect for dignity and human liberty, both inside and outside our countries.

Within this sphere of activity which defends social justice we must seek mutual understanding, as much between workers and employers as between credit-granting bodies and underdeveloped states; and therefore request the intervention of the ILO regarding the conditions imposed by the IMF and the World Bank aimed only at reducing social advantages, and resulting in discontent, revolt and even social insurrection in the countries which are victims of this injustice. We realise that these two organisations, the IMF and the World Bank, have never imposed conditions which would jeopardise social benefits in the case of developed countries. Thus, for the IMF and the World Bank the workers themselves are, through their sacrifices, both the remedy for all ills and the vaccine for all epidemics.

At the same time, the employers, of whom little is demanded, or nothing at all, see their profit margins increasing at the expense of the sacrifices of the State and the workers.

The ILO is well placed to denounce this injustice and to firmly recall that the destroyer of any system is, after all, lack of equity; and the sacrifices which are made to re-establish the balance of our economy must be distributed in an equitable manner for economy to benefit all concerned.

In our opinion, rights, freedom and dignity are not synonymous with the proliferation or the right to introduce or abolish measures or destabilise institutions. The new economic order of which less and less is being said should consist of aid or credits to implement the programmes elaborated by governments, employers and workers. To achieve recovery and create employment, it is necessary to meet the conditions for obtaining sufficient credit to attain private and public objectives in the fields of health, education, roads construction and viable private co-operatives.

After cancellation of our ever-growing debts, conditions should be defined by all concerned. The lenders should accord the necessary credits and establish monetary parity and rates of interest, and the borrower would have as the only repayment guarantee the participation of the social partners in the programming and its implementation. This tall order would not upset existing structure but would, on the contrary, generate enthusiasm. All prerogatives would be duly respected.

All this cannot be achieved unless man, the artisan and the beneficiary of development, receives an intensive and accelerated education. The Third World does not have a very great tradition in important and complex management.

Accelerated training in management is, in our opinion, of major importance. It is one of the priority needs for the vitality of our enterprises and the implementation of development programmes in our States. Without this training, and due to the bad state of our enterprises, a true social policy cannot be maintained or even promoted.

Law, liberty, dignity and credibility, to be used properly or to be merited, must be accompanied by gigantic effort, and campaigns will be carried out for many years, thanks to the assistance of the ILO. Management seminars will be organised for managers of large and small enterprises and co-operatives at village level where there is a possibility of discovering latent ability.

In order to achieve economic recovery and create jobs, it is necessary to avoid anti-social measures which could endanger our state institutions. The mass media is only waiting for an opportunity to amplify or extrapolate such possibilities.

International peace and stability remain a precondition for the promotion of development. Development, through the delivery of factories key-in-hand, is at an end, together with its corollary of growing indebtedness. This last decade of the twentieth century requires a balancing of the practice of partnership in small- and medium-sized enterprises as well as in production co-operatives in rural areas. There, in these rural areas, the gloom, the rural exodus, malnutrition and hunger will not be overcome merely by good intentions or speeches.

Furthermore, it must be said that the experts of the ILO have a duty to act upon the observations made in connection with the application of standards in our States; but there is another duty which is also essential, and this is the role to be played by the office of the Director-General. This office must rekindle the flame of tripartism within our States and establish a frank and sincere dialogue between nations. This necessity can be met only through direct contact missions. Standards and reports alone are not sufficient.

It is also part of the trade union vocation to participate in any initiative the objective of which is to protect nature and, in particular, prevent the mortal danger from toxic substances.

We welcome the fact that France and Canada have taken the courageous and humane decision of cancelling the debts of the majority of countries in Africa. But this measure, no matter how courageous and humane, would nevertheless be without any lasting effect if the wealthiest countries continue to lend at the same conditions as now to the poorest countries. The increases in rates of interest and floating rates of exchange will lead underdeveloped States to the same ruin and to the same dead end.

That is why it is the urgent duty of the ILO, of its leadership and of its Governing Body, as well as of the Conference as a whole, to take the necessary steps to ensure that such an economic and human catastrophe will never occur again.

May 1989 be the year of anniversaries of events characterising the evolution of our way of life and the marked change in our attitudes, as our President, El Hadj Bongo, would wish to see and so wholeheartedly desires. His policy is built on dialogue and, therefore, in the spirit of 1919, the spirit of which he has given evidence both within and outside his country, a political attitude which he has applied both in inter-African and international affairs.

The moment is all the more appropriate for the taking of such initiatives, as 1989 is the year of the commemoration of great victories of humanity such as the first evolution and change in attitudes which took place in France, which is today celebrating the bicentenary of the Declaration of the Rights of Man and also such great achievements as the century of the Eiffel Tower. We must not, of course, forget the 70th anniversary of the ILO either.

In referring to the heirs of the past great pioneers who devoted their lives to fighting tyrannical slavery and all abuses of human dignity I am thinking of Albert Thomas, Léon Jouhaux, David Morse and so many others, not forgetting our dear Francis Blanchard. It is our duty and that of the Director-General, to follow the example of these illustrious universalists, using the same weapons with the same conviction and the same persuasion and obstinacy, so that the IMF and the World Bank will understand our anxiety and take it into account. This is the necessary and undeniable condition for economic recovery and in order to guarantee job creation, the major concern of the 76th Session of the Conference.

Through your influence, the influence of our Organisation on the other United Nations Bodies and the credit-granting organisations, you will be defending and ensuring respect of the rights of peoples, and dignity and human liberty, and you will have done what is essential. The rest will then follow – of this I am convinced.

The PRESIDENT (Mrs. MOLKOVA) – Before I give the floor to Mr. Danieli, Government adviser, Israel, to exercise his right of reply, I would like to recall that the reply should not exceed the limit of three minutes. I give the floor to Mr. Danieli to exercise his right of reply in connection with the speeches given by Mr. Al-Fayez, Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Saudi Arabia, and Mr. Bozo, Minister of Social Affairs and Labour, Syrian Arab Republic.

Mr. DANIELI (Government adviser, Israel) – Some speakers, such as the Syrian Minister of Social Affairs and Labour, apparently do not have much to tell us about labour achievements in their own countries, and therefore find it always easier and more convenient to indulge in base allegations and fantasies concerning the situation of Palestinian workers in the territories administered by Israel.

The Syrian Minister should realise that the relentless pursuit of ill-conceived political goals in the framework of this Conference will not only fail to bear fruit for his own country, but will also prove detrimental to this Conference as a whole.

Delegates are well aware that Syria allows virtually no freedom of association or right to organise and practises repressive policies towards workers, both Palestinians and Syrians alike. The Syrian Government is in complete control of the Syrian trade union movement and workers are not free to form labour unions independent of the official one.

The ILO Committee of Experts has been quite critical of Syrian labour laws and practices, including the existence of a compulsory single trade union structure and restrictions on the workers' rights, which are incompatible with the provisions of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

The Committee of Experts has especially criticised Syrian legislation under which non-Arab foreign workers are prevented from joining or forming trade unions of their own. It has also expressed concern about the Syrian Penal Code under which prison sentences prescribing hard labour can be inflicted.

All this is only the tip of the iceberg. Repression and deprivation of workers' rights has become widespread in Syria in the context of an overall deteriorating economic system. This situation is a consequence of years of entrenched dictatorship. There is no need for the Syrian Minister to dwell on Israel – he has much work to do at home.

DECISION BY SECRET BALLOT ON THE REQUEST BY THE BAHA'I INTERNATIONAL COMMUNITY TO BE REPRESENTED AT THE CONFERENCE

The PRESIDENT – The first item on our agenda today is to decide on the request for representation submitted by the Baha'i International Community. The merits of the request have been discussed at length and, as indicated in the Daily Bulletin, we are here now to take a decision without further debate. It has been indicated previously by Mr. Muhr, on behalf of the Workers' group, that he would request a secret vote under article 19, paragraph 11, of the Standing Orders. For purposes of having it put formally, I will give the floor to Mr. Muhr.

Original – German: Mr. MUHR (Workers' delegate, Federal Republic of Germany) – In order to exclude all possible doubt and to observe all the procedural rules, I confirm that the Workers' group invokes article 19, paragraph 11, and requests a vote by secret ballot.

The PRESIDENT – We now have a formal request for a vote by secret ballot on the request by the Baha'i International Community to be represented at the 76th Session of the Conference.

This request has been made by the Chairman of a group acting on behalf of his group, in accordance with article 19, paragraph 11. It is therefore valid.

In conformity with article 19, paragraph 12, we must first designate three returning officers. The proposals of the three groups are as follows: Mr. Nabian, Islamic Republic of Iran, for the Government group; Mr. Hernandez, the Philippines, for the Employers' group; and Mr. Vanni, Italy, for the Workers' group.

If there are no objections, I consider these proposals adopted and I would be grateful if the returning officers would take their place on the platform at the table situated on my right.

(The returning officers take their place on the platform.)

The PRESIDENT – We shall now take the vote and we shall proceed in the following way. Ballot papers have been prepared with sections marked "Yes", "No" and "Abstention". The Clerk of the Conference will proceed to a roll call. As each delegate's name is called, he should go first to the platform on my left where he will be given a ballot paper. He will then go to the speakers' rostrum in front of me to fill in the ballot paper by marking the appropriate square with a cross. If I may explain a little further, if you wish to say "No" you mark an "X" in the square against "No"; if it is "Yes" then it is in the square against "Yes"; and if it is an abstention then it is in the square against "Abstention".

Once he has done so, he will proceed to the table in front of the returning officers, indicating to them clearly his name, his national delegation and his status, that is, delegate or duly authorised substitute, within the delegation, and then drop his ballot paper in the ballot box.

I must point out that a ballot paper bearing any mark other than a cross in the chosen square will be declared invalid.

Original – Arabic: AL-OMAR (Government adviser Kuwait) – I would like to ask the President to clarify whether the question being put to the vote is the one mentioned in the Daily Bulletin, that we are asked to express our opinion on whether we agree to give the Baha'i International Community observer status. Those in favour of granting such status should say "Yes", and those who are opposed, "No"; those who would like to abstain should mark the appropriate square. I would like clarify this and after this is clarified I would reserve my right of reply.

The PRESIDENT – The substantive matter we are voting on is a request by the Baha'i International Community to be represented at the 76th Session of the Conference. If you want to accede to the request, you should put your "X" on the appropriate square, which is "Yes". If you oppose the request, you should put your "X" under "No". If you are abstaining, you should put your "X" under "Abstention".

Original – Arabic: AL-OMAR (Government adviser, Kuwait) – Based on your clarification, I would like to say that the position of my country is to abstain.

The PRESIDENT – We are now going to vote and the President does not want to be informed about the intentions of any delegation.

(A vote by secret ballot is taken.)

The PRESIDENT – The result of the vote on the request by the Baha'i International Community to be represented at the 76th Session of the ILO Conference is as follows: 152 votes in favour, 30 against, 207 abstentions, one blank vote, and 11 invalid votes. Since the quorum is 253, the request by the Baha'i International Community to be represented at the 76th Session of the Conference is denied.

I have a request for the floor from Mr. Hammond, Government adviser, Canada, to explain his vote.

Mr. HAMMOND (Government adviser, Canada; Chairman of the Selection Committee) – The Canadian Government regrets the decision that the Conference has taken though of course it respects it. The reason that we regret it is that, as is widely known, the organisation in question is an organisation with consultative status with ECOSOC and UNICEF and collaborates with the World Health Organisation, the Food and Agriculture Organisation, the United Nations Development Programme and the United Nations Environmental Programme. It is an NGO that takes a keen interest in the subject of human rights and is a member of the Special Committee of NGOs on Human Rights. We therefore regret that this request was not acceded to immediately in accordance with the normal practice in the ILO. My Government hopes that this organisation will not be discouraged by what has happened today.

The PRESIDENT – The matter has been discussed twice in committee and twice in plenary and has now been voted upon. I would therefore be extremely reluctant to reopen the debate on the issue.

I give the floor to Mr. Muhr on a point of order.

Original – German: Mr. MUHR (Workers' delegate, Federal Republic of Germany; Vice-Chairman, Governing Body of the ILO) – The point of a secret ballot is that nobody can thereafter give an explanation which, directly or indirectly, challenges the result. I therefore think that what Mr. Hammond has just said is not acceptable, and I ask you to insist that no statement should be made which identifies the way in which a country has voted.

The PRESIDENT – I give the floor to Mr. Hewitt on a point of order.

Mr. HEWITT (Government adviser, United Kingdom) – I have heard what the Workers' Vice-Chairman of the Governing Body said. I see nothing in the Constitution or the Standing Orders of this Conference which prevents anyone explaining their vote. It is an absolutely democratic issue that anyone who wishes to explain his vote, even when the vote has been taken by secret ballot, can do so. I would like to ask that this Conference respect its own rules of procedure.

The PRESIDENT – Since nothing is specified in the Standing Orders of this Conference in this respect, then the ruling of the President, who is required to conduct the proceeding in the best possible manner, should be respected. My ruling, since a vote has been taken is that, there shall be no further debate of the issue. However, since five people have requested to speak I am prepared to allow each to speak for one minute.

Mr. MATTSON (Government delegate, United States) – After the hours that have been lost in past plenaries on this issue, I find it quite unreasonable to have to speak for one minute only. Nevertheless, I shall comply.

This is a day of shame for this Organisation which my Government shall not soon forget. In this city of Geneva a long-time centre of religious tolerance and diversity, in this Organisation which is celebrating 70 years of progress in the field of workers' rights and labour standards, today for the first time in the history of the Conference you have denied a non-governmental organisation the right to observer status on the basis of religion. We shall not forget it.

Original – Arabic: Mr. AL-OMAR (Government adviser, Kuwait) – If there are some who express regret at the democratic decision taken by the Conference, I should like also on behalf of the Islamic group to express our regret that there are some who are against democracy. It is up to them not to participate in this Conference if they do not believe in democracy. I should like to voice my objection to the statement by the representative of Canada, Chairman of the Selection Committee, who has misguided the Committee by citing erroneous information regarding observer membership in various organisations.

Original – Arabic: Mr. AL-YAHYA (Government delegate, Saudi Arabia) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I respect the decisions of the Conference and I respect the voting. We had previously voiced the opinion that we should be very careful of voting, but since it was decided to take a vote I should like us to close the matter at that and not reopen the debate. If any delegate wishes to explain his vote or that of his country, let his remarks be limited to that. To attack the voting conducted by the Conference is totally unacceptable to us.

Mr. NABIAN (Government adviser, Islamic Republic of Iran) – In the Name of Allah, the Merciful, the Compassionate! Allow me on behalf of the delegation of the Islamic Republic of Iran to support your ruling, Mr. President, that the debate should not be reopened after the results of the votes have been announced. I also wish to make two points for the record: first, the regret that was expressed by a Government delegate here should be interpreted as his regret for not having been able, both in the Committee and in plenary, to impose and dictate his views upon others; secondly, I would like to object to the incorrect information provided by the Chairman of the Selection Committee.

The PRESIDENT – I give the floor to Mr. Hewitt, Government adviser of the United Kingdom. But first Mr. Hussami, Government adviser, Syrian Arab Republic, wishes to speak on a point of order.

Original – Arabic: Mr. HUSSAMI (Government adviser, Syrian Arab Republic) – In accordance with article 14, paragraph 3, of the Standing Orders, no delegate has the right to speak more than once on the same amendment or proposal or resolution without special permission from the Conference. Mr. Hewitt has already spoken and is now asking for the floor once more. He has no right to do so and I therefore ask you not to give him the floor again, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT – The first time Mr. Hewitt took the floor was on a point of order. Mr. Hewitt, you have the floor.

Mr. HEWITT (Government adviser, United Kingdom) – Thank you Mr. President. I am sorry that this is causing you trouble, and I congratulate you on your chairmanship.

I would like to explain the vote of the United Kingdom Government delegation. The United Kingdom Government delegation voted in favour of the Baha'i International Community being invited to be represented at this Conference. In our view the Baha'i International Community is a well-known and distinguished NGO with full consultative status with ECOSOC and many other bodies of the United Nations family. We think it is highly regrettable that such a body should have been excluded from this Conference on religious grounds, albeit on the basis of a technicality in the absence of a quorum.

It is a sad day for the ILO, and seems to be contrary to the past proud tradition of tolerance of this Conference and of this Organisation.

Original – Arabic: Mr. AL-JASSEM (Employers' delegate, Kuwait) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate!

I should like to thank you once more, Mr. President, for your tolerance and patience. I should like to thank you and all those who participated in the vote, since this marks the adoption of a historic position vis-à-vis movements against Islam.

If there is anyone here who is not satisfied, I should like him to understand what real democracy is. This is a day on which the Conference has shown a real historic appreciation of democracy.

The PRESIDENT – I thank the Employers' delegate of Kuwait and assure him that the President and all his colleagues have always done their best in conducting the affairs of the 76th Session of the Conference. We would, however, like to count on the support and understanding of the delegations here because the success of this session depends very much on an objective approach to the issues before us.

There being no other delegations wishing to speak on the matter, the issue of the request by the Baha'i International Community is now closed.

The PRESIDENT – We will now proceed with the discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General.

Original – German: Mr. TEGTMEIR (Secretary of State, Federal Republic of Germany) – Firstly, on behalf of the Federal Republic of Germany, I should like to associate myself with the numerous speakers who have congratulated you, Mr. President, on your election and at the same time to wish you every success in conducting the debates of this 76th Session of the International Labour Conference.

At this point I should also like to express the gratitude of my Government to Mr. Francis Blanchard for all he achieved at the head of the International Labour Office. During his many years of activity within the ILO, including the last 15 years as Director-General, Mr. Blanchard personified the ideals and aims of the Organisation. He managed to steer the ship of the ILO, at a very difficult time, safely through rocks and shoals, so that it could assert and consolidate its leading role as the social conscience of the world.

I should like, from this rostrum, to extend a special greeting to Mr. Michel Hansenne, the new Director-General of the International Labour Office. Through his earlier activities in various ministerial posts in Belgium, he has already given proof of his special commitment to the basic values of our Organisation. As Minister of Labour, Mr. Hansenne was a strong champion of social dialogue, without which he believed that there could be no lasting settlement in the field of industrial relations. He was one of the first to allude to the economic and social dimensions of the coming together of the people of Europe – with an eye to the single European Market of 1992.

May I say, in this connection, that the Commission of the European Communities submitted a Preliminary draft Community Charter of fundamental social rights in May this year. I welcome this draft because it brings the previously abstract discussion of social problems down to concrete specific themes. This solemn declaration can only, however, be viewed as a first step. We must have a common end, namely to produce precise binding minimum standards. These minimum standards must be spelled out very clearly if we are to avoid possible sources of friction affecting workers which could arise for instance in the case of contractual workers employed in foreign countries or differing regulations on the weekly day of rest. It is not only, I feel, in our common interest to reach certain basic standards on social questions within the European Community; it is essential. The Common Market has both social and economic dimensions, and hence both employers and workers must strive together to attain this objective.

We shall more readily build our "house of Europe" if we combine economic integration with a definition of our social goals. It would be particularly advisable to set out with limited – but stable and specific – binding standards rather than more declarations of intent. The ILO has shown that it is possible to attain such minimum standards, with its almost 350 Conventions and Recommendations.

The Director-General's Report this year once again deals with a burning issue; it indicates how economic growth can be harmonised with social progress and how we can reduce world-wide unemployment which is acute, even though many countries are experiencing a welcome economic upturn. The Director-General rightly says that without employment, there can be no human dignity. I agree that the prerequisite for any progress is growth but that this growth first and foremost create jobs and alleviate poverty. This is confirmed by developments in the Federal Republic of Germany where the economy is doing very well indeed. We are now in the seventh year of a continuous economic boom and prospects for the future are also good. Since 1983 our gross national product has increased by 15.6 per cent. This economic boom has also affected the labour market and considerably eased the situation. The number of employed has increased sharply; since 1983, the number of actively employed persons has risen by 1.2 million. A halt has also been put to the increase in unemployment: indeed unemployment has actually fallen and, for the first time since October 1982; it is under the 2 million mark. But we shall not rest on our laurels; we need to make additional efforts. After consultations and agreements with the social groups, further efforts will be made to offer work to the long-term unemployed. This programme will begin in July 1989.

At the international level we have most unhappily to agree with the Director-General that, despite a considerable growth in the world economy, very many Third World countries are getting ever poorer. We in the industrialised countries are to some extent responsible for this and we do not deny it. In many quarters, it has been stated that the crucial issue is the foreign debt. The ILO, with its predominantly social aims, is not necessarily the right institution to discuss strategies to overcome this problem. Financial policy has to be discussed in other bodies, namely those dealing with finance and economy. However, let me say that my Government takes its responsibilities very seriously and acts in accordance.

Action is being taken to improve the position of the poorest and the highly indebted countries. The Federal Republic of Germany has already completely written off the debts of the most indebted countries. The total release agreement for the poor sub-Saharan States of Africa amounted to 4.4 thousand million German marks. At the same time it wrote off these debts, the Federal Republic provided financial help in the form of extra credit to the least developed countries. Furthermore, it improved its loan conditions. The countries most severely stricken by price increases have been offered particularly easy credits over 40 years, at 0.75 per cent interest, with the first ten years free. Indeed, in sub-Saharan Africa, all the countries, with two exceptions, have already been granted subsidies or credit on highly favourable terms.

In the field of development assistance, both bilateral and multilateral, we are contributing towards the establishment and modernisation of the urgently needed infrastructure – as advocated by the Director-General. The Federal Republic is also concerned about encouraging the efforts made by the developing countries themselves to reform their economies and to deal with obstacles to development. At the same time social and cultural points of view are also given consideration in the planning and implementation of these strategies.

In no field more than in environmental protection, international co-operation produce truly effective and lasting solutions. The protection of the world climate and atmosphere, the protection of endangered species and oceans and the protection of our forests are matters affecting us all and they are a challenge to the whole world. The Federal Government has adapted its practices to these considerations. When financing development projects, we make it a rule to ensure that they do not harm the environment. We propose that, in connection with the resolutions before us concerning environmental protection, other countries and international organisations should also take these precautions.

When undertaking our various actions, we should not forget that in a world which is growing steadily smaller, multilateral co-operation is also extremely vital in the social sector. Only together can we tackle world-wide problems such as: unemployment; inadequate social security; and social infrastructure, consisting of social administrations and a framework for collective bargaining. This is not a new idea however; it is very topical and requires urgent attention.

At the beginning of this Conference, when the President of the Swiss Confederation was present, much was said about the conditions in which the ILO came into being and about its activities. Allow me to say the following with regard to the significance of this 70th anniversary.

These 70 years bear witness to our Organisation's steady endeavours to improve the conditions of life and work of workers throughout the world. The experiences of the First World War are reflected in the first sentence of the Preamble of our Constitution: "Universal and lasting peace can be established only if it is based upon social justice". It goes without saying that a lofty statement, advocating noble objectives, will not necessarily be applied. But we have an impressive number of 168 Conventions and 176 Recommendations and this means that we are a step nearer to the goal of attaining social justice. Nevertheless, much remains to be done. At this session of the Conference, for example, we are discussing the adoption of standards on night work and the use of chemicals at work. There are also proposals for other standards; I can only recall the report of the Ventejol Committee of 1986. We must also cope with new challenges, which have emerged as a result of social and economic change.

With regard to these latter, we can no longer ask whether new technologies should be used or not. We must rather ask ourselves how we can use these new technologies for the greater social good of all. How can we make optimum use of these technologies and reduce the risks? Technical, economic and social progress must go hand in hand. We must, therefore, at one of the next sessions of this Conference, decide on minimum standards concerning the protection of workers' social rights when new technologies are introduced.

The demands made upon the ILO in 1919 were not new at the time. They were the result of the social movement of the nineteenth century. The workers' movement, but also the socially conscious representatives of the bourgeoisie, were also demanding both national and international protection of labour. Mr. Muhr, on 8 June of this year, recalled the demands made at the International Labour Congress of 1889, held in Paris.

At the same time, I should like to remind you of the first International Conference of Protection of Labour, which was held in 1890 in Berlin at the initiative of the Swiss Government. One hundred years ago, the Berlin Conference made a number of recommendations to governments; these covered such areas as night work, which brings us to our discussions at this session of the Conference. The President of the Conference, Mr. Nkomo, and the Chairman of the Governing Body, Mr. Mensah, both referred, with gratitude, to this Conference in Berlin at the beginning of the Conference. Next year we shall be remembering that it took place 100 years ago and that it was a forerunner of the International Labour Conference; it bears witness to the long social tradition which exists in my country.

Seventy years of the ILO mean 70 years of activity for human rights, which necessarily include the rights of workers and trade unions. Last year we commemorated the 40th anniversary of the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87). Our action in the field of human rights is still, unfortunately, extremely necessary. Political developments in the recent past show human rights can be grossly infringed – even when the world is looking on. It is unacceptable that people demonstrating peacefully for freedom and democracy can be made to pay for their demonstrations. I must also recall that last year we asserted that human rights are an integral part of human nature and human dignity. They are inalienable rights and apply throughout the world, irrespective of the period in time, the prevailing social system, the government in power, or whether or not they are reflected in a country's legislation. Human rights must therefore be made an issue wherever they are infringed. We are not interfering in the internal affairs of other States if we raise our voice against the neglect of human rights. This is a matter for human solidarity.

The Federal German Parliament has expressed its dismay and concern about the bloody repression of the peaceful demonstration of students and unarmed civilian persons in China; indeed, all political groups joined together in making a common statement on this matter. Our contacts, which started out so promisingly, will only bear fruit if the Chinese authorities conduct them in a spirit of respect for basic human rights and are prepared for dialogue and openness.

In concluding, I should like to say that the ILO has achieved much in the past. Freedom, democracy and social justice are making progress throughout the world and our discussions will contribute even more towards that end. The ILO has an important task before it. The challenges of the nineties will lead to new challenges, but also open new doors.

With its objectives in social policy, it can contribute towards attaining peace and understanding between member States, without which there can be no lasting peace in the world.

Original – French: Mr. ZINSOU (Government delegate, Benin) – On behalf of the delegation which I have the honour to head at the present session and in my own name, it is with pleasure that I address to Mr. Nkomo my warm congratulations upon his election to the Presidency of our Conference. Given his lengthy experience and his competence acquired at similar international gatherings, as well as that of the other Conference Officers, I am convinced that the work entrusted to his able direction will be successful.

Accordingly, I should like to address my cordial and amical congratulations to Mr. Michel Hansenne, our new Director-General, upon his brilliant election on 13 February 1989. I am convinced that, taking into account his keen intellect and his sense of dialogue, he will succeed in furthering, consolidating and enriching the ILO, both in terms of its principles as well as its objectives of peace, justice and social progress.

We are once again in this great forum of the Palais des Nations, a memorable site in contemporary history, to reflect upon one of the most preoccupying topics for our countries and our governments.

Complying with tradition, the Director-General has submitted his annual Report to us, the first part of which has to do with economic resurgence and employment, whereas the other parts concern the activities of the ILO, carried out during the year 1988.

In expressing my full agreement with the central theme which has been submitted for our reflection, I am keenly aware of the extent of the resources made available by our Organisation to sustain the actions of the Director-General within the context of technical co-operation throughout the whole of the past 12 months.

In this respect, I should like to express my great appreciation to all those involved and who have contributed to the preparation of the present Report.

Indeed, the global destabilisation of the economy, the marked slow-down in exchanges on a world-wide basis, the slackening of the multiplier effect, the persistence of major financial imbalances, the ever-increasing indebtedness, particularly of the developing countries and the severe testing of international co-operation, have been the main topics of the Report presented by the Director-General of the ILO to this session.

Moreover, I think it is necessary to point out that the merit of this Report is that it is based on proposals made by the Director-General for strategies to provide impetus for restructuring on a short-, medium-, or long-term basis of our destabilised national economies.

As you will appreciate how can we not be impatient to come to grips with a theme as preoccupying and as relevant?

That is why I should like to say on this occasion that to try to restore the world economy with the establishment of a new job-creating strategy in view, appears to me to be an attractive undertaking, both in terms of its form and its substance. But how many articles have already been devoted to this subject by well-informed specialists?

How many international and national seminars have dealt with the subject? And yet, unemployment and underemployment have constantly grown in our countries. At this stage of the debate, therefore, I wish to point out that I am among those who believe that the international community can no longer continue as in the past two decades, to expose the problem of unemployment without attempting to resolve it.

For my part, I consider that the problem of employment, or quite simply that of development, is among the priorities which must be addressed without any further ado.

It is no longer a question of scholarly debates on the limits of economic growth, but rather one of setting into motion all the national productive forces in the service of another group which would find its raison d'être in the new order; because the level of violence observed in various parts of the world, the demand of social organisations for a possible reform of present economic structures are historic signals the manifestations of which defy the international community at times, rendering the ILO powerless as an instrument of social policy throughout the world.

I know that our Organisation, since its establishment, has always defended the social objectives of development, but its efforts, although successful in bringing about changes in certain parts of the world, have not been sufficient to overcome the institutional obstacles in other regions, and thus sweep the continent to which I belong towards harmonious and integral development.

It therefore seems essential for the ILO to intensify its activities to combat not only unemployment and underemployment, but also poverty and want which have acquired ever-increasingly disturbing dimensions in our States.

Indeed, the classical system of development implemented in our countries, based upon economic growth, has merely accelerated the impoverishment of a large number of our populations, who, at a point in the history in our societies, placed all their confidence in that system.

It is not for me to criticise an economic system which has not lived up to the hopes and expectations of millions of people who are today fighting for their survival.

Nevertheless, it seems appropriate to remind this Conference that the structural adjustment programme, as a new remedy, should give impetus to our strained national economies and must also consider their social dimension in order not to accelerate unemployment, poverty and want in our young States.

Similarly, I am greatly pleased at the conclusions of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment which was held in November 1987 in Geneva.

However, I must emphasize that my Government, in supporting the conclusions of that meeting, wishes to see them put into operation very rapidly in order to complement the efforts of our countries in their struggle for social and economic recovery.

Beyond these considerations, my country is among those who believe that the solution of the problem of employment, as it arises today, necessarily involves four strategies.

The first consists in ensuring dynamic and effective follow-up of all the actions conducted by our Organisation over the past ten years in this field.

In this context, our Organisation must now take stock of the World Employment Programme launched a few years ago. The second strategy involves the reorientation of vocational training, both of dismissed workers and of young workers with or without diplomas, whose ever-increasing numbers are constantly disrupting the data of the employment market.

The third strategy should be guided by the concern for controlling the population growth in our countries.

Particularly in the case of training and the rapid insertion of young graduates and the unemployed, the ILO will have to work out specific programmes capable of supplying the latter with the appropriate qualifications for them to satisfy the requirements of new jobs.

The ILO will also have to elaborate a programme for a meeting at the highest possible level with the competent international institutions in the field of education, with a view to defining a common platform for collaboration capable of reorienting employment trends.

As for population growth, I am aware of the cultural problems that are involved in birth control in certain parts of the world. But, in the interest of promoting employment, it seems to me to be important for the ILO seriously to examine the problem of converting population growth into a process of providing appropriate training and of adapting employment to the technological civilisation.

The fourth strategy also touches on the cancellation of the debts of the least advanced countries. Indeed, how can we revive our national economies, how can we create new jobs, when our countries can no longer stand up on their own because they are bowed down by chronic indebtedness.

This is why it seems to me appropriate to emphasize that, given the prospects for an improvement of the employment situation and a possible new economic resurgence, the international community will have to think again about the debt problem and define a new strategy, given the state of indebtedness of the developing countries.

In this respect I am pleased to affirm here that France and Canada have already perceived this need and today are examples to be followed by other industrialised countries.

On this occasion I wish to express to these countries my feelings of satisfaction at their partial or total writing-off of the debts of certain of the poorest African States.

These are the thoughts that come to mind when I consider the central theme of the Report of the Director-General of the ILO, submitted to the Conference.

Turning to the other parts of the Report, which basically deal with the activities of the ILO during 1988, the Director-General, as custom requires, has clearly set out the various activities in the fields within his province; namely, international labour standards, practical action professional training and regional activities.

In full appreciation of all these activities under the leadership of the Director-General, I should like, on behalf of my Government, to express to him my most sincere thanks for the attention he has always paid to the development of Africa in general and the People's Republic of Benin in particular.

Taking into account my country's interest in the problem of training and the promotion of the informal sector for job creation, I venture to hope that the Director-General of the ILO will continue to respond favourably to our needs in this respect as he has always done in the past.

There is no doubt that the economic and social progress of mankind, the real improvement of living conditions for all the workers of world, as well as international co-operation, are possible only if peoples live in peace and social justice, regardless of their colour, their race and their political and ideological convictions.

Mr. MORTON (Workers' delegate, United Kingdom) – I am likely to be among the last of the speakers to congratulate the President and the other Officers of the Conference, on their election, but I hope I am among the first to congratulate the President on his guidance afforded to the 76th Session of the Conference during the last two weeks. As in many previous years, this has been exemplary. I should also like to congratulate the new Director-General, to wish him well and to assure him of the full support of British trade unionists in fulfilling his most exacting and vital role in line with the best traditions of this Organisation. British workers would wish me to express deep satisfaction at the presence among us of our friends from Solidarnosc in Poland, who persevered in the fight for trade union freedom and who have won a victory for independent unions everywhere.

This is a historic session of the Conference. The ILO has reached three score years and ten but I believe that the Director-General, a young man himself, is already aware of the vigour of this Organisation. The Conference has already involved sharp debate and controversy, some of which has been inevitable when we have been tackling issues which have real meaning for working people. The ILO is regarded by informed people in the United Kingdom pre-eminently as a staunch and honest advocate and defender of basic human rights at work. These rights – to freedom of association, to freedom from discrimination and forced labour – are fundamental to any society that claims to be civilised. Most governments would find that difficult to deny; so would the majority of employers. And yet every day there are attacks on these rights, sometimes subtle, sometimes open and sometimes brutal.

I do not wish to take up much time by dealing with the position in my own country, but I must just remark that in the United Kingdom the trade union movement, the largest democratic voluntary organisation in the country, continues to face bitter ideologically inspired antagonism from the Government. This antagonism has not only led to a number of complaints to this Organisation (virtually all of which have been upheld) but which has deprived the British people of the contribution that the trade union movement could make to the formulation of economic and social policies.

I listened with great interest to what the distinguished Secretary of State for Employment, Mr. Fowler, speaking of industrial relations reform and workers' participation, had to say this morning. Notably absent from his contribution was any reference to the vital role in workers' participation and representation of democratic trade unions, the only institutions through which their collective interests can be effectively represented.

Now the ILO has, of course, a wider international role. Time and time again, delegates to this Conference give practical examples of the interdependence of nations and peoples around the world. Governments are sometimes slow to wake up to the fact but few, if any, would argue that a single country acting on its own can hope to tackle effectively the massive problems confronting its people. For example, if we think of the crushing burden of debt on many countries, it is absolutely clear that international co-operation is essential if we are to confront this crisis. The great majority of workers at this Conference had high hopes, not yet completely banished, that a resolution of this Conference would add to and strengthen the work already undertaken by the ILO on this crucial matter. The Director-General's Report, Recovery and employment, is a fitting tribute to the great contribution that Mr. Francis Blanchard has made to the ILO. It is also a valuable contribution to an analysis of this problem and it reminds us of the harsh realities involved. In some countries we have come to expect continued material progress as inevitable, and yet in 1980 there were 820 million people living in absolute poverty. This figure has now risen to 950 million. The phrase "living in absolute poverty" is misleading; it would be more accurate to say "dying in and from poverty". And if a sense of humanity or pity is not enough to stimulate new action, the Director-General reminds us that the debt crisis is a major impediment to the expansion and growth of the world economy. For those who – even in the face of bitter experience – persist in advocating the "pull yourself up by your own bootstraps" approach, the Director-General again advises us that "a global solution is an absolute requirement. Debt and terms-of-trade problems cannot be overcome at the national level even if the political will to do so exists".

In referring to structural adjustment, the Report has another lesson for those who would attempt to ignore trade unions. Commenting on the value of the 1987 High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment, the Director-General declares that it "helped to advance the idea that structural adjustment can be attained at minimum social cost so long as there is strong commitment to doing so based on social consensus and tripartite consultations".

I fear that in my own country "consensus" has come to be regarded by some as a rather dubious foreign concept, but recent political events suggest that this may change in the not too distant future.

Of course, co-operation across national boundaries is never easy. To achieve it, you need suitable institutions as exemplified by the ILO with its unique tripartite constituency, its experience and its ability to develop practical programmes and plans. It brings people and nations together in order to achieve common objective. Co-operation always involves some sacrifice; it often means subordinating narrow interests, at least for a time, in order to win greater and wider interests. Even more importantly, it involves integrity and solidarity in honouring commitments.

In the European Community that principle is well understood by most. All 12 governments see great economic and political advantages in a wider Community. All have accepted commitments which mean that in important areas, perceived national interests may be overridden by a majority vote. All, save one, accept that the Community can never achieve its full economic potential and never become the force for good in the world, which it is capable of being, unless social protection goes hand in hand with economic integration and with the disruption that integration can bring to the working lives of more and more Community citizens. Most heads of governments in the European Community find it incredible that one of their number can describe modest information and consultation rights for employees as Marxist. We hope that the United Kingdom will return to its noble traditions and soon again uphold social justice, human rights and the value of dialogue.

The Director-General's Report deals with another matter in which both international co-operation and full involvement of the social partners at all levels – genuine tripartism – are essential: the question of the environment. The Workers' group at this Conference again had every hope that a valuable resolution on this matter would be adopted. It would represent a unique breadth of co-operation between workers' organisations, governments and employers. It would illustrate what the Director-General describes as a newly awakened strong sense of common destiny. "Conservation and restoration of the environment, construction and modernisation of needed infrastructure – these", he says, "are the immense tasks that must be undertaken without delay", and he suggests a novel conversion of some of the savings that could result from reductions in the present inordinate levels of arms expenditure. It is a proposal that merits strong consideration.

I can speak with confidence for British working people in welcoming the positive evolution of international discussions about détente and disarmament. We see the tremendous chances that this gives us for tackling world poverty, disease and hunger around the world. I remember the point in the Brandt report – the resources used on a half day's arms expenditure would be enough to defeat malaria finally. Let the international community get down to that problem.

And I speak for British workers in expressing our strong sympathetic interest in the developments that are occurring and being openly discussed in the Soviet Union, Hungary and Poland. As trade unionists, we note in particular the official recognition of the paramount trade union role of defending working people, independently of other considerations. We note the official recognition of the right to strike. I hope that soon there will be a recognition by the Israeli authorities of the rights of Palestinian workers to have their own independent trade unions. I join with the Director-General in saying that such a move, called for by the ILO, could go a long way towards relieving the intolerable working and living conditions of the Palestinian people and the tensions and sufferings which afflict them.

Finally, let me return to the institutions that I am proud to represent here today: the trade unions. Just as the ILO is celebrating an anniversary, so is the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, an organisation that plays a valuable role within this Organisation and elsewhere. The ICFTU's annual survey of the violation of trade union rights, published the other day, makes grim reading. It reinforces what we know from the work of the Committee on Freedom of Association, from the Committee of Experts and from the Committee on the Application of Standards: that trade unions are the first targets of repressive regimes and that in trade unions, as generally, the price of liberty is eternal vigilance.

Even in democratic countries, we have to be on our guard against sophisticated arguments advanced to justify restricting trade union development or to give spurious backing to a claim that unions are no longer relevant to employees' needs or aspirations. I was reading the other day an account of this thinking. It said that the quickening pace of technological change was destroying jobs, especially in sectors where trade union membership was very high. Skills were being diluted and there was a great pressure to reduce wages especially when unemployment increased to 11 per cent. Production was speeding up; employers were on the offensive and encouraging strike breaking; and the government, courts and parliament took a series of decisions which undermined trade union rights. It sounds very familiar. Similar challenges are facing many of our organisations around the world. It is a grim picture – not holding out much ground for optimism for unions. But what I was reading was written 100 years ago. That was the description of the situation precisely 100 years ago, when trade unions were on the threshold of a great advance in membership and influence.

We can take confidence in our past and so, we believe, can the International Labour Organisation.

Original – French: Mr. SAMPEBOGO (Government delegate, Burkina Faso) – Speaking on behalf of the delegation of Burkina Faso, I should like to warmly greet all of the tripartite delegations, members of the Governing Body, the Director-General and his staff and all those who in one capacity or another have taken part in the work of this session.

I should also like to congratulate sincerely the President on the occasion of his election, as well as all of the Officers for the responsibilities entrusted to them. I wish them every success for organising the debates of the Conference.

Although a special sitting was devoted to honouring Mr. Francis Blanchard, I should like to wish him a good retirement. For 15 years he competently headed the ILO; 15 years during which the International Labour Organisation experienced a remarkable increase in activity. Finally, we should like to express our encouragement to Mr. Michel Hansenne, the new ILO Director-General. We wish him every success as Director-General.

This session of the Conference is taking place in a particularly difficult context for the developing countries. We note with interest, however, that the Director-General's Report calls on us to examine a burning issue of our time: "Recovery and employment". The Report gives an account of the difficulties of the world economy in the 1980s, as well as the disastrous impact that this has had on social progress particularly in developing countries.

The importance of this subject prompts us to share our view on the matter. We find that the structural adjustment policies that raised so many hopes have shown their limits.

More specifically, the deterioration of the terms of trade, the growing indebtedness of the countries of the South and, in general, the international economic crisis have led many poor countries to the precipice with the following consequences (among others): worsening of the level of poverty; slow-down in the rate of job creation; deterioration in the quality of employment with the concomitant substantial reduction in earnings.

To this already dark picture must be added a significant reduction in development aid.

With respect to this situation, it is not surprising that all the studies reveal a rather perverse situation in international economic relations, characterised by the massive transfer of capital from the countries of the South to those of the North.

All in all, while there are some scattered islands of growth, the current economic environment presents a difficult situation in which hundreds of millions of workers are seeing their working and living conditions dangerously threatened.

What is even more serious, however, is that the future prospects are no less alarming if one believes the different studies carried out on this subject.

Although Burkina Faso has been cruelly struck by the international crisis, it has nevertheless continued to make enormous efforts to ride out the storm or at least to soften the impact – particularly the social impact.

The adoption by the Government of a certain number of measures, even if of limited scope, undeniably sets out the concern of the Government to protect the population from the horrors of the breakdown in the international economic system.

These measures include: the strengthening of tripartism by the adoption of a national labour convention aimed at facilitating the best possible balance between economic development and social progress; the continuation and even intensification of activity in the area of housing policy construction of social housing, large-scale housing development, etc.; the intensification of the campaign against illiteracy and strengthening research activities designed to improve the quality of the classic education system; the improvement of living and working conditions in rural areas, through sinking of wells and construction of dams, with the consequent creation of some modest paid employment. Although these are useful measures, they are only of limited and partial effect and cannot cure the ill. Our country is convinced that the solution to its problems ultimately lies with the international community in the form of collective and concerted action.

Burkina Faso therefore considers that it is not superfluous to again call on the international community and particularly the industrialised countries to realise once and for all the need to seek a comprehensive and world-wide solution. Such a solution would require: a systematic lowering of all protectionist customs barriers; the restoration of the terms of trade through the revaluation of the commodity prices paid to countries of the South; a resolution of the debt problem.

We are convinced that the International Labour Organisation can and should play a special role in this area.

Before I conclude my intervention, I should like to take advantage of this rostrum to ask our august assembly to vigorously condemn the transfer of toxic waste to the developing countries.

I hope that these few ideas will serve to further enrich the Report of the ILO Director-General. With a wish for every success in our work: country or death, the victory is ours!

(Mr. Nkomo takes the Chair)

Original – French: Mr. HABİYAKARE (Minister of the Public Service and Vocational Training, Rwanda) – At this moment in time, when we are celebrating the happy occasion of the 70th anniversary of the International Labour Organisation, it is a pleasant duty for me to address to our dear Organisation and all its Members, on behalf of the working people of Rwanda, and of its President, Major-General Juvénal Habyarimana, as well as in my own name, our most sincere wishes for prosperity and happiness, for long life and full success in all the objectives which the ILO has set itself.

I take this opportunity of addressing my warmest congratulations and greetings to Mr. Nkomo on his election to the Presidency of this 76th Session of the International Labour Conference, whose work he is co-ordinating with enthusiastic competence, to the great satisfaction and joy of all participants. I have no doubt that his moderation and wisdom, well known beyond the frontiers of his native country of Zimbabwe, will contribute largely to the success of these present sittings.

You will permit me also to take this opportunity of addressing my congratulations to the new Director-General of the International Labour Office, Mr. Michel Hansenne on his recent brilliant election to the head of this Organisation, to which Rwanda is proud to belong.

We wish him full success and we pledge our full collaboration and availability to contribute, within the limits of our means, to the continuing construction and consolidation of this great humanitarian edifice of the ILO.

The commemoration of the 70 years of existence of the ILO is a happy opportunity for us to celebrate, in an atmosphere of serenity and realism, free of ostentation and illusion, 70 years of tireless labour, of dignified sacrifice, and also of the remarkable merits of our Organisation which, over the course of the twentieth century, has constantly been the standard-bearer of all those who defended human rights in general and the rights of the working masses throughout the world in particular.

We can rejoice, congratulate ourselves and feel satisfied with the numerous and important achievements of the ILO within the world of labour. And this Organisation is quite right to be proud. Looking back over the long and hard path which it has taken since 1919, it has always courageously overcome many obstacles and the difficulties, without ever faltering.

This glorious past of the ILO, rich in humanitarian lessons, has shown us the value of solidarity among individuals, peoples and nations. Moreover, it is this solidarity among people, and more particularly among the social partners in the world of labour which, in 1919, fortunately led to the germination of the seed of this Organisation and which, throughout the ages and throughout history, has supplied the yeast for vigorous growth and universal expansion.

It is, therefore, with admiration and confidence that my country and my people without hesitation recognise the ILO's authority and competence to act as our guide and our informed counsellor in the steps which we are to take, assiduously and without hesitation, in order to tackle the thorny problem of the economic recovery and the problem of employment in Rwanda.

I would like here to draw attention to the fact that my delegation fully shares the points of view which were so objectively presented in the Report of the Director-General. It seems to me superfluous to go beyond the detailed analysis of the subject presented in the Report for our consideration.

Might I, nevertheless, be allowed to convey to this august assembly our feelings in the face of the incessant world economic crisis, of which we are the primary victims, designated by fate and harassed without respite.

Although often impotent and full of anxiety in the face of an uncontrollable economic situation, we are nevertheless aware of the ineluctable and constant reality facing our country. Our people and our working masses, our families and our children must – whatever the cost – be able to enjoy their inalienable right to live decently in humane conditions which are socially and morally acceptable.

We consider that these hard tests to which we are put at the present moment, rather than discouraging us and tarnishing our existence, should on the contrary arm us with a greater will to set seriously to work and tackle the future with optimism and hope.

For in the light of our real possibilities, and of the means available to us, we agree, and the people of Rwanda have happily already recognised this important truth: that the best path to lead us towards socio-economic prosperity is that which passes through austerity, and particularly tireless work. For us it is through work, through the sum of the efforts of all the sons and daughters of our country that Rwanda will be able to take its place and accede to development. Progress in unity and peace, through work and co-operation: that is our motto.

We cannot therefore allow ourselves to become discouraged, since we have at our disposal so many human resources; they are not perhaps very finely honed, prepared or adopted, but they are nevertheless always available.

It would be unwise to spend time lamenting our inadequacies rather vigorously concerting our efforts to take our destinies in our hands.

We also agree that it is an illusion to expect to be able to accede to economic progress without considering the actors in this progress, and here of course the workers have a privileged role. Indeed, one cannot think in terms of the real economic recovery of a country without thinking in terms of the need to improve the social conditions of its citizens.

Any economic growth which does not bring with it an improvement in the well-being of the population is of no interest to the nation.

The economic recovery of our countries, however small and insignificant they may be on the chessboard of world international economic policy, nevertheless represents survival. We wish to live and to survive decently, without shame, without humiliation and without illusions in the present unfavourable world economic situation. As regards Rwanda, we are making all the sacrifices necessary and employing as much energy as possible to achieve our aim.

In the light of this, we recognise that we must rely first and foremost on our own efforts, and secondly on solidarity and international co-operation.

As regards this international co-operation, whose benefits have not as yet all been recorded, I would like to mention the contradictions which exist between certain promoters and defenders of the quasi-magical theory of structural adjustment of our economies, proposed and sometimes imposed on our countries, as the miraculous remedy for our weak economies and in order to meet the needs of repayment of debts.

All well-thinking persons, including of course the ILO, know that the economic recovery and growth of our country – to be real, lasting and efficacious – must go hand in hand with the creation of employment and the meeting of the vital needs of the population. Our advisers and our creditors, on the other hand, call for a decrease in employment, reduction in incomes through cuts in wages and monetary devaluation – in short, all kinds of initiatives along the same lines and aiming at real objectives which are often not openly admitted, namely to drive the countries concerned to settle their debts vis-à-vis their rich creditors, without taking into consideration the primordial and priority development of their resources towards self-sufficiency.

We are therefore called upon to sacrifice our children and our peoples in order to remain faithful, credible and solvent vis-à-vis our creditors.

To all those of good will, who understand the profound contradiction of these paradoxical conditions that are imposed upon us, we ask that our creditors be made to understand that we are aware of the seriousness of our situation and of our obligations, that it is incumbent upon our honesty and our loyalty to repay our debts, and that we are in no way trying to evade this. Nevertheless, our partners must recognise that we are struggling for our survival, for the honour of our country and our populations, and we ask to be spared the superfluous and useless humiliations which may be imposed upon us. It should be recognised that the present economic situation of our countries calls for unprecedented courage in order to carry out the necessary reforms. But it is also essential that these structural adjustment programmes normally proposed should themselves be adjusted to the real interests of the populations concerned. We should not lose sight of the fact that these reforms are necessary not only inside the country but also as regards international economic relations in general, where there are many obstacles which are denounced as barriers to the full development of poor countries.

Original – French: Mr. TCHINDE (Workers' delegate, Togo) – Mr. President, allow me, on behalf of the workers of my country, to associate myself with all those who have congratulated you on your election and for your skilful direction for our debates.

I should also like to congratulate the Vice-Presidents for the confidence placed in them, and in you, by this august international assembly.

Allow me furthermore to congratulate most sincerely the Governing Body and the Director-General on his excellent Report. On behalf of the Togolese workers, we congratulate the outgoing Director-General, Mr. Francis Blanchard, for the immense amount of work he has accomplished during his term of office.

We should also like to take this opportunity to congratulate the new Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, on his brilliant election, and to assure him of the readiness of the National Confederation of Workers of Togo (CNTT) to co-operate with the ILO.

I wish to mention certain points in the Director-General's Report; namely, international labour standards, employment and development and training and retraining.

For workers as ourselves, the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) is fundamental. We are happy to observe that it has so far been ratified by 98 countries, which means that in that many countries the working masses can freely assert their rights. Togo is one of these lucky countries.

The National Confederation of Workers of Togo has recently experienced certain difficulties which led it to hold an extraordinary Congress after the resignation of its Secretary-General.

Owing to the ratification of this Convention by the Togolese Government, our Confederation has at no time been subjected to constraints of any kind. It enjoys complete freedom, as in the past. The extraordinary Congress went off very smoothly. A new Secretary-General was democratically elected in the person of your humble servant who is now speaking from this rostrum.

We appreciate the ILO's efforts to ensure that this Convention is ratified by all member States with a view to enforcing respect of workers' basic rights.

We also appreciate the emphasis placed by the ILO on the 40th anniversary of the adoption of this Convention and we hope that very soon the Government of all the member States will have ratified it and fully apply it.

The National Confederation of Workers of Togo urges and applies a policy of responsible participation both within the country and internationally.

In Togo it is widely believed that our Organisation meekly toes the line. Not a bit. It has simply decided to work in a peaceful environment by relying on dialogue and consultation to surmount the problems which confront all countries in these times of general crisis, in which development and employment are at daggers drawn.

Internationally our Confederation has opted in favour of solidarity and total non-alignment. Solidarity is intended to guarantee the mobility of labour, that is work for all people everywhere in the world, which, after all, belongs to all of mankind. Hence we maintain the friendliest relations with all trade union federations throughout the world.

We invite the ILO to continue its campaign for employment growth and to step up its activities under the sub-programme for alternative structural adjustment with an eye to seeing how member States deal with the problems of dismissal and subsequent redeployment of workers. We support the efforts made by the ILO in this field, for, despite the crisis, employment remains a necessary condition for human dignity.

ILO collaboration with the World Bank and regional banks must also be pursued to promote work on infrastructure which will generate employment both in rural and in urban areas.

Our Confederation is especially keen on workers' training and re-training. This is to be encouraged, for so many projects have foundered owing to the incompetence or backwardness of their leaders.

Desperately indebted countries could well do without inefficient and highly expensive executive staff. We appeal to the ILO to maintain and to further increase its assistance in the area of training so as to ensure the economic and social development of our countries. To this end we should also like to appeal to the industrialised countries to rechannel the astronomical sums swallowed up by the arms race to fund the operational budgets of specialised agencies of the United Nations, such as the ILO. By regularly paying their contributions, the member States would show that they have clearly understood this appeal.

The 76th Session of this Conference has to cope with a number of very urgent topical problems which I have briefly touched on.

The Togolese workers wish every success to these deliberations.

(Mr. Delpino takes the Chair.)

Original – Spanish: Mr. GUBBINS GRANGER (Employers' adviser, Perum) – In taking the floor in this august assembly, allow me to express to the President the congratulations of the delegation of Peruvian employers and the National Confederation of Private Employers' Institutions (CONFIEP) on his election as President of the Conference. We are sure that under his sure leadership, our work will be successful. We extend our congratulations also to the Vice-Presidents and wish them great success. Similarly, we wish to express our congratulations to the new Director-General of the Organisation, Mr. Michel Hansenne.

In acknowledging the great efforts made by the Governing Body and the ILO in the past year, a detailed account of which is to be found in the Report, I should like to move to the excellent Report of the Director-General on Recovery and employment submitted to us by Mr. Francis Blanchard as one of his final activities in his very delicate mission.

We agree with the Director-General with respect to the listing of the causes which slow down development and also with the plans for their solutions made therein. Indeed, the weight of external debt is so great that no economic recovery of the countries of the South will be viable if the present schemes which immobilise us and paralyse us, shifting the greatest weight of the debt to the groups which have least resources are maintained.

We have studied with great care the scope of the Report, where after putting the question: Is there a way out? The reply is that the solution must take into account the errors of the past and new ideas for the future, and, in doing so, it gives an account of the situations which we should bear in mind. We are thus told that contributing to the debt crisis was the allocation of loans to low-productivity activities and irresponsible investments on maintenance and exorbitant levels of consumption. It also points out that no account was taken of the need for state intervention in economic activities with high output and productivity. In many countries public sector activities exceeded the limits justified by the social and economic situation and the Report states there were frequent examples of economic policies which were clearly irrational and of benefit of no one. Finally it stresses the need to recognise and correct all these mistakes.

If the subject of recovery is serious, it is even more so for a country such as Peru which, at the present time, is facing very serious problems of terrorism and drug trafficking and a severe economic recession in the midst of excessive inflation, problems which, according to certain analysts, can lead the whole system to collapse if they are not properly managed.

To the problem of underemployment and acute unemployment already existing in our country, we must add those already mentioned which are resulting in painful mass exodus of our youth, who every day leave our country to seek better living conditions and security which our system does not afford them.

The common good – the aspiration of any State – includes the general well-being, and its complement, security. When it is not possible to offer any of these, the situation becomes dramatic. With respect to well-being, the employers, after having declared that the framework within which they operate – necessarily this must benefit the workers – must be reorganised within an organised, ethical framework, clear concepts and coherent norms to enable development of a climate of mutual trust in the employers' activities, have reached the conclusion that not only must they participate more actively in political life, such as in impartial bodies but also that it is only by assuming responsibility in analysing the problems of the country that we can find concrete and viable solutions and making of our daily activities a permanent exercise in solidarity that we can hope for possible economic recovery and better social well-being. From this point of view the work of our National Confederation of Private Employers' Institutions for institutional reform and social support is acquiring ever-more importance and also bringing relief to sectors of extreme poverty.

Security is derived from the State, which requires true moral power to muster and motivate the population to unite against those who deprive it of its freedom through fear and threat. It is only thus that we can advance along the road of peace, social justice and development. For information, the results of the subversion of these last nine years are that Peru has lost some 15,000 lives, and it is calculated that the cost of destruction of installations and goods is approximately equivalent to our external debt.

Peru is at the present time probably facing the worst crisis in its history. In our country, terrorism has been carrying out silent bloody and pitiless struggle against the population and the institutions of the nation. Subversion is continuing to paralyse the whole productive sector so as to get a stronghold of power through force. We are frequently informed of the murder of peasants, workers, trade union leaders, policemen, soldiers, priests and even members of the national Parliament and university authorities, by armed groups which are inspired by an ideology which brings with it only destruction and violence. Destruction of electricity pylons which conduct energy for development is a common feature. Between 10 and 12 May, terrorists ordered an armed strike in big cities in the centre of our country. Those who did not participate endangered their lives and their property.

The international labour community must be informed of a new manner of intervention and interference in the trade union movement which flouts the sacred right to life, the right to freedom of work and the right of the organisations to develop and formulate their programmes and plans of action within the law.

These circumstances are putting a crushing burden on the country. Perhaps now, from a wider perspective we can understand why, last year, mining, which constituted one of the fundamental pillars of the Peruvian economy, faced a stoppage of more than 90 days. The apparent overt purpose was to force our collective bargaining system by trying for the first time to impose a twofold competitive and parallel negotiations through which it was sought simultaneously to negotiate as a trade union document and another on the federation level; and the points to be dealt with were the same there as those which are being negotiated or which had been agreed freely between the parties, thus violating constitutional precepts according to which collective conventions have legal backing for the parties concerned and procedures for the peaceful solution of labour disputes have to be determined by parliamentary law.

Extreme violence occurred in the conflict, with the death of workers, destruction of installations, and even a devastating attack on the premises of the National Society for Mining and Petroleum; and then, after a few days of the stoppage of the strike, the murder of trade union leaders – Saul Cantoral, the national leader, and Ceferino Requis – was carried out by subversive elements in the trade union assembly, crimes which we reject and condemn and all of which are against agreements traditionally entered into by the mining companies and their workers, where more than 80 per cent of disputes are solved directly without intervention of third parties and where the second-level organisation itself frequently participates an organisation which convened and announced the mining stoppage.

The control of trade unions with purposes which were partisan-political by trade union leaders without legitimacy cannot but paralyse the economy of the country – as has been the case elsewhere. In Peru, this phenomenon has fostered the attempts of terrorists to clamp down on the trade unions through the elimination of leaders of the introduction of their own management staff or simply by intimidation and threats.

I am afraid that the case of Peru perhaps cannot be appreciated by our meeting in its full dramatic scope. Even those who are nationals have not overcome their surprise at the negative factors which seem to be aspects of sinister boding. Perhaps we should consider that the greatest challenge to economic recovery and its corollary is employment.

That is why in order to face this situation – which is unprecedented – we need solidarity, support and understanding of the attending delegations and the Organisation itself; it is why the employers – be they formal or informal, organised or not – are ready to face the challenge together in order to save the country from the barbary of terrorism and growing inflation, and for the benefit of thousands of those who are unemployed or underemployed due to dramatic circumstances can overcome the poverty which is incompatible with human dignity.

We believe that the greatest aspiration of our population of this time can be summarised in two words: peace and work; peace with social justice and peace with freedom, as we are constantly reminded by the first words of our national anthem: “We are free... may we remain so forever!”

Mr. KEARNEY (representative of the International Textile, Garment and Leather Workers' Federation) – Let me firstly, on behalf of the International Textile, Garment and Leather Workers' Federation, extend our congratulations to Mr. Nkomo on his election as President of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. Our thanks to Mr. Blanchard for his past service to the ILO and our best wishes to Mr. Hansenne on his appointment as the new Director-General.

I have just come direct from Chile. There, five-year-old Manuelito Bustos does not see much of his father. Not surprisingly. A cuddle from dad demands a 1,000 kilometre, ten hours round-trip from his home in Santiago.

But the Bustos family are hardened to this. They have to be.

Manuel Bustos, Sr. has been detained eight times since 1973. On four occasions the detentions were protracted and included torture, one resulted in exile abroad and the latest is a 541-day sentence of internal exile in a small rural town in the south of Chile.

Arturo Martinez is even less fortunate. He is serving a similar term of internal exile twice as far away from Santiago in the north. Martinez has also been arrested and detained on numerous occasions over the past 16 years.

And Bustos and Martinez's crimes? Nothing more than defending the rights of Chilean workers. Bustos, a mechanic in the textile industry, is President of CUT, the National Trade Union Centre. Martinez, a graphical worker, is Vice-President. Their current sentence arises from their organising a one-day strike to secure improvements in the living conditions of Chile's downtrodden workers.

These sentences are flagrant abuses of human and trade union rights. Internal exile is akin to gaoling, with the victims being given the key to their cell. If Bustos and Martinez stray outside the boundaries of the two small towns to which they have been exiled, they can be shot on sight.

All decent people world-wide must share a deep revulsion against a system and a regime which condemns reasonable men to exile away from their wives and families, their homes, their work and their community, for nothing more than the pursuit of workers' rights clearly set down in the various ILO Conventions.

The international community of nations meeting here during this International Labour Conference must condemn the Chilean regime which persists in maintaining internal exile on Bustos and Martinez. Workers in Chile; the churches, political parties, employers' organisations and indeed even members of the Government believe and state openly that Bustos and Martinez should be freed. But to no avail. Their fate lies in the hands of the President and he will not be moved.

Both Bustos and Martinez should have been participants at this International Labour Conference. The CUT is the legitimate voice of organised workers in Chile. The names of Bustos and Martinez were submitted by CUT to the Government but their nominations were ignored. The Chilean delegation to this Conference is a sham and is unrepresentative of workers in that country. It is an insult to the principles of the ILO.

Chile's Minister of Labour indicated here yesterday that his country is considering ratifying the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87). Chile must be reminded that ratifying a Convention is more than signing a piece of paper, it is about putting into practice the spirit of that particular Convention.

If the Government of Chile is serious about ratifying Convention No. 87, it must demonstrate that seriousness by freeing Bustos and Martinez immediately, by legalising CUT and permitting sectorial and national wage bargaining.

Manuel Bustos and Arturo Martinez are counting on the ILO to condemn their exile and to demand their freedom immediately. I trust it will.

Unfortunately, Chile is not the only country in the world where action is needed to safeguard and promote basic human and trade union rights, as set down in the United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the various ILO Conventions.

In the course of the past year, workers in the textile, garment and leather sectors in every continent have experienced interference from governments and others in their right to organise, to bargain collectively and to strike. Continuing action at all levels, and particularly by the ILO, is urgently needed to counter these threats to workers' rights.

These widespread attacks on the right to organise and bargain collectively are having a dramatic impact on the wages of workers in the textile, clothing and leather sectors. It is surely not unreasonable that the fundamental right of all workers to a wage sufficient to provide a decent standard of living, to enable workers to secure a level of comfort and well-being reflecting the twentieth-century's industrialisation, should be met.

Unfortunately, this is not happening. The wages of textiles, clothing and leather workers around the world are decreasing in value. Most recent figures for the spinning sector, one of the best paid, highlights this. Direct daily wages in Thailand are less than US$5 per day, in Malaysia just over US$4 per day and in Sri Lanka just US$2.25. In Bangladesh the situation is even worse.

The ILO must step up its activities to promote adherence to the various Conventions which, if implemented, would provide a decent standard of living for workers world-wide.

Growing industrialisation and improved productivity should lead to reductions in the working day, week and year. In the textile, clothing and leather sectors this is not generally happening. Forget the official statistics. In reality, in many countries, working hours are increasing rather than diminishing.

Urgent action by the ILO is necessary to secure better protection for those on shift working as well as part-time, temporary and contract working, all of which are growing in our sectors.

It is surely not unreasonable to demand a 35-hour week in developed countries and a 40-hour in developing countries as soon as possible.

Again in our sectors there is growing concern around the world at the inadequate working conditions which lead to industrial injury and disease. The International Textile, Garment and Leather Workers' Federation (ITGLWF) accordingly applauds the attention being paid by the ILO to the subject of occupational health and safety.

But we want to see the ILO do more, in particular we would wish to see the publication and enforcement of guide-lines which would lead to the elimination of the use of benzidine and beta-nephtylapine in the manufacture of dyestuffs; the cessation of the manufacture of asbestos textiles; reductions in noise emissions from machinery; and the establishment of strict limits for exposure to cotton dust, and their enforcement.

In addition, we believe that the ILO should encourage widespread programmes of workers' education on the prevention of occupational hazards, that it should liaise closely with international lending and development agencies to ensure that industrial development aid includes specific allocations for employees' safety and health.

It is greatly encouraging that the Report of the Director-General includes reference to vocational training. This is particularly important in our sectors, where profound social consequences are accompanying the very rapid technological change now taking place. Inadequate vocational training has left workers unprepared for the consequences of the drive for greater productivity.

To this end, we believe that the ILO must redouble its efforts to secure improved vocational training world-wide to equip workers for change and to help them avoid unemployment. In addition, it must impress upon governments the need for financial support for workers, their families and communities affected by technological change and structural unemployment.

Child labour is unfortunately prevalent in the textile, garment and leather sectors. Official statistics indicate that up to 75 million children under 15 years of age are involved in work. However, this is a gross underestimate. A recent United States report indicated that perhaps as many as 200 million children are at work in Asia alone. In China, ten-year old girls are reported to be working 15 hours a day, while 12-year old girls were working 15 hours for the equivalent of 2 US cents per hour.

The situation in Thailand is even worse.

In both countries, the growth in child labour appears to have been spurred on by foreign investment. One foreign company operating in China recently threatened to transfer its operation to Thailand if there was any clamp-down on the local employment of children. Such approach are nothing short of criminal. These companies are robbing kids of their childhood and workers of their jobs.

ILO activities in this field must be strengthened. In particular, wider ratification of the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) is needed.

The International Textile, Garment and Leather Workers' Federation is increasingly concerned at the dominance of multinational enterprises in the textiles, clothing and leather industries. Their search for competitive advantage poses great threats to the livelihood and working conditions of workers in these sectors. Too often these companies behave in a manner which indicates that they have a commitment to no country, salute no flag and respect no worker.

The ILO guide-lines for such companies are, of course, useful, but we believe that the ILO should be working with governments around the world to secure legislative support in individual countries for the provisions in its Declaration of Principles concerning multinational enterprises and social policy. Only in that way will workers secure protection from the activities of such companies.

Alongside the growing dominance of multinational enterprises in our sector is the growth of so-called free trade zones. In many such zones, the trade union rights of textile, clothing and leather workers are prohibited or ignored.

The ILO should be actively involved in ensuring full human and trade union rights for all workers, regardless of their workplaces.

Frequently ILO Conventions are not ratified, or when ratified are not implemented. Far too often, it seems, there is little that can be done to force governments to ratify or implement some of the basic Conventions. Is it not time to look for a new means by which this can be done?

The ITGLWF believes that the most effective way forward, particularly in the textile, clothing and leather sectors, would be to link the issues of trade and workers' rights. After all, the orderly expansion of world trade based upon a growth of purchasing power of the populations of developed and developing countries alike is beneficial.

Unfortunately, in far too many cases the benefits of development and trade and increased industrialisation are not passed on to the workers concerned. There is a growing tendency for countries to compete for a share of the world market by suppressing living standards.

The current round of the GATT negotiations provides an opportunity to reverse that trend. The Working Group, established by GATT and the ILO to look at this issue is welcome, but there must be rapid progress.

The ITGLWF believes that international trade agreements, including the Multi-Fibre Arrangement, ought to include an article on social development.

This is more commonly known as the "Social clause".

Such a clause would ensure that certain social minimum standards be observed when industrial countries give preferential treatment to imports from developing countries. This is entirely in conformity with the belief that development co-operation should aim at social and economic progress.

The aim of these minimum standards would be to support workers in their struggle to secure part of the social and economic benefits of industrialisation. It would also enable governments and trade union organisations to put pressure on countries which do not respect these standards, in order to ensure that workers get an appropriate part of the benefits of industrialisation.

The standards demanded by the Social clause would be the minimum standards set down in ILO Conventions, namely: equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and profession, in order to eliminate all discrimination based on race, sex, religion, nationality or social origin; the right to create free and independent trade unions and the duty not to hinder their activities; a ban on child labour; the observance of provisions for the protection of health; the promotion of occupational safety; the limitation of the working week; a guarantee of minimum wages which permit a living standard worthy of a human being.

There is in the textile, clothing and leather industries a desire that the rights guaranteed by the declarations, conventions and recommendations of international agencies, including the International Labour Organisation, be freely exercisable. It is for this reason that we in the International Textile, Garment and Leather Workers' Federation look to the ILO to expand its activities to ensure that this desire becomes a reality as soon as possible.

Mr. ACHMAD (Workers' adviser, Indonesia) - It is a great honour for me to join the other distinguished speakers, on behalf of Indonesian workers, in congratulating the President, as well as the Vice-Presidents, on their election to their highly responsible posts. I am confident that under their leadership, this Conference will successfully tackle the tasks before it.

It is my great privilege to convey our deep appreciation of the great service rendered by Mr. Francis Blanchard, former Director-General of the International Labour Office, and to offer our best wishes to Mr. Michel Hansenne, the new Director-General.

Employment is a world-wide problem that is not necessarily limited to the poor, less educated, or the less developed countries. Nevertheless, the employment problem tends to strike hardest these groups and is increasingly seen as one of the most crucial policy issues facing most of the developing countries over the next two decades.

The reasons for concern tend to be universal and generally self-evident. Low average income levels, high concentrations of poverty, high population growth compared to resource ratios, disproportionately young population structures, rapid urbanisation and, all too frequently, misguided policies that ignore rudimentary economics, combine and interact to breed pessimism among even the most optimistic observers. If seen in this perspective, Indonesia's employment problem is neither unusual nor probably worse than most countries in the low- and middle-income group.

However, I would like to avail myself of this opportunity to bring to your attention the developments currently taking place in my country, Indonesia, which I believe are also occurring in other developing countries. The first issue I shall raise will be workers' rights, which are an integral part of human rights.

The Indonesian workers, as members of the Indonesian society as a whole, are fully aware of their basic right; that is, the right to organise and bargain collectively. However, in the exercise of our rights, we still face serious structural problems due to a low level of education and the lack of appropriate communication tools. I believe that these problems are also being encountered by many other developing countries.

The guide-lines for the prevailing industrial relations in Indonesia were adopted at a tripartite seminar held in 1975. They are based on our Constitution and long-held cultural practices and put the worker-management relationship into a "partnership" perspective. At the present time, they are being intensively introduced throughout the country with promising results.

As I mentioned earlier, employment has become the most critical problem that requires not only the government, but also workers' unions and employers' associations, to contribute towards resolving it.

All of us here understand well that each country's situation is unique and requires a separate analysis and an individual policy. Factors that contribute to each country's employment problem differ both in kind and degree, and the social, political and economic feasibility of potential solutions also vary.

The main problem Indonesia currently faces is the unbalanced growth of population and the creation of employment. From 146.8 million in the 1980s, the population now totals about 178 million and is expected to reach 220 million by the year 2000. The labour force in Indonesia is defined as all those who are economically active over ten years of age.

The low percentage of employment absorption bears witness to the increasingly serious manpower problem in Indonesia.

The excessive labour force has made it extremely difficult to implement labour protection regulations effectively. This, I believe, is also the case in many developing countries with similar problems.

I feel therefore that it is very important for us to focus our attention on programmes applicable to developing countries to help them cope with their employment problems.

I would like to propose that the following points be taken into consideration.

First, the macro-stabilisation of the economy in any developing country is essential to maintain and improve current employment and income levels because it reduces unnecessary fluctuations. It is important to future employment and income because it tends to create a better investment climate and promotes growth. Therefore, the advanced countries and all international financial institutions, together with the respective governments of developing countries, have to strive for macroeconomic stability. This means that fluctuations in currency must be properly controlled so as not to affect the already heavy burden of foreign debt of most Third World countries. Only truly and sincerely concerted actions and programmes, both at the economic and political level, can be expected to bring about desired results.

Second, another major problem facing not only Indonesia but also other developing countries is the global industrial and trade policy, which appears to work to the advantage of only a chosen few advanced countries. The industrial policy of many developing countries has strongly discouraged either domestic or foreign competition by using restrictive, often monopolistic, licensing rights and inducing the ad hoc use of highly protective trade policy instruments: import bans, quotas and tariffs. This phenomenon has to be eliminated if we want to create a better and more just world in which we all are living.

Third, we must adopt education and family planning programmes. The widening gap between the growth in population and employment opportunities is crystal clear in all developing countries. Serious efforts have to be taken to narrow this gap. State budgets have to be earmarked for the implementation of programmes to improve the level of education and curb population growth, in addition to economic remedy action. The success of these programmes will certainly alleviate the present heavy burden of emerging countries. In this regard, I am very proud to inform you that the President of the Republic of Indonesia has just received a reward for the successful implementation of family planning programmes in Indonesia. The distribution of the population on a proportional basis – achieved by intensifying the development of rural areas and thereby preventing urbanisation – is also an effective way of creating jobs and maintaining employment.

The ILO and the trade unions of the industrialised countries must contribute more to this type of programme, particularly by encouraging the industrialised countries to transfer technology.

In conclusion, I would like to extend to the ILO our sincere thanks for all the assistance that it has given to the Indonesian workers.

Original – Farsi: Mr. HABIB ZAY (Workers' delegate, Afghanistan) – First of all, I would like to express on behalf of the workers of Afghanistan my sincere congratulations on Mr. Nkomo's election as President of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. I am confident that his guidance will surely lead to the success of the Conference. Also, I would like to express my deepest and sincere congratulations to Mr. Michel Hansenne, appointed Director-General of the ILO and I wish him every success in the fulfilment of the great task he has before him.

Going through the activities of the ILO, one can certainly be satisfied with what has been achieved in the past 70 years despite the existence of numerous problems, particularly after the Declaration of Philadelphia in 1945.

The adoption of 168 Conventions and 176 Recommendations by the year 1988, which are taken into account in the preparation of legislation in over 150 member States, has proved to be an excellent guide in the enactment of labour legislation. The ILO's role in enriching the organisation and management of improved labour relations and better labour conditions in these countries is to be lauded.

In recent years, in our country, many-faceted and serious measures have been taken to eliminate socio-economic backwardness. As a result, notable changes and developments have taken place in the socio-economic, political and cultural spheres. However, it should be pointed out that the extensive damage done to the economic structure of the country, with an expenditure amounting to billions of afghanis, due to the imposed war has slowed down the growth rate of the country.

The Government of the Republic of Afghanistan attaches special importance to the betterment of the living conditions of the workers. The Constitution of the Republic of Afghanistan and the labour law of the Republic have made provision for the formation of trade unions and other public organisations.

The living conditions of workers during recent years in our country have improved greatly. Free distribution of coupons for flour and oil has been introduced in order to meet the primary needs of the workers. Wages have been increased and other allowances are being started. Workers are now granted annual leave by law. Health clinics are being built inside and outside workplaces, and there is provision for loans and free education inside the country and abroad. Hundreds of workers are sent abroad or within the country for rest and recreation. Useful work has been done to improve the living and labour conditions of our workers and peasants. Attention has also been paid to the safety and protection of workers at the workplace.

The trade unions of Afghanistan have done much for the benefit of workers and peasants. In the field of safety at work, there is a safety laboratory and training centre run by the Central Council of Afghanistan Trade Unions, but we think it is still not enough. Therefore, international assistance and co-operation are also needed to achieve these humanitarian objectives.

Our workers strongly support the policy of national reconciliation in the country and are striving for peace, disarmament and the preservation of human rights in the world. More than a year has passed since the signing of the Geneva Accords and almost four months since the complete withdrawal of Soviet troops. The workers and others are counting the minutes until peace is a reality in our lovely country. Unfortunately, not only are war, bloodshed and destruction still continuing, but they are taking place on a greater scale than ever.

Armed extremists, with the help of their international supporters, are trying to solve the issues relating to Afghanistan by the continuation of war. Because of their ignominious actions our people, especially workers and peasants, are being killed. The peoples of our homeland know who are the main cause of bloodshed and war in Afghanistan.

Not only are Afghanistan and the Soviet Union honourably observing the Geneva Accords, but also the Government has made proposals for achieving peace in the country; the decisions of Loya Jirgah – the Grand Assembly – in May 1989 are particularly noteworthy in this connection.

The opposition groups have not put forward any proposals for achieving peace in our country. They only insist on a military solution which, up to now, has killed thousands of our people. The continuation of war brings great losses to our people and workers.

The aggressions of the extremists not only affect workers at the workplace, but also prevent the people from living in peace.

You are well aware of the aggressions of the extremists in one of the provinces of Afghanistan, named Jalalabad, where rockets, cannon and heavy machine-guns have been used. As a result, not only have residential areas and public establishments been destroyed, but many of our people, including children, women and the old, have died the death of martyrs. Aggression also caused the complete destruction of the olive processing factory, agricultural and animal husbandry farms in places like Ghazi Abad and Hadda, which had been important achievements resulting from many years of hard work by our workers and peasants.

The buildings used for recreation and rest by the workers of Afghanistan were also damaged by shelling from the rockets of extremists on the City of Jalalabad.

Finally, on behalf of the workers of Afghanistan, I wish you every success in your work. We hope that international, governmental and non-governmental organisations will not hesitate to give their humanitarian assistance and co-operation to the people of Afghanistan in their endeavour to reach a lasting peace and rehabilitation of the country.

Original – Spanish: Mr. CEBALLOS GOMEZ (Employers' delegate, Mexico) – First of all I would like to congratulate the President on his election and express our best wishes for the successful conclusion of the work of this Conference, which is facing special problems and raising particular points of resolution which concern the future of this Organisation.

I would also like to congratulate the Vice-Presidents of the Conference, and Mr. Michel Hansenne, the new Director-General of the ILO and express our best wishes to him on the challenge of his new job.

I would like to give my best wishes to everyone attending the Conference on the occasion of the 70th anniversary of the ILO. I hope that we will soon be celebrating its centenary.

Referring to the Director-General's Report, I would like to highlight Part I, entitled Recovery and employment, a subject which is of vital importance for all countries. Undoubtedly 1988 was welcomed as the first year for a long time in which some economic recovery took place, a recovery which included developing countries such as Mexico.

I cannot but agree with the Director-General when he points out that the main lesson to be drawn from the present decade is that it is very difficult to solve social problems if there is no economic growth. This argument is fully shared by the employers of Mexico and certainly also by our Government and the workers of our country.

When it says in the Director-General's Report that each and every person will have to work harder in order to increase productivity, savings and investment; it reflects the feelings of employers the world over and we hope will continue to apply in Mexico and in this organisation.

In our country, this principle has been applied since 1988, and I should point out to this assembly that the share of the different sectors of society in term of income depends on three main aspects: productive capacity; the volume of external debt; and the productivity of the economy of a particular society.

There are three premises to be considered in examining the relation of the economy to the distribution of incomes. First, you cannot consume what you do not produce or import. Second, the wealth of a nation, its distributable income, depends on the society's productive capacity converted into money terms, or a capacity to use external savings to pay for wages. Third, the distribution of income in society, measured in terms of its purchasing power, depends on the productivity of that society.

If you take productivity to be a unit of product for a unit cost, you cannot distribute purchasing power in excess of productivity. If the cost of products rises because of pay increases, without being able to reduce other costs in order to maintain the same level of productivity, the result is inflationary.

The non-fulfilment of these three premises was the determining factor in the changes that have taken place in the labour relations of Mexico.

Half-way through the 1960s, Mexico's economic growth began to wane, after three decades of development. For some years growth was at a standstill, and for others it was lower than the rate of population growth.

During the 1970s, Mexico replaced internal savings by external savings in the investment process. It was able to maintain a more or less stable standard of living, and this increased, for certain groups of industrial workers and for the public servants, using the external debt as the basic source of currency and as a substitute for the foreign currency previously earned by exports from the agriculture and fishery sector, which was then going into an acute crisis.

The basic reason for this was the overall drop in productivity of the economy, the consequent inflation and the crisis that began in 1971, labour relations in Mexico remained unchanged and priority was still given, on the one hand to job security, and on the other to a proportional contribution of wages in the gross domestic product. In this way, it was possible for wages to increase their contribution to GDP independently of productivity, thanks to the fact that the economy was based on protectionism. The country's frontiers were closed to imports that competed with articles produced in Mexico. This made it easier for the price of such articles to become independent of international prices and, in turn, the overall inefficiency of the system, a product of the unrestricted protectionism affected internal prices, provoked a complete loss of internal and external competitiveness.

This situation was aggravated by the oil boom of 1979-81. Mexico based its growth on exports of a raw material, oil, in a fluctuating market, and in order to produce this oil, Mexico had to go further into debt. It based this growth partly on as yet unproduced oil, and partly on wealth which existed only on paper – because of the artificially high level of oil prices, due to the international crisis. Therefore, standards of living improved, salaries were increased, without any reference to GDP or to the productivity of the economic process overall.

When the oil price fell in 1981, external credit had reached saturation point and drew attention to Mexico's low productivity. The productive system was no longer competitive externally. Mexico had to renew its sources of foreign currency by reinvigorating the system. Adjustments were introduced to increase competitiveness, in order to develop the export of manufactured goods. It also became clear that the improvements in living standards between 1971 and 1981 did not have any real basis in production or productivity, so the share of wages in GDP had to be reduced. In order to make this process work, several adjustments in labour relations were necessary, between the factors of production.

The adjustment goals set by Mexico for its economy can be summed up in two points: achieving external competitiveness for its manufactures and eliminating the inflationary process. The experience of many different countries has shown that to achieve these two objectives, one did not just require adequate economic policies, but also thorough negotiations, which in Mexico were called "The Pact" or agreement between Government and the social partners.

From December 1987, the Pact included the Government, employers, unionised workers and agricultural workers. The Pact's specific purpose was to control inflation. For this purpose, the Pact had to apply measures to curb inflation which produced a public deficit and take decisions aimed at increasing the productivity of the economy. All the measures that have been taken in successive negotiations, in which every sector involved has sacrificed some of its interests, have been directed to achieving this. Some negotiations have direct consequences for labour relations.

The first change in labour relations was linked with employment. The oil boom crisis in 1981 showed that Mexico had an excessive installation capacity and that the drop in the market required reduced production.

The second change related to modernisation. The investment which took place in order to replace obsolete stock, installations and technology had the inevitable effect of introducing a greater quantity of capital, including foreign capital, in order to improve productivity.

The third change concerned the reconversion of the framework of the crisis economy, which meant the temporary or permanent closure or winding down of large enterprises.

Fourthly came the adjustment of workers' benefits, but only those which increased over and above real productivity during the boom period.

The fifth change is the achievement of new legislation to make workers' contracts more flexible; that is, unrestricted security of employment should not be guaranteed unless balanced by the enterprise's ability to increase its efficiency levels if necessary or under foreign investment and national taxation laws. In fact, a tripartite commission set up to propose reform to these laws is still functioning in Mexico.

It is clear that, in Mexico's case, the final aim is not to eliminate the basic demands that protect workers, nor are we trying to dismantle labour organisations, nor reduce the number of workers, but only for the country to try to achieve its objective of competitiveness in order to be able to rely on the foreign currency which is absolutely necessary to finance its development and thus to increase employment and to create more small- and medium-sized enterprises.

This would be economic development based on growth and international competitiveness, grounded on healthy economic policies by means of higher productivity, so that workers may regain the standard of living they enjoyed during the oil boom, but today this should be on a real basis, which now seems to have natural justification.

The external debt of our country continues to be the determining factor in its development and in the growth of employment and the GDP, and the Director-General's comments on the reduction of this and its appropriate treatment by the international community, is very pertinent.

Finally, I would like to point out that tripartite dialogue is an essential precondition in order to ensure economic growth, job creation and social peace.

Original - Arabic: Mr. OMAR (Government delegate, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya) - The delegation of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya is very happy indeed to see a son of Africa preside over the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference.

We believe that this appointment is a token of high esteem for his considerable ability and an acknowledgement of the prominent role played by Zimbabwe in championing the cause of the developing countries.

The delegation of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya would like to reiterate its congratulations to Mr. Hansenne, the new Director-General of the ILO, assuring him of its full co-operation in strengthening the role of the ILO and in the achievement of its objectives. We should also like to express our gratitude for the efforts made by his predecessor, Mr. Blanchard, wishing him a life of health and happiness.

Part II of the Director-General's Report on the activities of the ILO in 1988 has dealt with several aspects of the ILO's activities in the course of 1988. These aspects will be further examined in detail by the authorities concerned in the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya. Yet we should like at this point to express our full satisfaction with the new technical co-operation projects adopted by the ILO in 1988, particularly those relating to Africa, which has experienced extremely grave natural disasters and a very serious economic situation.

The Director-General's choice of the topic of recovery and employment as one of the main themes for discussion was very appropriate. This theme has been and will continue to be a matter of concern. Our world today is interdependent. No part of this world can live in isolation from the others. Nor can the world possibly enjoy peace and prosperity so long as it is divided into the rich becoming richer and the poor becoming poorer.

This is a simple and obvious facts. However, we have not yet been able to arrive at constructive and practical solutions to lead us out of our devastating economic crisis, despite the attempts, sacrifices and concessions made by the developing countries.

What makes the economic crisis even worse is the continued demographic growth, together with the deflation of resources, the falling price of raw materials exported by developing countries and the rising price of manufactured products, as well as the widening gap in the field of technology between the countries of the Third World, on the one hand, and the industrialised countries, on the other, which impose stringent conditions on the transfer of technology, and even refraining from this transfer in some cases, and attempt to enforce protectionism or collective measures.

The debt problem has further aggravated the situation and has led to a feeling of despair with every plan for reform. It seriously jeopardises the most important achievement of the Third World in the 1960s political independence.

We share the Director-General's view, as stated in his Report, that the past decade has witnessed a serious setback in the quest for full employment and social progress. His analysis of the world economic situation is very sound. We agree with him that the desired growth should create employment and fight poverty. However, this cannot possibly be achieved within the framework of existing economic relations, which are characterised by considerable exploitation, both within States and among them. The gap is widening year after year, without any attempt being made to save the poor from the scourges of hunger, ignorance and disease. The most vulnerable groups fall victim to the economic recovery.

In this deteriorating situation suffered by the developing countries, and particularly those burdened with accumulated debts, it is impossible to achieve growth or to establish infrastructures, or even to maintain existing ones, since the bulk of the countries' resources go towards the servicing of debts. This is why we associate ourselves with and support those who call for a radical solution to this dilemma.

The situation of the world economy cannot be isolated from that of the environment, as emphasised by the United Nations Environment Programme report for 1989. The international community is faced with a vicious circle, for economic problems cause or aggravate pollution of the environment, which in turn makes economic progress and structural adjustment very difficult. The Report sounds a note of warning as it declares that environmental deterioration not only threatens today's generations but those of the future as well.

We support the proposal of the Director-General to launch an appeal for concrete and highly symbolic action by calling upon the member States of the United Nations and its specialised agencies to use the savings realised thanks to disarmament in a joint effort to finance a series of operations at the regional or subregional level to create or refurbish essential infrastructure within the framework of a major works programme, much of which would be devoted to the conservation of the environment.

The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya is concerned with human beings as both the means and the end of economic development. This concern is manifested in the fact that the Jamahiriya allocates a considerable portion of its resources to health care, education and vocational training, in view of their prominent role in development. It has established a special secretariat for vocational training in order to train highly qualified staff necessary to implement the development plan for 1990-95.

There are peoples who have not yet had the opportunity of seeking social and economic progress, and who are still struggling to lay the foundations of progress - peace, security and the respect of human rights. They are the peoples of South Africa and occupied Palestine, who face two regimes which are identical in their barbarity and practices.

We have all heard of the decision adopted by the mayor of the Erbil kibbutz on the West Bank, which stipulates that every Palestinian worker should wear a badge marked "foreign worker" on his chest.

We all know that this behaviour has aroused a wave of protest, even among the Jews themselves, who have likened this badge to the yellow star which Hitler forced every Jew to wear under the Nazi regime.

The Conference has before it a modest resolution concerning the protection of Arab workers' and employers rights and freedoms in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories. It would be a shame for this Conference if it failed at this session to support the Palestinian employers and workers, as it did at the preceding session as a result of the intransigence of a minority of delegations.

We condemn all racist practices and the apartheid policy perpetuated by the South African regime. A few days ago we in the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya awarded the African leader Nelson Mandela, who has been languishing in prison for 25 years, the Gad-dafi Prize for human rights, which has been conferred for the first time. This was a tribute to his struggle against the racist regime and his role in leading millions from his prison cell.

This session has before it item 6 on its agenda, concerning safety in the use of chemicals at work. The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya has enacted dozens of rules guaranteeing the safety of workers in this field. We should like to make special reference to the Order issued in 1972, which prohibits the employment of children under 18 years of age in such industries, in particular fertiliser plants and chemical factories. We hope that the Conference will be able to prescribe precise standards providing for adequate protection in the use of chemical substance.

Our agenda includes a preliminary discussion of night work. While it is important, this subject has a great many implications, which makes it rather difficult to arrive at a single comprehensive concept. Although we support the elements which justify night work in the broad sense, we feel that it involves certain dangers which should be taken into account with a view to drawing up effective international standards which would be applicable in every member States and which would be conducive to greater economic and social well-being.

We are satisfied with the existing technical co-operation between the ILO and our region at the regional and national levels. We should like to refer in particular to what has been achieved by the Labour Management Development Centre in Tunis in collaboration with the ILO and the Arab Labour Organisation. We hope that efforts will continue to consolidate and develop this Centre in order to enable it to contribute to developing the skills of Arab managers in the field of labour administration. We should like to commend the regional seminar on occupational safety and health in the petroleum industry held within the framework of the co-operation between the ILO and the Arab Federation of workers in the Petroleum and Chemical Industries. We should also like to commend the seminar on occupational safety at the national level held in collaboration with the ILO and the Secretariat for the Public Service. This seminar was attended by over 70 participants, mainly heads of occupational safety departments in national enterprises and establishments in the Jamahiriya. We look forward to strengthening and developing such co-operation for the achievement of the ILO's objectives.

I should like to conclude my statement by making an important point: the time has come for the International Labour Organisation to seriously consider the concept of workers' remuneration of which should not be limited to fixing a minimum wage, but should go further, in order to ensure that, workers receive their share of the results of production since they are the main element of production. The ILO can participate in this process by conducting a study of workers' participation in production and management in order to lay the foundations of international standards on this subject.

Original – Spanish: Mr. FRANCIS de los REYES (Employers' delegate, Cuba) – First of all we would like to congratulate Mr. John Nkomo, Minister of Laobur, Manpower Planning and Social Welfare of Zimbabwe on his election as President of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference; we also extend these congratulations to the Vice-Presidents.

In speaking in this plenary session we would like to take this opportunity to congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne on his appointment as Director-General of the International Labour Office. We are sure that under his careful management the ILO will steadily move forward and achieve the essential objectives of universality, harmonious development of the economies and social justice.

In this decade which has been described as a "lost decade", the world has faced a violent economic crisis. Its effects have been felt in both the developed and the developing countries. The crisis which worsened at the beginning and in the middle of the decade, has improved favourably in the developed countries which experienced growth rates in 1987 and 1988 of approximately 3 per cent of global production which meant the stabilisation of these economies and a significant reduction in the inevitable consequence: unemployment. But did this growth, which could be said to be world-wide, have the same effect in the developing countries? No, on the contrary, the reverse was true. In order to have a true picture of the situation, the statistics reflecting development show that, in the sub-Saharan African nations studied between 1980 and the present day, there has been a 14 per cent reduction in economic growth. This frightening figure helps us to understand the terrible economic and social situation facing this part of Africa.

The introduction to the Report, which serves as a guide to this meeting, by Mr. Francis Blanchard, who has just terminated his office as Director-General, refers to Part I which deals with the situation of recovery and employment in the world economy and with the necessity for structural adjustment in order to reactivate growth and achieve greater social justice.

Now, can the present structure which operates in the economic, financial and commercial mechanisms in the world lead to these goals? We feel that, on the contrary, they accentuate the economic and social differences between nations. The developed countries will continue to achieve high growth rates and the Third World will become further impoverished, with the ensuing social unrest, unemployment, hunger, poverty, illiteracy, lack of education, unsanitary conditions and the early death of millions of human beings.

The main cause of this obvious contradiction is clear: the foreign debt, the worst scourge of the late twentieth century affecting the developing countries. Its beginnings date back to the fifties and sixties and was a kind of neocolonialism thought up by the major powers who, as they had accumulated capital in the banks, provided huge loans with high rates of interest, thus leading to unequal terms of trade, due to the increase in prices of their goods and, on the other hand, lowering the prices of the raw materials from our impoverished countries, such as oil, sugar, coffee, and, in addition to this, practising protectionism, dumping and voracious exploitation.

This economic and social cancer is consuming our societies. It is calculated at over US$1,200 billion in the three affected regions: Asia, Africa and Latin America. In our region alone, the figure is over US$480 thousand million. During the past seven years Latin America has suffered capital flight of over US$200 thousand million as interest payment on debt – almost 50 per cent of its principal capital. They have applied economic adjustment policies mainly aimed towards increasing exports, reducing imports and cutting investment down to the absolute minimum.

A summary of the plan for negative growth. The “inspired” plan by the IMF and the World Bank, of “tightening our belts” which meant more work for our people and less consumption, and which led to the inevitable phenomenon of social unrest, which took on certain specific characteristics in the various regions which make up the so-called Third World.

Standing at this crossroads, there was no other alternative but to act with a firm will. The payment of the foreign debt really means inevitable disaster. The crude reality inevitably leads us to “wipe the slate clean” and “start anew”. With respect to greater social justice, as the Director-General said in his Report, we must apply the new international economic order, which provides, among other aspects, that the rich countries must help the poor countries, thus enabling them to reactivate their impoverished economies; an end must be made to unequal terms of trade, by establishing price policies that take account of productivity in the highly industrialised countries as compared with our countries, which essentially rely on agriculture and minerals, and we need an international body to guarantee this.

This approach will lead us to the reactivation of growth. In our country, Cuba, we have been applying a new economic order for the past 30 years. We have made great steps forward: a child mortality rate of 13 per thousand births and an average life expectancy of 73 years, an end to illiteracy, a minimum level of education up to the ninth grade level, hundreds of new industries, millions of litres of water prepared for human consumption and for the irrigation of land, to mention a few, and great attention has been paid to agricultural production which assures us of a sufficient food supply, a widespread plan of tourist housing which will enable us considerably to increase our offers to international tourism, the construction of thousands of houses thanks to the system of micro-brigades, thus enabling us to face up to an absolute necessity. In our present sugar plan we have managed to achieve a production of 8,124,000 tons which represents 708,926 tons more than the last harvest. It is important to point out that this has been achieved with a substantial reduction in the number of cane cutters, and without generating unemployment. Over 60 per cent of our crop is now being mechanically harvested thanks to assistance from the Soviet Union, which has enabled us to manufacture KTP1 and KTP2 reapers. Moreover, the efforts being made to perfect the production process and to stimulate its mechanisms should enable us to further raise the level of productivity and to satisfy growing needs. A major aim for 1991 – only two years away – is that of bringing electricity to the most far removed corners of our country. All these achievements are being brought about despite the economic blockade which has been imposed for some thirty years by our powerful neighbour, the “Imperial Eagle”, who has employed every device to defeat our revolution. This neighbour has, for example, resorted to the use of “Radio Martí”, paradoxically named after our national hero, José Martí, who, with great discernment and anti-imperialist sentiment, described that nation, at the end of the nineteenth century, as “the antagonistic and brutal North which despises us”. Today, also it is contravening international telecommunication agreements by attempting to broadcast insidious televised messages. It has adopted a similar attitude towards the heroic homeland of Augusto César Sandino, our Nicaraguan brother, by putting up obstacles to a peaceful settlement of the conflict, and by supporting the contras with financial and logistical assistance. It is acting likewise in Panama by refusing to honour the Torrijó-Carter Treaty in order to maintain control of the Canal at all costs. In the Middle East, also, it is clearly backing the Zionist perpetration of crimes and acts of barbarism against the Palestinian people in the occupied territories. It is furthermore giving financial support to the Pretoria regime, which is pursuing its policy of apartheid against the Black population of South Africa. In that respect, we endorse the recommendations of the pertinent Working Group which has met during the current session of the Conference and we hope that these recommendations will be quickly implemented so as to achieve the eradication of apartheid. We also support the Working Group’s recommendation that United Nations Security Council resolution 435 should be fully implemented so as to bring about the independence of Namibia, which is a victim of the same abhorrent system.

Before ending our statement, we should like to draw attention to a question which stands to seriously affect the principle of universality which should govern our Organisation now, in its 70th anniversary year, as always. I am alluding to the discrimination which the majority of the Employers’ group is practising against the socialist employers and the progressive developing countries by not enabling us to participate in the Governing Body, in inter-Conference work, in the daily meetings of employers at each session of the Conference, and in the Resolutions Committee. Admittedly, there has been progress, to judge from the conversations we have had with representatives of the majority; the unregulated participation this year in Conference committees testifies to this, although for the fourth consecutive time the registration of the legitimate delegate of Nicaragua has been disregarded, compelling him once again to appeal before the Appeal Board which again upheld his right to attend.

Next year, new elections to the Governing Body will be held and, to judge from the ratifications of States to date, everything seems to point to the coming into force of the new structure of the ILO. This will involve a doubling of the number of posts in each group. The majority of Employers’ group is willing to observe and apply the “Briki formula” put forward by a delegate from a developing country (Algeria), which provides that the Governing Body should be composed in the most representative way possible, taking account of the different geographical, economic and social interests of the three groups, without prejudice, however, to the recognised autonomy of these groups.

Unless the "Briki formula" is applied, discrimination will continue in the Employers' group. The USSR, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Bulgaria, Poland, the German Democratic Republic, Romania, Yugoslavia, the Ukrainian SSR, Mongolia, China, Afghanistan, Democratic Yemen, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Syria, Madagascar, Angola, Ethiopia, Mozambique, Burkina Faso, Namibia, Nicaragua and Cuba, to name a few examples, will continue to be discriminated against and prevented from effectively participating in the Employers' group.

We hope that it will be understood that this discrimination must cease in the ILO, because as long as it continues there cannot be full universality and social justice in the Organisation. We must remain alert as regards such a decisive topic at the 77th Session of the Conference.

Mrs. GRAN OLSEN (representative of the Federation of International Civil Servants' Associations) – I should like to start by thanking you for giving the Federation of International Civil Servants' Associations (FICSA), of which I am the General Secretary, the opportunity to address you, the delegates to the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference.

FICSA is a world-wide federation of associations and unions of the staff of the United Nations common system. It includes, among its members, not only the staff unions of the ILO and other major agencies, but also associations in a number of smaller duty stations in the field. The Federation co-ordinates the activities of its members and is the representative and spokesperson for over 30,000 staff members, in all executive and advisory bodies of the common system. The common system includes the United Nations and its specialised agencies whose terms and conditions of service are more or less uniform.

FICSA represents staff in discussions with executive and advisory bodies such as the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination (ACC), composed of the executive heads of the organisations of the United Nations system, the Consultative Committee on Administrative Questions (CCAQ), made up of the representatives of the administrations of those organisations and, in the past, the International Civil Service Commission (ICSC), a body established by the United Nations General Assembly to make recommendations on matters concerning the terms and conditions of employment of the staff of the United Nations system. However, since May 1988, relations between FICSA and the ICSC, have been severed, owing to dissatisfaction of staff with the present unilateral system of determining conditions of service and the increasing politicisation and lack of independence by members of this Commission.

In May 1988, staff demanded that conditions of employment in the common system, which so far had been determined unilaterally, should in future be the subject of negotiations between representatives of the staff and the employers. This is the topic on which I would like to address you today.

The frustration by the staff of the member associations/unions of FICSA has now reached its peak on account of the totally inadequate level of staff participation in the process of determining our conditions of service.

The staff consider the unilateral system of determining conditions of service as being antiquated and out of date, and we have for a number of years encouraged the executive and advisory bodies of the United Nations to accept changes allowing for full staff participation. Staff will no longer tolerate being a silent partner who is consulted from time to time, while conditions of service are rapidly deteriorating.

Let me assure you that this is not just the whim of some dissatisfied staff, but a demand which for the past decade has been growing and which has now reached a crescendo which must be heard. In 1981, when the President of FICSA addressed the 67th Session of the International Labour Conference, she voiced concern at the issue of growing politicisation of the secretariats of the organisations, which threatened the independence and integrity of the international civil service; she also addressed the need for reform at either the local level of our member organisations or at the level of the common system, to obtain the clout of a fully fledged trade union.

The President in 1981 further referred to the unequal and anachronistic framework of staff/management relations in the United Nations system, and voiced concern at the fact that collective bargaining, negotiation and even participation were virtually unknown in our member associations and unions as a means of determining conditions of employment.

In 1982 when addressing the 68th Session of the Conference, the President spoke of discontent growing louder, of a hope for tangible results in the form of the establishment of machinery whereby we can negotiate with management. She spoke of the fact that it is anomalous, indeed scandalous, that the United Nations organisations do not apply to their own staff the standards they set for the rest of the world.

I will not dwell on the number of times FICSA has claimed the need for a total revision of the machinery which determines our conditions of service, but I would like to address the issue of standards set for the rest of the world.

You, the delegates, are the ones who set the standards for the rest of the world. You are the ones who approve international labour Conventions such as the Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 and the Collective Bargaining Convention, 1981 (No. 154). These Conventions clearly spell out our right of collective bargaining to determine our working conditions and terms of employment. But it is not just the ILO which supports the right of public service employees to collective bargaining.

A colloquy of the Council of Europe, on relations between administrations and their staff (national and international civil services), held in Trieste in November 1988, recommended that the United Nations system invite the governments of member States to adopt a positive attitude towards the international civil service, by safeguarding the independence of civil servants of the United Nations common system, and by working towards a better awareness of the rights established by Convention No. 151. We look to the ILO for assistance in ensuring that this right is respected. For years now our conditions of service have deteriorated to the point that it is difficult for the United Nations and its specialised agencies to recruit the best qualified and most highly committed men and women. We, the international civil servants, feel that the ILO has a fundamental role to play in helping to resolve the crisis which now exists in the international civil service and which must be resolved if we do not wish to compromise the work of the organisations and international co-operation. If the United Nations and its specialised agencies are to continue to serve the world, the status and dignity of the international civil service must be restored.

We are a highly professional group, who for years have been trying to make the executive and advisory bodies of the United Nations understand the urgent need for reform. We have written to member States, addressed the General Assembly, submitted proposals to the ACC for the establishment of a negotiating mechanism as a starting point for discussion. The ACC did not even bother to reply to FICSA's concerns, and nor did it set up a joint administration/staff working group, as requested by FICSA. Some weeks later, the former Director-General of the ILO stated in reply to questions by members of the ILO Governing Body that FICSA's proposals on negotiation were a form of co-management to which he could not agree. We have taken our proposals to other forums within the United Nations common system, which had the audacity to inform us that as they did not negotiate with their own staff, they saw no need for negotiation with FICSA. While we work for peace, the members of FICSA are no longer peaceful and are increasingly turning to strike action to demonstrate their frustration at the intolerable situation whereby staff have no say in their conditions of service. The vicious circle of the last decade has now lasted too long.

Like any other employees, the staff of the United Nations common system must have the right to negotiate with their employers. Admittedly, our system is a very complex one and it is not for us to decide who are our employers, whether they are the member States or the executive heads. The staff, for their part, have no doubt as to who should negotiate on their behalf: FICSA, the Federation of International Civil Servants' Associations, who represents them. We feel that there are experts, among member States and organisations, especially in the ILO, who could certainly look into this problem.

It is high time that changes took place. We must have a system of collective bargaining to determine fair conditions of service. We are confident that you, the honourable delegates to this Conference, are in agreement with the concerns and the demands voiced by FICSA members, and we trust that those of you who have connections with delegates to the Fifth Committee of the General Assembly will convey to them the need for reform of United Nations management practices to bring them into line with the various standards on labour relations which it, the United Nations, through the ILO, is advocating to its member States.

Although not a signatory to its own Conventions, the ILO is certainly the organisation to take the lead and initiate the fundamental reform which has been so long awaited. The future of the international civil service as an independent instrument to promote peace and development is at stake.

We must have a system of collective bargaining.

Original - Spanish: The PRESIDENT (Mr. DEL PINO) - I give the floor to Mr. Mallia Milanes, Employers' delegate, Malta, who wishes to exercise his right of reply in response to remarks made by Mr. Boggs, representative of the International Federation of Chemical, Energy and General Worker's Unions.

Mr. MALLIA MILANES (Employers' delegate, Malta) - I wish to reply to the statement made by Mr. Boggs, the representative of the International Federation of Chemical, Energy and General Workers' Unions on Monday, 19 June 1989, when he said: "In the United Kingdom and the United States, there has been a lamentable drift toward the authoritarian centre, symbolised by the newly Draconian anti-trade union laws and practices by governments and vicious union-busting campaigns by employers, even in countries such as Malta."

This is clear proof that Mr. Boggs has not got the foggiest idea of what he is talking about when he states that there are "vicious union-busting campaigns by employers, even in countries such as Malta." Both the General Workers' Union and the Malta Confederation of Trade Unions, which are represented here in this Conference, can vouch that in Malta, employers have excellent working relations with them.

Mr. Boggs must have swallowed the bait offered to him by partisan, utterly false political propaganda and then addressed it to the wrong quarters. Mr. Boggs would have done a better service to his Federation had he bothered first to check his facts before taking the rostrum.

(The Conference adjourned at 8.15 p.m.)

Seventy-sixth Session, Geneva, 1989

Twenty-ninth sitting

Thursday, 22 June 1989, 10.15 a.m.

President: Mr. Nkomo

ELEVENTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT – The first item on our agenda is the eleventh report of the Selection Committee. I give the floor to Mr. Hammond, Government adviser, Canada, Chairman of the Selection Committee, to submit the report.

Mr. HAMMOND (Government adviser, Canada; Chairman of the Selection Committee) – I have the honour to submit to the Conference the eleventh report of the Selection Committee, which is to be found in Provisional Record No. 4J. The report deals solely with changes in the composition of committees.

I commend the report to the Conference for adoption.

The PRESIDENT – The discussion of the report is now open. If there are no objections, I take it that the report is adopted.

(The report is adopted.)

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON ACTION AGAINST APARTHEID: SUBMISSION AND DISCUSSION

The PRESIDENT – The next item on our agenda is the consideration of the report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid.

I have pleasure in asking Mr. Ndoeye, Minister for the Public Service and Labour, Senegal, Chairman of the Committee on Action against Apartheid; Mr. Hernandez, Employers' delegate, Philippines, Employers' Vice-Chairman; Mr. Mercier, Workers' delegate, Canada, Workers' Vice-Chairman; and Mr. Vollebaek, Government adviser, Norway, Reporter, to come to the rostrum.

I call on Mr. Ndoeye, Chairman of the Committee, to submit the report.

Original – French: Mr. NDOYE (Minister for the Public Service and Labour, Senegal; Chairman of the Committee on Action against Apartheid) – The Committee on Action against Apartheid, which I have had the honour and privilege to chair, has met for the first time under its new title. Its mandate was to examine the Special Report of the Director-General on the Application of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia, updated at the 75th Session of the Conference in 1988. The officers were as follows: Vice-Chairman. Mr. Hernandez, Employers' member (Philippines), and

Mr. Mercier, Workers' member (Canada), and myself as Chairman.

The Committee also elected as Reporter for its work, Mr. Vollebaek, Government member (Norway), and set up a tripartite Working Party of 15 members with equal representation, which elected as its Chairman the Reporter of the Committee, Mr. Vollebaek.

First of all, the Committee, unanimously, vigorously and clearly, declared its resolute condemnation of apartheid. Moreover, it immediately set out on the road to positive action, its major aim being the complete eradication, in as short a time as possible, of apartheid.

The Committee showed its good faith, commitment, determination, courage, and its moral and intellectual honesty in its analysis and assessment of all of the information concerning the situation in South Africa and Namibia, supplied by the in-depth Special Report of the Director-General for which we thank him and congratulate him. The Special Report has been the basis for an in-depth and substantial discussion of this matter.

More than 60 constructive and relevant interventions during the general discussion of the Special Report of the Director-General on the Application of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia enabled the Committee to come up with specific and appropriate recommendations to effectively combat apartheid within the framework established in the Declaration and its Programme of Action against Apartheid and with tangible support for Namibia, which is moving towards independence.

The discussions, which were carried out in a very calm and responsible manner, provided the Working Party with the guidance and recommendations necessary for it to prepare the Conclusions of the Committee.

Both the report and the conclusions were adopted by consensus and very enthusiastically. The United States Government delegate formulated a reservation, which was taken into account in the report.

These two elements, with your permission, will be explicitly presented by our brilliant Reporter Mr. Vollebaek.

I should now like to thank the Conference for having selected Senegal as a member of the Committee and for having elected me to serve as Chairman.

I warmly thank and congratulate our two excellent Vice-Chairmen, Messrs. Hernandez and Mercier, the Reporter and the members of the Working Party, all the members of the Committee, the representative of the Secretary-General, Mr. Abdel Rahman, as well as all of the staff interpreters and secretaries, whose competence, devotion and availability were very much appreciated.

I should also like to thank and congratulate the representatives of the liberation movements, trade unions, the Organisation of African Unity, and the Government delegate of Namibia, who provided valuable elements for our discussions and certainly greatly contributed to the success of the work of our Committee. I should like to ask you to adopt the report of the Committee by consensus.

Mr. HERNANDEZ (Employers' delegate, Philippines; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Action against Apartheid) – Mr. President, on behalf of the Employers' group, may I reiterate our warmest congratulations on your election and express most sincerely our appreciation for the manner in which you are presiding over this 76th Session of the Conference.

May I also, with the deepest pride, pay tribute to all the members of the Committee on Action against Apartheid, particularly to its Chairman, the Hon. Moussa Ndoeye, Minister for the Civil Service and Labour of Senegal, to the Workers' Vice-Chairman, Mr. Richard Mercier, and to the Reporter, Mr. Knut Vollebaek, for their understanding and for having produced the Committee's report and conclusions, which I have the unique honour and special pleasure to commend, in association with Mr. Ndoeye, for your approval and adoption.

The Committee's report, which contains important conclusions, is a reiteration of the international community's strong commitment to the universal objective of totally dismantling a political system that continues with impunity and unashamedly to disregard and reject the tenets of freedom and democracy, the imperatives of social justice and equality and, most importantly, the rights and dignity of man as a citizen of the world and as a child of God.

The report, with the Committee's conclusions, is a document of international unity and understanding, recognising that every man and woman, whatever his or her colour, has been created in God's own likeness, each with the same spark of divinity, and each with no claim to superiority over any other.

The report once again strengthens the updated Declaration and Programme of Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia and sends a strong message to the administrators of apartheid that the members of this world-renown and noble International Labour Organisation will not waiver in their determination and commitment, and will redouble their efforts, towards the eradication of racism in South Africa and elsewhere in the world.

At this juncture, allow me to recall the message of Mrs. Corazon C. Aquino, beloved President of the Republic of the Philippines, to this forum last year, that "liberty is non-negotiable". The Committee's report and conclusions reaffirm that message, which will continue to ring loud and clear during our time and throughout the ages in the entire universe, paraphrasing one of the fundamental principles that are the linchpins of this great International Labour Organisation, namely, that repression anywhere is a threat to freedom everywhere.

In endorsing the Committee's report and conclusions for adoption by this Conference, I most respectfully beg your kind indulgence in asking you to understand and appreciate the reiteration I am constrained to make of the reservations put forward in the previous sessions of this Conference by a very small minority of employers from such member States as the Federal Republic of Germany, the United Kingdom, Belgium, the Netherlands, the United States, France, Switzerland, Israel, Italy, Canada and the five Nordic countries. These reservations of various parts of the Committee's conclusions in the report relating to certain aspects of the updated Declaration and Programme of Action with which their organisations have some difficulty relating to constitutional, corporate and entrepreneurial policy constraints.

Nevertheless, I must convey to you the fullest assurance that such reservations do not in any way constitute a dilution or weakening of the Employers' resolve to join in the continuing and steadfast indignation against an abhorrent regime in the universal war against apartheid. I must stress most emphatically and most specifically that the Employers' group fully supports the Committee's work.

May I therefore be permitted to enjoy the personal luxury of asking every one of you, with all deference and earnestness, to express concurrence with and support for the report and its conclusions which, given the intransigence and indifference of South Africa to world opinion and to the deafening roar of discrimination, constitute both a timeless and a timely document?

Original – French: Mr. MERCIER (Workers' delegate, Canada; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Action against Apartheid) – As spokesman of the Workers' group of the Committee on Action against Apartheid, I must first of all express my deep satisfaction for the unanimous adoption of our conclusions for the first time for several years. I very much hope that this same spirit of agreement will guide our debates today and will lead to the unanimous adoption of these conclusions by our tripartite Conference. The representatives of the Black majority in South Africa and those of the front-line countries have told us clearly in our discussions that their people will never forget those who join forces with them, or those who take the side of apartheid, and it is they who know what the remedy is. And this remedy – they repeated this – is mandatory economic sanctions.

At present, the Government of South Africa is undertaking new international initiatives to convince the international community that is now engaged in reform. However, Mr. de Klerk, who will probably become President of South Africa after the September elections, from which elections the Black majority once more will be totally excluded, has publicly said already that it cannot envisage the introduction of elections by universal suffrage in a unitary South Africa. So, apartheid will remain. Apartheid will remain unless we, the international community, are serious when we talk of sanctions. It is more important than ever to make the Government of South Africa feel the effective pressure in its present diplomatic action, that is to say the pressure of severe economic sanctions.

This year our Committee has tried to assess the progress made in abolishing apartheid and to see how far the Declaration and Programme of Action against Apartheid has been applied. The Director-General's Report on this matter is quite explicit. The agreements calling for the application of Resolution 435 of the United Nations on the independence of Namibia were considered by the Director-General, and I quote, "the only bright spots in an otherwise bleak year for the people of southern Africa".

The state of emergency in South Africa has been prolonged once more. During this very session, I have received a telex from COSATU drawing our attention to the fact that there had been – and I quote – "a new and tangible increase in repression and we expect a new concerted attack".

In the last two weeks, more than 70 trade unionists have been arrested, including the vice-chairman and secretary of the regional section of COSATU in Queenstown. Donsie Khumalo, the regional secretary of COSATU in northern Transvaal, was arrested on 1 June and accused of having transgressed the restrictions imposed on him. And the persons arrested, such as Donsie Khumalo, who were, it is claimed, released after their hunger strike complained that all these restrictions are worse than detention itself. Moreover, attacks against trade union premises are continuing. The police has four times raided COSATU offices in the eastern Cape within a fortnight. Fire bombs were thrown into the homes of two trade union organisers at the end of last month. The police brutally intervened to put an end to the strike of the Food and Allied Workers Union (FAWU) last week and 20 trade unionists had to be taken to hospital. The members of the Building, Construction and Allied Workers Union (BCAWU) were beaten up by security agents recruited by the multinational undertaking EVERITE. How many other examples could be given! Incidentally, the Director-General's Special Report quotes official statistics, according to which the police intervened no less than 953 times during the year to break strikes.

Increasing attempts are being made to weaken the independent Black trade union movement. The promulgation – despite all our protests, both inside and outside the country – of the Labour Relations Amendment Act (LRAA) has no other aim but to weaken this movement.

In the Director-General's Special Report we note the replies given by the employers and their efforts to combat discrimination. But, what we want to know is – why has the gap between the wages paid to Black workers and those paid to White workers grown wider in almost all sectors of the economy between June 1987 and June 1988? We have raised this question as so many others in our Committee, but all these questions remained unanswered.

Only yesterday, we received a telex from POTWA – the Postal and Telecommunications Workers' Association – informing us of the arrest of its 148 members following to a strike in Transkei. We have also just learnt, that the police has raided the offices of MWASA – the Media Workers' Association of South Africa – and arrested Miranda, a female organiser of that organisation. The day before yesterday, bombs exploded in the offices of the ANC in Lusaka. Rigorous restrictions have been imposed on 33 organisations of the democratic opposition movement and more than 500 people are living under individual restrictions.

The reason such news still does not appear in our papers is because of strict censorship. I believe it is not because we ourselves have become indifferent to the daily news of apartheid and the routine violence created; it is simply that this has already lasted far too long.

And if apartheid has lasted far too long, we must consider why. In our Committee we have considered how far our Programme of Action and the recommendations by our Committee have been applied. Most unfortunately, all too often the commitments entered into here have not led to action to put these commitments into effect.

The Director-General's Special Report clearly confirms that only a very few governments have been ready to increase their pressure on the South African regime. The answer, for example, given by the European Economic Community to the ILO questionnaire seems to us completely cynical. The Twelve take note of the absence of progress in the abolition of apartheid. That is why the Twelve, and I quote, "stated at Hanover and in New York that their relations with South Africa might well take a further turn for the worse". Apparently, this risk was not taken seriously because at the most recent meeting of the Community in Luxembourg an embargo on coal was once more rejected.

Thus, in the meantime, trade between the Federal Republic of Germany and South Africa increased by 33.8 per cent in the first eight months of 1988.

In the meantime, the European Economic Community is even discussing the possibility of lifting the embargo on uranium and nuclear technology if South Africa signs the Treaty on the non-proliferation of nuclear weapons

Even mandatory sanctions, such as an embargo on arms, are the subject of regular breaches. According to a recent study by the International Peace Research Institute in Stockholm, Japan, France, Federal Republic of Germany and Canada have helped South Africa to produce military vehicles. The Federal Republic of Germany and Israel have contributed to the development of a rocket industry, and Austria and Belgium have been involved in the supply of equipment to the industry manufacturing small arms.

Last year, we insisted on the importance of financial sanctions. In March, we learnt that several banks were preparing to offer South Africa a new loan. Last December, a consortium of Swiss banks acted as intermediary for the private investment of governmental funds, amounting to 88 million rand. A month later, in January, the Union of Swiss Banks (the UBS) acted as paying agent for the renewal of the contract for 100 million rand. And this brings us once more to the problem of the UBS. Once more, we have the problem of the UBS agency within the premises occupied by this Conference. We trust that this time next year something concrete will have been done to remedy this state of affairs, which is becoming more and more intolerable.

Exports from South Africa to Switzerland, which do not include the trade in gold, which is never included in published figures, increased last year by 102 per cent. Taiwan has increased its imports from South Africa by 164 million dollars. Following the adoption of legislation aimed at putting an end to the transport of oil to South Africa by the Governments of Norway and Denmark, a Hong Kong company has taken up this trade in breach of the embargo on oil. And Japan: How should we interpret the assertion that, and I quote: "our trade relations with South Africa are limited to normal trade"? At the time the international community and the black majority in South Africa are calling for real economic sanctions, how can we talk of "normal trade"?

We very much regret the reservations by the United States Government; but we have also noted that that Government took certain positive action during the last year.

The work of our Committee this year was very difficult. It is because we realise that our Declaration and Programme of Action in reality include all the necessary factors to lead to the abolition of apartheid.

However, that is the remedy. It is the lack of political will to apply it without any loopholes which is missing.

Thus, we have decided to give a new boost to action against apartheid. We must send, all of us, a firm message of indignation to the South African Government, and the best way of doing this is to organise concerted campaigns, well targeted campaigns, within the general framework of efforts undertaken to impose overall mandatory sanctions.

In appealing to all the Members of this Organisation to make renewed efforts to ensure that specific action is urgently taken to promote the progressive application of all the Recommendations contained in the Declaration, we mean that, by this time next year, we expect to see proof of concrete action by all our Members in regard to each of the Recommendations in the Programme of Action.

Thanks to the Committee of Experts, to be set up further to our recommendation made last year, we hope to be able to have a proper assessment and monitoring of the progress made in applying the Declaration and Recommendations made by the Conference.

To facilitate the work of these experts, we renew our appeal to all Members to send in their full, individual answers to the ILO questionnaire. We specially hope and urge the Twelve of the European Economic Community to show themselves receptive to our appeal.

Finally, we very much hope that, in accordance with the recommendations of our Committee, a message will be sent to the Government of Pretoria to demand the abolition of the state of emergency, the release of political and trade union detainees and the elimination of all the additional restrictions on detainees.

The Workers' group also undertakes to lead an international campaign for the abolition of the death penalty in South Africa, a country which at present holds a world record for executions, the execution of its opponents.

We repeat that violence is apartheid, not those who demand the application of internationally recognised standards and principles, such as the International Labour Organisation defends.

I do hope, however, that not only our conclusions this year will be adopted unanimously but will also be accompanied by a firm political will to give them full effect.

Our credibility depends on this.

Mr. VOLLEBAEK (Government delegate, Norway; Reporter of the Committee on Action against Apartheid) – Mr. President, may I join those who have already congratulated you upon your election to the Presidency of this Conference. It gives me a special pleasure to see you presiding over this plenary session, since you last year chaired the Committee on Apartheid.

I have the honour to submit to the Conference the Report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia, as recorded in Provisional Record No. 20. The Committee had six sittings. The report both reflects the Committee's deliberations and contains specific conclusions adopted by the Committee.

As you will recall, the Committee on Apartheid last year adopted an updated Declaration and Programme of Action. This year the Committee has focused on some of the recommendations made last year to be specifically followed up.

The contents of the report have already been presented most eloquently to this Conference and I shall not go into detail. I would, however, like to draw your attention to the fact that, in addition to recording the deliberations of the Committee and the conclusions adopted, there is a request to the Director-General of the ILO to convey to the Government of the Republic of South Africa the deep concern of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference that no real progress has been made in the abolition of the apartheid system and to strongly urge the South African Government to make a meaningful gesture of good will towards its own people as well as to the international community by lifting the state of emergency, releasing political and trade union detainees and removing all restrictions on detainees who have been released. Such a gesture could eventually lay the basis for a dialogue which South Africa so badly needs.

The Committee also welcomed the nomination of Nelson Mandela for the Nobel Peace Prize in recognition of the fact that violence is a feature of apartheid itself and not of those who stand for international recognised standards and principles that the International Labour Organisation upholds.

I would like to underline that the report this year was adopted in the Committee by consensus, even though some delegations had certain reservations, and it is of course my hope as Reporter that this Conference also will adopt it by consensus. By adopting the report the Conference is also then invited to associate itself with the request to the Director-General of the ILO and welcome the nomination of Nelson Mandela for this year's Nobel Peace Prize.

The PRESIDENT – I wish to thank the Chairman of the Committee, the two Vice-Chairmen and the Reporter for submitting the report.

The report is now open for discussion.

Mr. SUNMONO (representative of the Organisation of African Trade Union Unity) – I would like, on behalf of the Organisation of African Trade Union Unity, to congratulate the Chairman and all the members of the Committee on Action against Apartheid for the excellent work done in the Committee this year, which has led to the adoption by consensus of the Committee's report. It is our hope that the report will also be adopted by the Conference, but if, however, there is any call for votes, we shall respectfully ask you, Mr. President, to call for a record vote again tomorrow morning.

The OATUU supports the adoption of the report and its recommendations in its entirety.

Nothing gives us grounds for hope that the apostles of apartheid intend to change their policy. What we are seeing is a public relations gimmick by Mr. Botha's likely successors, on the lines that they intend changing some aspects of apartheid. We see at home in Africa that there is no way you can putty a leaking grass roof; you either have to remove it entirely or put a new corrugated iron sheet. You cannot putty a grass-thatched house. So that is what we have been told by the apostles of apartheid – that they intend to putty a leaking thatched roof, i.e. apartheid.

The OATUU is of the view that nothing has changed in the policy of apartheid, because the basic structure of apartheid has not changed and there is no indication that it will change. We advocate the abolition of the system itself and all the laws that sustain this system. Not enough attention has been given to the release of all political prisoners, including Nelson Mandela, and all detained politicians and trade union leaders – the state of emergency has also not been removed. And yesterday or today Mr. de Klerk was – or is – on tour of three Western countries to call on them to assure them that apartheid has changed and that the climate is now favourable for investments again in South Africa. We call upon the Governments of Italy, of the Federal Republic of Germany and of the United Kingdom not to be deceived by this talk, because the fundamentals have not changed; and they will not change until all political detainees are freed, until all laws sustaining apartheid have been removed and until all political organisations like the ANC and others have been legitimised. Another prerequisite is that there should be “one man, one vote”, to lead to a more judicial and democratic South Africa. Until that time we do not believe and we shall not believe that the apostles of apartheid want to change anything. The Organisation of African Trade Union Unity is therefore fully in support of the conclusions and recommendations of the Committee on Apartheid and asks for its report to be adopted in its entirety.

Mr. AZIKIWE (representative of the United Nations Special Committee against Apartheid) – It is a great honour for me to address this gathering on behalf of the United Nations Special Committee against Apartheid. It is indeed appropriate that you are presiding over this debate as your country, Zimbabwe, has not been spared the destructive consequences of the ruthless policies of the racist regime of South Africa. Your country's commitment to the cause of peace in southern Africa has found expression, time and again, in its concerted support to the international campaign to help eradicate apartheid.

We have before us the report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid, including its conclusions and recommendations. These represent the consensus of the tripartite structure of the Committee. Indeed, they are the outcome of the intense debate whose ultimate goal is the definition of specific measures by the international community against apartheid.

The Special Committee against Apartheid believes that the implementation of these recommendations, especially those concerning economic sanctions against South Africa, is of particular importance. As you are aware, economic sanctions have had a serious impact on the South African economy. They have deprived the Pretoria regime of substantial capital needed to sustain the apartheid economy. The United Nations Special Committee also believes that an effective oil embargo could seriously impair the ability of the racist regime to pursue its repressive and aggressive policies. Short of a mandatory oil embargo imposed by the Security Council under Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter, the Special Committee considers that the adoption by governments of legislation or comparable measures would allow for effective monitoring of the oil embargo and any violators.

As you are aware, the hearings on the oil embargo against South Africa were held in New York last April 1989 by the Intergovernmental Group to Monitor the Supply and Shipping of Oil and Petroleum products to South Africa. Several important recommendations were made to strengthen the embargo and these recommendations are contained in document A/44/279. Among them are the adoption of legislation or comparable measures to impose an effective oil embargo, the enhancement of enforcement measures, particularly punitive measures against violators of the oil embargo, and the strict monitoring of the use of certificates of discharge.

It is appropriate that these recommendations focus both on disinvestment by the transnational corporations and on the need to negotiate the terms of disinvestment with the trade unions concerned. Any disinvestment plan must include a labour clause on the rights of South African workers. As different experts' studies have demonstrated, most of the transnational corporations that have disinvested from South Africa continue to maintain non-equity relationships with the domestic companies that purchased the transnational corporations' assets. It is for this reason that the non-racial trade unions in South Africa refer to “corporate camouflage” as falling short of disinvestment.

The Special Committee is particularly supportive of the establishment of the group of three independent experts, as we believe that the lack of strict monitoring of the measures adopted by governments, as well as the lack of co-ordination on the imposition of these measures, has, partly, resulted in the loopholes which have been exploited by the Pretoria regime to circumvent sanctions. It should be stressed that this process of evasive sanctions has received direct assistance from some countries. Economic considerations have been allowed to take precedence over the obvious moral issues involved. When we talk of the evils of apartheid, we are assured of the sympathy of the industrialised countries, but when we call on them for reasonable actions to dismantle the criminal policy, which is a barrier and a crime against humanity, we are confronted with non-cooperation.

The apartheid system must be abolished. As the community of Governments, Employers and Workers, the ILO has a vital role to play in assisting the process of eradicating apartheid. It is clear that the racist regime of South Africa has no credible alternative to its “repressive reform” policy, designed ultimately to give the Blacks limited political rights while maintaining minority rule. This was of course evident in the renewal of the four-year-old state of emergency, which shows that the regime can only rule by force. This has consistently been rejected by the Black majority and a growing number of Whites. Thus, the struggle against apartheid continues with the non-racial labour movements playing a crucial role. The international community can do no less than provide full and effective support to the struggle.

The Special Committee will continue to offer its constructive co-operation with the ILO in this noble endeavour: the abolition of apartheid and the beginning of the process that will bring peace and freedom to South Africa.

Mr. KAIEMBO (representative of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions) – On behalf of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, representing 88 million workers the world over, I should like to express fullest support for the conclusions of the Conference Committee on Action against Apartheid, which I hope will be adopted by consensus.

But more important, not only adopted, but implemented. Speakers before me have given countless examples of continuing – indeed worsening – repression in South Africa, while the media remain silent, while there is talk of dialogue (but dialogue with whom?), while every apartheid law that is removed is immediately replaced by other legislative measures that bring in the same restrictions, or even harsher restrictions, through the back door. In the words of Jai Naidoo, General Secretary of COSATU, “The Government is digging deeper into the trenches of emergency rule in a futile bid to reverse the march of history”.

In December last year, in Harare, leaders of the independent Black trade union movement in South Africa, of COSATU, NACTU and others, were unanimous in telling us that the situation was getting worse not better. “Don’t let bogus signals from Pretoria fool you”, they said. They asked us to diffuse one message, namely: “The space for legal and democratic opposition is almost comprehensively becoming closed. Only sanctions will convince the South African regime that this cannot, just cannot, go on.”

ICFTU policy on South Africa has evolved from listening to the needs of the Black majority workers of South Africa. It is for this reason that the ICFTU was in the vanguard when it adopted a first blueprint for comprehensive mandatory economic sanctions back in the spring of 1985, when it set up a monitoring machinery to look at the practical implementation of sanctions, to expose sanction-busting practices and to promote co-ordinated international action.

Through our ongoing work, spearheaded by the ICFTU’s special Co-ordinating Committee on Southern Africa, we feel that we can make a practical contribution to the implementation of the conclusions adopted by the Conference Committee on Action against Apartheid this year, and indeed to the implementation of the Declaration and its Programme of Action. For example, the conclusions this year call on trade unions to organise campaigns to prevent or expose attempts by South African multinational enterprises to take over enterprises outside South Africa.

The ICFTU has just published a list of subsidiaries of South African transnationals abroad. This is entitled “Apartheid for export?”. The list shows that a total of 88 South African transnationals control 437 companies spread over 44 countries from the tiny Virgin Islands, Liechtenstein or Hong Kong to the United Kingdom or the United States. Britain, with 76 South African-owned companies established on her territory, takes the lion’s share. Out of 437 subsidiaries, 110 are linked to the South African giant Anglo-American Corporation Group. It is for this reason that President Kenneth Kaunda of Zambia requested the ICFTU earlier this year to research into the activities of Anglo-American. There is no doubt that the companies listed by the ICFTU play a vital role in sanctions-busting, that they play a dynamic role in helping to maintain apartheid. They must be targeted.

The publication of our list of South African subsidiaries does not of course mean that we intend to let non-South African transnationals off the hook. On the contrary, our monitoring unit keeps an up-to-date list not only of such transnationals, but also of those that have tried to deceive public opinion by fake disinvestments, disinvestments that amounted to little more than corporate camouflage. What credence can we give to companies such as Mobil Oil that has consistently been feeding its workers, organised by the Chemical Workers’ Industrial Union, false information about its intentions, refused to divulge the terms of its so-called disinvestment and systematically rebuffed the union’s approaches for a negotiated settlement?

And what of the employers that are only too happy to use the anti-union provisions of the Labour Relations Amendment Act? Some leading transnationals such as Dunlop must be publicly exposed and targeted for years of union-bashing tactics.

The ICFTU is maintaining a blacklist of all those companies that take advantage of the Labour Relations Amendment Act. A preliminary list has already been sent to all our affiliated organisations. We hope that a tripartite commitment to implement the conclusions we are now discussing will help reduce the length of this list.

We, for our part, are fully committed to an international trade union campaign in support of the demands of COSATU/NACTU and independent Black trade unions, drawn up by the Workers’ Summit held in March this year.

The ICFTU welcomes the emphasis in this year’s conclusions on the special efforts to bring about an embargo on South African coal, effective financial sanctions, appropriate legislation to prevent the transport of oil to South Africa and a severance of air links so that certain companies cannot benefit from the withdrawal of others. Indeed, representatives of the independent Black trade union movement in South Africa have pointed out to us that advertisements in the South African press now invite potential travellers to fly to the United States via Amsterdam with KLM or Frankfurt with Lufthansa. What Lufthansa and KLM are doing can only be qualified as shameless sanction-busting.

The ICFTU Executive Board has established a special working party to promote an embargo on South African coal. Numerous representations have been made by the ICFTU, both to individual governments and to the European Economic Community. Our Asian Regional Organisation is organising pressure on governments such as Japan, Taiwan, South Korea and Hong Kong. Special attention is being focused on the major North Sea coal import harbours and their role in trans-shipments of South African coal, and pressure is being put on harbour and municipal authorities. It is distressing, however, that direct trade union solidarity action is much too often restricted by legislation to impede such action, exposing unions to severe civil liabilities. The ILO Programme of Action calls for the lifting of all such impediments. The ICFTU renews its appeal on this recommendation. Our working party is also promoting research into possible alternatives to South African coal and other minerals, with special emphasis on the promotion of exports.

How many more South Africans will be murdered by apartheid while we pay lip service to democracy?

Finally, a few words about Namibia. Of course, we welcome the progress made towards the achievement of Namibia's long overdue independence, but we are most concerned about reports from the democratic trade union movement in that country that ruthless repression of trade unions and political activities continues unabated and that the press remains restricted. ICFTU affiliates are putting pressure on the United Nations for effective implementation of Security Council resolution 435 with a full and efficient deployment of the United Nations Transition Assistance Group.

Above all, we should not allow Namibia's independence process to blind us to the fact that apartheid continues, until such time and will continue to do so as the international community begins, seriously, to fully implement the commitments undertaken here.

Mr. NORUSHE (representative of the African National Congress) – Mr. President, allow me to associate myself with the previous speakers in congratulating you on your election at the head of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. I should also like to extend a warm welcome to Mr. Hansenne and ensure him of the support of the African National Congress (ANC) and the South African Congress of Trade Unions (SACTU). A well-deserved tribute and hearty farewell go to Mr. Blanchard for the devotion and competence he has shown in serving our Organisation, the ILO.

I must comment, as I may be the only one to do so, that in this decade two important sessions of this Conference stand out with respect to the history of southern Africa, namely, the 67th and the 76th.

The 67th session took place in 1980, the year in which we celebrated the independence of Zimbabwe – and what a good opening that was for this decade! During the current session, nine years later, we are again rolling up our sleeves to complete, come 1 November, a decolonisation process that is already under way, this time in Namibia. While looking forward to welcoming our Namibian comrades as representatives of the independent State of Namibia at the next session of this Conference, we observe that all of southern Africa is on the alert 24 hours a day owing to the constant destabilisation and violation of national sovereignties by the racist police. The peoples of our region are repeatedly forced to flock to their graveyards in order to bury their beloved ones whose lives have been cut down in the darkest hours of the night by the racist henchmen of the terrorist colonial apartheid regime. Moreover, the economies of the region's countries have been devastated by the policy of apartheid. It is because of these circumstances that we are appealing to you, members of the international community, to support the victimised countries diplomatically, politically, economically and morally and to couple this support with an intensification of comprehensive and mandatory sanctions against the Pretoria regime.

At home another destabilisation process, engineered by the Bantustan chiefs in response to their masters' voices is in full swing. Our activists are suffering sleepless nights in a large-scale battle of survival imposed upon them by the Bantustan gestapo police.

Whole families have had to abandon their homes to seek hiding place for fear of being burnt alive in their houses. Scores of our people have lost their lives. The enemy is not only depending on its White collaborators but is also making use of Black stooges and puppets to murder people, regardless of whether or not they are attached to any political organisation.

The Congress of South African Trade Unions (COSATU) delegation is not with us in this 76th Session of the Conference because the regime is refusing to grant them passports so that they can travel. While the granting of passports is a right for every citizen of any country, in our land it has become a privilege. This is another violation of human rights. Hence we stress that apartheid cannot be reformed but must be destroyed.

Thirteen years ago this month the whole world was shocked when the racist forces went on rampage in Soweto and other African townships of our country, killing scores of schoolchildren. As for the young girls who were detained, they became the victims of rape by the racist gestapo and thus when they were finally released, they found themselves burdened with fatherless children. This was the last straw for our people.

Scores of our patriots are on death row, awaiting their date with the hangman, after having been sentenced to death by racist judges using instruments of the law which were formulated without representation of those they serve to condemn. There is no other country in the world today that has more than 300 of its citizens in prison awaiting execution. South Africa has fast become the hanging capital of the world.

Our people have become wanderers in the land of their birth through forced removals by the racist regime whose notoriously unscrupulous acts are meant to shunt our people around like cattle. African sentiments are easily provoked by forced removal away from the graves of their forbears. They naturally nurse a grudge against anyone who violates this traditional attachment. Every nationality in our country has, at one stage or another, been angered by the racist regime's violation of this sacred tradition through forced removals.

These are some of the problems whose impact and aftermath will still be felt even after freedom has been won for our people in South Africa. When we talk of reconciliation, some of our people will be unable to understand us. This is because they have lost their entire family in our struggle. It would not be amiss of me to say that there are going to be outbursts of anger in South Africa even after freedom. Fortunately, we have a seasoned leadership in our vanguard movement, the African National Congress, together with its allies, the South African Communist Party and the South African Congress of Trade Unions (SACTU), who might be able to prevail upon our people through some form of education to forgive. Of course, we know that in a revolution, not everybody sees the day of freedom.

Trade unions in our country are burdened by scores of racist labour laws among which we can name but a few, the first being the Labour Relations Amendment Act, promulgated in September 1988, which is aimed at crushing all traces of trade union activity in our country. Our workers, of course, in COSATU, the National Council of Trade Unions (NACTU) and in other independent unions, are busy drafting their own version of a labour relations act which must and will reflect the type of protection they expect. That's why I appeal to the workers of the world to support this noble endeavour.

There is also the new Minerals Bill which undermines the health and safety measures that the National Union of Mineworkers (NUM) has been fighting for. We have the South African Transport Services Labour Bill aimed at breaking the bargaining power of the most highly representative and powerful union in this sector – the South African Railway and Harbour Workers' Union (SARHWU). We also have the Post Office Services Act which is discriminatory and limits the training and promotion opportunities of workers in the post and telecommunication sector, and many, many, many more. The South African Employers' Consultative Committee on Labour Affairs (SACCOLA), which is an employers' organisation, is benefiting from all these laws. Domestic and foreign employers alike are making use of these racist laws in our country. We therefore appeal to governments as well as to employer bodies worldwide to try and bring pressure to bear on these racist employers to steer clear from complicity in the crimes that are being perpetuated against our workers in South Africa.

The racists in our country are tantalising us with the release of our leader, comrade Nelson Mandela, after the racist elections that are scheduled for September this year. We do not want to be tantalised. We demand his unconditional release as well as the release of all other political prisoners in our country, and the removal of all restrictions on banned people's organisations. Promises made by the racist regime have always come to nothing. We are greatly heartened by the proposals made by Mr. Krasucki, the General Secretary of the French General Confederation of Labour (CGT), for putting forward the name of our leader, comrade Nelson Mandela, for nomination for the Nobel Peace Prize in recognition of the fact that violence is a feature of apartheid itself and not of those who stand for internationally recognised standards and principles that the International Labour Organisation upholds. The Committee on Action against Apartheid has also welcomed this nomination.

In conclusion, we would like to appeal to the delegates assembled here today by saying: please don't close your files at the end of this 76th Session when you return to your countries, open them up and let it be known that the demise of apartheid can only be guaranteed with the massive participation of your members in your solidarity struggles with us to erase this evil system. At least, when we meet again, tripartite delegates must be able to report on the progress made in the following fields: the implementation of mandatory and comprehensive sanctions against racist South Africa; the refusal by the international trade union movement to handle South African goods; the closing off of air links and diplomatic missions of the racist regime abroad; an end to loans and credit facilities to the racist regime; an end to emigration to South Africa; and the fight for the lifting of the state of emergency. In order to achieve a speedy resolution of the issue concerning the Union Bank of Switzerland (UBS), the Director-General must convey the feelings of this house to the UBS and proceed to pursue the possibility of finding alternative banking arrangements. It is now time to put words into action as an injury to one is an injury to all.

Mr. MAKHANDA (representative of the Pan-Africanist Congress of Azania) – May I wish you grace and peace. Mr. President, at the outset, allow me, on behalf of the Pan-Africanist Congress of Azania, to congratulate you on your unanimous election to the venerated position of President of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. Your diplomatic views and experience have been fashioned in the crucible of a bloody struggle for the liberation of your beautiful country, Zimbabwe; a struggle in which your own role as one of its leaders stands out as a beacon to us who are still engaged in same for national liberation and the right of self-determination. We have no doubt that you will execute your difficult responsibilities with the same high quality of expertise and finesse and as a true son of our beloved continent Africa.

May I also extend congratulations to the new Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Hansenne, for his brilliant Special Report on Apartheid. The ILO has been one of those organisation in the United Nations family that has made a very positive and concrete contribution to our struggle to eradicate apartheid. For this we are deeply grateful. We hope and believe that under his leadership this attitude will continue. Of course he has already given us that assurance and has shown his sensitivity towards Africa's causes by visiting us early this year in beautiful Bujumbura during the 12th OAU Labour Commission.

I would be failing in my responsibilities if I did not express my organisation's and my own feelings of gratitude to the outgoing Director-General, Mr. Blanchard, who has served this Organisation with distinction, diligence and great competence and under whom most of the programmes we benefit from were established. We wish him God's grace and a shower of His blessings in his new life.

My delegation accepts the conclusions and recommendations of the Committee on Actions against Apartheid. It is a minimum programme, incremental in nature, but worthy of support. Apartheid is a very pervasive issue that overshadows every aspect of our human relations. Labour, in this instance, has been no exception.

The events in our country are heading with alarming speed towards a cataclysm, despite pronouncements to the contrary.

The renewal of the state of emergency a few weeks ago is testimony to this contention. The resignation of seven leading members of the racist ruling clique in our country is yet another. The sentencing of 14 patriots to death from among the Upington 26, on the basis of the now infamous common purpose doctrine, is further confirmation of this bleak prognosis.

On the labour front, the picture is no better or worse. The contentious Labour Relations Amendment Act has not been reviewed by the regime despite promises to the contrary by the racist Minister of Manpower. The pillars of the racist regime, the police, the soldiers and security apparatus continue to arrest, detain and maim our workers; they continue to besiege their homes in the African townships with tanks and other military paraphernalia, such as Casspirs. A few days ago, we were informed by a NACTU official that their offices were raided by police. Police dogs were used on members of the National Union of Farmworkers, another NACTU affiliate, during a strike for recognition of their union. The Director-General's Special Report is accurate in reporting that a new climate of hostility has built up, with repression of the non-racial trade unions reaching an unprecedented level. Indeed, scores of union leaders have been detained for varying periods; several have been killed by police forces and White vigilantes; union premises have been vandalised, some entirely burnt down; and police intervention in strikes has increased significantly.

Every year a catalogue of racist violations of human rights of the dispossessed, oppressed and exploited African majority workers are tabled in various conferences. And, every year, the apologists of the apartheid regime also drum up unsubstantiated arguments to show that there is a movement towards the resolution of our plight; that racist South Africa must be given a chance; that its isolation should be terminated. In the meantime, our workers and people are suffering and dying daily as the Director-General's Special Report documents and illustrates in a very graphic and poignant manner. Countries can help make a difference if they strengthen sanctions instead of helping the apartheid regime.

With the near-chaotic implementation of resolution 435 on 1 April this year and the signing of the Brazzaville Accords last year, we have been told we can now look forward to a similar model being put in place to resolve our situation in Azania. The international community is being told that it was not sanctions or armed struggle that has brought about the new willingness on the part of the racist regime in Pretoria to relinquish its occupation in Namibia. It is said that reason and persuasion and a little pressure did the job!

The truth of the matter is that the movement towards the implementation of resolution 435 was brought about by the racist regime's defeat at Cuito-Carnival, which was decisive. Similarly, the movement towards the Lancaster Conference was brought about by the victories of the Patriotic Front in Zimbabwe, and these were decisive. No oppressor, no dictator gives up power on the basis of logic or reason; if they had the qualities of reason and logic they would not be oppressors and dictators in the first place.

Our workers are as resolute as ever in their determination to eradicate the scourge of apartheid. They have continued to score impressive victories in their struggle. This past 1 May, our workers stayed home and commemorated May Day by the thousands. They succeeded in forcing the regime to recognise this day, rather than the first Friday in May, as workers' day. The regime had designated the first Friday in May as the day to be observed by workers, ostensibly to make it void of any "revolutionary" content.

As an integral part of the dispossessed and oppressed community, Azanian workers have not shed their responsibilities, or limited their struggles to shop-floor issues of bread and butter. They have championed two very successful major campaigns – that of the Sharpeville Six who had been sentenced to hang but whose sentences have been commuted – an act for which we are very grateful to the International Labour Organisation and the international community in general. The second very successful campaign was that of the release of our 75 year-old President, Zephania Mothopeng, who addressed the United Nations last Friday, 16 June, at the invitation of the Special Committee against Apartheid. He had been sentenced to 30 years for "organising and predicting" the 16 June 1976 Soweto uprisings. In a series of prayer meetings all over the country involving hundreds of thousands of workers and members of the oppressed community, the national Council of Trade Unions (NACTU), joined by members of the Council of South African Trade Unions (COSATU), and other community organisations such as the Azanian National Youth Unity (AZANYU), demanded the commutation of the death sentences of the Sharpeville patriots and the release of the Pan-Africanist Congress President. The racist regime, confronted by all this anger, bowed down. This anger was even perceived by the foreign embassies' staff accredited to Azania, and was communicated to their capitals. Even the Iron Lady, Mrs. Margaret Thatcher, for once had to stand on the side of justice.

I am highlighting these events to show that our workers are engaged in a constant battle and that the struggle is being fought resolutely inside Azania, despite the state of emergency and restriction on the press. Our workers and our people are fighting on all fronts, using all forms of struggle, including armed resistance. As our President said at the United Nations last Friday: "The Azanian people have long dismissed the notion that the racist army could sustain the apartheid system indefinitely." And he reminded the meeting that: "Great empires have fallen."

Experience, it has been said, is a great teacher. A burnt child, we are told, will always dread a fire, and rightfully so. We of the PAC are like that child. When, on 21 March 1960, we launched a non-violent positive action campaign, we were able to persuade hundreds and thousands of our workers not to go to work but instead to go to prison. Our campaign was so successful, beyond anything we could have dreamt of. Capital fled the country. The wheels of industry came to a standstill. The regime killed our people, and later opted to negotiate with our leaders, if they could only stop the thousands of people and call them off the streets.

This our leaders in the PAC did. Calm settled in the country and then the racist regime reneged on their word. Instead our leaders were rounded up and locked up, our workers' and peoples' misery continued with more killings, arrests and banishments. Witness the 16 June 1976 peaceful demonstration, witness the 3 September 1974 peaceful rent protest in Sharpeville and Seboken.

As the Director-General's Special Report makes clear, today our entire societal fabric is in shambles and will continue to be so until effective remedial measures are taken.

We have called for the effective imposition of comprehensive mandatory sanctions as a peaceful and non-violent option to our programme, which we intend to carry out resolutely if the former does not redress the injustice perpetrated against our workers and peoples.

In conclusion, we once again call upon all of you here to save the lives the Upington 14 patriots, to continue demanding the unconditional release of all political prisoners.

Our President has launched, with the International Red Cross, a campaign to ensure that all political prisoners receive medical check-ups twice a year, as prison conditions have made them susceptible to tuberculosis. Nelson Mandela, as you know, was a victim of this disease owing to prison conditions. We hope you will support this worthy effort.

We would also urge this august body to support concretely the front-line States, whose economies and workers have suffered enormously as a result of the racist regime's policy of apartheid. Their sacrifices on behalf of justice and freedom more than commend them. We wish other countries, especially in the developed world, would exhibit the same high moral values of justice, peace and security and freedom, as against the high material values of profit and profit and profit.

Original – Japanese: Mr. TANAKA (Workers' adviser, Japan) – I fully appreciate the work of the Committee on Action against Apartheid in formulating conclusions against apartheid in South Africa and Namibia, on the basis of social justice and humanity.

I especially welcome the fact that the independence of Namibia was included in the conclusions. I fully endorse the resolutions and decisions taken by the Committee.

I feel that Mr. Nelson Mandela's nomination for the Nobel Peace Prize is to be welcomed. I pay tribute to Mr. Mercier, spokesman of the Workers' group, and the members representing the Workers' group in the Working Party.

The main theme of the Director-General's Report to this Conference is "Recovery and employment." It is deplorable that human rights are violated and racial discrimination is still prevalent in South Africa and Namibia. Harsh laws enforcing this modern version of slavery are ruthlessly applied. Black workers are deprived of their human rights and suffer unemployment and poverty. The theme of the Director-General's Report will achieve its purpose only when apartheid is abolished. Black workers' human rights are regain and secure employment is achieved.

Black workers in South Africa and Namibia who fight against this vile apartheid system are arrested without just cause, detained for long periods and murdered or executed without trial. In the face of such atrocities, I feel strong anger and indignation against the apartheid regimes of South Africa, and Namibia. It is atrocious that more than 90 Black people are executed every year in those countries and I extend my condolences to the families of the victims. I strongly urge that those detained without cause should be freed immediately.

The new labour relations Amendment Act promulgated in South Africa in October is a bad law, aiming at suppressing trade union rights. We demand comprehensive revision of this law which aims at increasing pressure on labour unions in South Africa.

I hope this law will be revised completely at the intergovernmental meeting to be held in August. I hope that the attempt to revise the law will achieve success.

The ICFTUAPRO, to which I belong, invited the representative of NACTU to its 14th Assembly held in Bangkok last August, where he spoke against apartheid. The meeting adopted unanimously a resolution calling on Asian governments to impose strong economic sanctions and calling on multinational corporation in Asia trading with South Africa to discontinue such trade.

Labour unions in Japan are deeply concerned about the degree of economic relations between South Africa and Japan. We have taken every opportunity to urge the Government of Japan to take effective measures including economic sanctions, against South Africa. We have asked for this many times. We also requested the Prime Minister of Japan to take up the issue of South Africa at the Ottawa Summit, held on 18 June 1988.

It is most regrettable that some sections of our Government, society and industry are unwilling to take a firm stance on economic self-restraint towards South Africa, but nonetheless since last year the flow of trade between Japan and South Africa has begun to slow down. Four major electric power companies of Japan have agreed to discontinue imports of South African uranium. The Government has also agreed to address the issue of coal and oil exports, which have been the subject of discussion between my trade union and the Government.

Last year, we organised rallies and demonstrations against apartheid. We are also conducting fund-raising campaigns. Although we do not have a South African embassy, since there are no diplomatic relations as such between Japan and South Africa, we have a South African consulate in Japan and have delivered strong protests to this consulate. We have sent telegrams to Mr. Botha expressing our protest and denunciations against apartheid on several occasions. We are determined to continue our firm action against apartheid, based on the conclusions reached by the Committee this year.

Lastly, I would like to report to the Conference that we have established the International Labour Foundation in May this year with donations from trade union organisations affiliated with Jptuc-Rengo – the Japanese Private Sector Trade Union Confederation – for the purpose of strengthening co-operation and exchanges with trade unions and showing solidarity with the workers of the world. The foundation will contribute to assistance for co-operation development. The Japanese trade union movement and this newly established foundation will closely co-ordinate action with each other and will strengthen co-operation with trade unions in Asia, Africa and other countries.

Original – Russian: Mr. YURGENS (Workers' adviser, USSR) – Speaking at the 76th Session of the Conference on behalf of the Soviet workers on the burning problem of apartheid, I would like to express satisfaction and optimism on the one hand, but a certain pessimism and disappointment, on the other. Our optimism is based on the fact that in December last year an agreement was reached on the regularisation of the situation in south-west Africa, providing a real opportunity for Namibia to achieve full independence. We cannot fail to point out the constructive part played, and still being played by the Governments of the USSR, the United States, Cuba and Angola. We should like to take this opportunity to call on all member States of the ILO to give the greatest possible support to the people of Namibia in setting up a new democratic State. Our optimism is also based on the fact that solidarity with those struggling for independence and freedom in South Africa is not at all weakening, as some would like it to, but is extending throughout the world. This has been clearly shown in the work of the Committee on Action against Apartheid at this session of the Conference.

The international community is understanding increasingly clearly the fact that the racist policy of Pretoria and the shameful system of apartheid is not only the main source of acute conflict in Southern Africa, but a threat to security world-wide. The International Labour Organisation continues to make a significant contribution to the fight against apartheid, as is evidenced by the Special Report on the application of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia submitted by the Director-General to this session of the Conference. We also take a positive view of the fact that the special report gives us information about what the ILO has done in this respect. We have to emphasise the international importance of the two conferences held in Harare, the programme of proposals to assist Namibia after its independence, and the extension of technical assistance programmes to southern Africa, including those carried out within the framework of the Turin Centre. However, the organisation itself has not done everything it could.

We cannot overlook the fact that there is still the problem of the Union Bank of Switzerland, and the failure to undertake a study on the gold trade, as well as other issues. This brings us to the pessimistic part of my statement. As we all know, terror and gross violations of trade union and human rights in South Africa continue to occur daily. Another daily occurrence is the failure to give effect to, or breach of, the sanctions which we have been repeatedly calling for for 25 years now, in 25 reports. I won't repeat the details here.

Our energetic and spirited Workers' Vice-Chairman of the Committee, comrade Mercier, presented glaring instances of such violations to the Committee itself, and previous speakers have outlined even more glaring facts. In view of this, we can say that despite the position taken by a number of governments and employers' organisations, only compulsory and comprehensive sanctions are capable of putting an end to the inhuman system of apartheid. The international trade union movement will continue its struggle to this end.

Coming back to the activities of the ILO, I, like other speakers, would like to urge the Director-General to set up a group of independent experts to verify the application of the measures adopted, if possible before the Governing Body completes its work.

Finally, I would like to express the warmest support of the Soviet workers for the nomination of Nelson Mandela for the Nobel Peace Prize.

Allow me to conclude my statement in the words of a great American, Martin Luther King, who knew more than anyone else what racism and segregation really meant. I would like to quote him in his own language. "This is no time to engage in the luxury of cooling off or to take the tranquilising drug of gradualism. Now is the time to make real the promises of democracy."

Mrs. FOULKES (Workers' delegate, New Zealand) – Thank you, Mr. President, for the opportunity given to me to speak on behalf of the workers of New Zealand in support of the report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid.

This is the 25th occasion that the Special Committee against Apartheid has met to discuss the actions the constituent members of the ILO should undertake to ensure the end of the abhorrent form of administration that flourishes in southern Africa. New Zealand workers have consistently participated in the debate of the Conference and in the battle against apartheid within New Zealand and internationally. New Zealand has now withdrawn from almost all direct contracts with South Africa – political, cultural, sporting and economic. Action now within New Zealand is against the indirect support of apartheid that is shown through the transnational corporations that still work within New Zealand although not trading directly from New Zealand to South Africa.

I speak in this debate because I agree with the contentions in the conclusions of the Committee. The measures endorsed by the Conference last year would be sufficient to end the apartheid system if they were applied equitably by the participants of this Conference. It is obvious from the interventions made today by both brother Mercier and our African brothers that the system has in fact strengthened its activity against the Black majority in the past year. I shall not repeat the list of outrages, but I do ask: How can there be such unanimity at this Conference and so little action taken by some parties at the Conference between our meetings?

The call of the Committee on Action against Apartheid is to exchange words for action, and the emphasis of the conclusions is on action by member delegations – government, workers, employers – throughout the coming year. Essential measures to be taken include the sanctions with respect to coal, oil, gold and finance. Sanctions with respect to these four strategic commodities would critically, and possibly mortally, wound the Pretoria Government.

These moves must be made this year, and they cannot be made in the small States alone. Sanctions by New Zealand can be seen as almost irrelevant in the face of the actions of the major industrial nations and the oil-exporting countries who continue to fuel the South African economy, both figuratively and literally.

In taking action, we must look in particular at the role of the multinational corporations in the avoidance of sanctions, and in this area all countries can play a role.

At this Conference and during the year we must give our support to the front-line States in their solidarity with the people of South Africa. The call in the conclusions for financial commitment to the AFRI-CA Fund is a call we should all heed as the African States continue to bear the brunt of the world opposition to apartheid.

Turning to the ILO itself, the conclusions include several recommendations with which I concur and which I endorse. To promptly set up a group of three independent experts to monitor and evaluate progress made and to work on activities within the ILO against apartheid. To improve and to review the questionnaire on the implementation or non-implementation of the Declaration, its appended Programme of Action and the recommendations of the Conference by member States and to ensure that the responses to next year's questionnaire allow us to more adequately advise next year's Conference on the work done by member States. And, finally, to take action on the issue of the Union Bank of Switzerland. On this last issue, it appears ludicrous to me that for 25 years we have debated the inhumanity of apartheid on the need for solidarity actions within this Conference hall, whilst we continue to allow an organisation which is actively supporting South Africa to operate within this building.

Finally, I would like to turn to the reservations already raised by certain countries and employers. I note that these countries and employers are among the most prosperous in the world and the most powerful. Many are among the most vocal on human and individual rights, and I challenge them to review their decision to ignore the call by the majority of African organisations to impose mandatory sanctions in order to end the apartheid regime.

In closing, I would like to place on record the support of the New Zealand workers for the conclusions of the Committee and for the request that the report be endorsed unanimously by the Conference to give the clearest possible message to the regime in South Africa that the international community will not allow their activities to continue.

I also support the recommendations regarding Nelson Mandela, the release of detainees and the removal of restriction on those that have already been released.

Mr. CHARLTON (Workers' adviser, United States) – First, I congratulate you on your election as President of this august body, and especially this important sitting on the abhorrent system of apartheid, and on your important role in the struggle for independence in your own country, Zimbabwe, a decade ago.

In May 1944, 45 years ago, the International Labour Organisation issued its declaration of aims and purposes in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, the birthplace of the American Constitution. It is worth quoting here today in part: "The Conference reaffirms the fundamental principles on which the Organisation is based and, in particular, that ... labour is not a commodity ... [and that] freedom of expression and of association are essential to sustained progress" These words are as relevant today as they were then. Although nearly half a century has passed since these important objectives were stated, today there remain far too many countries of the world where workers are denied these basic human rights. South Africa is such an example. Almost three years ago, we in the AFL-CIO upheld the passage of the United States Comprehensive Anti-Apartheid Act. However, today the sweetness of that victory has turned sour. What we had hoped would be a temporary pressure tactic to force to South African Government to abandon its policy of Black disenfranchisement has not eliminated apartheid. Yes, apartheid is alive. The South African Government and its supporters would have us believe that apartheid is dead. Reforms are in place and changes are taking place. But every time we turn the corner of change and expect to see a ray of hope, we encounter another darkened alley. A gauntlet of apartheid which is a physical, moral and psychological threat to us all. If reforms mean the introduction of more draconian labour legislation, then regressive reform has taken place. If change means that the conservative party is now the official opposition, then regressive changes have taken place. If reform means the reintroduction of petty apartheid laws, then real reform is dead. If change means a new State President who promises that the majority rule will never occur, then concrete change is dead and apartheid is still alive.

We cannot reform apartheid. Apartheid is like an apple that is rotten to the core. You may slice away some of the rot, you may peel that apple, but it is still a rotten apple. You cannot reform it. You must change it. You must replace it. That is apartheid. The AFL-CIO does not pretend to have the answer to the complex problems of South Africa, nor would we be so presumptuous as to offer one. The answer to South Africa's problems can only be found internally, with the full participation of all people and organisations who profess to have the best interests of South Africa at heart.

The measure of our support will continue to be dictated by the express needs, positions and resolutions of the trade union movement. Mandatory and comprehensive sanctions are only one example of this position, along with vigilant monitoring to ensure compliance.

We would continue to call for the strongest measures. We will maintain this strategy until our South African brothers and sisters call on us to abandon it. We will continue to heed their voices – those voices which are saying no to apartheid; no to a tomorrow which resembles today. But yes to sanctions when it means a new tomorrow and a new beginning.

The recommendations of the Committee strongly reflect the position of the trade union brothers and sisters in South Africa. The AFL-CIO programme is a multi-faceted programme. As an affiliate of the ICFTU, we continue to actively participate in the ICFTU Co-ordinating Committee on Southern Africa. Our contribution to that Committee and to the Committee's programmes for South Africa's broad-based effort to co-ordinate, assist and promote trade unionism which can stand against the onslaught of apartheid, which tries to conceal, weaken and emasculate free, democratic and independent trade unionism. Internationally, we are actively involved in the various international secretariats.

I mentioned those, not to promote the AFL-CIO and its affiliates who are involved in all these activities, but to accentuate the breadth of the problem, the diversity of the needs and the recognition that a multi-faceted approach – flexible in nature, capable of responding – is the only cause of action that can satisfy the moral needs of our brothers and sisters in South Africa. We, like other developed countries, have a trade union history, experience, expertise, structures and methodologies that we are prepared to share in order to bring about a better world.

In the last year, significant developments have occurred in Namibia that have escalated the opportunity for peace that hopefully will lead to a government chosen by the majority of citizens of Namibia. That effort could not have taken place without the intervention, very positively, of the USSR, Cuba and the United States, and we commend them on their efforts.

The AFL-CIO stands resolute in its support for the implementation and both the letter and the spirit of United Nations Security Council resolution 435. We call on the South African Government to unconditionally release Mr. Nelson Mandela.

In closing, I am confident that the report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid, under consideration today, will be adopted unanimously by this body.

The American trade union delegation and the majority of the people in the United States support the concept for which this document stands, and will therefore vote for it.

The intent and the strength of the measures called for by the AFL-CIO are not punitive, but an effort to bring the South African Government to face the reality that apartheid must end. To this end, we have chosen peaceful, economic intervention by supporting in full the report of the Committee, because we recognise in the words of the great American slavery abolitionist, Frederick Douglass, that power concedes nothing without demand – it never did and it never will.

Mr. DRZEWICKI (Workers' adviser, Poland) – Mr. President, I should like to join the preceding speakers in congratulating you and the Vice-Presidents on the election to your distinguished posts at this session of the International Labour Conference.

I have a great honour to take the floor at the plenary, on behalf of the Polish trade union Solidarnosc, for the first time since 1981 when our leader, Lech Walesa, addressed the International Labour Conference. I have been requested by him to convey to the ILO our profound appreciation for not having been forgotten here and for its persistent stand in defence of our right to exist.

I would like to declare solemnly that the trade union Solidarnosc entirely supports the struggle of our sisters and brothers in South Africa and Namibia against apartheid. We are increasingly concerned by the continued severe repressions of COSATU, NACTU and other independent Black trade unions. Solidarnosc understands all these organisations and their programmes. Our experience shows that trade unionism cannot remain indifferent to a wider background of political and structural impediments to its existence and development. There are no genuine trade union rights without human rights as a whole, since they all constitute an indivisible and interdependent set of principles.

This is the universal message of the Declaration of Philadelphia and of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

Following with attention the developments in South Africa and Namibia, we find that our experience is of relevance to the situation of trade unions there. The total onslaught on all political democratic opposition forces the trade unions of South Africa to address the problem of their work in the widest structural context possible. Apartheid permeates the whole field of industrial relations.

We support the vigorous campaign launched by COSATU and NACTU against the new Labour Relations Amendment Act (LRAA). The restrictive and punitive nature of the Act undermines the universally accepted concepts of acquired rights and their dynamic character.

It should be clearly stated that the promotion by the South African Government of racially constituted unions at the expense of non-racial unions and the abridgement of the right to strike manifestly runs counter to the fundamental principles and standards of the ILO.

Furthermore, since the adoption of the Labour Relations Amendment Act, the new powers vested in the industrial court and in a new labour appeal court give rise to serious concern. A distinction between "unfair" and to "unlawful" labour conduct will require a thorough re-examination, to guarantee the basic rights to trade unionists.

As part of our support to South Africa, we must do much more on the practical level. In this context, Solidarnosc will be informing our members and sympathisers that immigration by Poles to South Africa – regrettably, quite an increasing trend – constitutes support to the White minority and reduces job opportunities of the Black workers who are already suffering unemployment. This is not an easy task for us, when many Poles are offered residence and labour permits in South Africa more generously than in other countries. But we will undertake a campaign to make any potential Polish immigrants fully aware of all consequential effects.

We fully appreciate the fact that the struggle of Black workers for basic human rights is not an ideological struggle. It is a fight for existence, survival, self-deterioration, the right to development and all principles that the ILO upholds. We have clearly seen for ourselves that peaceful and non-violent methods of struggle for independent trade unionism lead authorities to understand that inalienable human rights are not granted as a gift of the State, but that they are an inherent part of human dignity and the social needs of all individuals.

What we observe world-wide is that the desire for democracy and freedom is becoming increasingly stronger. Autocratic regimes – of whatever ideological leanings – have no future, and, even less so, apartheid South Africa.

All political and social systems can be reformed; but the experience of the French Revolution shows that some of them have started to be reformed far too late. We recognise that apartheid cannot be reformed; it must be abolished.

In this context, we are sure that the beginning of the end of apartheid is in sight.

The trade union I represent here bears the name of Solidarnosc. It is an ideal we uphold as a moral imperative and it determines our attitude towards the concerns and needs of other people; those living today and future generations. The fight for democracy and human rights cannot only be carried out on the home front; it must be waged for others, not only in words but also in deeds. The sense of solidarity extends therefore to all human beings subjected to immoral rejection by large sectors of the human community. There should be no human rights outsiders, and the ILO has much to do in this respect.

Solidarnosc fully subscribes to the conclusions of the Committee on Apartheid and supports the adoption of the report, together with its conclusions.

To conclude, I would like to refer to what our leader, Lech Walesa, said recently in the Council of Europe; to the effect that: Solidarnosc is moving neither to the left nor to the right, neither to the East nor to the West, but it is moving forward, towards the future peaceful and just social order.

Let us all move forward together to abolish apartheid!

Mr. TAPIOLA (Workers' delegate, Finland) – I should like to speak briefly in favour of and plead for the unanimous adoption of the report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid and, in so doing, I would wish to make three points.

Firstly, the way in which we are going to deal with this report naturally will send a signal to the international community in general, and the regime of South Africa in particular.

The deliberations in the Committee were serious and, despite some difficulties, they were constructive. We state in this report that we have to be more specific in the future, both in reporting on the implementation – or, even more difficult, the non-implementation – of our Programme of Action. At the same time, we have to focus on certain target areas.

At this stage, any abstentions, let alone votes against, would naturally be interpreted by the South African regime as a signal that the action we envisage and our discussions are not really to be taken seriously.

In the Nordic countries we have taken the question of sanctions seriously, including industrial action to stop trade with South Africa, so that at least our formal trade links are severed. But the world of international trade and international business is far from being transparent and the repulsive action of different dealers and middlemen only becomes easier when major partners of South Africa refuse to efficiently join in and draw the practical conclusions from the political consensus that we already have on, or rather against, the apartheid system.

It would seem to me that, in addition to now focusing on the special target areas which are mentioned in the report, we have to continue to educate ourselves and develop our own mental attitude.

I should just like to make one observation on behalf of most workers, as consumers, in the area that I come from – the Nordic area: I think we would quite instinctively refuse to buy South African products off the shelves of supermarkets, even if those products were there. For me to do so as long as the apartheid system continues, would be equivalent to buying drugs from a dealer down a murky alley: and I think that this is the way that we should increasingly start viewing this situation.

Second, the conclusions highlight the problem that disinvestment by multinational enterprises is not always real. In fact, it seems that it is becoming increasingly a mere camouflage. As I pointed out already earlier in the Committee, for multinationals to exercise effective control, direct involvement in terms of ownership or capital is no longer necessary. Control over technology, international marketing, licensing arrangements and so on are increasingly important and they can be fully used to circumvent the intention of the Programme of Action. This is why we have to get much more, and much more precise, information on the different forms of linkages multinationals have with South Africa, also after their formal withdrawal from the country.

Third and finally, we have stated resolutely in our recommendations and conclusions what needs to be done regarding Namibia. We should assure our Namibian sisters and brothers that we are holding our breath and sincerely hope that the independence process can be successfully concluded. Our role now and after independence is to help fully in the nation-building that a free and democratic Namibia will undertake, including the strengthening of the institutions, particularly trade unions and employers' organisations, which – of course on the basis of the Namibians' own free choice – are indispensable for future development and progress.

In concluding, I wish to thank all of my colleagues on the Committee for the experience of working together on this important issue.

Original – French: Mr. NZISABIRA (Government delegate, Burundi) – Speaking on behalf of the African group to which my country, Burundi, belongs, I should like to congratulate and warmly thank the Chairman of the Committee on Action against Apartheid, Mr. Ndoye, Minister of the Public Service and Labour of Senegal, the Officers and members of the Committee, as well as the secretariat, for the important work they have done, which has just been submitted to the Conference in the form of its excellent report.

The conclusions of the report faithfully reflect the debates in the Committee, and the resulting recommendations are very realistic.

The application of these recommendations will depend on the conviction as to the crimes of apartheid and the willingness of each member State of the ILO to contribute to the effort of the international community to bring about the speedy eradication of this scourge, which threatens millions of human lives.

The Committee has quite correctly stated that despite the efforts made for some years by the various peace- and freedom-loving nations and the ILO to ensure respect for human rights in South Africa and Namibia, no real and tangible progress has been noted as regards the abolition of the abhorrent system of apartheid.

The so-called reforms undertaken in South Africa are merely ways of justifying apartheid used by the South African authorities and are designed purely to enable them to conceal their crimes against the Black population.

The many facts outlined in the Special Report of the Director-General on the Application of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia show that the Pretoria Government continues to use force to hold down the Black populations struggling to recover their freedom.

The discussions in the Committee stressed that international action against apartheid has been marked by apathy for some time, and that some member States of our Organisation confine to paying lip service to such action themselves.

As the Committee stated, it is time for the ILO, our Governments, and our employers' and workers' organisations to give a new impetus to the struggle against apartheid through concrete measures, some of which are suggested in the recommendations of the report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid.

The African countries fully support the conclusions and the recommendations of the report, which entirely reflect the resolutions on the situation in South Africa and Namibia adopted at the meeting of the Labour Commission of the Organisation of African Unity held in Bujumbura, the capital of my country, from 29 March to 4 April this year.

The resolutions of the OAU Labour Commission call for the unconditional release of all political prisoners, including Nelson Mandela, and of all those detained without trial, the removal of banning measures on liberation movements the lifting of the state of emergency, the imposition of compulsory and comprehensive sanctions, and the repeal of the Labour Relations Act.

The Labour Commission of the OUA also supports the efforts of the Secretary-General of the United Nations aimed at ensuring the application of Security Council resolution 435 on the independence of Namibia.

In welcoming ILO action against apartheid, Mr. President, I should like to ask you to allow me to invite the Conference to unanimously adopt the report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid.

Original - Arabic: Mr. ABDULGHANI (representative of Palestine) - In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! Allow me to offer you the greetings of the Federation of Workers of Palestine and to thank you for giving me the floor. I compliment you, Mr. President, on your competence which has gained you this very well-deserved election. Furthermore, you belong to a country which has long been active in its struggle for freedom and against apartheid, even after becoming independent, as a member of a front-line State, which opposes the racist regime of Pretoria.

On the basis of our common struggle against colonialism, Zionism and racism, we have great hopes in the efforts made by this Conference to reach satisfactory results.

It is with great interest that we have read the Special Report of the Director-General on the application of the Declaration concerning action against apartheid in South Africa and Namibia. We have also taken part in the work of the Committee Against Apartheid and we made comments on the report and the action taken by the governments and employers' and workers' organisations mentioned therein.

At the end of its work, the Committee succeeded in adopting important conclusions which reflected the views of all those present. It was particularly concerned at the increasing diversification of South African capital abroad and the lack of investments in the front-line States. The Committee reiterated its appeal to governments to boycott the South African Government, impose effective financial sanctions, sever air links and bring about an embargo on South African coal.

There is no doubt that the preparations that went into the Special Report of the Director-General are worthy of our respect and our gratitude, although some of the information given is not credible because it was provided by the apartheid regime. However, we can only praise the efforts made by the Committee against Apartheid and its Chairman, and the Chairmen of the Workers' and Employers' groups, which resulted in the conclusions reached by the Committee. We totally support these conclusions and express our full solidarity with our brothers and sisters struggling in South Africa and Namibia.

In order to bear witness to our solidarity, we must strongly denounce those who are accomplices of the racist regime of Pretoria, although they claim to boycott it. On this point, I should like to inform you of the Bulletin of the Israeli Ministry of Foreign Affairs, No. 3, of 1989. It quotes a statement by the South African Minister of Foreign Affairs on relations between Pretoria and Tel-Aviv. He is reported as saying that he believes there is a vast difference between what we believe is happening and what is actually happening between our two countries. Furthermore, he is of the opinion that we have many feelings in common and that many of us are in a situation with no options.

The same Bulletin notes that Bishop Desmond Tutu spoke to a group of Jewish Americans. He is reported as saying that the Black population in South Africa cannot understand that a people with such a history as the Jews could possibly allow the Israeli Government to have relations with the Government of South Africa, to co-operate with it in the fields of nuclear energy and security and to provide the necessary means to the South African Government to enable it to continue its uprising. He went on to say that he failed to understand how the Jews could co-operate with a Government whose majority of members sympathised with the Nazis and for a long time refused to allow Jews into their party.

In another statement, Bishop Tutu said words to the effect that if we changed the names around, everything happening in the Gaza Strip and West Bank could apply to South Africa.

Similarly the Bulletin of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, No. 2, of 1969, reported the following. First, it seems that recently the Kour Company, which belongs to the Histadrut, lent more than 80 million dollars to four banks in South Africa. Some of these loans were pledged after Israel had already announced its intention to impose sanctions on South Africa and the Histadrut had announced for the fourth time that it was going to stop trade with south Africa.

Second, the Israeli newspaper, The Jerusalem Post, of 3 March 1989, stated that it had discovered that the Kour Company was still continuing to administer a branch office in Johannesburg named IFTRA.

Third, the Emie Holdings of South Africa has built a wearing mill in Israel which is named Emie Limited and administered by Mr. Yevram, who is also chairman of the Emie Holdings Company in South Africa. It is evident that for many years, the products of this company have been traded throughout the world by Israel after their trademarks and certificates of origin have been changed.

Fourth, the reports show that the Tadiron company, a subsidiary of the Kour Company, which has specialised in electronics, has opened offices in Johannesburg and is helping to set up an electronics industry in South Africa. At the beginning of 1987 Israel acknowledged for the first time that it had sold a vast amount of military and technical equipment to the racist regime of South Africa to the sum of hundreds of millions of dollars per year.

Fifth, the Israeli Government invited a team of cameramen from the television of the South African Government to make a publicity film on tourist attractions in Israel. Filming started in March 1989.

Sixth, the South African Airlines recently sponsored a golf tournament in Ceasaria in Israel for the Revedin Trophy. The winners of this trophy received free air tickets to South Africa.

Seventh, there has been a twinning of towns in South Africa and Israel, such as Durban and Eilat, Haifa and Capetown, Ashkelon and Port Elizabeth and between the Erbil kibbutz and Bicho, the capital of the "homeland" of Ciskei.

Several days ago, Professor Israel Chahak, Chairman of the League of Human Rights in Israel, spoke before the National Press Club in Washington. He pointed out that the Black citizens in South Africa could go from Soweto to Johannesburg but that the citizens in the Gaza Strip could not leave this area without the agreement of the Israeli Army. He said that Israel was not South Africa – it was worse.

These are only a few examples among many of the relations between the two racist regimes of Pretoria and Tel Aviv. But we are sure that the freedom soon to come about in Namibia will be the beginning of the end of apartheid in South Africa.

May the people struggling for their freedom win.

Mr. AHMED (Workers' delegate, Pakistan) – It is an honour for me to speak on behalf of the Workers' delegation of Pakistan before this august body. I also take the opportunity to associate myself with the earlier speakers who have taken the opportunity to speak on a very vital subject which concerns the whole of mankind. Apartheid is a crime against the whole of mankind and is a violation of all principles laid down in the ILO Constitution, the Philadelphia Declaration and the United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights. But still this crime is being committed in South Africa and Namibia, and the people struggling in South Africa and Namibia deserve the support of all freedom-loving people all over the world.

We know that this is a legacy of colonialism, and the peoples of Africa and Latin America and Asia have broken the chains of colonialism and achieved independence. Those still victim of this suffering in South Africa and Namibia are bound to succeed.

We also take the opportunity to express our appreciation for the work done by the Chairman of this Committee, from Senegal, the distinguished spokesman of the Workers' group, brother Mercier, the other Vice-Chairman of the group and the distinguished members of the Committee, in particular the Workers' group, who have stressed the need to eliminate this suffering.

The report spotlights the atrocities being committed against the people of South Africa. As the Director-General's Special Report also shows, discrimination under the Labour Relations Act, punitive action for strikes, and victimisation are practiced against the people of South Africa; and we also appreciate that the Director-General and the Office is lending support to the liberation movement and we stress that this support should continue to be strengthened, not only in this country but also in the trade unions as well as in the front-line States who are helping the people of South Africa and Namibia. We fully share the concern of the struggling people of these countries and we have no diplomatic, cultural or any trade relations with South Africa and what has been stressed the strict implementation of economic sanctions against this regime need to be examined in regard to those countries who are still have trade and economic relations with the racist regime of South Africa. We assure our continuous support to the struggling people of South Africa and Namibia and hope they will be able to achieve independence and eliminate this crime from the face of mankind.

(The Conference adjourned at 12.45 p.m.)

Thirtieth Sitting

Thursday, 22 June 1989, 3 p.m.

President: Mr. Nkomo

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON ACTION AGAINST APARTHEID: DISCUSSION (concl.) AND ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT – We shall continue our discussion on the report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid.

Mr. OLUMIDE (Government delegate, Nigeria) – I would like to associate myself with those who have spoken previously in congratulating the President on his well-deserved election to the presidency of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. I also wish to congratulate the Committee on Action against Apartheid and its Chairman, Mr. Ndoye, Minister of Labour of Senegal, on their excellent work which is amply demonstrated by the important conclusions that emerged at the end of their deliberations.

Apartheid is an abhorrent system which evokes the condemnation of all well-meaning and civilised peoples of the world. This Conference is taking place at a time when the struggle against apartheid has reached a crucial stage. The racist regime is facing a retreat as it suffers reverses on all fronts. The Director-General's Special Report on Apartheid has once more given an in-depth but pathetic account of the outrageous faces of the apartheid regime in South Africa. I congratulate the Director-General and his staff on their brilliant exposé of the current conditions in South Africa. In spite of the universal condemnation of apartheid, the regime has not relented in its oppression and dehumanisation of the Black population of South Africa. The intransigence of the right-wing White Movement undermines negotiated settlements and aggravates violence. Nigeria condemns in its entirety the Labour Relations Amendment Act recently promulgated by the racist regime. This obnoxious Act infringes the trade union rights of Black workers and seeks to perpetuate apartheid. The racist regime has even resorted to more stringent measures to curb popular protests by detaining union leaders and vandalising union premises.

It should be noted that the obnoxious system of apartheid cannot be reformed. It has to be dismantled root and branch. The Report of the Director-General has rightly pointed out that the Blacks in South Africa are still constantly being harassed, and those clamped into detention under the repressive regime reached an unprecedented number of 32,000 in August 1988. In the midst of all this deprivation, the problem of unemployment amongst the Blacks is growing worse.

Nigeria believes that only sanctions can bring down the apartheid regime of South Africa. While it is true that some sanctions have been adopted, we note with dismay as indicated in the Report of the Director-General that "no significant new sanctions were announced by South Africa's major trading partners".

Indeed, there were signs that the rate of disinvestment by foreign companies was slowing down. This development is highly regrettable and does not augur well for the oppressed Blacks of South Africa. The argument by some Western countries that the imposition of sanctions would lead to the worsening of the conditions of the Blacks is spurious and, therefore, unacceptable. These countries merely put their own immediate economic gains above the welfare of Black workers of South Africa. We therefore deplore the attitude of governments that maintain close political, economic, military, cultural, diplomatic and sporting links with South Africa.

We also believe that the imposition of comprehensive and mandatory sanctions against South Africa should be closely monitored, as this will, to a large extent, accelerate the ultimate dismantling of the apartheid regime.

In spite of her economic difficulties, Nigeria is totally committed to the freedom of the Black people of South Africa. In this connection, it has continued to give material, financial and moral support to the Liberation movements and the front-line States. Nigeria has also offered scholarships to Black South Africans and Namibians to study in Nigerian educational institutions. As Chairman of the United Nations Special Committee against Apartheid, Nigeria is in the forefront, championing along with others the cause of liberation of the Black majority in South Africa.

However, it must be admitted that recent developments in Namibia have raised the hopes of the oppressed peoples of southern Africa. Nigeria has been following, with interest, the unfolding events culminating in the signing of the December 1988 agreement in New York for the independence of Namibia. We are, however, concerned that the racist regime is scheming in various ways to frustrate the implementation of the United Nations Security Council resolution 435 on Namibia's independence. There are disturbing reports of mischievous attempts by the rulers of apartheid in South Africa to pervertly influence momentous developments in Namibia in their favour. We call on the United Nations Transition Assistance Group in Namibia to ensure that the transition programme is successfully and faithfully implemented despite the machinations of the racist regime.

We condemn the killing of 300 Namibian refugees in April 1989 by the occupation troops of South Africa. We however note with satisfaction the current efforts being made by the United Nations representative in Namibia for the repatriation of over 41,000 SWAPO refugees from Angola and Mozambique to Namibia. ALL SWAPO freedom-fighters based in the front-line States should be allowed to return to Namibia with minimum delay so that they can fully participate in the forthcoming November elections.

Permit me to pay glowing tribute to those countries outside the continent of Africa and other miscellaneous organisations that have contributed immensely towards the campaign against apartheid. We salute the Nordic countries for their courage in their consistent condemnation of apartheid and support for the struggle against the obnoxious system. We also commend the positive steps taken by some multinational corporations to withdraw voluntarily from the racist enclave, bereft, of course, of corporate camouflage.

Finally, we salute the courage, determination and doggedness of the Black people of South Africa. We commend the Black workers for organising themselves into viable trade unions to fight for and protect the interests of their members. We urge them to step up the struggle until the final devastating blow is delivered on the apartheid structure in racist South Africa.

Original - Arabic: Mr. HUSSAIN (Government delegate, Iraq) - In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! On the occasion of the debate concerning the report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid, I have the honour to address the International Labour Conference once again on behalf of the tripartite Arab group consisting of Government, Employers' and Workers' representatives. I should like to begin by congratulating Mr. Ndoye, the Minister of Labour of Senegal, for his wisdom in guiding the Committee's work, which has led to a certain number of positive conclusions conducive to strengthening the efforts of our Organisation to combat apartheid in South Africa and Namibia.

We shall state frankly that we are beginning to doubt the effectiveness of the recommendations and measures adopted by this Conference since the 1964 Declaration and its subsequent updating. We have observed, on the basis of the Committee's reports, that the eradication of the apartheid regime in South Africa remains a distant goal owing to the fact that certain Western countries continue to place their interests and profits before the blood, sweat and tears of the people of South Africa.

In the Arab world, we have committed ourselves, and will always commit ourselves, to carrying out the decisions of the Conference in respect of apartheid, and we can assure you that the Committee's annual conclusions receive all due attention in every part of the Arab world. Our solidarity with the workers and people of South Africa is a long-standing principle and we consider that a total and compulsory boycott covering every area of activity is the only way to deal with the racist apartheid regime, the elimination of which is an international duty and a moral obligation. Apartheid is a scourge for mankind. Nobody can remain indifferent to the suffering caused by racial discrimination and its dire consequences on the lives of those who live under its immoral precepts. This is particularly intolerable in an age when human rights and fundamental freedoms have been given paramount importance.

Arab solidarity with the African States is a well established foundation and linchpin of Afro-Arab relations. The Permanent Commission for Afro-Arab Co-operation, which met in Kuwait earlier this week, has confirmed this long-standing solidarity by supporting continued efforts to combat and eradicate apartheid. There is really no need to further underscore the action undertaken by the Arab world on behalf of the peoples of southern Africa, and the various types of support and technical assistance extended by Arab nations to these peoples and to their liberation movements to enable them to resist the barbarous practices and policies of the apartheid regime.

The Arab countries will continue to support the struggle of the peoples of southern Africa to attain independence and to put an end to the practice of apartheid. Accordingly, all resolutions adopted by this Conference will be fully applied by the Arab world, and we consider that what is stated in paragraph 68, subparagraph 6, of the Committee's report, is the very minimum position which can be adopted towards this regime, which is already doomed to disappearance.

The Arab world shares the suffering of the people of South Africa because this suffering is similar to that borne by the Palestinian people in the face of the injustice, violence and aggression perpetrated by the Israeli occupation regime, which entertains relations of close co-operation with the South African regime in a joint effort to strengthen their foundations which have been shaken by the resistance and determination of the people of Palestine and South Africa.

A comparison between the practices of the Pretoria regime towards the workers and peoples of South Africa and Namibia and the inhuman and repressive practices perpetrated by the Israeli occupation authorities against the Arab peoples of Palestine could not do more to confirm that the philosophies of both regimes spring from the same source and are inspired by the same concept; namely, the most abject form of racism, in an era which has resolutely discarded all forms of racism.

We hope that the ILO Committee on Action against Apartheid, the Governing Body and the Committee on Discrimination will in future remain vigilant with respect to nuclear and military co-operation between Israel and South Africa, to its impact on the living and working conditions of the workers and citizens of South Africa, to its consequences on the future and very survival of those people and to the threat it constitutes for the front-line States. This co-operation has been condemned on every occasion by the international community and should therefore be given all due attention by the ILO.

Finally, on behalf of the Arab group, we welcome all the resolutions adopted by the Conference and we pledge to respect them. We hope that they will be followed up by the programmes of action necessary to the eradication of apartheid. We also hope that the recommendations of the Committee will be unanimously adopted and that they will be observed and respected by all the countries and by all the institutions named by the Committee.

Mrs. FRYBORTOVA (representative of the World Federation of Trade Unions) - On behalf of the World Federation of Trade Unions, which represents 214 million workers all over the world, I should like to express the support of our organisation for the conclusions of the Committee on Action against Apartheid and assure you that our Federation and its affiliated organisations will contribute in every possible way towards follow-up actions.

The World Federation of Trade Unions takes this opportunity to reaffirm its strong solidarity with the workers and peoples of southern Africa in their struggle against apartheid. In accordance with the conclusions of the Committee on Action against Apartheid, our organisation has repeatedly called for the immediate and unconditional release of Nelson Mandela and of all other political prisoners. We fully support the proposal that Nelson Mandela should be nominated for the Nobel Peace Prize. At the same time, we firmly demand the immediate lifting of the state of emergency and other oppressive measures and of the ban on democratic organisations inside and outside South Africa, and the cessation of killings and kidnappings of trade union activists.

In the ever-worsening tragic situation in southern Africa, trade unions have stood at the forefront of the struggle for freedom. They have also become the primary target of the outrageous acts of the Pretoria regime. COSATU premises have been bombed and some its leaders detained. The Labour Relations Amendment Act, introduced by the racist regime in collusion with employers, clearly goes against the workers' interests. There is no doubt that these amendments are aimed at emasculating and destroying the trade union movement in South Africa.

However, notwithstanding restrictions and repression, the South African trade union movement continues to show its strength. Industrial action and union membership appears to be on the increase and there is greater co-operation among the trade unions. The WFTU stresses that apartheid is a repulsive and abhorrent system and a challenge to mankind. It is the duty of the international community to combat all the injustices inflicted on millions of men, women and children in South Africa and Namibia.

The hour is late and the world has to be reminded of the continuing horrors being perpetrated by the Pretoria regime.

Despite the unanimous condemnation of the shameful apartheid system, the Pretoria regime turns a deaf ear to the demands of the international community and continues to defy them. Pretoria's attitude is undoubtedly linked to the inability of the international community to impose comprehensive and mandatory sanctions. The assertion that the imposition of comprehensive and mandatory sanctions against South Africa will be detrimental to the Black majority of South Africa and Namibia cannot be maintained and only serves the economic interest of certain Western countries. The collaboration of Western countries with the Pretoria regime is the main obstacle preventing the South African and Namibian workers and peoples from enjoying their inalienable rights. The selective sanctions which have been imposed are unable to exert effective pressure on the Pretoria regime. The banning of camembert cheese from France, computers from the United States, Mercedes cars from the Federal Republic of Germany and many other things from Japan and Britain will not make any difference to the sufferings of the majority of the people. The limited sanctions and half-hearted measures against the Pretoria regime have resulted only in the implementation of more repressive actions against the workers and peoples of South Africa and Namibia. Therefore, our organisation is in full agreement with the appeal of the Committee on Action against Apartheid to governments to bring about an embargo on South African coal and to apply effective financial sanctions.

The coming independence of Namibia in an act of self-determination is a step forward in the march of progress and dignity in Africa at a time when, even in South Africa itself, almost all sectors of the population are becoming increasingly aware of the untenability of the system of apartheid.

This historical turning point in the development of Namibia has been reached as a result of the united patriotic struggle of the Namibian workers and people, led by SWAPO.

International solidarity, which has played an important role in support of the national liberation struggle in Namibia, should now become stronger in order to ensure that the transition process and the implementation of the agreements on the complete withdrawal of Pretoria's troops from Namibia and the establishment of an independent sovereign State of Namibia become accomplished facts. All efforts must be made to defeat the manoeuvre of the racist regime in Pretoria to continue its interference in Namibia's internal affairs. Therefore, the WFTU fully supports the conclusion of the Committee on Action against Apartheid to call upon governments to support the Secretary-General of the United Nations in his efforts to ensure the implementation of Security Council resolution 435.

Far too much blood has been shed, far too many lives lost in the brutal spiral of violence engendered by apartheid. Now is the time for decisive action to eradicate apartheid forever. Therefore, let us unanimously demonstrate our unity in the struggle against apartheid, not only in supporting but in implementing the conclusions of the Committee on Action against Apartheid, and particularly the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia.

In conclusion, I would like to assure you that the WFTU will take an active part in contributing to the eradication of apartheid.

Mr. KACHIMA (Workers' delegate, United Republic of Tanzania) – Since it is my first time to take the floor, may I therefore congratulate you, Mr. President on your election to the presidency of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. My delegation has observed with utmost satisfaction the manner in which you have been conducting the deliberations of this Conference, and it is my sincere conviction that you will guide the Conference to its fruitful conclusion.

As in past years, we have here today a report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid, based on the Special Report of the Director-General on the application of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia.

The very fact that this Conference continues to discuss apartheid is in itself indicative of the continued existence of apartheid – an existence which has been characterised by political fascism, economic exploitation of the majority of the population and social iconoclasm.

The South African racist regime has constantly kept the indigenous population under a reign of terror and coerces them into selling their labour cheaply. To maintain this high degree of exploitation, the regime has at the same time maintained a large force of migrant labour from neighbouring countries. Migrant labour serves to dampen trade union mobilisation and action against the regime.

Apartheid in South Africa is therefore, among other factors, essentially sustained by labour, the nature of which, as I have described above, provides incentives to investors, particularly transnationals, whose primary objective is to look for huge profits which, in racist South Africa, accrue from the scant wages paid to the indigenous working population and migrant workers. Trade union action, up until recently, was less effective in South Africa because the apartheid regime managed to drive a wedge between the working groups. For example there was no concerted action workers from the Bantustans and other areas, between the black workers and the workers of other races, and between the indigenous workers and migrant workers. The regime also managed to exploit the differences between the major unions to its advantage.

However, in recent years there has been a considerable increase in trade union mobilisation and activity against the apartheid regime. The unions in South Africa have realised at long last the imperative of concerted action in the struggle for workers' rights.

Despite the fact that the Pretoria regime is using different means to frustrate the trade unions, such as the promulgation in 1988 of the Labour Relations Amendment Act, the Congress of South African Trade Unions (COSATU) and the National Council of Trade Unions (NACTU) are currently conducting talks aimed at uniting them. My organisation highly appreciates this step and is very enthusiastic about the outcome of such talks.

There are also other developments taking place that are supportive and may contribute to the effective functioning of the trade unions in South Africa. By this I have in mind particularly the decision announced by the Government of Malawi during the 10th Meeting of the Southern African Labour Commission in January this year that it is phasing out labour contracts to South Africa. This is a practical and positive step that should be emulated by other States which have labour contracts with the racist regime.

At this juncture I would like to launch an appeal to the constituent members of the International Labour Organisation to increase their assistance to our brothers and sisters in South Africa and those being contracted out of South Africa. We in the labour movement are particularly concerned with these two aspects of the labour situation inside South Africa and in the neighbouring States.

We should ask what we, in the Southern African Trade Union Co-ordination Council (SATUCC); in the Organisation of African Trade Union (OATUU); in the World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU); in the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU); and in the World Confederation of Labour (WCL) can do individually, severally and collectively to strengthen the unity of action of the trade unions of South Africa. For it is my conviction that our united support for our brothers and sisters in South Africa is the only way we can enhance their strength against apartheid. Uncoordinated support will serve no useful purpose at all.

We should also address ourselves to the inevitable problems linked to the return of the migrant workers. Some concrete plans must be drawn up in collaboration with the relevant authorities to absorb and redeploy the returnees into the national economy.

This is true also for the Namibian situation. Namibia, having been a victim of occupation and apartheid for many years, equally needs our unconditional support in her efforts to overcome the legacy of colonialism and apartheid. But I must hasten to caution that the process of Namibian independence is not complete as yet. The implementation of Security Council resolution 435 did not come about with the willingness and co-operation of the racist regime of South Africa. It came about due to international pressure, and, more significantly, the telling defeat of the South African fascist army suffered in Angola. It is in the light of this, therefore, that the Pretoria regime may still want to influence events in Namibia by disrupting the democratic process, and it would wish to see social groups and state institutions in Namibia that would perpetrate and camouflage its existence in that country.

In conclusion, I would like to commend the Special Report of the Director-General on the application of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia for it has shed some light on some very important areas upon which our actions have been effective and also upon some areas in which we have not fared so well. The Special Report, for example, mentions that the South African economy continues "to limp along, hamstrung by debt, declining fixed investments, and sanctions". But this should not in any way be a cause for complacency on the part of the international community. It should rather be a source of inspiration for continued action. Therefore, I commend the report of the Committee for adoption.

Original – German: Mr. BAIER (Government adviser, Austria) – The Austrian Government delegation approves the report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid in the light of the Austrian Government's policy of rejecting apartheid. We are following events in southern Africa with close attention and concern. The problems of this region within the International Labour Conference are, of course, of great interest to us, above all those concerning workers and employers, which cannot be solved as long as the inhuman, unjust system of apartheid continues to exist.

The Austrian delegation particularly welcomes the Committee's suggestion to strongly urge the South African Government to make a meaningful gesture of good will towards its own people and to the international community by lifting the state of emergency, releasing political and trade union detainees and removing all restrictions on detainees who have been released, in order to enhance the dialogue among all political groups in South Africa on an equal basis and without preconditions.

However, the Austrian delegation wishes to stress that it cannot agree with all the items in the report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid.

Original – French: Mr. ALDER (Government adviser, Switzerland) – The delegation of Switzerland does not wish to oppose the adoption by consensus of the report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid. However, I wish to state clearly that the conclusions contain various recommendations which we cannot endorse and which, moreover, are not within the ILO's terms of reference.

We should therefore have to make certain reservations concerning this text and, if there is a vote, we should not be able to approve it.

This having been said, I wish to recall and strongly emphasise that Switzerland has long ago condemned apartheid. The pursuit of this policy, which can only prolong and aggravate the crisis in South Africa, is intolerable. This is why I wish to stress that, although we diverge as regards the means and ends, we share the objectives of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia, which aims to eliminate apartheid.

Our policy is one of dialogue and positive action a policy favouring amongst other things consultation amongst the parties involved, which is obviously urgently needed, and emphasising positive efforts to aid the underprivileged among South Africa's population, while assisting the region's States within the framework of the Southern African Development Co-ordinating Conference.

There are signs of positive action in Namibia, where an assistance group is being set up by the United Nations for the transitional period. Switzerland is taking an active part in this action by making available a medical unit.

We appeal to the South African Government to take decisions and to make tangible efforts that give us reason to believe that our policy of positive action, is still valid.

Original - Spanish: Mr. CASTRO (Government adviser, Nicaragua) - Mr. President, allow me to associate myself with the distinguished speakers who have already congratulated you from this rostrum.

The Government delegation of Nicaragua listened this morning with great attention and care to the presentation of the Committee's report, which we fully support.

It is our duty to recognise that this report has, in all objectivity, been written with great care and diligence. Its evaluation and analysis of the information obtained from all sources is so convincing that we cannot fail to be concerned about the situation of the numerous people who are victims of the inhuman and criminal system of apartheid.

The Government delegation of Nicaragua cannot consider the matter of apartheid, to which this day has been specifically devoted, merely as a formal and programmed subject for discussion by the Conference. It must condemn most strongly and firmly the inhuman and abhorrent apartheid regime which has become a shame and a disgrace to the civilised world.

We wish to take advantage of addressing this international forum to highlight the fact that certain governments, while giving lip-service to the condemnation of apartheid, actually consolidate the material basis for its existence by trading with South Africa in order to promote their own narrow economic interests, even though this regime has been condemned as being one of the most criminal in the world.

Bearing in mind South Africa's racist policies, which are an affront to all civilised peoples, yet are still supported by certain governments, my delegation launches an appeal to all governments and peoples who believe it to be their duty to respect the inalienable human and societal rights of all men.

We call for the co-ordination and consolidation of effective measures to destroy this monstrous system, for which there can be no justification in our day and age, and we call for its well deserved and inevitable eradication.

Original - Arabic: Mr. MIRO (representative of the International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions) - Mr. President, on behalf of the International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions and on behalf of millions of Arab workers, allow me to offer you our congratulations and to say that we support the conclusions set forth in the report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid. We hope that these conclusions will be adopted so that they may be applied.

On this occasion, we wish to affirm once more the solidarity of our trade union movement with the peoples of South Africa against the apartheid regime and against racial discrimination perpetrated by a White minority and the Pretoria Government.

Here, at this august assembly, we declare our solidarity with these people. This is not the first time that we declare our solidarity with our brothers in their day-by-day struggle in Africa. It is not the first time that we condemn oppression, discrimination and racism and the breaches of human rights in South Africa.

We, too, have to struggle because we are familiar with the sufferings of the peoples of the occupied territories where our Palestinian brothers struggle day by day for their rights. We are conducting the same struggle, and therefore we can fully understand the sufferings of our brothers in South Africa; and we understand very well the effects of racial discrimination and oppression by a wicked occupier.

In the past 40 years and throughout the past 19 months of the "intifadah", we have understood what suffering is on a day-to-day basis and what has to be done to struggle against such regimes. We therefore have common objectives to attain justice, peace and freedom. These are links which join us to workers throughout the world, peoples anxious to achieve peace and justice, peoples who are trying to establish equality amongst men, and who have come amongst us today to declare their solidarity and their concern in the light of what the racist regime of apartheid is doing.

In this connection, our workers, our peoples, hope that there will be a special meeting for the defence of the Palestinian workers, the Lebanese workers and all the Arab workers who suffer daily from discrimination imposed by the Israeli occupation forces.

The Arab workers and their trade union movement are following with concern and regret the position of the African workers. This state of affairs is getting steadily worse. The Pretoria Government is continuing to terrorise the local people, to arrest citizens and to prevent them from exercising their legitimate rights. We therefore know fully well that the road will be a long one before the South African workers achieve their freedom and can enjoy their political, social and human rights.

The Pretoria Government's stubborn refusal to discuss any change and its inhuman attitude cannot last eternally. If this Government has been able to subsist until now, it is simply because other governments, who claim to defend human rights, continue to support this regime. They continue to nourish the economy of that Government and to encourage it in its repressive actions, flying in the face of international decisions. Despite this state of affairs we are certain of the victory of our dear brothers in South Africa, because history has taught us that peoples who fight for their dignity, sovereignty and freedom always win in the end.

That is why we encourage them to continue their struggle until victory is achieved. They should not forget that we, too, are living a very similar experience. We are fighting by throwing stones in occupied Palestine to achieve freedom, despite oppression by the Israeli forces. We are continuing to fight for our basic rights and the right to have an independent Palestinian State. We will continue to struggle to abolish the occupation regime.

Similarly, we support our brothers in Namibia. We appeal that action should be taken to hasten the process of independence in Namibia. We appeal that Namibia be offered all the necessary assistance so that it may occupy the place it deserves in Africa and on the international stage, and the place due to it in international organisations. Let us hope that the Workers', Employers' and Government representatives of Namibia will be able to take their place alongside us at the next session of the International Labour Conference.

Our Confederation and the whole Arab trade union movement here repeats its solidarity and its support for the peoples of South Africa and Namibia. They can count on us and the support of our trade union movement, which has always been available on all occasions, both at the regional and international level.

We take this opportunity to associate ourselves with the Committee on Action against Apartheid and ask the ILO to take the requisite action with a view to putting a stop to the regime of apartheid. We support the nomination of Nelson Mandela for the Nobel Peace Prize and we appeal to various financial and economic and other institutions to suspend any relations they may have with the apartheid system. And we support any action, wherever it may, which is designed to put an end to this deplorable system.

Original – French: Mr. NZOMWITZA (representative of the Organization of African Unity) – Since the adoption in 1964 of its Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa, the ILO has spared no effort to expose the true fact of apartheid. It has done this through its many publications and the meetings it has organised, both here in Geneva and in the front-line States in Africa condemning this worst scourge of our time. And it has also done so through the Special Reports regularly submitted by the Director-General to the sessions of our Conference.

The exchange of views resulting from these meetings and the exhaustive and varied information contained in these reports have contributed positively to alerting world opinion to the abhorrent and monstrous nature of the apartheid system and to the imperative need to combat it by every possible means.

On behalf of the Organization of African Unity, I wish to pay tribute to the International Labour Organisation for its highly commendable work and especially its commitment to continue the struggle until the final victory is won, that is, until the total collapse of the apartheid regime. Notwithstanding the considerable efforts that have been made by the ILO and by most of its member States, as well as by the entire international community, to combat this scourge, unfortunately it continues to exist and dominate, exploit and commit act of violence against the non-White population of South Africa with impunity.

The Special Report submitted by the Director-General to this session, which has been thoroughly studied by the Committee on Action against Apartheid, has clearly exposed the sufferings of the Black population of South Africa, and in particular the workers, trade unionists and students, who have been the most aware and committed of all to the struggle for liberation.

The report makes clear that the current turn of events in South Africa is likely to exacerbate violence, suffering and impoverishment. It goes without saying that it is the non-White population who suffer the most from this deterioration of the situation. This is borne out by the particularly high rate of unemployment, particularly among Blacks, with all the harmful consequences this implies.

Many voices are ceaselessly being raised, both inside and outside South Africa, to denounce the repeated violations of human rights in all aspects of national life in South Africa and Namibia. They call for the lifting of the state of emergency which allows the South African police and armed forces to arrest, torture and even kill people without the slightest justification or control. The state of emergency is nothing other than a declaration of open war against the Black population of South Africa. On this pseudo-legal pretext, the South African racists engage in bloody and blind repression of anyone suspected of showing any sympathy towards the liberation movements and anti-apartheid organisations which have been banned under the evil state of emergency.

Criminal arson, mass destruction of property, deportation, expulsion to the Bantustans, and police provocation of all kinds are the daily lot of trade unionists and anti-apartheid fighters. There can be no doubt that this is new phase of the war that has been waged since apartheid first came into existence by a white minority against millions of Blacks, Asians and persons of mixed race, in the name of alleged superiority of the White race over all other races.

If one takes a closer look, it is easy to see that this war is nothing other than the last desperate throes of the racist Pretoria regime and a sign of its imminent and long-awaited demise. It is a barbaric and horrible war, which extends to the front-line States, where the South African regime supports puppet subversive movements which it has set up and armed with the deliberate intention of destabilising these countries and preventing them from supporting the liberation struggle and furthering their development.

During its discussions, which have been rewarding and fruitful, the Committee on Action against Apartheid has displayed great concern with this situation. It has stressed that, in order to revitalise action against apartheid and send a strong message of indignation to the abhorrent South African regime, targeted campaigns are needed within the overall framework concerted of efforts in pursuance of comprehensive mandatory sanctions.

Lastly, the Committee adopted highly relevant recommendations, which are a valuable contribution to the struggle of the international community to eliminate apartheid. However, the fact remains that, in order to be meaningful, these recommendations must be adequately implemented by everyone, and especially by the main partners of South Africa. We are satisfied to note that these recommendations were adopted by consensus, thus fortunately breaking away from the voting practice which has been in use for some years. Although this was a normal practice, it split the Committee into the – very numerous – advocates of the elimination of apartheid on the one hand, and an active and powerful minority of those who defend the system, on the other.

The recommendations thus lost some of their strength, which often led the Committee to deplore the fact that few measures had been adopted to implement them.

We are therefore extremely satisfied to note that a very important stage has now been reached and that our ILO family is now unanimous, not only as regards the principle of condemning apartheid, but also as to the strategies to combat this scourge.

I should like to congratulate most warmly the Committee on Action against Apartheid, its very dynamic chairman and officers, who have displayed intelligence, tact and skill in achieving these positive and satisfactory results.

The Organisation of African Unity sincerely rejoices at this turn of events, which appears to presage a promising future for the Black population of South Africa and for the international community, which looks forward impatiently to the end of the monstrous system of apartheid.

The Conference will certainly not fail to adopt the recommendations submitted to it, in the same innovative spirit of unanimity which has prevailed in the Committee on Action against Apartheid and which I believe has emerged from all of the statements we have heard this morning and this afternoon.

As the representative of the OAU, I am sincerely delighted to have the privilege of witnessing this development, which is very encouraging and brings us hope.

In this way I will have an encouraging message to take back to the OAU leadership, who will certainly take account of it in their future strategies, especially in this last phase of the dismantling of apartheid.

As everyone knows, the OAU vigorously supports in every way it can the armed struggle of the liberation movements of South Africa and Namibia. It also advocates the imposition and application of comprehensive and mandatory sanctions against the racist South African regime. However, it would be equally willing to undertake negotiations, provided that the parties concerned expressed the wish to do so and displayed their willingness in the form of concrete action devoid of any malicious intent, duplicity or falsehood.

The experience of Zimbabwe and the process now under way in Namibia are models and examples to be followed, as well as a source of inspiration for all who desire peace in South Africa.

For its part, the OAU believes that peace is possible in South Africa, but in order for this peace to be accepted by everyone and to have every chance of succeeding, the policy of apartheid must be renounced.

I should like once again to congratulate the Committee on Action against Apartheid on its work and urge that its recommendations be unanimously adopted by the Conference.

Ms. RUGE (Government delegate, Norway) – I have the honour to speak on behalf of the Nordic countries, Denmark, Finland, Iceland, Sweden, and my own country, Norway.

For a quarter of a century the International Labour Organisation has been dealing with the question of apartheid. We celebrate this anniversary in mourning and condemnation, but not in despair. We mourn all those who have suffered in South Africa and Namibia all these years even to the point of death. We condemn a system that deprives the majority of South Africa's population of their basic human rights, rights that we in our part of the world see as self-evident. However, we shall not give in to defeatism and despair. Those who suffer need our support now more than ever.

The Government of South Africa has just decided to prolong the state of emergency in order to be able to continue to suppress any opposition to the regime. In the same way, that Government last year implemented the Labour Relations Amendment Act, in clear violation of the workers' right to negotiate and strike and in disregard of protests from all over the world. Thus, we have to continue to put pressure on the Government of South Africa for the dismantling of apartheid. The Nordic countries will continue to call for comprehensive and mandatory sanctions against South Africa to be adopted by the Security Council as the best means to secure the abolition of apartheid by peaceful means.

As long as this is not possible, the Nordic Governments will call on other governments to introduce national measures against South Africa. This does not mean that we are in favour of sanctions per se. We see sanctions as an evil, and we have no desire to hurt South Africa or its people. But we hate the system of apartheid. The Government of South Africa has shown no willingness to listen to reason. Therefore, as we see it, it is only by increasing the pressure on the South African Government that we can hope for a peaceful dismantling of apartheid.

The Nordic countries would like to stress also the need for positive measures: by supporting the forces opposing apartheid inside South Africa, by humanitarian assistance to South African refugees and by development assistance to the front-line States in order to reduce their dependence upon South Africa.

In this regard, we welcome the Director-General's 25th Special Report on the Application of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia. The information given and the studies made of the impact of apartheid on labour and social matters are of great value in our national efforts to fight apartheid and support the victims of that inhuman system.

We do believe, however, that the report can become even better. Thus, we welcome the call made this year by the Committee on Action against Apartheid to change the questionnaire to make it more specific. The Nordic governments also welcome the decision to appoint a group of three independent experts by the end of this month and would urge the group to undertake a revision of the questionnaire as a matter of high priority.

The Nordic countries likewise welcome the concrete and specific manner in which the Committee on Action against Apartheid has approached the question of following up last year's updated Declaration and Programme of Action. This pragmatic and concrete approach could have a far greater impact on the fight against apartheid than sweeping statements with no possibility of being put into practice.

Therefore, while the Nordic governments last year had to make a couple of reservations, we see no need for that this year. We would also like to appeal to other governments to study this year's proposals carefully and seek to implement them. Concerted action in the areas mentioned in the Committee's conclusions could have far-reaching positive impact.

At the outset I underlined the need not to give in to despair. The emergence of Namibia's independence is a sign of hope. Our governments welcome the agreements that resulted in the possibility of starting the transitional process for the independence of Namibia. We join the call upon governments to support the Secretary-General of the United Nations in his efforts to ensure the implementation of Security Council resolution 435.

Furthermore our governments support the appeal to all constituent Members and to the ILO itself to give the maximum support and assistance to the people of Namibia in order to promote the emergence of a strong democratic nation.

Our governments have established a working group among themselves to identify possible areas where the Nordic countries could offer assistance to the future Namibian Government.

While we are at the threshold of a new Namibia without apartheid, we may still have a long way to go before the same can be said for South Africa. However, we appeal to the new leadership who will govern South Africa after the forthcoming elections to seriously consider talks with the representative leaders in that country to start dismantling the appalling system of apartheid and to lift the ban on the African National Congress (ANC) and on other organisations.

In June 1964 the Pretoria Supreme Court sentenced Nelson Mandela and five others to life imprisonment for conspiring against the State. We call on the South African Government to release Nelson Mandela and all other political and trade union prisoners as a sign of goodwill. Only through negotiations can that country be saved from a blood-bath. The Government will have to take the first step to its willingness.

Time is running out. How many more times do we have to appeal for justice and reason? A strong, unified stand against apartheid from this forum may be of great importance in the future development for not only South Africa but for the whole region of southern Africa.

The PRESIDENT – I wish to thank Mrs. Ruge, who spoke on behalf of the Nordic countries, and may I say on behalf of the Conference, that we wish to express our profound appreciation for the exemplary and collective stance the Nordic countries have always adopted.

Original – Russian: Mr. OZADOVSKI (Government delegate, Ukrainian SSR) – As regards this question of ILO action against apartheid my delegation would make the point first of all that the elimination of apartheid has a particularly topical ring at this time. In our world of rapid change, where common sense, goodwill and readiness to compromise have already led to some lessening in international tensions, a reduction in the threat of nuclear war and some progress in settling regional conflicts, new opportunities to settle the knotty problems of southern Africa are also opening up.

Today, at last, there is a new hope for the peaceful settlement of a conflict of many years standing, involving directly or indirectly ten countries with a total population of over 90 million. Clearly the new trends in political thinking are beginning to reach this corner of the world as well. Over a relatively short period the efforts of the whole international community have achieved substantial progress towards stopping armed confrontation in south-west Africa. The machinery now exists to monitor observance of the cease-fire between South Africa and Angola. A date has been set to start implementing Security Council resolution 435 dealing with Namibian independence. These are all most welcome steps towards improving the situation in southern Africa.

My delegation is firmly convinced that the southern African crisis can be overcome only by a root-and-branch elimination of racist totalitarianism and the adoption of democratic government. The total abolition of apartheid can alone overcome the internal contradictions inherent in the system, but it is equally essential for settling the overall political problems of southern Africa, strengthening certain welcome trends already emerging there and ensuring international security, which can never be lasting if it is constantly threatened by regional conflagrations.

The ILO has played a part of no little importance in boosting an international effort to curb apartheid. The ILO is a body which possesses the necessary authority and potential to do this. My delegation welcomes and fully supports the steps taken by the ILO in this direction, especially the appeals made at previous sessions of the Conference that all member States take the necessary action in support of United Nations action against apartheid by introducing comprehensive, mandatory sanctions under Chapter 7 of the United Nations Charter. In a word, we are in favour of stepping up ILO action against apartheid on the basis of the revised Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia.

This would add weight to the collective endeavours of people of goodwill to stamp out the threat to international security in southern Africa. In this connection, we support the setting up of a group of independent experts to observe and monitor the application of sanctions and other measures directed against the apartheid regime in South Africa.

The Ukrainian SSR over many years has actively participated in action by the United Nations, the ILO and other international organisations to eliminate apartheid, especially in the work of the Special Committee against Apartheid and the Intergovernmental Group to Monitor the Supply of Oil and Petroleum Products to South Africa.

We wish to collaborate closely and actively with all members of the international community to eradicate all remnants of colonialism and racism from the political map of Africa in the near future.

Original – Spanish: Mr. ARTACHO CASTELLANO (Government delegate, Spain; speaking of behalf of the European Community) – Allow to speak on behalf of the 12 members of the European Community. The report by the Committee on Action against Apartheid was approved by the Committee by consensus. The Workers', Employers' and Government delegations have given proof of the spirit of compromise which has made it possible to reach agreement reflecting the universal condemnation of apartheid by the whole international community.

As we have stated on repeated occasions, apartheid for us is a flagrant breach of basic human rights as set forth in the United Nations Charter and in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights subscribed to by the 12 countries of the European Economic Community. Our position is quite clear: the system of apartheid, including Bantustans, must be totally dismantled if it is to be replaced by a society that is non-racist and democratic through full and free exercise of universal suffrage for the whole population in a South Africa which would guarantee all persons freedom and justice.

As is stressed in the Special Report by the Director-General on the Application of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia, the position in southern Africa has got steadily worse since the declaration of the state of emergency in 1986.

On 12 June in Luxembourg, the Ministers of Foreign Affairs of the Twelve approved a communiqué in which the Twelve deplored the decision of the South African Government in prolonging the state of emergency, and expressed their profound concern that this prolongation may be an obstacle to the creation of the necessary atmosphere for a solution of the problems of South Africa. The Twelve deplored that the South African Government has not responded to the repeated appeals by the Twelve for the lifting of the state of emergency. Consequently, they urged the South African government again to put an end to its policy of oppression and to release all political prisoners, including Nelson Mandela, to remove its restrictions on anti-apartheid organisations, to lift the state of emergency and initiate national dialogue leading to the abolition of the system of apartheid.

The member States of the European Economic Community are convinced that international pressure is necessary and important to induce the South African Government to put an end to its policy of apartheid. In accordance with this aim, the Twelve have maintained a full application of the restrictive action agreed on by their Ministers in September 1985 and September 1986.

The European Community as such also attaches the greatest importance to the implementation of positive action to benefit the victims of apartheid, as manifested in the community programme set up to support bilateral programmes organised by member States and, in particular, as regards humanitarian and social assistance and educational and trade union aid. As regards the trade union aspect of these matters, we wish to reiterate our support for the Black trade union movement which plays a very important part in promoting political change in South Africa. The Twelve are against any breaches of the workers' rights and would firmly oppose any action which would reverse the progress made by the Black workers these past few years.

The European Community and its member States continue to offer substantial aid to the member countries of the Southern African Development Co-ordination Conference, and recognise the important part played by the International Labour Office in this field.

As regards Namibia, the position of the Community is governed by United Nations Security Council resolution 435 and the specific rules applied by the United Nations Transition Assistance Group to facilitate the transition towards independence in Namibia which will follow the Programme of Action and the Declaration against Apartheid. In this respect, the Community warmly welcomes the terms of paragraphs 7 and 8 of the conclusions which amongst other things invite Members of the ILO to give every support possible to the people of Namibia with a view to the setting up of a strong and democratic nation.

In relation to the report and conclusions of the Special Committee against Apartheid, the Twelve wish to make the following comments. The report contains many ideas which the Twelve are ready to share or examine. Nevertheless, as in past years, a certain number of conclusions reached by the Committee go beyond the terms of reference of the ILO. The Twelve accordingly have certain reservations about some aspects of the conclusions and recommendations made in the report. As regards certain basic questions, the fact that no member State of the Community requests a vote must not be interpreted as a change of attitude.

The position of the Community and of its member States on the question of sanctions is well known and is unchanged.

As regards the matter raised in paragraph 6(a) of the reduction of the level of our diplomatic representation in Pretoria, the Twelve point out that an action of this kind would result in a reduction of their capacity to influence the South African authorities as well as direct talks with and support to those groups which are in favour of a political change.

As regards the call for disinvestment, we wish to emphasise the positive aspects of the implementation of the Code of Conduct of the European Community which is continually being revised and brought up to date and which will strongly contribute to the elimination of the social consequences of apartheid.

As regards the group of three independent experts provided for in paragraph 6(k), in accordance with the recommendation submitted at the 75th Session of the Conference, the Twelve think that the terms of reference of this group should be laid down more clearly, carefully avoiding any duplication of effort with other bodies of a similar kind.

Original – Chinese: Mr. WANG (Workers' delegate, China) – We have listened carefully to the report by Mr. Ndoeye on the work of the Committee on Action against Apartheid. We subscribe to the report and suggest the Conference adopts the conclusions made by the Committee.

We note with pleasure that the situation is becoming less strained in southern Africa. United Nations Security Council resolution 435 on the independence of Namibia began to be implemented as from 1 April this year. This marks the beginning of the independence process of Namibia, the last colony on the African continent, which has been under the illegal occupation of the South African authorities for over 70 years. This is the result of the protracted struggle waged by the Namibian people under the leadership of the South West Africa People's Organisation (SWAPO). It must also be attributed to the vigorous assistance of the workers and people of the African countries, especially the southern African front-line States, as well as the profound sympathy and the extensive support by the international community. At the same time, we are soberly aware that the South African authorities will not resign themselves to defeat. Right now, they are trying by various means to undermine the free and fair elections to be held in Namibia, in an attempt to prevent SWAPO, which has the support of the people, from winning the elections.

For example, they have some non-Namibians, even men from the South African armed forces, registered as voters and they carry out unbridled persecution of Namibians who support SWAPO. This is an adverse trend in the independence process of Namibia that warrants great attention and vigilance by the international community and public opinion, and should be exposed and stopped.

We have also noted some changes within South Africa. Since coming to power, Botha, a stubborn supporter of racism, redoubled his efforts to pursue the policy of apartheid internally, while launching repeated armed aggressions against the neighbouring countries, resulting in prolonged instability in the whole of southern Africa. This has naturally aroused the condemnation and opposition of all the people, countries and international organisations which uphold justice. The newly elected President of the South African Nationalist Party, de Klerk, expressed such a view in the Parliament, saying the White rule should end so as to build a new South Africa without domination for one race over another; a new Constitution should be enacted to allow the full participation of all races in management and sharing of power by all races through consultation. But as a Chinese proverb goes: "listen to what he says but see what he does." We are rather disturbed to see that to date there have been no substantive changes in the policy of racial discrimination in South Africa. Leaders of the Black nationalist movement and trade union leaders are still suffering persecution, the innocent Blacks struggling for racial equality are still being arrested and murdered, and the vast number of Black workers remain under brutal exploitation and suppression. We demand that the South African authorities adopt a realistic approach, change their wrongful policies quickly and match their words with deeds in earnest, because the wheel of history cannot be turned back and the historical trend to eliminate this evil system cannot be reversed.

The Chinese workers and trade unions have always shown profound sympathy with and firm support for the South African workers and people in their struggle against racial discrimination and for racial equality. We are confident that all countries and peoples upholding justice and opposing the apartheid system will take all kinds of action in various fields to actively fight against the apartheid system in order to thoroughly isolate the South African authorities diplomatically and to carry out comprehensive and mandatory economic sanctions against South Africa, including arms and oil embargoes. We highly appreciate the tremendous contributions made by African countries, especially the front-line States, to the liberation cause of southern African peoples and resolutely support their unrelenting efforts to safeguard their national security and territorial integrity.

The International Labour Conference adopts a report against the South African apartheid system every year and the ILO also makes efforts to that end. However, we note with regret that every year, the Government and the Employers' delegates of a few countries fail to carry out their due commitments on the question of apartheid. It is our hope that the ILO, which works for the promotion of social justice, will continue with its efforts to take effective measures to co-ordinate its member States and give resolute, moral, political and material support to South African workers and people.

We are confident that so long as the South African workers and people strengthen their unity and persist in their struggle, they will surely be able to overcome the hardships and obstacles on the way forward and finally eliminate the evil apartheid system.

Mr. BERAN (Workers' adviser, Czechoslovakia) – First of all I should like to point out that this year's session of the International Labour Conference is taking place in rather a different context to the previous one, due to a change in the situation in southern Africa. A very significant event has taken place in the time which has elapsed since our last meeting. Very important steps were taken for granting independence to Namibia, the last colony in Africa held by the racist regime of apartheid of the Republic of South Africa.

The signing of agreements on a peaceful settlement of the situation in South-West Africa and the final decolonisation of Namibia raised realistic hopes that after long years of struggle, the people of Namibia would soon be free of the yoke of racist oppression forced upon them by South Africa.

On this occasion, I should like to reiterate our full solidarity with the just struggle of the Namibian people under the leadership of the South West Africa People's Organisation (SWAPO), for the successful implementation of concluded agreements and of United Nations Security Council resolution 435, as well as for the democratic elections held in November. We underline that the final solution of the difficulties in Southern Africa is impossible without the elimination of the regime of apartheid.

We do not believe that the South African racist regime is giving up its endeavours to control the situation in the south of the African continent.

The support of the Republic of South Africa and its encouragement of destabilisation in neighbouring sovereign countries will continue unless all international forces unite and call for the consistent implementation of the agreements that were adopted under the auspices of the United Nations.

This is why we lend our full support to the resolute struggle of the South African workers and people; the struggle against force and repression, for union and civil rights, for freedom and democracy. Along with many other workers all over the world, we express our full solidarity with their just struggle.

Finally, we agree with the report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid and we shall fully support its conclusions and recommendations.

Original – Russian: Mr. TSYBA (Government delegate, USSR) – Our meeting today, held to adopt the report by the Committee on Action against Apartheid, is taking place at a time when positive developments are occurring at the international level, which will inevitably have an effect on the problems and the fate of the long-suffering peoples of southern Africa.

At the end of last year, we witnessed the successful conclusion of talks on a settlement in South-West Africa. A major step forward was taken towards the long-awaited independence of Namibia. This became possible thanks to free and equal talks between all participants, who displayed political realism, understanding and will to reach mutually acceptable decisions based on the balance of interests of those involved. In the progress made we see the trend towards doing away with the sources of tension in the world: yet another manifestation of the new political thinking which the Soviet Union has consistently championed.

Any progress towards a comprehensive settlement in southern Africa depends to a great extent on the co-ordinated efforts of all active opponents of apartheid and racism, all peace-loving peoples' movements and international organisations. The logical culmination of such efforts would be the establishment of trust and co-operation in this part of the world.

The international community is now faced with the important task of carrying to its conclusion the process of Namibian decolonisation which has already begun, without allowing it to drag on or, still less, break down. Success will depend on how strictly the parties involved in the decolonisation of Namibia abide by their obligations under the agreements on a settlement in South-West Africa under Security Council resolution 435 and subsequent resolutions on Namibia.

A political settlement involves the elimination of the inhuman system of apartheid. It is apartheid which is the basic cause of the bitter conflict in this part of the world. To settle the matter with all possible speed, a constructive approach and collective efforts by governments and social forces are now essential. We are deeply convinced that the eradication of racism is an international task for all mankind. We firmly support the demands for a speedy end to this inhuman system of apartheid, this crime against humanity, for the creation of a free and democratic State in South Africa.

The African governments will always find the Soviet Union a steadfast supporter of the creation in Africa of the atmosphere of peace, stability and security which is so necessary for their economic and social development.

The Soviet Union values highly its friendly relations with the front-line States. These relations have evolved over years of co-operation and my country continues to give these countries assistance of various kinds. In 1987 alone, the scope of bilateral economic and technical assistance by the Soviet Union to the front-line States amounted to 418 million roubles, something like 670 million dollars. The Soviet Union offers help in giving effect to some 70 bilateral projects in Africa, in various sectors of the economy.

The overall interest-free contribution made by the USSR to the AFRICA Fund represents more than 100 million dollars. I should also say that in December 1988 the Soviet Government decided to offer additional assistance to the People's Organisation of South-West Africa (SWAPO).

We think it is very good that our Organisation should be stepping up its action against apartheid and we fully support the report and conclusions of the Committee.

Our support for the anti-racist forces remains unchanged. Today, when the South African Government of Pretoria is dropping hints about the possibility of dismantling apartheid, the world community has a duty to demand immediate steps in this direction. We join the African peoples in calling for the immediate release of Nelson Mandela and other political detainees in South Africa. The international campaign against racist policies must be continued, an embargo must be imposed on arms delivery and effective sanctions must be implemented in accordance with the resolutions of the United Nations and our Organisation.

The Soviet Union is ready to contribute to producing an international atmosphere conducive to the solution by political means of the internal and international conflicts in Africa. It will continue to help cement the unity of the African States and reinforce and extend co-operation amongst the countries of that continent.

Original – German: Mr. LAMPRECHT (Workers' adviser, German Democratic Republic) – One week ago, we commemorated the thirteenth anniversary of the day on which the racist South African police killed 600 people because the schoolchildren of Soweto peacefully protested against the introduction of Afrikaans into the curriculum of local schools.

Ever since, all peace-loving peoples have celebrated 16 June as Soweto Day – a day in remembrance to protest against apartheid, when they declare their solidarity with the peoples of South Africa.

For 25 million Black South Africans, nothing has changed since then. In spite of the fact that the regime has often promised reforms, the great majority of the population are living in conditions unworthy of human beings. The most basic human rights have been trodden underfoot and there are gross breaches of basic trade union and democratic rights.

This state of affairs is emphasised in the Special Report of the Director-General on the application of the declaration on action against apartheid in South Africa and Namibia. The report also stresses how necessary it is that the ILO and its members should step up efforts to do away with apartheid.

This year, the Committee on Action against Apartheid has once again done a capital job and my organisation fully supports the report now before us with its conclusions concerning South Africa and Namibia.

The report clearly shows that during the period under review there has been a noticeable worsening in living and working conditions in South Africa. It points out that systematic and flagrant breaches of human and trade union rights are of daily occurrence in this country.

There can be no doubt, and experience has proved this, that apartheid is a serious threat to international peace and security.

In view of the fact that the situation has become dramatically worse for employees and their unions, that sincere patriots are being increasingly hounded – especially trade union officials – that the economic and social conditions of workers have deteriorated and, above all, that there has been a murder campaign against all those who speak up for progress, we support the report's demand that the sanctions decided on against South Africa be put into effect. The transnational undertakings which continue to make gigantic profits in South Africa should be aware that every dollar of profit is stained by the sweat and blood of a people deprived of their rights. Hence we demand respect for the declaration and programme of action adopted by the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference.

The monitoring decided on should be used to accuse, in the Director-General's Report, all those countries and undertakings which fail to comply with the programme of action. However, one thing is clear; we cannot reform apartheid. We must destroy it root and branch. This is why we attach such importance to the conclusions in point 6(b), because they spell out specific sanctions.

The settlement to bring about the independence of the Namibian people is the outcome of efforts made by all progressive forces throughout the world.

The Namibian people, led by SWAPO, are hoping for the development of their country and of Africa, in conditions of peace and safety for all States in this region, and for the elimination of apartheid. The Committee's report makes it clear that the ILO can also help in making these hopes a reality.

Allow me to use this rostrum to assure the trade unions of South Africa and Namibia of our undying solidarity in their just battle for a free, democratic and non-racial South Africa and Namibia.

We join with them in their cause to eliminate apartheid, and ensure the release of Nelson Mandela and other imprisoned patriots. My organisation supports the proposal that Nelson Mandela, a South African patriot, should be nominated for the Nobel Peace Prize.

I can only associate myself with the appeal of former speakers to support the report and conclusions of the Committee.

Original - French: Mr. DEMBA (Workers' delegate, Namibia) - I should like to associate myself with all the speakers who have preceded me in congratulating you on your brilliant election to the presidency of this distinguished assembly.

This is an excellent opportunity to express, on behalf of my delegation, our satisfaction and gratitude to His Excellency, Mr. Ndoeye, Minister of Labour, Senegal, Mr. Hernandez, Employers' delegate, Philippines, and Mr. Mercier, Workers' delegate, Canada, who have been respectively the Chairman and the two Vice-Chairmen of the Committee on Apartheid. There is no doubt at all that it is thanks to their determination and their wise guidance that it has been possible for the Committee to reach successful conclusions.

I should also like, on behalf of my delegation, to thank the ILO Staff Union for all the efforts it has made to combat apartheid. My delegation expresses its gratitude to the ILO Staff Union and urges it to continue its campaign against the continued use of the services of the Union Bank of Switzerland.

The delegation of Namibia would like to express its appreciation of the work of the Committee on Action against Apartheid and support its recommendations with regard to the application of resolution 435 of the United Nations Security Council as regards Namibia and ILO technical co-operation with post-apartheid Namibia.

In view of the fact that Namibia will shortly gain its independence, there may be need for adjustments in the ILO programme.

My delegation would like to take this opportunity to provide the Conference with information on the latest developments in Namibia. Reports from Namibia indicate that despite certain difficulties which arose at the beginning of the implementation of the plan for the independence of Namibia under resolution 435 of the United Nations Security Council, there does not seem to be any delay in the implementation of this programme. Under the auspices of the United Nations, elections will take place in November 1989 for the members of the Constituent Assembly which will adopt the Constitution of independent Namibia.

So far as trade action is concerned, the major event has been the establishment, in March 1989, of the National Union of Primary School Teachers as the sixth member of the National Union of Namibian Workers. We are informed that it has 7,000 members. In addition, before a commission of inquiry into labour matters appointed by South Africa, Namibia has steadfastly refused to adapt South African labour law to conditions in independent Namibia. The unions have stressed that labour legislation needs to be reviewed without reference to South African legislation extended to Namibia during the period of South African colonial rule.

Another development of direct relevance to the ILO has been the opening of the Office of the United Nations Special Representative under the terms of Security Council resolution 435. This has helped United Nations specialised agencies, NGOs and individuals to obtain information on all aspects of economic and social conditions in Namibia today.

In these circumstances, the ILO might be encouraged to take action to establish itself more firmly in Namibia with a view to evaluating ongoing technical assistance activities and preparing the ground for labour programmes which will require particular attention in post-apartheid Namibia. The ILO's role in assisting all the social partners in independent Namibia to eliminate the evils of the past is very important. The ILO will undoubtedly be continuing its technical co-operation activities for the benefit of the people and trade unions of Namibia. Provision has been made in the ILO Programme and Budget for 1990 and 1991 for a review of law and practice in the broad context of an independent Namibia.

To conclude, on behalf of my delegation, I should like to thank the Director-General of the ILO for the excellent information and documents provided on the subject of apartheid and Namibia.

Mr. TEFERI (Workers' delegate, Ethiopia) - I would like first of all to congratulate you, Mr. President, on your unanimous election to the presidency of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference and express my full confidence that your broad experience and able manner will bring this Conference to a successful conclusion.

I would also like to congratulate the Director-General of the ILO for the detailed and comprehensive Special Report presented on the application of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia.

The Report has updated our knowledge of the present situation in southern Africa and has enlightened us on the continued atrocities of the racist Pretoria regime against the peoples and workers of the southern part of the African continent.

As you are all aware, the Special Report of the Director-General clearly indicates that not much has improved in the situation prevailing in South Africa in spite of the maximum pressures exerted on the Pretoria regime from the international community to put an end to its repressive policies.

The racist regime of South Africa, defiant of world public opinion, has further increased its violence and heavy repression against the people. The state of emergency declared three years back is still in force, and the people are suffering under inhuman repressive measures in their struggle to oppose apartheid. The regime has refused to release political detainees and the sufferings and impoverishment of the people have continued.

The Black population of South Africa is still shouldering the heavy burden of repressive machinery, rampant unemployment and other social injustices; the trade unions of South Africa are facing severe repression, their political activities are highly restricted and their leaders perpetually harassed. Labour activities have suffered a number of setbacks.

Furthermore, the greater power given to the police, the military and the employers has exacerbated the repressive activities against trade union movements in southern Africa. However, the courageous struggle of trade unions in South Africa, pressing the regime to find immediate solutions to issues of vital concern to the Black working population, is highly admirable.

The atrocities that the peoples and workers of southern Africa are suffering under the obnoxious policies of the racist regime of Pretoria are well known to all of us.

The 75th Session of the International Labour Conference and several other meetings held concerning this same issue have discussed the grave situation in South Africa and Namibia. Several proposals and ways and means of alleviating the problems of southern African people have been formulated at these gatherings. We are meeting again this year to discuss the same problems because the situation does not seem to change and the several proposals and resolutions adopted do not seem to be effectively implemented. The people and workers are still languishing under similar repressive measures as in previous years.

We have repeatedly affirmed that effective implementation of recommendations and resolutions passed by international organisations such as the ILO would bring about the desired changes in the policies of South Africa. But it is sad to say that these resolutions and recommendations have not been implemented effectively and in good faith by some of the parties concerned.

In particular, the recommended comprehensive mandatory sanctions, which we believed would have brought concrete results, failed to achieve their objectives because they were not effectively implemented by the governments concerned.

The action taken against apartheid by the United Nations, the ILO and other specialised agencies of the United Nations has been highly encouraging. Moreover, the all-round action taken by the ILO, urging and mobilising governments and employers' and workers' organisations of member States to combat the evils of apartheid, as well as its continuing technical co-operation activities, are highly commendable.

While commending the activities undertaken by the ILO in this regard, I would like to state that the ILO should further strengthen its programme of action in, and put more pressures on, the tripartite organisations of member States to effectively implement resolutions adopted by the ILO against apartheid in the southern part of our continent.

The decisions of the Seventh African Regional Conference of the ILO, held in Harare in December 1988, reaffirming the need for effective sanctions against South Africa and intensifying the assistance of the ILO to national liberation movements, Black workers and trade union movements in South Africa, are an immense contribution to the struggle the people and the workers of southern Africa are waging.

We therefore once again urge the ILO to further enhance its efforts to strongly press member States and organisations for effective action against apartheid.

We, the Ethiopian workers, while hailing the courageous struggle of the workers and peoples of South Africa and Namibia, reaffirm our unwavering solidarity with them on their journey to complete independence and freedom.

Finally, I commend the report presented by the Committee on Action against Apartheid, and request the Conference to adopt it unanimously.

Original – German: Mr. NOACK (Government delegate, German Democratic Republic) – One year after the adoption of the updated Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia and the related programme of action, the Committee on Action against Apartheid has produced its first assessment of the effect given to these documents. It can be seen that the great majority of members, including the German Democratic Republic, have given effect to the provisions of the documents of 1988. However, it is again evident that governments and undertakings of certain countries, countries with a high economic potential, do not comply with ILO decisions. Quite the contrary, they are maintaining relations with the racist Government of South Africa or even expanding them. They bear some responsibility for the absence of progress in eliminating apartheid in South Africa. We might ask these governments and undertakings how they stand as regards respect for the most basic human rights.

The updated Declaration and Programme of Action are documents which meet the requirements of the times and make an effective contribution to the establishment of a democratic, non-racist South Africa. The point is that all Members of the Organisation must act, without ifs, ands or buts, in accordance with the spirit and letter of these documents. This year's conclusions now before us have rightly been drawn up with this in mind.

The conclusions emphasise those steps mentioned in the Declaration and Programme of Action which seem especially necessary. First and foremost, of course, the full and immediate application of the sanctions mentioned in paragraph 6 (b) of the conclusions – an embargo on South African coal, financial sanctions, an oil embargo and an effective severance of all air links. At the same time, effect must be given to provisions stipulating the withdrawal of investments in South Africa. Only if this entire set of measures is taken will the racist regime finally be brought to its knees.

In this connection, a decisive role will be played by the supervisory machinery; that is, the independent monitoring group and the ILO questionnaire on the topics indicated for the submission of annual reports. No country must be exempt from such monitoring and nobody must be allowed to evade the responsibilities he has assumed in the ILO.

My delegation supports the appeal made to member States and to the ILO, to give the maximum support and assistance to the people of Namibia on its peaceful path to independence and self-determination. We feel that the relevant ILO projects for the benefit of Namibia should be stepped up.

The German Democratic Republic has always taken a stand in favour of an end to apartheid and to the aggressions and conflicts it engenders, and in favour of peaceful development of southern Africa. In future, too, we shall stand steadfastly by the peoples of southern Africa.

In view of this policy of principle adapted by my Government, my delegation fully supports the report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid and the conclusions contained therein. We thank the Committee, and particularly its Chairman, Mr. Ndoye, for the work they have done.

Mr. KERN (Government adviser, United States) – This year, my Government joins the consensus on the Report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid. We do so with certain reservations which were mentioned in the Committee on Apartheid. As we said, we are concerned about sanctions, disinvestments and diplomatic relations.

With respect to Namibia, I would supplement the record by recognising the important contribution of African nations and African diplomacy to the independence process. African diplomacy is and will continue to be an important factor in bringing about the peaceful end of apartheid in South Africa.

My Government's unalterable opposition to apartheid and the necessity for its demise has been a constant factor in our foreign policy objectives towards South Africa. The issue for the United States never has been one of "where do we stand?". Six American Presidents representing our two major political parties over the past 25 years have made it clear where Americans stand on apartheid. The abolition of apartheid has always been our objective and remains a precondition to normalisation of South Africa's relations with the United States.

In the United States, the issue has always been "what can we do to help bring about the end of apartheid and the emergence of a constitutional system which will guarantee equal political rights and equal economic and social opportunity for all South Africans?". In 1963, we were the first of South Africa's major trading partners to embargo the sale of military equipment to that country. Also, our comprehensive Anti-Apartheid Act, as detailed in our report, imposes the most severe set of restrictions of any of South Africa's major trading partners.

While sanctions have sent a clear signal of American opposition to apartheid, it is important that the United States and other nations remain active in South Africa to promote change. Our assistance programmes aid the victims of apartheid in areas such as legal assistance, trade unions, education, community development and are designed to enhance Black political leverage. In essence, Black empowerment is essential to the peaceful elimination of apartheid and to the establishment of an equitable democratic non-racial society.

As the Special Report of the Director-General on the application of the Declaration concerning action against apartheid in South Africa and Namibia points out, infringements and in many cases denial of basic human rights and trade unions rights continue in South Africa. While the South African Government has made some progress in recent years in ending various forms of petty apartheid, such as a Separate Amenities Act, job reservations and the pass laws, the cornerstones of apartheid, such as the Population Registration Act and the Group Areas Act, remain on the books, and the freedom of speech, assembly and association is routinely denied to government opponents. In this environment of grudging and painfully slow change, it is understandable why various individuals and institutions call for sanctions. We have thus far opposed the expansion of mandatory sanctions as called for in the Declaration and in the programme of action because we believe that the effect of such sanctions is to deprive us of leverage, of influence and of the ability to press for change.

It has been our active presence in South Africa which has enabled our embassy officials, including our ambassador, to make frequent appearance at the trials of anti-apartheid activists, to monitor trials such as that of trade unionists, Moses Mayekiso and to intercede on behalf of the Sharpeville Six. With respect to Mr. Mayekiso's exoneration of subversion, sedition, and treason charges, we hope the South African Government will now accept the legitimacy of peaceful protest.

It is precisely because of our presence in South Africa and our commitment to end apartheid that Archbishop Desmond Tutu, Reverend Bozak and Reverend Nauri, in a recent visit with President Bush, asked the President to take the moral leadership in starting negotiations between Whites and Blacks in South Africa. President Bush, in turn, expressed his intention to be a catalyst for change and to use American pressure, influence and leverage to bring about justice and equality in South Africa.

There appears to be a realisation on the part of the South African Government that the current system of governance cannot continue and that a new system of governance cannot be instituted without the active participation of the Black majority. The Black majority, through its trade unions, community organisations and its tenacious drive for freedom and equality, has already demonstrated its ability to influence the White minority. However, within the Black community, there also seems to be a growing realisation that the White power structure will not collapse in the foreseeable future as a result of direct assaults on the existing power structure.

These realities and the prospects for a new generation of Afrikaaner leadership allow some measure of hope that negotiations leading to a peaceful democratic solution for South Africa might now be possible. South Africa is in a period of transition and possibly a historic moment in its history. We cannot predict if this opportunity, like so many others before it, will be squandered by the ruling establishment. However, we have an obligation to remain engaged in South Africa and to use our presence there to encourage all parties towards the imperatives of dialogue, negotiations and compromise.

Original – Spanish: Mr. BONMATI PORTILLO (Workers' adviser, Spain) – My address to this assembly is on behalf of the Spanish workers, first of all to express our support for the adoption by the Conference of the report and conclusions of the Committee on Action against Apartheid.

In our opinion, it is impossible for us to understand how anybody in any group of this Conference could oppose this report and these conclusions unless they have to defend hidden interests which give them cause to be against the recommendations that have been put before the Conference by the Committee on Action against Apartheid.

In our opinion, there is nothing that could possibly justify the continuation and increase in trade with South Africa which throughout its history has demonstrated that its regime is something that nobody can possibly accept.

I wish to very strongly criticise the members of the European Community as individual countries as well as a community.

The relations between the Community and South Africa in global terms not only have not declined – they have even increased. To cite an example, if I take only trade in coal, more than 50 per cent of South Africa's total coal exports end up in countries in the European Community ports and are imported by countries in the European Community. Another question which has been debated in the Workers' Group, in respect of which we have to offer criticism, is the customary tradition of the European Economic Community in this Conference to respond jointly to the questionnaire on sanctions sent out by the ILO to governments. It must be said, in addition, that their latest reply sent for the purposes of this Conference is a joint reply from the countries of the European Community which does not enter into any firm commitment for the adoption of concrete measures against the South African Government.

In our opinion, it is not possible to cover in a joint response all the trade between each of the countries of the European Community and that in which this tragic regime of apartheid is practised. The countries of the European Economic Community have a moral and ethical obligation to reply individually to the questionnaire that is sent to them rather than conceal their real trade by a joint reply. In addition, in their capacity as the European Economic Community, they should impose the necessary sanctions against South Africa. From this rostrum, therefore, we ask that these countries take immediate steps to impose an embargo on South African coal. We make this plea following the resolutions adopted by the ILO as well as the conclusions adopted at the Twelfth Session of the ILO's Coal Mines Committee in April 1988.

As concerns Spain, we spoke in the Committee on Apartheid to raise with the Spanish Government the question concerning Spain's coal trade with South Africa. The Government response is unacceptable since we have no concrete reply.

Spanish workers cannot accept the fact that, from 1981 to 1985, in my country, there has been an increase in the consumption of South African coal from 0.5 million to 2.2 million tons. This is an increase of 440 per cent. The Spanish merchant fleet unloaded South African coal to the amount of something like 300 million tons between 1985 and 1986 in European Community ports. Even more unacceptable than this, is the increase of this fuel in the energy industry in my country. Since 1981, 5.3 per cent of the coal used has been South African coal, and in 1988 the figure for the increase amounts to 50.9 per cent – the increase in the coal imported from that country.

We have not been given a clear answer in the Committee and we wish to place on record our disagreement with the reply given. We sincerely hope that the Spanish Government will bring about a drastic change in its policy. Furthermore, we have the impression, when reference is made to South Africa, that many governments and employers are showing solidarity on the South African question, but their solidarity is only theoretical. In practice, they do very little to carry out any real boycott, as they have pledged to do against the apartheid regime.

What they are doing, in fact, is to use a double language, which is unacceptable to the trade union movement. It is disappointing to observe the words and the deeds of the European Community countries in general and what follows in practice, when they maintain or even increase their trade with South Africa. I say this at a time, moreover, when the Government of my country holds the presidency of the European Community.

We have seen that many governments and employers are using this double language, of solidarity in theory and increased trade with South Africa in practice. There is nothing so cynical as saying one thing and doing something quite different.

In our opinion, it is necessary to take a broad view of the situation rather than looking at it in terms of short-term interests. It is not a problem affecting governments, employers and workers separately. It is something that affects the whole of mankind. There is nothing to justify the failure to impose the strongest sanctions against South Africa and to respect the resolutions and recommendations of the ILO on this subject.

I should like to conclude by reaffirming our support for the conclusions and the report submitted to the Conference. I should like to congratulate Mr. Mercier for the work he has done in the Committee, in defending the views and interest of the workers on this matter, and I should like to tell the Conference that, as Spanish workers, we are committed to the work and efforts of the ICFTU and other international organisations in their struggle in this regard. As always, the Spanish workers will continue to join in the battle to secure democratic citizenships for the South African people, but to achieve this it is necessary to isolate the present regime, to apply sanctions fully and to boycott the apartheid system. The recommendations submitted to the Conference must be supported.

Original – Spanish: Mr. ZAMORA HERNANDEZ (Government adviser, Cuba) – I should like to echo the sentiments of the delegations who have preceded me in congratulating you on your election. We are convinced that under your wise leadership the Conference will be crowned with success.

We have carefully studied the report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia and my delegation wholeheartedly approves the recommendations set out in this report.

As we know, there are countries which are still making efforts to avoid the elimination of apartheid. It makes us indignant to see how these same countries trade, and offer economic, financial and other kinds of help to the racist regime of Pretoria. I need only cite certain figures from the Committee's report, to show the level of poverty, suffering and violence which racist South Africa and its odious system of apartheid has brought upon the peoples of southern Africa, and which has increased the number of arrests, the level of unemployment, hunger, illiteracy, insanitary conditions and death.

So much injustice and wrong is being done! However, when people are fighting to defend their cause, nothing will hold them back.

When we speak of what the people of South Africa and Namibia are doing in their struggle against apartheid we are sure history will record "the battle of Quito Cuanavale" as one of the most decisive and brilliant actions that could be engaged in and which led to the victory of the heroic fighters of the South West Africa People's Organisation (SWAPO), FAPLA and the Cuban fighters. This heroic deed also destroyed the myth that South Africa was invincible.

It was the outcome of the battle of Quito Cuanavale which compelled the forces which maintain the system of apartheid to sit down at the negotiation table and to lay the foundations for the present hopes for peace in Namibia and for positive developments for the entire region of southern Africa.

Cuba, which feels the blood of our African brothers running in its veins, will not stop until the system of apartheid has completely disappeared and a new society has been created in South Africa.

My Government reiterates the Committee's request for governments to support the United Nations Secretary-General in its efforts to secure the strict application of Security Council resolution 435, including the holding of free and just elections in Namibia.

The Cuban Government wholeheartedly supports the proposal that Nelson Mandela, an exceptional patriot, should be awarded the Nobel peace Prize.

Original - French: Mr. ROBEL (representative of the World Confederation of Labour) - The World Confederation of Labour, speaking through me, would wish to congratulate first of all the Director-General on his report on apartheid, which fully describes the position of apartheid in South Africa.

The evolution of apartheid and its impact on peoples are a subject of concern for all those who are anxious to secure liberty and justice. Every year the International Labour Conference discusses policy of apartheid, which, by its very nature, constitutes a breach of human rights in the cruellest possible manner. It is a permanent source of exploitation, poverty and unemployment and the racist regime continues to have recourse to violence to repress the just struggle of the Black majority.

Twenty-three million Black people are deprived of their rights and if they cry for freedom they are arrested, beaten, tortured and killed. Far from getting any better, these practices are being stepped up, facilitated by the state of emergency.

The South African authorities continue with their brutality, arbitrary arrests, the torture of detainees, exiles, the exploitation of Blacks and executions.

If I had to quote here all the forms of tyranny and barbarism of which the Blacks are victims in South Africa, including trade unions and workers, the time available would not be enough; moreover, these are adequately described in the report. Incidentally, the workers and their trade unions are most subject to these evils. Restrictions on trade union activities are legion. The police interfere with the normal working of trade union organisations; their offices are raided and even the personal belongings of trade unionists are confiscated. Workers' lawful strikes are broken up; indeed, the report refers to many cases during the past year - more than 900. All this shows that South Africa is not ready yet to abandon its policy of racism.

Its pseudo-reforms are merely a smoke-screen designed to deceive public opinion, in order to continue to enjoy foreign assistance to save the South African economy which would otherwise be very seriously disturbed by the outflow of capital and certain foreign companies.

The Labour Relations Act, far from improving the position, considerably limits freedom, trade union activities and the right to strike.

I do not want to dwell on this matter but all the facts quoted here show that, far from getting better, the policy of apartheid is doing everything it can to become perpetual.

If apartheid continues to exist it is because it is supported and because the sanctions called for by those who want to put an end to apartheid are not fully applied.

It is to be deplored that countries, and particularly the rich ones, continue to have major links with the South African Government in the economic, trade, financial and diplomatic field. It is also true that enterprises and multinational companies are still present in South Africa. All verbally condemn the regime but their relations can only be an encouragement to the apartheid regime. The brief reports they send to the ILO, often couched in very general and vague terms, in fact speak volumes.

Of course, governments deny that they are accomplices of apartheid and put forward various arguments to justify their links with South Africa. We heard some of these earlier. These fine declarations, insisting on the importance of freedom and respect of human rights, claimed in various instances, and particularly in the ILO, should be applied by all and everywhere, and notably in South Africa.

The existence of this regime is a problem of moral conscience for mankind as a whole because it is a crime against humanity; but it is also a danger for peace, security and the development, especially in Africa. The isolation of South Africa, putting a halt to investments and bank loans and the application of economic sanctions against the regime are the most effective means of forcing Pretoria to change its course, and to respect the rights of the Black.

Here, once more, we wish to congratulate the Staff Union of the ILO which for some time has withdrawn its bank account from the Union Bank of Switzerland (UBS) - one of the banks which has links with South Africa; this is an example which should be followed by other institutions.

We would also like to pay a tribute to the determination of Blacks who wish to throw off apartheid; their determination remains intact. One of the most notable trends of the past few years has been the emergence of trade union action, as workers are becoming increasingly aware that their strength resides in unity. Their efforts, however, would be to no avail without the solidarity of all those who play a major part in mobilising public opinion and workers in the campaign against apartheid.

For its part, the World Confederation of Labour has always undertaken various activities in areas of workers' information and awareness in various parts of the world, to ensure they undertake and reinforce all possible action against apartheid – and this has borne fruit.

In order to step up its anti-apartheid campaign, the WCL has set up a special committee against apartheid to study the action to be undertaken and to renew at various levels the different forms of giving support to the Black workers and trade unions.

The WCL has brotherly relationship with the Black workers in South Africa and offers constant support to their trade unions, more particularly in the field of workers' education, to reinforce their trade unions and their activities.

My organisation also provides assistance to victims and their families.

We shall continue our struggle until apartheid is totally eradicated and democracy emerges in South Africa – a democracy in which the Black population will have its freedom and responsibility for its own State.

We will co-operate fully with all those who are working in this direction.

I would end by congratulating and thanking the members of the Committee for the work they have done which has led to positive conclusions which we fully approve.

We hope that the conclusions which appear in the report of the Committee should be adopted unanimously and followed by concrete action by government, by the employers and by the workers.

Original – Chinese: Mr. ZHANG (Government adviser, China) The Chinese delegation agrees with the report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid and its conclusions and appreciates the enormous work done by the members of the Committee.

The past year has witnessed progress in consultations with a view to the settlement of questions relating to withdrawal of foreign troops from Angola and in implementing United Nations Security Council resolution 435. Nevertheless, the South African people are still confronted with a serious situation in their struggle. In spite of condemnation by international public opinion, the South African authorities have obstinately clung to the system of apartheid and continued with the suppression of movements of trade unions and liberation. An arduous road still lies ahead for the Black people and their organisations in South Africa in their struggle for racial equality and basic rights and freedoms.

The Chinese Government and people strongly condemn the policy of apartheid and racial discrimination. China does not have any political, military, cultural, sports or diplomatic relations with the South African authorities nor has it any commercial links with the racist regime. Over the past year, we have, as always, rendered moral and material assistance to the South African people and southern African countries to the best of our ability. We will continue to support the just struggle of the South African people in future so as to force the South African authorities into renouncing the system of apartheid.

We hope the international community will take further initiative to energetically support the people of South Africa and the front-line States in their struggle against apartheid and take forceful sanctions against the South African authorities. Only by doing so can we put an end to this criminal system of apartheid at an early date. It is our hope that in the struggle against apartheid the ILO will offer greater contributions.

Mr. NISHIBAYASHI (Government adviser, Japan) – I would like to take this opportunity, on behalf of the Government of Japan, to present briefly our view on apartheid and the report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid of this Conference.

The Government of Japan has been of the opinion that the South African Government's policy of apartheid is utterly incompatible with today's international public order and value. Therefore, Japan has steadfastly opposed this abhorrent policy. In this spirit, Japan has been taking various strict measures against South Africa, in co-operation with the international community, including the United Nations. Japan will not change its policy at all as long as South Africa does not carry out drastic reforms towards the abolishment of apartheid.

Let me take this opportunity to give some examples of our measures. First of all, Japan has no diplomatic relations with South Africa, nor has Japan accorded any recognition to the so-called independent homelands.

In an effort to limit contacts between the peoples of the two countries, Japan has imposed restrictions on sports, cultural and educational exchanges; it has suspended the issuance of tourist visas to South African nationals, and has urged the Japanese to refrain voluntarily from touring South Africa.

Japan refuses to engage in military or nuclear co-operation of any kind with South Africa.

In the field of economic and trade relations, Japan has banned all direct investment in South Africa since the end of the 1960s. It has restricted commercial loans and urged all those concerned to co-operate in halting the import of Krugerrands and other gold coins. Its trade restrictions vis-à-vis South Africa also include a prohibition on iron and steel imports, on arms exports, and on the export of computers to South African institutions that enforce apartheid. It has suspended air links with that country, and prohibits its government officials from using international flights of South African Airways.

Furthermore, I would like to point out that the total amount of our trade with South Africa was reduced on US dollars basis in 1988 compared to the previous year. This is, we firmly believe, mainly because the Japanese Government has appealed to the Japanese business community to take proper measures for their trade activities since the beginning of 1988.

Lastly, although there are some remarks in the report of the Committee indicating our export of arms to South Africa, as well as the statement made by the Vice-Chairman this morning, I should like to mention the obvious fact that Japan has been strictly observing the arms embargo to South Africa. Therefore, the claim that Japan has exported arms to South Africa is utterly groundless.

Original – Arabic: Mr. NASR (Employers' adviser, Lebanon) – Mr. President, first of all, I would like to congratulate you on your election as President of this session of the Conference. You have been guiding our proceedings with a great deal of wisdom and skill. Wisdom always has been and will continue to be the foremost instrument of the International Labour Conference.

Since we first began to talk about apartheid and racism in South Africa, that is to say, since the beginning of our discussions, the Conference has adopted a number of resolutions, followed by the famous Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia, as well as Programme of Action against Apartheid.

The Conference recently set up a group of experts in order to follow up its work and to ensure that its resolutions and decisions are actually implemented. These are laudable achievements, but they are still far from what could be done. For when we look at what is going on in South Africa, at the South African policy against the indigenous majority, we see that these peoples have been deprived every kind of freedom – political freedom or human freedom – and are subjected daily to every form of discrimination and oppression.

Therefore the international family, headed by our Organisation, the ILO, is called upon more than ever before to renew and double its efforts with a view to bringing pressure to bear on the regime. This should be the primordial task undertaken by our Organisation, in order to put an end to these inhuman scourges of apartheid and racial discrimination. This effort which we are undertaking against apartheid responds to an urgent need, for we have found that the same practices take place elsewhere, for example in Palestine, where liberties are flouted. There is no freedom for the workers, employers, children and students and all of the Arab inhabitants. Whether at the workplace or at the universities, or because of their membership in political organisations or trade unions, all of these people are subjected to all sorts of pressure.

The international family of organisations, headed by the ILO, should, first and foremost, realise that if it yields to this new form of discrimination, this epidemic will spread to other countries and other populations, who will live under the heavy yoke of colonialism and other pressures.

Personally, I would like to say that I fully concur with the decisions arrived at here. Allow me to appeal to all of you to implement the agreement we have reached.

Perhaps we will be able in this way to end this barbaric system of apartheid, to wipe out this epidemic, so that the peoples now struggling may recover their right to freedom, dignity and progress.

Original – Arabic: Mr. AL-JASSEM (Employers' delegate, Kuwait) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I should like to join previous speakers in thanking the President, the Vice-Presidents, the Reporter and the secretariat of the Committee on Action against Apartheid for all the efforts that they have made in the Committee.

Any civilised human being can only deplore that in an international community and a Conference of this importance we should need to speak about apartheid, at a time when man claims to have reached the heights of civilisation and when progress has gone beyond all imaginable limits. Despite this progress we find that in many parts of this world there are still regimes that maintain inadmissible policies such as apartheid which by all divine and human laws we can only condemn.

The International Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Racial Discrimination adopted by the United Nations in 1965 called for the abolition of apartheid in all its forms. The Convention defined this system as discrimination or segregation based on a difference of sex, religion, creed or race, leading to a deprivation of human rights and violation of basic liberties, social, economic or otherwise.

Kuwait approved this Convention, enshrined in Law No. 33 of 1968. Kuwait also maintains no cultural or other relations with this regime of South Africa, which we can only condemn.

We must ask why this racist regime is allowed to persist in violating all rights, ignoring all appeals to it. We hope that the resolutions or decisions that may be taken during this session, what we call the conclusions in Provisional Record No. 20, will be more successful than those adopted earlier and will be applied more firmly. We cannot remain indifferent when we hear of the inhuman practices in Palestine. We cannot be optimistic about this policy when we also hear about new measures adopted by the Israeli occupation authorities in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories. Their policy is designed to compel the Arab inhabitants of these regions to carry foreign workers' cards. We can only condemn such a policy, which is a form of racial discrimination. It has been denounced even by Israelis, not to mention others of authorities including some Americans in positions of authority. If we are truly determined to fight against apartheid we must fight against this form of discrimination, wherever it is practised, at every level. We must boycott any regime that practises such a policy and proclaim our determination to do so without shame or fear. It is unacceptable to be tolerant toward regimes which violate human rights or trample on man's dignity, whether in South Africa, Palestine or elsewhere.

We should not accept any regime that does not allow man the right to live or work; we must openly and violently condemn such regimes and all the States of the world, of East or West, North or South, must co-operate to put an end to such practices by regimes which unfortunately continue to exist in this day and age that we call an era of freedom, democracy and civilisation.

Because of the historic friendly and fraternal relations that have always linked the African and Arab peoples, a meeting was held in Kuwait recently, the tenth meeting of the Committee of Arab-African Co-operation, in the presence of His Eminence the Emir of Kuwait, who gave a speech in which he stressed the importance of the secular and privileged relations linking the African and Arab peoples.

Among the resolutions adopted by this meeting, there was a very frank and explicit resolution condemning the policy of apartheid and the policy of racial discrimination in both South Africa and Palestine. I therefore urge you all not to tolerate any violation of human rights, but to co-operate in the struggle against these regimes, wherever they may be. As I said, it is shameful to think that when we live in an era of civilisation we should still permit such violations.

The employers in Kuwait support the Committee's conclusions and we call on the Committee on Action against Apartheid to present a report on the measures taken against apartheid, denouncing those who establish links with South Africa, this satanic regime. The Committee should also propose practical actions to put an end to such discriminatory practices in both Palestine and South Africa.

Original – French: Mr. FLOREA (Workers' delegate, Romania) – At the outset, I would like to state that we fully support the statement made by the Workers' Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Action against Apartheid.

As the Director-General points out in his Special Report on the Declaration regarding action undertaken against apartheid in South Africa and Namibia, apart from the withdrawal of all troops from Namibia and Angola in accordance with United Nations Security Council resolution 435, nothing positive has been achieved in the situation in southern Africa.

The racist regime of Pretoria has stepped up its policy of violence against the majority population of South Africa. It refuses – and this in spite of protests of the international community – to free Nelson Mandela, the symbol of resistance against apartheid, and the same goes for other political prisoners.

We fully support the proposal concerning Mr. Mandela's nomination for the Noble Peace Prize. In spite of the terror and repression unleashed by the racist regime in South Africa and Namibia, the workers and the peoples of this region continue to fight resolutely and courageously in order to obtain their lawful rights of freedom, equality, dignity and social progress. The courage and self-sacrifice with which South African workers take on one of cruellest regimes of our day and age, as well as running the risk of going to prison and being killed, deserve the admiration of all peace- and justice-loving people in the world.

The just cause of freedom in South Africa has always had the support of my people. The General Trade Union Confederation of Romania, which is deeply attached to the ideals of liberty, freedom and progress, has constantly come out in favour of the peoples fighting for their liberty against foreign domination and insisted on their inalienable rights to self-determination.

Our trade unions have unreservedly supported our country's efforts to provide the African freedom movements with all types of assistance – diplomatic, material, political – and we have welcomed with sympathy the appearance of new States in Africa with which we maintain links of close solidarity.

The General Trade Union Confederation has supported all our country's initiatives as regards the signing of agreements with a number of African countries. This has led to fruitful co-operation on both sides. Through specific means we have, over the years, made our contribution in order to train a number of trade union leaders or specialists in various disciplines.

We are actively campaigning for the rapid independence of Namibia and we support, in this regard, SWAPO and the Namibian Trades Union Congress in their fight for freedom and independence. We call for the immediate elimination of the racist policy of South Africa and demand the freeing of all political prisoners who are imprisoned for their heroic stand against the racist regime of Pretoria. We also demand that an end be put to all interferences by South Africa in other southern African countries. We encourage the peoples in their struggle for economic and political independence, for their economic and social development, without any foreign interference.

We firmly believe that the struggle of workers and their trade unions, of the national freedom movements and of peoples in South Africa and Namibia will, if they are supported by all democratic forces of the world, triumph and prevail in the end so that all peoples in South Africa can develop freely, in accordance with their social and national aspirations.

In conclusion, I would like to assure you that the General Trade Union of Romania, guided as it is by truly international feelings, will also in the future unreservedly support the just struggle of the people in South Africa in favour of independence and liberty and in favour of their right to live freely and in human dignity in their territory as part of the international community. The workers and their Trade Unions in Romania, indeed all our people, have always joined efforts with other peoples and other progressive and democratic forces to fight for national independence and sovereignty; they will stand side by side with all those who, throughout the world, try to liquidate all types of colonialist and neocolonialist domination and the policy of apartheid and racial discrimination, so that all peoples may lead a free, dignified and civilised life and social progress, independence, democracy and peace may prevail.

Apartheid cannot be reformed as some try to convince us. Apartheid must be eradicated once and for all.

By way of conclusion, I should just like to say that we support the Report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid and we trust that it will be adopted unanimously.

Mr. WALDEN (Government delegate, Israel) – Israel has read with great interest the report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid. Israel continues to maintain its active opposition to the doctrine and practices of apartheid.

The policies of our Government continue to be based on the fundamental decision adopted in September 1987 regarding relations with South Africa. According to this decision, new investment in South Africa is prohibited without special permission; government loans, the sale and transfer of oil, the transfer of krugerrands, are prohibited. Imports of iron and steel have been frozen; cultural ties, sports ties and tourism restricted; new scientific agreements frozen. No visits by government officials are made without express permission by an interministerial committee. Steps have been taken to prevent Israel from becoming a transit area for goods. And finally, the decision calls for a fund to be established to assist in training programmes in educational, cultural and social fields.

All the provisions of this decision continue to be fully implemented. At the same time, Israel continues to foster contacts with the Black population of South Africa, especially through the operations of the Afro/Asian Institute of the Histadrut, both by visiting members of the Black community and the anti-apartheid movement in South Africa, and by inviting members of this Community to seminars and training programmes in Israel.

In all these ways, Israel continues to demonstrate its opposition to the racist doctrine of apartheid; we will do all that we can to oppose all manifestations of this ideology.

I do not propose to reply to attacks that have been made against my country by certain delegates; they are both false and irrelevant to this discussion and do not merit any response.

Mr. SANDHU (Government delegate, Pakistan) – My delegation fully supports the conclusions adopted by the Committee on Action against Apartheid. We share the view that the emphasis as reflected in the new title of the Committee should be on action against apartheid.

It is really a matter of concern for us to note that the rate of disinvestment in South Africa has slowed down and that the multinational enterprises are “barely restructuring” their involvement in maintaining their interests.

We firmly believe that strict adherence to the measures suggested by the United Nations and comprehensive and mandatory sanctions are essential for early elimination of the system of apartheid.

The minority regime in Pretoria continues to follow the policy of apartheid in total disregard of world public opinion expressed year after year from different forums including this august Organisation. We condemn the policy of apartheid in all its forms and manifestations, including repression and injustices perpetrated against the trade unionists and the working people; while doing so, we appreciate the efforts that have been crowned with success in Namibia and hope that the majority of the South African people shall also be able to achieve their inalienable right to self-determination and freedom for which they are sparing no sacrifices.

We urge the ILO and through this Organisation, the international community at large, to take further concrete measures which will compel the illegal regime of South Africa to desist from its policies of racial discrimination and ultimately allow the majority of the people of South Africa to exercise their political, economic and social rights in full freedom through total elimination of the abhorrent system of apartheid.

Mr. BORG GARDONA (Government delegate, Malta) – I take the floor to add the condemnation of the Government and people of Malta to that of other representatives who spoke before me.

It is to our shame and a heavy burden on the conscience of all of us that this loathsome system of apartheid still exists in the twentieth century. History will condemn us for allowing it to persist. We pledge our full solidarity with the oppressed people in South Africa and Namibia and salute them for their bravery and perseverance. They deserve much greater support from the world community in the name of freedom and of social justice for which this Organisation stands. Altogether, we can do much more to abolish this obnoxious racist system.

My delegation wholeheartedly supports the report and appeals that it be adopted unanimously.

Mr. SHARMA (Government adviser, India) – May I first of all congratulate the Chairman and the members of the Committee on Action against Apartheid for the high quality of the report placed before us. On behalf of my delegation I would also like to express our full support for the conclusions adopted by this Committee.

India's longstanding commitment to the struggle against apartheid is well known and extends over many decades. Since the turn of the century India has been an uncompromising opponent of racial discrimination in South Africa. In this we were inspired by the example of the Father of our Nation, Mahatma Gandhi, who began on the soil of South Africa itself the first organised movement of opposition to the despicable system of apartheid. Our support for racial equality in South Africa, along with decolonisation elsewhere in the world, became deeply intertwined with our own movement for freedom and independence. In fact as early as 1946, at a stage when we ourselves were still not free from foreign rule, the Government of India placed a protest against racism in South Africa before the United Nations, thus beginning the efforts of that world body to confront apartheid. Since then we have been privileged to play a special and leading role in support of the long and valiant struggle of the majority in South Africa for human dignity, equality and freedom. India has relentlessly pursued in every forum and through all available means the basic goals of establishing in South Africa the dignity and worth of every single human being without distinction of colour and race.

The South African case is unique since in South Africa racism and racial discrimination are the deliberate, acknowledged and official policy of the State. India firmly condemns the evil of apartheid and considers all modifications of it as completely unacceptable. We are convinced that apartheid has to be eliminated in its entirety. We are also convinced that the only peaceful means which can force the Pretoria regime to dismantle apartheid are through the imposition of comprehensive and mandatory sanctions against South Africa. In this connection, we call on all governments, which have not done so, to join in imposing such comprehensive and mandatory sanctions. Employers' and workers' organisation too can play an extremely effective role in this regard and the international community should now act cohesively and quickly to make such sanctions a reality. The few remaining governments which support South Africa should realise that any delay in action to end apartheid can only lead to more and more bloodshed. They would be erring in thinking that co-operation in any manner with the Pretoria regime could give them some sort of influence to change things for the better.

I would like to congratulate the Director-General of the ILO for the high quality of his Special Report on the application of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia. The contents of Report are, however, a cause of deep concern to us since they clearly show that the conditions of the majority in South Africa have continued to deteriorate over the year which has passed. As the Report points out the number of people detained in South Africa under emergency regulations has increased sixteenfold during the period June 1986 to August 1988. In our view there is no doubt that the continuing unrest in the labour field in South Africa stems primarily from the apartheid policies being pursued by the Pretoria regime which continues to violate trade union rights, harass and imprison trade unionists, place ban on trade union organisations and increasingly use force to deal with strikes and to put down any form of protest. The South African Government persists in its reprehensible repressive policies in full defiance of international public opinion. The state of emergency in South Africa has been extended and a Labour Relations Amendment Act has been brought into force which is being used as an instrument of severe repression against trade unions. In addition, the South Africa Government is using a most rigid form of press censorship to keep the world in the dark about the enormity of the crimes which it is perpetrating against the majority population.

Three years ago India was entrusted by the Harare Non-Aligned summit to chair the AFRICA Fund which has been set up to channelise urgently-needed assistance to the front-line States and the liberation movements as also to mobilise public opinion against apartheid. Since then the AFRICA Fund has received pledges and contributions from 54 countries exceeding US$422 million in cash and in kind. However, the needs of the front-line States and the liberation movements, which have so bravely borne the brunt of the economic aggression and attempts at destabilisation by the racist Pretoria regime are so immense that while commendable efforts have so far been made, these can only be considered small and inadequate in the context of their immediate needs. In this context we would call upon governments, employers' and workers' organisations, non-governmental bodies and individuals to make every possible contribution to the AFRICA Fund in order to early secure the achievement of its noble objectives. I think it is worth my mentioning here that most of the countries which have contributed to the Fund are developing countries which, while themselves suffering from serious resource constraints, have contributed their might to help in the struggle against apartheid. The Fund has also received contributions from members of the public, trade union organisations and others. A few months ago, in a remarkable gesture of solidarity from families who themselves have meagre resources, a group of coalminers and bank employees in India contributed as much as Rs.20 million to the AFRICA Fund. More recently, trade union organisations in the telecommunications field in India have also made an important contribution to the Fund. In all, such contributions from non-governmental sources in India have already reached Rs.23.6 million in cash.

With respect to Namibia, we are of the view that the bloodshed which took place at the beginning of April 1989 was entirely avoidable. I would like to reiterate my Government's position that the UN Security Council resolution 435 clearly needs to be implemented fully, both in letter and in spirit. We deeply regret that difficulties are being created in the Namibian election process and call for free and fair elections in Namibia. The Namibians have already suffered enough, and it is clearly time that the people of Namibia are allowed to establish a truly national government. In this context my Government views with serious concern attempts being made to see that a puppet regime emerges in Namibia. My country pledges its full support to SWAPO, the sole legitimate representative of the people of Namibia, in its struggle for Namibian independence. We are sure that all freedom loving people in the world would also accord SWAPO their full support.

Last June this Conference approved establishment of a group of independent experts to follow up and monitor the implementation of sanctions and other action against apartheid. We, however, note with deep concern that despite the passage of one year the group of independent experts has not yet been set up. We do hope that the new Director-General will establish this group without further delay so that it can quickly embark upon its important task.

Original - French: Mr. KHORAMMIAN KER-MANCHAH (Government adviser, Islamic Republic of Iran) - In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate!

Very briefly I should like to say that this session of the Conference has included on its agenda a complete revision of outdated texts. Many years of struggles of all kinds will have passed before the voices of the Black minorities and the victims of apartheid can finally be heard. A resolution or Convention has no force unless it is ratified by States, and even then it is difficult to ensure that States respect their commitments. The International Labour Organisation has traditionally been interested in this question since its founding

The adoption of global, mandatory sanctions against the racist regime in South Africa would constitute genuine progress towards the elimination of the system of apartheid and would contribute to the establishment of peace and stability. Some Western Powers have not replied to the repeated and direct appeals of the United Nations General Assembly to take urgent, effective measures to put an end to all co-operation with the racist regime in the political, economic, commercial, military, nuclear and other areas and to refrain from establishing any such co-operation with that regime, in violation of the relevant decisions of the United Nations. The governments of these Powers have not, up to now, taken effective measures in legal, administrative and other areas affecting their citizens and the bodies under their jurisdiction that own or manage private enterprises in South Africa to the detriment of the indigenous African population.

Finally, the activities of these enterprises must be stopped, and new investments contrary to the interests of the population prevented.

The General Assembly has expressed its deep concern at the repeated violations of the embargo on arms called for by the Security Council in its resolution 418 and at the co-operation of certain Western States with the South African racist regime in the nuclear field.

The Islamic Republic of Iran, under Imam Khomeini, from the outset of its Islamic Revolution, has been active in the struggle against apartheid in accordance with the principles of the Koran.

(The speaker continues in Arabic.) "We have set up confederations and tribes so that you may know the most noble and pious of you in the eyes of God" (Koran).

(The speaker continues in French.)

Apartheid, segregation, racism and discrimination are phenomena alien to the values of Islam and our Constitution, which is why my country has resolutely opposed apartheid and has given its support to activities against apartheid at the national, regional and international levels, and to the breaking off of diplomatic, political, economic, commercial, sports or any other relations; consequently it has not concluded any agreement or entered into any licensing or other arrangement with the racist regime.

The Islamic Republic of Iran respects the Resolutions of the Security Council and the General Assembly of the United Nations with respect to the South African regime.

The delegation of the Islamic Republic of Iran believes that the international community should apply the United Nations decisions and fully support the application of resolution 435 of the Security Council in order to resolve the problem under the aegis of the United Nations.

The PRESIDENT – The Conference has just completed a thorough discussion on this important question. Due account being taken of all comments and reservations made in the course of this debate, may I consider that the Conference adopts the report and its conclusion by consensus?

(The report and its conclusions are adopted.)

The PRESIDENT – Now it remains for me to thank the Director-General, the Chairman of this Committee and his Vice-Chairmen, the Reporter and other members of the Committee for an assignment well executed. I also wish to extend my gratitude to all those who took the floor.

(The Conference adjourned at 6.45 p.m.)

Sixth item on the agenda: Safety in the use of chemicals at work

Report of the Committee on Safety in the Use of Chemicals at Work

1. The Committee on Safety in the Use of Chemicals at Work was set up by the International Labour Conference at its fourth sitting on 8 June 1989. It was originally composed of 155 members (67 Government members, 40 Employers' members and 48 Workers' members). To achieve equality of voting strength, each Government member was allotted 240 votes, each Employers' member 402 votes and each Workers' member 335 votes. The composition of the Committee was modified 11 times during this session and the number of votes attributed to each member was adjusted accordingly.¹

2. The Committee elected its officers as follows:

Chairman: Dr. R. O. Adewoye (Government member, Nigeria);

Vice-Chairmen: Mr. M. Tarnow (Employers' member, United States) and Mr. M. Wright (Workers' member, United States);

Reporter: Mr. J. McLellan (Government member, Canada).

3. At its seventh sitting, the Committee appointed a Drafting Committee composed of the following members: Mrs. Plaisant (Government member of France); Mrs. Dejean de la Batie (Employers' member of France); Mr. Trudel (Workers' member of Canada); and the Reporter of the Committee.

4. The Committee had before it Reports VI (1) and VI (2) prepared by the Office for a first discussion by the Conference of the sixth item on the agenda: "Safety in the use of chemicals at work". The Proposed Conclusions submitted by the Office were contained in Report VI (2).

5. The Committee held 16 sittings.

General discussion

6. The Assistant Secretary-General of the Conference, Mr. Morozov, addressed the first sitting of the Committee and proceeded with the election of its Chairman. The representative of the Secretary-General presented the two reports and reviewed the considerations which had led the Governing Body to place the item of safety in the use of chemicals at work on the agenda of the Conference. He noted that Proposed Conclusions with a view to a Convention and a Recommendation in Report VI (2) were based on replies received to the questionnaire in Report VI (1). The Chairman thanked the Committee for his unanimous election and hoped to accomplish its tasks which have a lasting impact on the safety and health of millions of workers using chemicals at work and on industry, trade and agriculture. He expressed his confidence in a constructive spirit of co-operation.

7. The spokesman of the Employers' members stated that chemicals provided dramatic improvements to the quality of life. Hence, safety in the use of chemicals offered a challenge to governments, employers and workers. He underlined the strength of tripartism in ensuring the safety and health of workers for which the employers had the ultimate responsibility. The Employers' members considered that the Proposed Conclusions provided a sound framework for a Convention and a Recommendation on safety in the use of chemicals which should be supported by all groups. Account should be taken of the scope and application of the proposed instruments to avoid extension into impractical areas and to duplication of efforts and facilitate the task of the Committee.

8. The spokesman of the Workers' members agreed that the Office text of the Proposed Conclusions was a very useful first draft for a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation and noted that the proposed instruments aimed at minimising the enormous incidence of occupational injuries resulting

- (a) 9 June: 160 members (69 Government members with 680 votes each; 40 Employers' members with 1,173 votes each; and 51 Workers' members with 920 votes each);
- (b) 12 June: 162 members (70 Government members with 52 votes each; 40 Employers' members with 91 votes each; and 52 Workers' members with 70 votes each);
- (c) 13 June: 160 members (70 Government members with 1,961 votes each; 37 Employers' members with 3,710 votes each; and 53 Workers' members with 2,590 votes each);
- (d) 14 June: 161 members (71 Government members with 1,961 votes each; 37 Employers' members with 3,763 votes each; and 53 Workers' members with 2,627 votes each);
- (e) 15 June: 151 members (71 Government members with 396 votes each; 36 Employers' members with 781 votes each; and 44 Workers' members with 636 votes each);
- (f) 16 June: 150 members (71 Government members with 1,540 votes each; 35 Employers' members with 3,124 votes each; and 44 Workers' members with 2,485 votes each);
- (g) 17 June: 149 members (71 Government members with 748 votes each; 34 Employers' members with 1,562 votes each; and 44 Workers' members with 1,207 votes each);
- (h) 20 June: 145 members (71 Government members with 1,353 votes each; 33 Employers' members with 2,911 votes each; and 41 Workers' members with 2,343 votes each);
- (i) 21 June: 143 members (71 Government members with 429 votes each; 33 Employers' members with 923 votes each; and 39 Workers' members with 781 votes each);
- (j) 22 June: 139 members (71 Government members with 1,155 votes each; 33 Employers' members with 2,485 votes each; and 35 Workers' members with 2,343 votes each);
- (k) 23 June: 136 members (71 Government members with 1,056 votes each; 33 Employers' members with 2,272 votes each; and 32 Workers' members with 2,343 votes each).

from unsafe and uncontrolled use of chemicals at work. They were also committed to the task of adopting a good Convention and Recommendation and more importantly to the task of ratifying and implementing the international instruments through strengthened tripartism.

9. The Government member of Spain, speaking on behalf of the Government members of member States of the European Communities (EC), stated that the complexity and magnitude of the safety and health problems associated with the use of chemicals required urgent action and a unified approach based on national and international experience. The Single European Act has given new impetus to the improvement of the working conditions and environment and to the promotion of harmonised action. As several EC Directives have already regulated the classification, labelling and packaging of hazardous substances for the protection of workers' health, the EC had to have a positive evaluation of the Proposed Conclusions in the Office text. The Office text was a satisfactory starting-point for international instruments.

10. Several Government members, particularly those members from Australia, China, Côte d'Ivoire, Cyprus, Japan, Mauritius and Zimbabwe agreed with the direction and thrust of the Proposed Conclusions which formed a satisfactory basis for a first discussion.

11. The Government member of Australia referred to the conclusions of the ILO Meeting of Experts on Harmful Substances in Work Establishments (May 1987) and stated that the new instruments should cover all branches of economic activity, all categories of workers and all chemical substances. However, he recognised the need for flexibility to ensure ratification of the Convention. Exceptions should apply only with regard to monitoring and surveillance of some hazardous chemicals.

12. The Government member of Hungary observed that the Office text covered all essential points. He mentioned some hazards in the use of chemicals, including both immediate and latent effects, and considered that the term "chemicals" required a precise definition.

13. The Government member of Turkey supported the adoption of a ratifiable Convention supplemented by a Recommendation that included fundamental safety and health provisions, ensured the co-operation of social partners and supported economic viability.

14. The Government member of Cyprus stated that the proposed instruments would act as a catalyst for development of national legislation aimed at ensuring safety in the use of numerous amounts and varieties of chemicals imported to the country. The fundamental principles of safety in the use of chemicals should be specified in a Convention. Technical details that would assist member States in the implementation of the principles should be specified in a Recommendation.

15. The Government member of Côte d'Ivoire expressed concern at the hazards to the health of workers, particularly in developing countries, caused by the proliferating use of chemicals, both in industry and agriculture. Ignorance about the health hazards, inadequacy or lack of administrative infrastructure and regulatory measures to control import of hazardous substances affected the health of workers and the general public.

16. The Government member of Japan strongly supported ILO action aimed at the establishment of international instruments and expressed satisfaction that the Proposed Conclusions duly reflected the observations made by his Government. The response of his Government to the Questionnaire in Report VI (1) invited attention to several fundamental issues that needed clarification from a technical point of view. He recalled in particular that the international instruments should be flexible to enable member States to apply practical measures in accordance with national laws and regulations.

17. The Government member of the Islamic Republic of Iran urged that the new instruments should require the supplier of chemicals to provide information, including safety data sheets on safety in the use of chemicals, particularly to developing countries, and that the international companies should be required to uniformly comply with the provisions of the international instruments in all countries where they operate.

18. The Government member of Zimbabwe emphasised that the international community appreciated that chemicals were essential for survival, and that producers and consumers should have common guide-lines for safety in their use. International co-operation in chemical safety should be encouraged. International instruments in this field should be limited to basic principles while guide-lines with sufficient information were needed to assist framing national legislation.

19. The Government member of Gabon pointed out that inadequate training of workers and withholding information essential for safeguarding their health, often taking cover under confidentiality privileges, were factors that affected the health of workers as well as the public. Better management of chemicals, particularly in agriculture, was indispensable.

20. The Government member of China outlined the national priorities and programmes in safety and health and considered that the proposed instruments should provide for a uniform international system of labelling. Provision should exist also for the establishment of a national authority to control and monitor exposure of workers to chemicals.

21. The Workers' member of Sri Lanka expressed concern about the hazards of pesticides widely used in the plantations and in agriculture, ecological impact of chemicals, and the unrestricted import of chemicals to developing countries, some of which are banned in developed countries. Workers needed to be trained in safety in the use of chemicals.

22. The Government member of India sought clarification as to the reason for excluding provisions for major hazard control in the proposed instruments, while noting that this could be the subject of another instrument. He asked whether the term "chemicals" was meant to include natural fibres that may exhibit adverse health effects similar to asbestos.

23. The Government member of Tunisia stressed that the safety and health problems associated with the transfer of technology to developing countries, the direct and indirect exposure of both workers and the public to chemicals used at work, and the impact of chemicals on the environment should be addressed at the international level. Industrial development should accompany safety and health information awareness among workers.

24. The Government member of Mauritius stated that the legal framework for safety and health, as done in his country with the ILO's support, was essential as a basis for the industrialisation process.

25. The representative of the Secretary-General, in reply to the comments and clarifications sought from the Office, reminded that the Committee was charged with the question of safety in the use of chemicals at work in a wide variety of industrial sectors. The Office had a separate programme for the other important area of major hazard control and some years of experience with a code of practice to be published in 1990 would give guidance to the ILO and the member States on future action. The results of the Meeting of Experts on Harmful Substances in Work Establishments (May 1987) guided the Governing Body in limiting the scope of the agenda for this Conference Committee; hence the question of natural fibres is excluded. Furthermore, he recalled that the Conference had adopted the Asbestos Convention only in 1986. Environmental aspects covered by the mandate of other United Nations agencies, although of topical interest, had also to be excluded from the scope of proposed instruments. While inter-agency collaboration in environmental protection continued to grow, the ILO instruments should best be kept within its mandate.

Examination of the Proposed Conclusions contained in Report VI (2)

FORM OF THE INTERNATIONAL INSTRUMENTS

Point 1¹

26. The Employers' members proposed to add the word "hazardous" before "chemicals" on the grounds that any expansion of the scope of the proposed instruments would weaken the impact and make it impracticable to enforce. The Workers' members stressed that the prime obligation of the proposed instruments was to evaluate the chemicals as hazardous or otherwise and opposed the amendment. The Government member of Austria supported this amendment as the existing European legislation applied to dangerous chemicals. The Government members of Australia and Hungary pointed out that classification of chemicals, in particular, applied to all chemicals because of the necessity to identify hazardous ones. They, along with the Government members of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi, Zambia and Zimbabwe, therefore, supported the Office text. Consequently, the Employers' members withdrew the amendment.

27. The Office text was adopted without change.

Point 2

28. Point 2 was adopted without change.

Point 3

PREAMBLE

29. The Government members of Botswana, Brazil, Kenya, United States, Zambia and Zimbabwe proposed amendments to introduce in the preamble a reference to the Asbestos Convention and Recommendation, 1986, which was supported by the Employers' and Workers' members as well as the Government member of the Islamic Republic of Iran and was accepted unopposed.

30. Point 3, as amended, was adopted.

New Point (after Point 3)

31. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to refer, in the preamble, to the co-operation among various United Nations agencies and other appropriate organisations in the field of chemical safety and to note that measures aimed at the protection of workers' health would also enhance the protection of the general public and the environment. They considered that the proposed amendment would also respond to the wishes expressed in the Resolutions Committee of the current session of the International Labour Conference where five resolutions dealt with the linkage between the improvement of the working environment and its positive impact on the general environment. The Employers' members, while appreciating the intent of the amendment and noting that the proposed instruments were not meant to extend protection to the general public, expressed some reservation about including a general reference to "other appropriate organisations, in addition to any relevant instruments of these organisations" in the preamble without any specification. The Government member of Canada expressed a similar concern. The Workers' members agreed to withdraw the phrase opposed by the Employers' members and the proposed new point as subamended and adopted to read:

The preamble should also refer to the need for co-operation between ILO, UNEP, WHO, FAO, UNIDO and IPCS. The preamble should also note that the protection of workers from the harmful effects of chemicals also enhances the protection of the general public and the environment.

32. The Government member of Brazil sought to introduce in the preamble a reference to the basic objectives of the instruments, namely to include "the establishment of measures to prevent accidents and health hazards arising out of the use of chemicals". The Employers' members felt that the proposed amendment would extend the scope of the instruments to cover the control of major accidents which might be the subject of a future Conference discussion, as indicated by the Office. In response to the Workers' members who sought a clarification from the mover of the amendment whether she intended to cover major accident hazards, the latter agreed to withdraw the word "accident" from the proposed text of the amendment to quell any ambiguity and yet retain the objectives of the proposed instruments in the preamble. The representative of the Secretary-General, in reply to a question by the Chairman, stated that he could not recall a single ILO safety and health Convention with the objectives specified in a preamble. The Government members of the United States and Canada supported the inclusion of objectives of the instruments in the preamble, and the former recalled that he had also proposed two amendments for the same purpose. After a lengthy discussion the Committee moved by general consensus to postpone to the next day the discussion of the amendment proposed by the Government member of Brazil together with those of the Government member of the United States and hoped that a compromise formula would be reached.

33. The Government member of the United States withdrew a further amendment which had the effect of the proposed instruments superseding the requirements of previous instruments with regard to labelling and training.

34. At its third sitting, the Committee reopened the debate on the amendment introduced by the Government member of Brazil, as subamended, to include the objectives of the instruments in the preamble. The Government member of the United States withdrew his amendment in favour of the subamendment tabled which was supported by the Employers' and Workers' members and referred to an informal working party composed of the Government members of Brazil, Canada and the United States, and one Employers' and one Workers' member.

35. The text produced by the informal working party and subsequently agreed reads as follows:

The preamble should also contain the basic objective which is to reduce the incidence of chemical-source illnesses and injuries at work by -

- (a) ensuring that all chemicals are evaluated to determine their hazards;
- (b) providing employers with a mechanism to obtain information about the chemicals in their workplaces from suppliers so that the employers can implement effective programmes to protect workers from chemical hazards;
- (c) providing workers with information, which they have a need and right to know, about the chemicals in their workplaces, as well as appropriate precautionary measures so that the workers can effectively participate in protective programmes; and
- (d) establishing principles for such protective programmes to ensure that chemicals are used safely.

Proposed Conclusions with a view to a Convention

I. SCOPE AND DEFINITIONS

Point 4

36. The Workers' members proposed an amendment to replace the words "branches of economic activity in which chemicals are used" by the words "activities in which workers may be exposed to chemicals in the course of work". The Government member of Côte d'Ivoire moved a similar amendment. The representative of the Secretary-General referred to the definition of the term "branches of economic activity" as given in the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981. Based on this explanation, the Government member of Tunisia proposed to retain the Office text. The Workers' members agreed to retain the Office text as the term "use of chemicals" defined in Point 7 has not been proposed to be deleted and also on the understanding that the amendments proposed to this Point 4 by the Employers' members were withdrawn. The Employers' members withdrew their amendments.

37. Point 4 was adopted without amendment.

Point 5

38. Several amendments were proposed to either delete Point 5 altogether or to amend its clauses. The representative of the Secretary-General explained that the Office text proposed only to exclude the marketing or the use of final products as listed in clauses (a) to (e) and not their manufacture because many countries had regulated separately for such products. The Workers' members as well as the Government members of Australia, Botswana, Canada, Kenya, USSR, Zambia and Zimbabwe who had proposed the deletion of Point 5 argued that Point 6 provided for exclusion of branches of economic activity, which could be further improved to provide the required flexibility to facilitate the ratification and implementation of these instruments once adopted. The Employers' members dissented on the grounds that it was superfluous to regulate for products covered by other statutes. The Government member of Spain, speaking on behalf of the Government members of member States of the EC, also favoured retaining Point 5. At this stage, the Workers' members, supported by the Employers' members, moved to proceed with Point 6 before deciding on Point 5. The motion was carried unopposed.

39. The Committee reverted to Point 5 after having dealt with Point 6. The Employers' members, at this stage, agreed to delete Point 5 as proposed originally by the Workers' members and some Government members.

40. Point 5 was deleted.

Point 6

41. The Employers' members and the Workers' members withdrew some of their proposed amendments to Point 6 that sought to replace the word "economic" in view of the explanation already provided to Point 4. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to ensure that the consultations between the organisations of employers and workers concerned with regard to exclusion of branches of economic activity be subject to an assessment of hazards involved and protective measures to be applied. The Employers' members agreed with the amendment after deleting the word "full" before the word "assessment" in the proposed text. The Government members of India, Tunisia and Zimbabwe, the latter speaking also on behalf of Botswana, Kenya and Zambia, expressed some concern about the implementation of the provisions of an instrument that imposed a responsibility of hazard assessment on either the competent authority or the small-scale employers, such as farmers. The amendment proposed by the Workers' members as subamended to accommodate the proposal of the Employers' members was adopted, it being noted that some drafting changes were necessary.

42. The Employers' members proposed an amendment to introduce in Point 6 a provision to safeguard against the disclosure of trade secrets, a matter generally recognised by national legislation. The Workers' members appreciated the intent of the proposal but preferred an unambiguous text. The Government member of Spain speaking on behalf of the Government members of member States of the EC opposed the amendment to avoid confusion. The Government members of Côte d'Ivoire and Malaysia also expressed strong opposition to the amendment as restricting access to information would defeat the purpose of the instruments. After a recess the Employers' members proposed a subamendment as a new clause to read:

the competent authority may make special provisions to protect genuine confidential business information so long as the health and safety of workers is not compromised thereby.

This subamendment supported by the Workers' members along with the Government members of Canada, Malaysia, the United States and Zimbabwe was adopted unopposed.

43. The Workers' members and the Government members of Hungary and the USSR proposed amendments to delete clause (a). These amendments were withdrawn in preference to an amendment proposed by the Government members of Botswana, Kenya, Zambia and Zimbabwe and the Government members of member States of the EC to replace the word "or" at the end of clause (a) by the word "and". The Government member of India, however, expressed some concern about the implications of such provisions on implementation. The amendment was adopted.

44. The Government member of Japan proposed an amendment to insert in clause (a), testing and research as an example of activities that might be excluded. While the Employers' members had no objection to including an example the Workers' members strongly opposed on the grounds that research workers were a group of workers at special risk from exposure to chemicals at work. The Government member of Spain speaking on behalf of the Government members of member States of the EC, the Government members of Cyprus and the USSR and the Government member of Finland speaking on behalf of the Government members of Finland, Norway and Sweden also opposed the amendment, which was withdrawn.

45. An amendment submitted by the Workers' members to delete the words "it is satisfied that" in clause (b) was adopted.

46. Point 6, as amended, was adopted.

Point 7

47. The representative of the International Council of Nurses congratulated the Office for placing the question of safety in the use of chemicals on the Conference agenda as it was a matter of great concern to the nursing profession. She observed that Point 7 as proposed in the Office text was too restrictive as it covered only transport and disposal within the enterprise. She also wished that the scope of the instruments with regard to information be extended.

48. After discussion, the Employers' members and the Workers' members withdrew two separate amendments that sought to clarify the text of clause (a). An amendment by the Employers' members to place clause (d) before (a) was adopted without discussion. Chemicals should better be defined before use.

49. An amendment by the Government member of Hungary to delete the words "and use" in sub-clause (a) (ii) as it was repetitive was adopted.

50. Five amendments were introduced to sub-clause (a) (iv). Three amendments by: the Workers' members; the Government member of Argentina; and the Government members of the German Democratic Republic and the USSR proposed deleting the words "inside the enterprise". An amendment by the Government members of Botswana, Kenya, Zambia and Zimbabwe proposed replacing the sub-clause by the words "the handling of chemicals during transport" while another amendment by the Government member of Australia proposed to replace the words "within the enterprise" by the words "within the workplace". The Workers' members argued that legislating for the protection of the safety and health of transport workers engaged in the transport of hazardous chemicals was within the ILO's mandate and pointed out that the existing international and national instruments did not provide the required protection. There was a lengthy discussion during which the Employers' members tended to agree with the amendment of the Government member of Australia. The Government members of Botswana, Kenya, Zambia and Zimbabwe withdrew their amendment in favour of subamending the proposal of the Government member of Australia, which was also withdrawn subsequently. A proposal made by the Government member of the USSR to replace the term "use of chemicals" in clause (a) by the term "use of chemicals at work" was accepted by the Employers' and Workers' members as a condition for agreeing to delete the words "within the enterprise" in sub-clause (a) (iv). A subamendment was accordingly introduced and adopted.

51. The Government members of Botswana, Kenya, Zambia and Zimbabwe withdrew an amendment to sub-clause (a) (v) which was similar to the one introduced for sub-clause (a) (iv) on condition that the amendment submitted by the Workers' members, as well as by the Government members of Argentina and the USSR, to delete the words "within the enterprise" was adopted. This amendment was adopted without discussion. The Government member of the USSR proposed an amendment to introduce the word "and treatment" to the effect that the provisions should be extended beyond simple disposal of chemicals. The amendment was adopted, without discussion.

52. An amendment proposed by the Workers' members to introduce a new sub-clause after (a) (v) in the following terms: "the release of chemicals resulting from work activities" was adopted. A proposal by the Workers' members to introduce another new sub-clause after (a) (v) to cover "the maintenance, repair and cleaning of chemical equipment and containers" was adopted without discussion.

53. An amendment proposed by the Workers' members to replace the word "mean" by the word "include", to ensure that materials of variable composition are covered by the Convention, in clause (b) was referred to the Drafting Committee. An amendment by the Government member of Hungary to delete the word "their" in clause (b) was adopted without discussion. The Workers' members proposed to insert the words "whether natural or synthetic" after the word "compounds" in clause (b) on the grounds that protection should be extended to workers also exposed to naturally occurring substances. The Employers' members agreed to the proposal on the understanding that the intention was not to extend the coverage to natural fibres. There was a discussion on the definition of the term "chemicals" which included fibres in some countries and posed problems. The Committee adopted the amendment as it improved the text. An amendment proposed by the Government member of Spain on behalf of Government members of member States of the EC to replace the word "preparations" by the words "their mixtures", in clause (b), was adopted. Consequently a further amendment by the Government members of member States of the EC to delete clause (c) that defined "preparations" was also adopted.

54. An amendment by the Workers' members to replace the word "mean" by the word "include" in clause (d) was referred to the Drafting Committee. The Workers' members proposed an amendment to replace the word "is" by the words "may constitute" in clause (d) which they considered to be wider in scope. The Employers' members and several Government members disagreed to this proposal on the grounds that the hazards of a chemical were determined by criteria, while some other Government members considered that the proposal improved the Office text. An agreed text of a subamendment was adopted to read:

the term "hazardous chemicals" should include any chemical which has been classified as hazardous in accordance with Point 9 or for which information exists to indicate that the chemical constitutes a physical or a health hazard.

The Employers' members withdrew an amendment to clause (d) as an agreed text had been adopted. An amendment introduced by the Government member of Hungary to insert the words "due to the effects caused by the chemical properties" in clause (d) was rejected. This was considered to weaken the already adopted subamendment.

55. An amendment by the Government member of Spain on behalf of the Government members of the member States of the EC to insert a new clause after (d) defining the term "branches of economic activity" was adopted without discussion.

56. Point 7, as amended, was adopted.

II. GENERAL PRINCIPLES

Point 8

57. The Workers' members introduced an amendment to insert a new paragraph with the same wording as in Article 4, paragraph 1, of the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981. They believed that national level action should be introduced into the instruments. After discussion, the amendment as subamended to delete the word "national" before the word "policy" was adopted.

58. Point 8, as amended, was adopted.

III. PREVENTIVE AND PROTECTIVE MEASURES

Classification

59. The representative of the United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP) referred to the relevance of the work of the Committee to the ongoing activities of UNEP and, in particular, to the activities of the ILO/UNEP/WHO inter-agency International Programme on Chemical Safety (IPCS) and the International Register of Potentially Toxic Chemicals (IRPTC) of UNEP. He summarised the results of an IRPTC survey of classification systems in 98 countries and listed several criteria used in classification which also varied according to the purpose. He observed that efforts to further the harmonisation of feasible classification systems were needed.

60. The representative of the United Nations in Geneva recalled the development of the United Nations system for classification and labelling of dangerous goods in transport. He proposed that the Committee should take into consideration the already existing international instruments with regard to classification and labelling of dangerous goods during its deliberations on Points 9 and 10.

61. The Government members of the German Democratic Republic and the USSR withdrew an amendment that proposed to insert a new paragraph to the effect that chemicals should be classified according to their hazards.

62. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to insert the words "applied or newly" after the words "should be" and replace the word "applied" by the word "extended" in paragraph (1) to take into account the existing criteria and systems for classification that are applied in several countries. The Workers' members withdrew their opposition to the proposal based on the discussion during which several governments supported the amendment. The amendment was adopted. Consequently the Government members of the German Democratic Republic and the USSR and the Government member of Argentina withdrew their amendments that proposed deleting the word "progressively". An amendment by the Government member of Argentina to add the word "specific" before the word "criteria" was adopted. She proposed another amendment to insert the word "all" before the word "chemicals". The Employers' members noted the need to analyse all chemicals to ascertain the hazardous properties but stressed that all chemicals were not hazardous. The amendment was adopted. A proposal by the Employers' members to take note of the existing systems of criteria was adopted. The Government member of the United States withdrew two amendments that sought to delete the words "according to the type and degree of hazards inherent in their use at work" and to insert a new sentence to give effect also to both acute and chronic health hazards in favour of an amendment proposed by the Government members of member States of the EC. The latter amendment proposed to replace the words "hazards inherent in their use at work" by the words "their intrinsic hazards". The amendment was adopted and the Employers' members withdrew an amendment that proposed to delete the words that were replaced by the EC amendment that was adopted.

63. The Government member of Spain on behalf of the Government members of member States of the EC withdrew an amendment that sought to insert a new paragraph to the effect that criteria and classification of chemicals be based on those systems already in existence.

64. The Employers' members withdrew an amendment that proposed to introduce the words "or continue to be applied" after the words "established" in paragraph (2) on the understanding that this concept was implicit in the document. This was confirmed by the representative of the Secretary-General. The Workers' members proposed an amendment that sought to introduce the concept that best prevailing national or international standards should be applied in establishing criteria for classification. The Employers' members opposed the amendment on the grounds that a judgement on conflicting standards would be subjective and also that the ILO Constitution provided for the implementation of national legislation deemed to be more favourable to the workers concerned. Several Government members also opposed the amendment which was withdrawn. The Government member of Brazil submitted an amendment which essentially proposed to transfer Point 23 in the proposed Conclusions with a view to a Recommendation to paragraph (2). The Committee felt that criteria for classification was more appropriate to a Recommendation. The amendment was withdrawn.

65. The Government members of Australia and Canada submitted an amendment to introduce a new paragraph which would clarify that classification should be based on available information. The amendment was withdrawn after a discussion.

66. Point 9, as amended, was adopted.

Point 10

67. The Employers' members submitted a proposal, in agreement with the Workers' members, to introduce a complete different text replacing the whole Point 10 by subamending two separate amendments to paragraph (1) introduced by the two groups. The Employers' members explained the rationale for the proposal as it: established a labelling system for all hazardous chemicals; made a requirement for marking those chemicals not classified as hazardous; made possible the evaluation of chemicals to assess the properties as hazardous or otherwise; required a more stringent review of labelling systems; and ensured provision of information on the identity of products. The Workers' members strongly supported the joint proposal. The Chairman agreed to convene an informal tripartite group as proposed by the Employers' members and by several Government members to examine the subamendment introduced to Point 10. The text of the subamendment proposed by the informal group read:

10 (1) A hazardous chemical should be labelled so as to provide essential information regarding its identity, classification, the hazards it presents and the safety precautions to be observed.

10 (2) A chemical which is not a hazardous chemical should be marked so as to provide essential information concerning its identity and important properties.

10 (3) Requirements for labelling or marking chemicals, consistent with paragraphs 10 (1) and 10 (2) above, should be established by the competent authority, or by a body approved or recognised by the competent authority, in accordance with national or international standards.

68. The Government member of Ireland submitted a further subamendment to the proposed text: to delete the word "hazardous" and insert the words "which has been classified as hazardous" after the word "chemical" in paragraph (1); to replace the words "is not a hazardous chemical" by the words "has not been classified as hazardous" in paragraph (2); and to replace the words beginning with the words "provide essential information" to the end of the paragraph (2) by the words "indicate that it has been labelled with regard to national laws on classification and labelling of chemicals". He stressed that labelling of chemicals not classified as hazardous should be labelled according to national laws. There was a lengthy debate during which some Government members urged the Committee to adopt the text proposed by the informal tripartite group. The Employers' and Workers' members reiterated that the proposal was the best compromise formula, which might be further improved during the second discussion next year. The subamendment proposed by the tripartite informal group was adopted. The Workers' members pointed out that many workers had been killed by chemicals which had not been considered hazardous by their suppliers, and reminded the Committee that the Bhopal tragedy was caused when water, a chemical not normally considered hazardous, entered the wrong vessel. The Workers' members further stressed the need for independent reviews of a chemical's hazards to ensure that the supplier had properly evaluated it. Therefore, workers need to know at least the identity and all important properties of all chemicals used at work.

69. Point 10, as amended, was adopted.

70. The Government members of Australia and Canada withdrew two amendments that sought to introduce detailed information about each hazardous chemical on safety data sheets in favour of an amendment by Workers' members, for which the Employers' and Workers' members had proposed a subamendment to replace the whole Point 11. The proposal was based primarily on the need for information on hazardous chemicals. Nevertheless, workers needed to receive written information, through their employers, on chemicals whose hazardous properties have not been established or recognised. Some Government members expressed their views on the subamendment. In particular, the Government member of Hungary stressed that the Committee should always be mindful of the definition of "chemicals" as already adopted in Point 7. The Employers' members noted that the subamendment reiterated their obligation to provide essential information to safeguard workers' health. The Chairman agreed to constitute a working party to examine this subamendment to Point 11 and invited representatives from governments who had submitted amendments to this Point to participate. Before adjournment, and at the request of the Chairman, the Workers' members tabled a subamendment to their amendment to Point 12, drafted jointly by the Employers' and Workers' members, to replace Point 12. The Working Party, which was enlarged to accommodate Government members who had submitted amendments to Point 12, proposed texts for both Points 11 and 12 after their deliberations. The Government member of Canada suggested that difficulty might be encountered in legislating on non-hazardous chemicals since in that country chemicals are regulated under the Hazardous Products Act.

71. The text of the proposed subamendment for Point 11, submitted by the Working Party, read:

11 (1) For hazardous chemicals, chemical safety data sheets containing detailed essential information regarding the identity, classification, hazards, safety precautions and emergency procedures should be provided to employers.

11 (2) Add, at the end of paragraph (2) of the Office text, the words "and procedures".

11 (3) For chemicals which are not hazardous chemicals, information sheets containing the identity and important properties should be provided to employers through new or existing documentation.

The Employers' and Workers' members recalled that the explanations given by them before the Working Party was constituted were the reasons for agreeing to the proposed revised text that also included relevant proposals made by Government members. Employers' members further recalled that the proposed paragraph (3) responded to the concern for access to information on non-hazardous chemicals. A motion by the Government member of Spain on behalf of the Government members of member States of the EC to adjourn the sitting was withdrawn and replaced by a second motion to refer the decision on these points to the next sitting of the Committee.

72. The Committee resumed the examination of the proposed subamendment to Point 11 at its next sitting. The Government member of the Federal Republic of Germany, on behalf of the Government members of member States of the EC, proposed a subamendment to paragraph (3) of the text of the Working Party and sought to replace the words "which are not hazardous chemicals" by the words "not covered by 11 (1)" and insert the words "relevant occupational health and safety" after the word "properties". These proposals were considered necessary to overcome legal obstacles in implementation. The Employers' and Workers' members supported the subamendment. The Government member of Australia moved a further subamendment to a proposal by the Government member of the Federal Republic of Germany on behalf of the Government members of member States of the EC to replace the word "occupational" by the word "worker" to avoid introducing a new word, "occupational", to the instruments. Questions of procedure were raised as to whether such wording should be referred to a Drafting Committee and also the right to re-introduce a subamendment that had been withdrawn. This was provided for in the Standing Orders and the Employers' and Workers' members and Government members of member States of the EC agreed to substitute the word "occupational" by the word "worker".

73. Point 11, as subamended, was adopted.

Point 12

74. The Working Party proposed a text to replace Point 12. This was a revision to a subamendment proposed by the Workers' members. Opening this debate the Workers' members stated that the subamendment proposed to separate the two general requirements placed upon the supplier in the Office text; namely to supply information on: chemicals classified as hazardous according to 10 (1) and 11 (1), and on non-hazardous chemicals by way of markings supplemented by information sheets. The text proposed by the Working Party to replace Point 12 read:

12 (1) A supplier of hazardous chemicals should be required to ensure that:

(a) such chemicals are labelled in accordance with 10 (1);

(b) employers are provided with data sheets in accordance with 11 (1).

12 (2) A supplier of chemicals which are not hazardous chemicals, should be required to ensure that:

(a) such chemicals are marked in accordance with 10 (2);

(b) employers are provided with information sheets in accordance with 11 (3).

12 (3) A supplier of chemicals which have not been classified in accordance with Point 9 should be required to identify the chemicals he supplies and assess their properties, based on a search of available information, in order to determine whether they are hazardous chemicals and to classify them in accordance with any system established by the competent authority under Point 9.

The Workers' members stressed that the term "supplier" included a manufacturer, importer or distributor as well as other parties in the chain through which chemicals reached employers and considered the words to be redundant. The spokesman of the Government members of member States of the EC submitted the following subamendments to the text proposed by the Working Party: replace the words "hazardous chemicals" in paragraph (2) by the words "covered by 12 (1)" and replace the words "are marked" in clause (2) (a) by the words "bear essential information". These subamendments were adopted. The Government member of Canada withdrew a subamendment to paragraph (3) that proposed rewording for the purpose of clarity as the Employers' and Workers' members preferred to retain the text proposed by the Working Party that had debated fully the issues before a consensus had been reached.

75. An amendment by the Government members of Australia and Canada to introduce a new paragraph to provide for periodic revision of labels and chemical safety data sheets was adopted unopposed.

76. There was a lengthy discussion on an amendment proposed by the Workers' members seeking to impose a duty on an exporter of chemicals who exported chemicals that are banned or restricted in the exporting country, to disclose to the importer the circumstances surrounding those events. The Employers' members strongly opposed the amendment and argued that this was a matter for other international agreements between governments and that Points 10, 11 and 12 fully covered the information requirements in the proposed instruments. The Government member of Spain, speaking on behalf of the Government members of member States of the EC, also opposed the amendment as other international instruments covered this aspect and supported consideration of the idea in a Recommendation. The Government member of Zimbabwe, also on behalf of Botswana, Kenya and Malawi, felt that Point 12 covered the duties of exporters in this regard. The Government members of Brazil, Côte d'Ivoire, India, Islamic Republic of Iran, Lebanon and Turkey supported the amendment as they considered that such information was necessary for developing countries to provide improved protection to users of hazardous chemicals. A subamendment proposed by Workers' members to restrict the requirement of information only to safety and health aspects of hazardous chemicals was rejected by the Employers' members. A proposal by the Government member of Sweden and that of Zimbabwe, the latter also on behalf of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi and Zambia, to transfer the substance of the amendment for consideration in the proposed Conclusions with a view to a Recommendation was opposed by the Government members of Brazil, Burundi, Côte d'Ivoire, Gabon and Lebanon. The Workers' members also felt strongly that the amendment should be retained in a Convention. The Employers' members reiterated their strong opposition and they moved that the amendment be transferred to a Point in the proposed Conclusions with a view to a Recommendation where it could be discussed and subamended at that time. In the light of the strong opposition of the Employers' members against any Convention that contained this Point, the Workers' members stated that they would reluctantly agree with the voting instead of losing any reference to it in either the Convention or the Recommendation. The motion was voted and carried with 243,389 votes in favour, 39,839 against with 6,204 abstentions.

77. Point 12, as amended, was adopted.

New Point (after Point 12)

78. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to introduce a parallel responsibility on employers to co-operate as Point 17 imposed a duty on workers to co-operate with employers in the following terms: "Employers should co-operate as closely as possible with workers and workers' organisations in discharging their duties with respect to safety in the use of chemicals." The Employers' members proposed subamendments that sought to: replace the word "organisations" with "and their representatives within the undertaking" to reflect ILO terminology and insert the words "at work" after the word "chemicals". The Government member of Ireland, on behalf of the Government members of member States of the EC, submitted another subamendment to: insert the words ", in discharging their duties" after the word "Employers" and replace the words "and workers' organisations" by the words "or workers' representatives". The Workers' members agreed to the first part of the subamendment but disagreed to replace the word "and" by "or" before "workers organisations". After some discussion the amendment, adopted as subamended, read:

Employers, in discharging their duties, should co-operate as closely as possible with workers or their representatives in the undertaking in discharging their duties with respect to safety in the use of chemicals at work.

New Point (after Point 12)

79. The Workers' members proposed another amendment as a new point to the effect that "Employers should be required to ensure that all chemicals in the workplace are labelled and that safety data sheets are available to workers and workers' organisations." The Workers' members explained that they needed to subamend their amendment which they had submitted before Points 10, 11 and 12 were adopted. The amendment, as subamended, was adopted and it read:

Employers should be required to ensure that all chemicals used at work are labelled or marked in accordance with Point 10 and that safety data sheets or information sheets prepared in accordance with Point 11 are available to workers and their representatives.

Point 13

80. The Government member of Côte d'Ivoire withdrew an amendment that proposed to make suppliers, as well as employers, responsible for relabelling because a majority of the Committee members viewed that the amendment was redundant. Employers' members proposed an amendment to introduce wording to the effect that relabelling should also apply only to hazardous chemicals when transferred from labelled containers to unlabelled ones as the focus of the proposed ILO instruments was on hazardous chemicals. The Workers' members opposed on the grounds that the Committee had already adopted Points to enable identification of non-hazardous chemicals by marking. The Chairman disallowed other proposals to amend the whole Point 13 which were not subamendments to the amendment tabled. He then proceeded to call for a vote on the amendment at which point the Employers' members withdrew their amendment. In reply to questions on procedure, the Chairman ruled that the Standing Orders had been followed. An amendment proposed by the Employers' members to replace the words "such other containers . . . in order to" by the words "the containers are identified in a manner which will", because such wording better suited practical work situations, was adopted unopposed. Workers' members proposed an amendment to extend relabelling to equipment. After discussion, the amendment was adopted on the understanding that the term "equipment" meant process equipment in a chemical plant. An amendment by the Government member of Côte d'Ivoire to extend the information supplied and to cover action to be taken in case of accident was subamended in the wording of Point 11 (1) to read "safety precautions and emergency procedures" was adopted.

81. Point 13, as subamended, was adopted.

New Point (after Point 13)

82. An amendment by the Government members of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi, Zambia and Zimbabwe to introduce a new Point to the effect that empty containers of hazardous chemicals should be disposed of in a safe manner was adopted. The Workers' members remarked that inclusion of the term "in accordance with national law and practice" in the amendment may be irrelevant as such provisions did not exist in many countries.

Point 14

83. The Government member of the United States introduced an amendment to replace the Office text by new wording that she believed would enable employers to rely on the information provided by the supplier. The text, as proposed, read:

Employers receiving hazardous chemicals that have not been labelled as required, and for which chemical safety data sheets have not been provided, must obtain such information from the supplier as soon as possible, and should not use the chemical until such information is obtained.

The Employers' members and Government members of member States of the EC preferred the Office text. The Workers' members supported the amendment as they considered it improved the Office text. A subamendment to delete the word "hazardous" in the subamendment was accepted as the Points already adopted required information to be supplied on all chemicals; only the extent and type of information supplied varied according to the nature of the hazards of chemicals. The Workers' members considered that the new wording guaranteed that information was made available to the employers at the appropriate time to ensure workers' protection. The Employers' members agreed with the concept and a proposal to subamend the amendment by inserting the words "or from other reasonably available sources" after the word "supplier" that sought not to restrict the employers' access to valid information from elsewhere or through his own research was adopted. Further subamendments proposed to insert: the words "under Point 11" after the word "required" in the second line; the words "under Point 12" after the word "provided" in the third line; the words "or information sheets" after the words "data sheets" in the second line; and the words "or marked" after the word "labelled" in the first line were adopted. The finally adopted subamended version to replace Point 14 in the Office text read:

Employers receiving chemicals that have not been labelled or marked as required under Point 10, and for which chemical safety data sheets or information sheets have not been provided under Point 11, must obtain such information from the supplier or other reasonably available sources as soon as possible, and should not use the chemical until such information is obtained.

84. The spokesman for the Government members of member States of the EC proposed an amendment in two parts as a new paragraph to Point 14. The first part that sought to require the employer to use non-dangerous chemicals as far as this was possible was withdrawn as this concept was addressed in Point 15. The second part of the amendment sought to ensure that whenever dangerous chemicals were used the employers should be required to use only those correctly labelled and classified. The Employers' members opposed introducing the words "dangerous" and "correctly" in the text and reiterated that the principle of operational control belonged to Point 15. However, the Employers' members agreed to discuss the amendment on the understanding that the matter be referred to the Drafting Committee to decide the order of Points. The Chairman decided to refer the matter to the Drafting Committee. Government members of member States of the EC accepted subamendments proposed by the Employers' members to their amendment: to delete the word "correctly"; and to replace the word "dangerous" by "hazardous". Further subamendments were proposed by the Government member of Lebanon to the effect that chemicals are labelled according to Point 10 and then classified according to Point 9. The Employers' members noted that Point 9 addressed a different concept but did not oppose the subamendments. The amendment, as subamended and adopted, read:

Where hazardous chemicals are used the employers should ensure that only the chemicals which are classified in accordance with Point 9 and labelled in accordance with Point 10 are used and that the necessary precautions are taken when they are used.

85. The Workers' member submitted an amendment to introduce a new paragraph to Point 14 to the effect that employers maintain a register of chemicals used in the workplace cross-referenced to the safety data sheets. The Employers' members proposed a subamendment to limit the register to hazardous chemicals and insert the word "chemical" before the words "safety data sheets". A further subamendment by the Government member of Australia that sought to make the register accessible to all workers was also accepted. The Workers' members proposed that the scope of chemicals be limited to exclude "articles". The Employers' members proposed that this could be done by the Committee Drafting Committee when considering Point 7, and this was accepted. The amendment, as subamended, was adopted.

86. Point 14, as amended, was adopted.

87. The Employers' members proposed an amendment to introduce the term "as far as is reasonably practicable" after the words "to protect workers" and stated that this language was not uncommon in ILO standards. The Workers' members disagreed but were willing to consider wording to the effect that employers took appropriate and reasonable practicable measures to protect workers. The Government members of Australia, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Hungary, Lebanon and Government members of the member States of the EC preferred the Office text. The amendment was withdrawn. An amendment by the Government member of the United Kingdom on behalf of the Government members of member States of the EC to replace the word "hazard" by the word "risk" was adopted unopposed. As the measures listed in the clauses in Point 15 were not all inclusive, an amendment proposed by the Employers' members to replace the word "including" with the words "such as" was also adopted unopposed.

88. The Employers' members proposed to replace clause 1 (a) by the term "the identification and use of viable, alternative chemicals which would clearly reduce the hazard". The Workers' members preferred retaining the Office text and this view was shared by the Government members of Cyprus, Hungary, Lebanon and Turkey. The Employers' members argued that the risk was related to the manner of use of a chemical and the least hazardous chemical might present a higher level of risk under the varying circumstances of its use. The Government member of Zimbabwe, also on behalf of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi and Zambia, counter-argued that the subject under discussion was the type of chemicals used and not the manner to which they are used. The Government member of Australia proposed to subamend clause (1) (a) by deleting the words "of the least hazardous" and inserting the words "that minimise the risk" at the end of the clause. This subamendment was adopted.

89. The Government members of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi, Zambia and Zimbabwe submitted an amendment to insert the words "at no cost to the worker" after the word "provision" in clause (1) (e) as personal protective equipment should be supplied by the employer. The Employers' members preferred such wording to be placed in a Recommendation; an unlimited supply of protective clothing and equipment might leave room for abuse. The Workers' members and the Government members of member States of the EC and Cyprus supported the amendment which was adopted. The Government member of Cyprus introduced an amendment to the effect that personal protective equipment should be maintained and proposed deleting the word "use" in clause (1) (e). The Government members of Gabon, Swaziland and Zimbabwe, the latter also on behalf of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi and Zambia, and the Government members of member States of the EC viewed that both the use and maintenance of equipment were equally important. The Committee adopted the subamendment to retain the word "use" and insert the words "proper maintenance" after the word "use" in clause (1) (e).

90. The Employers' members withdrew an amendment that proposed deleting the words "where recourse to the above measures is not practicable" in favour of an amendment submitted by the Workers' members to replace the words "is not practicable" by the words "does not suffice to eliminate the hazard" if the latter group agreed to subamend their amendment to replace the word "hazard" by the word "risk". The amendment as subamended was adopted.

91. An amendment proposed by the Government members of Australia and Canada to replace clause (1) (b) by the term "provide first-aid facilities" and introduce it in paragraph (2) was subamended by the Employers' members by deleting the word "facilities". They considered that scope of providing "facilities" was too broad. The amendment as subamended was adopted.

92. The Workers' members submitted an amendment that sought to introduce an additional obligation on the employer to provide treatment for injuries and illness caused by chemicals at work where this treatment was not provided through other means. They argued that there was a need to provide treatment to an injured worker by the employer, particularly in instances where the workplace was very remote from a hospital or treatment facility. The Employers' members strongly opposed the amendment as the treatment and hospital care came within the purview of social security and compensation schemes. The Government members of member States of the EC, Brazil, Hungary and Swaziland also opposed the amendment which was withdrawn.

93. An amendment by the Government members of Australia and Canada to insert the words "provision of" at the beginning of clause (g) and transfer it to paragraph (2) was subamended to replace the words "provision of" by the word "provide" and adopted.

94. The Government member of Spain on behalf of the Government members of member States of the EC introduced a new clause to paragraph (1) which was subamended to read "the adoption of adequate occupational hygiene measures" and adopted although the Employers' members believed that the previous clauses, already adopted, provided for such measures.

95. The Government member of the United States proposed an amendment to renumber paragraph (2) as a new Point after Point 15 with a title "Information and Training" and replace clause (b) by two separate clauses because of the importance she attached to information and training of workers. The proposed amendment sought to expand the Office text on instructions about both how to obtain information and use them in safe practice. The Workers' members supported the amendment which they proposed to subamend to the effect that training of workers should be on a continuing basis. The subamended text as adopted read:

instruct the workers regarding how to obtain and use the information provided on labels and chemical safety data sheets; and on a continuing basis, train the workers regarding the practices and procedures to be followed to use the chemicals safely.

The title was to be determined by the Drafting Committee.

96. The Workers' members withdrew an amendment that sought to extend the provision of training to subcontract workers in paragraph (2), clause (b), after the Employers' members stressed that subcontractors were also employers to whom the provisions of the paragraph applied.

97. An amendment by the Government members of member States of the EC proposed a new clause after paragraph (2) to introduce an obligation on the employers to minimise exposure to chemicals to a level necessary for the protection of workers' health. The Employers' members opposed the amendment and pointed out that the question of exposure was dealt with elsewhere in the instrument. The Workers' members and some Government members supported the amendment and observed that order of points be referred to a drafting committee. The Employers' members proposed a subamendment to limit the scope of the provision to hazardous chemicals which was accepted. The amendment as subamended was adopted.

98. Point 15, as subamended, was adopted.

99. The Government members of Australia and Canada proposed to replace the term "generally recognised exposure limits" in clause (a) to refer specifically to the established limits that were recognised and applied according to national or international standards. The amendment was adopted.

100. An amendment by the Government members of Australia and Canada to insert the words "and record" after the word "monitor" in clause (b) was adopted. The Government member of Argentina withdrew an amendment that proposed to delete the words "when this is necessary" in clause (b). An amendment by the Government member of Cyprus to replace the words "this is necessary" by the words "required by the competent authority" was opposed by some Government members and was withdrawn. The Government member of Argentina withdrew an amendment that proposed to insert words to the effect that records of monitoring be kept and made accessible to workers in favour of subamending an amendment proposed by the Government members of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi, Zambia and Zimbabwe. They sought to introduce a new Point after Point 16 to ensure that records of monitoring be kept for a prescribed period. This was subamended to inroduce the similar wording in the amendment withdrawn by the Government of Argentina, adopted and referred to the Drafting Committee.

101. The Workers' members proposed an amendment to introduce a provision for medical surveillance of workers exposed to chemical hazards as a new clause to Point 16. After a discussion, and an explanation by the Representative of the Secretary-General that the Office refrained from reproducing text, in already existing ILO Conventions for greater flexibility in ratification, the amendment was withdrawn.

102. Point 16, as amended, was adopted.

New Point (after Point 16)

103. The Government member of Argentina submitted an amendment to propose a new Point to the effect that monitoring of exposure be the responsibility of the labour inspection services and for the establishment of safety and health committees to control the application of the provisions in Point 16. The amendment was withdrawn after a discussion during which some Government members opposed it.

Point 17

104. The Government member of Spain, on behalf of the Government members of member States of the EC, withdrew an amendment to Point 17 that proposed to include the concept of agreed-upon procedures and practices for co-operation between employers and workers, as this was opposed by the majority. The Committee agreed to refer to the Drafting Committee: firstly, an amendment proposed by the Workers' members that sought to introduce the concept of joint responsibility of all parties to co-operate in matters of safety and health; secondly, an amendment by the Government member of Côte d'Ivoire to revise the French language text of Point 17; and thirdly, an amendment by the Employers' members to transfer Point 18, as a paragraph, to Point 17.

105. Noting that the Drafting Committee would examine the question of transferring Point 18 to Point 17, the Employers' members submitted an amendment whereby they sought to impose an obligation on workers to take "necessary" steps to minimise risk to himself, his fellow workers and the employer. The Employers' members explained that a worker who removed himself from work in the face of serious danger should take "reasonable" steps such as shutting down a plant. The Workers' members argued that if workers had such an obligation, they should also have a right and proposed inserting wording to this effect. The Workers' members also argued that the language of the proposed amendment was extremely biased and might convey a legal obligation for a worker to shut down a machine or a process where the machine or process seemed to create a risk even where the employer disagreed. The Government member of Australia proposed to subamend the amendment proposed by the Employers' members by substituting the words "has an obligation to" by the word "should" and replacing the word "necessary" by the word "reasonable". This subamendment was accepted and the text, as adopted, read:

A worker should take all reasonable steps to minimise risk from the use of chemicals as it affects himself, other workers and his employer.

106. Point 17, as amended, was adopted.

New Point (after Point 17)

107. The Workers' members introduced an amendment that sought to empower the competent authority, at the national level, to prohibit or restrict the manufacture, import or use of certain chemicals or require advance notice before such chemicals were used. The Employers' members stressed that this was implicit. The Government members of Hungary and Zimbabwe, the latter also on behalf of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi and Zambia, observed that "manufacture or import" were already covered and proposed deleting such words in the amendment as well as to limit the provision to hazardous chemicals. The proposed new Point, subamended and adopted after some discussion, read as follows:

The competent authority should have the power to prohibit or restrict the use of certain hazardous chemicals, or to require advance notice and authorisation before such chemicals are used.

It was decided that the title, as well as the order of Points in Conclusions, should be determined by the Drafting Committee.

Point 18

108. There was a lengthy discussion on an amendment proposed by the Government member of Turkey to insert the words "he has reasonable justification to believe" after the word "when" as the workers might not be able to determine an "imminent danger" with respect to hazardous chemicals. Some Government members noted that it would be difficult to transpose such provisions into national law and in reply to the Chairman as to why the same text as in the Safety and Health Convention was not proposed by the Office, the representative of the Secretary-General explained that some flexibility in the wording would facilitate ratification. The Workers' members withdrew their amendment for other similar wording to the amendment under discussion, at which stage the Committee deferred its decision on this amendment and proceeded to examine two other amendments to Point 18, by the Government members of the German Democratic Republic and the USSR and also by the Workers' members, which sought to delete the word "imminent". They pointed out that chemical exposures would have latent effects. The Government member of Hungary proposed a subamendment to retain the word "imminent" and replace the word "danger" by "risk" on the understanding that with respect to chronic health hazards the risk could be imminent even though the disease might not develop for many years. This subamendment was accepted.

109. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to introduce wording to the effect that a worker should have a right not to use the chemicals where adequate information had not been provided to him and also a right to remove himself without fear of disciplinary action when there was an imminent danger. The Employers' members strongly opposed the amendment as these were new concepts. The provision of adequate information has been dealt with fully in the Points already adopted. They had also acceded to the right of a worker to remove himself from danger. The Workers' members cited examples of accidents caused in instances where workers were denied information and agreed to retain the text as they considered that denial of information was reasonable justification to believe that a worker was at risk. The Government members of Hungary, Turkey, Zimbabwe, the latter also on behalf of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi and Zambia, and the Government members of member States of the EC also opposed the amendment which was withdrawn in support of reverting to discussion of the amendment proposed by the Government member of Turkey. This amendment as subamended to retain the word "imminent" and replace the word "danger" by "risk" was adopted.

110. A proposal by the Government members of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi, Zambia and Zimbabwe to add the words "and the duty to inform his supervisor immediately" at the end of Point 18 was adopted after some discussion.

111. Point 18, as amended, was adopted.

Point 19

112. An amendment by the Workers' members to insert the words "and their representatives" after the word "Workers" was adopted.

113. A proposal by the Employers' members to insert after the words "hazardous chemicals" in clause (a) the words "consistent with the protection of genuine confidential business information" was adopted together with an amendment by the Workers' members to delete the word "hazardous". The word "composition" was replaced by the word "identity" by a further subamendment to the Workers' amendment and referred to the Drafting Committee to decide on a text similar to that in Point 6 to include wording to the effect that worker safety and health was not compromised.

114. Two amendments submitted by the Government members of Australia and Canada to introduce new clauses "education and training" and "labels and chemicals data sheets" were adopted noting that the latter amendment be examined by the Drafting Committee to determine if it was repetitive. Another amendment by the Workers' members that sought to introduce the workers' right to receive other information required by the Convention, while safeguarding the confidentiality of medical records was also adopted.

115. Point 19, as amended, was adopted.

TITLES OF SECTIONS

116. Several amendments that proposed to change the titles of the various sections of the Proposed Conclusions with a view to a Convention were referred to the Drafting Committee.

Proposed Conclusions with a view to a Recommendation

I. GENERAL PROVISIONS

Point 20

117. Point 20 was adopted without change.

Point 21

118. Point 21 was adopted without change.

Point 22

119. The Workers' members withdrew an amendment to replace the Office text in favour of an amendment proposed by the Government members of the German Democratic Republic and the USSR. The amendment, subamended to replace the word "persons" by the word "workers", was adopted after a discussion during which there was consensus that "specified chemicals" referred to hazardous ones. The text as adopted read:

The competent authority should specify categories of workers, which are not allowed to use specified chemicals or to use these only under conditions as prescribed in accordance with national laws and regulations.

120. Point 22, as amended, was adopted.

Point 23

121. An amendment proposed by the spokesman of the Government members of member States of the EC, to insert the words "including both acute and chronic health effects, in all target organs" in clause (a) was adopted after the Workers' members withdrew a similar amendment. A proposal by the Government member of the United States that sought to specify the listing in clause (b) as chemical or physical characteristics was subamended and adopted to read as "chemical or physical characteristics" at the beginning of the clause and to insert "dangerously reactive" before "properties". An amendment by the Workers' members to introduce synergistic effects of chemicals in clause (b) was adopted to be included in Point 27.

122. Point 23, as amended, was adopted.

Point 24

123. There was a lengthy discussion on paragraph (1) to which many amendments had been moved. The Employers' and Workers' members stressed the importance of maintaining a national inventory of chemicals; a question to which 68 out of 70 Governments had replied in the affirmative. The Government members of Australia and Canada, the United States, and the Government members of member States of the EC expressed concern that establishing a national inventory would not be feasible and proposed subamendments to the effect that the supplier or the employer should be responsible for compiling a list of chemicals used at the workplace. The Government members of Botswana, China, Malawi, Kenya, Lebanon, Turkey, Zambia and Zimbabwe stated that a national list should be maintained. Several amendments were proposed to the wording of the Office text to accommodate the dichotomy of views. These included replacing the words "national inventory" by the words "consolidated list" as proposed by the Workers' members and the Government member of India and inserting terms to the effect that the responsibility for the list rested with the competent authority "as far as is reasonably practicable" as proposed by the Employers' members. Other amendments qualified the word "chemicals" by inserting the words "elements and compounds". After a lengthy discussion, the Employers' sub-amendment to paragraph (1), as subamended, was adopted.

124. Several amendments to paragraph (2) were also either withdrawn or rejected. Two amendments proposed by the Employers' members to replace the words "inventory" by the word "list" in the second and third lines were adopted as subamended to replace the word "national" by the word "consolidated". An amendment submitted by the Workers' members to insert the words "prior to manufacture or import" after the word "authority" was subamended by them to replace the word "import" by the words "or use at work" and adopted. They agreed that the competent authority required such information to ensure implementation of the provisions in the instruments. The Employers' members proposed to include the words "consistent with the protection of genuine confidential business information" at the end of paragraph (2). They considered that the provision was consistent with standard practice and was important. It was subamended by the Workers' members to insert the words "in a manner" at the beginning of the amendment to clarify that the obligation was not meant to restrict the requirement to transmit information. The amendment, as subamended, was adopted.

Point 25

125. An amendment proposed by the Employers' members to insert the word "hazardous" before "chemicals" in the first line in paragraph (1) was adopted. A proposal by the Government member of Australia to replace the word "employer" by the words "persons handling or using chemicals" in paragraph (1) was also adopted. An amendment by Employers' members to replace the word "ordering" by "receiving" in paragraph (1) on the grounds that ordering meant the act of buying was adopted.

126. A proposal by the Employers' members to insert the words "in consistence with existing national or international systems" in paragraph (2) was adopted.

127. The Workers' members proposed an amendment to replace subclause (ii) to expand its coverage to names of hazardous and other major ingredients in accordance with internationally recognised nomenclature as they considered the name of a chemical was not informative enough to enable reference being made to literature on toxicology. The Employers' members argued that the purpose of a label was to allow identification of the products and referred to their amendments that proposed inserting the word "common" before the word "name" and the words "or material identities" after it. During a lengthy discussion the Government member of Côte d'Ivoire supported the amendment by the Workers' members as he believed that chemicals needed to be specified. The Government members of member States of the EC and the Government member of Cyprus proposed to subamend deleting reference to other major ingredients. The Government member of Canada stated that a label should alert the reader. A clutter of words in a label would defeat this purpose. He also noted that a list of ingredients was necessary, which should be found in the chemical safety data sheet. The Employers' members and the Government member of Australia and the United States shared this view. The Workers' members counter-argued that even small containers of pharmaceutical products listed the main ingredients and maintained that workers needed to have a list of ingredients in the label as workers might not, always, have access to chemical safety data sheets. When the discussion resumed at the next session, the Workers' members proposed a subamendment to replace the word "name" by the word "identity" in sub-clause (ii) which was adopted.

128. An amendment by the Workers' members to insert the words "involved with the use" in subclause (v), which they thought was required to bring the text in line with proposed Conclusions with a view to a Convention, was adopted.

129. A proposal by the Workers' members to extend the provision in subclause (vi) to include first aid was supported by the Employers' members on the understanding that detailed medical procedures were not intended in the label.

130. An amendment proposed by the Government member of Brazil to introduce the word "batch" as a new subclause to Point 25 (2) (a) was adopted as it was considered to be a useful reference in instances, such as, when a batch had to be recalled. The Workers' members proposed a new subclause in the words "the statement that a data sheet giving additional information is available from the employer or supplier" was subamended by deleting the words "or supplier" and adopted as the Employers' members also felt that the worker should obtain such data from the employer.

131. The Government member of Spain, on behalf of the Government members of member States of the EC, withdrew an amendment they had proposed to clause (b) to delete the word "durability" as it was opposed by the Workers' members.

132. An amendment proposed by the Government members of member States of the EC to include a new clause to Point 25 (2) in the wording that labels should be readily understood by the workers was adopted. The Government member of Brazil proposed an amendment to introduce, as a new clause, a provision whereby the size of the words of warning on the label were written in equal proportion to the name of a chemical. The amendment, supported by the Government members of Côte d'Ivoire and opposed by the Government members of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi, Zambia and Zimbabwe, Australia, Canada and Switzerland on the grounds that it was redundant, was withdrawn. An amendment by the Workers' members to introduce a new paragraph to the effect that the label for a chemical not deemed hazardous need contain only some criteria as listed in clause (a) was adopted.

133. Point 25, as amended, was adopted.

Point 26

134. An amendment by the Government members of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi, Zambia and Zimbabwe to ensure effective means of recognition of a container of hazardous chemicals that, for practical reasons, could not be labelled was adopted.

135. The Workers' members proposed to introduce a new paragraph to Point 26 to ensure that the hazards resulting from the use of a chemical should in all cases be indicated by appropriate wording or symbol on every container. Alternative wording proposed to the amendment was accepted and was adopted, as subamended.

136. Point 26, as amended, was adopted.

New Point (after Point 26)

137. The Government member of Spain, on behalf of the Government members of member States of the EC, proposed an amendment to introduce a new Point to the effect that publicity material on hazardous chemicals should also address their hazards as they considered that such information tended to be omitted during advertising. The Employers' members considered that such provisions should be a matter for commercial laws of a country. After a discussion, the amendment as subamended and adopted read: "Publicity material concerning hazardous chemicals intended for use at work should call attention to their hazards."

Point 27

138. The Committee decided to refer to the Drafting Committee a proposal by the Government members of the German Democratic Republic and the USSR that sought to replace the words "classified as hazardous" by the word "established".

139. The Government member of Spain, on behalf of the Government members of member States of the EC, proposed an amendment to replace the words "in particular on" by the words "such as". The Employers' members supported the amendment as it gave more flexibility while the Workers' members opposed it as it gave a possibility for a choice and exclusion of some of the criteria listed. The amendment, subamended and proposed by the Government member of Australia to replace the words in the Office text by the words "including if applicable" was adopted.

140. There was a lengthy discussion on an amendment proposed by the Workers' members to replace clause (a) by new wording to include the names of ingredients in descending order of concentration according to internationally agreed nomenclature. The Employers' members expressed concern over safeguarding genuine confidential business information and preferred an amendment proposed by the Government members of Australia and Canada to clause (a) which took care of their concern. The Government members of member States of the EC suggested limiting information to the hazardous components as proposed in their amendment. The Workers' members accepted to subamend their amendment to include reference to protection of genuine confidential business information in wording to the effect that workers' health was not compromised. The Workers' members presented a subamended text prepared by an informal working party composed of Government members of the United States and Canada, and Workers' and Employers' members that reflected the results of the discussion and suggested modifying clause (a) and inserting a new paragraph concerning confidential information. Some views were expressed concerning the length of this text and some ambiguity in wording but was adopted noting the possibility to revise it during the second discussion. The text of the new paragraph, as adopted, read:

Where the names of concentrations of the ingredients under (1) (a) constitute genuine confidential business information, they may be omitted from the chemical safety data sheet. In such cases, the information should be disclosed on request and in writing to the competent authority and to concerned employers, workers and their representatives who agree to use the information only for the protection of worker health and safety and not to otherwise disclose it.

141. An amendment by the Workers' members to add a new clause in Point 27 to insert the words "the trade name" was subamended by the Employers' members to read as "the trade or common name" was adopted as clause (a). The placing of the previously adopted text to clause (a) was to be decided by the Drafting Committee.

142. An amendment proposed by the Employers' members to qualify the word "physical" by inserting the word "likely" was subamended by the Workers' members to replace the word "likely" by the word "potential" and adopted. A proposal by the Government member of Brazil to insert the words "and exposure symptoms" at the end of clause (b) was subamended by the Workers' members to read "signs of exposure", adopted and referred to the Drafting Committee for including it in clause (k).

143. An amendment proposed by the Employers' members to add the word "likely" before the word "routes" in clause (c) was subamended by the Workers' members to replace the word "likely" by the word "potential" and adopted.

144. A proposal by the Government members of Australia and Canada to delete clause (a) was adopted as it was considered that Point 34 covered this aspect.

145. An amendment was proposed by the Government member of Brazil to include measures for storage and treatment of waste in clause (f). There was general support for the amendment. The Government members of Australia and Canada expressed concern that a supplier of chemicals would not be able to anticipate the methods of disposal after use. The Government members of Australia and Canada and the Employers' members replied that they had qualified Point 27 by the words "if applicable". Some Government members thought that the amendment was redundant because the definition of the term "use of chemicals" covered this subject. Others expressed a contrary view. A subamendment proposed by the Government members of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi, Zambia and Zimbabwe to include the word "disposal" was adopted.

146. Employers' members subamended their original proposal to delete clause (g) by retaining the words "work practices" as they considered that the supplier might have information on work practices but not on engineering controls. The Workers' members opposed on the grounds that many chemical safety data sheets contained information on engineering control measures. The amendment was withdrawn as Point 27 was qualified by the words "if applicable".

147. An amendment by the Government member of Brazil to insert the words "and fire" at the end of clause (i) was adopted.

148. A proposal by the Workers' members to include a new clause to read "the name, address and the phone number of the supplier or manufacturer" was adopted.

149. The Workers' members withdrew their amendment in favour of an amendment proposed by the Government member of the United States that had general support. Seconded by the Government members of Australia, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Liberia and Sweden the amendment proposed to introduce a new clause. This amendment was adopted and read: "Physical and chemical characteristics, such as flashpoint, odour threshold, and vapour pressure."

150. An amendment proposed by the Workers' members to Point 23 and deferred for discussion as a new clause of Point 27 to include the words "the possibility of synergism with other chemicals commonly used at work" was adopted.

151. An amendment by the Workers' members to include a new clause as "reactivity hazards" was adopted with some reservation by the Employers' members that the illustrations listed would be exhaustive, although the subject was important.

152. A further amendment by the Workers' members to introduce a new clause requiring information being made available to health personnel on medical treatment was subamended by the Employers' members to substitute the words "health personnel" by the words "medical professionals" and adopted.

153. A proposal by the Government member of Brazil to include a new clause in the words "methods of environmental monitoring" resulted in a discussion as to the terminology in occupational hygiene practice. In reply to subamendments proposed to reword the amendment as "methods of sampling and analysis" she maintained that her concern was monitoring exposure in the working environment. A subamendment proposed by the Employers' members to read "potential methods of monitoring workplace exposure" was adopted.

154. An amendment by the Government member of the United States to propose including the date of the preparation of the chemical safety data sheets noting that these were periodically updated was adopted; it ensured that the most recent information was used.

155. The Workers' members proposed an amendment to introduce a new clause to enable the competent authority to require additional information was adopted.

156. An amendment by the Workers' members to include a new paragraph that addressed information requirement concerning chemicals not deemed to be hazardous was subamended and adopted to correspond to the language of the text already adopted.

157. Point 27, as amended, was adopted.

New Point (before Point 28)

158. The Workers' members proposed to include a new Point that sought to require the member States to seek to ensure that carcinogenic, mutagenic, teratogenic, neurotoxic and other hazardous chemicals or processes were replaced with less hazardous ones.

The Employers' members opposed on the grounds that the proposal implied replacing processes, as well. They argued that the provisions were already covered in Point 15 as employers' obligations and in Point 29 as obligations of the competent authority. The Government members of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi, Zambia and Zimbabwe, the Government members of member States of the EC and Australia also opposed the amendment, which was withdrawn.

Point 28

159. The Employers' members withdrew an amendment that proposed to introduce the concept of "as far as is reasonably practicable" in operational control measures to be taken by the employers, because of strong opposition from several Government members and the Workers' members.

160. The Government member of Spain, on behalf of the Government members of member States of the EC, withdrew an amendment that proposed to replace the word "criteria" by the word "guide-lines" which they considered gave a greater flexibility; but the Workers' members opposed as they thought the guide-lines were voluntary information.

161. There was a lengthy discussion on a proposal by the Workers' members to introduce a paragraph that sought to impose a duty on a multinational employer or an employer that had establishments in countries other than his own to provide an equivalent level of protection with respect to use of chemicals at work in all establishments, without discrimination. The Employers' members opposed the wording in the amendment and proposed to either subamend the amendment to include reference to the Tripartite Declaration of Principles Concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy or use the wording in paragraph 39 of the Asbestos Recommendation. The Government member of Spain, on behalf of the Government members of member States of the EC, submitted as a subamendment the text of Paragraph 39 of the Asbestos Recommendation, replacing the word "asbestos" by "hazardous chemicals". The Workers' members suggested to use the wording in the Occupational Health Services Convention. The divided opinion in the Committee was resolved after lengthy discussion and the text as in paragraph 39 of the Asbestos Convention was suitably amended and adopted as a subamendment to the Workers' amendment.

162. Point 28, as amended, was adopted.

163. A proposal by the Employers' members to insert after the word "covering" the words "items such as" was subamended to replace the words "items such as" by the words "including, if applicable" and adopted.

164. The Government member of Spain, on behalf of the Government members of member States of the EC, proposed to replace the words "for safety" by the words "which require employers to take all appropriate safety measures" was subamended by the Employers' members to insert the words "and workers" after the words "employers". The Workers' members argued that such wording posed issues of dereliction of duty imposed by the employer vis-à-vis that by the competent authority. After a debate on the division of responsibilities and related issues, the amendment was withdrawn.

165. An amendment by the Workers' members to insert the words "acute or chronic diseases due to" after the word "risk" in clause (a) was adopted.

166. A proposal by the Government member of Brazil to insert the words "and eyes" after the word "skin" in clause (b) was adopted.

167. An amendment by the Workers' members to add the words "or unintended chemical reactions" in clause (c) was subamended to read as "chemical reactivity" and adopted.

168. The workers' members withdrew an amendment to replace the word "taken" by the word "including" in clause (d). The Employers' members withdrew an amendment in favour of an amendment proposed by the Government member of the United States that sought to replace the words "in the following order of preference" by the words "such as". Different views were expressed as to the feasibility and advantages of maintaining an order of preference and it was decided to delete the words "in the following order of preference" and refer the matter to the Drafting Committee.

169. A proposal by the Employers' members to delete subclause (ii) and move it to Point 30 was adopted.

170. An amendment by the Government members of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi, Zambia and Zimbabwe to insert the words "provision and maintenance" before the word "use" in subclause (vi) for consistency with Point 15 was adopted. A proposal by the Government member of Brazil to insert the word "suitable" after the word "of" in clause (vi) was also adopted. An amendment by the Workers' members to the effect that the use of personal protective equipment and clothing was conditional upon the inadequacy of other methods of protection was subamended to be consistent with the wording of Point 15 and adopted.

171. The Government members of the German Democratic Republic and the USSR withdrew an amendment that sought to introduce a new subclause with the wording "the requirements to the behaviour of workers" as it was considered to be already covered in the proposed instruments.

172. Point 29, as amended, was adopted.

Point 30

173. An amendment proposed by the Government members of Australia and Canada to delete the word "hazardous" in Point 30 supported by the Workers' members was subamended after much discussion to retain the word "hazardous" and replace the word "covering" by the words "including, if applicable".

174. A proposal by the Workers' members to insert the words "and relabelling" after the word "labelling" in subclause (f) was adopted.

175. An amendment by the Workers' members to insert the words "and unintended chemical reactions" in subclause (g) was subamended to read: "and chemical reactivity" and adopted. A proposal by the Government members of the German Democratic Republic and the USSR to include wording to cover contamination of soil and water was withdrawn after some discussion.

176. The spokesman of the Government members of member States of the EC proposed to include a new clause to read: "emergency procedures"; it was adopted.

177. A proposal by the Government member of Nigeria to include a new clause dealing with possible physical and chemical changes was adopted. He considered that one had to guard against properties such as photo-sensitivity.

178. Point 30, as amended, was adopted.

New Point (after Point 30)

179. The Government member of Brazil withdrew an amendment that proposed to introduce a requirement on the competent authority for the preparation of posters on hazardous chemicals; it was generally considered more fitting in a code of practice.

Point 31

180. A proposal by the Employers' members that sought to establish a consistency between the instruments and the existing international transport regulations was withdrawn in favour of an amendment proposed by the Government member of the United States which was subamended and adopted. An amendment by the Government members of Australia and Canada to delete the words "inside the enterprise" and a similar amendment by the Government members of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi, Zambia and Zimbabwe to replace those words with "at work" resulted in a lengthy debate. A subamendment proposed by the Government members of Australia and Canada to cover the safety of workers involved in the transport of hazardous chemicals was adopted.

181. An amendment proposed by the Government members of member States of the EC, to insert the words "including pipelines" in clause (b), was adopted.

182. The Workers' members withdrew an amendment that proposed to insert the words "and equipment" after the word "vehicle"; and the words "or handling" after the word "transport" in clause (c) as the Employers' members felt that the language was more suited to a code of practice.

183. Point 31, as amended, was adopted.

Point 32

184. A proposal by the Government member of the United States to introduce in paragraph (1) the wording to ensure consistency with existing national and international regulations with respect to disposal of hazardous chemicals was subamended and adopted. An amendment proposed by the Workers' members to replace the word "disposing" by the words "the disposal and treatment of" in paragraph (1) was adopted. An amendment by the Government members of member States of the EC, to insert the word "hazardous" after the word "and" in the second line, was referred to the Drafting Committee. Two proposals by the Government member of the USSR to delete the words "at workplaces" in the third line of paragraph (1) and to replace the word "these" by the word "their" were adopted.

185. An amendment by the Employers' members to delete clause (b) in paragraph (2) was adopted.

186. A proposal by the Workers' members to insert the words "construction, nature, integrity and protection" after the word "identification" in clause (d) was adopted with a remark by the Employers' members that the list might again be extensive.

187. An amendment proposed by the Government members of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi, Zambia and Zimbabwe to insert the words "provision, maintenance and" after the word "use" in clause (g) was adopted.

188. An amendment proposed by the Workers' members to introduce a new clause to read: "the method of disposal or treatment" was adopted.

189. Point 32, as amended, was adopted.

New Point (after Point 32)

190. The Workers' members proposed to introduce a new Point to give effect to the wishes expressed by the representative of the UNEP; consistency and harmonisation between these instruments and those established for the protection of the public and the environment. The Government members of member States of the EC and Sweden were not in favour of the amendment, while the Government members of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi, Zambia and Zimbabwe, and the Government members of the Islamic Republic of Iran and Turkey supported it. The amendment, as subamended by the Government member of Australia, and adopted read:

- (1) The criteria established by the competent authority for the use of chemicals at work should be as consistent as possible with any criteria established for the protection of the general public and the environment.
- (2) The criteria established by the competent authority under this Convention and Recommendation should be harmonised with the criteria established under any other instruments in force intended to protect the general public and the environment.

Point 33

191. The Government member of Spain, on behalf of the Government members of member States of the EC, proposed to insert the words ", in accordance with national law and practice" after the word "employer" in paragraph (1) as they considered it would facilitate implementation. After a discussion, the amendment, as subamended by the Workers' members to include the words "through methods" at the beginning of the proposed text, was accepted and the amendment, as subamended, was adopted.

192. A proposal by the Government members of member States of the EC, to replace clause (a) by the words "minimise exposure to such chemicals to a level necessary for the protection of the health of workers" was adopted.

193. A proposal by the Employers' members to insert the words ", as is necessary" after the word "record" in clause (b) was adopted as the Office text could be interpreted to require continuous monitoring.

194. The Employers' members proposed to amend clause (c) to qualify monitoring of exposure of workers where necessary for protection of their health or to ensure adequate control mechanisms. It was accepted. An amendment proposed by the Government member of the United States to transfer clause (c) to Point 34 was subamended to include the word "hazardous" before "chemicals" and adopted.

195. An amendment proposed by the Government members of member States of the EC, to replace the word "and" by the word "or" in paragraph (2) was rejected after a discussion.

196. The Workers' members withdrew an amendment that sought to delete the words "in accordance with national law and practice" in paragraph (2) as it was generally opposed.

197. Point 33, as amended, was adopted.

Point 34

198. An amendment by the Government member of Switzerland that sought to introduce an accepted system in countries not to limit the surveillance of workers' health only to employers was adopted with a slight modification. The Government members of member States of the EC withdrew an amendment that proposed a guarantee by employers to arrange for health surveillance; it was generally opposed. Their proposal to qualify the term "surveillance" by "medical" was accepted.

199. A proposal by the Employers' members to insert the word "hazardous" before the word "chemical" in clause (b) was adopted. The Workers' members withdrew an amendment that proposed to delete the words "in accordance with national law and practice" and stated that they would revert to the issue at the second discussion.

200. An amendment proposed by the Workers' members to introduce a new paragraph that sought to minimise exposure of workers who had demonstrated early signs of deviation from health norms was adopted to read:

Where the results of medical tests or investigations reveal clinical or pre-clinical effects, measures should be taken to prevent or reduce exposure of the workers concerned, and prevent further deterioration of their health.

201. An amendment by the Workers' members to introduce a new paragraph to read:

The results of medical examinations should be used to determine health status with respect to exposure to chemicals, and should not be used to discriminate against the worker.

was adopted.

202. A proposal by the Workers' members to introduce a new paragraph to the effect that: workers had access to their own medical records; workers and their representatives had access to results of studies; confidentiality of medical records was maintained; and results of medical examinations were explained to the workers was adopted as subamended and read:

Workers should have access to their own medical records either personally or through their physicians.

Workers and their representatives should have access to the results of studies prepared from medical records where individual workers cannot be identified.

The confidentiality of individual medical records should be respected in accord with generally accepted principles of medical ethics.

The results of medical examinations should be clearly explained to the workers concerned.

203. Point 34, as subamended, was adopted.

Point 35

204. Recalling that some governments had already established first aid and emergency procedures, the Government members of Australia and Canada proposed to introduce wording to take this fact into consideration. The amendment, as subamended, was adopted. An amendment proposed by the Workers' members that sought to provide for subsequent medical treatment where necessary was referred to the Drafting Committee for decision as the Committee had had a full discussion on the subject under Point 15 (1) (f). A proposal by the Employers' members to insert the word "hazardous" before the word "chemicals" was adopted.

205. The Committee reverted to re-examine an amendment introduced by the Workers' members to Point 12 that proposed a duty on an exporter of chemicals who exported banned or restricted chemicals to divulge information on the circumstances that determined such ban or restriction. Another lengthy debate continued. A consensus was not reached on a generally accepted subamendment proposed by the Employers' members as the Workers' members insisted on deleting the word "severely" that qualified the restriction. The Committee proceeded to vote on the subamendment. There were 124,066 votes in favour of retaining the word "severely"; 114,378 votes against with 2,706 abstentions. The text as finally adopted read:

When hazardous chemicals are banned or severely restricted by law or regulations with respect to use at work in an exporting country, this fact and the reason for it should be communicated by the exporting country or the exporter to the importer and the importing country.

206. Point 35, as amended, was adopted.

Point 36

207. An amendment by the Workers' members to replace the word "or" by the word "and", to ensure that workers as well as their representatives, co-operate with the employers, was adopted. Employers' members and Government members of member States of the EC withdrew their proposed amendments as an agreed text had been adopted.

208. Point 36, as amended, was adopted.

Point 37

209. The Workers' members introduced an amendment to qualify the text with the words "within the limits of their responsibilities", explaining that similar wording was contained in the Convention on the Use of Asbestos. Workers had limited powers and opportunities to ensure safety at work. The Employers' members opposed an overriding statement as proposed. They stated that workers had a general responsibility to bring safety problems to the attention of their employer. Government members of member States of the EC preferred their amendment proposing that workers should take care of their own safety and health and that of other persons affected by acts or omissions at work, which was supported by the Employers' and Workers' members, and adopted.

210. Point 37, as amended, was adopted.

Point 38

211. Government members of member States of the EC proposed to replace the word "and" by the word "or" as they thought that large enterprises would benefit if information was channelled through the workers' representative. They pointed out that similar wording was adopted in Point 33. The Workers' members opposed the amendment on the grounds that both workers and their representatives should be entitled to receive information collectively or separately. The amendment was withdrawn.

212. The Workers' members introduced an amendment to replace Point 38 with two new clauses which sought to stipulate the information which they considered was necessary to the worker. The Employers' members opposed the amendment and preferred the Office text. They maintained that the issue of information needs had already been addressed and that the new concept of investigation by the workers and their representatives could also not be supported. The Workers' members argued that precise wording was retained to ensure that information would not be withheld on the grounds of confidentiality. There followed lengthy discussion during which the Employers' members, supported by the Government members of member States of the EC, Cyprus and Malaysia, stated their preference for the Office text. In reply to a point raised by the Government member of Austria that the labour inspectorate was responsible for investigations, the Workers' members stated that the small size of the inspectorate in many developing countries necessitated the participation of workers and their representatives in conducting surveys to identify unsafe situations and effect control measures. The Government members of Burundi and Côte d'Ivoire shared this view. After a lengthy discussion, the Committee adopted Point 38 of the Office text as subamended to: insert the words "chemical safety data sheets, information sheets and other" after the word "obtain"; replace the word "themselves" by the word "workers" and the word "hazards" by the word "risks"; and retain the words from the beginning of Point 38 up to the word "obtain" as the leading phrase, was adopted as clause (a). The subamendment adopted as clause (b) read: "request and participate in an investigation by the competent authority of potential risks resulting from the use of chemicals at work".

213. A proposal by the Government members of member States of the EC to introduce a binding obligation on the employers to guarantee safe working conditions was subamended to replace the word "guarantee" by the word "provide" and adopted. The Employers' members remarked about the irrelevancy of reinstating such wording.

214. An amendment by the Workers' members that proposed to introduce wording to the effect that workers and their representatives maintained the secrecy of genuinely confidential business information released to them by the employer was subamended and adopted to read:

Where the information requested includes genuinely confidential business information, the employer may require the worker or workers' representative to limit its use to the evaluation and control of potential hazards arising from the use of chemicals at work, and to take reasonable steps to ensure that this information is not disclosed to potential competitors.

215. A proposal by the Workers' members to introduce a provision enabling workers to have access to information regarding procedures relating to safety in the use of hazardous chemicals from the home country of multinational enterprises was adopted.

216. Point 38, as amended, was adopted.

Point 39

217. An amendment by the Workers' members to insert the words "and, where necessary retraining" after the word "training" in clause (c) was adopted.

218. Point 39, as amended, was adopted.

New Point (after Point 39)

219. The Workers' members proposed an amendment to introduce a new point that sought to: ensure the worker's right to refuse work in case of imminent danger; provide for improved protection in case of pregnancy, chemical sensitisation or other medical conditions; and the right to treatment and compensation for work injuries from the use of chemicals at work. The Committee agreed to accept the wording already approved concerning the right to refuse work. The Employers' members stated that alternative work should be offered, if available, to those pregnant who could perform the job, and that in case of chemical sensitisation, which might well be of a permanent or recurrent nature, the worker should meet the qualifications for the new position. They also remarked that the medical treatment and workers' compensation fell within the purview of the competent authority. The amendment, as subamended and adopted, read:

Workers should have the right -

- (a) to remove himself from danger resulting from the use of chemicals when he has reasonable justification to believe there is an imminent and serious risk to his safety and health and the duty to inform his supervisor immediately;
- (b) in the case of pregnancy, to alternate work where available not involving the use of chemicals hazardous to reproductive health;
- (c) in the case of chemical sensitisation, or medical conditions placing a worker at increased risk of harm from a hazardous chemical, to alternate work not involving that chemical, if available and if the worker meets the qualification for the position;
- (d) to adequate medical treatment and compensation for injuries and diseases resulting from the use of chemicals at work.

RESOLUTION

220. The Government member of India moved that the Committee should adopt a resolution to the effect that the ILO takes a lead role to commence the task of harmonising national and regional criteria and classification systems established for the use of chemicals at work. He stated that cognisance should be taken of the existing United Nations classification system for transport of dangerous goods and the ILO should co-operate with UNEP and the WHO within the International Programme on Chemical Safety (IPCS), and with other international organisations in this task. The Government member of Malaysia supported the adoption of the resolution. It was also supported by the Government members of Brazil, Canada, Côte d'Ivoire, Turkey and the USSR. The Workers' members supported ILO action to harmonise existing systems of classification and labelling in co-operation with other organisations. The Employers' members agreed to the ILO embarking upon practicable measures with regard to harmonisation of existing classification and labelling systems. However, they were mindful of the ILO's priorities, namely to provide technical advisory services, mainly to developing countries. The Government members of Botswana, Kenya, Malawi, Zambia and Zimbabwe and the Government member of the United States as well as the Employers' members stated that the matter should be examined further and suggested considering it during the second discussion. Government members of member States of the EC and Gabon agreed with the principle of harmonisation and supported the views expressed by the Government member of the United States and several others. Finally, the Committee felt that the proposer of the idea should submit a draft resolution for consideration at its next sitting. The Chairman agreed and requested the Office to distribute the text of a draft resolution proposed by the Government member of India to the members of the Committee in the three languages before the next sitting.

Adoption of the Report, Proposed Conclusions and Resolutions

221. At its sixteenth session, the Committee adopted its report, subject to some changes requested by various members.

222. The Employers' members introduced an amendment jointly prepared with the Workers' members and the Government member of Canada that proposed to insert the words "but should not mean articles" in clause 6(a) of the Conclusions approved by the Committee Drafting Committee to limit the scope of the application of the instruments as the existing definition was deemed too broad. On a point of order raised by the Government members of the member States of the EC that the time for submitting amendments had expired the Chairman recalled that the amendment was receivable according to Article 67 of the Standing Orders, as it was a matter referred to the Committee Drafting Committee as shown in paragraph 85 of the report. The Government member of Austria moved to seek legal advice before proceeding. The Employers' Vice-Chairman explained that the amendment was being tabled on legal advice given during the sitting of the Committee Drafting Committee. The Reporter confirmed that the legal adviser had requested that the amendment be submitted to the Committee for its adoption.

223. The Government member of the Committee Drafting Committee stated that she had objected to introducing an amendment to change the definition in the Committee Drafting Committee and opposed discussing it in the Committee as well. She proposed to postpone the discussion until the next year. The Government member of Hungary recalled that Workers' members had agreed to submit to the Committee Drafting Committee a definition of the term "articles" and to exclude "articles such as bricks" from the scope of the instruments that would otherwise have to be labelled. The Workers' members reiterated the need to define "articles" and introduce wording to exclude such articles from the scope of the instruments, even through the wording might be imperfect. At this stage the Chairman ruled to proceed with the discussion of the amendment and the Government members of the member States of the EC moved to postpone the consideration of the question which was put to vote. There were 25,806 votes in favour of the postponement with 17,952 votes against and with 133,728 abstentions. The motion was defeated as the quorum for the sitting, which was 89,971, was not attained.

224. Workers' members and Employers' members who spoke in favour of their amendment earnestly requested the Committee to understand the absolute necessity to include the wording to exclude the "articles" from the scope of the instruments for reasons already discussed and reminded that an improved text could be introduced the next year. A subamendment by the Government member of Hungary to add the words "and organisms" as well as another subamendment by the Employers' members to replace the word "mean" by the word "include" were adopted and the amended text to be inserted at the end of clause (a) in Point 6 read: "but should not include articles or organisms".

225. The Workers' members proposed an amendment prepared jointly with the Employers' members and the Government member of Canada to introduce a definition of the term "article" as a new clause (e) in Point 6 of the Proposed Conclusions. The Government members of the member States of the EC proposed a subamendment to delete a part of the amendment which was opposed by the Employers' and Workers' members and the text, as adopted, read:

The term "article" should mean an object which is formed to a specific shape or design during its manufacture or which exists in its natural shape, whose use in that form is dependent in whole or in part on its shape or design; and which, under normal or reasonable foreseeable conditions of use, will not release or otherwise cause a worker to be exposed to a hazardous chemical.

226. At the same sitting, the Committee adopted the proposed Conclusions as presented at the end of the Report with the following modifications: a linguistic revision to reconcile the French and English texts; insert clauses (d), (e) and (f) of Point 20 as paragraph (2) of Point 19 and introducing the words "Employers should" at the beginning of that paragraph; reword the title "Medical exposure" as "Medical surveillance"; and insert the amendments adopted to Point 6, clauses (a) and (e).

227. The Committee unanimously adopted a resolution to place on the agenda of the next Ordinary Session of the Conference an item entitled "Safety in the Use of Chemicals at Work".

228. The Chairman referred to the discussion at the fourteenth session during which he had requested the Office to distribute the text of a draft resolution proposed by the Government member of India in accordance with article 63 (5) of the Standing Orders. The Committee proceeded with the discussion of this draft resolution "concerning harmonisation of systems of classification and labelling in the use of hazardous chemicals at work" that was introduced by the Government member of India. He emphasised the urgent need for establishing an internationally compatible system of classification of chemicals which could save the cost of creating individual national systems, particularly in developing countries. Such an international system would be of great advantage for all workers in the world. The Employers' members supported the rationale stated in the proposed draft, but preferred to take a decision in 1990 after reviewing existing systems and planning likely timetables for harmonising them. The Workers' members supported the proposed draft, agreeing that such a review would be the first step of the harmonising work.

229. The Government members of member States of the EC proposed an amendment which defined three tasks of the Office in initiating its work with a view to harmonising national and regional criteria and classification systems: to assess the size of the task, to prepare a report on the result of this assessment and to establish co-operation with other international bodies in order to ensure a system of harmonised criteria and classification which would protect workers using chemicals. The amendment also proposed to refer, in the preamble, to the value of classification systems for the general public, marketing and the use of chemicals at work. The Government members of the United States, Gabon and Côte d'Ivoire supported the amendment as they considered that preliminary studies were needed before laying out a valid approach.

230. The Government member of the USSR supported the views expressed in the draft resolution and the EC amendment and suggested a subamendment to make references in more detail to existing systems of classification and to the ongoing co-operation between the ILO, UNEP and the WHO through the IPCS. The Government member of Hungary pointed out the importance of assessing the scope of the envisaged task. The Employers' and Workers' members opposed this proposal by the USSR, which was rejected, and the Committee proceeded to discuss the EC amendment. The Government member of Canada supported it. A subamendment proposed by the Employers' members and further modified by the Workers' members included the co-operation with governments and employers' and workers' organisations. To the question by the Government member of Australia as to whether the ILO could accommodate such a resolution in its budget, the Representative of the Secretary-General replied that a resolution would not change the budget but would set priorities for the Office work. The representative of the EC stressed the need to assess the size of the task first. The Workers' and Employers' members supported the amendment which was adopted.

231. The draft resolution proposed by the Government member of India, as amended, was adopted.

232. The Government members of the member States of the EC emphasised the need to be mindful of the fact that international standards should be flexible enough to be ratified by most countries. An Employers' member further stated the necessity to classify chemicals to determine which ones were hazardous; thereafter the provisions of the instruments should be applied only to hazardous chemicals. The Committee needed to be careful of the impact and not jeopardise ratification, and avoid the trap of widening the subject so that the objective of protection of workers was lost.

233. The Employers' Vice-chairman noted that they had started with a good text from the Office. The most dramatic change was the extension of regulatory requirements to chemicals that have not been classified as hazardous. The Employers' Group continued to believe that the proposed instruments should be limited to hazardous chemicals, although it appeared from the discussion that most Governments supported the Workers' all-inclusive view. They had agreed to a compromise, but during the next year, what had been done to the scope of the documents should be carefully considered. Their second major concern was the overlap between these documents and existing international regulations. They referred to the lengthy discussion over the information on banned or severely restricted chemicals, and the view expressed by some governments that they would not meet their obligations under existing UN regulations and wanted not shift that to the employer, as well as the discussion on transportation issues, emphasised that during the interim year they should familiarise themselves with existing international contracts. Finally, there were redundancies in the draft. Next June they would have to eliminate unnecessary repetition. Attempts to gain further concessions from the Employers or shift additional burdens would be resisted. He concluded by pointing to the positive contribution that chemicals and pharmaceuticals had made to many countries, and stressed that they were all partners in the common objective of protecting worker safety and health, which needed tripartite co-operation.

234. The Workers' Vice-chairman recalled that all chemicals can be hazardous under certain conditions. They wanted more information on non-hazardous chemicals and thought this was a good compromise that they would strenuously defend. With regard to international instruments, they agreed with the Employers that they must be consistent. However, this instrument was intended to protect workers and was deliberated and approved through a tripartite body. They would seek to eliminate redundancies and arrive at instruments that were able to be ratified by all countries. The record number of amendments was not an indication that the Office text had been bad, or that they had great political differences, but rather that everyone had been concerned about the text and wanted it perfect. They felt a sense of achievement which was tempered by the knowledge of the hard work in the intervening year. They were dedicated to seeing the Convention ratified and put into practice in order to protect the health of workers.

235. The Chairman thanked the three groups for their contributions. He noted that the fact that the two Vice-chairmen came from the same country had been a benefit for the Committee because it had been easy for them to understand each other and the examples they gave. He was optimistic that the instruments envisaged would be ratified and would last for a long time. He hoped that the delegates would not lose their enthusiasm as it would be needed next year, when they would concentrate on those areas which had been pinpointed.

236. The present report, the Proposed Conclusions, the resolution to place on the agenda of the next Ordinary Session of the Conference an item entitled "Safety in the Use of Chemicals at Work" and the resolution concerning "Harmonisation of Systems of Classification and Labelling for the Use of Chemicals at Work" are submitted for consideration.

Geneva, 23 June 1989,

(Signed) Dr. R.O. ADEWOYE
Chairman

J. W. McLELLAN
Reporter.

Proposed conclusions

FORM OF THE INTERNATIONAL INSTRUMENTS

1. The International Labour Conference should adopt two international instruments concerning safety in the use of chemicals at work.
2. The instruments should take the form of a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation.

PREAMBLE

3. (1) The instruments should contain a preamble referring to relevant ILO instruments including the Benzene Convention and Recommendation, 1971; the Occupational Cancer Convention and Recommendation, 1974; the Working Environment (Air Pollution, Noise and Vibration) Convention and Recommendation, 1977; the Occupational Safety and Health Convention and Recommendation, 1981; the Occupational Health Services Convention and Recommendation, 1985; the Asbestos Convention and Recommendation, 1986 and the list of occupational diseases, as amended in 1980, appended to the Employment Injury Benefits Convention, 1964.

(2) The preamble should also refer to the need for co-operation within IPCS between ILO, UNEP and WHO, as well as FAO and UNIDO. The preamble should also note that the protection of workers from the harmful effects of chemicals also enhances the protection of the general public and the environment.

(3) The preamble should also spell out the basic objective which is to reduce the incidence of chemically induced illnesses and injuries at work by -

- (a) ensuring that all chemicals are evaluated to determine their hazards;
- (b) providing employers with a mechanism to obtain from suppliers information about the chemicals used at work so that they can implement effective programmes to protect workers from chemical hazards;
- (c) providing workers with information, which they have a need and right to know, about the chemicals at their workplaces, and about appropriate

- preventive measures so that they can effectively participate in protective programmes; and
- (d) establishing principles for such protective programmes to ensure that chemicals are used safely.

Conclusions proposed with a view to a Convention

I. SCOPE AND DEFINITIONS

4. The Convention should apply to all branches of economic activity in which chemicals are used.

5. The Convention should provide that, after consultation with the most representative organisations of employers and workers concerned, and on the basis of an assessment of the hazards involved and the protective measures to be applied, the competent authority may –

- (a) exclude particular branches of economic activity, undertakings or products from the application of the Convention, or certain provisions thereof, when –

- (i) special problems of a substantial nature arise; and
- (ii) the overall protection afforded is not inferior to that which would result from the full application of the provisions of the Convention;

- (b) make special provisions to protect genuine confidential business information, so long as the health and safety of workers is not compromised thereby.

6. For the purpose of the Convention –

- (a) the term “chemicals” should mean chemical elements, and compounds and mixtures thereof, whether natural or synthetic but should not mean articles and organisms;
- (b) the term “hazardous chemical” should include any chemical which has been classified as hazardous in accordance with Point 9 or for which information exists to indicate that the chemical constitutes a physical or health hazard;
- (c) the term “use of chemicals at work” should include –
 - (i) the production of chemicals;
 - (ii) the handling of chemicals;
 - (iii) the storage of chemicals;
 - (iv) the transport of chemicals;
 - (v) the disposal and treatment of chemicals;
 - (vi) the release of chemicals resulting from work activities;
 - (vii) the maintenance, repair and cleaning of chemical equipment and containers.
- (d) the term “branches of economic activity” should mean all branches in which workers are employed, including the public service;
- (e) the term “article” should mean an object which is formed to a specific shape or design during its manufacture or which exists in its natural shape; whose use in that form is dependent in whole or in part on its shape or design; and which, under normal or reasonably foreseeable conditions of use, will not release or otherwise cause a worker to be exposed to a hazardous chemical.

II. GENERAL PRINCIPLES

7. The most representative organisations of employers and workers concerned should be consulted on the measures to be taken to give effect to the provisions of the Convention.

8. In the light of national conditions and practice and in consultation with the most representative organisations of employers and workers, each Member should formulate, implement, and periodically review a coherent policy on safety in the use of chemicals at work.

III. PREVENTIVE AND PROTECTIVE MEASURES

Classification

9. (1) There should be applied or introduced and progressively extended specific criteria and systems appropriate for the classification of all chemicals according to the type and degree of their intrinsic hazards.

(2) Criteria and systems for such classification should be established by the competent authority, or by a body approved or recognised by the competent authority, in accordance with national or international standards.

Labelling

10. (1) A hazardous chemical should be labelled so as to provide essential information regarding its identity, its classification, the hazards it presents and the safety precautions to be observed.

(2) A chemical not covered by Point 10 (1) should be marked so as to provide essential information concerning its identity and important properties relevant to worker safety and health.

(3) Requirements for labelling or marking chemicals pursuant to Points 10 (1) and 10 (2) above should be established by the competent authority, or by a body approved or recognised by the competent authority, in accordance with national or international standards.

Chemical safety data and information sheets

11. (1) For hazardous chemicals, chemical safety data sheets containing detailed essential information regarding their identity, classification, hazards, safety precautions and emergency procedures should be provided to employers.

(2) Criteria for the preparation of chemical safety data sheets should be established by the competent authority, or by a body approved or recognised by the competent authority, in accordance with national or international standards and procedures.

(3) For chemicals not covered by Point 11 (1), information sheets containing their identity and important properties relevant to worker safety and health should be provided to employers through new or existing documentation.

Responsibility of suppliers

12. (1) A supplier of chemicals which have not been classified in accordance with Point 9 should be required to identify the chemicals he supplies and assess their properties on the basis of a search of available information, in order to determine whether they are hazardous chemicals and to classify them in accordance with any system established pursuant to Point 9.

(2) A supplier of hazardous chemicals should be required to ensure that –

- (a) such chemicals are labelled in accordance with Point 10 (1);
- (b) employers are provided with chemical safety data sheets in accordance with Point 11 (1);

(3) A supplier of hazardous chemicals should be required to revise labels and chemical safety data sheets when new information becomes available and provide revised labels and chemical safety data sheets to the employer for subsequent shipments.

(4) A supplier of chemicals which are not covered by Point 12 (1) should be required to ensure that –

- (a) such chemicals bear essential information in accordance with Point 10 (2);
- (b) employers are provided with information sheets in accordance with Point 11 (3).

Responsibility of employers

13. Employers, in discharging their duties, should co-operate as closely as possible with workers or their representatives with respect to safety in the use of chemicals at work.

14. (1) Employers should be required to ensure that all chemicals used at work are labelled or marked as required by Point 10 and that chemical safety data sheets or information sheets have been prepared as required by Point 11 and are made available to workers and their representatives.

(2) Employers should be required to ensure that when chemicals are transferred from labelled containers into other containers or equipment, the contents are identified in a manner which will make known to workers the hazards which are associated with their use, the methods of using them safely and emergency procedures.

Disposal of empty containers

15. Empty containers of hazardous chemicals should be handled or disposed of in a safe manner, in accordance with national law and practice.

Identification

16. Employers receiving chemicals that have not been labelled or marked as required under Point 10, and for which chemical safety data sheets or information sheets have not been provided as required under Point 11, should obtain the relevant information from the supplier or from other reasonably available sources as soon as possible, and should not use the chemical until such information is obtained.

17. Where hazardous chemicals are used employers should ensure that only chemicals which are classified in accordance with Point 9 and labelled in accordance with Point 10 are used and that the necessary precautions are taken when they are used.

18. Employers should be required to maintain a register of hazardous chemicals used at the workplace, cross-referenced to the appropriate chemical safety data sheets. This register should be accessible to all workers.

Operational control

19. (1) Employers should be required to protect workers against risks arising from the use of chemicals by appropriate means, such as –

- (a) the choice of chemicals that minimise the risk;
- (b) the choice of safe technology;
- (c) the adoption of safe working systems and practices;
- (d) the use of engineering control measures;
- (e) the adoption of adequate occupational hygiene measures;
- (f) where recourse to the above measures does not suffice to eliminate the risk, the provision and proper maintenance of personal protective equipment and clothing at no cost to the worker, and the implementation of measures to ensure their use;

(2) Employers should –

- (a) limit exposure to hazardous chemicals to a level necessary for the protection of the health of workers;
- (b) provide first aid;
- (c) make arrangements to deal with emergencies.

Information and training

20. Employers should –

- (a) inform the workers of the hazards associated with exposure to chemicals used at the workplace;
- (b) instruct the workers how to obtain and use the information provided on labels and chemical safety data sheets;
- (c) train the workers on a continuing basis in the practices and procedures to be followed in order to use chemicals safely.

Monitoring of exposure

21. Employers should –

- (a) ensure that workers are not exposed to chemicals to an extent which exceeds exposure limits established by the competent authority, or by a body approved or recognised by the competent authority, in accordance with national or international standards;
- (b) monitor and record the exposure of workers to hazardous chemicals when this is necessary to safeguard their safety and health;
- (c) ensure that the records of the monitoring of the working environment and of the exposure of workers using hazardous chemicals are kept for a period prescribed by the competent authority and are accessible to the workers.

IV. DUTIES OF WORKERS

22. Workers should co-operate as closely as possible with their employers in the discharge of their duties and comply with all procedures and practices relating to safety in the use of chemicals at work.

23. Workers should take all reasonable steps to minimise risk to themselves, other workers and their employers from the use of chemicals at work.

V. RIGHTS OF WORKERS

24. A worker should have the right to remove himself from danger resulting from the use of chemicals when he has reasonable justification to believe there is an imminent and serious risk to his safety and health, and should have the duty to inform his supervisor immediately.

25. Workers and their representatives should have the right to information on –

- (a) the identity of chemicals used at work consistent with the protection of genuine confidential business information so long as the safety and health of workers are not compromised by such protection;
- (b) the hazardous properties of such chemicals;
- (c) precautionary measures;
- (d) education and training;
- (e) labels and chemical safety data sheets;
- (f) any other information required to be kept by the Convention consistent with the protection of genuine confidential business information so long as the safety and health of workers are not compromised by such protection.

VI. ACTION AT THE NATIONAL LEVEL

26. The competent authority should have the power to prohibit or restrict the use of certain hazardous chemicals, or to require advance notification and authorisation before such chemicals are used.

Proposed Conclusions with a view to a Recommendation

I. GENERAL PROVISIONS

27. The provisions of the proposed Recommendation should be applied in conjunction with those of the proposed Convention.

28. The most representative organisations of employers and workers concerned should be consulted on the measures to be taken to give effect to the provisions of the Recommendation.

29. The competent authority should specify categories of workers, who are not allowed to use specified chemicals or to use these only under conditions prescribed in accordance with national laws and regulations.

II. PREVENTIVE AND PROTECTIVE MEASURES

Classification

30. The criteria for the classification of chemicals established pursuant to Point 9 (2) should be based upon the characteristics of chemicals such as –

- (a) toxic properties including both acute and chronic health effects, in all target organs;
- (b) chemical or physical characteristics, including flammable, explosive, oxidising and dangerously reactive properties;

- (c) corrosive and irritant properties;
- (d) carcinogenic effects;
- (e) allergenic and sensitising effects;
- (f) teratogenic and mutagenic effects;
- (g) effects on the reproductive system.

31. (1) As far as is reasonably practicable, the competent authority should compile and periodically update a consolidated list of the chemical elements and compounds used at work, stating their classification.

(2) The manufacturer or importer of chemicals not yet included in the consolidated list should be required to transmit to the competent authority, prior to use at work, and in a manner consistent with the protection of genuine confidential business information, such information as is necessary for the maintenance of the list.

(3) Employers should keep records as required under these instruments for a period of time determined by the competent authority.

Labelling and marking

32. (1) The requirements for the labelling of hazardous chemicals established pursuant to Point 10 (3) should be such as to enable persons handling or using chemicals to recognise and distinguish between them both when receiving and when using them, so that they may be used safely.

(2) The labelling requirements should, in conformity with existing national or international systems, cover –

(a) the information to be contained in the label such as –

- (i) trade names;
- (ii) identity of the chemical;
- (iii) name, address and telephone number of the supplier;
- (iv) danger symbols;
- (v) nature of the special risks associated with their use;
- (vi) safety advice including first aid;
- (vii) identification of the batch;
- (viii) the statement that a data sheet giving additional information is available from the employer;

(b) the legibility, durability and size of the label;

(c) the uniformity of labels, including colours.

(3) The labelling should be easily understandable by workers.

(4) In the case of chemicals not covered by Point 32 (1), the marking need contain only items 32 (2) (a) (i) to (iii).

33. (1) Where it is impracticable to label a chemical in view of the size of the container or the nature of the package, provision should be made for other effective means of recognition such as tagging or accompanying documents. However, all containers should indicate the hazards of the chemical through appropriate wording or symbols.

(2) Publicity material concerning hazardous chemicals intended for use at work should call attention to their hazards.

34. (1) The criteria for the preparation of chemical safety data sheets for chemicals classified as hazardous pursuant to Point 11 (2) should ensure that they contain essential information including, if applicable—

- (a) the trade or common name of the chemical;
- (b) the names and concentrations of its ingredients in a way that clearly identifies them for the purpose of conducting a hazard evaluation;
- (c) potential physical and health hazards as well as signs and symptoms of exposure;
- (d) potential routes of entry into the body;
- (e) exposure limits;
- (f) generally applicable precautions for safe use including storage, treatment and disposal of wastes;
- (g) engineering controls and work practices;
- (h) personal protective equipment and clothing;
- (i) procedures for dealing with spills, leaks and fire;
- (j) emergency measures;
- (k) first-aid procedures;
- (l) sources of additional information.
- (m) the name, address, and telephone number of the supplier or manufacturer;
- (n) physical and chemical characteristics, such as flashpoint, odour threshold, and vapour pressure;
- (o) the possibility of synergism with other chemicals commonly used at work;
- (p) reactivity hazards;
- (q) information to medical personnel on medical treatment;
- (r) possible methods of monitoring workplace exposure;
- (s) the date of preparation of the chemical safety data sheet;
- (t) other information as decided by the competent authority.

(2) In the case of chemicals not covered by Point 32 (1), the information sheets should contain —

- (a) the trade or common name of the chemical;
- (b) the names of the ingredients in a way that clearly identifies them for the purpose of conducting a hazard evaluation;
- (c) the properties important to worker safety and health;
- (d) the name, address and telephone number of the supplier or manufacturer.

(3) Where the names or concentrations of the ingredients referred to in (1) (b) or (2) (b) above constitute genuine confidential business information, they may be omitted from the chemical safety data sheet or information sheet. In such cases, the information should be disclosed on request and in writing to the competent authority and to concerned employers, workers and their representatives who agree to use the information only for the protection of worker health and safety and not otherwise to disclose it.

35. (1) Measures should be taken by employers to protect workers against hazards arising from the use of chemicals, based upon the criteria established pursuant to Points 36 to 39 below.

(2) In accordance with the Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy, adopted by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, a national or multinational enterprise with more than one establishment should be required to provide safety measures relating to the prevention and control of, and protection against, health hazards due to occupational exposure to hazardous chemicals, without discrimination, to the workers in all its establishments regardless of the place or country in which they are situated.

36. The competent authority should ensure that criteria are established for safety in the production, handling and use of hazardous chemicals, including provisions covering, if applicable —

- (a) the risk of acute or chronic diseases due to entry into the body by inhalation, skin absorption or ingestion;
- (b) the risk of injury from skin or eye contact;
- (c) the risk of injury from fire explosion and chemical reactivity;
- (d) the precautionary measures to be taken through—
 - (i) the choice chemicals that minimise the risk;
 - (ii) the choice of safe technology and safe installations;
 - (iii) the adoption of safe work systems and practices;
 - (iv) the use of engineering control measures;
 - (v) the provision, maintenance and use of suitable personal protective equipment and clothing where the above measures are not sufficient to eliminate the risk;
 - (vi) the use of signs and notices.

37. The competent authority should ensure that criteria are established for safety in the storage of hazardous chemicals, including provisions covering, if applicable —

- (a) the compatibility of stored chemicals;
- (b) the properties and quantity of chemicals to be stored;
- (c) the security and siting of and access to storage;
- (d) the construction, nature and integrity of storage containers;
- (e) loading and unloading of storage containers;
- (f) labelling and relabelling requirements;
- (g) precautions against accidental release, fire explosion and chemical reactivity;
- (h) temperature, humidity and ventilation;
- (i) precautions and procedures in case of spillage;
- (j) emergency procedures;
- (k) possible physical and chemical changes.

38. The competent authority should ensure that criteria consistent with national or international transport are established for the safety of workers involved in the transport of hazardous chemicals, including provisions covering, if applicable —

- (a) the properties and quantity of chemicals to be transported;
- (b) the nature, integrity and protection of containers used in transport, including pipelines;
- (c) the specifications of the vehicle used in transport;
- (d) the routes to be taken;
- (e) the training and qualifications of transport workers;
- (f) labelling requirements;
- (g) loading and unloading;
- (h) procedures in case of spillage.

39. (1) The competent authority should ensure that criteria consistent with national or international regulations regarding hazardous waste disposal are established for procedures to be followed in the disposal and treatment of hazardous chemicals and hazardous waste products with a view to ensuring the safety of workers at their workplaces.

(2) These criteria should include provisions covering, if applicable –

- (a) the method of identification of waste products;
- (b) the handling of contaminated containers;
- (c) the identification, construction, nature, integrity and protection of waste containers;
- (d) the effects on the working environment;
- (e) the demarcation of disposal areas;
- (f) the provision, maintenance and use of personal protective equipment and clothing;
- (g) the method of disposal or treatment.

40. (1) The criteria established pursuant to the provisions of the Convention and Recommendation for the use of chemicals at work should be as consistent as possible with any criteria established for the protection of the general public and the environment.

(2) The criteria established pursuant to the provisions of the Convention and Recommendation should be harmonised with the criteria established under any other instruments in force intended to protect the general public and the environment.

Monitoring of exposure

41. (1) Where workers are exposed to hazardous chemicals, the employer should be required, through methods in accordance with national law and practice, to –

- (a) limit exposure to such chemicals to a level necessary for the protection of the health of workers;
- (b) measure and record, as necessary, the concentration of airborne chemicals at the workplace.

(2) Workers and their representatives should have access to these records in accordance with national law and practice.

Medical surveillance

42. (1) The employer, or the institution competent under national law and practice, should be required to arrange such medical surveillance of workers as is necessary –

- (a) for the assessment of the health of workers in relation to hazards caused by exposure to chemicals;

- (b) for the diagnosis of work-related diseases and injuries caused by exposure to hazardous chemicals, in accordance with national law and practice.

(2) Where the results of medical tests or investigations reveal clinical or preclinical effects, measures should be taken to prevent or reduce exposure of the workers concerned, and prevent further deterioration of their health.

(3) The results of medical examinations should be used to determine health status with respect to exposure to chemicals, and should not be used to discriminate against the worker.

(4) Workers should have access to their own medical records, either personally or through their own physicians.

(5) Workers and their representatives should have access to the results of studies prepared from medical records, where individual workers cannot be identified.

(6) The confidentiality of individual medical records should be respected in accordance with generally accepted principles of medical ethics.

(7) The results of medical examinations should be clearly explained to the workers concerned.

First aid and emergencies

43. In accordance with any requirements laid down by the competent authority, employers should be required to maintain procedures, including first-aid arrangements, to deal with emergencies and accidents resulting from the use of hazardous chemicals at work and to ensure that workers are trained in these procedures.

Information

44. When hazardous chemicals are banned or severely restricted by law or regulations with respect to use at work in an exporting country, this fact and the reason for it should be communicated by the exporting country or the exporter to the importer and the importing country.

III. CO-OPERATION

45. (1) Employers, workers and their representatives should co-operate as closely as possible in the application of measures prescribed pursuant to the Recommendation.

(2) The term “workers’ representatives” should mean persons who are recognised as such by national law or practice, in conformity with the Workers’ Representatives Convention, 1971.

46. Workers should be required to –

- (a) take care as far as possible of their own safety and health and of other persons affected by their acts or omissions at work in accordance with their training and instructions given by their employer;
- (b) use properly all devices provided for their protection or the protection of others;
- (c) report forthwith to their immediate supervisor any situation which they believe could present a risk, and which they cannot properly deal with themselves.

IV. RIGHTS OF WORKERS

47. (1) Workers and their representatives should have the right to –

- (a) obtain chemical safety data sheets, information sheets and other information from the employer so as to enable them to take adequate precautions, in co-operation with their employer, to protect workers against risks from the use of hazardous chemicals at work;
- (b) request and participate in an investigation by the competent authority of potential risks resulting from the use of chemicals at work.

(2) These provisions should not release the employer from the obligation to provide safe working conditions for the workers.

(3) Where the information requested includes genuine confidential business information, the employer may require the worker or workers' representative to limit its use to the evaluation and control of potential hazards arising from the use of chemicals at work, and to take reasonable steps to ensure that this information is not disclosed to potential competitors.

(4) In the case of multinational enterprises, workers should have available upon request the information regarding procedures related to safety in the use of hazardous chemicals in the home country.

48. (1) A worker should have the right –

- (a) to remove himself from danger resulting from the use of chemicals when he has reasonable justification to believe there is an imminent and serious risk to his safety and health, and should have the duty to inform his supervisor immediately;
- (b) in the case of chemical sensitisation, or medical conditions placing a worker at increased risk of harm from a hazardous chemical, to alternative work not involving that chemical, if available and if the worker meets the qualifications for the position;
- (c) to adequate medical treatment and compensation for injuries and diseases resulting from the use of chemicals at work.

(2) A woman worker should have the right, in case of pregnancy, to alternative work not involving the use of chemicals hazardous to reproductive health, where available.

49. Workers should receive –

- (a) information on the classification and labelling of chemicals and on chemical safety data sheets in forms and languages which they easily understand;
- (b) information on the hazards which may arise from the use of chemicals in the course of their work;
- (c) training and, where necessary, retraining in the methods which are available for the prevention and control of, and for protection against, such hazards.

Resolution to place on the agenda of the next ordinary session of the Conference an item entitled "Safety in the Use of Chemicals at Work"

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Having adopted the report of the Committee appointed to consider the sixth item on the agenda,

Having in particular approved as general conclusions, with a view to the consultation of governments, proposals for a Convention and a Recommendation concerning safety in the use of chemicals at work;

Decides that an item entitled "Safety in the Use of Chemicals at Work" shall be included in the agenda of its next ordinary session for a second discussion with a view to the adoption of a Convention and a Recommendation.

Resolution concerning harmonisation of systems of classification and labelling for the use of hazardous chemicals at work

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Considering the importance of chemicals in industry, agriculture and services;

Recognising the common concern for avoiding risks associated with the use of chemicals at work;

Stressing the need to provide information to the user about hazardous properties of chemicals;

Recognising the value of the existing system of classification and labelling for transport of dangerous goods by road, rail, ship and air and also of several national and regional classification systems for the protection of the general public, marketing and use of chemicals at work;

Noting the existence of an International Register of Potentially Toxic Chemicals – IRPTC – established by the United Nations Environment Programme – UNEP;

Bearing in mind the cost of establishing individual national classification and labelling systems for the use of chemicals at work;

Considering the large volume of trade of chemicals between countries and regions;

Expressing concern about the varying systems for classification and labelling for the use of chemicals at work and for the transport of dangerous goods;

Noting that many governments in their replies to the questionnaire of the ILO on Safety in the Use of Chemicals at Work in connection with the envisaged adoption of international instruments by the International Labour Conference have stressed the need for international harmonisation of systems for classification and labelling as incorporated in Report VI (2) to the International Labour Conference's 76th Session 1989;

Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to request the Director-General –

1. to assess the size of the task of harmonising national and regional criteria and classification systems established for the use of chemicals at work, consistent with the United Nations classification system for transport of dangerous goods, in co-operation with UNEP and WHO within the International Programme on Chemical Safety (IPCS), with other relevant international organisations, and with government, employers' and workers' organisations;
2. to prepare a report on the result of this assessment and present this report as soon as possible;
3. to establish co-operation with other international bodies to ensure a system of harmonised national and regional criteria and classifications which protect workers using chemicals.

President: Mr. Nkomo

TWELFTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT – The first item on our agenda is the twelfth report of the Selection Committee. I give the floor to Mr. Hammond, Government adviser, Canada, Chairman of the Selection Committee, to submit the report.

Mr. HAMMOND (Government adviser, Canada; Chairman of the Selection Committee) – I have the honour to submit to the Conference the twelfth report of the Selection Committee which is to be found in Provisional Record No. 4K.

The report deals solely with changes in the composition of committees.

I commend the report to the Conference for adoption.

The PRESIDENT – The discussion of the report is now open. If there are no objections, I take it that the report is adopted.

(The report is adopted.)

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

The PRESIDENT – We shall now resume our discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General.

Original – Russian: Mr. FOMICHA (Government delegate, Byelorussian SSR) – Mr. President, first of all, I would like to congratulate you and wish you and your deputies every success in your work, on your election to your high and responsible offices at the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. We also congratulate the Director-General, Mr. Hansenne, and wish him every success in the responsible duties he took on in March of this year.

The current 76th Session of the International Labour Conference is taking place in the year of the 70th anniversary of the foundation of the ILO and the 20th anniversary of the adoption of the ILO's World Employment Programme, a fact which undoubtedly should introduce new elements into the ILO's activities and be marked by displays of good will in the interests of achieving real results promoting the social progress of member countries.

In appraising positively the Director-General's Report, entitled Recovery and employment, presented for our consideration, I would express the view that it constitutes quite a wide-ranging study of employment problems. It is realistic, reflecting up to a point existing trends in the social and economic development of the world community, as well as the factors which influence them.

The noticeable positive trends in the general political climate – particularly as a result of the reduction in military and political confrontation – the new political thinking, new major initiatives and new approaches to resolving the problems of international co-operation in various fields add up to the creation of an atmosphere in which the ILO's activities can be more responsive to the requirements of today's greater understanding of the world.

As the world increasingly becomes a single interlinked and interdependent entity, new opportunities are emerging for attaining the goals and realising the principles enshrined in the ILO Constitution, thus contributing to the reaffirmation in international relations of the primacy of common human values. The scientific and technological revolution has turned many problems into global problems, which in the field of labour and social development, among others, require broader co-operation between all the bodies represented in the ILO. In this context, the role of governments, trade unions and the management boards of enterprises is increasingly drawing up and implementing integrated measures on economic growth and employment, safety and labour protection techniques, environmental protection and maintaining the quality of life. In this regard, I would like to stress that in his message to the ILO on the occasion of its 70th anniversary, the Chairman of the Council of Ministers of the USSR, Mr. Ryzhkov, particularly noted the ILO's admirable responsiveness to the social and economic changes caused in part by the development of scientific and technological progress. On this basis, the ILO's activities might correspond more closely with modern requirements.

An important aspect of the process of putting into practice the principles of the new political thinking is the problem of transition from the armaments economy to the disarmament economy or, as the phrase goes, the problem of conversion of military production. Speaking at the United Nations, Mr. Gorbachev said that the Soviet Union was ready to prepare and submit its internal plan for conversion and in the course of 1989 would draw up experimental plans for turning two or three defence enterprises over to peaceful production; it would then publish its experiences with regard to transferring specialists from military industry and the use of equipment, buildings and facilities in civil production. As you know, during this Conference the Soviet delegation has transmitted the relevant documents on this issue to the ILO.

In this regard, I would also like to refer to the conclusion of the United Nations experts that conversion of military production, in spite of its complexity is not so out of the way. In the economy of any country there is a continual process of structural readjustment, where the production of outdated products is replaced by the output of new ones. Similar renewal takes place in military fields. So conversion does not present insuperable economic or social obstacles. At the same time there is a need to direct some of this conversion of military production towards nature protection.

In our opinion, the International Labour Organisation could make a worthy contribution to the study of this question. The implementation of the principle of "disarmament for development" could be practically expressed in a new employment strategy incorporating new approaches to the conversion of the military industry.

Particularly topical in the light of the economic and social situation in the world is the desirability of the ILO's active participation in drawing up relevant aspects of an international development strategy for the 1990s. In such a strategy due weight should be given to the questions of employment, conversion of military production, the environment, health protection for workers, the elimination of poverty and the social protection of the most vulnerable sectors of the population.

The world is now at a stage of industrial development where the tasks of environmental protection have become as important and decisive as economic development as a whole. The ILO's work on questions of environmental protection which are related to labour and living conditions must be intensified. Greater attention must be paid to the consequences of new technologies and more account taken of the relationship between industry and the environment. Environmental aspects of the ILO's activities should be part and parcel of its major programmes.

In the interests of further expanding co-operation within the ILO on matters of social security and scientific and technological progress, in our opinion the Organisation might to some extent step up its efforts in exchanging national experiences as regards employment, trade union participation in management, social and economic development at every level and the preparation and implementation of measures for structural adjustment in the economy and in the vocational training and retraining of workers in cases where new and advanced technology is introduced.

In referring to the importance of sharing national experience in these fields, I would like to point out that in the Byelorussian SSR the restructuring and acceleration of social and economic development requires from the workers and economic specialists in charge a high degree of competence, creative initiative, modern economic thinking, a mastery of new economic methods, skills in full economic cost accounting and the democratisation of all aspects of the life of society.

The process of scientific and technological progress and the radical restructuring of the management of the economy means that the continual training and retraining of workers becomes one of the most important factors in achieving the efficiency of associations, enterprises and organisations, institutions and all labour collectives. This entails the need for new approaches to the training, retraining and skill enhancement of personnel and the creation of an integral system of continual vocational and economic training.

The intensive development of the Republic's economy also involves a considerable release and distribution of labour resources. Thus, looking forward to the year 2000, the Economic Institute of the Academy of Sciences of the Byelorussian SSR forecasts that the overall release of production workers in industry alone will amount to 150,000 people in the Republic in 1991-99. An analysis of the results of such a release and placement of staff, together with a new payment structure and an improvement in management organisation, has shown that this process is basically following a normal course. Eventually, however, it will undoubtedly require additional efforts from bodies responsible for labour and social matters to ensure the effective use of labour resources.

In the year of the 70th anniversary of the ILO's foundation, I would like to express the wish that, together with the useful work which the Organisation undertakes in preparing international standards on social and labour matters, the ILO will mark the occasion by fresh approaches in the cause of achieving real results for the continuation and enrichment of dialogue and co-operation leading to social progress, which is a most important aspect of the work of our Organisation.

Original - Spanish: Mr. MEDINA GALVEZ (Workers' delegate, Chile) - Mr. President, on behalf of the Chilean workers I would like to express my very best wishes for your successful handling of the business of this Conference. I would also like to express our gratitude to Mr. Francis Blanchard and his staff for the considerable efforts they put into their accurate Report on the present situation of the world of labour.

I don't have enough time to comment on each of the important topics and conclusions contained in the Report.

I should, however, like to dwell on just a few aspects of the Report, especially on the question of labour policy, and the concern over wage differentials, permanent or temporary unemployment, the reassignment of the workforce and the need to build a social network to meet the needs of workers.

I should like to recall the words of a prominent statesman, Sir Winston Churchill, who said that there is no finer investment than putting milk in babies. We the Chilean workers are fully in agreement with this principle. In Chile, we try to help young people become truly productive by ensuring that their parents have the requisite economic resources to feed their children properly. This is how we are preparing the future of man, enabling him to live and work in good physical and mental conditions.

Our turbulent world is marked by terrorism, inflation, unemployment and the clashes between governments, political parties and workers which have led many countries to borrow more than they are able to repay; it is marked by a population explosion, the increasing automation and mechanisation of work and the ensuing greater unemployment. Even though wages are readjusted periodically, consumerism is increasing its stranglehold on the world population.

This is why the Director-General is correct in saying in his Report that only the participation of all workers can ensure their adequate protection.

Workers must insist on the ratification of Conventions Nos. 87, 144 and 151, and on the compliance of their respective governments, resorting to the ILO's supervisory machinery when the provisions of these Conventions are violated. Unfortunately, such violations occur all too frequently. The Director-General also calls upon us to reflect on the question of vocational training which is so important. He refers to the work being undertaken in Chile in this respect. We, the workers, agree with the aims pursued and urge all governments to give serious thought to these matters, and to provide for fair minimum pay in accordance with ILO Conventions Nos. 26 and 131.

We want to see all workers receiving a faire income so that they can buy food for their children, enjoy leisure time, education, and good health. This would also contribute towards a better world in labour relations.

As far as our country, Chile, is concerned we would point out that the political Constitution of 1980, which was approved by the majority of the people in a free, democratic and secret ballot, embodies a great many of the ILO's principles. For example, it guarantees the right of peaceful assembly without prior permission provided no arms are carried (article 13); the right to present petitions to the authorities about any matters of private or public interest (article 14); the right to work and the protection of workers: all persons are entitled to choose their work freely and to receive fair payment (article 16); collective bargaining is an acquired right of the worker; the setting up of trade unions is also covered – in article 19 of our Constitution, which provides that workers are free to establish and join trade unions in the cases and manner stipulated by law. This constitutional provision is very close to Article 2 of ILO Convention No. 87. The political Constitution of 1980 also deals with pensions and retirement protection. This is why we, the Chilean workers, have unreservedly supported the decision taken by the Government of Chile when (on 29 April 1989) it ratified the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, adopted by the United Nations General Assembly in resolution 2200 of December 1966. This Covenant is important for the workers of Chile since its articles 6, 7, 8, 9, 12, 14, 21, 22, 24 and 28 reflect our major aspirations with regard to liberty, to the right as workers and parents to protect our children; the right not to be discriminated against, the right for consideration of the family and the right to associate, as set out in article 22 of this Covenant.

We would also like to stress that in our country, on 27 May 1989, the Official Gazette published the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, which was also adopted by the United Nations General Assembly in December 1966. It is important that our Government ratified this Covenant because it affords real protection to the Chilean workers and thus to trade unions. Article 7 of this instrument advocates remuneration which ensures a fair minimum wage for all workers for work of equal value, decent living conditions, occupational safety and health and opportunities for based solely on length of service and ability.

Article 8 of the Covenant proclaims the right to establish and join trade unions, the right to form international organisations, the right to strike, the right to submit petitions to employers. Chile thus has thus given proof of genuine concern for the rights of all Chileans and this gives us good reason to be fairly optimistic.

I would also like to say that Chile is now recognised by people who were against us and who used to criticise us. I can state this at this rostrum, because Mr. Enzo Frizo, on the occasion of a trade union congress in Seville, Spain, in October 1988, stated that Spain and virtually all Latin American countries had lived through a long night of cruel dictatorship, in which human rights – and trade union rights – were barbarously trampled upon and that, although freedom was at last dawning in Chile, other Latin American countries still had to endure regimes which did not respect basic human rights.

In another part of this statement Mr. Frizo spoke of freedom to bargain collectively, to fight once and for all for the rights proclaimed in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, to create trade unions which are strong, efficient and capable of ensuring social justice, thus transforming theoretical democracy into genuine democracy.

Whilst we fully support these principles, we will never be able to accept trade unions being in the service of political parties, as occurs in our country. For, unfortunately, the message of this international trade union leader is unheeded by the workers' central organisations.

I would like to mention once again what Mr Frizo said at the Seville congress: what is important is that the labour movement opposes war because war is virtually always due to a conflict of interests between the rich and the poor; as they say in Central America: "the rich provide the weapons and the poor provide the dead". Now, what message can there be for the workers of the world unless we refer back to resolution 152, adopted on 26 June 1988, which states on the subject of the independence of the trade union movement that "it is therefore essential for each country to maintain the freedom and independence of the trade union movement, so that the latter can fulfil its economic and social mission, irrespective of political changes".

Point V of the same resolution, states that "when trade unions decide, in pursuance of the laws and customs of their countries and in line with the wishes of their members, to establish relations with a political party or to carry out political action in accordance with the Constitution, in pursuit of economic or social aims, these relations or these actions should not run counter to the economic and social objectives of the trade union movement, irrespective of whatever political changes take place in the country".

This is why, when the political parties together with the so-called workers' central organisations call for protest action and strikes they usually trigger off conflicts which in the end again result in deaths. This is why, in Chile, we are very much concerned with what might happen on 14 December 1989, when there will be the elections for the President, the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate. In Chile the spring will be over and we are very much afraid that with the new economic and social crisis lack of supplies will occur again, that there will be deaths again, that there will be political clashes, that we shall again see the dark clouds embodied by those whose leadership yesterday failed miserably, those who when asked for bread gave bullets, who when asked for work demanded party membership.

In conclusion, I should like to pay tribute to the 70 years of the ILO, which has afforded its protection to the working class all over the world. I urge my country Chile, to ratify Conventions Nos. 87, 98, 144 and 151. I also urge all Governments, especially my own, to apply the Conventions they have ratified – such as the Hours of Work (Industry) Convention, 1919 (No. 1). This is the position of the Chilean Workers' delegation. Like the ILO, we seek respect for these democratic principles. We ask only that social justice should prevail in Chile. This is why we are urging the present Government to promulgate an act on employment security before 14 December 1989, covering all workers without exception, for we do not know what will happen after the elections.

Mr. BOATENG (Deputy Secretary for Mobilisation and Social Welfare, Ghana) – Mr. President, let me begin my statement like the other speakers before me by conveying to you the most sincere congratulations of my delegation on your election to the presidency of the current session of the International Labour Conference. We are convinced that under your able guidance our work will be carried out in such a fashion as to yield the best possible results. My heartiest congratulations also go to your Vice-Presidents on their election.

Mr. President, your election is a fitting tribute not only to your beautiful country, Zimbabwe, and Africa in general, but also to your personal contribution to the independence struggle of your country, and your role in its labour movement. The able manner in which you chaired the special Tripartite Conference on Action Against Apartheid in Harare in 1988, the Conference Committee on Apartheid in the same year; the African Regional Conference in November/December 1988 and the Commonwealth Labour Ministers' Meeting in the first week of this month, makes us all believe that with you in the Chair we are in very capable hands indeed.

In every sphere of human endeavour, there come moments which invoke sentiments, emotions and despair but which at the same time serve to rouse all the fighting and conquering energies of a determined people.

Today as we come face to face with the retirement of Mr. Francis Blanchard, for many years the Director-General of the International Labour Organisation, we recall the invaluable service this dedicated, selfless and uniquely resourceful thinker and leader has rendered to the World Labour Movement during his tenure of office. We take this opportunity to pay a special tribute to him in acknowledgement of his contributions.

Although I was not personally present at the Meeting of the African Labour Commission held in Bujumbura, Burundi, in March this year, I have it on the account of the Ghana delegation to that Meeting that Mr. Hansenne, as Director-General, confirmed our belief that he is indeed a worthy successor of Mr. Blanchard. His appointment, therefore, is welcome and we assure him of our fullest co-operation during his tenure of office.

I now turn to the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General. When we look at the world economic scene today, what strikes us hard in the face is the fact that it has become symptomatic of the present world economic order, in which the position of the developing countries is growing worse and worse by the day, for reasons among which is the limitation of exports to agricultural and mineral raw materials which are vulnerable to fluctuating prices dictated by the consumer markets, and this in turn determines the developing countries' export revenue and influences the extent of their indebtedness to other countries.

The present international system for the exchange of goods therefore condemns developing countries to be suppliers of raw materials, who have to live with constantly falling commodity prices and, at the same time, contend with ever increasing prices of finished and semi-finished goods from the industrialised countries. As the Director-General's Report points out, for as long as the international economic order remains as it currently is, so long will the economies of the developing countries continue to stagnate, our debt burdens rise, and unemployment and underemployment plague us.

It is hoped that the industrialised nations of the world realise that unless they heed the advice contained both in the Director-General's Report and the conclusions of the ILO's High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment, and make a decisive effort with a view to rectifying the existing trade inequalities, they will be condemning the majority of their fellow human beings to perpetual squalor and human degradation.

I urge this Conference therefore to direct a strong appeal to the developed countries to take such steps as are necessary to reorganise the existing economic order and, thereby, to correct the disparity between them and the developing countries.

This appeal has become imperative now, given the fact that, by 1992, Europe will have a single market, an event which would have its own ramifications on the economic relationships between the industrialised countries of the West and the developing countries, particularly Africa.

The forthcoming changes could have been advantageous to Africa but looking at the way the industrialised market-economy countries relate to developing countries on the issues of commodity prices, debt burden and dumping, it would seem that much more effort would be needed from organisations like the ILO to ensure that the industrialised countries appreciate their obligations for a fair and systematic development of the Third World in such areas as the eradication of disease, hunger and illiteracy.

In other words, we should stress the mutuality of our dependence, without which the industrialised countries would have no access to the basic raw materials to sustain their development. The Director-General's Report, Recovery and employment, does indeed portray a vivid picture of the situation in developing countries when it states that "Developing countries in general emerged from the crisis with deteriorated infrastructure, transport facilities, communications, etc. whereas the changes in the international economy require increased capacity to be able to raise productivity." Productivity will still elude the developing world as long as adverse terms of trade, infrastructural decay, food crisis and the debt burden persist.

With a 2.6 per cent population growth rate without a commensurate relative growth rate of the economy,

Ghana – like many other developing countries – will continue to suffer from unemployment, underemployment and a drift of the rural population to the urban areas. Measures aimed at maximising job opportunities would be the only hope of saving the region from the throes of unemployment. This should be a matter of concern, particularly so when the region has a fast growing population.

The need for a high quality labour force at all levels of productivity is essential for effective utilisation of manpower in our economies. Education and training therefore need to be restructured to meet the needs of the labour market.

With the slow growth rate of the economies, the employment creation potential of the formal sector has been dwindling, thus making it largely impossible for the unemployed and newcomers to the labour market to secure productive employment in that sector, and they continue to consume the goods and services produced and provided by the comparatively few employed persons. The result is widespread poverty.

My delegation endorses the direct employment creation programmes outlined in the Director-General's Report, and hopes that they would enrich our planning activities. We would wish, however, to state that in developing countries whose economies subsist, in the main, on agriculture, avenues open in that economic sector should be tapped and promoted to the full by improving the efficiency of the production of cash crops, food crops and livestock. The traditional agricultural sector, which has remained the largest employer of labour in our various economies, needs to be encouraged. A boost in agricultural production should lead to the establishment of agro-based industries. This would undoubtedly provide job opportunities and also create new occupations and professions.

The result of technological change should be such that automation need not result in retrenchments. As much as possible, labour-intensive techniques should go alongside capital-intensive techniques. In other words, there should be an effective mix of labour and capital in production.

The role of the informal sector as a potential labour-generating area has to be articulated. The industrial development policies which Ghana has pursued since independence have been accompanied by the development of small-scale, labour-intensive enterprises which have spread rapidly through the economy, both in urban and rural areas. The informal sector has expanded to the extent of absorbing a satisfactory number of potential jobseekers and has contributed to the development of skills through traditional or non-formal apprenticeships.

We acknowledge the fact that no economy, however well endowed, be it in an industrialised or a developing country, can operate in isolation. It is in this respect that Ghana is using this forum – and the opportunity it offers – to express our deepest appreciation for the various forms of technical assistance received from the ILO, other international organisations, as well as donor organisations and countries. It is our cherished hope that Ghana and other countries in the vulnerable regions can continue to count on the ILO for additional technical programmes. Such programmes go a long way to supplement and complement member States' efforts at development and thus propel the wheel of development.

Part II of the Director-General's Report, which focuses on the activities of the ILO in the past year, 1988, gives a catalogue of programmes undertaken by the Organisation. It articulates the inalienable rights of mankind to social justice, human rights protection, freedom of association, and equality of opportunity and treatment of men and women workers.

In considering matters arising from this part of the Report my delegation would like to commend the ILO for the able and efficient manner in which it has followed and monitored developments in South Africa and Namibia.

The situation in that part of Africa continues to be of concern to the Government of Ghana for, notwithstanding the outcry from the international community, the South African regime, through its policy of apartheid, continues to deny the Black majority – particularly the Black workers of that country – their political, social, economic, legal and human rights.

South Africa thus remains the only society where one's race determines where one could live, work, die and be buried. This situation is no longer acceptable and the Government of Ghana once again calls on the international community to step up the pressure on the racist regime, with a view to getting it to dismantle that obnoxious system.

The events of the past few months have amply demonstrated that the Pretoria regime is vulnerable to international pressure. It was international pressure and the intensification of activities to advance the cause of national liberation that compelled the Pretoria regime to negotiate, and then sign the agreement for the independence of Namibia. History may indeed repeat itself, in South Africa as well.

As regards Namibia, my delegation would like to believe that in spite of the initial set-back, the peace process is back on course. The Government of Ghana is following with keen interest events currently unfolding in that country. Here again it is our hope that the international community will co-operate fully to ensure the full implementation of all the relevant United Nations resolutions on Namibia. My delegation would also like to pay a special tribute to the courageous people of Angola for their selfless sacrifices and invaluable contribution to the struggle for the liberation of Namibia.

The Report of the Director-General also reminds us of the serious challenges posed to the Organisation and indeed to all mankind by the threats to the environment. We are pleased to learn that matters relating to the environment will now be given priority attention by the Organisation. We in Ghana are particularly disturbed by the current practice whereby certain individuals and organisations arrange the dumping of toxic and industrial wastes on our continent. What is not good enough for the countries that produce these wastes cannot be good for the countries of Africa either. In this connection we welcome the ILO's efforts in promoting international action against the international movement of industrial and toxic wastes. My delegation would like to urge the countries that produce such dangerous toxic and industrial wastes to ban their exportation to those countries, particularly, in Africa, which do not have the technical capability for their environmentally sound disposal.

In conclusion, Ghana, like many other African countries, has chosen the difficult path of economic recovery and structural adjustment, which calls for self-sacrifice and strenuous efforts on the part of the people and the Government. So far, we have been making steady and remarkable progress. However, our hopes, aspirations and sacrifices would be a wasted effort if the ILO and other international donor organisations and countries do not help either to change or to modify the present inequitable world economic order, which completely ignores the principles of social justice.

I wish the Conference every success in its deliberations and to thank you for your attention.

Ms. DOLE (Secretary of Labor, United States) – It is a great honour to represent the United States of America at this, the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. Both President Bush and I look forward to working with the ILO in our mutual quest for peace and justice.

On behalf of my country, I would like to congratulate Mr. Nkomo on his election as President of this Conference. Mr. Nkomo has served his country, his region, and the ILO with distinction and ability, and I am pleased that we can call on his wisdom and strength to assist us in our important tasks.

Our congratulations are also extended to Mr. Hansenne on his election as Director-General. Mr. Hansenne has demonstrated commitment to the principles of the ILO. Upon taking office, he dedicated himself to fighting unemployment and implementing international standards to protect workers' rights, and clearly Mr. Hansenne understands the importance of encouraging dialogue to resolve international labour problems because without dialogue, "nothing durable could be built in the field of labour relations" – without dialogue there would be no ILO. Standing firmly on these principles, Mr. Hansenne will help to guide the ILO into the twenty-first century, and we look forward to working with him in the coming years.

On behalf of the United States, I would also like to express our respect and admiration for former Director-General Blanchard. Mr. Blanchard has served in the finest traditions of the ILO and his accomplishments will be long remembered.

This year marks the 70th anniversary of the founding of the ILO. It also marks the 20th anniversary of its receipt of the Nobel Peace Prize. In accepting the Nobel Prize, David Morse, then Director-General of the ILO, said that the Prize was "a tribute to the common man throughout the world, to his stake in peace, and his contribution to peace."

The world has turned over many times in the last seven decades, but one principle has endured: common men and women throughout the world continue to work for peace, economic freedom, human rights and social justice.

Peace is a result not only of international negotiations and security agreements, it also depends upon social and economic justice: jobs for those who want them; food and housing for those who need them; the granting of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness to all people everywhere. The most important contribution the ILO can make to the next century is to continue to assist working men and women across the globe.

From Europe to the Far East, from Africa to the Americas, ordinary men and women give their time, their efforts, and yes, their lives, as they struggle to bring basic human rights to their homelands. There is no doubting, that, as we enter the final decade of this century, the world is being swept by powerful forces for democratic change, fueled by mass-movements of common men and women who are demanding a voice in their own economic and political future.

Their dreams are not new – indeed, they find expression in the words of the ILO's Philadelphia Declaration as the right of each individual "to pursue both... material well-being and... spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity."

For the past 70 years, the ILO has distinguished itself by promoting the human rights of workers and the welfare of all sectors of society. The ILO's direct intervention on behalf of workers and employers condemned unjustly to prison or death has saved many lives, and the ILO's supervisory machinery has provided a means to focus public attention on the conditions of oppressed or victimised people worldwide. Application of ILO labour standards has brought freedom, improved working conditions, and prosperity to countless workers throughout the world.

The ILO must continue to promote and protect human rights and the rights of workers in every corner of the globe. The strength of the ILO, however, lies not just in the legal obligations undertaken by its Members. More fundamentally, its strength derives from its moral force among governments, workers and employers. But, this moral force in turn depends upon the ILO's strict adherence to its founding principles, and to its continued impartial role in supervising the application of its international standards. Respect for such due process is fundamental, because it is nothing more than – or less than – a respect for law. Without such respect, the ILO will lose its integrity and purpose.

Human rights ensure the freedom to work. But it is a strong economy that allows men and women to flourish.

The remarkable strength for the American economy this past decade is well known. But the United States continues to battle with a troubling national deficit. The threat of the deficit, if left unchecked, could undermine the United States economy. We are taking steps and making headway toward getting our fiscal house in order. Our economy has expanded for 78 consecutive months. During this period, we have created nearly 20 million new jobs – two-and-a-half times the number of jobs created by the next six largest industrial countries combined, and our rate of unemployment is half that of many other industrialised countries. While reducing unemployment to a 15-year low, we have also substantially reduced inflation and interest rates. Additionally, we have seen, in industry after industry, that management and workers are forging a new relationship based on co-operation, rather than confrontation.

Why has the American economy been so successful in creating jobs? I believe that flexibility – labour and capital market flexibility – has been a major factor. We have avoided erecting rigid barriers that would prevent the flow of resources between industries and across regions. We have sought to deregulate industries, wherever possible. We have lowered the barriers of entry into markets, stimulating competition and lowering prices. We have promoted entrepreneurship, innovation and technological change.

We strengthened the role of the private sector and state and local governments in the development and implementation of labour market and economic development programmes. We have encouraged labour management co-operative efforts to increase productivity and we are now assisting workers to ensure that work and family are complementary and not conflicting goals.

I would emphasise that, while the United States has experienced much growth, we have also preserved fundamental and well-established principles regarding the rights of trade unions and the integrity of the collective bargaining system.

Despite our record of economic growth and job creation, many problem areas still confront us. In that sense, the Director-General's message in his Report, Recovery and employment, – that "growth is not enough" – applies to the United States, as well as other countries.

Growth has never been our only goal. Domestically, I have initiated a policy of "growth-plus." It means pursuing continued economic growth, plus adopting policies to help those lacking adequate education and training to gain the skills and motivation necessary for employment.

Our goal is to target the most vulnerable groups in our society who have not fared as well as others during our economic expansion – minorities, immigrants, the disadvantaged and disabled. We are also focusing our attention on the needs of women, who will comprise three out of every five new entrants into the American workforce between now and the year 2000.

Like the ILO's tripartite approach, we are using the broadest possible base of partners – government, management, and labour – to train our workforce for the challenges and jobs of tomorrow. We must offer more than just training though for a job; we must also offer basic skills training, literacy, remedial education, and counselling. How else will we ensure that our workers not only have jobs, but the independence, self-respect and skills necessary for a lifetime of productive work?

Let me stress that I recognise the vast differences between national economies, national demographic situations and national traditions and customs. And I am not suggesting that the American experience is necessarily or directly transferable to countries in different stages of development. Nevertheless, I firmly believe that some fundamental elements of our experience are universal. Foremost among these are the need to invest in the labour force and the obligation to promote the welfare of individual workers.

And the Director-General's Report reaffirms that the ILO must play a role in investing in the world's workforce. While we may differ in our response to some of the individual proposals advanced in the report, I hope that supporters of this Organisation would agree that the ILO's pioneering work in human rights and basic labour standards must be integrated more fully with the ILO's activities to promote social and economic development – especially for the millions of people living with the daily consequences of increased poverty.

During the past decade, per capita income growth in many LDCs has been negative. And, as we are painfully aware, a heavy burden of external debt has accumulated. While economic growth has slowed, population growth has continued to dramatically outpace the ability of these countries to absorb new entrants into the workforce.

Despite several years of structural adjustment programmes, the situation of the most disadvantaged groups has worsened in a number of countries. Cut-backs in education and training resulting from austerity measures have contributed to both the declining skill base of the workforce and to diminishing productivity. In addition, the accompanying social unrest threatens the stability of reform-minded governments.

Through activities stemming from the conclusions of its 1987 High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment, and the ongoing work of the Governing Body's tripartite Employment Committee, the ILO has sought to encourage developing countries to pursue simultaneous policies of structural adjustment, revival of growth and greater social and economic liberty and justice. My Government welcomes these ILO efforts to ensure that the labour and social aspects of structural adjustment processes and policies are fully taken into account.

More generally, the Report of the Director-General, and indeed much the ILO's work during the past decade, suggest to me that a "global growth-plus" strategy is needed to respond to the tremendously complex structural adjustment and development issues that we face individually and collectively.

A global growth-plus strategy includes three main components: investing in growth; investing in the future of workers; and investing in the protection of workers.

As the Director-General's Report emphasises, growth is a necessary condition for improving the welfare of individual workers. This policy area has been studied and analysed in such detail that there now seems to be broad agreement on the kinds of measures needed.

Here, I would include policies to stabilise and liberalise economies; to strengthen the effectiveness of public administration, the private sector and the role of markets; to provide access to financial support and capital flows; to encourage agreement on a collaborative debt strategy, such as was recently proposed by United States Secretary of the Treasury, Nicholas Brady; to strengthen open multilateral trade and financial systems; and to implement sound monetary, fiscal and structural policies in industrialised and developing countries.

Let me be clear that a growth-plus strategy is not a substitute for corrective adjustments either to macroeconomic policies, such as monetary and fiscal reform, or to microeconomic policies aimed at improving resource allocation. It is a necessary complement, intended to introduce approaches to adjustment and stabilisation that are compatible with both economic growth and social justice. I hope that, in this area, we can all agree that the ILO's response must be directed at the social and labour aspects of these measures.

Greater growth requires not only increasing the number of jobs, but also investing in human resources by providing realistic training and retraining policies and programmes linked to employment needs. Here, the ILO unquestionably has a significant role to play. In particular, there is an urgent need for co-operation between labour and management in the implementation of literacy programmes, basic skills and job training, tied to realistic employment opportunities and targeted to the poorest and most vulnerable segments of society.

The ILO, through its labour standards and tripartite structure, possesses a unique capability to protect and promote the human rights, as well as the social welfare, of workers and employers. I firmly believe that protection of such fundamental rights is compatible with, and indeed, essential to, development. Worker rights are inseparable from social justice; therefore, they must go hand-in-hand with stable economic growth. The ILO must continue to advance this linkage.

The Report of the Director-General has brought into focus just how difficult the task will be to provide simultaneously growth and social justice.

While the task will be difficult, the rewards of success will be enormous. As the great American diplomat, Ralph Bunche, said in his Nobel Peace Prize lecture of 1950, "If peace is to be secure, long-suffering and long-forgotten people of the world – the underprivileged and the undernourished – must begin to realise without delay the promise of a new day and a new life."

Economic policy alone cannot provide that new day and new life. We also need fundamental commitments – at the national and international levels – to improving and protecting the workforce.

Just as investment in the workforce has become a primary goal of the United States "growth-plus" programmes, so I believe that the ILO must continue to play a lead role in demonstrating that investing in the workforce is a critical component of a global growth strategy. To support the ILO in its critical role of ensuring a continuing concern for the welfare of working men and women, I am pleased to announce my Department is funding three new ILO projects. One will examine the use of new and innovation training technologies for disadvantaged youth. Another will analyse the potential for developing the ILO's Turin Centre as a focal point for the identification and distribution of learning materials. The third, in which I have a particularly strong personal interest, provides for an international analysis of drug and alcohol abuse prevention and assistance programmes at the workplace. This grant is especially important because, sadly enough, drug abuse has become one of the critical issues of our times. I believe the ILO is in a unique position to co-ordinate and assist workers, employers, and governments in the battle against drug abuse. Thus, I plan to host, in Washington, DC, an international symposium of 30 top policy-makers and practitioners from governments, labour and management to discuss the results of this study, articulate a strategy to disseminate widely its findings, and advise the ILO on how best it can promote national and international action on this new workplace problem.

Beneath the foundation stone of the former ILO headquarters here in Geneva lies a document on which is written: "If you desire peace, cultivate justice." In cultivating justice – in working for economic growth, education, human rights, and liberty for common men and women – we can advance the cause of peace.

History bestows no greater title than that of "peacemaker." A generation has passed since the ILO was deservedly honoured with that title. By continuing to invest in growth and in workers – by releasing the energies, imaginations, and dreams of citizens across the globe – the ILO can ensure that the title of "peacemaker" will continue alongside its name for generations and centuries to come.

Original – Arabic: Mr. ISSA (Workers' delegate, Syrian Arab Republic) – I am pleased to convey to you Mr. President, the good wishes of the trade union movement in the Syrian Arab Republic. I have much admiration for your trade union role in the struggle against the policy of apartheid and I congratulate you on the confidence that the Conference has shown in you in appointing you to the presidency. I reiterate the confidence of our workers and trade unions that you will successfully conclude the work of this Conference in such a way as to respond to the aspirations of workers and trade unions world-wide and to carry out the objectives of the ILO, which is celebrating its 70th anniversary this year. We wish the Organisation every success in fulfilling its mission.

The International Labour Conference is an important event held each year reflecting the spirit of co-operation and democracy in international relations. It represents an opportunity to take stock of questions concerning labour and workers, and to monitor resolutions already adopted or adopt new ones which are the outcome of our debates.

We have always participated actively in the Conference, for we consider it to be an essential tool to put an end to arbitrary relations and relations of exploitation which still afflict many countries and to which millions of workers are victim, suffering from inhuman policies practised by regimes opposed to workers and to their legitimate rights, or from a policy of plunder of the people's resources pursued by multinational corporations.

Our trade union movement today is undergoing dramatic restructuring in its procedures and working methods, based on our technical experience over 51 years of a history rich in success and struggle, and on its privileged position in our State and society, thanks to the complete confidence placed in it by our Party and its Secretary-General, militant Comrade Hafez El-Assad, to develop and implement economic, social and cultural programmes, linked to the lives of our people and of our working class, and aimed at consolidating progress and socialism in society. The resolutions and the orientations of our trade union congresses, notably those of our 21st General Congress and of the Conference on National Creativity and Self-Sufficiency, as well as the directions taken by our Party and our progressive National Front, constitute a framework of action for the struggle of our working class and our trade union movement in all spheres.

Our main objective is to diversify our trade union movement and to extend the services it provides to workers, to pursue the struggle for reconstruction and liberation and to strengthen the position of our country in the face of imperialist Zionist plots and schemes, in accordance with the radical changes which have taken place on the international trade union scene, and while preserving our national identity and our relations of struggle in common with other progressive trade unions in the world.

At the stage in our struggle, we are able to mobilise the abilities of our trade unionists, both men and women, in order to create and move forward, while winning the respect of the masses.

In spite of our optimism over the successes we have secured, we are still very concerned by our nation's combat against the persistent Israeli aggression which has lasted for 41 years. The obstinacy and arrogance of the Zionist expansionists constitute without a doubt the major obstacle hampering a just and honourable solution to the Arab-Zionist conflict based on respect for the Charter of the international community, total and unconditional withdrawal of the Israeli occupation forces from all the occupied Arab territories, and recognition of the right of the Palestinian people to return to its native land, to determine its own future and to establish a democratic independent State.

I have familiarised myself with the Report of the Director-General on recovery and employment, and with its appendices. The Report also deals with the poverty which marks numerous regions of the world, and declares that the situation will deteriorate further if a solution is not found to the debt problem. I share the view of the Director-General about the need to place greater importance on the social aspects of structural adjustment policies and to the ultimate aim of development, the welfare of the people.

I have also read the report of the Director-General on the situation of Arab workers in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories, in accordance with the resolution passed by the Conference in 1974 condemning the Zionist occupying authorities for their policy of racial discrimination against the Arab workers and peoples, and the violation of their trade union rights and freedom.

In confirmation of this, the fact-finding mission sent by the Director-General of the ILO includes in its report of 1989 a large number of violations of the rights of the Arab trade union movement in the occupied Arab territories. In particular, it notes the closure of the offices of the General Confederation of Arab Workers in Nablus on 25 August 1988 for a two-year period, as well as the closure of other union headquarters. Furthermore, it confirms the difficulty of carrying out legitimate trade union activities on account of the police measures to which trade unionists are subject and concludes that the exercise of freedom of association has been affected by the Israeli occupation. In its report, the mission also stresses the multiple aspects of racial discrimination as between Arab and Israeli workers, especially the disparity in wages for the same work, the impossibility for Arab workers to obtain qualified employment or supervisory or management posts on a footing of equality with Israelis, no to mention the fact that they are also exposed to imprisonment, expulsion and exile. Moreover, the police and the army of the occupation authorities have subjected the people met by the Director-General's mission to stringent interrogation, which constitutes an attack on the principles of freedom of association and the right of freedom of speech (see paragraph 8 of the Report). I should also mention the serious negative effects of the continuing state of occupation in the sphere of work, labour relations and economic and social life in Palestine, in Golan and the other occupied Arab territories which have had dramatic consequences (see paragraph 14 of the Report). The mission then refers to the International Labour Conference resolution of 1980 in which it expressed its concern as to the establishment of Israeli settlements in the Arab territories and demanded that existing settlements should be abolished and new ones halted. But the Israeli occupation authorities have gone on to set up new settlements, at the same time expanding existing ones; this constitutes serious discrimination as between two kinds of worker in these territories.

All these human rights violations, which are characterised by racism, are carried out against Arab citizens on the dubious pretext that national security requires these measures. Yes, all these inhuman acts perpetrated against an unarmed people, which are characterised by extremist racism and unlimited discrimination, make life for Arab citizens in Palestine, the Golan Heights and other Arab territories occupied by Israel into something akin to living in a gigantic prison, over which hangs an atmosphere of terrorism such as the world has never seen before.

Nobody doubts that such terrorist practices aim at eliminating the Palestinian Arab people: there is never a day when there are not a number more to add to the list of dead and wounded, victims of the Israeli occupying forces; nor does a day pass without further butchery against Palestinian villagers, the destruction of their houses and the expulsion of a number of Palestinians from their homeland.

The details we have given you about these crimes and these violations of the rights of Arab workers and inhabitants of Palestine and the Golan Heights is not just random and ephemeral. These are facts, reported by the western news media and backed up by the reports of the Director-General as well as by United Nations documents, such as the report of the ad hoc commission of inquiry into human rights violations of the Israeli forces in the occupied Arab territories, the United Nations Secretary-General's Report No. A/43/806 dated 21 November 1988, the reports of the Executive Secretary of the International Centre for Trade Union Rights, of Amnesty International and of other international organisations.

As you know, if you have been following the news about the Arab territories of Palestine occupied by Israel, the level of tension has increased rapidly in recent times, accompanied by assorted techniques of violence and terrorism used by the Israeli forces of occupation against Arab citizens. The latest invention of the Israeli boffins to "refine" the art of terrorism is to oblige Arab workers and inhabitants to wear badges so as to differentiate them from Israeli workers.

These criminal acts taken as a whole can be taken as fully documented historical evidence, which condemns the Israeli authorities, and this evidence is by no means less substantial than that used against Nazi leaders at the Nuremberg tribunal at the end of the Second World War.

Guided by common destiny, suffering and objectives, the "intifadah" has spread right across the occupied Arab territories, starting in the West Bank, the Gaza Strip and the Golan Heights, passing through the territories occupied before the 1967 aggression, and finally reaching occupied South Lebanon. Viewing the realities of the Arab-Zionist conflict objectively, one can grasp and understand the Syrian position of resistance against imperialist designs, a position based on the Arab nation's inalienable right to freedom, to life and to controlling its moral and material destiny, just like other nations and peoples, and its right to justice, recognised by all human laws and confirmed by charters of the international community and its different organisations and institutions, of which the ILO forms part, and of which the ILO is the most important for us – the working class and the trade union movement.

When one has a real understanding of the position of our country, one can understand the national and sectoral significance of the unswerving support that Syria gives to the Palestinian people for the liberation of its occupied territories, the restoration of its legitimate rights on return and to self-determination, and the support Syria gives to the heroic struggle of the Lebanese progressive national movement against the Zionist-isolationist plan to partition the Lebanon and to divide into separate provinces on religious lines, which will only serve the racist Zionist enemy's aims and its expansionist dreams.

On behalf of the working class and the trade union movement of the revolutionary Syrian Arab Republic, I reaffirm the support of the Syrian workers and trade unions and their commitment to the national and progressive attitude adopted by our guiding fighter, Hafez El-Assad, General Secretary of the Ba'athist Arab Socialist Renaissance Party and President of the Republic. This strong and unswerving attitude gains the solidarity and support of those who defend freedom, peace and justice in the world, and its credibility has been clearly demonstrated by events, in spite of the many dangers and challenges facing our Arab country and the world. Our Syrian Arab people in the Golan Heights are fighting with unwavering courage, constantly affirming their allegiance to their mother country and refusing the occupation, the annexation and the imposition of Israeli authority over their lands.

The revolt of our Palestinian Arab people, "the war of the stones", has confirmed and confirms again the miscalculation of power made by the Zionist entity, and confirms that resistance against the occupation opens the way towards liberation, and that the policies of annexation, of new settlements, of the iron hand, maiming, barbarous torture, assassination, burying people alive and total destruction of property constitute war crimes from which the Zionist occupiers will only reap ills, disillusion and ruin.

We are confident in the future, as the Arab President Hafez El-Assad has said, and look forward to it with optimism. And optimism for a bright future for our Arab people is linked with peace; and effective peace, as advocated by President El-Assad, means a just peace; and a just peace will not come about as long as aggression persists and is renewed.

In this context, on the basis of the solidarity and unity of the struggle of peoples, I condemn, on behalf of our working class and our trade union movement, the racial discrimination practised by the White minority in South Africa against the native people, and I urge honourable members of the Conference to support the native people of South Africa in their fight to liberate themselves and enjoy the wealth of their country, which is exploited by this White minority.

Please excuse me if I have spoken too long, but there are so many subjects that have to be dealt with. I affirm to you, in the name of our working class and our trade union movement, that we are prepared to co-operate and take every opportunity to achieve more progress through this important Conference in order to ensure the well-being of our workers and peoples, achieve peace and disarmament, combat poverty, unemployment and debt, put a stop to the merchants of war and establish a new international economic system founded on justice and equality. In conclusion, I salute you and wish you and the Conference all possible success.

Mr. ENGELBERTS (representative of Public Services International) – I should like to add my congratulations on your election as President of the 76th Session of the Conference and I also wish to congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne on his election as Director-General of the ILO and to pay respects to the retiring Director-General, Mr. Francis Blanchard.

It is also my pleasure to convey good wishes to Mr. Heribert Maier, our colleague from the international trade union movement who has just been appointed Deputy Director-General of the ILO.

I am speaking on behalf of the common front of public service unions, namely, the Postal, Telegraph and Telephone International, the International Federation of Free Teachers' Unions, the World Confederation of Teachers, the International Federation of Employees in Public Service and my own organisation, the Public Services International (PSI).

Collectively, we represent more than 25 million workers in all areas of public service. As the common front, and also as individual organisations, we take an active part in ILO affairs. For many years we have been stressing the importance of a vigorous and effective public service as a vital ingredient to supporting the aims of the ILO, including improvement of living and working conditions and promotion of full employment, provision for and satisfaction of the basic needs of the community and protection of the poor. These are vital ingredients to long-term stability and progress in the struggle for development with economic and social justice.

We are deeply concerned that the international standards which have been constructed so carefully to protect the interest of workers are now increasingly being blatantly disregarded – especially in the case of public service workers.

Some governments are deliberately seeking to undermine trade union rights in the public service sector by refusing the rights of freedom of association and collective bargaining to the workers they employ. This discrimination takes on many forms such as the banning by the British Government of General Communications Headquarters (GCHQ) workers from belonging to a trade union and the sacking of those who dared to stand up for their legitimate democratic rights.

The events in Fiji, apart from the political overtones, have had severe repercussions on trade union rights of public service workers. All public service employees in Fiji are now in the category of "essential services", a device which is increasingly being used by some governments to deny full trade union rights in the public service. This act is also contrary to the interpretation of essential services laid down by the ILO.

The Committee on Freedom of Association has in its last report reached conclusions on complaints against Indonesia and the Netherlands.

The complaint against Indonesia includes the allegation that there is ban on the right to organise in trade unions for all public servants, teachers and employees of government-owned or controlled corporations. They are also denied the right to collective bargaining and the Committee has criticised very strongly these restrictions imposed on public employees, and has referred the case to the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations.

In the Netherlands the unions had alleged that conditions of employment in the national insurance and subsidised sectors denied the established principle that social partners should be able to negotiate freely. The Government has wide powers to intervene in the collective bargaining process and to declare inoperative collective agreements which have been concluded. The Committee's findings considered that these were restrictive measures and the Government should therefore amend legislation to allow workers and employers in national insurance and the subsidised sector to negotiate freely and to conclude agreements in accordance with the principle of freedom of association.

I could mention many other countries, like Turkey and Chile, because there are many more cases of acute discrimination – some of which go unrecorded in regimes which have totalitarian powers. We have documented evidence, such as that quoted in the latest ICFTU annual survey of violations of trade union rights, which shows a frightening increase in the murder and torture of trade unionists. And there are other tragedies known to have occurred, for instance in China, where workers and students, in the thousands, have been murderously attacked for declaring their right to democratic freedoms which are enshrined in the high principles of this Organisation. On occasions, these principles are quoted by the aggressors with what can only be described as hypocrisy.

But what happens when we raise our voice and protest at these violations of human and trade union rights? We are often accused of threatening to call for international action in support of our oppressed brothers and sisters and told not to interfere in internal matters. If we cannot speak on behalf of those who cannot be heard, and denounce atrocities against workers and trade unionists the world over in this forum of the International Labour Organisation, where can we do it? And if we don't, who else will?

Let me at this stage say that we are giving full support to the Amnesty International world-wide campaign against the death penalty and we are asking all our affiliates to give their support by urging their governments to stop executions and strike the death penalty from their laws.

The Special Report of the Director-General on the application of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia was somewhat disappointing in that the recommendations have not been fully supported by member States. We hope that this year more positive action will be taken to remove the criminal and disgusting yoke from our Black brothers and sisters.

For our part, we in PSI have declared our policy on South Africa, which includes a comprehensive campaign by affiliates to pressurise their governments to take action to ban all investments, to impose rigorous sanctions on trade, to place an embargo on air links and to call for a United Nations conference to obtain clear commitments on an effective oil embargo.

The President's address was inspiring and dwelt strongly on the ILO's past record on this its 70th anniversary. But it also contained the message that efforts should be made to attempt to do even better in the future. I endorse this view. To look back with appreciation, but to look forward with anticipation and firm resolve.

The Director-General points to this in the preface to his report where he says: "Within the ILO's tripartite system, we must see to it that the mandate of institutions sometimes condescendingly referred to as 'social' institutions, is placed on an equal footing with that of economic, financial, monetary and commercial institutions. Now, more than ever, we must reaffirm the essential link between the economic and social spheres." The manipulation of the social affairs of those countries who have to rely on loans from the International Monetary Fund and similar institutions is scandalous. The imposition of cuts in wages and in staffing levels – particularly in the public service – and the lowering of social, health and education standards places the debt burden not on the shoulders of the government but on the backs of the workers and the community.

To turn again to the Report of the Director-General, it refers to the fall in the wages of public employees, which in most cases is the largest ever recorded. He goes on to say that the reduction in public expenditure on education, health, housing and nutrition lowers the quality of available human resources, especially among your people. We totally share that view.

There must be a determined effort to restrain the onslaught against public services and a realisation that this is an attack against the whole structure and future of economic prosperity and social justice and equality.

The public sector still encompasses some of the largest areas of industrial activity, despite attempts to privatise most of the profitable ones. The introduction of privatisation brings previously accountable public services into the free market, where medical, educational and a whole range of social services are then limited to what the individual can afford to pay.

We appreciate the Governing Body's decision to support the proposals of the Industrial Activities Committee to restructure some of the industrial activities, and welcome the decision that the Joint Committee on the Public Service, a meeting for postal and telecommunication services, a meeting for medical and health services and a meeting for teachers will now be regarded as standing committees, each of which should meet at least once every five years. This will go some way to produce formative plans for some groups of public service workers. However, in order to do this, it is necessary to have the support and backing of an internal structure within the ILO.

The report from the last session of the Joint Committee on the Public Service in November 1988, dealing with the effect given to the conclusions and resolutions adopted by the Committee at previous sessions, lists a whole range of activities still to be undertaken.

These are related to the conclusions concerning the situation of women in the public service, the conclusions concerning the effects of structural and technological progress in employment in the public service, the regional ILO seminars on the conditions of work and life of nursing personnel, studies on the conditions of work of teachers and a general survey by the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations concerning trade union rights of public employees.

There are other outstanding matters relating to decisions and conclusions from the Joint Committee for Postal and Telecommunication Services, the meeting on teachers, the meeting on health and medical services, the meeting on electricity gas and water services and the meeting on the settlement of disputes in the public service. Surely it is now time that the necessary arrangements were made in the Office to give proper and adequate attention to these items.

Finally let me reassert our belief in the work and high principles of the ILO and our high regard for the officials of the Organisation. We have been proud to be associated with the activities related to those workers we represent and hope that there will be more opportunities to do this in the future programme of the ILO.

Original – Spanish: Mr. SELA (Workers' delegate, Israel) – Mr. President, may I congratulate you on your election and on the way in which you are guiding our deliberations at this 76th Session of the International Labour Conference.

We are meeting 70 years after the foundation of the International Labour Organisation. As has been pointed out by the Director-General in his Report, the pioneers who established our Organisation in 1919 would feel deeply satisfied at the positive evolution of this specialised agency.

From the debate on the paramount issues pertaining to the world of labour, we have now reached the preparation of resolutions of a far-reaching nature.

Today, we find ourselves discussing the safety in the use of chemicals at work, the limitations which have been placed on night work and the partial revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107).

At this Conference, as has been the case year after year, we shall also seek for more effective means of putting an end to the odious regime of apartheid in South Africa and its consequences in Namibia.

We view with concern that in spite of all our efforts, there persists still, in widespread regions of our planet, endemic and extreme poverty which constitutes an affront to all mankind.

We also note the continuing unjust North-South relationship which we are attempting to reverse by changing the role of the South, so that it is no longer the almost exclusive supplier of raw materials and markets for the manufactured goods of the developed world.

We are witness to the havoc which the debt repayment situation is causing in the developing countries, undermining further the already precarious living conditions of their peoples.

One hundred years on from the glorious first of May, we still see violations of the most elemental rights of the working class.

We view with horror the accelerated imbalance of the world's ecosystem, caused by the heedless exploitations of nature and the unbridled use and waste of substances which impair life and the environment.

We should do everything in our power to formulate and implement instruments likely to curtail these pernicious processes which are an affront to the basic principles guiding the work of our international agency.

There is no shortage of people who have either vested interests, a narrow mind or deep-rooted sense of intolerance – or perhaps all three characteristics – who try to hamper our work in this field, harming the spirit of consensus and diverting down narrow paths the principles of universality of our Organisation.

Our unbending desire for progress, the reaffirmation of the basic fundamental principles of the ILO and our total rejection of the pressure of political blackmail, will be the proper response to those who attempt to besmirch the universal principles which motivate us.

The General Workers' Confederation of Israel, the Histadrut, has had to meet testing challenges in recent years in pressing home its claims.

We have had years of adjustments to the national economy to try and escape from the inflationary spiral. The drastic measures imposed in this regard have given rise to a major reduction in the purchasing power of salaries and wages.

Thanks to successful tripartite bargaining and sensible collective agreements at national or sectoral level, we have managed to mitigate the effects of the initial wage reduction and managed to recover in full the value of labour remuneration in a relatively short period of time. This demonstrates that tripartism, when properly understood, can entail clearly expressed wage claims without these claims involving inflationary surges.

The economic stabilisation plan brought with it very grave consequences for the productive apparatus and caused a worrying increase in unemployment.

By taking a firm stand in defence of our union members, we succeeded in avoiding a considerable increase in lay-offs; but in spite of this, statistics indicate worrying levels of this scourge – around 8 per cent of the economically active population.

We have not confined ourselves to purely wage-claim action. In the trade-union-run sector of the economy, affiliated to the Histadrut, superhuman efforts have been made to guarantee jobs. This sector of the national economy, owned by the workers themselves and equivalent to 25 per cent of GDP, has also suffered – like the private sector – from the repercussions of the draconian economic stabilisation plan. High interest rates and severe constraints on all aspects of investment have given rise to grave anomalies in the national productive apparatus.

This has compelled us to undertake a broad and far-reaching recovery programme to restore profitability rates with a view to stimulating productivity and employment. We are now in the throes of this process.

The adverse reality of economic adjustment has also dealt a blow to the budgets of our programmes for social security, cultural and educational activities, vocational and ideological training, community work, among others.

Only the tenacity and perseverance of a working class with a deep social awareness and high organisational flair has enabled us to maintain the level of quality of services to our members and, in many aspects, even to improve them substantially.

Only a democratic and pluralistic organisation like the Histadrut, where Arabs and Jews live side by side in harmony with the secular and the religious, agricultural workers and urban proletarians, the self-employed, the unpaid and co-operative workers, could successfully combat these monumental challenges.

May I make reference to the lengthy conflict which has set us against our Arab neighbours for some decades now. The controversies and disputes which divide us will not be resolved either by violence or by sterile confrontation. Our conflicts will only be solved through sincere and direct dialogue. The prolonged tragedy from which our people suffer has not found and will not find the solution in war and bloodshed.

The Israeli labour movement has always held high the flag of peaceful coexistence on the basis of reciprocal respect for the right to national existence of the States in the region behind sure and recognised boundaries.

The Israeli labour movement was the first to accept the United Nations resolution on the partition of Palestine under British mandate into two States.

This decision was ignored and transgressed by the countries of the Arab League who in 1948 invaded the nascent Israeli State and occupied for 20 years and even annexed a large part of the territories which the United Nations had designed for the creation of an Arab State.

The long years of constant armed aggression, the decades of ostracism which were imposed on Israel by its neighbours saw just one glimmer of light: the historic peace agreement with the largest and most populous nation on the Arab world, the Arab Republic of Egypt.

Only Anwar Sadat's great courage and his outstanding political stature were able to break down the barriers of irrational hatred and deep-rooted resentment which appeared to obstruct indefinitely any peaceful alternative. Sadat paid with his life for the sealing of a peace treaty which put an end to so much futile bloodshed.

I could list a long litany of Arab martyrs for peace and understanding in our region: Issam Sartawi, King Abdullah himself (the predecessor of King Hussein of Jordan) and hundreds of Palestinian Arabs summarily executed for having ventured to indicate publicly their desire for dialogue.

Too much blood has already been spilt in the Middle East. The time has come to turn over a new leaf in the relations between peoples in the region. In recent months, an alternative for co-operative dialogue has opened up. The Government of my country has prepared a plan for free elections in the territories so that representatives of the Palestinian people may be democratically elected to negotiate with Israel.

The PRESIDENT – I give the floor to Mr. Abu Khormah, Workers' delegate, Jordan, on a point of order.

Original – Arabic: ABU KHORMAH (Workers' delegate, Jordan) I apologise for having interrupted the speaker, but I have done so because he has gone beyond the acceptable limit of our debate, namely the reports of the Director-General and the Governing Body. The speaker, unfortunately, has gone beyond the limit and has even made false statements which are refuted by United Nations resolutions. I challenge the speaker to say whether the Arabs refused peace. It is not the Arabs who are refusing peace. Would he at least give us the boundaries of the Israeli State if he is sincere in what he is saying? The speaker has gone beyond the limit of our debate; he has referred to names of Arab personalities and Arab countries in a tissue of lies which we cannot accept.

The PRESIDENT – I have sat here and heard previous speakers mention names in the course of their interventions without attacking or insulting anyone. I therefore rule that the speaker is not out of order.

Will you continue, Sir.

Original – Spanish: Mr. SELA – As I was saying before I was interrupted, The Government of my country has prepared a plan for free elections in the territories with a view to enabling representatives of the Palestinian people to be elected democratically to negotiate with Israel.

This is only a first step. It may not altogether satisfy those of us who advocate more far-reaching programmes. The Israeli labour movement has established and has been promoting for some time the formula of "land for peace". We understand that this is a step in the right direction and conducive to a positive move towards fruitful dialogue.

We address from this podium an appeal to all Member States to give constructive support to this peace initiative.

We urge our Arab neighbours not to cause the failure of this alternative. Let us not play into the hands of the extremists or the maximalists whose only raison d'être lies in perpetuating terror and violence.

Let us give peace a chance.

The PRESIDENT – I wish once more to appeal to delegates not to engage in unnecessary delays in the conduct of our business. Certainly, I did make the point clear right from the very first day that we would not accept any insults against a country or the head of State of a country. Since the Director-General's Report makes reference to occupied areas, occupied lands and Palestinian areas, the delegates are free to discuss that issue while remaining totally within the prescribed perimeters. I must say that various delegations have been making mention of countries; in the case of the delegate who has just taken the floor, his country has been mentioned and I have accepted it as genuine criticism in the course of the debate of the report.

May I now, therefore, request delegates not to interrupt the debate unnecessarily or delay our proceedings. I will, however, give favourable consideration to any genuine points of order raised.

Original – Spanish: Mr. CHAVES GONZALES (Minister for Labour and Social Security, Spain) – Mr. President, to begin with I would like congratulate you on your election and on the skill with which you have been conducting the proceeding of this Conference.

Also, I would like to express the congratulations of my country and also our willingness to co-operate with the new Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Hansenne. I am sure that under his leadership the International Labour Organisation will be successful in achieving its aims.

On behalf of my Government, I would also like to refer with special gratitude to the outstanding merits of the man who, for 15 years, was at the helm of our Organisation – Mr. Francis Blanchard. Even in particularly difficult times he was always able to maintain the prestige and the efficiency of the ILO.

The basic subjects mentioned by the Director-General in his Report are employment and economic growth. These are matters of major importance in today's social and economic situation.

I fully agree with the remarks made by the Director-General in his Report, for example, that economic growth is a precondition, although not the only one, for the creation of employment. I also agree with the Director-General's comment that "without growth it is very difficult to tackle social problems".

This statement is especially valid for a country like Spain which recently joined the European Community.

Our desire to achieve a middle position within the Community made it necessary to aim for higher levels of economic growth and employment, than are recorded on average by the other European countries.

Spanish society, after the necessary adjustment process, has responded dynamically during the past few years to the fundamental goal of recovering its growth capacity which is an indispensable factor in showing the employment problem. The economic growth rate in my country has been approximately 5 per cent since 1986.

Furthermore, the recent data published by the OECD corroborates that employment growth during the last two years was in excess of 8 per cent, thus being twice as high as the average rate achieved at the same time by the other countries of the Economic Community.

Since 1985, the net number of jobs created exceeded 1,200,000 which is the equivalent of 1,000 jobs per day. These new jobs made it possible to absorb a large increase in the working populations and resulted last year in 300,000 fewer people unemployed.

I would like to add something more. On the one hand this employment growth was accomplished by increases in wages which, in real terms, were higher than increases in consumer prices.

On the other hand, I would like to point out that all of the positive measures taken to promote employment made it possible for certain groups of society which found it difficult to find work – for example, young people looking for their first job, people who were unemployed for long periods, and women – to benefit directly from this employment creation process.

It is also significant, that in accordance with the most recent data resulting from a survey of the working population, carried out over the past few months, there is an increase in open-ended contracts among wage-earners.

This is due to the fact that temporary contracts are now being converted into open-ended contracts as soon as they have reached the maximum term of three years.

These results underline the need to maintain the policies which have made them possible and especially to continue the contracting procedures directed at the numerous groups of women and young people who are seeking employment opportunities.

At the same time, measures have been stepped up to promote stable employment through a series of incentives which will usher in unlimited work contracts.

This growth policy which, as I said, is an indispensable condition in the light of the challenge of the single market, is in itself not a sufficient guarantee for social welfare. Whilst there are some who believe in the regulating potential that the market has on itself, my Government believes that it is necessary to harmonise growth policies with measures of redistribution.

Thus, the economic growth rates to which I have referred are going hand in hand with increased employment, higher purchasing power and also increased public spending.

The increase in public spending is not only being used to achieve higher levels of social protection, but also to give priority to the development of the requisite infrastructure so that economic growth does not end up strangling itself.

The resources used to protect the unemployed have made it possible to increase unemployment benefits so that people who have been unemployed for some time or older people who are unemployed can now receive these benefits until they reach the age of retirement.

Today, of the 2,600,000 unemployed 1,200,000 receive regular unemployment benefits.

At the same time, we have increased the amount of training programmes which provide economic benefits as well as training, and which help the unemployed to gain access to the labour market. More than 400,000 people participate annually in these programmes.

Now, to take a look at the pension situation, our public system, which for a long number of years was seriously jeopardised, is today greatly consolidated. This was brought about, on the one hand, by a series of corrective measures adopted in 1985 to offset the huge defects inherent in the system, and on the other, by the rise in employment over the past three years, with the consequent rise in the number of tax payers and in money available in the system.

The recovery of the system made it possible; to incorporate 500,000 new members into the system since 1985; to re-evaluate the payments so that they would maintain their overall purchasing power, and at the same time raise the amounts paid to the lowest categories, for example, the retirement and invalidity benefits which, in 1982, were situated at 75.7 per cent of the minimum wage, in January 1990 will be the equivalent of the net value of the minimum wage; lastly, to multiply pension expenditure by 2.5 since 1982, so that it now accounts for one more point in the GDP. This year, this part of the budget will represent 3,300 billion pesetas.

The social security reforms which were embarked upon in 1985 will be completed by the transmission to Parliament of a bill, which at present is being discussed by the Government. It calls for the setting of a tax-free level of benefits. Up until now, there were different assistance processes, the number of which has quadrupled over the past six years, with very restrictive conditions of access.

The new law, as well as establishing a larger amount of pensions, will reduce the age of access to 65. The Report of the Director-General pays special attention to the participation of the social partners. It states that tripartite dialogue is indispensable for economic growth.

My government fully subscribes to these principles and objectives and has developed its economic and social policies with the participation and the collaboration of the social partners. Tripartite dialogue is widely institutionalised in Spain and can be seen in many labour administration bodies.

Apart from this institutional framework of tripartism, my Government has always maintained social dialogue as a principle of our political action, although during the last year it has not been possible to reach agreements with the social partners.

In all decision-making processes on social questions, we have always relied on the social partners either through consultations or through direct negotiations. We have defended tripartism, even when the trade unions were hesitant to accept the presence of employers in negotiations about employment. However, as I said, this participation by the social partners did not finally result in effective agreements.

My Government continues to consider that dialogue with social partners is an indispensable component of any policy of growth and redistribution designed to safeguard and consolidate social welfare.

Our tradition of trade union freedom and independence also places emphasis on collective bargaining between the social partners. We believe that this is an effective way to settle working conditions. It is therefore necessary to clearly define fields and to maintain a balance between what should be discussed between the government and the social partners, and what should fall within the sphere of bilateral negotiation between trade unions and employers' organisations.

Collective bargaining, however, should not be permitted to hamper government action designed to redress social inequalities. We therefore insist on our right to play a role in labour legislation in order to bring about basic guarantees and better living and working conditions for wage earners.

Still, this does not mean that a government should unilaterally step in and interfere directly in the establishment of working conditions in areas where free initiative by the social partners is more conducive to an efficient solutions.

The first school of thought, defended by neo-liberal politicians, is one which we do not share. The second outlook leads to a politicisation of the conflict which distorts and impoverishes collective negotiations by transferring to the Government responsibility for decision-making and thereby, in the medium term, weakening the trade union movement or even destabilising progress in a pluralist society.

Economic growth, employment, solidarity, social dialogue and consultation will continue to be the linchpin of our political action. They will also be the key to economic and social development in my country.

I would also like to touch on other matters for discussion before this Conference. For example, the questions of night work and the use of chemicals at work.

Occupational health and safety is one of the prime concerns of the policy pursued by my department. This has been one of the issues to which Spain, a Member country of the European Community, has given considerable attention.

It is necessary to establish an overall standard relating to occupational health and safety for my country, which is looking with considerable realism at this question.

But we have to say that in this important field, as in many others, government legislative action alone is not enough. We need to be able to draw on the support and the co-operation of both employers and workers, each of whom should assume their own responsibility and role, as the Government must also do.

I do not wish to conclude without addressing the question of the foreign debt, which is creating difficulties for a great many countries, especially in the Latin American continent.

I should like to express the solidarity of my Government with the Governments and the workers of these countries, who are staggering under the burden of foreign debt. This is making it impossible for them to overcome underdevelopment and has triggered serious events, such as those recently experienced by some Latin American countries. Thus, in addition to their problems of social inequality, they are suffering from severe imbalances which make it difficult to consolidate democracy in these regions to which we feel so close.

We are at the threshold of a new century and, as was rightly pointed out by the Director-General, the last years of this century provide us with an opportunity to forge ahead.

It is now for all of us to ensure that this opportunity becomes a reality, thanks to the efforts undertaken by governments, workers and employers, in order to create greater social well-being for our citizens.

Original - Arabic: Mr. Al-SABBAH (representative of Palestine) - First of all, I should like on my own behalf, on behalf of the State of Palestine and on behalf of its President, Yasser Arafat, to congratulate you on your election as President of this Conference. We welcome this choice, given the place your country, Zimbabwe, holds at the international and African level, and the major role it plays in supporting the struggle for democracy and peace throughout the world. We place our entire confidence in you and we are convinced that your skills, competence and impartiality will be a decisive factor in the success of this Conference and in the adoption of resolutions and recommendations in accordance with the objectives and principles of the ILO.

On this occasion, I would like to express my congratulations to Mr. Hansenne, the new Director-General, and to express our gratitude to his predecessor, Mr. Blanchard, for his considerable work in compiling the Report before us and everything in the Special Report on South Africa and Appendices on the situation of the peoples in and Palestine.

The report of the ILO mission contains interesting information from many sources, which makes the report all the more important; it is worth discussing as it reveals the truth - both to the participants at this Conference and public opinion.

We wish to stress the validity of the recommendations made by the Director-General in his report; but, at the same time, we wonder what became of previous recommendations? The answer, of course, can be seen in the rise of racist practices perpetrated by the Israeli authorities against the workers and people of Palestine who are living on their land but deprived of drawing any benefit from it; these practices are accompanied by an increase in the number of settlements, an increase in the number of houses destroyed, more arrests of trade unionists who are expelled from the land of their fathers, further seizures of land – which are sources of wealth and production for their owners – more taxes of all sorts and requirements for licences. Consequently the plundering carried out by the Israeli occupation authorities has become a sort of economic enterprise which has provided these authorities with an income of between three and five thousand millions – during the past ten years.

The authors of this report attempted to convey a number of tragic images of the situation of Palestinian workers living under occupation. As to the format of the report, it is descriptive and comprises many different points of view and statistics, without, however, putting a finger on the crux of the problem with which we are faced. Thus the suffering of Palestinian workers and employers, as well as terrorism, racial discrimination and inhuman working conditions contained in labour contracts, are inevitable outcome of the colonialist nature of Israeli occupation, which makes the Palestinian developing national economy dependent upon the powerful and programmed Israeli economy.

Coming to the heart of the matter, we should like to make several comments on the various paragraphs contained in the report, although we know in advance that it would be impossible to cover everything we want to say in a speech limited to fifteen minutes.

In paragraph 12 it is stated that “new causes for concern had arisen with the uprising in the occupied Arab territories,”... in fact, it was the occupation of Palestinian land, as well as measures of oppression, terrorism and the odious exploitation of labour and racial discrimination practised by the Israeli occupation authorities, which triggered off the uprising. The “intifadah” is a lawful means of self-defence and a national response to the continuing occupation and to Israeli practices and measures of oppression.

These practices have been condemned by the whole world and have given rise to new sources of concern; furthermore they have resulted in worsening living and working conditions of the Palestinian workers. Paragraph 39 of the report even tries to exonerate the responsibility of the occupation authorities in the eyes of the international community because it writes: “It is fairly clear that Palestinian labour from the occupied territories and substitute foreign labour is cheaper and more flexible than Israeli labour”. This implies to the reader that the situation is entirely normal, whether this applies to Palestinian workers who have come from far-away countries.

In paragraph 42 the report describes the situation of Arab workers in East Jerusalem and the Golan, from the standpoint that these workers have been living in Israel since the annexation of these two regions. For instance, the report refers to workers of the West Bank as Palestinian workers, whereas it refers to those in Jerusalem and the Golan as “Arab workers”.

The ILO is a United Nations specialised agency; and here there is a serious political error, which flouts resolutions of international legality which have rejected and condemned the decision of the Israeli occupation authorities to annex Arab Jerusalem and the Golan to Israel and to apply Israeli law to the Palestinian and Syrian peoples. And yet, this same paragraph points out that Arab hotels and restaurants in East Jerusalem, following the lead of the city's Arab enterprises and shops, have managed to continue to apply the legislation in force in 1967.

As regards Annex 1 of this report, which is devoted to technical co-operation in the occupied territories in 1988-89, we should like to recall United Nations General Assembly resolution 43/21 of 3 November 1988 and General Assembly resolution 43/178 of 20 December 1988, which call upon the international organisations within the United Nations system to continue helping and supporting the Palestine Liberation Organisation and to step up their action in close co-operation with this Organisation.

Let us now turn to the document submitted by the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs of Israel. We would like to point out that the information contained in the report, as well as the ILO mission's report on its visit to the occupied Arab territories to examine the situation of workers and trade unionists and the reports of other organisations and government bodies – as well as the reports and statements that have been widely circulated – suffice to give an answer to Israel's pretensions.

International law contains special regulations and standards pertaining to the protection of human rights and the obligations incumbent upon an occupation authority, as well as the rights of a population under occupation or in a state of war. For instance, the Annex of the Hague Convention of 1907 and the Fourth Geneva Convention oblige the occupying State to respect human rights. Article 43 of the Hague Convention, Article 55 of the Annex to the Convention and Articles 47 and 56 of the Geneva Convention are also very clear in this respect.

From this rostrum, we therefore ask the international community: where are these Israeli occupation authorities that expropriate agricultural land and water resources, that use cheap labour for all sorts of illegal work, that destroy houses, murder women, children and old people, arrest and expel trade unionists? Can Israel really submit such a falsified document to try and pull the wool over the eyes of the whole world – which is aware of the atrocious crimes and Nazi practices perpetrated against all categories of the Palestinian people.

The Palestinian workers are obliged to pay taxes to the occupying authorities which cannot be compared with the tax scales in Israel itself. Palestinians are paying taxes on incomes which are exempt from taxation in Israel. An Israeli single person pays 2 shekels on an income of 450 shekels, whereas a Palestinian with the same income is obliged to pay 31.3 shekels and does not benefit from the system of tax exemption (Haretz of 12 April 1988).

Official Israeli sources have refused until now, in spite of repeated demands, to provide statistics on the deductions made from the wages of Palestinian workers. Since 1970 the Israeli tax authorities have been levying enormous sums on the incomes of Palestinian workers which constitute 20 per cent of their wages. These sums are paid into the social security fund but, in fact, the Palestinian workers do not enjoy any form of social security or insurance.

The Israeli press itself has published statistics and studies on the taxes deducted from the income of Palestinian workers, also pointing out that they receive no social benefits in return (Haretz of 2 May 1988).

The illiteracy rate amongst the Palestinians was one of the lowest in the world; statistics published by United Nations specialised agencies report that the rate has risen considerably and that there are fewer educated people amongst the Palestinians. What other objective can the Israeli occupation authorities have if it is not to keep the young Palestinians in the occupied territories in a state of ignorance by closing the schools and universities – sometimes for periods of more than a year.

Furthermore, the fascist and racist nature of the Zionist entity does not allow us to be taken in by the plan for elections initiated by the person who pronounced three “no’s” to the Knesset on 17 May 1989: “no” to negotiations with the PLO; “no” to a Palestinian State, “no” to the slightest return of land to Palestinians in the occupied Arab territories.

The ratification by the Israeli Government of this plan for elections is entirely in line with their policy to refuse to listen to international demands and resolutions, calling upon Israel to establish a just peace on the basis of international legitimacy, with a view to granting the Palestinian people their rights to return to their homeland, self-determination and the establishment of an independent Palestinian State – like all the other peoples of the world.

Anyone who advocates these elections under the occupation and who threatens any candidate to these elections who proclaims his allegiance to Palestinian national rights or to the PLO, cannot conceal his true objectives in the eyes of world public opinion.

It is incumbent upon the international organisations to put an end to the inhuman Israeli practices which are a form of slavery and servitude for the Palestinian people.

Indeed, a 1,500-page report, published by the United States State Department on human rights contains 22 pages on violations of human rights in Israel. Israel occupies third place in the list of those countries violating human rights – whereas South Africa occupies the first place.

In reply to Israel’s spokesman who spoke at this international forum the day before yesterday, we feel bound to point out the statement made to the Washington Press Club by professor Israel Samak, President of the Human Rights Association in Israel. He said that Israel was not South Africa; it was worse than South Africa.

We can see from this comparison that the regimes of Pretoria and Tel Aviv have much in common; both are based on colonialism and racism. It is no wonder that these countries are stepping up co-operation in the fields of armaments and technology and exchanging experiences on methods of repression and terrorism that can be applied to the Palestinian and African peoples.

We should like to proclaim, from this rostrum, on behalf of the Palestinian people, our wholehearted solidarity with the struggle of the workers of South Africa and Namibia against the racist regime of Pretoria. We are waiting for the day when the flag of independent Namibia will be raised high and when it can take its place within the African and international family. We hope that the workers and peoples in South Africa may soon attain their objectives of freedom, independence and the total elimination of apartheid.

I should like to proclaim our support for the struggle of our Lebanese brothers against the Israeli occupation of southern Lebanon and wish them every success in fulfilling their goals, achieving peace, putting an end to the Israeli occupation and maintaining the existence of Lebanon both on its soil and with in its institutions.

The Arab people of Palestine, which has a long history and civilisation, are determined to continue their struggle, by all political and military means, to attain their national objectives of freedom and independence, their rights to self-determination – like all peoples of the world – and their right to establish their independent Palestinian State, with its capital in Jerusalem, under the leadership of its only lawful representative, the Palestine Liberation Organisation.

Our people, through its popular and heroic uprising, has enjoyed the support of the whole world and the international community, which has become convinced of the right of the Palestinian people to self determination.

Given this situation, it is the duty of all international organisations to reconsider the validity of Israel’s representation in these organisations, in order to maintain the principles enshrined in their constitutions, statutes and resolutions – which Israel so openly flouts. We call upon the international conscience to ally itself with the cause of justice and not with force, so that peace may prevail throughout the world.

Original – German: Mr. MARX (Employers’ delegate, German Democratic Republic) – Mr. President, our Conference has been in session now for more than two weeks; time enough for us to say that you have merited the confidence we placed in you. You have guided this Conference with considerable skill and I am sure that you will continue to do so during the final phase of the Conference.

The Director-General’s Report, Recovery and employment, touches on a number of interesting topics. In its chapter, “Development strategies for recovery”, the Report also discusses the role of the government in promoting economic growth.

Different points of view have been put forward on this subject during the discussion. Attempts, for example, have been made to denigrate central economic management and planning in the socialist countries. Some speakers considered the free play of the market factors as the only panacea. I cannot leave these remarks unquestioned.

An economy such as that of the German Democratic Republic, which is based on the principle of state ownership, requires a coherent economic approach and action.

In my country, we believe that given the present technological revolution and the rapid development of productive forces, it is more necessary than ever to combine central management and planning with the responsibility and independence of state-run enterprises, companies, co-operatives and local state bodies, to ensure the creativity and initiative of the workers.

For us, central management and planning of the economy was, and continues to be, the cornerstone of our society. Now, wherein lies for us the importance of central management and planning? I should like to share a few thoughts with you on this subject.

First and foremost, there can be no coherent economic and social policy without any central management and planning. It is the linchpin of our social strategy; in other words we intend to establish a socialist society in which every aspect of economic and technical progress and all economic achievements are reflected in improved working and living conditions for the workers. This cannot be left to the free play of market forces.

Second, in order to ensure that our structural policy is implemented consistently, central management and planning is a must. Without this central planning, the rapid development in microelectronics we have been experiencing in the German Democratic Republic since the middle of the nineteen seventies would have been unthinkable. And we are on the threshold of even more far-reaching technological changes. Without any government influence, this process could not be digested technically, economically and, least of all, socially.

It is therefore imperative today to concentrate research and to focus on those sectors which are geared to bringing about a smooth technological adjustment process. Some time ago, I questioned the representative of an important undertaking as to whether his undertaking was ready to take the plunge and operate under free market forces. He felt that this was out of the question. Research could not be left up to the market. Obviously, we need government subsidies – and this has nothing to do with a market economy approach.

We also have to bear in mind that a logical link between the economy and the environment in many sectors cannot be ensured and safeguarded by individual enterprises or institutions. Here again we have to rely on central management and planning.

Let me state this quite unambiguously. A coherent economic and social policy as well as central management and planning will never be a subject of discussion for us. Of course, the relationship between central management and planning, as well as the responsibility of state-run enterprises and companies, is subject to certain changes. We must always strive to keep this relationship as favourable as possible.

Since the inception of the present Five-Year Plan, (1986-90), 16 state-run enterprises of the German Democratic Republic have switched over to a self-financing system. In the light of their experience, we plan, as of 1991, to have all state-run enterprises operate on the system of self-financing during the next five-year plan.

But this is not primarily a financial matter. It involves structural problems, flexibility, the relationship between central planning and responsibility of the corporations themselves and – last but not least – the relationship between money and goods. What is of paramount importance is that the workers, in discussing the five-year plan – and this is standard practice with us – should enhance their influence and that of their trade unions.

Let me revert to this question of the relationship between goods and money. Here again we believe that the market, the relationship between goods and money, is of prime importance. The market has always been in the fore of our minds. After all, the largest share of our production is made up of goods and sold both domestically and abroad. With additional technological change, the market will doubtless gain in importance.

We know full well 30 per cent of all products in the world today will have to be replaced. In other words, every three years, there is a generally new production profile, and only those who are fully familiar with these changes will be able to develop products for which there will be a market. Consequently, it is necessary to have good knowledge of the market, but it has to be stated quite clearly that the market can never replace planning.

Incidentally, I would like to add that the policy we use has achieved extremely impressive results in the German Democratic Republic. Annual GNP growth rates of 4 per cent, an annual growth rate of labour productivity of 6 per cent, full employment and, last but not least, a high level of social welfare, all bear witness to this.

This continuous development will remain in force in the 1990s in order to safeguard and expand our social achievements. This is by no means an easy task.

As adjustment processes continue to occur, we will not only draw on our own experience, but also look across our national boundaries. I think that it is the role of the ILO to share knowledge and experience concerning the ways to make the best use of these adjustment processes in the interest of economic growth and social progress.

I think we all agree that economic and technical progress brings in its wake major changes in work, labour recruitment, and in the relations between workers at the workplace. As automation increases, the role and the requirements – as well as the responsibility of individual workers – increase, and the individual's responsibility goes up because he or she is working in a workplace and with equipment which cost millions.

The division of labour is also changing. In a flexible, automated system, many processes are interlinked. Thus, comprehensive knowledge and expertise about these processes are required. Modern, efficient production is dependent on the personal attitude and attention of the workers.

Doubtless, research and development will become increasingly important, but production itself continues to rely on well-trained workers. They will continue to be the mainstay. In flexible, automated factories, we find that 80 per cent of our workforce comprises highly qualified, experienced and skilled workers. This goes to show that well-planned and far-sighted training policies, and in particular advanced training and retraining, become an increasingly important and essential component of this process. This is why I welcome the fact that the training and advanced training aspect of the programme and budget for 1990-91, which I have approved, has been afforded high priority. Here again, we are ready to share our own knowledge and experience with other countries, and to absorb and make use of the experience of others.

This exchange of information in our Organisation will be all the more fruitful the sooner we realise that co-operation based on equality and mutual respect is a must.

In this regard, obviously, there are many problems, and I must say that in this connection I share the views expressed by my Cuban colleague before the plenary of the Conference on 21 June.

Original – Arabic: Mr. ABDULLA (Workers' delegate, Bahrain) – Mr. President, on behalf of the Workers' delegation of Bahrain, and on my own behalf, I am delighted to express our sincere congratulations on your election as President of this 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. We are sure that, thanks to your wisdom, skills and experience, you will successfully guide our deliberations.

On behalf of the workers of Bahrain I address to all of you my best wishes on the occasion of the 70th anniversary of the International Labour Organisation and I wish the Organisation greater advances in the future in its long-standing quest for social justice, an essential basis of economic development. I would also like to congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne on his appointment as the head of the ILO and also to pay tribute to Mr. Francis Blanchard, the outgoing Director-General of the Organisation, for all his services to the ILO.

The Director-General has submitted an exhaustive expert Report on economic and social measures which we must take in order to confront the imperatives of the 1990s. In this regard, I would like to emphasise that measures conducive to improving the minimum conditions for a decent life for workers and their families, measures which contribute to the protection of the fundamental rights of workers have an essential role also in bringing about greater productivity in the national economy.

I would also like to emphasise the fact that a developed system of industrial relations, fostering good relations between workers and employers, is able to eliminate from the outset the sources of conflict and dispute and in establishing social peace. However, flexibility in the labour market should not be effected to the detriment of fundamental principles of human rights and the protection of minimum standards to labour. Labour standards should not be evaluated from a purely economic standpoint since this would be to ignore their contribution to social justice. There is no doubt that the dialogue between the various partners in production is one of the most crucial factors in economic growth. The question of employment should be the focal point of such a dialogue.

The Director-General's Report comprises an Annex specially devoted to the situation of Arab workers in Palestine and in the other occupied Arab territories. In regard to this report of the ILO mission to Palestine, and the other occupied Arab territories, I would like to highlight its unequivocal condemnation of Israeli practices and policies violating the most elementary rights and freedoms which are within the competence and interest of our Organisation, as the Report states clearly. The Report also points out that the recommendations of this mission over the last 12 years have received not the slightest hint of application by the Israeli authorities, which means that we have to take new measures to guarantee the rights of Arab workers in Palestine and in the other occupied Arab territories. You will all agree with me, I am sure, that the Israeli occupation to which the Palestinian people are subjected is the underlying cause of the oppression and injustice they suffer. If we wish to guarantee the rights and freedoms of workers and employers in Palestine, we should put an end to Israeli occupation.

The uprising of the heroic people of Palestine has confirmed this and proved to the whole world that final victory will come to those struggling for peace based on justice. On behalf of the Bahraini workers I invite all the delegations present at this Conference to support the resolution concerning the protection of the Arab workers' and employers' rights and freedoms in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories.

The Bahrain Workers' Commission is continuing its efforts for the improvement of working conditions and the provision of information and skills to enable workers to take on their responsibilities with the greatest possible competence. Our workers' organisation is also making every effort to fulfil the necessary conditions for improved productivity. Here I should like to refer to co-operation with the ILO and the assistance afforded us by this Organisation. We would also like to thank the ILO for the support they have given us, and express our hope that such co-operation is strengthened for the greater good of Bahraini workers.

In concluding, I wish the Conference every success in its work.

May peace and the mercy of the Lord be with you all.

(The Conference adjourned at 1 p.m.)

Thirty-second sitting

Friday, 23 June 1989, 3 p.m.

President: Mr. Delpino

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

Original – Spanish: The PRESIDENT (Mr. DELPINO) – We will now resume the discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General.

Original – German: Mr. LINDNER (Employers' delegate, Federal Republic of Germany) – First of all, I should like to convey the most sincere congratulations of the German Employers to the President on his election. At the same time, I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate the new Director-General, Mr. Hansenne, on his appointment and to wish him a lot of luck and every success in his future work. His predecessor, Mr. Blanchard, who steered the ship of the ILO for the past 15 years through very difficult waters, deserves our deepest gratitude. We pay tribute to his commitment and achievements.

A few days ago we celebrated the 70th birthday of the International Labour Organisation in this hall. The Organisation can look back proudly and with satisfaction on seven decades of successful work. Having started out with 27 founding States in 1919, the membership of the ILO has since become universal. Through approximately 170 Conventions and as many Recommendations, it considerably influences minimum conditions of work in the world and ensures that the obligations undertaken by its members not do merely remain on paper. The impressive total of 5,400 ratifications shows that the labour standards laid down by the ILO in order to improve the social situation of workers have been accepted by very many countries.

We could say many positive things about the research, organised exchange of experience and information, and advisory activities of the ILO for the developing countries. There is also much to be said for the fact that a large number of workers' and employers' representatives owe their freedom or even their lives to the moral and political pressure that this Organisation can bring to bear on governments.

The Employers' group of this session of the Conference was recently able to welcome here in Geneva the director of an institute that is associated with the Employers' Association of Nicaragua. This man was arrested and imprisoned for nine months without being charged because of critical articles about his country's politics. Suddenly, however, after the Governing Body dealt with this case, he was discharged as innocent.

The largely positive results of 70 years of the ILO should not however distract us from the fact that a reorientation of its activities is necessary. I will comment on this in my conclusion.

Only a little more than seven decades ago, communism seized power in Tsarist Russia, an ideology with very specific ideas on the type of political order and upon the accompanying economic system.

Looking back on 72 years' communism and socialism is no reason to celebrate, at the very least, in those countries where the more or less pure form of this ideology determines official policy. The political concept that the individual serves the State, instead of the reverse, that puts the individual last, was doomed to fail economically and politically.

For a sober economist like myself, there was never the slightest doubt that a market economy with its ingeniously simple and cheap control mechanism would always be superior to a collective centrally directed system.

We can only wonder why it took so long for the realisation of the inbuilt inefficiency of socialist-planned economies finally to penetrate.

Some developing countries realised long before the communist States that they could solve their problems only with market economic methods. They are now the successful "newly-industrialised countries".

Gradually frustration grew, however, even in the countries still espousing the ideology of Marx, Engels and Lenin; and in these countries little by little numerous considerations were being put forward on how the low living standards could be raised by the incorporation of market economy elements.

The governments, or the individual parties, are however overlooking a decisive factor: the indivisibility of a system, that is to say the interdependence of the political and the economic system.

A little bit of market economy, a little bit of state control, a little bit of political freedom while retaining the monopoly of a single party results in an explosive mixtures as the recent horrendous events in China have shown.

Sooner or later one is obliged to take a decision. Today, however we must ask what are the legitimate grounds for the right to power of a single state party, how they can be explained and justified if those authorities no longer have the backing of the workers, for the workers' paradise is a reality in capitalist countries, whereas this is not the case in communist countries. The developments in Hungary and Poland, where political pluralism is being discussed, are sure to hold our attention.

Now let me speak about Chapter 3 of the Director-General's Report, Recovery and employment. At the beginning, we meet the repeated demand that in working out a new, realistic development strategy, the errors of the past must be remembered and corrected.

In regard to the debt crisis, it states that "in some countries a contributing cause of the debt crisis was the use of borrowed funds for low-productivity activities or unwise investments, or for sustaining an over-extended level of consumption." This is indisputable, though cautiously expressed. It is not the majority of borrowers who are responsible for the situation? How can we otherwise explain that for interests and for repayment of capital there is little of substance. My question is whether the re-examination, referred to in the Report as urgent, of the policy of developing countries has in fact been carried out if one can say that lessons have been taken from the past.

Why are the advice and the conditions imposed by international financial organisations always so violently criticised?

Let us imagine for a moment that there were no old debts, that new foreign loans were available. Can we be certain that these new funds would be wisely invested in viable undertakings, that they would not be used to buy consumer goods – in other words can we be sure that anything would have changed in comparison with the sixties and seventies? I seriously doubt it.

I hear from several developing countries that the public sector is being further expanded, that limited margin for the private employers is being narrowed, subsidies are on the increase and that widely distorted prices are common, all of which are factors aggravating the economic and investment climate. I am afraid that the necessary rethinking has for too long been inadequate. In many countries a scapegoat is sought everywhere but within itself.

My third and final comment deals with the future orientation of the work of the ILO. A stubborn problem in many of the Organisation's member States is to secure sufficient employment, also with regard to the sustained growth of the population. Unfortunately, the ILO is rather reticent about dealing with the population policy.

The causes of the employment problems are both in demand and supply in the labour market, and we must soberly analyse the imbalance of the two components. In his Report the Director-General deals with the factors that affect adjustment possibilities. His explanations of the need to keep production structures and production factors as flexible as possible or to make them as flexible as possible is incontestable.

The factor of production, for which this Organisation is competent, is labour, and all of us know that both structural and cyclical fluctuations of the economy make it necessary to determine adjustments on the labour market.

If the real wages do not tally with the qualifications of workers, or if the level of real wages is too high as compared to productivity, then the response will have to deal with employment as long as the possibility of adjustment is limited or practically non-existent. Where the possibility of the adjustment of real wages exists and the labour market can supply the necessary qualifications, the employment situation can be maintained or even improved.

This sounds like theory, but it is a living present. Within the industrialised world, the European OECD members are an example of relatively rigid labour markets while the United States and Japan are cases in point for high flexibility with the consequent high employment.

As I see it, the ILO should make these conditions and connections clear in all its future activities and programmes. The Organisation is wrong if it does not put the main emphasis of its work in securing or improving the conditions of work and employment.

The mobility and flexibility of the labour markets to the permanent structural changes in economy are a decisive condition sine qua non for the stimulation of employment.

Particularly in standard setting, the ILO must avoid everything that will make existing rigidities even more rigid, that is, counteract employment.

The Convention on night work is threatening to launch itself in this dangerous direction. The ILO must, on the other hand, promote everything that will strengthen adjustability and flexibility. The first priority must go to the unemployed. Only then the improvement of working conditions can be a secondary consideration for those who work and are in employment.

Mr. ETTY (Workers' delegate, Netherlands) – Although it is somewhat late in the unfolding of this Conference, I first want to join all those who have congratulated our President, Mr. Nkomo, and his colleagues, the Vice-Presidents, on their elections to such high offices. I hope that the Conference will go down in the history of the ILO as one of the most successful, and your leadership as a major factor of its success.

The Report of the Director-General, the last one to be signed by Mr. Blanchard, is an important document in several respects. It marks the end of an epoch for the ILO and it also contains some major insights and convictions which should guide the Organisation all through the final years of this century.

That the ILO has not only claimed, but has also started acquiring, a place among the international institutions in dealing with the difficult and vital questions related to economic restructuring and development, is a significant fact which will remain associated with the name of Mr. Blanchard. For his successor, it will be an important challenge to further define and exercise this role for the ILO.

The fact that this will not be an easy task can be read both in and between the lines of the Report. If economic growth creates favourable conditions, if a positive climate prevails in and among nations, if tripartism really functions and if some further conditions, identified in the Report, can be met, then the ILO will be able to make a major contribution.

But the ILO will not always be looked upon by governments, by the International Monetary Fund (IMF), by the World Bank and by the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT), as a legitimate and welcome partner in discussions and decision-making. Social justice is a concept whose realisation will be, more often than not, a complication of their tasks, as they see it. And the fact that the implementation of social standards, as we know them now, is under the supervision of the ILO's tripartite machinery, will certainly not attract many of their dispassionate economists, their cool bankers and their tough trade negotiators.

The new Director-General will no doubt need all his skills and experience to ensure that the ILO is given the place it deserves in the international debate about employment and structural adjustment.

We often tend to concentrate more on broad, far-reaching and challenging ideals rather than on the modest instruments at our disposal to achieve them. At some stage these instruments might be taken for granted, and that stage may have been reached when one has handled these instruments for 70 years.

The international labour standards are the major tools enabling the ILO to work towards its goals. They may be modest and not afford giant steps towards social justice, and thereby to a safer and more peaceful world, but they should never be taken for granted. We should keep them in optimal condition, we should see to it that they are not used in the wrong way or for the wrong purposes, and we should repair them if and when necessary.

Some recent experiences outlined at this very session of the Conference prove that we should continuously keep a watchful eye over the standards. I shall now touch on some of these experiences.

First, I should like to draw your attention to the problematic relationship between the ILO and the European Community. The Director-General notes, quite rightly I think, the importance of regional groupings of States for solving the problems discussed in the Report. Dutch workers are strongly in favour of an integrated Europe, guided by a strong European Commission, but, at the same time, we are very concerned to see that, for more than a decade now, the intricacies of supranational policy-making in the social field have obstructed the ratification of important labour standards, considerably delayed their submission to the competent authorities and created confusion and dissent among governments, employers' and workers' organisations, the European Commission and the ILO concerning the preparation of new standards.

I have the impression that there is a real danger that factors of secondary importance, such as the prestige of States in the European Commission and various bureaucratic balancing acts, are being given priority over the implementation of what has resulted from very hard work on the part of this Organisation, and that paints a sorry and a sad picture.

Second, we have seen during this Conference renewed pressure on the supervisory system. This phenomenon is not new, but the worrying aspect of the latest assault is that it has been undertaken by groups who have up until now always firmly defended the system. The Conference Committee on the Application of Standards has heard, this year, unprecedented and vicious attacks on the work of the Committee of Experts and on some of the working methods of the Conference Committee, by the Employer's group and the group of the industrialised countries. These attacks, which in my view are short-sighted and sometimes opportunistic, go to the heart of the supervisory system, and therefore to the heart of the ILO.

Finally, there is the problem of denunciation of Conventions, particularly what is called "pure" denunciation, that is the denunciation of a Convention without the ratification of a new one. In the past few years warnings could be heard repeatedly concerning the apparent carelessness with which governments of the highly developed countries talked about and made denunciations.

In my own country, the Netherlands, we had a recent example of this when the Government denounced the Employment Injury Benefits Convention, 1964 (No. 121). It was only through determined and concerted action on the part of the trade unions, which succeeded in convincing Parliament that the Government's arguments for denunciation were highly questionable, that eventually, last May, the Government's draft Bill for denunciation was unanimously voted down by Parliament.

Without going into detail, I would submit that this case showed a weak link in the denunciation procedure. This weak link is national Parliament. If, in a country like the Netherlands, which is an active and generally respected Member of the ILO, the Members of Parliament are virtually ignorant of the Organisation, of its work and of the importance of that work for national social policy, the situation is probably not much better in other countries. Therefore I would suggest that the ILO take the initiative to encourage governments to include some Members of Parliament in their delegations to the Conference.

Furthermore, and in conclusion, I think it would be worthwhile if the ILO gave some thought to ways of encouraging national Parliaments to discuss, in direct contact with representatives of the Office, the background of any denunciation planned by the government. This is what occurred in the Netherlands last April, and I am convinced that the information supplied by the representatives of the Director-General eventually convinced the Dutch Parliament that denunciation was not at all necessary, at least not for the reasons given by the Government.

Mr. VAN RUSSEL (Minister for Labour, Suriname) – I first of all congratulate Mr. Nkomo on behalf of the delegation of Suriname, on his election as President of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. We are convinced that under his guidance the deliberations during this Conference will be successful. I also wish the best of success to the new Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, and at the same time I extend gratitude to Mr. Francis Blanchard for the many good services he has rendered to the ILO and its Members.

Before I continue, allow me say that I am filled with sadness, standing here before you as representative of the Republic of Suriname only a few days after the people of Suriname have been cruelly startled by the news that an aeroplane had crashed before landing at the international airport.

This plane crash, which took the lives of 176 people, brought about a tremendous and indescribable shock in the Surinamese community which consists of less than 450,000 people. There were only 11 survivors. This disastrous incident and its many victims will forever remain stamped on the memory of the people of Suriname.

On behalf of my Government, I wish to express our heartfelt gratitude for the support and sympathy the international community has extended to the people of Suriname. For from these expressions of international solidarity my people may draw strength, which is necessary to overcome the grief caused by this tragedy.

In his Report to the Conference, the Director-General discussed a matter of concern for all peoples throughout the world. The approaches considered in the report show in all respects a sense of reality and a thorough analysis of the problems which in particular developing countries, of which Suriname is one, have to face.

It is therefore with pleasure that I avail myself of this opportunity to compliment the Director-General on his Report entitled Recovery and employment. In this report, the Director-General discusses strategies for economic recovery programmes which should result in a balanced economic growth.

These strategies are also aimed at preventing the costs of economic adjustment programmes from becoming too heavy a burden on the most vulnerable groups.

In view of the developments in my country, at present and also in the future, the various aspects mentioned in the Director-General's Report and the views thereby developed are of special significance to Suriname.

For some years now my country has experienced a serious economic crisis which has made itself felt in many areas of our society. This crisis has had far-reaching adverse effects on the employment and living conditions of the Surinamese people. Therefore, the Government statement identifies the restructuring of the economy, aimed at recovery and growth, increased employment and stable development with a view to bringing about prosperity, as fundamental goals which my Government hopes to attain during its present term.

From what has been said, it may be concluded that the employment issue is one of the priority areas of government policy. The Government's starting-point in this matter is the Constitution of the Republic of Suriname, which was approved by referendum of 30 September 1987, as a result of the great efforts of the Surinamese people to establish a democratically-structured society.

It has been laid down in the Constitution that labour is the most important means for the development of man, as well as an important source of welfare.

On the basis of the fundamental importance attached to labour for the development of man and society, the Constitution recognises the right of everyone to work, while it indissolubly relates the duty to work to this right.

The Government of my country therefore devotes itself to creating the conditions necessary for a goal-oriented employment policy as an integral part of the socio-economic development policy.

In this context, a national project for the reinforcement of our technical and institutional capacity in the field of employment planning and policies was prepared, in co-operation with the ILO Regional Office for the Caribbean. It is hoped to start this project by the end of 1989 at the latest.

We also co-operate closely with the ILO Regional Employment Programme for Latin America and the Caribbean (PREALC) towards Suriname's participation in a regional project. The preparations for this project are already in an advanced stage.

Within the framework of this project, PREALC will assist my Government in formulating a well-balanced structural-adjustment policy.

The Government of the Republic of Suriname is of the opinion that the development policy in general and the employment policy as part thereof can be successful only if the concerted action between government, employers and trade union movement is optimal. Moreover, the situation in my country has made the Surinamese people aware that peace, democracy and social justice are essential preconditions.

My Government is pleased to note that the Surinamese people have the valuable assistance of the ILO and its organs in their efforts for national reconstruction and development, while also the bilateral relations with ILO member countries offer favourable prospects.

I wish to conclude by expressing the firm determination of the Republic of Suriname to commit itself, in accordance with the objectives and principles of this noble Organisation, to the establishment of a world community in which justice will prevail and every human being will be guaranteed a dignified existence.

Original - Spanish: The PRESIDENT (Mr. DEL PINO) - The Director-General of the Office sent a message of condolence to the Surinamese people in connection with the airplane disaster to which the Minister referred.

Original - German: Mr. MUHR (Workers' delegate, Federal Republic of Germany) - The creation of the ILO 70 years ago was a milestone and a major development, promising great hopes for a future that was to bring more prosperity, social justice and safety.

In spite of all the successes, we still have a long way to go before we reach this objective, while mankind has never had as many technical and financial resources to do away with misery and poverty. However, in absolute terms there is more hunger in the world today than before and the figures are constantly rising, by about 1 million people every month. The same is true for the number of illiterates and homeless people.

While in the case of drought disasters, the world has often responded with large assistance programmes, food can only be a short-term, partial answer. The roots of the evil are deeper. In many regions of the Third World the production of goods is suffering both from mistakes made in the country itself and from the adverse influences of the world economy.

For about the last two decades, real prices of most African exports have been falling at the same time as import prices for industrial products have been rising.

This is bound to produce a debt crisis - a very heavy burden on developing countries, which throws the potential of any development policy into question. Most developing countries are already paying back more than they receive in capital from industrialised countries. However, the terrible financial crisis is still overshadowed by a dramatic environmental crisis. The debt crisis and a much too rapid rate of population growth has forced many States to overexploit nature and to waste raw materials.

According to FAO calculations, every year sees the destruction of about 3.7 million hectares of forest. You do not need much imagination to recognise that not only the developing countries are in danger. The biosphere is our common heritage and we must do all we can to keep it. The entire development process is in danger of becoming a fatal vicious circle.

The debt crisis and the environmental crisis are reinforcing each others and becoming more critical and will probably deepen the food and poverty crisis.

But there is another way: if we all are willing, then we can prevent the people from starving.

Unfortunately, the rich and powerful in the North and in the South are very rarely ready to cede power and financial resources. Also, in most industrialised countries the rising number of the poor shows that the benefits of growth hardly trickle down to the poorest.

At the beginning of the last decade of the twentieth century and of the second millenium, we should forget our petty quarrels and should aim to more effectively tackle the long-term problems which threaten us. We should argue against all those who say that we can resign ourselves to the poverty and the risk of starvation of millions of people.

It is still worth hoping that the chances for worldwide disarmament will finally be achieved, and the savings in expenditure on missiles could be used to improve life on earth instead of maintaining this sentence of death which hangs over mankind.

Morally, it does not make a great difference whether a person dies in a war or starves to death because of the selfishness of others. Therefore, we must use all our strength to ensure that solidarity never becomes an empty concept, talked about at international conferences, but without any action being taken in practice.

The only feasible way to achieve this objective is to create more employment.

As long as people are deprived of the right to work and to incomes, many rights and freedoms that we want to promote actively in the ILO are meaningless for them.

Most governments have not been able to fulfil their responsibilities for economic and employment policy, and this includes the industrialised countries as well.

In the member States of the European Community alone, official statistics show that nearly 16 million people are unemployed. This failure shows that, there as well, the real political will is absent.

Member States have not fulfilled their obligations to the ILO either. Already, in the Constitution of 1919, full employment was made a central objective, and this is also true of the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122).

Problems with the balance of payments and with currency stability receive more attention than the goal of full employment. In difficult economic periods, restrictive financial and monetary policy initiatives were taken which, in fact, slowed down economic growth and aggravated unemployment.

Very few lessons were learnt from the negative experiences of the world economic crisis at the end of the 1920s. Many industrialised countries are still continuing to try to solve their employment problems through export promotion campaigns and import restrictions. The consequences, both then and now, were mass unemployment, the decline in the value of capital and making productive capacity idle.

National selfishness grows in the same measure as the growth rate of national and international market share declines.

What is imperative is medium-term co-ordination of economic policy.

The positive effects that can be expected from internationally co-ordinated economic policy is shown by a joint study of the German Confederation of Trade Unions (DGB) and the Nordic Trade Union Council. This study shows that an increase in incentives of 1 per cent of the gross domestic product in all OECD countries would lead to the creation of 8.3 million jobs in only two or three years.

In spite of better knowledge, economic policy in force now is, in fact, often moving in the opposite direction. To cope with structural change in the economy the industrialised countries indulge in protectionism and in getting rid of certain safeguarding provisions of workers and for people in general.

The poor of the Third World and our own workers are the ones who, in fact, end up paying the bill for the decline in exports and reductions in social expenditure.

Meanwhile, social and labour legislation has in recent years been increasingly interpreted as a cause of the employment crisis.

The advocates of neo-classical deregulation policies want to apply brutal new regulations to govern the labour market. But they are wrong if they believe that work is a commodity – just like bananas or carpets. “Labour is not a commodity”, this is what it says in Article I of the Declaration of Philadelphia. The free play of the market is not capable of producing equitable arrangements in the labour market.

With sustained mass unemployment, social policy comes under ideological and financial pressure. Both nationally and internationally, social policy is often seen as an economic burden which cannot be maintained in periods of economic difficulty.

But renunciation of wages and a decline in labour standards helps line the pockets of the entrepreneurs. On the other hand, mass purchasing power is weakened and no new jobs are created. Every percentage of wage that a worker does not receive in one country allows employers in other countries to justify new wage cuts. The spiral leads down to the bottom.

We must recognise that poverty, unemployment, ecological destruction and the population explosion are inextricably linked. None of these basic problems can be solved by aggressive competition, but only through comprehensive human solidarity and international co-operation.

Added to these basic problems is the vicious circle of a lack of social benefits and a high birth rate.

As long as social problems remain unsolved within the family, a high birthrate is the inevitable consequence. Here again, economic growth and food problems result in a multitude of social and economic problems.

More than ever, we must ensure that welfare state regulations are not be crushed under the wheel of a supply-side economic policy.

The economy is not only dealing with the production of goods but also with social risk. Social policy on the other hand, not only creates costs but also creates important conditions for raising the living standard and improving the destiny of man.

The interaction of present social problems makes it necessary for state welfare interests in other policy areas, such as the economy, to receive more attention and counteract the fragmentation of social problems and different disciplines.

The ILO must keep in mind that our own common standards on human and trade union rights must not be put aside by economic considerations. A human concept could not otherwise prosper.

The policy of the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund, must be broadened by clauses with implications such as those within the framework of the GATT agreements. At the same time, industrialised countries and banks must waive some of their conditions that place such a heavy burden on debtor countries. Strict measures must be taken if we are to defuse the social ecological and demographic time bomb. We must always be aware that we are neighbours on a small, vulnerable planet. Not only have we the moral duty to help each other, but also it is in our mutual interest to do so. Let us learn from the history of the ILO and support it so as to strengthen this Organisation's capacity for peace and social justice. We in this Organisation should feel committed to social progress so that everyone irrespective of where the lives has hope for the future.

Original - Arabic: Mr. KHOURY (Government delegate, Lebanon) - Allow me first of all to congratulate Mr. Nkomo on his election as President of this 76th Session of the International Labour Conference and also to extend my best greetings to Mr. Michel Hansenne, the new Director-General of the International Labour Office. I should like to state three vital truths before turning to the discussion of the Director-General's Report for this year.

First of all, we should like to say that the departure of a Director-General, in this case Mr. Francis Blanchard, only means that he has departed in person because his work remains with us and will remain with us for many years to come. And with the arrival of a new Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, we hope that the coming years will bear much fruit so that we can rise to the challenges of the last decade of the 20th century.

Second, we believe that the departure and arrival of persons, whatever their rank, imply that the first have already given of their best and that their successors, in the flower of their age, will contribute their youth to the ILO. Although the young men of yesterday might have reached a mature age and well deserve a rest, their ideas remain with us like a living flame which is the vital proof that this Organisation, which developed because of the devotion of millions of human beings, will not age, will not weaken, will not die and will remain eternally young.

The third truth that I want to state is that I come here every year but that this year is special because we are commemorating the 70th anniversary of the Organisation. The presence of the Lebanese delegation at this forum - this delegation that leaves Beirut miraculously and also arrives here miraculously, only to return to its country - bears witness to our wish to remain the most faithful member of this Organisation, because we are undoubtedly the member most anxious to attain peace and justice and human rights.

I started my speech very clearly, as you have heard for yourself. I should like to say that all these hopes and all these congratulations will remain empty words if they are not backed up by resolutions and recommendations to make our world more beautiful - as no doubt cosmonauts see it from their spacecrafts; a world where there is no white, no black and no yellow; a world that makes no distinction on the basis of colour, race or religion. The cosmonauts' view of the world must be one where nature develops harmoniously, while our planet turns around the sun, far from human conflicts that take root in ambitions and cupidity.

If I have spoken in this way it is because I want to approach the Report of the Director-General from this overall standpoint. Indeed, he has taken as its title a slogan which civilisations have adopted since God created Adam and Eve: recovery and development. And our civilisation, on the threshold of the twenty-first century, has not found a better way to put it.

The Director-General's Report contains a vast number of modern ideas and advocates positive solutions. Quite frankly, it is not possible for the head of a delegation to cover everything he wants to say in a speech because, more often than not, more time is taken up in extending congratulations and bidding farewell than in saying anything of significance. As head of the delegation that comes from Lebanon, I feel bound to make the following comments.

First, we are living in an age of accelerated progress where developments in the technological field risk to overturn, in the ninth decade of this century, all our concepts of life and work in the eighth decade. The changes of tomorrow threaten to undermine the rules of today. We are living in a world of constant change and it is for this reason that I call for a dynamic strategy within the ILO to implement the ideas of the Director-General, whatever expenditure is required by this strategy, which not only covers human resources but also material and technological factors, because it is inadmissible that countries most in need of ILO services are not granted them because of the ILO's lack of means, while there are countries which are extremely advanced who do not want to provide the ILO with these means. In making this demand I am not asking for the impossible; I am merely asking that the ILO be given the chance to keep up with progress rather than lagging behind.

Second, development is the only way that leads to social recovery. However, we have to be very cautious in the face of technological progress because it may increase unemployment and poverty instead of creating additional employment. The countries which are most advanced - in terms of thinking, capital and production - must be aware of this, for if they fail to provide adequate and appropriate assistance to the developing countries, and if they do not help to relieve these countries of their huge debt burden, they will themselves become the victims of their own production system and of its misuse. After all, in practical terms, I should like to know what exactly the wealthy nations and the international organisations have to lose by supporting the humble farmer who works his fertile land by providing him with all the necessary resources? Sudan, for example, if it were given the means, could absorb millions of workers and ensure food security for hundreds of millions of human beings.

Third, I should like to mention a dream which we hold dear, that of peaceful and co-operative relations between East and West in order to create a better world, free of armed borders, the sort of world to which we all aspire. All we ask of rapprochement between East and West is that it not be achieved to the detriment of the South, so that our planet may preserve its harmony and be safeguarded from the architects of negative transformation.

Fourth, and most important, in my opinion, for the entire world, is a point I wish to make concerning Lebanon. It is high time for Christian citizens, who have been crucified for fifteen years, to get off their crosses and for Muslim citizens, who are bound in chains, to get up and walk. It is high time to bring an end to the plot fomented by the racist State of Israel, a nation with a direct interest in transforming Lebanon, which used to be a model of religious co-existence, into a racist country torn not only by conflict between religions, but also by conflict among sects of the same religion. It is for this reason that Israel is creating internal plots which are more vicious than premeditated murder.

In seven years, Lebanon has experienced a 1,500 per cent devaluation of its currency, which used to rank fifth in the world. Lebanon has experienced a total collapse of its infrastructures. As a consequence, water and electricity are available only for a few hours a day. Its few remaining factories are almost at a standstill. Its international airport has become paralysed, its ports are blocked and its telecommunication services have been so seriously affected that the country is now virtually isolated from the rest of the world. Meanwhile, its rate of demographic growth has reached 3.85 per cent, despite the fact that there are many voluntary or forced Lebanese emigrés and exiles. Lebanon, which used to be the Switzerland of the East, is now living under the yoke of Israeli occupation in its southern and eastern parts. It no longer has dreams for the future, nor does it anticipate the twenty-first century. Its people nevertheless aspire to better days, to a time when they will be able to gather their forces and catch their breath, regain their past prosperity and build a brighter future in a unified country enjoying freedom and dignity.

I am fully aware that this is not a political forum. But, whether we like it or not, the issues we are discussing are inherently political. When one talks about the Lebanese crisis, one inevitably touches on the Palestinian problem and, thereby, the problems of labour and workers, the problems of industry, commerce, orange production and domestic problems. The irony of civilisation in this century is that those who control it advise you to negotiate with those who have taken your land, deprived you of the wealth of your soil, occupied your homes, killed your young people, made widows of your wives and thrown your friends and relatives into the street. There has been enough procrastination, enough evasion of international responsibility!

Gentlemen – I might even say gentlemen of the civilisation of this century: show a little credibility; apply at least once your international resolution; overcome the crisis once and for all; be fair and enrich your consciences with human and moral values and notions of freedom and dignity.

The Lebanese delegation has come to this forum this year with such members as were able to reach this destination. This delegation comes with the hope, which is joined with the hopes of the whole world, that the odious wars waged on its soil will come to an end. This year there have been two initiatives, fired by the hopes of the Lebanese and the goodwill of the Syrians. The first of these initiatives was the setting up of a six-member committee within the League of Arab States under the presidency of Sheikh Sabah El-Ahmad El-Jaber El-Sabah, Minister of Foreign Affairs of Kuwait, whose good services led to the extraordinary Arab summit in Casablanca. The second initiative was the mission entrusted by this summit to three major Arab leaders: His Majesty King Hassan II, the Servant of the Two Shrines, His Majesty King Fahd Ben Abdel Aziz and His Excellency the President of the Republic of Algeria, Mr. Chadli Ben Jedid. This mission consists of helping Lebanon emerge from its crisis. In fact, these three heads of state – with the best wishes of the Lebanese and Syrians – do not only represent 250 million Arabs in the Middle East but they also personify the hopes of hundreds of millions of people of goodwill throughout the world.

Indeed, all of them represent the hope to see Lebanon assume the cultural role for which it was once famous and to put an end to all Israeli plots that aim at overturning, not only Lebanon, but all the Arab world – turning its peoples into tribes and mini-states. If Lebanon does not regain its peace, security and sovereignty throughout its territory and have its full capacities restored, I predict – indeed I see behind the gathering clouds – a flood whose waves will engulf more than one people and change the map of more than one country. It is for this reason that, from this rostrum, on behalf of the Lebanese delegation, on behalf of every Lebanese, I appeal to you that your states should support the Arab initiative to help Lebanon participate at all international peace conferences – with one president and not two, with one government and not two.

May peace be with you.

Original – Spanish: Mr. CASTAÑEDA SANCHEZ (Workers' delegate, Panama) – I bring you fraternal greetings from the National Council of Organised workers of Panama (CONATO), an organisation that combines all the trade union movements and associations of our country, and congratulations on having chosen Minister John Nkomo as President, in recognition of his personal merits and the struggles of peoples for their liberation, as in the case of Zimbabwe, which has now achieved full sovereignty.

For the International Labour Organisation, which bases its aspirations, among other good aims, on all that conduces to economic recovery and development, it should be a matter of concern that the Panamanian nation, in particular the workers, is living a tragedy as a result of the most cruel and merciless aggression against a small country.

In the name of an empty democracy and freedom, which has been foisted on too many countries of the world, we have in recent years been kept in the grip of intense economic aggression and psychological warfare, which has resorted to hostile, destructive and inhuman acts in the attempt to destabilise and dismember the banking system by provoking general panic through disinformation by its communication media. The supply of bank notes has been deliberately disrupted, as well as contractual obligations by the Panamanian state with regard to international conventions.

Above all, debts to the State, such as the instalments for the Panama Canal, have not been paid, and the economic boycott has been extended to prevent enterprises operating in the country paying dues, taxes, public service payments and all other obligations to the State. This has led to a deterioration in health, social security and living conditions and other basic services urgently needed by the people.

Panamanian money deposited abroad has been illegally frozen and withheld outside our territory, along with assets and equipment belonging to the State, by sheer force on the part of those who have enslaved other nations on the continent for over a century.

In the psychological war against Panama military occupation forces are despatched and maintained on our soil with the manifest intention of keeping the population terrorised under the threat of invasion. This constitutes a brutal and destabilising act which the National Council of Organised Workers of Panama and the more sensible elements of America and the world can only denounce and condemn.

This irrational and criminal act has taken the lives of innocent people in the civilian population, murdered by deadly weapons deliberately fired in transit areas occupied by communities bordering the Canal area.

The most perverted aspect of the escalating aggression, in dastardly alliance with groups opposed to the Government, is undoubtedly the strategy of disinformation and ideological penetration imposed on our people over these past years; by the use of the most modern transnational disinformation techniques, the world and our people themselves have been given a distorted image of the reality in Panama in order to justify the unbridled economic and military aggression. That is why the most wild, insensate, unimaginable fallacies and slanders have been dreamt up against the leaders of the Panamanian Government.

Here, fortunately, we find ourselves among the leaders of civilised countries, so in response to this tissue of lies, this primitive policy of disinformation and psychological warfare, we hereby announce that the most recent addition to this chain of aggression against our people has been the open and impertinent intervention in the Panamanian elections, which made itself felt not only through the campaign to discredit the governing forces, but finally reached the point where a parallel electoral tribunal and an illegal radio and television network were set up to transmit false information on the election results and encourage acts of violence among the population.

They intervened in the internal affairs of the country, acting like judges, threatening and giving orders at polling stations, having previously acknowledged that at least 10 million dollars had been allocated to their internal allies.

In short, the Panamanian people and the national forces fell into an electoral trap which was subject to all the vices, the most scandalously fraudulent conditions ever known in Latin America, leading the electoral tribunal of Panama, quite rightly, to declare the elections null and void.

Today, the position of the National Council of Organised Workers and of the Latin American peoples, with regard to the use of the Organisation of American States in imposing diplomatic isolation on Panama is clear: it is up to the OAS to mediate in conflicts between States, but not to intervene in the domestic affairs of countries.

The crisis in Panama is not due either to spontaneous confrontations between rival political groups or to the conflicting results of elections.

The reason for the Panamanian crisis is the decision by an interested foreign government to impose on our country at all costs a docile government which would accept a permanent military presence beyond the year 2000.

The National Council of Organised Workers of Panama is profoundly concerned at the social cost of this aggression to the Panamanian people; it has undoubtedly fallen most heavily on the workers and other sectors of the population.

Over these years of crisis the employers have thrown on to the streets more than 60,000 workers, casting them into the cruel uncertainty of unemployment. At the same time conditions of work and wages have deteriorated for the large majority of the Panamanian workforce, along with health, living and social security conditions.

We have to denounce at this assembly the employers of Panama, who call themselves civilised people and lovers of democracy and liberty, but have dedicated themselves to the political persecution of the leaders of our country and to the suppression of the trade union movement.

We have to denounce the external aggression against our people and the employers' strategy against the trade union movement of introducing the cancer of solidarism as a means of breaking up trade unionism and the principles of the workers' movement in our country.

In view of the tragedy which our country is going through as a result of this aggression we wish to appeal for the understanding and international solidarity of fraternal organisations, peoples and governments, since what is being rehearsed in Panama today will undoubtedly be acted out in other countries tomorrow.

In the time available to acquaint you with the difficult situation of the Panamanian people, we urge this Organisation to embark on effective, practical initiatives to help set in motion social and economic development in this suffering country, which prefers its hoped-for liberation to any aid conditional on international colonialism.

We workers demand compliance with the Torrijos-Carter treaties and respect for the sacred principles of non-intervention.

We demand respect for the sovereign will of the Panamanian people to choose freely the government it desires and our right to live in peace, democracy and social justice without the fear of having to sleep with more than 13,000 guns on our soil pointing at our hearts.

In the name of the people and workers of Panama, we are grateful for the solid support received from countries which have come down on the side of our hoped-for liberation and of compliance with the Torrijos-Carter treaties. We stand shoulder to shoulder with them and at the same time express our solidarity with the just aspirations of the workers and people of Palestine.

Original – French: Mr. DECOSTERD (Employers' delegate, Switzerland) – First of all, permit me to congratulate our President and the Officers of the Conference on their election and the effective manner in which they are conducting our debate.

I should also like to wish every success to Mr. Hansenne in his important tasks and express my gratitude to Mr. Blanchard, to whom our Assembly justly paid tribute last week, on his long and remarkable contribution to our common cause.

An anniversary provides the opportunity not only for festivities, but also for profound reflection on the justification, mission and objectives of our Organisation. The Report being discussed invites us to undertake just this type of reflection by providing us with proposals for equitable economic growth.

Without underestimating the relevance of the recommendations, which have been carefully grouped at the macro- and micro-economic levels, as experts are able to do so well, I was struck by the fact that, once again, emphasis is being placed on a world-wide approach to the problem of growth and that, of course, tripartism is defined as a key to this growth to which we all aspire. Are we not here confusing international organisations, States and social partners with magicians? Are we not trying to cure a sick and barren tree by treating the leaves instead of strengthening it by nourishing the roots? Reports, it has been said, cover everything but comprehend nothing. They are capable of saying everything while giving expression to nothing, particularly where required by the diplomatic caution of an international organisation.

For a man in the field like myself, who has given his life to the organisation of labour and the management of human resources in the enterprise, this is not the main thing. We are not a world agency for employment, we are the International Labour Organisation. This is why I would wish to see us focus on a perspicacious analysis of the meaning and value of labour, that is to search for the solution upstream of employment, as was said in this very forum by Mr. Delamuraz, President of Switzerland, because employment is ultimately but the result of man's attitude towards labour. Beyond macro- and micro-economics, with which the experts assail us, let us pay closer attention to the appropriate role and behaviour of economic agents, that is man and the enterprise. This is where we can successfully treat the endemic sickness of unemployment at the root and set the ball of economic growth rolling.

Only through labour can we produce the riches which, when judiciously distributed, will improve the living standards of our populations. Underdevelopment is not a foregone conclusion, but the countries which have overcome it in past and recent years have only managed to do so through work – work well carried out, effective work. The launching of major public works undoubtedly plays a part in this, as emphasised by the Report, but above all it is a question of investing in vocational training for the workers and investing in the maintenance of installations, rather than spending fabulous sums.

These ideas are not easy to put forward here. But how can we fail to be worried when we see, on the one hand, that work is increasingly being less valued than leisure in the industrialised countries and, on the other hand, that people in many developing countries are becoming more and more dependent on assistance? How can we imagine equitable growth if these two perverse trends continue? And what is the responsibility of our Organisation in the face of this development? Interventionism and "normatist", two familiar demons, seem to be jeopardising to a certain extent the freedom of action which is vital to productive labour? While liberalism is occasionally ruthless, collectivism is frequently tyrannical. Standard-setting should never predominate over the intrinsic characteristics of labour.

The cycle of stagnation and unemployment, however, is a simple one. When a person stops working, somebody stops buying. When somebody stops buying, somebody stops selling. When somebody stops selling, somebody stops producing. And when somebody stops producing, somebody stops working. And so on, since humanity has existed, since the ancient institution of the market has been regulating the exchange of goods between men. This has nothing to do with either liberalism or socialism. It is the reality of human behaviour.

This analysis might be viewed as simplistic by the experts. Let us think about it just the same, and let us remember the erroneous theses, once defended at this very tribune, about job creation through the reduction of working time, through job sharing or through the creation of non-productive jobs in public administrations; or nowadays, the blind opposition to the idea of a more flexible organisation of working time, so as to dissociate it from the utilisation time for machinery and thereby to generate increased productivity.

Are we going to continue drawing up, researching and applying standards according to outdated modes of thought, or do we want to use a greater part of our resources in order better to understand the profound transformation that the labour world is going to undergo in the decades to come, particularly as a result of the prodigious technological development, so that we can then formulate and recommend within the framework of our Organisation a realistic concept of labour in the twenty-first century?

To improve the dignity of man at work is first and foremost a question of teaching him skills of which he can be proud, to make it possible for him to work in a stimulating working atmosphere, to remunerate him in an appropriate manner and to give him a certain amount of freedom as to the choice of his hours and his working method.

Only work can create work and only the enterprise can create wealth and add value to work. This is another paradox, and I would have appreciated that it be dealt with in the Report Recovery and employment.

I would like, in conclusion, to reiterate Mr. Blanchard's excellent point namely, that it is by ensuring and improving this dignity of man at work that we will give real contents to "economic and social citizenship."

In order to create jobs, let us work better and let us work in a different manner. The most lucid and innovative amongst us have already begun to do this. Let us help others to do the same.

Original – French: Mr. LEBRUN (Workers' delegate, Haiti) – Mr. President, before submitting to you my statement at the 76th Session of the Annual Conference of the ILO, I would like, on behalf of the Haitian workers, on behalf of my trade union organisation, CATH-CLAT, and on my own behalf, to congratulate sincerely Mr. Nkomo for his election to the presidency of this tripartite international parliament and also to greet and congratulate the new Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, known throughout the political world as in the working world for his competence and his dynamism.

I should also like, apart from the task which faces the Director-General, to draw his attention to the particular case of my country. Much has already been done in the framework of the ILO's support to Haiti, but much more has still to be done to improve tripartite relations between the social partners of the labour world in Haiti.

After the First World War, the situation prevailing at the time, and the reiterated demands of the trade unions, the Peace Conference of 1919 gave birth, through the Treaty of Versailles, to the labour organisation, the ILO. Haiti was among the first countries to become a member. It is to be regretted that its political culture forces it every year, until now, to find itself accused and condemned for violating standards and ratified Conventions which, however, are not numerous in number. Thank God Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 have been ratified by our country; the Gordian knot remains, however, in the field of their implementation. Although with popular pressure and as a result of the demands of the working class, apart from our recognition of the Haitian Constitution of 1987, we were able to legalise the right of public servants to organise and to form trade unions, the current labour legislation is still the same that existed through the period of dictatorship in our country.

Many attempts were made with the co-operation of the ILO in 1987, to amend our Labour Code; however, all these efforts were in vain. The Government of the day and also the employers – the most retrograde, the most reactionary the world has ever known – utilised all possible resources to block the process of tripartite negotiation. The social and economic struggle of the workers for survival, for the improvement of their conditions of work, are becoming more and more difficult, certainly more difficult than in any other country in the world.

Apart from social problems, there are the problems of deprivation, of poverty, illiteracy, endemic disease, exploitation and violation of human rights – all compounded by the political crises of the last three years of transition towards a democracy which has been too long awaited after the legacy of authoritarianism of the past thirty years.

I do not wish to judge my country here at the rostrum of this international labour parliament, but it is important to state once again that the problems faced by our people today are equally the responsibility of the imperialist countries which held our freedom hostage with their east-west conflicts.

If peace and social justice are by their nature closely linked, the major countries should know that they cannot continue to sleep in peace while the social and economic situation of the countries of the south continues to deteriorate. If their conscience has not sufficiently disturbed yet, they must realise that they are the first to be responsible for these different situations. Just as hunger has no religion, no motherland, social disruptions have no frontiers. To quote again the Declaration of Philadelphia, "poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere". I would like to stress that it is a serious threat to the survival of humanity, to the social peace of the richer countries – too rich, because they have exploited the countries of the southern hemisphere since colonial days and continue to impoverish the countries of the Third World. If the big countries of the northern hemisphere really enjoy giving charity to the relatively poorer countries, which are exploited and endeb-ted up to the hilt, they must also know that there is no merit on their part in this eternal assistance.

Economic pacts are being signed ... groups of countries dream of becoming the greatest economic powers by the year 2000. The time is marked by competition and protectionism while the number of unemployed is probably going to reach 1,000 million shortly, while children by the thousand are dying of hunger. These contradictions are intolerable and unacceptable. At each international gathering one hears speeches calling for pity, for mercy. Millions of dollars are spent on studies to find adequate solutions. Innumerable specialised institutions are set up with thousands of experts, yet poverty still gains ground. Has thought really been given to what this signifies for the future of humanity? Is this really to best way to conceive of the drawn of the year 2000? It would be a great shame to continue to think along these lines.

To refer again to the Declaration of Philadelphia and the statement of our honourable Director-General on 8 June "lasting peace can be established only if it is based on social justice." This was true yesterday and is true today, seven times seventy-seven times seven.

If it is urgent to improve the conditions of work and life of the workers, it is also urgently necessary for the larger countries to liberate the countries of the southern hemisphere, which for too long have been hostages of their political decisions ... to free the economies of the countries of the Third World from the domination of their big banks.

What for you are the implications of the thousands of immigrants who come to your countries? They are the consequences of yesterday and of today and the threat of tomorrow. Do not drift too far in your sleep in the twilight of this century for you may have a rude awakening at the dawn of the new millennium. You have been warned: you will reap what you have sown with your concept of development and your political and economic systems. The golden years forecast by your scientist will be so dimmed that you will think that the prophesies of the Apocalypse are being fulfilled.

At the time of signing agreements to limit strategic arms, think for a minute what would be represented by one day's military budget of the big world powers. The sum would be greater than the total debt of the Latin American and Caribbean countries. Is this not madness towards which the world is rushing blindly?

This external debt of the southern, Third World countries has become a real AIDS syndrome for their economies, a sword of Damocles hanging over their fragile democracies. This money now is in the personal and secret accounts of the dictators. Who then will pay the debt? Once again, the workers. It is easy to understand the social difference between the rich and the poor countries. It is easy to understand that you live in a democracy and indirectly support our dictatorships. But we, the organised workers, are not going to tolerate this situation which impoverishes us. The social disputes breaking out everywhere among the poor countries, the protests by workers' organisations to the relevant ILO bodies, are all the outcome of your economic policies as regards our countries. As long as the policies do not change, as long as your specialised financial institutions have the same attitude towards our countries, the situation will remain the same.

Stability, like instability, are imported products; Haiti will always be in the dock of the accused for violation of agreements and ratified international Conventions. You will always be there, as judges, to condemn us for the harm you have exported.

Last year marked the 40th anniversary both of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and of Convention No. 87. And what is the situation today? Many governments continue their repression of peoples seeking justice and liberty. Thousands of Chinese have been massacred in Tien An Men Square, yet here in the Conference not a word is said on the matter. This year is the 70th anniversary year of the creation of the ILO, the majority of the delegations have spoken of this. What conclusion is to be drawn?

Many of the situations of yesterday are improved today, but many still have to be resolved. If certain countries have reached a haven, we, the Haitian workers and people, are still on stormy seas of political troubles, coup d'état after coup d'état. We have to witness mass migrations towards foreign countries in the fruitless quest of better conditions – as in the case of Haitian agricultural workers subjected to appalling conditions in the Dominican Republic; chronic and ever-growing unemployment. We are the poorest country of the continent, a country marked by precarious employment, inhuman conditions of work, a vast, unskilled labour force in a basically agricultural country which imports its foodstuffs through a system of legalised smuggling while its inhabitants are below the poverty threshold. Although our country was called, in the original Indian language, the land of forests and mountains, today only 15 per cent of its area is covered by trees. The ecological catastrophe is rapidly approaching and the sufferings of our people continue, our people who were the first to teach democracy on the new continent.

The speech of the Minister for Social Affairs of my country, at this rostrum, pleaded the cause of the struggle against poverty; the Minister did refer to the situation of our country but he did not stress the distribution of national wealth, which is in the hands of 10 per cent of the population which possesses 75 per cent of the gross national product. Nor did he point out that the poverty of our country is relative and not absolute. Despite all the crises that our country is going through, it does possess unequalled riches: its cultural identity, its natural resources, its potential and valiant human resources, both inside and outside the country, its historical and touristic sites are there to bear witness. The Minister did not say that our nation State lacks political determination to guide us along the path of integrated, community development. He was reluctant to state that it is the traditional economic barons of the country who decide everything arbitrarily.

It is they who decide whether to produce or to import, whether to maintain or increase the prices of basic-necessity commodities, whether to dismiss unionised workers or to close down enterprises and reopen them under other names, whether to compensate redundant workers or to "block" their appeal to the courts even though a decision may already have been reached.

In Haiti political authority is merely an instrument in the service of economic power. An illustration of this can be seen in the example – one of many – of three hundred unionised workers of a subcontracting firm, Jean-Edouard Baker S.A. JEBESA, who were fired because of a single claim in respect of an arbitrary rate increase. For three years they appealed to one court after another with the support of the CATH-CLAT to which their union belongs. They won their case at three legal levels. But since the owner is one of the big bosses of the country, and an influential member of the employers' association, ADI'H, no satisfaction has been granted to them and they have no further areas of redress. Our Minister did not speak of this.

By way of conclusion, I would like to stress that despite all the poverty in my country, which is a direct consequence of the policies of previous governments, there is clear determination on the part of the Government, together with the workers and the people, through their genuine representatives, to seek democratic solutions to our serious problems. Despite the deplorable situation, the workers continue their untiring struggle for the implementation and observance of international standards, their struggle to throw off the chains of oppression.

Mr. BAKER (Workers' delegate, United States) – Congratulations on your election as President of the Conference. The confidence that has been placed in your leadership has been fully justified by the manner in which you have conducted our business. Congratulations to the Vice-Presidents as well and to the Director-General, Michel Hansenne, and to his new Deputy, Heribert Maier. On this occasion I would also like to thank the former Director-General, Mr. Francis Blanchard, for his many years of excellent service to this Organisation and for his dedication to its principles and its mission.

The Director-General's Report, although offering no magic or easy remedies for the world's economic problems, succeeds in presenting a balanced analysis which stresses the vital need to find both social and economic solutions.

There are those who still think that the debt crisis is none of the ILO's business. It would, however, be irresponsible for the ILO, with its historic role in protecting the interests of workers and as the only international organisation in the United Nations family with a tripartite constituency, to ignore the social effects of debt and refuse to contribute to ideas and approaches which, unlike purely market and banking prescriptions, offer some possibility of success.

One of the most striking aspects of the debt burden is that there is often a clear distinction between those who incurred it and those who must pay for it. The rural and urban poor, the workers and small farmers do not have fat accounts in foreign banks built up when the money was still flowing, to fall back on. It is the least advantaged who have been hit hardest and it is for them that relief must be found. The High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment was a good beginning but a modest one. Much more remains to be done.

The meat-axe approach of severe austerity programmes and conditionality has created disorder and instability which threatens and undermines democracy, where it exists, and gives excuses to dictators to become even more brutal. We have to find a way to inscribe employment, the alleviation of poverty, and democracy on the bankers' ledger sheets and factor them into their econometric models. Bankers who require purely market solutions seem unwilling to live by the same rules. Others who make bad investments lose their money. The world cannot, of course, afford a collapse of the banking system, but short of that, banks must make sacrifices. As indicated in the Report, an unprecedented degree of international co-operation and tripartite involvement is indispensable if current difficulties and their underlying causes are to be addressed, and if we emerge from this crisis, firm steps must be taken to ensure that it never happens again.

Debt is not found only in developing countries. My own country is saddled with a heavy debt, both public and private. As in other countries, the public debt arose out of colossal mistakes in public policy. In our case, this adventure was supported by fairy tale economic theories and, as usual, it will undoubtedly be the poor and the working people who will be forced to settle when the bill comes due.

The private debt in the United States includes massive borrowing for corporate takeovers; a debt burden which is then transferred to the acquired company and often paid for by workers with their jobs and incomes. One of many recent takeover targets, RJR Nabisco, must finance a debt-service charge of 3 billion dollars per year and be dismembered to pay for its own takeover. In such situations, restructuring and adjustment are propelled by the financial imperatives of a market gone mad. Corporate decisions are distorted by takeovers and fear of takeovers and vast resources are wasted in short-term speculation and profit-taking which crowd out productive investment.

Growth, productive investment, employment creation, social protection, freedom of association and democracy are all linked. In showing that vital connection between economic and social progress, the Director-General's Report rejects the simple-minded sloganeering that has, far too often, characterised the debate in other institutions and unfortunately, on occasion, in the ILO itself. The message must be heard beyond this Conference hall and become a part of the overall strategy for development in both North and south.

This Conference is an occasion to celebrate progress in freedom of association and the beginnings of democracy in Poland. Such changes, if continued, open up for the first time in many years, the possibility of economic improvements. The struggle of Solidarnosc is an inspiration for us all; it is the story of a movement which refused to die. The determination of Polish workers to have and keep a free trade union has been the driving force behind progress and the liberation of the human spirit. Solidarnosc has restored in Poland a positive meaning to the term "trade union". "Trade union" no longer means an organisation to oppress and control workers, but an instrument, belonging to them, to fight for their interests on and off the job and for social justice and democracy. Poland must not become yesterday's headlines; the world must stand ready to help overcome the economic crisis in that still-troubled country, encourage the process of democratisation and, above all, support Solidarnosc, on which the future and hopes of the Polish people depend.

The developments in Poland also highlight the importance of the ILO's system of supervision. It has been a difficult fight to defend the supervisory machinery and maintain the standards and principles of the ILO against the intense attacks made on them during the past few years. The report of the Commission of Inquiry, a fair and well-reasoned document, provoked a particularly hysterical response. It is useful to remember that period, not to relive history or to rub salt in old wounds, but to remain ourselves of the absolute need to support the machinery, assure its credibility and fairness and preserve it from attacks and contempt from any quarter.

In stark contrast to the hopeful developments in Poland, we have witnessed the shocking massacre of workers and students by the authorities in the People's Republic of China. These events and subsequent arrests, death sentences, executions and terror reveal the moral bankruptcy of a regime which can find its only legitimacy in military power and brute force. There are reports that the families of those who have been tried and murdered by the State are being required to pay for the bullets; a practice also followed by executioners in Nazi Germany. The dead cannot be brought back to life, but other lives must be spared. Those arrested should be immediately released and a dialogue should begin with the people.

China has received US$33 billion in credits and private foreign investments in the past ten years, including about $10 billion in 1988 alone. This demonstrates the foolishness of the notion that democracy can be achieved through capitalism and serves as a useful reminder that the two should not be confused. What have we heard from major business leaders with investments in China about these tragic events; the normal human reaction of outrage and disgust? No, instead, we have learned of concerns about the need for the restoration of order and a good business climate. We have yet to hear a single reference to the ILO Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy. If we cannot expect conduct flowing from compassion and decency, they should, at least, heed the wise words to this Conference last week from Mr. Oechslin, speaking in his capacity as Employers' delegate of France. He said "Men and women try to excel for the sake of honours, profit, sacrifice or friendship, but never, in the long term, through fear".

The ILO was born 70 years ago out of a profound yearning for peace following a long and terrible world war. The principles of the ILO are every bit as compelling and just as relevant to the search for peace as they were in 1919. Real peace among nations will only come when governments make peace with their own citizens. In keeping with its traditions, principles and structure, the ILO must fully carry out its mission and play an ever larger role in the world in the defence and promotion of freedom, justice, and social and economic progress.

Original - Spanish: Mr. GROBA (Workers' delegate, Uruguay) - We would like to join the speaker who preceded us in congratulating the President and the other officers of the Conference on their election.

We represent the PIT-CNT of Uruguay, the only workers' federation existing in the country, due to the wishes of its workers who are motivated by a profound feeling and conviction of unity.

Once again, we have come to this Conference to convey our complete solidarity with all of the workers of the world, a solidarity which came to our aid when we were suffering recently under the yoke of a repressive dictatorship, and which we are ready to offer to all our brothers.

We should also like to express our gratitude to the ILO itself which is celebrating its 70th anniversary. Since its creation, in the framework of the Treaty of Versailles, up to the present day, it has carried out extremely positive work aimed mainly at improving working conditions. Our gratitude also is addressed to Mr. Francis Blanchard and thus we would like to participate in the homage that this session of the Conference has addressed to him for his invaluable contributions to the International Labour Organisation.

This 70th anniversary coincides with the year before the 100th anniversary of 1 May, Labour Day; all humanity will recognise the importance of this anniversary for the workers' struggle for social justice and world peace.

The Report before us tackles an extremely complex subject. A subject on which specialists throughout the world have often taken up very differing positions. As the Report says, on the one hand, "1988 is viewed as the year in which the world economy turned around" and on the other that for Africa and Latin America this has "been a lost decade". The deterioration of their economies was such that one cannot reasonably expect that simple worldwide economic growth will be sufficient to ensure the economic recovery of the region. It is important to remember that for six consecutive years the member countries of the OECD have maintained a sustained rate of growth. It will thus be necessary to develop an appropriate strategy, which is what the Report has primarily concentrated upon.

We should also like to mention various concepts in the Report, particularly relating to the fact that investment has decreased in Africa and Latin American and that, "it was precisely these segments of the population that were less well equipped to bear the cost, however, that were most severely affected." One of the most serious items in this Report is the fact that, "In Latin America (...) the debt service ratio exceeds 40 per cent of exports and this region has become a net capital exporter".

So far as the question of external debt of many developing countries is concerned, this question is still a current one. The trade union movement has played a decisive role in coping with this illegitimate debt, and in trying to unify and co-ordinate the actions and meetings that have taken place in the past decade, in particular those in Cuernavaca, Havana, Lima, Buenos Aires and the Conference of Campiñas, where we set up the Co-ordinating Committee against the Payment of Foreign Debt.

Latin America continues to make interest payments on its foreign debt, of an amount which is higher than the inflow of capital to the region. Thus, we are continuing to finance the misery and hunger of our peoples, and the modernisation process of the rich countries. This transfer, as well as the enormous sacrifice imposed on the peoples of our continent, has not even eased the problem. On the contrary, it has made it even worse.

During this period, the external debt of Latin America and the Caribbean has increased by US$71 billion, going from $331 billion in 1982 to $401.4 billion in 1988. For the International Monetary Fund, however, the more we pay the more we owe. The repercussions of the problem of foreign debt in our countries are innumerable. Among the economic repercussions are the drop in salaries, the recession, the lack of investment, inflation, and other consequences which prove that, at the present time, the foreign debt is the principal obstacle to economic development. But the most urgent repercussion is the dreadful deterioration in the living conditions of our peoples. No effort, however great, could alleviate the dramatic situation which is imposed upon us by the foreign debt, unless this mechanism of domination is totally eliminated and we begin to set up a new international economic order.

The Report deals with the question of the deterioration of terms of trade, and of protectionism, by way of subsidies, of the goods produced by the developed countries.

It must be noted that this problem does not only affect the two continents mentioned above, but that the global situation as a whole is extremely serious. According to the Report, "poverty has increased. The number of people living in absolute poverty has risen from about 820 million in 1980 to an estimated 950 million in the late 1980s". In a view that we share, the Report states that, "the emphasis in the 1980s on macro-economic problems of adjustment, external balance and fiscal deficits has distracted attention from the social dimensions of development". Further on it is stated that it is important to recognise "the increased social debt towards the poor and the workers who have already contributed more than their share to finance the cost of adjustment".

In certain aspects the critical focus of the Report seems to point directly to the Government of Uruguay. For example, when it says that as a result of the crisis, "There has (...) been action to shut down or privatise public enterprises and to restrict future state involvement in economic activity". In answer to this policy, the Report states that, "In countries with very low levels of development or with rigid production structures, the State must play an important role in providing essential investments in infrastructure and social overhead capital to ease constraints on increased production ... For these reasons it is important to avoid a rigid approach to the question of the role of the State in promoting structural adjustment and development. In many cases it is true that the State has been part of the problem, but it is equally true that it has to be part of the solution".

In the more precise framework of a subject that is extremely topical for the workers of our country, the Report states that "freedom of association and trade union rights are basic human rights which should remain inviolable". We are adamant that no form of the deterioration caused by the economic crisis will affect basic trade union rights. We denounce once again and with great insistence, the fact that employers are putting increasing pressure on the trade union movement, and they are encouraged in this by the tolerance of the Government. The persecution against, and the dismissals of, union militants is becoming increasingly widespread, and all the trade union organisations have to combat it is their own strength. Indeed, the Ministry of Labour and Social Security limits itself, for the most part, to only carrying out its legal functions of control and conciliation without, however, taking effective measures to bring about respect of the law and trade unions rights.

Very serious, concrete denunciations have been addressed to the Ministry of Labour and Social Security in writing and there has been no sign that any effective measures have been taken. In addition to these unsolved problems there is the added fact that enterprises, when they see that they can act with impunity, ignore workers' rights and thus act arbitrarily. We should mention in this respect that the employers of the clothing industry in Uruguay have dismissed more than 500 militants and trade union leaders from their factories, but have not, as yet, been able to break down the trade union organisation in that sector, which has the total support of the PIT-CNT.

It is clear that in this case the Ministry of Labour and Social Security has not been sufficiently determined vis-à-vis the employers to secure the latter's recognition of the trade union organisation and respect for democracy, as in a democratic civilised country. This example could also be extended to other situations of violation of ratified ILO Conventions but which in Uruguay are violated.

Collective bargaining is impeded by the involvement of the executive, invoking Decree No. 14791 which empowers it to fix wages directly as well as by an irregular system of wage boards.

This year's report by the Committee of Experts points to this violation by the Government of Uruguay in preventing collective agreements from being drawn up in State industrial and commercial enterprises.

Nor does the Government respect its international commitments as regards consultation of the workers' federation for fixing minimum wages. This is an open contradiction of the provisions of the Minimum Wage-Fixing Convention, 1970 (No. 131). Likewise it fails to respect its commitments when it fixes rural workers' wages unilaterally as well as when – in breach of Act No. 13,426 – it fails to set up wage boards for workers in the wine-growing, farming and bee-keeping sectors. The Committee of Experts has also consulted the Government of Uruguay on the amounts of wages for domestic workers, which were below the minimum mentioned by the workers' federation.

So it is vital that the workers unite their efforts in these periods of crisis in order to maintain intact what has been already achieved, demanding from the Government vigorous adherence to the law of the land and to the international standards that have been ratified.

It is not sufficient to ratify dozens of Conventions; it is vital that the maximum effort be made to put them into practice, and the fact is that they are not being complied with in Uruguay.

We have reconquered democracy and freedom for all Uruguayans, and we must now all act responsibly so as to avoid any artificial conflicts generated by the Government and employers and for this to happen, implementation and observance of commitments are required, both as regards the ILO, and as regards the bipartite agreements reached between employers' and workers' organisations. This situation is responsible for the conflict in Uruguay. We have been obliged to declare a general 24-hour strike, to defend our rights and our salaries, for Tuesday 27 June, after exhausting all the possible methods of dialogue in the country in an attempt to avert it.

We wish to work in peace and we wish our trade union organisations to be respected. Practices violating trade union freedom and wage bargaining in all areas of work in our country were presented in detail in the complaint lodged by the Workers' delegation to the 73rd session of the International Labour Conference; these complaints are intensified today, and we reiterate them before this world parliament of labour – violations of standards and Conventions by the Government and employers of Uruguay.

Finally, we would like to express our solidarity with the struggle of the workers of Paraguay and Haiti in the face of oppression, and with the people of Chile, claiming freedom for brother Manuel Bustos and Arturo Martínez and for all trade union and political prisoners. Our solidarity goes also to the workers and people of El Salvador who are striving for a better destiny for their country, and to the workers of South Africa suffering under the shameful regime of apartheid. We demand the implementation of resolution 435 on the independence of Namibia. Our solidarity goes as well to the workers of Colombia who are defending their rights and fighting for their lives. We condemn the murder of trade union leaders and demand that the Government put a stop to this situation.

Our solidarity and our total support go to our Argentine brothers of the CGT and to the Argentine people defending the Malvinas, which belong to Argentina and to the Latin American continent. We deplore the colonialist attitude of the British Government.

We also demand that the United States respect the right of the people of Panama to self-determination, just as we express our support for the people of Nicaragua and from this rostrum call on the United States once again to cease supplying resources to the counter-revolutionaries.

Original – Spanish: The PRESIDENT (Mr. DEL PINO) – I give the floor to Mr. Zhang, Government adviser, China, to exercise his right of reply to the statement made by Mr. Baker, Workers' delegate, United States.

The Chair would like to remind Mr. Zhang that the right of reply is limited to the point referred to in the objection and therefore should be brief.

Original – Chinese: Mr. ZHANG (Government adviser, China) – A moment ago, the United States Workers' delegate made a completely unjustified attack on China, over which the Chinese delegation expresses regret.

The Chinese Government was compelled to take measures, in accordance with the law, to suppress the counter-revolutionary riot in order to safeguard the fundamental interests of the State and the people. This was a purely internal affair of a sovereign State. We hope the United States Workers' delegate will in future refrain from making short-sighted comments detrimental to the interests of the Chinese and the American peoples.

(The Conference adjourned at 5.15 p.m.)

Credentials

Third Report of the Credentials Committee

Communication concerning the delegation of Afghanistan

1. The Credentials Committee received a communication from the United States' delegation stating that, while it did not object to the credentials of the delegation of Afghanistan, the United States did not accept the regime in Kabul as the legitimate representative of the Afghan people. The Committee simply took note of this communication which called for no action on its part.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Employers' delegation of Nicaragua

2. The Committee examined an objection to the nomination of the Nicaraguan Employers' delegate and one of his technical advisers, lodged by the Chairman and the four Vice-Chairmen of the Employers' Group at the Conference.

3. The objectors claimed that Mr. Aragón, Employers' delegate of Nicaragua, and Mr. Gonzales Pastora, his technical adviser, both from the "Unión Nacional de Agricultores y Ganaderos" (UNAG) had been nominated without the agreement of the "Consejo Superior de la Empresa Privada" (COSEP), which was the most representative Employers' organisation in Nicaragua, both in relation to the number of members and to the number of workers employed by them. UNAG covered only one part of the sector where the "Unión de Productores Agropecuarios de Nicaragua" (UPANIC), a member of COSEP, was more representative. UNAG was in fact an organisation of mostly small farmers without hired manpower.

4. According to the objectors, the Government had called a meeting on 19 May 1989 in order to nominate the Employers' representatives at the Conference at which were present, as well as COSEP and UNAG, the "Consejo Nacional de la Mediana y Pequeña Industria", the Ministry of Construction and Transport, the Ministry of Economy, Industry and Commerce and the "Asociación de Empresarios Nicaragüenses". At this meeting, the representative of UNAG suggested that the post of titular Employers' delegate should be occupied alternately by UNAG and COSEP. COSEP did not accept this suggestion given the large difference in representativity of the two organisations.

5. In a written reply to the Committee, Mr. Meza Soza, Government delegate of Nicaragua, stated that at the meeting of 19 May referred to above, at which the following Employers' organisations were present: "Consejo Superior de la Empresa Privada" (COSEP), "Unión Nacional de Agricultores y Ganaderos" (UNAG), "Asociación de Empresarios Nicaragüenses" (AENIC), "Consejo Nacional de la Pequeña y Mediana Industria" (CONAPI), "Corporación Industrial del Pueblo" (COIP), "Corporación Nacional de Empresas Constructoras y del Transporte", the Government has done its best to see agreement reached on the composition of the delegation. In the face of the rejection by COSEP of a rotation proposal, which all the other organisation present could accept, the Government could only nominate as titular delegate the candidate supported by the majority of the organisations which, taken together, were far more representative than COSEP. Although COSEP had been recognised in the past as the most representative Employers' organisation, it should not be claimed that decisions of the Committee were immutable since the element of "representativity" was subject to change. The reply also stated that the Committee appeared reluctant to accept as valid information supplied by the Government; this was contrary to its customary practice under which such information was accepted except in cases where there was substantial evidence to the contrary.

6. The reply concluded by affirming that the Government had included representatives of COSEP among the technical advisers and remained concerned to find a practical solution to the problem; to this end it would welcome any suggestions or good offices which the Credentials Committee might be able to offer.

7. As in the past, the Committee considered that, while the representativity of organisation might change, it had not been proven that COSEP had lost its representative character.

8. With respect to the Government's claim that the Committee appeared reluctant to accept as valid information supplied by it, the Committee stated that, when comparing the representativity of COSEP and UNAG, its opinion was based primarily on the nature of these organisations which did not imply rejection of statistical data supplied by the Government; such data obviously had a rather different character in the case of UNAG, which was an organisation comprising mainly individual farmers who only occasionally needed hired manpower and whose character as "employer" was debatable. None of the foregoing was, of course, meant to cast any doubt on the importance of UNAG with respect to agricultural production in the country.

9. The Committee took note of the desire expressed by the Government to find a practical solution to this problem and of the Government's openness to any assistance or good offices which the Credentials Committee might be able to offer. In this respect, the Committee indicated that its mandate did not extend thus far and recalled that, at the last session of the Conference, the Committee had suggested that, given its experience, the Office might lend assistance to the interested parties; but this had not happened. The Committee thus requested the Governing Body to take the appropriate steps so that a mission of good offices could be embarked upon.

10. In conclusion, the Committee again expressed its concern at the situation of the Employers' organisations in Nicaragua and concluded that, in the absence of agreement, the Government should have nominated the titular Employers' delegate in agreement with COSEP, which undoubtedly was the most representative Employers' organisation. The Committee decided nevertheless not to propose invalidation of the credentials of the Nicaraguan Employers' delegate and expressed the hope that, in future, the Government would nominate the Employers' delegation to the Conference in full conformity with the provisions of article 3, paragraph 5, of the Constitution.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Moroccan Workers' delegation

11. The Committee examined an objection to the nomination of the Moroccan Workers' delegation from the "Union générale des Travailleurs du Maroc" (UGTM) and the "Confédération Démocratique du Travail" (CDT) and supported by the World Confederation of Labour.

12. The objecting organisations claimed that the Government continued not to consult the most representative workers' organisations, the CDT and UGTM, in nominating the Workers' delegation to the International Labour Conference and did not abide by the rotation rule applied by countries with union pluralism. Faced with such an attitude, the organisation had suspended their participation in the African Regional Conference at Harare (December 1988) and at the 17th Conference of the Arab Labour Organisation (March 1989).

13. At the request of the Committee, the objecting organisations furnished statistics on union voting for the election of worker representatives in the Moroccan Parliament and on the representativity of the CDT in various sectors.

14. In a written reply to the Committee, accompanied by statistical data on union elections, Mr. El Ghali Benhima, Ambassador and Government delegate of Morocco, listed the representative Workers' organisations in Morocco and stated that the most important, in terms of results in the election of union delegates which took place every six years, was the UMT. This was, moreover, the organisation which held the most seats in Parliament and the titular Workers' delegate of Morocco had always belonged to this organisation. In relation to the 76th session of the Conference, the Government had invited the UMT, the UGTM and CDT to a consultative meeting. The CDT did not reply. The representative of the UGTM requested institution of a rotation system for the post of titular Workers' delegate, to which the UMT objected, denying any representative character to the other two organisations. Faced with difficulty in reaching agreement, the Government, following past practice, proposed to the UGTM and CDT that they nominate technical advisers to the Conference, as could be seen in the accompanying documentation.

15. In view of the information provided both by the objecting organisations and the Government, the Committee noted that although the objecting organisations might be more important in some sectors, the general representativity of the organisation to which the Workers' delegate of Morocco belonged could not be questioned. The Committee recalled that a rotation system in the nomination of the Workers' delegate could only be established by agreement with the organisations concerned and could not be imposed by the Government. In these circumstances the Committee decided not to act upon the objection. At the same time, the Committee appealed to the organisations concerned that in future the nomination of the Moroccan Workers' delegation be made in agreement with all of the most representative organisations in the country.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Nicaragua

16. The Committee examined an objection to the Workers' delegation of Nicaragua by the "Confederación de Unificación Sindical" (CUS), the "Central de Trabajadores de Nicaragua autónoma" (CTN-a), the "Confederación General del Trabajo independiente" (CGT-i), and the "Central de Acción y Unidad Sindical" (CAUS), members of the "Congreso Permanente de los Trabajadores" (CPT).

17. The objecting organisations alleged that the Government had not complied with the terms of article 3, paragraph 5, of the Constitution, by not having consulted the CPT in nominating the Workers' representatives. The official unions in Nicaragua did not defend nor represent the true interests of Nicaraguan Workers.

18. In a written reply to the Committee, Mr. Meza Soza, Government delegate of Nicaragua, affirmed that the nomination process for the Workers' delegation had taken place in strict compliance with the terms of article 3, paragraph 5, of the ILO Constitution.

19. The reply listed the six most representative Workers' organisations which had been consulted and which had nominated Workers' representatives to the Conference, and added that these organisations represented 90 per cent of the country's unionised labour. The membership of the organisations belonging to the so-called "Congreso Permanente de los Trabajadores" did not exceed 12,000 persons, as a result of which their representativity did not fall within the terms of article 3, paragraph 5, of the Constitution. Nevertheless, if the number of their affiliates and importance of these organisations were such as to allow them in future to be considered as representative, the Government of Nicaragua would involve them in appropriate consultations.

20. The Committee indicated that the objection of the CPT contained no data on the number of affiliates or activity of the four organisations which would allow it to put in question the representativity of the organisations which had nominated the Nicaraguan Workers' delegate and advisers and decided not to act upon the objection. At the same time, the Committee took note with interest of the Government's undertaking to the effect that the organisations concerned would be consulted when and if the number of their affiliates and their individual strength permitted them to be considered as representative.

Communication from the Head of the Government delegation of Afghanistan

21. The Committee took note of a communication from Mr. A. Kawesh, head of the Government delegation of Afghanistan, indicating that, in relation to the reservations made by Pakistan recorded in paragraph 2 of the Second Report of the Credentials Committee (Provisional Record No. 16), the delegation of the Republic of Afghanistan wished to reaffirm the position of its Government as expressed at the most recent session of the United Nations General Assembly.

Communication (late) concerning the composition of the Workers' delegation of the Philippines

22. The Committee received a communication from the "Kilusang Mayo Uno" (KMU), concerning the composition of the Workers' delegation of the Philippines at the Conference.

23. The Committee considered that since the composition of the Workers' delegation of the Philippines was given in the list of delegation published on 7 June 1989 as a Supplement to the Provisional Record, the communication was irreceivable as being received outside the time-limit of 72 hours established by article 26, paragraph 4(a), of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

24. The Credentials Committee submits the present report to the Conference in order that the Conference may take note of it.

Provisional Record

Seventy-sixth Session, Geneva, 1989

Fourth item on the agenda: Partial revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107)

Report of the Committee on Convention No. 107

Introduction

1. The Committee on Convention No. 107 was set up by the International Labour Conference at its fourth sitting on 8 June 1989. It was originally composed of 74 members (39 Government members, 9 Employers' members and 26 Workers' members). To achieve equality of voting strength, each Government member was allotted 6 votes, each Employers' member 26 votes and each Workers' member 9 votes. The composition of the Committee was subsequently modified six times¹ during the session and the number of votes attributed to each member was adjusted accordingly.

2. The Committee elected the following officers:
Chairman: Mr. España Smith (Government member, Bolivia);

Vice-Chairmen: Mr. de Regil (Employers' member, Mexico) and Mr. Svenningsen (Workers' member, Denmark);

Reporter: Mr. Helms (Government member, Denmark – Greenland Home Rule Government).

3. At its fourth sitting, the Committee appointed a Drafting Committee composed of the following members: Mr. D'Alotto (Government member, Argentina); Mr. de Regil (Employers' member, Mexico); Mr. Adam (Workers' member, Canada) and the Reporter of the Committee.

4. The Committee had before it two reports: Reports IV(1) and IV(2A) and (2B), prepared by the International Labour Office on the fourth item on the agenda of the Conference, "Partial Revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107)", to be discussed at the Conference for the second time. The text of the proposed Convention concerning indigenous and tribal peoples in independent countries, submitted by the Office was contained in Report IV(2B).

5. The Committee held 13 settings.

6. The representative of the Secretary-General noted that the task of the Committee was to finalise a draft Convention on the right of indigenous and tribal peoples and on the responsibilities of States towards them. The proposed Convention contained in Report IV(2B) took into account the Committee's discussion in 1988 as well as comments received from governments, employers and workers in member States. In many cases organisations of indigenous and tribal peoples had also been consulted and their positions recorded. In recalling the integrationist attitudes of the 1950s when Convention No. 107 on indigenous and tribal populations was adopted, the speaker referred to the radical change in attitudes which had taken place in the intervening years. This change had resulted in the current policies of respect for the identities and cultures of these peoples, with any integration being solely a matter of choice. He noted that there were three clear factors which the Committee had to take into account in its deliberations. These were, first, the fact that these peoples now had a voice through their own organisations. Second, a number of governments had very recently considered the question of the place within national societies of indigenous and tribal peoples. Finally, he recalled that the United Nations had set up a Working Group on Indigenous Populations to draft a declaration of rights for these peoples. The speaker noted that the process of revision of the 1957 Convention was set in motion by the Governing Body in response to repeated calls by a number of organisations, in particular the United Nations. He stated, however, that the value of the old Convention should not be underestimated and that the protective provisions contained therein remained completely valid. In this regard, the Governing Body of the International Labour Office had decided upon a partial revision. Recalling the first discussion in 1988, he reminded the Committee that a large measure of agreement has been reached on a number of points. Firstly, integrationism was no longer an acceptable doctrine, although people wishing to integrate should be able to do so. Secondly, indigenous and tribal peoples must be genuinely associated with any decisions taken which affect them. Turning to items on which no agreement had been reached, the representative of the Secretary-General cited the use of the term "peoples" or "populations". He noted that despite the difference of opinion, both sides agreed that political separatism – which could be implied by the use of "peoples" – should not in any way be promoted by the Convention. Moreover, both sides had agreed

¹ The modifications were as follows:

- (a) 10 June: 70 members (39 Government members with 66 votes each; 9 Employers' members with 286 votes each; and 22 Workers' members with 117 votes each);
- (b) 13 June: 68 members (39 Government members with 60 votes each; 9 Employers' members with 260 votes each; and 20 Workers' members with 117 votes each);
- (c) 15 June: 66 members (39 Government members with 6 votes each; 9 Employers' members with 26 votes each; and 18 Workers' members with 13 votes each);
- (d) 16 June: 63 members (39 Government members with 15 votes each; 9 Employers' members with 65 votes each; and 15 Workers' members with 39 votes each);
- (e) 21 June: 62 members (39 Government members with 42 votes each; 9 Employers' members with 182 votes each; and 14 Workers' members with 117 votes each);
- (f) 24 June: 56 members (39 Government members with 14 votes each; 3 Employers' members with 182 votes each; and 14 Workers' members with 39 votes each).

that the communities concerned should retain their identities and should not be reduced to ciphers – which was the concern surrounding the use of “populations”. He referred the Committee to a formula which had been suggested in Article 1, paragraph 3, of the proposed text as a means to assist in reaching an agreement. The second question which remained unresolved was that of land rights, which was covered in Articles 13 to 19 of the proposed text. The outstanding items included the use of the terms “lands” and “territories”; the kinds of rights to be covered, such as ownership, possession and use; and the question of natural resources. He noted, however, that it was agreed that these provisions were of special importance to the survival of indigenous and tribal peoples. The representative of the Secretary-General then drew the Committee’s attention to the provisions in the Standing Orders of the Conference concerning the participation of international non-governmental organisations. He recalled that in 1988 the Committee had noted “... the invaluable contribution made by the international non-governmental organisations representing indigenous and tribal peoples”; and had made it clear that it wished this collaboration to continue. The Committee had also decided in 1988 to enable national non-governmental organisations to participate to a rather special extent. He felt that the Committee would wish to consider this matter at the earliest opportunity. In concluding, the representative of the Secretary-General noted that the Committee had a unique opportunity to contribute to the welfare and cultural identity of some 300 million indigenous and tribal peoples of widely differing races, living in just about every part of the world. The resulting Convention would be immediately relevant to the current issues facing them and would have far-reaching effects on their lives in the future.
